The following newly appointed Senators were introduced and took their seats:—

Hon. DAVID MILLS.
Hon. GEORGE ALBERTUS COX.
Hon. GEORGE GERALD KING.

THE SPEECH FROM THE THRONE.

His Excellency the Right Honourable Sir John Campbell Hamilton-Gordon, Earl of Aberdeen; Viscount Formartine, Baron Haddo, Methlic, Tarves and Kellie, in the Peerage of Scotland; Viscount Gordon of Aberdeen, County of Aberdeen, in the Peerage of the United Kingdom; Baron of Nova Scotia; Knight Grand Cross of Our Most Distinguished Order of Saint Michael and Saint George, &c., &c., Governor General of Canada, being seated on the Throne.

The Honourable the Speaker commanded the Gentleman Usher of the Black Rod to proceed to the House of Commons and acquaint that House,—"It is His Excellency's pleasure they attend him immediately in this House."

Who being come with their Speaker,

His Excellency the Governor General was then pleased to open the Session by a gracious speech to both Houses.

Honourable Gentlemen of the Senate:

Gentlemen of the House of Commons:

In welcoming you on your attendance at the second session of the present parliament, I desire to express the gratification I feel at the evidences which prevail throughout the Dominion, of the loyalty and affection entertained by the Canadian people for Her Majesty the Queen and of the desire to join with their fellow-subjects in all parts of the Empire in celebrating the Diamond Jubilee in a manner worthy the joyous event. And I am pleased to be able also to announce that in accordance with an invitation from the Imperial government, arrangements are being made for an effective representation of the Dominion in connection with the commemoration of this historic occasion at the Capital of the Empire.

Immediately after the last session the government of Manitoba was invited to hold a conference with my ministers on the subject of the grievances arising out of the Act of that province relating to education passed in the year 1890. In response to that invitation, three members of the Manitoba government came to Ottawa, and, after many and protracted discussions, a settlement was reached between the two Governments, which was the best arrangement obtainable under the existing conditions of this disturbing question. I confidently hope that this settlement will put an end to the agitation which has marred the harmony and impeded the development of our country, and will prove the beginning of a new era to be characterized by generous treatment of one another, mutual concessions and reciprocal good-will.

A measure will be submitted to you for the revision of the tariff, which it is believed will provide the necessary revenue, and, while having due regard to industrial interests, will make our fiscal system more satisfactory to the masses of the people.

You will be asked to give your support to a bill abolishing the present expensive and unsatisfactory Franchise Act and adopting, for the election of members of the House of Commons, the franchises of the several provinces.

My government has determined that the advantages to accrue, both to our western producers and the business interests of the whole Dominion, from the completion of the works for the enlargement of the St. Lawrence canals, should no longer be deferred, and has, subject to the approval of parliament, taken the initial steps for a vigorous prosecution of those works and for the perfecting of the canal system by the close of the year 1898.

I have much satisfaction in informing you that arrangements have been concluded which, if you approve, will enable the Intercolonial Railway to reach Montreal, and thus share in the large traffic centering in that city. The many advantages which will flow from this extension of that railway are apparent, and I have no doubt you will gladly approve of the proposal.

Appreciating the difficulties encountered by our farmers in placing their perishable food products on the English markets in good condition, my government has arranged a complete system of cold storage accommodation at creameries, on railways, at ports and on steamers, by which these products can be preserved at the desired temperature during the whole journey from the point of production to Great Britain. The contracts made for this purpose will be laid before you.

It is desirable that the mind of the people of Canada should be clearly ascertained on the subject of prohibition, and a measure enabling the electors to vote upon the question will be submitted for your approval.

The Behring Sea Claims Convention constituted during the past year to adjust the damages payable to the owners of the British sealing vessels, seized by the cruisers of the United States on the high seas, has completed taking the evidence submitted to it by the respective governments of Her Majesty and the United States, and has adjourned for a time to hear the arguments thereon on behalf of both Governments. I indulge the hope that a final and satisfactory adjudication of these long delayed claims will now speedily be reached.

The calamity which has befalled our fellow-subjects in India has evoked a widespread sympathy in this country. The generous manner in which the appeal for practical tokens of this feeling has been responded to, has elicited warm assurances of grateful acknowledgment from the government of India which have also been specially and heartily endorsed by the Imperial authorities.

Gentlemen of the House of Commons:

The accounts of the past year will be laid before you.

The estimates of the coming year will be presented at an early day. They have been framed with every regard for economy consistent with the efficiency of the public service. I regret that the receipts from ordinary sources continue to be inadequate to meet the charges against the Consolidated Revenue. The proposed revision of the tariff and the application of strict economy in the administration of the Government will, I trust, restore the equilibrium between income and expenditure.

Honourable Gentlemen of the Senate:

Gentlemen of the House of Commons:

Among the bills which have been prepared and will be submitted for your approval, are bills amending the Superannuaction Act and the Civil Service Act.

These and other measures, I commend to your earnest consideration and express the hope that your deliberations under the Divine guidance will tend to increase the happiness and prosperity of every class in the Dominion.

His Excellency the Governor General was pleased to retire, and the House of Commons withdrew.

BILL INTRODUCED.

Bill "An Act Relating to Railways"—(Mr. Scott.)

THE ADDRESS.

MOTION.

The SPEAKER reported His Excellency's Speech from the Throne, and the same was then read by the Clerk.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT moved:—

That the Senate do take into consideration the Speech of His Excellency the Governor General, on Monday next.

The motion was agreed to.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL asked whether the terms of the so-called settlement of the school question would be laid before the Senate prior to the discussion on the Address. It would, he said, be difficult to deal with the important question without knowing the exact terms.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT replied that the terms of the settlement would be laid before the House prior to the discussion of the Address, but he might say now that there was no correspondence on the subject.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWDLL—Neither before nor after?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—No.

The Senate then adjourned.

THE SENATE.

Ottawa, Monday, 29th March, 1897.

THE SPEAKER took the Chair at Eight O'clock.

Prayers and routine proceedings.

NEW SENATOR.

Hon. JOHN LOVITT was introduced and took his seat.

THE ADDRESS.

MOTION.

Hon. Mr. COX moved,—

That the following Address be presented to His Excellency the Governor General, to offer the humble thanks of this House to His Excellency for the gracious Speech which he has been pleased to make to both Houses of Parliament, namely :—

TO HIS EXCELLENCY the Right Honourable Sir JOHN CAMPBELL HAMILTON-GORDON, Earl of Aberdeen ; Viscount Formartine, Baron Haddo, Methlic, Tarves and Kellie, in the Peerage of Scotland ; Viscount Gordon of Aberdeen, County of Aberdeen, in the Peerage of the United Kingdom ; Baronet of Nova Scotia ; Knight Grand Cross of the Most Distinguished Order of Saint Michael and Saint George, etc., etc., Governor General of Canada.

MAY IT PLEASE YOUR EXCELLENCY :—

We, Her Majesty's most dutiful and loyal subjects, the Senate of Canada in Parliament assembled, beg leave to offer our humble thanks to Your Excellency for the gracious Speech which Your Excellency has addressed to both Houses of Parliament.

He said :—An unwillingness to shrink from the discharge of any duty that may be entrusted to me by the honoured leader of this House must be my apology for presuming to occupy your time thus early in my parliamentary experience.

I have accepted the task of moving the address with the greatest diffidence. I feel that I must ask for the indulgence of the Senate when I venture to make my first remarks before them upon subjects of such great importance as those contained in the Speech from the Throne.

I am pleased to know that the first topic to be referred to is one on which there can be no two opinions in this chamber, and no two opinions in this country. The celebration of the Jubilee year of Her Majesty's reign is a common ground upon which all parties, all creeds, all races and all classes in Canada can unite with loyal pride.

In touching upon the events of the long and glorious reign of Queen Victoria it is scarcely possible for an inexperienced speaker to express his ideas in language that will not seem to be exaggerated. Within the sixty years of that reign, the British Empire has shared with the rest of the civilized world a more marvellous advance in the arts of peace than can be claimed for any similar period in the history of the human race. At the same time the people of Great Britain have distanced all other nations in their vast and almost fabulous increase in material wealth, and in the all pervading influence which their enterprise has given them in every part of the globe.

In 1837 it may have been a question as to what language and what race would lead the civilized world, but in 1897 no one can dispute that the English language and the Anglo-Saxon race must hold that proud position.

The political progress of the empire during the present reign cannot be better illustrated than by referring to Canadian history. In 1837 our system of government, while far in advance of the old Crown colony plan, was not based upon the same lines of freedom as prevailed in England itself. It cannot be said that peace and harmony prevailed in either Upper or Lower Canada at that time. How different it is to-day ; England with wise generosity has given to Canada the fullest rights of self government, and the result is that in no other part of the empire can be found a more loyal and contented population.

While the Queen owes much to the distinguished line of statesmen who have been her advisers from Lord Melbourne to Lord Salisbury, still her own sound judgment, her patriotic loyalty to the constitution, and her womanly virtues, have combined to make her reign the greatest in English history.

I will now turn for a moment to a question on which we cannot all see eye to eye ; I must express my great satisfaction at the settlement which the government has made as to the Manitoba schools. At one time the agitation on this subject was assuming dangerous proportions, and was a menace to the peace and good feeling which should prevail among citizens of all creeds in the Dominion. If the settlement with Manitoba does not satisfy extreme views on either side of the question it may perhaps be all the more reasonable on that account, and I believe it does satisfy the vast majority of the Canadian people who desire no more agitation of that dangerous character.

There has for many years been extreme dissatisfaction with the operation of the Dominion Franchise Act, and it seems fair and reasonable to return again to the provincial franchises as we had them up to 1885.

It is to be hoped that the vote which will be recorded upon the question of prohibition and the manufacture and sale of spirituous liquors will be sufficiently decisive to leave no doubt as to the wishes of the people. It cannot be denied that the immediate loss to revenue from the adoption of prohibition would involve at least a temporary increase in taxation, direct or indirect, and that point will no doubt be discussed in all its bearings, moral and financial, during the campaign.

The next paragraph in the Speech from the Throne to which I shall refer reads as follows :

> A measure will be submitted to you for the revision of the tariff, which it is believed will provide the necessary revenue, and, while having due regard to industrial interests, will make our fiscal system more satisfactory to the masses of the people.

The importance to this country of the legislation foreshadowed by this paragraph cannot be overestimated. It is a matter fraught with consequences too serious to be influenced by the campaign speeches made by either political party under circumstances quite different from those that now exist. It should, if possible, be taken out of the political arena altogether, and approached by both political parties with due regard to the circumstances as they exist in Canada to-day. By the construction of the Canadian Pacific Railway, the Intercolonial Railway and many other important and extensive public works a large national debt has been created, the interest upon that debt and the cost of administering the government have increased out of all proportion to the increase in population. Not only these charges, but also the subsidies to the provinces must be raised by customs and excise, for the time has not come when the people of Canada will submit to direct taxation.

Not only have we built up a great annual outlay. We have created industries upon the basis of protection, industries in which many millions of dollars of private capital has been invested, and upon the credit of which many millions more of working capital has been borrowed from our banking institutions. It is not necessary now to discuss the merits or demerits of the system under which these industries have been created, the fact remains that they do exist, that large investments have been made, large liabilities incurred and that legislation tending to embarrass important interests would be disastrous.

It has been the hope of the Liberal party to effect improved trade relations between this country and the United States. If the products of our manufacturers, our forests, our farms, our fisheries, and our mines had been admitted to the markets of that country upon fair terms our producers would have been glad to meet their competition upon the same basis, but judging from the tariff measure now under discussion at Washington it appears to be the settled determination of the American politicians to shut our products out of the markets of this continent, there can be no doubt that this action must tend to force Canada into cultivating closer relations with other countries who will admit our products upon an equitable basis, and to give some tangible recognition of our sense of the value and importance of the great free market of the empire. Our exports to Great Britain now exceed those to the United States by twenty-two millions, and, in fact, exceed our exports to the United States and all other countries together, and as we must find the chief market for our exports in the old land, so under a freer tariff we must increase our imports from England, and in thus improving return cargoes the tendency will be to reduce rates of transportation as well as to cheapen supplies to the masses of our people.

In this connection the plans of the government for putting our products on the British market in better condition by a system of cold storage, and by better transportation facilities is of great importance. Products from every corner of the world are seeking the great free market of the old land, and we can only improve our position in that market by improving the quality of our products, and in delivering shipments in as good or better condition than those of our competitors. Last year we sent $14,000,000 worth of cheese and $2,000,000 worth of butter to England and there is room for great increase in the butter export. In order that we may get our butter into this market in the best condition, the Minister of Agriculture is providing a complete chain of cold storage from the railway stations here in Canada through the shipping ports to the English market. Many creameries will be provided with cold storage chambers, the railways will provide refrigerator cars from the creameries to the large centres, where cold storage warehouses are found, and at shipping points arrangements have been made to provide cold storage until the products are put on the steamships. The minister has also arranged a weekly steamship service to the chief ports in England, and as a result we ought to have a great increase in the butter export and also to receive a better price for the Canadian article. In cheese we have now a splendid position in this market, and under the improved system of cold storage we ought to be able to hold our advantage if not to improve even upon the splendid position we have already achieved. The trade in poultry should also be improved, and it is evident that we must continue to send eggs in increasing quantities to the British market. It has been estimated, too, that the shipment of dressed beef will add from $10 to $15 to the value of every steer raised on the western prairies. The transportation charges for the carriage of steers alive average nearly $30 ; the carcases of the same steers can be shipped as dressed beef for $15 per head, and the shrinkage during the journey would not be more than five or seven pounds per carcass. It is believed that the cold storage service arranged for by the government on railways and steamships will be of great benefit to the whole cattle interest of Canada and particularly to the live stock interest of Manitoba and the west. In the development of these great natural industries must we look for the real growth and prosperity of the Canadian people, and if we are to be denied reasonable access to the markets of our own continent it is of enormous importance that the government should persevere in its well ordered plans for improving the quality of the products that we must send to England, and in making Canadian products of the very first quality, and therefore guaranteeing to the Canadian producer the best prices in the ultimate market.

The enlargement of the St. Lawrence canals, the extension of the Intercolonial Railway to Montreal, and other matters referred to in the Speech from the Throne, afford evidence of an intelligent, aggressive and vigorous policy upon the part of the government. And I desire to take this opportunity of extending my congratulations to this House, and to this country, upon the fact that we have, at this important epoch in the history of our country, gentlemen guiding the ship of state so well qualified and so well disposed to extend the commerce and to develop the resources of our fair Dominion.

Hon. Mr. KING. – In rising, as I now do for the first time, to address this hon. House and discharge the duty which devolves upon me, I think I may fairly claim the measure of indulgence which I believe has been accorded on similar occasions to gentlemen filling the position which I occupy at this moment. I am conscious that in speaking to the Senate of Canada, I am addressing a body of men, the majority of whom conscientiously and honestly differ from me in the opinions which I hold on many important questions affecting the welfare of this country, and, I have no doubt, in the remarks which I may choose to offer before I resume my seat, that there will be found in this chamber some who consider it is their right and the proper thing for them to dissent to what I have to say ; but from the manner in which the remarks of the hon. member who preceded me were received there are some questions upon which I am sure we all agree. The first matter to which I propose to allude to-night is that paragraph of His Excellency's speech delivered at the opening of this session of Parliament which points to the loyal feeling that obtains in Canada at the present time. I may say that in times past, and in times not very remote, some hon. gentlemen have thought it worth their while to characterize their opponents, in the heat, perhaps, of an election campaign, as disloyal and unpatriotic. I am glad to think that that time has passed away in Canada, I trust never to return. I make bold to say to-night that as matters stand to-day, no party in this country has anything to gain with the people of this country by characterizing their opponents as disloyal and unpatriotic. When I remember that in this year in which it is my privilege to address the Senate we are to have a celebration known as the Diamond Jubilee celebration, I am sure I may be permitted to say that the people of Canada, one and all, feel that a compliment has been paid them in the invitation extended to us by the Imperial government to send a representative from Canada to take part in that celebration, and I may be permitted also to say that in the present premier of Canada I feel, as one, that we have a gentleman well fitted to represent not merely a party in Canada, but the whole Canadian people. I do not know that it is at all necessary for me to venture to make any extended remarks with regard to that question known as the settlement of the school difficulty of Manitoba. I do not intend to deal with that question at all from its legal aspect, as I believe it would be presumption on my part to make any such attempt; but I may say here, that I honestly believe that the people of this country, from one end of Canada to the other, with few exceptions, indeed, are satisfied with the way in which that difficulty has been disposed of. I daresay that there are some who are not satisfied. There was but one way, in my opinion, to settle the question. It was referred to the courts in the first place, then it had to be referred back to the people of Canada. If I understand right, there are in this country but two powers competent to deal with the question. It might have been settled by the legislature of the province of Manitoba; it might have been settled by this Federal Parliament here at Ottawa, but it was settled by the help of both the government of Manitoba and the government of Canada. I believe it is safe for me to say that recent events have shown that the people of Canada, in all the provinces where they have had an opportunity of speaking out on this question at the polls, have pronounced in favour of that settlement. I come now to another matter which has been alluded to in the Speech of His Excellency, and that is the revision, or the reform, of the tariff. I stand here to-night as an advocate of reduced taxation in this country. I stand here to-night as one who has all along favoured a reduction of the tariff; I stand here to-night as one who has all along from the outset been opposed to the National Policy. I believe to-night that a mistake was made when that policy was introduced into this Dominion. I am satisfied, speaking from a provincial standpoint—more particularly speaking from the standpoint of the province from which I come—that it has been productive of no good, that is, to the maritime provinces. I admit there are sections of Canada which have benefited by that policy, but if we are to be guided and governed by the statistics placed in our hands, it must be clear to every one of us that the progress made in Canada during the time in which that policy has been in operation has not been such as we had a right to expect. Will any hon. gentleman say that I, as a New Brunswicker, should be satisfied when in ten years the province from which I come has only gained sixty-one souls—when previous to that decade our population was increasing by leaps and bounds. We were keeping pace with the other provinces of Canada, but during ten years of the eighteen since the adoption of the National Policy our population has been stationary. What I say with regard to New Brunswick, will apply equally well to the other maritime provinces, but, as remarked by the hon. gentleman who preceded me in discussing this question, we have to take things as we find them, Circumstances have changed and are changing. I am to-day as firm a believer in a low tariff as I ever was, but when I look around me and see the condition of things existing to-day in the adjoining republic, among the people to the south of us—when I find that that people are determined to crush us as Canadians and avow that they are going to adopt a tariff which will compel us to forego our allegiance to the mother land, or in other words, which would starve us into annexation with that country, then, if I had advice to offer to the government of Canada, I would ask them in the revision of the tariff to go slowly. I would ask them to consider well the steps they were taking and I would go further and say that until the better judgment of the people of the United States reasserts itself, I would ask them to grant favours only where favours would be granted in return. They have adopted or rather are about to adopt a policy not only of protection, but a policy of exclusion as well. They have their alien labour laws, and they propose amendments to the immigration law, and they propose a tariff more prohibitory than the McKinley tariff. I do not know what the effect of it is to be. I am quite sure if it is to bear hard upon any part of this Dominion it will be upon the eastern provinces of Canada. But it may turn out that it will prove to us a blessing in disguise. It is possible, I say, that we may be able to so arrange matters as to keep our young men at home. I have faith in the future of this country. I know that in the western parts of this Dominion we have a great heritage and great resources. I know that we have a wealth of mines, and what I ask to-night of this honourable House—and I think I would not be doing my duty if I were not to state it thus plainly—is that in any policy which may be adopted to open up and develop that western country it should not be forgotten that there is an east as well as a west in the Dominion of Canada. You may take, as it is proposed to take, millions, and lavish them in deepening canals and waterways in this Dominion. You may build the Crow's Nest Pass Railway, you may build railways through all that western country, and if the policy which has prevailed in Canada ever since confederation is to be continued in the future then I say that the people of the maritime provinces would have good reason to oppose the expenditure which it is proposed to make for the purposes of that North-western country. But I go further and point this out to this honourable House to-night, that if in carrying out the policy of the present government, which I believe is a policy acceptable to the majority of the people of Canada, they take care that the trade which is developed in that great west, and in British Columbia, finds its way to ports in the Maritime provinces, and to ports in Canada, and not to allow it to filter out through other channels to Boston and Portland, as it has been doing ever since we had the honour of forming part of this confederation——

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.)—Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. KING—Then I say the maritime provinces will respond and there will be no hesitation on our part, at all events, in contributing our fair share towards the cost of those very large undertakings. I might be permitted to say here what perhaps is known to most of the hon. gentlemen present, that the people of the maritime provinces—more particularly St. John—are making in proportion to their population and in proportion to their means, large sacrifices for one or two or three years past in order to be able to demonstrate to the people of this country that we have at our own seaboards, harbours sufficient to accommodate the trade of Canada. They have spent their hundreds of thousands of dollars, and I believe they have clearly established the fact that in the city of St. John, to say nothing of what is well known in this House with regard to Halifax, that they are able, or will be able in the near future to accommodate as much traffic as it is possible to direct that way, and I hope that in adopting this policy of deepening the canals and developing the western country, it will be the aim of this House and the aim of the government of this country to see that no more money is expended in subsidizing lines of steamers to Boston and Portland; but to see that encouragement should be given to lines of steamers as is being given to-day, and which may be supplemented still further to lines of steamships to the ports of St. John and Halifax and other ports in the maritime provinces. It was not my intention to speak at length to-night. I am satisfied that I could not do the subject justice by continuing my remarks, I have nothing to say to this hon. House that is not very well known to most of the hon. members, and therefore I take the liberty of seconding the motion made by my hon. friend to my left.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I should like to call the attention of the leader of the House to the promise made by the Secretary of State before the adjournment of the Senate on Thursday last in reference to laying upon the Table the terms of what is called the agreement between the Federal Government and that of Manitoba before the debate on the Address.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I have already laid the terms on the Table. Probably my hon. friend did not catch my observation at the time.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I was not aware of that fact. However, it is not my intention now to make any remarks with reference to it, not having seen it, much less had time to read it. I have, of course, read the newspaper reports, but as I notice that the leader of the government, the premier, on every occasion repudiates newspaper reports, I do not deem it safe to indulge in any criticism upon that which has appeared in the newspapers. Hence I was anxious to see the official document itself. I shall be able, no doubt, to sleep after I have read it. I have little fear that it will keep me awake any part of the night. After having heard the mover and the seconder of the address, if the House has no objection, I would move the adjournment of the debate. Before doing so I would say that I have listened not only with a great deal of interest, but a great deal of pleasure to the remarks of the mover of the address and also to the remarks of the seconder; though I must qualify it by saying I am more in accord with the observations of the mover of the address than I am with those of the seconder. These are points that I will have an opportunity of dealing with at a later period. Let me say further that I compliment and congratulate the government on the late appointments to the Senate. I say so in all sincerity. I had the pleasure of sitting in the House of Commons with the hon. Senator from Bothwell for nearly a quarter of a century. I am not aware that upon any great question we ever agreed; but I can say this for him that he always dealt with any question that came before the House, in a manly, straightforward, I believe conscientious, and I am sure intellectual manner. My hon friend from Toronto, if I may mention his name, Mr. Cox, is a gentleman with whom I have been acquainted for a number of years. I congratulate him, and I congratulate the country, on the appointment to the Senate of a man of his commercial and financial standing in the country. And as to the other hon. member from New Brunswick, though he came here under peculiar circumstances, I congratulate the country on the accession to this chamber of a gentleman of the ability which he possesses. Though his opinions are not in accord with my own, I am quite sure he is fully as honest as I am in the views which he holds. I deem it my duty to say this much in reference to the composition of this House, because appointments of this kind, of men of ability, men who have taken an active part in the commercial affairs of the country, who have been leading members in politics, will add, not only to the dignity of the House, but will also add a great deal to its—shall I say intellectual standing in the country? Having made these remarks, which I have done in all sincerity—I move that the debate be now adjourned.

Hon. Sir OLIVER MOWAT—Before the motion is carried I wish to say a word or two. I am grateful at the generous way in which my hon. friend opposite has alluded to the late appointments made to the Senate. He has used very strong language, but not too strong: and I hope he will find that all the appointments made to the Senate and to every other department of the government with which we have to do will be of as praiseworthy character as the appointments which have been made.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I reciprocate that wish.

Hon. Sir OLIVER MOWAT—My hon friend who has moved the answer to the address is known throughout all the Dominion as a gentleman of uncommon energy, uncommon business ability, of the highest moral character, and one who has an immense experience in public business of various kinds. Such a man will be, I am sure, of great service to us in many of the matters that come before us, and I have the satisfaction of knowing that, as it has been his habit to apply his energy to everything which he has undertaken, so he has accepted the office of senator with a determination to throw into the discharge of its duties the same energy, and to give to it the same attention, which he is known to have done with regard to other things during the whole of his life. His observations here to-day show him to be a thoughtful man with regard to public as well as to other matters. My hon. friend who seconded the motion comes from a different part of Canada. He, too, is a gentleman with large experience of business, a successful man of business, and who has given his attention not only to matters of business, but also to public matters, and is very familiar with them. I expect we shall find in him also a very valuable assistant in dealing with the many questions with which we have to deal. Another of the new senators is a gentleman whom we are all familiar with—with whom politicians generally are more familiar than they are with either of the other gentlemen,—I mean Mr. Mills, of whom my hon. friend opposite has spoken very kindly. Mr. Mills is one of the ablest politicians in public life. He probably bestows upon the questions which come before him a larger amount of thought—of deep, independent thought, than most gentlemen can. His habit is to study thoroughly every question and to give the public the benefit of his mature thought upon it. He possesses an eminently logical mind, he has a good memory and other valuable qualities which fit him for any assembly in which he may take part. There is no appointment which I ever expect to have an opportunity of making here during the ten or twenty years for which I may be leader of the House, which I expect to be superior to that of Mr. Mills. The other hon. gentleman who was introduced to the Senate this evening is less known to me than the hon. members to whom I have referred, but from what I have heard of him I expect to find him also a valuable member of the Senate. I have no objection to the motion before the House.

The motion was agreed to.

The Senate then adjourned.

THE ADDRESS.

THE DEBATE CONTINUED.

The order of the day being called

Consideration of His Excellency the Governor General's Speech, on the opening of the Second Session of the Eighth Parliament.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL said:—In rising to address this House I propose to confine myself as closely as possible to the subjects contained in the Speech from the Throne, and to be as brief as I can. I desire, before proceeding further, to state that I think I did the honourable Senator from Bothwell an injustice, yesterday, when I stated that during the long period I had had the pleasure of sitting in the other House with him, we had always been opposed, particularly upon all great questions. Upon reflection, however, I find that that was not correct. There were occasions on which constitutional questions arose, questions which affected the creeds and nationalities of the people of Canada, and on every one of those occasions which created discussion—and I may say, to a certain extent, bitter animosities among the different races of the people of the Dominion—the then member for Bothwell took sides with the government of the day, and in an argumentative manner defended the constitutionality of the position which was taken by the government of which I was a member. It is only just that I should refer to these matters in order that I may put myself right so far as his parliamentary course, during the time I had the pleasure of sitting in the Commons with him is concerned. I refer more particularly to the Jesuits' Estates Act, which we all know created a great deal of discussion and opposition, and to the Bi-lingual Act in which he was in accord with the government of the day. Upon the very question which has created so much discussion of late, he delivered one—I think I am safe in saying—of the best argumentative speeches in the debate in the House of Commons, in which he justified the position taken by the government of the day in carrying out the decision and recommendations of the law lords of the Privy Council. But, unfortunately—perhaps I would not be doing justice if I did not say so—after delivering that portion of his speech, which met the approbation of almost every one, he wound up with an attack on the government of the day for the course they had pursued in reference to the settlement of that question. I can only compare the hon. gentleman's position on that occasion to that of a character in one of Bulwer's works, "My Novel." An old Tory country gentleman had a son who had visited the United States and returned imbued with Republican ideas. The son ran for a seat in the House of Commons; this put the old gentleman in a rather difficult position as to how he should vote—whether filial affection should counterbalance his better judgment upon political matters—so, when the contest came on he says: "My son, I wish you well, but I always vote blue." Now, it struck me that this is a modern illustration of the principle. The hon. gentleman certainly defended in a masterly manner the position which had been taken by the government, but as he always voted Grit, he had to get a good excuse for doing as he did. Having made this explanation, I join cordially with the mover of the Address in his remarks respecting the first paragraph of His Excellency's Address to Parliament, in which he refers to the loyalty of the people of Canada, and to the Diamond Jubilee of Her Majesty, I need scarcely waste time in discussing, or even referring, to a question of that kind. It is a matter for congratulation to know that there are very few, if any, of Her Majesty's subjects in Canada who are not devoutly loyal to the Crown, and who have not the highest respect for the sovereign, who has reigned so long and stands pre-eminently above—in fact has no peer amongst the ruling powers of the world. My hon. friend passing from that paragraph expressed his gratification on the settlement of the Manitoba school question. I wish I could join him in that congratulation. I wish I could believe for a moment that the terms of the agreement entered into between Mr. Laurier's government and Mr. Greenway, meets the approval of the country as a whole, and particularly of those who are directly affected by that settlement. If it were so, I think it would be a happy augury for the future. I should be gratified to know that a question of this kind which appeals to religious prejudices and to race feeling was removed entirely from the political arena. Every one who desires to see Canada prosper, should also desire to have removed from all political platforms questions affecting our religious belief, or the place of our birth, or the race from which we sprang. I do not propose to read a large number of extracts from the official correspondence on this question to prove the soundness of the position which I propose to take. It has been charged that the late government made demands on the Manitoba government in a manner which they were justified in resenting as dictatorial. I deny in a most positive manner that any demands of a dictatorial character were ever made by the government of the Dominion on Manitoba. If those who have paid any attention to this question will refer to the answer of the government to the petitions which were sent in by the bishops and by the laity of Manitoba, asking for interference by the Dominion government; the report made by a sub-committee of the Privy Council, composed of the late Sir John Thompson, Mr. Chapleau, the present Lieutenant Governor of Quebec, Mr. Daly, and myself, they will find that the winding up paragraph of that report implores the Manitoba government, in the most respectful manner, to deal with this question in such a manner as to remove it altogether from the Dominion political arena. You have also to refer to the Order in Council which was an answer to the reply of the Manitoba government to the remedial order, and you will find that the language of that reply was of such a character that by no possibility could it be construed into a demand that the Manitoba government should do anything other than restore the rights which we believed, under the constitution, the minority of that province had been deprived of. We pointed out to them that in their answer to the remedial order they had possibly misunderstood the terms of it; that there was no desire on the part of the Dominion government to force them to take any course other than to restore as far as they possibly could, under the direction of the decision of the law Lords of the Privy Council, those rights, and remove the grievances which the law Lords of the Privy Council had pointed out as existing in the Educational Act of Manitoba. I point to these facts to show that the charge against us that we made demands in such a manner as to be repulsive and to induce the government of Manitoba to resist the recommendations which we made to them, is absolutely incorrect and incapable of being established by the documents which have been laid before the country. I say it with a good deal of reluctance —that the information I received during those negotiations was of such a character as to force us to the conclusion, that there was a determination on the part of the government of Manitoba to resist any proposition that might be made by the Dominion government at that time, in order to keep the question before the public, to enable hon. gentlemen opposite to carry the elections, which were then approaching, with Mr. Laurier at their head. Information was received that such an understanding did exist between them, and if there was anything wanting to prove that beyond a peradventure, it was a remark made by Mr. Greenway the other day in the House of Assembly when this question was under discussion, when the leader of the Opposition, Mr. Roblin, was pointing out that the terms of this agreement had not settled the question—that it had not removed the discontent, nor would it remove the discontent that existed. Mr. Greenway replied that it had accomplished one thing, and that was it had driven the Conservative party out of power. Now, that was the object, I have not the slightest doubt from the beginning, and I believe the party now in power was a party to that arrangement and a party to that understanding. Whether the people affected are satisfied with the settlement or not is a question for them to decide. I do not agree with some of those with whom I act politically on this question. It has been said, repeatedly said, and I regret to say it has been repeated in the House of Commons lately, that because the people of the province of Quebec had returned a large majority against the late government, who proposed to do justice to the minority in Manitoba, that therefore we should drop the question altogether. Now, to me, it matters not what position the people of Quebec may take. If every man in that province were to record his vote in favour of Mr. Laurier, whether because of his race or because of his creed, it is a matter which does not affect the question at issue one iota. The simple question is this, did the constitution give to the minority in Manitoba certain rights and privileges? Did the parliament of Canada in 1870, when they passed the constitution of Manitoba, intend that the minority should be protected in their educational rights, or in the exercise of the rights and privileges which they had at that time so far as education and the teaching of their religion is concerned? If so, it matters not to me whether the whole country should decide against me or not, my position would not be affected as to their rights under the constitution. Every one who thinks upon the subject, who came to the decision that we did upon the question, believing the minority of Manitoba to have rights which should be maintained, ought not to be influenced by the result of the general election, or the result of any election which has taken place since then. After all, did the last general election prove that the Roman Catholic population of Canada approved of this settlement, or that they would be content with the settlement of the question which has been presented to this House? We all know that every candidate in the province of Quebec pledged himself in writing, by speech, or by solemn declaration, to do more than the Conservative party proposed to do, and if the honest habitants took the word of their countrymen when it was dinned into their ears, is it to wondered at? We know that they were told, not only by Catholic leaders but by Protestants also, when this question of the Remedial Bill was discussed: "Are not the rights of the minority in Manitoba safer in the hands of Laurier, who is a Frenchman and a Catholic, than they would be in the hands of Sir Mackenzie Bowell, who is a Protestant and an Orangeman?" This was the method pursued, these were the utterances which were made to the voters of the province of Quebec, and if they believed, as no doubt they did, the assurances of the present premier and his followers, I am not prepared to say that I blame them so much for the manner in which they voted. Since the general election, and since the terms of the agreement have been made public, there have been several by-elections, and I heard them referred to in the House of Commons a few nights ago, as evidence of the fact that the country accepted the settlement. Is that true? Has not every candidate in the by-elections, in the province of Quebec and in other parts of the Dominion, stated that they do not regard this as a final settlement, but that they would obtain more, that this was simply a beginning of what they intended to accomplish? Did not Mr. Laurier himself state in a speech in Montreal that this was but an instalment, and that he would continue to agitate for more concessions? If the people are all content with this settlement, what necessity is there for the government candidates pledging themselves to agitate for further concessions to the minority in Manitoba? In all the elections which have taken place since the general election, with the exception of one, the people had pronounced upon this question before, and the only constituency in which the people are now and have been directly interested in this matter—that is St. Boniface —returned a member in opposition to the Greenway government, and pronounced against the agreement which we are told has been accepted by the whole community, and that, too, mark you, although the government candidate had given a written declaration at different polling places that he accepted the opinions and declaration of Archbishop Langevin upon the question, and that he would vote, if elected, to have them carried out; while in Winnipeg and in other portions of the constituency he was pronounced to be an admirer of Mr. Greenway and an ardent follower of Mr. Laurier's, and that he accepted the agreement which had been effected. I mention these facts to show that there has been a system of hypocrisy in dealing with this question, from beginning to end, that there has not been a straightforward, manly stand taken with respect to it. First we should see whether it is a constitutional question or a religious question. If it were simply a religious question, I should not take the position that I hold today. I hold it to be a constitutional question, in which the minority of Manitoba and all minorities are interested. My course has been suggested by thoughts of this kind: if the minority of a province who do not think as I do are to be deprived of their rights, may it not lead to a similar interference in some other province with the rights of a minority with whose views I am in accord? I make this explanation because I desire to be fully and fairly understood in dealing with a question in which race and religion are too apt to be mixed up. Now, what is this settlement which has been made? It is somewhat singular that that same system of contradiction should have been carried on to the present day. Mr. Laurier told the people of Montreal a short time ago that he had obtained more for his countrymen and co-religionists than the late government offered to accept. Mr. Cameron, the Attorney General of Manitoba, when introducing the bill to give effect to this agreement, told the people that there was no comparison between the demands made by the late Conservative government and the concession which had been accepted by Mr. Laurier. I leave it between those two gentlemen to decide who is right, and to the public to say which of them tells the truth. There is the same system, I repeat, of contradiction, uttered to suit the circumstances of the case, and the locality in which the person who utters the sentiment happens to be for the time being. In order that this agreement may be fully on record—I will read it. It is as follows:

1. Legislation shall be introduced and passed at the next regular session of the legislature of Manitoba, embodying the provisions hereinafter set forth in amendment to the "Public Schools Act," for the purpose of settling the educational questions that have been in dispute in that province.

2. Religious teaching to be conducted as hereinafter provided.

1. If authorized by a resolution passed by a majority of the school trustees, or

2. If a petition be presented to the board of school trustees asking for religious teaching and signed by the parents or guardians of at least ten children attending the school in the case of rural district, or by parents or guardians of at least twenty-five children attending the school in a town, city or village.

This clause gives the right, on petition or by a vote of a majority of the school trustees, to furnish religious teaching, provided there are ten children in a rural district or twenty-five in a city, attending the school. Let me ask those who conscientiously believe that religious instruction should accompany secular education, why the limit of ten children in rural districts and twenty-five in cities, towns and villages, should be fixed? If religious instruction be necessary for ten children, why should nine be deprived of it because there does not happen to be a tenth pupil? Or in the case of a city, town or village, why should twenty-four children be deprived of religious instruction because there does not happen to be a twenty-fifth pupil? If religious teaching be recognized at all, and if it be necessary for the welfare of the children, then it is just as important that one child should receive such instruction as the ten or twenty-five should; and it is an outrage upon the feelings of the parents if they cannot have the same rights and privileges as though there happened to be the number of pupils specified in the terms of the agreement, attending the school. I leave it to any reasonable man to say whether there is any concession in that, which should not be extended to all children attending a school. I am one of those who believe that the fundamental principles of religion should be taught in all our schools. I do not pretend to say that I would approve of sectarian instruction, but the fundamental principles of Christianity, in which we all believe, whether we are Catholics or Protestants, should be taught to every child who is capable of understanding his duties to himself and to his country. Of course, the next clause is simply one providing for the manner in which the teaching shall be done. It must be by a Protestant clergyman whose charge includes any portion of the school district, or by a person duly authorized by such clergyman, or by a teacher when so authorized. I presume that the intention of this provision is, that if the teacher is considered fit for the work, he may be so authorized by the clergyman. I do not know of any other interpretation that I could put upon it. The fourth clause provides:—

Where so specified in such resolution of the trustees or where so required by the children's parents or guardian; religious teaching during the prescribed period may take place on certain specified days of the week only, instead of every teaching day.

Another clause provides that there may be three days in which the Roman Catholics can teach religion after school hours, and the other three days can be devoted to Protestants, if they desire to have their children taught any religion, or to send a clergyman to those schools. Practically I look upon the whole of these regulations as an utter farce. They can never be carried out, nor would they meet the requirements or wishes of those who hold the views of the minority of Manitoba. The fifth clause reads as follows:

In any school in towns and cities where the average attendance of Roman Catholic children is forty or upwards, and in villages and rural districts where the average attendance of such children is twenty-five or upwards, the trustees shall if required by the petition of the parents or guardians of such number of Roman Catholic children respectively, employ at least one duly certificated Roman Catholic teacher in such school.

It goes on to make the same provision in case there are a requisite number of Protestants. I would like to ask any one who has experience in public school matters, what benefit can possibly arise to the children from the provision in that section of the agreement? The teachers are not permitted to teach the religion of any sect or of any church, and surely it matters not to Roman Catholic child or parent, or to a Protestant child or parent, whether the rule of three or a problem in Euclid is taught by a Roman Catholic or by a Protestant teacher. I have yet to learn that there is any particular religion in the teaching of a child that three times three make nine, and whether he is taught by a Roman Catholic or a Protestant is a matter of perfect indifference. Why a provision of that kind should be made drawing a distinction between the teachers under such circumstances must be a marvel to everyone, unless we come to the conclusion that it is to tickle the ear and the fancy of men who never think beyond the fact that they are Protestants or Roman Catholics. In my younger days this question of the creed of a teacher never was considered. When I was a boy, a large number of the teachers in the town where I resided, were educated gentlemen who had come out to this country under adverse pecuniary circumstances, and took up teaching as a means of livelihood. No one objected to them as teachers. No one in the section of the country in which I lived objected to any teacher because he happened to be a Protestant or because he happened to be an Irish Catholic—I do not say French Catholic, because in that section of the country there were very few, if any. The next section simply provides for the giving of power to the Department of Education to make certain rules and regulations in order to carry out the terms of this agreement. There is but one other point in connection with this agreement to which I would draw your attention, and that is the tenth clause which provides that when ten of the pupils in any school, speaking French, (or any other language other than French) as their native language, the teaching of such pupils shall be conducted upon the bi-lingual system. There is no provision in this regulation for the teaching of English in the section. I dare say my hon. friend from Manitoba will understand this point better than I do. In a section where the large proportion of the inhabitants are Roman Catholics and are French and speak the French language, supposing that there happens to be the requisite number of Protestant children in that particular school section, what provision is there here that they shall be taught the English language? There is but one answer to that question and that is, if the school law of Manitoba provides that in all cases the English language shall be taught.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—The majority could take care of itself.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I understand my hon. friend very well. I am quite sure the majority would take care of itself, but it is not the majority I am speaking of. It is the minority in a French section where they speak nothing but the French language. What provision is there in these regulations that the children of Protestants attending that school shall be taught the English language? That is what I desire to point out. Perhaps I was not sufficiently clear.

Hon. Mr. POWER—Would the hon. gentleman read that 10th paragraph again?

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL (again reads the paragraph)—That provides for the teaching of French in addition to English in the case of ten French children being in the school. In a further section of this agreement where it provides for religious teaching, it provides for the employment of a Roman Catholic teacher or a Protestant teacher. It is duplicated. It is made applicable to both classes of people, but in this section it is only made applicable to one and there can be but one answer to it; I speak under correction when I refer to it. I do not desire to draw improper conclusions from the reading of this 10th paragraph. If the Manitoba school law provides absolutely for the teaching of English in all schools, then, of course, my objection is answered; if not, then the deduction which I draw from this 10th paragraph must be correct—there is no provision where there is a minority of ten Protestants in a French settlement for teaching of the English language. If the people who are interested in that agreement are willing to accept it as carrying out the provisions of the constitution, it is not for me, and those who think with me, to take exception to it. I again repeat my repudiation of the charge that has been laid against the late government of having treated the Manitoba government with discourtesy in any respect, directly or indirectly. I repeat that it is a matter of very little consequence to me, taking the position that I hold, and believing it to be the position which every statesman and every public man should hold, whether the whole province of Quebec or any other province should vote acceptance of that agreement. If the papal ablegate who is now in this country, advises the people to accept a settlement, it is a matter for themselves. But if the question comes up as to recording my vote in favour of the rights, as I understand them, of the minority in Manitoba, notwithstanding the Pope should say himself that it was satisfactory to him, I should vote for the enactment of a law which would give to the minority that which I believe they are entitled. The next paragraph is perhaps one more congenial to my feelings—one with which I could deal with less reserve. My hon. friend who moved the address expressed pretty strong views in reference to the trade question and the tariff. He pointed to the fact that millions of dollars had been invested, and that vested interests should not be interfered with. When one reflects upon the past, and what has taken place during the 17 or 18 years in which the protective policy of the government has been in force, and then reads the utterances of the leaders of the Liberal party of to-day, if one could only blot out the names of those who utter them and read them without knowing who gave expression to those views, one would say they come from the veriest Tories in the land. I congratulate my hon. friends upon their conversion. They have been denouncing in the bitterest possible terms the national policy for the past 17 years. They have told us, only place them in power and they would remove the incubus which has weighed down the country during the last 18 years, and driven the people abroad and made us all miserably poor. The farmers were ruined; they were literally under burdens which they could not possibly carry. Now, these same gentlemen tell us that we must not interfere with rights that have grown up under the protective policy, because they are vested rights. Why all this change? I have not heard my hon. friend from Bothwell give utterance to any expressions of that kind. I believe that he is too ardent a free trader, and moreover that he is too honest to give expression to similar views to those which have fallen from hon. gentlemen with whom he has been acting. Let me say, parenthetically, that I agreed with the leader of this House when he passed the glowing eulogy he did upon my hon. friend from Bothwell. I have watched that hon. gentleman with a good deal of interest during his political career. I have received from him very much information, and it was a marvel to me that a gentleman who had done so much for his party, a gentleman who, in season and out of season, had never hesitated to raise his voice in defence of the principles which he consistently advocated from the time of entering parliament up to the present session, should have been set aside for men who never did anything for their party. Notwithstanding that fact, he has the satisfaction of knowing that he maintains a better position to-day in the estimation of the people generally and of both political parties, than those who occupy positions that he was so eminently qualified to fill, if I may take the opinion of the hon. leader of the government in this House. We have had denunciations of the tariff ad nauseam. I might occupy pages and pages of the official report by reading declarations of a most vehement kind against the tariff and against every man who advocated the policy of protection, but I shall not inflict the House, or myself either, by doing so. There is one thing, however, that I may just as well refer to, and that is, when we take the Liberal platform and read it, and compare it with the declarations of the leaders of the party to-day, we are somewhat amazed that a transformation of so complete a character could possibly take place in so short a period. Was it because of the views which were presented to the hon. gentlemen during their interview with the manufacturers, or was it from some other cause that they were led to adopt the course they take to-day? "Oh, they say, you have involved the country so deeply in debt, that we must have a revenue, and it is only by money raised from customs and excise that we can possibly obtain that revenue." If they were consistent with the views they formerly expressed, that they were free traders of the English schools, or that they desired a tariff for revenue purposes only, there is no difficulty whatever in raising the revenue. Why did not my hon. friend take the same course as the English free traders? If he and his friends were honest in their convictions and declarations prior to the elections, why did they not do as Mr. Reed, the premier of New South Wales did, when he was returned in that country? In New South Wales Mr. Reed opposed Sir George Dibbs, and the issue before the people was free trade and protection. Mr. Reed was a free trader. Under Sir George Dibbs they had a protective tariff, not only against the outside world, but against the other Australian colonies as well. Mr. Reed declared himself a free trader. He professed sentiments similar to those which have been uttered by every leader of the Liberal party in the Dominion during the last fifteen or sixteen years. In the general election he carried the country as Mr. Laurier has done. He met parliament and at once put his promises into practice, abolished the customs duties from the statute-book, and adopted a free trade policy, pure and simple. He raised his revenue by a land tax and a tax upon income, etc. If hon. gentlemen opposite are honest in their professions, why do they not do the same thing? Simply because they do not dare to carry out, or attempt to carry out the policy they announced when in opposition. Any one who listened to the speech of the late Finance Minister, the present Minister of Trade and Commerce, the other night in the House of Commons would come to the conclusion that changing his seat from one side of the House to the other, has had a marvellous effect upon that hon. gentleman, both in his manner of speaking, and in the views which he utters. He had declared in the past that all manufacturers were rascals, great and small; he denounced them as legalized robbers and loud mouthed blatant defenders of a system which was robbing the people. He compared the Conservative government to priests of Baal. He spoke of the shallow clap-trap of the national policy; of the Conservative leaders as wolves, a minstrel troupe and juggling combination—a menagerie—tools and agents of the manufacturers, whom he describes as skilled and drilled cohorts of sinister interests, dangerous to freedom and a standing menace to the government—a far worse set of bandits than the Robber Barons of the Rhine. These are only a few illustrations, yet the other night he was as bland and as courteous and as mild in dealing with this question as my hon. friend sitting opposite will be when he rises to address the House. Yes, and he spoke of vested rights, though when he was in Lanark a short time ago the reports say that in ringing tones, Sir Richard denounced those who had made these investments as loud mouthed blatant blockheads. He said the policy of the Liberal party will bring about a cordial union between Great Britain and the United States, and no greater service could be rendered to the British Empire. If that is the policy of the Liberal party, how it it that their sunny ways have not accomplished anything in that direction? I find nothing in the Speech from the Throne intimating that a commission is to be appointed to confer with a similar commission to be appointed by the United States to deal with the trade relations between the two countries. An intimation of such an arrangement has been given to the public. Perhaps my hon. friend can tell me whether that is correct or not. It seems to me, however, that if there was any such arrangement between the United States government and the government of Canada it would have been heralded forth to the world in the Governor General's Speech. Is it merely one of those little side plays for the purpose of letting them down easily, or have they found out in going to the United States, that they were treated precisely as the delegation of the late Conservative government was treated when it sought extended trade relations with the neighbouring republic? The hon. gentlemen opposite denounced the Conserservative party as being dishonest in their professed desire to extend the trade relations between the two countries, and they told the people, "Put us in power, and the moment we show our faces across the line the United States will at once come down from their high horse and will give us what we want." They have been met precisely as we were met. The spirit displayed by the late Hon. James Blaine, when he was Secretary of State, was that no system of reciprocity would be conceded to Canada until we were prepared to cast in our lot with the United States as a part of that country, or to discriminate against Great Britain. He told us that distinctly, and he stated it in a speech made in Boston; and that is the spirit which pervades the whole of the politicians of the United States to-day, if we except a few merchants of Boston and other frontier towns and cities which would benefit by reciprocal trade relations with Canada. Then what are we to do—I do not know that my hon. friend will tell me—what are we to understand is to be the tariff policy of the present government? Last night I heard the late Finance Minister ask a question across the House as to how certain information was obtained by people in Kingston which induced them to set all their operatives to work again in their factories, for the reason as given by the manager, that the government did not intend to interfere materially with the cotton duties. We know that the Finance Minister made a declaration of the government policy in the city of Montreal in an interview in which he communicated to the people of the maritime provinces that the coal duty was not to be interfered with. The hon. gentleman forgot his duty as a Privy Councillor when he made that declaration, and any minister who gave information which enabled speculators to take advantage of the coming tariff changes, committed little less than perjury, for every minister is sworn solemnly to keep the counsel of the advice he gives to the Governor General in all matters relating to the tariff, or anything else, until he has the consent of the Crown to lay it before the people's representatives. Only to-day I received a letter from a gentleman in the town from which I come, in which he states that a certain person who has not been in business and has no more to do with the liquor trade than I have, has purchased three or four carloads of whisky, and my correspondent asks how did he get this information—why does a man, who is not in trade, speculate in whisky to such an extent? Has any intimation gone abroad that the duty on spirits is to be increased? If so, this man will be enabled to reap a profit on his speculation, or if not, he will sell the spirits and lose nothing. If the articles which appear in the press indicate the trend of public opinion, I believe the attitude of the government on this question is beginning to be understood. When a newspaper of the political character of the Montreal Witness, denounces the compromise upon the tariff question as a "mean" transaction, it is evident that there is a good deal of dissatisfaction. The Witness says:

> A meaner attitude could not be taken than that into which the beheaded Nova Scotia government proposes to lead that province. If there is any province which has been steadily denouncing protection as a wrong and an oppression, and even a ground for secession, it is Nova Scotia. But the Nova Scotia government is willing to wreck the movement towards deliverance from this incubus for the sake of the interests of a small minority of people.

What says the Halifax Chronicle on this question? The Chronicle is the free trade journal par excellence—a journal that has never had a good word, until now, to utter in favour of protecting any industry. It has at last come to the conclusion that my hon. friend who moved the address has reached, that large vested interests exist and therefore they should not be interfered with, no matter what principle is violated. Speaking of the coal duty it says:

> There are fifteen million dollars invested in the coal industry of that province. Several thousand men are employed, and many millions of money annually expended, so that, "no one can be indifferent to its maintenance and progress. If no fair concessions are made by the American Congress, then no patriotic Canadian, and certainly no Nova Scotian, will hesitate to uphold the government in seeing that an important coal industry is maintained in its integrity."

Now, compare that with the utterance of of Mr. Laurier in Montreal when he was asking for the votes of the manufacturers. Then he said:

> There are two articles which are raw material of every manufacturer, and these articles are coal and iron, and are they free? If you have a revenue tariff, the object will be to develop the country, and all raw materiel should be free under such a tariff.

Contrast that utterance of Mr. Laurier's with the utterance of Mr. Fielding, the other day, and then draw your own conclusions as to which is the honest politician of the two. Or what are we to think of a government where you have the Finance Minister telling people that a certain industry is of such a character that it will not do to interfere with it, and his organ, because it is well known the Chronicle is the organ of the Finance Minister, if the articles are not written by himself, affirming that the duty on coal must be retained, and the premier of the government stating it must be free. The public must draw their own conclusions as to the principles of these men. Either free trade is correct or it is wrong. If it is right, it is the duty of those who advocate it, not only to frame a tariff to meet the requirements of the country, but to promulgate it at the earliest possible moment. If they have not the courage of their convictions, as they are proving they have not, then they should take the course which they have taken and say manfully that they have changed their opinion. If they do so they will have my congratulation on their sudden conversion, but the question will remain whether the removal from one side of the House to the other has not been the cause of the conversion, rather than a desire to carry out any certain principles. There is so much connected with this question of the tariff that I could occupy hours in discussing it. There are portions of this address to which I shall refer very briefly. Two promises made to the people are mentioned in the address—one to repeal the Franchise Act, and the other to submit the question of prohibition to the people by a plebiscite. That the Franchise Act is so objectionable to the people as has been stated, I am not prepared to admit. I say further that all legislative bodies such as the Dominion should have control of their own franchise. When you consider the diversity of systems throughout the Dominion, you can easily understand the difference in the character of the voters which would under the system proposed by the government have the right to send members to the House of Commons. The principal objection which has been made to the Franchise Act has been the expense attending it. That, I admit, is an objection. I have been opposed all my life to manhood suffrage, but it were better a thousand times that we should have manhood suffrage throughout the whole Dominion, so that we should all sit in the House of Commons upon an equality, than to have the various systems which prevail in the several provinces of the Dominion. Are we to have a repetition of what I have known to take place in my own province. I will not say whether it was during the reign of my hon. friend opposite, or before he took charge, but I am inclined to think it was when he was leader of the government? The government decided to have an election. The courts of revision throughout the province had sat and done their work, but the government had not notified their friends throughout the country that there was to be an election at so early a period, and in order to give them an opportunity to prepare the lists for the election, they repealed the law as it stood, abandoned the revision which had taken place and put the whole country to the expense of another revision from one end of the province to the other.

Hon. Sir OLIVER MOWAT—I do not remember anything of that kind. When did that occur?

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I do not remember the year.

Hon. Sir OLIVER MOWAT—My hon. friend is probably referring to something done by the late Dominion government and imagines it was done by the Ontario government.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—No, it was before the Franchise Act was passed. My recollection is tolerably good on that point. What impressed it on my mind, is the fact that I had to travel through the whole of my constituency, a county one hundred miles deep and thirty miles wide, in order to watch my hon. friend's friends, that they did not stuff the lists to defeat me at the then coming elections. At that time the Ontario voters' list was used for the Dominion elections as well as for the provincial elections. I have heard of other cases of a similar character in other provinces. I lay down this principle: that this Parliament should not be subject to the whim or caprice of any local legislature in tampering with the voters' list as they think proper. I hope before they get through that some uniform system—I care not how cheap you make it, I care not though it be universal suffrage, —may be adopted by which we will have uniformity. I would rather have a system of that kind than one subject to the whim and dishonesty of any political party in any province. Next, we have the question of the canals and my hon. friend congratulated the government on what they are doing to improve the canal system. To read the speeches of those who support the government, one would suppose that the enlargement of the canals, the adoption of cold storage and the settlement of the Behring Sea claims, were new subjects; something which had just emanated from their brilliant intellects. My hon. friend must know that the cold storage project was being carried out to its fullest extent by the late administration and has only being added to by the present Minister of Agriculture. For what he is doing he deserves credit. I will be the last to detract from any credit due to him for extending that principle, but does not the honourable gentlemen know, that in preparing a draft contract for the fast Atlantic line of steamers the late government had, in one of their principal clauses, provided for cold storage to the extent of thousands of tons, in order that the trade of this country in articles of a perishable character might be extended? Yet these gentlemen talk through the country as though they had originated these projects. The deepening of the canals has been carried on from year to year. I am only sorry that they did not go further. I wish a decision had been arrived at long ago to sink every lock twenty feet, so that as the trade of the country justified it the canals could be deepened without going to the great expense that will otherwise be involved in deepening them. If there is one thing of which I am proud of having done when acting as Minister of Railways and Canals, it is, that after visiting the Sault Ste. Marie Canal with the Hon. Sir Frank Smith, then a member of the cabinet, we changed the size of the locks to sixty feet in width instead of one hundred feet, and its length from 600 to 900 feet long, by which the canal can be worked more economically. Every engineer connected with the United States Sault Canal, and on this side of the line, confesses now that it was an improvement and of incalculable benefit to the trade of this country. Had we carried out a system of that kind on the whole of the canals from the beginning, I believe a great saving would have been effected, and it may be within the experience of many who are here to-day, that it will be necessary to go to a large expenditure in the enlargement of our canals to meet the requirements of the trade of the country. The very best evidence of this fact is that the tonnage passing through the Sault Canals, on both sides, during open navigation, exceeds the tonnage passing through the Suez Canal during the whole year. It is an indication of the extraordinary development of our trade and justifies the adoption of large measures. If there has been one ground of complaint against the late government—and I admit there was—it has been because they did not prosecute these works rapidly enough so that we might have the full advantages of a 14 foot canal from one end of the route to the other, because the system is comparatively useless for through trade until the whole of it is completed to that depth. As to the plebiscite, I am opposed to it on principle. I think it is an evasion of the constitution under which we live. I am of the opinion that under responsible government the government of the day, no matter to what party it belongs, should have the courage to come down with a measure if they think it is in the interest of the country, and pass it without evading responsibility by sending it to the people. That question of prohibition has been on the tapis for how long?

Hon. Mr. POWER.—The plebiscite is not as good as a royal commission, I suppose?

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL.—That is quite true, but royal commissions are recognized under our system both in England and here, and the only place where a plebiscite has been recognized, as far as my recollection goes, has been in France, when they wanted to decide who should be their emperor and who should not. It has never been known in England. Royal commissions, forsooth! Does the honourable gentleman object to royal commissions? I hope he will change his opinion. I have no doubt he will when that return for which I have moved comes down, for there never has been a time in the history of this country when so many royal commissions to investigate nothing, had been appointed as during the short period that my honourable friend has been supporting the present government. Just as soon as ninety or one hundred thousand majority of the voters in Ontario had recorded themselves in favour of prohibition, my honourable friend opposite found that he had not the power to carry it out, and he referred it to the Dominion government, promising to carry out to the fullest possible extent of their powers as might be defined by the law lords of the Privy Council. You have all read the little episode which has lately taken place between the present premier of Ontario and the prohibition people in Toronto. I am not prepared to say that those who went there representing the temperance people behaved as they should have done. The liquor men, who went a few days afterwards, behaved much more correctly and in a more gentlemanly manner than the prohibition men. They neither contradicted the premier nor hissed him when he gave expression to his opinions. My honourable friend opposite (Mr. Vidal) will agree with me that their conduct was no credit to those whom they represented on that occasion. In Manitoba they had a plebiscite and when the people were heard from, the government found that they had no power. If the plebiscite is taken in Canada the present Minister of Justice, I am satisfied, will find that there is a negro in the fence somewhere. If he does not find some excuse for not carrying out prohibition, then I not only misapprehend him, but I have an incorrect opinion of his powers of manipulation under circumstances of the kind. Like many others, in the early period of my life, I was an ardent prohibitionist. Perhaps I was something like the mover of the address in the House of Commons. He said those were his opinions when he was a younger man but in a "moment of weakness" he had changed his view. I happened to pick up an extract from a Hamilton paper dealing with this question, in which the writer points out how often those who have been advocating prohibition in the past when placed in a position to put their views on the statute-book have evaded the question. I am not going to refer, as Mr. Hardy did the other day, to my hon. friend who sits opposite me (Mr. Vidal), when he asked him how long he had been in parliament and what had he done towards enforcing prohibition in this country. My hon. friend did not reply to him and very properly, but every one who knows anything of parliamentary practice must know that my hon. friend was never in a position to do anything. He might have replied that had he been a member of the government he might have insisted upon the adoption of a certain policy or left the cabinet. He might have added further that he is simply a private member of this House and that he has never failed, on all occasions, to express his views fearlessly on the subject whenever it has come up for discussion. Until the plebiscite takes place, of course I cannot express any opinion as to its success, but I trust I may live long enough to cast my vote upon that question, and that my hon. friend the Minister of Justice may have the delicate task of dealing with it when he has a large majority in his favour. I frankly confess that I do not desire to undertake the responsibility which he will have to assume in carrying out that law should he have a majority in its favour. I agree with my hon. friend in saying that I hope the time has arrived when these Behring Sea claims will be paid, and I also congratulate this country on the magnificent donations which have been made by the people from one end of the country to the other towards the Indian Famine Fund. The most pleasing feature, perhaps, of the whole of it is the fact that some 30,000 children in the different schools of Canada have contributed their mite towards the relief of the starving millions of India. It indicates a feeling of which every Canadian may be proud, and nothing could possibly have occurred that will raise the people of Canada so high in the estimation of the mother country and of the whole world, as the fact that over $130,000 has been raised in this country to aid our starving fellow-subjects in another portion of the empire. I think I am not going too far when I say that the enterprising proprietor of the Montreal Star deserves much credit for advocating and opening what is called the Indian Famine Fund. It will never be forgotten by the people of this country nor by those who have benefited by it. Now, let me ask one or two questions as to what is not in the Speech. Might I asked the leader of this House whether there is any intention to carry out the scheme of the fast line of steamers between Canada and England? It is not mentioned in the Speech. To my mind it is one of the most important features of any policy that could have been inaugurated by any government in this country. I was delighted to see the other day a letter written by the Hon. Alfred Jones of Halifax, advocating a line of steamer between Halifax and Cape Colony. That was a favourite scheme of mine—not entirely mine, but one in which I took a deep interest, and I did hope that the present government would not only push with the vigour that an enterprise of that kind deserves, the establishment of a fast line between Canada and England so as to compete with the greyhounds between the United States ports and the mother country, with its cold storage, and to assist to its fullest possible extent the important line between British Columbia and Australia which is cultivating a trade that is growing rapidly; but that in addition to that, we should have a line from Halifax to the Cape, where I am confident a large and profitable market can be obtained for the products of this country. It is true that there cannot be a return cargo of such a character as would justify the putting on of steamers without a subsidy. The opening up of trade of that kind which did not exist before, must be aided in the same way that you aid in the bringing up of a child and in teaching it to walk, and that has been the policy of past governments, and I should like to know from my hon. friend, whether these are to be allowed to sink or to fall into—shall I say decay—and that there is no intention of carrying out that portion at least of the policy of the late government. In connection with that are we to have any assistance given to the Pacific cable or a cable from Canada to Australia, in order to assist in developing the trade between these two countries? I am convinced, after much study and consideration—not only my own study, but on reading the opinions of others—that it is not only practicable, but if properly conducted, it can be made a profitable enterprise to the governments if they undertake it. I am in favour of a Pacific cable owned by the governments and not by a company. My reasons for that are varied. It can be done cheaper. There will be less expense to keep it running, and the people whom it will be necessary to employ in carrying on and operating it are so few, that the difficulties that present themselves in running railways would not exist. However, that is a question on which, when it comes up, I shall speak perhaps more at length, but in the meantime I should like the hon. gentleman to tell the House and the country what we are to expect in reference to these great enterprises to which I have called attention, and to inform us whether they intend to accept the suggestions of the Hon. Mr. Jones by aiding and assisting the line between Halifax and the Cape, touching at the different West Indian ports, which could be done, and made profitable I am sure; and the construction of the Pacific cable, or whether at an early date the papers connected with that conference will be laid before the House. There are many other things to which I might call the attention of the House; but I have spoken much longer than I intended on these different subjects. I congratulate the country, that there is to be no revolution, as I understand it, in the tariff. I hope that before we get through with the discussion of the tariff, the members of the government may all be converted to the sound principles of protection to all the industries in this country. I will not include my hon. friend from Bothwell, because I do not think it is possible to convert him on that question.

Hon. Sir OLIVER MOWAT—In making a few remarks on the various subjects which my hon. friend has spoken on, I desire to acknowledge the courteous manner in which he has discussed the questions before the House—a courtesy becoming to this House in the position which it occupies, and I believe characteristic of it. If he has not always been fair in his statements, I am sure he meant to be fair, and that is all that can be expected of human nature. The greater part of my hon. friend's speech was directed to the important subject of the Manitoba school settlement. My hon. friend says that that settlement has not met with the approval of the country. I differ from my hon. friend there. While it has not received the universal approval of the country, it has received the approval of the great majority of the electors. My hon. friend says that there was an understanding with the Manitoba government on the part of the Liberal party of the Dominion which prevented any settlement being made by the government of which he was the head, and of which he was an important member before becoming the head. I quite deny that there was any such agreement. I ought to know something of it if there was any, and I have never heard an observation or a word which would enable me to fancy that any such agreement had existed. The subject of the schools is one of very great importance, because it involves religious considerations, and because it relates to the very delicate as well as important subject of education. Nobody can have any doubt that there has arisen out of that question strife and bad feelings throughout the whole Dominion. We all recognize the evils incident to religious strife and bad feeling, and as Canadians, desiring the prosperity of the country and the well-being of its people, we all must feel how desirable it would be that evils of that kind should cease in the land. The great objection to the policy of my hon. friend while he was a leader of the government or a member of it was, that he did not take into account the public feeling which existed on this subject, or the importance of preventing this strife and this bad feeling. It was in 1890 that the Manitoba legislature passed the Act which has given rise to all the trouble that has taken place. That Act, I have no reason to doubt, was passed in good faith. It was passed under the impression that such an Act was in the interest of Manitoba, and it was passed under the impression also that it was within the power of the provincial legislature to pass such an Act. That impression appears now to have been a mistake. The Privy Council, to whose decision we all owe respect and pay deference, has decided that while the Act was perfectly valid in point of law, which had long been thought to be the only matter in question, the Act gave jurisdiction to the Dominion Parliament to correct a grievance which the Act worked to the minority of Manitoba. That is the result of the decisions, and there is no doubt that the local legislature, according to these decisions, had the power to abolish the separate schools of Manitoba, and there is no doubt also, that the passing of the Act gave jurisdiction to the Dominion Parliament to interfere, if parliament should think fit. The power is not a judicial one, or to be exercised judicially. The counsel in arguing for the minority before the Privy Council disclaimed any pretense that there was any judicial authority or any judicial duty on the part of the government or of parliament. Counsel declared that as regards parliamentary action, it was a political question—that political considerations were to be taken into account. So it was the duty of the government to do that which was best for the country in the matter and to remedy the grievance in some way which would be consistent with the best interests of the Dominion. Now, what was the course that the late government pursued to accomplish that object? As soon as the decision of the Privy Council was known here, steps were immediately taken to have an appeal which the minority had the right to make to the government considered and entertained; that appeal was made accordingly within a few weeks after the receipt of the decision of the Privy Council. The decision at which the late government arrived was that set forth in the remedial order. The province of Manitoba was not prepared to adopt what the remedial order required. Now, this matter was a very delicate one. It was one which had to be dealt with very cautiously and very considerately. What the remedial order proposed to do was to restore the Act as it had previously stood, as nearly as was practicable. The objection to that was that it was far too sweeping a thing to do in so hasty a manner. The effect of it would have been to perpetuate religious strife in Manitoba, and the religious strife would have prevailed all over the country; and before determining upon a course so injurious to the country, time should be given. The people of Manitoba have a strong opinion that separate schools are not suited to that country at present. The people of that province are a loyal and a law-abiding people and are largely composed of the same people who dealt with the separate schools of Ontario, in a way that everybody knows. In Ontario, the great majority were non-Catholic, just as the great majority of the people of Manitoba are non-Catholic, and as soon as the position of the schools was such that the people were under no further apprehension of being coerced by laws which they did not want, and to which they were opposed, they acted in a generous and fair manner—generous and fair according to the judgment of the minority itself, and that minority have ever since conceded. Separate schools in Ontario as constituted at the time of confederation were not provided with the means of efficiently discharging the work for which they were created; and the people of Upper Canada gave them such amendments as the minority and their representatives thought sufficient for their purposes. The majority might have rejected every one of those amendments. They might have rendered the work of separate schools more difficult, but they did not. On the contrary they put the separate schools into a position far superior to that which they occupied at the time of confederation. But they were a loyal and law-abiding people, and felt this course to be their duty, and accepted it. And I may add that the Acts which they passed had the approval of Conservatives as well as of the Liberal party. Now, the same spirit, I have no doubt, will be manifested in Manitoba, and any steps to coerce the people of Manitoba into that which they were not at the time prepared to coerce them immediately, only allowing a few weeks before the coercion was to come into force, was unstatesmanlike, and injurious to the country, and objectionable from every public point of view. But that was the position that the late government took. Now, what was the position which the Liberal party took? They recognized the great evils of coercion. They believed that the Roman Catholics themselves would not, in the long run, gain any advantage from it, that it was not in their interest that they should be in a position of antagonism towards the great majority of the people; that the proper course was to obtain such terms as might be practicable from those who represented the majority in Manitoba; and to bide their time for such improvement, by means of legislation and otherwise as might remove such grievances. That was a course which the result in Ontario and also the result in the maritime provinces would justify being taken. In the maritime provinces there is no law in favour of separate schools and never has been. But so fairly has the majority governed in those provinces, so kindly have they acted towards their Roman Catholic fellow-subjects, that the system in operation there gives satisfaction to them and has done so for many years; and it gives satisfaction without legislation and merely by administration. In dealing with this Manitoba matter the Liberal party considered that these things indicated the course which was in the interest of the country and of Roman Catholics themselves. Coercion is a very bad thing in such a matter; it is so bad that it ought only to be resorted to as a last remedy, even if in such a matter it should be resorted to then. The leader of the Liberal party has announced his opinion, and the party generally concur in it, that it was better to accept almost any measure that could be obtained without coercion, rather than to obtain a more satisfactory measure by means of coercion. That was substantially the policy announced by the party before the last elections. The settlement had not then been made. The Liberal party was not in a position to make any settlement, but that policy was announced as the principle of the party and it was the principle on which the party went to the polls. My hon. friend picks out a sentence here and there from this speech and that speech, and says that things were said inconsistent with that view. I do not think it necessary to follow my hon. friend in that respect. I do not consider it necessary to defend my friends in the other House against charges of inconsistency. If the charges are made there, they are made in the presence of those against whom they are made. It would be unreasonable to suppose that any large proportion of our people could have been misled by inconsistent statements of prominent speakers because what a man says in one place is immediately published over the whole country. What he said in Quebec is published in Ontario, and what he said in Ontario is immediately published in Quebec, and everything is known. That the general policy such as I describe it, was generally known all over the whole country is beyond any doubt whatever. Well, the elections came on, and it is in Catholic Quebec that the Liberal party obtained its great majority.

An Hon. MEMBER—Why?

Hon. Sir OLIVER MOWAT—Because their principles are sound principles, and because the people of Quebec believed in those principles, and thought that this country would be better governed by the Liberal party than by the Conservative party, and because, so far as this question had any influence on the election, they believed the Liberal policy was the sounder one, and one by which the Catholics would gain the most in the long run. The settlement was necessarily after the general election. I want to remind the House that since the general election and since this settlement has been effected, we have had by-elections when the country knew exactly what had been accomplished, and in those by-elections the people showed most emphatically that in Catholic Quebec and in Protestant Ontario the same view is taken. The subject was brought up at these elections and discussed on platforms and in the newspapers, and the result of the elections demonstrates that the public sentiment is that it was a wise thing to accept that settlement. And why was it a wise thing? My hon. friend points out that we did not obtain this concession or the other concession, or some of the provisions are not what they should have been; and that the settlement contains some things which are useless; and he objects to a French teacher being provided for.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—No.

Hon. Sir OLIVER MOWAT—In a certain case my hon. friend did.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—No, I made no objection. I pointed out that while there was a provision for teaching French there is no provision for teaching English.

Hon. Sir OLIVER MOWAT—My hon. friend knows that the schools are English schools; the school laws are based on the assumption that the people are English people. We were not providing for the English people nor for the people who were non-Catholics. We were providing some additional guarantee for the French population, and some additional guarantee for the Roman Catholic population. That tenth clause expressly shows that English was to be taught. My hon. friend suggested that that clause only provided that those speaking either French or some other language than English should be taugh English. Would it not be ridiculous to suppose that they were the only class to be taught English? Could any court put such a construction on the statute? I do not think my hon. friend would say so, and I am quite sure no lawyer could. None of us who are responsible for that settlement and had to do with the negotiations say that the settlement is the best possible. None of us say that. Each of us, from our own standpoint, might prefer an agreement containing other provisions, and perhaps not containing some of the present provisions. But we say it was the best settlement obtainable, considering public feeling in Manitoba, and it is far better that this settlement should be accepted than that it should be rejected; that it was best for the country; and best for the Roman Catholics themselves; best for those who are dissatisfied with the settlement in its present form, because it is hoped and confidently believed, that the working of the system will be managed in such a way as the experience in Ontario and the experience in the maritime provinces justify us in believing. If that settlement is effected I have no doubt that there will be no further strife throughout the country. I have no doubt both parties will find the advantages of it, and that the cause of education in Manitoba will be greatly advanced. It is impossible, in dealing with this question, not to keep in mind that the Catholic population in Manitoba is a very small one. There are but 20,000 Roman Catholics, including women and children, scattered over a country larger than England and Wales. How could it be expected that so small a population could maintain, except in two or three cases perhaps, efficient schools for their children? It could not be done. The whole population is so small and so scattered over the whole country that it is difficult, even in large places, to maintain separate schools. All these things have to be taken into account; and we considered the settlement was one which, as it was the best that could be obtained, the country should sanction ; and so far as the country has had an opportunity of expressing an opinion, the country has sanctioned it. It is to be remembered too that even from a Catholic standpoint the settlement is far in advance of the condition of the public schools in the Dominion and in the United States, which are attended by multitudes of Roman Catholic children, with the approval of their spiritual advisers, where there are no separate schools. There is no doubt, so far as I have read, that there is no doctrine of the Roman Catholic Church which says that their children must never attend a public school, that they must attend a separate school or go to none. Of course they must attend separate schools when they can, but when there are no separate schools they will take advantage of the public schools. This settlement provides for religious teaching in all public schools, and it provides for it in a definite and practical way. There is no such provision for the public schools of my own province. I wish there was. I think it would be an advantage if there was. I do not see why it is not practicable. But the fact is that there is no such provision there, and therefore from a Roman Catholic standpoint this condition of public schools is far in advance of the condition of public schools in Ontario where notwithstanding Roman Catholics attend the common schools in the absence of other schools. It is also far in advance of the provisions of the law in the maritime provinces, speaking still from a Roman Catholic standpoint. The law there does not provide for religious teaching, and yet Roman Catholic children attend the public schools there, and for many years there has been no agitation in those provinces to establish separate schools. The condition of the public schools there renders separate schools unnecessary. We know that in every state in the United States, no provision is made for religious teaching in public schools. It is not practicable there, and the provisions of this settlement are far in advance of the United States system, from the same standpoint. In view of these and other considerations which if it were desirable to take up your time I could point out, it seemed to us plain that this was a settlement such as the people of Canada should accept, as an advantage both to the country and to our Roman Catholic fellow brothers. Roman Catholics also constitute a large proportion of our population and it is important that they should be educated, and also that they should be contented, and that peace and harmony should exist between them and the rest of the population, and we believe that this settlement, in view of the circumstances I have mentioned, is what we all desire. My hon. friend next took up the subject of the tariff. My hon. friend says that we have ceased to be free traders. My hon. friend's notion of free traders is that they must either cease to be free traders, or must take into account nothing whatever that would justify duties. Now any free traders who take a view of that sort would be very unpractical men, and the free traders of Canada have never taken any such absurd position. Why, if we are to proceed upon the ground that my hon. friend says we are bound to proceed on, if we are free traders at all, we could not even have a revenue tariff.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Hear, hear!

Hon. Sir OLIVER MOWAT—A revenue tariff involves a tax upon imports and therefore gives necessarily a certain amount of protection.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—It does not involve protection now.

Hon. Sir OLIVER MOWAT—A revenue tariff involves some protection.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Not at all.

Hon. Sir OLIVER MOWAT—A revenue tariff gives protection and sometimes it is quite sufficient protection.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—It may be.

Hon. Sir OLIVER MOWAT—And then it would not be statesmanlike of free traders, or any other set of men, to disregard changed circumstances and changed conditions. Things were possible 18 years ago which are not possible now. The changes have been so great we need an immensely greater revenue than we needed then. That is to be taken into account ; and then we are just now met with a policy on the part of the United States which few of us thought they would ever adopt, and which it is only recently they could be got to adopt. It looks now certainly as if the policy of the politicians who at present have the confidence of that country, is to exclude Canadian products from the United States altogether. It would be unstatesmanlike for Canadian politicians to ignore that fact. It is no doubt our duty to bear in mind the actual conditions, and to take whatever course which is thought best for the country after the very fullest consideration. I do not suggest at all retaliation, but retaliation is one thing and our own safety is quite another. I think it was while discussing this subject that my hon. friend interrupted himself a little for the purpose of saying flattering things about the hon. member from Bothwell. I am glad that my hon. friend appreciates my hon. friend from Bothwell. If he had appreciated him in the past more fully than he has done, if he had appreciated the results of that thought and study which my hon. friend from Bothwell gives to these questions, my hon. friend would not be occupying the position he is now, or his party would not be in the position they are in now, for they would be doing good to the country instead of harm. My hon. friend next referred to the subject of the coal duty. My hon. friend speaks of an announcement which the Minister of Finance made in Montreal as being a very improper thing. My hon. friend says that the object of that announcement was to affect the elections in Nova Scotia. My hon. friend is entirely wrong about that.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—You are confounding what was said in the lower House. I never referred at all to the elections.

Hon. Sir OLIVER MOWAT—You never referred to the coal duties?

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Yes, but not to the elections. That was said in the lower House.

Hon. Sir OLIVER MOWAT—I thought my hon. friend also did say that.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I did not say it, but I meant it.

Hon. Sir OLIVER MOWAT—My honourable friend has said it now. He was ashamed to say it a little while ago, but he says it now. Since my honourable friend was ashamed to say it a little while ago, I should be ashamed to have to reply to it. An objection to the announcement to a change in the tariff arises if the communication is made privately, or to some particular person or persons. An announcement which everybody hears, which is published from one end of the country to the other, is not subject to that objection. It may be deliberately made, it may be made in the interests of the country, it may be made for a great public purpose. Just before that announcement was made it had been announced that a bill was to be introduced in the United States Congress, with every expectation of its being carried, by which the heavy duty of 75 cents should be put on our coal, and while our coal goes into some parts of their country, and their coal into some parts of our country, it would not do to allow their coal to come in free while our coal was heavily taxed, almost to prohibition, in their country, and Mr. Fielding therefore made an announcement which he was authorized to make, having reference, not to bituminous coal only, which was the only coal we exported to the United States, but also to anthracite which we import into Canada. My honourable friend will not find it laid down anywhere that an announcement of that kind for a definite purpose, called for by a circumstance which was important to the country, and which we had to deal with, was such an announcement as a government has no right to make. My honourable friend rather insinuates that communications were made to certain persons of other changes contemplated, in consequence of which mills at Kingston have recommenced operations, and some whisky friends of the honourable member—

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—No, they are no whisky friends; they are not in trade at all.

Hon. Sir OLIVER MOWAT—Well, some friends.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—No, they are friends of my hon. friend; they are Grits.

Hon. Sir OLIVER MOWAT—If they are my friends, I should rather they made their living in some other way than by the whisky transaction which he mentioned, but my hon.

friend is quite mistaken in ascribing any information that they had to the government or any member of it. I am quite satisfied that no member of the government has communicated anything of the kind, and in fact I might go further than that, though it is difficult to speak at large in the matter, lest I should say more than I am authorized at the moment to state, from what they have done must have been from their own conjecture as to what was likely, the newspapers have been saying and what has been said in public discussions. Any one who reads the public newspapers knows how frequently some of them tell what is going to happen. They do not know but they guess, judging from what seems probable; and very often their guesses are right and sometimes they are wrong. Well if the guesses of speculators in regard to cotton duties and whisky duties are right, this shows their wisdom and good fortune in guessing right. If it was not their own guessing, it may have been the guessing of friends. But I am not saying now that they guessed right. Newspapers guess wrong often, as well as right, and whether this is one of the wrong guesses or the right guesses I am not going to say.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.)—Almost right I should think.

Hon. Sir OLIVER MOWAT—The hon. member next, I think, referred to the subject of the franchise and took the opportunity of expressing a strong opinion that there should be separate voters' lists for the Dominion, and that we should not adopt the local voters' lists under the local franchise. I think my hon. friend on that question is in opposition to his whole party. In every constituency in this country, those Conservatives that have to do with preparing and settling the voters' lists recognize the enormous expense of the Dominion voters' lists, where they are fair men and have no bad purpose to serve; they feel the enormous expense of getting out these lists, and they are very anxious to get rid of the expense, and they hail the adoption of the provincial lists as a reform of a very great grievance. My hon. friend seems to treat the two franchises as if they were wholly different, as if one set of people are voting under the one, and another set are voting under the other. But there is really very little difference. There is a small percentage only in regard to whom there is any difference—a small percentage only that can vote at provincial and not at Dominion elections, or that can vote at Dominion and not at provincial elections, and the difference is not worth taking into account, in view of the immense gain there will be by the adoption of one list of voters. These are some of the reasons why we should adopt the provincial franchise. But then another and very serious reason—and which one should and does commend itself to every fair man—is that the Dominion franchise is in the hands of the government of the day, and that the provincial franchise is not in the hands of the government of the day at all. I know more about my own province than I do about other provinces, though I have been studying them too, but in my own province the provincial government has nothing whatever to do with the preparation of the voters' list. It is all done outside of them and outside of their jurisdiction. They are prepared by the municipal authorities, some are Conservatives and some are Liberals. Any appeal is to a county court judge not appointed by the provinces and for the last 18 years appointed by the party in opposition to the provincial government of Ontario. It is entirely different as we all know, in regard to the Dominion system. The Dominion government appoint the revisers, and they may appoint and they did appoint great partizans, men who had been actively engaged in party politics up to the last moment. That is a bad system, and no fair man will say that it is a system which should stand. I expect to find the great majority of the representatives of the people of all parties in the other House and the whole of this House, supporting the principle of the Franchise Bill when it is introduced. My hon. friend then attacked us because the Speech alluded to the cold storage matter and to the enlargement of the St. Lawrence Canals and yet had not originated those things. We do not say that we originated those things. It would be absurd for us to say that we originated them. The hon. gentlemen opposite and his party did not originate them. The statements in the Speech were merely informing parliament and public, what had been done in regard to a great many things where there is no pretense whatever of any credit being claimed, so far as origination is concerned;

but we are doing more for cold storage than ever was done before. We are giving it an amount of practical attention never given before, and great good has resulted from it and will result from it. So with regard to the canals. We have no doubt that great good will arise from the enlargement of the canals in the way we propose. I think the last subject the hon. gentleman attacked was the plebiscite. There may be a difference of opinion as to the propriety of submitting this question, or any other, to the determination of the electors by a direct vote, but it is not without precedent. The Scott Act provided for a plebiscite. It can only be brought into force by a plebiscite; and while the Liberal party were the authors of the Scott Act our opponents were in power 18 years and never proposed to repeal that Act. They had a large majority at their back, but as they never proposed its repeal, it is plain that they did not think the plebiscite was a bad thing. The plebiscite has been acted on in municipal matters also; and the mere fact that it has not been acted on in England is no answer.

Hon. Mr. MILLER—The Scott Act is a dead letter in Canada—at least it is in Ontario to-day.

Hon. Sir OLIVER MOWAT—My hon. friend is wrong. On the contrary I am not aware that any province is wholly without the Scott Act. It was largely adopted at one time; but that has nothing to do with what I am dealing with now. I am merely referring to the Scott Act as a precedent for which our opponents are responsible as well as ourselves, because although they had the power to repeal it, they made no proposition to exercise their power of repeal. With regard to the Scott Act not being in general use now, the temperance people declare that they find it unavailing because if you have the Scott Act in one municipality and the municipalities all around it have not the Scott Act, you get no benefit from the Act, but rather evil. Just one word more on that: we all recognize the immense evils of intemperance and those of us who are not members of temperance societies must recognize the immense amount of good the temperance societies have accomplished by the literature they have sent abroad, by the addresses they have delivered to the public, by the zeal with which they have prosecuted reforms of all kinds in this matter. They constitute a large portion of our people and a very respectable portion. Now it is the desire of the temperance people that this question shall be submitted to the vote of the people. They have found in Dominion, provincial and municipal elections, they could not get voters to proceed on the sole ground of this man being a temperance man and his opponent not a temperance man. Other things always came into view and were acted upon, so that while the vote of a township, for instance, under a Scott Act, might be very largely in favour of prohibition, but often could not elect a majority of municipal councillors holding that view, thereby interfering very much with the enforcement of the act in that locality. In view of these and other considerations, temperance people desire a plebiscite, and considering the importance of the subject, considering the importance of that part of our population, I hold that the demand is one which it is a right thing for us to grant. A demand to ascertain the proportion of sentiment on this subject, at the instance of these people, was a demand which it would have been wrong to refuse, and I hope the Parliament of Canada at this session will show that they take the same view.

My hon. friend is anxious to know what the policy of the government is on several points not touched on in the speech. It is not usual, in a discussion on the answer to Her Majesty's speech in the old country or His Excellency's speech in this land, to make any announcement of policy which it is not thought fit to make in the speech from the Throne. I will not make such an announcement now, but before the close of the session I probably shall. Before prorogation all the subjects my hon. friend refers to which are not touched in the speech will be brought up, and I hope the government policy will be found satisfactory to the people of this country. My hon. friend referred at the close of his speech to a subject that the mover and seconder of the address referred to in theirs—the loyalty of the people of this country to Her Majesty, and the joy we feel at her long reign and that she is still with us. It is my intention to ask the House shortly to join in an address of congratulation to Her Majesty fitting this great occasion, and while there are not many subjects on which we think the same,

I feel this is one on which every senator will unite with the greatest possible satisfaction.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—In rising to offer a few observations on the subjects contained in the speech from the Throne, I feel it my duty, as others have done, to compliment the honourable gentlemen who have been put in the position on this occasion of moving and seconding the answer to the speech from the Throne. These gentlemen have performed their duty very well indeed, and it is a pleasure to this House to find that, in exercising the prerogative of calling members to seats in this House, though there has been a change of government, there is no danger, so far as we have yet seen, that the honour and dignity of the Senate will be lowered by the appointment of new members. The government have, with commendable promptness, filled the vacancies in this House, and filled them, as I have already stated, to the satisfaction of members of the Senate, as far as the gentlemen selected are concerned. While this is the case with regard to the Senate, I am sorry to say that I cannot express the same pleasure with the action of the government in filling the vacancies in the other House, and it is on this point, as well as on a great many others, that we have to gravely censure the members of Her Majesty's Government for going so strangely back on their professions when they were in opposition. If there was any one position which these gentlemen took more strongly than another during the long years they were in opposition, it was that the government of the day had shamefully abused their powers when they brought on by-elections piece-meal instead of bringing them on simultaneously, or at least in regular order as vacancies occurred. The Prime Minister speaking on this subject used very strong language to condemn the action of the late government, because he complained, and complained with some reason too, that they they had not brought on the by-elections simultaneously, where it was possible so to bring them on, and had not brought them on in the regular order in which the vacancies occurred, but had ordered them to suit their own political purposes. His language is so strong that I think it will bear reproduction. This is what the hon. gentleman said during the session of 1896 in his opening speech:

> On the very first day of the opening of this parliament you informed the House that you had issued your warrants. * * Sir, have these hon. gentlemen, these sticklers for the constitution, honoured the warrant of the speaker? They should have issued the writs. They did not do so. They have it in their power to block the warrant of the Speaker, to block the constitution of the country, to deprive the people of their rights because there is in the Act an unfortunate paragraph whereby the nomination of the returning officer belongs to them, the fixing of the date of the election belongs to them, and until they fix a date for the election, until they have appointed a returning officer the Clerk of the Crown in Chancery is altogether powerless to act * * * * We find that to-day two constituencies are disfranchised by these sticklers for the constitution. Some forty thousand of Her Majesty's subjects have not a voice on the floor of parliament. * * * * *
> Very well, they (the government) are welcome to all means, to all tactics which can be defended under the law, but I submit to them that these tactics are base, are cowardly, are criminal, which violate, systematically, wickedly and designedly the very letter of the statute and the most sacred rights of the people.

Will it be believed that the hon. gentleman who uttered this language, who described only a little more than a year ago the conduct of the late government in the manner I have quoted, pursued the very course that he had condemned in this strong language? What do we find? The county of Champlain has been open for three or four months and the election has not yet been held. The writ is now out, and the election is to take place early in the following month. The vacancy which occurred long after in the neighbouring county of Wright was filled with amazing promptitude, while Champlain is still unrepresented in the House of Commons. The premier styled such conduct as base, cowardly and criminal. We have another county, Colchester, which has been open for nearly three months, and in which the election will not take place until some time next month. Why was the election brought on in Bonaventure almost immediately after the death of the late member, while Champlain is still unrepresented? The explanation has been given that Bonaventure is a fishing community and fishermen must soon leave their homes to proceed to the fisheries, while Champlain is a lumbering county and the voters are not yet back from the woods. Now, I know something about Bonaventure, and I know that it is also largely a lumbering county. When I inquired of a member of the government why they undertook to operate the Bay Chaleur railway in the winter without the sanction of law nor the authority of the legislature, the answer was that it was to carry the lumber of the people of the county of Bonaventure to market. The excuse given for different practice in different counties will not hold water. It is not consistent with the facts. The government thought they had a better chance of carrying Bonaventure and Wright than of carrying Colchester and Champlain, and they took those two counties first. They threw all their forces there—what they called the Boodle Brigade when they spoke of the Conservatives sending their friends to help their candidates. They threw all their strength into Bonaventure and Wright, and now that the elections in those two counties are over, they can send the brigade to Champlain and later on to Colchester. The premier condemned such conduct in the language I have quoted and while we have reason to congratulate the government on the manner in which they filled the vacancies in this House, we feel it our duty to censure them for not only going back on their solemn pre-election principles but for having followed a course which cannot be fairly justified no matter by whom it is pursued. The first clause of the address is one upon which under ordinary circumstance, there would not be very much difference of opinion. It refers to the loyal feeling which pervades all parts of the empire and which animates all Her Majesty's subjects in every part of the globe on the occasion of the glorious jubilee year in which we now live, and in the celebration of which the people of Canada through their premier and probably through other representatives will take a part during the present year. It is no doubt a joyful occasion, and will do not a little, I hope, to strengthen the bonds which bind the empire together. In discussing this question the seconder of the address took occasion to rebuke the opposition—I suppose he meant the opposition when he said "certain people who have been in the habit of imputing or had in the past imputed disloyal sentiments to those who were opposed to them"—and he went so far as to say that no party could gain by such tactics. I was aware that my hon. friend had reference in these observations to the Conservatives, and the view which we took of the action of the Liberal party through their leading men and through the policies they had proposed within the last few years on public questions. I do not feel at all disposed to allow that rebuke to pass unchallenged, I am inclined to remind my hon. friend that these charges were not only made but that grave cause existed for them. I regret that I do not see my hon. friend in the House this evening. He cannot forget that when he occupied a seat in another place, one of his colleagues from New Brunswick had openly advocated through his newspaper, the St. John Globe, the severance of Canada from the empire to which we belong and its union with the United States. Conservatives felt it their duty, as loyal subjects of the Queen, to enter their protest against such a course of conduct, and I am very sorry for the reputation of the people of Canada for loyalty and attachment to the great empire to which we belong, that this same gentleman, Mr. Ellis, has since that time been accepted as a candidate by the Liberal party, and elected not by a majority of the people of St. John, but by a plurality vote, and now represents them in the House of Commons. I hope we are going to have a better record in the future. It used to be said in England that a Whig in office and a Whig out of office was a different man altogether. We begin to hope already that before our Liberal friends are a very long time in power they will be transformed and will become a very different class of people. I cannot, however, in this connection omit a reference to the fact that a prominent member of the administration, no less a personage than the Finance Minister in the government of the day, led an agitation in Nova Scotia for the severance of that province from the Dominion. The breaking up of this confederation was what he aimed at, by the withdrawal of his province—the breaking up of all the pleasant and advantageous ties which have grown up between the different provinces. Mr. Fielding, the present Finance Minister, was not content with advocating that, but he passed a series of resolutions which he transformed into an election address—dissolved the local legislature and appealed to the people of Nova Scotia on the question of secession. It may be that he was not very sincere about it—indeed the facts seem to indicate that he was not, for although he carried the province by a large majority, we have never heard anything more officially about secession. No official act of his has ever been put on record from that time to the present to carry out the platform on which he appealed to the electors of Nova Scotia. However, I do not think any hon. gentleman in this House will be inclined to lessen the censure, or feel less indignation over the attitude of Mr. Fielding in Nova Scotia on the plea that he was not sincere in fact, it would only make the matter worse. But that is not all: a gentleman who has been honoured very much by the present administration—who took the place of the leader of the opposition on the Cable Conference, once demanded that the British flag be pulled down on Citadel Hill, Halifax. But it is in regard to a more recent matter—the unrestricted reciprocity or commercial union cry that Conservatives honestly and fairly, as I believe, charged their opponents with disloyalty in the years gone by. We know that question was put forward as a platform by the party. I believe my hon. friend who leads this House never identified himself with that movement. He was too wise, too shrewd and too loyal to do so, and notwithstanding the censure of my hon. friend, the seconder of the address, the public were justified in drawing the inference, from the position of the Liberal party on the question of commercial union, that they were drifting into disloyal positions. I refer also to the remarkable speech made by the present premier in Boston in 1891. He was tendered a banquet in Boston and he made a very remarkable speech there. He was reported in the Boston newspapers and the reports referred to were quoted in the House of Commons afterwards.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—And Mr. Laurier denied them.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—Mr. Laurier denied the correctness of the American reports, but he said the Toronto Globe contained a fair report of what he had said no that occasion. Mr. Kenny of Halifax, charged him with the utterance as quoted in the United States newspapers. Mr. Laurier replied "I did not see those reports, but the Toronto Globe contains a report for which I am responsible." I shall now read an extract from the report in the Globe. It is as follows:

In my opinion the conduct of England, of Canada towards the United States during the war was a disgrace to the civilization of England, of Canada. The American people could fight their own battles, they required no help, but when they were engaged in the supreme struggle for the life or death of this great nation, when they were fighting for a cause as great, as holy, as ever engaged the devotion of mens when they had reason to expect the outspoken sympathy of those nearest to them, it was galling that Southern privateers could be manned, built and equipped in England with the tacit connivance of the British government to destroy American commerce on the high seas. It was galling that rebel refugees could find shelter in Canada, and there with impunity and without provoking condemnation plot abominable crimes against secession.

I have no hesitation in saying that it was a very improper speech for the leader of a great party, a Canadian statesman, to make in a foreign country. I remember very well myself—I was old enough to take a very great interest in the questions which arose during the civil war in the United States—that in Canada, although we had many sympathisers for the Southern states who were the weaker party, and for whom the hearts of many of the Canadian people went out as they naturally did to the weaker party in the struggle—but nevertheless the fact remained and was undeniable that the great majority of the Canadian people rather sympathized with the north than with the south in that struggle. I am able to sustain my recollection by the language of a very eminent man who knew the feeling of Canada well on that occasion, and who spoke shortly after the close of the war at Detroit—I refer to the Hon. Mr. Howe, perhaps the most distinguished man that Nova Scotia has ever produced. On that occasion he said:

It is something to be able to say that during the four long disastrous years of war, just ended, not a single act of which complaint could be made has been committed by a Canadian. Notwithstanding the false reports that were circulated, I do not believe there was a single intelligent citizen of my province at least, who did not believe that the capture of the Chesapeake off the coast of Maine by rebellious citizens of the United States was nothing less or more than an act of piracy. And so of the St. Albans raid. The government of Canada acted most promptly and nobly in connection with that affair, and has repaid the money which rebellious citizens of the United States had carried into their territory from the States banks. As to their harbouring the rebels and of extending to them the right of asylum, is there a single American here who would have his government surrender that right! There was not an Englishman nor an Irishman nor a Scotchman nor an American who would not fight three wars rather than give up that sacred right.

At six o'clock the debate was adjourned.

The Senate then adjourned.

THE ADDRESS.

THE DEBATE CONTINUED.

The Order of the Day having been called:—

Resuming the further adjourned Debate on the consideration of His Excellency the Governor General's Speech, on the opening of the Second Session of the Eighth Parliament.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON said:—When the House adjourned yesterday afternoon, I was dealing with some observations which had been made by the hon. seconder of the Address in reproof of the Conservative party and their organs for charging their opponents with disloyalty, and in answer to that reproof of the hon. gentleman I had pointed out to the House that there was ample justification for these charges, and had instanced among others the extraordinary speech made in Boston in 1891 by the present Premier of Canada. In that speech, part of which I read to the House, the people of Boston were told that Great Britain and Canada had acted shamefully towards them in the war of the rebellion, that they had harboured privateers and encouraged rebels to concoct vile and abominable treasons against the United States government. In answer to that I had given the statements of the Hon. Joseph Howe in his Detroit speech in 1865, immediately after the close of the war, made in the presence of hundreds of leading men of the United States who knew the truth of what he said, and on that occasion he told them that the Canadians had not taken part in those treasonable schemes but, on the contrary, the government of Canada had punished the St. Albans raiders and had not connived at the seizure of the Chesapeake. I think the Hon. Mr. Laurier's conduct on the occasion to which I have alluded deserved grave censure, and when he becomes premier of Canada we have no right to forget that on such an important occasion as that to which I have referred, when he was called upon to speak before a meeting of United States citizens, he delivered a speech which was calculated to stir up a strong feeling of unfriendliness in the United States against the people of Canada. His statements on that occasion were unjust to this country, and I have given the evidence of the Hon. Joseph Howe to contradict what was stated by the Hon. Mr. Laurier. Nearly 30 years had then elapsed from the close of the war, and the people of the United States themselves had learned to cease shaking the bloody shirt at each other and bringing up reminiscences of that unfortunate struggle. It was unbecoming in the leader of a great Canadian party to go to Boston, among United States citizens, and help them to shake the bloody shirt of the war of rebellion against his own countrymen. But there are more recent events than that, which we have a right to canvass in connection with this question of loyalty. Two members of this government visited the capital of the United States during the present winter—Sir Richard Cartwright and the Hon. Mr. Davies. They had interviews with the President and with other prominent men in Washington, and were interviewed by the United Associated Press reporters, and here is a statement made on that occasion by the Hon. Mr. Davies, the Minister of Marine and Fisheries in the government of Mr. Laurier. He was asked "What would be the result if the American government declines to make a reciprocity treaty such as you desire?"

It will result "said Mr. Davies" in an enlargement of our trade with Great Britain. We must trade somewhere and shall naturally trade where we can make the best bargain. We have in Canada to-day a large element whose influence is thrown in the direction of a more extended trade with the mother country as against the United States. We Canadians believe that our trade should flow through natural channels, and the natural channel incline to this country. If we can't trade with America we shall be compelled to trade with Great Britain, and once these intimate relations are established with the mother country it will be difficult to break them.

He evidently implied, in fact, expressed, that it would be a bad thing to establish these intimate relations with the mother country, and told the Americans that if these intimate relations were established, it would be very difficult to break them. He goes a little further and said:

The effect of Canadian competition can only be felt immediately along your northern border, while on the other hand the manufacturers of the United States will secure a greatly enlarged market.

I notice that the closing paragraph of the interview rather dashes to the ground the extravagant statement that has been dinned into our ears for many years about this great market of 60,000,000. Mr. Davies, speaking in the county of Wright about that market, put it at 75,000,000, but talking to the Americans he said "the Canadian trade will only be felt in the very fringe of your American border," so this large market for Canadians of 75,000,000 has no existence except in that gentleman's imagination. But not only Mr. Davies, but another prominent gentleman was in Washington last summer and was interviewed, and his interview was published in the press. I refer to Mr. John Charlton, and I will read a paragraph from the published report of that interview :

Mr. Charlton states he is not here in an official capacity. In an interview to-day with a reporter of the United Associated presses Mr. Charlton in discussing the question of the desirability of more liberal trade relations between the United States and Canada, stated that the recent change of government in Canada had brought the question of reciprocity to the front. The Liberal party of Canada had always favoured more intimate trade relations with the United States. The Conservative party, on the contrary, had uniformly been adverse to reciprocity except upon unattainable conditions. Now Canada was governed by broader-minded and more liberal men. Hon. Wilfred Laurier, the premier of Canada, is a man of broad views. He is a Liberal of Liberals. His knowledge of American affairs is accurate and extended, and he ardently hopes for intimate and friendly business and social relations between the two countries.

"Canada," said Mr. Charlton, "will unquestionably attempt in the near future to obtain a treaty of reciprocity in trade with the United States; a treaty that will admit to freedom of mutual interchange all natural products, and will cover, in addition, as wide a list of manufactured articles as the establishment of a just equilibrium of mutual interests shall require. When the conditions of trade between the two countries are carefully analyzed," said Mr. Charlton, "it will be found that the advantages to be arrived from a free interchange of natural products are not entirely upon the side of Canada. The removal of the Canadian duty on Indian corn would lead to an enormous consumption of that grain in Canada for stock feeding and other purposes. American pork would be largely used by Canadian lumbermen if admitted free, and the repeal of the Canadian duty on flour and meal would enable the United States to supply Nova Scotia, New Brunswick and Prince Edward Island with breadstuffs, to the exclusion of the Ontario and Manitoba wheat. Fresh beef from Chicago packing houses would find extensive sale in Canadian cities and towns and the repeal of the duty of sixty cents on bituminous coal would crowd out the use of Nova Scotia coal in all of Canada west of and including Montreal."

PARTING OF THE WAYS.

One statement, which Mr. Charlton emphasized, seems to possess significance. He represents Canada as now standing at the parting of the ways. On the one hand, are friendly business and social relations with the United States and the gradual closing of the gap which has been widened since 1886. On the other hand, are Imperial confederation, Empire consolidation, a distinctive British system, embracing the Motherland and all her colonies, improved steamships and cable services; differential duties in England in favour of the colonies and in the colonies in favour of England, colonial representation in the Imperial parliament, and a movement all along the line for the consolidation and unification of all the scattered outposts of Britain's Imperial world-wide domain. When Canada shall present her overtures to the government of the United States for more extended trade relations, the latter will decide upon which of these ways she will enter.

Here Mr. Charlton distinctly states to the people of the United States that they have the destiny of Canada in their hands and that whenever Mr. Laurier presented his proposition, it was for the United States to decide whether Canada should be allowed to go on and work a consolidation within the lines of this great empire of ours, or whether he should fall commercially into the hands of the great republic to the south of us. I have always felt that this course of conduct pursued by Liberal leaders when the Conservative party were in power, of going to Washington and interviewing the government at Washington behind the backs of the government of Canada, has been most reprehensible. I would like to know when any such course was known to be pursued in any European country—a member of the opposition going to a government, a friendly government, perhaps, and dinning into their ears that the ruling party were unfriendly to them, but that when the other party came into power, they would do what was fair and right with them. That course has been followed by several members of the present government when they were in opposition. They stepped between the government of the day and the government of the United States, and barred the government of Canada from settling some of the difficulties that existed between Canada and the United States by saying that the Canadian government were unfriendly to the United States. It was unpatriotic and disloyal to Canada, and borders, in some instances, on the limits of treason. I refer to the conduct of Mr. Charlton when the Wilson Bill was before Congress. The Wilson Bill contained a provision which I may as well read, in order that it may go on the record :—

Provided that any of the articles mentioned in paragraphs 672 to 683 inclusive when imported from any county which lays an export duty on the same or any of them shall be subject to the duties existing prior to the passage of the Act.

This was the Wilson Bill as it was then agreed by the Senate Committee of the United States. Mr. Charlton memorialized the Senate over his own signature as follows :—

But the proviso contained in that will not reach the purpose intended, but if the interpretation of your memoralist is correct will result in the imposition of American duties upon the articles only, that Canadian export duties are imposed upon, thereby supplementing the Canadian export duty and furthering the purposes of the Canadian government.

It is respectfully submitted that this proviso should read as follows :—

Provided that if any export duty be laid by any foreign country upon any of the articles mentioned in paragraphs Nos. 672 to 683 inclusive then all said articles imported from said county shall be subjected to the duties existing prior to the passage of this Act.

The United States proposed in the Wilson Bill that if an export duty were placed by Canada on any of the articles in the lumber schedule, it should be met with the duty imposed under the McKinley Bill on the same article. Mr. Charlton pointed out that that would not be a sufficiently severe blow to the government of Canada, and suggested that in the event of Canada imposing an export duty on any one article in the lumber schedule the McKinley rates should apply to the whole schedule. They seized the suggestions and put it in the Wilson Bill, and it prevented Canada from putting an export duty on saw-logs, because the moment Canada imposed an export duty on saw-logs the whole of the provisions of the McKinley Bill were revived against Canada as far as the lumber schedule was concerned. I have no hesitation in saying that the conduct of that gentleman on that occasion, going to the United States and securing such a drastic measure as that against Canada, was unpatriotic and that it bordered on the very verge of treason. I dare say that one remark which I made yesterday afternoon may be challenged by some hon. member in reply, because I heard a similar statement challenged before now. I charged the Liberal party, with a few honourable exceptions, with having committed themselves to the policy of commercial union and unrestricted reciprocity with the United States and I said that the policy was disloyal to Canada and to the empire to which we belong. I am aware that many of these gentlemen have denied that any recognized member of the Liberal party ever advocated commercial union with the United States. In answer to that I shall just read a few words from a speech delivered by Mr. Davies at Cape Traverse, Prince Edward Island, on the 23rd of August, 1887. I am quoting from the Patriot newspaper report, and I may say the Patriot is Mr. Davies's own organ. He said on that occasion :

The difference between commercial union and reciprocity is that the former would do away with all custom houses between the two countries, and they would have a uniform tariff against the rest of the world. * * * The key note should be struck in the lower province. Commercial union means a uniform tariff from the north pole to the Gulf of Mexico. The Reciprocity Treaty of 1856 he was prepared to accept, but he was afraid the Americans were not willing to concede. As commercial union seemed to be more easily attainable he was prepared to support it because he believed it would secure to us wealth, peace and happiness.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I should like to ask, as a matter of curiosity, what particular paragraph of the Speech the hon. gentleman is now dealing with.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—I am dealing with the question of loyalty, which was referred to by the hon. gentleman from King's, N.B., who undertook in his speech to reprove the Conservative party for accusing their opponents of disloyalty.

Hon. Mr. POWER—The only reference in the Address to loyalty is the Diamond Jubilee, and I do not see what the hon. gentleman's remarks have to do with the Diamond Jubilee.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—My hon. friend seems to be anxious to limit discussion on this subject. I notice that he did not detect any departure from the rules of debate until I touched the question of reciprocity with the United States. The question of reciprocity is not in the Speech and because it is not there he thinks we should not speak about it, but I feel when we discuss the Speech from the Throne we have a right to point out what important public questions are left out of that Speech as well as those which it contains, and if there is one question more than another upon which this great Liberal government should have spoken, on the occasion of what we may call their first regular session, to the people of this country through its parliament, it was the question of reciprocity with the United States. They had sent two gentlemen to Washington in the early part of the present winter and surely it is due to this House and to the people of this country to know what progress these gentlemen made, whether they were well received, whether a measure based on the conferences which they had with the United States government was in contemplation. In my province, year after year, in all elections which have been held since the Conservative party were in power, we had the distinct statement that no sooner would the Liberal party get into office than they would commence negotiations with the government at Washington for the purpose of securing a reciprocity treaty, and the Hon. Mr. Davies on one occasion, in 1887, pledged himself that if his party were returned to power they would have a measure of reciprocity secured within six weeks from the date of their triumph at the polls. Now we find that, although a reasonable time has elapsed since the elections, and although they have sent deputations to Washington, there is no statement in the Speech from the Throne explaining why that deputation was sent, or what it accomplished, or what the government intend to do on this great question of reciprocity with the United States. We have no utterance whatever, and when questioned by my hon. friend the Leader of the Opposition in this House, the Minister of Justice declines to give a statement of the government's policy with regard to matters not referred to in the speech from the Throne. I am not at all surprised that my hon. friend, the senior member for Halifax who, as far as this government and party are concerned, assumed the position of defender of the faith, should at once interpose his objections when he finds a reference made to the question of reciprocity. I can tell my hon. friend that the very fact that it has not been referred to in the speech makes it a legitimate subject of comment, a subject for censuring the government for not having stated what they hoped to do on that question. Though they have not told us what their policy is, we are not left altogether in the dark. The mover and the seconder of the Address told us that we are called upon to adopt a course with regard to our own tariff, different from what the party had advocated before, because the United States were not friendly because they were not disposed to give us a fair reciprocity treaty. We have, then, information coming from the mover and seconder of the Address, information which the leader of the House does not condescend to give us; nevertheless we feel we have a right to discuss this question and elicit all the information we can upon it, although it does not seem that we are going to get very much. The hon. gentleman who moved the Address said, among other things, that he trusted the government and the parliament of this country would never mind what had taken place, never mind what had been said in campaign speeches and campaign literature, but go to work as reasonable men and frame a tariff based on the present circumstances of the country. In one respect the advice is very good, but I can hardly think the other part of the advice, that is that the members of the government should pay no attention to their campaign speeches was very moral and I am sure such advice was not needed because, short a time as this government has been in power, they show that they need no mentor at their shoulder to remind them that they should pay no attention to their previous promises and pledges. They are amply able to perform that service of violating their pledges without any prompting from him. But while so much stress is laid upon the fact that the McKinley tariff is being revived in the United States as a circumstance which should alter the views of the government and the attitude of the parliament of this country towards the United States, have we forgotten that it is not the first time we have had to encounter the McKinley tariff? We had a McKinley tariff in operation before, and the Conservative party had to face that tariff and strengthen its national policy tariff in view of the action of the United States Congress. It was under the influence of the McKinley tariff that we strengthened our agricultural duties against the United States, duties that have proved to be greatly to the advantage of the farmers of Canada. The Conservative government of Canada, did precisely what these gentlemen say they feel themselves impelled to do now, that is, they strengthened their hands against the United States in dealing with that country, on account of the passage of the McKinley Bill when it was first enacted. What did our opponents say then? Did Mr. Laurier and the gentlemen now associated with him say that the Conservative government did right? No, they said we had been the cause of the enactment of the McKinley tariff and that we were riveting that tariff on Canada by pursuing a retaliatory course. They said we should do nothing of the kind. I heard Mr. Laurier in a speech at Charlottetown tell the fable of the sun and the north wind endeavouring to compel the traveller to take off his coat. It was the same fable he has told so often with regard to the Manitoba school question. It served his purpose with regard to the trade question and our dealings with the United States, and latterly it has served his purpose in discussing the Manitoba school question. He has been following the sunny ways of patriotism. That was the course which he said should be pursued then and which was to be pursued should his party attain to power, and now we find inklings from the speech of the hon. leader of this House, and ample evidence in the speeches of the gentlemen who spoke for the government in moving and seconding the Address, and we have abundant evidence in the press that they are going to find a pretext for going back on their pre-election pledges on the trade question, from the reintroduction of the McKinley tariff in the United States—although that tariff, as far as it relates to Canada, was just as hostile under President Harrison as it now proposes to be under President McKinley. One little difference is all that my attention has been called to, as being more severe against us. There is an increased duty on white pine, and that is about the only difference between the McKinley tariff as it previously existed and as it appears now before Congress; yet hon. gentlemen opposite condemned our government because we stiffened our tariff to meet the hostile tariff of the United States. Now they ask us to excuse them when they propose to go back on their pre-election pledges, because, forsooth, they have to meet this same McKinley tariff. The hon. leader of the House in gently letting himself down from former positions and in reply, I think to an interruption, or in reply to my hon. friend the Leader of the Opposition, stated that it would be impossible to have even a revenue tariff without protection, therefore, he is going to find some justification for adopting a protective tariff, because a revenue tariff there, may possible give incidental protection. I know that my hon. friend and his colleagues, before election, talked about a revenue tariff, but the only public intimation that has been made of what their tariff is to be is in the matter of bituminous coal, and my hon. friend will not pretend to say that the duty on bituminous coal in Canada is intended for revenue only. If that is his object, I wish him joy of the increased revenue he is going to get out of that duty. He will get very little revenue from it. Its object is simply protection and nothing else, and my hon. friend is evidently preparing to excuse himself for departing from his position as the exponent of the principle of a tariff for revenue only, because it is possible some incidental protection may be given by a revenue tariff.

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—Ontario pays a million dollars revenue on bituminous coal.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—And anthracite coal is free. If the duty is retained upon coal, the main effect of it is protection.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Oh, no.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—It has been one of the strongest points of objection on the part of the Liberal party in the upper provinces that the Conservative government imposed this duty for protective purposes, and although it may be true that some bituminous coal had been imported into the province of Ontario and a duty paid upon it, still the general trend of the duty on bituminous coal is for protection and not for revenue purposes. With regard to the pre-election policy and the course of the Liberal party on this question, I would just read two or three words from the Ottawa platform, which my hon. friend the leader of the government in this House did a good deal towards framing. Here are the words:

> We denounce the principle of protection as radically unsound and unjust to the masses of the people, and we declare our conviction that any tariff changes based on that principle must fail to afford any substantial relief from the burdens under which the country labours. This issue we unhesitatingly accept, and upon it we await with the fullest confidence the verdict of the electors of Canada.

Here is the platform of the party, and in amplifying and explaining that platform a gentleman with whose utterances I am more familiar than with those of any other member of the government—the Hon. Mr. Davies—when speaking in Middleton, N.S., in fall of 1893, said that the policy of the Liberal party was to eliminate every vestige of protection from the tariff. He said the great historical battle between free trade and protection was now opening in Canada, and this is the declaration with which I was familiar and with which my friends in the lower provinces have been familiar for some years. This declaration has always been emphatic, and was just as emphatic after the announcement of the Ottawa platform as before. Now we come to the extraordinary course pursued by the government with regard to this question. Speaking in Montreal, in one of the closing days of 1895, the Hon. Mr. Laurier, as was quoted in this House the other day, said it would be the policy of the government to make raw material free, and he indicated that coal and iron, as the raw material for the manufacturers, would be admitted free under the tariff which it was proposed the Liberal party should put in force in Canada. He secured the votes of many manufacturers in Montreal and elsewhere by that statement, yet in the face of that statement of the hon. the leader of the government, and the public had a right to believe that he spoke for his party, we have the Finance Minister going to Montreal and receiving a deputation of coal men and telling them that the coal duties were to be retained in view of the change of circumstances in the United States. Here we have an extreme divergence between the statements of the leader of the government when speaking to the people, as leader of the Opposition and the statement of his Finance Minister. It is a most extraordinary spectacle to find two prominent men, the Premier and his Finance Minister, putting such diametrically opposite views before the country, and it remains to be seen within the next few weeks which of them has been speaking more correctly. Notwithstanding the fact that Mr. Fielding's statement is the later one, I am inclined to think that after all Mr. Laurier's statement is correct, and my reason for that is the extraordinary action of the Liberal party in Nova Scotia at the present moment. Mr. Fielding makes this important declaration—and I will speak later about the propriety of his making such a declaration at all. I am now speaking of the declaration itself. We find that immediately following that declaration Mr. Murray, the gentleman that followed him in the leadership of his party in Nova Scotia, dissolved the House and issued a manifesto to the electors declaring that the object in dissolving the House before it would naturally die by efflux of time was the desire of the government to elicit a strong expression from the people of Nova Scotia in favour of the retention of the coal duty. It is a most extraordinary thing that Mr. Murray should feel it necessary to bring such strong influence to bear on the Dominion government if he believed the statement of Mr. Fielding. He will try to secure votes in Nova Scotia on the strength of Mr. Fielding's declaration, but the very fact that he finds it necessary to prematurely dissolve the House and try to snatch a verdict from the people before the government here passes on the tariff question—all indicate to me plainly that in his inner heart Mr. Murray believes it is not the intention of the Government to retain the coal duty, but simply an attempet to secure the votes of the people of Nova Scotia before the facts with regard to the tariff come to be known. It looks extremely like it, and I may say I regard the action of Mr. Fielding in making such an announcement as he has made as being very extraordinary conduct on the part of a Cabinet Minister. I understood the leader of the House to say yesterday that Mr. Fielding was authorized to make that statement. Did I understand the hon. gentleman correctly?

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—That is what he said.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—I presume by the hon. gentleman's silence now that I heard him correctly and that Mr. Fielding was authorized to make that statement.

Hon. Sir OLIVER MOWAT—The government were quite aware that that statement was to be made.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—That implies that they discussed it in the Cabinet?

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—I think we have had so much of that kind of thing that we have to go further than to censure Mr. Fielding. The indecency of making this declaration when any intelligent man in the country will understand the object of it was to influence the coming elections in Nova Scotia——

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I never thought of it.

Hon Mr. FERGUSON—There could be no other object. My hon. friend says he never thought of it. He is the most innocent man in the world. No such thought ever comes into his innocent heart. He may never have thought of it. Perhaps he did not, but there were men around him who thought of it without any doubt, and if this was not the object in making the statement with regard to the coal duty why were there not advance statements made with regard to other industries which have just as good a right to be informed as to the policy of the government as the coal industry has. Is there any reason that can be shown why the coal interest was suffering from uncertainty as to the tariff more than any other interest?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Yes.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—I would like to take my seat if the hon. gentleman will tell me what that reason is.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—The announcement by the United States of a duty of 75 cents on Nova Scotia coal imported into the republic.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—What has that to do with it?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Everything.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Your policy is free trade. What has the policy of the United States government to do with the coal duty in Canada?

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—That is not the only product of Canada on which there has been an announcement of an advance in the American duty. If that were the case there might be some reason in the statement of my hon. friend, but we know that it is not the only one. There are numerous articles on which the duty will be increased in the United States as well as coal, and the people of the country have to look ahead in making their arrangements in other matters just as much as in the coal industry, and perhaps more. Take pork packing for instance. There is a certain season of the year when pork packers buy their stock, when the farmers put it in the market, and these men have been buying pork all winter, protected as the market was with 2 cents a pound duty, aud they did not know and have not been able to learn, unless some special friends of the government have been advised by some one in the cabinet, what the change in the tariff is to be. The pork packer has no means of knowing whether the duty of 2 cents is to remain as a protection to that industry until the time arrives for him to sell his stock. Pork has to be purchased some months before the packer can dispose of it. Farmers in my province were bringing pork to market in the months of January, February and March which they sold at a loss on account of the uncertainty. The packers were buying and had not the means of sending it away during the winter and did not know but by the time their pork would reach the lumbermen's camp or the market where it was sold that the duty might be abolished. Why were not the pork packers and farmers informed of the intention of the government, as well as the coal miners? Mr. Laurier made a declaration at St. Johns, P. Q., during the election of Mr. Tarte, last summer, announcing that an inquiry was going to be made—that Mr. Fielding was going to travel over the country to investigate the working of the tariff. I felt in my heart then that the government intended to recede from their pre-election promises on the trade question to a great extent and were trying to get a good excuse for doing it. And that was long before the renewal of McKinley tariff was threatened by the United States Congress. My reason for that opinion I stated briefly in this House on that occasion. It was that if they intended to adhere to their pre-election pledges and give us a tariff for revenue only it was not necessary to go about the country consulting the manufacturers at all. The productiveness of the tax, the revenue requirements of the country and such considerations as these, were all they had a right to consider, but the moment they went around with their caps in the hands asking how this industry and that industry was going to be affected by the increase or reduction of the tax, it was at once apparent that they contemplated receeding from the position they had taken before the elections, and what has occurred since then amply justifies the opinion I entertained with regard to their course. I feel there has been a vast amount of damage done to the commercial and agricultural interests of this country, and to our people generally, by this long delay and by the uncertain sound which the government have been making with regard to their tariff policy. This session has been unduly delayed. We have met at a time of the year which they were never tired of condemning when the Conservatives no matter what reason they had to give, called a late session, and now when there are grave reasons for an early session and an early announcement of the policy, they have pursued a course very different from that which they said was the proper course to be pursued when they were in opposition. My hon. friends on the other side of the House, the mover and seconder of the Address and the leader of the government himself, expressed in their speeches very great satisfaction that the Manitoba school question had been amicably settled. I have been reading the newspapers and watching the current of events, and I fail to find any evidence of a settlement at all. It is true that some conference has taken place between the government of Canada and the government of Manitoba. We have been told of that in the Speech from the Throne, and certain terms have been laid on the table of this House and a bill is passing through the legislature of Manitoba on the question. The idea when a great controversy existed between the minority and majority in Manitoba that a settlementhas been reached without consulting or trying to satisfy the minority at all, is a contradiction in terms. I fail to see that there has been a settlement of that question and evidence is abundant on the other hand, that the question is still unsettled. It is a troubler of Israel as much now as it ever was. I feel that the mover and the seconder of the Address had very small ground when they congratulated the leader of the House on what they called the settlement of this Manitoba school question. The seconder of the Address said that this settlement or agreement was approved of by the electorate of Canada. What evidence have we of that? I have no doubt some hon. gentlemen will say, as I have heard it stated in another place, that two elections which have been recently held, one in the county of Wright and the other in the county of Bonaventure, in the province of Quebec in which the government were successful by large majorities, is evidence that the Manitoba school question is settled to the satisfaction at least of the province of Quebec. But what is the evidence that is coming in from day to day with regard even to the carrying of these very counties? We find that the gentlemen who contested these elections and their friends, and even members of the government themselves, declined to say to the people of Quebec at those elections that there was a complete and perfect and final settlement of the question. On the contrary, they said—the premier himself said in Montreal not long ago—that it was only the first instalment, and Mr. Guité who was elected the other day for Bonaventure, told the people that he would work hard to get greater advantage for the minority in Manitoba. He led the people there to believe that the matter was not settled yet, but that the good work would still go on. If that is so, in place of these elections being a verdict in favour of the so-called settlement they are rather a verdict to the contrary, and prove that the government are still holding out hopes to those who sympathize with the minority in Manitoba that still further concessions will be made to their friends in that province. The only election that is really important with regard to this question was the local election in St. Boniface, Manitoba, which was brought about by the resignation of Mr. Prendergast, one of the sunny ways of the government was to provide a judgeship for Mr. Prendergast who had been one of the strong advocates, in the local legislature, of the rights of the minority. An appropriation was put in the estimates last year which it was surmised, when it passed through the House, was to provide a judgeship and a salary for that gentleman with the hope that he would advise the acceptance of anything that Mr. Laurier would provide for the minority, and in that way they applied the sunny ways of patriotism to settling that question. There was a settlement in Mr. Prendergast's case no doubt. There was a settlement even in the case of

Mr. Donohoe, who appeared before the Privy Council against his co-religionists. He has been provided for, but it does not appear that the parties affected by this settlement are at all satisfied with its terms, and until the rights and privileges for which they contend are restored to them, it is unlikely that they will be satisfied, and the hon. gentleman opposite need not lay the flattering unction to their souls that the question can be settled until they have made peace with the minority of Manitoba. We were told when the Conservative government had to deal with this question that the facts were not ascertained, that it was foolish on the part of the government of Canada to attempt to deal with this question without ascertaining the facts. How could they know what the exact difficulties of the situation in Manitoba were until they had taken evidence on that point, and they said that as soon as they came into power, they were going to appoint a royal commission for the purpose of going to Manitoba and visiting these schools and meeting the people who were interested and examining them on their oath and taking the necessary evidence, in order to find out what the exact nature of the remedy should be. Mr. Laurier went so far as to say that on the very day he got into power he would appoint two commissions, one to go to the United States, and the other to Manitoba, and that the leader of this House Sir Oliver Mowat, would be chairman of the commission to be appointed to visit Manitoba and take evidence on this school question. The whole thing was outlined. My hon. friend had achieved some credit among the Catholics of Ontario for standing up for them, as it was believed he had done, in connection with the separate schools. His name was used with the Catholic people, and they were told that this man, who was their friend, would be chairman of the commission, and they could rest assured that what he had done for the Catholics of Ontario he would do for their friends in Manitoba. I do not know why this plan did not materialize. I do not know why my hon. friend was not placed at the head of a commission of that kind to take evidence in Manitoba on this question. But we know that such a commission was not appointed, Whether it was my hon. friend felt that he was unequal to the task and that the sunny ways of patriotism were more effectual than cold facts that he could elicit by going up there, he was not appointed, and Mr. Tarte, another member of the government, went up there instead. I think Mr. Tarte did visit one school up there in which there was some little trouble on the question of the commissariat between the teacher and himself. I believe the inquiry he made on that occasion was his only inquiry with regard to the state of the schools in Manitoba. The promises which had been made with regard to the appointment of a commission and the making of an inquiry have all been cast to the wind. Mr. Tarte went up there and made some reports to his colleagues ; Mr. Greenway came down here and the result is this paragraph or two providing that there may be religious instruction between half past three and four o'clock in certain schools. That is what it all ends in. These people contended that by the constitution they had some privileges, which privileges they claim have been taken away. The Lords of the Privy Council of England found that their contention was right ; promises were made by the hon. gentleman's leader, the Hon. Mr. Laurier, that he would restore the rights of the minority in Manitoba. He was not going to do it by coercion, but he would do it more fully than the late government proposed to do it by the remedial bill. Instead of that, here we have this paltry provision which I am told by parties who have more experience in such matters than I have myself will be found perfectly useless and calculated, if put into effect at all, to create in the minds of the children a repugnance against religion altogether, because they will be kept in half an hour longer than other children. It will create a distaste for religion, and instead of being a help, as it should be it will be a detriment. The leader of this House yesterday denied that there was any understanding between the government of Canada and the government of Manitoba with regard to the initiation of this troublesome question. He does not dispute the fact that the government of Manitoba threw this apple of discord into the politics of this country by passing the School Act of 1890, but he denies that there was any understanding between themselves and the Federal government at any time during the course of the events. With regard to that subject I will take the word of my hon. friend as speaking for himself. He only came into federal politics at a comparatively recent date, but before he came in there were no doubts in my mind that there were parties acting in collusion. I need only point to the fact that after the remedial order was passed and Mr. Montague accepted office in the government of Sir Mackenzie Bowell, Mr. Sifton, the Attorney General of Manitoba, came down and entered into the campaign in Haldimand against Mr. Montague. If they were not acting in concert that would not have occurred, we would not have Mr. Sifton interfering in an election in favour of the Liberal parti and against the Hon. Mr. Montague, a member of the government who was seeking re-election. But we have stronger evidence than that. In December, 1895, just before the legislature of Manitoba was dissolved, the same gentleman (Mr. Sifton) came down to Montreal and had a consultation with Mr Laurier. He went back, and immediately afterwards the legislature of Manitoba was dissolved and a general election was brought on. That general election had a most embarrassing effect on any settlement of that question between the government of Canada and the government of Manitoba. It was natural to expect that the Premier of Manitoba, in going to his constituents at that time with that question a burning and live issue would commit himself very solidly against any reasonable legislation towards meeting the views of the Federal government, and it was evident that an appeal was made to the people in order to furnish an answer which could not be overcome on the part of anybody that the government of Manitoba could not meet the views of the Federal government in restoring separate schools in that province. It was evident from the fact that that step was not taken until Mr. Sifton came down to Montreal and had a consultation with Mr. Laurier, and that step, the most important one in the whole history of the question, was taken immediately afterwards and at the time the opposition here were pressing the war with all the vigour they could against the Sir Mackenzie Bowell's government. That action was taken after consultation between the Attorney General of Manitoba and the leader of the opposition party of that day and the effect of it was most disastrous against securing a settlement of the question in the interest of the minority of the people in Manitoba. My hon. friend speaking for the government of Manitoba, says he believes they acted in good faith, in passing that Act of 1890. He thinks they passed that Act believing it to be ultra vires and because they felt that it was the best measure for education that they could possibly pass for that province. This was the substance of what my hon. friend said yesterday. I have rather a different opinion to present to the House with regard to that point. I do not want to throw any apple of discord between gentlemen who sit so closely together in this House and in the government of the country, but it is only right that the leader of the House should be put on his guard, because when he makes a statement of that kind, we can turn up statements of his colleagues in an altogether opposite direction. He says that the government of Manitoba acted in good faith, that they passed this bill not for the purpose of creating discord, but for the purpose of passing the very best measure they thought they could provide in the interest of their province. Speaking in this House in 1894, the hon. Secretary of State, who sits beside his leader now, used these words :—

> The parties who passed the law, I am quite satisfied, felt sure it was ultra vires. It was done evidently by a trick, as pointed out by the hon. member from St. Boniface, not done after an agitation by the press or the people. It was done by political tricksters (no one else would have sown all this discord) just to meet their own political purposes.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Quite correct.

Hon. Sir OLIVER MOWAT—What mistake did my hon. friend make?

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—It is the hon. Minister of Quebec himself who has made the mistake. I call attention to the very great harmony which seems to prevail in the views of hon. gentlemen in the government. The leader says they acted in good faith; the Secretary of State says they were tricksters who passed it.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I think so now.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—I wonder how the hon. gentleman can sit in a cabinet with one of those political tricksters. Mr. Sifton, his colleague, is one of those political tricksters.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—He has repented since.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—We have no evidence of that. It must be a delightful condition of affairs in that cabinet. We have a gentleman in the cabinet who is regarded, by one of his colleagues at least, as a political trickster.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—I do not think he was in the Manitoba government at the time Mr. Martin was in.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—He was a member of the Manitoba legislature and assisted in passing the Act of 1890. The sunny ways of patriotism were practised on Mr. Sifton, too. My hon. friend the leader of the House said yesterday that the remedial order as it was passed by the late government attempted to force upon the province of Manitoba a restoration of the separate school as they had existed.

Hon. Sir OLIVER MOWAT—Substantially, I said.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—Not even with this modification is the statement correct. The principle of separate schools was to be recognized, that the people of Manitoba had under the Act of 1870,—that the Privy Council had declared they had a right to have. That was the important privilege that had been taken away. That was the privilege that it was intended should be restored to them. All that was clear enough, but the remedial order did not profess to restore the separate schools, either as they were or substantially as they were—that is in regard to the state of efficiency in which they were. There is a good deal of dispute on the point as to the efficiency of those schools.

Hon. Mr. BERNIER—They were efficient.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—I do not think it affects the argument in the slightest respect whether they were efficient or not. It was the duty of the parliament of Manitoba to make them efficient. It was in their power to deal with them, and if they were inefficient in any respect, it was their duty to make them efficient. That was what the government of Sir Mackenzie Bowell aimed at when they introduced the Remedial Bill, to restore the right which had been taken away from them, to restore separate schools, to restore them in a state of complete efficiency, as far as it was in the power of the Federal government to do so. They could not do everything. There were some things which it was not possible for them to accomplish, but as far as it was in the power of the government of Canada to restore the schools and put them in an efficient state, they endeavoured to do so. My hon. friend says that the agreement which has been entered into between the province of Manitoba and the Federal government will, after a while, give satisfaction, and that the same happy results will follow from it as have resulted in the maritime provinces, where there was some trouble in the beginning over the schools, and where happily in the most of the provinces at least compromises have been agreed upon, and substantial advantages have been given to the Catholic minorities in matters of education. My hon. friend says he hopes and trusts and believes that the same results will follow the action of his government in Manitoba. My hon. friend must, however, bear in mind that there is a very important difference in the case of the schools in the maritime provinces and the case of the Manitoba schools. In all three of the maritime provinces, the minority had no right, by law or practice, before confederation to separate schools. No separate schools were established in fulfilment of the bargain of confederation, or in any other way. They never had a system of separate schools and the minority have no constitutional right to them, although they tried to get their views carried out. When they were fairly defeated at the polls, and found that they could not carry their point, they submitted and made the best they could of the situation, and in a great many cases, though not in all cases, they found a majority, not bound by any constitutional guarantee, ready to give them any advantages they desired and disposed to meet them in a fair and generous spirit. That is the state of things in the lower provinces, but the case of Manitoba is entirely different. The case of Manitoba is as strong as that of Ontario or Quebec, where the minorities have constitutional rights and privileges, and they feel that they have a right to stand out for them and there is a feeling in the mind of every man who respects the institutions under which we live that they should be treated fairly and no deduction should be drawn from the cases of the maritime provinces where there was no such constitutional guarantee to prevent them from having their rights restored. But in addition to sunny ways of patriotism which the leader of the government and his friends have been adopting, they have taken another and a most remarkable mode of dealing with the matter. An appeal has been made to Rome. I notice that when some such statement as that was made in the House of Commons the other day the premier became very indignant and requested that notice should be given as he wished to have an opportunity to give an answer on that question which would show what were the facts of the case. He was indignant that an insinuation should be made on the floor of parliament that an emissary had been sent to Rome for the purpose of securing influence on behalf of the settlement his government had made. Notwithstanding the apparent indignation of the hon. premier on that occasion—notwithstanding the apparent reluctance on the part of the members of the government in discussing this question, we cannot ignore the fact that is known to every inhabitant of this Dominion that there have been frequent pilgrimages to Rome on this question. Abbé Proulx, Chevalier Drolet, Mr. Russell, the law agent of the government of Canada, and a member of the government itself, Mr. Fitzpatrick, was there.

Hon. Mr. POWER—And Senator Landry was there too.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—My hon. friend may have been there too for all I know, but I seriously doubt if the hon. gentleman went there for the purpose of invoking the influence of the Sovereign Pontiff in favour of the settlement made by my hon. friend on the school question. I very much doubt whether he went there for that purpose or for the purpose of soliciting the intervention of the Sovereign Pontiff in the political affairs of Canada. I have serious doubt whether he went there for the one purpose or the other. Whether he went there or not I do not know; but the gentlemen I have mentioned went there, and it appears that a representative of the Sovereign Pontiff is now in this country who has been brought from Rome at the solicitation of members of the government—I suppose not in their capacity as members of the government. I do not suppose they signed their names to the memorial with their cabinet designations following, but it is nevertheless apparent and clear that this gentleman is here at the solicitation of members of the government with a view if possible to bring the great influence which he wields to bear in favour of their policy on this school question. It would really seem from the newspaper reports that have been published within the last two or three days —they may not be correct, but in the end such statements with regard to gentlemen in this government, that have been denied have been found to be correct so often that we are inclined to attach some importance to the intimations we have of double dealing in connection with this question—that we have not yet heard all the facts in connection with the gentleman's visit to Canada. The charge of double dealing is made on the tariff question and on the Manitoba school question and many other questions, and it is now being hinted in the press that there has been double dealing on this subject also and that the ablegate who is now in Canada, was brought here with the impression in his mind and probably in the mind of His Holiness as well, that his visit to Canada was to be undertaken with a view to taking part in the settlement of the school question, because he expressed his regret that the bill had been passed in the Manitoba legislature before he entered upon his work. It is very evident from that—it is extremely likely at all events—that there has been double dealing and that the ablegate was led to believe if he came here that the government of Canada would be guided very largely by his advice in the matter and that even the government of Manitoba, who have been officially notified of his arrival in this country—even the government of Mr. Greenway would be very glad to listen to his representations and do justice to the minority. It would almost seem that this ablegate has been brought into this country with the prospect held out to him and probably to the distinguished Pontiff who had accredited him that he would play a very different part in this question from what he will find he will be able to do. It further appears that this gentleman has been brought to Canada for the purpose of censuring or approving of the acts of the Roman Catholic clergy of Canada in political matters. It would seem that he will indicate the lines they should pursue, and that he has been brought out by politicians for that purpose. I am not a Roman Catholic. I am a Protestant, and have very little concern in matters between the Roman Catholic Pontiff and his clergy, or between the clergy and their people. They are a large and intelligent body in this country, a great church organization which all of us, no matter how much we may differ from them, have to respect. We know that they are eminently able to manage their own affairs without any interference on the part of parliament or governments, and I feel bound to say that I would feel my interests as a Protestant and the interest of the Protestants of this country just as safe in the hands of the Roman Catholic clergy, as far as their influence goes, as I would in the hands of the gentleman who has been brought into this country to influence the settlement of this question. The Roman Catholic clergy of Canada and bishops of of Canada are Canadian citizens. They were born and brought up amongst us. They have our feelings and sympathies. They understand us and they are very much more likely to form a correct judgment on this school question than a stranger from Rome. We must not forget that in all the trying days of Canada from the breaking out of the American war up to the present time the Roman Catholic hierarchy and clergy of Canada stood nobly by the institutions of the country. During the war of the American revolution their influences was steadily exerted to keep the French Canadian people in the British Empire and to prevent them from joining the rebels. Notwithstanding the great military glory that France achieved in the wars of Napoleon glory enough to inspire the sons of France although they were so far away from their motherland, yet, during all this time the French of Canada were kept steady in their allegiance to the British Empire and principally through the influence of the clergy. We know that the rebellion of 1837, as far as the province of Quebec was concerned, would have assumed very different proportions if it had not been for want of sympathy on the part of the Roman Catholic clergy who adhered loyally to the government during that period. It is no concern of mine what this gentleman who has been brought into Canada may do on this question, but I feel as a Protestant and as Canadian that I am quite as safe and the interests of Protestants and Catholics are quite as safe as regards the influence which the Roman Catholic hierarchy and clergy exert as they would be under such influence as the government appears to have invoked on this question. I wish to read four very distinct opinions upon this Manitoba school question to the House before drawing my remarks to a close. I wish to quote authorities which I think hon. gentlemen sitting opposite me will not be inclined to treat with disrespect. I feel assured that each and every one of the words I am going to read will be entitled to a great deal of respect. The first opinion which I quote is that of the Hon. Mr. Laurier himself. He said in April, 1893 :—

> I affirm this at the outset, as I read the constitution of this country, as I read the British North America Act, and the Manitoba School Act, I say that there is within the provisions of the constitution an appeal given to the minority of Manitoba wherever they feel oppressed by local legislation in the matter of education.

This is a positive opinion by Mr. Laurier, that there was an appeal, that they had a right of redress. Then, I quote from the Hon. Mr. Davies in the debate in Parliament last session. He is a gentleman for whose opinion I am sure the leader of this House has great respect. He said :

> I have not heard any lawyer who valued his reputation, any lawyer of standing or any constitutional authority ever express the doubt that there is a power constitutionally vested in the government of Canada to hear an appeal, and that after they have heard and allowed the appeal there is power on the part of this parliament to intervene and enact a remedial order, if it chose.

This is what Mr. McCarthy said when pleading the case before the Privy Council :

> The Superior Court held that the separate school law of 1871, being a matter which the legislature had the right to pass, they had the right to repeal it. That was held in the Barrett case, but it was also held nevertheless by the Privy Council, that the taking away, in 1890, of the rights given in 1871, did constitute a grievance which gave the minority the right to seek redress in the way that they are now doing.

This is Mr. McCarthy's admission. Following on in logical sequence we have the opinion of my hon. friend from Bothwell, in a speech delivered in parliament last year, and contains the ablest constitutional discussion of that question which it has been my pleasure to read. The first half of the speech was devoted to a constitutional discussion of the question, and an admirable argument it is, and I commend it to everyone who has not read it. I am sorry I cannot compliment him with the closing part of the speech, which is very illogical, erratic and inconsistent with the early part of it.

It is also a well settled rule that where there is a right by law in the supplant to seek for relief there is a corresponding duty to hear his complaint, and if a substantial right or privilege be injuriously affected or destroyed to redress the grievance and restore the privilege taken away. This legal and constitutional obligation rests upon every state functionary from the sovereign down to the humblest officer to whom any portion of state authority is entrusted.

Here was the declaration of the hon. gentleman, with which I fully agree. When all these things were established, as they have been by Mr. Laurier and Mr. Davies and Mr. McCarthy in the extracts I have already read, then he says an obligation rested upon every state functionary, from the sovereign down to the humblest officer, to fulfil the duty and restore the privilege which had been taken away. I say, in view of this law, so ably expounded by the hon. member from Bothwell, endorsed by the declarations of the other gentlemen I have read, that it was the duty of the parliament of Canada to restore the provision of the old Act of Manitoba, to restore the separate schools and make them thoroughly efficient, and until that duty is performed there will be trouble in this country. That is my own honest, candid opinion. It may be very difficult to accomplish. The difficulties have been amazingly increased within the last year, but when my hon. friend, the leader of this House, Sir Mackenzie Bowell, staked his political reputation upon settling that question upon the lines of the constitution, when he brought down his Remedial Order when the Bill was presented to parliament, and ably presented to parliament by Sir Charles Tupper and supported by the large body of Conservative Protestants and Catholics in that House, if Mr. Laurier had risen in his seat and manfully given it his support, the trouble would have ended. But we have the trouble continued amongst us because Mr. Laurier was more anxious for office than to do what was fair for his weak, struggling co-religionists in the province of Manitoba. My hon. friend the seconder of the Address spoke of the electorate having spoken on this question, referring to recent by-elections. I have here a statement that I must read to the House. It appears that during the election at Bonaventure double dealing was practised. There were two manifestos issued there, one to the Protestants and one to the Roman Catholics in favour of Mr. Guité. Here is an extract from the Protestant manifesto:—

All honour to Mr. Guité! In our country independent men like Mr. Guité are rare and we ought to give him our confidence and our votes. If Mr. Guité had been willing to sign the ultimatum of the Bishop of Rimouski, he would have been elected by acclamation. He prefers to fight rather than to become a slave and lose his independence. All honour to him. By signing that declaration Mr. Guité would have ignored the fact that in Bonaventure more than one-third of the electors are Protestants who cling to liberty of conscience and wish to put an end to the racial struggles which are running the province and the Dominion.

This was the language addressed to the Protestants of Bonaventure, who form one-third of the population. Here is the circular issued to the Roman Catholics:—

The Manitoba school question has reached its present phase through the criminal negligence of the Conservative party, which by a word or a stroke of the pen, could have prevented the Greenway government from putting into force the law of 1890, which abolished separate schools, by disallowing the bill in accordance with the power conferred upon the Federal government by the Constitution. The Conservative party has shamefully deceived, insulted and humiliated our revered Episcopate by refusing their just demands for the disallowance of the bill so as to wipe the Greenway school legistion out of existence.

This same Conservative party caused the death, through disappointment and chagrin, of the venerable Bishop of St. Boniface, Mgr. Taché, to whom it had given a promise to re-establish separate schools.

In its hatred of the French and the Catholics, this same Conservative party, in spite of the opposition of Messrs. Laurier and Blake, incorporated the Orange Order, that sect of fanatics which works for the destruction of our religion.

The Liberal party, on the other hand, under the Hon. Mr. Mercier, was the first to install as the deputy minister of a department a priest of our religion, Mgr. Labelle, with a salary of $3,000 a year.

It was the Liberal party which, after years of vain promises on the part of the Conservatives, paid $400,000 to the Jesuits as indemnity for the property of which they had been unjustly robbed by the English government.

It was the Hon. Mr. Laurier, who on the floor of the House of Commons and in the presence of the Orangemen at Toronto protested with all his might and the energy of his superb eloquence against the miserable attempt to disallow the Jesuit Estates Act.

It was again Mr. Laurier who on the floor of parliament denounced the execution of Riel by the Tory party. In this instance, again, the voice of the episcopate had asked for executive clemency to spare the life of the Metis leader. Once more the clergy and the episcopate were treated as pariahs, with scorn and disdain, and Riel was hanged.

The church has not pronounced against Mr. Laurier. The august voice of the Pope has not made itself heard, and when the illustrious father speaks, he will render unto Cæsar the things that are Cæsar's and unto Mr. Laurier the things that are Mr. Laurier's.

These counter blasts, one intended to excite and to prejudice the minds of the Catholics and the other intended to excite and to prejudice the minds of the Protestants, were issued in Bonaventure and it appears they succeeded. Also in the county of St. Boniface, in the local election, a similar attempt was made to secure votes for the Greenway candidate on the ground that he was opposed to the settlement, and it is believed that most of the few votes of the Catholic minority which were given to him were given on the strength of the statement that he would oppose the settlement. My hon. friend the Secretary of State and the hon. premier of this country, since he has become the premier, have censured the government of Sir John Macdonald and Sir John Thompson for the present state of the Manitoba school question, inasmuch as they did not disallow the Act of 1890. In a document, from the pen of the hon. premier, he introduced the old argument to us that the Conservatives were responsible because they did not disallow this Act.

The hon. gentleman appeared to think this parliament has a short memory. We have not forgotten that it was Mr. Blake who introduced the famous resolution in 1890 which tied the hands of the government in regard to disallowance and he introduced it after having declared and declared repeatedly during the progress of his speech, that he brought in that resolution at that time and was desirous it should receive consideration and be disposed of in view of what was happening then in Manitoba in the passage of this very Act. It is true Sir John accepted Mr. Blake's suggestion on that occasion, but it is equally true that the Hon. Mr. Laurier was in the House and perhaps my hon. friend from Bothwell was in the House, but I did not search the journals to find out whether he was there that day or not, but I know Mr. Laurier was there when that resolution was passed unanimously.

Hon Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—He seconded it.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—Then that is still stronger. The Hon. Mr. Laurier, seconded Mr. Blake's resolution, and still that same gentleman has gone round this country, and his colleagues have gone round the country, censuring the government of Sir John Macdonald because they did not disallow the Act of 1890. I never knew the case was so strong as it is. I knew he was in the House and silently acquiesced in the resolution, but now, I am told, he seconded it, and he himself was a prime mover in the act of Parliament that put the power of disallowance out of the hands of the government. We know in 1891, when the Blake bill was introduced in parliament, Mr. Laurier was present and he took part in the discussion on that occasion. Hon. gentlemen who will take the trouble to look at Hansard will find that Mr. Laurier was under the impression that the action parliament was taking was to take away the power of disallowance and to have these educational questions altogether and completely settled by the Privy Council: that the ministerial responsibility was going, and he approved of that, but where he thought the bill was faulty was that it did not go that far in regard to other measures as well as in educational questions. I will just read what he says, and it will more clearly bring out the state of his mind when he made his speech:

> As I understand the wording of this bill it is proposed that on all questions arising out of the appellate jurisdiction given to the government and to parliament where the provisions regarding schools in the provinces is concerned on all such questions which may be referred to the Supreme Court the decision of the court is to be final and binding on the government. That is whatever the legislation referred may be under such circumstances if it is pronounced by the Supreme Court to be legal or not legal, or within the powers of the province that decision shall be binding on the government and that shall be an end of the question. "I submit it to the Minister of Justice that whenever the constitutionality of an act has been proposed to the court for decision its decision should be binding and final, not only on the appellant jurisdiction of the government on matters of education but on all other matters as well."

He was anxious that the appeal should not only be final and binding on the government, on educational questions, but in all other matters as well that the same effect should take place. So, the premier of Canada, who has so often condemned the government of Canada for not disallowing the Act, was himself a party to the introduction of the Blake resolutions and bill. He seconded the Blake resolutions, and expressed himself in the way I have read to the House when finally under consideration and adopted by the House, showing that the hon. gentleman was fully committed to the settling of this question in the courts, and that he fully believed that the decision of the court was to be final and binding on the government of the country and everybody else, when he supported it. Therefore, it does not lie in the mouth of Mr. Laurier or any of his friends to allege, as they have been alleging up to the present time, that the government of Sir John Macdonald is wholly to blame because they did not disallow the Manitoba School Act of 1890.

Hon. Mr. MILLS.—I suppose the government had some reason for acquiescing in that motion.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON.—Yes, and they have never gone back on that. The Conservative party believe that action was well taken, and the process of sending that question for solution to the courts was the right and proper way to deal with it. The Blake Bill made it the legal way to deal with it, and they saw no reason to change their minds and they have submitted to the decisions of the Privy Council, first when they were favourable to the government of Manitoba and in the second place when they were in favour of the minority. They are lovers and respecters of the constitution of Canada, bound to yield respect and deference to the decisions of its legal tribunals and they have done so. But the Hon. Mr. Laurier and his friends, after being as fully committed to the Blake bill and resolution as were Sir John and his friends, had gone about the country misrepresenting the facts and alleging that Sir John Macdonald's government was entirely responsible for the non-disallowance of the Manitoba School Act, and that that was done because they had no sincere regard for the rights of the Roman Catholic minority. Before leaving this question, I wish to make just one other observation. Our friends in the opposition have never failed to allege that the act of the parliament was a coercive act, and that it was a very disagreeable and offensive act on the part of the government of Canada to pass a law which they said would coerce the province of Manitoba. I feel assured it is not necessary for me to point out to my hon. friend from Bothwell that that is a very erroneous view indeed, that all the talk we have heard in this country about a royal commission to ascertain the fact and all the talk about coercion and the offensiveness of it, have only been merely political talk for the sake of agitating the minds of the people. I do not think it will be necessary to argue that point very strongly with the hon. member from Bothwell, because I find he is on record on this subject, and his views are entitled, in my judgment, to very great respect. He discussed the Manitoba situation in parliament last year, and compared it with the position of Quebec at the time of confederation. Sir A. T. Galt and some others had taken the point that the Protestant minority in Quebec were not safeguarded in the matter of education as effectually as the Catholic minority in Ontario, and a clause was inserted in the British North America Act to meet the case. It is subsection 2 of section 93, and is as follows:—

> That all the powers, privileges and duties, at the union by law conferred and imposed in Upper Canada on separate schools and school trustees of the Queen's Roman Catholic subjects, shall be, and the same are hereby extended to the dissentient schools of the Queen's Roman Catholic subjects in Quebec.

My hon. friend from Bothwell discussed that question in the House of Commons last year and pointed out very truly and very conclusively that if the legislature of the province of Quebec had not immediately after confederation carried out the provisions of that clause and made the amendments necessary in the legislature of the province of Quebec in order to give the Protestant minority there the same rights and privileges as the Catholic minority in Ontario possessed, it would have become the duty of the parliament of Canada to step in and enact those provisions itself, and he did not see that there would be any coercion in it or that it was necessary to appoint a commission to ascertain the facts. He says:

> Had the legislature failed to give effect to this provision under the constitution, there would have arisen a grievance which would have given to the Protestant minority, under subsection 3, the right of appeal to the Governor General in Council, whose duty it would have been to have heard that appeal and to have decided in favour of action, if it was unable to secure local legislation, and to have ultimately ordered action in conformity with the facts, and, if that order was not carried out by the legislature of Quebec, upon the fact being reported here, it would have imposed upon parliament the duty of legislation in kind and in degree exactly the same as that which, in the first place, rested solely on the legislature of Quebec. To have discovered what it was the duty of the Quebec legislature to do. Parliament would have been obliged to have looked to the law of Upper Canada, as it would have been called upon to force upon the people of Quebec, against the will of its legislature, the school system of another province. The duty of parliament would have been, not simply to restore a right or privilege taken away, but, under the compact, to have created for the first time the right under the authority of the words for the due execution of the provisions of this section.

Here is the opinion of the hon. gentleman from Bothwell, no doubt his matured opinion. Every word and line of that argument bears on it evidence of the closest thought and careful consideration and here he says that no commission was necessary, that it was only necessary for the parliament of Canada to look at the legislation of Ontario and find what the sections were which provided for the education of the Catholic minority in Ontario, and to look at the section of the law as it stood in Quebec and find out what was deficient, and then it would have been their duty to make an order and if the legislature of the province of Quebec had not passed the necessary legislation to follow that order by a bill—not a bill to restore rights which had been taken away, but a bill to create rights that were provided for by the compact at confederation, should the majority of the province of Quebec have refused to put them on the statute-book themselves. That, it strikes me, is a most powerful argument. It would have been the proper course where no right or privilege was taken away, but in case the province of Quebec had failed to carry out the compact, then the powers of the Federal parliament would have come in. I repeat, before leaving this question, that the responsibility for leaving this unfortunate question in the position where it stands to-day rests with the hon. gentleman's leader, the premier of Canada. It was in his power to have aided the passing of the Remedial Bill a year ago. Whatever would have been the fate of parties the effect of it would have been that the legislature of Manitoba would have found that they lost the support of the other provinces and of the general government of this country. They would have known, as they did know, that there was a large minority of the Protestants in the province of Manitoba who believed that the minority were badly used and would help them, and the Greenway faction who had kept this question alive for years would have wilted out of existence and a good system of schools would have flourished in Manitoba, giving all children a good education according to their conscientious convictions. What Sir John Thompson said on this question in 1893 was in line with Conservative doctrine, he said :

> I want simply to impress upon you this, that candidly and honestly we intend to be guided in that matter simply by the constitution as it will be expounded by the highest authorities that can be got to expound it.

That was the only safe doctrine. Any other course may gain temporary advantages, may sweep a party into power to-day but it is as likely to sweep it out of power to-morrow. Any other course may lead to temporary political triumph, but in the end it will result in discomfiture and disgrace to the party that practises it. There are just two or three other paragraphs in the speech that I feel I should say a word or two upon and they will be very few, for I have spoken much longer already than I intended to speak. We are told in the speech that a Franchise Bill will be submitted. I believe the measure has been already brought down in the House of Commons but I have not seen it yet. We are told in the speech that the principle of the bill will be to repeal the present Franchise Act and to adopt the franchises of the provincial legislatures and use these as the franchises for the general parliament of Canada. I am very sorry that any such proposition as that should be made. I feel that it is very dangerous and that it should not be entertained. Hon. gentlemen may say, on this question of the franchise, that it is a matter which relates more particularly to the popular branch of parliament, and that it is a question with which it should be left to deal almost entirely. I do not think that is altogether a correct constitutional doctrine, because the Commons have a good deal to say at times on the constitution of the Senate and we do not feel that they are travelling outside of their jurisdiction when they express opinions on the subject, and if it was open for them to legislate, I would not have any fault to find with them for dealing with the question of the constitution of the Senate. But I go this far and say that if the representatives of the people in the House of Commons mature a franchise bill, if they come to the conclusion that the present law is too expensive and cumbrous and otherwise not the best law that could be enacted, and if they agree upon a well considered measure providing for the registration of voters and declaring what the qualification of voters shall be, which shall be an improvement of the present Franchise Act, and send it to this House, we would certainly have a right to scan its provisions carefully and offer any suggestions we could to make the measure as good as possible, but we would be straining our rights a little too far to throw it out. It might be so extremely bad that that duty would be imposed upon us, but it would have to be very bad before I would advise such an extreme step. But if it is proposed that the parliament of Canada is to delegate the power and authority it has, under our constitution, to declare what the franchise shall be of the men who shall vote for members in our representative chamber, to provinces, municipalities or other authorities, and permit them to make up the lists, I say the members of this Senate have a perfect right to stand up and say: "No, we will not agree to that; hold the matter in your hands, have respect for yourselves, see that the franchise is a good and proper one, but do not hand over the power of dealing with the rights of citizens to vote for members of parliament, to bodies over which you have no control. Keep a tight grasp upon the franchise."

Hon. Mr. MILLS—What do you say to Sir John Thompson's bill?

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—Sir John Thompson's bill did not propose to hand over the making of the lists to the provinces.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Yes, it did.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—He admitted the franchises of the provinces.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—No. He used them as the basis.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—I think that Sir John Thompson's bill merely provided that the provincial lists should be taken as the basis and there should be revisions of them, but it did not contemplate the handing over of the power of revising the lists and expunging or adding names.

Hon. Mr. MILLS.—It declares the qualification of voters for members of the Commons shall be the qualifications in existence in the provinces.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—That they should be taken as a basis. He was willing to go that far, but I do not think Sir John Thompson or any member of the Conservative party was willing to go so far as to hand over the correction of the lists and the making of the final disposition of the lists to the provinces or to municipalities or any local organizations. However, that might be, it would not alter my opinion on the matter even if my hon. friend and the Secretary of State should be right. I have had too much experience. I have been watching too closely the conduct of some provincial governments of Canada to be willing to entrust the great and important matter of framing our franchises and our voting lists to them. I have seen the so-called Liberal government of my own province disfranchise all the Dominion officials in the provinces even down to day labourers, because a majority of them had been appointed by the Conservative party and were believed to have Conservative leanings. I have seen in various other provinces a tinkering and tampering with the franchise on the part of the provincial governments which warns me that it would be extremely unsafe and wrong on the part of this parliament to delegate the power and right which it undoubtedly possesses to make the lists for itself and declaring by the lists what the qualifications of voters shall be, and create a judicial power which shall decide whose names shall be on the lists, to unscrupulous parish politicians. It is something for which I am not prepared to vote. I am willing to yield to the popular branch the right to deal with this franchise question so long as they deal with it themselves and deal with it wisely, but they shall not, as far as my consent goes, hand over that power which we have something to say about as well as they. I will say a few words before I close on the subject of cold storage. I do not know that I have said many complimentary things about the government: from my point of view it is hard to find anything very complimentary to say about them, but inasmuch as they have followed with almost slavish exactness the policy of the late government in the matter of cold storage, and inasmuch as they have kept the matter in motion up to the present time, I am inclined to give them a word of commendation.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—That is the hon. gentleman's compliment.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—They are following in regard to cold storage the footsteps of their illustrious predecessors. They are fair imitators, as far as that is concerned. I do not know that there is any question that we are discussing which is of more importance to the people of this country than that matter of cold storage, thrown as we are upon British trade and meeting active competitors in that trade, competitors who are ahead of us in cold storage, although they have a longer sea voyage to overcome. From our nearness to the British market, there is no reason why we should not put all the perishable commodities of our country, fruit, butter, eggs, &c., on the British market in just as good a state of preservation as in our own daily market. It can be done by a complete and efficient system of cold storage, and I am delighted to find that the government are following the lines laid down for them by their predecessors on that question, and I believe great good will result to the people of Canada if they continue in that course.

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—We have listened to a very interesting speech from the hon gentleman from Prince Edward Island, and there is a great deal of the subject matter of that speech with which I agree and I congratulate him upon the manner in which he has presented it. We are called upon to discuss some very important subjects in the Speech from the Throne. One of the most important that has been included in the programme of subjects presented by His Excellency, is that which refers to the Diamond Jubilee of Her Majesty the Queen. It is one of those memorable occasions, one of those marked periods in the history of the world which only comes at rare intervals. The Canadian government takes cognizance of the unity with the other parts of the British empire which causes us to celebrate the Diamond Jubilee of the Queen's reign, and to bear tribute to the worthy sovereign who has been permitted by the Almighty to reign so well for sixty years over the British empire. I think there is no more important point could be inserted in the Speech from the Throne than that reference to Her Majesty. The liberality of the British government in providing the expenses to enable the members of the British empire to accept an invitation to take part in that jubilee is, I think, without precedent. The prosperity of Great Britain for such a number of years is so great, her coffers overflowing with revenue, enables her to take that proud position in the world in the maintenance of her forces both naval and military, in commanding that political influence and physical power which gain her respect throughout the world, and which is now joined in by the rest of the British empire which extends to the four corners of the earth. I feel perfectly sure that all will agree with me when I say that I believe the present premier of Canada will do justice to the occasion and represent our country in the most worthy manner, supported as he will be by a semblance of the forces that we maintain here for the maintenance of law and order and the defence of our own country, and by the staff that I have no doubt will accompany him on that auspicious occasion. Canada is the leading colony of the empire, both in extent and in importance. It is so because we are in advance of nearly all other portions of the British empire in so far as we have become a federated nationality. Australia is making an effort to put on record the same federation this jubilee year, but I think that when Canada goes there with her premier as the political head of the union which extends from the Atlantic to the Pacific, occupying a territory on this continent that is second to none in the world in healthiness of climate and latent resources, it is a very proud position that Canada is going to take at the celebration of that jubilee commemoration which, though cosmopolitan in its character, is loyal in its sentiment and design. The next paragraph in the speech deals with the Manitoba school question. That subject has been discussed for a great number of years. It is one which has been getting warmer and warmer in the discussion as the years go on and loses nothing of its interest as time passes. So far as my views are concerned, coming from the province of Manitoba, I consider that my mouth is closed for any practical purpose, because the legislature and government of Manitoba which are responsible to the people, have passed legislation dealing with this question which I consider is a settlement of it so far as the province of Manitoba is concerned. The settlement of that question has been effected by negotiations between the Dominion government and the government of the province of Manitoba. The result of those negotiations is contained in the settlement which has been laid on the Table and which has been I have no doubt, at the request of the Dominion government, passed by the provincial legislature before this parliament met. That is to my mind virtually a settlement of the question. That settlement cannot now be altered, but has to be carried not by the parliament of Canada at the instigation of the dominant party in power in Canada. Those who disagree with it of course may not consider themselves bound to pass it, but the dominant party in power having entered into the agreement and it having been signed and sealed by one of the parties—I was going to say at the dictation of the government, because the first words in the settlement are that the province of Manitoba shall legislate in accordance with this agreement—therefore to that extent I consider that any arguments I might bring forward are futile so far as altering the position of matters in regard to that question. There are, however, constitutional points involved in the discussion which I do not think it is wise for me to pass over without referring to them. The Senate should not only be clear upon, but guard the constitution referring to any part of Canada. Constitutional liberty is one of the greatest prizes that any nation can possibly possess. Anything that restricts constitutional liberty is a detriment to the population—it is what you call a retrograde movement in the life of the nation, and therefore I think that any discussion upon constitutional matters is a subject that is worthy of dwelling upon. I do not agree with the leader of this House in the statement he mentioned yesterday that the province of Manitoba had no power to alter the laws of the province in regard to education—that, the second judgment of the Privy Council showed they had no legal right to alter the law of the province in the matter under discussion. I must take exception to that statement. The facts of the case are these. The province of Manitoba in 1890 changed the policy that they had had in regard to education, and I wish to say that when I argue this matter from a constitutional standpoint, I do not in any way desire it to be understood that I wish to restrict the privileges of our Roman Catholic fellow-countrymen or our French Canadian fellow-countrymen in any way. I desire that they shall have all the privileges that they conscientiously believe is their right and the constitution allows; I claim the same liberty. I believe the more liberty we have the better. We will have a contented people and a better government. At the same time, when you appeal to the law, you must be judged by the law, and therefore it is absolutely necessary that we should understand what the principles of our constitution are in order that we may not go beyond its power and in order that we may not restrict the liberty of the various provinces of Canada, or subordinate our own constitutional liberty in any way in the carrying out of our national life. Now hon. gentlemen the province of Manitoba changed its law in 1890. In consequence, there was an appeal made to the Privy Council to ask whether that law was constitutional or not; whether under the restricting clauses of the Manitoba Act the province of Manitoba had a right to pass that law. The answer of the Privy Council was that there was nothing in so far as any rights that were acquired prior to the union that prevented the province of Manitoba passing that law. That it was intra vires of the provincial constitution. That, I think, was the reponse to the first judgment. Then the minority submitted another case and that was whether there was anything in that law that constituted a grievance within the meaning of the Act of the province of Manitoba. You see the first judgment allowed that the law was constitutional and, therefore, that the province of Manitoba had the right to pass that law. I am not now arguing as to whether it was a wise law, or whether it was a just law, but whether they had the right to pass that law. There was no doubt about that they had the right to pass that law, and therefore if they had the right to pass that law their constitutional liberty in dealing with matters of education was intact, and I think it is very desirable that position should be retained that they should have the power within their constitutional liberties, that they should exclusively have the right to pass laws in matters of education, subject to the constitutional restrictions laid down hereafter. What are the restrictions? The restrictions are if there is a grievance to the minority in an Educational Act, the Dominion parliament have certain powers to hear an appeal and to act upon that appeal. That is the position in which I consider this question stands. Now the minority made an appeal and they made out before the judicial committee of the Privy Council that a grievance did exist and that they had a right under that grievance to appeal to parliament. Now, they appealed to parliament and the question is now before parliament.

Hon. Mr. BERNIER—The appeal is not to parliament but to the Governor General in Council, which makes a great differencce.

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—The appeal is to the Governor General in Council, but it is for parliament to justify any act the Governor General in Council may take in the matter, because the Governor General in Council only exists by the will of parliament, and therefore the Governor General in Council has no power to deal with it without being responsible to parliament, the judicial committee was precise on the point that the question was political, not judicial. The appeal has been made. Now the question that I say we should realize in our own minds is this, should the law be altered, should that grievance be removed by the influence of this parliament or government exercising itself upon the provincial legislature of Manitoba, or should that grievance be removed by this parliament itself? Should it be removed by the influence of this parliament acting upon the government or legislature of Manitoba? The opposition to the late government always contended that there was coercion under the Remedial Act. Well, there was coercion; there was legislative coercion under the Remedial Act, but so far as coercion is concerned, I think that that coercion has been used, though in a different way, in order to secure this settlement. There has been political pressure used in procuring this settlement while the other was legislative coercion. It is almost a distinction without a difference. I was opposed to the Remedial Bill that was brought up by the late government for this reason: not that it has not got the perfect right to pass the Remedial Act, but the Act had no right to interfere with the laws of Manitoba. That Remedial Act of last year provided that the pecuniary means in order to give effect and in order to make the Act worth anything, was to be provided by the municipalities of Manitoba. Now the government of Manitoba under the law of 1890, which was a constitutional and legal law, said the municipalities should do one thing and this Remedial Act said they should do another. Very well, that was unconstitutional, and I think would be held unconstitutional in anybody's mind. The Dominion parliament have a perfect right to pass a remedial measure or any other measure and provide the means to put that in effect without any aid from Manitoba or any one else. But the very moment they pass an act which requires another authority to carry it out, then there is immediately a constitutional difficulty which prevents it being carried out. That was the position last year. This year a settlement has been effected by negotiations between the two governments. The portfolio of the Interior was withheld from a member of the provincial cabinet until he was able to announce that the provincial government was prepared to settle upon this basis. That is what I call political pressure being used in gaining the settlement and is only another form of coercion. Hon. gentlemen know the position I have always taken on this matter and when I speak of it, I speak as one who knows something about it, having been acquainted with that country for some years. The ground I have taken was always that the Dominion parliament had a right to remedy the grievance. The grievance had to be ascertained and when it was ascertained, if the province of Manitoba did not voluntarily meet the minority and satisfy them in regard to the matter then the Dominion parliament could act. The grievance, to my mind, has always been limited to the old province of Manitoba, constituting the Selkirk settlement which was erected into a province by the Act of 1870. Beyond that there is no grievance because there was no population. There was not a soul west of the old Selkirk settlement at the time the Manitoba Act was passed. It was a prairie that was part of the North-west Territory. The province of Manitoba as constituted when the Act was passed, was only for the existing Selkirk settlements and it is only in them where the population of 1869 was contained, that the grievance could exist. The province has been enlarged once or twice since that act was passed. When anybody comes to settle in that country and take up a free homestead on the unoccupied prairie he comes in under the laws of Manitoba as they exist. That is to say those laws may be changed, as all constitutional laws are liable to be changed, surely no one is going to restrict constitutional liberty and say they can never be expunged. I do not think that would be a sound position in any way.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.)—It depends on the constitution what rights you have.

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—No, Manitoba has perfect constitutional liberty within its bounds the same as this parliament has, the prerogatives of the Crown as represented by the Imperial parliament only restricting this parliament, and the provinces work with freedom within the specified limits of the British North America Act under the restricting influence of the Governor General in Council representing the sovereign.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B C)—Then there is a limit?

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—The limit is more in name than in fact. The restricting influence in this case is specially provided for where there is a grievance an appeal may be made and the Governor General in Council may hear that appeal and may adjudicate upon it and apply the remedy if the province itself does not of its own will and accord negotiate with the minority and rectify the grievance themselves of their own will and accord. The educational clauses in the act itself implies that in so far as they cast a doubt upon the province doing it. If a province does not do it, then, and only then, and only as far as the grievance exists, has the Dominion parliament power to pass a Remedial Act. You see the power of the Imperial parliament is limited to the settlement of the grievance and only as far as the circumstances require—those are the words used, I think—only as far as circumstances require, has the parliament of Canada any jurisdiction in the matter at all and the Act itself implies that there can be no compulsion used by this parliament upon the provincial government or legislature, because the wording of the Act says if the provincial authorities do not make the necessary changes in order to remove the grievance, then and only as far as this grievance exists has the Dominion parliament power to interfere. Taking it from a constitutional standpoint, seeking honestly to try and preserve the constitutional liberties of the various component parts of this great country, I think that while the Remedial Bill of the last session was not satisfactory because it was defective; so far as the constitutional liberties of the province clashed with the powers contained in it, in the same way this settlement is defective in so far as it was obtained from the legislature by political pressure rather than any voluntary movement on the part of the province itself, and to that extent there has been a straining of the constitution. It is not a grievance removed, but a change of policy on the part of the province of Manitoba is the result. Unfortunately, that change of policy does not appear to settle the question in so far as the minority are concerned. It settles it in so far as this parliament and the province are concerned. That is to say, the appeal ceases and the appeal is satisfied when this parliament, which is the judge of the matter, tacitly or otherwise accepts that settlement as full satisfaction of the grievances of the minority. There is no legal power that you can use or go to beyond that. You can bring pressure to bear, you can bring your influence to bear upon this parliament to pass any measure you wish in regard to assisting that minority to obtain schools in which to teach their religion—to have separate schools or anything else you like out of the revenues of the Dominion, but so far as the law itself is concerned this appeal is now closed.

Hon. Mr. BERNIER—Oh, no.

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—Any power that this parliament has under this appeal will be closed when parliament has accepted that settlement.

Hon. Mr. BERNIER—No.

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—That settlement has now been put on the statute-book of Manitoba at the instance of this parliament. It is used in that dictatorial form that they shall pass that legislation and in accordance with that mandate they have passed it, and this parliament is not only bound after they have been a party to the treaty—unless they consider themselves in the position that the United States Senate assume in the arbitration treaty now before them—that they can reject a treaty if they chose or accept it. The only difference is that this treaty was negotiated with the representatives of this parliament, while the arbitration treaty of the United States was negotiated by the executive of the nation which is subordinate to the Senate in its treaty making power. But this treaty was negotiated by the representatives of this parliament and the representatives of the province of Manitoba in accordance with the terms that were arranged, and now this parliament, so far as the present government has the power to dominate it, must accept that treaty.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.)—It does not come before parliament at all. Parliament has nothing to do with it.

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—When parliament acting as a judge between the minority and the province of Manitoba are satisfied that is a proper settlement between the two, then there is no further action upon the appeal. That is the constitutional position in which the province is placed and the constitutional position in which this parliament is placed. This parliament has a right to pass any legislation it pleases giving the minority a right to their separate schools, but they have to provide the means to enable them to do it. They cannot deal with the question as under that appeal any longer, and I wish to emphasize also at the same time that the province of Manitoba had a perfect right according to the judgment of the Privy Council, to pass that law of 1890 and they have a perfect right under the constitution to amend that law. Whether they have the right to amend that law now, under this agreement I have doubt, because it is an agreement made with the national government representing this parliament and cannot be undone without the sanction of this parliament, without a fresh appeal being in order, but up to that point so far as their constitutional liberty to amend any educational act they chooose to pass, it was quite within their bounds. That is the position in which, according to my mind, the question rests that so far as any Remedial Bill is concerned the question is settled. There can be no further action, no further legal action taken except the pressure that influence may bring upon the Dominion parliament in order to deal with it in some other way, but under the appeal authorized by the educational clauses in the Manitoba Act the matter is settled.

Hon. Mr. BERNIER—It is as open as ever.

Hon. Mr. DEVER—What we would like to know is this: Are you, as a citizen of Manitoba and the North-west, any better satisfied with the recent settlement than you would be by an Act of coercion passed by this parliament compelling you to do it?

Hon. Mr. BERNIER.—That is not a constitutional question.

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—I take this ground that this Parliament has no right to pass an Act of coercion. But this parliament if it passed a remedial measure that in no way conflicted with the laws of Manitoba that would not be an act of coercion or to pass an act giving the population in the Selkirk settlements where their schools erected prior to 1869, where by virtue of that the minority now affected were enabled to establish a grievance by taking away the rights that they were enjoying at that time, the right of paying for their own schools but without being called upon to pay for any other. That established the grievance in the minds of the judicial committee of the Privy Council, but those schools were limited to the population of 1869, no grievance can be established, in those districts of Manitoba (the bounds of which have been enlarged and which was unoccupied open prairie) by reason of provincial laws passed since the Manitoba Act gave local autonomy. This parliament cannot force the provincial government to make any change in its laws but this parliament can pass an Act remedying the grievance but it has to provide the means in some way or other to give effect to that law. It has not the power to direct that the municipalities of Manitoba shall raise the funds which is the metho l in which all school matters are dealt with. This parliament has no right or power to direct the municipality to do so because the provincial Act of 1890 is diametrically opposed to it.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—You misunderstand the proposition altogether. There never was any proposition made by the Remedial Bill to give power through the municipalities to tax the people. It only gave the power to those people to tax if they thought proper.

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—The hon. member has forgotten the terms of the Remedial Bill, it directed the municipalities of the province of Manitoba that they shall not levy any rates for public school purposes upon the Roman Catholics.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—We had the right to do that.

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—And that upon the application of Roman Catholics to establish their schools that they the municipalities, shall levy rates on Roman Catholics in order to do that. The provincial law of Manitoba directs that all the ratepayers in the municipality of Manitoba shall levy for public school purposes upon the property of all within that municipality. You will have to get the province of Manitoba to change that law to be in accord with the Act of the Dominion parliament before you could give effect to the remedial legislation and to that extent the Remedial Bill of last year failed, but a Remedial Bill of the Dominion parliament that did not clash with provincial laws was quite in order provided the province of Manitoba had not made this settlement, but the province of Manitoba having made this settlement at the solicitation or dictation whichever you like, of the present government, any further legal proceedings under the appeal of the minority must naturally cease, any redress or any further redress of that grievance must be an act of this parliament quite irrespective of that appeal. I think I have stated what I conceive to be the constitutional position in which the matter is placed as clearly as I understand it, and it is a question of very great importance to understand it correctly that our constitutional powers may not be misdirected. The settlement is now concluded and any discussion that may take place will be merely to sift the constitutional points which must be our guide to legislation for the future. I think an unfortunate precedent has been established and that it would have been better to have withheld the political pressure and allowed the provincial government to have met the minority voluntarily and failing their doing so then this government could do so and remove the grievance. The minority I know are not satisfied and in that way the settlement I have no doubt will not be satisfactory, but what steps will be taken or what will follow after all, it will be impossible for any one to tell, but I feel strongly impressed with the fact that the constitutional position is that the appeal is now at an end.

Hon. Mr. BERNIER—The power of this parliament can not be at an end unless the Remedial Order is satisfied, and it is not.

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—You are quite right, but it all depends whether the minority is able to command the influence of this government to say that it is not satisfied.

Hon. Mr. BERNIER—That is quite a different thing. One is a constitutional question and the other a question of physical force. That is all.

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—You will acknowledge that if this government has a sufficient majority to say that settlement is satisfactory, then the question rests, but if the parliament should say they are not satisfied with what the government has done, then that is another matter altogether. Then I presume the settlement would be turned up and the question would revert back to its old position. It is natural to assume that as the present government has negotiated the settlement and has a majority in parliament that they will be able to give effect to the settlement they themselves have created if anv further action by this parliament is considered necessary. I move the adjournment of the debate.

The motion was agreed to.

The Senate then adjourned.

THE SENATE.

Ottawa, Thursday, 1st April, 1897.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

Prayers and routine proceedings.

A QUESTION OF PRIVILEGE.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Before the Orders of the Day are proceeded with, I would like to call the attention of the leader of the government to an interview published in a government organ last night with one of his colleagues, the Minister of Militia, in New York, in which that hon. gentleman makes some very important statements. I think the country should know whether they were made upon the authority of the cabinet, as was the case, as I understood it, with the Finance Minister in reference to his statement about the coal duty. I find in the Free Press of last night a published interview, portions of which I shall read. The interview is said to have been held by a reporter with Dr. Borden, the Minister of Militia and Defence, at the Everett House, New York, in which the hon. gentleman said, among other things, referring to the tariff:

> You have enough territory already, and, therefore, I do not see just why this bill should be framed to exclude trade relations between two friendly countries. We do not wish any advantage whatever in our trade relations. We want to give dollar for dollar, and to deal on a fair and square basis. The Liberals of Canada believe in commercial reciprocity and they are not afraid to say so. But they do not believe in annexation, and they never expect to see it. Why is it then that the Dingley bill completely ignores the reciprocal commercial relations that have existed in the past between the two countries? We, of course, will retaliate and raise our duties.

This is one portion of the interview to which I desire to call the hon. gentleman's attention:—"We, of course," continued Dr. Borden, "will retaliate and raise our duty. At present we do not discriminate in our tariff duties between this country and England. They are on the same basis commercially." Then he goes on to say in reference to export duties:

> All of the wood pulp will have to come from Canada, and we certainly will place a duty on it. Then, we have white pine and spruce, all of which is used extensively in the United States.

The points to which I desire to call the attention of the leader of the government, are, in the first place, the announcement that we will retaliate, in the second place, that we will raise our duties, and, in the third place, that we intend to put an export duty on pulp wood and other woods exported from this country to the United States. I wish the hon. gentleman to understand distinctly that I am not finding fault with the principle of an export duty. On the contrary, if the question comes up, I shall be very glad to give it my support; but what I desire to know is this, whether the people of Canada are to ascertain the policy of the government through individual members of the cabinet telling strangers and the commercial community in different sections of the country what the government intend to do. I also desire to call his attention to a paragraph among the editorial items of the Toronto Globe of yesterday, in which we have information furnished which the hon. gentleman has not yet vouchsafed to give to this House, nor has the leader of the government or any of the members of the government given to the House of Commons. I omitted in my speech on the address to refer to the intimation that it is the intention of the government to extend the Intercolonial Railway from Point Lévis, or as the leader of the government designated it in an interview that he had with some parties a short time ago, "a field in Lower Canada"—is Point Lévis to be considered the field, or did the hon. gentleman refer to the Chaudière Junction? However, the Globe tells its readers:

> The government has granted three hundred thousand dollars to the Grand Trunk Railway for the improvement of Victoria bridge, the conditions being that the Intercolonial is to have running powers over the road from Lévis to Montreal.

Now, is it possible that while parliament is in session, information of this important character both as to the raising of duty on imports, the imposition of duties on exports, and what is to be done with reference to the extension of the Intercolonial Railway, is to be obtained only from the individual members of the government in different sections of the Dominion and in a foreign country?

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.)—Hear, hear.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—And through a newspaper which represent the government? I go further than that. I conceive it a gross violation of the duty of any cabinet minister to make any such statement, even if it be true, that the government intend to pursue a course of that kind. Perhaps it is unfair that I should, at the present moment, do more than call the attention of the hon. gentleman to it, and to obtain such information from him as he is prepared to give, in order that those who take an interest in the tariff, both in the imposition of duties upon imports and exports, and the policy of the government upon the question of the extension of the Intercolonial Railway and a grant of $300,000 to a company, before it has been laid before this House or the other House either by message from His Excellency or in any other way.

Hon. Sir OLIVER MOWAT—I should be sorry to be responsible for all that New York newspaper men publish in their newspapers with reference to interviews. I know in my own case long interviews have been reported as having taken place when not a word passed such as the newspapers stated. In fact I have had a long interview reported when there had been no interview at all. I do not happen to have seen the article that my hon. friend has read.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Here it is if you wish to see it.

Hon. Sir OLIVER MOWAT—I am not doubting it is there, but I did not happen to see it. All I know about it is what my hon. friend states. What the policy of the government will be on the tariff will be very shortly stated officially by the Finance Minister in his place in the other House, and the country will be put in possession of what that policy is. Though my hon. friend has put his question to me, of course he does not expect that I should give the information here. He does not consider that I should be justified in giving it here. My hon. friend is an old politician with a great deal of experience and excellent judgment, and he has no notion that the policy of the government on the tariff should be stated here and now because of a newspaper paragraph giving an alleged interview with a member of the government who happened to be in New York at the time this occurred. It is well known that Dr. Borden is very ill just now. He is not in his place in parliament, and I do not know when he will be. I suppose he was on his way to Boston at the time he was in New York, to consult medical men there in regard to his condition. Then, with reference to what my hon. friend finds in a paragraph in the Globe, my hon. friend has had the advantage of me there too. I quite see that he reads Reform papers much more extensively and much more closely than I can find time to do. I hope it will be of service to him to do so. I am sure the more he studies Reform literature the better member of this House will he be and the more efficient.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—The better acquainted will I be with the iniquities of the party.

Hon. Sir OLIVER MOWAT—If there had been any iniquities, but there are none to be acquainted with, and therefore my hon. friend could not become acquainted with the iniquities of the Reform party. If there was any arrangement made for the use of the Victoria bridge or for the enlargement of it, and as to the other matters referred to in the paragraph which my hon. friend has quoted, it will be announced in due course. No such arrangement as the paragraph speaks of would be practicable unless it has the sanction of parliament, and negotiations are necessarily subject to that; but when there are negotiations with regard to any transaction, such as is mentioned in that paragraph, of course there are two parties to those negotiations, and though the government may say nothing about them, the other party may. We have no control over the parties negotiated with. And then the newspaper may have misapprehended what occurred. All those matters will be brought before the public in proper form when the right time comes. I am not able to give my hon. friend the information he asks for to-day.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—The House will be gratified at the lucid explanation the hon. gentleman has given on this question, after which I have only to draw his attention to a character in Dickens—in Oliver Twist—I have no doubt he knows the character very well. I would not compare my hon. friend with that character, but the one to which I refer is the Artful Dodger.

Hon. Sir OLIVER MOWAT—Is the hon. gentleman describing his own case when he makes use of that reference?

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I leave it to my hon. friend to make the application.

THE ADDRESS.

The order of the day being called,

Resuming the further adjourned debate on the consideration of His Excellency the Governor General's speech on the opening of the second session of the Eighth Parliament.

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—On resuming the debate on the Address which I moved the adjournment of yesterday afternoon, I take up the next question in the speech which is stated as follows:—

A measure will be submitted to you for the revision of the tariff, which it is believed will provide the necessary revenue and while having due regard to industrial interests, will make our fiscal system more satisfactory to the masses of the people.

Hon. gentlemen in this House know perfectly well the interest I have taken for the past five years in the discussion of questions relating to the tariff and trade and commerce. They know the stand I have always argued from—that has been from the standpoint of free trade. In using the term "free trade," it seems difficult to get any one to accede to the proposition of free trade and to many it is a bugbear because people in Canada take so many views of the subject. Many regard free trade as only free trade with the United States; others, as free trade with Great Britain, and they put different interpretations upon it. Some regard free trade as an absolute abolition of everything connected with our customs duties. That is, of course the extreme of free trade, but what we understand and the world understands generally by free trade is that most advanced position taken by any nation in regard to the question, and that is the policy pursued by the people of Great Britain. The mother country is always called a free trade country, but it derives $100,000,000 of its revenue from the imposition of certain customs duties. To that extent it is not an absolute free trade country, but we are now coming to what I call a crisis in the history of Canada. For past eighteen years the Liberal-Conservative party have been working under what was called a national policy but is really a protective policy. Up to 1878 the tariff was gradually increased, first of all starting at 12½ per cent and then increased slightly, and when the Liberal party came into power they increased it to 17½ per cent. When the Liberal-Conservative party came into power in 1878, they increased the tariff again, and in 1888 when the iron duties were put on it became an absolutely protective tariff. We have now had an experience of eighteen years working under a policy of protection. The very moment the thin edge of the wedge of protection was inserted, which was only designed by the late Right Hon. Sir John A. Macdonald to be merely a readjustment of the tariff to provide for certain contingencies which had occurred during the United States panic between 1873 and 1878, protection solely became the policy and it has grown until now the country is working under a protective tariff, not so high a tariff as that of our neighbours or the tariffs of some continental countries of Europe, but still a very high tariff. Now, if the Liberal party, according to some, have no intention of making an advance towards free trade and that the Conservative party remains very stiff in their old position, it may be said that any one who argues free trade will stand alone. I am not prepared to accede to that proposition, because we all know that there are circumstances which will drive individuals to follow a course to which they had formerly been opposed. There are certain circumstances which will drive a nation to make a change of its policy. It is unavoidable when a man finds his health or prosperity failing that a change must necessarily take place. It is forced upon him unless he continues to swim on the top of a wave and trusts to Providence to land him somewhere or other. I do not think that is a wise policy for a nation to prefer. Providence helps those who help themselves, and to drift on the top of the wave is dangerous. According to the trade and navigation returns for the past three years our exports have exceeded our imports. They have exceeded the imports in 1895, and in 1896, and during the eight months up to the 1st March last, the exports exceeded the imports by $20,000,000. The exports were $93,000,000 while the imports were only $73,000,000. Now, almost every gentleman that I meet is of the opinion that that is a healthy commercial condition for a nation to be in, that the more we export and the less we import the better off the country is. It is well known to those who hold sound economic views derived from experience, and from those who have written works upon political economy, that that condition of excessive exports over imports is an unhealthy condition of the commercial life of any country and we have arrived at that stage when the country is working at a loss. We are very much in the position of a labourer who works for a sub-contractor and does not get his pay. As I have stated before on the floor of this House imports must be paid for by exports—that the only pay you receive for what you export from the bounds of your country, is the imports that come back to the bounds of that country—that there is no balance of any kind or description drawn from any source that will make up the deficiency between those two. As a very distinguished banker, in an address last night, which I had the pleasure to hear, said, there was no money changing between nations. This is the utterance of Mr. Hague, who has been for fifty years connected with banking. He said there is no money changes hands between nations, and London is the great clearing house of the world—that that is the place where heavy balances are worked off by an exchange between nations. For instance, we export to the people of Great Britain more than 50 per cent beyond what we import. We import from the United States a great deal more than we export to them. A great many people would think, perhaps, we would give the balance to the United States in the shape of gold or something of that kind, or rather that we would be sending gold to the people of the United States to pay for the imports that we have made in excess of our exports; but it is not the case. London is the clearing house of the world. The people of the United States sell a great deal more produce to the people of Great Britain and export a great deal more than they import, and therefore the exchange is purchased in London by us to remit to the United States. That is the way trade is conducted between nations, and therefore we have come down to a condition, after eighteen years of this commercial policy, that in eight months' time we are exporting $20,000,000 more than we are importing, the country must be going to the bad.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.)—It is just the other way.

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—The hon. gentleman laughs, but it is necessary to apply your mind to it if you have any regard for the necessity of the country, because what I am stating is an absolute fact. It is the first time since confederation was established that that has occurred with the exception of the year 1880, I think.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.)—Would you stop all exports?

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—Certainly not. You cannot stop exports or you come to grief at once, because you have certain indebtedness to settle abroad and the way we pay our indebtedness is by exports and if we do not export we fail to pay our debts. But what I wanted to emphasize more particularly is the fact that in the twenty-eight years that we have been under confederation this is the first time with the exception of the year 1880 that this has occurred. It is very easy to account for that condition of affairs in 1880, because it was the first year after re-adjustment of the tariff when high duties were put suddenly on the country, and of course it stopped importation, and importations then fell to $3,000,000 below our exports. But between 1880 and 1894 the imports have been exceeding the exports. If hon. gentlemen will look at the trade and navigations returns they will be able to verify the statements I have made. You cannot obtain light on any subject without taking pains to inquire as to the accuracy of the statements that anybody may make with regard to it. What I am stating to you is a fact, and the reason that our imports exceeded our exports between those years is very largely due to the borrowings we have made in order to construct the Pacific Railway and other public works. You have only to take the years 1881 to 1890, and just in proportion to the magnitude of the public works and loans that were undertaken, to that extent the imports exceeded our exports, because the very moment we go home and sell our bonds in England to build a railway or any public enterprise, or raise a government loan for a public enterprise, the proceeds of that loan does not come over in gold, it is remitted by exchange, which is regulated by the importation of necessaries we require to purchase to conduct those operations, and you can go down and take the exports and imports from the year of confederation to the present day and can almost see how it is that they exceeded in some instances and now how it is that we have come down to the condition that our exports so largely exceed our imports. If we set to work and construct public works and borrow largely to build them, you will immediately resuscitate the imports and you will resuscitate the revenue, because these imports are paying duty under our present policy, but hon. gentlemen will realize that the effort on the part of an individual to borrow himself rich, or on the part of a nation to borrow itself rich has a finality, and cannot go on for ever. There should be profit enough made out of the resources of the country to meet the expenditures and the liabilities necessary to carry on the public works without having to borrow in that way in order to maintain the revenue and that profit can only be realized by taking the tax off of labour and industry. There is one point that I desire to call the attention of the House to, as a reason why the exports exceed the imports. I am not clear myself as to the reason but the reason which I adduce from it is this, that having ceased to borrow from abroad to construct public works on public capital, we are now working within ourselves. We are working all through the country on what we are able to earn, and when we come down to that and are thrown back on our own resources we find that condition that we are exporting $20,000,000 more than we are importing. These exports are absorbed by the public indebtedness that we have incurred through our railway bonds and government loans and all that kind of thing. But there is another position that I would desire to point out to this House in order to try and convince hon. gentlemen who are yet skeptical on the principles I advocate—that is that we export to Great Britain $60,000,000 worth of the produce of the people of Canada and that we only import from Great Britain fifty per cent of that. Our exports during the seven months past have increased sixteen per cent to Great Britain. Our imports from Great Britain have only increased one per cent. What I argue is this, that if we send $60,000,000 exports to Great Britain, which they purchase at free trade prices, charging us nothing for entering them there, they give us full value. If we send a steer over there, that is well fattened, weighing 1,500 lbs., we would get $110 for it, while we could not get over $50 for it here. That steer, or any other cargo that is sent across, is paid for by imports, but when the imports arrive at our boundary they are met with a duty of thirty-two per cent—in other words the people of Great Britain who have bought that $60,000,000 of the products of our labour and industry, only send back sixty-six per cent. That is all the country is receiving, and that is very largely, in the absence of any borrowing or extraneous condition of affairs, very largely due to the fact that the people of Great Britain can only send us back sixty-six per cent of the products of their labour to pay for the one hundred per cent that we send over to them. The purchasing power of the people of Canada is reduced by the thirty-two per cent that the government tack on to the price of the goods imported and I do not think that that position can be combated. That seems to be a self evident proposition as to why, in the absence of borrowing of any kind or description, that we are only able to import from the world at large, and Great Britain in particular who admits our goods free of duty, and only receive back some 66 per cent of the value of the goods that we have sent to them. Now, somebody looses that. I do not say that the city of Montreal looses it or that the city of Toronto looses it, but I say that somebody in the country is loosing it. The people who are loosing it primarily are those who have produced the goods which have been sent across there, secondarily those who are hampered in their industrial employment by the increased cost of necessaries through the protective tax, and the consequent throwing out of employment such a large proportion of the industrial class. The condition that I want to point out is that it impairs the prosperity of the country, from the fact that those who produce from the raw material or the raw products of the country are the ones who produce the real wealth of the country, and to the extent that they are prevented in the distribution of their labour by a tax of 32 per cent, to that extent they are unable to distribute the whole of the products of their industry in their various localities and are impoverished to that extent. It is upon that element of the community the great tax which supports the country is laid and it has now become a question, or should become a question with hon. gentlemen and with this government, and with the people generally to say, is it fair or wise in the commercial and financial interests of the country that those who produce from the raw material of the Dominion should be impoverished by a tax of 32 per cent upon the goods that come back to pay them for the product of their labour—not only the 32 per cent upon the mere imports, but these imports are protected—they are imposed for protective purposes in order to increase the value of certain home industries which are not natural to the country and which produces the same effect in our internal trade that is now exposed in the returns affecting our foreign trade.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.)—Supposing the hon. gentleman proceeds to Great Britain with a cargo of fat cattle, all marketable, or a cargo of butter or cheese, can he not get gold for it in Great Britain? Can he not bring back the proceeds in sovereigns in his pocket or in the shape of a bill of exchange, less the amount of the exchange? He need not take cotton or iron or any thing else for it but the hard gold, and if it can be done in the case of one individual it can be done in the case of the whole country.

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—I can very well answer the hon. gentleman. He cannot do it. It would be impossible for each individual to conduct his own foreign trade.

Hon. Mr. COCHRANE—I have exported many hundreds of thousands of dollars worth of cattle to Great Britain and I always get the cash.

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—You get it in Canadian currency?

Hon. Mr. COCHRANE—I get exchange for it.

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—Yes, but the hon. gentleman is wrong. It would be utterly impossible to send over a cargo of cattle at a profit and bring back on a ship the amount which it represents, in gold because those cattle would not only have to pay the freight of the vessel going across but they would have to pay the freight of the vessel coming this way and in order to conduct such an operation on a profitable basis, you must have a return cargo. It is that want of a return cargo that is driving so much of our trade to American seaports.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.)—You pay the vessel to carry your stock across to the market and you have done with it when you have paid your freight over.

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—All you have to do is to examine the trade returns of Canada and of the United States and Great Britain and other nations of the world and you will see that there is no such thing as trade in gold. It is not a theory I am pointing out, it is a condition. I can give the hon. gentleman a practical illustration of what I mean, in our home life. My boys wanted to get some lumber to roof their stable and make some improvements. In Russell, our town, lumber is $18 per thousand and oats were only selling for 10 cents. There was, however, 35 miles away, a small mill working in the woods sawing ties. They wanted oats and paid 25 cents for them in lumber at $10 per thousand. It was a long distance to haul green lumber in the cold weather, but the improvements could not be made by selling oats for 10 cents and buying lumber at $18, so they went to the mill and freighted their oats there, and brought back a return freight of lumber, and by doing so they traded 300 bushels of oats for 7,500 feet of lumber. To have obtained the same lumber in Russell would have taken 1,400 bushels of oats. That is what I call a practical example of free trade in the necessaries of life. Now, sir, suppose the municipal council was to say, look here, we cannot allow that, we must protect our lumber merchants, you must pay a tax on that lumber of 30 per cent, not only a tax on the $10, its first cost but its cost with the value of the freight added, making it $15. If they were to do so it would stop the trade, because we could not find the $5 per thousand tax by selling oats at 10 cents a bushel. That is on a small scale what we are doing here on a large scale.

There is not gold enough in the country to conduct the trade as the hon. gentleman suggests. The large international commerce of Great Britain is carried on by an interchange of about 6 per cent gold, the trade of Canada by an interchange of coin to the extent of about 5 or 6 per cent and you have to take the condition of affairs as they exist. There is no such thing as bringing back a lump of gold for a cargo of cattle or lumber. It would be an utter impossibility, so you have to accept the position that in all international trade, it is imports that pay for the exports and not gold. My hon. friend from Compton sends lots of cattle and when he does so he draws on England and the pay for those cattle comes back to the country in goods.

Hon. Mr. COCHRANE—It comes back to me in cash.

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—You purchase the exchange on England which is to buy a draft on the merchant in Canada who imports the goods. Any one who understands how business is conducted will say that is the way it is carried on.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.)—What do you do with the profit on the goods that come in?

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—The profit is swept away. We send out of the country $93,000,000 worth, and we bring back $73,000,000 worth.

Hon. Mr. McCALLUM—Where does the balance go?

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—It goes to pay the interest on our national and other foreign indebtedness.

Hon. Mr. McCALLUM—We are paying something with it.

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—Certainly, but it is an evidence that we are working at a loss. It is worth while paying attention to it because the subject is of the gravest consideration to the House and to the country generally. The condition in the United States is exactly the same. There is a protective country. They export $150,000,000 more than they import and you can see what the financial condition of the United States is to-day. You can see the effort that the new government in that country is making to resuscitate the revenue and improve the commercial condition, but in my opinion they are not going the right way about it. Mr. Dingley, the chairman of the Ways and Means Committee, says: "We have to raise the revenue. We have lost one hundred and fifty-five millions of dollars in the last four years in deficits. We have to replace that, and the only way to replace it is by increasing the duties upon the imports." That is contrary to all economic principles, because it has been proved by the experience of Great Britain that if you want to raise your revenue that is dependent upon customs duties you must lower your custom duties. The increasing of your tariff only increases the difficulties under which you are labouring. I should like to read what the Hon. Mr. Lyman Gage said on the subject. He is a gentleman who was president of the First National Bank of Chicago and is now Secretary in the President's Cabinet. He enters that cabinet with these views, which I take from a late issue of the Review of Reviews:

> If a country has trade and commerce beyond its own boundaries and desires to establish and extend such trade, then its interests require the use of that money which is current in the market where its foreign trade is settled. At the present time the market is Great Britain. If the United States of America is to take that position in the world's progress which we confidently hope for, it must be by the extension of its trade and commerce with other parts of the world. Whatever favours this favours our nation's development; whatever hinders this hampers and restricts our progress.

Those are the utterances of a member of Mr. McKinley's Cabinet though they were uttered in connection with the currency they are just applicable to the principles of protection. You have only got to change the first paragraph and make it read "If a country has trade and commerce beyond its own boundaries and desires to establish and extend such trade then its interests require to assimilate its tariff or commercial policy to the market where the foreign trade is settled. At the present time the market is Great Britain. Such are the liberal principles of that gentleman that according to public report Mr. Gage was invited by President Cleveland five years ago to take a seat in his cabinet, and to-day he is invited by President McKinley to take a seat in the Republican cabinet. Mr. Gage is a Republican and although he was expressing democratic views on the trade question, he preferred to carry the reforms that he desired to see effected into his own party, rather than join the other party, but it shows the sentiments with which a member of the present protectionist cabinet is imbued. Those are the sentiments which I wish to express here—if we want to extend our foreign trade we have to pursue a different policy from that which we are following to-day because the tariff as it exists is bound to draw more and more every year upon the profits of our industry, and the only way to resuscitate it is to move in the direction of free trade. Some bankers who have bolstered up our smaller manufacturing industries fear from the condition they are in that serious difficulties may soon appear. That wrench is to come some day or other, and the sooner it is brought about the easier it will be on the people of the country and our financial interests. A great many people think that the abolition of the tariff in Great Britain was affected by the sliding scale, but that is a mistake. Sir Robert Peel on the 26th of June after a century or more of protection, brought the Corn Laws down from eighteen shillings to four shillings, and in four years' time 75 per cent of that four shillings was to be knocked off and in 1869 the one shilling remaining was knocked off. They were not afraid of a wrench. The policy of free trade was commenced in 1843, and absolute in 1846, and hon. gentlemen can see for themselves by the great prosperity of the people of Great Britain what has been effected in consequence of the abolition of those duties. It is to come down to a condition of that kind that I hope the present government is contemplating. Many people say the present government do not contemplate anything of the kind. We hear of retaliation, of carrying on a commercial and industrial war with the people of the United States. I must say there is a great deal one hears that causes those who desire to see an extension of our foreign brought about to be suspicious from the present attitude of the government, but as the hon. leader of the opposition said they might be after all only artful dodgers, and while keeping their own counsel they are really intending to act honestly by the people. The utterance of the hon. gentleman who moved the address and who, I have no doubt to a certain extent is in the confidence of the government, gave one indication of free trade tendencies in so far as he said it was desirable to extend our trade in that direction where our trade was admitted free. If the government will only make that first step I say that they will make a very important step. I am prepared to say that under present conditions in the United States by their refusal to consider us as a next door neighbour, we are bound only to consider our own interests, but for the present while I hope that retaliation will not be instituted, while I hope we will show no temper of any kind or description because any person or nation gets the worst of it by losing temper, while I do not advocate retaliation, I would advocate a waiting policy in any changes of tariff with our neighbours except in those articles we may find it to our own interest to foster, to see what their tariff will develop into. I see that the tariff is to be passed in the House of Representatives in Washington to-day and is to go before the Senate. We are in a position now that we need not be afraid to show a preference to Great Britain as against the United States. The action of United States should cast that fear aside from every Canadian's mind. We are simply putting our hands across the ocean to the mother country and offering to trade with them on the same terms as they trade with us. The state of Massachusetts and the state of Minnesota and California though separated by enormous distances being part of the same union trade freely with each other across the continent, and we should adopt the same principle and have free trade with the mother country, but we are not going to close our doors to any nation that gives us most favoured nation treatment and enters into a treaty with us. That is not discrimination, all that the people of the United States have to do is to accord to us what we are quite willing to accord to them. The fallacy that a market of seventy million of people is of more value than a market of five million of people must be apparent. Everybody knows that the selling power of five million of people can not be greater than their purchasing power. We cannot sell a dollar more to the seventy millions than we are able to purchase from them and therefore there should be nothing in that. We have this condition of things opened to us to-day. There has been a change of government. The Conservative party had been in power for 18 years, working under a protective policy. I was a supporter of the national policy for years and I do not regret it because it has accomplished a certain benefit to the country. It has enabled us to do a great deal that probably we would not have been able to accomplish as rapidly as it was done, and shown us the weakness of protection. Having performed it so rapidly, it has been naturally more expensive, and as soon as I began to realize to myself what the commercial condition of the country was after 15 years of that policy I came to the conclusion that a change was desirable and the change which every loyal and patriotic Canadian desires is to see closer trade relations with the mother country.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.)—Why change a good thing?

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—It may be very good to you. I acknowledge it is to some, but where it is very good for one, it is bad for one hundred, and it is for the hundred that I am speaking and not for the one. When you see commercial restrictions upon the necessaries of life creating an artificially high price you know that the comfort of the hundred must be reduced, and a complete submergence of the unemployed. When prices are raised by any artificial means, there is a submergence of a portion of the industrial classes to the extent those prices are artificially increased and by the enforced idleness of a portion of the population by the over production of manufactured articles, and a decrease of purchasing power in a limited market the national and commercial interests suffer. When I see financial distress emanating as it is undoubtedly emanating when a nation parts with ninety-three millions of dollars exports and only gets seventy-three millions of dollars back for it, I say it is bound to get serious. The Liberal government are in power to-day on the strength of their policy to abolish protection and to adopt free trade. For 18 years they have been denouncing the viciousness of protection. For 18 years the country has been educated so far as they were prepared to receive that education, to acknowledging the claims of the broad principles of free trade, and the country expects the Liberal party to deal with the tariff, not in a half-hearted way, but with honesty of purpose and to carry out principles they have so long advocated. So far as I know the views of the people of Canada, they expect the Liberal party to carry out this policy and if they fail to do so they will be denounced as dishonest politicians and will lose the votes not merely of their opponents but of their friends as well. I am only pointing this out in a friendly way to the government. I know the difficulties they have to contend with, I know the pressure that is brought to bear on them by large and very powerful interests, but there is only one way of coming before the people of Canada and that is in an honest and upright way and to carry out the principles that they have advocated. If the Conservative party are true to their traditions, if they are loyal to the British empire and patriotic to Canada, honest in opposing the Liberal party only in faults of administration, they will assist them by every means in their power to bring about closer trade relations with Great Britain and promote the unity of the British empire. Now is the time, in the Jubilee year of Her Majesty, when the Conservative party have an opportunity to sink political differences and unite in assisting the Liberal party to carry out that policy and send the premier home with a resolution in his pocket offering the practical loyalty of Canadians to British policy. It is not always the duty of an opposition to oppose what may prove to be a good practicable policy. Where a broad policy is brought down, if it is thought desirable that the proposed change should be made, then it is the duty of the opposition to help to carry that out and confine their opposition to legitimate subjects for the sake of securing good government for the country. I hope that the discussion which is likely to take place on the tariff will prepare the feeling that it is going to draw Canada into closer commercial relations with the British empire by trading freely with one another in the same way that the United Kingdom trades with the rest of the world, and pursuing a policy which has given them such prosperity, such physical power and political influence. If we cast our eye on the map of the world and look at the British Isles we cannot fail to realize that they occupy about the same space upon the surface of the world as the brain does in the human body and exercising the same influence. The reason of that is that their people have opened their minds to enlighten men and civilization upon the highest plane yet developed, and they are gradually distributing that enlightenment and civilization through the force of their commercial policy. If we allow ourselves to realize its force and cast in our lot with them, not in a carping spirit of protection, we will have an honourable share in that political influence and that physical power which extends throughout the four corners of the world. Now is the time to show that patriotism and loyalty to the empire by assisting the Liberal party in carrying out that policy. Of course, if the Conservative party are going to refuse to shake hands commercially with the British Isles, then the Liberal party will not go one bit further than the Conservative party will permit them, because their motto is business is business. I know that the people in the country want such a policy. I have come down sixteen hundred miles through the country, and have met Conservatives and Liberals, and all have united in saying, "Let us have free trade with Britain, but keep up the tariff against the United States, until a treaty of friendship and commerce can be obtained." I would say to my hon. friends from Montreal, no doubt they will feel that they will be more or less affected by the lowering of the tariff, so far as their manufacturing industries are concerned, but I am perfectly confident that the generality of manufacturers will not be injured at all, that there will be, comparatively speaking, very little loss under any circumstances to any established industry, because the working of free trade will sustain them, if not exactly in the same position, in another position. The experience of the world is that, wherever a sea port is made a free trade port, the country for five or six hundred miles in its vicinity is benefited and its trade concentrated there. If we adopt the policy which I have advocated, you will at once make the port of Montreal and the port of Quebec the most flourishing ports on this continent. The same may be said of Halifax, St. John and all ports accessible to water carriage. What is more, I believe the people along the northern boundary of the United Sates will begin to realize at once from the activity of the commerce and trade that will be developed under such conditions the benefit of the free trade policy and they will use their influence with their own government to follow a similar course. I suppose every one in Canada will admit that if the people of the United States will take down their tariff and trade on an entirely free trade basis such as Great Britain there will be no desire on the part of any one to keep up a tariff against them. We can in the meantime institute a policy such as I have been advocating, such as is mentioned in a great many public newspapers, and which has been intimated by the honourable mover of the address. Always the question is argued, where will we get a revenue—there will be $7,000,000 lost on articles imported from Great Britain. I say put a higher duty on spirits and tobacco.

Hon. Mr. PROWSE—We will have prohibition.

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—We have not prohibition yet. All the Australian colonies have $3.50 on spirits.

Hon. Mr. DEVER—You have that on spirits now.

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—No, we have only $1.70 excise.

Hon. Mr. DEVER—You have $3.40.

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—The Australian colonies have $3.50 a gallon on spirits, and if we were to put $3.50 a gallon on spirits and increase the excise on tobacco, we would easily raise the $7,000,000.

An Hon. MEMBER—You would have smuggling.

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—We have got to deal with smuggling. There are seven millions to go upon to put down smuggling. It is merely a matter of money, and honesty of purpose on the part of the employees of the government whether smuggling can be put down or not. But there is the revenue which can be provided at once. Now, is it better to put the collection of that $7,000,000 of revenue on those who drink liquors and smoke tobacco or put it on the farmer and the miner and the lumberman and those engaged in producing from our natural resources and our industry generally and collect it from them on the necessaries of life. That is what you have got to consider. It is not a question of direct taxation at all, because direct taxation is not necessary, but you have got to satisfy your mind on whether you will impose taxation in that way or impose it upon the industries of the country. So far as the question of revenue is concerned it is out of the question altogether. You can put a portion of the revenue on tea, but it is not necessary to touch teas, in my opinion. I would like to say something about retaliation. Of course, a great deal has been said about a retaliatory policy. Hon. gentlemen have read the interview with the hon. Minister of Militia and we saw what the hon. Finance Minister is reported to have said, that he will not only put a duty on soft coal but on anthracite also, if the American people do not consider us at all in the matter of lumber or coal duty, but what they are looking to is the great competition springing up on the Pacific sea board. China is delivering coal at San Francisco, and underselling anything that goes in there by three or four dollars a ton. It is that fact that is helping to attract the attention of the Americans in the framing of their tariff on coal. Then with regard to the duty on lumber, it will be a tremendous injury to the northern lumbermen along the borders of Michigan, having that duty of $2 a thousand. They do not want it. It is put on in the interest of the southern lumbermen who desire to shove their lumber to the north and enter into competition with the lumber which comes from Canada, and they propose to do that by taxing our lumber that goes into the American market. I am astonished to see in the trade and navigation returns that there is only cognizance taken in our exports of 157,000 logs, and they are valued at a million dollars. I am not overstating the case when I say that there are 300,000,000 feet of Canadian logs taken across Lake Huron from Canada to the mills of Michigan and there is no cognizance whatever taken of that in our export returns. What would that show in our export returns if it was published I do not suppose there is a single custom-house or barrier erected on the north shore of Lake Huron to prevent the American lumbermen from taking their whole plant and outfit into the woods from the state of Michigan and taking back saw-logs, and all that is left in the country is merely the duty Ontario has collected upon those logs. I might refer also to Lake Superior where the same thing applies in the matter of pulp wood. What I wish to point out is that fact that there is as large export of our most valuable raw product going on without any knowledge on the part of the people of Canada or government. I suppose information could be obtained from the province of Ontario. If the province of Ontario, when they sold those limits—and it is worth while drawing the attention of the government to the fact—had provided that these saw-logs should be manufactured in Canada it would have simplified matters so far as the international difficulty is concerned, because it becomes an international difficulty when we undertake to put an export duty on anything going into a country that is in the habit of using it and Ontario would get just as good a price. I think there is more profit to Ontario in a trade of 300,000,000 feet lumber than in a trade of 300,000,000 feet logs and certainly a great deal more in the general trade of the country. However, that is beside the question. What I wish to say is that when the people of the United States undertake to put $2 a thousand duty upon the lumber that goes into their country from Canada and increased the duty upon wood pulp and the American lumbermen and Canadian lumbermen are working side by side, the Canadians are cut out—the ground is cut out from under their feet entirely by the fact that American lumbermen can be so much better off by not having to pay the duty on pulp wood and saw-logs that it is impossible for us to allow such a condition of affairs to continue if we have any self respect and any interest in our own welfare and in the dignity of the country. Lumber is not like wheat or fish which can be reproduced from year to year, because timber limits are perishable. It takes fifty years to grow a merchantable pine tree, consequently we are parting with something that we cannot replace at any rate under fifty years, and it is very doubtful if the wealth will come back again that we are now cutting off at the enormous rate of 300,000,000 feet per year. Now, so far as retaliation is concerned, I think it would be wiser for the country to confine any retaliation to that. So far as retaliation upon coal or anything else is concerned, that is foreign to the principles of any one who advocate free trade, and if the hon. minister is intent upon carrying out what he says in the interests of his province, then, of course, he ceases to advocate the principles of the Liberal party that we have heard advocated for so many years. The manner in which the government has been formed, out of men who have been unknown to the Canadian public at large is somewhat peculiar. For instance the Finance Minister is not known except by name to the great masses of the people, and the Minister of Railways and Canals is not known to the great masses of the people, while the hon. Minister of Interior is only known to the great mass of the people by his connection with the school question. None of these gentlemen are pledged to carrying out the policy that those members of the Liberal party were pledged to by virtue of their public utterances for the last 15 years. We know exactly what the policy of the Minister of Trade and Commerce has been and what it is to-day and we know the utterances of Mr. Laurier, and the country can hold them responsible for their utterances and the policy they have advocated; but when it comes to other Ministers who have not been before the Canadian public until they became members of the present government, they are not responsible to the country at all and feel more at liberty to advocate the interests of their own particular locality than they are to advocate the principles which should guide the government in conducting the affairs of a large country such as Canada. With regard to iron, I would like to say a few words, because it is a very important subject. We put a duty of $4 a ton on iron, I think in 1888. We put it on for the purpose of developing the production of pig iron. But the iron production in the country is decreasing and has been decreasing from the past five years, showing that that duty has not effected the purpose for which it was imposed. I can give hon. gentlemen the exact figures:

Importations of pig iron.

	Tons.
1892	69,000

So that hon. gentlemen will see that it fell from 81,000 tons in 1891 to 31,000 tons in 1895. There was a reason for that, because protection was increasing the amount of production. Then, as to the production of iron and iron ore in the Dominion it is as follows:

	Pig iron.		Iron ore.
1891	23,000	tons	69,000	tons.
1892	42,000	"	103,000	"
1893	55,000	"	124,000	"
1894	49,000	"	109,000	"
1895	49,000	"	102,000	"
1896	40,000	"	88,000	"

We exported of iron ore in:

	Tons.
1873	47,000
1885	54,000

In 1891 there was an importation of 81,000 tons and a production of 23,000 tons, a total of 104,000 tons consumed in the country. In 1896 we produced 40,000 tons and we imported 36,000 tons so that there has been a falling off of 30,000 tons in the production and importation of iron, nearly 30 per cent less iron consumed in the manufacturing industry in Canada. That is the result only in a short space of five years. Our mineral return here shows that in the past year there has been a decrease between 1895 and 1896 of 14,191 tons of iron ore, which makes a decrease of about 7,000 tons of pig iron, then see how our export of iron ore has fallen off. If the imposition of $4 a ton duty upon the production of iron in Canada produces that result in five years, in one of the most important materials that enters into the industries of the country, what is the use of keeping a duty of $4 a ton on it, because when you impose $4 a ton duty to ensure the production of 36,000 tons of pig iron you in consequence of that compel the government while that duty is maintained, to put an enormously high protective tariff upon the whole $12,000,000 worth of iron manufactures that has been imported in the country. We imported $12,000,000 worth of materials made from iron. Now, when you put on $4 a ton duty on that 36,000 tons of iron you are taxing the people not only upon the $12,000,000 worth of material, of which iron is the principal component, but you also tax them upon every particle of iron that is manufactured in the country out of the importation of pig iron and the production of pig iron artificially increased in price, so that you will see what an enormous tax you are putting on the industries of the country in the shape of the cost of tools, machinery and everything that iron enters into the manufacture of iron and what for? To induce the production in Nova Scotia of 36,000 tons of native iron! There is the broad fact that you have got to study out, and if there has been a falling off in consumption of 30,000 tons of pig iron since 1891, is it not evidence that there is less iron being consumed or less manufacture being maintained in the matter of iron and less employment of labour? I do not think hon. gentlemen can for one moment come to any other conclusion, and if you put all that I have told you with regard to this alongside of the fact that with our exports during the past eight months far exceeding our imports by $20,000,000 and just taking up this one article of iron—though I might take up many other articles of industry and probably show the same result, you will see more clearly that we are impoverishing ourselves by a greater exportation than importation, and it is further evidence that the country is poorer by the fact that we are not able to consume the amount of iron now that we were previously doing. I think I have said upon that portion of the address as much as the patience of the House will permit. The next subject submitted to us is the Franchise Act. I am not prepared to deal with that question further than to express the hope that when the government does come to thrash out the Franchise Act they will carry out the spirit of our Canadian nationality and make it a national franchise. The adoption of the provincial franchise for Dominion elections is not a sound principle. If we want to make a homogeneous people and maintain the integrity of this national government I say this parliament must not in any shape or form put itself under the control of the provincial governments. We have to keep this parliament free from the control of the provincial governments. The disposition of provincial governments is, I may say, rather to impoverish the national government. The government is asked for national aid for enterprises in every province which increases the value of provincial assets. Provincial governments lay hands violently—I will not say violently, because they are no doubt acting within their constitutional rights—upon this tax and that tax, and expect the Dominion government to be carried on and the country to be governed from the Atlantic to the Pacific without the resources on which it is depending for its financial strength and without which the large responsibilities devolving upon this government cannot be maintained. We must not, therefore, put ourselves under the control of the provincial governments, otherwise the usefulness, strength and dignity of this government might be impaired.

We can use the provincial lists or municipal lists as a basis to ensure the largest number entitled to vote exercising their franchise, but the voters' list should be compiled under federal authority and simple machinery established to secure an up-to-date list. It is easier to lower the franchise when there is a strong public demand for it, than to withdraw the power conferred by manhood suffrage, the franchise is practically manhood suffrage for the industrial classes, a step lower would weaken sound principles of government under existing circumstances. The national government has incurred a heavy debt to bind the provinces together in a national life with a national spirit, and to make internal trade not only possible but practicable. We have reached the end of our tether in revenue under protection, unless more borrowing is resorted to. When therefore an enterprise that is going to develop provincial resources seeks the strengthening aid of the national credit, the national government should receive an asset from the provincial government, if the national credit is to be maintained, and is to be utilized for the development of our country. Therefore the national government should not receive its inspiration through the interests of provincial governments but through an independent expression of the national will of the people through their federal franchise.

We are engaged in an honourable and great effort to govern as large a territory as Russia, one might say, upon the principles of self-government. Our people have been educated in political life under the Liberal ægis of the British constitution, and, while there is still room for a great deal of improvement, they are developing a self-reliance and a knowledge of political life that is enabling them to succeed admirably well; but if we are going to assist the British empire by the national strength developed within ourselves, we must maintain the strength of the national government, and the dignified position due to a nation. Therefore, I hope that when the Franchise Bill is thrashed out, it will be thrashed out on that principle. It is quite possible it may not be brought forward this session, but it may be introduced to be considered and discussed during the recess. With regard to the canals, I think the action that the government has taken in regard to them is worthy of every commendation. There are one or two canals that require to be deepened in order to give effect to the expenditure we have already incurred, and to give us fourteen feet of navigation clear to the ocean, and that is all in accordance with the development of foreign trade. What we want is to have our water communication to reach as far inland as it possibly can, because it is the cheapest mode of transport, and it aids the people to enlarge their foreign trade. With regard to the Intercolonial Railway system, I shall not refer to it, although that is, of course, intimately connected with the duty on coal. The rates on the Intercolonial Railway are made so low that it is unprofitable to the country as far as freight is concerned, but it is done for the purpose of driving Nova Scotia coal as far west as possible, and with that and a duty of 60 cents a ton it is endeavouring to bolster up our coal industry. I think it is a poor way to bolster it up; without it we should succeed as well as they do in Great Britain under free trade, and make the coal and iron mines of Nova Scotia contribute to the workshops of the world. So far as cold storage and accommodation for creameries are concerned, the government deserve every credit for the laudable efforts they are putting forth in that direction. It is a matter of importance to the people of western Canada, who have some sixteen or eighteen hundred miles of land carriage, and who could not possibly export their perishable produce without the cold storage system, and I am quite satisfied that under the able guidance of Professor Robertson, the government will be able to develop a system that will increase the exports of dairy and other perishable produce to a very great degree. There is another question that I feel I could not pass without remark and that is the question of prohibition. I take strong ground upon that question and the question of a plebiscite. For my part I do not think the plebiscite is a constitutional way of dealing with a question of that kind, or in fact a question of any kind.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—I think it is unconstitutional in this way, that it has no effect whatever. The speech says: "It is desirable that the mind of the people of Canada should be clearly ascertained on the subject of prohibition." Now, it is impossible to ascertain clearly "the mind of the people of Canada" by means of a plebiscite, because the only people which will vote on a plebiscite will be those who are anxious to see the law enacted, and those who do not care to see such a law invoked will not turn out to vote. It only shows the earnestness of those who will turn out to vote for it. That is the only effect. The plebiscite in the province of Ontario has been unproductive of anything useful and in the province of Manitoba it is the same way. All the votes taken there only showed the earnestness of a certain class of the population. So it will be with this proposed Dominion plebiscite; the only effect it will have is to show a very large vote in its favour in Canada, and what is the government going to do when they get the vote? Are they going to say this vote does not represent a majority of the people of Canada? There are so many votes polled at general elections and you may only get 30 or 40 per cent of the vote in this plebiscite. Do you expect under such circumstances the government is going to bring in a bill with a backing of only 30 or 40 per cent of the electors to enforce upon the country a sumptuary law which many well-wishers of the temperance cause and advanced thinkers amongst temperance worker do not regard as a sound principle of legislation?

It is useless to pass a law which the majority of the people are opposed to. We are told that if the government increase the duty on liquors it will induce the people to smuggle. There is this to be said, if you raise the duty on liquors and tobacco and get a revenue of seven or eight millions of dollars additional from it, you have got some money with which to stop smuggling, but under prohibition you collect no revenue from the manufacture of liquor and you have no financial means to stop the illegal and illicit manufacture and sale of it. So far as I am concerned, I applaud the efforts that the temperance people are putting forth. I admire their persistence and I like their example, but they have got to use discretion and judgment in forcing upon the country extreme views which are not sound. We are surrounded on all sides with material out of which we can make alcohol. You can go into your garden, or into the woods or into the vineyards, the wheat fields, the barley field or the corn field and on every hand you will find the utmost profusion of material out of which you can manufacture alcohol for yourself.

Hon. Mr. CLEMOW—That will be free trade in liquor.

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—Yes, without any revenue. What I say is, that if you reduce the country to that condition and make it illegal to manufacture or sell liquor, you simply drive into dark places the vice arising from the abuse of liquor which is now being controlled by the government and which is brought alongside of a better class of people, and to the extent that vice meets righteousness face to face to that extent is vice going to be suppressed. But if you drive vice into dark places it will be carried on secretly and young people will be drawn towards it because you must recollect it is going to be very profitable without an excise law to manufacture liquor, and when you have the manufacture going on the men who produce it will go into dark places to find customers. The statistics the temperance press furnishes placing liquor at the head of the cost of consumptial articles is misleading. If all the goods enumerated alongside of it had a heavy excise added to the original cost, liquor would not occupy the leading place assigned to it. The abuse of liquor we must all deplore. In the consumption of it is a very large proportion of waste. It is not waste when taken for heathful purposes or in moderation, but when it is taken in excess it is waste. What does the government do? They go round and collect this waste and bring it into the revenue. It would be all waste if we had prohibition, but a revenue is created out of that waste for the support of the country. I fail to see in the Scriptures, that should be our guide in national life, any law or instruction by which the public sale of liquor is prohibited, we can see plenty of instances where the abuse of it will be punished, but none where prohibition is required or called for. The removal of temptation is not one of the principles of Scriptures ; it is self control that we are in duty bound to exercise over ourselves in order to restrict the abuses and the excesses to which we are tempted, and also as an example to our neighbour. That is what is enjoined upon us and not the total prohibition of liquor. I feel quite confident that if the country was drawn into any act that would lead to prohibition, it would be a great mistake. The Scott Act which was promoted by my hon. friend the Secretary of State was brought about by a plebiscite and what is the result? It is, I think, practically a dead letter. It is the law still, but the people do not use it for their self protection, and as the Scriptures say: "The last stage of that man is worse than the first." If we adopt a prohibitory law and it failed to receive the support and the respect of the majority of the people, when we relapse we relapse into a worse condition, and it would be better for the temperance people not to force the hand of the government at the present moment but wait patiently to see what the effect of their example is before trying to rush this question on the country. The calamity which has befallen our fellow subjects in India has evoked widespread sympathy in this country, and this clause of the speech has been adopted in view of the efforts put forth by the people of Canada, and I would refer particularly to the Montreal Star, and also to the efforts of their Excellencies the Governor General and Lady Aberdeen have put forth and the efforts of the lieutenant-governors of the various provinces, all of whom have been the mediums of liberal subscriptions from the people. It is a magnificent offering and it has been taken advantage of by the Canadian people not only to relieve the suffering people of India, but also to call forth the charitable impulses of the people. We all understand that it is more blessed to give than to receive and when the charitable instincts of the people are called forth on public occasions of this kind it is an admirable incentive to a higher national character. There is one other subject I desire to take up though it is not referred to in the address—it is the subject of the Canadian Pacific Railway and its connection with the Crow's Nest Pass Railway. It is a subject which has created a great deal of interest throughout the country and especially in the west—our railway communications and the development of our resources. The Toronto Globe, no doubt speaking on behalf of the Canadian Pacific Railway Company, has been full of articles advocating a bonus or other assistance to their railway for the construction of the Crow's Nest Pass Railway. Some newspapers have controverted that position, feeling that the Canadian Pacific Railway should have no further strengthening, but rather the reverse, and that the government should themselves undertake the construction of that road. The position laid down by the Toronto Globe is that the Dominion government, having entered into an agreement with the Canadian Pacific Railway Company by which the latter were to earn ten per cent on their capital before there was to be any interference with their rights to levy freight rates to suit themselves, the government should take advantage of the present position and offer a bonus to the Canadian Pacific Railway Company, making it a condition that they should forego this advantage they possessed under that agreement. While I am desirous of assisting the Canadian Pacific Railway Company in every way that I can so far as to strengthen its position in the country and enable it to carry on the trade of the country and maintain the credit of the Dominion, I do not agree with the suggestion of the Globe. In the first place, I do not allow that that ten per cent which the Globe claims the railway is allowed to earn, is worth anything. The agreement between the Dominion government and the Canadian Pacific Railway Company was that upon the capital which was invested in the construction of the main line between Callendar Station and the Pacific Ocean, they should be entitled to receive ten per cent before any reduction of rates could be called for by the government. My interpretation of that is this, that if the Canadian Pacific Railway Company claimed that as a bond, they should be reminded of the story of the Merchant of Venice, where the celebrated case was before the court and Portia said "the law gives you the bond but not one drop of blood." That is the position we have to hold the Canadian Pacific Railway Company in. If the company put forward a claim to ten per cent, then the government should value the line from Callendar Station to the Pacific Ocean, and deduct from that the cost of the roads given to the company, the money bonuses given to the company and the value of the land grants and upon the difference the company is entitled to ten per cent. That is the extent of the privilege that can be claimed properly or justly under the Dominion agreement not upon an indefinite increase of capital account raised at the will of the directors. Therefore when that is put forward as a reason why the country should pay three millions of dollars towards constructing the Crow's Nest Pass Railway, I say it is no argument at all. If the Canadian Pacific Railway Company is to be assisted at all, it must be on the merits of the project and the requirements of the company. The earnings of the Canadian Pacific Railway this past year have been $8,000,000 over and above the expenses and the fact that the largest profits earned are in those months in which our wheat and cattle and heavy products are being carried to market, are an evidence that the farming community hears the brunt of the revenue of the railway.

That $8,000,000 is the net profit which goes to the payments of the dividends. The fixed charges have very nearly reached $7,000,000. The common stock amounts to $65,000,000, and on that 2½ per cent was paid last year. As these fixed charges creep up, naturally the common stock must fall back, unless increased earnings or assets strengthen it, because the company cannot go on increasing the fixed charges and maintain an interest on this common stock. Three million was added to the fixed charges during the last year by a sale of preference shares amounting to about $3,000,000 and the fixed charges are creeping up gradually. I am a friend of the Canadian Pacific Railway Company (though perhaps too candid a friend), and I wish to help that work as a national work all that I possibly can, but it is necessary for the public to keep a check upon large corporations, otherwise they will bring ruin, not only upon the country but upon themselves in time. The directors are able business men and so far as railway men are concerned they are second to none on this continent, but large corporations which are virtually monopolies must not forget that the public are partners with them. The public furnish the traffic that enables them to pay their way and meet their dividends. It is their interest in preventing, if it is possible to do so by legislation the Canadian Pacific Railway Company or any other corporation getting into the position which the United States railway corporations have reached—that is extracting the last drop of blood which they can take from the people, and which the Toronto Globe says is the natural outcome of all corporations, but which ultimately brings unavoidable destruction to vested interests when established upon an unsound basis. If this is the spirit in which corporations act, the public must take the reverse position and check the growth of capital on the part of the companies. The earning power of the people is limited in their ability to meet undue drafts upon it. I wish to see the Canadian Pacific Railway maintained in its present superior state for the benefit of the country and for its own credit. When through our legislation, innocent purchasers become creditors, we are bound in honour to sustain them, but when we see that the condition of affairs is growing and increasing by the increased capital account beyond the legitimate earning power of the country, then I say we have to raise a warning voice. The Canadian Pacific Railway runs for 7,250 miles in Canada and nearly 9,000 miles in Canada and the United States jointly. It is a huge enterprise so far as railway construction and management are concerned, but we who are living in the interior of the country and have to pay on an average for 2,000 miles of land transportation will demand an inquiry into the rates of the Canadian Pacific Railway, so as to try and reduce them without impairing the credit of the company, in such a manner that the prosperity of the country and of the people who are producing the raw material from which the wealth of the country is derived, can be maintained. Every soul in Manitoba and the North-west Territories is supported by what comes from the soil directly or indirectly and to the extent that the tariff reduces their earning power or the rates of the railway reduce their profit, to that extent is every man, woman and child in that country impoverished. Mr. Hague of the Merchants Bank, who said last night in his lecture the banks have lost millions in the North-west justifies my warning. To the extent that the Canadian Pacific Railway Company reduces its rates on our products and leaves a larger margin of profit to the farmers, to that extent are the farmers benefited, immigration attracted, and the profits now drawn off are distributed through the country. To the extent that they prosper, will the country be attractive to immigrants and it is that view that the Canadian Pacific Railway Company should take. The west supports 4,000 miles of that railway with much heavier rates than the 3,000 miles in the eastern sections have to pay. When the directors of that company meet they simply concentrate their ideas upon the earning power of the road and the possibility of extracting dividends and discounting future profits. They do not realize the way in which large sections and large communities are impoverished by high rates. They reduced their rates upon the Edmonton road and for the farmers at the foot of the Rocky Mountains to enable them to get their produce into the mines but it was only the competition of the American railways induced that. To the extent that they reduce the rates, they support the farmers and to that extent are they able to attract their friends to that section of the country. The Crow's Nest Pass Railway is a project of importance, not only for the development of resources which show great power of development, but also for the purpose of turning those resources on to the main line of the Canadian Pacific Railway. The more we enrich the Canadian Pacific Railway by finding traffic for it, the lower the rates can be reduced. The more we allow foreign lines to take that trade away from the Canadian Pacific Railway the more will the railway weaken and the further off we will be from getting any reduction of rates. What I say—and hon. gentlemen have heard me argue this question in the House before—is not to give a penny to the Canadian Pacific Railway but to guarantee the bonds of the railway. The credit of the Canadian government is good and the bonds will sell at par at 3 per cent, and the fact of the Canadian Pacific Railway being able to raise ten or twelve thousand dollars a mile on the government guarantee at 3 per cent is a big bonus to them. That is what I advocate. I further advocate that we should stop the idea of bonussing railways in the way we have been doing. The districts through which the railway passes should maintain it, bear the charge of its construction through the traffic. Where a province is having its resources developed on the assistance of the federal government by a railway, there should always be a land grant as a basis of credit to strengthen the bands of the federal government in assisting. Cash assets to the company are no benefit to subsequent traffic. Where you have a large field of virgin prairie, of course you put a railway through that because it will bring farmers and they will produce wealth and trade. In that case a portion of the guaranteed bonds should be set aside to meet the first four or five years' interest, but in the case of the Crow's Nest traffic awaits and demands the railway. The Crow's Nest route possesses coal in abundance, freights carried into the mines from the east or the west cannot bring back a return cargo as one of the chief productions is gold and the company can fill their empties with coal and distribute cheaply along their line to the advantage of their railway and the people.

In the Rocky Mountains the resources exist to support the railway fully from the start, but there is just this to be said; if the government should not give them any assistance, then they raise money by the sale of their own bonds at five or six per cent interest. A bond of the Canadian Pacific Railway Company at six per cent interest will not fetch as much in the markets of the world as a guaranteed bond at three per cent. To the extent that the district is impoverished by having to pay a dividend of six per cent on those bonds and reduced capital, to that extent will the freight have to bear a burden. To the extent that the interest is diminished by the government guarantee on three per cent bonds, to that extent is the district assisted and the Canadian Pacific Railway Company assisted, and the development of the country will go on. The Dominion government should have security for that guarantee by getting the first mortgage on the railway. They should get also certain grants from the provincial government as a basis. All the provinces except Manitoba and the North-west Territories have their own resources, and for the Dominion government to go on and develop those resources while enriching the province in that way, without any co-operation on the part of the province, is a mistake. The province, by so doing, is assisting itself in the development of its own resources and should assist. That assistance should go to the Dominion government and not to the railway. The railway gets the assistance of the guarantee on its three per cent bonds. We had an illustration of that in the railway to the Lake Dauphin district. The Dominion government gave first of all a land grant of six thousand four hundred acres a mile for one hundred and fifty miles. The project hung fire and did not go on. Then the Dominion government entered into a contract with them for carrying the mails, &c., which amounted to a bonus, I think, of two thousand dollars a mile; they did not accomplish anything with that. Then the province of Manitoba guaranteed their bonds to the extent of $8,000 a mile, guaranteed at 4 per cent interest, 30 years to run and abolition of taxation on their franchise. What did that railway company get? Eight thousand dollars a mile under a guarantee from the provincial government, and they were entitled to issue bonds to the extent of twenty thousand dollars a mile. Eight thousand dollars of this were first mortgaged to the present government as a security for repayment. The provincial government only took security on the railway itself. The subsidy of two thousand dollars a mile and the land grant of 6,400 acres a mile went into the pockets of the promoters. That road did not cost over eight thousand dollars a mile to build. There is not a road in prairie country which under existing conditions cost over eight thousand or ten thousand a mile to build. The provincial government gave them a guarantee of eight thousand dollars a mile and, in addition the railway had two thousand dollars a mile and six thousand four hundred acres a mile, and presumably they sold their second mortgage bonds for twelve thousand dollars a mile. This is a waste of public resources which goes into the pockets of a few individuals, and the provincial government should have appropriated all the assets, which were valueless without its guarantee and which under assistance rendered by the guarantee of the federal government would not have been essential to the construction of the railway. That condition of things should be stopped. We should proceed on a different basis. We should regard the Canadian Pacific Railway as a national line worthy of assistance on legitimate grounds. We should watch with care and jealously the increase of their capital account, because the increase goes on, and the habit of United States railways has been to discount the future profits that are to be derived by the growth of the population. What we want is that the growth of future population should assist, assist not to unduly increase the capital account of the company, and thereby the wealth of the Canadian Pacific Railway, but it should go to enriching the prosperity of the country, which is due entirely to the industry of the people themselves. Those are the views that I hold with regard to this question. I hope that the government will assist the Canadian Pacific Railway Company to build the Crow's Nest Pass Railway upon that basis. It will be an advantage to the country and an advantage in the development of those natural resources. The opposition to it to-day I think would probably die out if it were put on some such basis as that. They, no doubt, have in their minds the monopoly of the Southern Pacific in California and the forcible way in which it salted every commercial interest. There is no private company that could approach that line so well or build it so cheaply. It is out of the question the government building it, because it would cost the government a large sum of money, and it is an expenditure that the government are not prepared to enter upon unless there was a proposition to bring all our railroads under one national management, which we are not prepared for now. Therefore, under the circumstances there is no company that can build the road so well, or manage it so cheaply, as the Canadian Pacific Railway Company. All the country is bound to do is to assist it and give it that assistance by the Dominion guarantee of its bonds. A principle which if wisely administered will ensure development without incurring national debt. In connection with the consideration of our railway management, the Toronto Globe has been advocating the appointment of a commission on the lines of the interstate commerce commission. It is worth while considering carefully before applying this machinery to our system of government. We have a railway committee of the Privy Council and if it powers were enlarged it would have all the force of the interstate commerce commission of the United States, and be more elastic in its action. Under the United States system we are relegating powers of government and there have been complaints that this commission frequently fell under the influence of the railway companies in its working in the United States. The railway committee of the Privy Council is under the direct influence of the people guided by the General Railway Act which can be amended at any time. The system of the United States is a great network of railways rapidly approaching I think 100,000 miles, covering a large area not only east and west but north and south, while our system as yet is comprised in two great systems, the Grand Trunk and Canadian Pacific Railway systems, the Intercolonial being a government railway and in that respect there is a difference in requirements. The subject is worthy of most careful consideration before parliament assigns its present control over railway management to a fixed commission.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.)—In addressing a few words to the House on the speech of His Excellency the Governor General at the opening of parliament, I will first offer my congratulations to the gentlemen who have been called to the Senate and I congratulate the House also on the addition to its ranks of men of experience and ability in commerce, finance and parliamentary affairs. The hon. Minister of Justice passed an eloquent eulogy on some of those gentlemen—no doubt deservedly so—but it struck me it was a fortunate thing he was not within hearing of John Charlton, M.P., or he would have been arraigned on the charge of seduction. Such speeches are very seductive. Not only this House, but the people at large will heartily concur in the first paragraph of the speech on the subject of loyalty, and the desire to celebrate in a fitting manner the long and illustrious reign of Her Most Gracious Majesty, Queen Victoria. The Minister of Justice spoke of an address of congratulation to Her Majesty on this unique occasion. I think there should be more than that—such as a public celebration at the capital in connection with the municipal celebration. Something for the enjoyment of the masses on such an occasion should be done, so that there should be a real demonstration of loyalty.

The next paragraph refers to the so-called settlement of the Manitoba school question. In speaking on this question at the last session of parliament, I pointed out the political immorality there would be in giving a member of the Manitoba government the bribe of a Dominion portfolio for a settlement of the school question. It is well known that the portfolio of the interior was kept dangling for months before the hungry government of Manitoba. It is well known that the Attorney General of that province, Mr. Sifton, was a strong advocate of public, non-sectarian schools, and that he stumped Ontario in support of those views. It is well known that he defended the right of Manitoba to have one common school system in all the courts of the empire. But now we find a change come over the spirit of his dream—he is willing to modify his once strong opinions, and give the Catholics a shadow and only a shadow of their rights. It is known that for that change of opinion he is renumerated with office and a salary of $7,000—a transaction by which he betrayed his constituents, and sacrificed his convictions. Such a man is not qualified, in my opinion, to hold any important portfolio. I fully agree with Sir Mackenzie Bowell on the important constitutional question involved in this so-called settlement, The parliament of Canada conferred on Manitoba certain powers and privileges within certain bound and with certain limitations. The provincial legislature oversteps those bounds, and the Dominion becomes a party to such a breach of an Act of parliament, "The Manitoba Act," without the sanction of parliament. If that province can break through its constitution in one instance, what is to prevent it doing so in another, and following liberal tendencies from which I exempt the ministers on the floor of this House—it may declare for annexation next. Therefore, setting aside the religions questions, the constitutional one is important and may hereafter cause very serious complications. Reverse the condition of things—let a Protestant minority be deprived of a right secured to it by the unanimous sanction of parliament, and enjoyed in peace for twenty years after which those rights are torn from it. Under such conditions, I would like to ask the Minister of Justice what he would do. Would he surrender Protestant rights, and accept an emasculated deformity like that now offered the Catholics?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—He would not allow it to go for six years. He would stop it within a very few months. It ought to have been stopped the first year—the School Act of 1890 ought to have been disallowed.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Would not Manitoba have followed the example of Ontario and re-enacted the bill the following session?

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.)—The experience of disallowing Acts is this: they have been passed year after year by the local assemblies. When Australia passed an Act to tax the Chinese, it was vetoed twice, and when it was passed the third time it was allowed to become law. In the case of the Manitoba School Act, it was referred to the courts of justice. That was the proper course to pursue. I remember speaking to Sir John Macdonald on the subject and he said that was the wisest plan. "It will be settled for ever," he said, "but if it was left to be settled by parliament, it will be always cropping up." I ask if the case were reversed, if a Protestant minority were in the position of the Roman Catholic population of Manitoba, would the Minister of Justice submit to such a violation of rights guaranteed by the constitution? No, hon. gentlemen, he would be the last man to accept anything of the kind. Then why should the Catholics accept an unjust settlement? Is he a true son of the church who accepts such a settlement? I know that were I a Catholic I would fight for my rights to the last.

The next paragraph refers to the tariff about which I will say little, until the commercial and fiscal policy of the government is before parliament in crystallized form. I will say this much, that I am in full accord with the opinion expressed on the subject by the hon. mover of the address, and a gentleman of such ripe and extensive experience knows whereof he speaks. I congratulate him in having the courage of his convictions—a virtue not possessed by all of us. A gentleman like the mover of the address, who has been in close touch with the financial pulse of the country from 1874 to 1879, must have noticed with surprise and gratification the restoration of confidence and business activity, the liberation and investment of millions of capital, and the elevation of the country from a slough of despond to a condition of buoyancy and prosperity under the national policy. We will look for the new tariff with interest. The next paragraph refers to the abolition of the Franchise Act and the adoption of the provincial franchises. So far as my own province is concerned, I object strongly to this being done. In British Columbia we have manhood suffrage, every male person, being a British subject of full age, who has resided one year in the province, is entitled to vote. Such a franchise is highly unfair to the thrifty citizen and taxpayer. Why should worthless idle characters have the privilege of voting for our law makers, and have a voice in placing taxes on the shoulders of others which they do not bear themselves? At the same time, I admit that the present law is too cumbersome and expensive in its operation, and might be amended with advantage.

The continuation of the former policy to deepen the canals is to be commended, and so is the intention to give improved cold storage facilities to our farmers.

The programme referring to railways is meagre and unsatisfactory. Instead of announcing the opening up of undeveloped parts of the country, which should be done, we are told that the Intercolonial Railway is to be extended to Montreal. Is it proper or fair in the government to parallel the lines of two companies, and enter into competition with them, backed up by the revenue of the country? These companies now are not in a very prosperous condition, and this opposition by the government will still further lessen their business and profit, whilst a loss to the government matters not, the country bears it.

With regard to taking the opinion of the country on the question of prohibition, I would ask—What is the use of putting the country to such an expense on a matter which is impracticable? I am in favour of temperance, but not in favour of a demoralizing comedy on temperance. How is a frontier line of 4,000 miles, and a seaboard of 7,000 miles to be guarded? It is an impossibility, and should a Prohibition Act ever pass, the largest field in the world will be opened for smuggling. Then the question of compensation for the destruction of vested rights will have to be considered, which means millions of dollars.

In trying experiments with trade conditions of long standing the government must exercise all its wisdom, and remember that in "rooting out the tares, they root not the wheat also."

Hon. Sir WILLIAM HINGSTON—I listened with a great deal of interest to the able speech from the hon. gentleman on this side, who was so severely logical, however, that I found it difficult to follow him in some of his arguments, and in one in particular: that the more we exported and the less we imported, the worse for the country. I was under the impression that the more our exports exceeded our imports, the greater the wealth of the country; in other words, that the more we earn and the less we spend, the richer we become Whenever I have leisure, I shall be glad to sit at the feet of my hon. friend, and learn those lessons in political economy which, at present, are new to me. With regard to the address, so much has been said that I shall simply go over the ground hurriedly. The enlargement of the St. Lawrence canals recommends itself to us all; and the Intercolonial Railway terminating in Montreal is a wise measure, which I think should have the support of this House. As head of ocean navigation Montreal is, geographically speaking, a city that cannot be overlooked in any wise legislation. The same with regard to cold storage on steamers; but here let me remark that hitherto there has been more cold storage provided on steamers than has been availed of. One shipowner in Montreal told me that he constructed storage arrangements at an expense of I forget how many thousands of pounds upon fast vessels, and he had yet to receive his first contract and with it his first dollar to carry provisions across to the other side of the Atlantic. With regard to the Behring Sea claims, we approve of any measure between the United States and Great Britain, with a view to a fair and amicable settlement; but it is for the United States and Great Britain to settle that question, and not for us, however interested we may be. As to the Indian famine fund I am proud, as a Canadian, that we have done our fair share, and are still doing it to come to the relief of those who differ from us in language and in colour, but who are subjects of Her Gracious Majesty and our fellow beings. The allusion to the Queen and the Diamond Jubilee is well thought of. Our feeling towards Her Majesty is one not only of loyalty, but of devotion and admiration of—nay—I might say almost of adoration, one of the noblest and best sovereigns any country has ever had. And so soon as our good Queen shall have passed away—and may it not be in the near future—I think that Justin McCarthy's words will be realized that Great Britain has had the greatest monarch probably that ever occupied a throne. A measure we are told will be submitted for the revision of the tariff which proposes to make our fiscal system more satisfactory to the masses. Of course any improvement in that respect will receive my support. Then the next subject referred to is the school question. It is called a settlement. Do the advisers of the Crown who have put the word into His Excellency's mouth know its meaning? A settlement is supposed to be something final. It means an adjustment of differences; a reconciliation in which both parties to the adjustment or reconciliation are agreed and are content. Yet by members of the government in both Houses, we are told it is not final. Arrangement is the word I should have preferred or modus vivendi or a modus patiendi, rather. An arrangement has been come to between the representatives of a distant province and ourselves and the government of this country. Well, hon. gentlemen, the less a question is understood the more is said about it, and the greater is the confusion in our ideas regarding it. I find nothing in the natural world more resembling this question than one of those optical illusions that occur so frequently in the west, and nowhere more markedly than in Manitoba itself where, in a particular condition of the atmosphere, the sun's rays falling at a certain angle upon a sometimes distant scene gives the appearance of terrestrial objects in the heavens, the size and shape of which depend upon the position of the observer. The man at one place sees them clearly; and the man a few thousand yards away does not see them as clearly, or perhaps does not see them at all. If he sees something, it is not like what others see. And so on this question, a question of conscience, which only those who take a conscientious view of the question can begin to understand or to realize. What is the position of this subject of investigation? The situation is simply this: from one end of this country to the other, we have been promised a settlement. That means, of course, a settlement that will be satisfactory to all, and especially to those chiefly interested. Let me ask you, from the opinions that have been expressed in pulpits, at public meetings and in assemblies and in social life, let me ask you if the settlement that has been reached is a satisfactory one? Has it been a satisfactory one to those who are most deeply interested?

Several hon. MEMBERS—No, no.

Hon. Sir WILLIAM HINGSTON—You answer no, and you answer rightly. You might as well put a worm on a hook and ask, is it satisfied because it ceases to wriggle? No, it is not satisfactory, and here I am sorry I cannot agree with the speech from the Throne when it says: "I confidently hope that this settlement will put an end to the agitation which has marred the harmony and impeded the development of our country." What a grim savagery is there in the word settlement in this connection! There is no man in this community who would not wish to see this question disappear for ever and for ever; but it cannot be carried away upon the shoulders of injustice. The settlement, I say emphatically, is not satisfactory to those most interested, and to those who love the good name of our beloved country, and her respect for established privileges and rights, and I think it is our duty to say so. And here I shall take the liberty to read some words that fell from the hon. the leader of the opposition, and I hope they were duly recorded. When he was twitted about the change that had taken place in the feelings of the people of the province of Quebec—how they were misled, or bamboozled, I should say—what were his words? He did not care how the people of the province of Quebec had voted; it was not a question upon which the people had a right to vote. It is not for the people of the province to say that an injustice had or had not been done when the highest tribunal in the world, the court of last appeal, had said an injustice has been done. Now, what is the defence set up? 1st. That it is all that can be granted; 2nd. That it is all that is necessary; and 3rd. That it is all that the minority had a right to expect. Now, to the first, I should say: what was the intention of the Privy Council's later decision? Nothing is clearer than that it was intended to mean the re-establishment of schools such as existed, or something to that effect, that would bring justice, relief and satisfaction to a section of our people. To the second, I would say that it is not at all sufficient; that the time devoted to religious instruction—one half hour in the afternoon—is illusory; it is not satisfactory, and, worse than that, it is deceptive. It cannot be made satisfactory, and why? I am not talking now of the religion of any particular sect. I am speaking of the question of education as proposed as one from which religion has been excluded or of any form of religious belief making it non-religious rather than irreligious. It is impossible to carry out a measure of that kind and give to the people of Manitoba the religious instruction to which they have been accustomed for many years. 3rdly. We are told the French Canadian population of Manitoba is numerically weak ; there are but a few thousand, and why have so much trouble ? Well, hon. gentlemen, if fifty, or one thousand French Canadians in that district are zeros, how many times would you require to multiply those figures to make them anything more than zeros ? Ten zeros, after all, are but zeros ; and a hundred zeros are simply zeros. And now that I have asserted that an injustice has been done to a minority, that is not a zero in the eye of the law—nor in the eye of God, and with your permission I shall lay before you a very short statement of my appreciation of the case. First of all there are constitutional reasons, and there are reasons of conscience. The British North America Act guaranteed provincial rights, and among those rights were separate schools and schools for minorities. The protection of minorities is a necessary corollary. Any contravention or abolishment can be appealed to the federal government which has the power to annul such legislation, and that is what we desire. Now, the minority in Manitoba claims that its rights were abolished. They had schools from the very beginning, from the very earliest days. The first missionaries were sent from the archdiocese of Quebec by Bishop Plessis, whose episcopal jurisdiction at that time extended from the Atlantic to the Pacific. Did the missionaries go uninvited? No, they were invited. Missionaries of the stamp of Mons. Provencher and Mons. Dumoulin do not often wait to be invited, but the highest authority at the time, Lord Selkirk, on behalf of the Hudson Bay Co., invites them to come and establish churches and schools and they respond, and when Bishop Plessis, the bishop of Quebec, sent his missionaries, what were his instructions? Instruct those Indians, and before he sends them he sends his instructions to the governor who says "C'est sage," "It is wise." They go, and what are they told to do? You will build churches. You will raise schools. What schools do you suppose they would have? They were long there in undisturbed possession, and the Hudson Bay Co., to show its appreciation of them, gives them land to build upon, and money to help them to build, endows their schools and continues to give them money every year. The Episcopalians wished their rights recognized, and the Hudson Bay Co. gave them land; and by-and-by the Presbyterians got some 15 per cent of what the others received. Thus it was recognized that the schools were separate and distinct, the Presbyterians teaching according to their views, the Episcopalians in their way and the Catholics in theirs. Where a school was built the missionaries had simply to ask the government of the Hudson Bay Co. for a piece of land and it was given, and when they asked for money it was furnished. The Hudson Bay Co. recognized that the missionaries were there for the good of the country, to teach the Indians to forget their savagery and become Christians. The missionaries taught them economy and to be true and loyal to the Throne. One of the commissions to Messrs. Provencher and Dumoulin reads thus :

Les missionaires feront connaître aux peuples l'avantage qu'ils ont de vivre sous le gouvernement de Sa Majesté Britannique, leur enseignant, de parole, et d'example, le respect et la fidélité qu'ils doivent au souverain, les accoutumant à adresser à Dieu de ferventes prières pour la prospérité de Sa Très Gracieuse Majesté, de son auguste famille et de son empire.

When this matter was alluded to in the House of Commons, one of the gentlemen said there, "What business had they with that ? That is a political question." So far for constitutional reasons. But there are reasons of faith and conscience. While listening to the discussion of the tariff and cold storage and the rest, I recognized their importance, but they sink into utter insignificance compared with the question of conscience involved in this controversy, because upon the decision depends whether we shall have a good, loyal, honest and contented people, or leave them to drift as they will, a soured and discontented people. They should come to appreciate what religious education means, and to recognize God in every step of life, to recognize Him everywhere, and not put Him in the background as a deposed statue or heathen god is set aside when fashions change. Now, it is apparent, that when men situated as the minority in Manitoba undertake what they have undertaken ; go to the expense of such costly appeals ; and at present when they remain despoiled of their schools, refuse to accept the conditions of the government, and in the face of every difficulty, at the greatest of personal and financial sacrifices, begin the opening of private schools while paying for the maintenance of public schools, it is very apparent that some intense conviction, some grand underlying principle, must be at stake, must be the motive of such heroic endeavours. The answer is plain. It is their right, and their duty not less than their right, to bring up their children according to their conscience. Religion must be in the heart; it must be taught. Who teaches the child? The parent. The parent never relinquishes his right over the child. He educates the child, but supposing he himself is not educated and has not the time, then he does it by deputy, he gets those who will teach the child. It is therefore a question of conscience—a very serious question to interfere with, and when interfered with, imposing serious responsibility upon him or upon them who deprive them of that right. It is the sacred right and the duty of parents to bring up their children. You have not the advantage that I have of being in a French Canadian community, where the Bon Dieu is everywhere; everything in the house of the French Canadian is intended to remind them of God, and everything in their books and teachings is of the wisdom and mercy and unbounded love of God. Is it an advantage or not to have children educated in that way? Now, the school, as I say, is simply a fire-side, an extension of the domestic fire-side, so to speak. I may be competent to teach my child but if I have not the time, I send him to school, and what do I say now? Perhaps it may not be quite the thing, but having given to my children the best education this country could afford, if I were asked to choose between the religious instruction they have received and their mathematical and classical instruction, I would say, if choose I must, then classics and mathematics must disappear. I would not weigh them in the balance any more than I should weigh the matters of time against those of eternity. That is the feeling which animates that minority, that poor distressed minority, at the present moment, and when I am told in the address that this abortion—this would be enforced "settlement"—is to put an end to the heartache of that simple and religious, but too confiding people, I say no, it will not. They will not rise up against it. No, but what will they do? As good loyal subjects, they will conform to the law and will pay to the government what is asked for public schools, but at the same time they will work, and if needs be, beg and raise funds for their own schools as well. I had the sweet satisfaction recently to put my hand in my pocket and to give according to my means in order that the dissatisfied might be instructed according to their consciences. When I first learned that the present leader of the Senate had consented — reluctantly, it seemed at the time—to accept the portfolio of Justice, I must say it was with great satisfaction. I thought: "Here is a troublesome question coming up and there is no man whose abilities as a jurist better fit him to unravel it. He ruled the destinies of Ontario for many years with great ability, and on many occasions he carried her legal cases across the Atlantic and generally with success. All that is necessary for a man of that great legal mind is to exercise his abilities in the direction which is its wont and all injustice to the minority in Manitoba will disappear." I must say I do not recognize the work either of his head, or of his hand, or of his heart, in the so styled "settlement" which is before us. Now, what are public schools? They are schools where there are all religions among the pupils, and not necessarily much of any religion in the teacher, and none, none whatever in the matters taught, for religion must of necessity be eliminated from a non-religious school? This kind of school is the very reverse of the home, and yet it should be the mere extension of the home and of its sweet and healthful influences. Hon. gentlemen have noticed the struggle that is going on in Germany and France, and no one would wish to see our people in Canada reduced to the condition of the people in France where God is banished from their schools and too often from their hearts. In Germany forty years ago, where I was at the time studying, I rarely or never met a young professional man who believed in Divine revelation. I recollect being in a group of thirty young physicians and not one of them believed in God. The atheists would deny the existence of God, not aggressively but sullenly, but the agnostics, who pretended to know nothing about it, acted and spoke and argued as though they knew everything about it and that was the difference between them. And what was the result? I shall not offend the susceptibilities of any one present by stating it, but all thoughtful men were of opinion that it was an unhappy day when religion was banished from the schools. And we have the same state of affairs in France. Is France to-day what it was a hundred years ago! It is as much below it as the earth is below the heavens. Some time ago I read what occurred in a French court of justice. A young man was brought up for murder and the evidence was clear and positive against him. The lawyer, instead of pleading that he was innocent said, "I plead guilty, but in whose behalf do I plead guilty? Not the prisoner's is the guilt but your's gentlemen of the jury, every one of you, and your's most learned judge upon the bench, for you have dismissed and put aside every emblem of religion and all knowledge of Christ, and how can this young man learn his duty with religion entirely ignored. The commandments of God have been kept from him and he cannot learn it by studying division or the multiplication table." The young man was condemned and executed and the jury went upon their way forgetting, if they could, that they had a share in bringing about this result. We, loyal British subjects, are accustomed to look to Great Britain, and I hope the time will never come when we will cease to look in that direction for example, and I hope we will have the manliness to follow that example. There we find able, serious, thoughtful men moving in the direction of religious schools at the present time? Take Gladstone and Salisbury and Balfour and Morley—all agreeing in the absolute necessity of giving to the people religious education. Speaking of non-religious schools, I am reminded of a professional visit I paid some time ago to one of the northern states of the adjoining union. It was to one of the most distinguished academies in the state. I had a long conversation with the principal, and I put a question or two to him and got answers which amazed me. I asked as to the condition of the pupils, and the principal thought I referred to their moral condition, which I had not intended, and being seated near me he grasped me by the arm and said: "Doctor, it is a hot bed of vice, and God help me, I don't know how to remedy it. I have done all that I can, but evidently there is a something which I cannot reach and cannot control and how it is to be remedied I do not know." "Well, what is your system of instruction?" "We teach physiology and all the other ologies, but nothing of theology. God is kept in the background, and we have very apt scholars." This is what the good, conscientious Episcopalian clergyman said to me and he said it with great emotion. "My wife," he added, "has tried all she can and without avail. It is to be remedied," he said, "only in one way, but it is useless for me to speak. The Saviour must be brought back to the schools, and, I hope, it will be ere it is too late." Let us not blame the pastors when they try to keep out of this country a system which has been so disastrous in France and in the United States. Depriving a child of the knowledge of Divine things when the parent desires that knowledge to be imparted is an injustice, and to whom? It is an injustice to God; it is an injustice to parents: it is an injustice to the children, and it is an injustice to civil society. I am told that separate schools are not efficient in the province of Quebec, and we are asked why give them such schools in Manitoba as those in Quebec. They who make that statement are profoundly ignorant of what obtains in Quebec. I dare say I should surprise some,—not many, because we are too well informed not to admit the correctness of what I state—that in no part of the Dominion of Canada is education at a higher standard; and that in no part of Canada are there more educated people in proportion to the population than in Quebec. Look at the proceedings of the Royal Society, and one will find more litterateurs in the city of Quebec alone than in any other city of the Dominion. There are too many educated men there. The professions are overstocked all over the province, and one gets an education in Quebec at a less figure than in any other of the provinces of the Dominion. One may receive board and education for £21 or $84 a year and if that could not be given $70, or $50 would be accepted and in some cases colleges take pupils for nothing. If they see a young man who promises well they will endeavour to fit him for a position and will educate him. I know some of the most brilliant lawyers, some learned physicians, and many zealous priests whose classical education cost them nothing! If one goes into Montreal he may at any time hear French gentlemen speak most classic English. We have distinguished men going to plead cases in Great Britain from our province and the one who overshadowed the whole of them was Vallières, I may say we have never since had his equal. He was a Frenchman and spoke English, when before the Privy Council, in London better, it was remarked, than the other lawyers. I do not know whether, if one went to the English speaking provinces of the Dominion one could find quite so many who are able to speak French, and yet the French Canadians are as familiar with Latin and Greek as we are, so that we are not losing in Quebec. I say the schools which can produce these results in Quebec are good and worthy schools, and it would not be prejudicial to the interests of any portion of the Dominion were they to be copied. The people in Manitoba had their schools modelled after those of Quebec, and enjoyed them for nearly eighty years without disturbance; and now having been ruthlessly deprived of them by violence, there will never be peace and harmony until they are restored. But you may ask how, after what has taken place at the hustings in the province of Quebec? Again I say with the leader of the opposition in this honourable House, what difference does it make? Does that touch the question of the rights of the Manitoba majority? But let me give you a word of explanation with regard to Quebec, and I do not think you will have the harsh feelings against the French Canadian Conservatives you otherwise most naturally might have. The question of the Manitoba schools hung fire so long that people began to be uneasy, and to doubt the earnestness, indeed the honesty, of the leaders; and then I will say here—I am sorry to be obliged to say it—something which occurred at Ottawa in the month of January, 1896, had much to do with disturbing the peoples' thoughts, and they were told, "What! are you going to entrust your interests to? To whom? Men not of our race, nor of our religion," and they would quote speeches of the hon. member for Simcoe and of the former Controller of Customs and others who evinced in their speeches no love for them, and they would say "are you safer with these men or with us, the men of your own religion, your own flesh and blood?" But, there is an awakening, a very serious awakening, and before long, I think, in the province of Quebec, and if it has an opportunity, will show that it is not less intelligent than it should be. I go a great deal through the country and while I never speak on politics when on professional business, I hear men who worked for the present Prime Minister, thinking, that because he promised, and promised solemnly, that he would give more than his opponents would give; when, I say I find these people now muttering condemnations of the settlement, I am convinced that if an election were to take place in the province of Quebec to-morrow, except in certain districts, where party spirit is above everything else and crushes out conscience and the duties and dictates of conscience, there would be a most material change. But we are asked what is the use of all this religion? I hear, at all hours of the day, that science is the thing to teach. I would ask any hon. gentleman in this room what branch of science he would wish his child to learn and to pin his faith to? That would puzzle him. I am tired of those sciences which are as changeful as the figures in a kaleidoscope—nothing stable, nothing permanent, but bold and bald assertions. I have found that what was laid down as fundamental principles years ago is as nothing to-day. I find in certain departments of science that there have been complete changes three or four times in the course of as many decades. Take the very structure of the earth, take ourselves for instance. Those of us who have put aside revealed religion have taken to evolution; but that is not sufficient now. Evolution is not the last vagary of the German mind. It is old. The new, the bran new is this: that the whole universe is one elastic ethereal mass, and in that there are countless particles of precise size which are impenetrable, and which have in addition the property of inertia and these are supposed to conglomerate together and arrange themselves in such wise as to form noble man, with all his courage and manliness, or woman with all her gentleness and beauty, or the tiger with all its ferocity, and all from this combination or selection of spherical particles of precise size inhabiting this elastic fluid—and such is creation, and in such wise are we created! A creation so independent of an Almighty is at the will and wickedness of all—and, as a result, the relative fruition and natural increase of a people give evidences of where these views receive the less or the more general credence.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.).—Is that what they make governments of?

Hon. Sir WILLIAM HINGSTON.—I do not know what governments are made of—but this is the way that men are made which make the governments. While on my visit to one of the northern states to which I have already alluded and speaking to my good college friend, the Episcopalian minister, I saw some books for the use of the student. This was a school from which religion was excluded. The first book was Diderot in French, another was Voltaire and a third Jean Jacques Rousseau. But, as generally happens where no religion prevails in a school, something more negatively good is sure to enter. Hon. gentlemen, if you would send your sons to an accademy of learning of that non religious character and they should learn to talk French, they would be sent to a French master, and he would put into their hands Diderot and Voltaire, and if these were not spicy enough, they would have Balzac introduced. If you send your son there would he be a better boy when he returns than he was when he left his mother's care, and where he had learned the only true consoling and imperishable truths he had ever learned? It is far better to deprive children of the ability to acquire that kind of knowledge than to deprive them of the ability to acquire religious instruction. In the province of Quebec what have we? We have a Protestant board of education and a Catholic board of education, and yet another over-riding both. This supervising board interferes only when called upon by the Catholic board on the one side or the Protestant on the other. How often does the supervising board meet? I do not know that it has met once in twenty years. Things have gone on so smoothly; the Catholics attending to their affairs, and the Protestants to theirs, that the general board is not called upon. And such men as Sir William Dawson; the Rev. Dr. Shaw; Professor Robins and hosts of others have again and again borne testimony to the liberal Christian spirit with which the minority is treated, and such is the condition of things I hope we will have some day in Manitoba and throughout this country of ours when the proposed "settlement" will have been numbered with the things which were not to be.

Hon. Mr. POWER moved the adjournment of the debate.

The Senate then adjourned.

BILL INTRODUCED.

Bill (C) "An Act to commemorate the reign of Her Majesty Queen Victoria by making her birthday a holiday for ever." (Hon. Mr. Macdonald, B.C.)

THE ADDRESS.

DEBATE RESUMED.

The Order of the Day having been called

Resuming the adjourned Debate on the consideration of His Excellency the Governor General's Speech, on the opening of the Second Session of the Eighth Parliament.

Hon. Mr. POWER said:—It has been my privilege since the last meeting of parliament, on more than one occasion of a festive character to respond for this House, and I told my hearers certain things that were complimentary to the Senate. I spoke of the moderation that this House had shown during the time of Mr. Mackenzie's administration, and I intimated that probably the Senate would show a similar moderation under the Liberal government of to-day. I said there had not been a great deal heard from the Upper House for several years, but that was because the senators felt that the right men were at the helm and that the Senate could afford, in a certain sense, to go to sleep, feeling that everything was in proper hands and that there was no danger of any mishap; but I took the liberty of telling them that now, that the Liberal administration had come into power, we should hear a good deal more of the Senate—that the Senate would be a much more active body and a much more important factor in constitutional work than it had been.

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—A good thing for the Senate.

Hon. Mr. POWER—It would be a good thing for the reputation of the Senate if the Liberals were in power for a long time. While I said this, I must be honest and confess that I did not think the discussion of the address in reply to the Governor General's speech would occupy a week in this House. I am not finding fault with the fact. I simply state that I did not anticipate it. The hon. leader of the opposition has discussed His Excellency's speech at considerable length. I do not undertake to say that the hon. gentleman has discussed it at too great length; but I feel that the hon. gentleman is above all things a man who is true to his party, and that whatever his feelings may be as to the present leadership of the party, he does not allow that fact to influence him; and I even fancy that he was perhaps a little more energetic and little longer in discussing His Excellency's speech than he might have been under other circumstances. There is not in the hon. gentleman any of the material out of which "nests of traitors" are made. With respect to the hon. gentleman who sits on the right hand of the hon. leader of the opposition, when I heard him thundering away for nearly three hours, resurrecting exploded Tory legends which have not done duty except before remote and only partially informed audiences for the last 10 or 15 years, and when I heard him misrepresent his opponents and find them guilty of serious political sins upon evidence which reminded one very forcibly of Pickwick's "chops and tomato sauce," I realized, more forcibly than I had ever done before, the truth of the saying I heard from the gentleman who formerly represented South Wentworth in the other chamber, to the effect that a she-bear, robbed of her cubs, was mild compared to the Liberal Conservative politician thirsting for office. The first paragraph of His Excellency's speech deals with the celebration of the Diamond Jubilee of Her Majesty and refers to the loyalty of Canadians. One would have thought that that paragraph might, on the present occasion, have been allowed to pass.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B. C.)—It has not been objected to.

Hon. Mr. POWER.—It has not, but we have been treated to a repetition of exploded slanders on Liberal leaders, and on gentlemen who are no longer Liberal leaders. I shall not go into the charges against Liberal leaders generally, but one or two of them may be referred to. One was the old story about Mr. Jones of Halifax, and the flag. The incident which was referred to took place in 1869. Mr. Jones is out of Dominion politics at the present time, and I presume is not very likely to re-enter them. Considering the fact that he is out of politics and that this event took place so long ago, it may be regarded as barred.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—He was on the cable conference.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I was not aware that the cable conference was a political body. I am not aware that Mr. Fleming, who was a member of the conference, is a politician. That was a slander with respect to Mr. Jones, and that slander was dealt with fully in the other chamber in the session of 1878. This charge which the hon. gentleman from Prince Edward Island has brought up here, was brought up by his present leader, the gentleman who now leads the Conservative party, and was effectually disposed of by Mr. Jones in 1878. I happen myself to be in a position to state that the charge has no foundation whatever in fact. I was not only present at the meeting where this language is supposed to have been used, but I was the secretary of the meeting. It was a public meeting, and Mr. Jones never used the language attributed to him, and used no language that the most loyal man might not have used. Then there was something said about the action taken by the present Minister of Finance in 1886. It was told us as being a very disloyal act on his part, that he went to the electors of his province in 1886, on the question of repeal. That is a fact, but it was not proposed that that repeal was to be got by violent means. The proposal was that if the people signified by a large majority that they were anxious to retire from the confederation, an address was to be sent to Her Majesty, with a view of legislation being passed in the Imperial Parliament allowing Nova Scotia to withdraw from the confederation. I fail to see that there was anything disloyal to Her Majesty in that. It may have been, in a certain sense, disloyal to Canada, but it was not disloyal to Her Majesty. Then the hon. gentleman went on to say that, having got into power on this cry, the present Minister of Finance acted in a fraudulent way, and never pushed the matter any further. The explanation of the inaction of that gentleman is not difficult. There was a Dominion election before the Nova Scotia legislature was in a position to deal with the matter, and at that Dominion election a majority of members were returned by the province of Nova Scotia to support the government of Sir John Macdonald; and under those circumstances a mission asking for repeal could not have succeeded. There could have been no hope of success; and the leader of the local government consequently did not push the matter. We heard a good deal about a speech delivered in Boston some four or five years ago by the hon. gentleman who now leads the government. I am not going to discuss that. It appears that the leader of the government in this country is loyal enough for Her Majesty. He is so loyal that Her Majesty's government are anxious that he shall be present to celebrate Her Majesty's Diamond Jubilee; and, as long as he is loyal enough for Her Majesty's government, we ought to be satisfied with that—at least ordinary people should be satisfied with that. I do not intend to say that the hon. gentleman from Marshfield, who is so super-loyal — more loyal than Her Majesty's government—need be satisfied. But if we go into ancient history in this way, and discuss the past of gentlemen who are prominent in public life, the leaders of the Liberal party should not have a monopoly of the thing. I think the Conservative leaders should also contribute a little of the history.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—The old story.

Hon. Mr. POWER—The hon. leader of the opposition says "the old story." Well, what are those stories that we have been discussing but very old stories? I am going to give the hon. gentleman some old stories, one of them with which he is not familiar perhaps, though it is not so very old. There is the story of 1849. That is 20 years older than the story about Mr. Jones. The story about Mr. Jones is nearly 30 years old and the other is 20 years older. The difference between the two is that one story is true and the other is not true. There is no question about the annexation manifesto and the names of the Conservatives which were appended thereto. I am not going to deal with this 1849 business; but the present leader of the opposition has a record on this question. We know that he is nearly as loyal sometimes as the hon. gentlemen from Marshfield, but he is loyal like a good many Conservatives, when it suits him to be loyal. When the representative of Her Majesty crosses his path, then it is a very different thing. I propose to read to the House a couple of extracts from a letter which the present leader of the opposition addressed to the Duke of Newcastle when he was Secretary for the Colonies. There was an election in Nova Scotia in 1859, and the Conservative government, which had been in power, were defeated in that election as happened in the election which took place in 1896. The government did not accept their defeat, but called upon the representative of Her Majesty, Lord Mulgrave, to forthwith dissolve the House which had just been elected. They found that they were in a minority of four, and they claimed that there had been certain irregularities in the elections of some members and asked that the House should be dissolved. The Lieutenant-Governor of Nova Scotia very naturally and properly declined to do that. He said that that was not his business—that the trial of those elections was a matter for the House and its committees. This happened in the beginning of the year 1860—this refusal to dissolve. The House met in 1860 and the government were defeated and as the governor would not give them a dissolution they had to resign. They resigned I think, about January, or February, 1860, and they sent a very strong memorial to the Duke of Newcastle in connection with the Lieutenant-Governor's conduct. The action of the Lieutenant-Governor met with the cordial endorsation of the Duke of Newcastle; and after all this had taken place, on the 29th October, 1860, months after the whole thing had been disposed of by the Duke of Newcastle, the gentleman who now leads the opposition in the House of Commons addressed a long letter to that nobleman from which I propose to quote to the House two or three extracts. Speaking of the refusal of Lord Mulgrave to dissolve, this gentleman said to the Duke of Newcastle:

> A decision has been made which cannot fail to induce, in these colonies, the impression that what has been supposed to be self government, is but a delusion and a snare.

A little further on he said:

> The people of this province have been content, my lord, to pay a salary of fifteen thousand dollars a year to a governor sent from England, besides a large additional sum to keep up his establishment;

while the state of Maine, with twice our population, has the privilege of electing that officer from among her people, and pay him but fifteen hundred dollars.

Can such a condition of things be expected to give satisfaction, with the evidence forced upon us that we have no rights worthy of a moment's consideration, when weighed against the interest or convenience of a gentleman who has been useful to the Imperial cabinet before coming here?

Destitute of representation in the Parliament of Britain, with our most eminent men systematically excluded from the highest position in their own country, and for which their colonial experience and training eminently fit them, it is impossible that the free spirit of the inhabitants of British North America, can fail soon to be aroused to the necessity of asserting their undoubted right to have their country governed in accordance with the well understood wishes of the people. * * * *

In conclusion, Your Grace will allow me to add, that should it prove true that the colonial office has determined to sustain the Lieutenant-Governor, in the unconstitutional course pursued by him, it will become necessary to lay the subject before the Imperial Parliament, and this country will then learn whether the time has arrived, when important constitutional changes have become indispensable for the acquisition of British institutions, as enjoyed in the parent state.

I have the honour to be,
Your Grace's, most obedient servant,
CHARLES TUPPER, M.P.P.

That was pretty strong language, all because the government had not chosen to dissolve a newly elected assembly.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—All pointing to federation as a remedy!

Hon. Mr. POWER—There was not a word said about federation, and nothing thought about federation. It rather pointed to independence, or annexation, so that we could elect our own governors, and pay them only $1,500. That is rather ancient history; still the leopard does not change his spots; and a few months ago, in the summer of 1896, this same gentleman was the leader of a government which appealed to the country and which was defeated upon that appeal; and the language which he used in another place towards the representative of Her Majesty, was nearly as strong as the language contained in that document of 1860.

Hon. Mr. PROWSE—Not a whit too strong.

Hon. Mr. POWER—Our Conservative friends are loyal when it suits them; but when loyalty crosses the path of the Conservative party it is a bad thing for loyalty. We remember that the organ of that party said some few years ago that if British connection and the national policy (the 35 per cent loyalty) did not harmonize, then so much the worse for British connection. That is the story always. I do not believe in talking about loyalty. I think it may be taken for granted that most Canadians are loyal. I am not aware that there are fifty annexationists in the whole country. I say further that the election of 1891 was the last election won in Canada by the false cry of loyalty, and the last that will ever be won by sham loyalty, as it was also the last election to be won by protection.

The next paragraph speaks of the Manitoba school question; and before undertaking to deal with that paragraph, I may be allowed to make a few observations on what some hon. gentlemen have said on the subject. We all listened with the utmost pleasure to the eloquent address of the hon. gentleman from Victoria division who spoke yesterday afternoon. That hon. gentleman appeared to think that the question we had to consider was whether separate schools were or were not a good thing. That is not in any sense the question before parliament. All Liberals and Conservatives alike who belong to the faith to which that hon. gentleman belongs agree that religious education should go hand in hand with secular education. I do not in the slightest degree question the entire sincerity of the hon. gentleman; but I am not so well satisfied as to the sincerity of some other hon. gentlemen. I happened to go into the gallery of the other chamber the other evening, and I heard an hon. gentleman who belongs to the same church to which I belong—a gentleman from the province of Quebec, who was speaking in almost as strong terms as the hon. gentleman from Victoria division spoke in last night. He spoke of the blessings of religious education and the iniquity of purely secular instruction, and how necessary it was that children of parents belonging to our church should be instructed in their religion at school. I might, under ordinary circumstances, have been considerably affected by the eloquent speech which that hon. gentleman was delivering; but I happened to be aware of the fact that he had sent his own two sons to board at a school belonging to a different denomination altogether; so that the intense interest in the welfare of Catholic children which is exhibited by politicians of the Catholic and of other denominations must be discounted somewhat. With respect to the hon. gentleman who leads the Opposition in this House, I must say that I have never from the beginning of this agitation questioned his entire honesty in the matter. I cannot say that I have the same feeling with respect to his leader. Going back to ancient history again; the present school system, which makes no provision for religious instruction at all or for anything in the nature of separate schools, was introduced in the province of Nova Scotia by the gentleman who now leads the opposition in the House of Commons; and in the year 1865, when his measure was before the legislature and an amendment in favour of separate schools was introduced by Mr. Levisconte, and was supported by the hon. gentlemen from Richmond who now sits in this House and ten other gentlemen, I have forgotten now whether it was a bill or a resolution, the hon. gentleman who now leads the opposition in the House of Commons and who then led the government in Nova Scotia, declared that no such amendment would be accepted, as it would utterly destroy the school law. At the time of the union conference it was well understood in Nova Scotia that he maintained the same position. I have very grave doubt as to whether there is any sincerity in his expression of a desire that separate schools should exist in the province of Manitoba. I do not think the manner in which he handled the question in the House of Commons last session was calculated to make one believe that there was very much sincerity in his statements. Now, the question before parliament, placed before us by His Excellency, is not whether separate schools are a good thing or a bad thing; it is not whether the record of the present leader of the government or the present leader of the opposition is all that it might be; the sole point for consideration is whether this settlement, made a few months ago, is "the best obtainable under the existing conditions of this disturbing question," to quote His Excellency's language. This is the sole question; and I have no hesitation in saying that, whatever else it may be, the settlement is certainly better than anything we could have obtained from the passing of the Remedial Bill. I am free to confess that when this question first came before parliament I was in favour of vigorous and drastic measures with the province of Manitoba. I was in favour of vigorous action on the part of the federal government and parliament. Further consideration and a careful examination afterwards of the Remedial Bill led me to the conclusion that that bill would be of little or no value, and that comparatively small concessions made by the province would be better for Catholics not only in Manitoba but throughout the whole country than the passing of that bill, and better for other denominations also. It is too late, perhaps it is hardly worth while to go on to apportion blame for the appearance of this unfortunate Manitoba school question in our politics; but I cannot help making a reference to one circumstance which has been referred to already in the course of this debate, and which has been mentioned in such a way as would be calculated to mislead —that is the subject of disallowance. The primary responsibility for this difficulty rests with the government who failed to disallow the Acts of 1890. The hon. gentleman from Marshfield took the ground that the government of the day were estopped from disallowing the Manitoba Acts of 1890 by the action of Mr. Blake.

Hon. Mr. ALMON—Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. POWER.—My junior colleague says "hear, hear." It often happens that my junior colleague is wrong, and he is on this occasion. What are the facts of the case? In the session of 1890 Mr. Blake had introduced a resolution in favour of referring important constitutional questions to the decision of the higher courts, but that resolution had not become law. The Act which turned that resolution into a law was passed only in the session of 1891, a long time after the year during which it was possible to disallow the Manitoba Acts of 1890, had expired. In order to show that it was not understood that Mr. Blake's resolution was to exclude any action of the government of a different character, we find that in the debates at the time he is reported as saying this:—

> It is nevertheless, and I think with sound reason, contended, that circumstances of great general inconvenience or prejudice from a Dominion standpoint, and involving difficulty, delay or the impossibility of a resort to law, may justify the policy of disallowance.

This was just a case where all these things did exist. General inconvenience and great prejudice from a Dominion standpoint arose from allowing this law to go into operation, because if the law had not been allowed to go into operation—if the Acts had been disallowed—then a new system of schools would not have been established in Manitoba. The law having been allowed to go into operation, and operated for some years while the litigation took place, the setting aside of that law would naturally cause a great deal of difficulty and confusion in the educational machinery of the province of Manitoba. Not only did Mr. Blake feel that there were exceptions to the rule which he was laying down, but Sir John Macdonald in accepting the resolution, declared that it should not be considered as taking away the responsibility and discretion of the Dominion government and he used this language :

> The government may dissent from that decision (of the court to which the reference is made), and it may be their duty to do so if they differ from the conclusion to which the court has come.

I think it is worthy of note, in connection with the observations which have been made with respect to this matter, that two bills which were passed by the Manitoba legislature during that same session of 1890 were disallowed by the Dominion government of that day. One of them was, "An Act to authorize Companies, Institutions or Corporations incorporated outside of this province to transact business therein," and the other "An Act respecting the Diseases of Animals." Another circumstance which we are likely to forget in dealing with this Manitoba question is that both parties in Manitoba were agreed with respect to this school question. There was a provincial general election in July, 1892, and the opposition of that day in their platform, went further than the government of the day did, because they urged in their platform that if, under the terms of the constitution, separate schools must exist, then the Imperial Act should be altered so as to provide that those separate schools need not exist. Hon. gentlemen have said here and said elsewhere that the decision of the Privy Council was to the effect that the old system should be re-established. That was not what the judicial committee of the Privy Council said in their judgment. They said this :

> It is certainly not essential that the statutes repealed by the Act of 1890 should be re-enacted, or that the precise provisions of these statutes should again be made law. The system of education embodied in the Acts of 1890, no doubt, commends itself to, and adequately supplies the wants of the great majority of the inhabitants of the province. All legitimate grounds of complaint would be removed if that system were supplemented by provisions which would remove the grievance upon which the appeal is founded, and were modified so far as might be necessary to give effect to these provisions.

I suppose hon. gentlemen have seen recently, an opinion delivered by Mr. Blake who acted as counsel for the Catholic minority in the last case before the Privy Council, an opinion concurred in by Mr. Walton, a very distinguished English lawyer. That opinion is decidedly to the effect that the decision of the Privy Council was not intended to insist upon the re-establishment of such schools as had existed before.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Don't you think you are expressing it too strongly ? I do not think Mr. Blake said it was not intended : what he said was that it did not declare that there should be a re-establishment of such schools.

Hon. Mr. POWER—He went on to say that in his opinion, it would be a mistake. The decision did not mean what some gentlemen appear to think it did.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I do not think any one who has been advocating remedial legislation disputes the position that Mr. Blake took on that question.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I have heard statements of that kind, and I think in this House. The hon. leader of the opposition in this House, speaking of the course of the late government with respect to this matter, stated the other day that there had been no want of courtesy to Manitoba and no undue haste in the action of his government with respect to this matter. The hon. gentleman's memory must have been a little at fault. I find that the judgment of the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council in England was delivered on the 29th of January, 1895. A despatch from Downing street to His Excellency the Governor General transmitting the decision, bears date the 19th of February ; and we find that on the 26th of February the Privy Council of Canada had met to hear counsel on both sides on this appeal case, and from the language of the gentleman who was then First Minister it was apparent that the Privy Council here had met before. At that time, the despatch from England conveying the copy of the judgment had not been received. It must be admitted that was rather rapid work. I do not think that was the most judicious way in which to approach the government of Manitoba. I think it would have been wiser to have sent a copy of the judgment of the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council to the Manitoba government with a friendly request that they should deal with the matter at their earliest convenience, and, if possible, take such steps as to render action by the Dominion government unnecessary.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I am quite sure the hon. gentleman does not wish to misrepresent me or the late government. The government of Canada took no action with reference to the remedial order until a certified copy of the judgment of the law lords of the Privy Council was received by the government.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I have just stated the facts.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—The hon. gentleman said we acted before a copy of the decision had arrived here.

Hon. Mr. POWER—The despatch from Downing street bore date the 19th of February, and we find that seven days afterwards the Privy Council here had met to hear counsel for the parties. Clearly there must be some mistake there. I think the probabilities are that while the official despatch was sent at that comparatively late day, the government may have had a certified copy of the judgment; because I find that the judgment of the Privy Council was delivered on the 29th of January. Still it would be well to have waited for the official despatch. However, that is not a matter of very serious consequence. The calling on Manitoba in this summary sort of way to do something and the almost immediate issuing of the Remedial Order, were calculated to irritate the province and put the government of the province and the legislature in a frame of mind in which they were not likely to negotiate in the best temper. The truth is, it was a sort of open secret, that at that time the Dominion government had almost made up their minds to dissolve; and the idea was to dissolve on the Remedial Order. It may not have been the case, but that was the talk of the whole country, and that would explain the vigour of the action which led to the Remedial Order, compared with the slowness and want of resolution in the government's subsequent action. If, at that date, the Remedial Order had not been passed, and if the subject had been approached in a gentle manner—if a committee of the Ottawa cabinet had met a committee of the provincial executive, probably some arrangement might have been made which would have been satisfactory. It would have been better than the course which was adopted. With respect to the Remedial Bill I do not propose to discuss it here at any length; but I wish to say about it that it would have effected very little of a beneficial character, if it had been passed. It proposed to give, and did, I presume, give the Catholic minority of Manitoba the power to build and maintain their own schools and to assess themselves for that purpose. I do not think that is a very valuable privilege. It did not need any Remedial Bill to enable them to build schools and pay for them themselves.

Hon. Mr. BERNIER—That was something, however.

Hon. Mr. POWER—That is a very small thing. It does not need legislation to enable people to raise money and put up buildings themselves.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—But it requires legislation to exempt them from taxation for a system which they do not approve.

Hon. Mr. POWER—The Remedial Bill undertook to do three things. It did one, I think, which was of no consequence and no value. There were two others. Those are the things that the Remedial Order set forth. The next one was the right to share proportionately in any grant made out of public funds for the purpose of education. Now, this the Remedial Bill did not attempt to do at all, and that was the most important item. There was only one clause in the bill which dealt with this vital question of the provincial grant, and that clause reads in this way:

The right to share proportionately, in any grant made out of public funds for the purposes of education having been decided to be and being now one of the rights and privileges of the said Roman Catholic minority of Her Majesty's subjects in the province of Manitoba, any sum granted by the legislature of Manitoba and appropriated for the separate schools, shall be placed to the credit of the board of education in accounts to be opened in the books of the Treasury Department and in the audit office.

Was the province of Manitoba, which was opposed to those separate schools going to grant money to them? Certainly not; and this clause does not even say that it shall be the duty of Manitoba to make the grant; and there is nothing in the bill to compel the province to make a grant, and no provision for any substitute for that grant, and I do not think any one will pretend that the Remedial Bill would have had any effect in that direction. That disposes of two of the points. The other was:

The right of exemption of such Roman Catholics as contribute to Roman Catholic schools from all payment or contribution to the support of any other schools.

That is an important privilege and there was an attempt made in the bill to secure it. I am not going to trouble the House with the correspondence; but any hon. gentleman who reads the correspondence will see that the legislature and the government of Manitoba were prepared to fight that undertaking of the Dominion or the undertaking embodied in that portion of the Remedial Bill—to fight it to the death; and there would have been without any question a very long litigation, and the result of the litigation no one could tell. While that litigation was going on the whole country would have been disturbed and people set by the ears not only in Manitoba, but all through the Dominion, in a manner which would certainly have been very injurious to the country and very injurious to the Catholic minority throughout the Dominion. Hon. gentlemen must remember, and I think that gentlemen who are the friends of the minority of Manitoba should bear it in mind, that while there are some five or six thousand Catholic children in the province of Manitoba, there are about 40,000 in Ontario and probably about 50,000 in the lower provinces; and if this agitation were continued those 40,000 Catholic children in Ontario and 50,000 in the lower provinces would lose infinitely more than the minority in Manitoba would gain, if they got all that they were striving for; and the whole country would have been kept in a state of agitation besides. Some Conservative gentlemen at present profess to prefer Dominion to provincial legislation. They seem to think that the Remedial Bill was a perfect bill, or that it was nearly perfect, and that unless the provincial legislation came quite up to that it should not be accepted. But that was not the tone which was adopted in 1896, and that is not very long ago. The government of the hon. gentleman opposite sent three commissioners out to Manitoba about a year ago. The report of the commissioners bears date just twelve months ago—"Winnipeg, 2nd April, 1896." What do these commissioners propose? This document is headed "Suggestions for settlement of Manitoba school question from the Dominion commissioners for Manitoba government," and this is the first suggestion:

Legislation shall be passed at the present session of the Manitoba legislature to provide that in towns and villages where there are resident, say, twenty-five Roman Catholic children of school age, and in cities where there are, say, fifty of such children, the board of trustees shall arrange that such children shall have a school house or school room for their own use, where they may be taught by a Roman Catholic teacher.

Then it goes on to say:

Provision shall be made by this legislation that schools wherein the majority of children are Catholics should be exempted from the requirements of the regulations as to religious exercises.

That text-books be permitted in Catholic schools such as will not offend the religious views of the minority, and which, from an educational standpoint, shall be satisfactory to the advisory board.

And this is the important paragraph:

In all other respects the schools at which Catholics attend to be public schools and subject to every provision of the Education Acts for the time being in force in Manitoba.

Now, gentlemen of the Conservative faith are claiming that nothing but separate schools will do. Here are the commissioners sent out by the Conservative government; and this is the way in which they speak of those schools, that in all other respects except those mentioned, the schools shall be public schools and subject to all the provisions of the Education Acts for the time being in force in Manitoba. I wish to draw attention to the fact that this provision with respect to the number of children is very like the provision which has become law in Manitoba under the recent agreement, only that instead of fifty children the recent agreement says forty. The commissioners who were sent out were anxious that the province should deal with the question and they were willing to take less than they asked.

The province offered that:—

If authorized by resolution of the trustees, such resolution to be assented to by a majority, religious exercises and teaching to be held in any public school between 3.30 and 4 o'clock in the afternoon. Such religious exeercises and teaching to be conducted by any christian clergyman whose charge includes any portion of the school districts, or by any person satisfactory to a majority of the trustees who may be authorized by said clergyman to act in his stead.

The agreement actually made by the present Dominion government with the province of Manitoba is different. The matter is not left in the discretion of the majority of the trustees, but it is provided absolutely that the parents can insist on having religious instruction for their children. In order to show hon. gentlemen that these commissioners who went out were not disposed to exact all that they had asked in the first instance, I may quote their second communication to the Manitoba commissioners:

A few words are necessary as to the character of our memorandum. It was put in general terms as a suggested basis upon which our future discussions might proceed with a view to a possible agreement of all parties interested. It is therefore open to some of the objections raised by you, inasmuch as it does not deal with details, and professes only to lay down broad lines upon which legislation might be drawn.

The problem presented in the school question is to secure to them their just and lawful privileges under the constitution in such a manner as to cause the minimum of interference with the public school system of Manitoba, and in that view we think our suggestion has merits.

Further on they say:

In reply to your third objection, we beg to urge upon you that the changes we suggest are much less than what we understand to be involved ordinarily by the establishment of separate schools. We do not insist upon normal schools. As to text-books, and representation on the boards, as a matter of practice and administration we find that you raise in point of fact no objection. We do not ask that the Roman Catholics have a separate right to elect trustees or otherwise to have any special representation on the board of trustees, being content with the protection afforded by an appeal to your own Department of Education, and in this respect our proposals very materially limit what is always considered the privileges essential in connection with a separate school system. The proposed schools would be controlled by trustees elected by the whole body of ratepayers under the provisions of your school law. There does not seem to be any adequate foundation for your remark that the carrying into effect your suggestion would involve a modification of school organization greater than usual, in cases of separate schools. We desire to minimize such modification, and think that to some extent we succeeded.

On the same page they go on to say:

Considering the question of efficiency alone we think it cannot be denied that the state of affairs under the system we suggest would be very much better for the community than that which would obtain under existing conditions or under the Remedial Bill if it became law. And if this be so, even the argument from efficiency is all upon the side of bringing the Roman Catholics amicably within the public school system by some method as we suggest.

Further on they say:

Your argument on this head loses weight when it is considered that we propose that there should be in towns and villages twenty-five, and in cities fifty, Roman Catholic children before they could ask for a separate room or building, while under the old law, before 1890, under the Remedial Bill, and even under your own existing law, the presence of ten children only is necessary to the establishment of a school district. We must again direct your attention to the evident advantages in point of economy of the system we propose over the old system, over schools under the Remedial Bill, and particularly over the existing state of affairs where an important section of the public has to pay school taxes, and in addition feels compelled from conscientious motives to educate their children at their own expense. There would be no expenses of organization either general or local.

It is perfectly clear that the commissioners who went out to Winnipeg were not insisting on separate schools or separate organization at all; and I am satisfied, without going into the thing any further—at least I think it highly probable—that, if Manitoba had been approached in the beginning in that sort of way instead of by a remedial order some fairly satisfactory settlement might have been made then. The hon. leader of the opposition took up the agreement to which our attention is called by His Excellency the Governor General and discussed it at some length and could not find that there was anything in it that was of any value. I do not think the hon gentleman had his eyes as wide open as he usually has, when he read this paper. I find there is a provision in it for religious teaching which I consider on the whole satisfactory. It is provided, first, that there shall be religious instruction from half past three to four o'clock in the afternoon, if authorized by resolution passed by a majority of the school trustees. That was what was offered to the hon. gentleman's own commissioners:

Or if a petition be presented to the board of school trustees asking for religious teaching and signed by the parents or guardians of at least ten children attending the school in the case of a rural district, or by the parents or guardians of at least twenty-five children attending the school in a city, town or village.

I think that is a reasonable limit, ten in a rural district and twenty-five in a city, town or village. I should like it better if there were twenty instead of twenty-five; but it will be noticed that the hon. gentleman's own commissioners in dealing with this school question, proposed that there should be Catholic teachers where there were twenty-five or fifty children in rural districts and cities and towns respectively; and you have to draw the line somewhere. It is not to be expected that if there be one Catholic child a room should be set apart and religious instruction given to that child by himself. The next provision is that the instruction is to be given between 3.30 and 4 o'clock in the afternoon by any Christian clergyman whose charge includes any portion of the school district, or by a person duly authorized by such clergyman, or by a teacher when so authorized. The offer to the former government did not go so far as that. It said that the instruction was to be given by a clergyman or by some person authorized by him and satisfactory to the trustees. The next paragraph is that where so specified in such resolution of the trustees or where so required by a petition of the parents or guardians, religious teaching during the prescribed period may take place on specified days of the week instead of on every teaching day. I can understand that would apply where there was only one teacher and only one department in the school, and where the pupils were of various denominations. You could not occupy the single school-room for religious instruction every afternoon. An arrangement would have to be made under which the Roman Catholic children would take half the days and the other children the other half. The fifth provision of this agreement is that:

In any school in towns and cities where the average attendance of Roman Catholic children is forty or upwards, and in villages and rural districts where the average attendance of such children is twenty-five or upwards, the trustees shall, if required by the petition of the parents or guardians of such number of Roman Catholic children respectively, employ at least one duly certificated Roman Catholic teacher in such school.

I think that is a very important provision indeed. It provides that in rural districts where the average attendance is 25 there must be, when the parents wish it, a Catholic teacher. I am not very familiar with the distribution of population in Manitoba; but unless I am mistaken, the result would be that through the rural districts of Manitoba you would have, under that provision, practically separate schools with Catholic teachers—I mean separate so far as religious instruction is concerned.

Hon. Mr. McMILLAN—Twenty-five means a large proportion of Catholic children in a school section.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I do not think so. I know that a clergyman in Ontario has published some letters in which he elaborates that plea. I have been struck with some figures given by the reverend gentleman. His figures go to show that, in a county in Ontario with which he is familiar, the average attendance at the separate schools was not more than one-third of the registered attendance. In the province of Nova Scotia, we should look upon that as a very low average attendance indeed. In the city of Halifax, the average attendance is much nearer two-thirds. I do not think there is as much force in that objection as the hon. gentleman from Glengarry and his clerical friend seem to think. This agreement does not say that there shall be only one Catholic teacher. Suppose the government agreed—as they probably would if the Archbishop of St. Boniface concurred in the agreement—to take over the Catholic schools in Winnipeg. There would be no difficulty in arranging that. I suppose there are a couple of hundred pupils, and they would have Roman Catholic teachers. I presume there would be no difficulty in taking over the schools, and continuing them as Catholic schools so far as the teachers and religious teaching are concerned. I am able to testify that, in the city of Halifax, where the condition of things is not so very different from that in Winnipeg, the Catholic schools were taken over more than thirty years ago, and they are now conducted, as far as the denomination of the teachers is concerned, in the same way. We have not any law for it. A resolution of the school commissioners could upset the arrangement any day; and I am satisfied, once the present feeling passes away in Manitoba, the Catholics will be dealt with just as generously by their neighbours there as they have been dealt with in Nova Scotia and the other maritime provinces. Mind, I do not say that we are satisfied with the condition of things in the lower provinces, because it is not a desirable thing to hold one's privileges by the sufferance of one's neighbours. It is much better to hold those privileges by law, and that is just one of the features about this agreement with Manitoba, that certain very important concessions are made law, and all you want is to have that law administered in a generous spirit, as I believe it would be, and our people would have no reason whatever to complain. The provision that the parents of ten French speaking children may insist on the teaching of their language is very important. Few English teachers are qualified to teach French and therefore the teachers would usually be French and presumably Catholic. I do not say, I am not claiming, that this agreement is all that one could wish. Certainly not, but can we expect that? There has been a contest going on now for seven years—it is just about seven years since the conflict began,—and the majority have made concessions. It is not reasonable to suppose that they would concede everything, but they have conceded a great deal, and the question now is whether as His Excellency puts it, this is the best arrangement obtainable under the present conditions of this disturbing question. No one has shown that there was any better settlement possible. Our experience in the maritime provinces has shown that it is possible to get along with much fewer concessions than are made here, and I feel, for myself at any rate, that I can echo His Excellency's sentiments. I confidently hope "that this settlement will put an end to the agitation which is marring the harmony and impeding the development of our country and will prove the beginning of a new era to be characterized by generous treatment of one another, mutual concessions and reciprocal good-will."

The next paragraph in the address speaks of the tariff. Considering that this House is not supposed to have anything to do with the tariff, it would have been just as well that this particular paragraph should not have been discussed very much, more particularly as we are to have the tariff announced in a few days. I wish to say a few words with respect to some animadversions on the statement made by the Finance Minister to certain coal owners in Montreal a few days before parliament met. It was contended that that was a most discreditable performance. I should like some hon. gentleman to say in what way it was discreditable—how it hurt anybody—how it gave any man a chance to take advantage of his neighbour? I could understand if it was proposed to put a heavy duty on some article and the Finance Minister had told one of his political friends that it was the intention of the government to do that, so that that particular friend would have an opportunity to make a large sum of money at the expense of his neighbours, that would be a highly discreditable thing, but that the Finance Minister should make a statement publicly, a statement amounting practically to the fact that if the United States persisted in carrying out their proposals with respect to the coal duties, this country was not going to take the duty off coal——

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—How would it affect the revenue, announcing what revenues you are going to take off or put on?

Hon. Mr. POWER—I do not see how a statement that the duty on coal is going to remain as it is, can affect the revenue. Will the hon. gentleman intimate how it can? It has been charged that this was done with a view to the local elections in Nova Scotia. Certain high toned gentlemen around me say that it is. There are certain gentlemen in this House who seem to attribute the lowest and smallest motives to their opponents. I am not in the confidence of the Minister of Finance, but I am perfectly satisfied he was not thinking at all of the local election. There was something which was of more consequence, and it is just possible that as the result of the speech of the Finance Minister the United States Senate may amend the Tariff Bill in such a way that it will not be necessary to raise our duty on coal.

Hon. Mr. DEVER—It was just as well to warn them any way.

Hon. Mr. POWER—There is a paragraph with respect to the Franchise Bill, and I was rather surprised to gather from the observations made by one hon. gentleman that this House might undertake to refuse to repeal the Franchise Act. In one sense that would be rather an advantage to the Liberal party, as the government would then have the appointing of those who prepare the electoral lists. If I were a member of the opposition, I do not think I should be anxious that that condition of things should exist. That is one point on which there has been almost complete unanimity of sentiment throughout the country; that the Franchise Act should be repealed. Everybody understands that this is a matter with which the Senate practically has nothing to do; it is a domestic matter of the House of Commons. The paragraph with respect to the canals is important. I cannot say, speaking for myself alone, that if we had to begin to spend money on the canals I should be in favour of it, but having spent millions of dollars to deepen the Welland canal to a depth of 14 feet, it is absolutely necessary that the St. Lawrence canals should be deepened too, so that we can have 14 feet of water all the way from Montreal to the Upper Lakes. Then, there is a proposal to extend the Intercolonial Railway to Montreal. Speaking as a citizen of Halifax, I cannot say that that inspires me with very much pleasure, but speaking from a broader standpoint, speaking as a friend of the Intercolonial Railway, I think that there is no doubt that this extension of the Intercolonial Railway to Montreal—that is, if it is made in the proper way—will be of very great advantage to the road, that the road will do very much more business and at much greater advantage than it has been doing it. As it is now, everybody knows that the freight business of the Intercolonial Railway is controlled by the Grand Trunk Railway and by the Canadian Pacific Railway. If the Intercolonial Railway gets into Montreal, to the great distributing centre, it will be quite independent of the other two companies and that it is a matter of very great consequence to the road. There is a paragraph dealing with the question of cold storage. I was rather impressed by the claim made by the leader of the opposition that in this matter the government were only following in the footsteps of their predecessors. Their predecessors only talked about cold storage, because the hon. gentleman's leader in his manifesto said his government had taken steps to establish buildings for the purpose, but after the change of government took place, when inquiry was made, no one was able to find that any of these arrangements had been made. These arrangements were like many of the achievements of that distinguished gentleman, they were all talk. I am glad to find that even in this House every one is prepared to admit that the present Minister of Agriculture has been doing all that could be expected of him in the way of providing for cold storage, and that it is likely to cut a considerable figure in the business of our agriculturists for the future. With respect to the other paragraphs of the speech I do not propose to say much. Every one must feel gratified that Canada has not been recreant to her duty in assisting our fellow subjects in India. Not knowing the character of the bills to amend the Superannuation Act and the Civil Service Act I cannot, of course, express any opinion about them. I understand that one provision of the new legislation will be that the widows and families of civil servants will receive something at the death of the civil servants. I think that is a very desirable thing. What the character of the Civil Service Act is I do not know, but I trust that one provision of the new bill will be to bring back again the practice of having third-class clerks instead of having clerks who are appointed just at the option of the government.

Hon. Mr. PRIMROSE—I confess to quite a feeling of disappointment that no one on the government side of the House has as yet seen fit to reply to the able, masterful and interesting speech of my hon. friend the member for Marshfield. It may be that in some retired nook of classic shade, some government Goliah has been diligently masticating the tid-bits of mental food which abound in that speech and it may be too that although the process of mastication may be found detrimental to the health of the governmental dentals, that when mastication and deglutition have both had their perfect work, the House may have the benefit of the operation. I leave it to the House to say whether in the speech of the hon. senior member from Halifax this has been realized. The hon. gentleman in his opening remarks, when the "divine afflatus" sat upon him, said he ventured the prophecy that the country would be likely to hear more now from the Senate since the Liberal government is in power. Well, I am not at all surprised that that prophecy has received, in a measure at least, its fulfilment, because if ever there was a text we have had it in the extraordinary conduct of the government of the country in their wavering and vacillation, one thing to-day and another to-morrow —never certain of the course they are to follow. I think that is a text which could be considerably enlarged upon and which we are likely to hear a good deal more about. The hon. gentleman says that he heard the leader of the opposition in this House misrepresent and slander his opponents.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I said nothing of the kind. My reference was to the hon. gentleman from Marshfield.

Hon. Mr. PRIMROSE—In that case I made a mistake as to the individual referred to, but the statement is otherwise correct. Now I presume that the hon. gentleman is enough of a lawyer to know what constitutes a genuine slander—that if a charge is made which can be proved to be true there is no room for calling it a slander. I can cite an instance in which a charge against the Liberal leader was made, and there are plenty of them. I cite only one, and that is the remarkable declaration of the premier in Montreal, about coal and iron which he said came under the category of raw materials and all raw materials ought to be free. Now comes the corollary. When Mr. E. M. Macdonald, the Liberal candidate in the late general election in Pictou county, from which I come, found that the attitude of the government in regard to the duty on coal was inimical to his prospects for election, he telegraphed in a great hurry to the premier of Canada to see what the actual course that he proposed to pursue was. He received this very Delphic oracle-like declaration, "the coal interests will be carefully guarded." He used that for all it was worth in the election, and when the question was propounded on the floor of the other House as to what the premier meant by the coal interests being carefully guarded, the House received the very interesting and satisfactory reply that it meant that the coal interest would be guarded carefully. That may be Liberal statesmanship, but I think it will hardly be considered common sense. Now, as to the cry of repeal, I do not wish to use strong adjectives, but if ever there was a disreputable cry raised in any province to serve a political purpose, it is the cry of repeal in the province of Nova Scotia. That cry was raised for a special purpose, and this special purpose was to maintain in power Mr. Fielding and his Liberal coadjutors. They educated them up, so to speak—if that is not a prostitution of the term—they educated up the people of Nova Scotia to such an extent in regard to this matter of repeal that they returned him to power, and when they returned him to power repeal was dropped like a hot potato, in common parlance. It was told to go and not to "stand upon the order of its going." The reference of my hon. friend to the leopard changing his spots is a most unfortunate illustration for him. He should give the whole quotation. It runs this way:—

> Can the Ethiopian change his skin or the leopard his spots?

Now I make no affirmation in regard to the cuticle of the Ethiopian but I have been told that the leopard can change his spots and if the illustration of the leopard is used in regard to the Liberal government we have often seen the facility with which the members of that government can change from one spot to another. The hon. gentleman should have completed his quotation, although the government's chance of illustrating it would indeed be small, "then may ye who are accustomed to do evil, learn to do well." Then, with regard to the duty on coal, the government are anything and everything as time and circumstances require. When Mr. Fielding wishes to curry favour with the manufacturers of Ontario and the upper provinces, he uses language like this in regard to coal:

> It is well known that the tendency of the policy of the present government has been towards a reduction of the duty rather than an increase.

That will not operate very well down in Nova Scotia among the miners, but he had not them in view when he spoke. He was rather thinking of conciliating and coquetting with the manufacturers of Ontario and he goes on to say:

> We still desire to move in that direction unless events on the other side of the line make it impossible for us to do so. If, however, it turns out that the United States duty is raised to a high figure, then we shall claim and exercise the right to revise our views respecting the Canadian duty, and we shall feel bound to impose a duty not only on bituminous coal, but also on anthracite coal. We should much prefer, however, to move in the other direction, and we shall still hope that nothing shall occur at Washington to prevent our carrying our desire.

That was very nice for the manufacturers, but it does not suit the miners and others in Nova Scotia. Notwithstanding the statement made from the government side of the House that there is not much in the speech to provoke discussion; it opens up many debateable subjects. It is a large text giving much room for anxious thought. There is the immense importance to the country of having the provisions of the tariff known and that at the earliest possible moment. The business of the country from Halifax to Vancouver is completely blocked. Men do not know what to do. The merchants are anxious and do not know what steps to take in the conduct of their business. They cannot tell what the tariff is to be. If they were to order largely it might involve them in utter ruin. Still these gentlemen do not see that there is any necessity to bring the tariff down.

Hon. Mr. POWER—There is a great deal of exporting going on.

Hon. Mr. PRIMROSE—The proof of the statement I am making is to be found in the immense falling off of receipts from the customs. Why is there any delay in bringing down the tariff? It cannot be for want of knowledge of what that tariff should be to suit the country, because after the peregrinations from one end of the land to the other of that remarkable commission that passed throughout this country it surely cannot be ignorance that is pleaded. It would be rather an uncomfortable plea to make in view of the declarations that were made in the time of the late administration, when those gentlemen professed that they knew all about the tariff and could fix it up in short order if they were in power. I have said something should be done. The tariff should be brought down to relieve the country from the stress and strain under which it is now labouring. In proof that this stress and strain is very severe and very generally felt, I read an extract from the Monetary Times trade review and Insurance Chronicle which any gentleman who knows anything about business at all will at once acknowledge is a very reliable index to the pulse of the business and commerce of this country.

The universal cry that comes up from business circles in all directions, in almost all places, is of continued and most monotonous dullness. This condition of things settled down upon the country months ago and has continued ever since with blighting effects upon trade and industry, until the condition has become almost unbearable.

The banks are experiencing the full effect of all this and loudly complain of stagnation, want of enterprise, want of active demand for money and diminished profits. The only thing which has not diminished is the liability to losses. This continues and exhibits no sign of abating. Failures are constantly occurring, many of them where they were least expected, and amongst those who were thought to be prosperous and doing well. The year upon which we have entered has so far been not at all an improvement upon previous years, and if it goes on as it has begun will earn for itself a very unenviable name among the years of depression in Canada. Our readers are well aware of the main cause of this wretched state of things, viz., the uncertainty as to tariff legislation.

And I draw particular attention to the statement that the uncertainty as to tariff legislation is the cause of all these things. Notwithstanding what has fallen from the hon. senior member for Halifax, I maintain that there is a method in this madness of holding back the tariff. These gentlemen know perfectly well that there is an election pending in Nova Scotia, and they know just as well that it would not do for them to bring down a tariff which would contain provisions prejudicial to the interests of Nova Scotia, and, therefore, they withhold it. I feel persuaded that whatever be the ostensible reason assigned by the government, this is the real reason for the delay. If so, is there any language in the English vocabulary strong enough to characterize such dastardly conduct on the part of men to whom "the accident of an accident" has entrusted for the moment the safe guarding of the commercial and business interests of this great country. They have given the introduction of the tariff the go by, and given precedence to a measure for the revision of the Franchise Act, a measure which is not immediately required, and even if passed could not go into operation for months or perhaps years to come, and when a question twice propounded, was put to the Finance Minister as to whether the government intended to bring down the tariff prior to the 13th April (nomination day in the Nova Scotia elections), only a semi-contemptuous and evasive reply was elicited, and I predict now, that if the tariff is brought down before that date it will only be because their hand has been forced and the lookout on the government ship has given voice to the warning cry

"breakers ahead." Then as to the Franchise Act, it is said to be expensive. I daresay that in many regards that is quite true, but would it not be infinitely better to try to curtail these expenses than to expose the country to the wretched results that would accrue from having the franchise of this Dominion under the control of the provincial governments.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—It was for eighteen years under the control of the local governments.

Hon. Mr. PRIMROSE—That may be, but I think the circumstances will be found to be different at present.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—No, it was only in 1885.

Hon. Mr. PRIMROSE—And then again is it not derogatory to the dignity of the Dominion parliament to have their members holding their seats on a lot of different franchises, instead of one common franchise. I think it is. I wish to say just here that the Hon. Mr. Fielding, the present Finance Minister, holds his position in the Dominion cabinet, I am sorry to say, largely through the assistance of Liberal-Conservative men in Nova Scotia, but these men have received a rude awakening in the presence of so many Liberal provincial premises in the cabinet. The history that is going on now in the local elections in Nova Scotia will prove that what I say is correct, and they will not be caught napping again. I was a little amused at the disclaimer of the hon. leader of the House that the franchise was not under the control of the government but of municipalities. I will give you a little of local provincial county history with regard to that. We Liberal-Conservatives in Pictou county have, I was going to say, from time immemorial, almost sent Liberal-Conservative candidates to the Dominion parliament, and we have been in the habit—I am not including myself—but other Liberal-Conservatives have been in the habit of belittling the local elections and saying it is a small affair, so long as we secure our candidate in the Dominion elections, we will let the others go. Some have supported by their vote and influence the Liberal candidates. There has been a systematic course of procedure on the part of the Liberal party and their followers, and I will give you a short history of it. They made up their minds to obtain a majority, beginning at the root of matters, so to speak, in the civic councils of the towns. To illustrate what I mean, I may just say that in the last civic election held in Pictou for the mayoralty, the Liberals of the town at that time said "this is a matter of merely local interest, let us put in the best man who has the best qualification for the position, irrespective of politics whatever," and yet the outcome proved that they brought to bear all their ingenuity and resources to secure the election of this Liberal mayor, and when it was secured no time was lost to telegraph to the Chronicle, the organ of the Liberals, in Halifax "this is the first time the Liberals have secured a victory in the town council." Then the municipal councils were managed in the same way; put in the best men who would do most for the county—the most intelligent: what do we care for politics and so on. They filled the municipal councils with their men and par conséquence and as a sequitur, the civic councils and the municipal councils played into the hands of the local government and the local government into the hands of the federal government, despite the denial of the Minister of Finance, the late provincial secretary of Nova Scotia, when he proclaimed ore rotundo from the platform that it was entirely outside the functions and sphere of local governments to interfere in Dominion politics—look how well they did it. From one end of the country to the other, they had their organizations, and they carried it this time; but I think it will be a long time before they carry it again. As I said, he proclaimed from the platforms everywhere that it was outside the functions of the local government to interfere in federal elections; but a change came over the spirit of his dream, and he has become like Baalam the son of Beor, "the man whose eyes are opened." As to any consistency in their action in regard to tariff, franchise, or any other measure, the present government, in its corporate capacity, so to speak, constitutes, to my mind, a unique specimen for a national anatomical museum, as a body possessed of a patent, accommodating, elastic thorax, capable of providing free passage way for any bolus however big, and grasping with vice-like pressure and tenacity any pill however small. And while in this connection I may say that, notwithstanding the disclaimers of the hon. the leader of this House, it really is rather amusing to note the way in which the government, in the speech from the throne in regard to improvements which it states are to be made, seem to arrogate to themselves all the credit of the initiation of these measures. I know that has been mentioned before, but I wish to reiterate it. I think any stranger picking up that speech, who was entirely unfamiliar with the circumstances, could not come to any other conclusion, with due respect to his intellect. They took all the credit of the initiation of these measures, while they were only carrying out, so far as anything good or praiseworthy is concerned, measures inaugurated by their predecessors and in so far are simply putting in a dress parade in borrowed plumage. In regard to prohibition, the speech states that it is desirable that the mind of the people of Canada should be clearly ascertained on the subject. Will the result of any plebiscite that can be obtained really attain the object referred to in that speech? I do not think so, and the reason why I do not think so is this, that an experiment was tried in this direction some time ago and the result of that experiment proved that the votes that were recorded bore no proportion whatever to the whole number of electors, and therefore, you cannot really get at the mind of the people of Canada in regard to this important matter. I must tell you candidly my own impression. I do not believe in prohibition. I realize to as great an extent as any hon. gentleman in this House, or anywhere else can realize the terrible evils that flow from the liquor traffic and the abuse of the use of spirituous liquors, but I do not think that a prohibitory law is ever going to compel people to keep sober. If you cannot persuade a man to respect his manhood to have a proper estimate of his duty to his God and of his duty to his fellows except by law, I think it will be a failure. You must induce him to do it from a higher motive. And in my estimation that motive is to have him feel his responsibility to God and his fellows and to act from the impulses of a renewed heart, then it will have a better result than any prohibitory law. I have in my own mind another system which I think will be much more effective, but I do not intend to detail it now. Then again, supposing the prohibitory law is inefficient, has it not the effect of bringing all law into disrepute? I think it has. I must tell you a little experience of a friend of mine in the state of Maine, an educated man, a school inspector, he was aware, as almost any one who knows anything of the history of that remarkable state in the temperance line, knows that it has been for over forty years a prohibitory state. Notwithstanding that, the fact remains—I do not think I am astray in my figures: I may not have them very accurately, but I believe there are at least 1,200 places in Maine where you can get liquor if you want it. My friend was travelling by rail. He is an intelligent man and he thought he would try for himself how this matter really stood. So at the first station at which they stopped he went up to a fellow as if he had been to the manor born and said "Where can I get a drink?" The native replied "Over there." He went "over there" to the place indicated and asked, "Where is the bar?" and was answered "in there" He went "in there" and he found he could have got all the liquor he wanted. That was repeated time and again at every station. That is a commentary upon prohibitive legislation. The experience of a state which has been so long under the prohibitory liquor law as that state has been should count for something. There is as has been already remarked by speakers who have preceded me, at least one paragraph in the speech from the throne, on which we all, whatever be our political convictions, can find common standing ground, where we shall be most heartily at one, and that is contained in the opening sentence in which His Excellency gives expression to the gratification which he feels, at the evidences which prevail throughout the Dominion of the loyalty and affection entertained by the Canadian people for Her Majesty the Queen, and of the desire to join with their fellow subjects in all parts of the empire in celebrating the diamond jubilee in a manner worthy the joyous event. Although many members of this honourable House may well take, and do take exception to other statements contained in the speech, this one cannot but receive our most hearty approval and endorsement.

A touching incident is recorded of the experience of a French soldier, who being well nigh done to death in battle, and having received a very serious wound in the region of the heart, when under the knife, looked up into the operating surgeon's face, and with what little reserve of strength was left to him faintly said, "a little deeper and you will find the emperor"—even so—down—deep down, in the Canadian heart—in its penetralia—in its innermost Holy of Holies, will be found enshrined, the image of that beloved woman, whose splendid qualities of head and heart, whose magnificently noble character and life, have compelled the regard, admiration and love of all her subjects, throughout the whole area of her well nigh boundless realm, and who for nearly sixty years has sat upon the throne, Queen regnant of the mightiest empire which our world has ever known, whose sceptre holds sway over lands and over seas, "from the rising of the sun unto the going down of the same," and whose meteor flag, in whatever quarter of the world the breezes of heaven kiss its glorious folds, is the emblem and forerunner of christianity, civilization, enlightenment and commerce, the very palladium of civil and religious liberty.

Well may Canada as the foremost colony of such an empire, join with her fellow-subjects in all lands in celebrating right royally the diamond jubilee of such a Queen, who, from the time at which she ascended the throne, down through the lapse of long years, has never for one moment lost her hold upon the hearts and the homage of her people, but on the contrary by her virtues, her noble life, and beneficent reign, has drawn closer and closer the bonds of affection and love about her person and her throne; and from amid the glad acclaim and the exultant paeans of the grand celebration of the Diamond Jubilee Day, will go up, wafted on wings of love, from many a Canadian heart and home, emphasized and endorsed by "the sound of a great amen" from fellow subjects the world over, into the ear of the Eternal, the King of kings and the Lord of lords, the earnest fervent prayer, "God save our Gracious Queen."

THE ADDRESS.

The Order of the Day being called,—

Resuming the further adjourned debate on the consideration of His Excellency the Governor General's Speech, on the opening of the second session of the eighth parliament.

Hon. Mr. BERNIER said—In welcoming our presence here at the opening of the session His Excellency the Governor General has been pleased to express his gratification at the evidences which prevail through the Dominion of the loyalty and affection entertained by the Canadian people for Her Majesty. It will be my duty, in the course of my remarks, to question the accuracy of some other statements contained in the Speech from the Throne, as well as the wisdom of the course taken by the government in connection with certain matters. But in so far as this expression of gratification is concerned, no one in this Dominion concurs more sincerely than I do in such gratification. The loyalty of the Canadian people for Her Majesty, irrespective of creed, origin or class, is as strong and as full of affection as that of the people living along the shores of the Thames. And the celebration of the Diamond Jubilee of our Gracious Queen is a suitable occasion for her loyal subjects to give expression to their feelings of joy and pride, and also to the good wishes they are all so happy to send across the ocean to Her Majesty and to the royal family. Her Majesty has adorned the Throne for the last sixty years. During her long and glorious reign the possessions of the British empire have been enlarged to a remarkable extent; civil liberty and self government have steadily grown all over the immense domain over which she rules; the colonies have been brought more in touch with the heart of the empire. It is under this eventful reign that Canada has reached its present area, its prominent position in the world and its prosperity. The illustrious events of Her Majesty's reign are the glory of our own country, and we heartily join with His Excellency and his government in the congratulations which such a commemoration as the Diamond Jubilee must prompt in every hamlet of this Dominion. There are, however, some clouds travelling across that otherwise bright sky. In a distant part of the empire physical suffering in its most woeful form has befallen thousands and thousands of our fellow subjects, and a widespread sympathy has responded to the appeals of these unfortunate people whose distress is so lamentable. But closer to us, and even within our own borders, there is also a large portion of the loyal subjects of Her Majesty who are now enduring civil and moral disabilities of the gravest nature. And while the sympathies of the government rightfully go to the former, they do not seem to have, I regret to say, the slightest regard for the latter. While the sun of liberty is shining all over the rest of the empire, religious liberty—which is placed on the top of all the liberties which our modern times claim to have conquered—religious liberty is denied to the Catholic minority in Manitoba. Indeed, there is no religious liberty when the parents are forced to educate their children contrary to their own religious views. This contention is put forth by others as well as by Catholics. Sir A. T. Galt, one of the fathers of our constitution said one day :

> There could be no greater injustice to a population than to compel them to have their children educated contrary to their own religious belief.

Mr. Gladstone has said also :

> In my opinion an undenominational system of religion framed by or under the authority of the state is a monster.

Lord Salisbury expressed himself in the following way :

> Numbers of persons have invented what I call a patent compressible religion which can be forced into all consciences with a little squeezing, and they wish to insist that this should be the only religion taught throughout the schools of the nation. * * * * There is only one sound principle in religious education to which you should cling, which you should relentlessly enforce against all the conveniences and experiences of official men, and that is that a parent, unless he has forfeited the right by criminal acts, has the inalienable right to determine the teaching the child shall receive upon the holiest and most momentous of subjects.

I need not furnish any other quotations to show that the Catholics are not alone in their contention. It is shared by most illustrious statesmen of different creeds, and hence any charge made against the Catholics for holding such views, must fall alike upon these statesmen who stand amongst the greatest of modern times. In support of the opposite views, some advocate the right of a state to educate the people. On this point also I shall quote an authority which is not a Catholic one, but which, however, coincides with the Catholic doctrine. John Stuart Mill, an advanced Liberal, says in his Essay on Liberty :

> That the whole or any large part of the education of the people should be in state hands I go as far as any one in deprecating. It is not endurable that a government should, either in law or in fact, have complete control over the education of the people.

Then on this point also the Catholic views are shared by distinguished thinkers, and the minority cannot be accused of holding views entirely at variance with those of modern times. What has been the policy pursued in England? From the year 1870 onward school legislation has been on the basis of denominational schools, and this year that legislation has been further amended in a way which brings it more fully within these lines, and pledges are given that in the near future denominational schools will be given the same privileges as the board schools. I have not the presumption to suppose that I can convince everybody that my views are better than theirs ; but I may say this—in the presence of the opinions I have quoted, in the presence of the policy of the successive governments which have held power in England for the last forty years, are not those who differ in opinion from me disposed to concede at least that after all the Catholic views, shared as they are by the most illustrious statesmen and thinkers in Protestant England, are not to be looked upon as quite unreasonable ? And if so, are not those views entitled to some consideration, particularly when those views are placed under the guarantee of the constitution ? If I could bring my fellow citizens to that point, I am sure that justice would soon prevail ; because their good sense, their fairness, their generosity, would then mediate and advise them, for the sake of peace and harmony, to accept a condition of things, which looked at as a pure matter of policy, commends itself to such men as Gladstone, Lord Salisbury and others, while it is demanded by their Catholic fellow-citizens in Canada as a matter of conscience. It must be remembered here at once that religious belief cannot be decided by yeas and nays, that it is not a matter in which the law of give and take can work. We are in this Canada of ours in round numbers, five millions of people, of whom two millions are Catholics and three millions belonging to other denominations. The two millions cannot surely dominate the three millions, but on the other hand the three millions would certainly be in the most serious error if they believed that they might finally drive out the two millions. We are bound to live close together in this land; this is a hard fact. What are we to do then? Is it not our respective duty to live in peace and work hand in hand for the development of our resources and the prosperity of our country?

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—I do not think anybody wants to drive out the two millions.

Hon. Mr. MASSON—We must take the consequences of any act we do and abide by it and the hon. gentleman has just stated the consequences of the act.

Hon. Mr. PERLEY—That act was supported by a large number of the hon. gentleman's own friends.

Hon. Mr. BERNIER—But this patriotic aim cannot be attained so long as a section of the population is abused in the way the Catholic minority has been abused in Manitoba. In matters where uniformity of views cannot be expected on account of what is most sacred in man, on account of his religious belief, we must agree to disagree. In antiquity Solon gave a lesson to all subsequent legislators. One day he was asked whether he had given the Athenians the best laws that he could conceive. His answer was that he had given to his people the best laws that could be applied to them. Here in Canada, in a mixed community such as ours, there are certain matters upon which we do not agree, upon which we can never agree, because it affects our religious belief and conscientious views. It may be that your views are better than mine; it may be that mine are better than yours. But that must remain outside of our political parliamentary discussions. Since the stream which divides us cannot be bridged in any other way than by mutual regard, let us have that regard for each other. A common law might be the better law, but since that common law is impossible of application to all alike, let us do as Solon did, let us make the best law that can be applied to our Canadian people. The people is not made after all for the legislators, but the legislators do exist for every section of the people, whose wants, whose feelings and whose honest and concientious views must be considered. This is, it seems to me, not only justice but pure common sense, and, moreover, the expression of an honest belief, that unless those principles are acted upon by those whose duty it is to legislate in that school matter, peace and harmony will never be restored. The fathers of confederation acted upon those principles. It is a fundamental principle in the constitution that the minorities should be protected in matters of education. It was understood that in a community like ours, honest religious belief had to be recognized. Sir Alexander Mackenzie, a strong supporter of what is called public schools, had at last to admit the utter impossibility of the working in our communities of the system. One of the essential reasons of such views was given by Sir A. T. Galt, in the words which I have already quoted but which cannot be quoted too often. He said:

> There could be no greater injustice to a population than to compel them to have their children educated contrary to their own religious belief.

Sir A. T. Galt was then concerned about his co-religionists in Quebec. At the risk of being called an extremist, I cannot see by what sort of reasoning we can arrive at the conclusion that what would be an injustice to the Protestants of Quebec could be the right thing for the Catholics of Manitoba. But, perhaps, Sir A. T. Galt was himself an extremist. Before proceeding further, it may be well to state, for the information of the new members of this House, what I have had occasion to state before, that the Catholic minority do not ask for church or parochial schools. Whether church schools are better than state schools I am not discussing at present; the question does not arise here. I am only stating the important fact that church or parochial schools have not been in existence in Manitoba since it became a province. I am merely stating also this other fact, that we have never asked for, and do not ask now, for church or parochial schools. What we had were parental schools aided by the state, and we are now simply asking for the restoration of those parental schools. By the law of nature, it is the duty and, consequently, the right of parents to control the education of their children. On account of the very great interest that the state has in the diffusion of knowledge amongst all classes, it may consider it a duty to help the parents in their work and in the fulfilment of their duties and obligations in that respect, but it must not take their place. While the state extends to the parents its protection and its financial aid it has a right to see that the school grants are not misapplied, it has a right to exact full compensation in the form of knowledge for the money they hand over to the parents. The Catholic parents do not object to that, but what they object to is that any disability be placed upon them on account of their religious belief. To use the words of the Lords of the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council :

> The objection of the Roman Catholics to schools such as alone receive state aid under the Act of 1890, is conscientiously and deeply rooted.

It was for the protection of such conscientious and deeply rooted belief that clause 22 of the Manitoba Act was inserted therein, In the judgment just referred to, their lordships declared that this clause is "a parliamentary compact" which cannot be overlooked, either by the provincial legislature or by this parliament. They have declared that the appeal of the Catholics under subsection 2 of that clause "is admissible on the grounds set forth in their memorials and petitions." Further on the same judgment says that the appeal on such grounds "is well founded." Even if we had only these words to rely upon for the support of our claims, they would be conclusive. It would be only necessary to ascertain what these claims are, and what sort of remedy should be given us to remove all "legitimate grounds of complaint," and to get at that information it would only be necessary to refer to the petitions of the minority. There we would find the whole thing. These petitions and memorials state the grounds of complaint of the minority, and the redress to which they contend they are entitled.

They are as follows :

> (4.) That it may be declared that to Your Excellency the Governor General in Council, it seems requisite that the provisions of the statutes in force in the province of Manitoba prior to the passage of the said Acts, should be re-enacted in so far at least as may be necessary to secure to the Roman Catholics in the said province the right to build, maintain, equip, manage, conduct and support these schools in the manner provided for by the said statutes to secure to them their proportionate share of any grant made out of the public funds for the purposes of education and to relieve such members of the Roman Catholic church as contribute to such Roman Catholic schools from all payment or contribution to the support of any other schools, or that the said Acts of 1890 should be so modified or amended as to effect such purposes.

These are the grounds of complaint and the remedy prayed for. When the Privy Council decided that the appeal of the minority, on the grounds set forth in their memorials, is well founded, they decided at the same time that the rights and privileges enumerated in those petitions were rights and privileges which should be restored, according to their demands, as stated in such memorials. This is as clear as daylight. Any one is at liberty to designate those privileges and those rights by whatever name he may choose, but these very rights and privileges must be restored, if any respect is to be paid to the findings of the highest tribunal of the empire. However, their lordships have thought proper to say more, or rather, to say the same thing in a different way, and to expressly mention that the denominational school system must be restored. Their lordships say in their judgment that "subsection 2 of section 22 of the Manitoba Act is the governing enactment." In another place they say that this second subsection "is a substantive enactment and not designed merely as a means of enforcing the provision which precedes it." And they go on to say :

> The question then arises, does the subsection extend to rights and privileges acquired by legislation subsequent to the union. It extends in terms to "any" right or privileges of the minority affected by an Act passed by the legislature, and would therefore seem to embrace all rights and privileges existing at the time when such Act was passed. Their lordships see no justification for putting a limitation on language thus unlimited. There is nothing in the surrounding circumstances, or in the apparent intention of the legislature, to warrant any such limitation. Quite the contrary.

According to this opinion, then, not only some of the rights and privileges existing at the time the laws of 1890 were passed have been affected, but every one of them; and it is useless to say that all affected rights must be restored. It is a simple matter of common sense, a matter of course. Then their lordships proceed to enumerate those rights. They do so when contrasting the position of the Roman Catholics prior and subsequent to the Acts from which there is an appeal. Their words are as follows:

> The sole question to be determined is whether a right or privilege which the Roman Catholic minority previously enjoyed has been effected by the legislation of 1890. Their lordships are unable to see how this question can receive any but an affirmative answer. Contrast the position of the Roman Catholics prior and subsequent to the Acts from which they appeal. Before these passed into law there existed denominational schools, of which the control and management were in the hands of Roman Catholics, who could select the books to be used and determine the character of the religious teaching. These schools received their proportionate share of the money contributed for school purposes out of the general taxation of the province, and the money raised for these purposes by local assessment was, so far as it fell upon Catholics, applied only towards the support of the Catholic schools. What is the position of the Roman Catholic minority under the Acts of 1890? Schools of their own denomination, conducted according to their views, will receive no aid from the state. They must depend entirely for their support upon the contributions of the Roman Catholic community, while the taxes out of which state aid is granted to the schools provided for by the statute fall alike on Catholics and Protestants. Moreover, while the Catholic inhabitants remain liable to local assessment for school purposes, the proceeds of that assessment are no longer destined to any extent for the support of Catholic schools, but afford the means of maintaining schools which they regard as no more suitable for the education of Catholic children than if they were distinctively Protestant in their character.
> In view of this comparison, it does not seem possible to say that the rights and privileges of the Roman Catholic minority in relation to education, which existed prior to 1890, have not been affected.

This paragraph of the last judgment in appeal states in effect:—

1. That there existed, by law, prior to 1890, Catholic denominational schools.

2. That these denominational schools were under the control and management of the Roman Catholics (this includes the formation, the examination and the certification of teachers, and also the inspection of schools by inspectors regularly appointed according to the law in force for the time being.)

3. That the Roman Catholics had the right to select the books to be used in schools.

4. That the Roman Catholics had the right to determine the character of the religious teaching in the same schools.

5. That the Roman Catholics had the right to levy and collect taxes for the support of their denominational schools.

6. That they were exempt from paying taxes for the support of non-Catholic schools.

7. That they had the right to have their proportionate share of the money contributed for school purposes out of the general funds of the province.

Now, say their lordships, those denominational schools have been deprived of their legal status by the Acts of 1890 and have ceased to share in the financial advantages which are accorded to the other schools, "In view of this comparison," these are the words of the Privy Council:

> In view of this comparison, it does not seem possible to say that the rights and privileges of the Roman Catholic minority in relation to education, which existed prior to 1890, have not been affected.

Now, hon. gentlemen, since such were the rights of the Roman Catholics in 1890; since those rights and privileges, and every one of them, have been affected by the legislation of 1890; since subsection 2 of section 22 of the Manitoba Act assures to the Roman Catholics the existence of all those rights and privileges; since no limitation can be put upon that subsection of the law; since the appeal, claiming the restoration of such rights and privileges is well founded, then it follows from that judgment, that the very same rights and privileges which have been affected, must be restored, or else the legitimate grounds of complaint are not removed. And since those rights and privileges are known as the denominational school system, and in fact, constitute the denominational school system, it is that system which must be restored, and not any other one. There is no suggestion of a compromise in that decision of the Privy Council. Let us put that in a different way. We cannot insist too much on that point. We are here face to face with a very simple and conclusive agreement. Since the rights of the Catholic minority have been affected by the fact of the denominational schools having been deprived of the advantages which they enjoyed before 1890, as enumerated in their lordships' remarks, it is that fact which constitutes their grievance. Then, such grievance cannot evidently be removed, except by the restoration of the same denominational schools to their former legal status with all the privileges which were attached to them. In other words, the judgment plainly orders that the Catholic denominational schools must be restored, with such privileges as are detailed in the above quotation. So long as they are not, so long will the "legitimate grounds of complaint" remain, so long will the grievances remain, and so long will that judgment stand unsatisfied, against the command of Her Majesty, as embodied in the following paragraph, page 14:

Her Majesty having taken the said report into consideration, was pleased, by and with the advice of Her Privy Council, to approve thereof and to order as it is hereby ordered that the recommendations and directions therein contained be punctually observed, obeyed, and carried into effect in each and every particular. Whereof the Governor General of the Dominion of Canada for the time being, and all other persons whom it may concern, are to take notice and govern themselves accordingly.

No man, whatever may be his standing at the bar, will be able to convince the minority that the restoration of its denominational schools is not ordered by this judgment. Any other view would have the effect indeed of placing their lordships in a very unenviable position, a position of contradiction with themselves. In one breath, they would have said: the Roman Catholics were enjoying at a certain period certain advantages, which we define here to be so and so; these advantages have been taken away from them; thereby their rights, as protected by subsection 2 of clause 22 of the Manitoba Act which is "a parliamentary compact," have been affected so as to constitute a well founded grievance; the constitution provides machinery for the redress of that grievance, and, in conformity with the provisions of that machinery you must remove all legitimate grounds of complaint. And yet, in the next breath, they would have said: do not remove that grievance, do not make use of the machinery to which we have referred, let the Roman Catholics strive under the disabilities which the legislation of 1890 have inflicted upon them; you are the majority, you may do what you like notwithstanding our judgment. In other words, they would take back with one hand what they would have given with the other. I say that this position is not a reasonable one. It is a misconstruction of a very clear law, and almost an insult to the highest tribunal in the empire. But some one may object—have not their lordships said that it is not essential to re-enact the old statutes? Certainly they have said so and they were right in saying so. Any one reading closely and accurately that part of the judgment, will not find one single hint in contradiction of the position I take. Let us read that paragraph—I beg my hon. colleagues to pay attention to the wording of that paragraph:

It is certainly not essential that the statutes repealed by the Act of 1890 should be re-enacted, or that the precise provisions of these statutes should again be made law. The system of education embodied in the Acts of 1890 no doubt commends itself to, and adequately supplies the wants of the great majority of the inhabitants of the province. All legitimate grounds of complaint would be removed if that system were supplemented by provisions which would remove the grievance upon which the appeal is founded, and were modified so far as might be necessary to give effect to these provisions.

First of all, let us observe that the affirmation of the fact that it is not essential that one thing be done, is at the same time an affirmation that at least something must be done. And what is the thing that is to be done? It cannot be anything else than the removal of what their lordships have just defined to be the grievance of the Roman Catholics; in other words, the restoration of the denominational schools with their privileges. In the second place, in reading closely that paragraph, one will see at once that it does not say that the denominational school system itself shall not be restored, but only that it is not essential for such restoration, that the precise provisions of the statutes under which they previously existed, should be re-enacted. That paragraph alludes only to certain provisions of the former statutes, to the external arrangements of the system, to the exterior vestments, as it were, in which was clad a certain body known as the denominational schools, which body may indulge in a moderate change of dress, but should not be strangled. It does not allude to the system, to the thing itself which existed under those statutes.

That system was, in the main, the existence of the denominational schools with certain privileges. This must be restored, although you may do as their lordships say: You may, in restoring those denominational schools, depart somewhat as to details from the precise provisions of the statutes repealed by the Act of 1890. That is all that is said here. There is nothing strange about this, it is only a repetition of our memorials. Let us read a part of such memorials:

(3.) That it may be declared that the said last mentioned Acts do affect the rights and privileges of the Roman Catholic minority of the Queen's subjects in relation to education.

(4.) That it may be declared that to Your Excellency the Governor General in Council, it seems requisite that the provisions of the statutes in force in the province of Manitoba prior to the passage of the said Acts, should be re-enacted in so far at least as may be necessary to secure to the Roman Catholics in the said province the right to build, maintain, equip, manage, conduct and support these schools in the manner provided for by the said statutes, to secure to them their proportionate share of any grant made out of the public funds for the purposes of education and to relieve such members of the Roman Catholic church as contribute to such Roman Catholic schools from all payment or contribution to the support of any other schools, or that the said Acts of 1890 should be so modified or amended as to effect such purposes.

This petition does not ask for the repeal of the Acts of 1890; it does not ask for the re-enactment of the statutes repealed by the Act of 1890; it does not ask for the re-enactment of the precise provisions of those statutes. We did not ask for any such things in our petitions, nor are we asking for anything of the kind now. We are only asking for some amendments to the Acts of 1890, such as may be necessary to secure our rights, as it is stated in our memorials. With their lordships we say:

The system of education embodied in the Acts of 1890 no doubt commends itself to and adequately supplies the wants of the great majority of the inhabitants of the province.

But supplement these Acts by provisions which would remove the grievance and all legitimate grounds of complaint. To attain that object, it is not essential to re-enact the statutes repealed in 1890, nor the precise provisions of the same. By the Acts repealed in 1890, there was a general board of education composed of Protestants and Catholics. It is not essential for the removing of our grievances that such board be restored. It is not essential that the formation and modification of the school districts be regulated in the same way as they were by the old statutes. It is not essential that the school rate be levied in the same way. It is not essential that any of the precise provisions of the old statutes be re-enacted. I go further. We do not ask for the re-enactment of the old statutes. We are quite ready to accept the Acts of 1890, provided they are supplemented by such provisions as would remove all legitimate grounds of complaint. Ten or twelve provisions would answer the purpose. It would be hardly the work of four or five hours for an expert in law to make in good faith these modifications. This, assuredly, shows that that paragraph of their lordships' judgment can be construed so as to be consistent with the rest of the judgment, and so as to leave this parliament free to legislate in the right direction and adequately. As to the power of this parliament to legislate, as I have just said, it is affirmed in almost every paragraph of the judgment. In one place, it says:

Bearing in mind the circumstances which existed in 1870, it does not appear to their lordships an extravagant notion that in creating a legislature for the province with limited powers it should have been thought expedient, in case either Catholics or Protestants became preponderant, and rights which had come into existence under different circumstances were interfered with, to give the Dominion parliament power to legislate upon matters of education so far as was necessary to protect the Protestant or Catholic minority, as the case might be.

In another place it says that the precise steps to be taken in the matter are defined by subsection 3 of section 22 of the Manitoba Act. Let us see then by reading that sub-clause, what steps are referred to:

(3.) In case any such provincial law, as from time to time seems to the Governor General in Council requisite for the due execution of the provisions of this section is not made, or in case any decision of the Governor General in Council on any appeal under this section is not duly executed by the proper provincial authority in that behalf, then, and in every such case and as far only as the circumstances of each case require, the parliament of Canada may make remedial laws for the due execution of the provisions of this section, and of any decision of the Governor General in Council under this section.

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—There is a limit there to the power of the Governor in Council to interfere.

Hon. Mr. BERNIER—Yes, as far as circumstances require. That is what we ask.

We do not ask for anything more. The power given by this clause to parliament, of making the remedial laws, surely carries with it to the fullest extent the power of legislating adequately, and this power being the supreme power, its legislation would of necessity supersede the legislation or the action of the inferior power in case some clashing should occur. Moreover, the power given to this parliament creates a corresponding duty for parliament to legislate whenever it has been advised by the proper authority that such legislation is requisite. And which is the proper authority in this matter? The Governor General in Council and no other, not even the Canadian parliament, and here I would read again that 3rd sub-clause, but I suppose it is not necessary.

So the Governor General in Council alone has the right to say whether a law is requisite or not, and their decision in such matter is final on each appeal. It partakes of the character of a judicial act, and cannot be withdrawn or modified: it belongs to all the parties interested in the case, and without the consent of all it must remain, so long as there has been no compliance with the same by the provincial authorities. Now what has the Governor General in Council decided in the matter? Acting within their constitutional powers, they have determined that it was "requisite" that the system of education embodied in the two Acts of 1890 should be supplemented by a provincial act or acts which would restore to the Roman Catholic minority their rights.

And His Excellency the Governor General in Council was further pleased to declare and decide, and it is hereby declared that it seems requisite that the system of education embodied in the two Acts of 1890, aforesaid, shall be supplemented by a provincial Act or Acts which will restore to the Roman Catholic minority the said rights and privileges of which such minority has been so deprived as aforesaid, and which will modify the said Acts of 1890, so far and so far only as may be necessary to give effect to the provisions restoring the rights and privileges in paragraphs (a), (b), (c), hereinbefore mentioned.

And here are the provisions, paragraphs (a), (b) and (c):

(a.) The right to build, maintain, equip, manage, conduct and support Roman Catholic schools, in the manner provided for by the statutes which were repealed by the two Acts of 1890, aforesaid.

(b.) The right to share proportionately in any grant made out of the public funds for the purposes of education.

This is the governing enactment—so much so that even if the judgment of the Privy Council did not exist, that decision of the Governor General in Council would be binding on all parties and on this parliament. Surely parliament cannot be forced to vote a remedial law, or any law, any more than an individual member of parliament can be forced to vote in any particular way. No physical force can be used in such cases, no mandamus could be issued, but as an individual member would be derelict to his duty if persistently and without sufficient reason he should abstain from voting, though present in the building, so would parliament be in refusing to carry out the decision of the Governor in Council in this school matter. As a matter of fact, the present attitude of the government constitutes the most flagrant denial of justice that has ever occurred in our parliamentary history. Although vested with the duty of causing the legitimate grounds of complaint of the minority to be removed, according to the constitution, the present government has been an accomplice of the men, and of the methods of the men, who for the last seven years have trampled under their feet the civil and religious liberties of the pioneers of education and civilization in western Canada. Last year, speaking on the same subject, I said the minority would maintain towards the new administration the same attitude of dignity and moderation that we had maintained under the previous administration, urging no undue claims, throwing no obstacles in the way of an equitable solution of the existing difficulties, virtually extending a friendly hand to the administration. What treatment have we received in return? I am sorry to say that even the simplest courtesy has not been extended to us. Although we were the parties most interested in the matter, we have not been in the least consulted. More than that, we have been insulted at our own doors and in the most undignified and unjustifiable manner by a minister of the crown. The sweetness of the voice of the hon. leader of the government in this House will not atone for the harshness of the treatment. This government has followed the same course as the government of Manitoba. When the Manitoba government decided to sweep away the Catholic schools, not a word of information was offered to us. It has been said that the policy of the provincial government was prompted by the alleged defective character of our schools. As a matter of fact, those gentlemen did not know the exact condition of our schools; they had never taken the trouble of investigating their condition. Never a hint had come to us from those quarters that any improvement in our teaching, or in the management of our schools, was desired. On the contrary, again and again we had been praised for our work in the important matter of the education of the youth, by every one, high and low, who had come in contact with our institutions, and those praises were merited; because notwithstanding what has been said, our schools were in as good a condition as their rivals, the Protestant schools. That fact I established in this House in 1895. And yet, the government of Manitoba, adding insult to injury, swept away our schools in such a manner that the Hon. Hugh J. Macdonald had to qualify the action of that government as a brutal one. They had no regard for our feelings, no regard for our rights, no regard for the parliamentary compact entered into by the province with this Dominion. More than that, they had no regard for their own pledges. Because it must be remembered that the party whose leader Mr. Greenway was, the government whose head Mr. Greenway was, had repeatedly pledged themselves to the electors, and more especially to the minority itself, to maintain in their integrity the rights and privileges of said minority. However, they went back on their own pledges. They had made the promises for party advantages, as was said in the legislature itself by one who was the president of the Liberal Association at the time the promises were made, and they violated those pledges also for party advantages. When I recall those circumstances I cannot agree with the hon. leader of this House when he says that the government of Manitoba have acted in good faith. He himself must have his doubts about that, and surely his colleague, the hon. Secretary of State, has. The Minister of Public Works has himself styled Mr. Greenway as a vulgar politician without any scruple or patriotism. Now, I am sorry to say, this government is pursuing the same course as the government of Manitoba. They are acting in this matter without any regard for our legitimate grounds of complaint, without any regard for the judgment of the highest tribunal of the empire, without any regard for their own pledges. And in doing so, they open the doors wide to the accusation that like the government of Manitoba, what they are seeking is not justice, but mere party advantage. Any settlement which falls short of the requirements of the judgment of the Privy Council and of the Remedial order, cannot be a solution of the difficulties without our consent. In this case our consent has not been given and the government has, nevertheless, passed us over and entered into an agreement which they knew was not acceptable to us. It is treatment which is accorded only to helots. But we are weak and weakness is apparently no more entitled to consideration with this Liberal federal government than it was with the Liberal provincial government. That will not, however, affect the determination of the minority to insist upon their rights. Shall I remind the government of their pledges? They are fresh in every memory and cannot be repudiated. It cannot be denied that Mr. Laurier did promise, in the House of Commons and during the electoral campaign, that he would give full justice to the minority, and that he alone could do it. The pledges of his candidates to the same effect cannot be denied. They are so many and so well known that I need not take your time in reading them. And yet, these pledges are disregarded as was the case with Mr. Greenway! And we are called upon to accept again mere promises, to rely on the good-will of Mr. Greenway and of his friends. We have been too often betrayed to consent to that. The minority will adhere to its policy of claiming its privileges as a matter of right, and not simply as a matter of mere courtesy on the part of a hostile government. In doing so we may be stigmatized as extremists, because there are some who, unable to find good grounds to support the so-called settlement, like to resort to that word as a stigma against the friends of the good cause that the minority is fighting. But mere words are nothing but wind, and such wind will not uproot the tree of our claims, and of the constitution. The mover and seconder of the address did use that expression. Had they pondered a little more upon it perhaps they would not have done so, because, after all, they were stigmatizing their own leaders. These indeed are extremists also, since they admit that their so-called settlement is not all that we are entitled to. Such an admission is contained even in the Speech from the Throne, where it is said that it is the best arrangement that could be obtained, implying thereby that something more is due. On the other hand, I must confess that there is also in that part of the Speech from the Throne more than is necessary to convince the mover and seconder of the address, and I may say the whole Dominion, that the government does not intend practically to become an extremist. The good-will or the ill-will of the Manitoba government is their rule. That is a policy which does not indeed require any great exertion. It is a policy of surrender. Before the election a policy of sunny ways was announced, but it turns out that the beams of the sun are all for the Manitoba government, and that we are left in cold and darkness; and the government here insinuates, and the Manitoba government openly declares, that we must be satisfied with that lot. We think, however, that as British subjects, we are entitled to all the blessings that are to be derived from British citizenship, and we confidently expect that one day or other the sun will shine over our plains as it does over all the other portions of the empire. In the meantime, we will maintain our position like free men, and we will show that we are not unworthy of sitting at the board where British institutions are conceived and framed, and given to the people, not as an instrument of despondency or treachery, but as a generator of freedom and justice, and as a guarantee of good faith. The government and their organs are taking great credit to themselves for that so-called settlement. They triumphantly direct our attention to the fact that it has taken them only six months to effect that settlement, while the other government had not been able to do anything during the six previous years. Some reasons may be found for that, however. We have noticed that every time the late administration made a move towards an equitable solution, they had to face, not only the Manitoba government which was unfriendly to them, but the political party now in power, the men who, sitting at the time on the opposition benches in this parliament, were continually obstructing their policy, which action forms a marked contrast with the present opposition which has declared its willingness to help the hon. gentlemen on the treasury benches now if they were willing to introduce adequate remedial measures. The previous government wanted to give us something, while the present administration does not care to give us anything, but is satisfied with what their friends in our distant province are disposed to grant, however trifling it may be. In fact, this so called settlement does not give us anything; it is a complete surrender on the part of this government, and it did not require six months to accomplish such a feat. It could have been done in a month. It was very easy work, where there was no fight, no danger, and no credit. As we say in French,—"à vaincre sans péril, on triomphe sans gloire." That this settlement does not fully remove our grievances, it is useless to argue, because it is admitted by the government itself. It may be well, however, to mention some details to show how far this so-called settlement ignores the former position of the minority. Under the old law we had the right—I say the right, and not a mere possibility—of being represented on the general board of education. We had in that general board of education a Catholic section empowered to manage the Catholic schools. We had a Catholic superintendent of education. We had Catholic inspectors. We had Catholic normal schools. We had Catholic examiners. We had Catholic teachers. We had Catholic school districts and Catholic trustees. We had the selection of text books. We had the right to levy taxes on our properties for the support of our schools. We were exempt from taxation for the support of non-Catholic schools. We had our share of the legislative school grant, and all these have been held by the Privy Council to be rights and privileges that should not be taken away from us, but which had been affected by the school legislation of 1890. Now, the so-called settlement gives away each and all of those privileges. The mere reading of the law now passed by the legislature of Manitoba, and which is nothing but the settlement reduced into law, is a sufficient evidence of that assertion. Here it is:

AN ACT TO AMEND "THE PUBLIC SCHOOL ACT."

Her Majesty, by and with the advice and consent of the legislative assembly of the province of Manitoba enacts as follows:—

1. Religious teaching, to be conducted as hereinafter provided, shall take place in any public school in Manitoba;

(a) If authorized by a resolution passed by the majority of the school trustees of the district in which the school is carried on, or,

(b) If a petition be presented to said school trustees asking for religious teaching and signed by the parents or guardians of at least ten children attending the school in the case of a rural school district, or by the parents or guardians of at least twenty-five children attending the school in the case of a city, town or village school.

2. Such religious teaching shall take place between the hours of 3:30 and four o'clock in the afternoon, and shall be conducted by any Christian clergyman whose charge includes any portion of the school district, or by any person duly authorized by such clergyman, or by a teacher when so authorized.

3. Where so specified in such resolution of trustees, or where so required by a petition of parents or guardians, religious teaching during the prescribed period may take place only on certain specified days of the week instead of on every teaching day.

4. In any school in towns and cities, where the average attendance of Roman Catholic children is forty or upwards, and in villages and rural districts where the average attendance of such children is twenty-five or upwards, the trustees shall, if required by a petition of parents or guardians of such number of Roman Catholic children, respectively, employ at least one duly certificated Roman Catholic teacher in such school. In any school in towns and cities where the average attendance of non-Roman Catholic children is forty or upwards, and in villages and rural districts where the average attendance of such children is twenty-five or upwards, the trustees shall, if required by the petition of parents or guardians of such children, employ at least one duly certificated non-Roman Catholic teacher.

5. Where religious teaching is required to be carried on in any school in pursuance of the foregoing provisions and there are Roman Catholic and non-Roman Catholic children attending the school, and the school-room accommodation does not permit of the pupils being placed in separate rooms for the purpose of religious teaching, provision shall be made by the regulations of the Department of Education (which regulations the board of school trustees shall observe), whereby the time allotted for religious teaching shall be divided in such a way that the religious teaching of Roman Catholic children shall be carried on during the prescribed period on one-half of the teaching days in each month, and the religious teaching of the non-Roman Catholic children shall be carried on during the prescribed period on one-half of the teaching days of each month.

6. The Department of Education shall have the power to make regulations not inconsistent with the principles of this Act, for carrying into effect the provisions of this Act.

7. No separation of pupils by religious denominations shall take place during the secular school work.

8. Where the school-room accommodation at the disposal of the trustees permits, instead of allotting different days of the week to different denominations for the purpose of religious teaching, the pupils may be separated when the hour for religious teaching arrives, and placed in separate rooms.

9. No pupil shall be permitted to be present at any religious teaching unless the parents or guardians of such pupil desire it. In case the parents or guardians do not desire the attendance of pupils during such religious teaching, then such pupils shall be dismissed before the religious exercises are begun, or shall remain in another room.

10. When ten of the pupils in any school speak the French language, or any language other than English, as their native language, the teaching of such pupils shall be conducted in French, or such other language and English upon the bi-lingual system.

11. All the provisions of "The Public Schools Act" and amendments and of "The Education Department Act" inconsistent with the provisions of this Act, are hereby repealed.

12. This Act shall come into force on the day of A.D. 1897.

As Mr. Cameron said, in moving the second reading of that bill, this law is the triumph of the Manitoba government and of the legislature. There is in that law not the slightest vestige left of our rights. Is it more in conformity with the judgment of the Privy Council? It cannot be, because that judgment is substantially a recognition of the rights we had under the old law, and which I have already enumerated. But let us contrast more closely the two documents. The grievance of the minority says the judgment is in the fact that "denominational schools, of which they had the management," and for which "they could select the books to be used and determine the character of the religious teaching," have been deprived of their legal status, of their share of the legislative school grant, of their right to levy taxes for the support of such schools, and of the exemption they enjoyed as to the support of the other schools:

> They are, on the contrary, obliged to maintain "schools which they regard as no more suitable for the education of their children than if they were distinctively Protestant in their character."

Thereby, their lordships say, the rights of the Catholics have been affected—hence "their legitimate grounds of complaint." Does the settlement remove in any way the grievance? No; on the contrary, it affirms the position of the local government, and has the pretension of burying for ever those rights, the spoliation of which, according to the judgment of the Privy Council, constitutes the grievance. In support of this contention allow me to read from the speech of the Attorney General, Mr. Cameron, when introducing the measure into the local legislature :

He (Mr. Cameron) regarded the terms of the settlement arrived at as a distinct triumph on the part of the legislature and government.

And further on he proceeds to point out that the settlement and the bill based upon it are :

Precisely in accordance with the declarations of the legislature and the government ever since the question arose.

Now, what were in substance these declarations ? That they would never restore to the minority its rights and privileges. And this government has agreed to that. Let nobody be deceived by that clause which allows half an hour of religious teaching after the school hours. This is not a concession at all. We were not in need of the interference of this government, we were not in need of any amendment to the law of 1890, to use the school premises for that purpose after school hours. It might have been after four o'clock instead of half-past three, but this is immaterial. Whether it is after four or after half past three, does not change the principle. It is after school hours, and the trustees, by virtue of their corporate powers, had the right to authorize, by resolution or by simple permission, any sort of meetings in the school premises, whether these meetings be, in their nature, industrial, political, or religious. The school trustees had even the right, by virtue of their corporate powers, to authorize in the school-house, the celebration of mass one day, and the next day to authorize any other denomination to have therein its religious service, and so on, in succession with every one of them. And to prevent it, the legislature would have had to pass a law. Having that power, the trustees had surely also the power of authorizing half an hour of catechism after the school hours. I repeat it, that clause is merely, in another form, the repetition of powers which the trustees have always had, that is, the lending of the school premises for any legitimate object, outside of the school hours, which power they already possessed by virtue of their being a corporate body and the custodians of those premises. As a matter of fact, it is perfectly known that in the rural parts of the country, the school-house is generally the meeting place for the people. And, in case the school trustees would have been disposed to refuse such authorization, there is not a Catholic family in Manitoba which would not have gladly thrown wide open the doors of its home to the children to afford them an opportunity to receive that same religious instruction for half an hour. Then, in so far as this aspect of the case is concerned, the provision as to the half hour does not better our position. Does it alter the nature of the schools as a teaching institution ? Mr. Cameron, in the words I have already quoted, positively answers in the negative. Let me state my own views. The settlement provides that from nine o'clock in the morning until half past three in the afternoon there will be no reference to any religious matter. In going into the class-room teachers and children alike will have to hang up their Christianity, and God himself, in the hall with their hats and overcoats, and leave them there until the hand of the clock has marked the time when that stranger, who, however, gave His life to save ours, when that Saviour of our souls will have the option of making his humble ingress amongst those children, and there, with the kind permission of certain gentlemen and under certain regulations, of which we know nothing at present, have some conversation for half an hour or so. Will that half hour of religious instruction given to the children—as a sort of punishment to some of them—have the effect of christianizing that part of the day during which God has been expelled ? Not in the least. From nine o'clock until half-past three, the school will simply be an unchristian school, a school of infidelity, to be succeeded at sunset by another kind of teaching, if, perchance, there is such teaching. Because, it is provided that religious teaching may not take place every day in certain cases, but only on every alternate day, and even less frequently. There is even a possibility of having none at all. We were told the other day by our distinguished colleague from Rougemont that a friend of his, a Presbyterian minister, had told him with emotion that the schools in the United States were hotbeds of vice. I may quote a similar authority, the New York Methodist, in which it has been said that those United States schools were "hotbeds of infidelity."

That kind of schools comes within the remarks of the Privy Council, that is to say,

"a school which they (the Catholics) regard as no more suitable for the education of Catholic children than if they were distinctively Protestant in their character." A fact which, in the opinion of the Privy Council, constitutes "a legitimate ground of complaint" for the Catholics. Their lordships even go so far as to give an answer to those who maintain "that there should not be any conscientious objections on the part of the Roman Catholics to attend such schools.. if adequate means be provided elsewhere of giving such moral and religious training as may be desired." To that objection their lordships say that "all this is not to the purpose" in view of the law, in view of the "parliamentary compact" entered into by the interested parties.

True, in certain cases a Catholic teacher may get into the class-room. But this also is of no consequence, because that Catholic teacher will be bound by the law to have no religion during the school hours. His mouth will be closed as to his faith. His silence, I dare say, would be in many cases, perhaps more damaging than the silence of a Protestant teacher, because the children, who are not in a position at such an age to have a clear understanding of the law or of the circumstances surrounding them, would construe that silence in a suspicious way, and might receive from it impressions of the most unfortunate character. Be that as it may, sure it is that the teacher will have to behave himself as a pagan teacher, and consequently his presence in the school-house, although he may be a Catholic, does not change the pagan nature of the institution, does not give any advantage or guarantee to Catholic parents, if that teacher faithfully observes the provisions of the law. If he does not, then he breaks the law. As he goes one way or the other, he performs the part of a hypocrite, or of a violator of the law. In the former case he forfeits his rights to the confidence of the parents; in the latter case, he forfeits his rights to his teacher's certificate. In both cases he forfeits his rights as an educator. As far then as this second aspect of the case is concerned, the arrangement that we are offered, does not recognize any of our rights, does not remove any of our grievances, does not improve our condition; consequently it is quite unacceptable. There is another clause which is made use of amongst our own countrymen to bring them to accept the so-called settlement; it is the 10th clause relating to the use of the bilingual textbooks. It is said that by that clause the teaching of the French language is provided for. There was never a more erroneous assertion. That clause has been conceived only as a better method to teach English. And let me say at the outset that in so far as the teaching of the English language is concerned, I have no objection to such a teaching. As a loyal British subject, I quite admit the propriety of all of us learning the language of our metropolis; as a Canadian I admit, in a general way, the great usefulness of the English language in business, and in social life; as a member of this body, I regret to be unable to address you in a better form in the language of the majority. For all these reasons, and for many others, it is my sincere desire that the English language be taught in all our schools. It has been taught in the past. I never learned English elsewhere than in the Catholic schools. It was taught in the Catholic denominational schools in Manitoba before 1890; it is taught at present in our Catholic schools, notwithstanding the spoliation we have been and we are daily the object of from an unfair majority. It will be taught in the Catholic denominational schools whenever their rights and privileges are restored. I do not raise my voice against the teaching of the English language. That teaching is quite reconcilable with the love of my own language and with my desire that it should also be taught properly and thoroughly, as a matter of propriety, of national pride, and of practical usefulness. But I do raise my voice against the disingenuous contention that such a clause is a concession made to the French part of the population. There is no such concession in that, and so Mr. Cameron, the Attorney General of Manitoba, said in the speech to which I have already referred. He put it right then, and it is a direct contradiction of the contention of this government. He said:

> Section 10 provides that when ten pupils in a school speak French or any other language other than English as their native language, the teaching of such school shall be conducted in French or such other language and English, upon the bilingual system. It is absolutely necessary that in French, and German Mennonite settlements, the pupils should learn English by the best methods, and experience has shown that there is no method so good as the bi-lingual.

Remark the high propriety suggested here by Mr. Cameron, that the pioneers of the country, that those whose rights and privileges have been specially guaranteed by the constitution, should be placed on the same footing as the new comers. However, we have it from Mr. Cameron, a party to the arrangement and a friend of this government, that the real intention of the clause is not for the purpose of teaching French, but to facilitate the learning of the English language. I repeat it here, my objection does not bear upon the fact that English is to be taught. In so far as that is concerned, well and good. But let not this government tell us again that they are making a concession to the French population. They are simply trying to throw dust in the eyes of the people by reducing to a written law what was before the practice, and what is an absolute necessity in practice, from a pedagogical point of view. From this standpoint, it is perfect nonsense to try to teach a language foreign to the language of the child without making use, at least at the beginning, of the language of that child. That was done before, and that is done now in every institution where English and French are taught. Whether one book written in the both languages is used, or whether one book in French and one book in English are used simultaneously, or whether there is only one book in one of the languages, the teacher supplementing the missing book by his own knowledge of the other language, it is always the bi-lingual system that is followed. That is the only reasonable system, and if Mr. Cameron has only discovered that lately, as his language would seem to indicate, he must admit that the French schools, so despised by him and his colleagues, have been long and much in advance of his public schools, for, when I began to learn English, some forty years ago, I began under that system, and that was in a French school. Evidently, everything is not so bad in those humble French or Catholic schools.

One remark more on this subject to show the utter disingenuousness of that clause: who ever heard that to teach French we should use English books. This simple remark is a conclusive argument against that settlement in so far as it pretends to be a concession to the French population, and to the teaching of its language.

I have demonstrated, I believe that on principle, that settlement does not offer the slightest redress to the minority. But let us suppose for a moment and for the sake of argument, that it does to a certain extent. In practice, that settlement would be unworkable. Let us take the city of Winnipeg as an example. We must take the population as it is and where it is. If we were to go on and make a trial of that settlement, the first thing that would confront us is the fact that our children scattered in all the wards of the city of Winnipeg, and consequently, in all the schools, would be short of the required average attendance for the working of that law. Consequently, while the law would stand in the statute-book, we would not be placed in a position to take advantage of it. We would not have the right to engage a Catholic teacher, nor to avail ourselves of the half hour for religious instruction, nor to make use of the bi-lingual system. In fact the law would of necessity be a dead letter. That is to say, the settlement takes away with one hand what it pretends to give with the other. It is a cruel mockery. It is not only an injury but it is an insult to the intelligence of the people and to the high notions that legislators, leaders of the nation, must have of their functions. From a constitutional point of view there are some two or three remarks which I want to make. The constitution says, and the judgment of the Privy Council affirms, that rights and privileges which belonged to the minority have been affected. Consequently redress must be given to the minority--to the whole minority, not to a portion of it only. Now, this so-called settlement, even in case it should be all it pretends to be, does not give redress to the minority as a whole, but to certain individuals of it only, and it gives that redress to those individuals provided only they are placed under certain circumstances, and provided they are in sufficient number at one place. That condition of number, as embodied in the settlement, is not contemplated by the constitution. For instance, an average attendance of at least 40 children in towns and cities is required to authorize the engagement of a Catholic teacher. If that average happens to be only 39, then the law is not applicable. Apart from the manifest injury which is done here to these 39 children, apart from the illogical aspect of such a provision, there is, from a constitutional standpoint, a breach of the law, because the Manitoba Act does not provide that certain individuals of the minority shall be picked up here and there and certain privileges be given to some 40 children, and the same privileges be refused elsewhere to 39 children, but it directs that the minority, whether its number be 10, 20, 25, 50 or more, shall enjoy certain rights, unconditionally in so far as number is concerned. In this regard, then, the settlement is insufficient, both in fact and in law. The settlement is deficient in another way. There is no permanent character about it. The minority has grievances, it has been so declared by the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council. A grievance arises necessarily from a right of which the party aggrieved has been deprived. Now, the idea of right implies the idea of permanency. To be, then, an acceptable measure of justice, the settlement, even if it were an improvement on our present condition, should be, for all that it contains at least, of a permanent character. Such is not the case with the present settlement, in so far as it does not guarantee that in the future, the would-be advantages which it pretends to concede, shall not be swept away. It must be borne in mind that this arrangement is not acceded to by the local government as being the outcome of a vested right in the minority, but merely as an evidence of the would-be generosity of the provincial legislature and executive. Coupled with this settlement is the assertion on the part of the local government that the power of the provincial legislature has no limitation in matters of education. Mr. Cameron said, in moving the second reading of his bill:

> A matter of very considerable importance was they had here preserved the principle of provincial autonomy in matters of education.... the principal of federal interference in our provincial education is for ever abandoned; it can never happen that any political party will endeavour to force on the province educational legislation which the province does not want.

Now, if it is true that henceforth the federal authorities could in no case exercise the powers conferred upon them by the constitution, and recognized by the Privy Council as a legitimate jurisdiction, for the protection of the minorities, it follows that the local authorities may do what they like, go as far as they like in the way of oppression, and there would be no remedy for the victims of such ill-treatment. A good deal has been said about the good faith and the fairness of the Manitoba government. I have my own opinion about all that. If those who speak in that way knew the men and the situation I venture to say that they would not insist on that subject. But for the present, there is no object in discussing that. Granted that the present government is well disposed. Who can say that the next legislature, feeling that no check can be put upon their action, feeling that the federal authorities have no disposition to interfere, who can say that it will not go back even further than the laws of 1890 went, and wipe out every vestige of christianity from the schools, injuring thereby Protestants and Catholics alike? Taking into account the prejudices that have been so unwisely raised by the Liberal government of Manitoba, taking into account the tendencies which those prejudices have created and strengthened, the probabilities are that within ten years from now, if we accepted this settlement, our province, and perhaps other provinces of this Dominion, would have a school system entirely outside of all religious influences. Where would the settlement be then, where would the Roman Catholics be, where would Christian Canada be? The want of permanency which characterizes this so-called settlement is a capital deficiency which makes it objectionable in every way, and more particularly, in this, that it does not bring the same within the requirements of the constitution as construed by the Privy Council. The constitution gives to the minority a guarantee for a minimum of rights and privileges, and any settlement must not only embody that minimum of rights, but must assure its permanency. Such a feature is entirely wanting in this so-called settlement.

I must also question the action of the government for the powers they seem to have arrogated to themselves in this matter. It is said in the speech from the throne that "a settlement was reached between the two governments." Now, this statement is of a most serious character. It proclaims that the government has not acted within the scope of its functions. Let us read the constitution. Subsections 2 and 3 of section 22 of the Manitoba Act read as follow:

> (2.) An appeal shall lie to the Governor General in Council from any Act or decision of the legislature of the province, or of any provincial authority, affecting any right or privilege of the Protestant or Roman Catholic minority of the Queen's subjects in relation to education.

(3.) In case such provincial law, as from time to time seems to the Governor General in Council requisite for the due execution of the provisions of this section is not made, or in case any decision of the Governor General in Council on any appeal under this section is not duly executed by the proper provincial authority in that behalf, then and in every such case and as far only as the circumstances of each case require, the parliament of Canada may make remedial laws for the due execution of the provisions of this section, and of any decision of the Governor General in Council under this section.

In these clauses where is the power of the government to make any settlement without the consent of the minority? It is nowhere. The functions assigned to the government here are very distinct. They are empowered to hear an appeal, and to adjudicate upon the same. They are a special tribunal, but they are not parties to the controversy, and not being parties, they have no qualification to make a settlement. They may use their good offices to bring to a settlement the interested parties, namely: the minority and the local authorities. If the government had done that, no one would have grudged their interference. But when they take upon themselves to make a settlement without the consent of the most interested parties, then they go beyond the powers assigned to them by the constitution, and beyond also all propriety. In fact, one has only to make an appeal to his reason, without referring to the law, to see the error of such an attitude. No settlement can be made except as between the interested parties. This is quite evident. There is a marked difference between the action of the late administration and the administration of the day in this connection. The late government sent a delegation to Manitoba, but with the positive instruction not of making a settlement themselves, but of bringing together the minority and the local government, in the hope that a settlement might take place between the two interested parties. That was legitimate, but the action of the present government is not. If the settlement were not deficient, however, I would not mind that excess of jurisdiction. We would gladly accept the settlement without quarelling with the administration of the day. But the settlement being deficient, it is not possible not to take notice of the manner in which it has been brought about. Because that action of the government is resulting in wrong conclusions being arrived at by the public at large. The mere fact of that arrangement being given out as a settlement agreed upon by the two governments, is taken as putting an end to the jurisdiction of parliament, as shutting the door to any further action on our part based upon our former appeal, as being practically the death blow to our claims. If I am not mistaken, that is substantially the position taken by my hon. friend from Marquette. I must take the strongest objection against such an interpretation of the effect of the settlement, and to support my views, I was bound to show at the outset the unconstitutionality of the powers which the government has assumed in this respect. For, the moment we come to the conclusion that in reaching that settlement the government has exceeded its jurisdiction, it follows that the power of parliament, the force of the remedial order, and our claims, remain as alive as ever. An act done in excess of a jurisdiction is null and void, and the nullity of said act prevents the rights and privileges which were intended to be overruled, from being affected. Such is the importance of the point that I have just now raised. But apart from that, there are other arguments to be opposed to the theory raised by my hon. colleague from Marquette.

He says that "the appeal ceases and is satisfied when this parliament, which is the judge of the matter, tacitly or otherwise, accepts that settlement as full satisfaction of the grievances of the minority," and the hon. gentleman adds that the question is settled "in so far as this parliament and the province are concerned.' In other words the proposition of the hon. gentleman is that, as the matter stands at present, the jurisdiction of parliament has ceased and no further action can be taken on the appeal.

First of all, it must be observed that the negotiations have taken place between the government of Canada and the province of Manitoba, and not between the latter and this parliament. So far, this parliament has taken no action, and consequently parliament cannot be said now to have impaired its own jurisdiction. And nobody else can.

In the second place, in assuming the right to make such a settlement, this government has exceeded its jurisdiction and capacity, as I have already shown. Then this settlement, the issue of an unconstitutional transaction, cannot be a bar to the jurisdiction of parliament. But, moreover, this so-called settlement cannot be a bar to our jurisdiction because it does not comply with the remedial order. That the settlement does not comply with the remedial order is a fact which cannot be disputed. Here is the remedial order:

It is hereby declared that it seems requisite that the system of education embodied in the two Acts of 1890, aforesaid, shall be supplemented by a provincial Act or Acts which will restore to the Roman Catholic minority the said rights and privileges of which such minority has been so deprived as aforesaid, and which will modify the said Acts of 1890, so far and so far only as may be necessary to give effect to the provisions restoring the rights and privileges in paragraphs (a), (b), (c), hereinbefore mentioned.

Said paragraphs (a), (b) and (c) are as follows:

(a.) The right to build, maintain, equip, manage, conduct and support Roman Catholic schools, in the manner provided for by the said statutes which were repealed by the two Acts of 1890, aforesaid.

(b.) The right to share proportionately in any grant made out of the public funds for the purposes of education.

It is not necessary to recite here the settlement. It is in the mind of every hon. gentleman in this House; and in contrasting the two documents their opinion cannot be at variance with mine as to the fact of the settlement falling short of the requirements of the remedial order. Now, the remedial order is a judgment to all intents and purposes; it is final, and cannot be withdrawn or merely altered in any way, shape or manner. That judgment belongs to the minority as well as to the other parties to the controversy, as does any judgment in any contested case. By the constitution, the refusal of the local authorities to comply with that judgment opens the door to the jurisdiction of parliament. And so long as the judgment stands (and it will stand for ever); so long as the refusal of the local authorities to comply with that judgment stands (and it does stand at the present moment); so long stands the jurisdiction of this parliament. There is no authority on this side of the Atlantic to alter that situation. My contention is that the settlement does not comply with the remedial order in any particular. But for the sake of argument, let us suppose that it does comply in some way; it is at the utmost but a partial compliance. In law, in equity, as well as in common sense, a partial compliance is equivalent to no compliance at all, when it has to be taken into consideration as to whether a legal or parliamentary jurisdiction has been affected. So, the jurisdiction of parliament remains the same. We are told that parliament accepts the settlement as a solution of the question. Supposing that this assertion be true, it is merely a fact which has no bearing on the right or on the law. Parliament, I know, has the physical power of refusing to act in the matter, and practically the immediate result of that inaction is to leave us in the same position as we would be placed in had the jurisdiction of parliament really ceased. But, I repeat, the exercise of that physical power does not affect the legal and moral aspect of the question. A highway man may rob or kill a passerby; that shows that he has physical power enough to rob or to kill; it does not prove that he had the right to do so. A man owing a sum of money may refuse to pay; he may be imprisoned, and still refuse to pay; there is no possibility of getting the cash from his pocket; but that stubborn refusal is a physical fact which does not take away from that man his obligation to pay, and does not affect the right of his creditor of being paid. And so with the parliament of Canada in this instance. Parliament has the physical power to refuse to vote for an equitable remedial law, but that refusal is not a repeal of the remedial order, does not change the nature of the refusal of the provincial authorities to act in compliance with the requisition served upon them, and is not a repeal of the jurisdiction of parliament, which remains, along with the rights of the minority, standing in all its entirety. The constitution has assigned certain powers to the Governor General in Council and to parliament; it has conferred on them the power of protecting minorities in matters of education. There is for them a corresponding duty to use their legal powers when appealed to. It cannot be optional for them to fulfil or not fulfil that duty; otherwise, there would be no guarantee for the minorities and the constitution would be mere waste paper; in other words, it would be a fraud perpetrated upon the people. This supposition would be an insult to the fathers of confederation and to the various parliaments which went into that parliamentary compact. True, the word "may" is used in reference to the exercise of such powers. But in this instance the word "may" is not merely an enabling word, but is imperative. I beg to be permitted to quote here some arguments and quotations which I find in the speech of our distinguished colleague from Bothwell, on the consideration of the Remedial Bill. The hon. gentleman then said:

> Words of compulsion are never applied either to the sovereign, or to a sovereign body .... our constitution, like that of England, imputes the intention both to the sovereign and to parliament, to keep faith and to perform all the duties falling within their respective jurisdictions....It has again and again been decided that mere enabling words do impose a duty in certain cases.

And the hon. gentleman quotes Chief Justice Jarvis who says:

> The general rule derived from the cases is that where the statute confers the authority to do a judicial act in a certain case, it is imperative upon those so authorized to exercise the authority when the case arises, and when its exercise is duly applied for by the party interested, and having the right to make the application.

That the minority has a right of appeal is clear from these words of the constitution. "An appeal shall lie."

> Here a right is given, says Mr. Mills, to a dissatisfied party, and there is an implied duty imposed upon the executive authority to make that bearing effective.

A question arises here: which is the judge, which is the executive? The judge is not parliament, but the Governor General in Council. An "appeal shall lie" not to parliament, but to the Governor General in Council, says the constitution. And again, the constitution says that the Governor General in Council shall adjudicate upon the appeal and determine what is requisite. There is not a word in the constitution ascribing to parliament similar or concurrent powers. But when that appeal has been finally adjudicated upon by the Governor General in Council, then the constitution goes on to provide, that on the refusal of the province to comply with the requisitions of the Governor General in Council, parliament shall take the matter into its hands as an executive, and make remedial laws to redress the grievances in so far as circumstances require. If, however, it is still contended that parliament is the judge, then I say this judge must adjudicate according to law, as any other tribunal is bound to do; and the law in this instance is the remedial order, expounding the constitution as construed by the highest tribunal of the empire.

I am perfectly aware that all these arguments can be traversed by the proposition that after all the majority must rule in a parliamentary country. But I say that the majorities themselves are bound to rule according to the constitution. The constitution is the supreme authority, not the majorities. If it was not so, we would have arbitrary government and not constitutional government. It can be said also that parliament is supreme, and that under our political institutions we cannot help it. Yes, I say, parliament is supreme within its jurisdiction. If they choose to commit a denial of justice, they have the physical power to do so, and no mandamus can be taken against them. Parents also can deprive their children of the necessities of life, because they are the supreme authority within the family circle. But both parliament and the parents in doing so are ignoring their most sacred duties, in law and in equity, and in doing so they trespass upon the law of nature which must obtain amongst the nations as well as amongst individuals. Some others assert that the result of the elections is a decided blow against the claims of the minority. On several grounds I take the strongest exception against that theory.

The majority of the present government came mostly from the province of Quebec. Now, you have heard what the hon. senator from Rougemont has said about that. He certifies that the elections there went in favour of Mr. Laurier because he and his candidates had pledged themselves to a larger measure of justice to the minority than the Remedial Bill afforded. I am myself a witness to the same pledge. I was in the province of Quebec at the time of the election and I know that the electorate in voting the way they did intended to vote for the restoration of our schools. In view of the pledges referred to, there is no doubt that the verdict of the people in Quebec is in favour of the settlement of our claims according to our wishes and not in favour of a settlement such as the present one.

In the second place, the people is not the tribunal to which such questions are to be referred. It was never contemplated by the framers of the constitution that such questions should be at the mercy of prejudices, of partisanship, or of a misled public opinion. These matters were wisely committed to a calmer tribunal. It was referred to the Governor General in Council, whose decision must be executed by parliament. See subsections 2 and 3 of section 22, Manitoba Act. What would be the result if the electorate was to decide as to such fundamental questions? The result would be that under certain circumstances, the constitution would be torn to pieces, the people would in fact reject the constitution that has been given us by the Imperial parliament, and frame one of its own against the authority and the dignity of the Crown. Substantially and practically the school legislation of 1890, and the stand subsequently taken by the local government, are the striking out of the limitations imposed upon them in relation to education; it is an encroachment upon the rights of others, it is really an amendment to the constitution, an amendment to an Imperial Act. Provincial legislatures and this parliament have not the right of so amending the constitution, and in assuming such right, they practically declare that they do not want to be bound by the authority of the Imperial parliament, that they do not want to receive their constitution from England, but that they want to be free from such fetters. What is this if not disloyalty in disguise? We must be reminded that England can make such alterations to its constitution as she may choose through parliament, because she is an independent power; but a colony, whose parliament, and still more the local legislatures, which have but a delegated power, cannot constitutionally evolve in the same way. They must obey in every particular the constitution that they have received from the Imperial parliament, or else they put themselves in antagonism with the metropolitan power. That would be in the end the result of the interference of the electorate in such matters, that is, the substitution of another constitution of their own make for the constitution that we have received from England. The rights of the minority exist by virtue of the constitution independently of the views of the electorate, and as it has been said with so much force, so justly and so generously by the leader of the opposition in this House, were the whole of the country to cast their votes against us, that would not change in the least our claims before the Dominion. Right is right, and none but the Imperial parliament can, in our case, impair that right. And it is well to remind here that whatever may be our respective views as to the merit or demerit of the denominational school system, the question is not here whether, as a matter of expediency, we must adhere to it or not, but whether the constitution is to be maintained or not.

We have heard a good deal about the advisability of making a trial of the present settlement. In fact, it seems to be almost the only argument now offered by this government in its favour. In response to such an invitation we must say at the outset, that no trial can be made of a negative enactment. We consider that this settlement does not improve our position, very far from it. It is the re-enactment of the law of 1890, in different words. Under certain circumstances, a trial may be given to something having an existence, but no trial can be given to an imaginary situation.

In the next place, to make a trial of the so-called settlement would be an expression of belief in it. To believe in it would mean an adherence to it, and to adhere to it would be a consent on our part to all the principles it involves, and an abandonment of all the rights it rejects.

Our adherence to that settlement, even for the sake of a trial, would be an admission on our part that from the beginning we have not been sincere in our fight.

It would be an admission that such an important question can be settled without our consent, and against our wishes; that we must have in fact no voice in the matter.

It would be an admission that our rights and privileges can be encroached upon at the will and pleasure of a majority whose hostility is so manifest.

It would be an admission that the constitution can be abused, and that the parties thus abusing the constitution cannot be checked by the proper authorities.

It would be an admission of the unconstitutional doctrine that the federal authorities must not interfere to protect the minorities in matters of education, a doctrine which Mr. Cameron has set forth in the local house as arising precisely out of the negotiations held between the two governments, and of the result of these negotiations. Here are his words:

A matter of very considerable importance was they had preserved the principle of provincial autonomy in matters of education * * * The principle of federal interference in our provincial education is for ever abandoned; it can never again happen that any political party will endeavour to force on the province educational legislation which it does not want.

This doctrine is unsound, unconstitutional, and opens the door to all sorts of injustice, leaving to those whose rights might be injured, no possibility of redress. Our adherence to that settlement would be an admission that the youth should be educated in unchristian schools. That would be a moral sacrifice that we have not the right to make.

It would be a withdrawal from the position we hold now. We have made an appeal; we have succeeded in getting a judgment from the Privy Council which says that our appeal is well founded; we have succeeded in getting a remedial order from the Governor General in Council which upholds our rights; the matter has been brought up to that point where the jurisdiction of this parliament cannot be questioned. All this would be lost to us. Our consent to make a trial of the settlement would carry us back to the position we were in at the commencement of all these contentions. We would lose the benefit of our past struggles and sacrifices, we would lose the legal position we are holding at present. These are some of the consequences that would ensue from our consent to give a trial to that settlement. There are some others. It would more specially cut the ground from under our feet in view of any other course that we might think proper to adopt at some future time; it would shut the door to our appeal to some as yet untried jurisdiction. It would do so even if we were to give that trial under protest. To recede from an unassailable position in such matters is always an error, and a cause of future weakness. Now that the battle is fairly engaged, it is better for all parties that it should go on; we intend to make our way onward, and let no fetters such as that settlement to impair our energy. We will not give our hands to a settlement which is nothing but a complete lamentable and disgraceful surrender. We will not consent to the substitution of mere tolerance for right. The responsibility which rests upon our shoulders, does not allow us to do so.

It is all very well to talk of Mr. Greenway's good dispositions. Mr. Greenway made pledges to us in former days, pledges of the most solemn and important character in connection with these very matters. He has violated all his pledges. He has no more right to our confidence, and nobody has a right to ask the minority to place itself at the mercy of the present government of Manitoba. We will treat you with justice, say they to us. Before confiding ourselves to that promise, we must ascertain what the word "justice" means in their mind and in their heart. "Justice" for them is that they have a right to dispossess the Catholic population of Manitoba of their well-earned properties and of their vested rights, that we should have no objection to let our children be educated outside the pale of our Catholic belief; that they have a right to ignore all the advantages conferred upon us by the constitution. That is what they have contended during the last seven years; that is what they proclaim still to be justice. In that kind of justice we do not believe. But let us suppose that the present government, harrassed by the past seven years of agitation, would in fact carry on this agreement in a liberal and generous way, we cannot foretell what a subsequent administration would do; or, rather we can do it. It is as clear as daylight that at a not very distant day a new agitation would make it hot for us anew. It would be argued with great force that, after all, that half hour of religious instruction does not amount to much, that it would be just as well to do away with it, and have purely and simply secular or neutral schools all over the province. We would try to have our voice heard again, but in vain. Again that appeal to peace and harmony, which is made to us to-day, would resound all through the land. We would be told that since, in 1897, we were willing to forfeit much more important rights, we should again give way and let the last vestige of such privileges vanish entirely In dealing with that question one cannot refrain from taking a view of the progressive movement of public opinion and of the weariness by which the latter is finally overcome. In such crises public opinion generally gets accustomed to the existing situation. It becomes impossible to move it up once it has gone down. Weariness sets in, there is a want of adequate energy to get back to an old situation, even if it is admittedly better than the existing one. That is what would take place in Manitoba before long, the Catholic minority would be sacrificed, and the remainder of its rights buried for ever. This disposes of the suggestion sometimes made that with time we might improve the settlement itself. That disposes also of the argument that this settlement is only an instalment on what we have a right to get. Mr. Cameron, the Attorney General for Manitoba, has conclusively set this matter clearly before the provincial legislature. He said in explanation of section 7 of the settlement :

> That rejects the system of separate schools, and shows that the intention of the settlement is to discard it for ever.

Surely, that is clear enough. We have nothing more to expect in the future, and we have everything to apprehend. I have heard some say that we were ready to accept the propositions stated in the memorials of the delegates sent a year ago to Winnipeg by the late government—and it is added that the present settlement does not substantially differ from those propositions. In reply I say, 1st, that the propositions of the commissioners were intended only to be a basis for subsequent negotiations between the minority and the parties interested ; 2nd, that the minority has never accepted those propositions ; and 3rd, that they differ materially from the present settlement. In support of this third assertion I have only to quote the words of Mr. Cameron in this regard :

> It has been charged that the government (of Manitoba) has acted perfidiously inasmuch as the terms of the settlement are substantially the offer made by the Dominion commissioners a year ago. Such is, however, very far indeed from being the case. * * *
> The charge was precisely the opposite of the truth ; there was not the slightest resemblance between the commissioners' offer and the offer of to-day.

In fact, the government of Manitoba rejected the offer of last year, as they call it, as giving, in their opinion, to the minority their separate schools ; they accept the offer of this year because it rejects for ever the separate schools. The offer of last year recognized our rights ; the offer of this year is practically a burial of those rights.

There is one great difference between the position taken by the late administration and the position taken by the present government. It is this : that the commissioners last year were positively instructed not to make any settlement which would not be satisfactory to the minority. This year the government makes a final settlement without any regard for the satisfaction or dissatisfaction of the minority.

Now, as to the minority having expressed their willingness to accept as a basis of settlement the propositions laid down in the memorial of the commissioners of last year, there is not the slightest ground for the assertion. His Grace the Archbishop of Saint Boniface declared his disapproval of them. I have also expressed my own dissent from a settlement upon the lines of those propositions. I beg permission to read to this House a letter which I addressed to the Prime Minister, as soon as an official statement could be had in connection with that mission :

> I claim full justice for the minority, and the proposals of the commissioners do not extend to us that full justice. Consequently it is my duty to mark my dissent from such proposals as being inadequate to the requirements of the case. It is useless to add that I still further dissent from the proposals of the Manitoba government. It is my request that this my dissent be brought to the knowledge of the cabinet."

This makes our position in this regard unassailable. Let us refer briefly to the Remedial Bill of last year. That bill gave us :

1. A Catholic board of education.
2. A Catholic superintendent of education
3. Catholic school inspectors.
4. Catholic school teachers everywhere and independent of the number of children.
5. Catholic school trustees.
6. Catholic examiners.
7. Catholic normal school.
8. The selection of the text books.
9. The right of levying taxes for the support of our own schools.
10. Exemption from taxes for the support of other schools.
11. It affirmed our rights to share proportionately in the legislative grant for educational purposes.

Now, the present settlement does not grant us any of the above privileges. It does not even recognize our right to any of them, and yet it is tried to make us believe that it is preferable. It is a wonder to me that any one should persist in such an attempt to misrepresent the situation. I will not insist upon that, however, because it seems to me that the mere mention of the facts is sufficient to do away with all misapprehensions in this regard. But I want to insist on one of the features of that bill. It was an undoubted sanction of the rights of the Catholic minority of Manitoba, and, above all, it was a sanction of the principles upon which the constitution is founded with regard to such matters; it declared that minorities could depend on the federal powers for their protection; and the recognition of those principles by the final adoption of the law, would have resulted in peace and harmony all through the Dominion, because, with the triumph of that policy, any future desire in any of the provinces to encroach upon the rights of minorities would have been discouraged and quieted for ever. This was sufficient to enlist in favour of the bill the sympathies of every sincere champion of the constitution. But it is said that our position might have been made uncomfortable by litigation. When the minority gave its approval to the Remedial Bill, it knew that litigation was ahead; but we knew, at the same time, that, with the judgment of the Privy Council behind us, with the remedial order behind us, with the remedial legislation behind us, with the Imperial guarantees behind us, with the "parliamentary compact" behind us, we were in a position to enter into new contests with a reasonable expectation of coming off from the same with flying colours. We were ready then to go into litigation, while if we accepted the present settlement we could not even have the idea of going into litigation at all. All grounds of success would be cut from under our feet. Our cause would be crippled for ever.

Make a compromise, suggest others; let the process of give and take operate. But, hon. gentlemen, what shall we give? We have had a genuine jewel stolen, and it is proposed to let the thief go provided he gives back a false stone. This is no compromise. It is all gain on one side, and all loss on the other. But, hon. gentlemen there are some reasons of a higher order to be advanced against a compromise. The education of their children is to the minority a matter of conscience, and in such matters, as I have already pointed out, the yeas and nays do not obtain, and although the hon. leader of this House has ventured to say that in his opinion our conscientious views had been fairly met by the settlement, we must decline, with all due deference, his teaching in such matters. He is not a judge as to what my religious belief exacts from me, any more than I could be a judge for him in like matters. I am surprised at the suggestion coming from certain gentlemen. For instance, the hon. senior member for Halifax, is one of the most uncompromising men in this House. Even on trifling things he holds steadfast to his views. But, strange enough, when it comes to the sacred interests of the souls of our children, he advocates a compromise. This, I cannot conceive. But I must take the fact as it is, and tell my hon. colleague that the Catholic minority in Manitoba begs leave not to act upon his advice.

The hon. premier, Mr. Laurier, said some time ago, that the minority, through their solicitor, had not asked for a restoration of their denominational schools, and the hon. leader of this House has repeated, in substance, the same assertion. I must take exception to such a statement. What the minority asked for is a matter that can very easily be ascertained. We have only to refer to its memorials and petitions. Our demands are couched therein in the following words:

(3.) That it may be declared that the said last mentioned Acts do affect the rights and privileges of the Roman Catholic minority of the Queen's subjects in relation to education.

(4.) That it may be declared that to Your Excellency the Governor General in Council, it seems requisite that the provisions of the statutes in force in the province of Manitoba prior to the passage of the said Acts, should be re-enacted in so far at least as may be necessary to secure to the Roman Catholics in the said province the right to build, maintain, equip, manage, conduct and support these schools in the manner provided for by the said statutes, to secure to them their proportionate share of any grant made out of the public funds for the purposes of education and to relieve such members of the Roman Catholic church as contribute to such Roman Catholic schools from all payment or contribution to the support of any other schools or that the said Acts of 1890 should be so modified or amended as to effect such purposes.

That is what Mr. Ewart was requested to ask as the minimum of our rights—that is what he prayed for, and the best evidence that he never asked for less is the fact that both the Privy Council and the Governor General in Council have granted the whole of our demands, as contained in our petitions. No tribunal ever grants more than what is prayed for.

Mr. Ewart has cheerfully espoused our cause, he has fulfilled his duties with science and devotedness, and it was due to him as well as to ourselves that the statement made here and elsewhere should be at least contradicted.

There are many other things which have been mentioned and to which it would be expedient to give an answer. But I must not trespass too long on your indulgence. I will only refer briefly to a few other matters.

The speech from the throne says that the agreement is "the best arrangement that was obtainable under the existing conditions of this disturbing question.

In answer to that I may say that when the matter was taken into their hands by the late government, if the then opposition had generously offered their co-operation for the settlement of the question, as the present opposition is ready to do, every right and privilege to which we are entitled would have been restored to us, the question would have been settled long ago, and removed from the political arena.

I must not forget to mention before closing my remarks the fact that the minority in Manitoba has protested against this settlement. Resolutions of complete dissatisfaction have been adopted in each locality where there is a Catholic settlement. That dissatisfaction has been emphasized more particularly in the late election of Saint Boniface where the Greenway candidate himself, in order to save his deposit, had himself to disapprove that settlement.

To justify their former attitude and their present course the government allege that the Remedial Bill was not an efficient remedy. If their solicitude for our interests is so great, why do they not bring a better measure? They have legal lights in their ranks. Let them frame a bill that will give us all that we are entitled and that will defy litigation. The present opposition will support them.

And even if there were difficulties ahead there is no statesmanship in avoiding them by a weak surrender. The government of a country has no right to give way before the assailants of the constitution; they must uphold the rights of every section of the people.

Appeal is made to peace. Let me remind the House that we had peace before 1890, we are not the parties who disturbed that peace. Let the guilty parties make the constitutional and equitable concessions they have been commanded to do, and peace and harmony will be restored as before. We need peace and harmony in that distant part of the Dominion, for the development of our immense resources.

I hope the House will pardon me for keeping the floor so long. As one of the sufferers, as one coming from the province where the trouble arose, as one of the representatives of the minority, I am in duty bound to raise my voice here to uphold our claims and to vindicate the constitution. Do not believe that we demand to have for our church special privileges, do not believe that we want to put ourselves out of reach of the government action; do not believe that we intend to raise a generation of hostile citizens to the British institutions. Our loyalty to our church does not impair our loyalty to the Crown. As was plainly said last night by the illustrious representative of the still more illustrious Pontiff Leo XIII., our loyalty to the Crown and to the British institutions goes hand in hand with our loyalty to our church. True, our grievances are the occasion of this battle, but we feel at the same time that we are not fighting for ourselves only. Surely we are fighting for the soul of our children, but we are fighting also for the constitutional privileges of every province in this Dominion, we are fighting for the preservation of Christian rule in our country. The present crisis has more than a local importance. It seems to me that we are on the verge of a decided step in the social movement in this Canada of ours. Shall Christianity be the rule in this country or not? It shall not be the rule unless positive Christianity is taught in the schools. If it is not taught, we will follow the decline in that respect which all right thinkers observe in the country south of us where fully one-third of the population are in the deep sea of infidelity. Such were the fears of the Duke of Argyll when speaking on Australian matters in the House of Lords in 1891, he paid to the Roman Catholics this glorious compliment, though himself a Presbyterian:

> The Catholics had the high honour of standing alone and refusing to pull down in their schools the everlasting standard of conscience. This resistance on the part of the Roman Catholics, I believe, may be the germ of a strong reaction against the pure secularism, against which I venture to call pure paganism, of the education of the colony.

Half an hour of religious instruction in the class-room, after school hours will not answer that purpose. It will rather emphasize, for the present, the pure secularism, or pure paganism of the school system, and lead in the future to the entire removal from the school premises, and from the mind of generations to come, all vestige of Christianity.

What the Catholics want is not only instruction, but they want true education.

To educate a child is not only to adorn his intellect, but it is also to form his character, to cultivate the aspirations of his heart and of his soul. This cannot be done unless the atmosphere of the school is permeated with Christian thoughts. It does not follow, as is so often said with respect to Catholic schools, that nothing but religious instruction must be given in schools. But, for Catholics, it means that the school work must be opened and closed with Catholic prayers. It means that the teacher may, during the school hours, and in a Catholic sense, refer to the Saints and the Blessed Virgin Mary. It means that in teaching how to read, the teacher must be allowed to tell the young child, that at all times, in his old days as in is younger days, he must not sully his soul by immoral readings. It means that the teacher when teaching grammar must have the right to tell the child that the language which he is learning must be used at all times for the defence of the truth. It means that in teaching arithmetic the teacher must be allowed to tell the child that God has created everything with number, weight and measure. It means that in teaching geography the teacher must be allowed at least to tell the child that the first missionaries in Manitoba were Catholic priests, who went there at the request of Lord Selkirk, and who did good work for the christianization of that country. It means that in teaching history, the teacher must be allowed to point out to his children the action of God in human events; and so on with all the branches of knowledge. It means also that when disciplinarian measures have to be resorted to, the teacher must be allowed to appeal to the Christian sentiments of the child rather than to brute force, civil law, or the law of nature only. Catholic education is an education where, while teaching all secular subjects, the thought of God is allowed to penetrate all the inner parts of the child's mind, as pure beams of the sun, so that he may learn everything with a view of becoming a good citizen and a good Christian. This does not occasion any undue waste of time on the part of the teacher or of the child. A mere look sometimes upon the walls of the schoolhouse, where are appended Christian emblems, is all that is required. That is briefly the Catholic conception of a school. There is nothing in that to which objection can be taken, even from a pure human or civic point of view. In fighting for that conception we are but fighting for our rights, for the constitution, for our country, for the Crown, for Christianity, and with the grace of God I hope the minority of Manitoba will never fail in this sacred duty.

Hon. Mr. DEVER. I wish to say a word or so expressive of my regard and veneration for the Queen.

On the death of William the Fourth, who was son of George the Third, the Crown of England had to go to the young Princess Victoria, who was the daughter of the Duke of Kent, a brother of the dead king, the dead king not having any children of his own.

Hence, on hearing of the king's death, the Archbishop of Canterbury and other gentlemen high up in the affairs of state went immediately to make it known to the Princess Victoria, who was staying at Kensington Palace at the time.

Lord Melbourne was sent for. He was then Prime Minister, and a meeting of the Privy Council was held and the Princess was sworn in Queen of England.

I remember well her marriage to Prince Albert and her children being born; the Crimean war, 1854-55, and its difficulties; the death of Prince Albert, 1861, &c., &c.

I remember, too, her affliction as a widow, and the sympathy of her children for her. But now, hon. gentlemen, nearly all is over with the Queen—age is coming fast upon her, and her venerable picture at present looks very little like her bright young face when I saw her portrait first.

Such is life, even with queens!

But to her people her reign has given great strides of advancement.

Knowledge has gone abroad; history has been thrown open.

Bigotry and ignorance are dying out, and theologians and tories of all creeds had better pay attention to the "handwriting on the wall."

It has been said that the school question has not been settled satisfactorily, and that half an hour is not sufficient for religious instruction each day. Well, hon. gentlemen, those who are making their living by theology are very numerous; and, if they are so anxious about the religious training of the children, I really think they can find means, and ample time, to gratify their deep interest in the spiritual welfare of these children if they so choose to occupy themselves.

But I fear there are other considerations in this school cry than great regard for the well-being of the children, and some Catholic thinkers would prefer to see theologians confine themselves to their speculations on divinity, and leave politics severely alone, to the laity, who can look after them very well. Spiritual theories are very good in their place; but practical use of mother earth is what we are after in this age of competition. Theologians by this time ought to be satisfied that the government of nations progresses the wrong way in their hands; at all events, we think so. If I were to draw my conclusions from some of the speeches that I have heard on this question, I would feel that the people might begin to look through their fingers, and ask themselves the question, Is Christianity a fact or an invention? What have they to fear about the foundation of Christianity? I was under the impression that it was a historical fact, but apparently these gentlemen think otherwise. They seem to think it is only secure when impressed on the plastic minds of children, there to be believed, whether true or false, like Mohammedanism or Judaism. Christianity may well exclaim, "Save me from such friends!"

Some hon. gentleman, spoke in this debate, very scornfully, of science, especially science in the United States, and how confused the people were in that country, I presume the hon. gentleman meant also, the science of theology; if not, I would like the hon. gentleman to explain the great confusion in this science, which exists in the several schools of theology all over the world. Some gentlemen look with contempt on all science only the one they are schooled in.

This hon. gentleman was also very severe on M. de Voltaire. He called him "an atheist," and other unkind names. I know many people very prone to denounce Voltaire who have never read any of his writings, but the following little bit of information does not go to show that Voltaire was an atheist, or that he was quite as bad as his enemies would like to make him out.

In looking up and praying to his God, Voltaire said:

Oh, God; misunderstood whom all proclaims,
Hear the last word my humble mouth now frames,
If I mistook 'twas while thy law I sought,
I may have err'd, but thou wast in each thought,
Fearless, I look beyond the opening grave,
And cannot think the God who being gave,
The God whose favours made my bliss o'erflow,
Has doomed me after death to endless woe.

Of course he was very severe in his writings, on certain theologians, and when we come to look back, on the many errors, committed by extreme men, who can wonder, at Voltaire, denouncing crime, in high places. Who can smile, on the accusers and tormentors of Galileo; who can love the murderers of Joan of Arc! Who can stand idly by, and see a government, for the people, and by the people, taken from them! But, hon. gentlemen, let me leave this unpleasant subject, and see what we can say about the tariff. I have no doubt whatever, but that the tariff will be satisfactory, this time. The men, at the head of affairs are able, and honest men, Of course the evil policy of the past cannot be wholly changed in its "spots," at once, but it will, I believe, in a very short time, and to the entire satisfaction of a large majority of the people, of this Dominion. There are many other points in the address I would like to touch upon, but this must suffice, for the present.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT moved the adjournment of the debate.

The motion was agreed to.

The Senate then adjourned.

THE SENATE.

Ottawa, Tuesday, 6th April, 1897.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

Prayers and routine proceedings.

A QUESTION OF PRIVILEGE.

Hon. Mr. McKEEN—Before the Orders of the Day are called, I wish to rise to a question of privilege. My attention has recently been directed to a newspaper article which has been copied by the Evening Journal of Ottawa from the Ottawa Weekly Tribune. This item, to my mind, is scurrilous and insulting to some members of this Senate, at least I regard it so, and I ask for the indulgence of the House while I read it:

STRONG BUT ——?

Ottawa Weekly Tribune.

Those senators who buncoed the public treasury by drawing double mileage should be prosecuted for obtaining money under false pretenses. A senator should have no further immunity than any other man when it comes to a question of theft. It was not enough for those fellows to sit in the Commons and vote with the promise of senatorships in their pocket, but they must descend to the paltry theft of a double mileage.

It is unnecessary to comment on the character of the item, but I think it is due to myself that I should make some explanation, as I am one of the parties referred to here. These criticisms are due to some correspondence which took place last year between the Auditor General and the Clerk of this House. The Auditor General took some exception to mileage that had been paid senators who had been brought into this House during the latter part of the first session of 1896. For my part, I resigned my seat in the House of Commons about the middle of January—speaking from memory, about the 16th of January. I did so in order to provide a seat for the present leader of the opposition in the House of Commons. In doing so, I was not without precedents, and certainly since then my example has been followed by others who now occupy seats in this House. I was called to the Senate, I think, about the latter end of February. In the interval, I had been home. I think I was sworn as a member of the Senate about the 5th of March, which made the time between my resignation in the House of Commons and my entrance into the Senate about seven weeks. When the statement of my indemnity was sent me, I agreed to it, and drew my pay. The question of mileage, as far as I know, was never raised. In my mind, I felt I was as much entitled to travelling fees coming here, as I had ever been when coming to the House of Commons. I had been six weeks at home, and in the interval had been to the States and elsewhere. During the subsequent session, in the autumn, my attention was called by some of my brother senators to the fact that the Auditor General had taken exception to mileages being paid: he had styled them "double mileages." I went down to see him and explained the situation as I understood it. I told him that to my mind it was perfectly right, that I could not conceive of any other way by which the mileage could be paid. I added, and I am prepared to affirm what I said, "If there is any idea in your mind or the mind of any person connected with your department—that this is not right, I am willing to hand back the money: I should much rather do it than that there should be any difficulty in regard to it." He agreed with my explanation and said he had no fault to find. He showed that there could be no question as to my right to being paid my travelling expenses, and I find that after some correspondence with the Clerk of this House, he writes as follows to the Clerk:

AUDIT OFFICE, OTTAWA, 8th Oct., 1896.

SIR,—In further reference to my letter of 28th September calling your attention to the indemnity and mileage paid to certain senators for the first session of 1896, I beg to state that when that letter was written I was under the impression that Senator McKeen was receiving the full indemnity for that portion of the session of which he was a senator less eight dollars a day for all absent days over twelve during that period, and over-looked the fact that he was not appointed from the Commons to the Senate. Senator McKeen has reminded me that such is not the case, that a considerable period elapsed from the date of his resignation in the Commons to his appointment as senator. I would therefore correct my letter of 28th September as regards his case.

I am sir, your obedient servant,

J. L. McDOUGALL, A.G.

The Clerk of the Senate.

He went on to take exception, which I need not go into, about the days I was here. As far as I am concerned, I have only to say that my attendance in parliament was checked by the accountant, or clerk, or proper authority in this House. I never paid any attention to it myself. I have no doubt, and as far as I know, the account was correct; the explanation of the clerk in a subsequent letter proves it. At all events I was paid only on the same basis as other members of the Senate. I am sorry to be obliged to allude to this, but the press having criticised my conduct in reference to the statement made by the Auditor General I am in duty bound to notice it. In regard to the charge that members of the House of Commons were sitting and voting with appointments in their pockets, as far as I am concerned, that is entirely untrue. I resigned my position in the House of Commons without any promise directly or indirectly, and up to the day I had the honour of receiving a telegram from the present leader of the opposition in this House that he had been pleased to recommend me to a seat in the Senate, I had no promise from any member of the government or of the party that I should receive such an appointment. I can appeal to any member of the government in or out of office whether I am not correct in this statement. I am sorry to have to take up the time of the House with matters of this sort, but it was due to myself, in view of the criticisms and charges that have been made all over the country, more particularly in my own province in regard to this matter.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I think the hon. gentleman's explanation is entirely satisfactory to every one within his hearing. It is quite clear from the statement he makes that he ceased to be a member of the House of Commons, had returned home and had been absent from Ottawa six or seven weeks and was then summoned to the Senate. The case is perfectly clear and no exception can be taken to it. With reference to the days of his attendance in this House or the other House they were subject to the rules of parliament, and I think the hon. gentleman is free from any further responsibility on that score.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I might add, as far as the statement made by the hon. gentleman from Queen's, in reference to any promise of an appointment, he never had any promise from me, nor did Sir Charles Tupper ever directly or indirectly intimate to me that he desired the hon. gentleman to be called to the Senate until some time after the election. Then when the matter was discussed I said it would give me great pleasure, and I think I telegraphed to the hon. gentleman to that effect, that it gave me great pleasure to recommend him to the Senate. He had no promise whatever from the head of the government or any one else, so far as I know.

TRIAL BY JURY IN THE N. W. T'S. BILL.

FIRST READING.

Hon. Sir OLIVER MOWAT introduced Bill (D), "An Act respecting trial by jury in certain cases in the North-west Territories."

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—It has been the practice, and I think a very good one, if the hon. gentleman would only follow it—although there is no rule to that effect—that when a bill of an important nature is introduced by the government, a short explanation is given to the House of what its purport is, in order to draw the attention of members of the Senate to its contents.

Hon. Sir OLIVER MOWAT—The object of the bill is this: The Assembly of the North-west Territories has passed an Act to provide for trial by jury in certain cases for which there was no provision in the North-west Territories Act of Canada; but it is doubtful whether that legislation by the assembly is constitutional or not. The cases in which they have given these trials by jury are recited here, and the object of the bill is merely to confirm their Act. It is a matter for their discretion to determine, and what they have done seems quite reasonable; but I propose that parliament should confirm it to remove any doubt there may be as to the jurisdiction of the Act they have passed.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—And to give them power in the future to continue such trials?

Hon. Sir OLIVER MOWAT—I have not said anything about that. I have left the jurisdiction as it was, and the larger question as to whether their jurisdiction should be extended; at all events, in this particular, I propose to confirm what they have done.

The bill was read the first time.

THE ADDRESS.

THE DEBATE—CONTINUED.

The Order of the Day having been called:

Resuming the adjourned debate on the consideration of His Excellency the Governor General's speech on the opening of the second session of the eighth parliament.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT said: Before the debate closes, I desire to offer a few comments on the observations that have fallen from hon. gentlemen who have spoken in reference to the various paragraphs in the speech His Excellency delivered on the opening of parliament. Before doing so, I wish to express, on behalf of the leader of the government in this House and myself, my recognition of the moderation which has marked the utterances of various speakers on the subject. I am afraid, however, I shall have to except from those complimentary terms my hon. friend from Queen's.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—All right.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—The hon. gentleman is always rather caustic in his remarks, particularly when he speaks with the feeling he did on the occasion of his address to this House. My hon. friend from Pictou also, I will not say committed any breach of the decorum of the House, but he certainly did not by his remarks elevate the tone of the discussion on the address. I think when he sees his words in print, if they have not been revised he will rather regret that he has made the comments he has with reference to the individual members of the cabinet and the comparisons he drew as to their ability and their position as members of the government.

The first paragraph of the address is one that naturally evoked an echo, not only in this chamber but from the whole Dominion of Canada. In no part of the Queen's broad empire is there a stronger feeling of loyalty and devotion to the throne than prevails throughout Canada. It is a matter of history that those nations which from time to time had to stand up for their rights and liberties have always been the most loyal to the Crown or the authority of the country. On two memorable occasions the people of Canada had to stand up for their rights and liberties, once in a contest that prevailed in the last century and once in the early part of the present century; but apart from that there are reasons why the Canadian people should entertain a more than an ordinary respect and devotion for Her Majesty the Queen. Probably in no part of the world has the same growth and development prevailed, so far as material progress or civil liberty are concerned, as we have experienced in Canada during the present reign. If we recall the period of 1837 when the Princess Alexandrina Victoria, ascended the British throne on the decease of her uncle, and compare the primitive condition of the country and of the government with the status of to-day, we will find that the progress and development of Canada has been in a much greater ratio than has been experienced in other countries. To give hon. gentlemen and the present generation one illustration of what I am adverting to in the development of the country, at that time, in 1837, the journey from Montreal to Kingston took from two to three days, and it was made up of six or seven different changes by stage and boat. To-day we traverse the distance comfortably in a few hours. At that time to reach Kingston from Montreal, we had to take a stage from the city of Montreal to Lachine, a boat to the Cedars, a stage to Coteau, a boat from Coteau to Cornwall, a stage from Cornwall to Dickenson's Landing, and a very primitive sort of flat boat with a stern wheel, such as one sees now in pictures of boats that are to be found in shallow streams in Africa, carried the passengers to Prescott where a boat of larger proportions brought him to Kingston. In reference to progress of government, Upper and Lower Canada were governed by a Governor or Lieutenant-Governor and Executive Council. It is quite true we had our legislative assembly and legislative council, but they were largely filled with office holders. They had not sufficient independence to resist the executive authority, and it is notorious that time and again the government was carried on against the direct will even of a subservient majority in the House of Assembly. To-day we rejoice in having probably the most perfect system of government that prevails in any country of the world. There is no part of the world where home rule is so thoroughly understood, enjoyed and appreciated as it is in Canada. We may have our differences of opinion in regard to minor questions—the tariff, details of expenditure, the franchise, and various other matters connected with our system of government, yet it must be acknowledged that, taking it all in all, there is no system of government that can be pronounced superior to that which exists in Canada. It answers quicker and more responsively to the will of the people than the government of any other land. It has broader principles of democracy than exist even in the United States, where, as we all know, even in that body that years ago attained to such eminence, the Senate of the United States, the country is ruled by, I will not say faction, but at all events by cliques who dominate over every principle of right and justice. The reign of Queen Victoria will be in the future, also, one of very great importance. All admit that the tone in the court since Queen Victoria assumed the throne, has been raised high above the plane that marked the lives of those of her predecessors. The example that she has set will, in future years, compel her successors to assume a tone of equal character and respect in the eyes of the people. The British people have become exacting in the reign of Victoria from the noble life that Her Majesty has led. I think, therefore, that, speaking for ourselves in Canada, there will be no part of the world where the Queen's Diamond Jubilee will be celebrated with a keener sense of appreciation and respect and love for Her Majesty than in the Dominion of Canada. Now, coming to some of the details in the speech, a good many comments were made upon the Franchise Act. The language of the speech was that it was expensive and unsatisfactory and I was surprised to hear hon. gentlemen rather find fault with the language of the speech and to express the belief that the system in force since 1884 or 1885 was better because of its uniformity than the proposed adoption of the provincial franchise. They seem to have forgotten the opinion expressed by Sir John Thompson in 1894 when he introduced a bill to abolish the franchise that had been in force for years. I will just read an extract from his speech delivered in June, 1894, when introducing the Franchise Bill. He said :

> The change is also proposed in this bill which I indicated a few days ago, that the questions upon which so much difference has arisen in the past as to the basis of the franchise, shall be adjusted by adopting the franchises of the several provinces. While I admit that this is a new departure, I deny what has been so widely asserted, that it is in any important or practical degree a surrender of any principle that we have contended for in times past. The number of differences which exist between the provincial franchises and the Dominion franchise as established by our own Act are so few as not to be worth the contest and the expense which are involved in keeping them up, and the adoption of a general system which will apply both to the local and Dominion legislatures has recommendations as regards simplicity and facilities for economy which cannot exist under a dual system such as we have been keeping up for the past few years.

That language is very decided, as showing that, at all events in the opinion of Sir John Thompson, it was not worth preserving the franchise under the federal principle that had prevailed for the preceding ten years.

The completion of the canals is a subject that has evoked general approval throughout Canada. The business men of this country appreciate the importance of having the canals finished at an early day. It has been the design of the preceding government, as well as this government, that the canals of this country should be enlarged. Our predecessors had proceeded with the construction of a portion of the works. Why all should not have been undertaken together, I do not understand, because the capital expended in deepening the Welland canal is practically lost; it yields no return and can yield no return until the whole system is deepened to 14 feet in depth. We hope at least in the course of two years that the canals will be deepened to 14 feet throughout, and then vessels can take grain and products of the west from Fort William, Chicago and Duluth to the point of export at Montreal or Quebec.

The proposal to bring the Intercolonial Railway to Montreal has already evoked some opposition. As hon. gentlemen know, the Intercolonial Railway has not been a paying enterprise from a commercial standpoint, and, it is believed, and believed I think with some degree of confidence, that the extension of it to the city of Montreal, which is an important business centre, will enable it to compete with the other railways. Its terminus will be at the head of tide water, and it will be able there to avail itself of those advantages that a long railway, such as it is, will enjoy by reaching so important a centre as the city of Montreal. It will be found in after years that the project was a wise and prudent one.

The hon. senator from Queen's, in his observations, twitted the present government with their omission to place a reciprocity clause in the speech from the Throne. It would have been only deceiving the people of Canada if we had introduced a proposal that we knew was wholly without avail at the present time and under present conditions. Both political parties in this country have been committed to the principle of reciprocity. It is on record that in 1878, when the Conservative party advocated a change of government by the adoption of the national policy, reciprocity with the United States was one of their planks. The cry was reciprocity in trade or reciprocity in tariffs. The announcement was made by Sir Charles Tupper and other leading statesmen of the day on the Conservative side that if they were returned to power, reciprocity was sure to follow in two years. Probably my hon. friend from Prince Edward Island will remember some of the speeches made by Sir Charles Tupper at that time, in which he pointed out that the return of the Conservative party and their resumption of power would necessarily bring reciprocity with the United States. Speaking at Charlottetown on September 3rd, 1878, he said:

> All that you have to do is to support the national policy of Sir John A. Macdonald in order to obtain reciprocity with the United States within two years. Liberal-Conservatives propose to bring about a renewal of reciprocity with the United States, under which the country prospered in so eminent a degree, &c.

That was the language of the Conservative party. Subsequently, as years went on, from time to time it was also enunciated that they were in hopes of securing a reciprocity treaty. We must recollect, because it is of comparatively recent date, that parliament was dissolved in 1891 on the distinct assurance to the people of Canada that a treaty was about to be established with the United States and that it was necessary to have a new parliament in order to confirm the terms of it. I have in my hands the official announcement made by the government at that time, and that was the plea on which the parliament preceding the present one was dissolved in 1891. We know that several members of the government went to Washington and that they had a conversation with Mr. Blaine, then secretary. We know, moreover, that without authority from him they divulged the overtures that were made in confidence, and that were not to be spoken of, in order to serve their purposes in the election that followed. We know also that apologies were demanded and given for that breach of confidence, so that so far as the record of the Conservative party is concerned they have not very much to boast of on the subject of reciprocity. The leaders of the Liberal party have always advocated reciprocity and have always been in favour of it. They recognize that during the last eighteen years the government of the day were largely responsible for the feelings that grew up in the United States during that period, and if to-day the present government have found it impossible to practically secure any treaty it is largely due to the irritation and the grievances that grew up during the time.

Hon. GENTLEMEN—Oh! oh!

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Hon. gentlemen smile—I have the record, and can read it, and it will not be disputed. They will recognize there is some truth in the observations I make. I say when the United States refused to ratify the Fisheries Treaty in 1886 and 1887 the course adopted by the then government in enforcing the treaty of 1818, was the substantial cause of the irritation in the United States.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.)—It was the $5,000,000 they were obliged to pay under the Halifax award that caused the irritation.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—No, it was the seizure of vessels and the enforcement of a treaty that was not adapted to modern times, a treaty that had not been enforced for twenty-five years, because it was not in force during the Reciprocity Treaty of 1854, nor subsequently, under the Treaty of Washington. It is notorious that in carrying out that treaty one vessel was seized because being short of hands, she had put into port in order to ship a seaman. It is very well known that they were not allowed to trade or to purchase anything. It is on record that a steamer put in for water, having had her barrels swept off the deck, and she was told "Yes, you have a right to procure water under the terms of the treaty, but you cannot purchase barrels—you are not allowed under the treaty to buy barrels." It was cases of that kind that caused largely the aggressive attitude assumed by the United States. I do not mean to say that the United States was not aggressive on its part, that there have not been year by year acts committed by them which were censurable in as high a degree. There has been on both sides an absence of that proper feeling that ought to exist and the desire to cultivate friendly relations that should always prevail between two countries situated as Canada and the United States are.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Does the hon. gentleman desire the Senate to understand that the government of the day should have allowed the treaty of 1818 to be a nullity?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Not a nullity, but it was carried out to an extreme degree. We have had that question debated in this chamber before now—probably before my hon. friend from Belleville came into it—and it was admitted by every one who has followed the circumstances under which that treaty was passed, that it was wholly unsuited for the present time.

Hon. Mr. MILLER—I never heard it admitted in this House, and when the subject was under discussion I always took part in it. The very contrary was contended for and when my hon. friend uttered sentiments on one occasion before, such as he has uttered now, they met with general condemnation on both sides of the House.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I am aware that my hon. friend always took the opposite view. I speak for myself and I think there were many gentlemen on the Conservative side of the House who took that view. I will read Sir Charles Tupper's view of it, expressed in a speech which he delivered in the House of Commons. In addition to that enforcement of the treaty, discriminating dues were levied on United States bottoms passing through the Welland canal. That was kept up for several years, until the United States declared that they would put a corresponding duty on vessels passing through the Sault Ste. Marie canal.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I do not like to interrupt the hon. gentleman, but I deny in the most distinct and emphatic manner that there was any discrimination against United States vessels.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—The hon. gentleman surely remembers that the dues were levied and were only removed when the United States imposed dues on Canadian vessels passing through the Sault Ste. Marie canal.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—The government of Canada gave them privileges that they were never entitled to.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Did not the government impose a duty of 20 cents a ton on United States vessels passing through the canal?

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—The duty that was imposed upon United States vessels was imposed upon Canadian vessels under similar circumstances; the duty was levied on all vessels passing through the Welland canal, not going through to Montreal. They had to pay the full dues, whether they discharged the cargo at Montreal or at United States ports west of it.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—My hon. friend knows very well that 99 per cent of the Canadian vessels went to Montreal, while United States vessels went to Ogdensburg.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—What difference does that make?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Hear what Sir Charles Tupper said when introducing the fisheries question on the 10th April, 1888, in the House of Commons:

> We stood face to face with an enactment which had been put on the statute-book by a unanimous vote of Congress, ratified by the President, providing for non-intercourse between the United States and Canada. I need not tell you that that bill meant commercial war, that it meant not only the ordinary suspension of friendly feeling and intercourse between two countries, but that it involved more than that. If that bill had been brought into operation by the proclamation of the President of the United States, I have no hesitation in saying that we stood in the relation to that great country of commercial war, and the line is very narrow which separates a commercial war between two countries from an actual war. Speaking a year ago, I pointed out in my remarks, with a view to prevent the possibility of such an act going into force, all the advantages that in our present position we could avail ourselves of to protect ourselves against such an unfriendly act on the part of the United States. I said then that it would be a mad act. I say so now. No man who knows anything of the intimate commercial relations which exist between Canada and the United States could contemplate such an act going into operation without feeling that it would tear up from the foundation those intimate social and commercial relations which exist between these two countries, which, in friendly commercial rivalry, are making rapid progress which has attracted the attention of the civilized world.

Hon. Mr. MILLER—How does that sustain your contention?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—The modus vivendi was introduced for the purpose of getting rid of this friction between Canada and the United States. The difficulty was avoided in that way. The hon. gentleman must recognize that that treaty could never have been enforced had it gone on for a year or two longer.

Hon. Mr. MILLER—It will have to be enforced very shortly now.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—The treaty was passed at a period when the United States was humbled, properly humbled, while Great Britain was at war in Europe, but it was a treaty that was dictated by a strong power against a weak power. It is not a treaty that Great Britain would to-day make with the United States. No one pretends that, nor do I believe that the British government would to-day approve of the Canadian people enforcing the letter of that treaty.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—They have.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I do not propose to say anything on the question of the tariff. The policy of the government is enunciated in the speech from the Throne.

Hon. Mr. McCALLUM—That is the question that we want to know about.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—My hon. friend will hear it in due time from the Finance Minister of this country. Some strictures were made upon what was considered an improper announcement. I think it was charged to be a disloyal act, in fact, trenching on treason. I refer to the announcement that the Finance Minister made in the city of Montreal in reference to the question of the coal duties.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—I think I said it was an indecency.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I go further than that.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—At all events, the statement was made openly to all the world. It was made under conditions that I think the majority of the people of this country would entirely approve of the statement. Those conditions were that on the Atlantic coast and on the Pacific coast the United States had been in the habit of making large purchases of coal from the Canadian people. The eastern cities buy their coal largely from Nova Scotia and Cape Breton. In the west, California and the Pacific States purchase coal largely in British Columbia. The people in the central portions of the Dominion bought their coal from the central portions of the United States. It was an advantage to both countries. It was just as much an advantage to the United States as it was to Canada. The recent tariff introduced in Congress proposes to levy a duty on coal going into the United States that is practically prohibitory. Does the hon. gentleman say that when Canada was smitten on one cheek that we should adopt the Christian principle and turn the other cheek to be smitten also without making any announcement of what it might be necessary for us to do? I think the responsive utterances that have emanated from the Canadian press are an ample justification of the course taken by the government. We do not believe in the principle of retaliation, but it is necessary in times like the present, when a great country like the United States proposes to strike down an important industry in this country—an industry that I understand has fifteen or sixteen millions of dollars invested in it in the east and a good many millions invested in it in the west and employs thousands of men—it was necessary that some announcement should be made of what might be possible if the United States were to persevere in the line of policy that they had marked out for themselves in reference to the duty on coal.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.)—What about the "sunny ways?"

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—The sunny ways come in. They will have their effect, no doubt, in years to come. We have to raise our revenue largely on imports, and every one knows if you want to favour trade with one country and decrease it with another the tariff is a very important factor in diverting trade from one country to another. Trade will flow in those lines where there is the least obstruction or impediment in the way, and surely if we have to tax ourselves—and it is quite immaterial whether the tax is paid by the consumer or the importer—the general principle applies as we have to raise a revenue. The feeling in Canada at the present time is that we should not, at all events, make it bear more lightly on the United States than on the mother country.

Hon. Mr. McCALLUM—Hear, hear.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—How is it going to benefit trade with the mother country retaining a duty on coal?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I am speaking now on the general lines that the sentiment of Canada proposes that this government shall adopt. I do not propose to follow the remarks made by my hon. friend from Queen's in the charges of disloyalty that he made against the members of the government, but I wish to remind him that in attacking the Minister of Finance as a disloyal man, and he mentioned several instances in which he thought his conduct verged on the realm of treason—he ought to remember that Mr. Fielding has been premier of his province for the last ten or twelve years; he has been an honoured representative, and any reflection cast upon him is a reflection upon the people who placed him in the position he has occupied and enjoyed during that long period.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—No.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—He has left the premiership of that province of his own accord to take a position in the federal government at Ottawa and I think, therefore, the charge of disloyalty under such circumstances, need not require any refutation on my part. Coming now to what might be called the pièce de résistance of the speech which has embraced a good deal more of the time of the House than any other question—I mean the Manitoba school question, I may say at the outset my opinions on that subject are very well known. This subject has been frequently before the House, and I have not hesitated at all times to express myself fully as to the opinion I had formed in reference to the rights of the minority in Manitoba. I may add that no fair-minded person who looks into the history of this question from 1870—and we need not go to the Bill of Rights or anything antecedent to that—but taking it from the time of its introduction into the parliament of Canada in 1871, the representatives of the people of Canada then decided that the separate school system as it existed in Ontario should be introduced into Manitoba, and to their credit be it spoken, excluding all the Catholic members who voted on the proposition to expunge the educational powers, there was a majority of the Protestant representative men of this country in favour of granting to Manitoba the right of separate schools. There can be no manner of doubt as to what parliament intended, because the subject was debated and an amendment was made to strike out the clause providing for separate schools and it was contended that if the clause was allowed to remain in, it meant that Manitoba could not at any future time disturb that legislation. That amendment was defeated, and the legislation was confirmed and approved by the Imperial authorities. The law was accepted by Manitoba, and acted upon for some 18 or 19 years, so that so far as the constitution is concerned, it must be conceded that the minority in Manitoba was guaranteed the right to establish and maintain separate schools. My hon. friend who sits opposite, and who has always taken a fair and honourable course in this House, voted against the separate schools clause. It was carried against his will but he accepted the situation and has always expressed himself as convinced that the intention of the parliament of Canada was to grant to the minority in Manitoba the right that they sought. In my judgment it was part of the constitution, and it may seem rather paradoxical, if I say that I do not regard it any longer as part of the constitution. That may be considered a very extreme announcement under the circumstances.

When the bill abolishing separate schools in 1890 came up for consideration, my opinion was then and is now, that the Act should have been disallowed; that it was no doubt ultra vires. My hon. friend smiles. He, I have no doubt, assumes that Mr. Blake's and Mr. Laurier's motion had to do with the government's omission to take any action in reference to it. Now, had they followed the lines laid down by Mr. Blake and Mr. Laurier in moving the resolution that an act of that character—because it was within a month after the Manitoba Legislature had passed the act—had they followed the course laid down by Mr. Blake, supported by Mr. Laurier, we would not to-day be discussing the Manitoba school question. As hon. gentlemen know, clause 37 of the Supreme Court of Canada states that the "Governor in Council may refer to the Supreme Court for hearing or consideration" any matter which he thinks fit to refer, and the court shall consider the same and certify their opinion thereon to the Governor in Council, &c." Now, Mr. Blake, following the words in that clause, moved this resolution on the 29th April, 1890, about one month after the act had passed the Manitoba legislature. It was moved on going into supply :

That it is expedient to provide means whereby on a solemn occasion touching the exercise of the power of disallowance or of the appellate power as to educational legislation, important questions of law or fact may be referred by the executive to a high judicial tribunal for hearing and consideration in such mode that the authorities and parties interested may be represented and that a reasoned opinion may be obtained for the information of the executive.

Sir John Macdonald accepted that resolution, and I shall read an extract from his speech on that occasion :

Of course my hon. friend, Mr. Blake, in his resolution has guarded against the position that such a decision is binding on the executive. It is expressly stated and that is one of the instances which shows that his resolution has been most carefully prepared, that such a decision is only for the information of the government. The executive is not relieved from any responsibility because of any power being given by the tribunal. If the executive were to be relieved of any such responsibility I should consider that a fatal block to the proposition of my hon. friend. I believe in responsible government. I believe in the responsibility of the executive, and the answer of the tribunal will be simply for the information of the government. The government may dissent from that decision and it may be their duty to do so if they differ from the conclusion to which the court has come.

Following the suggestion of Mr. Blake and the acceptance of it by Sir John Macdonald, had the question then gone to the Supreme Court of Canada we know what the judgment would have been. When it came up in the ordinary way that court was unanimous in their opinion that the Act was ultra vires. At that time, the year 1890, there was no appeal from the Supreme Court on a question of this kind. It was only in the following year that the law was changed which allowed an appeal, that such questions as might be referred to the Supreme Court could be appealed to the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.)—That would not confine Manitoba in any way?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Yes, it would.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—How?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—If the government disallowed the Act on the advice of the Supreme Court do you suppose Manitoba would have appealed against it?

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Certainly.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—There could be no appeal. We have disallowed other Acts from time to time and when it was made perfectly clear that the Act was ultra vires Manitoba would have acquiesced.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.)—They would have re-enacted it.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Not if declared ultra vires. The introduction of the bill abolishing the separate schools of Manitoba was a rash act. It was not a well considered or well thought out proposition that emanated from the great body of the people. The man who was principally responsible for it was Mr. Martin, who afterwards represented Winnipeg in the House of Commons.

Hon. Mr. BERNIER—Is it not a fact that the law under which the reference could be made to the Supreme Court did not exist in 1890? Was it not passed in 1891?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—No, it was passed some years before that. I am reading from the Revised Statutes of Canada, 1886. There is no doubt about that.

Hon. Mr. BERNIER—I beg the hon. gentleman's pardon. I think the law allowing the government to refer to the Supreme Court such questions as that raised by the Educational Act of Manitoba was only passed in 1891. I may be mistaken.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Yes, in 1891.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I am reading from the statute of 1886 :—

The Governor in Council may refer to the Supreme Court for hearing or consideration, any matter which he thinks fit to refer, and the court shall thereupon hear and consider the same and certify their opinion thereon to the Governor in Council.

There is no doubt about that fact at all. My hon. friend is entirely mistaken.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—It was only the Act of 1891 that provided for the reasoned opinion being given.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—No, for an appeal to the Privy Council. There was the law as it stood, and the words of Mr. Blake's resolution followed the words in the clause I have read, "for hearing and consideration." That is the language he used.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—But Mr. Blake points out in that very speech that the state of the law then did not render an appeal to the Supreme Court at all effective.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Under Mr. Blake's resolution it was competent to refer this case to the Supreme Court, and we had been in the habit of referring cases to the Supreme Court.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—No; you are mistaken.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—There is the fact. I have read the Supreme Court Act and the resolution and Sir John's opinion of it.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—If the law, as it then stood, afforded a perfect channel or means of appeal, what was Mr. Blake's resolution for? He points out that the law was not adequate.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Mr. Blake's resolution speaks for itself, and I have read it. He follows the words of the 37th clause in the Supreme Court Act and Sir John Macdonald states it, and he states further, that such opinion is only for the advice of the government, that they were not bound by it, that they were bound to use their own discretion and judgment if they did not acquiesce in that opinion; therefore, I say that in so delicate a question as this, affecting as it did the interests of the minority, it was unwise and unsafe for the government to have allowed it to pass away from their control and authority. We know what the consequences have been. They have been most deplorable. That was the first mistake that was made. We know when the case went to the Supreme Court there was not a shadow of doubt in the minds of any of the judges that the law was ultra vires, but when it was appealed to the Privy Council, unfortunately, a judgment was given that was not in accordance at all events with the understanding that was arrived at by the parliament of Canada and by the Imperial parliament. What I say is that that first judgment cut the ground completely away. The first judgment was positive. It was as dogmatic as it was possible to be. It took up the very words "rights and privileges" that are referred to in the Manitoba Act and declared that there were none existing—that there were no rights and privileges. What I contend is this, that in the interpretation of a constitutional question some wider and more liberal interpretation should be put upon the Act than the narrow one that has been given to it by the Judicial Committee. The clause under which the judgment was given reads in this way:

> Nothing in any such law shall prejudicially affect any right or privilege with respect to denominational schools which any persons had by law or practice at the time of union.

Hon. Mr. BERNIER—If the law of 1886 that you are quoting from was sufficient, what was the use of passing this one in 1891?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—If the hon. gentleman will resume his seat I will explain to him as I explained before. Under the Supreme Court Act as it stood in 1890 there was no appeal from it. In 1891, after the year had expired and when the power to disallow had passed away from the central authority, that Act was passed which allowed an appeal to the Judicial Committee. There was no appeal from the decision of the Supreme Court of Canada as the law stood in 1890.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Do I understand the hon. gentleman to say that there ever was a period since the passage of the Act establishing the Supreme Court that either the defendant or plaintiff could not appeal to the Privy Council?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—No, I think not.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—There has never been a period since the passage of that Act in which a litigant had not the right to appeal against the decision of any court to the Privy Council. I have a distinct recollection of a motion having been made by Mr. Irving, who was then member for Hamilton, to prevent an appeal to the Privy Council, and Sir John Macdonald laid down the principle that no action of the parliament of Canada could deprive Her Majesty's subjects of the right of appealing to the foot of the Throne for redress.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Yes, I will explain what the hon gentleman has reference to. He has reference to cases which come before the court in the ordinary way—ordinary litigants. This was a different matter. The parliament of Canada and the Governor in Council had the right under the Supreme Court Act to refer to that court any questions on which they desired advice. That has been done time and again. I say that up to the year 1891, when the law was changed, there was no appeal from any conclusion that the Supreme Court came to, or any special case submitted by the Governor in Council or the parliament of Canada. We have referred private bills to the court to ascertain the views of the court as to whether they properly belonged to the provincial or federal authorities, and various questions of that kind have been, from time to time, referred to the Supreme Court. The decisions were not subject to appeal. A reference of a constitutional question was not subject to appeal until the Act of 1891 was passed.

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—Do I understand the hon. gentleman to say that if the Supreme Court expressed the opinion that that Act was ultra vires, that then Manitoba would have no right afterwards to appeal to the Committee of the Privy Council?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—In that year any reference to the Supreme Court of a special case was final.

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—It was cut off from any appeal?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Yes. A case in litigation arising between two parties was subject to an appeal and that is what the hon. gentleman refers to—where there are two parties to a case—an ordinary case in court. The hon. gentleman is quite right in saying that either party could appeal if the court considered it a proper case to appeal to the Judicial Committee; but what I said was that a special case, if referred to the Supreme Court during the year after the Manitoba Act was passed, was not subject to appeal and had we had at that time a judgment of the Supreme Court on the Manitoba Act and the government of Canada had thought proper to disallow the Act, I venture to say it never would have gone any further.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—What necessity was there for disallowance if the hon. gentleman's statement be correct and the Supreme Court had declared the Act to be ultra vires? Why should the government interfere beyond that by disallowing? They could not do so if the year had passed?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—The Supreme Court would have done it only by way of advice to the government. Under the statute a case is submitted for the information of the government, and the Supreme Court if it came to the opinion they did subsequently—we know what their opinion was. We got it afterwards—that it was beyond the purview of the legislature of Manitoba to pass that Act, the government was then amply protected as to any charge of interference with provincial rights. They would have been amply justified, and nobody could have called their act in question, because they would have been supported in the line of policy they adopted by the highest court in Canada.

Hon. Mr. BERNIER—What is the clause in the statute?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Clause 37 of the Supreme Court Act. The hon. gentleman will find it in the Revised Statutes of Canada. I think that is perfectly clear. I do not think it is susceptible of any question whatever that there is ample justification for any government to disallow an Act when advised by the Supreme Court of Canada. Now, we come unfortunately to the judgment of the Privy Council which, as I said before, was a very clear-cut judgment—very positive, very absolute and to my mind entailing a terrible failure of justice. The clause of the Manitoba Act which I have just read to the House is quoted in the judgment given by the Judicial Committee, but they are very specific about it. They recognize the position taken by the Supreme Court. They say they cannot concur in that. They say:

> Their lordships have to determine whether that Act (of 1890) prejudicially affects any right or privilege with respect to denominational schools which any class of persons had by law or practice in the province at the time of the union.

They quote the very language of the Manitoba Act and they say:

> Notwithstanding the Public Schools Act, 1890, Roman Catholics and members of every other religious body in Manitoba are free to establish schools throughout the province; they are free to maintain their schools by school fees or voluntary subscriptions; they are free to conduct their schools according to their own religious tenets without molestation or interference.

No child is compelled to attend a public school. No special advantage other than that advantage of a free education in schools conducted under public management is held out to those who do attend.

The privileges thus spoken of are privileges that the Manitoba minority can enjoy to-day. The minority in any country, I presume, if they choose to pay for their own schools, can enjoy the privilege, but they completely cut out the possibility of any right or any privilege having been guaranteed to the minority. They go on to say:

What right or privilege is violated or prejudicially affected by law?

It is not the law that is in fault. It is owing to religious convictions which everybody must respect, and to the teaching of their church, that Roman Catholics and members of the Church of England find themselves unable to partake of advantages which the law offers to all alike.

Their lordships are sensible of the weight which must attach to the unanimous decision of the Supreme Court.

They have anxiously considered the able and elaborate judgments by which that decision has been supported.

But they are unable to agree with the opinion which the learned judges of the Supreme Court have expressed as to the rights and privileges of Roman Catholics in Manitoba at the time of the union.

I say when they gave that judgment, they cut the right to separate schools clearly out of the constitution. The next clause on which the second judgment was given depends entirely on the preceding one. If there were no rights or privileges taken away from the Roman Catholic minority, what rights are there to restore? In the British North America Act there is a clause which states that if in any province the legislature, after the province comes into the union, passes an Act giving special privileges to the minority, they cannot afterwards withdraw that privilege. If that subsection had been in the Manitoba Act there would have been a groundwork of justification for the second judgment. That clause is not in the Manitoba Act and the Privy Council, strange to say, decided that it had no bearing on the Manitoba Act —so that the only clause which really gave them a foundation for their second judgment they cut out from under their feet so to speak. Any hon. gentleman—it does not require a lawyer—any layman reading the clauses in the Manitoba Act, and reading the clauses in the British North America Act side by side, will say that the whole case depends on whether there were any rights or privileges granted to the minority in Manitoba at the time of the union.

Hon. Mr. DEBOUCHERVILLE—The Act passed by the Manitoba legislature in 1870 or 1871 gave them privileges.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—In the British North America Act, any province, such as Manitoba, for instance, passing an Act giving privileges to the minority, cannot afterwards withdraw those privileges, but the Privy Council held that that clause of the British North America Act did not apply to Manitoba, and therefore, I say, the only foundation they had for the second judgment they took away by deciding that the British North America Act did not apply. The only words used in the Manitoba Act are "rights and privileges" in the second clause. The clause is:

2. An appeal shall lie to the Governor General in Council from any Act or decision of the legislature of the province, or of any provincial authority, affecting any right or privilege of the Protestant or Roman Catholic minority of the Queen's subjects in relation to education.

If they had no rights or privileges, as the Privy Council decided in the first judgment, what was there to take away? They say in the first judgment the minority were at liberty to establish their own schools and to pay for them, but they could not be relieved from the public school tax. In my mind both judgments were expediency judgments. In the first judgment, the Judicial Committee had this fact before them, that the minority was a mere fraction in Manitoba, that immigrants were going in from various countries professing various faiths, and probably considered it was better, as was represented by counsel before them, that national schools should exist in that country, and there is no doubt they adopted the expediency view that it was better in the future that all classes should be educated in national schools. Subsequently, they, no doubt, discovered that a mistake had been made.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.)—They threw the law to one side.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I cannot understand any other interpretation, because the judgment in the Supreme Court was so clear and the language of the Act was so clear, that any one who comprehends the English language could not mistake it. The judicial committee even discussed this word "practice" and they say "practice" was not wide enough to cover the denominational schools in force before Manitoba came into the union. The committee say if the word "custom" had been used, it would have been susceptible of a larger interpretation than "practice" Did any one ever hear of such hair splitting on a constitutional question? The word "practice" was put in designedly, because it occurred in the debate on the New Brunswick school question.

Hon. Mr. BERNIER—Do I understand the hon. gentleman to say that the first clause of the Manitoba School Act is the only one on which the Catholics can claim redress?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Yes.

Hon. Mr. BERNIER—The lords of the Privy Council say that the second subsection is a substantive enactment and not designed as a means of enforcing the clause which precedes it. It is intended to protect the rights of the minority, not the rights that we had before the union or at the time of the union, but rights granted to us by the province itself since the union.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I have already explained that. The first clause provides that the province shall not pass any law to prejudicially affect any right or privilege with regard to schools which existed at the time of the union. The second clause says when the rights and privileges are affected, there is an appeal.

Hon. Mr. BERNIER—The Privy Council does not say so. The Privy Council says that the second clause is an enactment by itself and has no reference to the first clause —that it by itself is intended to protect the rights granted since the union by the provincial legislature; and I maintain that the two judgments are perfectly consistent—that the first judgment had relation only to the rights we had at the time of the union, while the second applies to rights acquired since the union.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—The hon. gentleman has made his speech already. We have gone very fully into that point. Had the first judgment been the other way, then if the province at any time passed legislation or adopted any administrative action that affected the rights of the minority, there should be an appeal to the Governor in Council, but the second clause was not intended to apply where it is decided that there were no rights or privileges existing at all.

Hon. Mr. BERNIER—It was intended to apply to the rights and privileges of the minority——

Hon. Mr. WARK—I must call the hon. gentleman to order. He made a speech yesterday that occupied over two hours, and no one interrupted him, and now he rises to make speech after speech while another member has the floor.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—As I explained on a former occasion, that the question of appeal to a superior authority was probably taken from the Separate Schools Act of Ontario, where there was an appeal to the Governor in Council from any decision that affected prejudicially the rights of the minority. Of course the hon. gentleman is entitled to his opinion—I wish very much that the people of Manitoba were of his opinion and that the people of Canada concurred in that view, but one cannot ignore the fact that a very wide-spread opinion prevails that he is not correct in the conclusions which he has reached.

Hon. Mr. BELLEROSE—Is not the second judgment just the reverse of the first as to these privileges, and, if so, is not the second judgment of the Privy Council to be carried out and not the first one, and if it be carried out, it is acknowledged that the rights and privileges which were taken away from the minority should be restored by the parliament of Canada?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—What I hold and what I have held all along is that the second subsection has no applicability if you take away the first. The hon. gentleman says it is a constitutional right which is guaranteed. Surely if there is a guarantee in so solemn a matter as an Act of parliament, there must be some way of enforcing it. In what position is the minority if the majority say, very well, you have your constitutional rights, enforce them? You cannot go into a court of law and enforce those rights and privileges, and if that is the fact, it cannot be contended that the privileges guaranteed to the minority have now any value. The right to separate schools has been eliminated from the Manitoba Act. Our constitution is a written constitution, an Act of Parliament, and it is subject to the decisions of the courts. The courts alone are the proper mediums by which laws can be enforced. Will you name any other part of the constitution where there is a violation of it that the parties who violate it cannot be brought to book for it? It is not so with the second judgment. The Judicial Committee in effect say if the majority of parliament at any time choose to adopt legislation in that direction, we think that can be done; we do not point out how it can be done. They guard themselves most carefully. They say "the particular course to be pursued must be determined by the authorities to whom it has been committed by the statute; it is not for this tribunal to intimate the precise steps to be taken." Can an involved conclusion like that extract be called a judgment? If it were a judgment it could be executed, but it is only an opinion. The Judicial Committee adheres to views expressed in the first judgment. They do not even qualify the opinions expressed in the first judgment—which decided that the Act of 1890, establishing separate schools, was within the powers of the legislature of Manitoba—that the goods of Dr. Barrett could be seized for payment of the public school rate, though he was a supporter of the separate schools. Now, as the Parliament of Canada cannot alter or repeal the Provincial Act of 1890, nor can Parliament enact a law practically altering the Provincial Act, is it not apparent that the subject is at least full of doubt and embarrassment. The legislature of Manitoba have declared, by a majority of 31 to 7, that the Remedial Bill was "an unjustifiable attack upon the constitutional rights of the legislature and people of Manitoba, and, indirectly, upon the constitutional rights of the legislature and people of every province of the Dominion, and a violation of the principle of provincial autonomy which is without precedent in the history in the Dominion."

In view of the hostile attitude assumed by Manitoba, it would be hopeless to enforce remedial legislation, even if it could be passed, apart from the important question of the constitutionality of such an Act.

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—And they may not do so if they see fit.

Hon. Mr. McMILLAN—Surely the hon. gentleman does not think it is permissive?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Yes, permissive. Put it in operation if you can.

Hon. Mr. McMILLAN—We tried it once and you would not consent to it.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—The Remedial Bill could not be enforced. It never was intended to be passed. It is an entirely novel proceeding in Canada. Are we going to administer a separate school system for Manitoba? Can this parliament, year by year, and from time to time, make amendments as required; it is clear we cannot. When you take action once, your power is for ever gone. There may be an appeal once, We know in so intricate a subject as the separate school system amendments are necessary from time to time, and it is utterly impossible that the central power here could exercise jurisdiction over the schools. Every hon. gentleman must recognize that, and I say, therefore, it is now no longer a part of the constitution, that it just depends on the good-will of the majority of the people and our representatives in parliament whether those rights and privileges shall be continued or restored to the minority.

Hon. Mr. BELLEROSE—Is the second judgment binding? That judgment declared that rights and privileges of the minority have been taken away and should be restored. If that is binding can it not be enforced? The Privy Council have decided there was an appeal and the minority did appeal to the Privy Council of Canada, and the Privy Council, acting in a judicial capacity, decided that the minority had rights taken away from them and that those rights should be restored. I say the present government are bound by the decision of the Privy Council.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—If the Privy Council had rendered a judgment, that might be so. A judgment means something that can be enforced. Now, the decision of the Privy Council cannot be enforced. To enforce it to-day you must get a majority of the representatives of the people to make a new law. That is practically what you ask.

Hon. Mr. BELLEROSE—Under the constitution.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—You must make a new law. The representatives of the people may say "no, we do not propose to make a new law."

Hon. Mr. BELLEROSE—The hon. gentleman knows perfectly well that the Constitutional Act says positively that the local authorities shall make that law and that in case the local authorities do not give justice the federal authorities will interfere and make a law to render justice.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Practically what the judgment of the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council amounts to is this: It is advice to the federal authorities to request the provincial authorities to restore to the minority their rights. But how can you enforce the advice? The minority cannot enforce it, and it depends entirely on the will of the majority.

Hon. Mr. BELLEROSE—No; on the federal authorities.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—You must pass an Act to do it, or you must get the provincial legislature to pass an Act.

Hon. Mr. BELLEROSE—The Canadian parliament can do it.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—One or the other. It is a delusion to talk of the second opinion as a judgment. A judgment is something you can enforce. What the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council did in the second case was to answer a series of questions submitted to them on this subject, and, strange to say, the Supreme Court of Canada, governed by the views I have just given utterance to, that the ground had been completely taken away by the first judgment, decided against the rights of the minority. They decided against the views that they had expressed a couple of years before. No one will accuse Mr. Justice Taschereau of being other than most friendly to the minority. He is a French Catholic, whose feelings and sentiments are in favour naturally of separate schools. He gave a very clear judgment on the first occasion. Read his language and it bears out what I have said.

Hon. Mr. BERNIER—That judgment has been reversed.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—The hon. gentleman talks about a judgment—there is no second judgment.

Hon. Mr. BERNIER—The opinion, I mean.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—This country is not governed by opinions. This country is governed by laws.

Hon. Mr. MASSON—You say we cannot make our opinions law?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Parliament can pass an Act in that direction. I do not think they can make that Act effective where it conflicts with the provincial and municipal authorities. The school system of the province is so intimately interwoven with the provincial and municipal system that unless it has the aid of both the municipal and provincial powers, it cannot be enforced.

Hon. Mr. MASSON—What then becomes of the law that says that in case such a thing is not done, parliament will have the right to make a remedial order? You answered me last year that there was no right to make a remedial order. If that is the case, why did Mr. Laurier promise a remedial law?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I am not here to defend any statements that have been made before this government assumed the responsibility of office. The cabinet is governed by the laws of the country. They have to take the responsibility of administering the law according to the constitution of Canada.

Hon. Mr. MASSON—You carried the election on that promise.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—The hon. gentleman says we carried the election; we did because we did not propose to the people to deceive them by a fraud. The Remedial Bill was a fraud—it never was intended to pass and it never could have been effective. I have it here under my hand and if the time were sufficient I could show hon. gentlemen by an analysis of it that it was wholly unworkable, unless you had the assistance of the provincial authorities.

Hon. Mr. BELLEROSE—If I understand the argument of the Secretary of State, he means to say that this clause of the British North America Act is just a humbug—that it is a clause which can have no effect.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I said that the clause sub-section 2, was intended to be operative while the clause preceding it was in force. The second clause refers to the rights and privileges mentioned in the preceding section. If there are no rights and privileges as set forth in the preceding clause, you cut away entirely the right of appeal, because there is nothing to appeal from.

Hon. Mr. BELLEROSE—That is under the first opinion, but under the second?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—The second, as I have explained, was an attempt to recover lost ground, to throw on the parliament of Canada the duty of removing the difficulty. They do not point out how it can be done, they say it must be left to the parliament of Canada to remove it. I should like to draw attention to Justice Taschereau's judgment on the second reference. Certainly he understood the question. Judge Taschereau, after going fully into it, says:

> With all these, and kindred considerations, we, here, in answering this consultation, are not concerned. The law has authoritatively been declared to be so, and with its consequences we have nothing to do. Dura lex, sed lex.

That is alluding to the first judgment of the Privy Council, he says this court does not make the laws, they simply interpret them according to the decisions which guide them. They had to be guided by the judgment of the Privy Council which declared that there were no rights taken from the minority.

> The Manitoba legislation is constitutional therefore it has not affected any of the rights or privileges of the minority, therefore, the minority has no appeal to the federal authority. The Manitoba legislature had the right and power to pass that legislation.

That cannot be disputed now, because the Act is in force. They can assess the minority for public schools under that Act. Try a test case. I suppose a test case can at any time be called up. Let the minority appeal against the imposition of a tax for the public schools and carry it up to the Privy Council and what will be their judgment? They would say "We have already held that the Act of 1890 is constitutional. We cannot get away from that unless we reverse our judgment." That is the position of it.

> The Manitoba legislature had the right and power to pass that legislation, therefore, any interference with that legislation with the federal authority would be ultra vires and unconstitutional.

That is Judge Taschereau's opinion.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—That was overruled by the Privy Council.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—It clearly was overruled. The Privy Council recognized that they had made a mistake in the first judgment, and they wanted to correct it, and they wanted to use the parliament of Canada as the channel through which they might correct it. I think the parliament of Canada, if it had the opportunity and the facilities for doing so, ought to correct a great wrong that has been perpetrated, but I do not consider the parliament of Canada has the machinery for doing it, and what I further believe is that it could not pass any statute that could be worked when both the provincial and municipal authorities were opposed to it.

Hon. Mr. BELLEROSE—Suppose the federal authorities were to pass a Remedial Bill and it came into operation, what would be the result? No doubt Mr. Greenway would sue those who would not submit to the local legislation of 1890. That would be appealed to England. Could not the Privy Council of England decide against their second opinion? The men who sit in the Privy Council would reverse their second opinion if the federal parliament were to take that stand.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I have the Remedial Bill in my hand and any one taking up its clauses will recognize, if they have any familiarity with the working of the municipal system as it prevails in Manitoba, which is somewhat similar to that of Ontario, that such a bill could not be enforced. There are so many questions that arise under it, in my judgment it would be absolutely worthless.

Hon. Mr. MASSON—I offer my thanks to the hon. gentleman for the information he has given us. We have interrupted him very frequently, and I recognize the kindness and patience with which he has answered us.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I quite appreciate that, probably no one appreciates it more than I do because I have taken the warmest and the deepest interest in the subject for years. It is forty years since I first entered public life. At that time there was a burning question prevailing in the province of Ontario. There was a minority demanding what they thought would be right and fair in support of denominational schools. I was selected soon after to champion that cause in Ontario. After many years; it was not accomplished in one or two, but after many years of agitation I succeeded in carrying through in the year 1863 a measure which, for the time, at all events, satisfied the minority and removed for many years a burning question that had excited the people of Ontario. Since that time improvements in the system in Ontario have from time to time kept pace with the public school system. Changes have been made in the direction of larger privileges and greater concessions, and to-day the minority in the province of Ontario are amply satisfied with the administration of the law, and peace prevails between the various denominations. Wherever they are able to establish two schools, one a Catholic and another a public school, they are established side by side, and the people get on amicably. Where they cannot support two schools they both unite and support one, and make the best of the circumstances; and although this privilege of establishing separate schools exists throughout the province, there are many parts of Ontario to-day where they do not exist for the reason that the Roman Catholics live among a tolerant population who recognize their rights and privileges and at all events the system has been carried on without any friction for many years, and I predict that the time will come in Manitoba when the same condition of things will prevail, that the people will grant, through a conciliatory spirit, these privileges and rights that the minority have been deprived of under the unfortunate judgment of the court. I believe to-day that if there was no interference with the people, more than one-half of the Catholic schools of Manitoba could be carried on as public schools with all the advantages of separate schools. I state that as a fact. I have under my hand here a public return that was brought down in 1895, to the House of Commons, in which a list of Catholic and French schools is given that had accepted the Public School Act.

Hon. Mr. DEBOUCHERVILLE—For what year?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—For the year 1894. Those schools were in sections where they (the population) were all Catholics. In one section they were Scotch Catholics, but the majority were French. They had Catholic trustees and they had Catholic teachers, and they managed the schools as they pleased. It is quite true that their teachers had to obtain a certificate from the public school board, which was quite right and proper. They had to submit to periodical inspections, which did not come very often, probably once in two or three months; I do not know how often; but certainly not in a way to interfere with the administration of the schools. I say in a case of that kind it would be infinitely better to advise peace and harmony, that those schools should be allowed to continue, and, if that were done, as years went by, what has happened in Ontario, and what has happened in Prince Edward Island, and in New Brunswick, and in Nova Scotia, would occur there, that the tolerant spirit which prevails all over this Dominion, I am happy to say, would recognize that the minority should be gratified in their wish to have denominational schools, subject, of course, to the proper inspection of the government, as they would be drawing government money, and the government would see that they rendered value in the secular teaching that they gave for the contribution they received from the revenue. I was myself a member of a government twenty years ago when I had to deal with the question. The Catholics in Prince Edward Island, before it came into confederation, enjoyed in a larger degree all the advantages that were enjoyed in Manitoba. But after that province came into confederation unfortunately one of those waves of public sentiment which occasionally sweep over a country caused by reasons we need not now analyse, swept away that system and introduced a very arbitrary public school system compelling Catholics to give up their denominational schools. An appeal was made to Ottawa just as the appeal was made from Manitoba. I was one of those who was consulted, but unfortunately the law would not allow us to help them as no provision was made for separate schools in Prince Edward Island when it came into the union. The law there was similar to the law in New Brunswick, and the Privy Council had already decided under the British North America Act that unless separate schools existed by law before the province came into confederation that they had no locus standi and consequently we had no power to interfere. The bishop of Charlottetown came up and remained here for a month, having frequent interviews with the Minister of Justice and myself, and the whole subject was then threshed out. We were powerless and we regretted it. We had simply to say, "Live it down. You have got to submit now. There will be a revulsion of feeling, and you will get what you want through the toleration of your neighbours." That time came sooner than they expected. I do not know when it came, but if I am correctly informed there is now no friction under the method in which the school system is administered in that island. The minority there are nearly equal to the majority, and it has been managed in a friendly way. In Manitoba there were no less than 36 schools reported to be running as public schools, St. Jean Baptiste, St. Leo Village, and several others, one of them is in Glengarry, another in Inglesides. I think it would have been very much better that those schools should have been allowed to continue under the name of public schools. They were getting all the benefit of separate schools, and, rather than to have broken them up and decline to accept the olive branch that was extended, it would have been better to accept the conditions thrust upon them, and in years to come, I have no doubt, a good understanding would have been arrived at. Hon. gentlemen must understand that the late government fully recognized that the Remedial Bill was a very doubtful remedy, and they sent commissioners to Winnipeg for the purpose of obtaining some agreement, and terms of settlement were offered. In offering the terms, the whole question was debated as to what was best for the minority. Was it best to have a Remedial Bill or to have a very qualified and restrictive provincial bill? I will read from one of the letters written by Mr. Dickey, Sir Donald Smith and Mr. Desjardins, dated Manitoba Hotel, Winnipeg, 31st March. In arguing that some proposal ought to be accepted with a view to peace, they say:

> In addition to this, we must premise that sufficient weight is not given by you to the undoubted legal position of the Roman Catholics.

The Manitoba committee were disposed to take the first judgment of the Privy Council as disposing of the whole thing. That was the standpoint they took—

> Under the judgment of the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council and the Remedial Order they certainly have important rights in connection with separate schools, and while the Dominion parliament may have jurisdiction to enforce some or all of those rights.

You see they do not claim the Dominion Government could enforce the rights, because they are most guarded. They say:

> And while the Dominion parliament may have jurisdiction to enforce some or all of those rights, it is universally acknowledged that this could be done with more advantage to all parties by the local legislature, and for this reason we are holding this conference.

That is the spirit which prevails through this correspondence, and they offer terms that simply differ from our terms in degree. Our terms are better in some particulars and theirs are better in other particulars. At all events it is simply a question of degree. At that time, in March, 1896, recognizing that the government of the day were doing all they could from their standpoint to obtain the settlement with Manitoba, had a settlement been arrived at by the commissioners, I have no doubt it would have been acquiesced in, and therefore one must acknowledge that probably after all a good deal of politics have entered into this unfortunate question. In closing the letter I have quoted, the commissioners say:

> We once more appeal to you in the interests of the whole population of the province, indeed of the Dominion, as well as in the interests of the minority, to reconsider the decision at which you have arrived, and to make some proposal that we could regard as affording a chance of the settlement which we so earnestly desire.

Does not that language show clearly that the Minister of Justice, who was there, and Mr. Desjardins who represented an important element, at least felt that it was very doubtful indeed whether the parliament of Canada could accomplish anything that would be of value.

Hon. Mr. MASSON—Oh, no.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I have read the language. The parliament of Canada may be able to, but they do not say positively they have the absolute power; they do not take that ground at all, and they very properly urge that there should be some disposition on the part of the committee from Manitoba to yield some of the points which they were debating.

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—Will the hon. gentleman inform the House what is the difference between the two settlements?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I can give you a short analysis of the two documents. The terms of the late government were that in towns, cities and villages it required 50 children to establish a school, and they were entitled to a separate room in the school or building and entitled to a Catholic teacher. The present agreement provides that in villages and rural districts where there is an average attendance of 25, or in towns and cities where there is an attendance of 40, they are entitled to a Catholic teacher. The proposals made by the present government go further in some particulars. Provision is made that in all schools, public or otherwise, wherever there were ten Catholic children in a rural district, or 25 in a city or town, that they should be entitled to at least one-half hour religious teaching. That clause was not in the terms offered by the late government. The French language was not an element either in the first agreement. As to the matter of text books there was no difference in the first or second. The Manitoba government agreed that text books should be made acceptable. The question of the normal school was not pressed by the first delegation or the second. The schools, under the proposal made by Mr. Dickey and Mr. Desjardins and Sir Donald Smith, were not in any sense to be separate schools and the trustees were to be public school trustees. They say:

> We do not insist upon normal schools. As to text-books, and representation on the boards, as a matter of practice and administration we find that you raise, in point of fact, no objection. We do not ask that the Roman Catholics have a separate right to elect trustees or otherwise to have any special representation on the board of trustees, being content with the protection afforded by an appeal to your Department of Education, and in this respect our proposals very materially limit what is always considered the privileges essential in connection with a separate school system.

So it will be observed that they did not insist upon the separate school system in any sense.

> The proposed schools would be controlled by trustees elected by the whole body of ratepayers under the provisions of your school law.

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—Was the proposal of the late government so limited in its operation at all?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—You mean as far as the area was concerned?

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—Yes.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—No. I should like to read an extract from the remarks of Mr. Blake, who argued the second case for the minority, who had in all his public life advocated separate schools, who supported them whenever the question of their being engrafted in the constitution came up since his advent into public life in Canada. Whenever the question came up he advocated the establishment of separate schools, because he thought from the experience he had in Ontario that it was conducive to the peace and welfare of the people. Recently in England the question was submitted to him as to whether it were better for the minority to accept what was offered in the terms prepared by the present government, or to hope for some legislation through the federal parliament that would in any way restore to them privileges they had lost. Mr. Blake after discussing the whole question, says:

> All sides seem to have practically agreed that the complete restoration by the parliament of Canada (of separate schools) was impossible in view of the overwhelming difficulties to which I have referred.

That is the difficulty that I have myself adverted to where you had provincial and municipal bodies opposed to the introduction of such a system. He goes on to say:

> As to the appropriation of public funds I believe no thinking man who knows Canada and the provinces can doubt that there would be the greatest practical difficulty in forcing on an unwilling province many other provisions of the Remedial Bill, and that in the attempt the interests of the Roman Catholic minority in Manitoba and six other provinces would be but too likely to suffer. In this state of things the limitation of power as to money and the dictates of policy alike seems to me to have pointed clearly to an adjustment whereby the province should agree to substantial concessions, and having considered the provisions of the settlement now under discussion, I think them infinitely more advantageous to the Roman Catholic minority than any Remedial Bill which it is in the power of the parliament of Canada to force upon the province of Manitoba.
> (Signed) EDWARD BLAKE.

Hon. Mr. MASSON—That is not a legal opinion. I would just as soon take your opinion as that.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—He is asked for an opinion on the subject, and the whole subject is submitted to him to ascertain what he thinks is best to be done. He was known to be a friend of the minority, who had argued their case before the Privy Council. He certainly was in the best position to know. As a constitutional lawyer he does not stand second to any man in Canada, and I think no higher authority than Mr. Blake could be quoted in support of the views I have presented to the House.

Hon. Mr. MASSON—He has given very bad opinions sometimes.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT.—No man regrets the violation of the constitution more than I do. I recognize that no greater blot or dishonour could attach to any province than will attach to Manitoba for breaking faith with the people of Canada, because it is a clear breach of faith. There was no misunderstanding and no one could deplore it more than I do. But let us take a common sense view of it. What is the use of trying to hide it? Why conceal the facts of the case? Is it not better to speak out one's views rather than to conceal them? If I saw there was any remedy by law, I would be very glad to adopt it. Nothing would give me greater pleasure. Nothing would give me greater gratification if I felt it was within the bounds of possibility itself, but it is because I regard it as impossible, that I am forced to come to the conclusion that I have this day stated to you, that I no longer regard it as part of the constitution of the country. The Privy Council have swept away every chance that the minority had of enforcing the constitution, and if a constitution cannot be enforced it cannot be said to exist. A constitution certainly cannot depend upon the accidental whim of a majority of the representatives of a country. A constitution means that every one under it is protected in his rights and privileges. It means that there are courts of law to enforce the constitution. Ours is a written constitution. It is not like the constitution of England, which is unwritten. In Canada it is nothing more than a statute, which is interpreted from day to day in courts of justice, and it is on that we have to depend. In Mr. Blake's opinion the parliament of Canada does not possess the machinery or the power, if it had the will, and I doubt very much, under all the phases that this question has assumed, whether any government that attempted to pass remedial legislation could obtain the approval of the majority of the people. This question has got beyond the control of governments. The great body of the people have been seized of this question. It is not a question whether the minority have been deprived of their rights in Manitoba, it is an abstract question, "Are separate schools best for the people or are national schools best for the people?" That is the question that the great body of the people understand. They do not take in the refinements of the judgment of the Privy Council. They do not take in all the intricacies which exist through the interpretation of the constitution of Manitoba. They look at the broad question, and say it is a question of separate schools or not—"We believe in national schools and do not propose to give separate schools." That is the feeling today, but there will be a change; as years go by the public will begin to recognize the fact that a wrong has been committed and I believe when a wrong has been perpetrated and the people of Canada have been appealed to after angry feelings have passed away, that those privileges will be restored. I believe that time alone can remove this trouble, if it were not discussed in the public press, party feelings would soon subside. How has it been in the province of Ontario? There were years when it would have been impossible to get any amendment to the separate school law, and years would come when amendments would be made to the separate school law in Ontario, supported by all parties without a dissenting voice. The legislature would unanimously vote for additional facilities and concessions for the separate schools. They were not lashed into angry prejudices; it was done quietly and calmly when there was no feeling existing, and time alone can remove the difficulty in Manitoba. We cannot force the people, because you know very well the people there do not all take the same view. The minority are, perhaps, one-seventh, and probably in point of wealth and influence, they are not one seventh of the population, and this disproportion is, year by year, increasing. So you have to judge of the question as it exists there, and take a practical commonsense view of what is best to be done under the circumstances, and the advice I give is to let time heal this breach, as I believe it will. I have pointed to what time has done in other provinces where the feeling was just as strong and bitter and determined as it is to day in Manitoba, yet after a few years the people, under happier conditions, under kindlier moods, were willing to concede to their Catholic neighbours what in conscience their Catholic neighbours believe they ought to possess in a free country. No one was injured by it. The existence of separate schools in Ontario does not impair the public school system. I think our system of schools in Ontario is as perfect as it is in any part of the world, and there is a spirit of tolerance. The majority of the Catholic children of Ontario to-day go to public schools. The very knowledge that Catholics have the right under the law to establish their own separateschools is a palladium under which they are protected, because their neighbours know if anything like intolerance is exhibited the Catholics have the right to secede and that of course is a protection In Ontario, we have large numbers of Catholics, but the number of Catholic children attending the separate schools in Manitoba in 1890, was really less than the number of Catholic children attending separate schools here in the city of Ottawa. The whole separate school population was 3,300 and the whole number attending the schools, being actually instructed, was only two thousand two hundred. I say that it is unwise, and it is not right, to advise the minority of Manitoba to refuse the offer of the olive branch that is handed out to them, not at all events to accept it in those sections where they are all Catholic, where they can have trustees and an inspector, and where nobody interferes with them and nobody disturbs them, where the priest is permitted to visit all the schools within his parish and jurisdiction. The clergy are free at any time of day to attend; they are invited to attend when the examinations are going on. They are allowed to address the children, and every latitude is extended to them. Why should we therefore say "we are entitled to certain rights and if we do not get them all we shall take none?" Is that not very foolish and unwise? It is not in harmony with the way we accomplish important matters when we are really sincere and anxious to bring them about.

Hon. Mr. MASSON—Supposing in the province of Quebec we wished to discontinue our policy with reference to the Protestant schools and to be unjust and unfair to the minority, then according to the hon. gentleman's argument there would be no relief from the federal parliament. If the argument applies to Manitoba it would also apply to Quebec. The hon. gentleman would advise the minority in Quebec, which is so well treated, to give away what they think their legal and constitutional right and trust to the generosity of the minority. Of course, they could do it in lower Canada because they know the generosity of the majority there. But you would give no relief if the Protestants were badly treated there. You would repeat your argument and say "trust to the will of the people. You cannot trust parliament." I heard a gentleman say the other day, speaking with reference to that question, "before doing that we trust our muskets."

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—The Protestants in this country are 3,000,000 people. They are the influential class. I do not think there is a possibility of any question arising which will injuriously affect denominational schools in Quebec. I think they can take care of themselves. At all events the British North America Act is so clear on that point, that I do not think the Privy Council could go wrong. Allow me to read what the law is on that:

> All powers and privileges and duties at the union by law conferred and imposed on Upper Canada, on the separate schools and school trustees of the Queen's Roman Catholic subjects, shall be and the same are hereby extended to the dissentient schools of the Queen's Protestant and Roman Catholic subjects in Quebec.

Hon. Mr. MASSON—If we do not vote the money you are in the same position as Manitoba. You cannot force the province of Manitoba to vote money any more than you could the province of Quebec. Of course, in Quebec we are disposed to extend privileges to the minority rather than to curtail them.

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—Does the hon. Secretary of State think this parliament has no power to pass a law and appropriate its own revenue to carry out and enforce that law?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Under the British North America Act the provinces are given exclusive control of education, subject only to the provisions referred to. They have exclusive control. And, except in those cases which have been provided for in Manitoba and in Quebec, parliament could not interfere.

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—They could not assist voluntary schools or anything of that kind.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I presume this parliament could vote funds if it pleased to support schools in Manitoba or in any other part of the Dominion. I do not think they could adopt any provisions affecting the educational question in a province, other than in accordance with the power given them in the British North America Act.

Hon. Mr. MASSON—You have the money in your pocket.

Hon Mr. SCOTT—This parliament is supreme. If it chooses to vote money to the majority or minority in any province it can do so.

Hon. Mr. MASSON—But the land grant which was set aside when Manitoba came in was granted to the schools of that country as they existed at that time. Denominational schools had been established in Manitoba and consequently you could take a part of the money which you have in your pocket and help the denominational schools in Manitoba.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—We are the trustees for the fund arising from the sale of the school lands. My recollection of it is this. We are bound to hand it over to the government of Manitoba. We could not hand it over to the schools. The last time I looked at it, that was the conclusion I drew.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—There is nothing to prevent the parliament of Canada from amending an Act that they passed themselves.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—As the law stands, we would have to hand the money over to the government of Manitoba to distribute it. We could not distribute it ourselves.

Hon. Mr. MASSON—But you admit the intention of the legislature at the time was to give a share of that money to Catholic schools?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Certainly.

Hon. Mr. MASSON—If that is right, parliament cannot object to it.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Unfortunately we cannot always accomplish what is right. This is a very prolific subject, and I have only partially touched upon it. I have very frankly given the House my views. I dare say they will not meet with approval, but I cannot help that. It is better that I should be frank and candid. I have had some 40 years' experience of these school questions and I think I know something about the temper of the people of this country and I have a right to say what I think is the best line of action to take.

Hon. Mr. BELLEROSE—As an adviser of the government, does the hon gentleman believe it is prudent to establish such a precedent as this? Here is a province almost in revolt against the law, and you say in order to make things easy we should sacrifice our rights and allow that province to be victorious. As an adviser of the Crown, I ask the hon. gentleman is it not a bad precedent to establish? Other provinces may, under other circumstances, do the same thing. If the parliament of Canada must abandon its position the British North America Act will not be worth much.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I think I may speak for future governments. They will never get into such a muddle as the late government permitted this question to reach—

Hon. Mr. MASSON—It should have been settled within six weeks. If such a case had arisen in Quebec, it would have been settled within six weeks.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—No doubt about that, but when a question of this kind, which so much touches the sectarian sentiments of the people, is allowed to brew and develop for six or seven long years, and is discussed in the press, and from pulpits, it is a very difficult matter to settle. You drag in vast numbers of people who would have quietly acquiesced in any reasonable line of action, but who, having once formed opinions on it, will not afterwards sacrifice these opinions until a change comes over their feelings. That was the position in which we found the question. Had we the opportunity to deal with this matter in 1890, I do not think it would have gone very far. I am quite sure it never would have got into the condition in which it is to-day.

Hon. Mr. BERNIER—The hon. gentleman has been speaking exclusively of the right of the legislature to legislate on the subject of education. The second judgment of their lordships says:

> Their right to legislate is not, indeed, properly speaking, exclusive, for in the case specified in subsection 3, the parliament of Canada is authorized to legislate on the same subject.

Hon. Mr. MILLER—I desire to make a correction in connection with the remarks of the hon. Secretary of State on the subject of the Franchise Act. In alluding to the franchise he quoted from a speech of the late Sir John Thompson. The impression the hon. gentleman desired to make on the House—and a similar attempt has been made to leave a like impression through the government press and by remarks in another place, on the country—was that Sir John Thompson intended to change the franchise in such a way as to give the power to the local legislatures to enact a franchise for the Dominion. Now, I think that that impression is entirely incorrect, that Sir John Thompson never intended to do anything of the kind, but was diametrically opposed to doing so. In the very speech from which my hon. friend read Sir John Thompson gives an emphatic contradiction to any such intention. The House is well aware that Sir John Thompson had strong views on two branches of the Franchise Act, that is with regard to the expense of compiling the lists and as to the power which should control the franchise of the Dominion. He was speaking on the question of saving expense when he argued for the wisdom of adopting the provincial franchise as a basis for the franchise of the Dominion, but what was the language of the then Minister of Justice with regard to this parliament parting with the parliamentary franchise upon which its House of Commons is elected? He said:

> We uphold the feature, which I regard as the principal feature of the Franchise Act of 1885, and that is that the revision shall take place by officers under the control of this parliament and of the federal government. The great principle which underlay the Franchise Act of 1885, was the control of this parliament over matters connected with the franchise. It was contended that control should exist in two branches; in the first place, as regards the laying down of the franchise itself, and in the second place, as regards the administration of the law by which the franchise was carried out. We have arrived, after the experience of eight or nine years, at the conclusion which I have stated, that it is not worth the effort to keep up the divergencies that exist between the two sets of franchise, the franchise as we have it now, and the franchise as it exists in the various provinces; but we adhere to the second branch of the principle of control, namely, that this House and the electors who return members to this House ought not to be under the control as regards the exercise of their franchise of the officers of any other government or legislature whatever in the country. And therefore we intend to ask the House to adhere to that principle of federal control over the federal franchise. With these remarks, I ask the first reading of the bill.

I think the impression my hon. friend would have left by his remarks on the House had I not made this correction, would be an impression that Sir John Thompson favoured the franchise which the present government has submitted to the House of Commons. No impression could be more erroneous, or unjustified by the facts and those uttered sentiments of Sir John Thompson, than the impression which my hon. friend intended to convey.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—What I endeavoured to show the House was that the speech bore out the language of the address; that it is expensive and unsatisfactory as it is now. The extract I read from Sir John Thompson's speech fully confirmed that view that he adopted the franchises of the provinces. It was of course to be under federal control.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—I think that bill was introduced by Sir John Thompson at my suggestion, and after the bill was read in parliament a second time and after that speech was made, I called the attention of the clerk, Mr. Bourinot, to the fact that it did not carry out the understanding at which we had arrived. He spoke to Sir John Thompson on the subject, and afterwards Sir John Thompson came to me and we took the bill and went into his room and I think we spent some two or three hours revising it and preparing a number of clauses for the purpose of carrying out what was his intention and what was mine on the subject. I had suggested to him that the voters' list and the franchise law of each province should be unconditionally accepted as the franchise law of the Dominion. He said he could not agree to that, his friends could not accept it, that he wished to reserve the privilege to any party of voting wherever he had a qualification. He was not willing to adopt the principle of one man one vote. In the bill as it was introduced in the first place, as hon. gentlemen will see on looking at it, there was a provision for the revision of the lists. I had suggested to him that it would be very much better and very much less costly not to revise the whole of the lists but to accept the lists of the local legislatures and to add to them each year any names such as those which I have indicated, and to that he agreed. The only point then in which there was a departure from the local list was with reference to the principle of one man one vote. He subsequently came to me and stated it was so late in the session, and some of his friends objecting to the measure, that he could not press it through that session but that he would certainly introduce it the next session as it had been amended between us in his room. I make this statement because I think the statement of the hon. member from Richmond otherwise might mislead with regard to the views which Sir John Thompson actually held on the subject. The important thing in his mind was that the expense of preparing a wholly independent list should be got rid of, and that the primary preparation should rest with the municipal bodies wherever they were entrusted with that power by the local legislature.

Hon. Mr. MILLER—I have no doubt what is stated by the hon. gentleman is perfectly correct, and it does not at all interfere with the explanation and the correction which I desire to make to the House. What my hon. friend the Secretary of State desired to convey to the House was this, that Sir John Thompson was in favour of the Franchise Bill now before the House of Commons. That is the bill which would withdraw the revision of the lists from the Dominion officers and from the control of this parliament. With regard to any details in the framing of the list, I have no doubt Sir John Thompson may have intended to make changes which may have been discussed with my hon. friend from Bothwell, but it does not touch what we are dealing with here. The great change in the scope of the present contemplated Franchise Act is the withdrawal from all control of this parliament of the Dominion franchise.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—At what period of the session did this conversation with Sir John Thompson take place? Was it after the introduction of the bill?

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Immediately after the second reading. Dr. Bourinot has a distinct recollection of the matter.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I do not doubt the statement of my hon. friend; but one thing I can assure him, the government never did consent under any circumstances to surrender control of the franchise just as laid down in the remarks of Sir John Thompson, which have been read by the hon. gentleman from Richmond.

Hon. Mr. BELLEROSE moved the adjournment of the debate.

The motion was agreed to.

The Senate then adjourned.

THE SENATE.

Ottawa, Wednesday, 7th April, 1897.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

Prayers and routine proceedings.

THE SENATE RESTAURANT.

Hon. Mr. PERLEY—Before the Orders of the Day are called, I should like to bring to the notice of this House the fact that during the last session of parliament the House of Commons passed an order prohibiting the use or sale of intoxicating liquors in the basement of their part of the building. I had occasion to-day to go down stairs, and I find that across the corridor, near the approach to the other House, there is a nice little red door, and I also noticed an opening through to the other part of this big building that never had been there before. I understand that that is all for the purpose of allowing members to come from the other House to the Senate to get refreshments of a stimulating character. I understand it is entirely contrary to the order that was made in this House last session to allow members of the other House to come here and get liquor, or to bring other visitors with them. I have seen members myself come through to the basement, and I have seen a number of other persons coming with them, contrary to the arrangements made in this House last session. Besides that, I think it is hardly fair to the other House to permit such a thing, because they are desirous of stopping the use of intoxicating liquors, and for us to encourage it by allowing a passage way to be made, which members of the Commons could use to get liquor, is really foiling the efforts they are making. It is detrimental to the character and standing of the Senate to allow such a thing. I thought I would bring this matter to the notice of the Senate so that we should see whether such a course is in accordance with our rules respecting the matter or not.

Hon. Mr. OGILVIE—If the hon. member had inquired a little further he would have found out that the rules of the House of Commons have not lasted very long. I have not been over there myself, but I understand you can go to the House of Commons side and get all you want of any kind of stimulant every day, so they do not need to come here to get refreshments.

Hon. Mr. ALMON—I think it is very un charitable for my hon. friend to refer to the passage way down stairs as a short cut to the bar. It is simply a much shorter way of getting to the Senate chamber than going round through the corridors, and it would be better not to hastily attribute bad motives.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.)—The reason for that door being open between the House of Commons restaurant and ours is this : one man is caterer for both places and he must have communication that way for his waiters to go back and forward, and if members come that way we cannot prevent them. So far as the sale of wines is concerned, I do not know anything about that. There is no bar down there. No committee has yet been appointed to look after it, and I suppose when the committee is appointed it will take up that matter and deal with it as it should be dealt with.

THE ADDRESS.

The Order of the Day having been called :

Resuming the adjourned debate on the consideration of His Excellency the Governor General's speech on the opening of the second session of the eighth parliament.

Hon. Mr. BELLEROSE said—I cannot let the address pass without expressing the views I hold on one of its paragraphs, the second, in relation to the grievances arising out of the Manitoba legislation of 1890 on education. I felt strongly on this question in 1872 and feel no less to-day when I have lived long enough to see that I was then right and that my predictions as to the trouble and the agitation that this question, not being then settled equitably, would produce for years to come.

Holding such views I remained silent during the last twenty-five years for fear I might be wrong and prejudice the case and be told later that I was responsible for this mischief which I then predicted, should it be realized. But now that this question of the rights of the Catholic minority in Manitoba seems to be a ruin—and that the present government have unjustly decided that nothing more shall be done for that minority, I may give expressions to my views without danger to this very important question which it seems is now a question of the past.

No doubt some of my expressions, some of my attacks or charges will be unpleasant to some of the members of this House. Let them allow me to ask of them to bear me with for a few moments.

Before I am done, I will put before them pretty strong evidence of the soundness of all such charges as I am about to make. Nay, I will even put before the House the very words which I made use of when I protested in 1872 against the course followed by Sir John A. Macdonald's government in the case of the New Brunswick school difficulty. If so, I surely have a right to make to-day such charges when I have kept to myself for over twenty years my reason for refusing from 1872 to 1896 to follow the leaders of the so-called Conservative party and waited until time would tell whether my utterances in 1872 on this question of education in New Brunswick were sound and proper, or whether they were illogical and wrong.

Let me add, hon. gentlemen, that on this occasion, as I have always done in all others in the forty-two sessions during which I had a seat in the councils of Canada, both before or since confederation, that I will follow the strictly independent course which I have followed in the past, that I will express my views conscientiously as experience has impressed them upon my mind, and as my Conservative principles show them to me to be, without regard to the leader of one or the other party, but with strict and due regard to the importance of this question, which to Catholics is unmistakably a religious question, and I am happy to add even to very many Protestants. Believing, as I do, that both parties are responsible for the trouble and agitation which is now our lot, I will express my views as to the amount of responsibility which, to my mind, rests on each party.

Such important remarks I would rather make in my own mother tongue, in French, but I feel that it would be more courteous towards hon. members of the Senate if I venture to make my remarks in the language of the majority of this House, in English. This I am ready to do if your honours will only allow me to use freely my notes when necessary.

The course followed by the Tory, or so-called Conservative leaders during the last six years in relation to the question of education in the North-west Territories and more particularly in the province of Manitoba, has the effect of recalling to my mind the circumstances which preceded, accompanied and following the passing in the legislature of New Brunswick of the School Act of 1871 and the troubles and agitation which that legislation caused. The cause of all those difficulties, as I established at the time in a speech which I intend to refer to later on to-day, was the violation by Sir John A. Macdonald and some of his brother delegates in England in 1867 of a solemn promise made by them, when abroad, to a high dignitary of the Church of Rome in Nova Scotia. I propose showing to-day that the difficulties we meet to-day in relation to the schools of the Western Territories and of Manitoba are the fruits of those misdeeds of some twenty-five years ago. So sure was I that such would be the consequence of the perfidious conduct of Sir John A. Macdonald and of his refusal to settle this question of the New Brunswick schools in 1872, that I said so from my seat in the Commons at the time, and so convinced was I then that such would be the case that, though remaining a staunch Conservative, I separated from Sir John and party, telling him that I would never go back to him. Twelve months after this, Sir George Cartier having died, Sir John came to me and asked me to join his government. "No," said I, "the New Brunswick school question, the amnesty promised to His Grace Archbishop Taché, and the grave charges which have been made against you and some of your colleagues (the Pacific scandal) will always be a barrier between you and me." So that I kept my word and never went back to him, neither did I go back to his successors, until Sir Mackenzie Bowell having become premier, and he having seriously taken the Manitoba school question in hand, it became my duty to give him my help. Indeed, how could I have gone back to the old chieftain when I had been discovering every day his foul-play at the time of confederation and which he later on made use of against my co-religionists and my fellow-countrymen. Since those days, I have made up my mind as to what kind of a politician the old man was. It gave me satisfaction, later on, to find that his best friends had no better opinion of him than I had myself. Who could have known him better than his colleague Sir George E. Cartier, and what was this noble baronet's opinion given before going to his last rest? In a solemn declaration made by a great friend and life supporter of Sir John A. Macdonald and Sir George E. Cartier, the Honourable Louis Archambault, who had been a member of the Commons as well as a legislative councillor in Quebec and a member of the Chauveau cabinet in that same province, says:

I declare that during the session held at Ottawa, 1872, Sir George E. Cartier, having requested me to take a seat by his side, at his place in the House, told me and he repeated to me at different times during that session that he had had a good deal to complain of with regard to the conduct of Sir John A. Macdonald towards himself and towards Lower Canada, when they were endeavouring to have the Imperial Act passed in England, establishing the confederation. . . . . On arriving in England, Sir John did not want a confederation . . . . but simply a legislative union . . . . . Sir John persisted nearly a month in this pretension—Cartier and Langevin found themselves alone for the province of Quebec, resisting such a pretension, for Galt, Cartier told me, was of the same opinion as Sir John A. Macdonald. Cartier told me that he was indignant at the conduct of the latter whom he had placed in power and who could not have maintained power since but by the favour of the legislators from Lower Canada, for the majority of the members from Upper Canada were hostile to him—This was on his part a task of sincerity and loyalty towards Lower Canada and would have caused the destruction of himself, Cartier, politically speaking, and the placing of the province of Quebec at the mercy and under the control of other provinces. . . . . In fact, Sir John wished in playing this treacherous game, to annihilate the province of Quebec. . . .

Cartier told me, seeing the bad faith of Sir John, he wrote at once to Sir N. F. Belleau, who fortunately was then Prime Minister, to inform him of the trouble and embarrassment stirred up by Sir John and told that if he received a telegram from him to that effect, he should resign immediately. . . . . At last, after a month of efforts to bend Sir George E. Cartier to his opinion, Sir John put anew the question, Shall we have a legislative union? Cartier . . . . replied by a "no" short enough to give Sir John A. Macdonald to understand that he must not push the matter further. . . . . Cartier told me that from that time he had lost all confidence in Sir John, that he had never forgiven him this act of treason and that he could never pardon him, so much so, that he had dissuaded McKenzie, then leader of the opposition from imitating George Brown who . . . . had vilified and slandered the civil and religious institutions of Lower Canada . . . . giving Mackenzie to understand that he might possibly find a means of co-operating with him. . . . . This declaration I am prepared, if need me, to confirm under oath. I may add here, the evening on the day before the departure of Cartier for England, whither he was going for his health, I saw him at his residence in Montreal—there, he told me . . . that he was ill and was going to England and that he thought he should never return to Canada. . . . . He begged me to remember what he told me during the preceding session with regard to Sir John Macdonald and added, distrust him, he does not like the French Canadians—he detests them—I give you this advice in order that you may be guided by it.

Hon. gentlemen, please do not lose sight of the important fact that all those hon. gentlemen named by Sir George E. Cartier and publicly invited, nay publicly challenged, by the Hon. Mr. Archambault to deny his statements and his charges, never did, though this declaration was published through the public press so far back as more than ten years ago. Every one of those gentlemen, Sir N. F. Belleau, Sir A. Galt, Sir H. Langevin, were there in full life. Yet not one of them contradicted those important facts nor the grave charges made. Even Sir A. Galt, who was charged with nothing less than an act of perfidy, never contradicted the charge. Sir N. F. Belleau, an old friend of Sir John Macdonald, was bound in honour to deny such grave charges against his late colleagues, if the reference made to him by Mr. Archambault was not true. Did he ever deny? No, never.

Sir Hector Langevin is still living, did he ever say a word of contradiction? Never. Will he do so now? No, he cannot. Should he do so he would have to contradict those facts under oath.

Then, hon. gentlemen, we have good evidence of this perfidious act of St. John, insisting, while in England on a legislative union, in lieu of a confederation of the provinces. Before I go on with this subject of the solemn declaration of the Hon. L. Archambault, I beg to call the attention of your honours to the fact that according to the statement of Sir George E. Cartier, the difficulties about a legislative union, were stirred up by Sir John, when he met his three colleagues of the Quebec cabinet and not in a general session of all the delegates. Indeed, it could hardly have been otherwise. Had he not to agree with his co-delegates and colleagues, before he could venture to put the question for discussion before the whole delegation?

This I call the first act of treason of Sir John since confederation. We have also in this declaration good evidence of the fact that the late chieftain entertained in his heart an unmerciful hatred both for Catholics and for French Canadians, which explains perfectly the course he followed, and which I will allude to in a moment. Who knows not how ingenious such a mean passion is when it has entered into the heart of a man desirous of attaining the end he aims at. History is full of examples showing what a curse this passion is and what mischief it has worked.

So far as I am concerned, I may say that for over twenty-five years past, it has been my conviction and I often said so, that in due course of time, now and then, when the people of Canada would have to consult the past, traces of such a grudge and aversion would be discovered in this man's political acts. Was this a rash suspicion on my part? Certainly not. When you go over the list of his misdeeds towards the minority, you find the thing to be so and you have to acknowledge the soundness of the judgment passed on his colleague by the late Sir George E. Cartier, dying and making as it were his political will as a guide to his countrymen after he had gone.

Let us put aside all the political sins which Sir John A. Macdonald may have been guilty of before confederation. Let us even refuse to advert to the act of indemnity of 1849, as well as to the burning of Ste. Anne's market, and let us confine our researches to some of his acts since the confederation of the British American provinces began to be seriously agitated in 1865.

I may state here en passant that from the passing of the resolutions which were to be the basis of the Confederation Act, up to the day when the last act came into force, Sir John A. Macdonald was in a position to be answerable for the acts which I shall presently recount. Having crossed to England he was senior member of the Canadian government on the other side of the sea and so acted as premier, as far as old Canada was concerned. Add to this that he was president or chairman of the delegates.

Having done with those incidental remarks, I will now go on with my subject.

During the discussion on the resolutions adopted by the delegates of the different provinces to be united (1865) which resolutions were to be the basis of the confederation Act, Sir John A. Macdonald had made the most solemn promises and engagements from his seat in the then Canadian assembly, and had pledged his honour, to his working for a confederation strictly in accord with the resolutions which he said, in moving them, could in no way be amended. As an evidence of this statement of mine, the House will allow me to quote his own words which I find in the official report of the Debates on confederation in 1865. He said :

> I have the honour of being charged, on behalf of the government, to submit a scheme for the confederation of all the British North America provinces. While there may be occasionally, here and there, expressions of dissent from some of the details, yet the scheme as a whole met with almost universal approval and the government has the greatest satisfaction in presenting it to this House. The government desired to say that the present scheme as a whole, and would exert all the influence they could bring to bear in the way of argument to induce the House to adopt the scheme without alteration, for the simple reason that the scheme . . . was in the nature of a treaty settled between the different colonies . . . These resolutions on their face bore evidence of compromise . . . These resolutions were in the nature of a treaty, and if not adopted in their entirety, the proceedings would have to be commenced de novo . . .

This was not the first time that Sir John had decided in favour of a confederation. So far back as 1858 the Cartier-Macdonald administration had determined to take up the question, so that it cannot be said that Sir John was this time taken by surprise ; nevertheless look at what he did.

Having reached England with Messrs. Cartier, Galt and Langevin, Sir John would have no confederation, but a legislative union. If this is not treason, I must admit that I know not what treason is.

The proof of this charge I have already put before your honours. It is a part of the solemn declaration of the Hon. Louis Archambault, which declaration has never been contradicted either by those whom it accused of having acted treacherously, such as Sir Alex. Galt and Sir John A. Macdonald, by their colleagues, Sir Narcisse A. Belleau and Sir Hector Langevin.

But this is not the only evidence which I could bring in support of my charges. Should I feel inclined to refer to his ability as far as the mounting of the Protestant horse is concerned, would I not have much more to say !

Why, if I decided to follow this up I would not have done to-day. Every day you discover something new. Only a few months ago an old colleague of his, and one of the fathers of confederation, the Hon. P. Mitchell, in a letter published in the Evening Sun, accused him of being crafty, deceitful, &c.

I now come to another charge, the third. During the same discussion on the confederation resolutions, most serious objections were made by Catholic members of the House, to some of those resolutions, but especially to the 29th, subsection 31st, relating to "Marriage and Divorce." Day after day questions were put to the government and answers given, but members were not satisfied. At last the government decided to put in writing the meaning which would be given to the word marriage in the Act. Sir Hector Langevin was charged by his colleagues with reading this declaration from his seat in the House and give all explanations desired. I quote from the official report of the Debates on confederation in 1865 the very words of Sir Hector. Sir Hector said :

> Civil rights form part of those which, by article 43, paragraph 15 of the resolutions, are guaranteed to Lower Canada. This paragraph reads thus :—
> 15. Property and civil, excepting those portions thereof assigned to the general parliament.

Well, amongst those rights are all civil laws of Lower Canada, and among these latter those which relates to marriage..... With the view of being more explicit, I now propose to read how the word marriage is proposed to be understood.

The word marriage has been placed in this draft of the proposed constitution to invest the federal parliament with the right of declaring what marriages shall be held and deemed to be valid throughout the whole extent of the confederacy, without, however, interfering in any particular with the doctrines or rites of the religious creeds to which the contracting parties may belong.

This is a question of great importance, and the French Canadian members ought to rejoice to see that their fellow countrymen in the government have not failed in their duty . . .

A few days after Sir Hector had made those statements, objections having been made, Sir Hector rose and spoke in the following way, which I also quote from the official report above mentioned :

I made the other day, in the name of the government, the declaration now alluded to . . . relative to the question of marriage. The explanation then given by me exactly accords with that which was affixed to it at the Quebec conference . . . I can assure . . . that the Imperial Act relating to it will be drawn up in accordance with the interpretation I put upon it . . . In order that I may be better understood . . . I will read the written declaration which I communicated to the House the other evening. This declaration reads thus :—

The word marriage has been placed in the draft of the proposed constitution to invest the federal parliament with the right of declaring what marriages shall be held and deemed to be valid throughout the whole extent of the confederacy, without, however, interfering in any particular with the doctrines or rites of the religious creeds to which the contracting parties may belong.

In order, added Sir Hector Langevin, that no doubt may exist respecting it (the declaration) I have given to the reporters the very text of the declaration.

No doubt, hon. gentlemen, you are satisfied that this solemn promise was honourably carried out and that the British North America Act is in accord with this promise. You are quite in error. The Imperial Act enacts the very reverse of what was so solemnly promised. In order to make good this statement of mine, let me tell you that in 1882 a bill to allow a man to marry his deceased wife's sister having come up before the Senate, I at once took exception to the federal parliament dealing with such a measure. I referred the government leader in the Senate to the promises which he and his colleagues had made when discussing the confederation resolutions.

Sir Alexander Campbell answered that such was the law. That parliament had not to deal then with promises but with the law as it stood on the statute-book. His own words, which I find in the official report of the debates for 1882, are as follows :

All that I need say is that the time at which these expressions of belief were uttered has gone by, and we are now to deal, not with what was then expected, but with what has since taken place.

During the discussion on this same bill in the House of Commons on the 22nd March, 1882, Sir Hector Langevin is reported, in the official report of the debates, to have said :

Those declarations were made in precisely the same sense as the declarations which I made in parliament fifteen years ago (1865.) We did not consider then that in placing the words "marriage" and "divorce" among the attributes of the legistion of the federal parliament, we were giving that parliament the right to determine what were to be the conditions of celebration of marriage, any more than the other conditions mentioned in the debate which took place at the time, but we were of opinion and it was the intention of the then government and parliament as well as that of the legislators and others busying themselves with the question in London, that the word "marriage" should be inserted merely to determine that a marriage contracted in a province according to its laws, should be considered as valid in other parts of the country. Such was the only qualification we gave the word marriage.

I wonder if any other word but treason can be found to characterize such a treacherous act ?

It is the second treason and third charge which I have made good against the old man, and the third charge I have proven.

I now come to another act for which Sir John A. Macdonald is answerable. This being a more vital question than the three others I have put before the House, and it being of such a nature that it may and will probably create for years to come agitation and trouble in our country, as it has done for the last twenty-five years, I propose to deal with it at more length. In fact, I propose to give a full history of it with some evidence going to justify my remarks.

To this I propose to add a short history of what was done by our predecessors at the time of the union of Upper and Lower Canada and what we have been doing since. Comparing the two epochs will enable me to draw my conclusions. To fulfil this programme I have, in the first place, to go back to the year 1864, when both political parties in old Canada were about equally strong. Neither of the two then existing parties could accept the responsibility of forming an administration. Our head men on both sides came to the conclusion that the time had come when it was necessary to consider the question of uniting together the whole of the British colonies in North America. It was then known that delegates from the provinces of Nova Scotia, New Brunswick and Prince Edward Island were to meet shortly at Charlottetown with a view to a union of those provinces. Delegates from our province were sent to meet those gentlemen at their conference. Our delegates having been graciously admitted, they proposed a confederation of all the provinces. The question was taken into consideration by the conference, and it was decided that the conference should adjourn and meet again in Quebec on the 10th of October of the same year. The day fixed having arrived, the delegates were all present and the conference took place. A confederation of the provinces was decided upon. Resolutions which were to the basis of the Union Act were adopted, and it was agreed that those resolutions should first be submitted to the legislature of each province. In 1865 this project was accordingly submitted to the provincial legislatures. When submitting the resolutions in the Canadian assembly Sir John A. Macdonald, the leader of the House, gave a full explanation of this project of confederation, insisting on the necessity of adopting the resolutions without in any way amending them, as I have already shown, by quoting his own words from the official report of the Debates on confederation in 1865.

Please, hon. gentlemen, bear in mind this important fact, to which I will have to refer your honours to shortly. The project having been adopted by the provinces of Nova Scotia, New Brunswick and old Canada, delegates from those provinces left for England to get Imperial legislation based on those resolutions. The Act was passed at the beginning of 1867. So soon as the delegates had left for England, the Archbishop of Halifax left also. His Grace, having met them there, insisted on the right the minorities in the maritime provinces had to an extension of the purport of the 6th subsection of the 43rd resolution, granting certain privileges, relative to education, to the minorities in Upper and Lower Canada. Promise was made that the purport of the resolution above mentioned, should certainly be extended to those provinces as asked for.

Relying on those solemn promises, the Archbishop left for home. The delegates set to work. A bill uniting the provinces was prepared. In conformity with the promise made to the Archbishop of Halifax, the purport of the resolution relative to education (the 43rd) was extended to the maritime provinces, and became the 93rd clause of the British North America Act. So far, things were right; but this was too honest a course for the old man to pursue. After he had extended the purport of the clause to the maritime province, he added two words (by law) to change the sense of the clause, and made the clause so extended of no use to the maritime provinces.

The 43rd resolution reads thus:

> The local legislature shall have power to make laws respecting the following subjects:
> 6. Education, saving the rights and privileges which the Protestant and Catholic minority in both Canadas may possess as to their denominational schools at the time when the union goes into operation.

In introducing this resolution in the British North America Act the sense was altogether changed in order to prevent the effect of its extension to the maritime provinces. Your honours will remark that in the resolution all rights and privileges possessed by minorities at the time of the union will be safe, while in the British North America Act only rights and privileges guaranteed by law may claim to be safe. The addition of the words "by law" in the Act renders the extension of the clause to the maritime provinces of no effect, they having at the time no such laws. The clause in the British North America Act reads thus:

> 93. In and for the provinces the legislatures may exclusively make laws in relation to education, subject and according to the following provisions:

The British North America Act came into force on the 1st of July, 1867. The whole population of the Dominion, relying on the honour of their leaders, had no reasons to even suspect that they had been deceived. So it came into the head of no man to scrutinize the deeds or acts of their delegates on the new constitution. Satisfaction existed on all sides. Both deceivers and dupes seemed to enjoy the new state of things. This explains how it was that in 1870, when the people of the North-west, having risen in arms, sent their delegates to Ottawa with their bill of rights to negotiate their entry into the confederation, their delegates had no objection to have the 93rd clause of the British North America Act, with a small addition made to it, inserted in the Act creating the new province of Manitoba. The bill of rights of the people of the North-west having been accepted at Ottawa, the delegates left for home, hurrying to give their people the good news of their successful mission. Arms were laid down. The territories were delivered to the federal authorities, and the province of Manitoba began its existence, an existence which, it seems, will not be a very peaceful one.

A few months later, in 1871, the legislature of New Brunswick passed a law, the effect of which was to abolish the privileges as to separate schools which the Catholic minority then practically enjoyed. Petitions poured in from all parts of the Dominion, asking that such an unjust law be disallowed by His Excellency the Governor General in Council. This could not be done unless the conclusion of the petitions had been recommended by the Minister of Justice to His Excellency in Council. Sir John A. Macdonald, then Minister of Justice, reported in the following words:

> The undersigned does not, on examination, find that any statute of the province exists establishing such special schools. Under the circumstances he is, therefore, of opinion that no other course is open to the Governor General than to allow the Act to go into operation.

The Act was not disallowed, but went into force.

No doubt your honours perceive where the act of perfidy rests. In England, when preparing the ninety-third clause of the British North America Act, on education, the delegates had to extend the purport of the forty-third resolution, relative to education, to the maritime provinces, as promised to His Grace Archbishop Connolly. So they did; but they added the words "by law," in order to neutralize the effect of such extension to the maritime provinces, where practically separate schools existed, and where Catholics had their fair share of the school fund, but where such schools were not recognized by any law. Later on, when Sir John had to report on the petition asking the disallowance of the Act, he could audaciously state that the Act was quite constitutional, New Brunswick having "no law" as to separate schools at the time of confederation.

Such is, hon. gentlemen, in a very few words, the history of this important question of the schools in New Brunswick. Having been foremost in the Commons in 1872 in entering my protest against the course followed in England by Sir John and his colleagues, I thought it my duty, more than that of any other member, to take occasion of the great present agitation which has been produced by somewhat similar legislation in Manitoba and in the North-west Territories to bring the whole facts before this parliament. I cannot be told, as many others could be, that I waited until Sir John was dead to attack him on this subject, since I did so at the time, face to face with him, when I nailed him to his seat as I will presently show.

During the session of 1872, the member for Victoria, N.B., Mr. Costigan, gave notice that he would move a resolution asking that the School Act of New Brunswick (1871) should be disallowed. I at once decided to take advantage of this motion to denounce Sir John and his colleagues for the course they had followed in England in the matter of the schools in New Brunswick. But before doing so I thought I was in duty bound, as a matter of courtesy to the man who had so long been my leader, to go to him and tell him what I had determined to do. So I did. I was very well received by the premier. I told him that having decided to attack him on Mr. Costigan's motion, I thought I ought to let him know. What is the matter, said he: Have you any blame to throw upon me, what is it? I replied, I have not come to you to discuss the matter, but the moment Mr. Costigan's motion will have been put before the House, I will let you know the whole of my story. I bowed to him and retired. On the same day, or possibly on the next day, the speaker having called upon Mr. Costigan to make his motion, the premier rose in his place and asked the member for Victoria (Mr. Costigan) to let his motion stand for a few days. On the 20th May, 1872, the motion was put, accompanied by a beautiful speech of Mr. Costigan. I was convinced that with the information I had given him, Sir John would speak after the member for Victoria in order to prepare his friend for my attack and destroy any effect which my words might have. I knew also what the tactics of the premier were when he had determined to follow the member then speaking. In such circumstances it was customary with him to pass near the speaker of the House whispering to him, or to send a page telling him that he desired to follow the member then speaking. The speaker would then keep his eyes in the direction of the premier so that whatever number of members should rise to take the floor, the speaker could always honestly declare that "his eyes had caught the premier first." The trick was perfect and Sir John had the floor.

I thought over the matter, trying to find some means of baffling such a trick, if it was ever resorted to. I sat quietly in my place, doing my best to let members of the House believe that I was in no way anxious to follow Mr. Costigan, but when I saw that this hon. member was uttering his last sentence, I moved up, addressing the Chair, "Mr. Speaker," said I. "Order," called out the Speaker. I did not resume my seat, so as to force the Speaker to look at me. A few moments later, I was again called to order, but stood up, and the member for Victoria having sat down, Sir John rose up. Sir George E. Cartier and Sir Hector Langevin, turning their eyes towards me, cried out, "Give way! Give way!" "No, gentlemen, I will not give way," said I; "the Speaker has to say whether his eyes caught the premier first, or whether it was my humble individuality." The Speaker rose and announced that I had the floor, and Sir John sat down.

I then read my speech, written in pretty bad English, as your honours may judge for yourselves. I hold in my hands the same manuscript which I then held and read verbatim in the Commons—there was then no official report of the Debates—so that, convinced as I was that Sir John being responsible for this mischief I am now dealing with, many others would, no doubt, be discovered in due course of time. I thought I was bound to keep this manuscript, which I could at all times swear to, and which I had written with my own hand and read from my seat in the Commons, Sir John A. Macdonald being present in his seat.

I solemnly declare from my seat in this Senate that the manuscript which I hold in my hands and which I will now read before the Senate, is the same manuscript which I wrote and which I read verbatim in the Commons on the 20th May, 1872. After having addressed myself, as it is the practice in the Commons, to Mr. Speaker, I read as follows:—

Relying on the indulgence of the House, I propose to say a few words in English in this important circumstance, though I must say I am but little conversant with that language. But I believe it my duty not to let pass this motion without putting before this House the views I hold on this important question. Not, sir, that I intend to say a single word on the constitutionality of the School Act in question, as it seems admitted on both sides that the decision of hon. Minister of Justice on that point is strictly in accordance to law. But the motion which the hon. member for Victoria has placed into your hands, aiming to quite another object the exercise of the right of veto, which the British America Act gives to the Governor General, I will confine my remarks to the consideration of this view of the question.

True it is that the hon. Minister of Justice has stated that it was the policy of his government not to use this right except in two cases.

1. If the act was constitutional and there has been excess of jurisdiction.

2. If it was injurious to the interest of the whole Dominion—and the hon. gentleman added that the school bill in question fell in neither categories. Sir, the hon. premier is quite mistaken if he thinks that such a tyrannical law is not calculated to destroy that perfect harmony which he himself had in view to maintain when he and his colleagues settled the difficulty with Nova Scotia in 1869. Certainly such an arbitrary legislation may prove the cause of disastrous results to the peace and prosperity of the whole Dominion. And, sir, I am sorry to add that hon. members occupying treasury benches, who sat in the Quebec conference and were delegates to England, are responsible for that state of things.

Had the promises made by hon. members to the four first united provinces been kept. At the seventy-two Quebec resolutions, which it was then affirmed were to be considered as a treaty. Had they been the basis of the Imperial Union Act. and had not the words (by law) been added to the forty-third resolution after the words (rights and privileges) at the passing of this Act, sir, the minority in New Brunswick would be in a quite different position, the privileges was then indulging would be safe And this House would not have to-day the painful spectacle of the government admitting that the School Act of New Brunswick of 1871 may work disadvantageously to the minority, but that at the time the union was consumated, the privileges which that minority was then enjoying were not guaranteed by law. True it is that the forty-third Quebec resolution on education applied to the provinces of Quebec and Ontario only and that its purport was extended to the maritime provinces at the request of His Grace the Archbishop of Halifax, but, sir, I state here from my place in this House that His Lordship in asking you that extension never intended to have this resolution amended contrary to the understanding I have alluded to.

Does the hon. premier, does the government believe that when this important portion of our community, the Catholics of the Dominion, when they will recall to their minds all those facts and all that has been done since confederation in favour of Nova Scotia, whose case was in direct opposition to the law, will readily submit to such an injustice, when they themselves so heartily helped the government in changing the position in which the Union Act had placed the province of Nova Scotia.

Does hon. gentlemen believe that the minority in any one of the united provinces will at any time submit to such an arbitrary legislation and to such an abuse of power. To-day, the minority suffering is a Catholic minority. To-morrow it may be a Protestant one.

Mr. Speaker, it is in the recollection of hon. members of this House that at the beginning of the present parliament, the hon. member for Hants, now the honourable Secretary of State for the provinces, with the whole but one, of the representatives of Nova Scotia were on the opposition side of this House and were daily complaining that a great injustice had been done to this province and that its rights had been disregarded in the Union Act. To such a complaint what was the answer given to them by hon. gentlemen on the treasury benches? Was it that such was the law, the written law, and that it could not be helped? That there were no remedy. No, sir, the matter was taken into consideration by the government, and it was found that though that the Union Act stated positively that "certain specified grants should be in full settlement of all future demand, etc., an additional subsidy of $1,000,000 should be granted to Nova Scotia and the government asked this House for the same. What did this House do? This House, sir, concurred in the views of the government. This House decided that though the law was against that province, equity and justice demanded better terms for that province, and it was so enacted by the great majority of hon. members that Nova Scotia, numbering but one-twelfth of the whole population of this Dominion should not complain in vain, that she should receive justice at our hands and that an annual subsidy of $100,000 during ten years should be granted to her.

On the other side, we have to-day other complaints of the most serious character. We have one-third of the population of New Brunswick who having been ill-treated by the majority of that province, have made an appeal to the government of Canada, asking for redress, which redress they did not get for reasons which I have already alluded to. We have in addition the admission of the hon. Minister of Justice "that the Act in question may operate unfavourably on the Catholics or on other religious denominations."

In such circumstances, is it not the duty of the government to use all possible and constitutional means to protect that minority, and the government failing to do so, I say, sir, that it is the duty of Catholic members of this House, representing one third of the whole population of this Dominion to make an appeal to gentlemen on both sides of this House whether Protestants or whether Catholics, in favour of their co-religionists so unjustly dealt with.

Sir, the motion of this honourable member for Victoria, is not only the voice of 300,000 individuals as in the case of Nova Scotia, but it is the voice of one-fourth of the population of this Dominion, asking for the relief of their countrymen, not in a way opposed or contrary to the law of the land, but in a way which the constitution of this country as provided for in view of exceptional cases, of cases of extraordinary nature. It is the voice of over a million of Catholics of this country praying that this School Act of New Brunswick (1871) be disallowed, that the constitutional right of veto be exercised by His Excellency as an exceptional case, as a case better than that of Nova Scotia, as a case to no one second if the subject to which it relates is considered. The Nova Scotia case being a money matter, the present case, the New Brunswick a denial of religious liberty.

Now, sir, may I ask hon. members of this House, to view this case not as a case between Catholics and Protestants, but as a case of public good, as a case of general interest to the whole population of this country, as a case of justice and equity towards minorities as in the case of Nova Scotia.

Sir, let hon. members pause before they decide. Let them reflect and say what would be their feelings if the minority in the present case were Protestants. Would they not think that in such circumstances the minority should be protected if the constitution furnished a mode to do so?

Having said so much, I have nothing more to add except to express my hope that hon. gentlemen, having helped so far in the case of Nova Scotia, a case it was then stated should not be considered a precedent but an exceptional case, the House had now to consider whether it should not have justice rendered to so great a proportion of the people of New Brunswick in a matter of far greater importance than that of Nova Scotia, and which must evidently be considered as an exceptional case for reasons which I have already detailed and which I need not repeat.

Such were the remarks, or, if hon. gentlemen will allow me to call it so, such was the speech which I made in the Commons on the 20th May, 1872, Sir John A. Macdonald being present, on Mr. Costigan's motion to have the School Act of New Brunswick of 1871 disallowed. Having concluded my charges I resumed my seat, anxious to hear what answer Sir John, who had been so quick to rise in order to speak after Mr. Costigan's speech, would make. In vain did I wait; in vain did the House wait; Sir John had lost his energy. The speech he had prepared to deliver before I had made my charges was then useless. It was a serious case to deny my accusations when I had given him good evidence that I knew something of what had passed in England. The most prudent course for him to follow was to hold his tongue, and he did so. Mr. Masson (now the hon. Senator Masson) then rose and spoke in favour of the motion, and sat down. A perfect silence prevailed in the Commons chamber. On both sides of the House members were anxious to hear what the leader had to answer to such serious charges, but in vain did they wait. Sir John had lost that eagerness which he had shown before I had spoken. A motion to adjourn the debate for two days was carried, and the House rose. The day appointed to continue the discussion having come, the debate was continued, but Sir John had not yet recovered He had not a word to answer, and to the day of his death, for over twenty years, he never made up his mind to contradict my statements. Hon. gentlemen may not forget that Bishop Connolly was then living, and it was, no doubt, owing to this fact that Sir John thought that the safest thing for him to do was to keep silent, for fear a denial of his or an attempt to explain might make things worse; and he maintained a prudent silence. This is the fourth charge and the third treacherous act which I have made good against the late chieftain.

What effect had those treacherous acts of Sir John A. Macdonald upon our people? What effect had such a course so detrimental to our national and religious interests? Very little indeed I am bound to admit—so little that I might fairly add, none, none whatever. Party spirit had blinded our most sincere politicians. Personal interest retained others, while corruption did the rest and secured such a majority to the veteran that he was kept in office for years and years, and could from time to time use his influence to destroy our institution slowly but surely. Had he done us an injury our people would have risen in arms, a storm would have followed. Sir John would laugh and call all this un feu de paille, and in order to bring us back to the flock would show himself quite magnanimous towards us for some time. A few days later the storm had abated, and the whole party had fallen into line and so on year after year up to the scaffold of Regina and from that memorable date to the death of the old man in 1891.

From this last date to the present day I heard more than I ever did before, I heard my compatriots complaining of the course followed by the different Conservative administrations which succeeded Sir John's government in connection with the rights and privileges of the French minority and of the Catholics. Is it at all extraordinary to find the two administrations of Sir John Abbott and Sir John Thompson following the path traced for them by their old leader and continuing the work of depriving us of those rights and privileges which the heroic courage of our ancestors had gained for us—indeed it is quite natural that it should be so—it is the natural consequence of our submission to the wrong of our leaders for some twenty-five years past. How different it would be if we had followed the examples given to us by our predecessors at the time of the union of Upper and Lower Canada, at a time when our position as French and Catholics was far more desperate than it is now or than it has ever been since. Long ago as it was I can not help giving here a summary of the political history of United Canada during the twelve or fifteen years which followed the arrival of Lord Durham as governor of Canada.

It is well known that Lord Durham was sent to Canada, after the troubles of 1837, as Governor General and Queen's High Commissioner to adjust the affairs of our province and report to the Imperial authorities his opinion as to what was best to be done. He had he been in Canada some few months when he came to the conclusion that the French population had to be put in a minority, in order that the English speaking majority might become supreme. In consequence, he inclined towards a confederation of all the British possessions in North America, but he felt at the same time that it was too soon yet to unite under one government such a large territory, and he recommended for the present the union of Upper and Lower Canada under one government, and gave his reasons for such recommendations. They are as follows: I quote from his report:

Report of Lord Durham, dated at London, England, on the 31st January, 1839, to Her Majesty the Queen.

A plan by which it is proposed to ensure the tranquil government of Lower Canada, must include in itself the means of putting an end to the agitation of national disputes in the legislature, by settling at once, and for ever, the national character of the province. I entertain no doubts as to the national character which must be given to Lower Canada, it must be that of the British Empire; that of the majority of the population of British America; that of the great race which must in the lapse of no long period of time, be predominant over the whole North American continent. Without effecting the change so rapidly or so roughly as to shock the feelings and trample on the welfare of the existing generation, it must henceforth be the first and steady purpose of the British government to establish an English population, with English laws and language, in the province and to trust its government to none but a decidedly English legislature.

In any plan which may be adopted for the future management of Lower Canada, the first ought to be that of making it an English province; and that, with this end in view, the ascendancy should never again be placed in any hands but those of an English population.

Lower Canada must be governed now, as it must be hereafter, by an English population, and thus the policy, which the necessities of the moment force on us, is in accordance with that suggested by a comprehensive view of the future and permanent improvement of the province.

If the population of Upper Canada is rightly estimated, at 400,000, the English inhabitants of Lower Canada at 150,000, and the French at 450,000, the union of the two provinces would not only give a clear English majority, but one which would be increased every year, by the influence of English emigration, and I have little doubt that the French, when once placed, by the legitimate course of events and the working of natural causes, in a minority, would abandon their vain hopes of nationality.

The union of the two provinces would secure to Upper Canada the present great objects of its desires. All disputes as to the division or amount of the revenue would cease. The surplus revenue of Lower Canada would supply the deficiency of that part of the upper province; and the province thus placed beyond the possibility of locally jobbing the surplus revenue, which it cannot reduce, would, I think, give as much, by the arrangement as the province, which would thus find a means of paying the interest of its debt.

No time should be lost in proposing to parliament a bill restoring the union of the Canadas under one legislature, and reconstituting them as one province.

Those recommendations were accepted in England, and an "Act to unite Upper and Lower Canada" was presented to parliament during the session of 1839. This Act provided for an equal number of representatives from each of the two sections, 42 for Upper Canada and 42 for Lower Canada, though the population of Lower Canada was 650,000 souls, while that of Upper Canada was only 450,000. The upper province had an enormous debt of nearly $6,000,000. The Union Act provided that it should become a debt of both sections, that is to say, a debt of the new province. The Act also provided that English alone should be the official language of the united provinces.

The Union Act was not adopted during that session, but was postponed in order to consult the Canadian people. The Honourable Poulett Thompson was appointed Governor General of Canada, he being considered the best man for the occasion having himself prepared, with the help of Sir James Stuart, Chief Justice of Lower Canada, the bill for the union of Upper and Lower Canada. He took the reins of power on the 23rd October, 1839, and soon succeeded (an English author says) in influencing the governing bodies, the special council of Lower Canada, and the legislative council and assembly of Upper Canada to concur in the plan of the union. I beg to remark that the people of Upper Canada were consulted through their lawful representatives in parliament assembled, while in Lower Canada the constitution having been suspended since the troubles of 1837-38, no legislature existed at the time except a special council composed of some twenty gentlemen chosen by the governor himself to help in the administration of the affairs of the province.

In 1840 the Union Act was adopted by an almost unanimous vote in the Commons, but serious opposition was made to it in the House of Lords.

The Union Act was sanctioned by Her Majesty the Queen, on the 23rd July, 1840.

Hon. gentlemen, I will not take up the time of this honourable House, in giving you my opinion of that Act of union, and of the course followed for its adoption. My opinion would evidently be considered an interested one. I prefer giving you the opinions expressed at the time of the passage of this law in the English parliament by gentlemen who, or at least a majority of whom, knew Canada or the Canadians only by what they had heard or read of them—and consequently who must be considered as having appreciated the Union Act as a matter of principle, as a question of right or wrong, of justice or injustice.

Mr. O'CONNELL—The avowed intention is nothing less than the annihilation of the French Canadians as a party, who have already been treated shamefully by the British government. They have been described as the most excellent and amicable people in existence, and yet they have been visited as if they were the most ferocious and wicked. Now, after all they have suffered, it is proposed to legislate for them in the most flippant and harsh manner. It is proposed that they shall be sacrificed to what is called the British party, and what is that but an outrage. . . . .

Sir, against such a precipitate mode of dealing with a grave question; against the infliction of injustice as the remedy of injustice, I enter my most solemn protest. There can be no real union of the Canadas unless the French Canadians are put upon a footing of exact equality with the other inhabitants. If we do not make the proposed union in that way, there are examples to show that the passing of a mere act of union is no corrective to long-existing evils.

Mr. O'CONNELL— . . . I have seen, with regret in the otherwise admirable report of Lord Durham, a recommendation amounting to this that political privileges of the French Canadians shall be annihilated. What have they done to deserve this? They are distinguished by almost every humane virtue. They are mild, benevolent, charitable and exemplary in their conduct towards their families, and yet they are to be annihilated as a people. . . . . The way to deal with Canada is to deal with her generously, to ameliorate her institutions, and above all, to act upon the principle recommended by Lord Durham, of making the government depend on the confidence of the people. Conciliation is doubtful, perhaps, even in that way, but it certainly is not to be accomplished by annihilating the French Canadians as particular people who are only accused of being defective in point of education. That defect can be remedied by making the means of instruction more attainable and aiding the diffusion of knowledge. In other respects, they do not suffer by a comparison with the British servants.

Mr. HUME—I do object to any principle not founded upon the basis of population, and which was proposed with a view of giving the British population a preponderating influence. I cannot but regret to see a people so amiable as the French Canadians treated with so little justice or consideration . . . I, therefore, feel bound to protest against the plan of the noble lord, which I consider as nothing more than a continuance of the same system which has already proved so disasterous.

Mr. C. BULLER—The vacillation, not of this government particularly, but of the British government for the last ten years has brought the Canadians into their present state. . . .

Mr. LEADER— . . . If the proposed union were effected the French Canadians would be completely crushed. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Bulmer) says they must adopt the language, laws, institutions and religion to, I suppose, of the governing few . . . It may be right, perhaps, according to the view of the hon. and learned gentleman, that the few English Protestants of Lower Canada should give laws to the many French Roman Catholics there, but then upon that principle, all that the British legislature has been doing in favour of the Irish Roman Catholics must be erroneous. It would be absurd to argue that the Roman Catholics of Ireland, forming the majority there, should be in possession of rights as British subjects, and that the Roman Catholics of Canada, also forming the majority, should be denied those rights only because they are in Canada. . . . It would be the greatest tyrany to make them English in language, laws and religion against their own feelings and wishes. The hon. and learned member for Liskeard seems to think that there is nothing offensive to the French Canadian in Lord Burham's report. . . . Why, one of the chapters of that report is headed "Acknowledged inferiority of the French Canadians." . . .

Such arguments as these may be borne out by the practice of former ages, and of barbarous nations; but I maintain that it would be a lasting disgrace to the British nation, if by any legislative acts for depriving the French Canadians of the due exercise of their electorial rights, we gave additional power to the strong to crush and oppress the weak. I trust that in any future discussion on the question of the union, the French Canadians will have the powerful advocacy of the hon. and learned member for Dublin against that proposal, or against any plan which, by uniting the two provinces would sweep their language and their religion from that part of the world. The bill now before the House is, truly, a bill to enlarge the powers given under the coercion bill passed last session to an already despotic authority . . . I cannot but complain of the manner in which I have been treated by the government. I presented two petitions, one from Mr. Lafontaine and another individual, and I was told by the government, that as the whole question would be discussed, the proper time to bring forward the complaints contained in those petitions would be when that discussion took place. No such opportunity has, however, been afforded me, the government are afraid of meeting the question, and here the end of the session.

Sir C. GREY—When it is considered that the Roman Catholic religion was the religion of Canada before that territory was acquired by England, and that Canada then possessed abundance of Catholic institutions, I cannot think of trying to rob that religion in Canada of its just influence.

The hon. member for Liskeard has stated, without reserve, that one of his first steps would be, to compel the French to renounce their language—not their religion—(of course, such an intention could not be for a moment entertained)—but to compel them to adopt the English language in all public proceedings, and to renounce their present tenure of land and to submit to the breaking up and alteration of their whole social system. . . . When the hon. member for Liskeard propounded his plan he should have embodied in it an ample compensation to the Roman Catholic clergy, for the tithes to be abolished by the abolition of those tenures of land. We are bound to preserve there ecclesiastical endowments. We could not, if we would, we ought not, if we could abolish them. There are many other considerations which would operate as powerful obstacles to the proposed union, amongst others, the difference in the productiveness of the revenue of the two provinces, that of Lower Canada exhibiting a surplus of £100,000 per annum; that of Upper Canada, no surplus at all . . .

The first thing that I would urge on the attention of the House, is the absolute necessity of doing nothing contrary to the principles of liberty and of the British constitution. I would next urge the necessity of holding the principles of property sacred in Canada.

Sir ROBERT PEEL—We have two races speaking different languages, of totally different customs, living under different laws, and it will be necessary to ascertain what security would be given to the interests of the minority, when their union shall have been effected. I know that some gentlemen have implicit confidence in the wisdom and judgment of a majority. I have not implicit confidence in a majority, and immediately after the suppression of an insurrection, I have still less.

I must be well assured, in considering any measure for uniting the two provinces and introducing British laws for the maintenance of British supremacy, that the measure will not have the effect of exposing to injustice those who now form the majority of one province, but who would be the minority in case of a union. Who can deny that we are bound to fulfil the treaty under which the Canadas were acquired. The religion of the people of Lower Canada is Roman Catholic, whose securities we must continue.

Mr. C. BULLER—I cannot understand how any one can cast his mind over the recent history of our colonies, or advert to their deplorable state in everything that respects their government, without coming to the conclusion that, in our whole colonial system, there is some radical vice requiring vigorous and searching correction. The system of governing colonies from home has had a long trial in the North American provinces, and going on this principle of combining an irresponsible executive with a representative legislature, now as it is practically worked in all of them. I say in all, for in truth, the evils to which we have now to apply a remedy are not to be found in the Canadas alone. In every British colony in North America there is the same collision between the assembly and the executive. I merely refer to it (the working of the present system) in order to remind the House that the contest of races in Lower Canada is but one of the many causes operating to produce the present calamitous state of our provinces.

Mr. HUME—I would ask if he (the under secretary for the colonies, Mr. Labouchere) does not know that for many years, the special council of Lower Canada has laughed to scorn the whole Canadian people? If we are to have a despotism in Canada, I say again, let us have a pure and single despotism, with sole and undivided responsibility.

The Earl OF GOSFORD—Much do I regret that Her Majesty's ministers have not brought forward some system of legislation of a more permanent character than the one now on your lordship's table. The delay, pregnent as it is with evil, has, however, in my eyes, one redeeming quality, it has led to the suspension of the proposition for uniting the two Canadas; and I trust that it will, ultimately lead to the abandonment of that project. . . In my opinion, such a union, if carried, would produce results far different from those anticipated by its advocates. The French Canadians, who are estimated at more than two-thirds of the population of Lower Canada, and nearly one-half of that of both the Canadas, are, to a man, opposed to it. Do your lordships expect that any measure, having to encounter such a maze of hostility, can work well, or even fall short of alienating the affections of the French Canadians from the government of this country. I must here beg to reach to your lordship's recollection what occurred in 1822, when a similar proposal was unsuccessfully urged, and gave rise to the greatest excitement in the colony, and I believe that, in the exertions then made by Mr. Papineau to give effect to the general opposition; may be traced the origin of that person's subsequent popularity and influence over a large portion of his countrymen, an influence that, however, patriotically it might at first have been used, was, I regret to add, ultimately exerted in the furtherance of designs decidedly at variance with the real interests of his country. I am aware, my lord, of the existence of great alarm in Canada, which indeed does not surprise me. Arising, as it must do, so far as the French Canadians are concerned—from an apprehension of a violent ultra Tory British party, whose object is, to monopolize as much as possible of the power and patronage of the colony, and to assume an ascendency over all who do not participate in their arbitrary views. The whole conduct of this party, and the violence of the language made use of by many of those who belong to it, are quite enough to exasperate the French population, and produce among them the alarm I have alluded to. Every means that ingenuity could devise has been resorted to, in order to mislead this country (England) as to the real state of affairs in Canada. The French Canadians (I can speak from experience) are, as a body, a most loyal, amiable people. A few, and but a few, have been, unfortunately, misled by designing persons—but when I left the province, in the end of February, 1822, everything was in a state of perfect tranquility. I say, my lord, let this country discountenance, equally, the violent on each side—persue a steady and impartial course, extending equal rights and equal laws to all, without distinction of race, and you will find but little difficulty in establishing in the colony the most economical, the most lasting, and the most satisfactory of governments—that which is founded on the affections of a people.

Earl FITZWILLIAM—The whole history of the Colonial Office shows that we have treated Canada with injustice.

Mr. HUME—Opposition to the wishes of the people led to the state of things which brought about the recent resolution. It appears to me that a great injustice is about to be perpetrated against the French population of Lower Canada. The bill violates the principle of equal justice promised. It is intended to swamp the French population, by not giving them a fair share in the representation. In the next place the revenues really are put under the control of the home government, and it was a sine quâ non with the people of Canada that the revenues should be placed under the absolute control of their representatives.

The Earl of GOSFORD. . . I consider the present measure for re-uniting the Canadas as a most dangerous experiment, and one of a most arbitrary and unjust character. If, as I believe, those who support it do so on the ground that the French population of the lower provinces are in an organized state of resistance to British rule, and British connection, they never acted upon more erroneous, more fallacious grounds. For my own part I do not believe that in any of our colonies, Her Majesty has for the extent of their numbers, a more loyal, better disposed people, or people who, from inclination, as well as interest, are more desirous to keep on terms of friendship and alliance with England. I am aware of the misrepresentations which have been so industriously and insidiously, circulated through this country of an opposite tendency, but I do assert, not without fear of contradiction, but without the smallest fear of any proof being adduced in support of such contradiction that what I have asserted is founded on fact, capable of the fullest confirmation. Much has been extravagently put forth relative to what is vulgarily called the late rebellion and revolution.

These are fine sounding and useful terms for those who have an interest to advance.

There is, and has been, a certain class of British people, to whom every liberal independent people must be hostile, whose acts and conduct have been marked by a domineering spirit towards the whole of the people of French origin and whose aims has been to arrogate to themselves the entire rules and patronage of the country. To this party may be attributed mainly the troubles and animosities which occurred.

Under the conviction of the correctness of what I have stated, I cannot but consider the proposed union of the provinces as a most unjust and tyrannical act, depriving the lower province of its constitution for the acts of a few evil-minded men, and handing them over to be swamped by those who have shown such bitter hatred without cause toward them—for swamped they must be by this bill. Indeed the legality of such a proceeding may be disputed.

I assert that the French population are anxious and eager for British protection as well as British alliance, and that for the great majority of the two Canadas are opposed to the union. My lords, I oppose this measure upon two grounds,—first, because I think it is founded on misrepresentation; and secondly, independent of that, because I think it most unjust.

Lord ELLENBOROUGH—My lords, I entirely agree in every word that has fallen from the noble duke (Earl of Gosford) who had just sat down. It is impossible not to say that the general feeling of the House of Commons is favourable to this measure—we have likewise the approval of this measure by the majority of the assembly of Upper Canada. But then they were told and they saw that the result of this measure would be to make them the Lords of Lower Canada—and they were also told that one of its conditions was that the surplus of the revenues of Lower Canada should go to the payment of their debt—it is not, then, surprising that men, not being practical statesmen, should have been led away by such delusive expectations as these. There may have existed in their minds, as I regret to say there exist but too strongly in the minds of the people of this country—the remains of those feelings of hostility towards the people of Lower Canada which are the growth and consequence of the events of the last few years. I am opposed to this measure on the ground stated by the noble duke (Earl of Gosford). I am opposed to it, because I think it the most imprudent, the most fraudulent and the most unjust measure that has ever been proposed to parliament, and at the same time the most erroneous; seeing that not one of the objects it professes will practically be effected by it. It has, for its objects to exchange for the Governor General and representative of the Queen the government of the majority of the people of Upper Canada and to plunge into eternal disfranchisement a whole people on account of an offense committed two years ago, by a portion of that people. This I consider grossly unjust.

What can be more unjust than to give the people of Upper Canada the power of governing the people of Lower Canada.

The Earl of HARDWICKE—Now, my opinion is, that no union between these two provinces can be founded on justice. I care not for what may be urged as likely to be the effect of an Act of parliament, but I say that, if an Act is to pass to unite the two provinces of Upper and Lower Canada, it can never carry with it the force of justice.

The Earl of WICKLOW—The government are professing to give the French Canadians liberal institutions, while they are really binding them hand and foot. The fact of this bill uniting people who are so different in point of taste, habits, customs, religion and general feelings, at once proves its inaptitude for any good, and in my opinion, it can only have the effect of exerting animosities, ill-will, quarrels, and finally rebellion.

The Earl of GOSFORD—I oppose the measure because it is founded on injustice to the French, whose loyalty I will ever maintain.

Lord ELLENBOROUGH—The object of the bill evidently is to deprive, as far as it is possible to da so by a legislative enactment, the people of Lower Canada, the people who are of French origin, of any share at all in the government of the united provinces. To all that principle I entirely object. The ministers of the Crown have certainly succeeded in getting up a majority in the legislature for the people of British origin, but I bid them beware, lest that majority obtained, as it has been by violence and by legislature and electoral fraud should turn into a majority hostile to the connection with this couuntry, owing, in Lower Canada, to the manner in which we have treated them, and in Upper Canada to causes which it is not necessary for me to specify. It is for these reasons that I hope Her Majesty's ministers will reconsider the state of the representation with the view of doing away with at the least that additional cause of discontent.

Hon. Mr. ALMON—What year was that?

Hon. Mr. BELLEROSE—The hon. gentleman is slow to apprehend. If he will not think I cannot think for him. Such were the views expressed, and the judgment given by some of the best minded men in the English parliament, when this very grave question of the union of Upper and Lower Canada was submitted to them. Those quotations from speeches made by gentlemen who knew very little if anything of Lower Canada and of French Canadians, show that their words were dictated to them by a sense of what was right and what was wrong. This establishes better than any thing else which I might bring in support of my charges, the truthfulness of the complaints so often made at the time by the French population, that they were illtreated to such an extent, that they even were refused their fair share of participation in the affairs of their province, by all new comers who, whenever their right foot had touched Canadian soil, became convinced that the new country was theirs and they alone had a right to have public affairs administered their own way.

Having now, so far, made out my case, I have next to show how the Union Act worked and prove to your honours, the truthfulness of every word which fell from the lips of the non-unionists in the British parliament. While doing this, it will give me occasion also to convince this House of the desperate position made for the French Canadians by the new constitution, as also of the hard struggle, which, under the leadership of their patriotic leaders they had to undertake, with no other hope of success than that always given by the justice of a cause.

To do this, and in order to establish those facts, it will be necessary for me to give here a short resumé of the political history of United Canada, during the first thirteen years and a half of the union, that is to say, from the passing of the Union Act (1840), by the British parliament to the days of Sir Allan McNab, who had given the best evidence of his determination and that of his party to put down all that was French in Canada and make the Canadas an English colony. At last having become convinced that the affairs of Canada could not be properly managed unless the French Canadians had their fair share in their administration, Sir Allan McNab went to the leader of the Lafontaine party (the Hon. N. M. Morin), in 1854, and asked him to form the McNab-Morin administration—I will show later the conditions of this coalition which have now existed for 43 years, let me add, en passant, far too long. The Union Act having received the sanction of the Queen (1840), the Governor General, Sir Poulett Thompson, then Lord Sydenham, set to work under the new constitution, to unite the two Canadas and grant responsible government to the new province. On the 5th February, 1841, His Excellency issued his proclamation, making it known that the Union Act would come into force on the 10th of the same month. He then proceeded to organize his cabinet, which he composed of nine members, all of English speaking nationality, and a majority of whom were taken from the upper province. They were for Upper Canada, Messieurs Draper, Sullivan, Dunn, Harrison and Baldwin; and for Lower Canada, Messieurs Ogden Daly, Day and Killaly. Your honours, no doubt, have remarked that not one single member of the great Liberal party or Lafontaine party of Lower Canada had been called in. This was too apparent an admission of the truthfulness of the charges made against the governor and his advisers as to their determination to crush the French minority not to be detected at once by His Excellency. He tried to disguise the evil by sending for Mr. Lafontaine and asking him to enter the cabinet. Mr. Lafontaine positively refused, giving as reasons of his refusal the fact that he considered the cabinet mostly composed of the worst enemies of his province, and that his influence would be null and of no advantage to his friends in an administration wherein the great majority held views quite adverse to his on the important question of carrying on responsible government on sound constitutional principles.

Was not this state of things a hopeless position for both Catholics and French Canadians? No doubt it was, but the leaders of the party thought they ought not to submit, and that their duty was to fight to the bitter end for the rights and privileges of their compatriots and their co-religionists. They thought, no doubt, that, having become aware of the intention of the English population in Lower Canada and of the help given to them to crush the French Canadians, they had an advantage which the Acadians had not when banished from Acadia and dispersed throughout the world, and consequently that they ought to fight for better or for worse. So they did. They called their friends together and prepared an election platform. Mr. Lafontaine issued an address to his electors, assuring them of his determination to fight constitutionally until justice should be done. The elections took place; the results were of the worst character. Mr. Lafontaine was defeated. The governor had identified himself with it. As evidence of this charge I will quote a few lines which I find in a letter published by Mr. Lafontaine himself in one of the newspapers of the time—Le Canadien of the 2nd April, 1841:

> A patent fact which no man can deny, and which has been the results of Lord Sydenham's conduct, is the fact that he has identified himself in the struggle, in our district wherein he went so far as to change the polling places, and in the countries wherein he did so the struggle was accompanied with violence, effusion of blood and murder.

The 1st session of the 1st parliament was convened at Kingston for the 14th of June.

The government were sufficiently strong by the number of their supporters. Before parliament met, Mr. Baldwin resigned and at the beginning of the session he gave reasons for having done so. He said, he could not agree with his colleagues on some of the most important questions; the result of the elections had shown him that the administration had not the confidence of the people. This he had made the governor aware of and had advised His Excellency to remedy the evil by some changes in the cabinet. His advice not having been favourably entertained, he resigned. A certain number of reformers from Upper Canada also expressed their opinions and declared they would always be ready to help the Lower Canadians in their struggle to have their rights and privileges acknowledged. A good many of them were dissatisfied with the refusal of the governor and his advisers, the Draper-Ogden cabinet, to admit their constitutional responsibility to the people whose confidence they had to have. The government were losing ground every day while the opposition were increasing in strength. On one occasion, Mr. Baldwin, speaking on the question of giving responsible government a true interpretation, said:

> Should it happen that I would become convinced that the people of Upper Canada were disposed to unjustly treat Lower Canada, I would be ashamed to be their representative.

Lord Sydenham fell sick, parliament was prorogued on the 18th September, 1841, and the governor died the next day (19th), and was replaced by Sir Charles Bagot, who showed himself at the very beginning to be quite moderate and naturally conciliatory. He repeatedly said that with him there would be no distinction as to races or political parties, and that he would do his utmost to make the whole people happy. Sir Charles Bagot called Parliament together for the 8th September, 1842. The Draper administration had become very weak, Lord Sydenham, who had given it life, being dead. The government were left to their own resources, which amounted to very little. They thought of increasing their strength and made overtures to Messrs. Lafontaine, Morin and Girouard, but without success. A great reaction was taking place in favour of the Liberals of Lower Canada. The Reformers in Upper Canada seemed to incline towards giving justice to the Lower Canadians. Mr. Lafontaine, who had been defeated in his county in Lower Canada by the efforts of Lord Sydenham, as I said before, was elected in Upper Canada in the county of Hastings, whose people elected him to show their sympathies towards the French Canadians. The new governor, convinced that his advisers did not possess the confidence of the French Canadians, called on Mr. Lafontaine to enter the cabinet, allowing two other seats for those of his friends he might desire to join with him. Mr. Lafontaine refused, determined as he was to fight for justice, with Mr. Baldwin and the reformers of Upper Canada, who had already done much service for Lower Canada.

On the address the premier (Draper) gave some explantions as to the offer made to Mr. Lafontaine, and added:

> I am free to admit that when I met for the first time in this House, during last session, the first since the union the honourable members from Lower Canada. I had great prejudices against them. But since I have the advantage of coming in contact with them such prejudices have disappeared.

Mr. Baldwin followed, impeaching the government. Mr. Lafontaine then rose and began speaking in French when Mr. Dunn interrupted him asking him to speak in English. Mr. Lafontaine replied in the following words:

> The hon. member who has interrupted me is one of those who have been repeatedly given to us as a friend of the French population. Would it be that he has forgotten that I belong to that race so unjustly treated by the Union Act. He wishes me to make this my first speech in this House in a language which is not my maternal language. Let me tell him, let me tell the whole House whose fair judgment in the matter I readily rely upon, that even if English was as familiar to me as French is, I would not make this first speech of mine in any other language than that of my French Canadian compatriots, had I for doing so, but one reason, that of protesting against the monstrous injustice contained in the Union Act that of proscribing the language of one-half of the population of Canada. This I owe to those I represent. This I owe to my ownself. The hon. Attorney General (Mr. Draper) admits that peace cannot be restored without the active co-operation of the French Canadians. Let me add it is a necessity. No peace without it. We are ready to grant it, but only under such conditions and terms that will keep our honour and our dignity.
> The idea of the framer of the Union Act was to crush down the French population in this provinc. Let me tell him he was mistaken. Such an end he will not reach. There are already sympathies between Upper and Lower Canadians. This will increase day after day. I repeat without the active co-operation of my compatriots the government of this province cannot be carried up in such a way as to re-establish peace and such confidence as is necessary to carry on the government of the country.

We have been placed in such an exceptional position by the Union Act and in such a minority as to the distribution of public patronage, that it may happen that we will be crushed down, but if so it will be only after we have shown that we deserve the respect of our enemies.

In the state of slavery, bondage and subjection under which Lord Sydenham has tried to keep French Canadians, I had, as a Canadian, a duty to perform, that of keeping high the dignity and the honour of my compatriots, to which our enemies have been forced already to give under hommage. This duty, Mr. Speaker, I will fulfil to the end and never fail. . . .

He then attacked the government and gave praise to the new governor, who he said he was sure would deal fairly with the French population. The situation seemed hopeless for the government. The governor called again on Mr. Lafontaine to help them. Mr. Lafontaine gave his conditions, they were accepted and he became premier with Mr. Baldwin. Some of the members of the late administration joined the new, submitting their opinions to those of their new leaders, who were determined to carry on the government on true responsible principles. The House, by an almost unanimous vote, passed an address to the governor, congratulating him on his conduct, and thanking him for having called the French Canadians to administer the affairs of the country. A certain number of members who had supported the former administration, fell in line with their supporters. The whole of the Reformers of Upper Canada gave the government their support. The Tories, headed by Sir Allan McNab and Mr. Moffat, composed the opposition, which was very weak. The session was quite short, not much more that one month. Then began the cry of "French domination" against the government, in which there were only two French-speaking ministers out of eleven, and the assembly, composed of eighty members, had only twenty French members. Such had been the success of Sir Charles Bagot's administration when he was taken very ill, and had to resign in March, 1843. He died on the 19th May, following. Sir Charles Bagot left to posterity a most honourable name and an unblemished reputation. He was one of those few governors who, by their noble conduct and their very great impartiality, have conquered the love of Her Majesty's subjects in Canada, and have been much regretted by the French minority of the then province of Canada.

Sir Charles Metcalfe succeeded Sir Charles Bagot. He arrived in Kingston in March, 1843, and called parliament to meet in September following. The Lafontaine government was strong. The session was prorogued on the 9th December. A difficulty arose between the governor and his advisers. The governor claimed the right to appoint public officers without consulting his ministers. The Lafontaine-Baldwin government entertaining quite opposite views, resigned. When the case came before the House, a majority of twenty-two voters approved of the course followed by the administration. During nine months the governor had only three advisers, but at last in September, 1844, he succeeded in forming a cabinet, the Viger-Draper, and dissolved parliament. Sir Charles Metcalfe, who had already violated the constitution when appointing public officers without consulting his advisers, thought that he might go a step further and that his influence might help the government in the struggle. So he did, and the effect was that, though the Liberals carried the elections in Lower Canada, their allies, the Reformers, were beaten in Upper Canada. Parliament met on the 28th November, 1844. Attorney General Smith moved that Sir Allan McNab be elected Speaker, Colonel Prince moved that Mr. Morin be the Speaker. Sir Allan was elected by a majority of three. On the address the government majority was six. During this session two most important addresses were unanimously voted to Her Majesty, one asking for a general amnesty for all offences committed in 1837 and 1838, and the other for the repeal of the clause of the Union Act prohibiting the use of the French language. Those two unanimous votes of both parties in the House, especially the last mentioned, which was to restore the use of the French language, is conclusive evidence that the bold stand taken since the union by the French speaking population, particularly by their leader, Mr. Lafontaine, had not injured their case, but on the contrary had helped them to receive justice at the hands of all good thinking men, and so it does always. No man is indifferent to pluck, courage, and determination. Your honours, no doubt, still recollect the good words spoken on this occasion by some of the English speaking gentlemen. Amongst others Messieurs Moffatt from Lower Canada and Dunlop from Upper Canada, admitted their wrong. They withdrew all harsh words they had used on previous occasions when speaking on this question of the French language. They were ready to do all in their power to have French made official as English was. But England was slow in rendering justice. It took three years to restore the French language. It was only in 1848 that French was used in the proceedings of parliament.

Parliament was prorogued on the 29th March, 1845. Sir Charles Metcalfe was made a peer of the United Kingdom at the beginning of this year, and left Canada in November. Lord Cathcart became administrator, and was appointed governor on the 16th March, 1846. On the 20th March he called parliament together. The government was supported on the address by a majority of 16. A long discussion arose in relation to a correspondence which had taken place between the premier, Mr. Draper, and Mr. Caron, one of the Liberal party from Lower Canada, in order to strengthen the government. The government, though not very strong at the beginning of the session, was rather weak at the end. So much so that Mr. Draper had on a few occasions to assemble his supporters and tell them that he would certainly resign if not better supported. Parliament was prorogued on 9th June, 1846.

Lord Elgin was appointed governor on the 16th September, 1846, and took office on the 30th January, 1847. He soon discovered that the cabinet as constituted could not command the confidence of the people at large. He was displeased with the fact that the French element was hardly represented in the cabinet. He called the attention of his advisers to those facts, and following this advice he called on Mr. Morin and Mr. Caron to join the administration. Mr. Morin refused at once, giving, amongst other reasons, the fact that he and the Liberals of Lower Canada had allies, the Reformers from Upper Canada, whom they could not abandon without good cause. Mr. Caron thought it was better, in the interests of his party, to continue the negotiations. So he did, but without success. Both Messrs. Morin and Caron were approved by their party. Some of the members of the cabinet resigned their office. Those were Messrs. Smith and Taschereau. A few weeks after, in May, 1847, Mr. Draper left the premiership to Mr. Henry Sherwood. Mr. John A. Macdonald, known for some years past as Sir John A. Macdonald, joined the cabinet as Receiver General. The Sherwood administration was composed of five members from Upper Canada and four from Lower Canada, of whom only one was of French origin. The governor had in no way meddled with the reconstruction of the cabinet. On the 2nd day of June, 1847, Lord Elgin opened the session. Mr. Baldwin, seconded by Mr. Lafontaine, moved an amendment to the address, congratulating Lord Elgin on his alliance with Lord Durham's family, and acknowledging that the granting of responsible government to Canada by England was due to Lord Durham, and the House of Assembly were confident that His Excellency would carry on the affairs of the province on sound constitutional principles.

Messieurs Alywin, Chauveau, Malcolm Cameron, Merritt, Watts, &c., spoke in favour of the amendment, while Messieurs Cayley, Gowan, John Hilyard Cameron, and John A. Macdonald, spoke against it. The address was carried by a vote of two majority, id est, 39 against 37.

Mr. Neilson in the Legislative Council, moved a resolution criticizing the government for their hostility to the French Canadians. The motion was lost by the vote of Speaker McGill.

After parliament had been prorogued, Lord Elgin, alarmed at the state of affairs came to the conclusion that it was his duty to find for his advisers men who would command the confidence of the people at large. He consequently dissolved parliament on the 6th of December, 1847. The Liberals carried the elections in Lower Canada and so did their allies, the Reformers, in Upper Canada. Parliament met on the 25th February, 1848. Mr. Morin was elected Speaker, against Sir Allan McNab, by a vote of 54 against 19. On the address an amendment was moved by Mr. Baldwin, and was carried by a vote of 54 against 20. The Sherwood administration handed in their resignation.

Lord Elgin called on Messieurs Lafontaine and Baldwin. A new cabinet was organized under the leadership of Mr. Lafontaine. It was composed of twelve Liberal members. The six members from Lower Canada were: Messieurs Lafontaine, Leslie, Caron, Taché, Alywin and Viger. The six for Upper Canada were Messieurs Baldwin, Sullivan, Hincks, Price, Cameron (Malcolm) and Blake. Mr. Lafontaine and Mr. Baldwin were then receiving their reward for the patriotic course they had followed in and since 1843, when, though they had then a majority of some 25 votes, had resigned rather than submit to the unconstitutional pretensions of Lord Metcalfe as to his right to make official appointments without taking advice from his ministers. Their determination to have the government of the country conducted on sound, constitutional principles of responsible government was then a success. It took a somewhat long time to lay the foundation of sound constitutional principles, but when you come to consider the disheartening difficulties in the way, you cannot help admiring the pluck shown by those two great men (Messrs. Lafontaine and Baldwin) during seven years in their struggle against both the governors for the time being (Sir Charles Bagot excepted) and their Tory advisers. They had determined at the very beginning of the union that, responsible government having been granted to Canada, it should be carried out on sound constitutional principles, whatever difficulties they might meet with. They had the courage to follow up their patriotic determination, and they had now the pleasure and satisfaction of reaping the fruits of their good work. Since that day (11th March, 1848) responsible government has been carried out in Canada on sound constitutional principles. The Lafontaine-Baldwin government was strong, having a majority of about three to one. Having to be re-elected, the session was short, parliament was prorogued in March, after the subsidies for the year had been voted. During the recess some changes took place in the cabinet —Mr. Drummond replaced Mr. Aylwin, who was appointed to a judgeship, and Mr. Merritt took Mr. Sullivan's place. On the 18th of January, 1849, parliament met. Lord Elgin was so generous and so courteous as to himself deliver his address in French. In one of the paragraphs of the address His Excellency made known the fact that the French language had been re-established, and in another that the Imperial authorities had granted a general amnesty to all Canadians implicated in the political troubles in 1837 and 1838. The address was voted by a majority of 48 to 18. Most important measures were presented and passed during this session. Amongst those was presented one which caused great trouble, "An Act granting an indemnity to those who had unjustly suffered in Lower Canada during the troubles in 1837-38." A similar indemnity had been paid in Upper Canada. The Tory opposition became mad. Most violent speeches were made against the project in and outside parliament by Sir Allan McNab, Messrs. Gugy, John A. Macdonald, Molson, and others. Sir Allan went so far in a speech outside the House as to advise the crowd not to submit, but to make a show of their strength at the governor's home. He himself would be ready, at a moment's notice, to come down with twenty thousand men to help the loyalists of Montreal. At the grand meeting on the Champ de Mars Mr. Lafontaine's effigy was burnt. Tory newspapers in Montreal and elsewhere were no less violent. Some in Montreal were still more violent. Before they would submit to be ruled in Lower Canada by French Canadians the province would be inundated with blood.

The next day Mr. Blake, from his seat in the assembly, showed the unpatriotic course followed by the Tories. They were acting in direct opposition to the course they had followed when dealing with the same question in Upper Canada.

Mr. Lafontaine took the floor also, and established that his administration was following in the footsteps of the previous Tory government.

Mr. John A. Macdonald spoke with violence against the indemnity.

The measure was carried by a vote of 48 to 23. Twenty-four members speaking the English language voted for the measure. In the Legisla ive Council it passed with a majority of six (20 to 14). The governor drove to the parliament buildings on the 25th April in order to give his sanction to this Act of Indemnity and to some others. When His Excellency gave his assent to the Act of Indemnity the Tories, who were in numbers in the galleries, made a terrible noise, vociferating words of despair. They then went out, insulted the representative of the Queen, throwing stones and rotten eggs at His Excellency and his staff. In the evening a grand meeting took place on the Champ de Mars, Mr. Moffatt presided. Violent speeches were made, after which the crowd went to the parliament buildings where the House was sitting. They began throwing stones into the hall, forcing members to abandon it, then entering the hall they proceeded to break up everything they could find, and took possession of the mace. One of the leaders of this mob, taking the Speaker's chair, dissolved parliament in the name of the people, and immediately was heard the cry of "fire! fire!" The whole buildings were destroyed, as was also the library. The loss was estimated at $500,000. A part of the properties of Mr. Lafontaine were burnt; so also were the residences of Messrs. Hincks, Holmes, Nelson and Wilson. Two Montreal English newspapers wrote most violent articles. "This was a war of races," they said, "one or the other must perish. Let us exterminate all that bears a French name." The next day the House met in Bonsecours market hall. The first thing the House did was to adopt an address to His Excellency protesting their loyalty to the Queen, giving expression to their indignation at what had occurred, acknowledging the impartiality shown by His Excellency, and offering their help for the maintenance of good order. This address was carried by a vote of 36 to 16. Lord Elgin came to the government house to receive the addresses of both Houses. He was assailed and insulted. He even was struck, so were also some of the members of parliament. The course followed by the governor was approved of by the vast majority of the people in both sections of the united provinces.

Parliament was prorogued on the 30th May, 1849, by Major General Rowan, His Excellency Lord Elgin believing this course better in the interest of peace in Montreal. Having not succeeded in their efforts, the Tories in Montreal and elsewhere in Upper Canada organized an association which they called "The British League of North America;" but its existence was short. It soon disappeared, and was followed by an organization in favour of annexation to the United States. The session of 1850 was opened on the 14th May at Toronto. A long debate took place on the address. Sir Allan McNab, leader of the Tories, was particularly violent, so much so that it disgusted some of his friends. Amongst others, Colonel Gugy left the Tory ranks, and gave his support to the Lafontaine-Baldwin administration, stating that he was induced to do so by the course followed by his political friends. The burning of the temporary parliament buildings, he said, had destroyed all hopes of the Tories ever gaining power. They could not, he added, even form an administration. The address was carried by a vote of 44 to 14. In the legislative council the address was almost unanimously voted. In the assembly the leaders of the Tory opposition were Sir Allan McNab, Messrs. J. A. Macdonald, Sherwood and Cayley, with Mr. Louis Joseph Papineau as leader of some few extreme Liberals from Lower Canada, and Mr. Malcolm Cameron, who, with some discontented extreme Liberals from Upper Canada, had joined the opposition, which then was composed of three classes of politicians: some belonging to the oligarchy, others who had signed the annexation manifesto, and others who were in favour of independence. Sir Allan McNabb tried to bring about a new discussion of the Indemnity Act, which had caused so much trouble during the previous session. He introduced a bill amending the Act; but it was not discussed, and was supported by only 19 members. Sir Allan McNab had now good evidence that the violence used by himself and his friends had ruined the Tory party. From that day he showed himself quite another man; he became moderate. Parliament was opened at Toronto on the 14th May, and was closed on the 10th August, 1850.

The last session of the third parliament was opened at Toronto on the 20th May, 1851. The address was unanimously carried on the same day.

Most important measures were discussed during the session, some of which were passed while others were postponed. Efforts were made by Mr. W. L. McKenzie to abolish the Chancery Court in Upper Canada. Mr. Baldwin opposed and succeeded, but as he was on this question in a minority in his province, he felt humiliated and handed in his resignation as attorney general for Upper Canada. Both sides of the House expressed their deep regret at this determination. Parliament was prorogued on the 31st August, 1851. A few months later, in October, 1851, Mr. Lafontaine also resigned as attorney general for Lower Canada and the premier, Mr. Hincks was called upon by Lord Elgin to form a new cabinet. He accepted and took in Mr. Morin as leader of Lower Canada. This government was a continuation of the Lafontaine-Baldwin administration, having the same principles and the same policy. Parliament was dissolved on the 6th November, 1851, its four years' existence having reached its end. Elections took place. The government was sustained by a strong majority, particularly in Lower Canada. The 1st session of the 4th parliament was opened on the 19th August, 1852, at Quebec. Mr. John Sandfield Macdonald was elected Speaker by a vote of 55 to 23. The address was voted by a large majority. The session was adjourned on the 10th November, 1852, to the 14th February, 1853. A measure was introduced by the government to regulate the representation, giving as before an equal number of members to Upper and Lower Canada. It was adopted in spite of Sir Allan McNab and Messieurs John A. Macdonald, George .Brown, Badgley, Robinson, who desired to have representation by population. The session was closed on the 15th June, 1853. During recess some changes took place in the cabinet. The burning of the parliament building in Quebec prevented the calling of parliament before the 13th June, 1854. The address was short, the government intending to have a short session in order to pass an Act for the representation of the people, to vote the estimates and dissolve parliament in order to carry out the new Act of representation. This was not satisfactory to the House, and an amendment to the address in that direction was moved by Mr. Cauchon and was carried by a vote of 42 to 29. In this instance the majority hostile to the government was composed of all classes of politicians, Liberals, Reformers, Tories, Clear-grits. After this vote Lord Elgin had a choice of but two courses to follow, either change his advisers or dissolve parliament. This last course he followed on the ground that it was impossible for the opposition to form a cabinet, there being too great a difference of opinion amongst the leaders of the Opposition. He prorogued parliament on the 20th June and dissolved parliament. A general election took place in the months of July and August. The Liberals carried Lower Canada but the Tories were in a majority in Upper Canada. The first session of the 5th parliament was opened on the 5th September, 1854. The Hincks-Morin administration were defeated on their motion to elect Mr. Cartier Speaker of the House. They were in a minority of three. Mr. Sicotte was elected Speaker on motion of Mr. A. A. Dorion. The government resigned. Lord Elgin called on Sir Allan McNab to form a cabinet.

The Tory party was too weak to form a government, so that Sir Allan had to make a choice amongst the different parties which existed in the House—Clear-grits, Liberal-Democrats, Liberals from Lower Canada who had opposed the Hincks-Morin cabinet on certain questions, and the old Liberal party from Lower Canada who had always followed Messrs. Lafontaine and Morin. Sir Allan called on Mr. Morin to help him and take the leadership for Lower Canada. Mr. Morin refused, giving as his reason the fact that Sir Allan had quite opposite views on certain important questions which he (Mr. Morin) had at heart, such as the settlement of the clergy reserves and the seigniorial tenure which Mr. Morin said, Sir Allan had always opposed. Well, answered Sir Allan, should we make the measures government measures, will you accept? Certainly, replied Mr. Morin, if you come to us, we can't refuse your help. You have my word added Sir Allan. A new cabinet was organized composed of Sir Allan McNab, Messrs. J. A. Macdonald, Cayley, Spencer, J. Ross and Henry Smith for Upper Canada, and of Messrs. A. M. Morin, Drummond, Chauveau, E. P. Taché, Chabot and Dunbar Ross for Lower Canada. The new government was sworn in on the 11th September, 1854. Some of the Tory friends of Sir Allan were greatly dissatisfied, and refused to follow him on account of his change of front on the most important questions. But the government stood strong and were supported by two-thirds of the House. The attorney general for Upper Canada (Mr. John A. Macdonald) who has always opposed the settlement of the clergy reserves, presented a measure to settle the clergy reserves. It was passed. Mr. Drummond, attorney general for Lower Canada, moved an Act for the abolition of the seigniorial tenure. It was adopted by the legislature by a majority of 39 votes in the assembley. Lord Elgin was replaced by Sir Edmund Head on the 19th December, 1854. Mr. Morin who had accepted the leadership of Lower Canada for the sole object of helping Sir Allan McNab in the organizing of a new cabinet and the passing of those measures which he and his followers had at heart, having now accomplished his mission, resigned his seat in the cabinet and was replaced by Sir E. P. Taché, another of the leaders of the Liberal party, or Lafontaine's party, in Lower Canada.

I beg to remind your honours en passant that this coalition of 1854, between Lafontaine's party headed by the Hon. A. M. Morin, and the Tories headed by Sir Allan McNab, under the party name of Conservatives, has been maintained to this day while the Papineau party, now the Laurier party, have always been found opposing it. It is then quite wrong for the Liberals to assert, as they often do, that they and no others, are the successors of Mr. Lafontaine and party, when history tells us that Mr. Lafontaine himself was quite disgusted, even in his time, with the advanced or extreme Liberals or the Democrats, such as Messrs. A. A. Dorion, Dessaules, Laberge, Pepin, Doutre, J. B. E. Dorion, Blanchet, Laflamme, Labrèche-Viger, &c., lead by Mr. Papineau at first, later on by Mr. Viger, still later on by Mr. Dorion and at last by Mr. Laurier the present premier of Canada. Who knows not that Mr. Papineau had hardly been twenty-four months in Canada, after his return from exile, when he was elected for the county of St. Maurice in 1847, and gave his views on the political affairs of the times; and what were those views? Were they not in direct opposition to those of Mr. Lafontaine?

Mr. Lafontaine, had accepted the union of Upper and Lower Canada, declaring at the same time that he would fight to the bitter end for the rights of his countrymen under the new regime—Mr. Papineau comes in seven years after, when Mr. Lafontaine, had so far succeeded and declares that he will not accept the union, but fight for its repeal. Mr. Lafontaine was in favour of equal representation for both Upper and Lower Canada; Mr. Papineau will have nothing but representation by population. Mr. Lafontaine opposes annexation to the United States; Mr. Papineau, favours annexation and so on. In 1848, Mr. Lafontaine having become premier, first adviser of the Crown, Mr. Papineau opposes his government, the government of the man to whom he owed his return from the land of banishment to his native land, in 1845. Every day Mr. Papineau has an attack to make on Mr. Lafontaine and his government, and his criticism is never at an end. Indeed Mr. Papineau's charges are of the worst character, he becomes aggressive. His language is an outrage. At last Mr. Lafontaine rises in his place and in a beautiful speech, shows the absurdity of Mr. Papineau's utterances. I quote from his speech the following sentences:

> If in 1842 we had adopted the system followed by some hon. members, would we have been in a position to solicit and press as we have done, for the return of our exiled compatriots? If we had not accepted a place in the administration in 1842, would we have been in a position to obtain for the hon. member in particular permission to return to his country, permission, for the obtaining of which, I did not hesitate, in order to overcome the reiterated refusal of Sir Charles Metcalfe, to offer my resignation of largely remunerative employment which I then possessed? Behold now the man who, obedient to his old habit of pouring out insult and outrage, dares, in the presence of these facts, to accuse me and also my colleagues, of venality, of love of sordid employment and of servility in the presence of power.

I leave your honours to appreciate those facts and pronounce on the absurdity, if not on the dishonesty, of the Liberal party, asserting as they often do, now and then, that they and no others are the political descendants of Mr. Lafontaine, whom they claim to have been their leader, when he never was after Mr. Papineau had entered the Canadian legislature in 1847. Having now done with those incidental remarks I will go on with my subject.

After Recess.

Hon. Mr. BELLEROSE resumed his speech. He said:—

I have now gone over, in as few words as it was possible for me to use, the political history of United Canada as far as the question I am dealing with is concerned, during the fifteen years which followed the arrival of Lord Durham in 1839, as Governor-General and High Commissioner, to inquire into the affairs of Canada and report to Her Majesty, the Queen, what was best to be done. Short as this summary is, it sufficiently shows that this period was one of trouble and agitation, that the French population had to struggle all the time in order to obtain their fair share in the administration of the affairs of the united provinces, as also to prevent their annihilation as a distinct people and preserve their autonomy. They had to force the advisers of the chief executive officer of the country, nay, the governor general himself, to administer the affairs of the country on sound constitutional principles, and lastly, that a part of the English speaking population were quite adverse to the French Canadians, is conclusively established by their determination to put into practice the recommendations contained in Lord Durham's report, which was to change the national character of Lower Canada, make it English, and to trust its government to none but a decidedly English legislature.

This summary of our history at the time of the union also shows that after fifteen years of the most arduous struggle, the French Canadians conquered their fair share of influence. The French language had been restored to them, and responsible government was carried on on sound constitutional principles, and their worst enemies had been forced to come to them and seek their alliance.

We, their successors, have followed another course, a course quite the reverse of theirs. Our predecessors fought to the bitter end—they refused all alliances which did not give them full justice. We, on the contrary, have submitted to all kinds of injustices and yet with those who were responsible for such wrongs we kept faith.

For some years past, say twenty-five, we have been discovering all kinds of tricks which we were the dupes of. Did those discoveries open our eyes? No, it did not. Such vexatious conduct on the part of our allies towards us did not change our mind. We continued giving them our support—we kept them in power—we stood by them in the most critical moments--we gave them strength which they used to attain slowly but surely the end they aimed at. We also see the results of the course we have followed. Indeed we see them every day : our rights and privileges are discussed in the most hostile manner, some are gone never to return, others are menaced, and still it seems as if we did not realize the danger of our position.

Indeed, we did more than that. Did we not even directly help them in their efforts to annihilate everything which was French? Yes, indeed, we did many times, I mean to say a majority of us of French origin did so. Let me quote one of those instances. If I open the journals of both the Senate and of the Commons for the year 1876, I find that a bill intituled: "An Act respecting the North-west Territories" was submitted to both Houses by the Mackenzie government. In this bill is found a clause making French a constitutional language in the Territories. This bill was passed, sanctioned by the Crown, and became the law of the land until 1891, when the so-called Conservative government of Sir John Thompson asked this parliament of Canada to do away with French in the Western Territories. I opposed such an unpatriotic measure, but a majority in both Houses, even of French-speaking members, gave their assent to such bad legislation.

In the Commons the vote stood in favour of the bill: even amongst the French members, the majority gave it their support.

In the Senate the vote stood, for this measure depriving the French population of their acquired rights, 39, amongst whom were six French senators. Against this bad measure only five voted, all French senators. Their names are: Armand, Bellerose, Girard, Chaffers, and Tassé.

In connection with this vote, I cannot help alluding to certain circumstances which accompanied it.

This last mentioned bill was introduced in the Senate in September, 1891. I immediately gave notice of a motion to amend the 18th clause of this measure, doing away with the French language in the North-west Territories, in order that French might continue to be a constitutional language there. I also advised my hon. friend for Repentigny (Hon Mr. Armand), to prepare for moving that the 18th clause be striken out in amendment to my amendment, and by so doing prevent any other senator from moving to my amendment an amendment of a general character which, if carried, would prevent a square vote on the question of the use of French in the territories.

During the interval between the day when this measure was introduced and the day when those two motions could be made, some of my colleagues came to me expressing their approval of the course I had followed and assuring me that they would vote with me. One of those senators in particular renewed at different times his approval and his determination to support the use of French in the territories.

During this same interval, much work was done outside the Senate room, in the lobbies by both sides in politics in order to have a unanimous vote. For the first time, I may say, during my long political career, I was approached and was solicited to let my motion drop and follow the leaders on both sides of politics, who, it was then evident to me, would give their votes in favour of the measure, and let the bill pass. This I positively refused to do, adding that even if I should be left alone with my seconder I would have a vote taken and recorded.

At last the day came when I was at liberty to submit the question to the House, and ask a vote, and I did so.

A discussion took place, during which one of our then colleagues, a strong supporter of the government, no more a senator but holding a high position under the Crown, left the Senate room. A few minutes after another strong supporter of the government also went out but immediately re-entered the Senate by another door and went to another senator, this last one the very senator who had repeatedly expressed his approval of my motion and given me his word that he would vote for it. A few words were exchanged between them and both went out. A short time after the three entered the Senate one after the other and resumed their seats.

The discussion having come to an end, the vote was taken with the result which I have made known to this House a moment ago. The French language had lost a vote. The senator who had particularly approved of my motion and promised to give it his support and who had been called outside this hall as I have mentioned before, having made a complete turn about and voted in favour of the measure depriving the French minority in the North-west Territories of their constitutional right to use the French language as before.

Having put those facts before the House, I leave it to your honours to appreciate them each for himself and I will now go on with my subject.

Such has been the course that we, the French minority, have followed during this last quarter of a century. We have submitted to all kinds of injustice. We have shown that we have lost that vigour which did so much for us in Mr. Lafontaine's times. Our people are discouraged at the change they observe in their leaders. Patriotism and the maxim salus populi was the motto of our ancestors. This is now all changed ; the watch-word of the politicians of our day is save the party.

Would to God, my compatriots had separated, as I did myself in 1872, from Sir John A. Macdonald and his party, when he refused as leader of the then government to disallow the School Act of New Brunswick of 1871, in violation of the policy of his government, which was "to disallow all local constitutional legislation which could be injurious to the interest of the whole Dominion."

Then was the time to separate from him, when he had given the best evidence of his opposition to separate schools and of his determination to do his utmost to prevent the spread of the system throughout the Dominion. But no, the old man was left alone. He was left to have things his own way and the consequences we have seen, agitation, trouble, dissatisfaction ever since. A quarter of a century has since passed away and yet we have the same difficulties to meet to-day. Will they ever have an end? God knows. For my part, my conviction is that not having settled them on sound principles of justice at the beginning, they will last as long as confederation lasts.

This example of what our predecessors of French origin did at the time of the union of Upper and Lower Canada in 1841, when they had determined to force their enemies to grant them justice, is not an exceptional one. It is the tactics of all those who desire to attain the end they aim at, of all those who are determined to succeed in their efforts. Was it not by following the same tactics that the province of Nova Scotia, with a small population of not much more than 300,000 souls, got redress when believing as her people did that they were not fairly treated in the Confederation Act, they elected as their representatives in the federal parliament, out of twenty members, nineteen to oppose the government until they had received that justice which they considered was due to them. But such tactics as those which we, the French Canadians and the Catholics have followed for some twenty-five years past, lead to ruin and perdition.

Are there not amongst the English speaking population of our days hundreds of men holding sufficiently large views to induce them to come and help a minority whose rights are trampled upon and whose convictions are ignored? Are there not in our days, as there were found in the past, large minded men amongst our friends of other origin and creed who would be ashamed to use such a force as that given by numbers to deprive a minority of their legitimate privileges?

Surely there are. Believing the contrary would be judging that our fellowmen of English, Scotch and Irish origin have greatly degenerated. But such is not the case. There are still amongst them such men as there were in the past. They would have been found in proper time. Had our people begun the fight in 1872, as Lafontaine did in 1841 they would have found Baldwins, Aylwin Blakes of our days who would have come to their help in their struggle for equal justice and religions liberty.

I wonder what reasons those who oppose them can give to justify the course they follow—Protestants as much as Catholics are astray when they do so. Protestants believe in the right of private judgment. Unless they are ready to be taxed with bigotry and be known as fanatics, how can they refuse to recognize, be they Catholic or Protestant, and advocate the principle and follow it up by asking that they may not be forced to send their children to and pay for schools which their conscience tells them are wrong. No doubt Sir Oliver Mowat was actuated by this principle, as well as by the constitutional law of this country, when he opposed as premier of Ontario in 1890 all legislation which interfered with separate schools in his province. The bold stand taken on this important question of education by the Protestant leader of Ontario in the House of Assembly of that province, composed almost exclusively of Protestant members, and on the eve of a general election, regardless of what would be the consequences as far as he and his colleagues in the cabinet were concerned, conclusively shows devotion to the constitution and to the principle of religious liberty which as Protestants they advocate for themselves. Sir Oliver Mowat did what he considered right and equitable and the House supported him, and the vast majority of the people of the province approved the course he had followed, and sent a good majority of his friends to support his government. Had my co-religionists refused to submit in 1872 to the treacherous act perpetrated in England at the passing of the "British North America Act" in the case of the New Brunswick school case—they would have found new allies amongst the English speaking population, they would have been helped by large minded men who would have been happy to grant to their fellow men the enjoyment of those privileges which they had a right to.

My compatriots and co-religionists did not do so. Their representatives in the cabinet had not the courage to resign their office. For one reason or another they preferred retaining their portfolios. What have been the consequences? We have been ill-treated to such an extent, that at last, after twenty-five years of humiliation, we had, last year, volente or nolente, to go to war. The leaders of Quebec had to do, what ought to have been done a quarter of a century ago, they had to resign their position in the administration, under circumstances a great deal less favourable than they were in 1872, when a crisis, such as that we are now in, would and could not have put in such great danger the great question of separate schools. At this last mentioned time (1872) either Sir John Macdonald would have submitted to the demands of his colleagues from Quebec, or he would not. If he had, the question of separate schools would have been settled for all times to come, a great precedent would have been established, which would have deprived all bigots and fanatics, of all hopes of gaining their points at any later period. If he had not submitted, then the Catholics of the Dominion, helped as they have been in the past by good and honest Protestants, would have turned Sir John out of power and given place, not to Catholic Mr. Laurier, but to Protestant Mr. Alexander Mackenzie. Having become premier, Mr. Mackenzie, no doubt, would have done what he did under other similar circumstances. Did he not, and did not his government submit to both Houses of parliament in 1876, a bill intituled, "An Act respecting the North-west Territories," in which there was a clause granting to the French minority in those Territories the free use of the French language, and was it not the Tory government of Sir John Thompson, as I said before, who asked both the Commons and the Senate, in 1891, to strike out this precious clause? A majority in both Houses, not only of English speaking members, but, sad to say, a majority of even French speaking members gave their support to such bad work, and from that day, English alone is the constitutional language of those Territories.

From all the facts I have pointed out, and from the different circumstances which

I have shown have preceded, accompanied or followed them, I can come to no other logical conclusion than the following, id est:

1st. That Sir John A. Macdonald and his friends, the so-called Conservative party, are responsible for the dangerous position which has been made to Catholics, in connection with their rights as to separate schools, and others which I do not intend to deal with to-day.

2nd. That Catholics, and particularly French Canadians, have been brought into the dangerous position they find themselves in, by their own fault, by their too great devotion to the old chieftain and their unlimited confidence in him.

No doubt, objections which I have often heard of, will be made to-day. Such as the following—

The vetoing of the Manitoba legislation, on education, in 1890, could not take place, as the constitutionalty of this Act had been referred to the Governor in Council, by a petition of the Catholic minority in Manitoba, before the expiration of the twelve months given by the British North America Act, to the Federal Government to examine the Act, disallows it or allow it to come into force; also because the Blake resolution adopted by a unanimous vote of parliament prevented the exercise of the vetoing power.

Now those objections on the constitutionality of this law, which might have some force if my proposition was that Sir John A. Macdonald was bound to advise the Governor in Council to disallow the Act on account of its being unconstitutional, have no value in this case, when my proposition is, as I said before, that this Act ought to have been disallowed because it was injurious to the interest of the whole Dominion—and so fell under the second rule laid down by Sir John A. Macdonald and his government after "the British North America Act" had come into force in 1867. Such was my argument in 1872. when I made an attack on Sir John, reminding him that he himself had given as the policy of his government to never use the power of disallowing provincial legislation except in two cases:

"1st. If the Act was unconstitutional and there has been excess of jurisdiction.

"2nd. If it was injurious to the interests of the whole Dominion."

If such is the case, and I have sufficiently shown that it is so, I would like to know, what other authority was bound to decide except the Canadian government? And if, as was the case, the government's decision was wrong, was not the Canadian parliament in duty bound to censure such a course? Such was my opinion in 1872; such also is my opinion now. Who knows not the great difficulties those questions of religion always bring after them, when they are not settled at once, when they are left in suspense. Where is the country where they have not worked mischief when not disposed of at once and in the most equitable manner, and in such a way as to convince all parties that the decision arrived at was of the most conclusive character. But even if my proposition had been that this Act of 1890 ought to have been disallowed, because it was unconstitutional, the objections I have mentioned cannot be considered as having any great weight since they could in no way deprive the Governor in Council of the exercise of their discretion.

But while I unhesitatingly charge the so-called Conservative party, now on the opposition side of this House, with such a dereliction of duty during the time they held the reins of power up to the happy day when Sir Mackenzie Bowell took the leadership of the party, I am happy to state that I am bound to acknowledge the great change which has taken place since then. Why, hon. gentlemen, the Manitoba school question was not only fought for with great energy under Sir Mackenzie Bowell's administration at first, and later under that of Sir Charles Tupper, but it must be said, in justice to to those hon. gentlemen, that the Remedial Act having the approval in the Commons of a majority of 18 members would now have received the sanction of the Crown, making it the law of the land, if the then opposition, headed by Mr. Laurier, relying on the fact that four or five weeks more would bring parliament to a close, as its five years of existence would have passed away—if the opposition, I say, had not set to work, wasting the time, in order that parliament might expire before the Remedial Bill could be finally adopted.

I cannot help congratulating those two premiers and their friends for their good work, by which they have, as much as it was possible for them to do, redeemed the errors of their party in the past. Those two premiers did not succeed; that is quite true, but it was none of their fault. They did all that they humanly could do. They got the measure sanctioned and adopted at its second reading, in spite of Mr. Laurier and of his party (of whom a majority of Catholic Liberals voted with him) by a majority of eighteen in the Commons. It was after this great success that, in order to prevent the final passing of the Remedial Act, and prevent it from becoming law, the opposition made use of the side issue which I have already mentioned, and which certainly worked quite disadvantageously to the Catholics of Manitoba, but in no way lessened the merits of both premiers, Sir Mackenzie Bowell and Sir Charles Tupper. Honour to those two gentlemen. Mr. Laurier and his friends are alone responsible for the great injustice done, with no excuse whatsoever except it be party triumph or ignorance.

I must say I have always found the course followed by the opposition a most irrational one, one of the most ridiculous character under the circumstances, one best calculated to shorten the time they might rule over this country. Indeed I never think over this conduct of theirs without at the same time thinking of the maxim, Quem vult perdere Deus prius dementat, as if I was impressed with the fact that they were blind stricken. For my part, it has always been my conviction that Mr. Laurier and the other Catholic leaders of the Liberal party knew not what responsibility this school question left on their shoulders. During last session I said so from my seat in this House. I am reported to have said so on the 1st of September, 1896.

I am still convinced that Mr. Laurier knew not what was the doctrine of the church he belongs to, and that he did wrong, because he knew no better. But such ignorance does not excuse him, except it be insurmountable. But it is not, it was easy for him to overcome it, he was often put on his guard. He knew where he had to go to to get information in the matter. He was in duty bound to do so. If, as some people say, Mr. Laurier knew what he was about and knew the teachings of his church on this question, then I am sorry to say that he was quite wrong and according to sound logical principles, that he gave away his church and her doctrines, not for a dish of lentils, but for power or the leadership of his party or something of the kind.

Be that as it may be, the hon. premier has lost all right to the support of all true Catholics and of all faithful Protestants.

Catholics cannot follow him, when he his turning his back to their common mother church, abandoning her doctrines, and condemning her teachings.

Protestants cannot give him their support as far as this question of education is concerned. If they did, would they not violate with their leader the very fundamental Protestant principle of liberty of judgment? Would not he and they, by human law, force Catholics to do what they believe Divine law forbids them to do? Would that be in accord with liberty of judgment? Have Protestants any right more than others to have two weights and two measures?

I will now refer your honours to the last part of the second paragraph of His Excellency's address, at the opening of this session; wherein I read the following words.

> . . . a settlement was reached between the two governments, which was the best arrangement obtainable under the existing conditions of this disturbing question. I confidently hope that this settlement will put an end to the agitation which has marred the harmony and impeded the development of our country, and will prove the beginning of a new era to be characterized by generous treatment of one another, mutual concessions and reciprocal good-will.

If it be so—and I believe it is so—that those difficulties arising out of the school question in Manitoba have impeded the development of our country, who is responsible for the delay during the last year? Is it not Mr. Laurier and his friends, who, by using a side issue in April a year ago, prevented a settlement of those difficulties? and, consequently, is it not Mr. Laurier and his friends who have been the cause of the great agitation which has marked the last twelve months, and prevented the beginning of the new era which the premier seems to desire now, in order, no doubt, to enjoy the position he now holds, and which cost him no less than an act of treason towards his church and his nationality, whether he knew, or whether he knew not, as I said before, the doctrine of his church on such a question.

Again, how can Mr. Laurier confidently hope that this settlement of the school question will put an end to the present agitation, when he knows—or, if he knows not, when he ought to know—that no Catholic who has any respect for his church, and who is anxious to remain one of her members, can in any way accept such a settlement, except if circumstances become such that, after due consideration, it should become evident that, in the interest of the whole community at large, and in the interest of the question itself, it was better to tolerate and submit pro tem to such an iniquitous settlement, having, before doing so, protested against it; for it can never be forgotten that no true and faithful Catholic can ever endorse it or accept it. The Laurier government, by the mouth of His Excellency, also assures parliament that "this settlement was the best arrangement obtainable under existing conditions." If circumstances are such, whose fault is it? Are not Mr. Laurier and his friends alone responsible for this sad position? They had to kill time in April, 1896, in order to prevent the Remedial Bill, accepted by the Catholic community, and by a good majority of the lower House, from becoming law, and thus defeat the remedy for the injustice done in 1890 to the Catholic minority in Manitoba; and, now that they have done the mischief, they come and ask for peace. "Let us treat one another generously," they say; "let us make mutual concessions and show our good-will." In other words, let Catholics give up their rights as asked for by such Protestants as those who will allow all sects to exist in this country, but will not consent to allow Catholics to have their own, and follow the dictates of their consciences.

The Secretary of State said yesterday that the Remedial Bill could not have been put in force, as the federal government had not the machinery necessary to do so.

Is not this objection a most extraordinary one? Have not our municipalities and our school commissioners to find out such machinery as will enforce their by-laws and their assessment rolls? It is only a few months ago that one of the municipalities in the district of Ottawa had to find out such machinery. They found it and collected their money.

In 1870, when Canada had bought the North-western Territories and appointed the Honourable Mr. McDougall as lieutenant governor of those territories, the population of those territories—true, it was the French population—rose up, formed a government de facto and made preparations to defend their rights. What did the Canadian government do? Did they not send an army? Only before any mischief was done, the Canadian government thought they might be wrong—and so they were—and they asked the provisional government of the west to send delegates to Ottawa and arrange for the entry of the territories into the confederation. Indeed, how many times, in certain provinces of the Dominion, had not the government to have recourse to armed force in order to compel people to abide by the law? But above all, is not the government quite wrong in setting such an example and creating such a bad precedent?

The hon. Secretary of State said also that this Act of 1890 ought to have been disallowed, and in this I entirely concur with him. Common sense recommended this course to be followed. But this would have brought trouble and perhaps made some enemies for Sir John's government, while in refusing to do so there was a probability that the Privy Council in England would declare the Act intra vires, and so put down the Catholic minority in Manitoba. And so it was with the first opinion given by their lordships.

But even in this last case this Act of 1890 ought to have been disallowed on the ground that it was injurious to the best interests of Canada, and so fell under the second rule laid down by Sir John A. Macdonald's government after confederation, as to how the right of vetoing provincial legislation would be used by his government.

Having said so much I have now to draw my conclusions as to the course which the Liberal party now in power have followed as far as this school question is concerned. My conclusions are:

1. That the Liberal government of the day have trampled the constitution under their feet.

2. That they have scorned the decision of Her Majesty's Privy Council.

3. That they alone are presently responsible for the trouble and agitation which, as His Excellency said in his speech at the opening of the present session, "has marred the harmony and impeded the development of our country."

They having protracted the debate on the question of the Remedial Bill in March and April last (1896) in order that this legislation accepted by Catholics, clergy and laity, and by the House of Commons by a majority of 18, should not become law before the 25th of April last when parliament had expired.

4. That they have unjustly refused to carry on the decision of their predecessors in office (Sir Charles Tupper's and Sir Mackenzie Bowell's cabinet) whose decision was binding upon them as this decision on the appeal of the Catholic of Manitoba was not an administrative but a judicial act of their predecessors in office the Bowell cabinet. As to the degree of responsibility which now rests on each party at the present time, I should think that the Liberal party, having in 1896, defeated the Remedial Bill which Catholics, clergy and laity, were satisfied with—and which Sir Charles Tupper's government had asked parliament to adopt, but which the Liberals, led by Mr. Laurier, opposed and succeeded by a side issue of the worst character to defeat—I consider now that the Liberals having come into power, it is their bounden duty, an imperative duty too it is, to give better terms to the Catholic minority in Manitoba. Failing to do so, they become answerable alone for the whole mischief which that minority will have to suffer in the future.

Hon. Mr. McMILLAN—I do not intend to detain the House long with the few remarks that I wish to make on this debate. It has already been ably discussed on both sides of the House, particularly by the hon. the leader of the opposition, the hon. gentleman from Marshfield, and those who followed him on that side. Indeed so pertinent were their remarks and so convincing their arguments that the leader of the government in this House and his followers have so far failed in answering them, except by a specious pleading of a hair splitting character, such as was made here yesterday by the hon. the Secretary of State.

I will not, hon gentlemen, follow the already trodden ground on the different paragraphs of the address from the Throne, more than to make a passing remark on two or three of them, before I come to the one which has caused me to get on my feet. I endorse all the loyal and patriotic expressions that have been made in reference to Her Majesty's Jubilee. I can't add more than has already been said. As to the clause in reference to the tariff, I will give the government my heartiest support so far as it proposes to have due regard to the industrial interests, for I take that to mean protection to the farmer, the manufacturer, and the artisan.

On the franchise paragraph, there shall be no uncertain sound from me. My vote shall be recorded against the bill as proposed, if it should ever come to this House. Sir John Thompson's opinions have been quoted to influence hon. gentlemen, but I can tell hon. gentlemen that the feeling with many here, was then opposed to that bill, and the probability was that it would have been then dealt with as it will be now.

To the plebiscite I am opposed. It is un-British. I voted against the one submitted a few years ago in Ontario. I looked upon it as a put-off scheme, and I will vote against this one as I look upon it in the same way.

What impelled me to say a word in this debate was, to record my views with reference to the Manitoba school question. The language put in the Governor General's mouth by the government in reference to it, is that this settlement is "the best arrangement obtainable under the existing conditions." What evidence have we of that? The government were asked to lay on the Tables of this House, all papers in connection with this question. What we have does not show that they asked for more, or made the slightest attempt to get the question settled according to the lines of the judgment of the Privy Council. The judgment said:

> The whole question to be determined is whether a right or privilege which the Roman Catholic minority previously enjoyed has been affected by the legislation of 1890. Their lordships are unable to see how this question can receive any but an affirmative answer. Their lordships have decided that the Governor General in Council has jurisdiction, and that the appeal is well founded, but the particular course to be pursued must be determined by the authorities to whom it has been committed by the statute. It is not for this tribunal to intimate the precise steps to be taken. Their general character is sufficiently defined by the 3rd subsection of section 22 of the Manitoba Act.

This can only mean a satisfactory restoration of their school rights to the minority.

For the purpose of giving these rights the Conservative government introduced and tried to get through parliament the Remedial Bill. This was accepted as satisfactory by His Grace the Archbishop of St. Boniface who had authority to speak on behalf of the minority of that province, but it was successfully opposed by the present government and said by them to be not worth the paper it was written on, and then they anxiously offered a more efficient remedy, but this so-called settlement is what we have for their promise. They asked the people of this country to accept this settlement as the best obtainable, and to draw us off the trail, they say they got us as much as was asked by the Sir Donald Smith, Desjardins and Dickey deputation sent up by the Conservative government, to try to effect a settlement with the Manitoba government, when they saw from the obstruction given to it that it was in danger of not going through the House. I have in my hands the report made to the House by that deputation on their return, they asked for Catholic schools but were refused. Let me read what they asked for :

Suggestions for settlement of Manitoba school question from the Dominion commissioners for Manitoba government.

Legislation shall be passed at the present session of Manitoba legislature to provide that in towns and villages where there are resident, say, twenty-five Roman Catholic children of school age, and in cities where there are, say, fifty of such children, the board of trustees shall arrenge that such children shall have a school-house or a school-room for their own use, where they may be taught by a Roman Catholic teacher; and Roman Catholic parents or guardians, say, ten in number, may appeal to the Department of Education from any decision or neglect of the board in respect of its duties under this clause, and the Board shall observe and carry out all decisions and directions of the department on any such appeal. Provisions shall be made by this legislation that schools wherein the majority of children are Catholics should be exempted from the requirements of the regulations as to religious exercises.

These are the religious exercises authorized by the Manitoba national schools.

That text books be permitted in Catholic schools such as will not offend the religious views of the majority, and which from an educational standpoint shall be satisfactory to the advisory board. Catholics to have representation on the advisory board. Catholics to have representation on the board of examiners appointed to examine teachers for certificates. It is also claimed that Catholics should have assistance in the maintenance of a normal school for the education of their teachers. The existing system of permits to non-qualified teachers in Catholic schools should be continued for, say, two years, to enable them to qualify, and then to be entirely discontinued. In all other respects the schools at which Catholics attend be public schools and subject to every provision of the Education Acts for the time being in force in Manitoba.

The answer they received we read in the same report. It says :

GOVERNMENT BUILDINGS,
WINNIPEG, 30th March, 1896.

To the Honorable
ARTHUR R. DICKEY,
ALPHONSE DESJARDINS,
Sir DONALD SMITH, K.C.M.G.

We regret that we are unable to accede to the terms of the proposition submitted to us. A study of its details reveals the fact that it involves much more than would appear at first sight. The objections are both general, that is to say, as to principles involved, and special, that is to say, as to practical operation.

1. Separate schools under this clause would result in a teacher having under his charge a comparatively small number of pupils of various ages and degrees of proficiency. The school could not therefore be properly graded and could not attain the degree of efficiency reached by public schools in cities, towns and villages. Grading of classes and mutual competition would be destroyed. The separate school would, therefore, of necessity, be inferior. Experience elsewhere will prove the truth of this contention.

2. The organization of the separate school would be compulsory. Neither the Roman Catholic parents nor the school trustees would have any option. The voluntary idea upon which, almost universally, school organization depends, and which rules even in Ontario, where there is a fully developed separate school system, is entirely eliminated. Given the requisite number of Roman Catholic children of school age, and the law would compel the separation without regard to the wishes of the parents or the trustees, and equally without regard to the ability of the district to maintain another school. It is most probable also that in such a case it would be held that the Roman Catholic children had no legal right to attend the public school. Thus we would by law compel Roman Catholics to separate themselves and deprive them of the right to send their children to the public schools. There seems to be no precedent even in separate school legislation for such a provision.

3. In many cases it would be impossible to provide a separate building, and the Roman Catholic children would therefore be assigned a room in the public school. It seems beyond dispute that nothing could be worse than the separation of children into two distinct bodies within daily view of each other.

This answer recognizes that the deputation asked for what was virtually separate schools for the Roman Catholics in Manitoba. Further on, I still quote from the Manitoba government answer :

It will not, therefore, be a matter of surprise to you that we are unable to accede to the proposition made, or any proposition based upon similar principles.

We are prepared, however, to make good the promise to remedy any wellfounded grievance if such exists, and we, therefore, submit a plan of suggested modifications, which we believe to be free from objections upon principle, and which in our opinion will remove any such grievance, and at the same time in no way affect the efficiency of the public school system, or deprive the Roman Catholic children of the privilege of participation in the same educational advantages enjoyed by the rest of the people.

Our proposition is in the form of an alternative :

First : Should it be accepted as a satisfactory measure of relief to the minority and as removing their grievances, we hereby offer to completely secularize the public school system, eliminating religious exercises and teaching of every kind during school hours. We desire it to be understood in connection with this proposition that it is made as a compromise offer, and not as embodying the policy which the government and legislature of the province are themselves desirous of pursuing. We are willing, however, to adopt such a measure in order to attain a settlement of the dispute.

It is unnecessary to say that the deputation knew that the secularization of the schools would not be satisfactory to the minority.

Second: In the alternative we offer to repeal the present provisions of the School Act relating to religious exercises, and to enact in substance the following:—

No religious exercises or teaching to take place in any public school, except as provided in the Act. Such exercises or teaching, when held, to be between half-past three and four o'clock in the afternoon.

If authorized by resolution of the trustees, such resolution to be assented to by a majority, religious exercises and teaching to be held in any public school between 3.30 and 4 o'clock in the afternoon. Such religious exercise and teaching to be conducted by any Christian clergyman whose charge includes any portion of the school district, or by any person satisfactory to a majority of the trustees who may be authorized by said clergyman to act in his stead; the trustees to allot the period fixed for religious exercises or teaching for the different days of the week to the representatives of the different religious denominations to which the pupils may belong in such a way as to proportion the time allotted as nearly as possible to the number of pupils in the school of the respective denominations. Two or more denominations to have the privilege of uniting for the purpose of such religious exercises. If no duly authorized representative of any of the denominations attend, the regular school work to be carried on until four o'clock.

No pupil to be permitted to be present at such religious exercises or teaching if the parents shall object. In such case the pupil to be dismissed at 3.30.

Where the school-room accommodation at the disposal of the trustees permits, instead of allotting different days of the week to different denominations, the trustees to direct that the pupils shall be separated and placed in different rooms for the purpose of religious exercises as may be convenient.

CLIFFORD SIFTON,
J. D. CAMERON.

This, hon. gentlemen, was Manitoba's answer, which of course the Conservative Government could not accept. A further appeal was made by the deputation. It is dated 31st March, and is addressed to those acting for the Manitoba government, Messrs. Sifton and Cameron. I will read an extract or two:

A few words are necessary as to the character of our memorandum. It was put in general terms as a suggested basis upon which our future discussions might proceed with a view to a possible agreement of all parties interested. It is therefore open to some of the objections raised by you, inasmuch as it does not deal with the details, and professes only to lay down broad lines upon which legislation might be drawn.

In addition to this, we must premise that sufficient weight is not given by you to the undoubted legal position of the Roman Catholics. Under the judgment of the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council and the remedial order they certainly have important rights in connection with separate schools, and while the Dominion parliament may have jurisdiction to enforce some or all those rights, it is universally acknowledged that this could be done with more advantage to all parties by the local legislature, and for this reason we are holding this conference.

We must further draw your attention on to the flagrant injustice of the present system which compels Roman Catholics to contribute to schools to which they cannot conscientiously send their children, and we beg to submit that this fact deserves due weight and consideration in this connection. It is to be further stated that the Roman Catholics earnestly desire a complete system of separate schools on which only their own money would be expended, a state of matters which would meet the observation under consideration, but which you decline to grant. One suggestion was to relieve you from the necessity of going as far as this. It is perhaps impossible to devise a system that would be entirely unobjectionable theoretically and in the abstract. We had great hope that what we suggested would commend itself to your judgment as a practicable scheme doing reasonably substantial justice to all classes, and securing that harmony and tranquillity which are perhaps more than anything else to be desired in a young and growing community such as is now engaged in the task of developing the resources of Manitoba.

We once mere appeal to you in the interests of the whole population of the province, indeed of the Dominion as well as in the interests of the minority to reconsider the decision at which you have arrived and to make some proposal that we could regard as affording a chance of the settlement which we so earnestly desire.

This provoked a further reply from the Manitoba government dated the 1st April. I will give you the most pertinent extracts from their reply:

GOVERNMENT BUILDINGS,
WINNIPEG, 1st April, 1896.

To the Honourable
ARTHUR R. DICKEY,
ALPHONSE DESJARDINS,
Sir DONALD A. SMITH, K.C.M.G.

We understand that, by Order in Council, your authority is limited to making a settlement satisfactory to the minority, and that as a matter of fact the minority will accept nothing short of statutory recognition of the right of separation. We regard ourselves as precluded by our declaration of policy preceding our last election from assenting to such statutory recognition.

We entered upon the task of seeking a settlement of the question at issue in the face of grave and obvious difficulties.

In the first place, so far as the re-establishment of separate schools is concerned, the question has for years been considered settled so far as the people of this province, to whom we are responsible, are concerned.

In the next place we have hitherto believed that a state aided separate school system, and that only, would be accepted by the minority. This view we have repeatedly stated, and we have not yet been authoritatively informed to the contrary.

It appears also that any settlement between the government of the Dominion and that of Manitoba must, by the very terms of your instructions, be subject to the sanction of a third party, and while all the members of both governments might approve of our proposition, or any other submitted as containing everything that in reason and in equity ought to be conceded, nevertheless that approval would be worthless without the sanction of the representatives of the minority.

In a word we are absolutely debarred from conceding a system of Roman Catholic and state aided separate schools, while the representatives of the minority, and, as a consequence, the federal government will accept nothing else.

In conclusion we have the honour to state that, notwithstanding the failure of the present negotiations, the government of the province will always be prepared to receive and discuss any suggestions which may be made with a view to removing any inequalities that may be shown to exist in the present law.

CLIFFORD SIFTON,
J. D. CAMERON.

You will notice that one of the extracts I have just quoted states, that as a third party is to be consulted any proposition they, the government of Manitoba, might make would be worthless. They did not want to consult the minority and evidently our government have accepted that stand and went on with the settlement without consulting them.

Let us examine the proposed agreement, it asks for exactly what was offered by the Manitoba government to the Sir Donald deputation with an additional clause or two which are worthless. I will read it in full so as to have this precious document on record:

Terms of the agreement made by the government of Canada and the government of Manitoba, for the settlement of the school question (presented to the House in session at Ottawa, 29th March, 1897).

1. Legislation shall be introduced and passed at the next regular session of the legislature of Manitoba embodying the provisions hereinafter set forth in amendment to the "Public Schools Act," for the purpose of settling the educational questions that have been in dispute in that province.

2. Religious teaching to be conducted as hereinafter provided:

1. If authorized by a resolution passed by a majority of the school trustees, or,

2. If a petition be presented to the board of school trustees asking for religious teaching and signed by the parents or guardians of at least ten children attending the school in the case of a rural district, or by the parents or guardians of at least twenty-five children attending the school in a city, town or village.

3. Such religious teaching to take place between the hours of 3.30 and 4.00 o'clock in the afternoon, and to be conducted by any Christian clergyman, whose charge includes any portion of the school district, or by a person duly authorized by such clergyman, or by a teacher when so authorized.

4. Where so specified in such resolution of the trustees or where so required by the petition of the parents or guardians, religious teaching during the prescribed period may take place only on certain specified days of the week instead of every teaching day.

5. In any school in towns and cities where the average attendance of Roman Catholic children is forty or upwards, and in villages and rural districts where the average attendance of such children is 25 or upwards the trustees shall, if required by the petition of the parents or guardians of such number of Roman Catholic children respectively, employ at least one duly certificated Roman Catholic teacher in such school.

In any school in towns and cities where the average attendance of non-Roman Catholic children is forty or upwards and in village and rural districts where the average attendance of such children is twenty-five or upwards the trustees shall, if required by the petition of the parents or guardians of such children, employ at least one duly certificated non-Roman Catholic teacher.

6. Where religious teaching is required to be carried on in any school in pursuance of the foregoing provisions and there are Roman Catholic children and non-Roman Catholic children attending such school, and the school-room accommodation does not permit of the pupils being placed in separate schools for the purpose of religious teaching, provisions shall be made by regulations of the department of education (which regulations the board of school trustees shall observe) whereby the time allotted for religious teaching shall be divided in such a way that religious teaching of the Roman Catholic children shall be carried on during the prescribed period of one-half of the teaching days in each month and the religious teaching of the non-Roman Catholic children may be carried on during the prescribed period on one-half of the teaching days in each month.

7. The department of education shall have the power to make regulations not inconsistent with the principles of this Act for the carrying into effect the provisions of this Act.

8. No separation of the pupils by religious denominations shall take place during the secular work.

9. Where the school-room accommodation at the disposal of the trustees permits, instead of allotting different days of the week to the different denominations for the purpose of religious teaching, the pupils may be separated when the hour for religious teaching arrives, and placed in separate rooms.

10. Where ten of the pupils in any school speak the French language (or any language other than English as their native language the teaching of such pupils shall be conducted in French or such other language) and English upon the bi-lingual system.

11. No pupils to be permitted to be present at any religious teaching unless the parents or guardians of such pupils desire it. In case the parents or guardians do not desire the attendance of the pupils at such religious teaching, then the pupils shall be dismissed before the exercises or shall remain in another room.

Do we get a substitute for separate schools in this proposed settlement? No, the only privilege we get in the whole settlement is to teach religion for a half an hour after half-past three o'clock, and in school sections of a mixed population, half an hour every alternate teaching day. This is the whole bill and all we get for the former separate schools.

The additional clauses given, which the Manitoba government did not offer to the Sir Donald deputation, permits, where there are 25 of an average attendance in rural districts, and 40 in towns and cities, that they can employ, if asked for, a Roman Catholic teacher. What a concession! He is not to mention, however, the word religion till half-past three. It is, therefore, difficult to see where his usefulness comes in. Let us examine this sop a little which is given to try to make the bill palatable. A Roman Catholic teacher can be employed. How many school sections in Ontario would ask what a man's religion is, so long as he is competent to teach reading, writing, arithmetic, grammar, geography, &c.? But few, but here it is a privilege, a great privilege, indeed! Moreover, there is another matter in this clause which renders it nugatory in rural districts. The average attendance must be 25; this means, even in Ontario, which is more thickly settled, a school population of Roman Catholic children of 75 to 80 in every school section, and in the more sparsely settled sections as they must have in Manitoba. This average cannot be supplied.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Oh, no, you are wrong.

Hon. Mr. McMILLAN—Beg pardon, I am right.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—The whole number of children on the roll in Manitoba is about 3,300; the number attending the schools in 1890, was 2,200.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—Of Catholics?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Yes.

Hon. Mr. McMILLAN—That does not settle the question.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Yes, the number on the rolls was 3,000 odd, and those in attendance at the schools was 2,200.

Hon. Mr. McINNES (B.C.)—What date was that?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—The last report.

Hon. Mr. McMILLAN—But I mean that in rural districts where there must be 25 in attendance, that would mean a population of Roman Catholic children to the extent of 75 or 80 in that district in order to make up that attendance, and that certainly is as near the figures as we can get it, even in the province of Ontario.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—You are entirely wrong.

Hon. Mr. McMILLAN—The same argument applies to the average attendance of 40 in towns and cities. This clause, therefore, is of no avail. There is another sop clause in this settlement. It permits the teaching of French under certain conditions. I respect the French and felt annoyed when the Manitoba government deprived them of their language there, and I would like to see that language restored, but I do not want to see it given as a substitute for separate school as a means to conciliate the minority, and I am sure the French people themselves will not accept it in the manner intended.

It is amusing to see the fast friends that this so-called settlement has made. Mr. Clark Wallace says it is fairly satisfactory, Mr. Dalton McCarthy has no objection to the settlement, the Hon. Mr. Sifton accepts it, it is his own offer virtually to the Sir Donald deputation, the hon. member for North Bruce thinks it an excellent settlement, and the three Toronto members also are satisfied to leave it where it is. All these gentlemen of course, voted against the Remedial Bill. On the other hand we have also agreeing to this settlement the Reform Catholic members of Quebec. It will please them if accepted as a good settlement in the hope that they can square their consciences with their pre-election promises and let them out of a fulfilment of their solemn pledges.

The hon. the senior gentleman for Halifax in this House the other day reiterated the statement made by the hon. the Minister of Public Works in the other House that over fifty thousand Roman Catholic children in Ontario are attending public schools. He went even further, he told us an hon. member in the other House who made a strong speech in favour of the restoration of the Manitoba separate schools was sending his own children to a public school. The hon. gentleman must be hard up to bolster a bad cause when he would use this, it is no argument against separate schools. Let him come to my county and I can tell him (knowing whereof I speak) that he will find in Alexandria a separate school second to none, separate or public in Ontario, I will tell him further that I can name him a number of school sections in that county where there are not over one or two Protestant families and yet for the accommodation of these they have public schools. This is not an argument against separate schools, it is an argument in favour of separate schools, these people know they can have separate schools if they wish them, but they want to be tolerant which is always an outcome of a spirit of liberality and justice.

The school question, hon. gentlemen, is not settled, it never can be settled until the right of the minority in Manitoba is restored, which was, as the hon. the Secretary of State said in his admirable speech two years ago, when then in opposition. He said that, "It was done, evidently, by a trick, as pointed out by the hon. member from St. Boniface, not done after an agitation by the press or by the people; it was done by political tricksters (no one else would have sown all this discord) just to meet their own political purposes. I care not whether they were Grit or Tory." He further said, "They were deprived of those rights by foul play, not British fair play."

The settlement, hon. gentlemen, is not satisfactory, and until it is, the agitation for British fair play is certain to be kept up.

Hon. Mr. McINNES (B.C.)—It was not my intention to take any part in the discussion on the address in reply to the Speech from the Throne, until a paragraph appeared in the Ottawa Citizen setting forth certain remarks made on the floor of this House by my hon. colleague from Victoria, and if those views attributed to him are correct I am bound to say a few words on the subject, as I hold diametrically opposite views. It appears from the report that I refer to, that while discussing the paragraph of the speech relating to the extension of the Intercolonial Railway from Quebec to Montreal he referred to the proposed Crow's Nest Railway from Lethbridge to the coast and warned the government not to build that road as it would be an expensive undertaking and an unnecessary drain upon the resources of the country. Am I right or not?

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B. C.)—No, I never mentioned the Crow's Nest Railway at all. I spoke against the government building the Intercolonial Railway as a government work, competing with private lines. That is all I said about railways.

Hon. Mr. McINNES (B. C.)—I was not present when the hon. gentleman made his speech. The paragraph I allude to appeared in the Citizen of April 2nd, and is as follows:

> He warned the government that if they build Crow's Nest Pass Railway with public money, there would be no end to the expense. The road should be constructed by private enterprise.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B. C.)—If the hon. gentleman would like it, I shall give my opinion on that matter. I am opposed to the government building any railway as a government work through the Crow's Nest Pass, or anywhere else.

Hon. Mr. McINNES (B.C.)—I believe firmly, and have for many years believed in the nationalization of every railway and every telegraph line in this country. There is a difference of opinion as to that policy, but I believe the day is near at hand when the government control of such works will be an accomplished fact I hope to live to see the day when that will be the case. I have seen, and hon. gentlemen present have nearly all seen, the abolition of toll gates on gravel roads, macademized roads and plank roads, and I believe that we, in the most advanced portions of the Dominion, will a few years hence look back and wonder how we submitted so long to the present improper system of taxation on the travelling, commercial and industrial community. I believe the day is fast approaching when we will look upon the ownership and operation of railways and telegraphs by private corporations, by which millions of dollars of the people's money are paid to shareholders and promoters in dividends, as a thing of the past; that such works will be operated by the government in the interests of the great masses of the people and not in the interests of corporations. With reference to the Intercolonial Railway, we all know that that road was not constructed as a commercial enterprise. We know that it was built more as a military highway than anything else. It was located away back in the interior of the provinces of Quebec and New Brunswick, through probably the least productive portions of the country in both provinces. But whatever commercial benefits the government could derive from the operation of that road were destroyed a few years ago by the late government subsidizing the Short Line of the Canadian Pacific Railway, not only through our own country, but, I understand, through a portion of the neighbouring republic. I am not at all averse to the government extending the Intercolonial Railway from Quebec to Montreal, if by that means they can secure a larger portion of the commerce of the maritime provinces and put that road on a more substantial commercial basis. I see no reason why we should have any delicacy at all in using the public money in the interests of the country, even should it clash, to a certain extent, with the interest of the Canadian Pacific Railway, or the Grand Trunk Railway, or any other railway corporation. In the past, every public work that was likely to pay anything of a dividend was handed over to private corporations, and it was only those public works which were run at a loss to the country that were retained by the government. Unfortunately, the Intercolonial Railway was one of those public works, and I venture to say that if the Intercolonial Railway paid a dividend on the money invested after paying the expense of operating that road, it would have been handed over long ere this to some large corporation. Most people, when they think of the government building a railway, are confronted with the Intercolonial Railway and asked, "Are you going to build another railway that will cost the country millions of dollars in construction and perhaps hundreds of thousands of dollars of a deficit every year?" That condition cannot by any possibility apply to the proposed railway from Lethbridge to the Pacific Ocean. I have some knowledge of what I speak, and I say that from the day that road is built as a government work it will pay a handsome dividend on the amount of money expended upon it. The Canadian Pacific Railway, for a great portion of its route, passes through an unproductive country, yet the road pays a handsome dividend, but from the time you leave Lethbridge and pass through the Crow's Nest you will enter upon the coal lands which, from reports of competent geologists and others who have examined them, are pronounced to be the richest coal deposits on the globe. The Canadian Pacific Railway Company, a few days ago, issued a report, a copy of which I have here, in which they describe the enormous body of coal which lies just beyond the Crow's Nest Pass in British Columbia. This is what they say:

> A most phenomenal discovery of coal has been made in the Crow's Nest Pass of the Rocky Mountains. Here no fewer than twenty seams are seen to out-crop with a total thickness of 132 feet to 448 feet.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.)—They are the thickest seams of coal in the world.

Hon. Mr. McINNES (B.C.)—Some of those seams I am informed are 30 feet thick, and I understand on the most reliable data that I can get, furnished by our own geologists, that this coal area extends from a quarter to half a million acres. I am also happy to say that from tests made in this country and elsewhere, the coal is declared to be equal to the best Welsh coking coal. Immediately after passing the coal belt, you enter into one of the most highly mineralized countries on the globe, extending from there to within a few miles of the Fraser River, at Hope, a distance of about 600 miles. Rossland is at the present time the centre of the mining interests in West Kootenay, but from developments that have gone on, and are being made west of that for some 300 miles, I believe that Rossland will be of secondary consideration within the next year, or certainly within the next year and a-half. I do believe that every mile of that country from the time you leave the coal belt that I have mentioned, until you get down to Hope, will be pouring in its wealth at stations located every four or five miles. Every mile of that country will contribute, and contribute largely to the support of the road. Therefore I say that, as a commercial enterprise, if on no other ground, the Dominion government ought to take possession of that pass and build the railway from Lethbridge down to the coast. They will be justified in taking that up and building and operating it.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.)—Is the route not covered by a charter now?

Hon. Mr. McINNES (B.C.)—A portion of it is covered by a charter, but no matter what charter may be given, the parliament is supreme and can build whether a charter exists or not. But why I urge that that road may be built and operated and held for all time as a government road is that we have only four gate-ways through which a railway can be built from the east into British Columbia. Away in the far north you have the Pine Pass, further south the Yellow Head Pass, 150 miles south of that the Kicking Horse Pass, now occupied and controlled by the Canadian Pacific Railway, and about 125 miles further south again we come to the Crow's Nest Pass, the best of all the passes. From information that I have received no later than to-day from gentlemen from Lethbridge and Fort Macleod, I learn that there is room for only one track for miles and miles through that pass. It is a narrow gorge, it is actually a crack in the mountains there, and on each side they tower up 3,000 and 4,000 feet, and in some places 500 or 600 feet perpendicularly. Owing to the fact that we are so situated, that we have only four passes by which you people in the east can gain access to our province by rail, I claim it is the duty of the government, in the interest of the people of this country, to hold for all time those passes. They could build railways through them and give equal running powers to all railways that see fit to connect with them. Were we situated as you are here, in Eastern Canada, it would be entirely different. You can build railways in any direction you please. You have no physical difficulties to encounter such as are met with in penetrating the Rocky Mountains. I say, therefore, as a commercial enterprise, not only in the interest of Manitoba, the North-west Territories and British Columbia, but in the interest of the whole Dominion it is the bounden duty of the government to build and control that road. I have no hesitation in saying, from the developments that have taken place in British Columbia from one end to the other, extending over an area of 400,000 square miles, that there is scarcely 10 square miles in that province but contains gold bearing and silver bearing quartz, copper, lead, iron and other metals in immense bodies. The output of our mines, during the last year, was not up to the expectations of a great number of us, but it can be very easily explained. In British Columbia, as in all other gold-bearing countries where they first discover gold in the sand and in the gravel beds of extinct river channels, gold could be got out very easily and returns were obtained almost in a few days or a few months work. Like California, Nevada, Australia and South Africa we have been in a transition state from the primitive way of mining gold in the gravel benches and in the old streams there. We have at last turned our attention to quartz mining, which is of a permanent character and will go on for generations, but it requires a great deal of time and capital to develop those quartz mines. Quartz ledges have to be followed down 15, 20 or perhaps 100 feet in some instances, before a sufficient bed of paying ore is reached, and as a general thing the further down they are driven the richer the lodes become. A great deal of the ore is refractory. The precious metal is found in combination with iron, lead and copper. It is not free milling ore. Smelters have to be erected at a very great cost, and I am happy to say that, while most of our ores are not free milling, they carry such a large percentage of copper and lead that it pays for the mining and smelting and other expenses connected with it, and the miners have the gold free for their profit. That is why I say that as large a return has not been made as many of us expected during the past year from the amount of development and the amount of attention that has been called to that portion of the Dominion. I hold in my hand here the report brought down by the Minister of Mines in the province of British Columbia. It gives one an idea of the enormous strides that are being made in the mining of precious metals in that province. The returns are for the years 1895 and 1896. In gold placer mining, in 1895 there was $481,633 worth of gold produced; last year the production had increased to $544,026. In quartz mining, in 1895 we produced $785,271 worth, and last year the output had increased to $1,244,180. In silver the output in 1895 was $977,229, last year it was $2,100,000. In copper in 1895 the output was $47,542, last year the output was $190,926.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.)—What is the total return for one year.

Hon. Mr. McINNES—Our total output for last year was within a few dollars of $5,000,000. in gold, silver, copper and lead, and that is merely the beginning of an enormous output in the near future. I would draw the attention of the House to a peculiar fact: you rarely hear anything about our rich silver mines. It is all about our gold mines. Up to the present time, during the last two years, from $2 to $3 worth of silver has been produced in that province for every dollar that has been produced in gold. People are bewitched by gold. Demonstrate to investors that you can make $100 per day for 20 years in a silver mine, and take a gold mine and demonstrate with equal certainty that you can make $50 per day, and you will find that 19 out of 20 will take the gold proposition in preference to the silver one. What I wish to call attention to with reference to silver mining is that the lead mined in connection with it last year amounted to $748,000. Our silver bearing ore is argentiferous galena. Nearly one-third of the total value of our silver ores is in the lead they carry.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.)—Tell us where they find a market for these metals?

Hon. Mr. McINNES (B.C.)—In the past nearly all the silver ore has been shipped to the United States.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.)—Is there a duty on the ore?

Hon. Mr. McINNES (B. C.)—The duty on the lead was $\frac{3}{4}$ of a cent per pound and I am sorry to see the proposed amendment to the tariff in the United States will raise it to one and a half cents a pound.

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—Is that on the ore?

Hon. Mr. McINNES—It is on the amount of lead the ore contains. Notwithstanding that, I believe our silver mines are so rich that they can afford to pay that extraordinary duty. I am satisfied also that the raising of the duty on our lead will result in inducing British capitalists to go in there and establish smelters to do all the smelting in our own country. A few years ago, when advocating the establishment of a Dominion mint here, I remember making a statement, and I think hon. gentlemen will find it recorded in the official report: I then predicted then that within five or six years, in all probability, the province that I have the honour to represent would be producing probably four or five million dollars in gold and silver. I remember distinctly that my hon. friend the Secretary of State, now in front of me, thought that that was a very bold statement; those are the very words he made use of. He thought, doubtless, that I was drawing on my imagination, but I am happy to say that that prediction has been more than realized, and I know there is no hon. gentleman in this chamber better pleased with the result than my hon. friend is. That progress has taken place in the last few years; sufficient development has gone on there within the last year or two, and English capital has poured in there, to develop our mines, and I predict that inside of five years the province of British Columbia alone will be pouring into the markets of the world from thirty to fifty millions a year. You talk of Africa; you talk of Australia, but I believe that they will not be in the race in the next ten years with our province. We have everything there in our favour. We have ten times the area of mineralized rock, bearing gold and silver and copper and lead, that they have in Australia or in Africa. And the conditions are favourable to us in British Columbia—more favourable, I believe, than in any other portion of the globe. We have one of the healthiest climates in the world. In Australia one of the great drawbacks is the want of the prime necessity of life, water. In British Columbia we are supplied from the eternally snow-capped mountains the whole year round. Timber can only be got at an enormous cost in Australia and Africa. In British Columbia you find, right over those mines, as fine timber as can be had in any market of the world. And taking that into consideration, and the favourable climate where men can work full time the year round, the outlook could not be better.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.)—Australia produced $37,000,000 of gold last year.

Hon. Mr. McINNES (B.C.)—Therefore I say, the outlook in that province is brighter to-day than in any portion of the British Empire. In the past, until a year or a year and a half ago, from the fact that our ores were not free milling ores, we could not get an English capitalist to invest one dollar. He would invest his capital in Central America, and South America, in every two-penny-half-penny country, but not in British Columbia. But when one or two of our mines were developed by British Columbia and United States capitalists, they then took hold of it, and that stream of gold that was pouring into Australia in the past, and to Africa later for the development of their quartz mines, is now pouring into our country and I believe such development will take place in the near future as will place us in the high and proud position of being one of the greatest, if not the greatest, gold and silver producing country in the world. I am not drawing upon my imagination. The developments that have taken place warrant every statement I have made on the floor of this House. I therefore say that I believe it is the bounden duty of the government to build that railway. It is not, as I said before, in the interest of British Columbia merely, but in the interest of the whole Dominion, and instead of being a drain on the resources of the country and on the tax-payers of Canada, it will be the means, even directly, of easing them of a great deal of the burden they are now bearing. What position will we be placed in if that road is built? The people from the east here will be able to take advantage of their railways. They will have the benefit of the Canadian Pacific Railway that will connect with the new line and goes now to Lethbridge. Before the road is completed from Lethbridge to the coast, the Northern Pacific and Great Northern will be in there and will cheapen transportation of every kind, thereby not only conferring an immense advantage on the Pacific province and the Territories, but on the most remote eastern province in this Dominion. I, therefore, trust that in the true interest of all concerned, the government will see that that road is built and controlled and operated by themselves. I quite agree with the statements made by some hon. gentlemen, that if it was built on the same extravagant scale that the Intercolonial Railway was built, and if it was operated in the same way, I would not be so sanguine of the good result that would accrue or flow therefrom. But my idea is simply this, that that road ought to be built and that it, and the Intercolonial Railway as well, should be placed under the control of commissioners, men disconnected and dissociated every way from politics, that it cannot be used as a lever for any party or any government that may be in power. It is a terrible commentary upon our people if we are not sufficiently honest to build a railway and operate it as well as a private company. I will refer to my hon. friend, the leader of the opposition in this House: he has visited Australia and I draw his attention to this fact, that nearly all the railways in the Australian colonies have been built by the respective governments and more than half of the entire revenue of those colonies is derived from railways. Many of those colonies had borrowed money at a very high rate of interest in England, and not only have they paid the interest on the money they borrowed, but in some instances they have had a handsome surplus. If they can do that in Australia, it is a sad commentary on the people of Canada if we cannot do as well as they have done. It may not be known to many hon. gentlemen here, but it is a fact, that, owing to sectional jealousies and rivalry between the colonies of Australia, they have different gauges for their railways. The result is that freight cannot be carried from one colony to the other without being transhipped. Notwithstanding all that, the railway lines pay over and above running expenses, in many instances, more than the interest on the money borrowed. If for no other reason than to see a better railway system prevailing in Australia, I should be glad to see the Australian colonies federated as we are in Canada. I may add, in Cape Colony the railway lines are owned and managed by the government. Let me call the attention of hon. gentlemen to the condition of affairs in England. Less than twenty years ago the British government took possession of every telegraph line in the United Kingdom, and the result is that you can send a message of twenty words for the same price that we have to pay here for ten words. Not only that, but nearly every post office in Great Britain is a telegraph office. They quadrupled the number of telegraph offices when they took possession of the telegraph lines, and the income from the telegraphs there pays a handsome dividend on the amount of money that the government spent in buying out the old companies. On the continent of Europe, the governments in many instances control the railway lines. It is so in Italy, where they have one of the finest railway systems in the world. Many lines in France and Germany are owned and controlled by the governments of those countries. If they can build railways in those old countries of Europe, I see no reason why we cannot do the same here. If it is to their advantage to build and operate the roads in the interest of the people, I ask, in the name of common sense, is it not equally in the interest of the great masses of the people of Canada, in the new portions of this Dominion, that the railways should be built and operated by the government for the development of that great western portion of Canada. I have been all over the Dominion and I am familiar with its resources and the conditions prevailing from Prince Edward Island and Cape Breton to Vancouver Island, and I unhesitatingly say that the future hope and glory of this country is in that far western Pacific province. I predict that there will be a larger immigration into that province—probably ten or twenty for every one that will go into the rest of the Dominion—for the next five or ten years.

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—What about food for the people?

Hon. Mr. McINNES (B.C.)—We are in close proximity to the illimitable plains of the North-west Territories and Manitoba, the finest wheat growing country in the world. We find now that it is very much cheaper to buy wheat and flour in Manitoba and the Territories than to raise it ourselves. The progress and prosperity of British Columbia will be of inestimable value to the North-west Territories and Manitoba.

Hon. Mr. AIKINS—What is the distance from Lethbridge to the coast?

Hon. Mr. McINNES (B.C.)—The distance is in the neighbourhood of 700 miles, and according to the estimates made by engineers who have gone over the different proposed routes, the total cost of constructing the line will not exceed fifteen millions of dollars. As a further justification for asking that the government undertake the construction of that road, I may say that I have returns from the departments here showing that for the last ten years, per capita, our province has paid no less than $8,422,000, more than an equal number of people in any of the other provinces

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—How do you arrive at that?

Hon. Mr. McINNES (B.C.)—I arrive at that from the returns I have received from the departments here. These are official figures. I take the responsibility of giving them, and if hon. gentlemen dispute them I am prepared to furnish details.

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—How do you arrive at the figures for Manitoba?

Hon. Mr. McINNES (B.C.)—From the returns.

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—But the returns do not show all that Manitoba contributes to the revenue.

Hon. Mr. McINNES (B.C.)—I can show that the figures which I give and the deductions that I draw from them are perfectly correct. Taking the annual grant that we get from the Dominion government for the support of the local legislature, and including our share of interest on the national debt, the salaries of judges and officials, every dollar that can be charged against our province in any form or shape, we have, in the last ten years, contributed to the Dominion treasury no less than $5,440,633 more than we have received from the Dominion.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.)—What has been the total revenue for those ten years that you have mentioned?

Hon. Mr. McINNES (B.C.)—It amounts for the last ten years to $15,249,986—an average of over a million and a half annually.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Does my hon. friend include in that calculation the interest on the cost of the Canadian Pacific Railway in British Columbia?

Hon. Mr. McINNES (B.C.)—I include in that estimate our proportion of the interest on the national debt, of which the Canadian Pacific Railway represents about one-third, and we all know that of the sum paid on that account we in British Columbia are paying our portion, and a great deal more. It has often been stated that the Canadian Pacific Railway was built for the benefit of British Columbia. That statement I emphatically deny. It was one of the conditions on which we entered confederation. Why was the Intercolonial Railway built at a cost of over fifty million dollars to this country? Was it not one of the conditions of confederation? It would be just as reasonable to charge the cost of the Intercolonial Railway to the maritime provinces as to charge the Canadian Pacific Railway to British Columbia. Without the Canadian Pacific Railway British Columbia would not be a portion of the Dominion to-day, and Canada would have been the loser. I am not disputing that the union has been a benefit to British Columbia, but what I say is this, I take the national debt and give an estimate of our population furnished me by the Statistician. He puts it at 140,000, though I think we have a little more than that. Allowing for our share of the interest on the national debt, and every charge that can be made against the province, we are losers by $5,440,633 during the last ten years.

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—Give us the details.

Hon. Mr. McINNES (B.C.)—I can give them to you.

Hon. Mr. POWER—Dispense! dispense!

Hon. Mr. McINNES (B.C.)—The details are as follows, and they are official:—

That is another reason why I say that the Dominion government ought to build that road, and that hon. gentlemen in both Houses should support them in doing so. We are entitled to it from what we have done, and from what we are absolutely certain to do in the near future. While my hon. friend from Victoria and myself generally agree on most subjects, that is one matter on which we will have to disagree. Owing to the reasons I have given, more particularly that we have only four passes through the Rocky Mountains through which railways can be built, I believe the work should be constructed by the government.

Although the Manitoba school question has been a live issue here for a number of years, I have never expressed myself on the subject on the floor of this House.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.)—Wise man.

Hon. Mr. McINNES (B.C.)—Perhaps I was, but as this is likely to be the last time it will ever come up before parliament in an acute form, I may be allowed to express a few ideas on the subject. I have stated that I am a thorough believer in the nationalization of railways and telegraphs: so I am a firm believer in public non-sectarian schools. I believe that nothing in the shape of religion should ever be taught in the schools of this country, composed as our population is, of different nationalities and creeds.

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—Would you exclude the Bible?

Hon. Mr. McINNES (B.C.)—Yes, I would exclude the Bible. I may be considered a Godless man, but a great many of those who are spoken of as God-fearing men, show by their actions how little sincerity there is in their professions. We have in British Columbia non-sectarian schools, and in no portion of the Dominion can you find such unity and brotherly love as prevail in that province. You can live in a community there for years and never know what creed your neighbours profess. There is no quarrelling or disagreeing on these subjects in that province. Our public schools are attended by all denominations, and, instead of being brought up in different camps, entertaining prejudices against each other, they are brought up to regard each other as fellow citizens. They estimate each other by their worth, and appreciate the merits of each other. I was sorry to read in a newspaper the other day that an eminent gentleman, Sir William Hingston, who is looked up to as a model man in many respects, decried the public schools because religion was not taught in them to a greater extent, and stated that he would prefer that his children should go without the rudiments of a common education rather than send them to what he calls Godless schools. It was my fortune or misfortune, whichever way you please to look at it, to be brought up in schools where the Bible was a text book, and my experience warrants me in saying that that condition of things should not be perpetuated. I honour and revere the man who worships his God in his own way, whether he is a Hindoo, a Roman Catholic, or a Presbyterian. I want every man to follow the dictates of his conscience and the tenets of his church, but I do not want to have to send my children, nor would I want other persons to send their children, to schools where they would receive sectarian instruction. We send our children to the public schools to make them good citizens and to fit them for the duties of citizenship. I would substitute for religious instruction, lessons in patriotism and morality, and I venture to say that the result would be to give us a more patriotic and moral population than by teaching children, parrot-like, any particular form of religion. If you turn to the statistics of this country, or any other country, you will find that the children brought up in separate schools, whether Anglican, Presbyterian or Roman Catholic, furnish a greater percentage of criminals than those who are educated in the public schools. I therefore say, eliminate everything in the shape of religious instruction from the public schools, and leave the teaching of religion to the parents, to the guardians, to the Sunday school teachers, and to the clergy. The instruction given by a sainted mother to a child at her knee, a good sister, or a faithful, religious father, will have a more lasting and enduring effect on the life of a child than all the religion that can be taught in the public schools.

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—But if the child has neither a saintly mother, nor a religious father, what then?

Hon. Mr. McINNES (B.C.) — No mother can be so lost to her duty to her offspring as not to inculcate religious ideas in the minds of her children, and besides, you have the Sunday schools and the clergy. No doubt most of us have been brought up in schools where more or less religious instruction has been given, and we know how it has been received. The children have learned it in a parrot like manner, and probably while the prayers where being read, were perpetrating some mischief on each other. We have all been boys and we know how it has been with ourselves. I say, leave the religious instruction to the parents, the Sunday school teachers and the clergy. But with respect to Manitoba I have only this to say; I have lived in that western country now nearly a quarter of century, and the men who have gone there have been men, as a general rule, who have had very good early advantages, men possessed of pluck and any amount of indomitable perseverence. They were men who acted and thought for themselves, as nearly all pioneers to a new country do, and I can assure this House solemnly, that if this government or any other government attempted to impose upon the vast majority of the people in the west any thing like what was proposed in the Remedial Bill, what they regard as a relic of mediævalism, the beginning of the end of confederation would have been near at hand. I believe, as firmly as I believe that I have an existence, that the Manitoba government have gone as far as they ever will go, and I believe if you want to force them any further, that the minority, instead of getting the benefits that have been voluntarily given them, will find themselves with fewer privileges than they now possess. My hon. friend from Saint Boniface referred to the year 1870, when that portion of the Hudson Bay territory was taken into confederation. At that time, I am fully aware, the population was about equally divided between Protestants and Roman Catholics. If that condition of affairs had continued to exist, if there was as large a population of Roman Catholics in Manitoba to-day as Protestants, or anything like the same ratio, I can understand then that they might insist upon retaining rights and privileges that they had been accustomed to before the union. But, instead of that, there is only one-tenth of the population of Manitoba that belongs to the Roman Catholic Church, and allow me to say this, that when Manitoba became a portion of this Dominion, the majority—I think my hon. friend will bear me out in that—of the people of the Roman Catholic religion were half-breeds. I ask is it right that we should be bound by any agreement entered into by a handful of such people?

Hon. Mr. BERNIER—Why not?

Hon. Mr. McINNES (B.C.)—No, it is unreasonable; we would be as non-progressive as the Chinese if we did that. It is a happy state of affairs that the people of Canada always accommodated themselves to circumstances. We must keep in line with the progress our country is making.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.)—It is an agreement ratified by the parliament of Canada.

Hon. Mr. McINNES (B.C.)—Precisely; and the parliament of Canada, if it has the power of enacting a law, has the power of repealing it or amending it.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.)—It has not done so.

Hon. Mr. McINNES (B.C.)—Here is the sum and substance of the matter in a nut shell, so far as I am able to conceive it: When that appeal was made, when a case was formulated, when it went through the Manitoba courts and came up to the Supreme Court and finally to the last tribunal, the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council, and when they declared that the Manitoba legislature had acted within its jurisdiction, that the Act was intra vires and not ultra vires, I believe then and there that that question should have ended. I say again, in the interest of the minority there and throughout the west and the Dominion of Canada, that the people should let this question of separate schools be buried so deep that it will never have a resurrection.

Hon. Mr. BERNIER—No, no.

Hon. Mr. McINNES (B.C.)—I know what I am speaking of when I say that the more you stir it up the greater antagonism will be created in the west, and instead of getting more, the chances are that the last state of the minority will be worse than the first.

Hon. Mr. BERNIER—We cannot have less than we have got.

Hon. Mr. McINNES (B.C.)—They are not willing to accept what I believe to be a most honourable and liberal concession arranged between the Dominion government, headed by Mr. Laurier, and the Manitoba government. And I believe if Mr. Laurier, the Prime Minister, is never credited with anything else except the settlement of this question, his name will be handed down to posterity as a true patriot and son of Canada.

Hon. Mr. BERNIER—There is nothing in that settlement—no settlement at all.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.)—What concession has there been?

Hon. Mr. McINNES (B.C.)—Are they not satisfied with half an hour's religious instruction in school every day? They seem to want all religion and nothing else. In that case you have no right to send them to a public school; send them to your private or denominational schools. I am perfectly willing that every denomination should have all the religious teaching that their parents and guardians wish to give them in their private seminaries and parochial schools. But I am dealing with public schools where every man, no matter what his nationality or religious faith may be, has to contribute towards the support of those schools, and as I said before, my conception of a public school is a place to prepare the young of both sexes for the battle of life, to make them good and useful citizens and to advance civilization.

Hon. Mr. BERNIER—May I remind the hon. gentleman that the question here is not whether we like or dislike the public schools; but whether our contributions to them are to be maintained?

Hon. Mr. McINNES (B.C.)—I do not for one moment wish to interfere with the opinions of any person; but as I said before, when the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council of England, declared that the Manitoba government had acted within its jurisdiction, that it was within the purview of the legislature to pass the Act they did abolishing state aid to the separate schools, I say that the question ought to have ended.

Hon. Mr. BERNIER—The first judgment decided that the Act of 1890 was intra vires in so far as the rights of the Catholics existing at the time of the union were concerned. This part of the judgment of the Privy Council says so:

> In Barrett's case the sole question raised was whether the Public Act of 1890, prejudicially affected any right or privilege which the Roman Catholics by law or practice had in the province at the union.

That was the only point raised then and that point was based on the first subsection of section 22. This was decided against us. Then the Catholics raised another point on the second subsection of section 22, which is a substantive enactment itself, and we claimed then the privileges arising from provincial legislation after the union. The first were anterior rights, and the second posterior rights, and the two cases are completely separate, completely different, based on two different sections of the Act and claiming different rights. So the judgments are perfectly consistent with each other.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I would like to ask the hon. gentleman whether the whole statute was not before the Privy Council on the first judgment. Barrett's goods were seized for taxes payable to the public schools. Barrett said: "No, I will not pay; I am a supporter of separate schools." The question to be decided was whether a supporter of the separate schools was liable to pay taxes in support of the public schools. That was the whole case. The Privy Council decided that the Catholic supporters of separate schools were liable to pay their taxes to public schools. The whole law was before the Privy Council. You do not mean to say they limited themselves to one clause of the Act. No court acts so idiotically as that.

Hon. Mr. BERNIER—The hon. gentleman knows, being a member of the bar, that any case is adjudicated upon by the tribunal on the materials of the case—not on something else.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I know very well that every case before the court is decided on the law as it stands on the statute-book. The whole statute was before every court, the court in Manitoba, the Supreme Court and the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council, and the effect of the decision was that Catholic supporters of separate schools must pay taxes to the public schools. Unless the Privy Council reverses that decision, Catholic supporters of separate schools must, for all time, pay their taxes to public schools unless the legislature relieves them.

Hon. Mr. BERNIER—That is the opinion of the hon. gentleman and I cannot give any better answer than the words of the Privy Council:

> The sole question raised was whether the Public Schools Act of 1890 prejudicially affected any right or privilege which the Roman Catholics by law or practice had in the province at the union.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—That Act is still in force unless it is repealed.

Hon. Mr. McINNES (B.C.)—I am not a lawyer and I will not attempt to discuss this from a constitutional standpoint, but I hope I have conceived enough of this question to discuss it from a practical and common sense standpoint. The statement I made in the first place was that when the matter was appealed to the Privy Council in England, they declared that the legislature had a perfect right to pass the bill.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Taxing everybody for public schools.

Hon. Mr. McINNES (B.C.)—Subsequently, in the next case, they declared there was a grievance, and that an appeal lay to the Dominion parliament. No person for a moment disputes that; but they did not give any instructions as to what the Dominion government should do. They were too wise and patriotic to do anything of the kind. It was an optional thing for the Dominion parliament to exercise its authority, or to let it alone; and I think it would have been very much better if it had never been brought into the arena of Dominion politics. I am happy that it has now been taken out of Dominion politics, and I believe from this time forward it will gradually recede until it becomes a matter of the past. The arrangement entered into is one that is fair and just—fairer and juster than the Remedial Bill, if it had become law, for this reason, that the Remedial Bill could never have been enforced. I do not believe there is any power in Canada that could enforce that Remedial Bill if it had become law. But here is a voluntary act on the part of the Manitoba legislature. They say, "We will do so and so." Not only have they pledged themselves to do that, but they have crystallized it into an Act of parliament. And, that having been done, I believe the minority in Manitoba will receive a great deal more consideration at the hand of the majority than they possibly could have got if the other had become law, because that remedial legislation would have been a dead letter, and it would have antagonized the feeling of the vast majority of the people of Manitoba. I say again that I am delighted that the present government, led by Mr. Laurier, has arrived at a settlement with the government of Manitoba, that will quiet the matter once and for ever. I am perfectly satisfied that we have unreasonable and bigoted Protestants of different denominations, as well as Roman Catholics, that it will not satisfy. There are some Protestants, and Baptists, that are dissatisfied, and will Episcopalians, Presbyterians, Methodists say, "Oh no, you have given a great deal too much." And I know there are a few—but I am happy to say that that number is very limited indeed—among the Roman Catholics, that take the other extreme view. The hon. gentleman from Richelieu told us that a reaction had set in in the province of Quebec; that the elections there were carried by fraud and misrepresentation, and he stated that if there was an election there to-morrow, Mr. Laurier would be hurled from power. What justification had he for saying that? Has not every election that has taken place in Roman Catholic Quebec been favourable to the government? I know there is one that took place to-day in which the opposition candidate has been elected, but I tell you that the reduced majority of the successful candidate is as great a victory as the carrying of the other constituencies. Champlain has never returned a Liberal since confederation; it is a constituency that rolled up a majority of nearly four hundred last June, and what is the majority to-day? Somewhere in the neighbourhood of 160. Is not that an evidence that the trend of public opinion among the Roman Catholics of Quebec and of other provinces is in favour of the government? I consider that it was a moral victory. Let us accept the situation. If the agreement is not carried out according to the Act placed on the statute-book of Manitoba, we will have just reason to complain; but if the compact entered into between the Dominion government and the government of Manitoba is carried out, any fair minded man must agree to it and say, Amen.

Hon. Mr. WOOD—I desire to say a few words on this subject before the debate closes. I am sure we all listened with a great deal of pleasure to the remarks of the hon. gentleman who has just resumed his seat, especially to his glowing description of the resources of the province from which he came, and of the wonderful development and progress which he anticipates for that province in the future. I may say that I do not think his remarks upon this point have been extravagant, and I have no doubt that his expectations will be fully realized. I cannot say that I endorse fully the remarks which he made in reference to the government undertaking to build railways in that section of the Dominion. I should rather concur with the view expressed by my hon. friend who sits on this side of the House, that it is better to leave those undertakings to private enterprise. I do not propose, however, to argue that question at the present time. In the few remarks I make I desire to refer to some of the subjects which have been mentioned in the Speech from the Throne which is now under consideration. I shall confine my remarks to two or three clauses in the speech, and particularly those which have been referred to by the other speakers who have addressed the House. The clause which has received the greatest amount of attention, and to which the greater part of the time of this debate has been given, is the one relating to this vexed Manitoba school question. Very much that has been said has related to the past history of that question, the law bearing upon the case and the proper interpretation of the different statutes and of the constitution under which we are living. This branch of the subject can, no doubt, be more ably discussed by others than it can by myself. Very much of it, however, is only interesting as matter of history and does not bear upon the real practical issue which is at this time before the country. The main facts in connection with this question appear to be really beyond controversy. They have been set at rest by the decision which has been given by the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council. There is no question that the minority in Manitoba have a real and substantial grievance. The rights and privileges which they enjoyed with regard to education from the time that province came into confederation until the year 1890 were entirely swept away in that year, by the local legislature of the province. The minority appealed, as they had a perfect right to do, to the Governor in Council and to this parliament for redress. The Governor in Council heard their appeal, and issued a remedial order, the provisions of which the provincial government did not choose to comply with, and it now remains for this parliament to exercise the power which is vested in it by the constitution, and legislate for the redress of those grievances. It appears to me the practical question before parliament and before the country, is whether that power should be now exercised, or whether it is better to settle this question under some arrangement such as that we are now considering. So far as my opinion goes, it appears to me that under those conditions the right and the power to legislate to redress a grievance, carries with it the duty and the moral obligation to legislate as well. I have listened to the whole discussion, and so far I have not heard anything which appears to me a good and sufficient reason for pursuing any other course. The reason which is given in the Speech from the Throne is that it is the best arrangement obtainable under the existing conditions of this disturbing question, and the hon. leader of the Senate, in addressing the House a few days ago in reply to my hon. friend who leads the opposition, gave the same reason, that it was better to accept this because it was the best settlement obtainable in view of the present state of public opinion in Manitoba. The hon. leader of the House argued that question from his point of view very plausibly, but I think that the sophistry of that course of reasoning will be apparent if we consider it for a moment. What is the state of public opinion in the province of Manitoba? It is simply that the large majority are opposed to this parliament passing remedial legislation. They are opposed to the separate school system. They prefer the school system which they adopted there in 1890. They have elected a parliament which represents their views, and there is no prospect whatever of the local parliament re-establishing the separate school system which existed previous to 1890, or passing any legislation to redress the grievance of the Catholic minority in that province. Remember that it is the very fact that that state of public opinion exists in Manitoba that constitutes the grievance. If it were not that that was the state of public opinion in Manitoba, there would be no grievance; the Catholic minority would have no reason to appeal to the Governor in Council, and this parliament would have neither the right nor the power to legislate, so far as education was concerned. Now the sophistry of the argument is this, that when a certain condition arises in the province of Manitoba which causes a grievance to the minority in that province, and thereby invests this parliament with the power to legislate to redress that grievance, we are told that this parliament should not exercise that power on account of the state of public opinion in Manitoba. The hon. Secretary of State gave us some other reasons why this arrangement was best and should be accepted. I do not know that I can follow that hon. gentleman through all the legal arguments which he addressed to the House. Some of them were, to me at all events, new in their character, and I certainly was not entirely convinced of the soundness of the argument which he advanced. The hon. gentleman referred to the first judgment which was rendered by the Privy Council in England, and as I understood his argument, he considered that that judgment took away the constitutional rights of the minority in the province of Manitoba. I, at all events, have never understood, and do not yet understand, that that first judgment bears the construction which the hon. gentleman put on it when addressing the House the other night, and which I understood him to put on it again when addressing the House during the interruption this evening. That judgment, as I understand it, was simply a declaration that the Acts passed by the local legislature in 1890 were intra vires. It was a review of the decision of the Supreme Court of Canada which declared those Acts ultra vires, and on appeal to the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council in Great Britain they reversed that decision and declared those Acts intra vires. The second case which was taken to the judicial committee of the Privy Council was an entirely different case. They had then to consider the rights and privileges of the Catholic minority in the province of Manitoba as affected by the second subsection of section 22 of the Manitoba Act.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—The whole statute was before us. It was a question whether a Catholic ratepayer was obliged to pay taxes in support of the public schools.

Hon. Mr. WOOD—I do not understand it in that way. It is true the whole statute was before them, but we have the judgment of the Privy Council; we have their remarks when they rendered the judgment, and they certainly say that the governing statute was the second clause of section 22 of the Manitoba Act, that that was the clause which affected the case which was submitted then for their consideration. They say that was a substantive enactment, as my hon. friend from St. Boniface has explained to the House, and under that section they decided that the rights and privileges which the Catholic minority enjoyed, and which were established by the statutes of the province after confederation were swept away by the statutes of 1890, that this was a grievance, that they had a right to have that grievance redressed, that they had a right to appeal to the Governor in Council, and that this parliament had the power and right to enact remedial legislation. That is my understanding, at all events, of the judgments of the Privy Council.

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—Or I might say they had the right to say that they did not wish to assume that constitutional position.

Hon. Mr. WOOD—I do not understand the hon. gentleman.

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—What I mean to say is that they were not compelled to enact any legislation by the judgment.

Hon. Mr. WOOD—Decidedly not, but they had the right and power to do it.

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—If they saw fit.

Hon. Mr. WOOD—My contention is that the right and power to enact remedial legislation under those circumstances where a grievance is acknowledged to exist and should be remedied, carries with it the duty and moral obligation to legislate. The hon. Secretary of State, in referring to those judgments described them as judgments of expediency. I feel that we are, as loyal subjects and law respecting citizens, bound to respect the judgments of the highest authority in the empire, and I am not disposed to cast any reflection on them, for so far as I can see, the two judgments are quite consistent with each other. There is no doubt, however, in my mind that the first judgment rendered by the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council was a general surprise. It was a surprise for this reason, that the framers of the Manitoba Act intended under that Act to prevent the local legislature of Manitoba from passing any laws which would deprive the Roman Catholic minority, or any minority in that province of separate schools. That was the intention of the framers of the Act, and more than that they thought that they used language which properly expressed that intention.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. WOOD—I have been handed to-day a copy of a letter which was written by Sir John Macdonald to a member of the local legislature of the province of Manitoba in 1889, which fully confirms that view. In 1889 this agitation first commenced. The laws, as we all know, repealing the Separate School Acts were passed in 1890. Sir John Macdonald writes as follows:

To E. J. Wood, M.P.P.

You asked me for advice as to the course you should take upon the vexed question of separate schools in your province. There is, it seems to me but one course open to you. By the Manitoba Act, the provisions of the British North America Act (section 93) respecting laws passed for the protection of minorities in educational matters are made applicable to Manitoba, and cannot be changed, for, by the Imperial Act confirming the establishment of the new provinces, 34 and 35 Vic., c. 28, sec. 6, it is provided that it shall not be competent for the parliament of Canada to alter the provisions of the Manitoba Act in so far as it relates to the province of Manitoba. Obviously, therefore, a separate school system in Manitoba is beyond the reach of the legislature or of the Dominion parliament.

It was his opinion that the separate schools in the province of Manitoba could not be abolished by the local legislature.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Or by the Privy Council's judgment.

Hon. Mr. WOOD—Or by the Dominion parliament.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—It says that the Manitoba Act could not be altered so far as the minority were concerned. The Privy Council had decided that it could.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.)—A judgment does not alter an Act of Parliament.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—The thing is clear enough.

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—It does not seem to me that the Manitoba Act is altered in any way. It is merely an interpretation of the clause.

Hon. Mr. WOOD—I do not say that the Manitoba Act is altered. What I say is this, that the intention of the framers of that Act was to use such language as to make it impossible for either the local legislature or the Dominion parliament to abolish separate schools. They thought they did use language which expressed that view, but, unfortunately, in the judgment of the Privy Council of Great Britain the language was not sufficient and they reversed the decision of the Supreme Court of Canada. This view is borne out by the very language used by the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council in the second judgment which they delivered.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—They knew more about the case then.

Hon. Mr. WOOD—They say it was not doubted that the object of the first subsection of section 22 was to afford protection to denominational schools, but the question which had to be determined was the true construction of the language used. Their lordships say :

> The function of a tribunal is limited to construing the words employed : It is not justified in forcing into them a meaning which they cannot reasonably bear.

That language indicates that the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council entertained this view that it was the intention, when that Act was passed, that it should make perpetual the separate school system in the province of Manitoba and guarantee it to that province for all time to come, but they were bound by the language used, and unfortunately in their opinion, the language used did not clearly express that idea. That is the point which I think this parliament should bear in mind in dealing with this question, that this whole trouble has, in the first place, arisen from the failure of this parliament to make its intention clear in that first subsection of section 22 of the Manitoba Act.

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—Does not the judgment also say that the Parliament of Canada need not do anything?

Hon. Mr. BERNIER—No, it does not say so : it says that it is not essential to do such a thing, but they must do something.

Hon. Mr. WOOD—Leaving that point, for I do not wish to detain the House too long, it has also been contended that legislation passed by this House for the purpose of establishing a separate school system in the province of Manitoba could not be made effective.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. WOOD—I believe the hon. Secretary of State endorses that view?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Yes.

Hon. Mr. WOOD—I must beg to differ from him on that point. I must confess that I did not clearly understand the reasons which the hon. gentleman advanced in support of his views. As I said before, I am not a lawyer, and perhaps not in as good a position as he is to discuss these somewhat intricate and involved legal questions, but on that point I will express my own opinion, and it is simply this : I believe that the laws of this country and the constitution under which we live, must at least have some basis in reason and common sense, and in my opinion if this Dominion parliament enacts any law which it has the right and the power to enact, the courts of the country are bound to take cognizance of that Act. I cannot see, although the hon. Secretary of State may be better able to see than I am—at all events I cannot understand why if this parliament passes a law exempting the minority in Manitoba from paying taxes for the support of schools which they do not attend, how those taxes can be collected.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—The first judgment of the Privy Council declares that they can. Of course, that is the whole point in the first judgment, paying taxes in support of the public schools.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.)—But if this parliament passes an Act saying that they shall not pay them?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—This parliament has no power to pass such an Act.

Hon. Mr. WOOD—The Privy Council have certainly decided that this parliament has the right and power to enact legislation which will restore to the Catholic minority in Manitoba their separate school system.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—You have just read the opinion of Sir John Macdonald, that this parliament cannot pass an Act that would repeal the Manitoba Act.

Hon. Mr. WOOD—That opinion, it must be remembered, was given before these cases were taken to the Privy Council, before we had these judgments of the Privy Council. I read that opinion to show that the first judgment of the Privy Council was a surprise and that the framers of that Act had intended to frame it in such a way that if their intention had been properly expressed in the Act itself, the decision of the Supreme Court of Canada in that first case would have been maintained by the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council and that would have been an end of the whole matter. In my opinion, if this parliament has the right and the power to enact a law establishing a separate school system in the province of Manitoba under existing circumstances, as the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council has decided we have, under that law, if it was enacted that the Roman Catholics should not contribute by taxation to the schools which they did not attend, it would be impossible for any power in Manitoba to collect those taxes from them. That is my opinion at all events.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Supposing an illegal tax is imposed in a municipality in the hon. gentleman's province, the rate is struck and the collector goes round, are the taxpayers in your province at liberty to refuse to pay their tax on the ground that a portion of it is illegal, or are they not obliged to pay the taxes and sue for the recovery of the portion illegally paid?

Hon. Mr. WOOD—I cannot answer that question. In any case it is only a question of legal procedure, I may say I do not think that the case which the hon. gentleman puts is at all an analogous case.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—I just put this because it is strictly applicable: supposing the Manitoba legislature imposes a tax on Roman Catholics and the Roman Catholics refuse to pay it, according to our decisions that tax must be paid. The parties might sue for the recovery of them, but if the local legislature should go a step further and declare that those municipal taxes were Crown revenues it would be a question whether the minority could refuse to pay them.

Hon. Mr. WOOD—The hon. gentleman is certainly raising an intricate question.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—There are dozens of them.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—No, I do not consider there is any intricacy about the question.

Hon. Mr. WOOD—I do not think it is applicable. I do not think it is a similar case at all. There is a different principle involved, that this is exceptional legislation specially provided for in the constitution.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B. C.)—That is it.

Hon. Mr. WOOD—That this legislature, under these exceptional circumstances existing in Manitoba to-day, shall have power to legislate to redress the grievance. If they cannot establish the separate schools, they cannot redress the grievance; and if they cannot redress the grievance, this whole part of our constitution which pretends to secure the rights of minorities, is a mere delusion and a farce.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—I am not calling that in question; but, granting the hon. gentleman's contention is true, and the local legislature acted in a contrary direction, I am pointing out this, that the collectors would have to collect the local tax.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Then the question arises as to the legality of the law.

Hon. Mr. WOOD—It appears to me ultimately the only question would be, which parliament have the right to legislate. That would be the question.

Hon. Mr. MASSON—It is the same as the revisers' list. You have got to put the name on the revisers' list, but you have to appeal to the court.

Hon. Mr. BERNIER—That would be a matter for the court to decide; but the contention is that, where there is a grievance, whether it arises from one cause or another—from a law relating to schools, or a law relating to municipal organizations—so long as it forms a grievance, this parliament has the right to legislate to check that law. This parliament is a superior power. Of course, that is a question of law.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—That is not the point I was bringing under your notice.

Hon. Mr. WOOD—I have given my opinion as to the law upon that point, and I understand that the hon. gentleman who interrupted me is to address the House tomorrow, and he will, no doubt, advance his opinion upon that point, but I certainly am driven back to the conclusion that unless this Parliament has the power to enact legislation, such as that I have referred to, establishing the separate school system for the minority in the province of Manitoba, and to create the machinery which is necessary for the purpose of carrying out that law and enabling the minority there to avail themselves of the provisions of the law, then certainly all the provisions in our statutes for the protection of minorities are simply a delusion and a farce. Besides this, I do not believe, as the hon. gentleman who last addressed the House seems to think, that any dangerous consequences would result from the enactment of such legislation. The leader of the government, when addressing the House, referred to the people of Manitoba as a very law-respecting and law-abiding people. He paid them a very just and well merited tribute in that respect, and I fully endorse everything that he said. While it is evident from what has taken place in the province, that there is a strong preference, a strong public feeling, in favour of free, non-sectarian schools, and opposed to the adoption of any separate school system, there is not, so far as I know, the slightest evidence to show that if this parliament, in the exercise of the power vested in it by the constitution, passes a law giving the minority the separate school system to which they are entitled, that there will be any disposition on the part of the majority to resist such legislation or to use any illegal means to prevent the operation of that law. I have confidence, at all events, in the good common sense and the law-abiding principles of the great majority of the people of that province, and I believe that they would respect that law, and that if such a law was passed, as I believe it should have been passed, a year or two ago, it would have gone into operation and this vexed question would have now been settled and this controversy ended. At all events the late government, when they were in power, were willing to assume that responsibility. They heard the appeal of the minority in the province of Manitoba and they granted them a remedial order, and when the legislature of the province refused to comply with the provisions of that order, they introduced a Remedial Bill into the House of Commons. If that bill had received the support of the opposition in the House, as my hon. friend from St. Boniface said, there would have been no difficulty in passing it, and it would have been now upon the statute books. The opposition, however, opposed it and it was defeated as the life of parliament expired. I am not going to discuss the motives of the opposition in opposing that bill. There is no doubt they saw in such a course an opportunity to defeat the Conservative party in this Dominion, and it is admitted that they have effected their purpose, and no doubt they feel now that the end has justified the means. However, that does not affect the position of this question. It does not affect the responsibility of this parliament. The same obligation rests upon parliament now as it did then to exercise its power to legislate upon this question. Indeed, the present parliament is in a much better position to legislate than the last parliament. The leader of the present House of Commons has a majority there supporting him. A very large proportion of those are persons of his own race and religion, the class of people in this Dominion who, above all others, are strongest in their views and sympathies in favour of the minority in the province of Manitoba, and who should be the readiest to redress their grievances and restore their rights. Besides this, the leader in the House of Commons has the assurance of the leader of the opposition in that House that he would have his assistance in passing any remedial measure of this kind. And another important matter which he should consider is, I think, that he has given a pledge to the country which he should feel himself bound to redeem, for he told the people of Canada during the elections that he would rest short of nothing except giving to his co-religionists in the province of Manitoba the very fullest measure of justice. It is true he advocated a conciliatory course, but he promised at the same time if those conciliа-tory means failed he would exercise the power vested in this parliament under the constitution and restore those rights by legislation. It appears to me a weak policy, an abandonment of his principles, to refuse now to legislate, and to accept an arrangement such as we are now considering, simply because it is the best arrangement they have been able to make with the province of Manitoba. It is simply saying "We decline to exercise the powers which are vested in us under the constitution and accept as a settlement of this question any concessions which the majority in Manitoba choose to give." The address in referring to this settlement expresses the hope that this will be the beginning of a new era to be characterized by generous treatment of one another, mutual concessions and reciprocal good-will. I fear that hope may be delusive. It is certainly a surprising way to introduce an era of generous treatment of one another, mutual concessions and reciprocal good-will by a breach of faith, by a refusal to exercise the powers which this legislature possesses to enact laws to redress the grievances and to restore the rights of a weak and helpless minority in one of the provinces of this Dominion, to fail to respect and carry out the obligations which the highest judicial authority of this empire have declared to be a solemn parliamentary compact. The hon. senior member for Halifax justified the arrangement which had been made and advised the acceptance of this settlement on account of the concessions which he pointed out it contained for the Catholic minority in Manitoba. He referred to some of the concessions which had been gained as matters of great value, particularly the privilege which the minority in Manitoba would have under the law which has recently been passed there confirming this settlement, of teaching religion, having the priest or clergyman giving religious instruction in the schools for half an hour before they closed. I was rather surprised to hear from the hon. gentleman that he regarded that as an important concession. For my own part, I regard it as a concession of no practical value whatever. So far as my observation goes, this is a privilege which no class of persons have sought to avail themselves of in any part of this Dominion. At all events, occasions where this privilege has been taken advantage of, have been very rare. I think, from my knowledge of the school laws of the different provinces, it would be quite competent in any of the provinces of this Dominion, where the majority of the trustees desire and where the parents of the pupils desire it, for a clergyman or a priest to go to the school and giving religious instruction for half an hour before the school closed.

Hon. Mr. SNOWBALL—That is the trouble.

Hon. Mr. WOOD—Perhaps the hon. gentleman will explain what the trouble is.

Hon. Mr. SNOWBALL—The religious instruction in the schools after hours is the trouble in New Brunswick. The hon. gentleman must know it.

Hon. Mr. WOOD—I do not think that is the trouble; I never heard that it was.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Not in Ontario.

Hon. Mr. SNOWBALL—In New Brunswick, I say. It has not been up before the courts for years without my hon. friend knowing it.

Hon. Mr. WOOD—I do not think the remark has anything to do with what we are discussing.

Hon. Mr. SNOWBALL—Giving religious instruction after school hours or during school hours.

Hon. Mr. WOOD—During school hours and after school hours are different things. The only point I was making—and I confess I do not see the force of the observation—was that there were very few instances in any province of the Dominion where this privilege had been desired by any class of people, or where it was granted that any class of people had taken advantage of it, and in my opinion it is a privilege to which no importance whatever will be attached by any class of people in any province of this Dominion, and can never, if it is incorporated in our school laws, be of any practical advantage whatever in the operation of any of these laws.

Hon. Mr. PROWSE—Except as a punishment.

Hon. Mr. WOOD—Except as a punishment. Besides that, it does not recognize the principle that the advocates of separate schools contend for. As I understand the position of the advocates of public schools, their desire is not simply to have a priest or clergyman to go to the school and teach religion for half an hour, but it is to have the whole morals of the school under the supervision of the church to which they belong. It is that they may see that the teachers in the schools are Christian men and women, in order that the pupils may be surrounded, while they are receiving their secular education, with religious influences, that they may have before them the example of a God-fearing man or a God fearing woman; that the influences which surround them during their earlier years, while their characters are being formed, are pure and good, and that they may learn to respect and reverence and love the Christian religion, and respect those who profess it and practice it in their lives. That is my view of the principle for which the advocates of separate schools contend, and it is a poor substitute to allow a priest or clergyman to enter a school for half an hour to give instruction in the catechism or in doctrines of the church. The hon. gentleman who last addressed this House emphasized this point, that this was to be the last we were to hear of this question. They take a great deal of comfort, too, from the result of the general elections. They look upon that as a verdict of the people in favour of the course which the present government has pursued. There is a difference of opinion upon this point among those who are in the best position to judge. In the province of Quebec, where the greatest change has taken place, there is a difference of opinion as to what has been the cause of that great change in public opinion. I do not care to express any view upon that point, but I will say this, that so far as my opinion and the results of my observation go, this proposed settlement, or this arrangement which has been entered into, is not at all events meeting with universal satisfaction. First and most important of all, it is not satisfactory to the minority in Manitoba, and if we may judge from the sentiment expressed by my hon. friend from St. Boniface, and others who think with him in this House, they are disposed to denounce this settlement in the very strongest terms. Besides this, there is no evidence to my mind that this settlement is satisfactory to the authorities of the Roman Catholic Church in any portion of the Dominion. It is true that the by-elections would seem to indicate that popular opinion favoured this settlement, that it was accepted by the majority of the people of the country. Possibly that may be so, but, for my own part, I doubt that very much. Indeed, I should be very much surprised if the Roman Catholics of this country are willing to accept this as a final settlement of this vexed question, an arrangement which does not recognize the principle for which they have been contending and which they consider of the most vital importance for the moral training and the moral welfare of their children. I do not believe they will willingly abandon those rights and privileges which the highest judicial authority in the empire has decided they are entitled to under our constitution, especially after they have contended for them at so great a sacrifice during the past seven years.

I intended to say something with regard to the tariff, but considering the lateness of the hour I shall defer my observation which I was to make on that subject except this—to express regret that the government have not dealt more promptly with this matter. It is a subject of great interest and importance to the business people of this country, and the result of the action of the government at the present time is looked forward to with the greatest anxiety. I was rather disappointed the other day when the leader of the House evaded the question put to him by the leader of the Opposition with regard to a statement purported to be made by the hon. Minister of Militia and Defence. That statement referred to the imposition of an export duty on our logs. This is a point upon which I have, for some years, held a strong opinion. I regretted very much when the late government removed the export duty from logs. In this House two years ago I pressed on the attention of the late government the enormous quantity of logs annually taken from our forests and rafted across the lakes to be sawn into lumber in the mills of the United States. I pressed upon the government the importance of introducing some legislation to prevent a continuance of that state of things. However, no action has been taken to the present time, and this country is loosing one of its most valuable natural resources. The country derives no permanent advantage from that class of business. A number of men come into the country and are employed in the woods through the winter. They are gathered from all parts of the country; no doubt many of them are Canadians and many come from the other side of the line. They work in the woods in the winter time and in the spring they go away with the logs they take out and carry their wages with them. The country gets very little advantage from such operations. If we exclude the profits which some speculators in timber limits and people of that class make out of it. In my opinion the timber of our country is one of the most important and valuable of our natural resources. Such legislation should be adopted that it will be manufactured in this country and be the means of establishing permanent industries and building up settlements, the logs should be converted into lumber in this country and the lumber into articles of commerce. In this way we would build up thriving settlements and give employment to our people, traffic to the railways, and commerce to our sea ports, and furnish a large and profitable market for the farmers of Canada. When the question was asked the other day the leader of the House evaded it by saying that he could not vouch for the newspaper reports. That was equivalent to saying that he did not know whether the Minister of Militia made that statement or not. We were not so much concerned about that as whether, if he did make the statement, he was authorized by the government to make it, and whether that was the policy of the government. I can only say I hope it is, and assure the government that if it is I shall cordially support them in carrying out that policy.

I intended to say a word about the Franchise Bill. I am sorry to say I would not be able to give the government the same assurance of support with regard to that measure, but as the hour is late I thank you, hon. gentlemen, who have remained so late, for the patience with which you have listened to me and I shall not detain you any longer.

Hon. Mr. CLEMOW moved the adjournment of the debate.

The motion was agreed to.

The Senate then adjourned.

THE ADDRESS.

THE DEBATE CONCLUDED.

The Order of the Day being called:

Resuming the further adjourned debate on the consideration of His Excellency the Governor General's speech on the opening of the second session of the eighth parliament.

Hon. Mr. CLEMOW said: Owing to the late sitting of the House last evening I was unable to make a few observations on this address, and that is the reason why I shall obtrude myself for a few minutes on your consideration. This address differs from very many others, because it contains a number of subjects which are well worthy the consideration of this House and of this country. I am not going to follow the example of gentlemen who were in opposition to the late government in finding fault with every address that is presented because it contains measures of which they did not approve, and did not contain others which they thought should be there. I am thankful for small favours on this occasion, and I trust that the House will always take into consideration measures submitted to them and decide upon them to the best of their judgment.

The first paragraph leaves no room for any difference of opinion. Every one has spoken in high terms of the subject to which it refers; that is, the celebration of the Queen's Jubilee next June. Upon that occasion I have no doubt that every city, town and hamlet in this Dominion will vie with each other in making this celebration as suitable as possible to the occasion, and will convince Her Majesty and the entire empire that there are no more loyal people throughout the empire than the people of this vast Dominion. While saying this, and knowing what will take place on the 22nd of June next, I am sorry that this city, the capital of Canada, is somewhat differently situated from the rest of the Dominion. Under circumstances beyond the control of the city authorities, it has been arranged, I believe, that a celebration shall take place on the 24th of May, from this I do not dissent, but which, it is said, is rendered necessary on account of the troops not being available for the celebration on the 22nd of June. So far as the city of Ottawa is concerned, the celebration of the 22nd of June will be a blank. While the whole Dominion will be ablaze, celebrating the Queen's Jubilee, the capital of Canada will be unable to join in the demonstrations. This is a deplorable circumstance. The people of the city take it severely and they do not know why, at the seat of government, where the Governor General resides and who is supposed to be present on the occasion, the troops will not be available to make this celebration what it should be. I bring the matter for the consideration of the House and government of the country in order that they may find the means whereby the troops may be had for a celebration on the 22nd of June. It is proposed—a very silly proposition in my mind—that the Queen's Jubilee celebration shall take place on the 24th of May. It is an extraordinary thing to celebrate an event before it occurs and is quite contrary to the wishes and desires of Her Majesty, who has stated that she did not wish any celebration to take place anterior to the date at which it should occur. I hope the government will take this matter in hand, and find whether we can obtain the assistance of the troops on that occasion or not, because I want it to be distinctly understood that the citizens of Ottawa are anxious, and always have been, to celebrate the occasion in a becoming manner on the 22nd of June. I do not know what influenced the authorities to take a different course. We made application and were told that, owing to prior arrangements, it was impossible to obtain the assistance of the troops on that occasion, and we all know that without the assistance of the troops on such an occasion, the celebration will not be worth mentioning. Above all things, at the place which the Queen decided upon as the seat of government, it would be unbecoming of us not to have the celebration carried out in such a manner as will bring conviction to the mind of Her Majesty that the people are not ungrateful for the honour conferred upon them in making Ottawa the capital of the Dominion. I ask the assistance and co-operation of the leader of this House—a gentleman whom I know to be thoroughly patriotic and anxious to do all that he can to promote a loyal sentiment in this country—I ask his assistance and co-operation, in order that we may have the troops here on the occasion referred to. It is reported—I do not know whether it is true or not, for I am not in the secrets of the government—that it is proposed to erect a museum in Ottawa in commemoration of the event of this city being made the seat of government. I think a scheme of that kind, or the erection of some remarkable structure, should be decided upon, in order to show that the people here fully appreciate the action of Her Majesty in selecting Ottawa as the capital. That is a matter that I wish to bring prominently before the members of the Senate and of the government in time, in order that provision may be made for it, if my suggestion is adopted. The next question of importance in the speech is the reference to the Manitoba schools. I do not intend to say very much about it; it is one of those semi-religious questions, very difficult to discuss, and I, for one, am not going to dwell upon it at any length. We have had many discussions of this kind, and yesterday had one of an extraordinary and unprecedented character presented to us by the hon. gentleman from De Lanaudière. I regret, and I believe the majority of this House regret, that the hon. gentleman found it necessary to refer to occurrences of a quarter of a century ago, and unearth serious charges against one of the most illustrious men of the Dominion—the man who has done more to advance the interests of Canada than any one that ever lived or who may live in the future. I am grieved at what the hon. gentleman from De Lanaudière has done, because it is contrary to the practice and traditions of men of his race, and I thought he would be the last man to bring up charges of this kind against one who has done so much for his country, and that he would let the ashes of the dead statesman rest in peace. He seems to have kept copies of all the proceedings to which he has referred and they have been retained in his possession for years; why he should bring them up at the present time, to create further discord among the people, is beyond my comprehension. I hope the hon. gentleman will see that he has committed a fatal error in maligning the character of the late Sir John Macdonald, whom he has indicted as the worst of criminals. But what are the facts? It is well known to every hon. gentleman in this House that for many years Sir John Macdonald led this country by a majority from Quebec. I believe I am correct in stating that that fact caused such displeasure amongst his own friends in Upper Canada that he was not able to obtain a majority of supporters there, because it was said he was under French domination. But Sir John Macdonald was a great chieftain; he settled difficult questions of race and creed, and his whole policy was to promote peace, prosperity and harmony amongst the people of the Dominion. But now, when he is dead and his bones are resting quietly in Cataraqui cemetery, these scandals are unearthed and brought to the light of day. Surely the public men of Canada have enough to undergo in their lifetime without being followed by enemies to their graves. They are abused on every occasion. There was no day of the year during the life of the departed premier that he was not held up to scorn and ridicule in this country by his opponents. Surely, after undergoing all that, and after accomplishing what he has done in reconciling differences of creed and class, in his desire to make the population of Canada a homogenous people, he deserved something better than the attack that was made upon his memory yesterday. It was not only questions of race and creed that he settled, but great questions of commercial importance, such as the building of railways and canals, the settlement of the North-west —in fact, he was the head and front of all such undertakings. I think it is nothing but right that we should bear testimony to the worth of the man who has done so much for his country, and not malign him now that he is in his grave. I merely refer to the matter now to show that I take exception to the unearthing of matters of this kind at this late date, when Sir John Macdonald is dead and cannot reply. Would the hon. gentleman from De Lanaudière have dared to bring forward his accusations if Sir John Macdonald had been in a position to reply? I doubt very much if he would. The late premier was a man who was well able to defend himself on all occasions. Whatever faults he had, and I suppose he had faults like other men, he did his best for his country. He was the head of the Conservative party—the party of progress in this Dominion, the party to whom the country owes everything; therefore I think his memory should be revered. With respect to the Manitoba school question, it has been discussed from all points of view—legal, theological and otherwise, but there is one matter to which I would refer and that is the constant rubbing into the Protestants of this country by our Roman Catholic friends that we are a Godless people, that we want our schools entirely free from any religious instruction. I tell those hon. gentlemen that such is not the case. There is only one member in this chamber, as far as I know, who came forward and made the bald and bold assertion that, as far as he was concerned, he would certainly have no religion of any kind taught in the public schools of the country. As far as the great majority of the people are concerned, they dissent from that proposition. The church to which I belong is just as strongly in favour of religious instruction in the public schools as the Roman Catholic Church is. We are willing and anxious, upon all occasions, to have a certain amount of religious instruction in the schools. But, hon. gentlemen of the Roman Catholic faith seem to think that they monopolize the whole religious sentiment of the day. I give them all credit for their sincerity in supporting their religion as they think best, and agitating for separate schools as they think best, but they should give Protestants credit for being just as earnest for the spiritual welfare of their children as they are, and being as earnest in promoting the cause of religion. In this city we have both public and separate schools. The separate schools are conducted, I believe, pretty fairly. Of course, difficulties sometimes arise in all systems of scholastic education, but as a general thing I believe the schools of Ottawa get on very well and there is no disagreement between them. In our high school, we open with prayer in the morning and have a certain amount of Scripture read, and I deny that our schools are Godless. I do not think it is right to accuse us of being so Godless as to exclude the Bible and prayers from schools. It will not hurt any child to hear the Lord's Prayer repeated, or a chapter from the Holy Scriptures read, and that is what we have done, are doing and will continue to do, I hope, for all time to come. As far as Manitoba is concerned, I suppose you may consider the question on the verge of settlement in some way. Whether the present settlement is satisfactory or not remains with two parties to determine. Had the Greenway government exercised forbearance and shown a disposition to meet the representatives of the Bowell government when they went to Winnipeg, the matter would have been settled satisfactorily to all parties, but it was not the intention of Mr. Greenway or Mr. Sifton from the start to settle this question in any other way than through Mr. Laurier.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. CLEMOW—They succeeded in that. Now, let them fight it out themselves. It is a matter with which they are principally concerned. I believe the minority have been deprived of certain rights, and when men possess rights they do not like to part with them. I know I would not, but whether the Catholics can be placed in the same position as they occupied originally, is for the parties interested to decide. The hon. gentlemen have heard the decision of the Privy Council read. My hon. friend from Saint Boniface has given you a full account of it, and he can, no doubt, speak by the hour on the question, because he is familiar with every phase of the subject. I am not conversant with it, and talk as a layman about these school matters. I simply want equal justice to all men. I believe in equal justice to all and privileges to none. The rights I demand for myself, I am prepared to extend to others. That is the course I have pursued during my life and will continue to pursue in future. I hope that the difficulties of race and creed in this country will be settled satisfactorily, because we want every man in the Dominion to work harmoniously with his neighbour for the general good of the country. If it is not settled satisfactorily now the blame must rest on the right shoulders. It cannot rest on Sir Mackenzie Bowell, who did what a loyal man should do. He thought he was compelled, as First Minister of the Crown, to obey the mandate from England. He did so to the best of his knowledge and he was beaten. He lost the premiership, and is now a private in the ranks like ourselves. If Sir Mackenzie Bowell had remained in power, matters would have been different, but we must accept the present condition of affairs. We find a state of confusion prevailing; one party states that the difficulty is settled, and others say it is not. Time alone will tell what the result will be. Let us be reasonable and take the best course we can under all the circumstances. We know there is a variety of opinions on the subject. You cannot talk to a man who has a different opinion from your own on this subject because he will not bear with you at all. You must either agree with him or you are nobody. I do not say that the intolerance is confined to any one side. We have extreme Protestants as well as extreme Roman Catholics. I have never said anything on this subject before, and I did not want to say anything about it now, but it is forced on me by the paragraph in the Speech from the Throne, and it is just as well to say once for all that this question is now in the hands of Mr. Laurier and his friends and they must settle it among themselves.

The next paragraph refers to the most important question in the speech, the tariff. I was glad to hear the other day from the gentleman who introduced these resolutions that there was no disposition to interfere seriously with the present tariff, that he wanted to conserve the rights of all parties. He very justly said that an enormous amount of money has been invested in the establishment of manufactories and carrying on business, and that if any great change takes place it will ruin those people. He deplored such a state of things, as any wise man should deplore it. Under the circumstances the national policy, which has done so much for this country in the past, should be continued, and I believe the present government are alive to that fact. We have seen a number of ministers perambulating through the country from one end to the other, taking the opinions of their friends and of the manufacturers and business men of the Dominion. I believe they have come to the conclusion, whatever their opinions may have been when in opposition, that the policy inaugurated and carried out by the Conservative government during the past 18 years, is the best for the country. It is the best vindication that we could have had of the wisdom of the course pursued by the Conservative party. Hon. gentlemen say that altered circumstances have a great deal to do with it. No such thing; we had the same condition of things in the past, the same trouble to overcome, and we met the difficulty by a wise policy. We consulted the people who are interested, and the Liberals abused us for having done so. They said that the late government had no right to consult the people, and some members of the other House went so far as to say that if such a thing were done by their own friends, when they came into power, they would not support them for a moment. Still, their friends have done it, and they support them; they are better able now to judge of the propriety of carrying out the national policy than they ever were before. I hope they will adhere to the wise policy of their predecessors, and, as this paragraph says, "make no changes which will affect injuriously any vested interests in this country." That is the true course for statesmen to adopt, and if they follow that policy I believe that the majority of this House, and of this country, will sustain them. The question arises whether we are Conservatives or Liberals. I do not know really what I am at the present time. Some people say that every one has gone Liberal; but it looks very much to me as if every one had become Conservative. Our opponents have stolen our clothes and are carrying out the policy which the Conservative government pursued. Their eyes are open now and they see the true state of things. They did not see clearly before, but now they do. The whole country is waiting, in anxious suspense, to be enlightened as to their policy on this all important subject, and I hope that no time will be lost in giving to the public the necessary information on the subject. We hear occasionally that one minister says this and another minister says that, but we are assured that nobody had official authority for making such statements. No minister of the Crown should give information of the kind to anybody until it is submitted to the representatives of the people in parliament. I know the old ministry were as close as oysters on such questions. You could not get the least information from them, but these gentlemen are inclined to give information to the public before it is furnished to the representatives of the people. I feel strongly on this tariff question. I am not a free trader; I have been a protectionist from the word go, and shall continue so as long as the exigencies of the country require it. A time may come when the country will be so rich and prosperous that a change may be desirable, but under present circumstances the national policy is absolutely necessary to meet the necessities of the country. The next clause refers to the Franchise Act. I, with a great many others, take exception to the Franchise Bill as submitted to the other House. I admit that the present Act requires very serious amendment and improvement. It is too cumbersome and expensive, but with some amendments it could be made to work admirably. Some hon. gentlemen say, "It is all very well for you to talk. When you were in power you had the patronage, the power of appointing revising officers." That power is now transferred to the present government; but, after all, what does it amount to? The late government, as a general thing, appointed judges to act, and we know as soon as a man becomes a judge he is no longer a partizan, but fulfils his duties in an impartial way. If there is any advantage in it, the government can appoint their own officers in the future, and I wish them joy of all they can get from that. In my experience we never got anything at all through the revising officers; on the contrary, our experience was the reverse, because they were considered Conservatives and they used to stretch a point sometimes and give decisions adverse to the Conservatives lest their actions might be impugned because of their former political proclivities. I think the franchise should rest with the Dominion, and that this highest legislative body should not be subject to the jurisdiction of inferior bodies. I hope that this part of the speech will be amended, and that, instead of changing the franchise, the present Franchise Act will be amended and improved without disturbing the principle upon which it is based.

The next paragraph refers to the canals. I am, and always have been, a great advocate for the enlargement and improvement of our canals. It has been the policy of the Conservative party from time immemorial, and the government are merely carrying out the policy initiated by their predecessors. The policy is right, and I am only sorry that, while so large an expenditure is to take place on the St. Lawrence canals, no appropriation is to be made for the construction of the Ottawa canal. You can deepen the existing canals and enlarge the locks, but you cannot interfere with nature and shorten the distance. The Ottawa canal has advantages over all other routes; it is the shortest route between the east and the west, and if you can save five or six hundred miles of transportation, the matter is of such importance that it cannot be overlooked. While I do not find fault with the expenditure on the St. Lawrence canals, I think if an equal amount of money were spent on the Ottawa canal, it could defy competition. We would have had this canal years ago when some money was spent upon a portion of it, but unfortunately thirty or forty years ago the work was suspended under circumstances beyond the control of the government at that time, and no work has since been done upon it. We had not influence enough here to have the work resumed, while other parts of the country had public money expended for their benefit which should have been devoted to opening up this great route. We find that all men, scientific and practical, capable of giving an unbiassed opinion on the subject concur in the belief that this is the only route that can be had that will attain the main object in view—that is, to furnish the shortest route from the North-west to the seaboard. I am told there is a company now willing to subscribe sufficient money to build that canal, and that a proposition has been made to the government to deposit that money with them on certain conditions. Whether the proposition is a practicable one or not, I do not know, but if it is practicable and the government will take up the work, no greater boon could be conferred upon the country, because the construction of the canal would shorten the distance between the North-west and the seaboard. It would cheapen transportation, and at the same time open up an artery through the country that will be of the greatest value in the future. In case of disturbance between this country and the neighbouring republic, we would have an independent route and be free to do our business in our own way, and secure the entire carrying trade of the great North-west.

Another proposition has reference to the extension of the Intercolonial Railway to Montreal. I am not in a position to give any very decided opinion upon this matter, but it occurs to me that so long as a transfer has to be made, it matters very little whether it takes place at Montreal or Quebec. We all know that the Intercolonial Railway has not been a paying concern. Whether this extension will increase its earning power or not, I cannot say, but it seems to me that you can transfer the freight at Quebec as advantageously as at Montreal, and you can get running powers over either the Canadian Pacific Railway or the Grand Trunk Railway at a cheaper rate than you can build a line for yourselves. However, that is a matter which requires great consideration, and I have no doubt, before anything is done, it will receive that consideration at the hands of the government. It is said that an arrangement has already been made to carry out this project. I do not believe any government would be so rash as to enter into an arrangement of the kind without consulting the representatives of the people.

The next paragraph refers to cold storage. Every one knows the advantage of providing cold storage. In addition to that, I should have been glad to see a clause in the speech promising a fast line. That is an important factor in the trade of this country. I want to see Canada stand second to no country in the world, and I want all the communications we have equal to, if not better than, those of our neighbours. We surpass them in our canals and railways, let us surpass them in our Atlantic service also. I am ambitious, but I have seen this country grow from nothing up to its present position. I saw the first line of railway built and opened for traffic, and I see what the railway development of Canada is to-day, and have great faith in the future of the country. No country has progressed in such a satisfactory manner as Canada, under all the circumstances. With reference to prohibition, I take no stock in the plebiscite at all. It is one of those cases where people do not vote honestly. They will vote for prohibition one minute and the next minute go to a bar to drink. There is no honesty about it at all, and I take no stock in the plebiscite. If the government submit it to the people, I believe it will be rejected.

There are some measures promised ; when they come before us we can give an intelligent opinion on them. With respect to the bills dealing with the civil service and superannuation, I hope every care will be taken to make the service efficient, and that no change will be made which will prejudicially affect the gentlemen who have so long assisted the government in carrying on public affairs. The dismissals, since the change of government, have been simply contemptible. Employes have been dismissed for taking part in the elections, and what are the government doing? They are dismissing men for partizanship and filling their places with friends of their own who will be just as partizan, and there will be no change in the complexion of affairs at all. I know the civil servants of the city very well. I believe last year they were a little out of sorts, and a majority of them voted for the Liberals. I do not know that as a fact, but I have reason to believe it. Be that as it may, these civil servants are entitled to every consideration at the hands of the people's representatives. I do not want to see them unfairly dealt with. I want to carry out every agreement with them fairly and honestly. I hope the government will take that view of the matter and consider themselves obliged to treat the civil servants in a fair and just manner.

There is one other matter which has not been referred to by any one that I wish to bring up—that is the recent conflagration in the western block, a most disastrous fire which will entail a loss estimated at from a quarter of a million to a million dollars. I merely sound a note of warning to the government. These public buildings are fire traps. In the eastern block public documents of incalculable value are stored. If they were lost, money could not replace them, yet they are piled up in the upper portion of the eastern block, which is simply a mass of inflammable material. Nobody knows how the fire originated in the western block—there has been no investigation or inquiry. Every year thousands of dollars have been voted to provide apparatus for the protection of these buildings, and yet it is not looked after. When the fire took place in the western block the hose was not in order and no water could be procured. When I first saw that fire two or three pailfuls of water would have put it out, but nobody seemed to have an idea where the fire was or how it could be extinguished. The government ought to take this matter in hand and provide some fire-proof building in which to store these valuable papers. I have brought this matter before the House on other occasions. I have shown where great quantities of lumber are piled within the city limits, and if those piles of lumber were to take fire, nothing could save these buildings from destruction. There is water, but no fire appliance to use it. The people of this city are amazed at the quiet way in which the fire in the western block has been allowed to pass. Look at our valuable library. It was intended to be fire proof, yet there is a wooden casing above the iron work. If that library were destroyed, nothing could replace it. The same may be said of the Geological Museum, which is situated in the worst part of the city, in a building utterly unfit for the purpose. This important matter has been brought to the notice of the government from time to time, but no action has been taken. If that building were to be destroyed by fire, money could not replace the contents of the Museum. It has taken a generation to collect it, and in a few hours a fire might destroy it. The government should be alive to the importance of protecting these public buildings. They should remove all valuable papers and inflammable matter from the eastern block, and make the building fire proof. If a fire were to take place there now, all the valuable documents connected with the North-west, all the deeds of that country would be consumed, and there is no knowing what confusion would result. Nobody seems to have thought it worth while to say anything about this matter. They have simply said "The western block has been burned, and men must be employed to rebuild it." The government hired men from the township of Hull, and in that way influenced votes in favour of their candidate in the county of Wright. All the men from the township of Hull were brought over and given employment. But that is not the point I want to raise at all. I wish the people of this country to know that every possible care is taken of our public buildings, and that the people are alive to the important fact that these buildings shall be taken care of, and no expense spared to protect them from fire. Remove the lumber piles. I tried to have that done years ago and I could not succeed. If those piles should take fire, with a north-west wind blowing, nothing in the world could save the buildings. Probably hon. gentlemen do not know as much about it as I do, but I tell you it is so. Timely warning should be given and I do not believe the government will object to it. Let them take my advice, given years ago, and see that the lumber piles are removed. That will serve the public interest, and we are not to consider the private interests of the mill owners. The duty of the government is to do everything they can to protect these magnificent buildings. It would be a national calamity of the worst kind if anything should happen to the parliament buildings. We are standing in a very dangerous position, and the sooner we recognize the fact the sooner the government will apply the remedy. I am sorry I have not been able to deal with all the questions I intended to discuss, but on some future occasion, I hope to have an opportunity to give my opinion with reference to certain measures which we are told are to come before us.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—I must begin my observations by expressing my thanks to the leader of the opposition for the kindly and somewhat benevolent manner in which he referred to me as a member of this House. The hon. gentleman informed the House that we had sat for more than a quarter of a century together in the House of Commons, and that during the whole of that period he was not aware that we had ever agreed upon more than two or three important questions. The questions he mentioned were the Jesuits Estates Act and the Dual Language Bill. I think I could add one or two more to that list.

The inference which the hon. gentleman's observations suggested was that on these two or three occasions he thought I was right, and during all the rest of my political career I was in the wrong, and the evidence of that was I was not voting with the hon. gentleman. I say to my hon. friend, the leader of the opposition, that I think on those two questions which he mentioned, he rather came over to my view. The hon. gentleman will, I think, discover that the principle upon which he and I voted on these occasions was a principle perfectly consistent with those general lines upon which I, and the party with whom I had been, during my political career, associated held, and scarcely in accordance with those which he had on earlier occasions held. I congratulate my hon. friend that in his political career he has made progress. His mind has broadened and I do not think he sees things to-day just in the same light in which he saw them at earlier periods. The hon. gentleman reminds me in this regard of a story I heard told of a resident of Griffintown, who had a very great dislike to Frenchmen, and he sought an opportunity of thrashing Frenchmen whenever he got the chance. But on one occasion he found one who was more than a match for him, and when he was worsted a friend said to him, "you did not have the best of it this time," and he replied, "No, them French is improving." I think my hon. friend, in the cases which he mentioned, shows marks of improvement, and upon that improvement I feel it my duty to congratulate him. The hon. gentleman omitted one question on which we voted together and which is of some importance at the present time. I think we voted against putting the separate school clause in the Manitoba Act. I do not know what the reason for his vote was, but I have a very distinct recollection of mine. It was not that I thought the people had not a right in the province to decide for themselves, when their constitution was framed, whether they should have separate schools or not, but I thought with a population of 13,000 there was not a sufficient number to settle a constitution—that the government ought rather to have been a territorial government until there was a larger population within the province. Otherwise there was a possible chance for serious difficulty if there should be a large population of a different way of thinking, and you might maintain on ethical grounds that they ought not to be bound by a constitution framed by so small a population. I am not going to say whether that was a good rule to adopt at that time or not; that was my conviction, and I have seen no reason for altering the opinion which I then formed. There is this common feature, however, throughout the whole of British North America in which we have taken a somewhat different line from our neighbours to the south of us. All the provinces had, in some form or other, in practice or in law—at all events, in all the provinces from Ontario eastward—recognized the right of the Roman Catholics to give religious instruction in the schools in accordance with their faith. We know that in the United States, where this right is denied, and where a different practice prevails, they have in proportion to the Catholic population a larger number in the parochial schools than we have in the province of Ontario in the separate schools, and my opinion is, that in the province of Ontario we have a more efficient education given in those separate schools than they have in the United States in the voluntary institutions to which I have referred. On the school question my hon. friend said that he and I agreed in our view of the law, but that in voting we differed—that I agreed with him but voted against him. I do not think that is altogether an accurate representation of my view and of his upon the subject. I agreed with him that there was a parliamentary compact in respect to the schools in Manitoba. The Judicial Committee of the Privy Council, in one of their judgments, say so. I agreed with him that the legislation of 1890 broke that compact. I agreed with him in thinking and in holding that if the minority desire to maintain the rights and privileges which had arisen under that compact they had a grievance, but at that point I think the views entertained by my hon. friend and myself, ran in parallel lines, no further. At that point we parted company. The hon. gentleman in dealing with the subject did not disallow the bill as he might have done. The government of which he was a member, and who were responsible, could have disallowed the Act within twelve months after it was passed by the legislature of Manitoba. No doubt the government had some reason for not doing so. It was not, I fancy, that they had doubt as to the construction of the law. Of course, they were obliged to treat with respect the different opinion which the legislature and government of Manitoba held, but my impression is, after all, that the hon. gentleman and his colleagues felt that in the state of public opinion on that question, very serious discontent and dissatisfaction would exist if the government advised the Crown to exercise the power of disallowance, so that the hon. gentleman and his colleagues recognize this fact that though a right exists under the control of an executive or legislative body, it is not always expedient or prudent to exercise that power. These two departments of government stand in that regard in a somewhat different position from the judicial department of the government. The duties of the judge are clearly marked out by the law. He has nothing to do with the question as to whether his views are popular or unpopular—whether they will be received with favour by the public or whether the public will entertain an unfavourable view. But that is not the case with regard to the executive or the legislative departments of government. My hon. friend, Sir Mackenzie Bowell, as Minister of the Crown, and I daresay as a member of parliament, or at all events his colleagues in the other chamber, had some regard for their own political existence, and that is a factor which members of an administration, and members of an elective House, will always take into account, and which you cannot very well censure them for doing Now, my hon. friend referred this question to the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council, and his government obtained a decision upon the interpretation of the first subsection of the Manitoba Act—the one relating to denominational schools. The second decision was had and the provisions of the Manitoba Act relating to another and a different class of schools, the separate schools, were expounded in that second judgment. My hon. friend refers to the answer which the government of Manitoba made to the report which the Committee of the Privy Council here had made, but he seems to have forgotten the fact that the answer of Manitoba was given before the judgment—that Manitoba was acting upon the assumption that she was within her constitutional rights, and that she was not violating any compact in the course which she had taken; but the government of Manitoba, after the judgment had been given in the case of Brophy and the city of Winnipeg.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Allow me to correct the hon. gentleman. I was not referring to that. I was referring to the answer that was given to the remedial order which they received.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—I did not so understand the hon. gentleman.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I may not have been clear enough, but that is the matter to which I was referring.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Then it is my duty to accept the hon. gentleman's statement. When the government passed the remedial order and communicated with Manitoba, what did the government of Manitoba say in their despatch? I will read a portion of it:

We deem it proper also to call attention to the fact that it is only a few months since the latest decision upon the subject was given by the Privy Council. Previous to that time the majority of the Legislative Assembly of Manitoba, had, either expressly or impliedly, given pledges to their constituents which they feel loyally in honour bound to fulfil.

Now, is it not clear to hon. gentlemen that that paragraph shows that the Manitoba government admit that they were acting upon a different construction of the law from that given by the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council? Is it not also clear that they are saying to the government: "in consequence of the pledges which have been given by members to their constituents, and the position taken by the government prior to that judgment, this government is not in a position to act at the present time."

The government could not put itself at once in direct antagonism to the position which it had taken a short time before. Time must be given. Time is asked for in that communication, and if such communication had passed from the government of one civilized state to another independent civilized government, if it had announced that there were difficulties in the way of keeping its treaty obligations, and it could not act immediately—if the government did not desire war, it certainly would make the necessary concession—it would exercise the necessary forbearance—it would wait until a more favourable opportunity occurred. And is not that a necessity under a constitutional provision such as this—under which this country has for so long a period of time been called upon to act? Is it not perfectly obvious that when you place a power of this sort, not under the control of the judicial department of the government, but under the control of the political department of the government, you are obliged to take into consideration all those circumstances that the political department of the government having a duty of this sort resting upon it would be entitled to take into consideration before it undertook to act. I stated in my speech to the House of Commons last year upon the subject, referring to the speech that my hon. friend the leader of the government in this House made then in the local legislature:

> I entirely concur in the observations addressed to the local legislature by Sir Oliver Mowat. There is no right whatever given here without full, frank and earnest effort made to secure legislation from the only body that can effectively deal with the subject—the legislature of Manitoba. The effort has not been made. Those moral and constitutional considerations which alone can give us jurisdiction, are wholly wanting. We have not the necessary information. When you have worked the public mind up into a state of intense religious excitement, and are fast dividing the country into two hostile camps on other lines than those which secular questions may, you have a different condition of things from which at present the evils that are likely to spring from legislation here are far greater than those which are endured by the minority even if everything called for to give you jurisdiction existed.

I think that was a sound rule. Let us look at what was done by the government that was led by my hon. friend the leader of the opposition. When it received that judgment it seems to me its duty was to have communicated it to the local government under the cover of a despatch. It ought to have assumed that that government would honestly, at the earliest practical opportunity, undertake to carry that judgment into effect. They ought to have initiated a discussion of the subject. The correspondence ought to show everything that could be said in favour of the view that Manitoba had taken, if she were disposed to take a different view. The whole of this provision of the law is based upon the theory of negotiation, those rules that prevail between one sovereign state and another. The very object of diplomatic discussion is, by presenting everything that can be said in favour of opposite views, to modify and mollify the public judgment in both countries and to enable the governments of both to reach a fair and reasonable conclusion. Now, there was nothing done to educate the public. There were no despatches written; there was no communication had. The result was that extreme men who were in favour of one view, and other extreme men who were in favour of another view formed public opinion and you had the country divided upon those lines. I do not think that is a favourable condition. Then the hon. gentlemen did more. They appointed a meeting of the Privy Council and summoned the government of Manitoba before them during the period of their legislative session. What right had they to summon the government of Manitoba? For what purpose was that government summoned? There was no work to be done, no object to be secured by what was proposed. The only effect was to exasperate the men upon the one side, and on the other and to make a practical solution of the question more difficult. When we met in 1895, and the government of my hon. friend undertook to deal with the question, after some consideration, the subject was postponed. Another special session of parliament was called to deal with the subject, and it was assumed that negotiations would take place. The very object of the postponement was for the purpose of negotiation. My hon. friend who was at the head of the government, and now leads the opposition in this House, went to Manitoba and discussed the prospects of the crop and the state of the weather with the premier of Manitoba, I am told, and I think my authority was good—the hon. gentleman will correct me if I am wrong—that no discussion whatever as to the subject of separate schools took place between my hon. friend and Mr. Greenway.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I do not understand what the hon. gentleman refers to.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—I refer to the visit made, after the postponement of the subject for another session of parliament, by the hon. gentleman to Manitoba, I think my hon. friend met Mr. Greenway.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—No, I did not. I never met Mr. Greenway.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—And no member of his government.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—And no member of his government upon that occasion.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—I did not say upon that occasion I am saying that my hon. friend said nothing upon that question.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I never met Mr. Greenway except to bow to him when introduced to him, nor did I meet any of his Cabinet ministers except to be introduced to Mr. Sifton by Lieut.-Governor Schultz, and I have never spoken to him since.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—And as to the other members of the government?

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Well, I do not know about them. If you asked me what took place officially, I can tell you.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Of course, I cannot say anything more on the subject, but I think my hon. friend had an opportunity in the North-west and in the city of Winnipeg, between the two sessions to which I refer.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I met Mr. Greenway in Mr. Patterson's room, and merely exchanged compliments and went out.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—And not a word was said upon this very important question?

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Not a single word, good, bad or indifferent.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—I think, after all, the hon. gentleman and I agree as to that. I say the hon. gentleman failed in his duty on that occasion. My hon. friend, I suppose, was under the impression that because of that second judgment of the Privy Council, the government of Manitoba could not do otherwise than conform to the provisions of it.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I might explain to the hon. member so that there will be no misunderstanding, that while I had no personal intercourse with any of those gentlemen, I wish it not to be interfered that there had not been official communications between the government of which I was a member, and the party of which I was the head and the government of Manitoba, because we sent a most respectful answer in reply to the petition from the bishop and the minority of Manitoba, asking him, in as courteous language as the Right Honourable Sir John Thompson could put on paper, to take this matter into their consideration and if possible to come to some solution which would allay the excitement that prevailed and grant justice to the minority.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—I have in my hand here a sentence or two from an interview, while the first of those sessions was being held here, between Mr. Ouimet and a reporter of the Citizen. Mr. Ouimet said on that occasion, and I suppose the government did not dissent from the views which he expressed:

> All they ask (that is the government) is to be at liberty to add to the secular education required in the public schools such religious teaching as will meet the religious views of the minority. I may say if that had been provided for in the legislation of 1890 we would never have heard of the Manitoba school question.

I am not going into a further discussion of the Manitoba school question, but it seems to me that the settlement which has been had, if generously carried out—and my impression is that it will be generously carried out—will not differ from that which Mr. Ouimet said they were prepared to accept. Of course, a great deal depends upon the government facilitating the teaching instead of putting impediments in the way. I have no doubt whatever that the government of Mr. Greenway will undertake to furnish every facility, within the terms of the agreement, for the instruction which our Catholic fellow countrymen require that their children should receive in respect to religion. There are several things which I think are lost sight of in Manitoba. The Catholic population are largely settled together. The half-breeds are in districts by themselves. Now, with us, in the province of Ontario, we have in the county of Kent several French settlements. No separate school, as such has ever been established in those settlements, because the whole population are of one way of thinking, and the instruction which is given in a separate school where the population is mixed is given in that school, although it is designated an ordinary public school. Now, what is to prevent, in the province of Manitoba, where you have thirty or forty sections of half-breed population, the children of those people being instructed in their schools under these regulations upon exactly the same lines as they were instructed before? It is quite true that you cannot give religious instruction every half hour, or every hour, but there is half an hour set apart for the subject.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—After the school hours.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—After half-past three. Four is the hour when the period of school instruction expires. Four is the closing hour throughout the whole province of Ontario. Four is the closing hour in Manitoba, and from half-past three to four is devoted to religious instruction. Now the objection, where the school is mixed, that the Protestant children may be dismissed and be playing outside while the others are receiving religious instruction inside, and of course are more anxious to go outside and play than to stay in and receive religious instruction, seems a very frivolous objection. I heard that point made by my hon. friend, that the children who are receiving religious instruction have so little regard for it, so little interest in it, that they would rather be outside playing.

Hon. Mr. MASSON—A child is only a child, whether Protestant or Catholic.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—My hon. friend reminds me of a story of an old lady who was suffering from rheumatism. She said she wished to be in heaven and her husband said he wished to be in the tavern. She said: "I don't know how it is you always want to be in the best place." If the children think it is better to be outside playing with the other boys than inside receiving religious instruction, they must have just such an impression as the old lady had. Supposing that were true, what possible difference can it make? In the great majority of the cases the children who are dismissed go home—they do not remain around the school-room to play, so those who receive religious instruction are not likely to be disturbed, and if there were no more serious objection than that I do not think it would make very much impression upon the public. I agree with the hon. leader of the House that, in all probability, if the arrangement is given a fair trial, what has happened in Ontario will happen also in Manitoba—the law will be amended by the local legislature from time to time so as to make the schools efficient and satisfactory to the population whose children are receiving instruction within them. Having said this much on the school question, I do not propose discussing it further.

Let me say a word or two with regard to the Franchise Act, which is also mentioned in the Speech from the Throne and referred to by the hon. member from Prince Edward Island and by the hon. member from Glengarry, in a somewhat bellicose tone. The hon. gentlemen intimated that if that measure came to this House, it would be the death of it—it would never go elsewhere. I do not think that that threat is at all consistent with the duties that rest upon hon. gentlemen as members of the second chamber.

Hon. Mr. McMILLAN—Of the first chamber.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Of the upper chamber—the better place above.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Perhaps you prefer the tavern below.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Let me say this, that since 1832 the rule has been well settled in England, that where the opinion of the country has been definitely taken upon a measure, while the House of Lords may undertake to amend such a measure, they never undertake to delay or defeat it. No rule is better settled than that. This question as to the franchise has been an issue between the friends of my hon. friend opposite and the Liberal party who are now in power. It was an issue in the last election. It was one of the questions on which the country pronounced. There has been an appeal to the political sovereignty of this country on the question, and the electorate have pronounced in favour of the adoption of the principle which the government have promised to submit to us in a bill this session. That being so, it is not open to this House—it would be wholly inconsistent with the dignity of this House—to avail themselves of the opportunity to defeat a measure upon which the public opinion of the country has been taken, and in reference to which the government are obeying a mandate which they received from the country at the last election.

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—Was that the sole question on which parties were divided?

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Certainly it was not the sole question, but it was one of the questions. In the English parliamentary system, you seldom have a single question submitted to the country. You sometimes have half a dozen, but if they are embraced within the policy of the party, if they have been accepted by its leaders, if they have been advocated and promulgated by the leaders of a party, and the country has returned that party to power, then it has also declared its opinion with reference to the measures upon which that party succeeded.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—Then we must pass any measure that this government brings in. That is what it amounts to.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—The hon. gentleman says we must pass any measure, not any measure, but a measure upon which the opinion of the country has been taken embracing a principle upon which the voice of the people has been sought and been pronounced. I say it is the duty of this House to acquiesce.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—I differ altogether from the hon. gentleman that public opinion has been pronounced upon that question.

Hon. Mr. McMILLAN—I never heard of it in our counties. It is true it was laid down in the platform that the Reformers adopted here, but that is the last we heard of it until now, as being a party question.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Since 1885, every session of parliament we have taken the opinion of the House on the subject.

Hon. Mr. McCALLUM—I say this in justice to the hon. gentleman, it has been talked of a great deal. The great Liberal party of this country advocated that, the same as they advocated free trade, but it has not been a question before the country. We are not going to be committed to anything before we see the bill. Then we will deal with it, and deal with it liberally. I say, for one, there should be an improvement on the old system, and there is no doubt at all we will get an improvement, but to say that we are going to adopt the franchises of the local legislatures—one place they may have universal suffrage, another place, property qualification—is something of which I cannot approve. I want the members of the House of Commons, when elected, to come to the House under the same franchise.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—I am not going into a discussion of the merits of a measure that we have not before us, but I am stating a principle—a principle that was recognized in this country from 1867 until 1885. I point out to hon. gentlemen that that principle was enunciated, was formally declared as a part of the policy of one of the great parties in the state, that an election was held, and that the country has pronounced upon that as it has pronounced upon every other proposition that the Liberal party had submitted, and just as they pronounced on every other proposition which hon. gentlemen opposite had submitted. That being so, I am content with simply stating that it would be a departure from the recognized functions of an upper chamber to do, what the hon. gentleman from Prince Edward Island and the hon. gentleman from Glengarry have declared it was their intention to do.

Turning away from the subject of the franchise, let me say a few words with regard to the tariff. I have no doubt whatever that the present government will consider all existing interests. It would be a very strange government indeed that would not do so. There is nothing in the policy of the party, there is nothing in any principle to which it is committed and which it has enunciated, inconsistent with that position. No one ever supposed that in advocating the principles of free trade in this country we were advocating the abolition of customs duties, but we were advocating certain lines or certain principles which have to be kept in view in framing a tariff. But these are not the only ends to be kept in view. There are a great many industrial institutions existing in the country that, perhaps, it would have been advantageous to the country if they had not sprung up. Looking at the question from purely economic grounds, it might have been better if they had no existence, some of them at least, but existing, having been called into existence largely by the protective tariff, a government is bound to consider them, not simply on economic grounds, but it is bound to consider them on social grounds; because you could not uproot an institution and throw out of employment a large number of people connected with it, even though they got immediate employment elsewhere, without serious social disturbances, and that is also a matter which every government is bound to take into consideration. We are also bound to take into consideration our environment. We must not overlook the manner in which others propose to deal with us, and it is our duty to pursue what our own interest calls for. That interest may be based upon economic considerations, or it may be based upon political considerations which are not economic. It may be advantageous to a government and to a country to adopt a policy that economically causes them to suffer a certain amount of loss, if the result is to be that thereby they can modify or change the policy of a neighbour. And I say all these matters we are bound to take into consideration, and all these matters, I have no doubt whatever, the government will take into consideration, and the fact that they do consider them and that their value is estimated and determined in the tariff which is proposed, is not any indication that they have departed from some one principle which it was important to make prominent and to discuss with more than usual fulness. If I were to follow my own inclination I would not be disposed to help those who did not help me, and I would not be disposed to hurt myself for the sake of hurting them. I think that it is possible for us to extend our trade with the mother country. I think it is possible to do so without impairing our revenue, and without subjecting ourselves to any reasonable remonstrance from those to the south of us. I believe that on many grounds it is of consequence to us, to impress on the mother country that we are in the empire and that we are in the empire to stay, that we have no intention of associating ourselves politically with the country to the south of us, that we believe that with British institutions and the system of parliamentary government that exists in this country, we are capable of a moral progress—we are capable of a degree of prosperity arising from moral considerations which can never be obtained under the constitution of our neighbours, and my opinion is that the more clearly we impress upon the mother country that that is our position, the more we will do to secure immigrants from the United Kingdom to Canada, because no one of intelligence who is devoted to his own country, would be disposed to come in our midst and become a citizen, if he thought it was simply a half-way house into the neighbouring republic. We cannot do this country a greater service than to earnestly impress upon the minds of the people of the United Kingdom that in coming to Canada they are coming to a country that is part of the empire, and is likely for all time to come to remain a portion of that empire. I agree with what is said in the Speech from the Throne in reference to Her Majesty's reign. There has been no period in English history to be compared with it. You can point to no century of time—I do not think you can point to any two centuries of time—where there has been the same degree of progress that has marked the sixty years that Her Majesty has been upon the throne of the British empire. Within twelve years the area of the empire has grown from eight and one-half millions to eleven and one-quarter millions of square miles, and its population has increased by 40,000,000. The revenues have enormously increased during that period of time, and I think that the feeling of every considerate man, must be, whether in the Liberal ranks or in the Conservative ranks, that it is in the interest of this country to remain a portion of that empire, and to do everything in the power of the government of this country to cement Canada durably into the great country of which we form a part.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—So many observations have been made upon the Speech from the Throne during this debate that I hope the House will not weary of the few observations which I may take the opportunity of making upon some of the subjects discussed in it. I have listened with a very great deal of pleasure to much that has been said in regard to many of the questions here debated, and particularly upon the question which has received greater attention than any other subjects which have come under our consideration, namely the Manitoba school question. I cannot refrain from giving expression to a few views which I hold upon this very important subject and which may not possibly be in harmony with the views entertained by many hon. gentlemen in this House. According to my conception of this subject —at least of the stage which it has at present reached— I venture to say that there is a more important phase of the subject than the Remedial Bill or the settlement entered into by the present government, namely, whether the country will view with approbation a great party, such as the Liberal party of this Dominion, appealing to the country upon a public question of this importance and representing beyond all question the attitude which they intend to take upon it, and securing not only the sympathy but the support of the electorate of the country to such an extent as to defeat the late administration and to place them in power, and then, having received that support and having announced a platform most uncompromising in its nature, to immediately disregard the solemn compact into which they had entered with the electors and to adopt a settlement which is absolutely at variance and absolutely in conflict with the professions which they had made. It therefore becomes, to my mind, a matter of consistency on the part of a great political party whether the representations which they may make to the electorate are to be observed in their integrity, or whether they can take advantage of circumstances that may arise to place themselves in a better position and thus sacrifice what I may term public faith. I say that is the position adopted by the Liberal party on this very important question. Before entering upon a discussion of the details which have received the consideration of the House up to the present juncture of this debate, I might ask hon. gentlemen if they could for one moment conceive that, had Mr. Laurier appealed, for instance, to the electors of Quebec upon the settlement which has been laid upon the table of the House, and which has been entered into by the two governments, will any hon. gentleman in this House— no matter how strong a supporter he may be of the present administration— conceive for one moment that the electorate of Quebec would have pronounced the way they did at the general election in June last? I say most positively, without fear of contradiction, that Mr. Laurier could not have received one supporter from the province of Quebec had he announced upon that occasion that his policy on this question was embodied in the settlement which has been laid upon the table of this House, and which to-day he claims credit for, as having settled this most vexed question. I therefore say that the Liberal party hold the reins of power to-day by reason of an utter disregard of the representations which they made to the electorate when they appealed to them in the month of June last. And, therefore, in my humble judgment, the most important question to be considered in this alleged settlement is the fact as to whether the public of this great Dominion will countenance uncertainty, inconsistency, duplicity of the kind which has placed those gentlemen in power. There was a phase, which was discussed at length, of this subject which in the past received a great deal of attention from the hon. Secretary of State, namely the question of disallowance. That hon. gentleman seems to think it necessary to advance some excuse whereby the blame for the hostility and the animosity created upon this question should be saddled upon the late administration, so that the present government may be relieved by reason of their not having granted to the minority the redress which the minority expected, and he formulated, as an excuse for the position taken by the Liberal party in not being able to grant a larger measure of redress, the fact that this difficulty might have been remedied long ago had the government exercised the power vested in them of disallowance. I have some material here bearing upon this important phase which I will take the liberty of referring to. Hon. gentlemen will remember that it was in 1890 that the Manitoba government repealed the old School Act and passed the legislation at present on the statute book. It was in the spring of that year that the statute was passed repealing the old Manitoba School Act. We find that in the spring of the same year the federal parliament was in session and, at a time when the hon. Secretary of State says that the late administration should have exercised its power of disallowance, we find the Liberal party at once taking the initiative steps to prevent the government of the day from in any way committing itself to so dangerous a ground as I consider it to be, namely, the exercise of the veto which they have in regard to provincial legislation. In 1890 the then leader of the Liberal party brought before parliament a resolution, protesting on very strong grounds against the Governor in Council exercising the right of disallowance of those particular Acts. On the 29th April, 1890, Mr. Blake says:

> Pursuant to the notice which I gave some days ago I rise to move in amendment, to leave out all the words after "that" and insert the following: "It is expedient to provide means whereby on solemn occasions touching the exercise of the power of disallowance or the appellate power as to educational legislation, important questions of law or fact may be referred by the executive to a high judicial tribunal for hearing and consideration in such mode that the authorities and parties interested may be represented, and that a reasoned opinion may be obtained for the information of the executive."

Now, I doubt very much if the Governor in Council at that particular time received official information from the province of Manitoba as to the Acts in question. One is astonished—and yet one should not be astonished when one is familiar with the conflicting attitudes that have been taken by the Secretary of State on public questions—that a member of the present administration should take so strong a position upon a principle which has always been most strongly fought for and advocated and most strongly protested against by the Liberal party, namely, the exercise of the power of disallowance. And we find the hon. gentleman from Bothwell re-echoing practically the same sentiments as those that have been repeated over and over again by the hon. Secretary of State on this important subject, namely, that the power of disallowance should have been exercised, and would have wiped out of existence, so to speak, the Acts of 1890, and would have quieted this question for all time to come. One is struck with the humour of the remark made by the hon. Secretary of State, that the power of disallowance should have been exercised, and thus have quieted for all time to come this question which has created so much public attention, so much hostility, and so much animosity throughout the Dominion, and which has resulted in the defeat of one government and the placing of another in power. My hon. friend says that if it had been disallowed before legislation had been passed by which there could have been an appeal from the Supreme Court to the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council, the Supreme Court would have decided in a particular way; the province of Manitoba not having the right to appeal to the Privy Council, would have at once recognized that they were wrong in the passage of the legislation in question, and hence its quietus. My hon. friend might as well say, in regard to mischievous boys, that they are better killed in their youth, lest when they become men, they become troublesome. My hon. friend seems to overlook the principle of British justice, that a province as well as an individual has the right to seek redress or to have tested by the highest court in the empire, any question which may arise, and particularly questions involving matters of such great importance as that embodied in the legislation in question, the disallowance of which my hon. friend so strongly agitated. My hon. friend is entirely in error in saying that the right of appeal did not exist at the time of the passage of the Manitoba School Act of 1890. I say that my hon. friend is in error, in saying that the right of appeal was embodied in the amendments to the Supreme Court Act of 1891. Any hon. gentleman, by referring to that Act will find that it makes no provision for an appeal to Her Majesty's Privy Council, that the appeal to Her Majesty's Privy Council from a reference to the Governor in Council to the Supreme Court remained very much in the same position at that time as it did at the earlier date when the Supreme Court and Exchequer Court Act was passed, and we find that it was not by virtue of any provision made in the Act to which my hon. friend refers, and which he says was passed, or which he impliedly says was passed for the purpose of establishing this legislation, because we find in the Brophy case a special application being made to the Privy Council for the purpose of this appeal being heard, and it was under the special leave which was given that the appeal was heard. We also find by reference to the speech made by the hon. gentleman from Bothwell at the last session of parliament, that he himself took very strong grounds on the question of disallowance, a matter on which he seems to have changed his mind recently and which to-day he advocates. If my hon. friend will remember, upon this occasion he expressed himself on the question of disallowance which he says to-day might have been exercised at that particular time which I presume he says the government should have done.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—I did not say that.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—You said it might have been done.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—You said the government might have exercised the right of disallowance at that particular time.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—I suppose my hon. friend will not deny they might have done so?

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—I assume, if the government exercise that power, it would exercise it wisely, it would exercise it presumably when it had a right to do so; but my hon. friend, when in the Commons, took very strong grounds on that question and expressed himself in very strong language on this particular question, and gave evidence of the opinion which he then entertained that the power of disallowance should not have been exercised by the government.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—I did not say anything to the contrary of that to-day.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—The hon. gentleman said:

> We must bear in mind that parliament has no power to interfere with a provincial right. There is no point at which it can come in contact with such a right. The power by which provincial rights may be interfered with is the power of disallowance, but this power rests with the Governor General in Council, and is restrained by the conventions of the constitution. The parliament of Canada can pass no measure invading any provincial right or encroaching upon any provincial privilege.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—That is so; it would be ultra vires if it did.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—The opinion then expressed by my hon. friend is the opinion which I certainly hold, and the opinion which was then followed by the government of the day, and which I fancy any public man in Canada must necessarily conclude is the only wise course to follow under such circumstances. But assuming the government had exercised the power of disallowance, does the hon. the Secretary of State think for a moment that the people of Manitoba would have sat meekly down and permitted a provincial right to be invaded, would have permitted the privileges which were their's to be encroached upon by the government of the day and not re-enact the Act in question? Hon. gentlemen who take this position must forget the attitude of that province on the Manitoba Railway Acts when they passed those Acts over and and over again after the Governor in Council had exercised the power of disallowance. And so in this particular, public opinion was then aroused to such an extent upon this question that the province would have sat if necessary from the 1st of January to the 31st of December to assert their rights under the constitution they had, and entirely apart from the merits or demerits of the School Act would certainly have re enacted it until the government of the day became convinced that public opinion was with them upon that particular subject. There is another phase of the matter to which I would take the liberty of referring, and that is the settlement itself. My hon. friend the leader of this House seemed to express himself as holding the opinion that a satisfactory settlement had been arrived at, and that the public of this Dominion was satisfied with the settlement. My hon. friend seems to be more confident upon that particular subject than the Speech from the Throne itself. I trace a little doubt in the Speech from the Throne as to whether this matter has given entire satisfaction to the Dominion. The government put into the mouth of His Excellency the Governor General, in delivering the speech, the very happily expressed sentiment:

> I confidently hope that this settlement will put an end to the agitation which has marred the harmony and impeded the development of our country, and will prove the beginning of a new era to be characterized by generous treatment of one another, mutual concessions and reciprocal goodwill.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—"Confidently hope" is strong enough.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—Certainly, there are expressions in the English language which in form may be very strong, but which imply a certain amount of weakness, doubt and uncertainty, and I fancy that this particular expression, couched as I say in very choice language, rather indicated a feeling on the part of the government, at the time when they prepared the address, that they were not at all certain, but hoped, and hoped very strongly and very confidently, that the settlement would eventuate in satisfaction to all parties. If the address had complimented the government upon the adroitness and tactical ability which they had displayed in securing this alleged settlement, I would have been entirely in sympathy with the expressions contained in the address, but when it undertakes to say that a settlement has been reached, I certainly must differ entirely from that expression. My hon. friend from New Westminster said last night that this was the last debate which we would hear upon this question. I really hope it will be the last debate. I hope the settlement entered into may prove a settlement of this question. Yet I am inclined to think we have only reached practically the climax of this important question and not the finale.

Hon. Mr. BERNIER—Hear, hear!

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—It seems to me that a question which has kept the Greenway government in power since the passage of the School Acts of 1890, that a question which has defeated the government, which has practically created two hostile camps within a great political party, which has placed the Liberal party in power, which has alienated in the province of Quebec the pastor from his flock and the bishop from his laity, and which has shaken Rome to such an extent that we find a legate here to lend his good offices in endeavouring to settle the question—it seems to me that a question which has accomplished what I have mentioned can scarcely reach a finality upon the settlement which has been brought down by the government and which they say in the address they confidently hope may be settled and put an end to the agitation which has impaired and impeded the development of our country. That leads me to ask what is the settlement which has been effected? The Liberal party, the present government, all seem to express themselves with the greatest possible satisfaction at what has been achieved. One not familiar with this question would fancy that the late administration had accomplished nothing in the direction of securing a settlement, but that the settlement secured by the present government is absolutely original in its character, and in no way partakes of the elements which heretofore entered into the discussion that took place respecting the settlement of the question. If hon. gentlemen will look at the proposals submitted by the representatives of the Greenway government to the commissioners of the federal government, and compare those proposals with the so-called settlement which has been entered into between the Greenway government and the present administration, they will find a surprising degree of similarity between the alleged settlement of to-day and the proposals then submitted by the Greenway government. I ask why did not the Liberal party, then in opposition, express their satisfaction with the proposal which was submitted to the House by the commissioners of the federal government upon their return from Winnipeg? Why, hon. gentlemen, they could not find language sufficiently strong to denounce the proposals made by the commissioners of the federal government, let alone to entertain for one solitary moment the proposals made by the Greenway commissioners to the federal commissioners at that time, and if hon. gentlemen will analyse the present School Act of Manitoba, they will find that practically the same results would be obtainable from that Act as are obtainable under the settlement which the present government claims to have carried out and claims a considerable degree of commendation for accomplishing. Take for instance the teaching of religion in the schools. All hon. gentlemen will, I think, conceive that the crucial test as to whether this is a settlement or not is the fact of the element of religion entering into the teaching of the public schools in the province of Manitoba. We do find an element of religion in this so-called settlement, but it is of so limited a character as to give dissatisfaction to the minority. I do not express an opinion as to whether there is such a degree of teaching of religion entering into this settlement as would be satisfactory to the minority, but I say—and I say it unhesitatingly—that the minority are dissatisfied with that particular element of the settlement. If hon. gentlemen will look at the present Manitoba School Act previous to the late amendments being passed, they will find that under that Act of 1890 it was discretionary with the trustees of any particular public school district to have half an hour's teaching every day if they should so decide. Does this settlement give any more than that? I say undoubtedly not. I say the same element of religious education which entered into the School Act of 1890 finds a repetition in this so-called settlement, and that the concessions, or the alleged concessions, which have been obtained are no greater than those which the minority enjoyed after the passage of that Act in 1890. There was an objection raised at one time that it was entirely discretionary with the trustees whether they should permit religious teaching. We find it so provided in this settlement. It is discretionary with the trustees, and if they do not exercise their discretion in that particular manner, then, on a petition from the parents, they shall introduce religious teaching. Every hon. gentleman here who may be familiar with the conditions of population in the province of Manitoba knows full well that if there are as many Catholic children in a school district as we find mentioned in this settlement, it would result in the appointment of Catholic trustees in that particular district. It is bound to work out in that particular way, and those trustees, if they are appointed by Catholic ratepayers—who must necessarily dominate in a district where we find the number of children which is mentioned in this settlement—such trustees would necessarily reflect the opinions and the sympathies which the people of that particular district might hold on the question of the teaching of religion in the schools; and they having the discretion vested in them, would exercise that discretion in allowing religious education to be imparted during the hours provided in the School Act, and the hours provided in the School Act are identical with the hours provided in this particular settlement, so that there is no question, hon. gentlemen, that upon comparing the Act of 1890 with this particular settlement you will find so close an identity, particularly upon the vexed questions which are at issue, that one is surprised that statesmen would seek to palm off this as a settlement of the question. I think there is no better evidence of the fact that the present administration does not view this as a settlement of the difficulty than the action they have recently taken in appealing to Rome and securing the good offices of the papal ablegate, who is in Canada at the present time, for the purpose of reconciling—I will not say differences between them—but reconciling public opinion in the province of Quebec to what I pronounce to be a sacrifice of the promise made to the electorate of Quebec on this important question rspecting which the people of the province of Quebec expected different treatment. It seems to me that the papal ablegate has entirely superseded the office which was to be occupied by the hon. leader of this House. It was he that was to settle this very important question. My hon. friend was to proceed to Manitoba upon the next train after the general elections to effect a settlement; but I find my hon. friend has not been tendered the pleasure of an excusion to that western country, where we would have been all very glad to have seen him. I find that the offices of the papal ablegate have been secured to perform the very important services which my hon. friend was to have rendered, and which he might have performed with equal satisfaction. There is no question in the minds of hon. gentlemen in this House, nor of the public, that the hon. leader of the government, the Hon. Mr. Laurier, and his Quebec supporters, entered into the most solemn pledges and into a compact as binding as they could possibly make, with the electorate of that province, upon this important question. It is unnecessary for me to point out that not only members of the present cabinet, but the rank and file of the party, considering that they could not sufficiently impress on the electorate of Quebec their sincerity in securing greater privileges for the minority than the late government could, entered into sworn declarations, written pledges, solemn compacts, sworn in some cases before their ecclesiastical authorities, that in no case would they be satisfied with such a settlement as was embodied in the Remedial Bill; nothing less than the pound of flesh would satisfy them—the restoration of the separate schools in their entirety as as they had existed previous to 1890. Will hon. gentlemen deny that the premier and most of his cabinet, and the majority which he has behind him in parliament, carried the province of Quebec upon pledges of the character I have just mentioned? They admit it. It cannot be denied. It is in black and white; yet in the face of these solemn promises, we find hon. gentlemen seeking for the commendation of the country because they have achieved what could not be effected by the late government, namely, a settlement of this vexed question. Then we find that the ecclesiastical authorities are attacked on the ground of calling into action the penalties of the church for a breach of faith, if I may so term it. Why would not the bishops of Quebec have the right to resent what I term a repudiation and a disregard of the solemn promises that were entered into with them by the leaders of the Liberal party and their supporters previous to the general election in June last? Did these hon. gentlemen expect that the ecclesiastical authorities, after being humbugged in the way they were—after being deceived into giving a certain amount of support to the Liberal party—were calmly to fold their hands and accept the deception practised upon them in the violation of these promises and not resent it? While I do not approve for one moment of the course which they pursued in the suppression of the press, and so on, yet it was only human nature that they should have sought to resent the deliberate violation of that compact by the Liberal party in accepting the settlement. Whoever writes the political history of the school question cannot fail to be struck with the remarkable feats of political equestrianship which have been achieved upon this important question. You have Mr. Greenway posing as the champion of the ultra Protestant majority in the province of Manitoba passing legislation which was characterized by the hon. Secretary of State in the strongest possible language. We find that gentleman shortly after proceeding to the province of Quebec and, at a banquet given to the Hon. Mr. Laurier, speaking to the population of the province of Quebec in the most conciliatory manner and proving to the satisfaction of the Liberal party in that province that he, Mr. Greenway, had always been their champion and friend. We have the leading members of the present government, who were professing to the electors of Quebec their sincerity—not only their sincerity but their intention that under no circumstances would they accept anything less than the restoration of the separate schools in all their integrity—we have these gentlemen performing all the feats of the accomplished equestrian in riding two horses round the ring, both going in opposite directions. I find no one riding more effectually in the province of Quebec the Catholic horse than the present premier, and certainly no one riding the Protestant horse so effectually in Ontario. I have a recollection of seeing some years ago in a humorous paper in Toronto, a cartoon of the leader of this House performing a similar feat of equestrianship, riding round the ring in velvet and spangles, two horses going in opposite directions, to the great satisfaction of the party to which he belonged and with much credit to himself. I recalled that cartoon, when I thought recently of what was achieved by the hon. leader of the Liberal party in the late elections, in which they accomplished a somewhat similar feat. We all have a recollection in our young days of patronizing the circus as it came along, and observing the facility with which certain actors would swallow knives, swords and all kinds of dangerous implements, but we certainly have seen nothing in our earlier days to equal the swallowing facility of the Liberal party in regard to many of these questions of conflict which by a swallowing feat they have had no trouble in disposing of. When the history of the school case comes to be written, the settlement may be possibly pronounced a settlement, but it will be pronounced as the greatest triumph of political machination achieved in Canada in the latter end of the 19th century. My hon. friend from Bothwell made some allusion to the Franchise Act. It struck me as peculiarly inconsistent with the attitude which he will shortly expect us to take upon another equally important matter, that is the tariff. My hon. friend propounded the doctrine, and it is a very salutary principle, I presume, that public opinion must be observed, so far as legislation in this House is concerned, in the consideration of all bills which may come up from the House of Commons. Where the public have pronounced upon a question, it is contended to be obligatory upon this body to accept the legislation which may come from the House of Commons in regard thereto. Of course the hon. gentleman has prepared the way for what will be expected of this honourable House when the Franchise Bill comes from the House of Commons on account of its having been alleged that public opinion has been expressed in favour of the principle to be embodied in that measure which, I understand, has been distributed in the other House. I suppose the hon. leader of the Senate will expect us to observe the same principle with regard to the tariff. I did understand that the Liberal party had appealed to the country on the policy of free trade—free trade, pure and simple—"free trade as it is in England." There, I understand, is to be found the fountain head of all free trade. I presume hon. gentlemen also—at least the hon. leader of the Senate—will say that this was the great and important subject before the country, and, being placed in power upon that particular question, they will expect that this House will carry out public opinion on the tariff and say that only a free trade measure shall be approved of. I point out to my hon. friend the leader of this House the rather inconsistent position which has been taken upon this matter, and if he insists upon urging it in regard to the Franchise Bill, to be consistent he will surely urge the same doctrine in regard to the tariff bill when it comes down. The Speech from the Throne is usually considered as a bill of fare, and I notice in the Liberal papers some very happy cartoons in regard to this particular bill of fare. In the Globe newspaper I noticed a cartoon representing a festive board laid out with all the delicacies of the season, which were intended to represent the various items contained in the Speech from the Throne, and most of them were marked "expenditure" for this, "expenditure" for that, and "expenditure" for the other, while parliament was looking on covetously, desirous of securing those dainties so that Mr. Laurier might complete his labours and proceed to England. It struck me at the time that, notwithstanding the fact of it being a bill of fare, it is rather a poorly prepared one. Most of the food is raw. The ingredients of the cooking process have not yet entered into it, and it is difficult to discuss much of the Speech from the Throne on account of the generality in which it is couched and the absence of any particulars or details to which we might make reference. We find some allusion made to the tariff. If His Excellency, in the Speech from the Throne, had congratulated the leader of the government on discovering how to harmonize free trade and protection, we might have joined, without any exception, in such congratulations. It always seemed to me that, so far as political scientists in their writings dealt with the question of free trade and protection, they dealt with them as the antithesis of each other. The one lay at the extreme point from the other, but we find that these hon. gentlemen have at last accomplished the happy feat of assimilating both free trade and protection, so that a free trade supporter may feel himself quite warranted in supporting a protective tariff, and the most ardent protectionist may find himself justified in supporting the so-called free trade doctrines of the government. But, as I say, owing to the absence of any details of this important question, it is utterly impossible to discuss its merits or demerits, and hence we shall have to postpone that for some future time. There is one question which I should like to refer to —that is the allusion which was made by my hon. friend the Secretary of State the other day to the question of the hostile feeling prevailing in the United States against Canada. He attributed the creation of that feeling to the attitude of the late government in connection with its dealings with the United States government. My hon. friend had to formulate some excuse for the purpose of escaping the failure of the representatives of the present government who proceeded to Washington some few weeks ago for the purpose of carrying out that much looked for reciprocity which for the last eighteen years we have heard could only be effected by the Liberal party. My hon. friend referred to the fact that such a feeling of hostility had been created by the animosity of the late government against the United States government, as to prevent negotiations being entered into by the representatives of the government who went to Washington a short time ago. I direct the attention of the House to the fact that since 1866 the United States have absolutely refused to enter into reciprocity with the Dominion of Canada. To listen to the hon. Secretary of State, one would fancy that this was quite a recent occurrence —that the question of reciprocity had never been entered upon previous to 1888 when the difficulties to which he alluded arose. I would point out to the House that in 1865--66--68--69--71--73--75--78--88--91--92 and 94 proposal after proposal was made by the Canadian government to the United States government that a reciprocity treaty should be effected between the two peoples, without any avail or success. Hence it seems to me that my hon. friend had no ground whatever to make such a statement that this feeling of hostility was created in the manner indicated. There is one matter which I desire to express my regret about that has not been referred to in the address and which I shall not occupy the time of the House in discussing—namely, the question of immigration. No subject was so exploited in the west by the present government in the late election as the vigorous policy which they intended to promulgate at the first session of parliament for the settlement of that great country, and I therefore regret to find that, notwithstanding the many promises which they made, and notwithstanding the fact that it was largely owing to those promises that the west went so solidly for the present government, we find those promises disregarded and no mention whatever made of this important question.

Hon. Mr. PROWSE—They sent Devlin to Ireland.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—There is another question which has been omitted from the address regarding which the west is very anxious to have a pronouncement upon from the government, namely, the building of the Crow's Nest Pass Railway. I express no opinion upon that question at the present time, because it is a matter too important to be disposed of in the two or three minutes left me. But here are two important questions in which that north-west country is deeply interested and upon which the government of the day made during the elections a strong pronouncement in the matter of assisting, to which no allusion has been made in the address, I hope that the silence of the government on these two particular questions may not indicate that at the present session of parliament they do not intend to deal with them.

The motion was agreed to on a division.

THE SESSIONAL COMMITTEES.

MOTION.

Hon. Sir OLIVER MOWAT moved:

That, pursuant to Rule 79, the following senators be appointed a Committee of Selection, to nominate the senators to serve on the several Standing Committees, namely:—The Honourable Messieurs Clemow, Sir Mackenzie Bowell, De-Boucherville, Lougheed, Miller, McInnes (New Westminster), Power, Scott, and the mover; and to report with all convenient speed the names of the senators so nominated.

Hon Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I would ask the leader of the government why the name of Mr. Macdonald, Victoria, has been omitted and the name of Mr. McInnes substituted therefor? I see that Mr. Clemow is also substituted for Mr. Allan. That I believe would be in accordance with the wish of Mr. Allan himself, who is not desirous of remaining on the committee. The substitution is a very good one, but the case of Mr. Macdonald is different. He has been one of the most useful members of that committee since I have been a member of this House, and there must be some reason why his name has been left off. If it has been done at his own request I have nothing further to say; if not, unless some very good reason can be given for the substitution of the one for the other, I shall certainly move that Mr. Macdonald be substituted for Mr. McInnes.

Hon. Sir OLIVER MOWAT—My hon. friend from New Westminster expressed a wish to be on this committee. I did not think that Senator Macdonald cared about it, and therefore made the change. There is no other reason for it. I believe that the number is fixed by the rules, so I cannot add to the committee, but I should be very glad if the hon. senator's name were substituted for mine, and I shall move that that change be made.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.)—Mr. McInnes asked me if I would allow my name to go off the committee, and his to take its place. I told him I would rather remain on the committee and help him to get on some other committee, as I had done in former years. I told him to see Mr. Scott and he would help him to get on some other committee after we met. I believe, and have been told since, that a Liberal member of the House of Commons interfered in this matter—that he wrote a letter to one of the ministers asking him to strike my name off and to put Mr. McInnes's name on. It is no benefit to me to be on that committee, but I do not wish to have my name struck out by a trick, and I want to remain on the committee.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I think the hon. gentleman is misinformed. I asked the leader of the House if he received such a letter, and he says he did not. I did not receive any. Mr. McInnes applied to be on the committee, and thinking it would not make much difference, his name was added without any idea or design that it was going to create trouble.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—We should be pursuing a course which has not been adopted in the past if the leader of the House was not to be on this committee. I know in the House of Commons the leader of the government and the leader of the opposition are never left off the committee, and I, for one, should object to the hon. gentleman's name being omitted. I move that Mr. Macdonald's name be substituted for that of Mr. McInnes.

The motion was agreed to, and the motion as amended was adopted.

The Senate then adjourned.

THE SENATE.

Ottawa, Friday, 9th April, 1897.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

Prayers and routine proceedings.

THE DIVORCE COMMITTEE.

MOTION.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT, for the committee appointed to select the sessional committees, reported the following list of senators selected by them to serve on the Standing Committee on Divorce:—Hon. Messrs. Baker, Boulton, Gowan, Kirchhoffer, Loughheed, Mills, McKindsey, Primrose and Wood.

The report was adopted.

9. The number of bailiffs and constables employed in each case, and the amount paid or to be paid to each for his services in any capacity.

10. The number and names of all lawyers retained or engaged in any way by the Crown to conduct each case, the amount paid or to be paid to each lawyer or counsel so engaged.

11. The number and names of all lawyers engaged by the defendants in each case, and the amount paid or to be paid to each of such lawyers for services rendered in defending the officer or other party accused, or for any other services rendered in defending such cases.

12. A copy of all reports made to heads of departments, or the His Excellency the Governor General in Council, by any commissioner or commissioners, together with his or their findings in each case; and a statement showing the action taken thereon by any head of a department, or by the Governor General in Council.

13. The name, age, office and salary of any and every person appointed to any office or employment under the government, in the place of, or in consequence of any person's removal or dismissal, as a result of the finding of any commissioner or commissioners.

He said:—It is not my intention to enter into any discussion on the subject matter of this question at present. We can deal better with it when the information is laid before the House. My reason for making a motion of this character is that I think it is unprecedented, in our history at least (and I do not know that history gives any example in the past) that so many commissions and commissioners have been appointed for the purpose of investigating what I think were the most trivial charges that could possibly be conceived of, and which, in some cases I know, have resulted in putting officials to very large expense in employing legal gentlemen to defend them, and in summoning witnesses to prove that the charges which were preferred against them were not true. I have reason to believe that in some cases the commissioners appointed by the government to make these investigations have so reported. I should hope that the government will, in cases of that kind, see that, for example, a postmaster whose salary ranges from $400 to $600 per annum, who was put to all the trouble and expense to which I have referred, will be generously dealt with where the charges have not been proved, and these men have sustained losses. I might say that in one case which arose under the old government, where very serious charges were preferred against a gentleman, it cost him $1,200 to $1,500 to defend himself. It was in the North-west Territories and he had to send all over the country for witnesses. The government thought, under the circumstances, that the charges not having been sustained, he should not be mulct of that amount, and they paid him. I hope that that precedent at least will be followed by the hon. gentlemen opposite.

Hon. Sir OLIVER MOWAT—I have no objection to the motion, so far as it is possible for us to comply with it. There is one paragraph in it that we have no means of informing the House about, and I think that should be struck out. That is the 11th clause which asks for information as to the number and names of all lawyers engaged by the defendant in each case. We cannot know that, and the amount paid we cannot know, and the services rendered we cannot know; but the rest of the information we may obtain, although it will take considerable trouble and will occupy a good deal of time, but we will do it.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I am aware of that, but there is no difficulty in obtaining that information by one of the clerks writing to the defendants.

Hon. Sir OLIVER MOWAT—Yes, but I would not be responsible for the answer I might get from defendants.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I do not think the government could be held responsible for letters sent by any of those parties. If the government recognize the claim as good, they could easily ascertain through other parties—through the commissioners and through the officers whom they employed as to the correctness of the statement.

Hon. Sir OLIVER MOWAT—It would be quite impossible to do so for the return asked. As a lawyer who has had a good deal of practice, I can say positively that a plaintiff's solicitor can not tell the expenses gone to by the defendant. I understand from what my hon. friend says now, that his object is to get these men to be paid the expenses they have incurred; but you will observe that he asks for this information not merely in regard to those who successfully showed that they were not guilty of any of the charges which the commission investigated, but also those who have been found guilty as well. I really cannot undertake to provide the information asked for in the 11th clause. We have not got it in the department and it is not known to the officials of the department. We cannot possibly get it except in such a way as my hon. friend mentions, and I decline to bring to this House, unsworn statements which the defendants might make as to the costs to which they may have been put. With regard to the repayment of the expenses of those officers who have been charged with offences which have not been made good, I think that may be a reasonable thing; it depends on circumstances. There may be some cases in which it should not be done, but I quite agree with my hon. friend, that as a rule it is a reasonable thing and I would recommend accordingly with regard to any such cases. I hope my hon. friend will not press the 11th clause; with that exception we can comply with the order.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—For the reasons given by the hon. leader I ask permission to drop that clause. At the same time I may say I had two objects in view. First the one to which the hon. gentleman has just referred—that is that these parties who have not been found guilty of the charges preferred against them should not lose more than a year's salary in defending themselves; and in the second place I was anxious to ascertain, so that the country would know what these commissions have cost not only to the government but what it has cost those men to defend themselves. I move that the 11th paragraph be struck out and that paragraphs 12 and 13 be numbered 11 and 12 respectively.

SALARIES OF CIVIL SERVANTS.

MOTION.

Hon. Mr. KIRCHHOFFER moved:

That an humble Address be presented to His Excellency the Governor General, praying that His Excellency will cause to be laid before the Senate, a statement showing for each department of the civil service, the names, ages, offices and salaries of all persons employed either in the inside or outside divisions thereof; and those not in the civil service employed by the government in any department, who, since the 13th July, 1896, and in cases where no commission of investigation was appointed, have been removed from office by dismissal, superannuation or otherwise, specifying in each case the manner of and grounds for such removal, and the length of notice given to the persons removed, and the amount of superannuation or gratuity granted, if any; also, showing the name, age, office and salary or remuneration of any and every person appointed to the civil service in the place of, or as a consequence of, any such removal.

He said:—There is a slight clerical error in punctuation in the fifth line. After the words "thereof," there is a semi-colon where there should be a comma. It alters the sense somewhat, and with that amendment, I beg to put the motion.

Hon. Sir OLIVER MOWAT—To accomplish the object of my hon. friend and to make the motion clear, I think he would require a little further change. I would further suggest this, for the purpose my hon. friend has in view, in making the correction. The fourth line now reads "salaries of all persons." I would propose to make it read "salaries of such persons employed either in the inside or outside divisions thereof and such persons not in the civil service; as, etc."

Hon. Mr. KIRCHHOFFER—I have no objection to the amendment.

RAILWAY TICKETS AND INSURANCE POLICIES.

Hon. Mr. BOULTON moved:

That an humble Address be presented to His Excellency the Governor General, praying that His Excellency will cause to be laid before the Senate, a return showing the number of railway tickets sold by the various railway companies of the Dominion, those under the rate of two cents per mile, and those over the rate of two cents per mile. Also, the number of life insurance policies in force, dividing them as follows:

$ 500.00	and upwards.
5,000.00	"
10,000.00	"

And also, the number of infantile insurance and amount.

He said:—In asking for this return my object is to ascertain the number of railway tickets that are sold, annually, in Canada, and one of the objects desired to be attained by that is to compare it with the policy that has been adopted in England, of leaving railway tickets untaxed that carry at a low rate for the benefit of the working classes, and taxing railway tickets sold over a certain rate. The principle which prevails in Great Britain is to lift the burden of taxation entirely off the labour of the country, labour being the foundation of the wealth and prosperity of the nation, and to put it upon the profits of the country. And under that policy a greater distribution of wealth and greater prosperity prevails in the British Isles than with any other nation. One of the methods adopted in carrying out that principle, is the taxation of railway tickets in the manner I have described. In England the penny-a-mile rate was found to be very profitable, and increased passenger receipts; there is no doubt the same results will flow from a two-cent rate in Canada. In the same way with regard to insurance policies, the principle prevails. A stamp duty is imposed in Great Britain upon all life insurance policies, commencing at an excessively low rate on the small amounts, and increasing as the amounts of the policies increase. These are two very fair subjects for the consideration of parliament and it is merely to draw attention to the principle upon which this is carried out that I have asked for these returns. In regard to life insurance policies it is decidedly advisable that something should be done in order to check, I will not say the growth exactly, but to check the zeal with which the collection of the money for these insurance policies is carried out by way of premiums to agents. The agents go so far now as to invade the kitchens and private premises in order to pick up insurance, and to induce the working classes to insure their lives. We have seen that there is a moral risk entailed now on life insurance in consequence of the criminal fraud which exists to such an extent as to make it desirable that the attention of the government and of the country should be drawn to that phase of the question. It would not be at all a bad thing if the government were to institute to a certain extent a state insurance for small amounts, say from five hundred dollars up to $1,000. By doing so, the working classes who desire to make a small provision for their old age, would not be subjected to and have to pay, the rates charged by life insurance companies necessary to increase their rates in order to cover the moral risk for the moral causes I have already spoken of. The principle that the government have adopted with regard to the issue of bank notes, might be applied to life insurance. The government issue small notes under five dollars, leaving the larger denominations to the banks. If the government were to institute cheap insurance for the poorer classes and those who cannot afford either to pay the risks or to insure for large amounts, they will be conferring a great benefit indeed upon that class. It is merely for the purpose of eliciting the principle that is involved in this that I ask for these papers. I dare say the government may not have them in their possession. If not, they have the power to call on all our public corporations to make such returns as they may deem from time to time advisable for the information of parliament as to the working of our large corporations. I hope, if such information is not available in the departments, the government will see their way to obtaining it so far as in their wisdom it seems proper.

Hon. Sir OLIVER MOWAT—The motion, I think, goes much further than my hon. friend can surely think necessary for his purpose. To require all our railway companies during the whole period they have issued tickets to give such returns as he asks for is out of the question. It would involve a large amount of labour and expense to them which would not be reimbursed, and I do not think there would be any advantage resulting from it. His purpose would be served, I should think, by limiting the time to, say, six months.

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—It was a clerical error not to say annually.

Hon. Sir OLIVER MOWAT—I hope the House will not put such a large expense on the railways. I may say the government have not such information in their possession. I suppose we have power by an Order in Council, to require every railway to make any return that it may be thought in the public interest they should make; but I certainly could not undertake to recommend the Governor in Council to pass an order for such a wide return as my hon. friend seeks to have. If he is content to say for the last six months of last year, or even, perhaps, for the whole of the year 1896, I think that would involve a good deal of trouble and some expense, but the railway companies might be very willing to furnish it.

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—It was not my intention to ask for anything covering such grounds as I see the language of the clause reads. My intention is to get returns for one year to ascertain information to base the argument upon.

Hon. Sir OLIVER MOWAT—Then after the word "sold" introduce the words "during the year 1896."

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—Yes, that will do.

Hon. Sir OLIVER MOWAT—I am afraid my hon. friend is far too sanguine in thinking that the railway tickets would prove a fit subject for taxation. I do not know that any of our roads are paying dividends that would warrant a tax of that kind; certainly most of them are not. Still the information might be valuable and I have no objection to the motion with the change I have suggested. I believe we have the information with regard to insurance policies and I have no objection to giving it.

The motion was agreed to.

THE POSTMASTER AT WINDSOR.

INQUIRY.

Hon. Mr. CASGRAIN rose to Inquire from the government, the reason why François Xavier Meloche, deputy postmaster of Windsor, has been dismissed from office?

He said:—Mr. Meloche has been seventeen years postmaster at Windsor. During that time there has never been a charge made against him—he has always been civil, courteous and obliging, yet without any warning he has been dismissed from office, though he has a large family and a wife who has been an invalid for the last five or six years.

Hon. Sir OLIVER MOWAT — My answer is this: Mr. Meloche was not dismissed, but has been placed on the retired list by an Order in Council, and he was retired to promote efficiency and economy.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Do I understand that his place has not been filled by the appointment of any other man?

Hon. Sir OLIVER MOWAT—I did not inquire as to that, and I have no personal knowledge of the subject.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—The reason I ask is, how can economy be effected if somebody has been appointed in his place?

Hon. Sir OLIVER MOWAT—I daresay nobody has been appointed, but I do not know it as a fact.

THE PRINTING OF PARLIAMENT.

MOTION.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Before the Orders of the Day are called, I desire to bring under the notice of the Senate a suggestion which has been made to me by some members of the other House. The Printing Committee of the House of Commons has been struck now nearly three weeks, but cannot organize or order any printing, so that it is a serious inconvenience to them not to have the members of the committee from the Senate named. I would suggest that the House, by unanimous consent, adopt the report of the committee of selection to-day, so far as the Printing Committee is concerned. I therefore move that the following senators be members of the Joint Committee on the Printing of Parliament:

Hon. Messrs. Armand, Arsenault, Bernier, Carling, Sir John, K.C.M.G., Dever, Dobson, Ferguson, MacKeen, Merner, O'Donohoe, Ogilvie, Perley, Power, King, Macdonald (P. E. I.), McKindsey, Primrose, Reid, Sanford, Sullivan, and Wark.—21.

CRIMINAL CODE AMENDMENT BILL.

SECOND READING POSTPONED.

The Order of the Day being called—

Second reading of Bill (B) "An Act to further amend the Criminal Code, 1892."

Hon. Sir OLIVER MOWAT said: Since this bill was prepared, proposals have been made to amend different parts of the Criminal Code, and the amendments do not all relate to the same subject. Since the introduction of this bill, I have had communications from hon. members and from others, pointing out other additions which could be made, some of which I am prepared to recommend to the Senate for consideration. It would be convenient to the House to have a fresh copy of the bill prepared putting in these various amendments in their proper places, and, further it will save a good deal of trouble and a good deal of time if to such proposed amendments as may be necessary, I should add some explanatory notes, pointing out the objects of the amendments. The form of the schedule to the bill is that article No. 500 should be amended by striking out certain words, and putting in certain other words. That is unintelligible of itself without looking at the original Act, and I know from experience how much trouble there sometimes is in making the comparison in such cases, and how unsatisfactory it is altogether, while a few explanatory words in such cases would make the whole matter clear. With the permission of the House I move that the Order of the Day be discharged.

Hon. Mr. ALLAN—When these notes are put in, is it proposed to give the explanations under each clause that is altered? I see there are explanatory notes here, but they are all on one page.

Hon. Sir OLIVER MOWAT—I had intended, and my manuscript showed, that those explanations should be at the end of each clause. Now that I intend to introduce additional clauses in the bill, I think it is better to put those notes in their proper places and to have the bill reprinted in that form. I am all the more satisfied of this being a good method from what has actually happened. I have had a strong letter from one quarter against a certain clause; if the writer had studied the clause in connection with the note at the end, he would have found that the clause had not the effect that he ascribed to it. The same thing may have happened with others, and I daresay has happened.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I would direct the attention of the hon. Minister of Justice to the necessity of an amendment which does not appear in this bill, that is, an amendment which would render guilty of a criminal offence, any married man who goes from this country to the United States, and there marries again and comes back to live in this country with a woman who is not really his wife. A bill to provide for such cases was introduced some couple of years ago, but it was afterwards abandoned: and I think it is a very serious omission in the law. I presume that the minister, having had his attention directed to it, will see that the case is provided for in the bill.

Hon. Sir OLIVER MOWAT—My attention has been called to the particular point my hon. friend refers to. Some doubt is entertained as to whether the Dominion has jurisdiction to make that a crime which is not committed in Canada, but is committed in another country. The crime is in marrying in the United States in such a case, but I am afraid we have no jurisdiction to pass a law by which we should punish here a person who has done something which was not a crime where it was committed. I daresay my hon. friend knows that if any one leaves this country for such a purpose as he mentions, or in other words with the intention of marrying illegally there, the offence comes within our law, but where it cannot be proved that the offender left here for that express purpose, he cannot be punished under our law. If my hon. friend would draw such a clause as he thinks would meet the evil, I shall be glad to consider it, but having given the matter some attention, I am not prepared, now at all events, to introduce a clause for that purpose.

Hon. Mr. POWER—Perhaps you could not say the man was guilty of bigamy, but there is no reason why we should not make it an offence for a man to come back and live in Canada under those circumstances.

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—Under our laws I presume a man who does that carries the penalty with him.

The motion was agreed to.

THE LATE SENATOR BÉCHARD.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Before the Orders of the Day are called, I desire to call the attention of the House to the death of a senator during the Easter recess. Before the recess, hon. gentlemen will remember that the late Mr. Béchard was introduced in this chamber, and sat here for a few days. Although a senator for a very short time, the late Mr. Béchard for many years was a representative man in this country. There were very few whose period of election went back as far as 1867, the year that the first parliament assembled under confederation. Since that time the late Mr. Béchard continued to occupy a seat in the other chamber, having been elected no less than eight different times, and in the great majority of those cases he was elected by acclamation, thus showing the esteem in which he was held by the people of his county. He represented during that long period the county of Iberville. Subsequently, when St. John and Iberville were united, he continued to represent the united counties. Although he rarely spoke in the House of Commons, he was extremely popular with both sides of the House. He was of a comparatively unassuming disposition, and he had always a genial smile for those with whom he was associated, whether politically allied or otherwise. I am sure those gentlemen in this chamber who knew the late Mr. Béchard will deeply sympathize with his family in the unexpected loss of that gentleman.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I desire to add a few words to what has already fallen from the hon. member for Ottawa in reference to the deceased senator. I have had the pleasure of his personal acquaintance since confederation. He and I were two of the few who were left who entered parliament at the same time, and I think I may with safety re-echo every word the hon. gentleman has said in reference to the late senator. He never took a very prominent part in the business of the House of Commons, but he was one of those members who always had a smile and a good word for every one. It was my good fortune to be on the most intimate terms with him personally. We never had a disagreement, an unkindly word was never uttered between us, although we always voted—I think nearly always—differently upon political questions which came before the House. He was genial, good-natured, courteous and gentlemanly in every sense of the word. Personally I deeply regret his loss and the benefit which I have no doubt the Senate would have derived had he remained a member of it for any length of time.

The motion was agreed to.

THE COMMITTEE ON RAILWAYS, TELEGRAPHS AND HARBOURS.

MOTION.

Hon Mr. SCOTT moved that the following members be appointed a Committee on Railways, Telegraphs and Harbours:

The Honourable Messieurs Allan, Almon, Boucherville, de, C.M.G., Boulton, Bowell, Sir Mackenzie, K.C.M.G., Clemow, Cochrane, Cox, Dickey, Kirchhoffer, Landry, Lougheed, Lovitt, Macdonald (Victoria), MacInnes (Burlington), Masson, McCallum, McDonald (Cape Breton), McInnes (New Westminster), McKay, McKindsey, McLaren, McMillan, Miller, Mowat, Sir Oliver, K.C.M.G., O'Donohoe, Owens, Poirier, Power, Ross, Sanford, Scott, Smith, Sir Frank, Kt., Snowball, and Vidal.—35.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I notice that the hon. gentleman from Bothwell appears on only two committees, one of them a comparatively unimportant one, and I think it is desirable that this House should have the benefit of the experience of that hon. gentleman on this committee. I understand the hon. gentleman has been for several sessions on the Committee on Railways and Canals of the House of Commons. The name of the hon. gentleman from Toronto (Mr. O'Donohoe) is on the list which has just been read; that hon. gentleman has not been here this session and he is already on three committees. I therefore move, that the name of the Hon. Mr. Mills be substituted for that of Hon. Mr. O'Donohoe on this committee.

The amendment was agreed to, and the motion as amended was adopted,

CONTINGENT ACCOUNTS AND INTERNAL ECONOMY COMMITTEE.

MOTION.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—With reference to the Committee on Contingent Accounts and Internal Economy, I would like to let that stand until to-morrow.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I was going to suggest that in the formation of this committee it was decided by resolution—although I do not know that I am in order in referring to what has taken place in committee—that it should be an entirely new committee, that all the old members should be left off. While it is true that I supported that resolution, I have grave doubts as to its propriety. I am still further impressed—and I wish it understood that I am not making these remarks in opposition to the suggestion of the hon. gentleman, but merely to throw out the hint—I am strongly of the opinion that some member of the government should be on this committee as it is really a patronage committee. It has been suggested by some friends on this side of the House (and I think the suggestion was a good one) that Mr. Reid of British Columbia having gone home not to return this session, his name might, without creating any feeling, be left off, and one of the hon. gentlemen sitting opposite me substituted therefor—say the leader of the House. It has been the practice in the past always to put the leader of the government on this committee.

Hon. Mr. McCALLUM—It would please me very much if my name were left off that committee, as I have no desire to be on it.

Hon. Mr. SULLIVAN—You are the best man on it.

Hon. Mr. POWER—The hon. leader of the opposition has made a very judicious suggestion, that the name of an hon. gentleman who will not be here during the session should be omitted, and the name of the leader of the House substituted. Although that may be violating the resolution which was adopted by the committee, it will not be violating the spirit of it, because it happens that the hon. leader of the House did not attend a single meeting of that committee last session.

Hon. Mr. PERLEY—I hardly think it a judicious suggestion, because I find it is the custom that all the sections of Canada are represented on this particular committee, but to-day the North-west Territories are not represented at all. Up to the present time the North-west Territories have had two members on that committee. I have always had the honour of being on that committee, and while I do not pretend to be a very efficient member of it, I do the best I can. Last session my hon. colleague was also appointed, giving us full representation on that committee, which I think was hardly fair or in keeping with the constitution of the other committees. But now when we are both struck off, it is something I really cannot understand. I think inasmuch as Mr. Reid has gone home, it would not be improper to appoint my hon. colleague to that committee, and let the leader of the government, if he desires to be appointed from Ontario, take the place of Mr. McCallum, or any other member who desires to resign. That would leave the government with one member from the province of Ontario. I think Mr. Reid's place should be filled by my hon. friend, and we should give every portion of the Dominion a fair representation.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Perhaps the hon. gentleman did not understand me or did not hear me. I said the committee came to a decision not to appoint any one on the Contingent Committee this year who was on the committee the previous year. It was not because he was from the West or because I was from Ontario that we were left off. My hon. friend from Monck is desirous of being left off, and we could substitute the leader of the government for him, and Mr. Lougheed could be substituted for Mr. Reid. That would not be strictly in accord with the resolution which we passed, but the House is bound by that resolution.

Hon. Mr. McINNES (B.C.)—Would the hon. gentleman be kind enough to inform the House why the committee came to the conclusion to recommend a new committee altogether? Why was that distinction made with this particular committee, any more than any other committee? It is something I cannot understand. Have they been guilty of some dereliction of duty? Hon. gentlemen may laugh, but it is only a few days ago that the hon. leader of the opposition rose and moved that the name of my hon. colleague from Victoria should be reinstated on the Nominating Committee to keep it intact, as it was last year. I should like to know why all the 25 members composing the committee on Internal Economy for many many years have been passed over. Many of them have been there, to my personal knowledge, for 16 or 17 years, and I think it is only due the House that some explanation should be given why they are left off, and new members substituted. I say—and I am within the mark when I say it—that you cannot find a committee on Internal Economy of this House since confederation without one or more members of the government on it. It is due the House that the hon. leader of the opposition and the hon. gentleman who has moved this resolution should give some explanation why the whole of that committee were summarily dismissed and other gentlemen placed on it.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—My hon. friend opposite is chairman of the committee. Let him take the responsibility of explaining.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I had no more to do with it than to vote against the proposition that the members should be all new. I was in a minority; I thought the committee were not deserving of a vote of want of confidence. No explanation was given other than the determination of the majority of the Striking Committee to sweep the old members by the board. My hon. friend from Wolseley wants to know why the hon. senator from Calgary was left off. I suppose that hon. gentleman is capable of giving an explanation himself, because he was on the committee and acted with the majority. He voted to exclude himself from the committee; probably he may be able to enlighten the House as to the clause.

Hon. Mr. POIRIER—I, for one, have no special objection to the resolution that was passed, but I do not and cannot approve of the principle of putting men on who are all new to the functions of the committee. I am reminded of an historical fact which bears directly on this question. If my recollection is correct, one parliament in France, before going to the country, passed a similar resolution to this forbidding any one then in parliament from being re-elected. What was the consequence? The new parliament was the parliament of 1793, which brought about the reign of terror. I hope this new committee, which is altogether new, will not repeat in this House anything resembling the enactments that were passed by the members of the parliament of the reign of terror in France.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—My hon. friend, the Secretary of State mentions the fact that he had no sympathy with the motion submitted to the committee to form an absolutely new Committee on Internal Economy. My hon. friend was not very emphatic in his opposition to that proposition, because while I take a rather active interest in the proceedings of the committee I have no recollection of any expression of dissent on his part. My recollection is that no division was taken. Certainly the Yeas and Nays were not called for, and if my hon. friend will ask the clerk of the committee to produce such a list he will not be found among the dissidents. My hon. friend from Acadia has alluded to the reign of terror in France; his allusion reminds me of the fact that the change in the committee might possibly have been prompted by the reign of terror policy of the government on their advent to power in their dismissal of those who served and we may have been inspired by the same zeal which has influenced those hon. gentlemen in office. In regard to the observations made by my hon. friend from Wolseley I may say that when the question came up for consideration as to whether there should be a representative from the North-west Territories on that committee, with unanimity the members of the nominating committee referred to the valuable services rendered by my hon. friend in the past and expressed a regret that owing to the letter of the resolution it would be impossible to place a representative of the territories upon that committee much as they desired to have my hon. friend from Wolseley on the committee occupying a position on the committee as in former years. However, we had to sacrifice any personal feeling we had in the matter, because it was desirable to carry out the resolution not only according to the spirit, but according to the letter. I might say that in previous years the proposition had been submitted to the committee, but it had not received that favourable consideration it met with this year. I cannot say that I was in sympathy with the proposition. If my hon. friend, the Secretary of State, will remember I took very much the same position that he did himself. I certainly did not vote for or against it, but as the majority of the committee deemed in their wisdom that it should be done I submitted with very good grace. I hope the experiment will not result disastrously. Certainly it is worth trying and it is not like the laws of the Medes and Persians. If we find it does not work satisfactorily we can next session depart from the spirit of the resolution and introduce into the committee some of the old members who have had experience, and who, doubtless, can rectify any mistakes that may be made.

Hon. Mr. PRIMROSE—The hon. gentleman from New Westminster stated in his remarks that that committee was largely composed of men who had had an experience of sixteen or seventeen years upon the committee. Perhaps it was out of deference to the prevalence of superannuation that the change was made.

Hon. Mr. PROWSE—It is due to the old members of the committee that some explanation should be given for passing such a resolution and making such a distinction between the Committee on Internal Economy and all other committees. There must have been some cause to justify the committee in coming to such a conclusion. If some explanation is not given it will be on record that, for some unexplained reason, it was not considered desirable to have any member of the old committee reappointed.

Hon. Mr. OGILVIE—Was it for their bad conduct?

Hon. Mr. PROWSE.—If it was advisable to adopt that policy in the case of one committee, why not adopt it in nominating all the other committees? Why make such an invidious distinction? I feel sore on the subject, because I happened in previous years to be a member of that committee. I am not at all anxious to be reappointed to that committee, but I do not want any resolution placed on record that the Senate has no confidence in one of its committees, unless it is stated definitely and positively what the reasons are for that want of confidence.

Hon. Mr. POWER—It is rather an objectionable practice to discuss what takes place at a sitting of a committee. The hon. Secretary of State was in the chair and, as far as I am aware, did not vote, and I found myself, as far as my memory serves, in a minority of one on the committee. There were some reasons given in the committee for the change but in the absence of the hon. gentleman who gave those reasons before the committee, I do not feel at liberty and I do not think that it would be regular to repeat those reasons now. With respect to the question raised by the hon. gentleman from Wolseley I may say that I deeply regret the fact that he was not to be on the committee this year. The nominating committee put on the hon. gentleman from Brandon to represent Manitoba and the North-west. I do not mean to say that that hon. gentleman will give the business such attention as the hon. gentleman from Wolseley did, but still the committee did the best they could with the material at their disposal. There was a feeling, in the House, I imagine, as well as among some of the members of the nominating committee, that a number of gentlemen had been on this Committee on Internal Economy for a great many years—I have myself been on that committee for 20 years —and there was a not unnatural feeling that it would be better to have a complete change and see if an entirely new broom would not do better work than the old broom had been doing. I do not suppose this session is to last very long or that any very revolutionary change will be made by this new committee, particularly as the action of the committee will be subject to revisal by the House which contains all the members of the old committee, and I think that perhaps we might as well try the experiment for this session.

Hon. Sir OLIVER MOWAT—The work of every committee is subject to revision by this House, and I see no reason why on that account the change should have been made which has been made. It is contrary to all precedent. I do not know what the reasons were—I do not know whether there were any reasons we could recognize. Whatever the reasons were, it is not thought expedient to state them to the House now. Ordinarily it is of great importance that a number of members of a committee should be experienced men. We who have to do with public life know the immense advantage in every important committee that a number of its members should be experienced men, and while it is desirable to have new blood now and then, there is nothing more important in the composition of committees than that you should not exclude experienced men. I have been a good deal in public life, both in the legislature of old Canada and in the legislature of Ontario, and I never heard of such a thing being done in any committee before, and why? Because it is not expedient to do it. It is not in the interests of the committee that it should be done. Certainly, when such an unusual course is taken, something contrary to all precedent, contrary to the reasons which ordinarily govern such matters, we should not be asked to assent to it without having good reasons for taking such a course. The House should refer this part of the report back to the committee for reconsideration. I am quite sure that anybody who speaks here would be disposed to say that experienced men, a considerable number of experienced men, should be on the committee, and if we are to make any discrimination at all, selecting those who were active and who were known to render good service before. On a committee such as this is, it is quite certain that there should be a member of the government. There is no committee on which it is more important that there should be a member of the government than a committee of this kind, the Committee on Internal Economy. Some hon. members have been kind enough to suggest my name to be added in some way to the committee in substitution for that of somebody else, but in consequence of my other duties, I could not possibly attend and therefore it would be a mere nominal thing putting me there. My hon. friend the Secretary of State is on two or three committees already, and if there is any rule which prevents him being appointed to this committee——

Hon. Mr. POWER—There is no such rule.

Hon. Sir OLIVER MOWAT—Then, there is no trouble about it. I would suggest to the House that my hon. friend Sir Mackenzie Bowell who is a member of the committee, might very fairly and properly move that this part of the report be referred back to the committee on nomination for reconsideration.

Hon. Mr. SULLIVAN – I did not intend to make any remarks on this question, but I think it is very unfair to put such a resolution on record. A committee selected by this House make certain recommendations, and I presume the same confidence which we had in them before we have in them now. I do not think it is right that all the little matters which have arisen in the committee should be ventilated here It is the duty of the House to support the report of that committee. One would think by the remarks made by the leader of the House that the state was in danger—that this committee has to do with things that are weighty and of great moment. As far as I know, its duties are merely the hiring of pages and the engagement of a few people around the House, matters of insignificance, and why should we vote want of confidence in this committee without sufficient reason. If it is necessary that a member of the government should be on it to guard the expenditure, let one be named, but it is entirely unfair to reject the report of the committee. If I were a member of that committee I would have nothing further to do with it if this House resolved to send the report back. I presume the committee gave the subject the fullest consideration. I was on that Committee on Internal Economy before and I rejoice to find that I am not to be a member of it again. I think all the old members find it agreeable to be left off the committee. I hope this House will not stultify itself—pardon me if I use too strong an expression—will not refuse to endorse what the committee have done. I can see valid reasons for the recommendation of the committee. Members have been so annoyed with canvassing and applications from people that they are to a certain extent handicapped, and it is very proper to clear them all out and put new men in who will be free to act in the best interest of the House and of the country.

Hon. Mr. OGILVIE—It is somewhat inconsistent for my hon. friend from Kingston to lecture the House for presuming to offer a motion resembling a want of confidence motion in that committee when, at the same time, that very committee has passed the worst kind of a motion of want of confidence by kicking out the old committee, and then, having done so, refusing to give a reason for it. I do not pretend to say that the committee have done anything that is wrong, but if they are such autocrats that they do as they please without giving a reason for it, there is perfect reason in what the leader of the House has said. I was a member of the Committee on Internal Economy, and I am very glad to be off it, but I think there should be a reason given why the old committee was kicked out bodily. They must have done something wrong. It could not be for having done what was right. Some few years ago, there was grumbling about this committee, when Sir John Abbott was premier, and it was then proposed to reduce the number of the committee to seven, nine or eleven. Had this nominating committee done something of that kind, I could have understood it. I think now, and have always thought, that it would be a very good thing, indeed, to reduce the committee.

Hon. Mr. McINNES (B.C.)—They did reduce the number from 35 to 25.

Hon. Mr. OGILVIE—That was some time ago.

Hon. Mr. McINNES (B.C.)—Some four years ago.

Hon. Mr. OGILVIE—I am aware of that. Had the committee reduced the number from 25 to a small number, I would have said they were quite right in doing so, and in appointing an entirely new committee. I do not often disagree with my hon. friend from Kingston, but I cannot, for the life of me, see why he thinks it would be passing a vote of want of confidence in the nominating committee, when that very committee kicks out a committee of twenty-five members, without giving a reason for it.

Hon. Mr. PERLEY—I did not bring up this matter from any personal feeling, but because I think the section of country which I represent should be represented on that committee. I felt, too, that if for the last couple of sessions it was necessary for our part of the Dominion to have all its representatives on that committee, certainly there is no reason why they should all be put off now. I am quite in accord with the idea that we should be represented. I do not want to be on it myself; in fact, I would not serve on it. I have never asked to be on a committee, but whatever position I have held I have endeavoured to fill it to the best of my ability. I take exception to the remarks of my hon. friend from Kingston. The year before last I voted against a report of a committee, and was blamed by members of the committee for the course I took. To my mind, we are here to vote according to the best of our judgment. We name a committee to report on certain matters. If that report is in accord with our views, we sustain it; if it is not, we should oppose it, and we should not be lectured for the course we pursue. The committee can report, and we can deal with their report as we think proper. That is what I have done in the past and what I propose to do in the future. I brought up this matter, not in my own interests, because I do not want to serve on the committee, but because I think the territories should be represented on the committee in common with other parts of Canada, and, inasmuch as Mr. Reid, a British Columbia member, has gone home not to return this session, it was fit and right that he should be replaced by a representative from the territories, and I suggested the name of my colleague, who is both able and competent and quite as good as any member of the committee.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I do not know why the leader of the government should throw the responsibility on me to move to refer back the report. The hon. gentleman should take the responsibility himself. I am not going to object to it, and I do not know that any hon. member does object. My hon. friend from Halifax is in error when he says that he was in a minority of one on that committee, he was in a majority of one with myself The only reason given for the course taken by the mover who, I regret to say, is not present now, was the fact that it was a patronage committee, nothing more and nothing less, and it was thought it would be better that it should be composed of new members who had not been on the committee in the past. As for any want of confidence in the members of the former committee, I scarcely think that the gentlemen who form the nominating committee acted on that principle. I myself had been on the Committee on Internal Economy ever since I have been in the House; my hon. friend from Halifax, the Hon. Secretary of State, my hon. friend from Calgary, and nearly all the members who struck these committees, have been on the Committee on Internal Economy, so the recommendation was not made with the intention of casting any reflection on any members of the old committee, because had they done so they would have been casting reflections on themselves, but it was for the sole reason that they thought it better that the committee for this session should be composed of new members altogether. The reasons urged by the hon. leader of the government in the House were urged before the committee. I know I am transgressing the parliamentary rules in referring to what took place in the committee; it is not usual; it is not in accordance with the parliamentary practice; but, as it has been done, I may merely state the fact that these reasons were urged, and so evenly divided was the committee that it was only carried by a majority of one, and I for one certainly will not consider it any reflection upon myself as a member of the committee nor do I think the members of the committee will—if the hon. Secretary of State, who was chairman of the committee should move to refer this clause back for reconsideration. I admit there is a great deal of force in what the hon. leader of the government says, that on all important committees, members who have been in parliament for a long time, who have had a good deal of experience, should be put upon these important committees, that is one reason why the hon. member from Bothwell should be put on the committee. His long experience would enable him to take hold of any work which would be allotted to him. That is the only reason that actuated myself in voting in the committee for the course which has been pursued.

Hon. Sir OLIVER MOWAT—It appears evident from what has been said on all sides that the House would like this to be reconsidered, and therefore I move that the report of the striking committee be referred back to the said committee, to reconsider it so far as the same relates to the Committee on Internal Economy and Contingent Accounts.

The motion was agreed to.

The Senate adjourned.

THE SENATE.

Ottawa, Friday, 30th April, 1897.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

Prayers and routine proceedings.

THE HARROUR OF CAPE TORMENTINE.

MOTION.

Hon. Mr. WOOD moved:

That an humble Address be presented to His Excellency the Governor General, praying that His Excellency will cause to be laid before the Senate, a copy of regulations respecting the discharging of ballast by vessels arriving at Cape Tormentine, Westmorland County, New Brunswick; and a copy of the instructions given the harbour master, respecting the disposal of such ballast.

He said: I may say, in order that the hon. gentleman who is leading the House may understand the object of this motion, that the harbour at Cape Tormentine was created a separate harbour in 1895 after the completion of the wharf which the government has constructed there, and which was finished in 1893. The object the government had in constructing that wharf was to open a better means of communication at these points, between Cape Tormentine and Cape Traverse, with Prince Edward Island. Owing to the fact that there is no wharf on the island side, this wharf has not been utilized for that purpose, but in the meantime shippers of lumber in that section of the country have found it a very convenient place for shipping their deals, and last year a very considerable quantity of deals was loaded at this harbour from this pier. At first, in 1893-4, very few vessels indeed arrived there, but those that did arrive discharged their ballast in the small space that had been left in the wharf at the time of its construction. That however was soon filled up. Last year there were as many as thirty square rigged vessels loaded with deals there for Great Britain. Outside of the wharf, about a mile or a mile and a half, there is a reef extending from just opposite the wharf to what is called Lighthouse Point on Jourimain Island. Between this reef and the wharf, these vessels lie with comparative safety in ordinary weather in thirty to forty feet of water. It appears that last year, and my attention was only called to the fact in the fall of the year, those vessels were allowed to discharge their ballast while lying at anchor in that part of the harbour. Of course, they like to do so because they get rid of their ballast without any expense, simply hoisting it over the side and throwing it into the water. Some of this may be washed away, but a great deal of it is of very hard material and as anybody must know forms heaps in the bottom of the harbour, and if this practice is continued it will certainly, in a very short time, destroy the anchorage grounds there. I may say in the harbour of Baie Verte adjoining, vessels were allowed some years ago to adopt this practice, and that harbour has been very seriously injured. It is very difficult now to get large vessels to come up into the best part of the bay and lie there at anchor. When my attention was called to this, I spoke to the harbour master about it and called his attention to the fact that it would injure and very soon destroy the harbour if this practice was continued, but he claimed that under the regulations or instructions under which he was acting this was perfectly allowable, that there was nothing to prevent it—that he had no power to prevent vessels from doing this. I spoke to him again this spring, and he says that he intends to endeavour to have them discharge their ballast further out, outside the reef, to which I think there could be no objection; but I consider it a matter of great importance, and my object in bringing it up now is that the attention of the government may be called to it, and that if no regulations have been adopted, regulations should at once be adopted before the evil goes any further.

Hon. Sir OLIVER MOWAT—The present government has made no regulations and given no instructions regarding these matters. I expected to hear, before the motion was made to-day, whether there were any regulations by former governments, but I have not yet learned, and my hon. friend had better repeat the motion on Monday. Of course it will be granted if there are any such instructions or regulations.

The motion was allowed to stand.

APPOINTMENT OF JUDGE ROUTHIER.

INQUIRY.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY rose to inquire:

1. At what date was Judge A. B. Routhier, of the Superior Court for the province of Quebec, appointed?
2. Since that date, how many times has he been granted leave of absence?
3. For how many days on each occasion?
4. Was it at the request of the Government or of any member thereof that the said Judge Routhier came to Ottawa, in the month of April; and for what purpose did he come?
5. Does the Government know whether, at the time of such coming to Ottawa, or since, Judge Routhier has obtained a new leave of absence, and for how long?
6. Has the Government entrusted him with a diplomatic mission, and if so, to whom?

Hon. Sir OLIVER MOWAT—To the first question, my answer is that Judge Routhier was appointed to the judiciary of the province of Quebec on the 9th December, 1889. He had been previously, namely in 1873, appointed to Chicoutimi, To the second question, my answer is that since 1889 he has not once been granted leave of absence. To the third question, as to how many days' leave on each occasion, I have already said that there was no such occasion. In reply to the fourth question, I have to inform the hon. gentleman that it was not at the request of the government nor so far as I know of any member thereof that the judge came to Ottawa in the month of April. As to the purpose of his coming, there is no official record, but I have ascertained otherwise that he came to meet his daughter who was on her way to the old country. In answer to the fifth question, I have to say that Judge Routhier did not obtain a leave of absence at the time referred to or any other time. And to the sixth question, I have to answer that the government has not entrusted him with any diplomatic mission.

QUEEN'S BIRTHDAY BILL.

SECOND READING.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.) moved the second reading of Bill (C) "An Act to commemorate the reign of Her Majesty Queen Victoria by making her birthday a holiday for ever." He said: I am much pleased to think that there are questions and grounds on which both political parties can sometimes meet to agree, and this is one of them. Doing honour to our Queen is a question in which we can all unite with every degree of satisfaction.

In moving the second reading of this bill, I feel it to be my pleasing duty to say a few words to you on the life and reign of Her Most Gracious Majesty Queen Victoria. My motive and sole object has been to do honour to Her Majesty, on the eve of the completion of the sixtieth year of her illustious reign.

Before leaving home in thinking over the different ways of doing honour to Her Majesty on this most interesting occasion it occurred to me that it would be a graceful compliment by the Parliament of this the oldest, most populous and influential colony of the Empire to perpetuate Her Majesty's birthday and name by such an Act as this. I have had resolutions and letters of approval of this bill from different parts of the country. It has come to my notice that this idea of "Victoria Day" was suggested by a gentleman in Milton, Ontario, last October, and by others in England last January. I am glad to know that others thought of this manner of honouring our Queen. I give them full credit for it and hope to be the means of giving practical shape to their ideas and mine. If we look at this measure from the humanitarian point of view, apart from the honour to Her Majesty, we will see that this holiday comes at a time of year when the sun is in the ascendency in our mother country, giving life and light to the varied beauties of nature. "When every prospect pleases," and vernal beauty reigns supreme. What a boon to the toiler, especially the indoor toiler, that he or she can with family, friend and companion, enjoy to the full a long day in the beautiful country by river and meadow. These reasons together with the fact that the 24th May has been a holiday for sixty years should be sufficient grounds for this bill becoming law although not the main ground. I will read with the permission of the House an extract from the Canadian Magazine for April dealing with that day. It is headed "Victoria Day" and is as follows:

The celebration of Her Majesty's diamond jubilee by making the 24th of May a holiday in perpetuity under the name of Victoria Day, was first proposed in "The Canadian Magazine" for October, at the suggestion of the writer, and since then it appears that a somewhat similar suggestion has been made in England by Sir John Lubbock. The idea has received considerable attention in the newspapers, and seems to be the most feasible and the most fitting from a national point of view, and the most popular of the schemes laid before the public.

Many of the proposals have much merit, but from their philanthropic aspects are adapted rather to private than to national enterprise. Others are impracticable as involving the expenditure of large sums of money on museums and art galleries which would be of benefit rather to those of æsthetic tastes than to the public generally; while others, again, are fanciful, of which the suggestion to have the Canadian Parliament beg Her Majesty to further burden her declining years with the title of Queen of Canada is a fair example.

It is impossible to realize the loss there will be to our athletic and sporting interests generally which the absence of the May holiday will bring about; and the necessity of taking steps for its preservation, when such an excellent opportunity affords, should not be lost sight of.

The present Parliament by legislation on the subject can endear its memory to lads of the twentieth century, and it may yet be known among them as "The Good Parliament."

There is no form of celebration which so appeals to young and old, rich and poor, as a holiday in early summer, and there can be no better method of keeping before posterity the great advances and the enormous progress during Her Majesty's reign than by establishing, as a perpetual holiday in Canada, Victoria Day.

It will be a lasting and pleasing memorial of our close relationship with the mother country, and of our share in the Greater Britain, which has been built in the last sixty years, as well as a tribute to the womanly qualities of her whom it is thus proposed to honour.

While Victoria Day would be as lasting as bronze or marble, it adds nothing to the national expense. It does not add even an extra holiday, until after such time as a new sovereign shall have ascended the throne. No distribution of political patronage or public funds would be entailed by the adoption of the idea by the nation. It would afford our children and ourselves a holiday at the most fitting season of the year for outdoor festivities; it would hand down the name of the greatest Queen-mother that the world has ever seen to a posterity that must be greatly benefited by the good that she has accomplished in her day and generation; and it would mark an age in the world's history which is akin to "the Golden Age," in which science and literature, art and commerce have made a progess too great to be, at present, properly estimated, and in which the doctrine of the brotherhood of man has come most nearly to realization.

I freely confess to being aware of my inadequacy to place before your honours, and before the country, a word picture of the life and reign of Her Most Gracious Majesty Queen Victoria, which will do some small justice to her many virtues and beneficient rule. But I expect, and hope that other hon. gentlemen, with greater powers of eloquence, will produce word pictures far superior to mine. Well, let it be so; let every honour that every tongue and pen can give be given to our Queen, and I will be satisfied to have my picture hang in the shade. I am fully impressed with the knowledge that no panegyric is necessary to add lustre to Her Majesty's life and crown or to induce parliament to do her honour living as she does in the hearts of all of us, living in the affection and esteem of the empire, and in the high estimation of the great nations of the world. The Duke and Duchess of Kent were living quietly in Germany previous to the birth of young Victoria; but in the hope that an heir to the throne of England might be born to them, they took up their residence in England, where Her Majesty first saw the light of day, and where she was carefully reared and trained for the high office she might one day fill. Her father, the Duke of Kent, died when the Princess Victoria was a few days old, casting the care of the royal child entirely on her mother, the duchess, to whom too much praise cannot be awarded for the natural, womanly and godly manner in which she reared the Princess Victoria. Her early training has brought forth fruit in a beautiful life, and reign. The death of King William IV., in June, 1837, and the accession of the lovely young Princess Victoria, who was living quietly with her mother, the Duchess of Kent, at Kensington Palace, her being awakened in the middle of the night by the arrival of Lord Melburne and the Archbishop of Canterbury, to tell her she was Queen of England, the dignified manner in which she received the announcement, and the readiness to transact business next day, are events so well known to hon. gentlemen that I will not dwell on them. The marriage of the young queen in 1840 to her own kinsman, Prince Albert of Saxe-Coburg-Gotha, three years after her accession, again marks her wisdom in the choice she made. The prince was a wise, and prudent consort, and of valuable assistance to the Queen in dealing with national and foreign affairs. This alliance received the approval of the nobles and people at large, and the result fully justified such approval.

Prince Albert in writing to the youthful Queen before their marriage, says:

You are queen of the mightiest land in Europe. In your hand lies the happiness of millions. May heaven assist and strengthen you in that high and difficult task. May your reign be long, happy and glorious, and may your efforts be rewarded by the thankfulness and love of your subjects.

How accurate was the prince's estimate of the vast British Empire, and how literally and fully his beautiful prayer for Her Majesty has been realized! Quoting a couplet by Theodore Martin and substituting she for he, is most apt:

> Whatever records leap to light
> She never shall be shamed.

We may feel assured that no revelations will hereafter cloud Her Majesty's name and reign. Her Majesty is no accidental sovereign. Descending by undisputed succession from a long line of kings and queens, she has, from the day of her accession to the throne, to this day, exercised the power of a sovereign with the power of a beneficent and constitutional ruler. She has shown great wisdom and firmness. Her life has been one of action, swaying great movements and stamping her impress upon events of far reaching importance. As a woman, tender, considerate, and affectionate, yet remarkable for her firmness, holding for sixty years a masterly grasp on all affairs of state, and taking a deep interest in the often subtle movements and political life of other nations, Her Majesty's clear reason, and well balanced judgment often predominating—yet with so much tact, and her views so systematically moulded, as not to overstep the limits of constitutional parliamentary government. The British throne has not before been occupied by so constitutional a sovereign as Queen Victoria, bending gracefully to the self-governing aspirations of a free people, who live in the freedom and elastic strength of the British constitution. Whilst restraining herself most scrupulously within the lines of responsible government, she has not played a colourless or neutral role.

When the Archbishop of Canterbury came to prepare for the marriage ceremony, it is said he felt perplexed and uncertain how to act, when he came to that part of the service where the wife has to say she will "obey" her husband. How could the queen be asked to obey a man who had just been naturalized as her subject! The matter was referred for Her Majesty's pleasure, and her common sense was again shown. She said "I wish to be married like any other woman."

They were a model husband and wife, model parents, training and bringing up a large family in high culture, virtue and godly fear, and to be useful members of the commonwealth. We find the royal sons serving in the two great branches of the public service, the army and navy, with credit and distinction, and we will long remember with pride and satisfaction their noble and charming daughter, the Princess Louise, whom we had in Canada for five years. Her Majesty and her consort possessed of every enobling quality, and highly gifted intellectually, leavened and elevated the social life of the empire, and were a guiding star to other nations.

We all know how long and how deeply Her Majesty mourned the loss of her wise and excellent consort, Prince Albert, and how in her own affliction she, with her kind heart, tried to sooth the afflictions of other widows in the land. We also know that Her Majesty has from time to time visited military and other hospitals, to cheer and comfort some of her loyal wounded soldiers, and other afflicted persons. On one occasion the Duchess of Sutherland presented a superbly bound copy of the Bible to Her Majesty on behalf of a number of loyal English widows. The Queen replied:

> My dear Duchess—I am deeply touched by the gift of a Bible from many widows and by the very kind and affectionate address which accompanied it. Pray express to all these kind sister widows the deep and heartfelt gratitude of their widowed queen. But what she values more is their appreciation of her adored and perfect husband.

Although Her Majesty's reign is termed a reign of peace, it can only be so considered relatively, but when compared with the condition of the empire even 100 years ago, it will bear that happy term—peace! Hon. gentlemen can look back on many anxious, restless years, and on many great battles fought during Her Majesty's reign, crowned with victory to the British arms. Many of us can remember the Crimean War, entered into to preserve the integrity of that blot on Europe—the Turkish Empire—as a buffer state between the Russian hordes and civilized Europe; also the widespread and horrible mutiny of the native soldiers in India; the Chinese War; the New Zealand War; with various smaller wars in Africa, Afganistan and other parts of India, but upon the whole, when compared with other not very remote epochs, the Victoria era may well be called one of peace. Although that noble and glorious achievement the abolition of slavery had been practically settled years before, yet during Her Majesty's reign the final settlement was accomplished. After thirty years of agitation on this subject humane ideas prevailed. Vested rights were satisfied by payments by Great Britain amounting to $100,000,000 to British planters, $2,000,000 to Spain, and $1,500,000 to Portugal. Henceforth in these countries the traffic in human beings should cease—and the black man be free for ever.

Other great rulers are remembered in different ways, and for different reasons—some for prowess in the battle-field, some for wisdom in affairs of state, some for folly, cruelty, intrigue and immorality—many of whose reigns are not marked by much progress, freedom, or the upholding and development of constitutional rights. The names of other monarchs may be written in marble, and bronze, but that of Queen Victoria will be engraven in the heart of a loyal nation. The Victorian era will be marked as the most enlightened and progressive in the history of the nation, including that of the numerous colonies. The principles of parliamentary government by the people were in their infancy when Her Majesty came to the throne, and this great Dominion was divided into petty colonies, governed by crown colony governors, or one-man government with no regard for the voice of the people, and the country was torn and kept back by faction and rebellion. The genius of the British people, together with the liberal ideas of Her Majesty, and a clearer understanding by her ministers of the rights of a free people, removed a dark cloud of discontent from this country. With the freedom of self-government the country marched on to progress, culminating in the welding of those separate North American colonies into a united Dominion —stretching from the Atlantic to the Pacific under one stable government, over 5,000,000 of people—proud to call Victoria their queen. The marvellous power and cohesion of the British empire can be seen when we consider that the territories and populations of India, Australia and Canada are large enough to form three great nations, yet so strong is the sentiment of loyalty and content that pervades the inhabitants of those countries, that they rejoice in their allegiance to the sovereign whose throne and emblem of power sits in the small British Isles. Her Majesty has ever been gracious and loyal to this country of ours, bestowing many favours on it, and conferring well earned titles of distinction on our most prominent statesmen, in which we have an honourable and living illustration in four gentlemen on the floor of this House.

It must be great satisfaction to all of us to know that Her Majesty with her increasing years is a sovereign and ruler in fact, and not in name only. We can look with pride, and much satisfaction to the arrangements now being made in London by the British government for the reception of some of the public men of this country, who have been invited to take part in the celebration of Her Majesty's diamond jubilee.

It would take up too much of your time were I to dwell on what all of you realize, as much as I do, that is the growth of population, the progress in educational facilities, the enlightenment of the people, the progress of civilization, the arts and science, the enormous expansion of commerce, our ships, and the British flag to be seen taking the first place on every sea and ocean and in every land and clime—and nearly all this great development during the reign of Her Majesty. Having placed before you a few facts in connection with Her Majesty, I think I may now say a few words about her loyal subjects. We may justly consider Her Majesty most fortunate in ascending the throne of the British Empire in the latter part of the 19th century, when the lust of conquest had ceased, when the lines of demarcation between the great nations of Europe had been firmly settled, and when the old rivals, France and Great Britain, have been found fighting side by side, when the science of constitutional government had fallen into well defined grooves, when art, commerce, science, discoveries in steam and electricity became largely developed, when literature and other intellectual pursuits were more sought after than war and rapine—and when swords could be turned into plough shares. Happy is the queen who rules such a people. Happy is the queen who in this century of progress, rules so many millions of the Anglo-Saxon and Anglo-Norman race, who carry with them to the different quarters of the globe, the elements of civilization, progress and self-government, feeling secure in the knowledge that the ever vigilant eye and the mighty arm of the ruler of the British empire will shield them in every remote part of the globe should their rights be invaded by any foe. Hon. gentlemen, such a queen, and such a people have made the Victorian era what it is—our pride and the pride of the empire.

The preamble sets forth what the bill means. The Interpretation Act defines all the public holidays in the country, among others the 24th of May, the Queen's birthday, and this Act extends that day perpetually, and here I think an amendment would be very proper, calling the day "Victoria Day" and that amendment could be made in committee of the whole. The other paragraph of the bill refers to the bank holiday. It will be necessary to extend that, the same as the other day is extended.

Hon. Mr. PROWSE—I quite agree with all, or nearly all, that has been said by the hon. gentleman who has moved the second reading of the bill. I do not think the powers of man can fully describe the good traits of Queen Victoria and the benefits and blessings that the British Empire has reaped from the reign of Her Majesty Queen Victoria. I am not going to make a long speech on that point. I believe she has been, and is still, a model woman, a model wife, a model mother and a model sovereign. While I say all that, I am not disposed to give my support to the bill now before the Senate, and in a few words I will try to give the reasons why I am opposed to it. I do not consider that we are justified in imposing upon the people of this country a tax equal to one-third of one per cent of their annual earnings.

Hon. Mr. ALMON—Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. PROWSE—That is a very heavy tax indeed, and I think if we look forward to the next 50 years and see the great struggle that the labouring classes from this time will experience in making a living for themselves, that they will scarcely be able to look back fifty years and say it was a blessing that the Queen's birthday was made a public holiday. I think her record is such that it requires no act of parliament to embalm her memory in the minds of the present generation, and so long as the English language is written and spoken, her memory will never be forgotten. But, hon. gentlemen, I do not think we are justified in adopting the course suggested or mentioned by a celebrated character who was prepared to sacrifice all his wife's relations for the benefit of his country, and I do not think we are called upon to sacrifice a great deal of the earnings of the poor people of this country to commemorate Queen Victoria's birthday, because I hope that the sovereign who rules Great Britain, when Her Majesty is laid in her grave, will be as good and celebrated a sovereign as Her Majesty is to-day and, as the years roll on, each succeeding sovereign of Great Britain will be a model of purity, honesty and integrity.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—My hon. friend the senator from British Columbia who has submitted to this House the bill now before us, has asked me to second the proposition, and I have great pleasure in doing so. I do not take the same view of the subject which the hon. gentleman has taken who has just addressed this hon. House. The observations which the hon. gentleman has made with regard to the tax on the people of this country on account of having a holiday taken from their ordinary pursuits, does not impress me as much as it impresses the hon. gentleman himself. At the time of the Reformation, a great many reformers held to the view that there was no obligation to observe Sunday and they believed that it was wrong to impose upon the people of England the legal obligation of observing that day as a day of rest, and if the view just expressed by the hon. gentleman were a sound one, there would have been great force, from an economic point of view, in the opinions advocated by those reformers in England who thought it was improper to impose upon the people the obligation to observe Sunday.

Now, in my opinion, a day devoted as a holiday by a nation is not a day taken from the industrial pursuits. On the contrary, we find that the progress of a community in material prosperity largely depends upon their intellectual progress, and upon the moral fibre which they exhibit, and neither the continued industry during the seven days of the week nor devotion to the ordinary pursuits nor both together are enough of themselves to secure the general prosperity of the community and the wealth of the nation at large

There is perhaps an objection to making a holiday a perpetual holiday; but no measure that may be enacted by this parliament is like a law of the Medes and Persians—unalterable. I take it that that provision of the bill is nothing more than the expression of loyalty and good-will on the part of the people of this country towards Her Majesty, and if it were found at some future period during the reign of some other prince inconvenient to continue this as a holiday, it would be no reflection upon the memory of Her Majesty if the Parliament in existence at that time should undertake to repeal the bill. With regard to the holiday, the birthday of Her Majesty, it is an extremely convenient season on which a holiday may be observed, and that being so, I see no objection whatever to the adoption of the 24th of May as a holiday as proposed by the bill of the hon. gentleman now under the consideration of this House. There are many things which have happened during the reign of Her Majesty which makes it appropriate on the part of the people of this country to commemorate Her Majesty's birthday. So far as Canada is concerned the reign has been one of singular interest to us. It has been during Her Majesty's reign that the principle of parliamentary government has been fully recognized. And this subject was brought under the attention of Her Majesty's advisers at an early period of her reign by statesmen of this country. These gentlemen stood at the point where the ways part. They had an opportunity of considering the English system of parliamentary government and the American republican system; and after very full deliberation, statesmen like the Hon. Robt. Baldwin and the Hon. Mr. Lafontaine came to the conclusion that the adoption of the English parliamentary system would be greatly to the advantage of the people of British North America, that it was to be preferred to that system which had been adopted by our neighbours to the south. The United States government has undergone great changes during Her Majesty's reign. It was at the beginning of this reign, as it was at the time of its institution, a republican system. It then became a democracy; and it has now become an ochtarchy. It was a government by the representatives, a government by the public at large; now it is a government by the least qualified section of the republic. Against that system of progress in political descent, we have been largely protected by the wisdom of those statesmen who insisted upon the introduction in this country of the English parliamentary system, and it was during Her Majesty's reign that that good fortune fell in the first instance to the people of Canada and ultimately to the population everywhere of the British Empire. And I may say to hon. gentlemen that it is during Her Majesty's reign that we have here introduced a federal system of government, a system which has reconciled the English parliamentary and representative system with an indefinite extension of territory. Under that union, although we may differ as to the wisdom of many of the measures—either on account of legislation or in spite of legislation—and I care not from which point the matter may be viewed—this country has made very great progress. That being so, I see no impropriety, on the contrary I think it is well, that we should adopt the measure of the hon. gentleman, not with a view of tieing the hands of those who may succeed us in the discharge of public duties after our duty has ceased, but as a present expression of the opinion of the people of this country through those who speak on their behalf, of their appreciation of the great advantages which they have enjoyed, and of the great progress which this country and the empire has made, under the reign of Her Majesty Queen Victoria.

The Senate adjourned.

THE SENATE.

Ottawa, Monday, 3rd May, 1897.

THE SPEAKER took the Chair at Three O'clock.

Prayers and routine proceedings.

NEGOTIATIONS FOR RECIPROCITY WITH THE UNITED STATES.

MOTION WITHDRAWN.

The motion being called:

That an humble address be presented to His Excellency the Governor General; praying that

His Excellency will cause to be laid before the Senate, a copy of the commission and instruction to the ministers who proceeded to Washington, to discuss the question of reciprocal trade between United States and Canada; specifying the commodities in which reciprocity was sought, together with the reply of the United States authorities to the ministers on this subject.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.) said: This notice of motion has been on the paper for some time now, and since it was put there a great many changes have taken place in the trade policy of the neigbouring republic and of Canada as well. I do not intend to go on with the motion to-day—I intend to drop it. My object was to show the government that reciprocity in farm products would be most injurious to British Columbia. We have no surplus to export, while the neighbouring states of Washington and Oregon have a very large surplus, and our province is their only market. As it is now, even with a duty, they invade our market and keep down the prices of our farmers. If free trade in those articles were given, I have no hesitation in saying they would swamp our farmers entirely and ruin them, and we could not carry on farming in our country. That was one of my objects in bringing up this motion; the other is this: knowing that hon. ministers had gone to Washington on the subject of reciprocity, I wished to know how far they were proceeding and what they proposed to offer to the United States in return for free trade between the two countries. I am now satisfied that those gentlemen got no reply of a definite character—in fact, the United States would not, at that time, hear of reciprocal trade in any shape or form. This is a very important question, and it is one that should not be entered into as a hobby by any party or government. It should not be entered into lightly. I know the Liberal government think they have the means of influencing the United States government to giving us a market of 70,000,000 in return for our market of 5,000,000. I never thought they had such means. Our neighbours know their business well, and I do not see how they could possibly give us their market of 70,000,000 in return for our market of 5,000,000. However, reciprocity has now got a set-back and it is more distant than it has been for a number of years before, and, therefore, I wish to say nothing more about it now. Although the whole subject of the preferential tariff would properly come up on my motion, I shall not deal with it now. The most important point in that tariff will be discussed by Great Britain—it will be forced on her by Belgium and Germany, and will be discussed with the government here. I ask permission to withdraw my motion.

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—Why cannot the farmers of British Columbia produce as cheaply as the farmers in the United States?

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.)—I take the facts as they are—they do not do so, and we are importing a great deal, even with a duty. Ours is a mining and lumbering country chiefly.

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—Do you want to tax them for the benefit of the farmers?

The motion was withdrawn.

BILL INTRODUCED.

(Bill 26) "An Act respecting the Grand Trunk Railway of Canada.—(Sir Mackenzie Bowell.)

A QUESTION OF PRIVILEGE.

Hon. Mr. McINNES (B.C.)—Before the Orders of the Day are called I desire to direct the attention of the House to a telegram that appeared in this morning's Citizen from Victoria, B.C., which I shall read for the benefit of hon. gentlemen. It is as follows:

CHANG MAKES A KICK.

HIS ROYAL NIBS OBJECTS TO THE FUMIGATING PROCESS.

VICTORIA, B. C., May 2.—When the Canadian Pacific steamer "Empress of China" arrived on Tuesday, she went into quarantine at Williams' Head because of two cases of smallpox on board. The incident attracted but little attention. Dr. Watt, the "the line officer," ordered all passengers "lined" for 24 days, because smallpox cases had developed, while the Northern Pacific liner "Victoria" was permitted to proceed before the full time was up a few months ago.

When the "Empress's" steerage passengers were taken ashore they were stripped and disinfected with an odorous bath, and their clothes taken from them and baked. That was all right. When the quarantine officials approached the cabin passengers on Thursday and politely said: "Your turn next," there was wrath and indignation from the Knickerbockered Londoners, who protested against the impudence of daring to offer to bathe them. They even indulged in threats of resistance. There is aboard His Excellency Chang, a special envoy from China, who will represent the Emperor at the diamond jubilee in London. He is accompanied by a large suite of gorgeously attired Chinese, who do not understand western ways, and who look with horror on an attempt to put the Emperor of China by proxy, under fumigation.

His Excellency has refused to undergo fumigation, and not only has the Dominion government been appealed to, but Lord Salisbury and the Chinese representative in London have received his protests. Chang says he will go back to China without proceeding to London, though in that case he is likely to lose his head for disobeying the orders from the Emperor. He says, furthermore, if a hand is laid on him, it means trouble between Great Britain and China, as the person of an ambassador is sacred. The officials have suspended operations, and await orders from the authorities at Ottawa.

I desire to know of the government if they have been applied to by the quarantine officer at Williams' Head for instructions as to how they should act with regard to those persons who are characterized as "knickerbocker Londoners" and the Chinese Prince? The gentleman who is in charge of that quarantine station is a man of ability, cool and collected, and possesses all the necessary qualifications to exercise a proper judgment in a matter of that kind, very much better than the minister himself, and if he has so far forgotten himself as to voluntarily apply for instructions here as to how he was to deal with the knickerbockered Englishmen and Mongolian nabobs, I think he was at fault. But, knowing the gentleman as I do, I believe that he has not applied for further instructions from Ottawa until he heard from the Dominion government, or certain representations were made by interested parties to the Dominion government. In all matters of this kind I think it would be very much better to let the quarantine officer exercise his own cool and deliberate judgment there and then on the spot. Unfortunately some few years ago, as my colleague from Victoria knows, smallpox was imported several times from China—once in particular The consequence was that the city of Victoria was actually placed under quarantine for several months. A great number of our citizens died and the city itself was put to a cost of nearly $100,000, all, I may say, owing to the incapacity and criminal neglect of the principal officers. He has gone to his reward, consequently I will say no more about that, but I would impress upon the government that the less they interfere in such matters, the better will the regulations be carried out. If the threat that the Prince has made be true, that he will not land but will return to China rather than submit to fumigation, I would say, and I believe nineteen-twentieths of the people of the province I hail from, and of the Dominion, will also say, "go back and never return; we can get along very well without you." I claim that if the Prince is the man he ought to be, representing a great empire like China, he ought to submit to all rules, regulations and laws of a foreign country when he comes into it. If the published report is true, I strongly object that he and other first-class passengers should be subjected to the same unceremonious manner of fumigation that the coolies in the steerage had to undergo. But if it was done properly—and I know from my own knowledge of Dr. Watt, and those under him, that the greatest delicacy and consideration would be had for their feelings—no objection could be taken to the carrying out of the regulation. I might mention that in the past the government of Canada have been altogether too solicitous for the tender feelings of Chinese in our province. Twenty years ago, a certain gentleman who occupies a seat in this House, happened to be mayor of the city of New Westminster and had to act as police magistrate. The Chinese cases coming before him were so numerous that the jails were crowded, and he ordered in certain cases, where there was not as much cleanliness observed as should be, that the Chinaman's queue should be cut off. The attention of the authorities in Ottawa was called to it and from that day to the present time the laws there discriminate in favour of the Chinese as against our own race and all other races. A Chinaman convicted of an offence and sentenced to a term of three, five, ten or fifteen years in the penitentiary, is allowed to enter that institution and wear his queue the same as if he had not been convicted of a crime, while the white man is shorn to the skull, as close as possible, for various reasons. There was a misapprehension abroad at that time—and I want now to disabuse the minds of the government in reference to it—that it was owing to some religicus belief the Chinese considered it necessary to retain their long hair. There is not a scintilla of truth in that. The reason why the Chinese feel that they are bound and compelled to retain the queue is that it is a badge of loyalty—a badge of subjection to the Emporer of China—if they once lose their queue they are not allowed to return to the mother country. They are looked upon as outcasts.

But apart from the sanitary point of view, apart from cleanliness altogether, I urge it on a still more important point, and it is this: I believe it would deter the Chinese from committing crime more than any punishment that could possibly be inflicted upon them. I merely mention this so that when the government take, as I believe they will take and must take, a firm stand and place all classes there, no matter what their position or grade may be, on the same footing—that they will not allow them to enter our country and disseminate amongst our population the seeds of that fatal and loathsome disease.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.)—I suppose you want the government to take the cue.

Hon. Mr. McINNES (B.C.)—I am giving the government a cue and I want them to follow it until they root out small-pox and all discrimination in favour of the almond-eyed race.

Hon. Mr. BOULTON.—Would you give his highness the first bath?

Hon. Mr. McINNES (B.C.)—I would give him a bath at any rate. An unwashed Chinese prince is just as likely to disseminate disease germs as an unsoaped coolie. I am sorry that the Minister of Justice is not present to-day, because this is a matter which should come under the jurisdiction of his department. However, the Secretary of State is present and I trust that he will draw the attention of his colleagues to the matter at the earliest possible date.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I am not aware that the attention of the government has been called by any of the authorities in British Columbia to the incident that the hon. gentleman has drawn attention to. His remarks will of course appear in the Debates, and I shall call the attention of the Minister of Agriculture to the subject, and I have no doubt he will give it his best attention.

VICTORIA DAY COMMEMORATION BILL.

THIRD READING.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on Bill (C) "An Act to commemorate the reign of Her Majesty Queen Victoria by making her birthday a holiday for ever."

(In committee.)

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B. C.) said—It has been suggested to me that a proper name for the holiday will be Victoria Day. I, therefore, move that the following words be added to the first paragraph, "which holiday shall be called Victoria Day."

Hon. Mr. ALMON—In amendment to that, I move that the Chairman do now leave the chair. While I yield to nobody in this House in my loyalty to the Crown, I take no credit for it. It is dyed in the wool and I could not help it if I tried. Both my paternal and maternal grandfathers were natives of the then British States of America, and fought on the British side from the capture of Bunker's Hill from the rebels until the battle of Eutaw Springs, the last battle in the war. Therefore, any remarks that I make in opposition to this bill must not be put down to any disloyal feelings. I give great credit to the hon. gentleman from Victoria, who is moving in this matter, for the exuberance of his loyalty, but in this case I think his loyal sentiment has taken a wrong direction. I object, in the first place, to this measure being introduced in the Senate. If it is to be introduced anywhere, it should originate in the House of Commons, and should be brought in by a member of the ministry. I disapprove likewise of this measure making the Queen's birthday a holiday in perpetuity. Are we able to do that? We may have the legal right to pass such a measure, but can we do it? Think of the number of holidays which have been created by legislation in the past. When I was a boy, the fifth of November was kept as a holiday; how is it now? Very few ever think of it and nobody celebrates it except a few fanatics. The same remarks applies to the anniversary of the martyrdom of Charles I. That was a holiday at one time. I do not think there is a man in this House who knows the date of it. I have no doubt that the bill which made it a holiday passed with a great deal more enthusiasm than was shown in this House last week when the hon. member's measure passed its second reading. Then, is it a compliment to tell Her Gracious Majesty the Queen, who we all hope will live long to reign over us, what we are going to do after she dies? Would it be right to erect a tombstone to a man who is still alive? It would be a doubtful compliment. I know I should take it as such. I remember when I was driving through Brooklyn cemetery, on one occasion, seeing a magnificent monument there. I asked whose it was, and I was told that it was erected to the memory of Mr. Townsend, a man who manufactured sarsaparilla. I said "dear me is he dead?" I was told "no, but people driving through the cemetery and seeing this beautiful monument would inquire whose it was and on being told that it was the monument of Jacob Townsend, who manufactured sarsaparilla, they would immediately go to the nearest druggist and ask for a bottle of Townsend's Sarsaparilla." That was the practical effect of erecting this monument. The hon. gentleman may tell me that there are precedents for this legislation—that in ancient Rome Romulus was put to death and immediately made a god. That was perhaps a compliment to him, but he had to be killed first. The same happened with the Cæsars including Nero, Claudius and with Caligula and all the brutes that followed after them—they were all made gods likewise. That did not do much harm, because immediately after their deification, they were killed. The way in which they were deified was this: a member of the Senate moved that the Emperor be made a god. That passed unanimously. The reason of that was the senators were afraid that if they voted against it, they would be accused of offensive partisanship and have their heads cut off. That was a serious offence. Nowadays, in this country, if a man differs in opinion from the government of the day, his head is cut off; but it does not do much harm, because he knows that very soon his head will be put on again and in the very near future he will give his executioners their congé. Another reason that I am opposed to this is, not only because it is injudicious, but because it injuriously affects a large element of the population. On whom does the tax fall? It does not fall on the lawyer, the doctor, the clergyman, or the merchant whose ships are at sea, but it falls on the labouring man—the man who delves with the spade and pick. Think of the great strain there is on labour in these days. In the first place we have Thanksgiving Day, which I disapprove of, because Sunday, and other holidays recognized by the churches, furnish opportunities for giving thanks to God for all his great mercies. Then there is Labour Day—I think Idle Day would be a much better name for it,—when tradesmen and mechanics must drop work and lose their $1.25 or $3 a day. They submit to a loss, not of one day only, but of three. The preparations for the day make them lose the day before, and many of them do not recover from the effects of Labour Day for some time after. They are more tired on the day after than on Labour Day. Therefore, they lose three days. One day in seven ought to be enough holiday. In Nova Scotia, there are four months of the year in which the labourer out of doors is not able to do any work. In addition to that, the main portion of the labour is on the wharfs, taking out the fish and drying them. That can only be done on a fine day. When that takes place the labouring man himself, and all his boys from twelve up to twenty years of age, can be employed at wages in lifting fish on to the drying ground. If this bill passes they must not work on the Queen's birthday. Now, how much does a family lose? The hon. gentleman from Victoria does not think the loss is of any consequence, but I am inclined to think that the loss is considerable. Supposing the Imperial parliament fixes some other day to be observed in commemoration of the glorious reign of Queen Victoria what would we do then? Would it not be better for us to wait and see what they are doing in England before we pass a bill of this kind? There are many other things I could say which I shall leave to other hon. gentlemen. There is one other way of commemorating the Queen's Jubilee which does not entirely meet with my approbation, that is, sending young women to the North-west as nurses. However, it may have this good effect: if they come from Nova Scotia they will certainly be good looking, and therefore, as we all know that pity is akin to love, tender feelings will spring up between nurse and patient and matrimony will result, which will produce its natural consequences. If it does, they will have plenty of employment at home. I think that they would make remarkably good wives. They can work in the kitchen and in the byre and at everything to assist their husbands to get on in the world, and they might call their little ones Victoria if they like. I trust when they get to the latter stage, that they will not be too hard on their husbands—that they will allow them to have a little to say in the government of the house and the dependents connected with it and likewise, while treating their dependents kindly, let them know that the kitchen and the parlour are not necessarily on the same floor.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I think it would be extremely unfortunate, after carrying the second reading of the bill in the Senate. if we are to kill it in committee. This country is jubilant now, and very properly so, at the glorious reign of Queen Victoria. It has been most memorable in the annals of British history. We in Canada have a great deal to be thankful for. When Her Majesty ascended the throne the two great provinces of the Dominion were in a state of rebellion and dissatisfaction at the existing order of things. Her Majesty, listening, as she has always done, to the advice of wise counsellors, who were always in touch with the feelings of the age, sent a delegate to this country to consider this subject. I need not go over our past history. Every hon. member is familiar with the introduction of responsible government in Canada and the happy results which flowed from it. I do not propose, therefore, to travel through the events of Her Majesty's reign. Everybody knows that it has been one of the happiest, as far as Canada is concerned—and I think I may speak for the empire also—that history records. The hon. gentleman's first objection is that the bill should originate in the House of Commons. I cannot agree with him. I think it is quite proper that it should originate here, if any hon. member thinks proper to bring it forward. As to making the Queen's birthday a holiday during the lifetime of Her Majesty, it has always been observed as a holiday for the last thirty or forty years.

Hon. Mr. ALMON—It is to making it a holiday after her death that I raise the objection. I am the last person in the world to object to the holiday during Her Majesty's life.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—The real effect of the bill is to continue the day as a holiday as years go by. I hope that during the lifetime of Her Majesty and for many years longer it will be observed, and if those who come after us in the next reign think proper to depart from the principles we have laid down, it is perfectly easy for them to do so. The birthday of William IV. was not observed in this country, nor was the birthday of George IV., and if such a motion had been made with regard to the birthday of George IV., I do not think it would have been acquiesced in. There was not the personal admiration for either of her uncles which exists for Her Majesty. I remember, and there are other hon. gentlemen who will remember, that the birthday which was observed during the reigns of George IV. and William IV., was the birthday of George III., who was the reigning sovereign before their time. I can remember frequently going out to see the militia parade on the 4th of June. That was the day, and it was kept up, not only during the reign of George IV. and of William IV., but for a long time into the reign of Her Majesty Queen Victoria. The first date that I am able to find when it was proposed that the natal day of Her Majesty Queen Victoria should be observed as a holiday was in the year 1850. Up to that time we had practically been observing the birthday of a sovereign who had been dead since 1819 or 1820. I will refer now to the report of the two Houses, Upper and Lower Canada. Some hon. member called attention to the fact that it was the Queen's birthday and the House decided that it was a very proper thing to adjourn. It was moved by Mr. Allan Macnab and seconded by Mr. Hillyard Cameron, and ordered that the further consideration of the question they were discussing should be postponed until the following Monday. It being the birthday of Her Majesty Queen Victoria, it was moved by Mr. Baldwin and seconded by Mr. Price that the House should adjourn till the Monday following, and the House adjourned accordingly. It will be observed that there was a good Liberal government in office at the time. Since 1850 the day has been observed. In 1855, I think, it was in Upper Canada, the day was selected as a proper day instead of June 4th for the militia to turn out. Under the Militia Act of 1855 I find that in Lower Canada they had been keeping up the 19th of June as the day for calling out the militia, but in Upper Canada it was decided that the Queen's birthday should be selected. It does seem to me that it would be unwise in this jubilee year to counteract any movement of this kind which all the people seem to acquiesce in so easily. It is a happy compliment, and surely it is a compliment worthy of being paid. The most that can be said about it is that it may not be observed in future years.

Hon. Mr. ALMON—I hope not.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—As far as we are concerned, the parliament of Canada, by passing this legislation, would be paying a very happy compliment to Her Majesty the Queen. When I first noticed the bill upon the order paper, it was not a matter to which I gave very much thought, but after its being discussed I do not think it would redound to our credit to throw it out. I think we should all regret it if that course were adopted. We should at least send it down to the House of Commons and let that chamber take what action it thinks proper.

Hon. Mr. ALLAN—I have listened with great pleasure to the remarks of the hon. Secretary of State. For my own part, I think no more appropriate compliment could be paid to Her Majesty, and none which could be found to commend itself more generally to the people of this country than the one that is sought to be paid by the passage of this bill. My hon. friend from Halifax objects to the bill because he thinks it is a sort of left handed compliment to pay to Her Majesty to pass a bill that her birthday shall be observed after her death.

Hon. Mr. ALMON—Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. ALLAN—I believe there are a great many anniversaries observed after the death of the individual whose memory they commemorate. St. George and St. Patrick were gathered to their rest long ago, yet we observe these days to the present time. I do not think that the making of this a holiday for all time to come is open in any way to the objections which the hon. member from Halifax has made with respect to the working classes. The people, if any, who would suffer from such legislation would be much more likely to be merchants or professional men, because although it is declared to be a holiday it does not prevent the labouring men or the farmers from working if they please. For instance, if there is a prospect of bad weather the farmer may gather in his corn or hay as on any other day. I have over and over again seen men working on the Queen's birthday the same as any other day, and wherever the necessity exists for work on such a day, no one would suppose that such an enactment as this would forbid it. There have been a great many objects proposed as commemorative of this long and glorious reign of our sovereign, and most of them have partaken more or less of the nature of charitable or benevolent institutions. I know of no scheme of that kind (differing entirely as I do from the remarks which the hon. gentleman from Halifax has made) which would commend itself more to the nation than the commemoration of the reign of Victoria by the establishment of the Victorian Order of Nurses which has been set on foot by Her Excellency the Countess of Aberdeen. I do not think that the manner in which the hon. gentleman from Halifax alluded to the establishment of this order is right or deserved. Every one knows how much, in these days, the science of nursing has supplemented the science of medicine, and how often it is that the nurse is more necessary and good nursing more effectual than medical treatment, and anybody who has taken the trouble to make the inquiry will find that in the very part of the world to which my hon. friend referred—Manitoba and the North-west—there have been cases over and over again where there has been great suffering and where death has ensued simply because there was no nurse to send to the house of sickness. We know also that even in our own cities and towns there are many people with limited incomes who cannot avail themselves of the services of the professional nurses at the charges which are now paid, and it would be an estimable boon to them if this order of Victoria nurses were established and they could have nursing given to them at rates which are within their means. How far this scheme may be too large a one for the present, I am not prepared to say, but I do say that it is worthy of all support and of anything that can be done to carry out the scheme and make it a perfect success.

Hon. Mr. ALMON—Are those nurses pledged to celibacy when they go up to the North-west? If they are not, I think it is very inappropriate. For my part, I hope they will all get married.

Hon. Mr. ALLAN—The hon. gentleman is hardly serious in asking me to answer questions of that sort. It seems to me this bill is one which is particularly appropriate as a compliment—I should hardly call it by such a name—but as an expression of loyalty and affection for one who has been an example to all the world, as sovereign, as wife, and as mother. It is an expression of feeling on the part of this parliament, as representing the people of Canada as far as we can by legislation in that direction, that for all time it shall be called Victoria Day and serve to keep in the memory of our people the long and glorious reign of our gracious sovereign. It is an expression of our loyal feelings. It would well become this parliament to adopt this bill, and I do hope most sincerely that it will be passed.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—Much as I regret to have to differ from my hon. friend from Victoria in regard to this bill, I consider it my duty to give expression to the view which I hold on the subject. I am only too glad to express my accord with the sentiments so well and so eloquently expressed by him in his speech when he introduced this bill, and to also agree with the very happy and very loyal sentiments which have been to-day expressed by hon. gentlemen. But to my mind this matter does not resolve itself into a question of degree of loyalty but a question as to whether it is expedient in the interests of this Dominion that this particular method should be adopted of commemorating Her Majesty's reign. My hon. friend the Secretary of State, as well as my hon. friend from Bothwell, seemed in their remarks, to recognize the inexpediency of this measure, inasmuch as they both gave expression to the idea that this particular form of commemoration could not very well be observed in perpetuity. My hon. friend from Bothwell made the statement in seconding the bill that there was nothing to preclude this House or the parliament of Canada from at any time repealing the bill, and my hon. friend the Secretary of State re-echoed the statement to-day. That is tantamount to an acknowledgment of the fact that it would be against the best interests of this Dominion that a day should for all time to come be entirely set apart and all business on that day suspended because Her Majesty had reigned so well and successfully for sixty years. I doubt if any member of this House or of the House of Commons would have the boldness at any future time, if this bill did become law, to move that it be repealed. I venture to say that the loyalty of the people of Canada is of so advanced a character that any one who would do so would be taking his political life in his hands. It proves conclusively that we must enter into the consideration of this measure, not as a mere matter of sentiment, but as one involving very considerable interests. It is very well for hon. gentlemen not actively engaged in business pursuits, and who do not come in direct contact with the various ramifications of business life, to move that a day for all time be set apart and that business be tied up for twenty-four hours each year in perpetuity. I should like to point out the far reaching consequence of adopting a holiday of this particular kind. Hon. gentlemen must first take into consideration the fact that it means every government office throughout this whole Dominion shall be closed—that the departmental offices shall be closed and the government officials shall cease for the day to perform their duties. My experience of the departmental business of Canada is of such a character that it is not being done too speedily at the present time, and if a further day is taken away from the discharge of those particular duties, I fancy that the public will not have to complain at any rate of the expedition with which the public business is transacted. The post offices throughout the Dominion will be closed. It is unnecessary to point out the inconveniences to which the community will be subjected by reason of that fact. The custom-houses throughout the whole Dominion will be closed, consequently the business of the country will be subjected to very considerable inconvenience. We must also consider the fact that every court throughout the Dominion from the Atlantic to the Pacific will be closed on that day, and litigants who have been attending at very considerable expense the trial of their cases, will have to kick their heels about the court-houses of the country pending the observance of this day as a holiday. Parliament is usually in session at that period of the year, and parliament will have to be adjourned and the country put to the enormous expense of parliament being detained for another day during the session.

In addition to that, there is the fact that the banks of the country will have to be closed. It is not an ordinary matter for the business of the country to be suspended during a day and the displacement which it necessarily involves to take place. There is the fact to be considered that it affects the maturing of bills and notes, which is a matter to be considered by the business community.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—It will give one day more grace.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—One day more. I might point out to my hon. friend that that may be all right for the maker of the note, but for the holder of the note it is rather an inconvenient and sometimes a serious matter. In addition to that the manufacturing establishments of the country will be stopped. Every mart of commerce will be closed up. I do not say that every mechanic but a great body of mechanics throughout the Dominion will have to cease work, and on whom does the cost of all this fall? The mechanic cannot well afford, after emerging from a winter during which he must have lost considerable valuable time, to observe this particular day.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—It may save him a doctor's bill.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—I hope so, but it will not help to pay a doctor's bill. I fancy that the doctors who have to rely on the slim wages of the mechanics for the payment of the bill will find this holiday at least an inconvenience in this regard.

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—The mechanic will not be obliged to lose his day.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—I would simply answer my hon. friend in this way, that while the married man may not be compelled to lose his day, the manufacturing establishment will be practically closed by the younger portion of the workers quitting work. My hon. friend from Victoria, in very poetic language, referred to the younger portion of the community wandering over hill and valley picking the daisies, on that particular day, but what about the married men who find it difficult to keep the wolf from the door? The holiday may not be surrounded by so much romance for them. These matters have to be taken into consideration in passing this bill. The hon. Secretary of State gave utterance to very loyal sentiments to-day, and they are peculiarly applicable to the day we are celebrating, namely, the Queen's birthday, just now a statutory holiday, and one that has been a holiday almost since her accession to the throne. It has been celebrated more loyally of late than at the period to which my hon. friend referred, a period which was brimming over with loyalty, but which did not afford such a demonstration of it as to absolutely make it a statutory holiday. For many years past it has been a statutory holiday and is so to-day. What I wish to point out is that this adds an additional statutory holiday to those now on the statute-book. The law is so framed that, immediately the Prince of Wales ascends the Throne, his birthday at once becomes a statutory holiday. Consequently, we add to that particular holiday the one now suggested. My hon. friend from Victoria passed a most glowing eulogy on Her Majesty. I can assure him that I do not yield to any one in my sentiments and feelings of loyalty, and I am satisfied that every member of this House is quite as loyal as those who have expressed a preference for the passage of this bill.

Hon. Mr. ALMON—Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—But I would point out to my hon. friend that while he refers to the fact that this will undoubtedly be a pleasing tribute to Her Majesty, there is probably not to be found among all her subjects throughout all her vast empire any one who has spent such a life of industry and hard work as Her Majesty. That same empire has been built up by the unceasing work and industry of those who established it, and if we desire to pay a tribute to Her Majesty, we cannot follow a more loyal course than to imitate her example, keeping in mind that it has been mainly due to her unceasing vigilance and industry and close attention to the affairs of the empire, that she has reached the high pedestal on which she stands. If we want to pay a tribute to Her Majesty, we cannot do better than on her birthday to exercise our labour and our duty in building up the commercial and industrial life of this Dominion the brightest gem in her crown, and thus add to the aggrandisement of that empire to which we are proud to belong, and over which we hope she may be long spared to reign.

Hon. Mr. DEVER—After the excellent speech of the hon. gentleman from Calgary, it is not necessary that I should say much on this question. He has pointed out clearly that the adoption of this bill will involve a great loss to the working and commercial classes of this country. I rise to say that I do not yield to any man a greater admiration for Her Majesty the Queen than I do. I have studied her private and public life, and I think I know them fairly well. I am also familiar with all the great events, improvements and blessings that have come to her people since she ascended the throne. Peace and charity for suffering humanity have been her ruling character, and I am prepared to say, God save the Queen from all her enemies for all time to come. But, saying this, hon. gentlemen, and much more that I feel for the Queen, I am not prepared to endorse the doctrine propounded by our hon. friend from Bothwell—that it would be no loss to labour to make the day an idle one for ever. Because, if this is sound philosophy, why not make all days idle, and let the toilers at labour have a grand good time doing nothing. Neither am I prepared to accept the desire of the early reformers to abolish Sunday as a day of thanksgiving and prayer, to the origin of all the blessings we enjoy in this mundane home of ours. No, I rather prefer clinging to the injunction in that book of the wisdom of ages which says: "Six days shalt thou labour and do all thy works, and the seventh thou shalt rest and give honour and glory to God." No idle day here. In fact, I look on it as profanity, bordering on idolatry, to place on the statute-book any day set apart for human glory for all time, no matter how much we may admire their many virtues.

We find fault with others for doing this, and yet we commit the same fault ourselves, under other forms of law. I trust this House will show no such weakness in this case. Manly loyalty is one thing, but overdoing it is another, that should be avoided by all people who pride themselves in being governed by that book of books, the Bible. There is a possibility, too, hon. gentlemen, of us becoming fulsome flatterers of kings and queens in this way, and this weakness, I find, is no new thing. It is as old as the hills. We can find a very remarkable case of it recorded in Josephus, where King Herod, being surrounded by his flatterers, "saying thus far, we have looked on thee, to be superior to the nature of mortals. But now we are sure thou art superior." But, turning to his flatterers, Herod said: "I, your king, am just commanded to depart this life, and fate will soon disprove your false flattery. I now must die, and receive my destiny, as it is determined by my God."

Hon. gentlemen, I admire the Queen—not for her greatness, but for her virtues, and deep consideration for the feelings of others, rare qualities to be found under the mantle of power and wealth. These will be the ornaments of her life and reign, and will be a guide to future generations, as well as to that of our own, to follow her example. I would be very sorry to see the Senate help to put so silly a law as this on the statute-book to be repealed shortly, as the hon. member for Bothwell puts it. If that is the best that can be said for it, surely, as sensible men, we should not sit here silently, and make each and every hon. member in this Senate responsible for it, by allowing it to pass unchallenged. I I believe Her Majesty would discountenance such legislation as this, if she had the opportunity. She has always avoided sycophancy and fulsome flattery, and in this, has she shown her great wisdom and superiority, as a woman, and as a Queen.

Hon. Mr. CLEMOW—I am very much surprised at the turn this discussion has taken. When this bill was introduced I believed and hoped that it would pass without dissent, but hon. gentlemen now seem to think that the labouring man is going to be despoiled of a day's work. I am satisfied there is nobody in this whole broad Dominion but will hail with satisfaction the passage of this bill. The people are willing to sacrifice one day, or even more, for the purpose of commemorating the glorious events that have attended the long reign of Her Majesty Queen Victoria. Hon. gentlemen oppose the bill because the labouring classes will lose one day in the year: how many days do they lose now for the commemoration of less important events? No bill that we could pass would be received with greater favour by the people than this measure. When people pass away, no matter how distinguished they may have been, they are soon forgotten, and it is very proper that our people should set apart a day to commemorate the reign of Queen Victoria. I recognize the fact that every member of this House is loyal to the Crown, notwithstanding the opposition that has been shown to this bill, but some hon. gentlemen are acting under a mistaken idea that they are serving the interest of the poor man. I hope their opposition will be withdrawn, because I should regret exceedingly to see a vote taken on this question, and that it should go abroad that there is the slightest division of opinion in this House on such a subject. There was some disloyalty in this country years ago, but that has all passed away. The reception that this bill has met with in this country shows that there is no disloyalty in Canada. It has met with general approval. We have been told that if we pass this bill parliament will be closed on that day, but that difficulty can be got over by calling parliament to meet the first week in January so that the session can end before May. The 24th of May is a very proper time for a holiday. Throughout the country the seeding is over and the people need a rest. They are now asking for half of every Saturday, and probably by and by they will want the whole of Saturday. Men get just as high wages now as they did formerly, and they can afford to give one day in the year to the celebration of the reign of Queen Victoria. They are not likely to look upon it as a lost day at all, but rather regard it as a great benefit conferred upon them.

Hon. Mr. POIRIER—This is a very serious and delicate matter; but since the motion has been put and a vote has to be taken upon it, I, for one, do not intend to shirk the vote, and I feel in duty bound to explain why I shall vote for the amendment of my hon. friend from Halifax, lest my vote should be misconstrued. If the subject is a delicate one for the majority of the members of this House to vote upon, it is still more so for those of us who are descended from a race who formerly were subjects of another sovereign, but who are now, and have been for over a century, as loyal as any inhabitants or citizens of this Dominion, and who intend to be so in the future. Because what was said of the French population of Canada by a former Governor General, that the last cannon to be fired in defence of British rule in North America will be fired by a French Canadian, may yet prove true. As for myself, I have, with all the rest of you, hon. gentlemen, only the highest admiration and love for our gracious Queen, and I may have greater cause for it, owing to the circumstances which followed her accession to the throne, than some hon. gentlemen here. The year 1837 was the first time in the history of the lower provinces when the Catholic inhabitants of those provinces were given perfect political freedom and liberty. The year of Her Majesty's accession to the throne, the test oath was abolished, and Catholics sat in the House of Assembly in Halifax. The law had been passed some time before, but it was only in 1837 that it was carried out practically, when two French Acadians took their seats in the legislature. The governor at that time issued a commission for them to be sworn without being obliged to take the test oath, and the same law extended to magistrates and others. I may say, on behalf of the Catholics in the provinces, that our perfect civil liberty also dates from the accession to the throne of Queen Victoria. That is one reason for my great admiration and love for the Queen, but that is not the question before us. I ask my hon. friend from Victoria to take my words in the best possible sense. The age when such propositions as this is were possible or were in good form, has passed. Even under an absolute monarchy such a motion would be deemed as one from courtiers to the court and not as one from civilians such as we are. A perpetual festival in honour of any person who has had existence is, according to history, a religious feast. In no case has such an honour been bestowed upon a living person, and it reminds us of the very apt saying of a Pope to whom was proposed something similar to this in reference to a great person still living. "Gentlemen," said that Pope, "never canonize a living man lest he may fall into some error before he dies." Canonization is only for the dead; perpetual feasts are only for the dead. Look back at history from the remotest period; look back to the greatest men who have adorned humanity from the Greeks and you will not find any proposition going to the extent of this. Alexander, the conqueror of so many nations, was, if I remember well, adored as a god, but his feast was not perpetual; nor was that of Pericles, that great man of Athens, who gave his name to his century. But take England before Queen Victoria; it had great sovereigns. Was ever such a proposition made during the time of Elizabeth, the "virgin Queen," so-called, or of Henry VIII., to whom England, as a Protestant nation, owes so much? No, not even courtiers would have dared to do it, because it would have smacked too much of the act of a courtier. I beg that my words be accepted in their best sense. I have too much respect for my hon. friend from Victoria to utter or even to think anything that would be disrespectful towards him. Look at France: Charlemagne of France and Germany never had any such festival bestowed upon him; nor did Louis XIV., who reigned longer than Queen Victoria; nor did Napoleon the Great; nor did Charles V. of Spain; nor did Washington. You cannot find in history a precedent for this legislation. Hon. gentlemen are establishing a precedent of a very grave and, I am afraid, of a ridiculous nature. True, the Romans did it, but hon. gentlemen must remember that before they established such a feast for a Roman emperor they began by making him a god, and if it be enacted that Queen Victoria be a goddess, then I will vote for this bill. No, I would not even vote for a motion that would make our gracious and beloved Queen a goddess.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.)—There is no intention to do that.

Hon. Mr. POIRIER—Because she would have to die, and I would be very sorry to see her depart, even for a better world. It has been said that this motion should have originated in the House of Commons. I do not see the necessity for its originating there; if it should originate anywhere, I think it should originate in England. Why should we be more loyal than Englishmen? Are we in fact more loyal than Englishmen? If not, then why this expression of ultra loyalty? I do not know that even in England they would do it, nor that the 24th of May is made a legal holiday there. Men in their lifetime have been honoured by such feasts. I think that is proper, because it is nothing but human, but to prolong it to the hereafter is something that does not pertain to man; it is something that pertains to standing or religious institutions, and to make a thing immortal is something that pertains to the divinity. This bill, I hope, will be crushed here, and will be got rid of without too much being said about it. It should be referred back to oblivion from whence it should never have come, in my estimation. If it should go there it would be a very delicate matter for the other House to deal with; and should it pass what of it then? Have we not a 24th of May celebration now? Do we need a double enactment for one day concerning a living person when the birth of Christ has only one? I do not see the sense of it. If it was not already a feast, I would vote for a feast of obligation during the time of Her Majesty's reign; but what will be the consequence of this unheard of precedent in history? By this bill we are doubling the feast and we cannot feast it twice over the same day.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—What about Washington. His birthday is a perpetual holiday in the United States?

Hon. Mr. POIRIER—Is the hon. gentleman absolutely sure of that? Independence Day and our Dominion Day do not give divine honour to individuals. It is a celebration of a standing event. The Jews had it in the celebration of their great victories; but they were memorable facts. Independence Day is not a festival making George Washington something like a God nor is the day of his birth a perpetual holiday. Queen Victoria is not a God and she must die and be judged like the rest of us, with better chances likely up above. When the Prince of Wales succeeds to the throne we shall have two feasts. When he reigns there will be a precedent for establishing the second and so on with his successors. Now the spirit of the age is to diminish those festivities. When the French revolution occurred there were 87 festivities commemorating the birth or death of Christ and his saints. Now those holy days are reduced to a very few in number. They were formerly established for a religious purpose, but also to help or to relieve the working man. The tendency now is to diminish those holidays which come between him and his daily bread. Even in England, after the reformation, after Protestantism was established as the religion of state, the Church of England preserved about thirty religious feasts. How many are there now? The tendency of the age is to diminish them, even to the detriment of the commemoration of the great saints of our religion. Shall we come in now and increase them? In principle I am averse to it. As I said before, no one here has a greater admiration, respect and love for Her Majesty than I have, but as the principle is something unprecedented in history, I am afraid it might be taken as a reflection upon her. I, therefore, hope the motion of my hon. friend, the senior member for Halifax, will pass, and that we will hear no more about this bill, and that the other House will not have it.

Hon. Mr. VIDAL—If the bill which is now before the committee was a bill originating the observance of the holiday which has been proposed, very much of what has been advanced might be held to be appropriate and opportune, against the observance of the holiday as causing many inconveniences to be suffered by the public in their various capacities, labourers, doctors, merchants and other callings. Now, it occurs to me that if these alleged evils, or inconveniences which result from the observance of a holiday of this kind really exist, we have certainly had them brought fully before us and summed up in his usual clear, precise, and generally convincing way by our hon. friend from Calgary. We have in the arguments which he brought before the House a pretty clear and distinct summary of the loss to working men resulting from the establishment of a holiday of this kind. But it appears to me that to be consistent, if thinking that the observance of the Queen's birthday has been fraught with evils—if it has done so much injury to the country—if it has interfered so much with its business and prosperity, he should years ago in this House have proclaimed these sentiments and boldly moved that the 24th of May be no longer a public holiday.

Hon. Mr. POIRIER—I am in favour of it during her lifetime.

Hon. Mr. VIDAL—For forty years the country has been observing the day with all these evils attached to it, and no petition has ever come to this House to ask for the abrogation of the Queen's birthday as a holiday. Does not that indicate that the country generally is satisfied with it, and does not wish it altered or interfered with? And so we have a clear indication of the public approval of the observance of the holiday whatever inconveniences may attach to it. Did not my hon. friend admit this? Did not he say that if this bill were passed into law no one would dare to rise up and move for its repeal? He gave away the whole argument. He said no man caring at all for his political existence would dare to offer a bill to repeal the observance of the day. Considering that this country for a long term of years cheerfully kept this holiday, and agreeing most fully with the sentiments uttered by the hon. Secretary of State and my hon. friends who have taken that side, I do trust that this House will not hesitate to approve of the bill which has been introduced by my hon. friend from Victoria.

Hon. Mr. PROWSE.—I spoke a few words against the introduction of the bill on the second reading, and the speeches of hon. gentlemen to-day have not convinced me that I took the wrong position. I feel a little stronger on that point than I did when the bill was first introduced. It appears to me the introduction of this bill is the result of a little overflow of loyalty. I will not attempt to say for a moment that the hon. gentleman from Victoria has not been loyal for the last sixty years, as loyal as he is to-day, and I think the remark will apply to my hon. friend from the Rideau Division. He could not have been more loyal than he was this time last year or ten years ago. He is no more loyal to-day than he was then, because I believe that at that time and at the present time he is prepared, if need be, to shed his blood for the Queen of England and for the British Empire. But I think he is a little unfair to the hon. gentleman from Calgary, inasmuch as he interpreted him as applying his remarks to the present observance of the Queen's birthday. I did not understand the hon. gentleman from Calgary in that way. He is perfectly satisfied, and so is everybody else, to observe that day as the Queen's birthday till her death, and if the people who may be alive at that time wish to perpetuate the memory of her great and glorious reign we have no objections to it in the world. But the position we take is that this is not the time for us to declare to future generations for ever that this day shall be a perpetual holiday, because we hope that the coming sovereign, whoever he may be, will be as great a benefactor to this nation as Queen Victoria has been. As the years rolls on and civilization progresses, we have a right to expect that the Prince of Wales, if he comes to the throne, will exceed, even, the glorious reign of Queen Victoria, and we want at the beginning of his reign to establish his birthday as a public holiday, not for any work or good he has done in the past, but as an incentive to him to reign in imitation and in the glorious succession of his beloved mother. A remark has been made that this bill ought not to have originated in this House, and to some extent I agree with that remark. We know that the House of Commons is supposed to represent the great masses of the people, rich and poor and high and low, but this chamber to some extent is supposed to represent the upper and the richer classess.

Some hon. MEMBERS—No, no.

Hon. Mr. PROWSE—I say yes. Why? Because no man can occupy a seat here unless he is worth $4,000 in real estate, while the members of the House of Commons need not be worth a dollar. I take it if you made every day of the year a public holiday it would not be any sacrifice to the members of this chamber. It would not be a sacrifice of a meal's victuals or an hour's sleep. What effect would it have on the labouring classes of the country? It would mean starvation. There is a fund open now for the establishment of a great institution for the trained nurses of this Dominion, and I would suggest to my hon. friend as a very appropriate way for the overflow of his loyalty to double his subscription to that institution, and if that does not suit, treble it and so on. I think, on the ground that I have already alluded to, the House of Commons would be the most appropriate place for this matter to be introduced, because the House of Commons represents the labouring people whom this bill would affect most. I take the ground also if a measure of this kind is introduced at all, it should be introduced in the motherland, where they have had close intercourse with the Queen. We hear nothing in the newspapers of anything of this kind in the old country, and I think it is time enough for us to follow her example when she takes action. If we would follow her example in this as in other matters we would not be far astray.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B. C.)—I mention the fact that Sir John Glover brought up the subject, but it has not made any progress yet though it has been discussed by some of the papers in the country.

Hon. Mr. PROWSE—It has not made any progress. I take it that the introduction of his bill is nothing but a compliment to Her Majesty the Queen. If I understand her character and noble principles, she would not give her assent to such a bill if she had it in her power, if she felt it was to be a sacrifice of the interests of the labouring classes. She would not want to impose any additional taxes upon the people; she does not wish to burden them in any shape or form whatever for the sake of her memory, and I would say if this bill had to receive the sanction of the Queen and she vetoed it, that it would commemorate her glorious memory more than the passing of such a measure would do. I think the arguments advanced by the hon. gentleman from Calgary are so strong and conclusive that the House would do well to adopt the resolution of the hon. member for Halifax, and I shall certainly support the motion that the committee rise.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—The hon. gentleman who just resumed his seat has informed the committee that this is not the proper House in which to originate legislation of this kind.

Hon. Mr. PROWSE—Not good taste.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—And that if it is introduced at all it should be introduced in the House of Commons, because the Senate did not represent anybody, and if they represented anybody it was the wealthier class of the community and not those who are in less prosperous circumstances. I think the constitution indicates the restrictions which are imposed upon this House in regard to legislation. I am disposed to obey those restrictions in the constitution. I am opposed to introducing measures here that the constitution says shall not be introduced here. I am not prepared to put further restrictions upon the authority of this House by abdicating some of the functions that necessarily belong to us. I think, hon. gentlemen, that our influence is sufficiently restricted as it is without proposing further restraints upon that influence, and if the doctrine laid down by the hon gentleman were acted upon I am not sure that the community would not insist upon the abolition of the House altogether as an unnecessary institution. Then one hon. gentleman said that this was a foolish proposition and that the arguments in favour of the bill were inconclusive. I may congratulate the hon. gentleman upon his frankness in what he says in regard to the arguments of those who differ from him, although I cannot congratulate him upon the excessive politeness of his observations. Another hon. gentleman has told us that if it were in the interest of the community to have this as a holiday the same line of reasoning would do away with any industrial day and that we should make every day a holiday. I do not see that this inference logically follows, that the establishment of a holiday would work against the industrial interests of the country. I pointed out on the second reading that arguments of this sort were to some extent used as well as arguments of another kind against the obligatory course of Sabbath observance at the period of the reformation, and immediately succeeding it; but no one has maintained that the people of England would have been in a higher state of industrial development and would have enjoyed greater prosperity to-day if no sabbath had been recognized by the law. In my opinion there is a great deal of advantage in rest and in the recuperative advantages derived from a day of rest and from a holiday, which far more than compensate the industries of the country for any loss which they may sustain in consequence of a holiday being taken. By the recognition of Sunday you take away one-seventh of the industrial time from the community; by the recognition of the day provided by this bill you take away $\frac{1}{365}$ portion of the time. Does any hon. gentleman suppose that that would make an appreciable difference so far as the industry of the country is concerned in the industrial progress of the Dominion? I do not think so. My hon. friend from Calgary spoke about the interference with the industries of the country, about the great losses the labouring classes would sustain, about their anxiety to devote themselves to industry. Let me say, Mr. Chairman, that the great majority of those who labour, are men who labour for themselves and not for others, and there is nothing in this bill imposing the slightest restraint upon them, if they are disposed to engage in industrial pursuits. And what is more, we have the day as a holiday at present, and I do not know that the industrial classes of this country have failed to avail themselves of the day to quite as great an extent as any other. In fact, while my hon. friend was making his speech, I wondered what he was in this House for. As far as my experience goes, we do business in this House in a very leisurely way, and I suppose my hon. friend will be so industrious and so anxious to find something to do, he will be like a fish out of water in being a member of the Senate at the present time, and then my hon. friend from Calgary, I think, approved of the observations of the hon. gentleman from Prince Edward Island, that this was not the proper House in which to introduce a measure of this kind.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—I would correct my hon. friend. I hope he will not attach to my observations any inference of that kind—that I take the ground that this is not the proper House to introduce this bill. Dominion Day, as a holiday, originated in the Senate, and we have power to originate such a bill.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—I am glad my hon. friend says so. We have very little to do at the present time, and I thought it would be too bad to reduce our work. I think the hon. gentleman from Acadia spoke on both sides of this question. He said you should not have a holiday while a person was living, and you should not have a holiday while the person was dead. It was improper to canonize the living because the living might go wrong, and it was improper to bear in memory the dead, because you are making gods and goddess of them simply because this had been done with the Roman emperors. The hon. gentleman said also that there was no case of the birthday of a dead statesman being observed. There is the case of Washington whose birthday is observed.

Hon. Mr. ALMON—Was that day to be kept during his lifetime or after his death?

Hon. Mr. MILLS—It is kept after his death.

Hon. Mr. ALMON—Was not the resolution made after his death—and not during his lifetime?

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Let me say for the information of my hon. friend that we are observing the Queen's birthday during her lifetime, and if our friends are at liberty to observe it after her death surely we are at liberty to say so.

Hon. Mr. ALMON—I do not think you are at liberty to quote the case of Washington, which has nothing to do with the question of making Her Majesty's birthday a holiday after her death. Washington's birthday was not made a holiday during his lifetime, and I think the hon. gentleman knows that as well as I do, and perhaps a good deal better.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—I think the hon. gentleman's knowledge is at fault. The Queen's Birthday is now a holiday—Her Majesty is living. This bill continues it after her demise; the people in the United States do as much in the case of Washington. I was addressing myself not so much to the argument which the hon. gentleman from Halifax addressed to this House as I was to the argument which had been addressed to the House by the hon. gentleman from Acadia who objects to canonizing the living by recognizing a holiday while they were alive, and who objected to deifying them after their death by making their birthday a holiday, and so the hon. gentleman's argument was that you should not have a holiday at all. I think there is one feature of this matter which the House has to some extent lost sight of. What is the great object of having what you may call political as distinguished from religious holidays at all? It is the teaching force and value of those days. What was the object of observing certain days amongst the Jews—one of the most distinguished people of the old world, one of the people who contributed as much as any other to the progress of humanity? It was the commemoration of the great deeds achieved, the great works accomplished by their ancestors, and by the establishment of holidays and by recurrence to a discussion of the events of that period to fix these great events in the minds of generations that existed long after the events themselves had occurred. It was one method of impressing the great facts of history upon the people. It was one way of keeping alive and developing a spirit of patriotism amongst that people, and I say to-day, looking at the condition of this country upon the accession of Queen Victoria, looking at the condition of this country to-day, and looking at the great events that have transpired during her reign, there can be in no country a more appropriate day to be observed by its people than the birthday of Her Majesty by the people of Canada. Take the establishment of responsible government, the union of those provinces, the abolition of restrictions upon colonial trade, the abolition of the navigation laws and a hundred other things that have taken place during the reign of Her Majesty that have improved the commerce of this country, and I say that no more appropriate day can be selected for teaching the principles of English parliamentary government to a people, and to induce them to cherish those principles, than by perpetuating the birthday of Her Majesty after she has departed. If the people of this country choose hereafter to abolish this day as a holiday, and I do not think they are likely soon to do so, but if they choose to do so no one pretends to question their right, and if they are free to do so why this extreme effort to protect them in the exercise of a right or privilege which they will enjoy as fully after this measure goes on the statute-book as they will enjoy if we refrain from putting it there. Hon. gentlemen have asseverated their loyalty. I am not questioning the loyalty of any hon. gentleman, but I say the opposition to this bill is a most unfortunate way of exhibiting that loyalty. It makes a very bad impression. I remember standing on the platform at a railway station on one occasion when a party was arguing that he was as much a friend of prohibition as the clergyman to whom he was talking, the party certainly being under the influence of drink at the time. The minister said to him, "you may be so, but, sir, you do not smell like it." And I say to these hon. gentlemen, "you may be just as loyal as we are on this occasion, I am not questioning that, but I say that the manner in which it is exhibited by refraining from a vote on the second reading when that vote could be recorded, and by asking for a division in committee when that vote cannot be recorded, is a most unfortunate way of exhibiting their devotion to Her Majesty and their appreciation of the great and important events in the history of this country that have transpired during Her Majesty's reign.

Hon. Mr. ALMON—I think the hon. gentleman said the navigation laws were repealed under Queen Victoria.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—They were repealed in 1849.

Hon. Mr. ALMON—They were very much altered before that time by Huskinson.

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—I do not consider that the question before us is one of loyalty at all. I do not dispute the loyalty of any man in Canada. No matter what political party or what class he belongs to, the same principles of loyalty influence him. Nor do I believe that it is intended to enshrine Her Gracious Majesty as some have represented, any more than the erection of a monument in India would be an enshrinement, as it was there considered by some of her Indian subjects. None of those arguments move me, at any rate, in supporting the hon. gentleman in bringing forward this bill. It is to commemorate the reign of Our Gracious Sovereign who has been blessed by Providence to reign over the British empire for sixty years, the longest reign, I was going to say, in the history of the world. I do not know whether I am correct in saying that. Not only that, but the blessings of Providence have rested on that reign in so far as the principles of our British civilization have been extended to every corner of the world and upon the foundation laid by the heroes of the past, the great empire has been built up during that sixty years, which to-day stands pre-eminent before the world in unity, loyalty, strength and governed on the principles of Christian civilization. I do not think that the question of the interests of the working classes should weigh in this debate, because it is not compulsory on any man to remain idle on that day. If he is not working in his factory, he may be working in his garden or performing some other industry if he is not enjoying himself with his family on that beautiful spring morning, which has occurred as a holiday for the past sixty years. The commemoration of this jubilee, which is now to be celebrated, is conferring benefits on the industrial population of Canada greater than any loss which they can sustain by withholding the object of this bill. The most charitable instincts have been brought into play. The greatest movements of the age, at the request of the Queen and the Prince and Princess of Wales, are now being prosecuted for the benefit of our industrial population, both in England and here in Canada and elsewhere. The hon. member for Toronto has referred to the efforts that have been put forth by Lord and Lady Aberdeen for the establishment of a system of home nurses, and other methods by which Her Majesty's reign can be commemorated, and by which a new era is being inaugurated of Christian love and Christian charity, an example of which Her Majesty the Queen and the members of her royal family have constantly set. I say they are going to confer upon our industrial population greater benefits by far than anything this bill can take from them by the perpetuation of this holiday. I only hope that the opportunities may, from this time forward, more frequently occur by which those charitable instincts of our people may be brought into play, namely, helping one another so as to confer greater benefits in that direction. In Great Britain the Banking Act provides for seven bank holidays. In Canada we have not yet arrived at seven bank holidays a year, and this is an appropriate occasion to add one at a convenient and pleasant season of the year. Great Britain is one of the greatest industrial populations in the world. I do not think there is any to excel it, and they having thought it advisable and necessary to have seven bank holidays, which are generally observed by the working classes as days of rest and enjoyment from labour, to say nothing about private holidays, we I think need not hesitate on that account. I was struck by the remark made by the honourable member from Bothwell, in so far as in ancient times perpetuation of the memory of individuals was in vogue, for the purpose of commemorating, as far as possible, the deeds they had done in their lifetime. Now, I think that there is a greater reason why Her Majesty's name should not be perpetuated in the way this bill is seeking to-day. We have as an example of what the effect of commemoration of these days has upon the public mind. I would cite the Day of Independence in the United States, the 4th of July. That day was unfortunately ushered into that great country in the midst of war, bloodshed and revolution, and the result of perpetuating that day has produced exactly the opposite effect that we desire to produce by Victoria Day, but it bears out the honourable member's idea. Another thing I consider this bill will effect, and that is that we in Canada are acknowledging to the world that we believe in the sovereign who has reigned over us for sixty years. We believe in the British constitution that gives us that sovereign. John Burns, the great labour leader, came out to the United States a few years ago, and spent some three or four months in the great republic where he was striving to inculcate the British principles of labour unions, and confer with his fellow workers. When he returned to England, what did he say? He said he preferred to have Albert Edward Limited as the principle of government than the system of government which prevailed in the United States. This bill announces to the world, so far as we are able to announce it, that we respect our sovereign and desire to perpetuate the system of government under which we live, and that the successor to Her Majesty will have the same loyalty from the people of Canada as has been offered to herself. And I think if a jubilee portrait of Her Majesty the Queen was put up in every school in Canada with the words printed in red letters—"In Memory of Good Queen Victoria, her birthday on the 24th May is made a perpetual holiday for the children," succeeding generations of children are not likely to forget her or abolish the holiday.

Hon. Mr. ALMON—As I have been very much misunderstood, and as this House persists in thinking my resolution has reference to the keeping of Her Majesty's birthday during her lifetime, I am afraid that a vote would confirm that opinion, and I beg leave, with the consent of the seconder, to withdraw the motion.

The motion was withdrawn.

Hon. Mr. GOWAN, from the committee, reported the bill with amendments, which was concurred in.

The bill was then read the third time and passed.

The Senate adjourned.

THE SENATE.

Ottawa, Tuesday, 4th May, 1897.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

Prayers and routine proceedings.

THE COMMITTEE ON CONTINGENT ACCOUNTS.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT, from the committee appointed to nominate the standing committees of the House, presented their third report. He said: I may say that the committee is the same as it was in the first report, with one exception. It was suggested to the committee that one of the main reasons for sending back the report to the committee for reconsideration, was the absence of any member of the government on the committee, and as one of the committee, Mr. Reid, had already left Ottawa, the name of the Secretary of State was substituted. With that exception, the committee stands as reported originally to the House.

DISCHARGING BALLAST IN CAPE TORMENTINE HARBOUR.

MOTION.

Hon. Mr. WOOD moved:

That an humble Address be presented to His Excellency the Governor General, praying that His Excellency will cause to be laid before the Senate a copy of regulations respecting the discharging of ballast by vessels arriving at Cape Tormentine, Westmorland County, New Brunswick, and a copy of instructions given the harbour master respecting the disposal of such ballast.

He said: I make the same motion as I made the other day when the premier promised me a reply.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I am advised by the Department of Marine and Fisheries that there are no special regulations referring to vessels arriving at Cape Tormentine in Westmorland, N.B. There are, however, rules and regulations that affect all harbours generally, and I shall be very glad to place in the hands of the hon. gentleman the rules of the department, which probably will satisfy him. I find one of them reads as follows:

No ballast, stone, gravel, earth or rubbish of any kind shall be unladen, cast or emptied out of, or thrown overboard from any ship or vessel whatever, in the port or harbour or at the entrance thereof, except at the places set apart for that purpose by the harbour master and under his direction, under a penalty of $50 for each and every offence, to be paid by the owner, master or other person having the charge of such ship or vessel.

I presume there is a harbour master at that port and that if his attention were called to it it would be his duty to see that the rules of the department were enforced. That is all the information that could be obtained, and I suppose, in view of that fact, the hon. gentleman will drop his motion.

Hon. Mr. WOOD—Yes.

The order was discharged.

JUBILEE COMMEMORATION CORPS.

INQUIRY.

Hon. Mr. BOULTON inquired :

If a contingent of four or eight from one or two of the regiments in Manitoba, cannot be included in the Jubilee Commemoration Corps from Canada ?

He said : I understand from the public press that there is no one included from the 90th Battalion of Winnipeg, nor do I understand that there is any one going from Manitoba to take part in the contingent of 200 men who are to be sent to England for the jubilee commemoration. I would ask if the government could not give a share of representation to Manitoba.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I am advised than an officer and six men will be sent from Manitoba to be included in the 200.

THE TREATY WITH JAPAN.

INQUIRY.

Hon. Mr. BOULTON rose to Ask the government if the date upon which notice is required, under the terms of the treaty negotiated between the Imperial government and Japan in July, 1894, and the supplementary convention of July, 1895, has elapsed ?

If not, is it the intention of the government to be included in this most favoured-nation treaty ; and will ask for papers ?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—The time expires on the 25th of August, 1897. The policy of the government was adopted by an order in Council dated the 30th of October, 1896, and it was decided that it was not expedient for Canada to adhere to the treaty. We have suffered so much from favoured-nations clauses in treaties that we prefer not to be included in them.

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—Since I put this notice on the paper, I have found by reference to the Trade and Commerce Report that my question was answered practically in the manner in which the hon. Secretary of State has answered it, and that report of the Privy Council replied in that manner, but at the same time, I should like to give my reasons why I think that if it is practicable the question should still be reopened. This question of most favoured-nations treatment is one of very great importance. It is not only a policy that has been adopted by Great Britain in her commercial life but it is a policy that we have inaugurated ourselves in the French Treaty that was negotiated in 1894 and 1895. We have adopted it as part of our commercial policy, and in doing so I think we have taken a very wise step indeed. The French Treaty was passed in 1894 and 1895 by a very large majority on both sides of the House.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I think not.

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—I was speaking more particularly of the House of Commons and the vote that was given there. Having adopted as our commercial policy the policy of Great Britain, and this treaty with Japan having been negotiated in 1894 that I am about to speak of, I think that it is advisable, if it is possible to do so, to reconsider the determination of the government not to be included in this treaty. Japan is a nation of 38,000,000, living on the western isles of the Pacific Ocean as the British Isles are situated on the eastern shores of the Atlantic. These two nations occupy islands in the two oceans, and both contain enterprising populations. The inhabitants of the British Islands we know for centuries have been so. Japan has sprung into existence and the commercial life of the world of recent years, but in the few years that it has stood before the world, it has shown it possesses great capacity for the extension of foreign trade, for the liberality of the measures it has passed in order to encourage and develop foreign trade. Most favoured-nations treaties are for the purpose of developing foreign trade and extending the trade of a country beyond its own boundaries. This treaty was negotiated in 1894 and the British government has always since 1880 adopted the principle of notifying the colonies that such a treaty has been made and that any colony that does not desire to be included in that treaty can withdraw if they see fit. In 1879 when protection was inaugurated by a readjustment of the tariff, the government of the day expressed the desire to withdraw from favoured-nation treaties, again in 1892 Sir John Abbott by address of both Houses asked the British government that Canada be released from the favoured-nation treaties by denouncing them because protection and reciprocity does not fit in with them. But free trade does. During the reign of protection the policy has been to withdraw from these treaties. The Japan treaty was negotiated in 1894, but there was a supplemental convention in 1895 of the same treaty and therefore it extended the time for us to elect whether we would be included or not down to August, as the hon. Secretary of State says, of this year, leaving still three months upon which the government, I presume, would be at liberty to change its mind if they saw fit to do so. As I feel that it is a matter of importance to the commerce of Canada, with a view to extending our foreign trade I ask this question for the purpose of giving expression to such views as might lead the government perhaps to reconsider the stand that they have taken. We occupy a peculiar position in regard to these most favoured-nation treaties that have been negotiated by the government of Great Britain in so far as the treaty can be rejected or accepted by the Governor General in Council. But, if we negotiate a treaty ourselves as we did with France in 1894, that treaty has to be brought before parliament. Parliament had to give its sanction to the French Treaty in 1895, but parliament has nothing to say to the acceptance or rejection of the treaty of 1894 negotiated by the government of Great Britain with Japan which is just as important. There are a great many valuable things in this treaty. I will read one or two of them to show exactly the trend of the treaty. It is very much on the lines of all the commercial treaties that the government of Great Britain have made. Article 1 says:

The subjects of each of the two high contracting parties shall have full liberty to enter, travel or reside in any part of the dominions and possessions of the other contracting party, and shall enjoy full and perfect protection for their persons and property.

Article 3 says:

There shall be reciprocal freedom of commerce and navigation between the dominions and possessions of the two high contracting parties, etc., etc.

Article 5 deals with the most favoured-nation treaty:

No other or higher duties shall be imposed on the importation into the dominions and possessions of Her Britannic Majesty of any article, the produce or manufacture of the dominions and possessions of His Majesty the Emperor of Japan, from whatever place arriving; and no other or higher duties shall be imposed on the importation into the dominions and possessions of His Majesty the Emperor of Japan of any article, the produce or manufacture of the dominions and possessions of Her Britannic Majesty from whatever place arriving, than on the like article produced or manufactured in any other foreign country; nor shall any prohibitions be maintained or imposed on the importation of any article, the produce or manufacture of the dominions and possessions of either of the high contracting parties, into the dominions and possessions of the other, from whatever place arriving, which shall not equally extend to the importation of the like article, being the produce or manufacture of any other country. This last provision is not applicable to the sanitary and other prohibitions occasioned by the necessity of protecting the safety of persons, or of cattle, or of plants useful to agriculture.

Article 6 deals in the same way, and is as follows:

No other or higher duties or charges shall be imposed in the dominions and possessions of either of the high contracting parties on the exportation of any article to the dominions and possessions of the other than such as are, or may be payable on the exportation of the like article to any other foreign country; nor shall any prohibition be imposed on the exportation of any article from the dominions and possessions of either of the two contracting parties to the dominions and possessions of the other which shall not equally extend to the exportation of the like article to any other country.

Article 9 deals with tonnage, &c.

No duties of tonnage, harbour, pilotage, lighthouse, quarantine, or other similar or corresponding duties of whatever nature or under whatever denomination, levied in the name or for the profit of the government, public functionaries, private individuals, corporations, or establishment of any kind, shall be imposed in the ports of the dominions and possessions of either country upon the vessels of the other country which shall not equally and under the same conditions be imposed in the like cases on national vessels in general or in vessels of the most favoured nation, such equality of treatment shall apply reciprocally to the respective vessels, from whatever port or place they may arrive, and whatever may be their place of destination.

Articles 15 and 17 are as follows:

The high contracting parties agree that, in all that concerns commerce and navigation, any privilege, favour or immunity which either contracting party has actually granted, or may hereafter grant, to the government, ships, subjects or citizens of any other state, shall be extended immediately and unconditionally to the government, ships, subjects or citizens of the other contracting party, it being their intention that the trade and navigation of each country shall be placed, in all respects, by the other on the footing of the most favoured nation.

The subjects of each of the high contracting parties shall enjoy in the dominions and possessions of the other the same protection as native subjects in regard to patents, trade marks and designs, upon fulfilment of the formalities prescribed by law.

Article nineteen stipulates that the colonies have the option of accepting or rejecting the treaty, provided notice is given within two years of the passing of the convention. Article twenty-one provides that the treaty shall not take effect until five years after its signature so that the treaty does not come in force until 1899, although it was signed in 1894. The idea that prevails in my own mind is that these commercial treaties are exceedingly valuable concessions to both countries which are parties to them. They give Canadians all the rights and privileges that the native Japanese enjoy in their own country—their right to trade and their protection. Every advantage that is enjoyed by a native of Japan is enjoyed by a Canadian if he goes there and trades there. It is the same way with the natives of Japan. We give them the same advantages and terms in our country. I think that to an enterprising nation that is springing into life, very active life, indeed—a great industrial community living within reach of water communication of our western coast, it is a very valuable addition to the commercial freedom of Canadians having that treaty in force. It is only to be in force for twelve years and does not come into operation for two years more, and like all these treaties it can be denounced by giving one year's notice, so that whatever difficulties present themselves in the working of a treaty of that kind, it does not exist for more than twelve years. As I said before these most favoured-nation treaties have been adopted by the Canadian government as part of our commercial policy. We negotiated the French Treaty in 1895. The treaty that passed in 1895 is this, that whatever favoured-nation treatment we give to any other power, we will also give the same to France; therefore, any concession that we make to any other nation we have to give to France under that treaty. The French Treaty is not based upon rights that the Belgium and German treaties are. The Belgium and German treaties were negotiated in 1862, and they give them rights that we accord to Great Britain in any concessions in our tariffs. The peculiarity of that position is that any concession Great Britain gives to us has no effect on these two treaties, but any concessions that are given by us to Great Britain have an effect upon them. The French Treaty came into force in October, 1895. It was passed in the Statutes of 1894. Now we are dealing with a new state of affairs. Under the tariff that has been brought down of late by the government we are dealing very largely with the most favoured-nations treaties, because amongst the resolutions which are part of the tariff brought down by the government—resolutions which I heartily approve of, and which are certainly upon the right line as far as extending the foreign trade of Canada is concerned—amongst the resolutions is found this clause:

> When the customs tariff of any country admits the products of Canada on terms which on the whole, are as favourable to Canada as the terms of the reciprocal tariff herein referred to, are to the countries to which it may apply, articles which are the growth, produce or manufacture of such country, when imported direct therefrom, may then be imported direct into Canada, or taken out of warehouse for consumption therein at the reduced rates of duty provided in the reciprocal tariff set forth in schedule D.

Now, under that clause I contend Japan would be entitled to be admitted to Canada upon the same basis as we are according to any other foreign nation. The only condition is that the terms of their tariff shall be as low and as favourable to Canada as the tariff of Canada is to foreign nations of the world. Now, the Japanese tariff is a very low one. It is practically and virtually a free trade tariff. Ten per cent, I think, is about the highest duty they impose, and, therefore, if these resolutions do contain what in reading them they are supposed to contain, the right of any nation to enter into trade with Canada upon terms that are as favourable as Canada is giving to other nations, then I say that in all justice and honour we are bound to extend to Japan the favourable terms that this resolution accords. If we have to do that, we may as well take advantage of all the benefits that are to be derived from the treaty of commerce that has been negotiated by Great Britain, a treaty that has been negotiated with great care in accordance with old established usages, after the experience of centuries of foreign trade. It is wise for us having introduced a new state of affairs since the government dealt with this particular treaty some few months ago, to consider whether, having introduced this resolution, it is not worth while to take advantage of all the concessions of favoured-nations treaties when we are in honour bound to give Japan the benefits that this resolution confers. More than that, there is reason under these resolutions. The present attitude of the government on the tariff, a tariff, I presume, taken with great caution, so as to proceed step by step, feeling our way under the new condition of affairs. The government have so far only acknowledged Great Britain in the concessions that are contained in this resolution. Great Britain giving Canada absolute freedom of trade, these resolutions have been framed especially to take advantage of that—I will not say especially to give preference to Great Britain, but to take advantage of that commercial form of life that, where a nation admits our products absolutely free, we are losing in the transaction if we tax the return goods that come back here to pay for those products; and, therefore, when we remove taxation from the products that the people of Great Britain send to Canada in payment of the produce that we send to her people, we are justified in taking this resolution and supporting it from the standpoint of self-interest, quite irrespective of discrimination. The fact that Great Britain admits our products free, and that this phase of the tariff does confer that discrimination upon the mother country, has been hailed with delight from all classes in Great Britain, and by all classes, I think, in Canada, excepting those extreme protectionists who can see no good in any policy that does not protect them; but the masses of the people, who are going to enjoy a totally different phase of commercial life under these resolutions, hail them with delight, and join with the people of the mother country in thinking that the greater extension of trade between the mother country and Canada that is going to take place the greater they, the consumers and masses of the people, are going to enjoy the benefits of it. But the government has seen fit so far, not to acknowledge that those resolutions apply to Germany and Belgium, because those countries by treaties negotiated in 1862 have favoured-nations treatment in Canada under the British treaty of that date. Now, I presume that the object which the government has in view in doing that is to bring prominently to the notice of Great Britain and the nations of the world that that anomaly does exist, that so far as our making a favoured arrangement within the empire, we are precluded from doing so in consequence of those two treaties, which not only give Germany and Belgium the favoured nations treatment under such resolutions as we are passing here, but to all those nations who have the benefit of most favoured-nations treatment on the same basis. In taking that step the government is probably doing wisely in so far as it is a public notice that that disability does exist, and that if the people of Great Britain want to have that preferential trade and want to have it alone, the burden rests with them to denounce those treaties that place them in that position. Whether the government of Great Britain will forego their commercial policy which is interwoven and bound up in these commercial treaties which she has with some 75 foreign nations, remains to be seen. I very much doubt myself whether Great Britain will decide to take any such step as that. But besides that, these resolutions favour Belgium in the same way that I claim Japan will be favoured by these resolutions by virtue of the fact that the tariff of Belgium is much lower than the tariff of Canada. If these resolutions mean anything at all, they mean that the nations having a lower tariff than Canada are to have the benefit of those resolutions and that upon the merits of the question itself, quite apart from any treaty obligations, quite apart from any international law that may be interwoven with those questions the fact that Belgium has a lower tariff than Canada has, upon the merits of that point alone, Belgium is entitled to enter her goods at the minimum tariff and in consequence of Belgium having to enter her goods on the minimum tariff, Germany comes in, quite irrespective of the clauses in the treaties of 1862. For the same reason, France, in consequence of the treaty which we negotiated in 1894, comes in exactly on the same basis. It is wise for us to be clear on those points, because they are matters of very great moment. If we propose to alter our international arrangement by these means, we probably would find we are wading in rather deep water. There is so much interwoven with these treaties that it is a matter of very great difficulty for us to get a clear perception of what it leads to. So far as it leads to Germany, France and Belgium entering Canada in competition with Great Britain under that minimum tariff, I welcome the resolutions because they are in line with what I have been advocating for the last six years.

I am heartily in sympathy with the government to that extent. When the motive can be construed that it is to exclude these foreign nations and to enter into a trade Zollverein with Great Britain and Great Britain only, then it leads to all kinds of difficulties that we cannot perceive the end of. National law is made for the preservation of peace and the good government of the people in any country, so international law is projected for the peace of the world and good government of the nations of the earth. This question of most favoured-nations treatment is at present closely bound up in our international obligations and therefore I would rather see that liberality of idea on the part of the government extended to these nations in consequence, to the lower tariffs that exist in New South Wales, Belgium, Japan and many other nations, which admit them into competition with Great Britain in Canada, under that minimum tariff that has been established. I think the government would act wisely in taking that step, although two tariffs are not wise in principle. High protection, as in France, can be quite as effectively maintained under a maximum and minimum as under a single tariff. So far as the policy of the Conservative party or the policy of the Liberal party is concerned, I do not think there is very much difference between them, so far as they would affect our international obligations. The Conservative policy of preferential trade would produce exactly an identical effect if it was carried out that the policy inaugurated under these resolutions would have. The only difference between them would be that the Conservative party a k the people of Great Britain to pay them something for the privilege of a lower tariff. I never could see that such a policy was a wise one. I always looked upon it as a selfish policy. If the United States to-morrow were to pull down their tariff and say "we will trade free with you" would not Canada gladly do it? If Germany or any other nation were to pull down their tariff and say "we will trade free with you," would we not do it? But when Great Britain gives us all she can, and has no more to give, then we say "You pay something in kind if you want the benefit of trading in Canada's markets." I do not think that is a loyal or patriotic plan to take with a nation that has accorded to us the advantages in trade and commerce, the advantage of the purchasing power which she gives to our produce, and everything else. I think that the statement in these resolutions is far more liberal and enlightened and likely to lead to far better results than the policy of preferential trade leading to imperial protection. The secret of England's great purchasing power for all our produce, is the fact that the competition which exists in those islands gives such an economic force in the prosecution of their foreign trade, that it draws the wealth from every corner of the world to the British islands and the expenditure of that wealth enables them to give such prices in Great Britain to those who trade with them, greater than any other nation of the world can afford. There is no market in the United States equal to the market of Great Britain for our products. There is no market in Germany or in France or anywhere equal to that of Great Britain. That is to say we get the benefit of the very highest prices, and when that state of affairs exists, I think that the purchasing power of the people of Great Britain would be greatly impaired if she were to tax the wheat of all foreign nations—nine-tenths of the wheat that she finds it necessary to import for food in order to give a benefit to the one-tenth the colonies have so far been able to supply. The very fact of her putting even a small margin of protection upon the food she requires would immediately reduce her purchasing power to the extent that the taxation of the necessaries of life would impair the purchasing power of her people and to that extent the market for the products we have to sell would be impaired, especially when we know protection is never satisfied with a little. Therefore on both grounds I think that the policy that is sought for by the Conservative party does not contain the elements of advantage to Canada or to the British Empire which we all have a warm spot for in our hearts, as these resolutions do. Moreover, if we had preferential trade under the Conservative policy Belgium would be admitted just the same and France would be admitted just the same as all the foreign nations who have favoured nation treaties would have admitted under these resolutions. If the Conservative policy were carried out, Belgium and Germany would be admitted exactly on the same terms, unless the British government denounced the treaties. There is another feature which has only lately cropped up to our knowledge by the discussion in the German parliament and that is the discussion of the most favoured-nation treatment between the United States and Germany. And what do we find there? We find according to Baron Marshall Von Birberstein that most favoured-nation treatment is accorded to Germany in the United States because in 1828 there was a favoured-nation treaty negotiated with the United States by Prussia, one of the states of the German Empire, and because one of the states of the German Empire was accorded favoured-nation treatment in 1828, although the German Empire itself has not got a treaty to that effect in force with the United States, the treaty with the German Empire remains in force through the effect of that treaty of 1828, and Germany is anxious to retain that favoured-nation treatment, although seeking to retaliate upon the United States in some other form in consequence of their high sugar duties against Germany. Now, if we find that the United States has a favoured-nation treaty with Germany, because of the fact that one of the German states negotiated a treaty in 1828, and we were to ask the Imperial government to denounce the treaty with Germany, because we form a state of the British Empire in the same way as Prussia formed a state of the German Empire—if we were to force the government of Great Britain to denounce the treaty with Germany, and the British government acknowledges our freedom where our own interests are concerned—what position would we be placed in so far as competition in the German markets would be concerned with Canada? The United States that have the same products to sell as we have would have favoured-nation treatment; Germany would have favoured-nation treatment in the United States market while we would not. I look upon it that favoured-nation treatment in any market between two countries develops trade between those countries. I am not one of those who think we should restrict trade between nations I think we should expand it, and the more we expand it and are able to hold our own in foreign markets the better we are able to hold our own in our home market. Some people say we would be flooded with German and Belgian goods, and goods from all parts of the world. I do not myself consider that that is an evil at all. That is an advantage to any country. A great many people say that the money goes out of the country. The money does not go out of the country at all. There is a certain amount of currency circulation necessary for the maintenance of whatever commerce we are enjoying ourselves. The greater international trade there is, the greater foreign trade there is, the larger the currency required there will be. We may run our currency up to twenty, thirty or fifty millions, just in proportion to the foreign trade that we develop, because the development of the foreign trade means internal industry. You cannot possibly develop foreign trade unless you have an additional amount of industry in some form or another, whether it is in handling goods that come in or go out, or the manufacture of our natural resources or free imports, or whatever it may be, to the extent that we develop that foreign trade, to that extent we have to increase our currency, and it is only that currency that is handled by the people. If we were to send 1,000 five dollar bills of the Bank of Montreal to London, the same $5,000 would be sent back again to Canada by express. If we were to send 100 dollar bills to Japan, those same 100 dollar bills would come here intact, just as soon as it possibly could. Everybody knows perfectly well that the currency of Canada does not pass in other countries. It is only current for the trade of Canada itself, and forms a very small portion of the value of our total trade, and that ought to dispel the idea that is prejudicial in the minds of a great many people when they approach this question, that when we admit the products of a foreign nation, whether it is manufactures, or products, or anything else, that we are sending money out of the country in order to pay for them, and that we are parting with our money. There never was a greater fallacy, and I think that the hon. gentleman from Peterborough, the president of one of our large banks, will bear me out in saying that there is no such thing as money passing between nations, except what is necessary to regulate our traffic in the great clearing market of the world, London. Therefore, if we import goods from France, Germany or Japan, or any other country, those goods are paid for with the products of the industry of the people of Canada, and we must be working at something or other in order to pay for those goods, and to the extent that we import, even if these goods are flooded in upon us, which some hon. gentlemen regard as a calamity, there has got to be people in the country in order to consume them and to reproduce the means of paying for them, and those people who are reproducing those means are enjoying the comforts of those imports both in the materials necessary for their industries and for the necessaries of life to the extent they are cheapened to them.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.)—What becomes of the balance between exports and imports if we do not get it in money?

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—Of course if the country is wealthy and had investments abroad or is doing a large portion of the carrying trade or from any extraneous sources whatever outside of our national trade, we will import more than we export in order to be paid for it; on the other hand if we have no investments abroad—if we are not doing our own carrying trade but it is being done by some other nation and we owe money to other nations, our exports have to go out from Canada in order to pay that indebtedness whether it be for railroad bonds or public indebtedness—whether it be private loans or whatever it may be, that money has to be transmitted—not that money but Canadian products have to be transmitted to the nation to whom we owe the money in order to pay the liability we have incurred, that is the way imports exceed exports and exports exceed imports. We have imported for the last 10 or 15 years a great deal more than we have exported, but the reason of that is we have been borrowing largely. We have borrowed during the last 10 or 15 years many millions of dollars and that does not come out in money; it comes out in the goods we require to use. You have only to look at the trade and navigation returns and you will see without any difficulty that there has been very little variation in the import of bullion and export of bullion. It has been just about the same. Whatever we import or whatever we borrow or whatever credit we have brought, that credit is supplied to us and paid for by the product of other nations. But for the last three or four years we have not been borrowing any money beyond borrowing money to supplement our debt liabilities that we have incurred in consequence of deficits and we are now working within our own means. There have been no imports coming from the old country in consequence of any borrowing that we have made for public works or new enterprises or anything of that kind. Consequently the condition has prevailed for the last three or four years that our exports have exceeded our imports, that is, we have parted with so much of the product of our industry and we have received back into the country nothing in return for it. It has been absorbed to pay the interest on our liabilities that had to be paid abroad. Now, that condition of affairs cannot be impressed upon the minds of hon. gentlemen too much because it is one of the conditions upon which it is necessary to dwell in order to convince hon. gentlemen that a successful commercial policy that has been pursued by Great Britain for the past 50 years is the true policy that brings wealth, prosperity, contentment and a fair distribution of wealth to the people of the country generally. I think we have one of the greatest object lessons that can be given to any nation. In Great Britain during the last year, in last year's budget the revenue exceeded the revenue of the year before. There has been an increase in the revenue of 1896 of $12,000,000, a portion of the national debt paid off to the extent of $37,000,000, and an increase of 5 per cent in the foreign trade of the country. Now, when people talk of the poorly paid labour and poverty existing in Great Britain, it must be apparent that that revenue could not be raised if such poverty existed and if such poor wages existed. There has never been such prosperity exhibited by any nation in the world as has been shown by the people of Great Britain year after year, and that prosperity is most noticeable amongst the working classes. The rate of interest returned to the large capital invested in the cotton industry being only two per cent. During the past thirty years there has only been one or two deficits. In thirty years there has never been a surplus beyond $16,000,000, showing how carefully the thing is done—that there is not an excessive amount of taxation taken out of the people one year and a lesser amount of taxation taken out another year. That is the fact I desire to convey. I am very glad to see the stand that has been taken by the government in making an advance toward that position. I think myself that the position the country stands in at the present moment is rather a dangerous one, because the government is evidently halting between two policies. I do not say halting between two policies, but it has that effect. The tariff is of that character that it is very easy to go back to protection if protection should get the strongest and it is in a position to go forward if those who hope for that policy should be the strongest. My contention is that there is no safe ground between the two policies, one of free trade and one of protection. If you protect, you must protect so that it does protect and confine the trade of the country to its own border. We know what effect that has upon the country. We know that it is not an equal distribution of the wealth of the people and we know that it has brought us into the difficulty the country is in to-day, because no one can say that the country is really in a prosperous condition or that our labouring population are finding employment, Then the other policy is that of free trade such as we have it in Great Britain, which develops the wealth, the strength, the political influence and every advantage any nation should desire to secure—it has been all accomplished under their commercial policy. I say that there is no safe policy between those two. We must make up our minds to go down to the one or come up to the other. I do not think there can be any doubt about that and my anxiety in seeing the position the tariff is in at the present moment, although it has abolished certain evils in connection with our former tariff, yet from the smiling faces we see upon all those who enjoyed protection before, it is quite evident that they are satisfied that they have still a protective tariff and that it is not the revenue tariff that was designed

Hon. Mr. PERLEY—Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—I am prepared to admit that the stand the Congress of the United States is taking under their new tariff it is impossible for us to lower our tariff to them, although there are some of their products such as iron, coal oil and coal, etc., that we can take advantage of, for our own advancement. It is, however, one thing to let in our neighbours, except on an even keel, along a stretch of 4,000 miles to exploit our country with their manufactures, while erecting prohibitory barriers against us, neighbours from whom we already purchase nearly double what they purchase from us; but because we are obliged in self defence to adopt that policy, it is no reason why we should hesitate in lowering down our tariff in favour of Great Britain who purchases from us nearly double what we purchase from her, until it reaches absolute free interchange of trade in our own interest; and if in pursuing a commercial policy that tends to give us the power to compete in the large markets of the world, we should have to let those foreign nations in with whom we are allied by most favoured-nation treaties, it is not going to check the advantages of that commercial policy, but rather increase them. When our manufactures have attained that strength that the economic force that free trade with Great Britain will impart we can then face any competition no matter what quarter it may come from. It is time enough when foreign nations denounce our commercial treaties, and commercial allies leave us, to draw closer the ties of the British Empire and develop an imperial commercial policy for mutual support and strength. The government have said they must proceed by slow stages, but slow stages are dangerous, as he who hesitates is lost, and if you do not walk right pass the grog shop firm in your determination to stick to your good resolutions you may be tempted to give in and so get back into your old habits. The only way is to go right on and give to the people of the country that inherent strength which free trade with Great Britain will undoubtedly give. Free trade gives an economic force to the people of any country and gives them the power to compete under the most favourable conditions in the markets of the world and it also gives to them the same power to hold their own in the market at home against all comers. I have spoken longer than I intended to to-day, but I confess that it takes a long time to convince hon. gentlemen longer than it does the younger ones on this matter. I think when the government have made up their mind fully and entirely to adopt that policy which they promised to adopt before they came into power, that this Senate will fall in royally and heartily to support them and help them in carrying it out, at any rate if they do not it will not be for the want of hearing good sound political economy from your humble servant which the object lesson of fifty years of unexampled prosperity in Great Britain in pursuance of that policy justifies.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I am afraid I owe the Senate an apology for having asked them to allow the hon. member from Shell River to speak to the question. He availed himself of the opportunity, and certainly has widened his remarks far beyond the legitimate scope of the question upon the paper. I do not propose to follow him, because on a question of this kind it is only fair to the House that notice should be given before a debate upon it, but I rise for the purpose of expressing my dissent from the statement that the policy of this country is to enter into favoured-nations treaties. I think on only one occasion have the people of this country had an opportunity of expressing an opinion on that subject. All the earlier treaties were entered into by Great Britain without consulting Canada The government of the day may have been consulted, but I am not even aware, as far as my own experience goes, that they were consulted in many of the treaties in which the favoured-nations clause has been imported, and it extends far beyond the treaties with Belgium and Germany. There are, I think, some 18 or 20 countries with whom treaties have been made by Great Britain in which the favoured-nations clause is inserted and in which the colonies of Canada have been included, Canada being specially mentioned in some of them, more particularly those with Belgium and Germany. The treaty with France did not receive the approval of this country, but I think we were rather drawn into it by the excessive zeal of our high commissioner, and there was a desire that he should not be placed in an embarrassing position. There was by no means a unanimous consent of this chamber and the other House when the treaty came up for discussion, more particularly in this chamber. When it was submitted first in 1894, the late government were not at all cordial in acceptance of the treaty. I find that the Finance Minister, who had charge of the treaty in the other chamber, speaking on the 17th of July, 1894, on the subject, said :

> Parliament will not be asked to ratify the treaty this year. I think it is also well to state that one of the chief points which the government have to keep in view, is with respect to the favoured-nations clause. Whatever may have been our understanding with respect to all the other clauses of the treaty as to articles which were to be allowed to come in, it is perfectly true that by our telegram of the 12th January we assented to these clauses, whether we fully understand them here or not, and are responsible for them. But with respect to the extensions of the most favoured-nation treatment, that was never contemplated by the government, that was not included in our instructions, and, so far as that is concerned, was entirely beyond the wish of the government.

That shows that, at all events, the late government were not favourable to the extension of this favoured-nations clause, and certainly the present government entirely coincide with the view then formed on the subject that they ought to be left entirely independent.

Hon. Mr. BOULTON. I should like to point out that I think that that remark of the Finance Minister was in reference to France admitting only twenty articles, while we admitted a larger number.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—The Minister of Finance said while they had no objection to reciprocal trade in the articles named in the schedule, they declined to let the favoured-nations clause be inserted, and it was for that purpose that I rise to express my dissent from the conclusion that the hon. gentleman drew that this country was really committed to the policy of the favoured-nations clause. We found it very embarrassing, and I can assure hon. gentlemen that when the present tariff comes to be discussed, it will no doubt be brought forward as a very embarrassing feature of it. So far as the trade with France is concerned, the entering into that treaty has not developed the trade we had a right to expect, if there was any value attachable to the treaty that was made. We sold to France in

1881	662,000
1883	617,000

While last year we only sold $588,000 worth, the year before $385,000 worth and the year before $544,000 worth, so that the treaty has not, at all events, benefited us particularly in developing an export trade.

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—That was her high tariff.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—We do not gain much by the favoured-nations clause so far as France is concerned. The whole aggregate trade that we have with France is only $3,302,000, while our aggregate trade altogether is $239,000,000, so you will see it is a mere fragment. The trade with Japan is rather better. Of late years we have been developing our trade with Japan, but we consider it would be extremely unwise for us to accept the proposal made by the Imperial authorities to become a party to that treaty. I do not propose to discuss the question that the hon. gentleman has incidentally alluded to, as to what the effect may be of the particular clause of the tariff which gives to any country which adopts a tariff as low as ours a reciprocal right. Of course that will be discussed when the tariff comes up to this chamber. At present our opinion is that it applies only to Great Britain. We may be wrong ; it is quite impossible to lay down any positive decision on that subject, but we consider that the wording of the proposal will not embrace those countries with whom we have the favoured-nations clause.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I do not know that under present circumstances it is advisable to discuss this question, particularly as it applies to the tariff, which will come before the Senate in a very short time. At the same sime, I am very glad that the hon. member from Marquette has brought the question under the notice of the House and of the country, because it is of very great importance that the country should know the extent to which the provisions of the tariff are to apply. I claim the indulgence of the House for a few remarks in reference to the position in which the hon. gentleman from Marquette has placed the Conservative party on this question ; and also, if I may be permitted to point out, that the hon. Secretary of State has confined himself to only one portion of the question as it affects the French treaty. Speaking to the latter first, the hon. gentleman pointed to the position taken by the government, as it was announced by the Minister of Finance in 1894. Whatever may have been the opinion of the government at that day, as announced by the Minister of Finance, I think it would have been much better and much more consistent with the information which he desired to give to the country, had the Secretary of State mentioned that, notwithstanding the expressions of the Minister of Finance in 1894, the treaty was ratified by parliament in 1895, and that no matter how many there were in this House, or in the other House, who dissented from the terms of that treaty, it became absolutely the bona fide law of the land, and as such, we have to deal with it. When the question as to its effect upon the trade of the country is put before the House, and we will have an opportunity of discussing it, I may take the opportunity of giving my opinion as to the results, and I may not differ very much from the hon. gentleman. But I take that subject to be apart altogether from the present question before the House. What I desire to know, before going any further, is whether the government has taken any action in reference to the treaty negotiated between England and Japan, and if not, whether it is their intention to ask the Imperial government to relieve Canada from the provisions and obligations which would devolve upon her if she became a party to the treaty. I might state that for a number of years past, particularly since the late government took very strong grounds against the favoured-nations clauses as they exist at the present day, and as they affect Canadian trade, the Imperial government have, upon every occasion, submitted the treaties which they negotiated with other countries to Canada, asking whether she was desirous of becoming a party to those treaties, and in every instance when I was a member of the cabinet, the government decided not to become a party to any treaty which restricted us in the management of our own affairs, or in the levying of a tariff. It is well known that a few years ago, when Sir John Abbott was premier of this country, both Houses passed an address to Her Majesty, asking to be relieved from the provisions of that treaty, for the reasons which I have already indicated. While I was on a visit on behalf of the government, on the question of trade, to the Australian colonies, this question was also discussed. The House will remember the constitution of that country prevented Australia from entering into any preferential arrangement with their fellow colonists or with England, unless they gave the same terms to all foreign countries. Hence, when we pointed out to them that if we made concessions to the Australian colonies in connection with the trade which existed between Canada and Australia, particularly the lumber trade, that we should be then making concessions to them which would enure to the benefit of the whole lumber trade of the Pacific coast of the United States, from the fact that they were prevented from giving us any concessions that were not given also to all other countries in the world. I pointed out at once, and the government pointed out, that we could not be expected to give a preference while those concessions which we gave would be to the advantage of the United States to a greater extent than to us, unless we could send cargoes of lumber and other articles exported from British Columbia to the Australian colonies, at a cheaper rate than they could be sent from Olympia Sound and the lumber districts of that portion of the United States. That was the position in which we found ourselves, and when the colonial conference was held in Canada, that matter was brought under the notice of the conference in my opening address, I having been honoured with the presidency of that conference, and a strong resolution was moved asking the British government to denounce the provisions of those treaties in order that we might be in a position to enter into preferential arrangements, if we thought proper, with our fellow colonists and also with England. England, however, has declined to denounce those treaties, for reasons which it is unnecessary for me to enter into at present. I wish to point out to the hon. member from Marquette that he has misunderstood the position of the Conservative party and of the late government on this question. We were always in favour, and strongly in favour, of preferential trade with England. We were desirous, if possible, to get a quid pro quo, but if that could not be obtained, we were quite willing, if the favoured-nations clauses were repealed, to say to Great Britain, while at the same time having such a tariff as would properly protect our own industries, we will give you an advantage that we do not give to foreign nations. That is the position of the Conservative party to-day, and has been ever since I have known anything of this question, I do not wish to be misunderstood on this question, I am not receding one iota from my principles of protection, which are diametrically opposed to the opinions of the hon. gentleman from Marquette, but if 20 per cent was sufficient to protect an industry in this country and to give employment to our artisans and labourers, then I would say I would make that 20 per cent as the tariff applied to England, but I would add 5 or 10 per cent to that as applied to all foreign countries. I would do so for this reason; being an integral part of the British Empire, receiving so many advantages as we do, our parent country should have advantages that we would not give to foreign countries.

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—That is the policy of France.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—That is the policy of France, and it is a right policy. I would be prepared to go the length almost that France has gone in her trade policy. She has a minimum and a maximum tariff, and she says to all the world, "if you will come down with your tariff to our minimum rates, you shall have those advantages in our markets." I would go further than that, while I would accept that policy, I would say you shall have advantages in our market if you give us entry into your markets upon equal terms; but I would hold a higher tariff against foreign nations than against England. That has been the Conservative policy in the past and is the Conservative policy to-day, and the only reason why that policy was not initiated and attempted to be put in force long ago, was because Great Britain refused to give us that permission, stating she could not do so under the favoured-nations clauses of her treaties with foreign nations. That is what I desired more particularly to say, because I did not wish it to go to the world that the Conservative party in their trade policy were determined to grant no concessions to Great Britain that they were not prepared to give to others, unless they received something in return.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—I would ask the hon. gentleman whether there has been any application to the British government for the denunciation of those treaties, since that of Sir A. T. Galt in 1893.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Oh, yes, the address which was passed by both Houses of Parliament in 1892 was sent to the imperial government, and also the resolutions of the colonial conference which sat in 1894 in this city. We have been met in every instance with a refusal, on the ground that their trade with foreign nations under the favoured-nations clause was so much greater than it would be by the adoption of what might be called a colonial policy, that they could not denounce those treaties. Hence we have been hampered in this matter. In reference to the present tariff resolutions I must confess that I am somewhat at sea. I should like to ask the hon. gentleman how he can come to the conclusion that the minimum tariff is only applicable to England at present. We all know that since the last election in Australia, New South Wales has adopted an absolutely free trade policy, taxing her lands, imposing a tax on incomes, and adopting other modes by which a revenue is raised, and abolishing altogether the protective principle. How do you come to the conclusion under your tariff resolutions to exclude New South Wales, and particularly as she is part of the empire to which we belong, from the operations of your tariff? Belgium, Switzerland and some other countries are I believe in the same position; you will find by looking at the different tariffs that they are lower than the Canadian tariff; hence, taking the words of the resolution, their tariffs "on the whole" being lower than ours, they must of necessity become a party to this treaty and have all the advantages, so when you talk of a preference to Great Britain, to my mind that is a mere illusion. It is an attempt to introduce a policy of free trade in this country, as the hon. gentleman indicated a few moments ago, under the delusive hope and under the pretense of granting to Great Britain concessions which you are not granting other parts of the world, and the intense feeling of affection and loyalty to Great Britain has so operated upon the minds of the people of this country, that without looking at its ultimate results on the trade of the country, they accept it, because they say "you are going to give preferential trade to Great Britain," and at the same time they are denouncing the Conservative party as being opposed to it. I say here, on behalf of the Conservative party, that there is not one tittle of truth in the charge which is made against them on this question. Hampered as they have been in the past, they have obeyed the mandate of the Colonial Office and refrained from doing that which they desired to do. They knew from the correspondence which had taken place between the Colonial Office and the Canadian government, that if they attempted any such legislation as that, it would be annulled by the British government. The hon. gentleman will keep in mind the question which I have asked him, whether there has been any understanding between the Colonial Office and this government upon this question. I pointed out on a former occasion, when I was addressing this House, that the extraordinary course has been taken by the government of keeping parliament in ignorance of what had taken place, and that we have had to obtain our information from the columns of newpapers and Ottawa correspondents. First we have the declaration of the Minister of Finance in reference to the coal duty, and then we have the declaration of Mr. Borden, the Minister of Militia and Defence, to a New York reporter, as to the retaliatory measures which were to be brought before the House. Now I suppose the correspondence which appeared in yesterday's Globe is to be taken as an authoritative declaration as to what has been done and what is to take place in this matter. The correspondent indicates that a conversation and negotiations took place between Mr. Chamberlain, when he was in the United States not long ago visiting his relatives there, and Sir Richard Cartwright, the present Minister of Trade and Commerce, and that there was an understanding come to between these gentlemen as to the course the Imperial government would take in case this present tariff was introduced and adopted by the country. The article winds up in this way:

> It has transpired also that when Mr. Chamberlain was in America last September visiting the parents of his wife at Denvers and was seen by Sir Richard Cartwright, the possibilities of the trade situation were rather freely discussed. While no arrangement was at that time concluded as it could not be, as the form of the present tariff was not then determined, it is probable that the Colonial Secretary learned a good deal about the aspirations and hopes of the Canadian government. In the diplomatic contest that must follow, the refusal of the government to extend the maximum duties upon the new tariff to Germany and Belgian goods, it is believed that Mr. Chamberlain will be found strongly supporting the Dominion authorities.

My hon. friend no doubt will say that this is a mere newspaper report, but we know enough of newspaper reports and of the intercourse which takes place between the leading journals supporting the government and the government itself, that these feelers are generally thrown out in order to ascertain what effect they will have upon the public, and in order to prepare them for what is to follow. That is a common course, not only in this country, but in all other countries. Are we to accept that declaration as semi-official? Are we to understand that Mr. Chamberlain is to approve of the views and the interpretation given to these clauses, and to decide that they do not come within the meaning of the favoured-nation clause? I for one, if he does so, shall hail it with delight, because I shall consider that one step in the direction of accomplishing that which the late government had been trying for four or five years to accomplish, and the sooner Canada is in that position the better it will be for her, and the better I believe it will be for the people, giving us as it will a wider scope to deal with all questions affecting our trade and commerce. If the hon. gentleman and his government can only succeed in breaking down that barrier which has existed for so many years, and secure freedom of action in matters of trade and commerce, by the denunciation or repeal of those clauses which hamper us at the present moment, he certainly will have my commendation, and I am quite sure he will have the commendation of every member of the Conservative party; but under the present circumstances I have grave doubt, from what has traspired, that the Imperial government or the Colonial Secretary will put the interpretation upon those clauses which has been put upon them by the Minister of Trade and Commerce and those who have addressed the House of Commons upon this subject. If he does not, then all these countries who are parties to the favoured-nation clause will come in and reap all the advantages without our receiving one iota of good in return. I should like to ask him another question: Have they considered the effect that this tariff will have on France under the provisions of the treaty that was adopted by parliament a couple of years ago?

Hon. Mr. McCALLUM—Hear, hear.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—The language of article 2 is so plain that we cannot misunderstand it:

> Any commercial advantage granted by Canada to any third power, especially in tariff matters, shall be enjoyed fully by France, Algeria and the French colonies.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—It says third power.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I know what my hon. friend means when he says it refers to a third power. If these other countries come in, France will have the benefit of the minimum tariff. I should like to see the government come down in accordance with its pledges and promises with a revenue or free trade tariff pure and simple, as they declared they would; then the country would know precisely the position it was placed in, and act accordingly. They should not bewilder the minds of those who have not studied the question and lead them to a belief that they are granting concessions to England which they are not giving to other people, and thus induce them to submit to a reduction of the tariff.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I shall endeavour to answer the hon. gentleman's questions seriatim, although I do not propose to go into a discussion of the whole question, which is a very wide one, at the present moment. In reference to the treaty which was passed, the negotiations were exchanged in July, 1894. It was then supposed that everything would have been completed within two years. I believe that the proposals were submitted to the government of Canada at that time, as at the time of the change of government we found that repeated communications had come from the Colonial Office asking for a final decision as to Canada's intention in regard to the treaty with Japan. They apparently had not been answered. They were left unanswered, and in October last we came to the conclusion to answer them in the negative. They were repeated after the change of government, and we assumed from the policy adopted by our predecessors that that was in the line of their intention as they had not shown their acquiescence. I think that in July, 1896, the Imperial government, with the concurrence of Japan, had the time extended for one year in the hope probably that Canada would become a party to it. In reference to the point as to whether New South Wales comes within the terms of the recent tariff, I am clearly of opinion that it does, and when any exports from New South Wales are entered in Canada, and when the opinion of the Commissioner of Customs, who is the official named in the resolution, is invoked, I have no doubt he will hold that New South Wales comes within the terms of the tariff, and will be entitled to enter goods at a reduction of one-eighth or one-fourth, as the case may be, according to the time at which the goods are entered. In reference to Belgium, I am quite aware that the tariff of that country is, relatively to the tariffs of Germany and France, a low tariff; but if I correctly understand that treaty, on the whole it is not as favourable as the proposed treaty Canada is offering to the mother country and to New South Wales. Of course, if it can be shown that the treaty with Belgium comes within our conditions, necessarily Belgium will be included. It is a mere matter of fact, which cannot be ascertained without investigation. At the present moment, as I am advised, Belgium does not come within the terms of the tariff. Now, in reference to the general policy of the Conservative party, we can only gather that, as far as the tariffs are concerned, by their acts, and certainly the effect of the tariff of the late administration was that British goods were taxed higher than the goods of any other country—not specifically, but that was the effect.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—No.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—My hon. friend has only to look at the figures. You will find in the aggregate of importations the goods coming from Great Britain came relatively at a higher amount; that would be the effect on the whole of the amount imported.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I will discuss that when the tariff comes up.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—It is explained in this way, that the very highest duty was kept up on woollen goods and certain classes of iron goods which are chiefly imported from Great Britain.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—And liquors and wine.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Oh, no, that does not come within the category at all. In reference to the hon. gentleman's question as to whether this government consulted Mr. Chamberlain about the tariff, all I can say is, they did not. The authority the hon. gentleman has read from is one that I do not accept. We acted upon our own judgment and our own view as to what was best for Canada and what was best for the mother country, and we were glad to find that the universal expression of the British press on both sides of politics was in support of the action that we had taken, and there was a general approval by the English people, whatever the opinion of the English government might be, and there was a pretty widely expressed opinion in the British House of Commons, which was a clear indication of the views of the British people on that subject; but so far as our consulting the Imperial authorities is concerned, we did nothing of the kind. No doubt questions will arise as to the views they or we may take on that much discussed question of the favoured-nation treaty, not only with Belgium, Germany and France, but with a number of other countries. It will be time enough to deal with that when we are forced to. In the meantime, we have laid down the principle that we think the lower tariff does not apply to any other country than Great Britain and Ireland and New South Wales.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Or in other words the favoured-nation clause does not cover it.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—It is outside of that. We do not directly give a preference to Great Britain. We offer the same terms to all the world; we do not name Great Britain or any particular country. We say any country whose tariff is, on the whole, as low as the tariff we now submit, may come in and obtain a rebate of an eighth now, and a rebate of a fourth when the second year has gone over on all importations from that country. Any country may adopt towards Canada, if it pleases, our own tariff as a basis and come within it. It is a matter for each country to decide. The offer is open to Germany, Belgium, France and every other country at the present moment. The facts are clear and undoubted.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Why did not the hon. gentleman apply that argument to the trade question generally?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—What is that?

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—The hon. gentleman said the late tariff discriminated against England, owing to the character of the goods that came from that country. The tariff stands in the same position that your preferential tariff does, and yet you say one discriminates and the other does not.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—The point I make is that on the amount of goods we imported from Great Britain, on the given amount, the duty collected was larger than the duty collected from the United States or any other country. That is on the amount of the importations.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—If the statement made by my hon. friend from Marquette be correct that the tariff of Japan will not exceed ten per cent on the whole, how does my hon. friend reason that the goods of Japan can be excluded from the preferential schedule of the tariff?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I do not reason that at all. Japan is entitled to come in, and the offer is open to any country. Our offer of preferential trade is open to all the world.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—Then the denunciation of the clauses of the Japan treaty will not exclude Japanese trade?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—No, we had nothing to do with a Japan treaty; we did not denounce it; we simply said we did not want to enter into any treaty with Japan. In the incipient stages we declined to be a party to that treaty. We make our tariff and it is for other countries to come in on our policy. It is free to the United States, Great Britain, France, Germany, Japan and all the world. We make no discrimination whatever, and it is quite improper to say that the tariff is limited to any particular countries, because it is not. It speaks for itself. Its words are clear and intelligible, and it is for any country to so frame its tariff as to justify the preferential tariff being applied to that country.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.)—I call attention to a point not referred to by the hon. member from Hastings. First, the hon. member from Marquette has raised one of the most important questions he has ever brought up in this House; that is the treaty with Japan, and I think I would be derelict in my duty if I did not warn the government not to give preference to the productions of that country in our markets. We all know that no Europeans can compete with the Chinese or the Japanese in manufacturing, and they are entering into that form of industry largely now. The United States, seeing the adaptability of the Chinese and Japanese in this line, are building large factories in Japan and are producing cottons and fabrics of all kinds and probably will produce iron and woollens. I have no hesitation in saying that they could in two or three years close up every factory in this country and in America.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—They give you too much for your money.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.)—Yes, they could swamp all our factories. I was glad to hear the Secretary of State say that they would not be bound by any new treaties made by Great Britain if they did not desire to. Great Britain can make treaties that Canada cannot possibly afford to accept, and why should we be bound hand and foot by foreign countries? I regret that the hon. gentleman from Shell River does not agree with me on the matter, because I think it would be a lamentable thing, and an injury to the country if we allowed Japanese goods to come in under favoured-nation clauses. I hope the government will resist anything of that kind as long as it possibly can, and not allow this country to be bound by any treaty made with China and Japan. The competition of Germany, Belgium and France is nothing compared with the competition that there will be from the people of Japan in a year or two. It is alarming our neighbours to the south of us, and that is one reason they are raising their tariff barrier as high as they can.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—My hon. friend appears to misapprehend the statement made by the hon. Secretary of State, that the reduced schedule will apply to Japan as well as to England.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.)—Suppose they have a ten per cent tariff in Japan, they must receive Canadian products, less the ten per cent, in order to come under our tariff.

DELAYED RETURNS.

INQUIRY.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I should like to ask the Secretary of State when I may expect that return for which I moved on the 9th of April last in reference to the appointment of commissioners, &c.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I am afraid it is rather an extensive document to get up. I will make inquiries. The information comes from the different offices, and notice was sent to all the offices to prepare the return.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—It is only the operation of six or seven months, and surely the return cannot be very long for that period.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—It was necessary to improve the service very materially.

Hon. Mr. McINNES (B.C.)—I hope the leader of the opposition has not forgotten that when he was in power, I moved for returns and had to wait more than two years for them. However, I think it is the duty of the government to bring down returns ordered by the House as soon as possible.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—There was another return moved for by the hon. gentleman from Brandon in reference to the same subject. Will the hon. gentleman take a note of that also?

THE FINANCIAL CLAIMS OF PRINCE EDWARD ISLAND.

MOTION.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON moved:

That an humble Address be presented to His Excellency the Governor General, praying that His Excellency will cause to be laid on the Table of the Senate all correspondence which has taken place since the 13th July last, between the government of the Dominion and the provincial government of Prince Edward Island regarding certain financial claims of that province upon the federal government.

He said: As this correspondence, if any, covers a very short period of time, we may reasonably expect that it will be brought down very soon, and we can discuss it then.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—There is no objection to this motion. I think there is a very limited correspondence. The only paper I have been able to find is a single letter and the answer to it.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—Then we may expect that the return will be brought down very soon.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Yes.

The motion was agreed to.

RAILWAY BRIDGE OVER HILLSBOROUGH RIVER.

INQUIRY.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON inquired:

Whether the Federal government have agreed to co-operate with the provincial government of Prince Edward Island, in the construction of a railway and passenger bridge over the Hillsborough River, connecting Charlottetown with Southport? If so, what is the estimated cost of the bridge, and what proportion of the cost is intended to be borne by the federal government?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—No agreement as to co-operation with the provincial government in the construction of the bridge referred to has been reached, but the question of the construction of such a bridge has been discussed between the provincial premier, the Hon. Mr. Peters, and the Minister of Railways and the Minister of Marine and Fisheries, and a sum of $7,500 has been placed in the estimates for the coming year for the purpose of making a survey of the bridge and arriving at an estimate of its cost. At present there is no estimate of the cost of the bridge.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—And there is no arrangement as to what proportion the federal government will pay. The usual amount, I think, is 15 per cent on large bridges of that kind.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—The ordinary amount contributed for railway bridges in the past, I think, has been 15 per cent of the cost—that is speaking from recollection; but I do not know in this particular case that any arrangement has been made.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—Not even 15 per cent.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—That is the ordinary subsidy, I think, paid by the Dominion for many years on railway bridges, but in reference to this particular bridge, I do not know whether that rule is to apply—whether the amount is to be more or less. It would not be any less, of course, but it might be more.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—As it will not be less, we are then to understand that there is to be a grant of 15 per cent. My hon. friend says it will not be less, are we to understand that 15 per cent is guaranteed.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—The hon. gentleman rather strains the language I made use of. I stated that under the policy of the late government—and I presume that this government does not propose to depart from it, of course it is open to them to do so—the usual contribution in building bridges that are used by railways has been 15 per cent of the cost. I know of no reason why a different rule should prevail in this particular case.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Then, I presume, it is implied that the railway is to be built? If it is not the intention of the government to construct the railway, what necessity is there for ascertaining the cost of building the bridge, unless it is for the purpose of enabling them to come to a decision as to the propriety of building that railway, unless we are to understand that the policy of the government is to be extended to bridges other than those which are used for railways.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I am not prepared to go so far as that, and I did not state that the government's policy was to build this particular bridge. What I stated was that the sum of $7,500 was put in the estimates for the purpose of making a survey and ascertaining what the cost would be. The mere ascertaining of the cost of a public work, does not involve the construction of it. It might cost more than the government feels justified in contributing. That I am unable to say, and there is no use in discussing questions which may or may not arise.

THE STEAMER "PETREL."

MOTION.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON moved:

That an humble Address be presented to His Excellency the Governor General; praying that His Excellency will cause to be laid before the Senate, a copy of the contract or charter by which the steamer "Petrel" has been employed for winter navigation between Prince Edward Island and the mainland during the present year, and all correspondence between the Department of Marine and Fisheries, or any officer thereof, and the owners of the said "Petrel" relative to the said contract or charter.

Also, a statement of all expenses incurred by the government of Canada, in the outfit, repair and maintenance of the said steamer, and in the payment of wages to her officers and men, giving the name of each employee, and the amount paid or to be paid each.

Also, a statement showing the number of round trips made by the steamer, between Cape Tormentine and Cape Traverse, or any other port in Prince Edward Island, from the 1st of December, 1896, to the 5th of April of the present year, with the date of such trips.

Also, a statement of the number of passengers, and the quantity of freight carried by the said steamer between the ports aforesaid, and the amount received for carrying such freight and passengers, for the above-mentioned period.

And also, a statement of the number of mails carried by the said steamer, during the same period.

He said: I will ask hon. gentlemen to allow a very slight amendment to this motion. When I put the notice on the paper, it was just a day or two after the 5th of April. Time has intervened since then, and it will be more complete if this information would extend to the 1st of May, which is the period when the winter navigation entirely ends in the lower provinces, and spring and summer navigation commences, and with the consent of the House I would ask to be allowed to amend the motion by inserting the 1st of May instead of the 5th of April.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—There is no objection.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—I do not intend to make observations at this stage of the motion, further than to say that the employment of this steamer "Petrel" has been a huge blunder from beginning to end. She has been, as I have no doubt when this return comes down, will be seen, a source of large expense to the tax payers of Canada, and she has performed no service whatever. She has been lying idle with an expensive crew on board, at great cost to the country—she has done absolutely nothing. I question if she has made three round trips during the four months, and she has been maintained at the expense of the Dominion. The utter unsuitability of this steamer for the service must have been apparent to everybody from the time it was put there. There was nothing but amazement felt that a boat, utterly unfit for the service, without the first qualification for the service, should be kept there during the whole of last winter.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Who owns the boat?

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—That is what we want to find out. She belonged, I believe, to some company at Collins' Bay. She is a mere tug boat, utterly unfit to grapple with ice. She could not even make an experiment. When the information comes down, as I hope it will soon, it will be apparent that what I have said is true, that the money has been absolutely and entirely thrown away without any benefit whatever, not even in the way of experiment. because she has effected nothing.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—There is no objection to the address going. I am not familiar with any of the facts. I presume when the papers come down we will be able to ascertain whether the statements made by the hon. senator are correct or not. In the meantime, I have no information whatever on the subject, but I have no objection to bringing down the return.

The motion was agreed to.

SUPERANNUATION OF THE INSPECTOR OF DOMINION CANALS.

INQUIRY.

Hon. Mr. McCALLUM—Before the Orders of the Day are called, I should like to ask if H. B. Witton, Inspector of Dominion Canals, has been superannuated, and if so, what reason has been given for relieving him of his duties.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—My hon. friend has given no notice of his inquiry, but I will ascertain and advise him to-morrow.

Hon. Mr. McCALLUM—With the consent of the House, I shall read what the Hamilton Herald says about it.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I would suggest that the hon. gentleman put it as a notice of motion, so as to give the Secretary of State an opportunity to ascertain whether it is a fact or not. In the meantime, I may say that the article which my hon. friend wishes to read is a very good one.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—We had better wait until we have the facts before us.

Hon. Mr. McCALLUM—There is nothing very wrong in it. The article is as follows:

MR. WITTON'S RETIREMENT.

A report comes from Ottawa that H. B. Witton, of this city, inspector of Dominion canals, has been superannuated. No reason is given for the retirement of Mr. Witton from active service. He is still in vigorous health and capable of fulfilling his duties for some years to come. It may be that the head of the department of railways and canals, in reorganizing the departmental staff, has devised some economical plan of combining duties without impairing the efficiency of the service.

Mr. Witton is known in Hamilton as one of our most cultured and scholarly citizens, a gentleman of vast erudition in many fields of knowledge, and with the ability to make practical use of it. He is known at Ottawa as one of the most efficient officials that the Dominion has in its service. For eighteen years he has filled the post of inspector of canals, and during all these years his work has frequently been the subject of special commendation. Some years ago the writer was told by a friend of Sir John Macdonald that the late Premier had in his hearing remarked that Mr. Witton was one of the few model public servants, and that there was no departmental official in whose judgment and integrity he placed more reliance than upon those of Mr. Witton. On one occasion the Premier required a special report, and an exhaustive one, respecting the Dominion canals prepared in a short time. The work of preparing it fell to the inspector. When it was presented, Sir John remarked, "I don't remember ever having read a more luminous and complete report from a government official."

While Mr. Witton's numerous friends in Hamilton will regret that he is forced to retire from public service while he is yet able to do good work for the country, it is still pleasant to think that his retirement from active duty means for him more leisure to cultivate the studies in which he delights and which he has so freely used for the benefit of his fellow citizens.

Of course I would be out of order if I should speak of Mr. Witton's character. I believe he is known to most of the people of this country, and there must be some reason given before the people of this country will be satisfied that that is a just act. He is an ex-M. P.; he has been member of parliament for some time, and he is well known. I will not say anything further on the subject, because I may have occasion to put a motion on the paper before the close of the session.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I will find out the facts for you to-morrow.

THE COMMITTEE ON CONTINGENCIES.

MOTION.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT moved the adoption of the third report of the committee appointed to nominate the senators to serve on the several standing committees for the present session. He said:—It will be in the recollection of hon. gentlemen that when this committee made their report they were instructed to reconsider that portion of it relating to the Internal Economy and Contingent Accounts Committee, and by order of the House this report was sent back, but without any particular instructions. The committee met in accordance with the order of the House, and it was moved that the name of Mr. Reid be dropped and a member of the government be selected to serve on the committee. The Secretary of State's name was therefore mentioned as the name to be substituted for that of Mr. Reid. With that exception, the committee remains as was reported by the committee of selection.

Hon. Mr. VIDAL — The report now brought under our notice has taken me completely by surprise. When the matter was discussed in the House a few days ago, the very general expression of the opinion of the House was rather against the principle which has been acted upon in the selection made by the committee. It is certainly a new thing to learn that the entire membership of a committee of this House should be completely superseded by new names. There are several objections to such an action. I think those which were enunciated by the hon. Minister of Justice in his place were unanswered. It is exceedingly important that in any committee, and more especially in a committee of the character of the Committee on Contingencies of the Senate, that there should be upon it persons who have had experience in the working of it in former years, but there is not a single member of this committee who was on the committee last year.

Hon. Mr. DICKEY—The Secretary of State is on it, and Mr. Miller.

Hon. Mr. VIDAL—The only change made by the committee is putting on the Secretary of State in place of Mr. Reid. The impression made upon my mind by the discussion that took place in the House was that the Senate did not concur in the view of making an entirely new committee. Although we have no claim to be informed of what took place in the committee, still we were informed that in the committee the matter was decided by one vote. Where the committee was so equally divided, it appears to me a very proper thing that the question should come up in the House so that the matter can be more fully discussed and the vote upon it decisive. I am quite well aware that objections have been made against dealing with the report of a committee in the way in which it is proposed to deal with this—that it is disrespectful to the committee, and that its members would have cause to feel personally aggrieved and be unwilling to serve if the House ventured to interfere. That is a very poor argument indeed. Our committees are generally appointed for the purpose of going more fully into detail and obtaining information from outside which could not be got in the chamber. Where there are matters of that kind which could be more fully discussed in committee, my own feeling would be to lean towards supporting the action of the committee, but this is not a matter of that nature. It was announced to us clearly and distinctly that the principle upon which the committee had acted was that they would dismiss the former committee and appoint an entirely new committee, and they gave no reason whatever why this should be done. Possibly there was an omission on the part of the House in not giving specific instructions, but I should think, from the views expressed by so many senators, it was unnecessary to give special instructions. It appeared to me that the feeling of the House was decidedly in favour of retaining a number of those who had been on the committee before. So far from thinking that there is any disrespect shown to the committee, I think it would be rather a relief to its members that the responsibility of the appointment should be taken from them and assumed by the House. Holding these views, I desire now to move in amendment to the motion before us, that the third report of the committee of selection be not adopted, but that it be resolved that the Committee on Internal Economy and Contingent Accounts for the present session be composed of the following members—I have a list here of the twenty-five names comprising the committee of the last session, with one or two changes. Mr. Mills is put on in place of Sir Oliver Mowat, as Sir Oliver never attended the meetings of that committee and has other duties interfering with his acting upon it. I need not read the names. It is the re-appointment of the former committee simply with the changes I have mentioned.

Hon. Mr. PERLEY—I take exception to my name being on that committee, for this reason, that the North-west Territories have always had two members on that committee, and we have been told that one is sufficient. I wish now to have my name struck off and the name of my hon. colleague left on the committee.

Hon. Mr. McCALLUM—It appears to me that the nominating committee acted strangely in regard to this matter. They made a clean sweep. We should have men on that committee of some experience, but what have they done? As far as I know, and I believe as far as the members of the House know, the committee always discharged properly and honestly to the best of their ability their duties in the interest of the country. But what have the selecting committee done? They have swept them all off and we have not heard one reason given for it.

Hon. Mr. PROWSE—By a resolution.

Hon. Mr. McCALLUM—Yes; by a resolution of want of confidence. I have no grievance. I do not want to be on that committee. I have been on the Committee of Banking and Commerce first in the House of Commons and then in the Senate for 25 years, and have always tried to do my duty on that committee to the best of my ability, but my name has been struck off, I do not know why. There must be some reason. There must be some clique work about it in some way. I am willing to attend if the House insists, but I say we should have some of the old hands on that committee who know something about the working of it, and not have a clean sweep altogether.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.)—I can affirm here that there was no intention to cast the slightest reflection on the old committee. It was quite the other way. We know what the arduous duties of that committee are. We know how members are button-holed about the corridors for increases of salary, and a member moved in committee that the Internal Economy Committee be entirely new and all the old members be left off. I looked upon that as a relief to the old members, and that new members should take their places and bear a part of the burden that the old committee had been bearing for a number of years. The hon. gentleman from Sarnia has moved an amendment to the motion, but I should like to ask him what is the difference between having members named by the Secretary of State and the members he has named? What difference will it make to the House or the work of the committee? Of course, if the House wish to restore the old committee, I have nothing to say, I shall be perfectly satisfied. The one committee is just as well qualified to carry on the work as the other.

Hon. Mr. PROWSE—I took a little exception to this report when it was first brought in, and I see no reason to change my mind now. When the report of this committee was first presented to the Senate, the leader of the opposition took exception to the formation of the Striking Committee in the first place, inasmuch as there was a change in it of one individual member of this House, and went so far as to move that the name of the hon. member from New Westminster be struck off, and the name of my hon. friend from Victoria substituted for it. That amendment was carried by the House. If it was necessary to retain the old members of the Nominating Committee, would not the same argument hold good in reference to the Committee on Contingencies, unless there was some sufficient reason given why it should be otherwise? As a member of the old committee last year, I have no objection to my name being left off this year. But when I am told by a member of the Striking Committee that this change was accomplished by a resolution of the committee—a formal resolution passed by the committee, disqualifying every man who was on it last year—then I take exception to the report. If the change had been made in the ordinary way, and every member of the old committee had been left off, and new members put on in their places, we could have no objection to it, but when the committee come to a deliberate decision by resolution, it casts a reflection on every senator who was a member of that committee last year, and before this House sanctions such a resolution we should have a full explanation why it was done. There is a popular quotation, I believe, about "dissembling your love, but why did you kick me down stairs?" That applies to the position taken by the hon. member from Victoria. The resolution proposed by the hon. member from Sarnia is a very proper one, and a very just rebuke to the committee for the course they have taken. I wish to make another remark with reference to the composition of the Striking Committee. It was composed of nine members of this House, and for several years past there has not been a representative of Prince Edward Island amongst them. I think in a committee appointed for the purpose of striking all the committees, every province should be represented. We have as much right to be represented on that committee as any other province. To show the result of not having a member from Prince Edward Island on that committee, I would just call the attention of the House to the singular way in which the committees have been nominated. Prince Edward Island has four members in this House out of a total of 81. In the Joint Committee on the Library of Parliament Prince Edward Island is not represented at all. I do not object to that, because there are only 17 members of this House on that committee. The Joint Committee on the Printing of Parliament is composed of 21 members, and Prince Edward Island is represented there with three out of its four members, an unreasonably large proportion from the island. Then in the Committee on Standing Orders, the island has two out of the nine members, a larger proportion than we have any right to expect there. In the Committee on Banking and Commerce we have one; while in the Committee on Railways, Telegraphs and Harbours, a very important committee, composed of 35 members, on which we have a right to have one member at least, if not two, because it is nearly one-half the Senate, we have no member at all from Prince Edward Island. I think after this, every province should be represented on the Striking Committee to prevent such an anomaly as appears in the case of the Printing Committee, where Prince Edward Island is represented by three out of its four members, and in the case of the Committee on Railways, where Prince Edward Island is not represented at all.

Hon. Mr. CLEMOW—I can assure my hon. friend that as far as the Striking Committee are concerned, they acted from the very best motives. There was a general feeling of dissatisfaction outside respecting the actions of the late committee. Whether that feeling was justified or not I cannot say, but I argued in this way—if such is the case, I do not want to draw any invidious distinction, and the better plan would be to appoint an entirely new committee so as to prevent any feeling that one man was sacrificed for the benefit of another. That was the motive that influenced me. In reply to the hon. member from Prince Edward Island, I may say the intention and the principle laid down was that each member should be on no more than three committees, and we tried to carry that out as well as we could. Afterwards we found that that was not the feeling of the House. They sent the report back to the committee, and I said "Let us retrace our steps." If we have done wrong, if we have been acting in a manner not agreeable to the House, let us renominate the old committee, I did not want to discriminate. But the majority of the committee said no, let us merely susbtitute a member of the government for Mr. Reid, who is not here, and return the report to the House. The Striking Committee were anxious to do what they considered right and proper, but there was a lurking feeling outside of dissatisfaction with some members of the committee.

Hon. Mr. McINNES (B.C.)—Will the hon. gentleman inform the House what that feeling was?

Hon. Mr. CLEMOW—I do not know. You often hear dissatisfaction expressed in a variety of ways, and if you ask the ground for it, none can be assigned. You often hear charges made against a government, and when you ask why, you can get no reply. So it was with the late committee, and we thought that if such a feeling existed to any extent, the best way was to appoint an entirely new committee. What does it amount to after all? One member is as competent to discharge the duties on that committee as another.

Hon. Mr. PROWSE—Then why pass the resolution?

Hon. Mr. CLEMOW—Because everything is done by resolution.

Hon. Mr. PROWSE—Oh, no.

Hon. Mr. CLEMOW—Yes, a resolution is passed.

Hon. Mr. McCALLUM—Of non-confidence?

Hon Mr. CLEMOW—No, it is not a resolution of non-confidence at all. It was a question whether we should have an entirely new committee, to obviate any ill-feeling existing outside. My proposition was to reappoint the old committee, and the principal argument against that in the committee was that owing to the distribution of members on the other committees it would disturb the whole arrangement. That was the reason why they simply substituted the name of the Secretary of State for that of Mr. Reid. It is a matter of very little consequence, in my opinion, and a great deal too much has been made about it.

Hon. Mr. McKAY—The remarks which have dropped from the hon. member from Ottawa have confirmed a little story that I heard with regard to this. I was told that there were three or four members of the old committee that it was desirable to get rid of, and they had not the courage to put those off, so they nominated an entirely new committee. I was told that I was one of those they wanted off.

Hon. Mr. CLEMOW—I never heard that.

Hon. Mr. McKAY—That does not matter much. My object in rising was to say that I am pleased that I am not on the committee. I have been a member of it for fifteen years. I have an intimate knowledge of the ins and outs of it, and I am quite relieved to think that I shall not be a member of the new committee. To show that I am in earnest about it, I intend to vote against the amendment of the hon. gentleman from Sarnia.

Hon. Mr. ALMON—I am inclined in this case to support the proposition that we concur in the report of the committee. When we appoint our committee we should take them as we do our wives—for better or worse. In the first instance I think they were wrong, but, having reconsidered their report and finding they are right, I am willing to vote for the adoption of the report. There are some hon. gentlemen left off that committee that I should like to see on it, and, if the modesty of the hon. gentleman from Colchester will allow me to say so, I think he was one of the most useful members on the committee. The patient and sympathetic way in which he spoke to widows and orphans, even when he denied their request, was such that they went out with a smile.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I do not know that I should have made any remarks on this question had it not been for what has just fallen from the hon. gentleman from Colchester. All I can say is, it was the first intimation I heard of any objection to him, or that any objection was made either in the committee or out of the committee to any particular member of the old committee. It is new to me, and I should like very much to know as one member of that committee who put a story of that kind into circulation. It never entered my head, and if my hon. friend from Monck says our action is a want of confidence motion, I can only say that it was voting want of confidence in overselves, because I voted with the majority in the committee.

Hon. Mr. McCALLUM—People often do that.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Yes, particularly when they know they are unfit for the position they hold, or should know that they are unfit for the position, if they do not. I must differ from the view taken by the hon. gentleman from Prince Edward Island, and also from the view taken by the hon. gentleman from Sarnia on this question. Has it come to this, that a member who is appointed to a committee has to be there as long as he lives? If so, there is no necessity in the future for appointing a committee with any other instructions than that they shall report the old committee, with such alterations as may be necessary to fill vacancies. That is really the principle which has been laid down. My hon. friend from Prince Edward Island says that because I moved for the substitution of the name of the hon. member from Victoria on the nominating committee for that of the hon. member from New Westminster, ergo, I am inconsistent in advocating an entirely new Committee on Contingencies. I cannot see what one has to do with the other. One of the reasons why I moved the motion referred to was because I had good authority for believing that the substitution of the name of the hon. gentleman from New Westminster for that of the hon. gentleman from Victoria was at the instance of a prominent member of the House of Commons, who, I thought, had no right to interfere with the composition of any committee of the Senate. If a member of the House of Commons, as I understood it, a whip of the House of Commons, could come here and interfere in the composition of any committee there must have been some reason for it. Whether that is true or not, I am not prepared to say; my authority was the member for Victoria himself, and consequently I have every reason to believe it. I had no desire to give that as a reason, or to raise any dispute on a question of that kind had I not been accused of inconsistency in the course I have pursued. Supposing I moved to strike out the name of any person and substitute that of another, it would not be inconsistent on my part if I vote that an entirely new Committee on Contingencies be appointed. As I mentioned to the Senate before, in speaking on this subject, the question of non-confidence never entered the minds of any of us nor did I hear an objection made to any member of the old committee. It was urged, as has already been stated, that it was better, as this was really the only patronage committee of the Senate, that some of the new members who had not been on the old committee should have the privilege of exercising their influence to get their friends into whatever small positions there were. I was quite willing, and would much rather be left off the committee. That was the only reason suggested for the course that was adopted. It is a matter of no consequence to me personally whether the report is adopted as presented or not. On a former occasion I made a suggestion, which was acted upon later, that this being a patronage committee some member of the government should be upon it. When the hon. gentleman says there is no one of experience on that committee, I need only point to my hon. friend from Toronto, Mr. Aikins, who was on this committee for years and years; surely he has sufficient experience to know what to do. Then my hon. friend from Bothwell was for many years on the Public Accounts Committee of the House of Commons, and I am sure that his experience is equal to that of any man in this House. There are others whose names I could mention on that committee who were members of the committee years ago. The hon. gentleman from Richmond is a very old member and certainly has had experience enough to conduct a committee of that kind or any other committee, so that so far as the composition of the new committee is concerned they are just as capable of conducting the business as any members of the old committee. I make this explanation because my hon. friend thinks I am inconsistent in the course that I have taken. The course that I took then I shall be prepared to take on any other occasion when the same reasons present themselves for doing so.

Hon. Mr. McINNES (B.C.)—One word in explanation. Will the hon. gentleman kindly inform the House on what authority he heard that it was at the instigation of a member of the House of Commons that my name was placed on that nominating committee?

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—If the hon. gentleman had had his ears open he would have heard what I said. I stated distinctly my authority was the hon. Senator from Victoria.

Hon. Mr. McINNES (B.C.)—All I have to say is that that statement is incorrect.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—As far as you know.

Hon. Mr. McINNES (B.C.)—As far as I know, and I think I ought to know it. If a member of the other House came over here and made such a request I would know it. A gentleman did ask me if I would go on the Joint Committee on the Printing of Parliament of both Houses; but the statement with reference to any member of the House of Commons coming over here and asking me to go on that nominating committee as far as I know is incorrect.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Then there was an interference on the part of some member of the House of Commons as to the composition of these committees.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.)—I think it is most unfortunate that a question of veracity should arise between members of this House, and I do not wish to pursue the thing at all. I spoke to members of the government on the subject, and I heard that a member of the House of Commons had written to members of the government here as to the matter, and I went to the hon. member for New Westminster, and spoke to him, and he said: "It is quite possible that a member of the other House has done so," indicating a whip of the other House. That is my information.

Hon. Mr. McINNES (B.C.)—I do not know what Mr. Sutherland may have written to a member of the government, but so far as I was individually concerned, I knew nothing of it, but I know that, looking over the names of the members composing the Joint Committee on the Printing of Parliament, he said: "We would like very much to have you on that committee," but he said nothing as to the Nominating Committee.

Hon. Mr. POWER—It appears to me that we are drifting away from the question before the House. What took place before the Nominating Committee was struck is hardly in issue just now. It is desirable that I should say a few words to-day, because the position which I have assumed is apparently inconsistent with the position which I took when the original report of this committee of selection was before the House. If hon. members bear the language in their minds, they will remember that at that time I thought it desirable that the report of the committee should be adopted, and I think it is only due to the House and to myself to say why I have since changed my opinion, or why I propose to vote differently from the way in which I should have voted then. The committee made their report. When that report was submitted to this House, it was received, one might say, with almost universal disapproval. There was no defence for the action of the committee. The leader of the House pointed out that the action of the committee was without precedent in parliamentary history, that the proposal was that all the experienced members should be taken off the committee and an entirely new committee formed, that that was unwise and contrary to all parliamentary precedent. I remember the hon. leader of the opposition indicated that the hon. gentleman from Bothwell was a gentleman whose services would be very valuable on the committee. The amendment which has been submitted by the hon. gentleman from Sarnia, provides that the hon. gentleman from Bothwell shall be on the committee, and we shall have the benefit of his experience. Now the position is this, hon. gentlemen: the House, apparently unanimously, referred this report back to the Committee of Selection with instructions to reconsider their report; and naturally it would be expected that the committee would have reconsidered their report with some respect to the opinions which had been expressed in the House. The leader of the House and the leader of the opposition and a number of prominent gentlemen in this House, disapproved of the policy which the committee had adopted of excluding all the members of the old committee from the new committee. When the committee met, that expression of opinion from the House was entirely disregarded; and I feel, hon. gentlemen, that while it is a matter of indifference to me whether during the six weeks or so that we are likely to be here, I am on the committee or not, and while as I stated the other day, the probabilities are that no serious harm can come from appointing the committee as reported by the Committee of Selection, I think the principle which is really at stake is this—whether, when the House has in its wisdom instructed a committee to do certain things, the committee is at liberty to act in defiance of the expressed opinion of the House. I know very well that the hon. gentlemen who compose the Committee of Selection did not intend by their action to defy the opinion of the House, but in the future, when the parliamentary history of this little transaction comes to be read, it will be understood in the sense, that the committee having been instructed to reconsider their report, and impliedly to report in accordance with the opinions expressed by the leading members of this House, had failed to do so and had reported substantially as they had originally reported.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.)—Will the hon. gentleman read the order of reference to the committee?

Hon. Mr. POWER—I shall not read it. I know what it was—"That the third report of the Committee of Selection be referred back to the committee for the purpose of reconsidering the same so far as it relates to the Committee on Internal Economy and Contingent Accounts."

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.)—To reconsider, not to reconstruct.

Hon. Mr. POWER—To reconsider in the light of the discussion which had taken place in the House. That is the way I look at it. I do not think it is of very much consequence, except so far as that principle is concerned, and I think the feelings of the members of the committee are not involved at all. The House owes it to itself to see that its intentions are carried out by the committee. For that reason I shall vote for the amendment moved by the hon. member from Sarnia.

Hon. Mr. PROWSE—One word in explanation. It appears my remarks, charging the hon. leader of the opposition with inconsistency, were based on an insufficient knowledge of the circumstances. I wish to withdraw that imputation now, because we have had an explanation from the leader of the opposition giving us his reason for moving that the names be changed on the Nominating Committee. From the information which he received—whether that information was correct or not, I am not prepared to say, I think he was quite justified in changing the names as was done in the formation of that committee, because there was sufficient reason for it. What I have already said that I objected to, was that there was not, as far as this House was concerned, sufficient reason given to us why a resolution was passed declaring that every member of this House who was on the Contingent Committee last year was disqualified from being on the committee this year.

Hon. Mr. BELLEROSE—When this question came before the Senate the other day I was astonished to see that such a sweeping change had taken place and no reasons given for it, so that I felt that the course followed has been unreasonable. As far as the question of reference is concerned, I must say that I do not look at it in the same way as some hon. gentlemen. The question of reference was a general one to reconsider. There has been a change made in the report, and this shows that there has been a consideration. A minister of the Crown has been appointed in the place of another member. If the House desires to go further and persevere in its determination, as shown in the discussion which took place, that is to say, persevere in its determination to have the old members back, then I should think the only way open for this House is to appoint a new committee and instruct them to that effect. The present committee having shown by their report that they cannot carry out the view of the House, it is evident that they had reasons for their course which they cannot make public. That is quite sensible and quite reasonable. The House cannot oblige the committee to do things they do not consider they should do. Since that day I have gone over and inquired so as to form my opinion as to the changes, and I was told that there was something wrong with some of the members of that committee. For my part having now such information, I approve of the action of the committee and shall support the report. It was rather difficult to say that this member or that member should be put off. It would be a reflection on those gentlemen and the best way was to make a sweeping change. Although I am not in favour of the House rejecting the reports of the committees, I say that sometimes it will happen that committees cannot abide by the wishes of the House and if a committee thinks they are doing right they are justified. It is often the case that committees do not submit to the instructions of the House. Committees are not obliged to go by the instructions of the House in the matter when they feel they cannot do it conscientiously. In the present case if the House has any confidence in the committee they ought to accept their report.

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—I feel a little difficulty in giving a vote on this motion. I was one of those who voted that this report should be referred back to the committee. This committee has brought in the report again with a slight change. Whether that change would meet the view of the House so far as the reasons that induced them to send back the report is a question. But at the same time it presents itself to my mind in this way; this committee is a nominating committee of the House and we have appointed them for that purpose. They have all the names before them and they select the members according to provinces, localities and capacity. We are asked how to accept in exchange for the report of the committee a nomination paper of perhaps one or two hon. gentlemen. I do not think the nomination of one or two hon. gentlemen could be equal to the nomination of a nominating committee that we have appointed.

Hon. Mr. POWER—This committee is the same as last year.

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—Then we shall be placed in this position: that the hon. gentlemen can vote either for the committee as it was last year with the three changes, or the committee as it is this year with one change. I would prefer myself, if the House is not satisfied with the nomination made by the committee, that the report should be sent back to the committee rather than attempt to condemn the committee for the action they have taken. As the hon. gentleman from DeLanaudière says, it is not uncommon to send back a report three or four or five or six times before the House accepts it.

Hon. Mr. BERNIER—I should like to make one remark upon this question. I think there are many amongst us who do not care very much whether it goes one way or the other. There are very few amongst us who desire to be members of that committee, but I think there is one consideration that should go a long way to influence the vote of this House in this matter. You have disturbed all the other committees to form this committee. I know that certain hon. gentlemen who were members of very important committees have been struck out of other committees to be put upon this one, which is also considered to be an important committee. If hon. members vote for this amendment they are striking out those members from this important committee after they have been struck out from other important committees. Their legitimate sphere of influence is restricted so much, and I do not think it is fair, and in voting on this occasion we should take that into consideration. You have laid down the rule that nobody should be on more than three committees, but, as a rule, it has been attempted to put every member upon at least two committees. If the amendment moved by the hon. member from Sarnia is adopted, it will have the practical effect of placing certain members on one committee only, and some other members on four committees, which does not seem to me a fair proportion.

Hon. Mr. PRIMROSE—When this matter first came up I thought it might perhaps have been better if some of those gentlemen who have been formerly on that committee had been retained on the new one, on the same principle that in selecting a grand jury, sometimes a part of the old panel has been retained so as to secure men of experience. After hearing the explanations which have been given this afternoon, I have changed my mind on the subject, and I shall support the action of the Nominating Committee and I do so also because I think it is an exceptional course of procedure to do otherwise. The House generally accepts the action of its committees unless there be something in it very much out of the way.

Hon. Mr. McINNES (B.C.)—In reply to what the hon. member from St. Boniface has said, there is no rule of the House to the effect that no member should be on more than three committees. That has been the practice, but you cannot find a resolution passed by any committee or by the House where it has been so provided. It has been the custom, so that if the new committees should be struck it will not disturb one of the committees that have already been appointed.

Hon. Mr. BERNIER—But it will restrict the influence of certain members who have been on other important committees. You are restricting their influence to one or two committees while you are increasing the influence of members who are already on both committees and whom you are putting on this committee.

Hon. Mr. McINNES (B.C.)—There may be something in that. A great many members of the House are under the impression that there is a rule as to a member not being on more than three committees, but I wish the House distinctly to understand that such is not the case.

Hon. Mr. BERNIER—For some time I have been a member of that selecting committee, and it was there laid down as a rule and it was the practice.

Hon. Mr. TEMPLE—I find, in looking over the minutes, that there are three or four members on different committees, and some members who belong to this House are not on any committees at all. I do not understand this rule. It may be the rule of this House, but I have been in the House of Commons for a great many years, and I know it was not the rule there to leave any one off. I recollect myself that I was on the Railway Committee for a number of years, and also on the Banking and Commerce Committee and a third committee, but I find this is the only committee I am on here. I do not care about it, but it looks singular, in a House like this, that there should be some members on three or four committees, and other members on no committees at all.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (P.E.I.)—After hearing the discussion, as far as it has gone, I have come to the conclusion to support the report of the committee as it is before the House.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I think it is due to the House that an explanation should be made, and I am very sorry the chairman of the committee has not taken upon himself the responsibility of explaining it. Acting upon the rule suggested by the hon. member from St. Boniface, when there are a number of new members appointed to the Senate—you are aware that on many occasions there are vacancies and that the committees have to be filled up—perhaps wrongly filled up, acting upon the rule suggested, and according to the number the rule provides for, that in order to put the gentlemen that have been appointed to the Senate on some committees other members have to be put off. That is the only way in which I can account for my hon. friend from Monck having been left off the Committee on Banking and Commerce and put on the Committee on Internal Economy and Contingent Accounts. I do not know that that is the case but it suggests itself to me that that is the reason. I find that he is on two other committees. That is the reason why such changes are often made. Why my hon. friend from York is left out altogether is something that must have been overlooked by every member of the committee. I cannot account for it. I think, under the circumstances, it would be the duty of the House in the future, although the committee's duties may cease, to see that he is placed upon some committee or some member struck off where he is on three or four committees. There is another reason: there are many gentlemen who are connected with different institutions who apply to be placed on certain committees for which they are peculiarly adapted and they should be placed on those committees, but the delicate question arises as to whom you should strike off to make way for him. The better way to meet the wishes of all the members of this Senate and put them on just such committees as they desire to go on, would be to repeal that rule limiting the number on each committee.

The question being put on the amendment it was declared lost by the following division :—

The Senate adjourned.

THE SENATE.

Ottawa, Thursday, 6th May, 1897.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

Prayers and routine proceedings.

DELAYED RETURNS.

INQUIRY.

Hon. Mr. KIRCHHOFFER—With the permission of the House, I should like to call the attention of the leader of the Senate to a return which I moved for more than a month ago, and which was ordered at the time, but which I understand has not since been brought down. I would ask the hon. gentleman if he can give us some indication of the reason for the delay.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—What was the return?

Hon. Mr. KIRCHHOFFER—With reference to the dismissal of members of the civil service.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—The return, I presume, involved work in the various departments; the order was sent over to these departments, and I suppose they are working at it.

Hon. Mr. McCALLUM—It is not complete?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—No.

Hon. Mr. McCALLUM—It will take a year to complete it.

Hon. Mr. KIRCHHOFFER—I am bound to accept the explanation given by the hon. leader of this House, but in view of the remark made by the Minister of Marine and Fisheries, in the other chamber, that the civil service of the country had been practically undisturbed, it seems curious there should be such great delay in bringing down that statement.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I presume his remarks applied to the inside service.

Hon. Mr. ALMON—The service was turned inside out.

HUDSON BAY NAVIGATION EXPEDITION.

INQUIRY.

Hon. Mr. PERLEY rose to Ask the government, what is the name of the vessel to be sent on the Hudson's Bay navigation expedition? How old is the vessel? Her tonnage? Her steam power capacity? Also, how many of a crew is required to man the vessel? And the name of the officer in charge who will make the report, and if Manitoba, North-west Territories and British Columbia are to have a representative to accompany the expedition? When will they start, and when expected to return?

He said: It is within the knowledge of this honourable House, as well as of most of the people of Canada, that there has been considerable agitation about the building of a railroad to Hudson's Bay, and hon. gentlemen will remember that last session the hon. member from Marquette and myself suggested that it would be a proper thing, before a charter was granted to build the road, to ascertain whether the straits and channel were navigable. I understand the government have taken steps in the matter in order to test the navigability of the straits. I am not justified in condemning their action on street rumours, although I heard it said that the vessel they are employing for that purpose is very inadequate for the service. I, therefore, put this question on the notice paper, and now ask the question. If the answer is not a satisfactory one I may have some further remarks to offer.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—The name of the vessel is the "Diana." As to the age of the vessel, she was originally built some 20 years ago, but was rebuilt in 1892. Her gross tonnage 473, and net tonnage 275 tons. The capacity of her steam power is 70 horse power, and the number of the crew will probably be 25. They have not been selected yet. The name of the officer in charge will be Commander W. Wakeham; Capt. Burke of the Royal Navy has been selected to represent the interests of the railways to be built to Hudson's Bay, and James Fisher has been selected to represent Manitoba and the North-west Territories. It is believed the expedition will start about the 20th of May.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B. C.)—Is it true that Commander Markham declined to go on the expedition on account of the vessel being unfit for the work?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—No, it was for private reasons.

THE SUPERANNUATION OF THE INSPECTOR OF DOMINION CANALS.

INQUIRY.

Hon. Mr. McCALLUM inquired:

Has H. E. Witton, Dominion inspector of canals, been superannuated, and if so, for what reason?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—On account of age, Mr. Witton, inspector of canal revenue, was placed on the retired list with an annual allowance of $680, and the office of inspector was abolished, the Treasury Board having reported accordingly. Mr. Witton's age is 66 years; service, 17 years; average salary for the past three years, $2,000. The Treasury Board finding that Mr. Witton was eligible within the meaning of the Civil Service Superannuation Act, and that his retirement would be in the public interest, he was placed on the retired list with an annual allowance of $680, and the office of inspector was abolished.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Then Mr. Witton was retired on account of the abolition of the office, and not on account of age?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Both; he was over age.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I am aware of the fact that he was over the age for superannuation, but Mr. Witton is as capable to-day of discharging the duties of the office as when he was appointed. Does not my hon. friend think that in cases of this kind, where men have given up their business and accepted offices under the government, which they are supposed to hold during good behaviour and ability to perform the work, that they should be allowed something in addition to the mere pittance given in proportion to the number of years of service? Take the case of Mr. Witton as an illustration. As was pointed out by the hon. senator from Monck, a more efficient officer there is not in the Dominion of Canada, intellectually and otherwise. He is a most industrious man and possessed of more than ordinary ability, as has been proved by his reports. The Superannuation Act makes special provision for cases of that kind, where the office is abolished. In those cases, particularly if a man has been appointed after a certain age on account of special qualifications, it has been customary to add some few years to his time of service in order to give him a living retiring allowance. If the hon. gentleman will refer back to 1874 and 1875, when he was a member of the Mackenzie government, he will find cases where they retired men for the ostensible reason for which Mr. Witton has been retired, and in some cases those officials had only been in the service for three or four years. They added ten years to their superannuation allowance, which was, I think, stretching the law somewhat to an extreme. At the same time, the law gave them the power to do so, and the special provision for cases of that kind is when an economy is to be effected by the abolition of the office. In a case of this kind, where a gentleman of known ability, who has performed his work with great assiduity during the time he has occupied that office, is retired some consideration should be extended to him. There are other cases to which I might call the attention of the hon. gentleman. Men appointed as superintendents of canals, who were compelled by the rules of the department to give up their former occupation by which they were obtaining a living, and making as much money, if not more, than by the salary pertaining to the office, but looking upon it as a life appointment they accepted it and were compelled to give up the practice of their professions, were actually dismissed on the first of a month and received no notice of it until the 6th or 7th of the next month, while they were still performing their duties —no intimation was given that the offices were to be abolished. I find no fault with the government for abolishing any office that they think is not necessary, providing the work pertaining to it can be performed by somebody else, but under circumstances such as those to which my hon. friend has called attention, and those to which I have referred, I think the government would be justified in extending some consideration to the men they are discharging.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Did you apply that rule to the inspectors of weights and measures?

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I would under the same circumstances. If my hon. friend desires me to enter into that question, I shall be glad to do so. I would not apply the rule in a case where the government had appointed 50 or 60 inspectors of weights and measures and paid them salaries amounting to $60,000 or $70,000, without ever placing instruments in their hands or giving them directions to do any work. That is a different thing altogether from the class of cases to which I have called attention. But that is not the point at issue. The cases to which I desire to call attention are of much graver character than those to which I referred, where the officials had several years added to their terms of service by the hon. gentleman's government in 1874 or 1875. I am referring now to cases where men have been compelled by the Department of Railways and Canals to cease practising their profession on the ground that they were receiving more than $1,000 a year. They have been a few years performing the duties of an office which has been in existence for over fifty years. The present government—and I may add, because I do not wish to be unfair, the same question was under the consideration of the late government as to the abolition of offices—have acted on reports found in the offices, and removed these men without one moment's notice and thrown them on the world to pick up and regain the profession they had lost, simply because they were required to give it up. I ask my hon. friend whether under circumstances of that kind he does not think the country would justify the adding of a number of years to their superannuation allowances. These officials in the cases to which I refer could not be superannuated, because they had paid nothing into the superannuation fund. When the late government in abolishing an office had to discharge an officer who did not contribute to the superannuation fund and whom we could not place on the superannuation list, put an item into the estimates granting him a gratuity and I never knew anybody in the House of Commons to object to granting a six months or twelve months' gratuity. That is what I would ask on behalf of the gentlemen to whom I refer. In reference to Mr. Witton, I think no one would object to five or ten years being added to his service in order to give him an allowance at his age, having given up his business as he did when he entered the service, to enable him to live comfortably for years.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I have no recollection of such a gross case as the hon. gentleman calls attention to having been perpetrated during Mr. Mackenzie's administration, of two or three years' service being favoured by a ten years' extension. Of course, it is quite impossible to discuss cases of that kind unless one had all the facts. It is scarcely proper to bring the matter up in that way, but I doubt whether there would be any case so extremely gross as that to which my hon. friend refers. I am quite aware that the law authorizes the government, if they think proper, to add a certain number of years to the term of service on the abolition of an office. It was the constant use made of that power by the late administration that led the present administration, when they were in opposition in the House of Commons, to the declaration that it should be discontinued, that the officials are well paid for the time that they have been in the service, and they can get their superannuation allowance. The extra years is entirely a premium, and in very few cases can it be said that a public officer is deserving of that extreme favour that it authorizes. Of course, it is still open to the government to do it under the law. They are by no means compelled to do so. In reference to Mr. Witton's case I am not prepared to discuss the merits of it, because I am not familiar with it or with the services he has performed. The case, as presented to the government by the Department of Railways, was that his services were no longer required. He was in receipt of a very good salary—probably very much better than had he not been taken into the public service; so that it does not occur to me that he has any special right to complain because he gets a reasonably fair retiring allowance—quite as much as the government expected or anticipated. Now, in reference to the inspectors of weights and measures, I think my hon. friend is wrong when he says the instruments were not in their hands, but I am credibly informed that they were in their hands. The whole service was new. It was the inauguration of a new service in Canada, and, of course, it could only go into operation gradually, and the government which succeeded that of Mr. Mackenzie swept every officer away, and within a year reappointed friends of their own. Could any more glaring case be cited as illustrating their disrespect of the sanctity of the position of the office holder? There was the very best possible evidence of it, and there would be no difficulty in pointing out hundreds of cases in the ten years where the government dismissed officials without giving them one day's notice. I know that in the department over which I preside, there were three or four gentlemen dismissed without an hour's notice.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Who were they?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Mr. Morgan was one. It was not contradicted. He was met in the lobby and told he was superannuated without a day's notice, and there were a number of officials in that department. Illustrations can be given. The government probably acted on what they believed was a proper policy, and I presume this government cannot be charged with being derelict in their duty or inconsiderate to their employés when, in the interest of the public service, they find it necessary to abolish an office and compensate the occupant in the way pointed out by the law.

Hon. Mr. ALMON—It was with much astonishment and regret that I heard yesterday from the hon. member for Monck that the axe had taken off another head. I regret this very much, because Witton was an old friend of mine. I will relate to my hon. friends in this House, who are not acquainted with it, a little history about Mr. Witton. He came out from England, where he served his apprenticeship as a house painter. He was in the employ of the Western Railroad in Hamilton. He made many friends for himself among his fellow-workmen, in the first place by his skill, by his urbanity of manners, and by the good qualities which he showed. It was determined by the then ministry, before the election in 1873, that a mechanic should be chosen to represent the city of Hamilton. He and the late Mr. Chisholm were elected. I was elected for the House of Commons at the same time and sat next to him, and made his acquaintance in the library, which was not in that majestic dome where it is now, but was in different rooms throughout the building. There was scarcely a book in the library that he did not know where it was, and there was hardly ever a book which I wanted of which he would not know the contents and everything about it, and in conversation with him I found that he was a good Latin scholar. I remember but little Latin myself, but I can tell a good scholar when I meet him. I asked him how he learned it, and he said, "Oh, very easily. After my work was over at night I would take the dictionary and grammar and study Latin." He took up French books and read not only the titles but extracts from them, and I asked him, "How did you learn French?" and he said, "In the same way, with the dictionary and the grammar." I was frequently in the library at the time. Being the member from Halifax I wanted to find out something as to the lobster trade, the season for lobsters and the habits of the lobsters. He recommended that we should search the Smithsonian Institute reports, and we looked through all of them and a number of others, but could not find out what we wanted. He had at that time a good knowledge of French and Latin. I met him some years after in Halifax, where he went to establish some agencies, and I said to him, "What have you learned since I left you?" and he said "I have learned the German language," and I am convinced he was a good German scholar. Some years after, when I was up in Hamilton staying with Mr. Turner, I said to him "What have you been learning since?" He said "I have been learning the Sanscrit language." Most of you are aware that the Sanscrit language is the language of old India, but now it is a dead language and only used in the books. It is used very much as Latin was used in the middle centuries—the language in which educated men wrote their works. He showed me a paper from Calcutta which contained a notice of his being elected an honorary member of a Sanscrit society. He was also a member of the Sanscrit society of Boston. I think when any one has the talent which this man had, and when we consider that he was a mechanic and that he taught himself all this, it would shame many of us. He knows more than a great many who have had the advantage of college education. I think it is a slur on the mechanics of Canada that he should have his head lopped off in the way in which it was done, and no extra years added to his service. They feel that there is a man who has been up in the House of Commons; he has been given a situation, and the Liberal government come in and turn him out without any notice, and his salary is reduced to the very lowest ebb. I remember on one occasion when Mr. Turner, with the hospitality for which Scotchmen are proverbial, entertained Lord Stanley and suite, who resided at his house during their stay in Hamilton, dined them in a room the ceiling of which was frescoed by this same Mr. Witton. A short time after I dined in the same room with Mr. Witton, and we were both treated with the same kind hospitality which had been shown to Lord Stanley and his suite. I do not think Mr. Witton would like me to mention these things, as he is a modest, unassuming man, but I think it is my duty to do it. I do not often beg, but I hope the government will take his case into consideration and treat Mr. Witton as leniently as they can. I do not know any man who has less political animosity than the hon. Secretary of State. I have often used language in reference to some of the hon. gentleman's temperance fads, or things of that kind, which I ought not to use, but when I met him the next morning I had the same good natured bow. I felt that the hon. member had forgotten anything that was disagreeable. I trust he will use his influence to get any additional recompense that can be given to Witton.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I must ask the indulgence of the House for a moment, because I think, from the remarks of the hon. Secretary of State, it resolves itself into a question of veracity as between him and me as to the custom—Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Oh, no. I said I had no recollection of any case of the kind where ten years had been added.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I desire to say that I am not in the habit of making statements unless I have pretty good authority for them, and I would like to call the attention of the hon. gentleman to the public accounts as published by the government for 1895. On reference to these accounts he will find a statement of the superannuations which have taken place for a great number of years past, and if he will look at them he will find that in one case, the abolition of office in the case of Mr. Brennan—a bailiff, not a very important office—he served six years and he had ten years added. On the same page the hon. member will find that in 1877, a period in which he himself was in office, the Rev. John Cameron, clerk statistical office, Halifax, served three years and had ten years added to his superannuation allowance, making the retiring allowance thirteen years for three years' service; reason assigned, abolition of office. Then, if the hon. gentleman will turn to the next page he will find that in 1878 T. B. French, clerk in the Public Works Department, served thirteen years. He was retired, not on account of ill health, not on account of the abolition of office, but because they were reducing the staff. He served thirteen years and had ten years added. I do not know whether that was by his government or the succeeding government. Then Mr. Nutting, a clerk in the statistical office, Halifax, was retired in 1877 after five years' service with ten years added. In 1877 W. A. Ryan, a messenger, served a term of three years and had ten years added. I repeat what I said, that I do not find any fault with the government for what they did, and the hon. gentleman was unfair in putting it that way. He said the government should not be found fault with. I made the statement that if it were the abolition of an office, if the government thought it was not necessary at the present day, I found no fault with them for abolishing the office and retiring the official. But I contended that while doing so, if the man was fitted for his work, under the law they had the power to allow him something, and they should do so. In order to justify that statement, I said that there were several cases where his government had retired officers with only three years' service and added ten years to it. I desire to put myself right as to that.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Mr. Vankoughnet was retired without anything. He had been many years in the service and he was fit for his work.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—His salary was $3,200 and his retiring would not leave him penniless.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I think it is a pity the hon. leader of the opposition did not take the same view at the beginning of the discussion. I rise to a question of order. The hon. gentleman from Monck does not call attention to a matter and then ask a question. If he had done that, under the practice of this House there might be a discussion of unlimited length. The hon. gentleman asked a simple question and got his answer; and under the practice of this House, as well as of every other legislative body, a discussion after an answer has been given is irregular. I am surprised that the hon. leader of the opposition, who has served so long a time in the House of Commons, should so often sin against that rule in this House.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I have been following the example of my hon. friend opposite.

Hon. Mr. McCALLUM—I wish to express my entire satisfaction with the action of the government. I do not think they should keep men in the service who are not required. If Mr. Witton is not required I think they should dispense with him. But the last part of the answer is not satisfactory to me. The hon. Secretary of State says that the abuse of the power by the late administration prevents them doing Mr. Witton justice. That is no answer. I say the government, no matter what their predecessors may have done, should do justice though the heavens fall. It is no excuse to say, because there was an abuse by a previous government, that they would not do justice to Mr. Witton, and I hope he will look into the matter and try and do a little better, and add ten years more to his time. That is all that I ask. I am satisfied with the answer and I hope that the services of other gentlemen who have nothing to do will be dispensed with. I hope that justice will be done to Mr. Witton. In that case I shall be satisfied, but I shall watch very closely to see if anybody else gets that position. I must not find fault now; I am satisfied with the answers and will be satisfied with Mr. Witton's superannuation if they will only allow him the proper retiring allowance.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I shall be very glad to bring the remarks of hon. friend under the notice of the government.

METHODIST TRUST FIRE INSURANCE COMPANY'S BILL.

SECOND READING.

Hon. Mr. AIKINS moved the second reading of Bill (23) "An Act to incorporate the Methodist Trust Fire Insurance Co." He said: This bill contains the ordinary provisions of a fire insurance bill, and the title designates the property to be insured: it is to be confined exclusively to Methodist church property. This bill has been under the notice of the General Superintendent of Insurance, and he concurs in the provisions of the bill.

The motion was agreed to and the bill was read the second time.

The Senate adjourned.

GRAND TRUNK RAILWAY COMPANY'S BILL.

REPORTED FROM COMMITTEE.

Hon. Mr. VIDAL, from the Committee on Railways, Telegraphs and Harbours, reported Bill (26) "An Act respecting the Grand Trunk Railway Company of Canada."

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—As the report of the committee indicates that there is no amendment, I move that the bill be read the third time.

Hon Mr. BOULTON—I rise to insist that the rules of the House as to this bill be followed, and that the bill be not now read the third time, but that the third reading be postponed until the next meeting of the Senate. My reason for asking for the postponement is to point out that this debenture stock is being raised for the purpose of providing means to meet the interest—

Hon. Mr. POWER—You can only object now.

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—My object in rising was to give notice that I shall move an amendment.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—There is no objection to allowing it to stand, if the hon. gentleman desires, until the House meets again. I was under the impression that where there was no amendment to a bill, it could be read the third time on the day that it was reported from committee.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—That was the rule, but it was changed.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I see by the 70th rule that it can not be read now. I move that the bill be read the third time on Wednesday next.

The motion was agreed to.

AN ADJOURNMENT.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY moved:

That when the Senate adjourns to-day, it do stand adjourned until Wednesday, the 12th instant, at eight o'clock in the evening.

The motion was agreed to.

DELAYED RETURNS.

INQUIRY.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I should like to ask the hon. Secretary of State whether he has made any inquiry as to the return to which I called his attention the other day.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I gave instructions to have inquiry made in the different departments. Some returns have been received, I understand. I gave instructions that letters should be written to the departments that are yet in arrears with those returns.

THE YUKON DISTRICT.

INQUIRY.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C) inquired:

If it is the intention of the government to give a lease of one hundred miles of the Stewart River, in the Yukon District, for twenty years, to a certain company for the purpose of mining, or dredging for gold?

He said: I have given but short notice of this, on account of the adjournment and the importance of the question I am asking. When I saw the notice in the Victoria paper I thought it was a large concession to make to give one hundred miles of one river to a company and for a term of twenty-one years. If it was proposed to give a short distance for a term of seven years, it would be ample to test the matter. Then again, the royalty proposed to be taken by the government is too small. Twenty-five cents an ounce would not be enough if any gold was found there. I hope the government will consider the matter carefully and not lock up one hundred miles of the river to any company for a term of years. If the intention of the government is to conserve the rights of miners on the banks of the rivers one company should not get all these concessions. There is room in one hundred miles for four or five companies. Last year a lease was giver n British Columbia of nine miles of a river, and that is quite large enough to give to any company.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—As the hon. gentleman has observed, tenders were called for and three have been received. The tenders have not yet been opened. As he anticipates, those tenders will be subject to certain conditions, which will be formulated by the department. Until the tenders are opened and considered it is quite impossible to say whether the government will be ready to lease that number of miles.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Were the tenders asked for on the basis of a lease of 100 miles of river?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—The tenders were advertised on that basis.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—And on the basis of a royalty of 25 cents an ounce.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—No, the conditions were not named. My recollection of the advertisement was that tenders would be called for, leasing 100 miles of the Stewart River.

Hon. Mr. McCALLUM—At so much per mile?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—No, it was a fixed sum,

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.)—A royalty of 25 cents per ounce is mentioned in the advertisement.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I think not. The conditions were not advertised.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.)—I saw them advertised in a Victoria paper.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I was not aware that they were. The only advertisement that I have myself seen simply called for tenders. The conditions have been brought down in the House of Commons, where the same question was asked a while ago.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.)—In the Victoria paper there is a whole column about miners having rights to the banks of the river.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I only saw the announcement of the minister in the other House. The answer that he gave, and my answer now, is that until the tenders are opened and the conditions considered by council the government will not be in a position to say whether they will lease the 100 miles or not.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.)—I think several companies might go in there on one hundred miles.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—It is unfortunate that the hon. gentlemen opposite are again violating one of their principles, that is, encouraging monopolies. Here is a proposition to give a monopoly of one hundred miles of a river to one company.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—It is not done yet. There has been no lease granted yet.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—The fact that you ask for a tender for one hundred miles of the river is evidence of the policy of the government.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.)—It is a most dangerous concession to give.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—Might I ask the hon. Secretary of State if the government has adopted this as part of the general policy for the development of the Yukon country—that is, leasing large stretches of river in this way?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—No proposition to lease any distance on any river has so far been entertained.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—May I ask what has given rise to the adoption of this very exceptional course?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I am quite unequal to answering a question of that sort.

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—I think it is desirable in leasing the river that the government should make provision for withdrawing from it if it should be thought advisable in the public interest, the same as the government have done in leasing ranches in Alberta.

ROYAL VICTORIA LIFE INSURANCE BILL.

SECOND READING.

Hon. Mr. BERNIER, in the absence of Hon. Mr. Forget, moved the second reading of Bill (27) "An Act to incorporate the Royal Victoria Life Insurance Company." He said: The object of the bill is to incorporate the company to carry on the business of life insurance in all its branches and forms. The only powers given to the company are those which are necessary for the carrying on of the business. The company is made subject to the general clauses of the Insurance Act and of the Companies Act. Hon. gentlemen may see by reading the names of the parties asking for incorporation, that they are all of financial standing and ability, giving ample guarantee to the public.

The motion was agreed to and the bill was read the second time.

The Senate adjourned.

THE CONTINGENT ACCOUNTS COMMITTEE.

FIRST REPORT ADOPTED.

Hon. Mr. KIRCHHOFFER, from the Committee on Internal Economy and Contingent Accounts, presented their first report. He said: As the report is merely a formal matter, I move that it be adopted now.

Hon. Mr. PROWSE—I think it is about time to call the attention of the Senate to the great delay caused by the late appointment of this very important committee. Parliament has been in session now some six weeks, and here is the first report of that committee. It was evident a few days ago that it was regarded as a most important committee, so much so that there was not a man on that committee last year that was qualified to be a member this year. This committee has an amount of important work to do. The session is now drawing to a close, but this is the first time we have had a report from the committee, and the whole report is simply to reduce the quorum down to nine.

Hon. Mr. VIDAL—Does the hon. gentleman forget that this committee was only appointed the day before it met?

Hon. Mr. PROWSE—That was no fault of mine..

The motion was agreed to.

FEDERAL OFFICIALS IN PRINCE EDWARD ISLAND.

INQUIRY.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON rose to inquire:

Whether the government is aware that Mr. H. James Palmer, a commissioner appointed by them to investigate charges of partizanship against federal officials in the province of Prince Edward Island, wrote a letter to an accused official notifying him to appear and containing the following words: "I may say that if you would care to see me before the investigation takes place, and talk the matter over, I will be glad to see you at any time, between three and five o'clock, this afternoon."

He said: It is not my intention to make any observations, but simply to ask this question and to say that it has a "business is business" smack about it. At present I merely ask the Secretary of State whether he is aware this letter has been written.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—The government is not aware that Palmer wrote any such letter.

THIRD READING.

Bill (27) "An Act to incorporate the Royal Victoria Life Insurance Company."—(Mr. McMillan.)

METHODIST TRUST FIRE INSURANCE COMPANY'S BILL.

THIRD READING.

Hon. Mr. ALLAN, from the Committee on Banking and Commerce, reported Bill (23) "An Act to incorporate the Methodist Trust Fire Insurance Company," with an amendment. He said: I may explain that the only amendment was one really to supply an omission, inserting after the words that "not more than 6 per cent should be paid on the paid-up capital stock subscribed." I move that the report be adopted.

The motion was agreed to.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL moved the third reading of the bill.

The motion was agreed to and the bill was read the third time and passed under a suspension of the rules.

BILLS INTRODUCED.

Bill (F) "An Act respecting forged or unauthorized endorsements of bills."—(Sir Oliver Mowat.)

Bill (G) "An Act respecting the jurisdiction of the Exchequer Court with respect to railway debts." – (Sir Oliver Mowat.)

CRIMINAL CODE BILL.

FIRST READING.

Hon. Sir OLIVER MOWAT—I introduced a bill some two or three weeks ago for the amendment of the Criminal Code. Since bringing in that bill, I have had quite a number of communications respecting various clauses of the bill, and also regarding new clauses which seem proper. I propose to withdraw the bill which I introduced and to give to the House a new bill containing most of the same clauses and some additional ones. I move for leave to withdraw the bill entitled: "An Act further to amend the Criminal Code," and to introduce a new bill with the same title.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Might I ask whether that bill contains the memoranda the hon. leader promised to give us for the information of the Senate, showing where the alterations were made, and the effect they would have? The hon. gentleman stated his intention of doing that on a former occasion.

Hon. Sir OLIVER MOWAT—I have not done it with regard to all the clauses, but I think I have done so in the case of all as to which the hon. gentleman would like to have the information.

The motion was agreed to, and the bill was read the first time.

TERREBONNE ELECTION.

INQUIRY.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL rose to inquire:

Whether any action has been taken to bring to justice Mr. Petit, the defeated candidate at the last Dominion elections, in the County of Terrebonne, for a violation of the provisions of paragraph f of article 133, of the Criminal Code, in writing the following letter to a tenderer for a government contract :—

"I have received from the Department of Public Works, at Ottawa, a letter informing me that you are a tenderer for the supply of———for the public buildings at———. As your tender is the same as that of another firm, they write to ask me to whom the contract must be given. I now write to know what you intend to do for me in this matter. I will await your reply. Business is business, as you know."

And if not, why not ?

He said :—My principal reason for bringing this again under the notice of the Senate is the remarks made by the Postmaster General a few days since in the House of Commons, in reply to a question put by the member for Annapolis, inquiring the reasons for the dismissal of a Mr West from the postmastership of the town of Annapolis. The answer given by the Postmaster General was that it was on account of what he considered to be a violation of the spirit of the Criminal Code, which provides a penalty for trafficking in public offices, or selling and trafficking in government contracts. That case, to my mind, was of a very trifling character—if I may use that expression—compared to that of Mr. Petit, who made a direct and positive proposition for a consideration to obtain a contract for coal. In the case at Annapolis, from the documents which were laid before the House of Commons, it appears that the postmaster, Mr. Corbett, placed his resignation in the hands of the member for Annapolis, Mr. Mills, who telegraphed to the then Minister of Justice, the Hon. Sir Charles Hibbert Tupper, that Mr. Corbett would resign if Mr. West was appointed to the position. The then Minister of Justice transferred that telegram to the Postmaster General and the appointment was made. In the documents which have been laid before parliament there is nothing to show that there was any corrupt bargain in that case. However, I am not going to argue that question now, because I have another notice on the paper which will probably justify some further remarks on the subject. What I should like to know is if the offer of a postmaster, or any other official to resign on the condition I have mentioned, without any consideration for the resignation other than that which is interpreted to be corrupt from the fact that he says "I will resign if another person gets it," whether that man is to be punished by dismissal from office while the man who makes a direct and positive proposition for a consideration to obtain a contract is allowed to go free ? I call the attention of the Minister of Justice to his remarks last session when I brought this question under the notice of the Senate. He then said :

It is stated that Mr. Petit denies the accuracy of what has been published as his letter. He has to be officially called on for an explanation.

Then he adds :

When an answer to the official communication to Mr. Petit is received, or a reasonable time has elapsed without any answer, the government will consider what course is to be taken.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—When the hon. gentleman says it is stated that Mr. Petit denies the accuracy of the letter which has been published, may I ask him by whom is it denied—by Mr. Petit himself ?

Hon. Sir OLIVER MOWAT—I have not the denial from himself personally ; some one else has stated that he denies it.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Oh.

Hon. Sir OLIVER MOWAT—I am aware that he denies the accuracy of the statement, but he is to be written to officially, and then his communication will be public property.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—And if it is ascertained that he is the author of the letter, I presume the hon. gentleman will take steps to bring him to justice, in the same way that the late Minister of Justice did in the case of the Connollys and the case of McGreevy.

Hon. Sir OLIVER MOWAT—I don't want to anticipate or make any announcement before I know all the facts of the case ; and then I will consider it.

What I desire to ask further is, whether the official letter was sent to this gentleman inquiring as to whether he was the author of the letter in question, and, if so, what was the answer, and what action the government have taken thereon. I may add that I have seen a notice of some letter from Mr. Petit himself in the newspapers, in which he acknowledges that he wrote the letter, but he gives an explanation why he wrote it, stating that the "business is business" reference related exclusively to the expenses to which he was put.

Hon. Sir OLIVER MOWAT—With reference to the parallel which my hon. friend draws between the Petit case and the case which the Postmaster General spoke of, he seems to forget that Mr. Petit had no office whatever. The man West was dismissed from office, but there was no similar power in the hands of the Dominion government with reference to Mr. Petit, for he held no office. Then my hon. friend spoke of the Postmaster General having said that West's case was a violation of the code. The Postmaster General did not go so far as that. On referring to his language, it will be found that what he said was, that it was inconsistent with the spirit of the Act. Of course the spirit is one thing and the legal effect may be quite another thing. The Postmaster General did not allege that the legal effect of such an act was a violation of the statute. On that point he said nothing, but he was of opinion —and I think we were all of opinion— that such an act was within the spirit of the Act, the sort of thing which was meant to be condemned, and which, perhaps, would have been condemned if it had occurred at the time to the legislature. What West did was to resign the place in consideration of its being conferred upon another person, his son-in-law, I believe. Now, if it is a legitimate thing to resign an office in consideration of its being conferred upon another in whom the resigning officer took an interest, is there any substantial difference between that case and the case of an officer getting $1,000 for the resignation? No one would doubt that if he was resigning in consideration of $1,000, that would be within the letter of the Act, and what he did was to resign for a consideration which might be of much greater money value than $1,000. In order to bring the case within the Act, in case of a money payment, it would not be necessary that the money payment should go to the officer who was resigning. If he chose to stipulate that the money should go to another person the case would be within the statute, but I repeat that all the Postmaster General said was that West's action was within the spirit of the Act. My hon. friend, in referring to the case to which his questions relate, added some other questions. I shall confine myself, however, in the answers I give to the questions which he put upon the paper. I have not seen the original letter mentioned in the question, but I have no reason to doubt that it is correctly set forth at all events in substance.

So far as I know, no action has been taken for the prosecution mentioned in the question, and as to why, I can only conjecture. The duty of taking action in such a case was with the Quebec government, for it is to the provincial governments, and not to the Dominion government, that the administration of justice belongs. The Quebec government has, since the date and publication of the letter, been in the hands of the political party to which Mr. Petit was and is an active and influential opponent ; that government cannot be suspected of desiring to screen Mr. Petit ; and the hon. member's question should have been addressed to that government, instead of to the Dominion government. I presume that the Quebec government had good reasons for not prosecuting Mr. Petit. The Dominion government can only interfere in criminal prosecutions as a private prosecutor may ; and when it does interfere does so with the concurrence of the government of the province in which the offence has been committed, and further, (so far as I know) so interferes only when the offence is one of fraud on the Dominion exchequer, as in the Connolly case. It is to be presumed that the Quebec government did not prosecute because of being advised and believing that under the circumstances a conviction could not be obtained. Mr. Petit denies that he had any such meaning or purpose as his letter has been interpreted by his political opponents to intend. What the article in the code does is, to make punishable any person who "demands,exacts or receives from any person any compensation fee or reward for procuring or furthering the obtaining for himself or any other person of any grant, lease, or other benefit from the government." Mr. Petit is not pretended to have received anything, and he denies that he "demanded" anything, or meant to demand anything, or had any thought of his letter being so understood. He insists that if that has been the popular impression from the letter, it is an unfounded impression ; and it is claimed on his behalf that the words which he happened to use do not necessarily bear such a meaning ; that a court could not so construe them as matter of law ; and that the facts outside of the letter make ridiculous the idea of such a meaning being intended ; that the person or firm to whom the letter was addressed belonged to the opposite political party, and that it would be the height of absurdity to suppose that Mr. Petit, an intelligent man of the world, would have placed himself in the hands of his opponents by making the "demand" which the letter is said to imply, and which would be a violation of the code. That he would do this supremely absurd and incredible thing for the chance of getting from a former political opponent the trifling sum which would be paid, if anything would be paid, for obtaining a contract for supplying to the government 37 tons of coal, it is said, no jury would believe. Such considerations as these may, for all I know, have had weight with the Quebec government; and Mr. Petit's political opponents may have thought a conviction either out of the question or not probable enough to make a prosecution worth while. I cannot give my hon. friend any further assistance towards ascertaining why no action has been taken against Mr. Petit for a violation of that article in the criminal code which is mentioned in his question; my hon. friend will have to refer to his Quebec friends for more full information, if he wants more.

DISMISSALS FOR PARTIZANSHIP.

INQUIRY.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.) rose to inquire:

Whether the employés of the government who were dismissed previous to the appointment of commissioners to inquire into cases of partizanship at the last general election will be entitled to appear before the said commissioners in their own defence?

He said: This question may seem now like locking the stable after the horse has been stolen, but on account of the changed policy of the government, I think it would be very unfair if those men who were dismissed would not have the advantage now of the clemency and the change in the policy as to those dismissals. Last session I took very strong grounds on this subject of dismissing workingmen on the approach of a long and cold winter, on hearing the Minister of Railways in the other House announce that he would not allow those men any defence; all he required was certain information, and on that information he would dismiss the men summarily. I am glad to hear that policy has been tempered and changed to a certain extent, and that commissioners are appointed and that those men will have the chance of defending themselves before that commission, and I heard with a great deal of pleasure this year in the House of Commons the premier admit that every man would have a fair hearing before he was dismissed, and I am perfectly willing and it gives me great pleasure, to commend the government for doing a thing of that kind. I am just as free to commend as to find fault where wrong is done, and I do hope that those men dismissed some time ago will not be debarred now from appearing and making their defence.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Commissions have not been issued in all cases. Where the evidence was clear and undoubted it was not necessary to issue a commission, and it was not the policy of the government to reopen the cases. The offices were held during pleasure and they were liable to be dismissed at any time. The government were satisfied that the charges were clearly brought home, and there was no necessity for the issuing of a commission.

Hon. Mr. McCALLUM—It appears to me, from the evidence before us, that the present government have adopted the policy that "to the victors belongs the spoils," and I regret exceedingly that that is the case. In the Senate last year the Minister of Justice told us that he did not believe in that policy, that he was as much opposed to it as anybody. My hon. friend asks for an investigation. I can tell hon. members that employés on the Welland canal have been swept out without any investigation, without being guilty of political partizanship or anything else. They took no notice of anything. The speeches of ministers in the other House and their practice do not agree, and I think that the Minister of Justice in this House, if he has any influence with the government—and he should have—should use that influence against adopting the policy that "to the victors belong the spoils." Has he considered seriously what effect it will have? If this principle is adopted, how can you expect to have a good, honest civil servant in this country, because every man that is in the employment of the government will be looking for what amount of support he can give to his party. It is not honest service, but how much support can they give the government. How can you expect to have good civil servants when every man is looking out for himself, and knowing that when the other party comes into power he must go out? I say that the government should consider where they are going to land. I care nothing for it, as far as I am individually concerned, as far as my times goes, but I look to the future, and I regret exceedingly that the government have shown by their actions that they adopt the policy "to the victors belong the spoils." I regret it more than any other feature of their policy—more than doing away with the national policy even. I do not know that I blame the members of the government so much as the people who are posting them. This is going to react on the government. For every man they dismiss, there are forty applicants for that position, and what will be the result? They will please one and displease thirty-nine.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—They will displease their opponents, according to your doctrine.

Hon. Mr. McCALLUM—I have read the orders that the Minister of Railways and Canals is said to have given as to the canals. I question very much if he has given those orders; I question if he said, "Do not dismiss anybody without just cause." Of course if you have no use for a man, it is right enough to dismiss him, but what is going to be the result? How are you going to have an honest civil service in this country, if you are going to have them all politicians? It depends on what amount of political influence a servant of the government is going to bring to support the party in power, whether he is to retain his position or not, and the Conservative party will come into power some time. Of course it looks very black now, but what will be the result when they come into power? These other people will be turned out of office and other men put in. The government should consider what they are doing now. In many parts of this country, particularly on the canals, you discharge good, honest men who understand the business, and put in men who do not understand their business, and what is the consequence? This country will have a bill of damages to pay—I am satisfied of that. I think the other day there was an investigation proceeding on the Welland canal. They made charges against a good man—a valuable man to the people of this country—and according to the instructions that the Minister of Railways gave the man in charge of the canal——

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Is that Mr. Ellis?

Hon. Mr. McCALLUM—No, he is dead as to employment: I got through with him long ago. I have nothing to do with Ellis. This is another man. I say he is a good man and I always stand up for the good employés of this country. I was speaking of the charges against this man. What are they? One of them is that when Sir Charles Tupper, then prime minister of this country, went to the town of Thorold he delivered a political speech and this man's daughter read an address to Sir Charles Tupper. What a great crime that was! Another of his crimes was that he volunteered, along with others, after hours, to put up a stand from which Sir Charles Tupper could speak. Another point was that his horse was in a political procession, though he was not there himself. Somebody had gone into his stable and taken the horse away and rode the animal in the procession. These are the charges that are being investigated now on the Welland canal. I believe he is one of the most industrious, clever and active employés on the Welland canal to-day. I do not say that the government of the country are doing this, but they are listening to people behind them and the investigation is being held because somebody wants his place. There is a pretense of fair play in holding this investigation, but I have shown you the nature of the charges that are being investigated. It makes very little difference to the country if they sack all the officials. That is not what I care for, but it is the effect that it will have on the public service of this country in the future. Having the responsibility which they hold, the government should keep clear of the policy "to the victors belong the spoils." You do not know where it is going to end. The hon. gentleman from Bothwell shakes his head, but he must know what the effect of that policy has been in the United States. When a man got into office there he made all he could while he was in office, because he knew that at the next change of government he would be dismissed. So long as I have a seat in this House I shall raise my voice against the adoption of anything of the kind in this country.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—I do not, any more than my hon. friend who has just spoken, favour the doctrine "to the victors belong the spoils." I think it would be singularly unfortunate if that should become the doctrine of any party in this country.

Hon. Mr. McCALLUM—You have that policy now.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—I do not think so. I think there is an important principle associated with our system of parliamentary government that my hon. friend, perhaps, has somewhat pushed into the background. We have two classes of administration officials—one class political, who are responsible for the conduct of public affairs, and the other class, who are intended to be, but have not always been, non-political. The permanency of their position, I understand, depends upon two things—upon the faithful and honest discharge of their duties, and their taking care that they do not convert offices into political offices that the law and the constitution intended should be non-political offices. It is essential to the good government of this country that the non-political officials should remain out of politics, because in the discharge of their duties it is important, not only that those duties should be well discharged, but that the political heads of the government should have no reason to think otherwise; should be as ready to trust those who, before they entered into office, were political opponents, as they are to trust those who are amongst their own friends. Now, I do not understand that any man who has accepted an office of importance, an office to which an annual salary is attached, has any right whatever to enter the political arena and take an active part in the discharge of public duties as a citizen.

Hon. Mr. McCALLUM—We all agree to that.

Hon. Mr. ALMON—What about this man's daughter?

Hon. Mr. MILLS—I am not disposed to discuss the question as to the indirect mischief that may be done. That is not the question that we have before us.

Hon. Mr. ALMON—Yes, it is.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—No, the question that we have before us is whether the government have discharged persons who are, or who were, their political opponents, who have taken no part in the parliamentary elections that have been held.

Hon. Mr. McKINDSEY—What about Mr. Dickson of Hamilton.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—I am stating a general proposition, and I intend to state my proposition fully. I know, myself, instances where parties have been removed from office and where their cases have been discussed in the other Chamber as cases of grievance, but I know that some of those parties were presidents of Conservative associations: I know that they took the platform, spoke at public meetings, and did the best they could to secure the election of those who were their political friends and the defeat of those who were on the opposite side politically. Every man who does so takes his political life in his hands. He has made up his mind that in office he will share the fortunes of his party, and he has no right to any better position or fortune than his party. When they go out of office he should go with them. What the country wants is an honest and faithful public service, and it is impossible to have that as long as the non-political officers of this country take an active part in parliamentary elections, and become the agents of the government for the purpose of promoting the political interests of the government? Who does not remember the case of immigration agents who were brought down from the North-west Territories by the late administration to take part in almost every by-election in this country, and who does not remember the large number of persons who were removed from office, who, in 1878, had not gone on the public platform, but who, it was said, had gone into the counties, from which they had come when they were appointed, to take part in political contests? I remember very well when the late Alonzo Wright had removed from office, in one of those buildings, parties appointed to office in 1873 or 1874 from his constituency, on the ground that they had assisted in organizing a political party and bringing out a candidate to oppose him. They were removed. I never said a word against that removal. I thought the gentlemen who did that took the risk of being removed if their friends were defeated, and they were properly removed, if the facts were as stated. I have heard laid down here propositions from which I entirely dissent. If any gentleman who was a Conservative, I care not how strong his feelings may be, who took no part in the elections, who remained neutral, who devoted himself to the discharge of the duties with which he was entrusted, has been removed from office, a wrong has been done, and the rule laid down has been departed from; but, so far as I know the cases, that has not been done in any instance where an employé has been removed. I know that, to-day, there are many persons retained in the public service who, from my point of view, ought to have disappeared within a fortnight from the time the new administration was formed.

Hon. Mr. McCALLUM—I believe the Senate will credit what I state that on the upper level of the Welland canal, in a distance of seventeen miles, at least ten men have been discharged who took no part in an election excepting they may have voted.

Hon. Mr. POWER—Were not those temporary employés?

Hon. Mr. McCALLUM—That is true, but some of them have been there for five or ten years. It shows that the government and their friends go on the principle "to the victors belong the spoils," because these men voted against the government candidates they are discharged, while others, who supported the candidates of the present government strongly at the last election, have been put in their places and the hon. gentleman thinks there is no harm in that.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—The hon. gentleman remembers Mr. Bodwell's case. He was appointed on that canal and he disappeared.

Hon. Mr. McCALLUM—Yes, I remember Mr. Bodwell and I could tell the hon. gentleman more about his dismissal from the canal than he would care to hear. I know all about the case. but I am not going to deal with it now. Let the dead rest; I do not want to disturb them at all, but when the hon. gentleman wants to create an impression here that the government is doing justice to the public employés and does not wish to carry out the policy "to the victor belongs the spoils," I say he is mistaken. The government are carrying out that policy every day and the proof of that has been furnished. Last session, when the Minister of Justice said in this House that he was not in favour of that policy, I said I was glad not to hear him say so, and I added that no one would do more to hold to that than myself, I am here to hold all governments, no matter to which party they belong, to that sound policy, because I foresee evil consequences that will follow in this country if they adopt the policy "to the victors belong the spoils." It is not a British or a Canadian policy. It is a Yankee policy. Are we going to introduce it here?

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I noticed the answer given by the Secretary of State to the question put by the hon. member from Victoria as to whether persons who were dismissed prior to the appointment of the commission would be allowed to appear before the commissioner to answer the charges made against them. The answer, if I understood him correctly, was that when they had what they considered sufficient evidence to justify the removal of an official, there would be no necessity to appoint a commission or permit parties so dismissed to appear before commissioners. What I ask is whether he adopts the policy laid down in the other House that a mere complaint on the part of a member of parliament, for the time being, or by the person who was defeated in the elections, is sufficient evidence, without any furthur investigation to justify the government in dismissing an official—because that is the doctrine which has been laid down. From my youth up I have always been taught that no man, under the British constitution, is considered guilty until proved guilty. We all know that, no matter how serious a crime may be, or how many persons may have witnessed it—even though the judge and the jury had witnessed it, the offender is not properly condemned until he has been tried and given an opportunity to defend himself. That is the reason why we object so strongly to the doctrine laid down by the present government. While on my feet, I should like to ask the hon. gentleman from Bothwell—and I regret to see that he has left the Chamber—where he draws the line between the political and non-political offices? Are we to understand that a non-political officer is one who receives an annual salary, or is the political officer one who is employed by the day, because we have both cases. We have plenty of cases in which men have been removed from positions which they held, for no other reason than that a complaint had been made by a member of parliament, or by a defeated candidate, that a certain man did a certain thing during the elections. Are we to understand that all officers whether they be of a permament character or of a temporary character, are to be removed because they go and vote? The law gives them the right to vote, and if it is to be understood in the future that no person receiving money from the Dominion government is to be allowed to vote, whether the money they receive be for the payment of a day's wages or a month's salary, the sooner it is known the better, and the sooner, if this theory is to be practically enforced, the government put on the statute-book a law prohibiting the exercise of the franchise, by anybody who receives remuneration from the government for services rendered, the better it will be for the country. The case to which the hon. member from Monck has called attention is one of very great hardship. The statement made by him is simply this, that the only partisanship displayed by the official was that his daughter read an address and presented a bouquet of flowers to the then premier, and that his horse was present in a political procession. Is that to be considered offensive partisanship? When I had the honour of administering the Customs Department, when an application was made to me by an officer as to his right to exercise the franchise, whether in a municipal or a political election, my answer was "you have a right to vote, but take my advice, do not take any active part," and I believe that was the advice always given by the members of the government to which I belonged. As long as a man confines himself to voting, it is an exercise of tyranny in a free country to turn him out of office because he has exercised the right which the law gives him, as he thinks proper.

Hon. Mr. POWER—What authority on the government side has laid down the doctrine that an officer is not to be allowed to vote? I have not heard any one.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I am not aware that I said any one did. I asked the question where is the line to be drawn. The hon. member from Bothwell drew a distinction between political and non-political officers. He said that if a man takes an offensive part in politics, he should be dismissed. That principle was recognized by Sir John Macdonald in speeches made in the House of Commons, and was concurred in by the late Alex. Mackenzie and by Mr. Blake. That was a principle recognized by both parties so long as I have had anything to do with political life—that if a man becomes offensive—if he abuses the powers that be and places himself in that position, he takes his official life in his hands and must take the consequences. No one has denied that, but what I want to know is whether the mere complaint of a defeated candidate, who feels sore on account of his defeat, should be sufficient evidence to warrant the discharge of a man who has done nothing more than to go to the polls and vote, so far as we know or as far as any evidence has been produced. In the case to which my hon. friend from Bothwell referred—that is, the case of the late Mr. Alonzo Wright, when a member of the House—he proved to the House and the hon. member for Bothwell should have stated that fact, that these men not only organized an opposition against him, but they were offensive to the greatest possible degree to himself as a member of the House and as a candidate, and also to every member of the government, whom they denounced in the vilest possible language. That was the reason for their removal from office, and in the instance that has been also mentioned in reference to Sir Charles Tupper's dismissal of some clerks down in Truro or Moncton, I am not sure which, there was evidence that that man had not only taken an active and offensive part in politics, but that he had abused the personal character and reputation of the candidate who was running at that time, and of every member of the government; that was the reason he was removed, not because he had simply gone and voted as every British subject has a right to do under the law. The sooner this country knows whether this vicious and pernicious practice is to be persisted in by the members of this government, the better it will be for the service and for the whole country. I should be very sorry to see, in the case of a change of government, the principle that has been carried out by the present gentlemen in power, adopted by any leader of the Conservative party. My hon. friend from Monck says that things look very dark just now. That is quite true, but he must remember that the darkest hour is just before the dawn. The time may be rapidly coming when these gentlemen may be taught that the policy which they are putting in force to-day—a policy which is being disowned and which is being wiped out of existence as far as possible in the United States—may recoil upon their own heads.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I have yet to hear of the first case which has been brought up in which it has been charged that the present administration dismissed a man because he merely exercised his electoral franchise. Hon gentlemen cannot point to a single case where the present government interfered with the franchise of any man. In all cases where dismissals have taken place, ample evidence has been produced to show that they were active political partisans.

Hon. Mr. McCALLUM—Not at all.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—The rule laid down in the House is one that has been accepted by both sides.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—No, no.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I beg the hon. gentleman's pardon. In 1878 the Conservative party did not issue commissions and made no inquiry. They dismissed men capriciously. They dismissed the postmaster at Hull because his son canvassed against Mr. Alonzo Wright. They had no other reason whatever. And they dismissed Mr. Buckingham, the Deputy Minister of the Interior. I could name dozens of cases where dismissals were made without any inquiry; simply by mere caprice the administration dismissed them. The principle that the present government have proceeded on has been this: that where a member of the House of Commons states over his own signature that so and so has been guilty of active political partisanship, interfered in the election, interfered for the party that appointed him, and took his political life in his hands, that he ought to be dismissed. That is the principle that has been laid down. If the government were to follow up the example set by their predecessors, they would dismiss one-third of the whole civil service in the country, but, as a matter of fact, what proportion has been dismissed? Not one per cent of the civil servants of this country have been dismissed. It is quite true a considerable number of men who have been temporarily employed as labourers have been dismissed, but were the Conservative party not in the habit of employing hundreds of labourers just on the eve of an election, and after the election was over they had no further use for them. Nobody found fault with them for that. It was an abuse of their power to employ men on useless work. We know in the city of Quebec, during the Conservative regime, men were employed to shovel snow off the heights down onto the river, and employés of that kind of course have been dismissed. Lock labourers are only employed for the season, and not paid from November until the following May. The instructions were given by Mr. Blair, and he could have had no personal knowledge of individuals. The instructions which I myself heard him say he had given to the officials in charge were that any man who had performed his duties faithfully, who was a good labourer, should be retained. Of course I know nothing personally about this.

Hon. Mr. McCALLUM—I do know personally.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Mr. Blair acted with the best possible intentions. His disposition was not to dismiss except for cause, but it is notorious that at the end of a season, when you have no longer work for hundreds of men that are employed on the canal system of this country, they are dismissed and paid off and have no claim to be re-employed the following spring. No doubt, from year to year, the best men are continued. Attention has been drawn during the present session to men who have been dismissed. The men naturally apply to their political allies, and say, "Oh, I have been dismissed because I have been a Conservative and voted the Tory ticket, and because I favoured my political friends;" they give that as a reason and it is taken up. We know that statements made by men under those conditions are not always reliable. Men, I think, feel a grievance in such a case and ascribe a cause, and, of course, they may or may not be right in that case. But all I can assure hon. gentlemen is that it was the desire of Mr. Blair that no good man should be removed from the canal service although he was only temporarily employed. It is quite possible he may have been misinformed in many cases. He has to take his evidence second-hand, he has to rely upon officials—officials appointed by the late administration, in whom at least my hon. friends opposite should have some degree of confidence, and if mistakes are made, the Minister of Railways and Canals should not be charged with them.

Hon. Mr. McCALLUM—I wish to say one word more on this question. The hon. Secretary of State says that Mr. Blair was consulted and gave instructions about this matter. The gentleman that gives instructions on the upper level of the canal is the defeated candidate for Haldimand at the last election. I know that no fault has been found with the parties who have been dismissed. They discharged their duties well. But the government even descended so low that a bridge tender getting $15 a month was sacked, and another put in his place, for no reason in the world except to make room for their hungry supporters, so that they could give in return political service when the time arises.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I rise to a question of order. We have allowed this discussion to continue although it has been irregular almost from the beginning. As we have spent about an hour over the matter now, we had better proceed with the regular business of the House. The hon. gentleman from Victoria asked the question which appears on the order paper and that question has been answered. We had a discussion ranging from one end of the country to the other, about dismissals in connection with the civil service, which is altogether out of order; and further, these discussions are simply repetitions, with no improvement, of discussions, which have taken place in the other chamber. It is not a dignified occupation for the members of this House to discuss second-hand these party questions, but if hon. gentlemen do wish to discuss them, they should put such notices on the paper as will enable them to proceed in accordance with the rules of order, but I for one shall ask the House to insist on enforcing the rules of order.

Hon. Mr. PROWSE—On the point raised by the hon. member, I should like to see that question settled once and for all, because I think ever since I have had a seat in this chamber, discussions have been allowed on questions put to members of the government. After being continued for an hour or so, generally the hon. member from Halifax has raised a question of order, and there it has always dropped. If any subject at all is open for discussion on a question, it should be open to every member of the Senate, or else we should enforce the rule and allow no discussion to take place on a question at all. I should like to see the point of order decided by the Speaker.

The SPEAKER—In my opinion, discussions on these inquiries are entirely out of order, but I could not take upon myself, after the permission the Senate has always given to members to discuss these matters, to decide that the discussion should be stopped to-day. If the Senate do not want to allow discussions on mere inquiries, they should so decide. I would like very much to hear an expression from members of the Senate on that question.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—On the point of order I am fully in accord with the remarks made by the Speaker. Are we to understand that in future a person making the inquiry can give any explanation as to the reasons why he makes it, or is it to be understood that he simply asks the question and receives the answer? That is the practice, I know, in our House of Commons. It has not been the practice here, nor is it the practice in the House of Commons in England. There you are allowed to discuss a question, provided you keep strictly within the question before the House for the time being.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—My hon. friend has stated the rule very, very broadly.

Hon Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I am stating the rule from my own personal experience in listening to debates in the House of Commons in England. It was a surprise to me, because I discussed the question with Sir Henry Holland, now Lord Knutsford, as to the difference in the practice in the House of Commons in Canada and the practice in England. A member rises in England and puts the question. He gives his reasons for it, and the Minister of the Crown answers that question, and any suggestion or any questions arising out of that answer can be replied to by the member who puts the question, and by every member of the House, but he must not introduce any extraneous or new matter. If that is to be the rule here, I should be very glad to have it adopted, and my only reason for asking the question is to ascertain whether the Speaker's ruling to-day goes to that extent, or whether it is to confine the gentleman who puts the question simply to the reading of the question and receiving his answer.

Hon. Mr. ALLAN—I suppose on a question of order I may be allowed to say a few words, and I would like to say from my own experience in this House that no inconvenience has arisen from the practice which has obtained here, of the member who may make the inquiry stating the reason why he makes that inquiry, and saying what he has to say in explanation of it. The real inconvenience has arisen when, after the minister has given his answer, the matter is taken up and discussed by members all over the House and new matter brought in. The result is that the minister has to answer again to fresh objections, and it makes the debate almost interminable. I think if the relaxation of the rule is allowed, by which the member making the inquiry can speak to it, that is all that can reasonably be desired. I know when I occupied the chair some few years ago, there was a discussion on an inquiry with reference to certain officials in connection with the public works, on which the House allowed so much latitude that the discussion lasted three or four days.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.)—It has been the custom in this House to discuss questions on calling attention to certain matters, and I can not see any difference, except a technical one, between calling attention to a matter and asking a question. If you simply put in the word "resolved" it has the same effect. If it was understood we could not discuss the matter on a question, we would not do so but would put in the word "resolved." It has been the custom for 20 years, and it now amounts to a rule of this House, that in calling attention to any question it can be discussed by any member of the House and replied to by the member who made the inquiry.

Hon. Mr. ALMON—It is very important that a discussion should take place on the matter brought before the House. I listened to the hon. member for Bothwell, who rose to answer some remark made by the hon. member from Monck. He referred to a couple of charges, one of which was that somebody had taken somebody else's horse out of his stable and gone to a political meeting. I would like to know whether the hon. gentleman thinks those are proper subjects to be discussed in committee.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—That is far too abstruse a question for me to answer off-hand.

An Hon. MEMBER—The hon. gentleman will have to give notice of that question.

Hon. Mr. ALMON—This was something which did not take place at Runnymead or the famous hunting grounds of the hon. member for Bothwell. It took place in Ontario, and I think when the hon. member speaks of Runnymead and the Bill of Rights, he might discuss more important matters.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Rule No. 20 reads as follows:

> A senator may speak to any question before the Senate; or upon a question or on an amendment to be proposed by himself; or upon a question of order arising out of the debate; but not otherwise, without consent of a majority of the Senate, which shall be determined without debate.

I think the rule has been stated by the hon. senator from Toronto. The objection is that we introduce matters not embodied in the question, and it is exceedingly inconvenient, because hon. gentlemen are not prepared to give explanations of matters to which their attention has not been called. I think on a question the speaking should be limited to the gentleman making the inquiry and the minister who replies. The gentleman who asks the question should have a right to speak, and the member of the government replying should have the right to answer him, and if a further explanation was required, the senator putting the question on the paper would have a right again to speak.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—I would direct my hon. friend's attention to Rule 55 on page 92, which provides that the House can, in its discretion, permit a debate of this kind to take place. If my hon. friend would refer to that Rule 55 he will see a very great latitude is given to the House in the event of the House tacitly consenting to the debate proceeding.

Hon. Mr. POWER—Read the rule.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—The rule reads as follows:

When a question is asked by a senator, the senator putting the question and the senator answering ought to make only such observations as they may deem indispensable to be understood, and no debate is allowed except by leader of the Senate. (In the House of Lords, 10 May, 206), and particularly in the Senate, this rule is generally disregarded, and lengthy debates often follow. If the senator questioning or answering, is allowed by the Senate, tacitly or otherwise to offer any opinion, argument, or inference, other senators may claim the same privilege.

I submit to hon. gentlemen present that the debate has not trespassed the rule of the House, which has been duly observed here.

Hon. Mr. McCALLUM—How can you limit discussion? If a senator cannot get the privilege of saying what he wants to say, he has a right to move the adjournment of the House and then he can speak. Every hon. gentleman has the means in his power to discuss it.

Hon. Mr. POIRIER—I believe the old custom which has been followed here in the Senate could be continued without inconvenience. The only trouble arises from the fact of one gentleman speaking twice or four times on the same question. I believe if the rule of this House was made that an hon. gentleman should be allowed to speak only once on the same question, it would be satisfactory. All this trouble would not arise, and that objectionable feature of the debate being disposed of, and only one speech by one member being allowed to be made, I think it would be much preferable that the old rule should obtain and that by tacit consent of this House, when a question is put and a speech is made by the member putting the question, other members might be allowed to speak once on the question, and the minister of the Crown might wait until the discussion was pretty well over and then given his answer.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I am out of order perhaps———

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—The hon. gentleman is clearly out of order; he has spoken once.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I am going to close with a motion to adjourn. I wish to direct the attention of the hon. gentleman from Calgary to the fact that what he cited as a rule is not a rule of the House. What he cited as Rule 55 is simply one of the articles in the manual which was prepared by a former clerk of this House for the information of members, and does not bind the House at all. The hon. leader of the opposition said that this matter could be looked at from two points of view, and he wished to understand which was the correct point of view. It has never been contended in this House that the hon. member who asked a question had not the right to make remarks upon it, nor that the minister replying had not the same right to speak to the question, and I do not think it has been contended that the member asking the question had not the right to say something in reply, but the rule which has been observed in late years—and no one should know it better than I, because I have been continually stopped from discussing questions when in opposition—is that where a member merely asks a question there can be no general discussion on that question unless with the consent of the House; but the practice was introduced some twenty years ago by the late Sir David Macpherson, borrowed from the House of Lords, of calling attention to a subject and concluding with an inquiry, and the practice was that on a question of that sort, prefaced by calling attention to something, there could be a general discussion, and hon. gentlemen must remember that in addition to that our rule requires, as does the rule of the other House and of every deliberative body, that the discussion shall be pertinent to the notice on the paper; and if you ask a question you cannot go over the universe and talk about matters in general, which has been the practice adopted here during the last session. The hon. leader of the opposition will remember that when he led the House this rule was enforced in the way that I put it, and, unless it is enforced now, this House, instead of being a deliberative body and conducting its business with the decorum which is expected to be found in a serious deliberative body like this, will become simply a mob of respectable gentlemen. I was going to move that the House do now adjourn———

Several hon. MEMBERS—Lost, lost.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I think perhaps it would be desirable if we invoked the opinion of the Speaker for our future guidance as to how far that rule should go.

Hon. Sir OLIVER MOWAT—I suppose there is no object in the Speaker's giving his judgment at the present moment. Perhaps he would like to consider it.

The SPEAKER—With the consent of hon. members I will postpone my decision until to-morrow.

INVESTIGATION OF OFFENSIVE PARTISANSHIP CASES.

INQUIRY.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON rose to inquire:

Whether the government is aware that James F. White, of Alberton, in the province of Prince Edward Island, bounty officer, under the Department of Marine and Fisheries, and Alexander Bannerman Warburton, of Charlottetown, law agent for the government of Canada in the said province, gave evidence of offensive partisanship by taking violent and active part in the recent by-election for West Prince? If so, is it the intention of the government to authorize their commissioner, Mr. H. J. Palmer, to investigate the matter; and whether the government regard active and violent interference by their officials in favour of government candidates as a good cause for removal from office?

He said: In rising to make the inquiry which stands attached to my name on the notice paper, I may say that, apart from the question of order that has just arisen in this House, I do not think it is desirable that a very exhaustive discussion should take place in connection with this subject of dismissals from office until the very important papers asked for by my hon. friend, the leader of the opposition, and my hon. friend from Brandon, have been brought down. I think it is extraordinary that these papers should have been delayed so long. They should certainly have been before the House ere this. Then we would have everything before us, and I feel sure that if these papers were before the House, it would not be possible for my hon. friend the Secretary of State to say that not one per cent of the employés of the government have been dismissed since the present government came into power. I feel certain, as far as the province I belong to is concerned, that if the returns that have been asked for were brought down, it would be found that a much larger number have been interfered with and dismissed, and that is not all. A perfect reign of terror exists in that province. A commissioner has been appointed who is travelling all over the province taking evidence and receiving charges against officials, and the result is that the officials all over the province are in a state of terrorism. Charges have been preferred against them, and they do not know who is accusing them. A very deplorable state of things exists, as far as the officials of the province are concerned, and the other natural consequence arises from this state of things, that a great batch of expectants of office is created and is getting larger day by day, pressing the members and pressing the government to make dismissals. It is a state of things that ought certainly to be brought to a close. It is very deplorable to have such a condition of affairs as I know exists in my province, and I believe exists everywhere throughout the Dominion. My object in asking this question is to ascertain, if possible, from the members of the government whether they have one rule for what they call offensive or active partisanship so far as it applies to Conservatives in office, and an altogether different rule as applied to those who are friendly to the administration. I dare say my innocent friends in the government benches will rise when I am done and say they are not aware of active interference by the men named in my inquiry In my place as a member of parliament, I now state in this House, with the responsibility attaching to my words that I know must attach to them as a member of the Senate, that these gentlemen that I have named took a very active and, what I suppose would be called by their opponents an offensive part, in the recent by-elections. I saw them myself at public meetings. I heard them addressing meetings. It was a matter of current report that Mr. James F. White, bounty officer, canvassed the county with bounty cheques in his pocket—that he travelled the whole extent of the riding, speaking at public meetings in the interest of the Liberal candidate, representing him, in fact, in his absence. I know this, because I heard him speak and I am informed he carried bounty cheques around with him, using them to influence voters in favour of the Liberal candidate. I make this statement so that the members of the government cannot say that they are not now, at least, aware that these gentlemen pursued this course in the contest. I want to know whether, with this information before them, the government think this is a subject for inquiry into the conduct of these gentlemen or whether they are going to take the ground, which they must take if they say this is not a subject for inquiry, that active and offensive political partisanship is all right as long as it is exercised in favour of the candidates of the government of the day. I hope we shall get some tangible ground to stand upon.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—The department has no knowledge whatever of these gentlemen having taken a violent or active part in the recent by-election for West Prince, and they have no intention of investigating the matter. If the facts are as stated by the hon. gentleman they are following the bad example set by their predecessors.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—No, no.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I am credibly informed by an hon. gentleman, now in his place, that the practice of the late administration was to have these bounty cheques given to the canvassers in election contests.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Is that right?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I am so advised by an hon. gentleman in this chamber. I am advised that that was the practice—that it was done in Nova Scotia.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Was it correct to do it?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—No, I do not think it was, whether it was done by the one government or the other. As to Alexander Bannerman Warburton, he is not a government official in any sense.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—Is he not?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—No, he is a lawyer who has been employed temporarily by the Department of Justice—who may be employed only for a week or a month. He cannot be called an official of the Crown. He is simply the agent of the Department of Justice there, and he has never been recognized in any degree as an official of the government nor has he ever been restricted in his action.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Has he, as a lawyer, any greater claim than a day labourer?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—He is simply a temporary agent of the Department of Justice.

PROMISES OF PUBLIC GRANTS IN PRINCE EDWARD ISLAND.

MOTION.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON moved:

That an humble Address be presented to His Excellency the Governor General, praying that His Excellency may be pleased to lay before the Senate, copies of all telegrams sent between the 15th and 27th of April last, by the Minister of Marine and Fisheries, to Bernard D. McLellan, or any other person in West Prince, Prince Edward Island, promising grants for harbours, piers or breakwaters in that constituency, different from or in addition to, amounts stated in the estimates now before parliament.

He said:—I do not propose to make any observations on this resolution, but simply to move it and wait, as we have to wait, for information from members of this government, with very great patience until this return will be brought down. I should think that, heavily taxed as they are and vast as their labours are, it will not take very long to prepare the report for which I am asking. I hope in five or six weeks at least they will be in a position to bring the information down to this House.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—There is no objection to the address if there are any such papers. I am not aware that there are any, but I shall call the attention of the Minister of Marine to the matter.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—I happen to know that there are papers.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—If there are, they will be brought down.

The motion was agreed to.

DISMISSAL OF CAPTAIN McKENZIE.

INQUIRY.

Hon. Mr. PRIMROSE rose to inquire:

Whether the following telegram was sent to Captain William McKenzie, of the dredge "Canada," and if so, whether there were any charges against Captain McKenzie, or any investigation held?

"ST. JOHN, N.B., 27th April, 1897.

"To Capt. WM. MCKENZIE,
"Dredge 'Canada,' Liverpool, N.S.

"Captain Elijah Nickerson has been appointed captain of the 'Canada.' You will kindly place him in charge. Report me men's time and all in connection with dredge before you leave.

(Sgd.) "W. J. McCORDICK,
"Superintendent."

He said:—Before asking the question which stands on the Order Paper in my name I wish to express my own personal gratification at having with us once more the hon. Minister of Justice, the leader of the House, in his accustomed place from which he has been detained by indisposition which I am sure every senator in this chamber hopes, with me, may be only of a temporary character. In regard to the subject of my inquiry, I have to state that Captain McKenzie, who has been known to me for a long period of years, is a thoroughly capable, competent, reliable, honest shipmaster. He was placed in charge of the dredge "Canada" on the decease of his predecessor, Capt. Thomson, who was likewise known to me for many years, and was an equally competent and reliable shipmaster, perfectly able to discharge all the duties required of him in the position of master of the dredge. Captain McKenzie came in as successor to Captain Thomson. His appointment was made in this way, as I was informed—and on reference to the documents in the departments my information will be found to be correct—the Department of Public Works sent over to the department of Marine and Fisheries a list of three names, asking, as that department was in a better position to judge of the fitness of the men, to indicate which of these three was best fitted to discharge the duties required of him in the position of master of the dredge, and of the three names Captain McKenzie's was selected. I wish to know why, if these things are so—and I would be very sorry to state anything that I did not know to be correct—if Captain McKenzie is the man that I have described him to be, capable in every respect of discharging the duties required of him, why is it, except that he happened to be a Liberal-Conservative that his services were retained until just after the local elections and then he was summarily dismissed. As a consequence of being thus summarily dismissed at that time he was deprived of the vote he might have cast otherwise. This is simply an instance of what is transpiring throughout the whole bounds of the Dominion of unjustifiable and indefensible dismissals of worthy and efficient officers so as to make room for supporters of the present government, and this notwithstanding their professed declaration of policy as voiced by the premier in the Hansard of last session. I quote from page 506 as follows:—

The PRIME MINISTER—No minister would pretend to dismiss any official unless he had an opportunity to defend himself; but when the case is within the personal knowledge of the minister himself, under such circumstances there is no cause for inquiry. When the minister is not cognizant of the facts himself, whenever the case is brought to him by extraneous evidence, those statements must be substantiated, and every man must be given an opportunity to defend himself. I do not want, for my part, and I am sure the government does not desire—and I can speak for the government on this matter—to act arbitrarily on this or any other subject; everyone must be given a fair opportunity to be heard before he is dealt with.

I read, in contrast with the above, the action which has been pursued in connection with Captain McKenzie. An anecdote recurs to my mind, in this connection which, I think, is illustrative of the promises and professions made by the prime minister in the extract which I have just read, and the government's action since then. A gentleman, on a certain occasion, with the assistance of his amanuensis, drew up a document having reference to matters to be attended to in the future, but in the interim he heard that call which none may hear and say it nay, and so he "shuffled off this mortal coil." His amanuensis, in subsequently looking at the document, deemed it incomplete in one particular at least, so he took his pen, and sitting down, wrote: "P.S.—Since writing the above I have died." Now I think I could very well interpolate, after that extract from the Hansard. on behalf of Mr. Laurier, the premier, "P.S.—Since writing the above, I have died." I should not like to transgress any rule of this House, but I did not observe until yesterday some remarks which were made by the hon. Secretary of State in the debate on the address. He thought proper to animadvert on certain things I had said, and quote things that I never said at all. It was in connection with dismissals. My hon. friend said:

My hon. friend from Pictou, I will not say committed any breach of the decorum of the House but he certainly did not by his remarks elevate the tone of the discussion of the address. I think when he sees his words in writing and they have not been revised, he will rather regret that he has made the comments he has with reference to the individual members of the cabinet and the comparisons he drew as to their ability and their position as members of the government.

I did not do any of these things. I did not hear the Secretary of State distinctly at the time, or I should have replied to him at once. My remarks were not directed so much against men as against their methods and measures. The men may be superlatively good, but in my humble estimation many of the methods and measures of these men are hyper-superlatively bad, and this case to which I have referred is an example. It is a glaring example of the most reprehensible system of political tactics that was ever put in operation in any civilized country—a system of which in its entirety the present Liberal government are the originators and sole and only Canadian patentees. Not so with the Liberal-Conservative party. Sir John Macdonald set his face as a flint against this obnoxious procedure and his followers have followed him. Of course, I am better acquainted with the position of matters in my own province and county than in many places further away from where I live. I may say that in my own county it is within my personal knowledge that in one of the most important departments of the government a gentleman was installed under the administration of Mr. Mackenzie, who was a Liberal, and all of whose relations are Liberals. He is in that same position to-day. He was never interfered with by the Conservative party, because he was a thoroughly competent man, who discharged his duties satisfactorily to the government that appointed him and to the government that succeeded the one which appointed him, and he is in every respect a worthy and reputable official. In that department is a young man who is competent also and is a Liberal—in fact he is what one might call a rabid Liberal. I do not think I ever knew of a man so unobservant of the proprieties, so far as political partisanship is concerned. He made himself actively offensive in every election that came around, yet that man was retained in the service of the Liberal Conservative government. I may quote also a case referred to before, in the House of Commons at least—that is the dismissal of gentlemen who were Conservatives, who had charge of the government steamers entering the port. These gentlemen were dismissed without a moment's notice, and the agency of those steamers was handed over to whom, do you suppose? To a ship broker? To a man of any experience whatever in shipping, or shipping concerns, or shipping management? No; but to a dry goods man, and you may ransack the maritime provinces and I am certain you will not get a more active or thoroughly offensive political partisan; yet that dry goods man is the man who, forsooth, has succeeded the other gentlemen who were dismissed for political partisanship. "Consistency thou art a jewel." I do not see it, however, in this matter. That change took place on the plea that these men were political partisans. I think in that case that the justice of the Liberal government was blind, but blind to the right. I have tried, as best I could, to place before the House this case of Captain McKenzie, a thoroughly competent, reliable and worthy shipmaster, of long experience sailing out of the port of Pictou, reputable in every respect, no fault to be found with him unless it be that he was a Liberal-Conservative, yet that short, curt telegram from Mr. McCordick was sent to him and he was dismissed at once and his successor installed in his place. Here is a case for the exercise of the fine subtleties of the hon. member for Bothwell, and I commend it to him to discover, if he can, the existence of offensive political partisanship in it If endowed with speech I am sure that this and similar cases would say as did the devils of old "our name is legion."

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Such a telegram was sent. No charges were made against Captain McKenzie, but engagements of men on the dredge were only for one season and Captain McKenzie was not engaged for the present season. No investigation was made.

Hon. Mr. PRIMROSE—I anticipated that answer, and if I did not state the fact it was simply an omission on my part. It is strange that in the history of the past those appointments should run on year after year for years, and that this plea should only be offered now, namely, that they are annual appointments. I think it is a weak answer, under the circumstances. If there is any force in the plea, is it that Captain McKenzie was dismissed because the man installed in his place was a better man? Were Captain McKenzie's duties discharged perfunctorily or improperly, or what was the reason?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Since I took my seat I have been informed by an hon. senator in this House that this captain had been an active political partisan.

Hon. Mr. PRIMROSE—He comes then under the government's general category?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—The hon. gentleman drew into the discussion some observations made by me in the debate on the address in reply to the speech from the throne, and he applied my remarks to an entirely different purpose from what I had intended them. My observations had reference to what I considered the very singular comments that the hon. gentleman made on the personnel of the government.

Hon. Mr. PRIMROSE—But I did not make any such comments.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—It is so reported in the Debates, I heard the hon. gentleman make the statements myself, and I thought at the time they should not have been made and that he would afterwards regret them. In speaking of the government he said:

As to any consistency in their action in regard to tariff, franchise, or any other measure, the present government, in its corporate capacity, so to speak, constitutes, to my mind, a unique specimen for a national anatomical museum, as a body possessed of a patent, accommodating, elastic thorax, capable of providing free passage way for any bolus however big, and grasping with vice-like pressure and tenacity any pill however small. And while in this connection I may say that, notwithstanding the disclaimers of the hon. the leader of this House, it really is rather amusing to note the way in which the government, in the speech from the throne in regard to improvements which it states are to be made, seem to arrogate to themselves all the credit of the initiation of these measures.

And so he goes on in a style which I think was not dignified.

Hon. Mr. PRIMROSE—I am only sorry to say that I think the history of current events is substantiating my method of anatomy.

LIEUT. SUTTONS' LEAVE OF ABSENCE.

INQUIRY.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY rose to inquire of the government:

1. Has Lieutenant F. H. C. Sutton, of "B" Squadron of the Royal Canadian Dragoons, stationed at Winnipeg, recently received any favours from the government; and if so, at whose instance and request? 2. Has he left for England, and why has he gone there?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Lieut. Sutton, of "B" Squadron of the Royal Canadian Dragoons, is one of the officers who have been sent to England to be attached to one of the Imperial regiments for instructional purposes.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—In accordance with the rules?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Yes.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—No, in violation of the rules.

THE ABSENCES OF JUDGE ROUTHIER.

INQUIRY.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—The other day I inquired of the government:

1. At what date was Judge A. R. Routhier, of the Superior Court for the province of Quebec, appointed?

2. Since that date, how many times has he been granted leave of absence?

The reply of the Minister of Justice was as follows:

To the first question, my answer is that Judge Routhier was appointed to the judiciary of the province of Quebec on the 9th December, 1889. He had been previously, namely, in 1873, appointed to Chicoutimi. To the second question, my answer is that since 1889 he has not once been granted leave of absence.

Chicoutimi is in the province of Quebec, and when I asked the question, at what date was Judge Routhier appointed to the Superior Court of the province of Quebec, the Minister of Justice should have stated that it was in 1873, and not in 1889. The first answer to that question has created the impression that Judge Routhier was not appointed in 1873, but in 1889, which is not the case. To show the government that I have not got the right answer I thought it better to give notice of these other questions which are as follows:—

1. Is the government aware that since Judge Routhier was appointed judge of the Superior Court for the province of Quebec he has made three voyages to Europe, which lasted respectively, the first, eight months; the second, three months; the third, three months, as appears by the following documents:—

1. "The Morning Chronicle, August 30, 1875:—"Passengers per SS. Sarmatian for Liverpool, from Quebec, 28th August, 1875:.....Hon. Justice Routhier, Mrs. Routhier....."

"The Morning Chronicle, April 11, 1876:—

"Passengers per SS. Sarmatian, Aird, from Liverpool, at Portland, April 10:.....Hon. Judge Routhier, Mrs. Routhier and infant....."

2. "The Morning Chronicle, June 20, 1882:—

"Cabin passengers per Allan Royal Mail SS. Parisian, Jas. Wylie, commander, from Quebec to Liverpool, June 10, 1882.....Judge Routhier, Miss Routhier....."

"The Morning Chronicle, September 11, 1882:

"Passengers per SS. Sardinian, Capt. Dutton, from Liverpool, Quebec, September 10, 1882..... Hon. Mr. Justice Routhier....."

3. "The Morning Chronicle. November 17, 1883:

"Cabin passengers per Allan Royal Mail SS. Parisian, James Wylie, commander, from Quebec to Liverpool, 17 November, 1883:.....Hon. Judge Routhier....."

"Le Courrier du Canada. 14 May, 1884:—

"His Honour Judge Routhier and Miss Routhier arrived at Quebec yesterday by steamer Parisian. Miss Routhier has spent nearly two years in Paris where she finished her education, and during the last months, accompanied by her father, she has visited France, Spain, Algeria and Italy."

2. Is the government aware that Judge Routhier has himself published an account of these three voyages in three volumes, entitled: A Travers l'Europe (Through Europe)," first volume, written after his first voyage; "A Travers l'Europe (Through Europe)," second volume, published after his second voyage; A Travers l'Espagne et Voyage dans le Nord de l'Afrique (Through Spain and a Journey in the North of Africa)," published after his third voyage, the whole proving in an irrefutable manner the absence of the honourable judge from the country during three different periods; the first time from the month of August to the month of April, the second time from the month of June to the month of September, the third time, from the month of November to the month of May?

3. Is the government equally aware that in 1889, in 1892 and 1896, Judge Routhier made three journeys to Manitoba and British Columbia, which lasted respectively: the first, five weeks; the second, three months; the third, three months as appears by the following documents:—

1. "The Courrier du Canada, 9th September, 1889:—

"The Honourable Judge Routhier left on Saturday (7 September) for British Columbia with Miss Routhier."

Le Courier du Canada, 10th October, 1889:—

"Judge Routhier has returned from a journey to British Columbia."

2. Le Courier du Canada, 16th May, 1892:—

"Episcopal excursion..... The excursion will comprise twenty-four bishops and ecclesiastical dignitaries..... Departure from Montreal Monday, 16th May..... On the 4th and 5th June the visitors will be at New Westminster and Vancouver..... On the 6th and 7th June they will visit Victoria, after which they will return to Canada (Montreal). The Honourable Judge Routhier will take part in the excursion and will give an account of the episodes of this interesting journey....."

"As for me," says Judge Routhier, at page 328 of his account of the journey (from Montreal to Vancouver), 'I did not return till two months afterwards.'"

3. The Herald of the 3rd August, 1892, published the following despatch:

(Translation from the French.)

"Winnipeg, 3rd August. Judge Routhier of the Superior Court of Quebec who is now in the west is, according to rumour, the commissioner sent by Prime Minister Laurier to make a report to him on the possibility of effecting a settlement of the schools question."

And La Patrie added:

"In fact, according to our information, Judge Routhier is the delegate of Mr. Laurier in the west and we believe we know that he has had interviews with a good number of priests and laymen of different parties in Manitoba on the subject of the school difficulties."

The Mail and Empire, 5th August, 1896, reproduced the following despatch from Winnipeg:

(Translation from the French.)

"A despatch received from the east to-day, confirming the rumour recently put in circulation about the settlement of the schools question, has caused much excitement here. The despatch says that the commissioner sent by Mr. Laurier is now in this province. Who is this commissioner? Where is the mystery? The name of Judge Routhier of the Superior Court of Quebec is mentioned, but friends do not believe that his presence in the province has any political signification. His Honour came to Winnipeg to see his daughter, Mrs. Sutton.....He is now at Pincher Creek, near his son."

Le Manitoba of the 19th August published the following item:

"His Honour Judge Routhier, who left (Winnipeg) some ten days ago with Miss Routhier to go to his son's at Pincher Creek, N.W.T., is to return to Winnipeg at the end of the week."

Le Manitoba of the 2nd September said:

"The Honourable Judge Routhier came back last week from Pincher Creek where he went to visit his son. He will be at his daughter's, Mrs. Sutton, until the 15th instant (September)."

L'Evénement of the 19th September said:

"With much courtesy the Judge (Routhier) said that he regretted not to be able to grant us an interview, seeing that he is completely a stranger to politics. He has been at Winnipeg at his daughter's, Mrs. Sutton, where he passed six weeks. He also went to Pincher Creek to his son's, where he remained four weeks. That was his journey."

4. Can a judge be absent so long and so frequently without asking permission, and is it not a matter of fact that Judge Routhier has never obtained leave of absence?

5. Is the government informed, by rumour or otherwise, that Judge Routhier is soon about to undertake a new voyage to Europe, and is it the intention of the government to entrust to him any mission whatever? If so, what mission and to whom?

Hon. Sir OLIVER MOWAT—On the 30th April the hon. member inquired how many times Judge Routhier had been granted leave of absence since his appointment to the Superior Court for the province of Quebec. Judge Routhier was appointed to the Superior Court of the province of Quebec for the district of Quebec, in December, 1889. He had been previously appointed a Judge of the Superior Court of the province of Quebec for the district of Chicoutimi. In my answer to the hon. member on that occasion I mentioned the second appointment (which was for the district of Quebec) as having been in December, 1889, and I mentioned the first appointment as having been for Chicoutimi at an earlier date; and I stated that since 1889 the judge had not once been granted leave of absence. The answers I gave on that occasion were the answers furnished to me by the proper officers, as I had no personal knowledge concerning the subject; and those answers were correct. The present questions of the hon. member go back to Judge Routhier's first appointment, and I am now to give my answers to them. So far as they relate to leave of absence during the period antecedent to the 13th July, 1896, I can only answer by the like means as I gave the answers on the former occasion.

To the first question now asked I have to say: That I am not aware, and so far as I know my colleagues of the present government are not aware, except from the statements made in the notice of the hon. member, that since Judge Routhier was appointed a judge of the Superior Court of the province of Quebec he had made three voyages to Europe, lasting for the periods alleged.

To the second question I have to say: That I am not aware, and so far as I know my colleagues of the present government are not aware, except from the statements made in the notice of the hon. member, that Judge Routhier had published an account of these three voyages.

To the third question I have to say: That I am not aware, and so far as I know my colleagues of the present government are not aware, except from the statements made in the notice of the hon. member, that in the years 1889 and 1892 Judge Routhier made two journeys to Manitoba and British Columbia, lasting respectively as alleged by the hon. member. As respects the year 1896 I became aware casually, as did I believe other of my colleagues, that the judge visited Manitoba in that year, but not that the visit had lasted three months, as the hon. member states, or what time. The legal vacation in Quebec lasts from the 1st July to 1st September. The courts, I am informed, do not sit during this period, nor until 16th September. It appears from the statement in the hon. member's notice that it was during this period that the judge's visit in 1896 to Manitoba and British Columbia took place.

To the fourth question I have to say: A judge may not, without asking permission, absent himself from his duties for such long and frequent periods as mentioned in the question. Further, it is not a "matter of fact" that Judge Routhier never obtained leave of absence. On the contrary, I find from the records that previous to 1889 he thrice obtained leave of absence by Orders in Council in 1875 and 1876,—1st, for five months, by Order in Council, dated 20th May, 1875; 2nd, for six months, by Order in Council, dated 8th September, 1875; and 3rd, for three months, by Order in Council, dated 7th September, 1876; these Orders covering the period of the absence during these years alleged by the hon. member. It is further of record that the judge obtained leave of absence for three months by Order in Council, dated 1st of June, 1882; for five months, by Order in Council, dated 15th October, 1883; and for six months, by Order in Council, dated 15th October, 1887. I do not find any other leave of absence by Order in Council than those I have stated. Whether any further leave was granted by the Minister of Justice I am not aware. By an Order in Council, dated 29th September, 1882, the Minister of Justice is authorized to grant to judges without an Order in Council, leave of absence for any period not exceeding one month in any year.

With regard to the judge's visit to Manitoba in 1896, I have further to say that the judge was not "a commissioner sent by the Prime Minister, Honourable Mr. Laurier, to make a report to him on the possibility of effecting a settlement of the schools question;" and that he was not a "delegate of Mr. Laurier in the west," on the subject of the school difficulty or on any other subject, notwithstanding what is stated on these points in some of the newspaper extracts which the hon. member has mentioned in his notice.

To the fifth question I have to say: That I have not been informed by rumour or otherwise that Judge Routhier is soon to undertake a new voyage to Europe, and I am not aware that any such information has reached my colleagues by rumour or otherwise. It is not the intention of the government to entrust to Judge Routhier any mission to any one.

RESIGNATION OF THE POSTMASTER OF ANNAPOLIS.

MOTION.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL moved:

That an humble Address be presented to His Excellency the Governor General praying that His Excellency will cause to be laid before the Senate, a copy of the opinion given to the Honourable the Postmaster General by the Honourable Sir Oliver Mowat, Minister of Justice, in which he decided that the conditions under which Mr. Arthur W. Corbett, postmaster of Annapolis, Nova Scotia, resigned and the appointment of Mr. Henry A. West to said office, came within the meaning of the provisions of the Criminal Code and therefore an indictable offence.

He said:—I reiterate what I stated a few moments ago when asking a question in reference to the conduct of Mr. Petit, and I think it desirable that if the Minister of Justice has given the opinion indicated by the Postmaster General, that it is of sufficient importance to be laid before the country, that the country should know exactly the reasons and arguments which led him to the conclusion to which he came in reference to this case of Mr. Corbett. It is important that every postmaster in the country, whether he be a temporary employé, or whether he be appointed by Order in Council, should know the position he occupies and the extent to which the Criminal Code applies to parties desirous of obtaining a successor to the office which he holds. The Postmaster General, in referring to this question the other day when the papers were moved for in connection with this dismissal stated in making his explanation:

Now my hon. friend refers to the Criminal Code. I did not proceed upon my own opinion. I did not proceed upon my own construction of the law. The Criminal Code that refers to such cases is as follows: "Every one is guilty of an indictable offence who directly or indirectly sells or agrees to sell, any appointment to or any resignation of any office."

Then the Postmaster General commented upon this clause of the Act as follows:

Now, leaving out that part of the section which does not apply, the clause reads:

Every one is guilty of an indictable offence who directly or indirectly sells a resignation or an office.

The selling of the office is giving the office to another man for a consideration, a valuable consideration.

Mr. POWELL—That is a new version of the law.

The Postmaster General continuing added:

It may be a new version of the law, but one of the highest legal authorities in this country at all events has expressed his opinion that this transaction was contrary to the spirit of that section.

Mr. POWELL—Who is he?

The POSTMASTER GENERAL—Sir Oliver Mowat. I did not take action myself on my own responsibility, nevertheless I would not have hesitated to do so. I submit that the transaction, quite apart from the circumstance, was one that should not have been allowed to stand. It was not a resignation in the ordinary course.

The interpretation put upon this clause of the Criminal Code is to my mind a very strained one, and for that reason I should like the opinion of the Minister of Justice as given to the Postmaster General, which guided him in the dismissal of Mr. West from office. The quotation from the Criminal Code, as read by the Postmaster General, and the facts in the case, to my mind, and I think to any ordinary reader, would lead to the conclusion that there was no valid consideration, as contemplated by this law, which would deprive Mr. Corbett or Mr. West, his successor, of the office which he held. The section reads:

Every one is guilty of an indictable offence who directly or indirectly sells or agrees to sell any appointment or resignation of any office.

Supposing Mr. Corbett, as has been suggested, did say to Mr. Mills, the member for Annapolis, that his resignation would be sent in if his son-in-law would be appointed—because a good deal appears to have been made not only by the Postmaster General, but by the Minister of Justice here, that that made it a much more heinous offence, because Mr. West happened to be the son-in-law of Mr. Corbett—are we to understand, that the provisions of the Criminal Code are so strict, that a gentleman holding an office which is paid by commission and not by appointment by the Governor by Order in Council, but simply by the Postmaster General himself, could not say in his old age, "If a certain other person is appointed, my resignation is at your disposal?" Is there any valid consideration in such a proposition? Did it come within the meaning of the law where it says that "Every one is guilty of an indictable offence who directly or indirectly sells or agrees to sell any appointment or resignation of any office?" If the mere suggestion of that kind is an indictable offence, it is well that every official should know it, and that we should know how far that is to be enforced in the future. Would it be an indictable offence if the Hon. Mr. Laurier should say to the Hon. Sir Oliver Mowat, "If you will assist me in this election, you shall have one of the first positions in my cabinet if we succeed?" Is it an indictable offence if Mr. Blair, the Minister of Railways and Canals, says to Mr. King, "If you will resign your position in the House of Commons in order to give me a seat so that I may retain my office, which is a valuable consideration, you shall have a seat in the Senate?" And is that to apply to my hon. friend Mr. MacKeen, who resigned his seat in the House of Commons in order to give Sir Charles Tupper a seat there, to enable him to retain the position which he had accepted under the late administration? If that is to be the interpretation of the law, let the world know it, so that a premier may not in the future place himself in the position of having to go into the dock to answer for a criminal offence, in making a bargain with a political friend that if he will give him his services he shall have the valuable consideration to which I have alluded. I do not desire to pursue this discussion to any unnecessary length, but I do think it is of sufficient importance that we should know precisely the position in which we are placed. Is it a criminal offence for a father, as he very often does, to deed a property to his son in consideration of his love and affection for that child? There is no valuable consideration received other than that which a parent would owe to his child. In this case it appears Mr. West was the son-in-law of Mr. Corbett, and Mr. Corbett said "I hold this temporary office in Annapolis, and I will resign if my son-in-law gets it." Is there anything very criminal in that? And if that be a criminal offence, I think it will take all the dexterity of my hon. friend the Minister of Justice to defend the position he has taken here, while he exonerates in an indirect way, as he has done to day, the act of a man who writes to another and claims a consideration for getting him a temporary contract for the supply of a few tons of coal. It is true my hon. friend says the thing was so paltry in its character that no one would believe that Petit would ask for a consideration for it; and more than that, Mr. Petit denied it, and, therefore, having denied it, it is sufficient for my hon. friend to accept the denial because of its, what he terms, absurdity. I admit the legal position he takes in reference to the duty of the Attorney General of Quebec in cases of that kind. I say that it was a violation of the Criminal Code placed on the Statute-book for the very purpose of preventing such transactions. I think the country will hold him responsible and say that he should have taken the same course that Sir John Thompson took in order to punish those who had committed wrongs against the laws of the country. The hon. member says that the Ministers of Quebec are my friends. They are, personally, I believe, most of them my friends so far as I know, and, I trust, politically as well, but the fact that they were my friends is no justification for the failure of the Minister of Justice to do his duty; it is simply a little side wind to tickle the ears of those who read it, to say "Another ought to have done it." I admit my friends have left undone many things they ought to have done, and in this case I quite agree with the hon. gentleman that they should have punished him, but I say further than that, that as it was a matter affecting this government, they should have taken means to prosecute the man who had violated the law, and if they were not prepared to do that, I think it is going a very long way to punish a man who has been appointed to an office simply because his father-in-law asked that he should be appointed. There was not a scintilla of proof that there was the slightest consideration, directly or indirectly. On the contrary, West has made a solemn declaration, which we find in the official reports of the House of Commons, as read there the other day, that there was no consideration, that there was no understanding with Mr. Corbett, either directly or indirectly, that he was to give him anything or that he resigned on those conditions. More than that, Corbett makes a similar declaration; and Mr. Mills, the member for Annapolis, states distinctly and positively that no understanding existed between him and West or Corbett in reference to this matter as to any consideration, directly or indirectly. It is said that because Mr. West happens to be a Liberal, therefore, it is an evidence that they are administering the law as it exists on the statute-books irrespective of politics. It is true that Mr. West states in his own affidavit that he has been a Liberal all his life; that his father always supported the Liberal candidate. But Mr. West was obnoxious to the gentleman who was elected to the local legislature, the Attorney General of Nova Scotia, Mr. Longley; and he demanded the dismissals, and the fact of his demanding the dismissals was quite sufficient for the Postmaster General to seek the opinion of the Minister of Justice, and the Minister of Justice gave an opinion such as I have indicated, and such as has been stated by the Postmaster General, which Mr. Mulock contends justify the dismissal of this man from office. Now, let us know what the law is, as interpreted by the Minister of Justice. Let it be published to the world and we will understand in the future that no man will dare to say "if you give this position to another man I will resign;" for if he does, he comes within the meaning of the provision of the Criminal Code and is subject to indictment. I hope the Minister of Justice will comply with this request which I have made in this motion, and that he will not tell us that he gave no written opinion, but that it was a mere verbal one. Perhaps I might say to him, as an hon. gentleman belonging to his party said in the House of Commons on one occasion when he moved for returns, and received the answer that there were no official documents, that only an oral correspondence took place—"well, bring down that as well"; or if he has not given a written opinion to the Postmaster General, that he will write one in order that we may have an authority upon which to act in the future.

Hon. Sir OLIVER MOWAT—My hon. friend stated his version of the case which led to the inquiry in the other chamber. The actual case in substance is that Postmaster Corbett resigned his office in consideration of his son-in-law being appointed to it, and the Postmaster General stated that he and his colleagues were of the opinion that that came within the spirit of the Criminal Code. My hon. friend asks whether such a case is stronger than that of the Minister of Railways for whom he says a gentleman resigned his seat in the House of Commons upon the consideration of getting a seat here. My hon. friend assumes that that was the bargain there. So far as I am aware there was no such bargain. The member recognized the importance of the minister getting a seat in the House of Commons and resigned in order to give him the seat. Of course it is a common practice and a necessary practice—a common practice always under our system of government.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I did not say it existed; I merely put the question as a suppositious case.

Hon. Sir OLIVER MOWAT—I do not think a bargain of that kind ought to be made. I do not think the Minister of Railways or the other Minister referred to ought to make a bargain that they will give a seat in the Senate, or any other consideration, for a member of the House of Commons resigning. But nothing of the kind took place. This motion asks for a copy of my opinion. That is the material part of the motion, and my answer to it is this: There was no written opinion on the subject; and no opinion written or unwritten as to the case referred to coming within the legal or technical meaning of the provisions of the Criminal Code, and, therefore an indictable offence. When afterwards informed of the case it seemed to me, in common with my colleagues, as being within the spirit as distinguished from the legal effect of the code, but there was no written opinion either way. My hon. friend seemed to think that if an answer or opinion of that sort was given even orally, still it ought to be brought down; but I do not know how to bring down an opinion that is not in writing. Perhaps my hon. friend can explain how it can be done.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Write it, and then you can bring it down.

Hon. Sir OLIVER MOWAT—That is another matter.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—You asked me how to do it and I have told you.

Hon. Sir OLIVER MOWAT—That is not bringing down a copy of an opinion given. My hon. friend desires that I should write one now. The motion of my hon. friend is a motion which cannot be granted, because there is no such document as the motion asks for a copy of.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—Might I say to the Minister of Justice, as he is bringing down some amendments to the Criminal Code, would it not be an opportune time for him to crystallize into law that which he deems to be a contravention of the spirit of the law, and that which the Act is infirm in covering? If my hon. friend is sincere in the opinion he expresses—and I cannot doubt his sincerity, although I doubt the soundness of his law on the subject—he can demonstrate that more effectually than in any other way by embodying it in this bill which has been introduced to-day in lieu of the one which was withdrawn; but I venture to say in this regard that if my hon. friend would embody that in the statutes he will not find either branch of parliament prepared to endorse the desirability of passing a law providing that such a matter as that which has been discussed should be an offence against the criminal law.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—My hon. friend says there was no written opinion given on this question; and as he declines to give a written opinion, desiring I suppose in the future that he should not be held by it, there is no necessity to press the motion. The hon. gentleman says there were no promises made. I may call the attention of the hon. gentleman to a letter I read some little time ago in which the hon. gentleman stated that he was coming to the Senate. I would not like to insinuate that that was the reason which induced him to assist in the last election the party with which he is now connected, and the government of which he is a member, to obtain power in this country. But there evidently was some sort of correspondence, and there must have been some kind of promise that if they succeeded in winning the elections the hon. gentleman was to be offered a seat here; because he promised in that letter that he was going to reform us and do some other good things which I look forward to at some not distant day, and I hope the reformation will take place on his side of the House at a very early period, so that we may understand in future that when these gentlemen make promises they intend to carry then out, and that they will have some little regard to their own status and position. I would not say for a moment that the hon. gentleman received any consideration for coming here, but I well remember reading a letter from a prominent politician now occupying a prominent place in the cabinet, stating that he would take a prominent part not only in this chamber, but in the government of the country. I compliment the hon. gentleman on his lack of memory in respect to promises.

Hon. Sir OLIVER MOWAT—My hon. friend talks about my reforming the Senate. I do desire to reform the Senate. I think we have done something of that kind, as all hon. gentlemen admit that since my appointment here valuable additions have been made to the Senate, and as long as I maintain my present position, I hope to make other valuable additions to the Senate, but any legal reform in it can only be accomplished with the consent of my hon. friend and those around him. So far I have found them very reasonable, and if I see occasion to bring in a measure of that kind, I shall look with confidence to the support of my hon. friend.

Hon. Mr. McCALLUM—I do not see how this postmaster could be brought under the operation of the Criminal Code. He might have had a hundred reasons for asking that this man should be appointed before he resigned. He might have had the welfare of the public at heart, and might think he was a proper person to fill the office. It has never been proven that he received any consideration. My hon. friend the Minister of Justice, when he comes here, says he is to reform the Senate. I think the Senate will reform him and he needs to be reformed a good deal. I hope we will do it kindly and deal gingerly with him. We have known him a long while, he is pretty fair, on the average, but we are not willing that he should have his own way altogether.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—I think the view taken by the hon. leader of the House with regard to the dismissal of Mr. West, the postmaster at Annapolis, is rather remarkable. My hon. friend has not gone so far as to say that Mr. Corbett had come within the provisions of the Criminal Code in having resigned conditionally, but he says he came within the spirit of it. He does not say, and no person has insinuated, that Mr. West did anything wrong at all. It does not appear that Mr. West knew anything at all about the condition. If it was a very bad thing on the part of Mr. Corbett to make this condition, it does not appear that Mr. West knew anything about it, yet Mr. West has been dismissed from office on account of this condition which Mr. Corbett is alleged to have made, or somebody made for Corbett when he tendered his resignation. Now it amounts to this, that my hon. friend's law, and the rule that he lays down, comes very near touching upon the course taken by my hon. friend himself in announcing, as he did a little more than a year ago, that in the event of certain things happening he intended to resign his office as premier of the province of Ontario and take a seat in this Senate and a portfolio in the new government to be formed by the Hon. Mr. Laurier. It does not appear to me that my hon. friend's arrangement at that time differed very much from what Mr. Corbett did, Corbett it is alleged announced that he would resign on condition of a certain thing happening, which did not appear to be very much in his own interest. My hon. friend said he would resign if a certain thing happened, which certainly was not inimical to his own interest at any rate. But the point I am urging is that the party according to the Minister of Justice to be punished is the one who accepted the position; therefore the Hon. Mr. Hardy should be turned out of office in consequence of his coming into office because of a bargain about offices made between Mr. Laurier and Sir Oliver Mowat just as Mr. West was dismissed because he came in in consequence of the conditional resignation of Mr. Corbett. If the Minister of Justice's law is true in the one case, I think it should be held good all round, and therefore my hon. friend must have done something which, if it did not exactly come within the letter, at all events trenched on the spirit of the criminal law, and the Hon. Mr. Hardy should be punished because my hon. friend the leader of the House did what was wrong.

OFFENSIVE PARTIZANSHIP.

DELAYED RETURNS.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Before the Orders of the Day are called I should like to ask the Minister of Justice when I may expect the returns I moved for a month ago in reference to the commissions issued and the reports made in connection with the investigation of offensive partisanship, and also the return moved for by my hon. friend from Brandon the same day or the day afterwards.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—As I explained the other day to the hon. gentleman, a circular was sent by the Secretary of State to the various departments asking them to prepare the return. The return has been received from some, but not from all of the departments to which the circular was sent. Hon. gentlemen will remember that when I was on the other side of this chamber and returns were moved for, they came down sometimes during that session, and more frequently during the next session, and very often had to be asked for week after week. In fact, returns have been brought down by the present administration which were moved for two years ago. There was a return relating to an official in the city of Winnipeg, and that return was made after the change of government, and brought down by the present administration. I mention that as an illustration to show that when those returns were moved for they were not brought down promptly by my hon. friends opposite.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—The act of the present government is justified by the action of the late government—is that it?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—No.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Then why mention it?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—It is just to show there were similar delays before.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—There may have been good reasons for that, but you have had now nearly a month to make the return. The commissions are so numerous and the reports so voluminous that it has taken six weeks to bring down a return of the commissions issued since the hon. gentlemen have been in office?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I might bring it down as far as it is complete, if the hon. gentleman desires.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—No, I want it all.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I understand half a dozen departments have made returns.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I want to know the extent of the commissions, and I want also to have added to the return the commissions and investigations since that return was moved for.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Some investigations are going on now.

GRAND TRUNK RAILWAY COMPANY'S BILL.

THIRD READING POSTPONED.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL moved the third reading of Bill (26) "An Act respecting the Grand Trunk Railway Company of Canada."

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—I gave notice the other day that I would move:

When the Order of the Day is called for the third reading of Bill (26) "An Act respecting the Grand Trunk Railway Company of Canada," the following amendments:—

Page 1, line 18.—After "state," insert the following words: "and to meet the interest upon its securities at six per cent."

Page 2, line 24.—After "sterling" insert "and provided that this debenture stock shall not be used for the purpose of maintaining the rate of interest at six per cent upon any of the securities of the Chicago and Grand Trunk which were taken up by the issue of consolidated debenture stock in 1887."

After I had given that notice, I realized that it would be more regular to follow the proper practice and refer it back to the Railway Committee and, therefore, I put upon the notice paper the following notice:

That when the Order of the Day is called for the third reading Bill (26), An Act respecting the Grand Trunk Railway Company of Canada, he will move that the said bill be not now read the third time, but that it be referred back to the Standing Committee on Railways, Telegraphs and Harbours with instructions to so amend the bill that the deficiency in the revenue of the Chicago and Grand Trunk Railway shall not be paid by adding to the capital account of the Canadian company, the interest upon which has to be borne by Canadian traffic.

This is a very important question that I am proposing to deal with, and I hope that the hon. members will give me the attention that the importance of it justifies.

Hon. Mr. POWER—It is almost six o'clock and the hon. gentleman has indicated that he is prepared to make a long speech on the subject, and I think it is a matter for the hon. leader of the House to say whether he shall call it six o'clock or declare all the orders adjourned.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—The remainder of the orders are second readings of private bills, and it would be better to allow that bill to stand till to-morrow, and go through the unopposed orders.

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—Then I move the adjournment of the debate.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—If the Minister of Justice desires to be present at this discussion I would not object to the postponement of the motion until to-morrow, but it seems to me that it is one of those simple questions that has been discussed not only in the other House but also in the committee, that I would prefer going on with this bill and getting rid of it. If it is the will of the Senate it should go to the committee to make the changes, the sooner it is done the better. On the other hand, if we dispose of the matter to-night, as I think we can do in a very short time, it would relieve the officials of the Grand Trunk Railway Company, from remaining in the city to look after what they consider to be their interests.

Hon. Sir OLIVER MOWAT—I think on the whole it had better stand till to-morrow.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I think if this matter, which is an urgent and important one, is to be postponed, it should be with the distinct understanding that it should be dealt with first thing to-morrow.

The third reading was postponed.

ONTARIO PACIFIC RAILWAY COMPANY'S BILL.

Hon. Mr. McMILLAN moved the second reading of Bill (28) "An Act respecting the Ontario Pacific Railway Company and to change the name of the company to the Ottawa and New York Railway Company."

The motion was agreed to.

Hon. Mr. McMILLAN moved that the bill be referred to the Committee on Railways, Telegraphs and Harbours to-morrow. He said:—It is important that this bill should be proceeded with, because the financial operations are just about ready awaiting the passage of the bill.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I must object to the suspension of the rule. I am a member of that committee, and also of another committee, and I would be unable to attend the meeting to-morrow morning.

The motion was dropped.

PROHIBITORY LEGISLATION.

INQUIRY.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I would like to ask the Secretary of State when we may expect the bill promised in the speech from the throne in reference to the subject of prohibition, in which the promise is made that a measure enabling the electors to vote on the question will be submitted for our approval. I have understood that that was to be introduced in this House; if so, and as it is a bill of great importance, I would like to ask the hon. gentleman at what period of the session we may expect to see it?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I am quite unable to say at present. I will have to consult my colleagues.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Will you endeavour to give us an answer to-morrow?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Yes.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—It is a matter of vital importance.

The Senate adjourned.

THE SENATE.

Ottawa, Friday, 14th May, 1897.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

Prayers and routine proceedings.

A QUESTION OF ORDER.

The SPEAKER—Hon. gentlemen, before proceeding with the business of the day, I beg to bring before the House the answer I have to give. Yesterday the hon. senior member for Halifax raised a question of order in the discussion of an inquiry made by the hon. gentleman from Hastings, and the Senate having been kind enough to allow me time to consult the authorities handed to me by the hon. member from Montarville, I am now ready to give my decision. If I am not mistaken the point of order raised was: that it was irregular and out of order for hon. gentlemen to speak and prolong a debate on a mere inquiry made by an hon. member, after a minister of the Crown had answered to that inquiry: and that it was particularly irregular to introduce in that discussion extraneous or new matter of which there had been no notice given. I do not believe that it may be pretended for one moment that any hon. gentleman making an inquiry or asking a question should be limited to the mere reading of the question or inquiry. I see nothing that would prevent that hon. member from adding remarks which he would think proper to make his inquiry more intelligible to the House and to the minister of the crown who is called to answer him, provided always that no new statement, no new inquiry be made, of which there was no notice given, this seems to be quite obvious. And I quite agree with the hon. member from York that it would be quite unfair to a minister of the crown to be obliged to give an answer to any question of which he had no notice. I think that notice being required for an answer on the part of the hon. minister of the crown, it shows evidently that this notice is given for the purpose of enabling him to get information, to make a proper answer to the House; so I do not believe there can be any difficulty on that point. I quite agree with what has been said that the rule of the House should be accordingly amended so as to provide that no new matters and no new statements should be introduced beyond those of which notice has been given. There is no doubt that great latitude has been allowed in this House. It is also admitted that, when there is no particular rule to guide us in the Senate, we are to follow the rules and practice of the House of Lords. May in his last edition (the 10th), page 206, says:

> In the Lords debate is permitted in putting questions, and in commenting upon them, without any question being before the House. In 1867 the Lords' committee on public business, while recognizing and approving this practice, recommended that notice of questions should be given in the minutes, except in cases of urgency. In consequence, it was resolved, by standing order No. 21, that when "it is intended to make a statement, or raise a discussion on asking a question, notice of question should," in that case, "be given in the orders of the day and notices." And under these conditions important debates are frequently raised.

Not only in May, but if we look at Bourinot, second edition, page 381, Bourinot says:

> The procedure in the Senate on such occasions is quite different from that of the Commons. Much more latitude is allowed in the upper House, and a debate often takes place on a mere question or inquiry, of which, however, notice must always be given when it is of a special character. Many attempts have been made to prevent debate on such questions, but the Senate have never practically given up the usage of permitting speeches on these occasions—a usage which is essentially the same as in the Lords' House. The observations made on such occasions, however, should be confined to the persons making and answering the inquiry, and if others are allowed to offer remarks these should be rather in the way of explanations or with the view of eliciting further information on a question of public interest.

In view of the latitude allowed by the House of Lords, whose practice we follow when there is no particular rule of the Senate against it, and the latitude allowed in this House we have only against that latitude our own rule. The hon. gentleman from Calgary cited an article which is not a rule of the House, but if it had been a rule of the House it would have made it very clear. I refer to article 55, not of the rules but of the forms and procedure of the Senate. This article or rule says:

> When a question is asked by a senator, the senator putting the question and the senator answering ought to make only such observations as they may deem indispensable to be understood, and no debate is allowed except by leave of the Senate. In the House of Lords, and particularly in the Senate, this rule is generally disregarded, and lengthy debates often follow. If the senator questioning or answering, is allowed by the Senate tacitly or otherwise to offer an opinion, argument or inference, other senators may claim the same privilege.

As I said this is not a rule which has been adopted by the House; it is only an article in the forms of procedure. It has been the practice in the House of Lords for a member to give notice, that he will call the attention to a certain subject, and then ask a question of the government. That practice has been introduced in our House since 1877. It has been allowed since, though sometimes objected to. On an inquiry, on one occasion, a member has not been allowed reply. In 1888, the Hon. Mr. Miller, formerly Speaker, expressed himself strongly as to permitting debate on a mere inquiry. It is evident that the Senate has never since laid down any distinct rule to limit debate. As it has been allowed by my predecessors in the chair, to allow the practice of the House of Lords to be introduced in this House, I would not undertake to overrule what they have allowed. Though it will be perhaps better to adhere to the 20th rule of our House which says:

> A senator may speak to any question before the Senate, or upon a question or an amendment to be proposed by himself; or upon a question of order arising out of a debate, but not otherwise, without consent of a majority of the Senate, which shall be determined without debate.

I do not think that a mere inquiry should be considered a question before the Senate so as to permit prolonged discussion. At least, as Bourinot says, the observations made on such occasions should be confined to the persons making and answering the inquiry, except in the way of explanation or with the view of eliciting further information on a question of public interest. So, in accordance with the 20th rule, any other gentleman could speak on the question or inquiry only with the consent of a majority of the Senate. But as I already said as the practice has been allowed by the Senate, it would be unbecoming on my part to overrule the decision or the tolerance of the Senate when I see no distinct rule laid down to limit the debate. Nevertheless, I would suggest that, when a member puts a question, he may give his reasons for it and the minister of the Crown answers it with all the explanations he may think proper to make his answer intelligible. And any remark or suggestion arising out of that answer can be replied to by the member who puts the question. Any other member, if tacitly allowed or with the consent of a majority of the House to speak on the matter, should confine his remarks strictly within the question before the House and introduce no extraneous or new matter. That is my humble judgment of the matter, and I am subject to be overruled by the Senate.

DELAYED RETURNS.

Hon. Mr. KIRCHHOFFER—With the permission of the House I would like to ask the Minister of Justice, whom I congratulate on his improved health and rejoice to see in his place to-day, when we may expect to get the returns which I moved for five or six weeks ago with reference to the dismissal of employés from the civil service, and which I understand have not yet been brought down.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—The returns which have been forwarded to the office have been brought down. I directed the deputy minister to-day to send a circular to all the departments which failed to furnish the details and to give me a memorandum of the cause of the delay.

THE PLEBISCITE BILL.

INQUIRY.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I should like to repeat the inquiry I made on the adjournment last night, as to the intention of the government with reference to the Plebiscite Bill. I think it has been understood that the bill was to be laid before the Senate and considered first by the Senate and that it was being drafted by the Hon. Minister of Justice. Could the hon. gentleman inform the House when we are likely to have it, in order that we may have something to do. It is a very important measure, attracting some little attention in the country.

Hon. Sir OLIVER MOWAT—It is now in the hands of the law clerk. I expect to get his draft of it to-morrow, and I may say that it will be brought down as soon as it is ready.

GRAND TRUNK RAILWAY COMPANY'S BILL.

THIRD READING.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL moved the third reading of Bill (26) "An Act respecting the Grand Trunk Railway Company of Canada."

Hon. Mr. BOULTON moved:

That the said bill be not now read the third time, but that it be referred back to the Standing Committee on Railways, Telegraphs and Harbours with instructions to so amend the bill that the deficiency in the revenue of the Chicago and Grand Trunk Railway shall not be paid by adding to the capital account of the Canadian Company, the interest upon which has to be borne by Canadian traffic.

He said:—When this bill was introduced I gave notice of my desire to move this amendment. There is a principle contained in this bill that I thought was desirable should be brought to the notice of this House, and I hope to convince hon. gentlemen before I finish that I acted wisely in bringing it to the notice of the Senate. This hon. House is constituted specially for the purpose of supervising legislation which may have been hastily passed in the lower House of legislation, the purport of which may have been overlooked and which is not desirable to place on the statute-book. The bill that is now sought to be passed is for the purpose of providing for the deficiency in the revenue of the Chicago and Grand Trunk Railway. It is interest to provide for that deficiency by creating capital stock of the Grand Trunk Railway of Canada in order to make up that deficiency. I will be able to show you that the Chicago and Grand Trunk Railway is a railway of 335 miles, and the Grand Trunk Railway is altogether 3,506 miles long. The Chicago and Grand Trunk, which is 335 miles of that 3,506 miles, absorbs one-eighth of the net revenue of the Grand Trunk Railway. The Chicago and Grand Trunk Railway has not earned the interest that is claimed by it upon the securities that are in existence. The deficiency of £122,000 or something like $600,000, in the past year is now sought to be made up by the issue of capital stock which is to be chargeable to the Canadian section of the road. The Chicago and Grand Trunk Railway is not under the legislation of Canada, but under the legislation of the state of Michigan. It draws its authority from there, and is governed by the rules and regulations of that state. While it is under the general management of the Grand Trunk Railway it is to all intents and purposes a separate road and in that unlike the amalgamation of Canadian branch railways. What I contend and maintain is that the efforts to pay dividends not earned on the United States portion of the line, but to be paid by adding to the capital stock of the Canadian section of the line is unjust in principle and is especially unjust to the great province of Ontario which has to bear the burden of the rates of this charge. The Grand Trunk Railway is especially a Canadian road. It lies in Canada almost entirely, and Canada has to furnish the traffic for 3,200 miles that is on Canadian soil. Hon. gentlemen from the maritime provinces cannot enter to the same extent into the merits of this question as the people of Ontario, Manitoba and our western provinces can, because we have to pay rates on the railway mileage in order to transport our produce to the markets that consume it. The maritime provinces have the Intercolonial Railway and their own traffic is not burdened with any interest at all on the capital stock that created that road. The Grand Trunk Railway is burdened—I will not say burdened, because it is not necessary to consider it a burden—but in addition to the running expenses of transporting our produce there is interest on capital that is necessary to provide for the construction and operation of these lines, and the question of the amount of interest that should be paid, the burden of capital that should be borne by the people that supply the traffic, is a point of very great moment to the people of Canada. Hon. gentlemen in discussing this and similar questions very frequently take the ground that this is a purely domestic matter of the Grand Trunk Railway, or any other railway that may be under the consideration of Parliament, but it is a mistake to consider it in that light. We have to consider that there are two parties to this question, one party is that which supplies the earning power to the railways of the country, and the other party is the representatives of the capital that has gone into the construction of that road, who if unchecked may make greater demands than are justifiable. So far as those two questions are concerned, we are here more especially to guard the interests of the public in dealing with a question of this kind. The public have only their representatives in Parliament to regulate these matters and see that their interests are protected and preserved, and to see that they are not improperly oppressed by excessive demands on the part of capital in taxing their industry. So far as the domestic arrangements of the Grand Trunk Railway Company are concerned, having their revenue and the distribution of their revenue among the various securities is, I acknowledge, a matter of domestic concern. If those securities are so distributed that they operate injuriously to the credit of the country by means of interest on the capital that has been invested in the promotion of a great railway like this, it becomes of some moment to this hon. House, how far the distribution of those revenues had effected the interest of the country at large. In order to show how far the policy of this House, and the policy of parliament is, and I may say has been in the past, with regard to the Grand Trunk Railway—and I may say the policy of the Grand Trunk Railway Company itself—the effort on the part of the Grand Trunk Railway Company has been to moderate the rate of interest, to get all the securities that have been outstanding into one class of security called the consolidated debenture stock, which in the main has been restricted in its borrowing power to 4 per cent interest. Some portions of the consolidated debenture stock have been issued at as high as 5 per cent, but I wish to draw a distinction between the class of stock we are asked to authorize now and the issue contained in the consolidated debenture stock. The securities now sought for are fixed charges amounting to six per cent or five per cent according to the class of security, and the obligation is as long as those securities are out to pay that 6 per cent or 5 per cent, but the consolidated debenture stock says that the Grand Trunk Railway may borrow capital in order to acquire and consolidate its indebtedness at a rate of interest not to exceed 4 per cent. If it be in the interest of the shareholders of the company to have it 3 per cent, it may be that or it may be only 2 per cent for that matter—it is not to exceed 4 per cent, but 4 per cent is not the fixed rate. That has been, and is, the policy of the Canadian parliament, and it is desirable that all those security holders whose securities brought a greater rate of interest than 4 per cent should conform to the policy of the Grand Trunk Railway Company itself and the policy of this parliament at the instigation of the Grand Trunk Railway Company. Some hon. gentlemen will no doubt say, "What have we to do with that, we cannot force people to give up those securities, we cannot force a man to give up his 6 per cent security if he chooses to hold on to it?" I grant that, but when those parties come with the 6 per cent securities to this parliament and ask that the people of Canada bear the unearned interest which was beyond the powers of the people living on the Chicago portion of the line, to pay, we can say we will not allow the people to pay compound interest by increasing the issue of consolidated debenture stock to rank pari passu with other consolidated debenture stock for the purpose of paying that interest. If the road does not earn that interest, they must do without it so far as this parliament is concerned—we will not put on the shoulders of the people of Ontario the burden of paying the interest on the accumulated revenue which has not been made by the Chicago end of the line. As the burden is increased on the Canadian end of the railway the greater the burden on the people of Canada will be. The debentures that we sanctioned, we must stand by, and if the road fails to earn it the country suffers in credit or the people are oppressed to the extent that the rates have to be increased, in order to meet interest out of capital which is added to the already overburdened capital of the company. I have here a copy of the statutes mentioned in this bill. This bill draws attention to certain statutes—the Acts of 1884, 1887, 1888, 1890, 1892 and 1893. The first Act referred to is that of 1884. It says:

THE GRAND TRUNK RAILWAY ACT.

Assented to 19th April, 1884.

3. The company may, from time to time, in addition to the powers granted by the Parliament of Canada, under the Act 37th Victoria, chapter 66, borrow and raise for the purposes hereinafter specified at any rate of interest not exceeding five per cent per annum, such sum or sums, as the proprietors of the company entitled to vote, in general meeting assembled, may, from time to time, determine, by the creation and issue of a perpetual debenture stock to be called "Grand Trunk Consolidated Debenture Stock": Provided always, that the total interest payable upon the entire loan capital, including the existing charges and the debenture stock already issued, and for the time being outstanding, shall not, at any time, exceed the sum of seven hundred and fifty thousand pounds sterling per annum.

5. The consolidated debenture stock hereby authorized to be created, or the proceeds thereof, shall be applied by the company to the following purposes, that is to say:—

(a.) In redeeming and getting in the existing charges upon such terms and conditions of purchase or exchange as may, from time to time, be agreed upon between the company and the respective holders of the said charges, a sum not exceeding the sum of five millions five hundred thousand pounds sterling (5,500,000);

(b.) In the purchase or exchange of the existing perpetual five per cent debenture stock mentioned in the said schedule hereto numbered two, a sum not exceeding eight millions eight hundred and six thousand pounds sterling (8,806,000);

(c.) And the remainder of the said consolidated debenture stock by this Act authorized to be created and issued, and any sums remaining out of the sums mentioned in the preceding paragraphs (a and b) after the said existing charges and debenture stock mentioned therein have been purchased or exchanged for consolidated debenture stock, shall be applied to the putting down of a double track or second line of rails, first upon the portion of the line between Montreal and Toronto, and then upon such portions of the company's railways as the directors may, from time to time, determine, with all necessary works, machinery and appliances connected therewith, and also to the purchase of additional rolling stock and other general purposes of the company; and the company shall render to the government statements of the application of the proceeds of the additional debenture stock by this Act authorized.

We have further the Act of 1887, which deals with the securities of the Chicago and Grand Trunk Railway, assented to 23rd June, 1887:

3. In addition to the amounts which the company are authorized to borrow and raise under the Act thirty-seven Victoria, chapter sixty-five, forty-fifth Victoria, chapter sixty-six, and forty-seventh Victoria, chapter fifty-two, the company may borrow and raise for the purposes hereinafter specified, by the creation and issue of perpetual consolidated debenture stock, to be called "Grand Trunk Consolidated Debenture Stock," bearing interest at any rate not exceeding 5 per cent per annum, such sum or sums as the proprietors of the company entitled to vote in general or special general meeting assembled may, from time to time, determine: Provided always, that the total interest payable upon the securities and interest-bearing obligations in schedule A to this Act mentioned, outstanding from time to time, and the interest upon the consolidated debenture stock issued under this Act, shall not at any time exceed the sum of four hundred and eighteen thousand eight hundred and forty-five pounds sterling per annum.

4. The debenture stock hereby authorized to be issued, as and when created, and the interest thereon, shall rank on an equality with the four per cent consolidated debenture stock issued by the company, or to be issued, under the powers of the Act forty-seventh Victoria, chapter fifty-two, and shall, subject to the priorities of all existing charges, and to five per cent perpetual debenture stock mentioned in schedule number two to the last mentioned Act and the payment of working expenses as now defined, become a first charge upon and over the whole of the undertaking, railways, works, rolling stock, plant, property and effects of the company; but the holders of the said consolidated debenture stock of the company, whether issued prior or subsequent to the passing of this Act, under the powers conferred by this Act or former Acts, shall not, as amongst themselves, be entitled to any preference or priority.

5. The additional consolidated debenture stock hereby authorized to be created, or the proceeds thereof, shall be applied by the company to the following purposes, that is to say: In acquiring by exchange, purchase or otherwise, the securities and interest-bearing obligations mentioned in schedule A of this Act, upon such terms and conditions of purchase or exchange as may, from time to time, be agreed upon between the company and the respective holders of such securities and obligations, and to the general purposes of the company: Provided always, that the interest on such of the consolidated debenture stock as may, from time to time, be issued under this Act, and the interest payable on the securities and obligations mentioned in schedule A to this Act, outstanding for the time being, shall not at any time exceed the sum of four hundred and eighteen thousand eight hundred and forty-five pounds sterling.

6. The securities and interest-bearing obligations acquired or purchased by or in exchange for the consolidated debenture stock hereby authorized to be issued, or the proceeds thereof, shall be held as subsisting and continuing as a security pro tanto for the benefit of the holders of the Grand Trunk consolidated debenture stock; but unless and until any default shall be made in payment of any interest on such stock, the revenue derived from the said securities and interest-bearing obligations shall be considered as part of and included in the general revenues of the company.

7. The charges mentioned in schedule number one of "The Grand Trunk Railway Act, 1884," and the five per cent debenture stock mentioned in schedule number two of the said Act, which have been or may hereafter be purchased or otherwise acquired by the company as provided in the said Act, shall, until the whole of such charges and debenture stock has been so purchased or acquired, be treated as subsisting and continuing as a security pro tanto for the benefit of the holders of the consolidated debenture stock for the time being issued by the company, in the same way in all respects as if such charges and debenture stock had been duly transferred to and were held by trustees for the benefit of the holders of the said consolidated debenture stock.

(d.) A sum not exceeding five hundred thousand dollars to be advanced, from time to time, to the Detroit, Grandhaven and Milwaukee Railway Company, on such security as the directors of the two companies from time to time determine; and such sum shall be used in the acquisition of additional rolling stock and buildings, and in the improvement of the property of the said Detroit, Grandhaven and Milwaukee Railway Company generally.

The shares, bonds and securities so acquired from the Tunnel Company, and the securities acquired from the Midland Railway of Canada, and from the Detroit, Grandhaven and Milwaukee Railway Company, shall be held as subsisting and continuing as a security pro tanto for the benefit of the holders of the Grand Trunk consolidated debenture stock, in the same way in all respects as if such shares and securities were held by trustees for the benefit of the holders of the said consolidated debenture stock, but unless and until any default is made in the payment of any interest on such stock, the revenue derived from the said securities and shares shall be considered as part of and included in the general revenues of the company.

The Act of 1893 contained the following:

1. In the interpretation of this Act, unless the context requires a different interpretation, the words "the company" shall mean the company created by the said amalgamation or consolidation, and the words "the said companies" shall mean the Grand Trunk Railway Company of Canada, the Jacques Cartier Union Railway Company, the Montreal and Champlain Junction Railway Company, the Beauharnois Junction Railway Company, the Midland Railway of Canada, the Peterborough and Chemong Lake Railway Company, the Lake Simcoe Junction Railway Company, the Grand Trunk, Georgian Bay and Lake Erie Railway Company, the London, Huron and Bruce Railway Company, the Galt and Guelph Railway Company, the Brantford, Norfolk and Port Burwell Railway Company, the Wellington, Grey and Bruce Railway Company, the Waterloo Junction Railway Company, the North Simcoe Railway Company, and the Cobourg, Blairton and Marmora Railway and Mining Company.

2. This Act may be cited as The Grand Trunk Act, 1893.

3. The agreement entered into by the said companies, and set out in the schedule to this Act, is hereby confirmed and made valid, and shall in all courts and places be taken and held to be legal, valid and binding in all respects whatsoever, as fully and completely as if the said agreement and each and every clause thereof were set out at length and enacted in this Act; and the said companies named in the said agreement are hereby amalgamated; and from and after the passing of this Act the said companies shall form and be one company under the name of "The Grand Trunk Railway Company of Canada," on the terms and conditions set out in the said agreement and in this Act, with the capital also mentioned in said agreement.

4. The company may, after the date of union mentioned in the said agreement, in addition to the several amounts of Grand Trunk consolidated debenture stock mentioned in and authorized by the several statutes referred to in section 3 of chapter 48 of the statutes of 1890, and also in addition to the amount authorized by the said section three, and over and above and in addition to the amounts authorized by chapter 39 of the statutes of 1892, and over and above and in addition to the amounts heretofore authorized by any statute or statutes of Canada (all of which by this Act are made applicable to the company formed by the said union) in order to get in the borrowed capital referred to in column three of the first part of schedule X mentioned in the said agreement as is not included in the schedules to the said above mentioned Acts, or any of them, borrow and raise, for the purposes in the said agreement mentioned and specified, by the creation and issue of perpetual consolidated debenture stock, to be called Grand Trunk consolidated debenture stock, bearing interest at a rate not exceeding four per cent per annum, such sum, not exceeding seventy-five thousand pounds sterling, as a majority of the proprietors present in person or represented by proxy (entitled to vote) at general or special meetings assembled determine.

5. The additional Grand Trunk consolidated debenture stock hereby authorized to be created and issued, or the proceeds thereof, shall be applied by the company in acquiring or getting in by exchange, purchase or otherwise, the said securities and obligations in the next preceding clause of this Act mentioned as being omitted from the schedules in the said several Acts in the said next preceding clause referred to, upon such terms and conditions as are, from time to time, agreed upon between the company and the respective holders thereof; and if there is any surplus it may be applied to the general purposes of the company.

6. The Grand Trunk consolidated debenture stock issued or to be issued under the provisions of chapter 52 of the statutes of 1884, of chapter 57 of the statutes of 1887, of chapter 58 of the statutes of 1888, of chapter 48 of the statutes of 1890, and of chapter 39 of the statutes of 1892, shall, together with the Grand Trunk consolidated debenture stock hereby authorized to be created and issued, also the consolidated debenture stock authorized to be created and issued under the provisions of section 12 of this Act, as and when created and issued, and the interest thereon respectively, rank equally as one single consolidated stock, and shall, subject to all the priorities of existing charges, and also to the five per cent perpetual debenture stock mentioned in schedule number 2 to the said chapter 52 of the statutes of 1884, and to all the provisions relating to the company as to working expenses as set forth in the schedule to this Act, be and become a first charge upon the whole of the undertaking, railways, works, rolling stock, plant, property and effects of the company; but the holders of the said Grand Trunk consolidated debenture stock, whether issued prior or subsequently to the passing of this Act or of the said former Acts in this Act above referred to, shall not as amongst themselves be entitled to any preference or priority.

To be converted as in section 5 of the agreement hereto annexed mentioned.

Hon. gentlemen will see by the rate of interest which is put down in the schedule, that the Act which I have referred to in 1887 was for the purpose of issuing consolidated debenture stock and acquiring those securities. The Act in clause No. 7 states that if there is any portion of the outstanding obligations of these securities in the hands of the public that these securities shall subsist and remain as they are as if they still were held by trustees in common for the whole of the security holders in addition to the consolidated debenture stock. The fact that the securities of the Chicago and Grand Trunk Railway mentioned in schedule A subsist, or in other words remain alive so long as there are any outstanding in the hands of the public, authorises the company to charge as revenue charges £178,000 or nearly $900,000 a year, notwithstanding the fact that the company own a very large proportion of them under the 4 per cent issue of consolidated debenture stock, and the higher rate of interest is now being perpetuated by the issue of the capital under this bill and the revenues, and consequently the rates of the company are now being charged in perpetuity with this £50,000 a year interest on unearned income. The Grand Trunk Railway Company has acquired a portion of those securities amounting to £260,000 of the first mortgage and bearing six per cent and £605,000 of the second mortgage, bearing five per cent and the whole of the securities for cars and rolling stock, amounting to £301,000, and presumably from the large amount of interest £178,000 demanded, stock of the railway must also be included in addition to the bond issue, and because there are only £260,000 of the first mortgage acquired, and there is still outstanding the sum of £979,000 of the first mortgage bearing six per cent and £633,000 of the second mortgage bearing five per cent interest, therefore, the whole of these securities subsist and the revenue is claimed by the Chicago and Grand Trunk Railway as if not one of these were purchased or owned by the Grand Trunk Railway Company, and the dividends which are claimed under those securities amount to £178,000. That £178,000 is one-eighth of the revenue of the whole line, and it is that amount that is now sought under this bill to be made up by the issue of capital, and paid out of the capital account. I will just read this bill in order to show that the position I am taking is a perfectly strong one, because hon. gentlemen say there are grants contained in it required for the Grand Trunk Railway construction account, and that a portion of this money is for that purpose. I contend that no portion of this money is for improvements at all, it is altogether for the purpose I speak of—the maintenance of the revenue of the Chicago and Grand Trunk Railway portion of the line. It is not for the purpose of construction of any portion of the section of railway in Canada at all. Here is the Act:

An Act respecting the Grand Trunk Railway Company of Canada.

Whereas the Grand Trunk Railway Company of Canada has, by its petition, represented that its net revenue from the first day of January, one thousand eight hundred and ninety-four, has been insufficient to meet in full the interest on all the borrowed capital of the company and the other net revenue charges, and that although the deficiency has been temporarily provided out of the general funds of the company, it remains a charge against future revenue, and that it is expedient that the company should be authorized to charge the same to capital account,—and that the company, under the provisions of chapter twenty-five of the statutes of 1878, has entered into working arrangements with the Chicago and Grand Trunk Railway Company, and is the holder of the greater part of the ordinary stock of that company, and a large proportion of its bonded indebtedness,—and that the Chicago and Grand Trunk Railway Company has not been able out of its own funds to maintain its line and works in an efficient state, and that the company has been compelled from time to time to make to them advances for this and other purposes, and that it is anticipated that further advances may be required, and that it is expedient that the company should have express powers to make the same to that company,—and that it is expedient that the company should have power to increase its capital; and whereas the company has prayed for an Act conferring the said powers and for other purposes, and it is expedient to grant the prayer of the said petition: Therefore Her Majesty, by and with the advice and consent of the Senate and House of Commons of Canada, enacts as follows:—

1. This Act may be cited as The Grand Trunk Act, 1897.

2. The expression "the company" wherever used in this Act, means the Grand Trunk Railway Company of Canada as now constituted.

3. The directors may at any time after the thirtieth day of June, one thousand eight hundred and ninety-seven, charge the capital account of the company with the sums by which the net revenue up to and inclusive of that date may have been insufficient to meet the interest to that date upon the borrowed capital of the company and other net revenue charges; provided that the amount to be so charged to capital account and the time and manner of charging the same shall be subject to the approval of the proprietors in general meeting.

4. The directors may, in addition to the advances already made by them to the Chicago and Grand Trunk Railway Company, from time to time make further advances to that company. Any sums so advanced shall be included in the accounts of the half year in which the advances are made, and the amount thereof shall be stated in the balance sheet and accounts of the company.

5. In addition to the amounts which the Company is authorized to borrow and raise under the several Acts following, that is to say, under the Grand Trunk Railway Acts 1874, 1882, 1884, 1887, 1888, 1890 and 1892, and the Grand Trunk Act, 1893, the company may borrow and raise for the general purposes of the company by the creation and issue of perpetual consolidated debenture stock, to be called Grand Trunk Consolidated Debenture Stock, bearing interest at any rate not exceeding four per cent per annum, such sum as the proprietors of the company entitled to vote in general meeting assembled shall from time to time determine; provided always that the aggregate amount of the annual interest on the debenture stock to be issued under this Act shall not exceed fifty thousand pounds sterling. $25,000,000.

6. The debenture stock by this Act authorized shall rank equally and be consolidated with the debenture stock issued or to be issued as Grand Trunk Consolidated Debenture Stock under any Act now in force and shall be subject to all conditions applicable thereto.

7. This Act shall not take effect unless and until submitted to a general meeting of the company and accepted by a majority of the votes of the persons present at such meeting or represented by proxy entitled to vote thereat; provided that notice of the submission of this Act at such meeting has been duly given; and the certificate in writing of the chairman of such meeting shall be taken as sufficient evidence of the acceptance of this Act, and such certificate shall be filed in the office of the Secretary of State of Canada and notice thereof published in the Canada Gazette, and copies thereof certified by the Secretary of State shall be taken and accepted in all courts of law as sufficient evidence of the acceptance of this Act.

Now, capitalized at 4 per cent that amount of interest, namely, £50,000, means an increase of capital to the extent of six million of dollars. That six million dollars, as I contend is sought for by the Grand Trunk Railway for the purpose of adding to the capital of the Canadian part of the road under our legislation, in order to pay out of capital the deficiency in the annual revenue of the company which they have not been able to meet by that portion of the line in the United States—the Chicago and Grand Trunk Railway. I have here the last annual report of the Grand Trunk Railway Company which I obtained from the library. I could only get the last half yearly report; however, for all purposes necessary it is quite satisfactory. It was made as recently as April last and here we see what the revenue of the Grand Trunk Railway Company is. The gross receipts for the half year amount to $10,400,000—£2,079,745, very nearly eleven million dollars. The net traffic receipt out of the gross revenue of the company is £616,000 or $3,079,000. That net revenue of the company is supplemented by the revenue that is received from the International Bridge Co., the interest on the Toledo, Saginaw and Muskegun bonds and interest on controlled lines acquired by the issue of a 4 per cent debenture stock, and the net earnings of the Chicago and Grand Trunk Railway amounting to £56,000, making a total net revenue of the Grand Trunk Railway Company, £707,000 sterling, or in round numbers $3,500,000 for the half year ending December, 1896. That revenue has been charged with the deficiency in the earnings to meet interest of the Chicago and Grand Trunk Railway for the half year and the Detroit, Grand Haven and Milwakee Company, in the first instance amounting to £67,000 and in the second instance to £24,917 of the Detroit, Grand Haven and Milwakee Company. That leaves a surplus to the good, after paying all the net revenue charges, including those two amounts, of £39,086 which the next clause says:

> The above net revenue surplus for the half year of £39,086 deducted from the net revenue deficiency at the 30th June last, of £306,769 leaves a debit balance of £267,683 to be carried to the next half year's accounts.

Now, that amount of £267,000 is the amount that is referred to in the first part of this bill, where it says that the net revenue from the 1st January, 1894, has been insufficient to meet in full the interest on all the borrowed capital of the company. This £267,000 has reference to that phase of it which is now to be paid for by increasing the capital stock of the company. In this report—half yearly report of the company—we see a reference made to the Chicago and Grand Trunk Railway Company. It says the gross receipts of the Chicago and Grand Trunk Railway for the year 1896 amounted to £647,657 as against £574,557 in 1895. The working expenses were £571,000. Hon. gentlemen will see that the gross earnings of the Chicago and Grand Trunk Railway are £647,657 on 335 miles, or $9,000 per mile of railway, as against a gross revenue on the whole mileage of 3,506 miles of £4,000,000 ($20,000,000), or $6,000 per mile of railway, showing a much larger proportion of gross income per mile on the shorter line but a smaller net revenue. The net revenue of the Canadian company is 30 per cent of the gross, while the net revenue of the Chicago and Grand Trunk Railway is only 9 per cent of the gross, how is the 91 per cent absorbed, and why should the Canadian company be burdened with the 19 per cent deficiency, while the proportion of gross earnings are so much larger? These are facts which will bear explanation and should be elicited by the Railway Committee before this bill receives parliamentary sanction. The net profit was £56,000 as against £20,000 the previous year. Those are the earnings on account of the Chicago and Grand Trunk Railway. There is a net revenue amounting to £56,141—that is a net revenue over and above the expenses—the difference between the expenses of running the road and the receipts from its operation. Then the report goes on to say that the net revenue charges for the year were £178,232 against £179,008 in 1895. So far as I am able to judge, that £178,232 claimed on behalf of the Chicago and Grand Trunk Railway Company is the amount that I referred to as being one-eighth of the whole revenue of the Grand Trunk Railway. The revenue of the Grand Trunk for 1896 was $7,000,000 or thereabouts, three and a half millions were the earnings of the last half year, and the previous half year brings it up to about $7,000,000. Of that $7,000,000 which is the net revenue of the Grand Trunk, £178,000 is now claimed by the Chicago and Grand Trunk Railway securities as their share of that revenue, and the report goes on to say "There was, therefore, a deficiency in meeting the net revenue charges of 1896, of £122,000." The reason it is put that way is because the £56,000 of the profit account that I have already referred is deducted from the £178,000, leaving the deficiency in the interest earned by the Chicago and Grand Trunk Company of £122,000; or $600,000 for the past year. It is these two amounts particularly of last year that I have already referred to—the £267,000, the accumulated deficiency since 1894 in the revenue of the company itself and this £122,000, which is the deficiency in the earning power of the Chicago and Grand Trunk Railway is what this bill seeks to pay by increasing the capital of the Canadian company, the traffic of which in Canada has to bear the cost of maintaining this unearned interest. But this is not the whole, because we would be far short of the $6,000,000 asked for here. The Grand Trunk Railway Company have acquired a portion of the securities here mentioned, amounting to, I think £260,000 of the first mortgage 6 per cent in the one case and £600,000 of the second mortgage 5 per cent in the other case and the whole of the bonds for cars and rolling stock and so on, but there still remains outstanding in the hands of the public of the first mortgage securities amounting to £979,000 or nearly $5,000,000 bearing 6 per cent interest—that is still in the hands of the public, and of the second mortgage bonds of the same railway there is still in the hands of the public £633,916. There is a foot note, at the bottom of the page upon which these items appear, by the company. It says:

"This is a contingent liability as the Grand Trunk Railway Company is only responsible for this interest when the respective companies fail to earn it, and then only so far as it is responsible under traffic and other agreements." You see the company itself acknowledges that it is not an actual liability. Not an obligation except so far as traffic agreements make it, liable to alteration. It is only a liability in so far as traffic and other agreements make it a liability and those traffic and other agreements apparently transfer to the Chicago and Grand Trunk Railway securities one-eighth of the whole revenue of the Grand Trunk Railway Company, and this bill now seeks to appropriate and capitalize these advances.

Hon. Mr. CLEMOW—Did they guarantee those payments?

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—No, except under traffic agreements liable to alteration, but if those securities had been transferred under the Consolidated Debenture Stock Act of 1887 then the Grand Trunk Railway would have guaranteed them. But the Grand Trunk Railway did not guarantee them only as far as traffic arrangements guarantee them.

Hon. Mr. CLEMOW—They have paid the deficiency?

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—They have no right to burden the Canadian people with the liability, they have no right to ask us to increase the capital of the Canadian portion of the line and throw the responsibility of paying the deficiency on the Canadian people.

Hon. Mr. McCALLUM—If they agree to it among themselves, what have we to say to it?

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—They may agree to it among themselves but they come here and ask us for legislation we are the party of the first part, and they are the party of the second part. Now are we going to consent to have compound interest added to the burden of the people of Canada for the purpose if meeting a deficiency of interest which has been incurred in the United States to the extent of one-eighth of the whole revenue of the Grand Trunk. Is that an equal distribution of the burden of sustaining this line? Are we going to consent to this legislation, which, if it means anything at all is going to put a burden on the people who supply the traffic in the province of Ontario of furnishing the interest on that capital? I think if hon. gentlemen will look at it closely and try to disassociate from their minds the fact that this is not merely a domestic question of the Grand Trunk Railway Company itself, but a question between the Parliament of Canada as representing the people and the Grand Trunk Railway Company, they will pause before granting this legislation. They come to us and ask us for something which would be unjust and improper to our own people to allow to go into operation. The Grand Trunk Railway Company have paid the interest upon those amounts that are spoken of—that is the £979,000 of first mortgage which bears six per cent interest still in the hands of the public and the £633,000, second mortgage at five per cent interest which is still in the hands of the public and they have paid those advances in the past as they say and there has been a deficiency which has been met out of the general finances of the country.

Now these are the two amounts which they have so advanced, £536,000 sterling to the Chicago and Grand Trunk Company and to the Detroit, Grand Haven and Milwaukee Company £269,000. Those two sums have been paid by the Grand Trunk Company to the security holders; that £536,000 sterling represents the accumulated advances of the past to make up the deficiency in the net revenue of the company itself and £122,000, deficiency of the past year which I have already referred to and which I presume is not included in this £536,000, and the £267,000 the deficiency in net revenue of the Canadian company's—are the three items amounting to nearly £1,000,000 altogether, $5,000,000, that is the amount that is now sought to be paid by the issue of the $6,000,000 consolidated debenture stock and whatever balance there may be over and above that is to be taken for future deficiencies because they anticipate still further deficiencies from the same reason. Now that is the purpose of this bill. It is not for any other purpose but to provide for the earning power of the Chicago and Grand Trunk Railway which it is unable to sustain and to meet the interest, £178,000, on those heavy securities which are now outstanding and which have been paid for so far by advances out of the Grand Trunk Railway Company's coffers. Hon. gentlemen are we going to perpetuate a principle that is fraught with very great danger to our greatest commercial interests: that is the transportation interests of Canada. The principle is unsound. Is there any business man in this honourable House who would say that compound interest is to be heaped up and liabilities to go to outside parties at the rate of compound interest? Does any business man expect to stand long upon a basis of that kind? Is there any business man in this House but would not say that six per cent upon securities of that kind is excessive. The rate of interest which most corporations of that class are satisfied with is three and four per cent. Why, hon. gentlemen, if this principle of legislation is to be continued, the Chicago and Grank Trunk Railway would be in possession of the whole railway in thirty years.

Hon. Mr. CLEMOW—This rate was some years ago?

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—I am quite aware of that. I do not dispute the authenticity of that rate of interest, but what I do dispute is that a company could come here and ask us to continue paying that six per cent by adding to the capital stock of the company.

Hon. Mr. CLEMOW—How can they avoid it?

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—By letting somebody else go without their dividends if it is obligatory upon them to continue traffic arrangements that produce that effect.

Hon. Mr. POWER—The hon. gentleman must see that this bill can only come into operation upon the resolution of the meeting at which all the parties interested must be present.

Hon. Mr. McCALLUM—The hon. gentleman has read all but the 7th clause. It must be satisfactory to all the parties before it goes into operation.

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—I have not finished my speech yet. The hon. gentleman from Halifax lives down there by the sea and knows nothing about railway charges and nothing about the traffic receipts for long hauls and he calls my attention to the fact that the company need not do this unless they choose. It is not a question whether the company need do it or not; it is a question whether we will allow the company to do it; whether we are going to put upon the shoulders of the people a burden greater than they are able to bear, they have to bear the liabilities incurred in the United States, by deficiency of revenue. The two railways are subject to different legislative authority, they are practically two different railways though under one management. They are seeking legislation at the hands of this House in order to perpetuate that state of affairs, in order to make up the deficiency I have already spoken of. £178,000 is equal to 4 per cent on the cost of the 335 miles of railway valued at $70,000 a mile, an excessive charge. Now the Grand Trunk Railway has been a great corporation in Canada for the last forty years. It has done a great work in the initial development of Canada since 1851, but it has done more to discredit the interest of Canada than we can overcome in a very long period, because a large portion of the money that was paid into that road has been sunk. I will not say it has been through any fault or mismanagement of the company itself. I will not say there is any discredit to be attached to any one, but unfortunately there is discredit attached to Canada in consequence of millions of securities being locked up in centres of capital on which people have never received one cent from that day to this. It is desirable if we can by withholding legislation of this kind, force on the holders of securities of the Chicago and Grand Trunk Railway the desirability, nay the necessity of their complying with the laws of Canada and exchanging their securities for the 4 per cent consolidated debenture stock which has been the policy of the Grand Trunk Railway Company itself, and the policy of the people of Canada. The outstanding obligations of the Grand Trunk Railway that I have already spoken of, amount to $325,000,000 upon the 3,500 miles of road. A very small portion of those outstanding obligations receive any interest or return for the money invested. Hon. gentlemen will be surprised when I tell them that the revenue of the Grand Trunk Railway for 1896 was able to pay 2¼ per cent on all their outstanding obligations.

Hon. Mr. CLEMOW—Stock included?

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—Yes, stock included.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.)—After deducting the working expenses?

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—Yes, the net revenue was $35,000,000 last year and the whole of the outstanding obligations, including stock and everything else of the Grand Trunk Railway amounts to $325,000,000. You have only to make a calculation to find that £7,000,000 is about 2¼ per cent on those outstanding obligations. I mention this to draw attention to the fact that Canada is not deficient in its power to meet the interest on the capital invested. The fact that Canada suffers is due to the policy adopted in the past, and which is now sought to be perpetuated by the passage of this bill. If certain security holders are going to enjoy 6 per cent and the rest nothing, and they come and ask us to enable them to pay the deficiency which the road does not earn, by increasing the capital of the company and making it cumulative revenue, you are putting them further and further away from seeing any portion of their money at any period of their existence. It is also to avoid that particular condition of affairs that I have drawn the attention of the Senate to this bill. I will just quote from the Grand Trunk Railway half-yearly report to show you what the outstanding liabilities of the railway are. Here we have a statement of the various securities, that is a statement of the capital authorized and credit by the company by the various Acts. Then we have in No. 2 statement the stock and share capital credit showing the proportion issued. Then we come to loans and debenture stock, toting up altogether £21,000,000 sterling, or nearly $105,000,000. That is the total debenture stock. The details added altogether make terminable bonds £3,377.000. Debenture stock, per account No. 3, £18,507,000, share capital account £40,000,000, Canadian Government advances £3,111,500, toting up £65,940,549 sterling, or, turned into dollars $325,000,000. Those are the total outstanding obligations of the Grand Trunk Railway. The revenue last year was $35,000,000.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—That would be enough to pay 10 per cent.

Hon. Mr. CLEMOW—Do you mean to say there is only £3,000,000 due to the government of this country?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—That is the capital without interest added.

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—That is the outstanding obligations from all sources, $325,000,000. The net revenue last year was $35,000,000. I think for the credit of Canada that is not a bad showing. In Australia the railways do not all pay on their capital as much as 2¼ per cent. Some of them pay as much as 3 per cent. In Great Britain the railways pay on their gross capital about 3 in that populous country. In the maritime provinces there are no charges for interest, because it is a government road. Their train mileage earning only amounts to 0·69 per train mile. The train mileage earning on the Grand Trunk Railway amounts to 1·03, and on the Canadian Pacific Railway 1·40 per train mile. That is the comparisoh between the three large roads. What I desire, and what I think every one in this House desires, is to see that this condition of affairs if it is as I state, is not perpetuated. And I have asked that this bill might be referred back to the committee in order that they may further investigate the question which I have brought before this honourable House in detail. Further than that the managers of the Grand Trunk Railway who have to be considered in this matter can appear before the committee and correct any misstatements that I have made, and point out more fully to the committee the position that they desire to place us in, and try and controvert the position I have already taken here. I feel quite sure the hon. mover of this bill, now that I have drawn his attention to the facts, will co-operate with me by referring this bill back to the Railway Committee in order that there may be a more thorough investigation. If the bill was asking for capital to improve the transportation facilities or to add to their privilege, I would raise no question, but to charge the traffic with compound interest or unearned revenue I must protest against. It is a question which more fully concerns the province of Ontario than any other portion of Canada, and as representatives of that province both the hon. gentleman who moved the adoption of the report, and the hon. gentleman who has moved the third reading of the bill will see that I am not asking the Senate to do anything that is out of the way or improper, and to give the Grand Trunk Railway authorities an opportunity of explaining their position to the committee, and to refute the position I have taken with regard to the unsound financial position that is sought to be promoted by the passage of this bill.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I do not deem it necessary to enter at any length in the way of reply to the very interesting speech made by the hon. gentleman from Marquette. He seems to have predicated his whole speech upon the assumption that the Chicago branch of the Grand Trunk Railway is a separate road, under a lease, or some special arrangement with the Grand Trunk Railway of Canada, while the fact is that the Chicago branch is just as much a part of the great system of the Grand Trunk Railway as is that portion of the road running from Island Pond to Portland. If the Grand Trunk Railway Company were asking permission to acquire a road in a foreign country, or to acquire running powers over it, or it was to be a separate entity by itself, then I would admit there would be a great deal of force in the statements of the hon. gentleman who has just addressed the House, but when we consider the fact that at the period when the Grand Trunk Railway sold that portion of the road lying between Quebec and Rivière du Loup, a distinct and positive arrangement, which is embodied in a statute, was made with the government that a portion of the money, if not the whole of it, which was paid for the Rivière du Loup portion of the Grand Trunk should be devoted to acquiring a road which was to give direct connection with the great centre of trade, Chicago, it will be seen that there is no ground for his position. It was under these circumstances that the Grand Trunk Railway acquired the portion known as the Chicago and Grand Trunk Railway, and to day it is as much a portion of the Grand Trunk Railway Company's property as is the road between Montreal and Toronto; hence they are just as responsible for the interest which falls due upon bonds issued when they purchased that road as they are for any other liability which may exist against them. If the arguments advanced by the hon. gentleman were crystallized into law, they would simply mean that those corporations and individuals who hold the bonds of the Chicago and Grand Trunk Railway bearing six per cent and five per cent interest, would be deprived of their investment to the extent of two per cent or one per cent. I am informed that the effect of carrying out the suggestion made by my hon. friend would be, not only to deprive speculators of the difference in interest that he says should be paid, but that a large proportion of these bonds bearing six per cent, falling due in 1900—£6,000,000 of the bonds fall due three years hence—are held by the Grand Trunk Railway superannuation and provident fund association, an association formed and constituted under the laws of the Dominion, for the purpose of providing a sustenance under certain cases for employés of the road. To adopt the hon. gentleman's plan would be to deprive that association and these men who have invested their money in order that they may have something in case of accident for their families, of that which they have a right to under the law.

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—We could get a detailed statement of that at any time.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—All you have to do is to look at the statute. The statute tells you how many bonds there are. It was in the schedule of the Act of 1887.

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—I have read that statement.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Then what more does the hon. gentleman want to know?

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—You said these securities are held by the representatives of the provident association.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I say that a portion of these debentures are held by the association. I go further. I could name gentlemen in Canada who have invested their means in the acquiring of these bonds, simply because they bear a larger rate of interest than other Grand Trunk Railway securities, and they considered it a safe investment. If the Grand Trunk Railway Company when these bonds fall due, think proper as probably they will, to make another issue of bonds at 4 per cent to pay them off, no harm is done to the parties who hold those bonds at the present time, because the bonds will then fall due and they will receive the full face value of them. I think it would be wasting the time of the House for me to enter into the statistical statements made by the hon. gentleman; nor, I frankly confess, am I in a position to do so in that intelligent way that I should like to do, but I was somewhat startled when the hon. gentleman informed the House that the net revenue of the Grand Trunk Railway for the past year was $35,000,000. If I am informed correctly, the whole gross earnings of the road did not amount to that by many millions.

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—Who is your authority?

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—My authority is Mr. Wainwright, who has just sent me a statement to that effect.

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—Mr. Wainwright told the committee the other day that the net revenue of the Grand Trunk Railway, varied between $5,000,000 and $7,000,000.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Supposing that to be true, that is not what the hon. gentleman informed the House. He said the net revenue was $35,000,000. There is a vast difference between $7,000,000 and $35,000,000.

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—I accept the correction—it was $7,000,000, the context of of my speech will show that $7,000,000 was intended, but which in my mind I had computed at £7,000,000.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—If the net earnings of the road were $35,000,000, the House will at once see, and so would the country, that there would be no necessity to come here for this legislation. Every one must deplore, as much as the hon. gentleman does, the fact that the Grand Trunk Railway has not been as successful as was anticipated when the late Hon. Sir Francis Hincks issued his prospectus. I have a distinct recollection of the issuing of those bonds and the inauguration of the road. The hon. gentleman says he is not prepared to blame any one—neither am I. We have to deal with the facts as they are, and the facts are these: they want to do precisely what the Great Western Railway did some years ago, increase their capital account to meet the liabilities of the road. They ask now to be put in a position, with the consent of the shareholders and bondholders and those who are interested, to add to their capital account, to enable them to meet the interest on their bonds as they fall due, and to expend the balance of the money in such a manner as they think will add to the earning capacities of the road. The very statement that the hon. gentleman read from the pamphlet shows, that during last year the earnings of the Chicago branch of the Grand Trunk Railway were a great deal larger than in 1895.

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—I should like also to state that it was far greater than the average earnings of the whole line.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—What! the Chicago branch?

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—The earnings of 3,500 miles amounted to £2,078,745—about $11,000,000—and the earnings of the Chicago portion amount to £647,657—over $3,000,000, but the net revenue of the former is 30 per cent of the gross earnings while the net revenue of the latter is only 9 per cent.

Hon Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—If that statement be correct—and I accept it as such—the acquiring of the Chicago branch of the road was to the advantage of the Canadian company rather than its disadvantage. What I wanted to point out was that the improvements which the Grand Trunk Railway Company have made, and propose to make, on the Chicago branch will enable it to earn more than it has earned in the past, and the better the state of efficiency in which that road can be placed, the greater will be the advantage to the whole country generally. I repeat the statement that I made at the beginning—the Grand Trunk Railway Company are just as much responsible for the debts and interest which fall due upon the bonds against that section of the road as they are for any other portion of it, and anything that the Parliament of Canada can do to assist them in making their road second to none on the continent, which will enable them to earn a larger amount annually at a less expense, it is our duty to do so. And then we must not forget the fact to which the senior member for Halifax called attention, that not one single step can be taken by the Grand Trunk Railway Company to increase their capital debt by the means suggested in this bill, until the whole matter has been submitted to a general meeting of the company and accepted by a majority of the votes of the persons present at such meeting, or represented by proxy, entitled to vote thereat. This is simply a power asked by a great corporation to relieve itself at the present moment of an indebtedness which exists, and that too after they have obtained the consent of every individual who is interested in the welfare of the road. I hope the hon. gentleman, after the short explanation which I have made, will not press his motion to a vote, because it is highly in the interests of the country, as well as of this railway, that the bill should become law.

Hon. Mr. VIDAL—The railway committee of the House having done me the honour of electing me chairman imposes upon me—at least I feel that it is so—the duty of justifying the decision at which they have arrived in reporting the bill without amendment. It is just one of those cases which occasionally occur where I think the principle generally acted upon in this House strictly applies, where the decision of the committee ought to receive the sanction of the House, on account of the advantages possessed by the committee of ascertaining and examining into all these details to which our attention has been directed by the hon. gentleman from Marquette. In that committee these same ideas were brought forward, not at the extreme length they have been to-day, but probably with greater clearness and more force, and we had present before the committee one who is competent and able to answer and explain every one of these arguments, the assistant general manager of the railway, who distinctly showed to the committee that the charges made by my hon.

friend were without foundation, that the interests of which he, under some hallucination, seems to consider himself here the sole representative and guardian—the public interest and the interest of the country—he showed that these interests were not in the slightest degree affected by the action proposed to be taken in the terms of this bill. Notwithstanding what my hon. friend says about its not being a domestic matter, it is strictly a domestic matter. It is a matter in which the outside public have no particular interest. All the interests of those in any way connected with it are most carefully and distinctly guarded, as the hon. member for Hastings has shown, in the clauses of the bill, which require that nothing shall be done in carrying out its provisions unless it is approved in the proper way by a majority of those interested, namely, the bondholders and shareholders. Now it was clearly and distinctly proved to us, that so far as the granting of this power to the company to make this change—and it is a mere matter of change in account—is concerned, it would have no more injurious effect upon Ontario than upon any other part of Canada; there would not be the slightest difference. How the hon. gentleman can try to awaken the sympathies of Ontario on this question, I cannot understand.

An hon. MEMBER—We have no sympathies.

Hon. Mr. VIDAL—We want sound judgment and not sympathy. The matter is one on which we should exercise our judgment and the appeal to sympathy is in my judgment quite out of place. If any sympathy is to be extended, the province of Ontario, above all other parts of the Dominion, should be strongly in sympathy with the Grand Trunk, because there is no work which has done for any part of Canada as much as the Grand Trunk has done for Ontario. In my private judgment it would be only a fair thing if the whole of its indebtedness to the Dominion were written off. I hold that the province of Ontario has derived in actual benefit from the existence and maintence of that road a much larger amount than all the indebtedness which may be shown as owing to the government.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I think this House is entitled to sympathy on the present occasion more than any one else.

Hon. Mr. VIDAL—I do not know whether my hon. friend means on account of the length of my remarks.

Hon. Mr. POWER—Oh, no.

Hon. Mr. VIDAL—Then with reference to another point of the hon. gentleman's remarks, one would suppose, to hear his argument, that the bill was one either to make a grant to the Grand Trunk Railway Company, to give them some additional power, or endorse their bonds, that the country was as deeply interested in this matter as if they were called upon to do anything. They are not called upon to risk a dollar or give a dollar. They are asked merely to give power which the letter of the law seems to require—I do not know that the spirit of it would—of transferring their accounts from one book to another. In their own financial management it is a matter of convenience to them. As a matter of fact there is no difference whatever to others.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.)—Parliament is called upon to wipe out a lot of interest earned by bondholders.

Hon. Mr. VIDAL—No, not at all. Every bondholder is entitled to get, and actually does get, all the interest his bond calls for, and there is no intention to make any change in that. There is no wrong done to any bondholders. I believe all parties feel considerable confidence in the present financial management of the Grand Trunk Railway Company; that they are doing very well indeed, managing their line admirably and economically, and in fact the information given to the committee assured us that this very branch of the line which has been spoken of, the Chicago and Grand Trunk Railway Line will pay well, but requires repair to be kept in order and money must be taken for that purpose. There was a distinct announcement to us that when that was done there was a strong probability—a certainty you might say—of the earnings being sufficient to meet all the expenditure required. I think that as the bill was referred to a large committee which heard the objections and every argument against it, fully answered, and as the large majority of that committee were satisfied that the bill was a correct one and its principles were right, that it should be allowed to pass into law. When an appeal is made to this House to reject the decision of that committee, some stronger reason—I do not know that any reason was given at all, but stronger reasons than those advanced by the hon. member for Marquette should be given to justify the House in ignoring the judgment of the committee so carefully arrived at—not with haste, not without sufficient examination, not without hearing at considerable length the objections which might be made against it. I think, therefore, in justice to the committee as far as the essential fairness of the bill and the necessity of granting it, and where public interests are so sufficiently and fully guarded, that not only have we no right to send the bill back to the committee, but the bill ought to receive without any great diversity of opinion the third reading now asked for.

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—Hon. gentlemen will allow me to reply to the remarks made, especially when the hon. gentleman who has just resumed his seat seems to consider that I am assuming a position that I have no right to assume to discuss the interests of the public in a question of this kind.

Hon. Mr. VIDAL—I did not assume that. I claimed that you assumed the right to do it as beyond that of others.

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—That I put myself forward as a champion of the rights of the people—a position I am very proud to occupy. Our two large companies, the Canadian Pacific Railway and the Grand Trunk Railway, bear similar relation to their American connections, and if the principle is laid down that unearned interest on the American connections is to be put on the Canadian main lines, the sooner the champions increase in number the better. I just wish to say one or two words in regard to this matter in reply to the hon. member who moved the third reading of this bill. He ignores the construction that I put upon the bill, which is a question of paying out of capital account interest which is not earned on the United States portion of the line, and putting the burden of paying those dividends upon the Canadian portion of the line. Now the accounts of the Chicago and Grand Trunk Company are kept quite separately from the accounts of the Canadian company. They are two distinct roads, so far as that is concerned. They will not be one road until the consolidated debenture stock covers the whole operations of the company. It is desirable, in the interests of the company and in the interests of the country, that every one of the outstanding obligations of the Grand Trunk Railway Company should be brought under the operation of the consolidated debenture stock, which is a policy that has been laid down by the Canadian Parliament—a policy that has been asked for by the Grand Trunk Company, and it is only the obstinacy or selfishness—I do not care what you choose to call it—of those who hold debentures of that kind at six per cent which the earning power of the people who live adjacent to the road on the Chicago and Grand Trunk Railway portion of the line have shown an inability to maintain, and that the whole burden of my remarks has been to bring forward to this honourable House that position. I do not desire to place this honourable House in a position of refusing to refer this bill back to the committee; I prefer rather to take the position of withdrawing it, because I see that while there is a great deal of sympathy round me for the position I have taken, I have so far failed to impress hon. gentlemen of the importance of the question I have brought to their notice. I do not want to put my hon. friend on my right from Ontario, and I do not want to put my hon. friend from Sarnia or the leader of the opposition in the position of appearing to ignore the rights of the province of Ontario, which bears the main traffic of the Grand Trunk Railway in Canada, and for that reason I shall not press the amendment. There is also the further reason, that this has been brought upon the Grand Trunk Railway Company without any notice; they have already paid this money, and while I have relieved myself of any responsibility so far as the issue of this capital is concerned, the Grand Trunk Railway Company having paid this money, having relied upon parliament being as generous and I may say as reckless where this company is concerned as it always had been in the past in order to recover that money they have advanced, I would ask the permission of the House to withdraw my resolution, trusting at any rate that what I have brought before this honourable House and before the country and before the Grand Trunk Railway will lead the company to act more judiciously in the management of their finances so that the principle of this legislation may not again be brought before parliament.

Hon. Mr. McCALLUM—Before this amendment is withdrawn I desire to say one word. I can tell my hon. friend from Shell River that I will not permit him to say that I am in the disgraceful position of ignoring the rights of the province of Ontario. The hon. member also said that the senior member for Halifax had no interest in this at all; he lives down by the sea and does not consume anything. You make a great fight for the province of Ontario. I live in the province of Ontario, and I say to you here that the province of Ontario, and every man, woman and child in it, owes a debt of gratitude to the Grand Trunk Railway. And what are they asking here? When my hon. friend read the bill to the House he skipped the seventh clause. It was like a lawyer in a case in court reading what was favourable to his own side, and omitting what was favourable to the other side. Why not put the case fairly as regards the Chicago branch of the Grand Trunk Railway? How are they going to keep the Chicago branch in order, so as to accommodate the traffic coming from this side unless they get assistance? They have built a tunnel under the river at Sarnia to expedite the traffic in the west. And yet my hon. friend would say, "let that branch go down." I take just as much interest in this part of the country as any one; but the hon. gentleman talks about the people of Ontario and thinks we cannot take care of ourselves because we do not choose to support him in any whim he may take hold of. And after all he has said, he withdraws his motion. I felt inclined—but I shall not do it—to insist on having a vote taken. However, I shall waive that. I think he would be like the last rose of summer left blooming alone.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.)—There is a very important consideration involved in the motion of the hon. member from Shell River, and it is this: If the bondholders and shareholders of these roads were distinct, they would be taking the funds of the one set of bondholders to pay the debts of the other. But now we are told that both roads are under one management. They have separate accounts for each branch, which makes it somewhat puzzling and misleading. If the road is under the same management, why separate accounts? That is at the bottom of the misunderstanding, and that is what the hon. gentleman from Shell River has seen. If the road was owned by different bondholders, of course it would be unjust to allow the bill to become law. But we are told by the hon. gentleman in charge of the bill that they are the same bondholders nearly man for man, and that takes the force out of the argument of my hon. friend opposite.

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—I wish to explain that I did not intend to say anything to offend my hon. friend on my right, and I should not have used the word "disgraceful." I wish to withdraw that.

The amendment was withdrawn.

The question being put on the main motion, it was declared carried, and the bill was read the third time and passed.

DOMINION BUILDING AND LOAN ASSOCIATION BILL.

SECOND READING.

Hon. Mr. POWER moved the second reading of Bill (48) "An Act respecting the Dominion Building and Loan Association." He said:—This bill is simple in its character, and is similar to several bills we have already passed. This Dominion and Loan Association has been doing business in Ontario and also in other provinces under the Ontario charter; they are now anxious to secure, in place of that, a charter from the Dominion Parliament, and they come to us asking us to give them a Dominion charter.

The motion was agreed to, and the bill was read the second time.

ATIKOKAN IRON RANGE RAILWAY COMPANY'S BILL.

SECOND READING.

Hon. Mr. MACINNES (Burlington) moved the second reading of Bill (50) "An Act respecting the Atikokan Iron Range Railway Company." He said:—This bill seeks to revive an Act already passed by this House, and asks for an extension of time. I believe the bill to be perfectly legitimate in its character.

The motion was agreed to, and the bill was read the second time.

NIAGARA GRAND ISLAND BRIDGE COMPANY'S BILL.

SECOND READING.

Hon. Mr. MACINNES (Burlington) moved the second reading of Bill (37) "An Act respecting the Niagara Grand Island Bridge Company." He said:—This company's charter will expire shortly and the purport of the present bill is to ask for a short extension of time. The company wish to keep the charter alive for the purpose of being prepared to go on with the work, which they expect to have to do at any moment, and no exclusive privileges of any kind are being asked for.

The motion was agreed to, and the bill was read the second time.

The Senate adjourned.

THE SENATE.

Ottawa, Monday, 17th May, 1897.

THE SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

Prayers and routine proceedings.

THE CASE OF MR. PETIT.

INQUIRY.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL rose to Call the attention of the Senate to a speech delivered by the Minister of Justice, on the 2nd day of October, 1896, as per the Official Report of the Debates, in which the said Minister of Justice promised that Mr. Petit, the defeated candidate in the County of Terrebonne, at the general elections in 1896, would be "officially called on for an explanation of the letter written by him to tenderers for the supply of coal to certain departments of government, in which he, Petit, asked what the tenderer intended to do for him in the matter, as 'business is business you know,' and that when an answer to the official communication was received, or a reasonable time had elapsed without any answer, the government would consider what course it would take,"—and will inquire:—

1. Whether Mr. Petit was, as promised by the Minister of Justice, "officially called on" for such explanation?

2. If not, why not?

3. If "officially called on" for an explanation, was any received?

4. If not, and a "reasonable time having elapsed without any answer," has the government decided what course it intends to take in the matter?

5. If so, what was that decision, and the reasons which led to it."

Hon. Sir OLIVER MOWAT—I shall answer the 1st, 2nd and 3rd questions together, and my answer is this: Before the intended official letter was sent to Mr. Petit a letter was received from him which rendered unnecessary a prior communication to him.

My answer to the 4th and 5th questions is this: The decision of the government after receiving Mr Petit's letter, and after considering the whole case, was for this government to take no further action in the matter; and for the reasons which I gave in my answer to the hon. member's former questions on the same subject; these reasons being, briefly, that under the British North America Act the administration of criminal justice in the province of Quebec belongs to the provincial government of Quebec; that the alleged offence of Mr. Petit is not of any fraud upon the Dominion exchequer perpetrated or designed; and neither is it a matter of magnitude in point of amount; and that under all the circumstances the case should be left to the unfettered discretion and judgment of the provincial government as to whether the offence is sufficiently proved by the letter to the tenderers, in the face of Mr. Petit's denial of the purpose inferred from the letter, and in the face of the facts which may seem to support such denial.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Might I ask the hon. gentleman if he will, and whether on the facts a conviction could reasonably be expected, lay that letter of Mr. Petit before the Senate?

Hon. Sir OLIVER MOWAT—Yes.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—It will obviate the necessity to move to have it done. I ask for the letter because I think it would be well that all these documents should be on record, in order that the country may see how the criminal laws are administered under the direction of my hon. friend. I think I understand the position which he takes in reference to the provincial governments, and I also desire that the country should know that the spirit, strained though it may be, of the law, may lead to the punishment of a man who is not proved to have had anything to do with the violation of that law, even in spirit, while we have a direct proposition made, which is in effect a direct violation of the law, allowed to go unpunished for the reason which the hon. gentleman has suggested, that it is such a small matter that it is not worth looking after. It reminds one of a story which I might repeat, but which perhaps is unnecessary to relate, being a small matter the crime is not a very great one. It is the first time that I have learned that a crime, if small, is not to be punished, that it must be a great crime before the magnates of the law will stoop or attempt to punish it.

Hon. Sir OLIVER MOWAT—My hon. friend ought not to forget that the administration of justice does not belong to the Minister of Justice, does not belong to the federal government—that when the federal government takes part in any criminal prosecution, it is just as any private prosecutor would, and necessarily with the concurrence of the provincial government. I am not responsible for the administration of justice except that where a man is sentenced to be punished, the jurisdiction to change that sentence or to limit the amount of it belongs to His Excellency the Governor General; but, I do not recollect any other case just now in which we have any executive jurisdiction over criminal justice. My hon. friend must not take it that I am responsible beyond this, for it is not the case. I have responsibility enough without that—responsibility enough imposed upon me, which I endeavour to discharge to the best of my ability. The hon. member assumes that there has been a violation by Mr. Petit of the criminal code. That is not so clear as my hon. friend assumes it is. I am not prepared to say as a lawyer, that there has been a violation of that provision of the code. All that I know about evidence of the offence is the letter and what may be inferred from the letter. Prima facie the letter would seem to have the meaning that my hon. friend ascribes to it; but, when you examine it critically, it by no means necessarily implies what is so inferred; and when we find a number of facts inconsistent with the hon. gentleman's construction, these facts have to be taken into account. All that is for the court. If my hon. friend chooses to have Mr. Petit prosecuted, he is at liberty to do so. The Quebec government have not chosen to prosecute. They knew that the responsibility of the administration of justice was with the province, and they were politically hostile to Petit; yet they took no steps whatever. Why did they not? I suppose there is only one explanation of it, and that is, that on the whole they did not consider the case clear enough to be the subject of a prosecution, and therefore did not go on with one. I do not say whether Mr. Petit's letter is or is not a violation of the criminal code, but I say the point is not so clear that one is to assume that the violation is clear. I can assume it, and my hon. friend can not assume it.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—I think my hon. friend, the leader of the opposition, is rather unreasonable. Ample time should be allowed the hon. gentleman's colleagues to prosecute the man who gave away the information and told on Petit. Full opportunity should be allowed to prosecute this man before the leader of the House should be asked to deal severely with Petit. To drop irony, I may make this remark, that although my hon. friend is a very eminent lawyer yet, to my simple mind, the case seems perfectly clear. I could not imagine a clearer case than this was of an attempt to sell political influence. As to the other point that my hon. friend makes, that criminal prosecutions belong to the local government, there is no doubt it would have to be prosecuted there, but there is very easy ways of getting at this man if the Minister of Justice wishes to. He can move the provincial authorities, just as Sir John Thompson, his predecessor, moved the provincial authorities when the Connolly and McGreevys were prosecuted. When, as now, a scandal arose in connection with a department of the federal government.

Hon. Mr. POWER—The hon. gentleman himself can set the law in motion just as well as the Minister of Justice.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—Yes, but I am not paid for doing such things.

THE MANITOBA SCHOOL QUESTION.

INQUIRY.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY inquired:

Has the present administration, or any of its members, asked for the intervention of the Capital Holy See, or the sending of an Apostolic delegate to aid, directly or indirectly, in causing the Catholic minority of Manitoba to accept the compromise arrived at between the federal government of Manitoba on the subject of the Manitoba school difficulty?

Hon. Mr. MOWAT—My answer to that question is "No."

DISMISSAL OF POSTMASTER LAVOIE.

INQUIRY.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY inquired:

1. Was Mr. Louis Lavoie on the 23rd of June, 1896, Postmaster of L'Ile aux Grues, in the County of Montmagny?
2. Has he been since that date dismissed from office by the present administration?
3. Why? And what is the nature of the accusation brought against him?
4. By whom was the accusation brought?
5. Does the accuser generally enjoy the gift of infallibility?
6. Was the accused officially made aware of the accusation brought against him, and had he an opportunity to refute it?
7. Has the Post Office Inspector been required to hold an inquiry and to make a report?
8. Has an inquiry taken place, and what is the report of the officer making the inquiry?
9. If the person dismissed protests his innocence and completely denies the truth of the accusation, is it the intention of the government to grant an inquiry or to refuse all justice?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Mr. Louis Lavoie was on the 23rd June last postmaster at L'Ile aux Grues. He has been dismissed on the charge, made by Mr. Choquette, M. P., that he was an aggressive partisan, distributed Conservative literature and charged Mr. Laurier and Mr. Choquette as being traitors to their race and religion by reason of their vote on the school question The statements made by Mr. Choquette, M.P., were accepted as fully establishing the accuracy of the charge in question and accordingly no further inquiry was held, and no good purpose would be served by the matter being reopened.

THE DISMISSAL OF ALFRED DUBÉ.

INQUIRY.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY inquired:—

1. Was Mr. Alfred Dubé on the 23rd of June, 1896, an employé of the government as section-man on the Intercolonial Railway in the County of Montmagny?
2. Has he been since that date discharged from his work by the present administration?
3. When, why, and upon whose complaint?
4. What is the nature of the charge brought against him?
5. Has the charge been proved?
6. What is the nature of the proof?
7. If no proof exists, has the accused at least a diploma of infallibility? Granted by whom?
8. Has the accused been made aware officially of the charge brought against him, and has he had an opportunity to refute it?
9. What was his reply?
10. If the person dismissed completely denies the truth of the charge brought against him, protests his innocence and offers to make it clear, is it the intention of the government to grant an inquiry or to refuse all justice?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—1. Yes; Mr. Alfred Dubé was employed as section-man on the Intercolonial Railway, in the county of Montmagny, on the 23rd of June, 1896.

2. Yes; his services were dispensed with on the 15th of September, for active and offensive partisanship in the last general elections, upon representations made by Mr. Choquette, M. P., from personal knowledge, so that no investigation was considered necessary.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—On this question I beg to state that he never acted as a partisan. He did not even vote, though he had a right to vote. He never took any active part at all, and he is ready to prove it.

INTEREST BILL.

FIRST READING.

Hon. Sir OLIVER MOWAT introduced Bill (I) "An Act respecting Interest," and moved that it be read the first time.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—It is usual, in introducing a bill of this character, to give some explanation of its provisions.

Hon. Sir OLIVER MOWAT—It has been ascertained that lately a frightfully large rate of interest is sometimes charged and recovered, even so much as 5 per cent per day—nearly 2,000 per cent. Everybody feels that it is an outrage that a provision of that kind should be enforceable, and the courts in Quebec, where these cases have been made public, have felt difficulty in not enforcing it. In gross cases it is proposed by the bill that there should be jurisdiction to prevent the enforcement of such agreements. It is not easy to determine how that had better be done. I shall be glad to consider any different views that may be expressed on that subject; the form of the bill is to provide, where the amount of interest exceeds a named percentage—I propose 8, but that is a matter of detail—that the judge should have a large discretion. Further, if large payments have been made on account of excessive interest, it is proposed that the judge shall have a discretion to apply what may seem unreasonable towards the principal. It is a subject the difficulty of which I quite acknowledge, but the evil is so great that I thought we should endeavour to grapple with it.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Has not a bill been introduced in the House of Commons dealing with this question? I understood that Mr. Quinn, the member for one of the divisions of Montreal, had introduced a bill dealing with the question. Of course that would not prevent the hon. gentleman from introducing his bill; what I meant was that if a bill of that kind should come up from the House of Commons what would our position be—we would have to make the two harmonize, of course.

Hon. Sir OLIVER MOWAT—Oh, yes.

The bill was read the first time.

CRIMINAL ACT AMENDMENT BILL.

SECOND READING.

Hon. Sir OLIVER MOWAT moved the second reading of Bill (H) "An Act further to amend the Criminal Act." He said:—This bill embraces a very great variety of topics, and I don't know that it would be a very substantial service for me to commence a discussion on them now. They embrace isolated provisions entirely distinct in their nature—quite a number of them are of that character. I propose, therefore, to take the second reading without a discussion so far as I am concerned, and to discuss the various provisions of the bill when we get into committee.

Hon Mr. GOWAN—I am very much pleased that my hon. friend has deferred the full consideration of this measure until it is before the committee, it contains so very many subjects which it is important to discuss in detail. I have read the bill over, and I must say that to my mind it contains many and most important and necessary improvements in the criminal law of the country. These improvements are carried out in the very best and most scientific way. Instead of making amendments to amendments as has been the practice in the past, in modern times it has been more usual and by far the better course to wipe out the original enactments and to re-enact the whole, as altered. Two or three pages of the bill I find comprehend changes of not more than a dozen words, but they are all important in themselves, and it would be quite impossible to discuss them except in committee, when there could be free intercommunication of ideas with respect to the subject. When I say there are in the bill many valuable and very necessary improvements, there are some that strike me as rather novel, and perhaps I might mention one—it is with respect to the new invention by which continuous action is represented in photography. There is a clause against printing and exhibiting photographs of prize-fights. While I personally agree with my hon. friend in his view, it is a question whether he might not have to include the struggles of what are technically called football scrimmages, and various other forms of sport. A great many people do not object to representations of these things, and we have to look at it from their aspect. It may be, as is said by some, demoralizing to see a painful scene represented, but, on the other hand, there are those who find in them aids to piety. I am very doubtful about that clause, and that is the only one that strikes me as being open to very serious discussion. It is doubtful whether it will find favour in this House. We must bear in mind that in this country we are a mixed people. The Anglo-Saxon and the Celt has a certain element of character which, I am afraid, might be described as brutal. I entirely approve of the measure as a whole, and I shall have, perhaps, something to say on some of the details which are very important, in committee, where the whole subject may be better and more effectually discussed.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I cordially endorse what has been said by the hon. gentleman from Barrie. The bill is a valuable one, and contains a number of important provisions, but, like my hon. friend, I was struck by the novelty of the particular clause to which he has referred.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—It is an interference with the pastimes of the people.

Hon. Mr. POWER—Yes, I think so. To be consistent, if parliament is going to pass the clause which has been referred to by the hon. member from Barrie, it should prohibit the newspapers from publishing accounts of those prize fights. A newspaper reaches a thousand people for the one person who sees the kinetoscope in operation. I really do not think that there is anything immoral or improper in looking at a representation of a prize fight I perhaps may sink a great distance in the opinion of my fellow senators when I say that if I had a comfortable seat I should not think there was anything improper or immoral in looking at a prize fight myself. I feel that, in endorsing a provision of this sort, I should be condemning myself. The line of action adopted by the hon. member from Barrie is the most proper and convenient. It is a desirable thing that the Minister of Justice should be given some notice, at the second reading, of the clauses of the measure likely to occasion discussion in committee, so that he may give those clauses further consideration and be further prepared to deal with objections when they are brought up. I may venture to make a further remark with respect to a number of clauses in this bill which go to render more stringent the provisions of the existing law, which are intended to protect the chastity of women and girls. We should remember—and that ground was taken in this House when the measures which are now on the statute-book were under consideration—we should be careful lest, in providing legal protection, we tend to take away moral protection. It is not desirable that reliance should be placed on legislative enactments instead of on the virtue of the female herself, and the tendency of too much legislation is to bring about that result. Of course, where the person who is sinned against is of tender years, it is the duty of parliament to protect her, and there are other cases where it is the duty of parliament to interfere too; but as a general thing where the male and female parties to an offence against morality are standing, so to say, on an equal footing, it is questionable whether it is desirable that parliament should interfere and punish one rather than the other. I do not propose to say any more on the subject just now, but possibly when the bill is in committee I may have something further to say on that point.

The bill was read the second time.

THE PRINTING OF PARLIAMENT.

ADOPTION OF THE REPORT POSTPONED.

Hon. Mr. PRIMROSE, in the absence of the Chairman of the Joint Committee on the Printing of Parliament, moved the adoption of their First Report.

Hon. Mr. McKAY—It has not been the practice in this House to adopt a report of this kind until it has been first adopted in the House of Commons. This report contains a recommendation involving the expenditure of money, and its adoption should be postponed.

Hon. Mr. POWER—The point raised by the hon. gentleman from Truro is well taken. This report provides for the expenditure of money, and it has been our uniform practice not to adopt the report of the joint committee until it has been adopted in the other House.

The motion was allowed to stand.

THE CONTINGENT ACCOUNTS COMMITTEE.

MOTION.

Hon. Mr. KIRCHHOFFER moved the adoption of the Second Report of the Standing Committee on Internal Economy and Contingent Accounts of the Senate.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I do not propose to move against this report, but there is one clause in it to which my attention has been directed and which does not, I may frankly say, meet with my approval. The 9th clause reads as follows:

> Your committee recommend that the chairman of your committee be authorized to employ a competent person as shorthand and type-writer to assist the law clerk for the remainder of the session, and to determine the mode and rate of payment therefor, and inasmuch as such assistance is needed from the beginning of a session, and the committee is not appointed for some time later, they also recommend that the present chairman be authorized to make similar arrangements for the next session of parliament.

No doubt the employment of type-writers has got to be a very common practice, and if there were any great necessity for the appointment by the committee I should not make any observations on the matter. One of the great objects of this House and of the Committee on Internal Economy which reports to the House, in the past, has been to keep down the expenditure of the session to as low a figure as possible. Our experience in connection with type-writers in the past has been that they are occasionally rather expensive, and consequently a type-writer should not be employed unless the services of one are absolutely, or very nearly absolutely necessary. Now, from my knowledge of the business of the House I am not of the opinion that the services of a type-writer in the law clerk's office are, at the present time, absolutely necessary, or anything like absolutely necessary.

I do not remember any session, during the past 20 years when the business of the law clerk's office was lighter than it has been this session, and I think only twice before were the services of a type-writer called into requisition. In former sessions we sometimes had a great many divorce cases, which would naturally give a good deal of work to the law clerk, this session there was only one divorce case, and that was disposed of in a remarkably short time. It must be borne in mind that up to a very recent period the law clerk, whose title is law clerk of the Senate and clerk of committees, had to attend to meetings of the various committees and act as clerk of those committees. Some three years ago there were a number of divorce cases before the Senate, and as the law clerk had to be present at the meetings of that committee, he was authorized to secure the services of other officers to act as clerks of the various other committees which he had been in the habit of attending as clerk. The great pressure of business in the way of divorces has not continued, but the arrangement which was made to relieve the law clerk during that session has been continued, and the work which in earlier years was done by the law clerk—the work of clerk of committees—is now being discharged by other officers who, as a rule, have more to do themselves, apart from this business, than the law clerk has. I cannot help feeling that if the 9th paragraph of this report is adopted it should be with the distinct understanding that the law clerk, in consideration of his having this assistance, shall discharge, as he was in the habit of doing up to about three years ago, the duties of clerk of the various committees. Hon. gentlemen who are members of any committee, as I am for instance of the railway committee, must feel that it is rather absurd that the committee should sit there, and that an officer, who has a great deal to do, apart from his duties in connection with that committee, should act as clerk of the committee and the law clerk should sit by doing nothing but simply listening, and being prepared to give his legal opinion when called upon. As the law clerk at present attends the meetings of the committee, it really would not involve much additional trouble—almost no additional trouble—for him to do the work of clerk of the committee. I think that the hon. gentlemen who compose the Committee on Internal Economy, might very well say that if this assistance is given to the law clerk hereafter he shall, as he did in the past up to some three years ago, discharge the duties of clerk of the various committees. I think that is only a reasonable proposition.

Hon. Mr. MILLER—I think my hon. friend from Halifax took the lead in having the change made to which he now alludes.

Hon. Mr. POWER—No.

Hon. Mr. MILLER—I beg pardon, if I am wrong; I thought it was so. The matter is altogether under the control of the chairman. The chairman is not to employ a type-writer at the instance of the clerk unless he is satisfied that the work requires it. It is not under the control of the clerk, but under the control of the chairman of the committee, who is responsible for any extra services he puts the House to the expense of at the hands of the law clerk. It is in very good hands and there will be no difficulty.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—The opposition to this pa agraph might be overcome if the first portion of it was allowed to go. There is no doubt that, during the present session, the law clerk has been engaged with a number of bills, more, probably, than he had time to attend to. He has been looking after several bills for the Minister of Justice, more particularly the bill relating to the Criminal Code, which has had to be reprinted at least twice, and I, therefore, suggest that the ninth clause should read:

> Your committee recommend that the chairman of your committee be authorized to employ a competent person as shorthand and type-writer to assist the law clerk for the remainder of the session.

And leave the question as to whether the services of a shorthand writer may be engaged at the next session an open question. There is no doubt, at the beginning of the session there is really not the necessary work that would involve the employment of a type-writer, but towards the end of the session the work accumulates and there are bills which the law clerk has to give attention to, and he also attends to various committees. As it new reads, the chairman would really be called upon to appoint a shorthand writer——

Hon. Mr MILLER—No, he would not, unless he thought it was necessary.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—The clause reads:

> And inasmuch as such assistance is needed from the beginning of the session.

There is an affirmation of the principle that it is really needed.

Hon. Mr. MILLER—It may be needed.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—The latter part is broader, I think, than the House would approve of.

Hon. Mr. MILLER—It is utterly irregular to amend a report of a committee in the House without unanimous consent, but a slight mistake of that kind may very properly, I think, be amended and by making the clause read, "may be needed" the difficulty would be overcome. In the 10th clause we should insert the word "working" before the word "day" in the last line of the clause. It is a mere clerical omission and it is not contended that the individual should receive wages for a non-working day.

Hon. Mr. KIRCHHOFFER—I wish to state that I would like to pay the greatest deference to the hon. gentleman from Halifax, who has just spoken with reference to the report; at the same time, this report was adopted in the committee after a full discussion in which the hon. Secretary of State and the Hon. Mr. Mills took part, and it was represented there, and not controverted, that at the beginning of the session before this committee was actually appointed, a considerable amount of work had to be done, outside of his ordinary labours, by the law clerk, and on that account, in case the occasion arose and it was necessary to employ a type-writer, that the chairman should have an opportunity of doing so if he thought fit. That was the intention of the report of the committee. At the same time, I do not wish to assume any responsibility in the matter any more than the House wishes me to do. It is not a matter of very grave importance. It is only a matter of about $40 a month. That is about what was conceded at the sitting of the committee. I do not wish to assume any responsibility that anybody in the House objects to. I should be quite willing that the recommendation of the hon. the Secretary of State or the hon. member from Richmond should be adopted, and whatever alteration is to be made in the section might be made by the House. With reference to the remark made by the hon. gentleman from Richmond, I am satisfied the intention of the committee was that that should only include working days, and it would be quite right that it should be modified in that way.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I move to strike out the latter part of the ninth paragraph, and my hon. friend on my right has suggested that it should read "may be needed" instead of "is needed," and that the word "working" should be inserted before the word "day" in the tenth clause.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I learn now, for the first time, that the law clerk had a good deal to do during the past few days. I was not aware of that fact, or I should not have, perhaps, made my observations as strong as I have, but I think, with respect to the ninth paragraph, that the chairman may or may not exercise the power which is given him in that paragraph. It authorizes the present chairman to make similar arrangements, I presume, if it is necessary for the business of the House, but not otherwise.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—You might add those words "if he deems it necessary."

Hon. Mr. POWER—I understand the motion is to strike out everything after the word "therefor" in the third line.

The amendment was adopted.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Then, I presume, the word "working" will be inserted before the word "day" in the last line of the tenth clause?

The amendment was adopted.

Hon. Mr. BERNIER—I do not agree with the third clause of that report. By that clause Ernest Bérubé is appointed a permanent messenger. There is another messenger, Mr. Gagnon, who is senior in every way to Mr. Bérubé. As a matter of justice we should not discriminate between our messengers without cause, as is proposed here, by passing one over the head of the others. Gagnon entered the service in 1885 while Bérubé was here only in 1886.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I would ask if Mr. Bérubé was not in the House as page before that time.

Hon. Mr. BERNIER—No; he came in 1886, according to what he says himself, and if we consider the time they have both acted as sessional messengers, Gagnon is still the senior of the other. Both were appointed on the same date, but the seniority was given to Gagnon, because of the fact that the report recommended that Gagnon should be paid from the 19th January, whilst the other was paid only from the 3rd March. Whether we consider the time spent in another way, as page or otherwise, or whether we consider the time they have acted as sessional messengers, Gagnon has the precedence of the other in every way. I do not want to insist unduly, but it seems to me, as a matter of justice, that we should not discriminate in this way. I take it as a matter of justice that Gagnon should be appointed. I move that the words in the third paragraph of that clause "Ernest Bérubé" be struck out and that the words "Moïse Gagnon" be put in their place.

Hon. Mr. MILLER—I am very sorry my hon. friend has thought proper to bring this matter before the House. He brought it before the committee and I think the decision of the committee was almost unanimously against it—unanimously in favour of the appointment of Bérubé, both on the question of right and on the question of merit. I think my hon. friend is wrong in his figures. Bérubé was in the service of the House, I venture to say, before this man Gagnon. I may state that Gagnon was brought into the House, not as a servant of the House, but as a body servant of an invalid member, and afterwards, through compassion, taken on, and his chief duty since that time has been his attendance on that invalid senator. At the time this was done I did not object to it. Many gentlemen condemned it, and said it was not right. From motives of delicacy they did not speak out, but as my hon. friend forces us to speak, I am not afraid to utter my opinion on the subject. With regard to the merits of the question, the man Gagnon is not equal to the duties of a sessional messenger. He speaks only one language, and is a lazy man besides. He has been a timber culler—employment for which I have no doubt he is admirably adapted, I think the service of the Senate would be just as well off if he had never been taken from that work and brought in here as a servant of a member. If he had the right by seniority to the appointment that he claims—which he has not—on the ground of his other disqualification for the duties of the position, I, as one member of the committee and of the House, would not be disposed to support him. The committee almost unanimously recommended this young man Bérubé on the ground of faithful service, he having been fourteen years in the service of the House and not a mark of any kind against him, and because he is qualified by his alertness and a willingness to do his duty, and possesses all the qualifications of a first-class messenger. Of course my hon. friend can use his own judgment in the matter, but, in view of the decision of the committee on the application of my hon. friend to the committee a few days ago, I am quite surprised that he should bring the matter before the House. The motion he has made is out of order; if he wants to make a motion it must be to send the report of the committee back for reconsideration, because I am very sure that, unless there are absolute instructions from the House, which a committee would be bound to obey, if given the committee would adhere to the decision it has already arrived at on the subject.

Hon. Mr. KIRCHHOFFER—While it was the intention of the committee, no doubt, that seniority in every case should to a certain extent be taken into consideration, I do not think it was in any way the idea of the committee that it was the only thing to be considered in making the appointment. Supposing all my hon. friend said was correct, that Bérubé was appointed, and the other man, his senior, was passed over, which is all he can contend for—though some hon. gentleman says that is incorrect—the expression of opinion in that committee was such that there was no hesitation whatever in saying that Bérubé was far better qualified for the appointment than the gentleman he advocates here. That committee which is composed almost entirely of Conservatives, chose a man who was announced to us as being a Liberal, because he was represented as being a better man and more fitted for the appointment than another who was reported to be a Conservative. That shows the temper of your committee is such that all that is necessary to place before them is the fact of merit, and that they will accept that before any other consideration.

Hon. Mr. PROWSE—Considerable has been said on this occasion, and perhaps unnecessarily said. While I have no feeling at all against the gentleman who has been recommended by the committee, I think a good deal has been said in reference to his opponent, or competitor, which perhaps might have been left unsaid. I have been in the Senate some years, and I must say I am satisfied of the good behaviour and good conduct of both applicants for the position, and I do not think it is very becoming for us, when we cannot give the position to both of them, to try to injure the character and prospects of the defeated man. I believe they both try to do their very best, and I have found them accommodating and civil in every way. One applicant happens to be a very large man, and that appears to be one of the greatest faults that he can have; but I do not think it should weigh very much with the members of the Senate. At all events there is one matter which should be taken into consideration—he is a married man, depending upon his little earnings to support his wife and family; and the other is a young man who can perhaps do better without the additional salary than Gagnon can. I feel like supporting the proposition made by the hon. gentleman from St Boniface, Gagnon being senior. Although it is said that he has not been as long in the service of the Senate as Bérubé has been, yet he has been longer in the public service. In that regard I think he is fully entitled to the position.

Hon. Mr. VIDAL—I agree with the hon. gentleman from Richmond as to the unwisdom, if I may use the word, of this matter being introduced in the Senate after having been so fully discussed in the committee and there decided by almost a unanimous vote. There can be no question in the mind of any one acquainted with Bérubé as to his eminent fitness for the position. He has proved himself a capable and faithful employé since he was admitted as a page. His ability as shown in his attendance at committees has always been such as to merit the approval of every committee on which he has served. I think the selection made by the committee was a very wise one, and it is a pity that it should be questioned in the House.

Hon. Mr. BERNIER—It has been almost insinuated that I have given wrong dates in my statement. I have in my hands here official documents which show that Gagnon has been in the employ of the Senate since December, 1885. I have here a certificate of the assistant accountant of the Senate, showing that Gagnon was employed as sessional messenger by the Senate before the other. I am very sorry to observe the promptness with which some hon. gentlemen question the statement of members of this House. I have not made any statement, without knowing what I was doing. As to the merits of the two men, as the hon. gentleman from Richmond has said, I have a perfect right to exercise my own judgment. I think that as one is as capable as the other to perform the duties of the position, the senior should be appointed.

Hon. Mr. MILLER—My hon. friend will find that Gagnon was brought on by a gentleman as his servant before he was engaged by the Senate, and was one or two years about the House before he was actually employed. Whether any gratuity was given him at the close of the session I do not know, but that he was longer in the employ of the House than Bérubé I think my hon. friend is incorrect.

Hon. Mr. BERNIER—I do not wish to force on the House an amendment which I see would be lost if pressed, and I, therefore, ask leave to withdraw it.

The motion was withdrawn and the report was adopted.

The Senate adjourned.

BUILDING SOCIETIES AND LOAN AND SAVING COMPANY'S BILL.

REPORTED FROM COMMITTEE.

Hon. Mr. ALLAN, from the Committee on Banking and Commerce, reported Bill (12) "An Act further to amend the law respecting Building Societies and Loan and Savings Companies carrying on business in the Province of Ontario," with an amendment. He said:—I may explain that part of the title was struck out. As originally introduced in the House of Commons, the bill contained several clauses relating to loan companies in Ontario which were all struck out except this one clause, and therefore it was necessary to make that alteration in the title of the bill in order to make the title and the bill itself agree.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL moved that the amendment be concurred in.

The motion was agreed to.

THE APPOINTMENT OF MR. LAFORTUNE.

INQUIRY.

Hon. Mr. PROWSE—Before the Orders of the Day are called I wish to call the attention of the Senate, and especially the attention of the leader of the House, to a paragraph which appears in the Citizen of this morning. It reads as follows:

> Sir Oliver Mowat brought down a bill restrictive of usury yesterday. This was in consequence of a recent judgment in one of the Quebec courts enforcing interest at the rate of five per cent a day. If we remember rightly the usurer was Mr. Lafortune, since appointed on the prison commission by Sir Oliver himself.

I bring this matter to the attention of the hon. gentleman so that he may have an early opportunity of contradicting and denouncing this paragraph in the Citizen, as well as the conduct of the wretch who had the brazen impudence and dishonesty to exact from any individual five per cent per day. Not satisfied, I understand, with taking five per cent interest per day, he enforced his claim by an action at law, and through the fault and failure of the law, he was able to recover the amount. I hope, for the credit of Canada and for the credit of those who govern Canada, that the statement contained herein is not true, that this wretch has been appointed to a responsible position under the government.

SUPREME COURT OF ONTARIO JUDGES' BILL.

FIRST READING.

Hon. Sir OLIVER MOWAT introduced Bill (J) "An Act respecting the Supreme Court of Ontario and the Judges thereof," and moved that it be read the first time.

Hon. Sir. MACKENZIE BOWELL—Will the hon. gentleman kindly explain the contents of the bill? I desire to call his attention, before he does so, to the question asked by the hon. gentleman from Prince Edward Island. As a matter of ordinary courtesy, I think the hon. leader of the House should at least answer the inquiry. He may not be responsible for the appointment which has been made, or the appointment may not have been made, but the House will agree with me that the hon. Senator who called his attention to the subject is entitled to some answer.

Hon. Sir OLIVER MOWAT—I did not reply, because I wished to make inquiries before answering. I had not seen the article in the Citizen which the hon. gentleman read and know nothing of what is alleged in it, but I shall make such statement, on a future day, as the case requires.

With regard to the bill introduced, there is no restriction in regard to appeals from Ontario to the Supreme Court of Canada as regards the value or amount in question between the parties. In regard to most, or probably all, of the other provinces, there are restrictions. Some years ago the Ontario legislature passed a bill limiting the appeals to the Supreme Court in order that unnecessary appeals might be avoided, or appeals where a small amount is claimed. It has been held by the Supreme Court here, I understand that the provincial legislature has no power to limit appeals. It is said that if a provincial legislature could limit appeals to the Supreme Court of Canada, they could practically abolish them, and therefore the limitation of appeals to that court is a matter for the Dominion legislature. Last session an Act was passed repeating the limitations of the previous Act, but expressing them differently, under the idea that if expressed as in the new it might be held that the local legislature had power to deal with the subject. The limitations are in accord with the public sentiment of Ontario, and there is the analogy of the limitations in the other provinces. That is one section of the bill. The other section is to provide for the residence of the judges. There is no statutory restriction in regard to the judges of the High Court and Court of Appeal in Ontario as to where the judges should reside. There is a restriction as to where the judges of the Supreme Court here should reside, namely in Ottawa or within five miles; and it is doubtful where the jurisdiction to limit lies in the case of the provincial courts. A late Minister of Justice held that a province had no right to pass a bill providing where the judges of the provincial courts should reside. I do not know whether he was right in that or not, but that view was acted upon, and the Ontario legislature has not thought fit to deal with the subject because of the question whether they have jurisdiction to do so. Of course, it is quite a reasonable thing that the judges of these courts should reside at the place where they sit as courts, and inconvenience is found where they do not do so. Therefore, I propose a clause requiring them to reside in Toronto, or within five miles, just as the Supreme Court judges of Canada reside here, or within five miles.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—I would ask the hon. Minister of Justice if the limitations in the other provinces were enacted by provincial or federal laws?

Hon. Sir OLIVER MOWAT—By the federal laws.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—In the other provinces?

Hon. Sir OLIVER MOWAT—In the other provinces.

The bill was read the first time.

A PROPOSED ADJOURNMENT.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Might I ask if the government has made up its mind as to any adjournment next week? Monday and Thursday will be holidays and on Saturday there will be no sitting. I should like to inquire as to what course the government intend to pursue, whether they will meet on Tuesday and Wednesday or adjourn over the week. We really have no business before us. I merely bring the matter under the notice of the leader of the government, in order that he may consider it. I have no particular wish one way or the other.

Hon. Sir OLIVER MOWAT—We shall consider it, and I shall reply to-morrow.

Hon. Mr. ALMON—I am opposed to such adjournments. Even if we have no business, we must pretend that we have—"assume a virtue if you have it not."

The Senate then adjourned.

THE SENATE.

Ottawa, Wednesday, 19th May, 1897.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

Prayers and routine proceedings.

HULL ELECTRIC RAILWAY COMPANY'S BILL.

AMENDMENT CONCURRED IN.

Hon. Mr. VIDAL, from the Committee on Railways, Telegraphs and Harbours, reported Bill (25) "An Act confirming an agreement between the Canadian Pacific Railway Company and the Hull Electric Railway Company," with an amendment. He said: The amendment is one which was proposed by those who are interested in the bill. No objection was made to it. It is merely a clause to protect some rights of the city of Hull.

The amendment was adopted.

THE DISMISSAL OF J. B. PROULX.

INQUIRY.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY inquired:

1. Was Mr. J. B. Proulx on the 23rd of June, 1896, an employé of the government as sectionman on the Intercolonial Railway in the County of Montmagny?
2. Has he been since that date discharged from his work by the present Administration?
3. When, why, and upon whose complaint?
4. What is the nature of the charge brought against him?
5. Has the charge been proved?
6. What is the nature of the proof?
7. If no proof exists, has the accused at least a diploma of infallibility? Granted by whom?
9. What was his reply?
10. If the person dismissed completely denies the truth of the charge brought against him, protests his innocence and offers to make it clear, is it the intention of the government to grant an inquiry or to refuse all justice?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—1. Mr. J. B. Proulx, was employed as section man on the Intercolonial Railway in the county of Montmagny on the 23rd of June, 1896.

2. His services were dispensed with at the request and upon the representation of Mr. Choquette, M.P., that Proulx had taken an active and offensive part in the late Dominion elections.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—At what date—when and why?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I have given the reason why, but I am not in possession of the date.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—I notice that although I have ten questions here, only two or three of them have been answered.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—The reply covers everything but the date. Proulx was discharged for active and offensive partisanship.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—Has that charge been proved?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—The proof was a statement made by a member of the House of Commons.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—And the tenth question—that is not answered.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—There is no answer to the tenth question. The man was discharged at the instance of a member of the House of Commons, who stated that Proulx had been guilty of offensive partisanship.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—But the accused person denies the truth of the charge. Is it the intention of the government to grant an inquiry or to refuse all justice?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—No, it is not the intention of the government to have an inquiry on the subject.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—I should like to be put in possession of the date of that dismissal.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Yes, I will ascertain that to-morrow.

THE DISMISSAL OF CHARLES BOUFFARD.

INQUIRY.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY inquired:

1. Was Mr. Charles Bouffard on the 23rd of June, 1896, postmaster at Berthier-en-bas, in the county of Montmagny?
2. Has he been since that date dismissed from office by the present Administration?
3. Why? And what is the nature of the accusation brought against him?
4. By whom was the accusation brought?
5. Does the accuser generally enjoy the gift of infallibility?
6. Was the accused officially made aware of the accusation brought against him, and had he an opportunity to refute it?
7. Has the Post Office inspector been required to hold an inquiry and to make a report?
8. Has an inquiry taken place, and what is the report of the officer making the inquiry?
9. If the person dismissed protests his innocence and completely denies the truth of the accusation, is it the intention of the government to grant an inquiry or to refuse all justice?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Mr. Charles Bouffard was postmaster of Berthier-en-bas on the 23rd of June, 1896, and was relieved of his office on the statement of Mr. Choquette, M.P., that Mr. Bouffard had conducted himself as a strong political partisan during the recent Dominion elections. The government, being fully satisfied with Mr. Choquette's statement, did not think any further inquiry necessary, and does not consider any good public purpose will be served by re-opening the matter.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—How does that agree with the statement made by the premier last session, that no man would be dismissed until after a full and ample investigation had taken place, and the accused was given an opportunity of defending himself?

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.)—The premier said so this session as well.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—He certainly said it in September last.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Are we to understand that the policy of the government in future is to be that a man is to be declared guilty and dismissed on the mere statement of any member of the House of Commons, without regard to the individual's innocence or guilt, and that no opportunity is to be given an accused official to defend himself or show that the charge is not true? I put this question, because I think it is well that the exact position of affairs should be known. I should like to know, also, whether the same courtesy is to be extended to senators that is accorded to members of the House of Commons. If a member of the Senate states distinctly that any man, being an officer of the government, has taken an active and offensive part in an election, is the accused official to be dismissed without any investigation of the case—is the statement of the senator to be taken, as it appears to have been taken in the case of Mr. Choquette?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Every case must stand upon its individual merits. I am not prepared to announce any policy on the part of the government with reference to the course they may adopt, further than this, that the statement made in the House of Commons and accepted by both sides—

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—No, no.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I so understood it—that if a member takes the responsibility of making the statement that a person, holding an office under the government, has been guilty of active or offensive political partisanship, that is quite sufficient to justify the government in dismissing him, and that is the policy the government has been following, except in some individual cases where it may have been considered necessary to have an investigation. I am not aware that there has been anything said or done to conflict with that principle.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—That was the principle laid down in the case of a day labourer, but not in the case of a high salaried official.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B. C.)—I heard the premier announce in the House of Commons this session that no one would be dismissed without being given a fair hearing and trial.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I have no doubt this man had a fair hearing.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—The policy of the government, as announced by the premier last session, was that no one in the employ of the government would be dismissed without a fair hearing. The only exception he made to that was in case a Minister saw the accused party doing the act of which he was accused—saw him personally. In that case no inquiry was needed, because his personal knowledge was sufficient, but with that exception it was declared by the Prime Minister that no man would be dismissed without being given a chance to answer the charge made against him.

THE FRENCH TREATY.

MOTION.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL moved:

That an humble address be presented to His Excellency the Governor General, praying that His Excellency will cause to be laid before the Senate a tabulated statement showing the effect which the commercial treaty between Canada and France has had upon the trade and revenue of the Dominion as compared with the three years preceding the date upon which the treaty came into force, in so far as relates to the various articles covered by said treaty.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—There is no objection to the address.

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—Is that statement intended to be up to date?

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I fear they could not well do that. It reads in that way. I am under the impression that our statistics would only show a correct statement up to the 30th June; however, I shall be prepared to accept it even up to that time. My object is to ascertain what the operation of the tariff is, particularly as it extends to all countries that have the advantage of the favoured nations clause. In looking at the trade and navigation returns, I notice that goods are imported from the United States which come within the provisions of that Act. I take it for granted that they must be goods of French origin, and production, which have been imported into the United States, purchased in the United States, and brought into Canada. Under the treaty they would be entitled to the low rate of duty as if they came direct from France, while we, under the treaty, are restricted to direct importation from Canada to France. Goods going to Liverpool and transhipped from Liverpool to Paris would not have the advantage of the treaty.

The motion was agreed to.

DISMISSALS OF LOCK MASTERS ON THE GRENVILLE CANAL.

INQUIRY.

Hon. Mr. OWENS inquired:

1. Was the dismissal of Thomas Foreman, lockmaster on the Grenville Canal, in consequence of the investigation held there by Commissioner LaBelle?

2. Does the government intend indemnifying Mr. Foreman; if so, to what extent?

3. Does the government intend paying Mr. Foreman his superannuation; if so, what amount?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—The answer to the first question is yes, and the answer to the second question is that it is not proposed to indemnify Mr. Foreman in any way, nor would it be proper to do so. The answer to the third question is no, Mr. Foreman will not be superannuated. A proposition is now being considered by the government with reference to returning to him the money he has paid into the superannuation fund.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Would the hon. gentleman inform us as to whether this gentleman has been in the service over ten years—that is, whether he has paid into the superannuation fund for ten years, and if so, upon what principle are they acting in refusing his superannuation allowance?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Without referring to the superannuation list I would not be able to say. I am unable at present to answer the question.

REPORT OF COMMISSIONER LABELLE.

MOTION.

Hon. Mr. OWENS moved:

That an humble address be presented to His Excellency the Governor Generl praying that His Excellency will cause to be laid before the Senate, a copy of the report of Commissioner LaBelle re the investigation held by him at Grenville and Grace's Point, about the month of December last: also, of all correspondence relating thereto, both before and since the said investigations were held.

He said:—I had reason to hope that the answer to my previous question would be such that I would find it unnecessary to ask for the papers mentioned in this motion, but I am surprised to hear from the hon. Secretary of State that no indemnity will be given to Mr. Foreman, and that he will not receive superannuation. Foreman was a lockmaster who had been engaged on that lock for thirty-three years. For the first four years he was engaged as a labourer in the summer and a carpenter in the winter. During the last twenty-nine years he has been engaged as the lockmaster, appointed by an Order in Council. During that twenty-nine years he has contributed regularly to the superannuation fund, and according to the laws of this country would be entitled to the full superannuation when his thirty years had expired. The fact that he has now entered upon his thirtieth year was sufficient to justify the government in paying him the balance of the thirtieth year and holding that he would then be entitled to his full superannuation. Foreman has been discharged in a most wanton manner. I presume he was declared to be a political partisan, but Mr. Foreman was not an offensive partisan. He might have had his own opinions, and recorded his vote, but he was not an offensive partisan and never acted as such. Moreover, he was one of the most competent lockmasters on the canal; no gentleman in Montreal would venture to say that there was a more competent official than Foreman. It is very poor encouragement, I must say, to the civil servants if a gentleman, after having spent thirty-three years in the service, is to be dismissed and thrown upon the street, and now the government turn around and as the Secretary of State intimates to-day "We will send him back his money." What would you think of any life insurance company, who had been receiving premiums for twenty-nine years from a policy-holder, that would turn around and say, "We will not pay you, but will refund you the premiums you have paid into the company."

Hon. Mr. PROWSE—We would say they were thieves.

Hon. Mr. OWENS—Then you would call them by their proper name, and what would apply to a company would apply to a government also. The system that has been adopted in Mr. Foreman's case has been carried on throughout. I do think it would be well to know exactly how the government does stand in this matter of dismissals. We have had from the Prime Minister in the House of Commons the declaration that no minister would attempt to dismiss any official without giving that official an opportunity to defend himself. Everyone would be given an opportunity to defend himself before he was dealt with. We have had a similar declaration in this House from Sir Oliver Mowat, the leader of the House. Even the Secretary of State, who is somewhat severe, has said that employés on the canal, who were good reliable officials, should not be dismissed. I challenge the House, and I challenge the Secretary of State to show me in any way that Foreman has not been a reliable and competent official. He is one of the most reliable and competent persons upon the canal; but this matter does not apply only to Mr. Foreman. It applies to the officials upon the canal generally. Upon the close of navigation last season, the lock labourers and other labourers upon the canal were notified that their services were no longer required and that they would not be engaged for the future. It was stated by one of the hon. members in this House quite recently that that has been the course pursued every year. Now, I will say that that course has not been adopted in the past. Those men have been paid up to the end of navigation. They were not paid during the winter when they were not working, but they held themselves in readiness to resume their positions when work commenced again. We have had men upon the canals who have held those positions for 25 and 30 years, year after year, holding the same positions on the canals. Last year, at the close of navigation, those men were turned out upon the country. They were notified that they would not be employed again, and you can realize, hon. gentlemen, the position it puts a man of that kind in, to be turned upon the world at this time—men who were reliable and competent and understood their work properly, after being so many years employed upon a government work. They were not in a position to take up other work. They were rendered unfit, to a certain extent, for agriculture or other work which they might have entered upon earlier in life. We have here before us those hon. gentlemen week after week denouncing the spoils system as it is carried on in the United States, and yet their colleagues in this government are carrying on a system ten times worse, in so far as its effect upon the civil service is concerned. They are dismissing the men from the canals and other public works without any charge whatever, or if there is any charge against them, the officials are not notified of that charge and are not given an opportunity to defend themselves, and as in this case of Foreman's they are dismissing officials who have been contributing to the superannuation fund year after year. We have been led to believe that those officials appointed by an Order in Council could not be dismissed without an Order in Council, but if we may judge from appearances, this government are dispensing with that formality and dismissing those officials without an Order in Council because it is quite certain that the colleagues of the Minister of Public Works and the Minister of Railways and Canals are not aware of the wholesale dismissals that are being made in those departments. The other day during the debate in this House, the hon. gentleman from Bothwell declared from his seat that only one per cent, or not one per cent, of the officials have been dismissed.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Hear, hear.

Hon. Mr. OWEN—I am not questioning the veracity of the hon. gentleman from Bothwell. I do not mean to say that he wished to deceive this House or to create a wrong impression, but I will say that the hon. gentleman was entirely in ignorance of the action of his colleagues. He was not aware of the dismissals that had been made by the Minister of Railways and Canals and the Minister of Public Works, or he would never have made such a statement in the Senate. Over 90 per cent of the officials upon the railways and canals—both upon the Ottawa canal and the St. Lawrence canals—have been dismissed. I will take the case of the Grenville canal, which I think will fairly represent the others, and I may mention that at the close of navigation last fall the government dismissed all the labourers upon the canal. Before the opening of navigation this spring, out of the seven lockmasters on the canal, four were dismissed; at the same time they were dismissed the political partizans and heelers of the government in the county, and it was stated that the remainder of the lockmasters, the collectors and the other officials would be dismissed so soon as the provincial elections were over. It was quite evident those gentlemen knew whereof they spoke. When they made these promises they had the authority of the government for making them, for it was only yesterday I received a telegram from Grenville announcing that the dismissals were being made and would be carried into effect to-day, and to-day I met in the city a political partisan of the government who informed me that the dismissals were to be made to day. Therefore, instead of one per cent, there have been 100 per cent dismissals on the Grenville canal alone. I ask is that the way you would treat old employés of the government, men who have been in the service 20 or 25 years. Here is a case of a man 29 years lockmaster, and for four more years employed on the same lock, yet he has been dismissed. Is that the way you are going to elevate the standard of the civil service? These gentlemen are being dismissed because they are political partizans. Now, I would like to ask hon. gentlemen, whom do you think is being appointed in the place of the officials dismissed? Why they are appointing the most offensive political partisans in the country. They are appointing the political heelers of the Liberal party in that county, men who are entirely unfit for the positions in which they are placed. I believe some of these men have gone so far as to sell the appointments. I am credibly informed that some of them have been selling the positions of labourers upon the canal, and those are the gentlemen from whom the representatives of these counties receive their inspiration as to who should be dismissed and who should be appointed in their places. As we have heard in this House from the Hon. Secretary of State; the government received their information from the Liberal member of a county, and upon his information they did not consider it was necessary to hold any investigation. It would be interesting to know from what source the Liberal member, or the defeated candidate, in the county received his information. Why, it is from the class of politicians I have been describing, and men are being dismissed that they or their friends may be placed in office. In the case of Foreman, they had an investigation upon a charge that was brought in writing from a party in the rear portion of the county, a man whom Mr. Foreman never saw, who accused him of canvassing him in the election. Foreman since drove out to see that party, and met him, and the man told him: "I know nothing about it. A certain party came here with a declaration written out, and asked me if I would sign it. He said there was nothing in it but just to sign it, and I signed it." That is the class of men from whom the Liberal representatives receive the information that comes in. Those pretended investigations, such as LaBelle had in Grenville, were simply that he came down to Grenville, and spent a night or two with the acusers,and in those particular cases, notified the officials to come there. They came in; there was no evidence taken under oath Any of those parties could come in and make any statement they wished. None of the evidence was taken down. There was no stenographer, nor did the commissioner who was there take down any of the evidence. He heard the statement that was made. One of the officials in particular had a lawyer to defend him; but the commissioner told him, "I cannot hear any lawyer; I cannot hear anything of the kind." He did not hear the defence. He makes his report to the government, and the accused hear nothing further about it except that they are dismissed. Now, if that is the Liberal interpretation of British fair play, if that is the way the Liberal administration is to be carried on in this Dominion, I may say, "Lord, help our civil service."

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—The hon. gentleman has rather taken the members of this House at a disadvantage. He has made statements purporting to be based upon an inquiry into Foreman's conduct without our having the papers before us. I have no information other than I gave the House.

Hon. Mr. OWENS—My question was before the House for the last seven days.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—It was simply a question, and there was no intimation that any debate would arise until the papers were before us. The hon. gentleman of course is quite within his right, although it is scarcely fair to the House that a debate should take place until the evidence is before the Senate.

Hon. Mr. OWENS—My reasons for making my remarks now is that papers similar to those called for by me—moved for early in the session, have not been produced yet.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—There were not called for more than a day or two ago. I have no explanation to make with regard to the statements made by the hon. gentleman and must await the arrival of the papers in order that I can ascertain how far his statements are correct. The other day when a similar subject was under discussion, it was not I who made the statement that no man would be dismissed on the canal except for cause. I said that the hon. Minister of Railways had made a statement—and I believe he adhers to that statement—that any employé who had not interfered in an offensive manner in politics, and who was a good, attentive honest man and attended to his work, would be retained. It was purely a question of merit, outside of the political question. If he interfered as a political partisan, he would be dismissed. As to the number of employés who have been dismissed, I myself stated that I did not believe that more than one per cent of all the employés of the government had been dismissed, and I believe if the figures were compared with the figures after the change of government in 1878, it would be found that the number of those who were dismissed for cause would be less than the number dismissed on that occasion.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—For cause?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—The former government were some time in power and the employés believed that they should be continued there in perpetuity. They did not recognize that any other than the then existing government should be sustained, and so they freely interfered in elections. No doubt appeals were made to them to do so, and if a man chose to take his political life in his hand, as admitted by both political parties, he had no right to complain. If his friends were successful, he made it a justification for advance and promotion. If they were defeated, of course, he simply had to take the consequences of it. The present administration do not believe in continuing the employment of men who actively interfere in politics. They are paid by all the ratepayers of this country and they have no right to take sides. If they do so, I say there is ample justification for their being dismissed. When the papers come down in this case we shall see whether there is any justification in this particular instance for the dismissal. I have no doubt the minister fairly considered it, and the question of what sum ought to be returned to Mr. Foreman will, no doubt, receive due consideration, and whatever is right and proper will be done. Where a man is dismissed for political reasons, he forfeits his superannuation; but it may be that he is fairly entitled to have the money he has paid in, with the government interest, returned to him. That is a matter to which the government have not yet come to any positive policy, but I am inclined to think that that is the conclusion that they will arrive at.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—The statements made by the hon. Secretary of State should not be allowed to pass without some little remonstrance. To begin with, he laid down this extraordinary doctrine, that this question has only been before the Senate for two or three days.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—This particular one.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I am speaking of this particular case. Then he goes further and says that these questions are not usually discussed until the papers are before us. The very object of having a motion on the notice paper asking for certain documents is to enable the member who puts it there, to give his reasons for so doing. That has been the practice in the past. I do not know, from what has taken place in the House during the last two months under this present government, what their policy is, for it seems to me they have one policy to-day and another policy to-morrow; one minister announces a particular principle which is just in itself, and to-morrow it is violated by the statements of one of his colleagues. That is the position in which they have placed themselves. It is the duty of every minister, when a notice is placed upon the paper, to make himself acquainted with the facts in order that the House may be put in possesion of them. We all know that papers when laid before the House give no opportunity for a member to discuss the question to which they relate, unless he makes a motion to refer them, or a motion of condemnation. So far as that is concerned the hon. gentleman's position is not in accordance with parliamentary practice or usage. Had the returns for which I moved some six weeks ago been laid before the House, probably we would have had the information sought for now by the hon. gentleman from Argenteuil. That return, for some reason or other, has been kept back. Numerous must be the number of commissions, and voluminous must be the evidence in the reports of these commissioners appointed to investigate cases of offensive partisanship, if it takes longer than six weeks to prepare the return.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I hope to have it this week.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—The hon. gentleman speaks of those officials who take an active part in elections—he guards it, I notice, on every occasion by saying "offensive partisanship," a term which I never heard defined. The law gives the right to every office holder to cast his vote. If he becomes offensive and abuses the government and acts in what I might term an ungentlemanly manner, he renders himself liable to punishment. There is no evidence, however, given in any of those cases that there has been conduct of that kind on the part of those who have been dismissed. Is it to be understood that it is only the party who casts his vote, or commits the offence to which the hon. gentleman has referred, against the party that happens to be successful in these contests——

Hon. Mr. MILLS—That has been your rule.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—That has not been our rule There has been no such rule laid down and no such practice carried out, except in cases of the character indicated by the hon. Secretary of State. I challenge the hon. gentleman to give me a single instance of the kind. I know he instanced two or three cases the other day—if I am not to be called to order for referring to a previous debate—in which the late Alonzo Wright had two or three officials dismissed for interfering in an election in the county of Ottawa. That occurred a number of years ago. The hon. gentleman's memory is tolerably good, and he must know that in those cases it was shown to the House, beyond a question of doubt, that the accused persons had become personally offensive to Mr. Wright, that they had condemned in the most virulent manner every member of the government at that time. If the hon. gentleman can point out to me any case where the individual was dismissed merely for voting, or on the ipse dixet of any particular member, I am quite willing, not only to stand corrected, but to apologize to the hon. gentleman for what I have said. Recent experience had taught us that the most violent politician who goes into a contest and supports a particular candidate, is the first man who is rewarded as soon as our opponents have an opportunity of doing so. My hon. friend from Argenteuil has told us that the very worst of political heelers have been appointed to fill the places made vacant by the dismissal of those officials who were dismissed for no good reason, so far as we know. I know of a case which occurred about twenty-five miles from where I live, where a collector of customs was dismissed. I am not finding fault with the dismissal, if they (the government) had reasons which induced them to dispense with his services. It was not on account of political partizanship. Who was appointed to fill his place? A man who was obliged to run away from the country in order to avoid being summoned before an election court to give evidence which he knew would not only have convicted the party with which he was connected, but would probably have disqualified half a dozen of them for some years. The hon. gentleman may remember the Dark Lantern Brigade that went through the county of Lennox some years ago. The man who carried the dark lantern and went about in disguise, and who afterwards was obliged to leave the country to avoid appearing before the court, is the one who has been given the responsible position of collector of customs in the town of Napanee, as a reward for his iniquities during the election to which I refer. Now, this is not the only case. I could occupy the House for some time in describing special instances. The principle on which hon. gentlemen opposite act appears to be this, that any man who dares to exercise his franchise without offensiveness in doing it, is to be removed, and the most offensive partisan who can be selected from their own party is appointed to fill the vacancy. I know the case of a postmaster in my own county, who was complained against by one of the leaders of the Reform party, the man who wanted the position himself, and they found some tu'penny ha'penny irregularity, which might occur anywhere in a country post office, and the official was dismissed and he who complained, one of their political friends, was appointed in his stead. If this doctrine is to be adhered to in the future, and if we are to understand that no official is safe in voting, let us place the employés of the government in a position in which they will know that. Let us pass a law and disqualify from voting any one who receives the slightest remuneration from the public treasury. It has been the practice in the past that every official should exercise his franchise. No one has questioned it, and it is only now that the spoils system in its worst features is being introduced. The hon. gentleman says that the Conservative party has been so long in power that office holders thought they should hold their offices in perpetuity. I dare say if hon. gentlemen opposite should be as long in power as the Conservative party were, they would hardly care to engraft upon our institutions the worst features of the United States system, or declare that because their party has been in power for a number of years, therefore, those they have appointed should not exercise the franchise. The hon. gentleman takes the ground that because a great majority of the public officials were appointed by the Conservative government and are Conservatives, ergo they must be dismissed.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—No.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Yes, that is the policy—dismissed to make room for those who have not been in that fortunate position. I wish to be understood—I find no fault with a government for appointing its own friends. Every government does that, but I say they should not make vacancies for the purpose of appointing their friends or rewarding the very worst character of political heelers that infest constituencies during elections. That is the position I take. If there is a complaint against this lockmaster on the Grenville canal, why was he not given an opportunity to defend himself, in accordance with the declaration made by the premier and by the hon. gentleman who sits opposite to me, a short time ago, that people should not be dismissed unless they had an opportunity of defending themselves? The hon. Secretary of State and the hon. member for Bothwell, who know so well what the Criminal Code of this country is, and what the rights of British subjects are—not to be declared guilty without being proved guilty—stand up in this House and say that on the mere statement—I care not though it be of a member of parliament—that a man has committed a crime, he shall be punished without an opportunity of defending himself. No one knows better than the Minister of Justice that if a man commits an open-day murder and it is witnessed by thousands of people, he is not hanged until he has had a fair trial before twelve of his countrymen and proved guilty. Surely it is time that this system of terrorism should cease in this country, and that men should at least have an opportunity of saying whether they are guilty or not, before they are punished by dismissal or in any other way.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—It is important, in discussing this question, that we should see whether we agree upon the principle upon which a government should proceed in reference to the retention or dismissal of public servants. The position laid down by the hon. leader of the opposition is scarcely the one upon which he acted as a minister of the Crown during the 18 years that he was in office or upon which those with whom he was associated acted.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I challenge the hon. gentleman to show a single case in the eighteen years that I was in office in which I took such a course.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—The hon. gentleman challenges me to do certain things. Let me say that the hon. gentleman, in the first place, appointed his political friends, I suppose he appointed those he considered most deserving, and in measuring the deserts of those whom he appointed to office, he considered what they had done for the purpose of promoting the views and principles to which he subscribed. I suppose that, as well as any literary or intellectual qualification, was taken into consideration by him, and so far as my experience goes, it was the paramount consideration in the appointments that were made. I do not think that the hon. gentleman derogates in the least from the propriety of that course, if it be a proper course, by calling those political heelers who do service for their party. The hon. gentleman, I assume, sincerely holds the views that he has promulgated as a public man, and he thinks the public interests will be promoted by the adoption of those views in parliament—that what he subscribes to in his capacity as a public man would be in the public interest if acted upon. He appoints those to office who supported and continued to support his principles and his opinions. The hon. gentleman says that the government appointed political heelers. What does he mean by political heelers? Those who did service, as those did service whom he appointed to office. If they are disreputable men, who ought not to be appointed because of their disreputable character, that of course, is an objection, but that disreputable character cannot be due to the fact that they supported the opinions and principles of their party, for I think the hon. gentleman will concede to the government and those who support them the same liberty of judgment which he claims for himself—the same sincerity of conviction which he claims for himself, and he ought not to deny to them the same means of maintaining and upholding those views and opinions which the hon gentleman claims for himself. The hon. gentleman has not conceded that to the government. He says that the government of which he was a member did not dismiss parties from office unless they were offensive partisans, but I understand that a man who having accepted a permanent position under the Crown to which an annual salary is attached, has accepted the position of a non-political public servant and having taken the office of a non-political servant, he is no longer entitled to enter the political arena and to take an active part in the conduct of public affairs in the same way as those who are political servants of the Crown. If he does so, then he takes his political life in his hands and should share the fortune of other political servants. If the government are beaten, the members of the administration are not allowed to retain their offices under the Crown. If the government which a person actively supports who holds a non-political office is defeated, he cannot plead that permanency of that non-political office for the purpose of maintaining him in his position against his actual conduct. He has no right to do so. Why, one of the important objects under our parliamentary system is not merely to have in the service of the Crown men of experience, but men who are faithful and whose fidelity cannot be questioned in the public service; but how is the government going to trust the permanent officers of the Crown if these men have appeared in every town and village, in every schoolhouse wherever a public meeting has been held, actively opposed to the members of the administration? They have forfeited the confidence of those who were politically opposed to them by the course they adopted. They are disqualified by their own personal voluntary action for continuing in the public service. They have no right to ask to be retained, and I do say this, that the hon. gentleman did not retain—his government did not retain those who went on the platform and took an active part in the election. They did not maintain those who took an active part in elections—who did not go on the platform, and no commission was issued and no inquiry was had, and parliament knew nothing of the facts beyond the declaration of the minister.

Hon. Mr. PRIMROSE—Will the hon. gentleman let me set him right in one matter? He made a statement just now which, to my own personal knowledge, is not accurate as applied to the district from which I come. I know a most active, energetic and offensive partisan Liberal who was retained under the Liberal-Conservative government, and is there yet.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—I do not know the particular case to which the hon. gentleman refers, but I know many cases where the rule acted on was the rule which I have stated. I believe no government, from the period of confederation—in fact in the ante-federation period—dismissed the country postmaster who was rewarded for his services by a small percentage on the amounts he collected. It was in the public interest that he should accept the position, and it was rather for the accommodation of the public than for any advantage to himself that such an office was held, but the rule was laid down by the leader of the Conservative party, Sir John A. Macdonald, at the very outset of confederation, that those who took an active part in the elections, who were permanent officials of the government, to whose office an annual salary was attached, ought not to be retained in the public service, and that proposition was enunciated by him in the discussion which arose in reference to the dismissal of certain officials in the constituency which had been represented by the Hon. Sydney Smith. There are many cases in which such dismissals have taken place, and let me say this, if hon. gentlemen will take the trouble to look over the list of sessional messengers and sessional clerks of the House of Commons at the close of the parliament of 1878, and compare that list of sessional messengers and sessional clerks with those who were engaged in 1880, he will see that there was almost a complete sweep made of the persons employed in the House of Commons, and the defence was that these persons were not in the permanent employ of the government, and it was open to the government to notify them to attend at the beginning of the session or not as the government pleased. Let me mention another case of a clean sweep—the case of those who were appointed to posts under the Weights and Measures Act. The leader of the opposition referred the other day to the fact that those persons had been appointed and had drawn their salary up to the time the new government came in without having the appliances necessary to discharge the duties of their office. The hon. gentleman in that is entirely mistaken. I am speaking of my own personal knowledge. I take the case of Mr. Watts, of the county of Bothwell; of Mr. Spettigue, of the city of London and county of Middlesex; of Mr. Campbell, of the county of Elgin—all those persons were employed as inspectors of weights and measures. They all had the instruments which had been purchased for their use to enable them to discharge the duties of inspectors, and by statute every one of those was removed from office. A new distribution of the districts was created and a new class of inspectors appointed. Not one of those men, although they belonged to the civil service, and had, I believe, paid into the superannuation fund, was reappointed to office under the new Act. It was a bold measure, no doubt, to remove so many, but it was easier to do so by an Act of Parliament than it was to have done so by the exercise of the discretion of the Crown. But it was done, and done effectually. The government of the day acted upon the assumption in that case that to the victors belonged the spoils. Now I say that would be an exceedingly unfortunate position to take. I do not think that is the proper course. I do not think that the government ought to remove for political reasons any man in the public service who has not been an active political agent or emissary during the election. I do not say that a government employee ought not to vote. The law gives him that right. I think it is unfortunate that the law does so, but as long as the law gives him a right to exercise the franchise, he may use his own discretion with regard to that; but if he goes into the streets and canvasses, and on the platform and speaks in favour of the views of his own party and against those of another if he takes an active part in the organization of the party if he takes an active part in the preparation of the voters' lists in doing all these things he is laying aside the character of a non-political officer, and is assuming that of a political partisan and is not entitled, nor is it in the interest of the public service that he should retain any office. Every man in the public service—no matter what his position may be in the permanent service—ought to know that if he engages in active political work he must share the fortunes of his party. He cannot be more fortunate than they are, and if they go out of office he should go out of office with them. He ought to know that when he engages in a contest, and I say that that is the only healthful and proper rule, and when it once becomes known and acted upon by both sides, I think he will hesitate before he engages in work of that kind We want in the public service non-political men equally earnest, equally faithful in the discharge of their duties, no matter whether their chief belongs to one political party or the other, and we will never have such as long as we have men actively engaged in political contests in the permanent service of the country. They cannot have the confidence of those who are opposed to them. They have no right to expect it. If the public service is to be an efficient service—a service after the English kind and not after the United States kind, then the public officials ought to abstain wholly from taking an active part in elections either upon the one side or upon the other.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—Much that has been said by my hon. friend from Bothwell will be accepted by those who at present constitute the opposition in this House, and will be accepted, I fancy, by the Conservative party generally as sound doctrine; but when my hon. friend deals in general principles, I wish to point out to him that those principles have not been observed in regard to the particular cases which have come under the observation of this House, and which have been discussed by members of it from day to day. The position taken by the Conservative party to day, and by the country, is that those general principles have been absolutely ignored—that public servants have been decapitated—that they have been deprived of their offices, and that their rights have been completely disregarded, irrespective of the fact as to whether they were political partisans or not. I subscribe to almost everything that my hon. friend from Bothwell has said to day, and said with equal force on another occasion, but when we come to apply these principles to the actualities we are called upon to face almost every day with regard to these dismissals, I must say that the government has certainly called upon itself the severest denunciation from every man who appreciates the principle of fair play being applied to officials in the public service. I was quite startled by the proposition laid down by the Secretary of State to-day—a proposition which goes very much further than any which he has hitherto laid down with regard to this subject. We were startled to hear, in answer to the case presented by the hon. gentleman from Inkerman, that notwithstanding the fact that a public servant has rendered thirty odd years of good and faithful service to the government of Canada, that nothwithstanding the fact that that public servant had contributed to the superannuation fund during all those years, he, at the caprice of some individual, possibly a member or a commissioner appointed for the purpose of investigating such cases, or some political partisan in the district in which this particular official resides, at the caprice of such an individual this public servant, who has spent almost a lifetime in the service of his country, can be not only deprived of his office but his superannuation allowance wiped out with one stroke of the pen. Although my hon. friend the Secretary of State, in that serious and solemn manner in which he usually conveys information to this House, has seriously laid this down as the policy of the government in this particular case, and presumably is to apply to other similar cases, I must certainly dissent from that view of the Superannuation Act and refuse to subscribe to that being the law of the land and dissent from the policy of applying it to any case. I say that when a man has been such a length of time in the public service as to bring him within the Superannuation Act, it is mandatory upon the government, on dismissing that man, if he has done good and faithful service in the discharge of his duty while in the employ of the country, to give him the superannuation allowance to which he is entitled by that Act. It was never the intention of parliament—it was never conceded to be the spirit of the Act, that it should be left within the caprice of the minister to say that such a servant as the one under discussion here to-day should have his superannuation allowance, which he has earned during thirty odd years, wiped out because, forsooth, of somebody saying he has been guilty of offensive partisanship. I have looked through the Civil Service Act, and through the Superannuation Act, and I do not find that because a public servant may interest himself in public matters, he, therefore, forfeits the rights to which he would be entitled under the law. I do not subscribe to the principle laid down by my hon. friend from Bothwell, that a public service must be necessarily a non-poltitical service. I find no such principle as that expressed in any of the Acts under which the public servants of the country are employed. I can very well fancy a case in which a public servant may to such an extent seriously interfere with the discharge of his public duties by taking an interest in political matters as to prevent him from faithfully discharging those duties; but so long as he discharges those duties faithfully and well, I say there is nothing within the four corners of the statute-book relating to the employment of public servants that would justify the government in taking the position which they have taken in regard to this particular servant, namely, that by reason of his having been a political partisan, if you choose to so term it—although the Secretary of State does not accuse him of being such—that he is hereby disqualified from the benefits of the Act. I say that even though he may be a political partisan, if he discharges his duties faithfully and well, as he is called upon to do under the Act by which he is governed, he is entitled to all the benefits and advantages of that, notwithstanding his political sympathies. And I feel satisfied that neither branch of parliament will consider the government justified in proceeding to such an extent in doing violence to a sense of justice, as has been done in this particular case. I might say, while I am on my feet, that I am quite prepared to accede to the principle laid down by the government, that if a public servant conducts himself so offensively in participating in political conflicts as to lose the confidence of the head of the department which may preside over the particular branch of the service in which he is employed, he cannot expect to be continued in the public service. It would be unreasonable to retain men of that character in their employ provided they are guilty of partisanship of so prominent and so offensive a character as to obtrude it upon the country to the detriment of the proper discharge of their duties.

Hon. Mr. PRIMROSE—Under the trend which the debate has taken this afternoon and considering the character of some of the answers which were given by the Secretary of State, especially to my hon. friend the member for Stadacona, I feel that it is my duty to take part in the debate. And in doing so I shall refer to a question which I asked the other day, and to which I received a certain answer from the Secretary of State. I do that because I have now under my hand information which will prove very clearly to this House that the hon. Secretary of State was not correct in the answer which he gave to me in regard to Capt. Wm. Mackenzie's dismissal. But before passing to that, I wish to make some comments regarding the answers that were given by the hon. Secretary of State to my hon. friend from Stadacona, for instance this question:

> If the person dismissed completely denies the truth of the charge against him, protests his innocence and offers to make it clear; is it the intention of the government to grant an inquiry or to refuse all justice.

Does any hon. member in this House think it is a satisfactory, or in any sense a sufficient answer to that query to say that they have been informed by a member of the House of Commons that this man was a political partisan? Is that a sufficient answer? I say no, it is an answer far more in consonance with the spirit of the autocratic government of Russia than of the Liberal government of Canada. In regard to the case brought up by myself, the dismissal of Capt. Wm. Mackenzie, the general answer given to pretty nearly every question propounded, namely, that of political partisanship, does not hold. There was only one other answer given—that the appointment was an annual one. No fault was found with the style in which this man discharged the duties required of him at the hands of the government. He was simply dismissed on the plea offered by the Secretary of State to make room for a Liberal appointee. I do not for one moment wish any hon. gentleman here to infer from any remarks I may make that I would wish at all to convey the impression that the Secretary of State would make a statement which he knew to be incorrect. I should be very far from doing anything of that kind; but I have now in my hands information which proves clearly that the following was the system adopted in reference to these dredges and here are the facts in regard to Capt. Mackenzie:

Mackenzie was appointed to the canal on or about 2nd May, 1896, by a letter from W. J. McCordick, superintendent.

In this letter, which was short, he simply informs him that he was appointed master.

There was at any rate no limitation in it, or anything to indicate that the appointment was only for the season. The custom with these dredges, the "Canada" and the "St. Lawrence" was in the fall of the year to pay off the crew—that is the hands including the mates—but the captains and engineers were always kept by the steamers in winter and throughout the whole year. Crews were re-engaged in spring, the captain and engineers were permanent officers. Thompson, formerly of the "St. Lawrence," and Lloyd, when in the "Canada" always stayed by them wherever they were laid up, and of course their pay went on as usual. Last fall the "Canada" was laid up at Liverpool, N.S., and the crew were, as usual, paid off. The captain and engineer remained in her all winter.

Here is a paragraph to which I ask the special attention of the House—as proving my contention that beyond successful controversy the appointment of captain and engineer of these dredges were permanent and not annual, as claimed by the hon. the Secretary of State.

Repairs were being done and Mackenzie was receiving instructions during the winter and spring right up to the time of his dismissal and of course was receiving full pay.

I think this makes the matter very clear as to whether or not this was simply an annual or permanent appointment. In regard to this matter and others like it, it is high time for the government to give up using the plea of offensive partisanship as a scapegoat to send out into the wilderness, bearing the incubus of their political sins upon its devoted head. When no other reason can be assigned than simply that of offensive partisanship, which has time and again in this House been proved to be in regard to the cases which have been cited inapplicable, I think it is time it was given up.

Hon. Mr. OWENS—In justice to myself I think I should say a few words in reply to the remarks which have fallen from the hon. Secretary of State and the hon. senator from Bothwell. The hon. gentleman from Bothwell has defined the question of political partisanship to a certain extent. I am sure every member of the House, or the majority, would agree with the hon. gentleman in so far as their action in relation to offensive political partisanship is concerned; but where we do differ is as to the means which they should adopt to find out who are those offensive political partizans. If it were proved that officials whom they charge with being offensive partisans, were such no hon. gentleman in this House would say a word in their defence, but what we do object to is when officials, good reliable men who attend to the duties of their office, and do not take part in politics, are held to be offensive political partisans and are dismissed. Now in relation to the subject under discussion, the dismissal of officials from the Grenville canal, I am in a position to know whereof I speak. The officials on that canal have not been offensive political partisans. There are amongst those officials on the canal gentlemen who have influence in the county. One of them is a gentleman who was at one time the Conservative candidate in that county, and probably no one man could exert a greater influence than that official, but what is the fact? Since his appointment to the public office he has never raised his hand or voice in the interest of his party. He was a political friend of my own, and I had occasion to take issue with him in reference to that. I considered, although he was a public official that it did not take away his right to be a citizen; but holding a public position, he would not do the first act in the election in the interest of his party. That is the class of men who are held up to-day as political partisans.

Hon. Mr. POWER—Was he dismissed?

Hon. Mr. OWENS—I received a telephone message that he was dismissed, and I heard from one of the hon. gentleman's political friends that he was dismissed to-day. It was promised by the hon. gentleman's political friends that he would be dismissed after the provincial election. The reason he was not dismissed before was this—the government knew that if they dismissed him he would take off his coat and go out into the county and work, but, being a public official, he did not raise his voice in politics. The hon. Secretary of State makes the statement that the remarks which I attributed to him were made by the Minister of Public Works—that his employés on the canal who were good reliable officials should not be dismissed. Unfortunately, the professions of these men do not tally with their practice; and, while the hon. leader of the House, and the hon. Secretary of State, and the hon. gentleman from Bothwell are perfectly sincere in their statements to-day, their colleagues, the Minister of Public Works and the Minister of Railways, are taking just the opposite course—dismissing the officials on the canals from one end to the other—dismissing men who have not taken any part in the elections and who are not political partisans. The hon. gentleman from Bothwell has asked me to define the meaning of "political heeler." A political heeler is one of the lowest politicians in the ranks of a party. There are always sufficient of them to be found, and they are not absent from the ranks of the Liberal party. Those are men who are clamouring for office—asking to have officials on the canal dismissed. When I refer to those men as political heelers, I do not say that honesty or respectability do not belong to both parties. No doubt honest and respectable men can be found in the Liberal party, but these are not the men who are asking for dismissals. The clamour comes from the lower ranks. My reason for rising was to reply to the speech from the hon. Secretary of State who, in opening the debate, stated that the government were taken at a disadvantage—that this matter was sprung upon them to-day and they were taken by surprise. If the hon. gentleman will look at the Order Paper he will notice that not only the questions which I have asked, but the motion for the papers was upon the Order Paper since the 7th May—twelve days—and certainly the government cannot claim that they are taken by surprise in reference to this matter. They find that the action of their colleagues, who have been making those dismissals, is utterly indefensible, and they now say that the matter is sprung upon them and they are taken by surprise in this discussion.

The motion was agreed to.

DELAYED RETURNS.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—Before the Orders of the Day are called, I wish to ask the hon. gentlemen on the treasury benches when we may expect some of the returns asked for by members on this side of the House, some of which were inquired for early in the session. There are some three returns I moved for myself, none of which would call for any delay in preparation. One is referring to the steamer "Petrel," showing what her work has been during the winter, and there is another relating to better terms, or correspondence with the government of Prince Edward Island with regard to any new financial arrangement between that province and the Dominion. My hon. friend said he thought perhaps there was nothing more than one letter upon that subject; I think we might have that letter. There is also a motion which I made asking for a telegram sent by the Minister of Marine and Fisheries. Those are three returns that I have asked for which would require very little time to prepare.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I will make inquiry about them. In reference to the better terms paper, I find that they have for some time past taken documents over to the Privy Council, and I have given instructions to have them hunted up. We have a number of returns, but I think the Post Office Department has not sent in returns, and possibly one other department. I saw the Postmaster General on the subject, and asked him to hurry up the papers as much as possible, and he promised them before the end of the week, when I hope all the other returns will be complete.

CRIMINAL CODE AMENDMENT BILL.

EXTRA COPIES.

Hon. Sir OLIVER MOWAT—Before the Orders of the Day are called, I wish to make a motion. The officer in charge of the distribution office says there is an unusual demand for copies of the Criminal Code Amendment Bill, and suggests that there should be an additional number printed, 250 copies in English and 100 in French, and I move that the House make an order to that effect.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I do not think that motion is strictly in order. It is requiring an expenditure of money directly by a vote of the House. I know in the popular branch we were not permitted to do that. The course pursued in the Commons, when extra of copies of any documents were required, was for some hon. member to move, sometimes a minister and sometimes a member of the opposition, that it be referred to the Printing Committee and they would order it.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—I will call the hon. gentleman's attention to the fact that we provided a shorthand writer for the law clerk, which implies an expenditure of money.

Hon. Mr. McKAY—That comes out of the Senate funds.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—That comes out of the contingencies of this House, and we have a right to dispose of our contingencies as we please. We can appoint messengers, and that incurs expenditure. We can appoint a clerk and give him assistants, but this is a matter which comes out of the general expenditures of the country. My hon. friend, if he has contingencies in his own department, has power to order these copies printed if he pleases, but the regular way, I know, has been, in the past, to refer it to the Printing Committee. I do not suppose he desires to depart from the ordinary rule in matters of that kind.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—As this bill will go into committee to-morrow, and possibly the House may not see eye to eye with the bill as it at present stands, and it may undergo several changes, would it not be better to have it printed after it leaves the committee?

Hon. Sir OLIVER MOWAT—These gentlemen are applying for copies and want them for the purpose of making suggestions which we could discuss in Committee of the Whole.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—It is only the members of the House who could discuss suggestions in Committee of the Whole and we are supplied with copies.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I think the hon. Minister of Justice is right. I have sent half a dozen copies of the bill myself to police magistrates and those who have been in the habit of acting in cases of this kind, asking them for suggestions as to clauses; perhaps the Minister of Justice desires the same thing.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—In that event it would not be well perhaps to go on with the second reading of the bill to-morrow—we would require to have more time.

Hon. Sir OLIVER MOWAT—We will get suggestions up to prorogation. We may as well dispose of what we have now.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—It may be in the recollection of hon. gentlemen that a motion to revise the bill was made two days ago, and no objection was taken to it. I think motions of this kind have been made. Perhaps the best way is to refer it to the Printing Committee and in the meantime to give the order. It can be referred to the Printing Committee, who can take cognizance of this at a later stage.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I do not know the strict parliamentary rule, but I know the rule that the leader of the opposition lays down has not been adopted in this House in the past. Some three years ago the hon. gentleman introduced a very long bill respecting insolvency, and that was reprinted, and I do not think there was ever any reference to the Joint Committee for authority to do it.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—No.

Hon. Mr. POWER—It was an expensive job, the reprinting of that bill, and inasmuch as we have a right to order the printing of a bill in certain numbers, we have a right to order any additional number which may be necessary for the use of members. That has been the practice at any rate. I do not undertake to say what the strict rule is, but the practice which the hon. gentleman proposes to lay down now has never been adopted in this House in the past.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—There is just this difference, if I may be permitted to point it out; the bill he refers to was the Insolvency Bill—a long and expensive bill. That was never referred to the Printing Committee. It was introduced by the government, and the printing of it charged to the department where it was originated, and when it was reprinted the same charge was made again and it was paid for out of the contingencies of that department. That is quite a different thing from moving for the expenditure of money. The general rule and practice of our whole constitution is that no member of this House can make a motion which necessitated the expenditure of public money or appropriate public money for any purpose other than comes from the ministry of the day by message from the Governor General. The way we used to get over the difficulty was by the mode I suggested—moving that it be referred to the committee. The hon. gentleman from London is chairman of the committee, and he would take cognizance of it and would proceed to have it done so as to avoid delay. I am not prepared to say that the Secretary of State is not correct, because it may have escaped the attention of the members present. I do not remember it, but we have got into the habit of doing things somewhat irregularly very often and probably this was one instance of it. I think we should not set a precedent which is not constitutional, small as it may be.

Hon. Mr. POWER—If the matter is referred to the committee on printing the additional copies of the bill will not be ready when we go into committee to-morrow, and that being the case, I think the wiser course would be to adopt the suggestion made by the hon. gentleman from Calgary, and have the bill reprinted in such numbers as may be required as amended in Committee of the Whole.

Hon. Sir OLIVER MOWAT—It would be very convenient if we had these copies before going into committee.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—When a motion of this kind is made, I do not know that it has ever been objected to: the chairman of the committee takes it in hand and gives the order for it. He takes that responsibility and I have no doubt the hon. gentleman behind me (Sir John Carling) would do it.

Hon. Sir OLIVER MOWAT—I do not wish to do anything irregular. I thought we followed the English practice as closely as we could. When I was in a different position, motions of this kind were constantly made and constantly carried. No one thought the British North America Act required they should be sent first to any particular committee. It certainly seems a cumbersome and roundabout way. I understand my hon. friend suggests that instead of the motion being carried now, it should be taken cognizance of by the chairman of the committee without its being carried.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Yes. My hon. friend from Bothwell knows very well what the practice is. The chairman in the House of Commons takes cognizance of it and it is done.

Hon. Sir OLIVER MOWAT.—What is to be done with the motion in the meantime?

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Drop it. However, I will not press my objection if the hon. gentleman wishes the motion carried.

USURY IN QUEBEC.

AN EXPLANATION.

Hon. Sir OLIVER MOWAT—An hon. member of this House yesterday read an article from the Citizen in which he suggested that a Mr. Lafortune, who had been lately appointed as one of the commissioners for investigating the affairs at St. Vincent de Paul Penitentiary, was the person who had been in the habit of charging 5 per cent a day upon his loans. I had heard nothing of it and was therefore unable to make any observation upon it. I have made inquiries and this is what I have learned: Mr. David A. Lafortune, advocate of Montreal, who has been appointed commissioner for the St.

Vincent de Paul Penitentiary investigation, is not the man who recovered judgment upon a note bearing interest at 5 per cent a day. The latter is Ambrose Lafortune. The person appointed is David A. Lafortune. This man is Ambrose Lafortune, a trader. There is no connection whatever between the two gentlemen.

THE PRINTING COMMITTEE.

ADDITIONAL MEMBERS.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Before the Orders of the Day are called, I would like to direct the attention of the Senate to the message sent from the House of Commons to-day appointing an additional member to the Printing Committee. Our rules provide that there shall be 21 members. Rule 80 reads:

> The Joint Committee on the Printing of Parliament whereto there shall be appointed twenty-one senators.

That limits us to the number. I notice in the committees from the House of Commons that they have 22 to our 21, and they have now added another which makes 23. I thought probably that the appointment of Mr. Perry might possibly be in the place of some other person, but I find the motion made by the Hon. Mr. Laurier was to add the name of Mr. Perry to the Joint Committee on the Printing of Parliament. Would it not be well for us to change our rule, leaving it optional with the Senate to appoint as many as they think proper—at least as many as are appointed by the House of Commons? It is a Joint Committee and each House has always been represented by equal numbers. I call the attention of the House to that, as I think it is a matter where we should stand upon an equality.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Our rule is positive, apparently. It would involve changing our rule. I suppose it is not a matter of sufficient importance to warrant taking it up at the present stage of the session. We might consider our rule, if they are going to depart from the former practice.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I do not know what their rule is, but the suggestion I made is that if the Commons have the right to appoint as many as they please, we should have the same right.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—If the House of Commons were to appoint 90 members on the committee, we could not appoint an equal number.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Yes, we could. The constitution gives the power, on an address asking the Imperial Parliament to increase the number of senators in this House, to add to our number; whether the power which is given us would be sufficient to make up the 90 I do not know. I have not looked at it yet. If not, we might in a grave matter of importance like this have the constitution changed in that respect.

THE SENATE DEBATES.

FIRST REPORT OF THE COMMITTEE ADOPTED.

Hon. Mr. BELLEROSE moved the adoption of the first report of the Committee on Reporting Debates. He said: The contract made with Holland Bros. in 1885 does not cover an extra session. The tenth section of that contract provides that, in the event of an extra session, a special agreement shall be made. Had the work last year been done under their contract, they would have been entitled to a balance of $3,182.86. The reporters have consented to reduce this sum by $682.86, leaving $2,500 due them, and this amount the committee recommend should be paid.

The motion was agreed to.

JURISDICTION OF THE EXCHEQUER COURT RESPECTING RAILWAY DEBTS BILL.

SECOND READING.

Hon. Sir OLIVER MOWAT rose to move that the second reading of Bill (G)

"An Act as to the jurisdiction of the Exchequer Court with respect to railway debts" be fixed for Friday next.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Is it the intention of my hon. friend to refer this bill to the Railway Committee or to a committee of the whole House? There are so many private interests involved in the passage of this measure that it would be better to refer it to the Railway Committee, where the parties could appear on behalf of those whom they represent, and whose interests might be affected by this bill.

Hon. Sir OLIVER MOWAT—I entirely approve of the suggestion. Perhaps, in view of that, we might take the second reading to-day and refer the bill to the Railway Committee. I move the second reading of the bill.

The motion was agreed to, and the bill was read the second time.

The Senate adjourned.

THE SONGHEES INDIAN RESERVE.

MOTION.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.) moved:

1. That it is desirable that the Songhees Indians, on the reservation in the city of Victoria, be re-removed as soon as possible to a more suitable locality in the country.

2. That the legal rights of the province of British Columbia, if any, in abandoned Indian reserves, be ascertained without delay, and a settlement of that question be made as soon as practicable.

3. That a suitable reserve having a sea frontage be selected for the said Indians; that it will be advisable that Mr. J. W. McKay, of the Indian Department at Victoria, from his knowledge of the country, the Indians, their requirements and manner of living, and three head men of the village should be associated in selecting the reserve and the site for a new village.

4. That houses be erected for the said Indians suitable to their requirements, out of the funds to their credit.

5. That an allowance of money of about one hundred dollars be made to each family, to provide food and clothing for the winter, out of the funds in the hands of the government to the credit of the Songhees Indians.

6. That on the accomplishment of the recommendations in paragraphs 2, 3, 4 and 5 of these resolutions, that the said Indians be compelled to remove, should they not do so voluntarily.

7. That the said reserve be forthwith surveyed, laid out in lots or half lots and disposed of at auction to the highest bidder.

8. That the surplus funds from the sale of the reserve over and above the price paid for a new reserve, the cost of erecting houses, the cost of removal and any advances made, be placed to the credit of the said Indians.

9. That it is desirable that the new reserve be occupied in severalty by the heads of families who may wish to embark in agricultural pursuits.

He said:—As the subject matter of this resolution is new to the present government, I should like if they would give me their attention for a very few minutes until I explain briefly the meaning of this resolution. The question is a very old one and was before the former government for a number of years to try to get those Indians removed from the reserve at Victoria. The town has grown around the reservation and it is an eyesore to the people, and a detriment to the town, and it is a very great injury to the Indians as well. They are brought into contact with immoral, drunken men, who do them a great deal of injury in many ways, and therefore it is desirable—especially desirable for the Indians—that they should be removed as early as possible, far more desirable than it is to please the inhabitants of the city of Victoria. I believe there have been negotiations going on for a number of years between the Provincial and Dominion governments on the subject. There is a legal question involved, that is, the right in the province to an Indian reservation when it becomes abandoned or not occupied by the Indians, and that has been the hindrance to the removal of those Indians. I believe there has recently been correspondence, and that the Provincial government desire or expect to get the reserve after another reserve has been purchased. The provincial government expect to have the balance over and above the price of the new reserve paid to them and that, I take it, is the question which prevents the matter being settled. I do not know how it stands now, or what its legal aspect is. I dare say the Minister of Justice will be able to tell us exactly how it stands.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Has it ever been referred to court ?

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.)—I do not know how it stands. Some years ago the Dominion could have had a very handsome sum for this reserve, I think $250,000, from the provincial government. At that time they could have sold it to advantage, and now I do not suppose it will bring over $30,000 or $40,000. There is no demand for land in that part of the country. At present there is a great stagnation in real estate, and no one wants to buy, although every one wants to sell. With regard to the third paragraph, of course it is evident to hon. gentlemen that Indians require a sea frontage for the reserve, because they live chiefly by fishing, and the reason I mentioned Mr. McKay, is that he is a gentleman thoroughly acquainted with the country and the Indians and speaks the Indian language well, and knows all their manners and customs, and knows what would suit them. The fourth paragraph should commend itself to the House, that out of their own money houses should be erected on the reserve, and the fifth paragraph is that $100 be allowed to each family. I mention this amount because the Indians have spoken to me several times about it. They are aware that there is an amount belonging to them, the proceeds of rents from the reserve now held by the government, and when they require that money for the purchase of food and clothing, they do not see why they could not have a part of it. If they were given a certain amount of money in hand to buy supplies for the winter, then they would be willing to move to the new reserve ; otherwise there would be some trouble in getting them away from the old place. I think that will commend itself to the government as well. The Minister of the Interior, in whose department this matter comes, is not at all familiar with this question, and therefore I mention these matters in detail, because I know myself what the feelings of the Indians are. After the reserve has been selected and some of their own men associated with Mr. McKay in making the selection, then I should make them move. There are very few of them, and by having the government steamer they could be transported in a few hours to the new reserve, which I believe will be within eight miles of Victoria. Then I should recommend that the old reserve be at once surveyed and sold, pending of course the question of the settlement as to the rights of the province, whatever they are. The land might sell for a fair price. At all events it would sell for more than would buy the new reserve, and for more than would build houses for the Indians, and give them a certain amount of money in hand.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I fully appreciate all the hon. gentleman says on the subject of the advantages which would accrue to the Indians if they were moved to a more suitable place, and I also fully appreciate the great benefit it would be to the city of Victoria to be relieved of what must be an eyesore in having a body of Indians within the limits of the city. As the hon. gentleman observes, this question has been going on for a very great number of years, and efforts have been made to overcome the conditions which now prevail to let the Indians remain where they are. It has always been, however, the policy of the Indian Department, where the Indians are on a reserve, that they should not be forcibly removed. We must obtain their consent. I understand in this particular case the Indians would not consent under certain terms : that is, that the Indians should be paid for any individual improvements they may have made on the principal portions of this reserve in Victoria, and that a reserve should be obtained in a portion of the country somewhat more removed, or on the margin of the ocean, that would be suitable for them. The reserve to which they would be removed would be of comparatively small value, and the main difficulty, as far as I can gather, between the federal government and the government of British Columbia is the question of the difference in value. Assuming that the land in Victoria is worth $30,000 or $40,000, the few hundred acres that would form the Indian reserve in an outlying district remote from any settlement, would be only worth so much per acre, probably one or two or four dollars an acre. That difference the federal government considers the government of British Columbia should pay, inasmuch as they then would be able to sell the land within Victoria now occupied by the Indians, at a very considerable price, just depending upon the market value at the time the land would revert to them and the exchange would be made. It is just a question of the money difference. The Indian Department have furnished me with the specific answers, and probably hon. gentlemen might desire that those answers should go on record in order that the people of British Columbia should be apprised of the difficulty in the way of the arrangement from the standpoint of the Indian Department. The memorandum reads as follows :

The removal of the Songhees Indians from their present reserve has formed for some time the subject of communication between the Dominion and Provincial governments. The present administration is quite seized of the desirability of removing the Indians to a more suitable location, but as trustee and guardian of their interests it devolves upon it to provide that in effecting the removal the rights and interests of the Songhees Indians shall be fully guarded. When the question, therefore, came before it an Order in Council was passed and communicated to the provincial authorities, setting forth that this government was ready to instruct its commissioner to proceed at once in the matter upon the government of British Columbia, intimating its assent to the following statement of the scope of the proposed commission.

The hon. gentleman is probably aware that a year or two ago a commissioner was named on each side, one to represent the federal government and one the provincial government, and in arriving at the basis on which an estimate should be formed as to the difference to be paid, the British Columbia government objected to any terms being defined of payment as between the value of the two properties.

Hon. Mr. McINNES (B.C.)—Who were the commissioners?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I do not know. Perhaps they may be named in this paper. The document continues :—

1. The commissioners to select a tract of land as a new reserve for the Songhees Indians, and to value such land and the land comprised in the prssent reserve, assessing the difference in valuation, such difference to be made good by the province, either by a money payment to the Dominion government as trustee for the Indians, or by the allotting of additional land to the satisfaction of the Superintendent General of Indian Affairs, it being understood that such land as the province may set apart for the Indians will be conveyed in fee simple to the Dominion government, and that the land comprised in the Songhees reserve will revert to the province.

It was taken as a subject solely by itself and dealt with on its own merits and demerits.

2. The commission to value the improvements of individual Indians upon the Songhees reserve, such Indians to be compensated by the province therefor by a money payment through the Dominion government, or by the making, at the cost of the province, of improvements of equal value upon the land selected as a new reserve.

3. The commission to negotiate with the Indians as to their removal, and to fix the time, and to make all necessary arrangements for such removal, the expenses of such removal to be borne by the province.

4. The expenses incurred by each commissioner to be paid by his respective government.

5. Nothing which may be agreed to by the two governments and the Indians in respect to this matter to in any way affect the claim of either government as to other Indian reserves in the province.

6. The report of the commissioners to be subject to the approval of their respective governments, and the Indians of the Songhees band to be consenting parties to the removal.

The provincial government replied accepting the terms stated with the exception of the provision for the compensating of the Indians for the difference in value between their present reserve and the new reserve which might be set apart for them, and intimating, in effect, that the new reserve should be taken as a fair equivalent for the old one.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B. C.)—That is the whole difficulty.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—It would seem absurd, as one might have a market value of a couple of thousand dollars and the other of thirty or forty thousand dollars, according to the value of property at Victoria : it would be a rather unfair thing, because the difference in value would go to the funds belonging to the Indians. It would not go into any other funds and it is their property, practically, the federal government being simply trustees. It would simply be a breach of faith for the federal government to acquiesce in any other proposition. It seems so apparent that one cannot understand why there should be any hesitation in carrying it out.

Although anxious to meet, as far as possible, the views of the government of British Columbia and the legislature of that province in the matter, this government felt that it could not, without disregarding the interest of the Indians for the management of whose affairs it is responsible, agree with the proposition that the site which might be selected by the commission as a new reserve should be accepted in exchange for the valuable tract at present occupied by the Songhees Indians, and accordingly informed the Songhees that it could not agree to a reference of the question to a commission without it being provided that such commission be directed to value the present reserve and the site which might be selected, and to assess the difference between them, such difference to be made good by the provincial government.

No direct answer has yet been received to this expression of the position of the federal government in the matter, but a resolution of the Legislative Assembly was transmitted intimating that in the opinion of the assembly the terms which the provincial government agreed to as the scope of the proposed commission should be concurred in by the federal government. On the 17th ultimo, the provincial authorities were informed that a consideration of the resolution had not led to any change in the views of this government, and up to the present no further communication from the provincial government has been received upon the subject.

2. The question of the rights, if any, of British Columbia in reserves in that province is, under an understanding come to between the two governments, to be made the subject of a reference to the Supreme Court, and the law departments of both governments have been in communication to that end.'

This controversy about these reserves has been going on for a long time, because in looking over the file I find that in 1875 I made a long and elaborate report on it in hopes of having the matter settled and, strange to say, it cropped up again twenty odd years after.

3. In the event of the removal of the Indians being arranged for this government will see that the new reserve is advantageously situated and acceptable to the Indians.

4 & 5. The amount at the credit of the Songhees Indians is not sufficient to warrant the government to committing itself to the proposal as to erecting houses and granting an allowance out of the funds at their credit of $100 to each family, and, if the amount were sufficient, the capital of an Indian band could not, under the law, be used as proposed without the consent of the band.

6. It would be contrary to the established Indian policy of the government of Canada to compel the Indians to remove, and under the law their consent is essential.

7. At this stage of the negotiations for the removal of the Songhees Indians it would be premature to lay down any policy as to the subdivision and disposal of the present reserve.

8. Whatever moneys may arise as a result of the disposal of the present reserve will, after meeting legitimate charges, go, as a matter of course, to the credit of the Songhees Indians.

9. In the event of the Indians being removed to a new reserve under the law as it stands the title of the whole band to the reserve must be recognised. Subject to such title, location tickets may be issued to individual Indians for their holdings upon the reserve, which location tickets secure them in possession of such holdings. It would be impossible for this government to go further than the issue of location tickets in the way of providing for the holding of land in severalty by the Indians, unless such Indians should elect to become enfranchised under the enfranchisement clauses of the Indian Act.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.)—The reply is very full and ample. I am very glad to see the government intend to reserve the rights of the Indians in any surplus there may be in that reserve. The chief difficulty is between the two governments as to what their rights are and what they ought to receive, and I do not think any settlement really will be had unless some agreement is come to have an arbitration in which both parties agree to submit to whatever the award is. That is the only way to arrive at it. The province has rights in the matter and the Indians have rights. Whatever surplus there is over and above the value of the new reserve they have a right to share in. As to the buildings, the new houses for the Indians, that would be with their own money, in the hands of the government, and not with the funds of the government or of the country.

Hon. Mr. McINNES (B.C.)—I would ask the hon. Secretary of State if the government have the power, with the consent of the Indians, to dispose of that reserve.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.)—That is where the trouble comes in.

Hon. Mr. McINNES (B.C.)—I would like if the Secretary of State would give me an answer to my question.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Perhaps before the hon. Secretary of State answers I might supplement the question. It seems to me, looking at this matter while I had the honour of occupying a position on the other side of the House, that the difficulty consists in the claims which the British Columbia government make to the land in case of the removal of the Indians, and that really the point in dispute is, if the Dominion government purchases land and establishes the Indians upon another reserve, when the Indians remove from their present location, the lands that they now occupy should revert to the province instead of the Dominion. If that point were settled, then the Dominion would be in a position to negotiate at once independent altogether of the British Columbia government, because they could purchase other lands with the Indians' money and locate them upon a new reserve and sell the present reserve to any purchaser in British Columbia, placing the surplus required, after establishing them upon another reserve, to the credit of the Indians and pay them annuities as they do in Ontario. That seems to me to be the difficulty existing in the settlement of this question, and if the government would act in accordance with a portion of that report and submit it to the Supreme Court for a decision as to the actual ownership in case of the removal of the Indians, that would settle the question, and then both governments would be in a position to act as they thought best in the premises.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—The question is a very wide one. It might be that the Supreme Court would decide that the Indians owned the whole of British Columbia. It appears that the British colonists took possession of the land, entirely ignoring the Indians. They never made any treaty with them fixing reserves, and I remember, when I was in the government before, acting for the Interior Department and Superintendent General of Indian Affairs, having a very long correspondence with the British Columbia government, pointing out the unfairness of the course they were taking. They endeavoured to corral the various bands of Indians on small reserves, quite unsuited to them and quite contrary to the policy that has been observed in all the provinces of the Dominion How far that question has been settled I am not at this moment prepared to say, but it then was a very embarrassing question, the British Columbia government maintaining that the Indians were not entitled to any property. They claimed the whole of the province, although the Indians had made no surrender. Applying common sense principles to the particular subject under discussion, it cannot be doubted that the Indians have a right to the lands that they are now placed on within this comparatively small reserve in the city of Victoria. There would be no difficulty about the title. If an exchange was made and the difference paid between the new reserve at a remote point, costing a few thousand dollars, and the value of the reserve in Victoria, the federal government would of course release to the British Columbia government all its claim and interest in the land. It would revert by the consent of the band to the trustee and the provincial government, so that there would be an absolute title. There is no trouble on that score. The only trouble is the British Columbia government want to make an equal exchange for lands of an entirely different value.

Hon. Mr. McINNES (B.C.)—The reason I asked the question a few moments ago was this: Some nine or ten years ago the late Mr. Robert Dunsmuir, who built the Esquimalt and Nanaimo Railway, which railway runs through a portion of this reserve, applied for the whole of the reserve to the then Sir John A. Macdonald government. The reserve comprised, I think, one hundred and ten acres. The proposition was favourably received by Sir John A. Macdonald. Mr. Dunsmuir offered $60,000 for the reserve, and the transfer was all but accomplished, but it fell through on the eve of a general election, or something of that kind.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.)—It fell through in this way: the Indian agent in Victoria told Sir John A. Macdonald that they could not sell it.

Hon. Mr. McINNES (B.C.)—My hon. friend's statement may be correct, but my information was and is that the Indians at that time consented to the transfer—that is, the purchase of 400 acres of land some five miles further west of Victoria. I think it had a frontage of one-half a mile or a quarter of a mile on the Straits of Fuca. They consented to it, and out of the $60,000 that Mr. Dunsmuir was to pay for this reserve, a sufficient amount was to be used in paying for the erection of suitable buildings for the Indians on the new reserve. I must confess I cannot see myself that the local government of British Columbia have any particular right to that reserve, if an arrangement can be entered into by the government here and the Indians for a new reserve. My idea is that the reserve ought to be auctioned off, and the proceeds, after paying for a new reserve and the necessary buildings and all the expense in connection with it, should be placed in the hands of the Receiver General for the benefit of the Indians. What my friend has stated about the demoralizing effect of having those Indians almost in the very centre of Victoria, I cannot emphasize too strongly. It has a most demoralizing and degrading effect on the Indians themselves, and, unfortunately, upon the low class of white people, as hon. gentlemen can well understand, in seaports like Victoria and Esquimalt. For the sake of the city of Victoria and the whites living there, to say nothing of the Indians themselves, I would say at the very earliest moment they can be removed from there, they should be removed. It will be a benefit to the Indians and the white people of Victoria. I trust that the present government will lose not one moment longer than they can help in having that accomplished.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.)—I will withdraw the resolution. I will not ask the House to adopt something which they know very little about.

THE INSPECTOR OF FISHERIES FOR PRINCE EDWARD ISLAND.

INQUIRY.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON rose to :

Call the attention of the Senate to the fact that James Yeo, of Port Hill, Prince Edward Island, was recommended on the 6th July last, by the late government for the office of Inspector of Fisheries for Prince Edward Island, and that on the 16th day of September last, the present administration by Order in Council, declared that this was not an appointment from which His Excellency's approval was to be withheld, but that nevertheless effect has not been given the aforesaid recommendation and Order in Council,—

And inquire why Mr. Yeo has not received notice of his appointment ?

He said : This matter was brought up in this House last year, and on that occasion my hon. friend the leader of the Senate explained that the question of giving effect to this Order in Council was then engaging the consideration and attention of the government. It is within the recollection of hon. gentlemen that on the 8th of July last the Governor General instructed his private secretary to send a memo. to the late government with reference to the number of recommendations to appointments that had been made on the 6th and 7th July last year and that the Governor General had signed these. Statements had been made here and elsewhere that these appointments were not approved. It appears from this memo. that they were signed by the Governor General. The private secretary said so distinctly, but that he desired that his approval should be withheld from all those appointments which came within a certain category, that is, where new offices were created, where vacancies had existed for more than one year, or where superannuations had been ordered without having been applied for. The present government, on the 16th day of September, passed an Order in Council defining these different appointments, declaring which of them came under the category from which the Governor General's approval should be withheld, and declaring further another class, which was placed under schedule "D," of those from which it was not intended that the Governor General's approval should be withheld. I pointed out last year that Mr. James Yeo had been appointed inspector of fisheries, and that his appointment was included in the category of those appointments from which His Excellency's approval was not to be withheld. I called the attention of the leader of the government in this House to the subject and his final answer was that the carrying into effect of this appointment, among others, was receiving the consideration of the government. It appears that it is still under consideration or, if anything has been done, it has not transpired publicly, as far as I am aware. Mr. Perry, the gentleman who was defeated at the last general election, had been, I believe, performing temporarily the duties of the office up to a very recent date—until he was at the by-election returned again to the House of Commons. Up to the present time I have not learned of the appointment of Mr. Yeo, which was recommended in July last and which was not disapproved or placed in the category to be disapproved by the Governor General. The recommendation having been signed by him, as stated by the private secretary in his memorandum, and the present government having on the 16th September formally passed an Order in Council declaring that this was so, and that this was an appointment which was not to be disapproved by the Governor General, I think it is a most extraordinary thing that effect has not been given to that Order in Council. Has it come to this, that a minister in any department is able to override and overrule an Order in Council passed by the ministry as a whole ? It would really seem that the Minister of Marine and Fisheries has undertaken to appoint persons to act temporarily in public positions, and that this can go on for nearly a year notwithstanding that an Order in Council has been passed by the government as a whole declaring that a regular appointment has been made and approved by His Excellency the Governor General. All I can do is to call attention once more to this matter. It may be, although it has not transpired publicly, that Mr. Yeo has received notice of his appointment. It may be that his appointment has been cancelled. If so, it has been very recently. We want to know in what position this matter stands at the present moment.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—My hon. friend is not quite accurate in making the statement that His Excellency approved of all the names that were contained in what is called schedule "D." His Excellency the Governor General returned, as you remember, the papers he had not formally approved—he had, I think initialled them in the margin. In the opinion of the Minister of Justice, all those appointments that come within that would require to be submitted for His Excellency's official approval. Mr. Yeo's name was never submitted for the approval of His Excellency, and in October last an Order in Council was passed which I will read to hon. gentlemen:

> The committee, with reference to the following recommendations of the Treasury Board, contained in the reports referred to in His Excellency's memorandum and relating to appointments in the Department of Marine and Fisheries, report as follows:—
>
> (3) James Yeo, recommended as fishery inspector for Prince Edward Island. The committee do not consider that it would be in the public interest to make this appointment, as the circumstances under which he was recommended, showed that political considerations alone, and not the public interest, prompted the submission of his name for the position.
>
>
> The committee, therefore, advise that the appointment of Mr. James Yeo as fishery inspector for Prince Edward Island be not confirmed.
>
> * * * * * *
> The committee submit the foregoing for your Excellency's approval.

So that the reference was practically cancelled by this Order in Council.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Was that Order in Council approved by His Excellency?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Yes.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—That, I understand, was after this memo. was laid before the Senate.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Yes, it would be after that.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Was Mr. Yeo notified of the cancellation of that Order in Council?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I presume he was. I cannot speak positively, but I presume he was.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—As a matter of fact he was not.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Some one has been discharging the duties of the office.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Mr. Perry, the defeated candidate, performed the duties of the office until he ran for the House of Commons a couple of weeks ago. Was he performing the duties of the office under an Order in Council or by order of the Minister of Marine and Fisheries?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I cannot tell.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Was there any written instruction placing Mr. Perry in that position?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I think not.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—We know he had just been defeated; and this was the compensation for the defeat. I think the hon. gentleman had better acknowledge the truth at once.

THE DISMISSAL OF CAPTAIN McDONALD.

MOTION.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON moved:

That an humble Address be presented to His Excellency the Governor General, praying that His Excellency may be pleased to lay before the Senate, all correspondence relating to the removal of John N. McDonald, as captain of the steam dredge "Prince Edward," and the appointment of William Sharp Larkin to the said position.

He said: This transaction—I suppose we may call it a transaction—the dismissal of Capt. McDonald and the appointment of Mr. Wm. Sharp Larkin, is one that cannot be defended. Capt. McDonald was for twelve years employed in different capacities upon the dredge. He had served from the lowest position on that dredge until, in the course of promotion from time to time, he became captain. He was made captain on the death of Captain Doyle, a little more than a year ago. I have very good reason to know that on the death of Capt. Doyle very many applications were made by persons, with political claims on the late administration, for the position thus made vacant, but the government, on the recommendation of the department and departmental officers, deemed it best in the public interest that the appointment should be filled by the promotion of the best man on the dredge, in the opinion of the department, and that was done by the promotion of Capt. McDonald, who had served long on the dredge as a faithful officer and who had no claim whatever except his merit. Last winter Capt. McDonald received notice that his services were not required, and some two weeks ago, I understand, Mr. Wm. Sharp Larkin was appointed to that position. I know that the hon. Secretary of State has expressed the view that public servants ought to be non-political,—that they are paid by the entire population and should not, therefore, be strong partisans. No charge of any kind has ever been preferred against Capt. McDonald, and it has never been alleged that he was a political partisan at all. He was simply notified that his services were no longer required, and an extreme, ardent politician has been appointed to succeed him. It is well, perhaps, that hon. gentlemen should know who this person is who has been appointed to that position. Larkin was the petitioner in the West Prince election trial and there is no doubt whatever that he has no qualifications for the position which would entitle him to the appointment, and that his appointment is entirely and wholly due to the fact that he served the political party that is now in the ascendant in the matter of the protest in the election trial of West Prince. In order to show the kind of man Larkin is, I have only to read, from the official report of the West Prince election case, an extract from the evidence taken at that trial to show the sort of man who has been appointed in the place of Capt. McDonald, an old faithful public servant whose promotion was due entirely to his merit. This man Larkin was put on the witness stand in order to prove his status as a voter, and of course he was open to cross examination. Mr. McQuarrie, the opposing counsel, asked him "did you get any whisky for distribution at the last election?" His reply was follows:

> I got a barrel at the station in Tweedie's name at Alberton. I got it by order endorsed to me. Came to order. I took them home. Marked groceries. I can't say Tweedie requested me to take them to my place. Whisky in the package. 3 to 5 gal. keg, might be 10 gals. I took this to Tweedie's. This was in May, I think early in May. I delivered them in 48 hours. Tweedie was an active friend of Perry's at elections and he and I active about petition. Tweedie sampled them.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Sample what? The whisky?

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—Yes. I put this authentic information before hon. gentlemen, and I want to point this out as an evidence of the institution of the spoils system, at least as far as Prince Edward Island is concerned. In order to make a place for this party heeler, this man who filed the petition against the return of Mr. Hackett—who was unseated, as hon. gentlemen will remember, because one charge out of a great many in the particulars had been proved, that one man had given another a taste of whisky out of a bottle—yet this man, the petitioner in the case, had, himself, according to his own admission on the witness stand, distributed a barrel of whisky. He said it was a ten gallon keg. This man is rewarded for the lowest stamp of political service by being appointed captain of a dredge, a position for which he has no qualification. No greater outrage upon the public service has been perpetrated. Under the late government the appointments to this dredge were settled by promotion, as I have already mentioned, and Mr. McDonald received the appointment by ordinary promotion without the interference of politicians at all; but we have this man now dismissed and a political heeler appointed in his place. I need not amplify on the subject. I merely move for the return, and when it is brought down I may have something further to say about it.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I am extremely sorry to hear the disparaging character given by my hon. friend opposite of the people of Prince Edward Island, and I was particularly shocked to hear that this distribution of whisky had occurred in a Scott Act county. I do not like to challenge the truth of the hon. gentleman's statement, but I confess I feel somewhat skeptical that the people of Prince Edward Island would break the law in so open a manner, particularly at a time when their calm judgment was required to record their votes for the proper candidates at the elections. The facts of the case I am not conversant with, other than I am furnished with them by the department. I learn that Captain McDonald had not been employed during the winter. In January he was advised that his services were not required. Subsequently, some months afterwards, when the dredge was called into requisition another person, the one named by my hon. friend in not very complimentary terms, was appointed to the position. The department did not regard it as a dismissal, inasmuch as in the winter, if I am correctly advised, it is not usual to continue the captain under pay. Whether last winter was an exception to the rule observed in former years I cannot say, but during last winter, at all events, the services of the captain were dispensed with while the vessel was laid up, and in the spring of the year another person was appointed to the position. However, the papers will be brought down.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—I do not find fault with the non-employment of Captain McDonald during the winter time. It is not customary to pay men when they are not employed. The complaint is that he was not engaged as usual at the opening of the season—that he was not notified to take his place in May as he had formerly been for years.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—The House will be somewhat surprised at the answer given by the hon. Secretary of State. First of all he tells us that he is somewhat skeptical as to the correctness of the statement made by my hon. friend on my right.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—About the distribution of whisky in a Scott Act county.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—He can scarcely have paid attention to the statement made by the hon. gentleman. In giving expression to that opinion he casts a reflection on my hon. friend, and at the same time discredits the solemn oath of the man that the government has appointed to the captaincy of the dredge.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Oh no, it was the general character of the people there.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—My hon. friend from Prince Edward Island read an extract from the evidence of this man Larkin. It is not his own statement merely. It is an extract from the affidavit made by Larkin himself, yet my hon. friend says he is skeptical as to the correctness of that statement. He not only doubts the veracity of the man whom he has honoured by appointing him captain of the dredge, but he also casts a reflection on my hon. friend who has read an extract from the record of the Supreme Court. He made no statement upon his own responsibility. And with the information that he evidently has himself of Mr. Larkin, being skeptical of the truth of Larkin's affidavit, let us hope that he will see that he is removed from so responsible a position. If not, I think the hon. gentleman will not be doing his duty either to his government or to the country. There is another point connected with this. The excuse is constantly given in cases of this kind that an officer who was removed is not a permanent officer, and, therefore, it cannot be considered as a dismissal.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—He was not removed; simply not reappointed.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Thank you. I am very glad, the ministers have got somebody to put them correct and to instruct them as to the style of the answers they should give to questions of this kind. What I wanted to point out—and I think the hon. gentleman from Bothwell knows it just as well as I do—is, that there is a class of officials in the Dominion known as "temporary permanent." That is what they are termed and have been termed in the different departments. That is the class of men who are employed from year to year, their business ceasing in the fall, or in the spring, as the case may be, and then re-employed when the interest of the service requires it. Take the case of Montreal: there are scores of officials who are appointed during the summer to work assisting in the loading and unloading of dutiable goods when they arrive at that port. It is just the reverse in Halifax. Halifax becomes the winter port and during the winter there are a large number of men put on to perform the same character of work that is performed in Montreal. When the summer comes, and the vessels cease to make Halifax their terminus, then these men are not employed, not being wanted. It is the same thing in the winter season in Montreal. These men are employed year after year. In this case a faithful servant was employed some eight or ten years, and had worked himself up from almost a labourer on the dredge until he became the captain, and now he is removed for this person who purchased whisky in order to corrupt electors, and who is so untrustworthy that my hon. friend is skeptical of his affidavit made before the Supreme Court. However, I will leave the case with the government. It is a fair illustration of the policy pursued by members of the government, and in that course of dealing I wish them luck.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I am sorry the hon. gentleman did not see the point of my remarks.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I took what you said.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I am quite sure the hon. gentleman from Marshfield did not understand me in the same way as my hon. friend who has just spoken. I did not dispute the statement he made as to the fact inferentially that the distribution of this keg of whisky was in order to corrupt the electors: I, in a jocular kind of way, expressed my regret and skepticism that the people of Prince Edward Island could be so easily corrupted by whisky.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—I said nothing at all about the people. I only spoke of this official of the government. He himself on his oath admitted that he had obtained this liquor at that time and for that purpose.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I am rather surprised at the incredulity of the Secretary of State, because the impression upon my mind is that there is no place where whisky is more keenly appreciated than in a Scott Act county. I just wish to direct the attention of the House to the rather solemn prospect which is before us. The hon. gentleman from Marshfield has told us that the spoils system is in full operation in Prince Edward Island, and the hon. gentleman has apparently set out with the intention of calling the attention of the Senate to every single case of dismissal, or removal or suspension which occurs on the island. Now, if the spoils system is in full operation in Prince Edward Island as the hon. gentleman asserts, and if the hon. gentleman persists in the course he has begun, this House will have nothing to do, during the remainder of this session at any rate, but to consider those cases of dismissals and suspensions in Prince Edward Island. I was going to suggest that it might be better for the Secretary of State, in the interest of the general business of the House, to plead guilty and say that he would not contest any more of these assertions.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—A good suggestion.

Hon. Mr. POWER—But there is just this about it—the hon. gentleman from Marshfield makes those statements where there is no one on the other side who is familiar with what has taken place in Prince Edward Island. Now, in the other Chamber, there are gentlemen on both sides of politics who, I assume, know what has taken place, and if a statement is made there which, while it may not be absolutely true, gives an altogether false colouring to the position of things, that statement can be set right. Hon. gentlemen must see that in this House that is not the case. I am not accusing the hon. gentleman of intentionally colouring those statements, but every one knows that unintentionally and insensibly one's views of facts are coloured by his political feelings, and it is to be regretted that the time of this House should be taken up to so great an extent as it is in discussing matters where they can only be discussed from one point of view, where we have not the information on the other side. I venture to say that the hon. gentleman is aware of the fact that this captain, who has not been re-employed, was a good Conservative, and I venture the further assertion that if any one of those men who has not been re-appointed to the position which he held—not a permanent position at all, but the position to which he was appointed each season—had voted Liberal he would not have been re-appointed by the late administration. It is perfectly absurd, those hon.

gentlemen assuming the air of a virtue which they never possessed, and which no party in this country does possess. Where a man is a permanent employé it is right and proper he should be continued, and if an employé is not, strictly speaking, a permanent employé, if he is a man who has given satisfaction and not rendered himself objectionable in taking too active a part in politics, I think that he should be re-employed, but I unfortunately am not as strong a party man as most politicians are, and as long as we have the present system of government in this country, it is absurd to expect the government of the day to appoint their enemies to positions and to give their enemies employment. It never was done by any government since confederation, and I think the day is remote when it will be done by any government. It is not creditable to the Senate that the time of this House should be taken up by discussions of this kind. When there is a case of a man who has been a permanent employé and who has given no substantial reason for being dismissed and has been dismissed without inquiry, then that is a matter to call attention to, although I think myself that the other chamber is the place in which it should be discussed.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (P.E.I.)—I do not agree with the views of the hon. gentleman from Halifax on this matter. There is no doubt it makes a government feel uncomfortable to find that the various appointments and dismissals they have made during the time they have been administering the government does not meet with the approval of the opposition, neither does it meet with the approval of men who are not swayed by political influence throughout the country. Those men who look to us to get a prudent government, a good and wise administration do not approve of the system of dismissals that has been in vogue since this government came into power. The hon. gentleman says that the Secretary of State or the government should plead guilty to the number of dismissals that have been made, and that they should take their stand on that. I believe if they took their stand on that question, and said they would dismiss from office all those who have opposed them, they would find that the country would not approve of that system. We know that system was pursued for many years in the United States and they found it led to such demoralization of the service that they have been doing away with it as far as possible.

Hon. Mr. POWER—I did not say the Secretary of State should declare that the government should dismiss everybody who opposed them. I said the best way was to plead guilty so that the charges would not be brought up day after day.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (P.E.I)—I have no doubt the hon. gentleman would like to see that course pursued.

Hon. Mr. POWER—No.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (P.E.I)—But if the various dismissals in the provinces were brought up day by day, it would occupy the time of the government during the remainder of the session to explain and justify the dismissals which they have made. With reference to the parlicular case under consideration, I happen to know something of the circumstances under which McDonald had been captain of that dredge. The dredge has been laid up during the winter season within sight of my residence, within a hundred yards of it, and I could see this man going down day by day during the winter season to that dredge, and performing what duties he had to perform there until he received his dismissal from the government some time in the spring. I am not quite sure of the month, but it was somewhere near the opening of navigation. Now, that gentleman was known by every person who was acquainted with the working of the dredge, to be one of the most efficient men who could be placed on that dredge or on any similar vessel in any part of the Dominion. He had served his time, as stated by the hon. member for Marshfield. He was twelve years in the employment of the government in the dredge. He was a long time working on that dredge in one position or another and his efficiency was the cause of his being promoted. Other gentlemen, who were strong friends of the government then in power, applied for the position, but the government, considering that this man had every right and every claim to it, from his superior knowledge of the working of the dredge, appointed him to that position, and I am quite sure it had the approval of every person who was not swayed by political considerations. The hon. gentleman said that he was sure that any person who had not voted for the late government would not have been retained in office. That is a statement which I certainly must dispute, for within my own knowledge a very great number of the employés of the government in the province from which I come were opponents of the Conservative government and they were retained in office.

The motion was agreed to.

FISHERY BOUNTIES CLAIMS.

MOTION.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON moved :

That an humble address be presented to His Excellency the Governor General, praying that His Excellency may be pleased to lay before the Senate, a return showing the names of all persons who filed similar claims for fishery bounty before Stanislaus F. Perry, acting inspector of fisheries Prince Edward Island, up to the 20th day of April last ; also the names of all persons who filed similar claims before James F. White, bounty officer, up to the same date.

And also, showing the tames of all persons who received fishery bounty in the West Riding of Prince County, in the months of March and April last.

The motion was agreed to.

LIGHTKEEPER AT FISH ISLAND, PRINCE EDWARD ISLAND.

INQUIRY.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON rose to Call the attention of the Senate to the fact that Charles E. McDonald, late acting lightkeeper at Fish Island, in the province of Prince Edward Island, has been removed from office, notwithstanding that he was recommended on the 6th day of July last, for permanent appointment by the late administration, and that the present administration has declared by Order in Council, on the 8th September last, that this was not a recommendation from which His Excellency's approval was withheld. And inquire, why effect was not given to the Order in Council of the 8th of September ?

He said : This case is very similar to Mr. Yeo's case, and it is not necessary to discuss it in detail. It is the same in every respect, except that in this case Mr. McDonald has been superannuated and another man put in charge of the light. In all other respects, the appointment was made under the same circumstances and received the Governor General's approval in the same way as the other did. I will just remark in connection with those motions that it is not correct, as stated by the hon. gentleman from Halifax, that I am in the habit of putting a notice on the order paper in relation to every dismissal made by the government in Prince Edward Island. In fact, I have studiously abstained this session from making motions or putting anything on the order paper until the information has come down, unless it would be where some special feature attached to the case, such as, I think, attached to those which I have made to-day, particularly this subject of appointments made on the recommendation of the late government and solemnly approved by Order in Council by the present government in September last, and not carried into effect by the heads of the departments, and afterwards, as in the case of this one, cancelled by the government itself and another man put in the position. If I were to call the attention of this House and put a notice on the order paper for every dismissal that has been made in Prince Edward Island since this government came in, we would have a very voluminous record indeed, for the dismissals have been going on incessantly in that province from the time this government came in My hon. friend from Halifax is of opinion—or at least he very often expresses the opinion—that this House is not a proper place to ventilate such matters as this. I heard my hon. friend say that repeatedly last session, and after that, almost for the sake of getting peace with him on this side of the House, we agreed to drop these motions, and some of his friends put on a notice themselves and took up a whole day in discussing it after the opposition had practically given up the discussion. Some time before that I had dropped a notice I had on the order paper in relation to such a matter. I do not agree with my hon. friend that this is not a proper place to bring up a matter of this kind. A non-political civil service should be regarded as a legacy belonging to the Dominion of Canada, and the House of Commons should not be considered in so great a degree the custodian of that great inestimable right which we should have of having a non-political permanent civil service in this country. I am sorry to say that the day is almost past and gone when we can lay any such claim. We talk disparagingly of the neighbouring republic in this matter. Why, they are practically in a better position in the United States on this question than we ever were, even under Sir John A. Macdonald. But as compared with the position in which we stand under this government, the United States is very much before us. I was recently in New York, and in conversation with some of the leading men learned that they had established the competitive system for appointments to public positions, and the only discretion the government has is to select one out of the three highest on the list of those who had engaged in the competition. They have taken appointments practically out of the hands of the politicians, leaving them only the choice out of the three highest names on the list of those who have competed. In Canada, at the present moment, we have lost every vantage ground that we gained for a long time. We were gaining ground on that question by the firm stand which Sir John A. Macdonald took upon it; more was due perhaps to Sir John than any man. We knew well in our province how firm a stand he took when in 1873 the patronage of the province fell entirely into the hands of the Liberal party who opposed the confederation, and who, it was believed, had not a fair claim to the patronage. Yet, owing to the events that took place in the autumn of 1873, the change of government resulted in the manning of the Prince Edward Island Railway and the filling of the civil service of the province, after confederation, entirely from the Liberal party. In 1878 a great many dismissals were made from the local civil service at the time of confederation, and in 1878 a very strong pressure was brought to bear upon Sir John A. Macdonald to dismiss those parties who were appointed in 1873 and subsequent years, and give a share of the patronage of the province to the Conservative party. It is a matter of notoriety there that Sir John Macdonald's government firmly resisted, and it was a great source of weakness and annoyance that such should be the case. From 1878, the Liberals had the entire control of the patronage of the province, as they came in in 1873 and reversed the appointments under the local government, and manned the railway and had the entire patronage in their hands, and the result was a great deal of dissatisfaction existed from that time forward among the Conservatives, but, as I said before, Sir John A. Macdonald's government firmly and emphatically resisted. I did not intend to make this statement, but I was led into making it because of the remark of the hon. member from Halifax, who seems to be particularly a defender of the faith for the government, for whenever their explanations are plainly not satisfactory, my hon. friend gets up behind them and endeavours to help them out of the difficulty in some way or other. I do not expect any very different reply with regard to this subject than that which I received to my other motion in reference to the appointment of Mr. Yeo. As I said before, the cases are almost entirely alike, and I suppose I will be treated with a somewhat similar answer, but it does seem to me to be an extraordinary thing to keep these appointments standing in this position, the Governor General having not disapproved of them, having signed the recommendation. I know my hon. friend shakes his head, but here is what was done:

> The memorandum with reference to Treasury Board's report Nos. 2611, 2612, 2613, 2614, 2640 and 2653, which are returned herewith subject to this memorandum and signed by the Governor General, having been submitted to him on the 6th and 7th inst.

And then the private secretary goes on to say that pending further consideration of Council he wishes his approval to be withheld from some of these recommendations, and he then describes what they are. He wishes his approval to be withheld from the following:

> First, where new offices have been created, where vacancies have existed for more than a year and where superannuations have been made, or where appointments have been made and filled, superannaations which are not asked for.

But beyond that the private secretary says the Governor General approves of these.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—No.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—He signed them.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—No, they are not signed.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—Yes, and this is all embodied in the Order in Council of the 16th September, which reads:

> The Council is of opinion that the several recommendations set out in the schedule hereto annexed, marked "A," come within the category of those from which your Excellency withheld your approval, and that those set out in the schedule hereto annexed, marked "B," come within such category, and the Council advises accordingly.

JOHN J. McGEE,
Clerk of the Privy Council.

And still, in the face of that, this appointment, which is included in this schedule "B," has been held over for more than nine months, and finally the person holding the appointment has been notified that his appointment has not been confirmed, and another person is appointed to the position.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—His Excellency did not sign the particular appointment. He signed the reports of the Treasury Board, in order to identify them. They were initialled in order that they might be identified, I understand. The classification was made by the Clerk of the Privy Council, and, as I explained before, the opinion of the Minister of Justice was that, in order to carry out the appointment in schedule B, it became necessary to secure the direct approval of His Excellency the Governor General. Before going into the merits of this particular case, I wish to say a word or two on the general question which my hon. friend has brought up so very frequently before this House, that the Conservative party, when they came into power in 1878, were so delicate and tender to the interests of the civil servants then in the employ of the government that they were not disturbed. What was the fact that everybody knows who is familiar with the subject? That they made very great changes, that they never gave any explanation, that they never issued a commission, that they dismissed men without giving the slightest explanation why they dismissed them, simply the word "dismissed"; and when in the session of 1879, an address was carried in the House of Commons for a return of all persons who were dismissed from the public service between the 14th day of October, or some day in October and the beginning of the then session, what was the result? The government never brought it down. They refused the information to parliament and the country, and I have here under my hand the Journal of the House of Commons of 1879, from which I will read extracts to the House:

Return of all persons dismissed, superannuated or resigned since the month of October, 1878, showing the position of such persons, &c.

The order was made but not brought down, and has never been brought down to this day. In the following year a motion was made in the House of Commons showing the names of persons dismissed or removed from the public service, the reason for such dismissal or removal, also names of persons who have resigned, and so on, or who have been superannuated between the 13th February, 1879, and the 23rd February, 1880. The date of the first return was admitted, because it was supposed it would be brought down from time to time. It never was brought down. This report was laid before the House but it only includes a certain class of officials. It does not include the lower ranks, or what might be called the temporary employés. And what does it say? Of course they do not give a reason. They say there is no work, not necessary and so on. I will read some of the names:

D. V. Pelletier, dismissed, no work.
R. Luttrell, dismissed, abolition of office.

He held a very important position, superintendent of the Intercolonial Railway, and they abolished the office to get rid of him.

W. A. Jones, dismissed, abolition of office.
P. D. Finley, office abolished.
H. A. Case, bridge inspector, office abolished.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—The office was renewed the other day.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—The office was renewed in 1879.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—No, not till the other day.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Peter Huff, lighthouse keeper, office abolished. John Murphy, paymaster Intercolonial Railway, dismissed in 1875. W. McKechnie, dismissed. He was superintendent of the Prince Edward Island Railway. G. Cunningham, engineer, dismissed.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Does it say Mr. McKechnie was dismissed?

Hon Mr. SCOTT—Yes, both McKechnie and Cunningham dismissed.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Is there any reason given?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—It says, "Alexander MacNab to replace these two." That is the only explanation given.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—My recollection is McKechnie was sent to Manitoba. I will not be positive.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—No, the note is "dismissed; superintendent of Prince Edward Island Railway; Macnab to replace these two." Capt. V. B. Armour, dismissed, keeper of Red Island Light ship, superseded by F. Larivée. John Clarke, fishery overseer, Prince County; Isaac Thompson, fishery overseer, Queen's County, and Martin McInnes, fishery overseer, King's County, dismissed and no reasons given. There was one official appointment made in place of the three. Alfred D. Deschenes, keeper of Upper Traverse light ship, superseded by Capt. Ed. Pelletier; A. St. Denis, keeper of light at Ste. Anne de Bout de L'Isle, superseded by A. Deschamps; Joseph Pilon, keeper of light at Ste. Anne de Bout de L'Isle, superseded by Wm. Cummings; F. X. Dionne, keeper of lighthouse, Matane, superseded by Octave Desjardine. I am not going into the cases of all those who were superannuated or removed for some alleged cause, but those simply dismissed and no reason whatever given. Louis Berg was no longer required. He was immigration agent on the Intercolonial Railway at Halifax. A. Cauchon, was dismissed. He was clerk in Montreal canal office. Lieut. Col. F. B. Lees, services no longer required. Lieut. Col. R. Burt, district paymaster, Lieut. D. Wylie, Col. W. H. Brehaut, Lieut. Col. Wm. Cunard, Capt. Ed. Mallandeine and Capt. F. D. Beer—all those persons were dismissed without any reasons being given—services no longer required.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Is not that a reason?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—That is a very small reason to give.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—A very good reason I think.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Then there was John Brown, dismissed to re-instate Wm. Johnstone, harbour master at the port of Chatham, N.B.; Lieut. M. W. Strange, dismissed, abolition of office. He was paymaster of Militia district No. 3, Major S. Sampson, dismissed, abolition of office. Thomas Nixon, abolition of office. He was agent of the North-west Mounted Police at Winnipeg. John Parr, paymaster, abolition of office. Among the rest was Hon. Luc Letellier, Lieutenant Governor of Quebec, who was dismissed. He was dismissed as summarily as the others were.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Is any reason given?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—There is no reason given. These are just the words—"Hon. Luc Letellier dismissed, Lieutenant Governor of Quebec." There is no comment. John F. Baker dismissed, office abolished; he was custom appraiser at Summerside, Prince Edward Island. Then there was James F. White, dismissed. he was sub-collector of customs at the outport of Cascumpec, Prince Edward Island, C. Desormiers, clerk in post office at Winnipeg, dismissed. Cowan, another post office clerk at Winnipeg, dismissed. G. A. Carman, collector of canal tolls at Ottawa, dismissed. Robert Gilmor, dismissed, reduction of staff. I am not reading the names of any of those who were superannuated.

Hon. Mr. CLEMOW—Were not all of these Conservatives?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I am inclined to think not. Then there was Nixon, inspector of penitentiaries at Winnipeg, dismissed. G. E. Laughlin, dismissed, "not required." He was assistant engineer of the public works at St. John. A. G. Millage, H. Egan, F. Lawlor—in fact they seem to have made a clean sweep at St. John, commencing with the assistant engineer, including draughtsmen, paymaster, two clerks, and even down to messengers. Then there was John McCormick, sub-collector of customs at Cardigan, P.E.I., who was dismissed. Then E. V. Bodwell, superintendent of the Welland Canal, was transferred to British Columbia. John McCormick, sub-collector of customs at Cardigan was dismissed. J. V. Ellis, postmaster of St. John, N.B., was dismissed. I find immediately following there was a return asked for of the appointments made within that time. I will not weary the House with reading it, but it extends over a great many pages. I have calculated the number and I find in that short period in which they dismissed those I have mentioned there were between 500 and 600 appointments made, very considerable appointments. The list I have read did not take in the inspectors of weights and measures. The other list includes them, but it totals up 553 appointments which were made.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—In how long a period?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Between the 13th February, 1879, and the 23rd February, 1880. These were only the high positions—important officers, not the temporary officers—not the men on the Intercolonial Railway or on the canals, but all important offices, with salaries ranging from $700 to $3,000 a year, showing that the Conservative party made pretty good use of their time when they came into office. I do not think they are quite in a position to make the statements they do, when they refused to bring down the returns asked for by parliament of the dismissals between October and the meeting of parliament. A very considerable number of dismissals took place, and we have no record of them at all and no way of getting at them. I called for return to-day from the clerk who has charge of that particular work, showing how the addresses from the Senate were answered in past years, and I find that very little attention was paid to us when we were on the other side of the House. Only a very small fraction of the addresses carried by this chamber received any attention. Very few were brought down, and then, as a rule, they were only submitted the following year—about one-third or one-fourth—rarely half of the returns moved for in this chamber were brought down. The information was refused. Honourable gentlemen opposite exhibit a good deal of indignation because a return cannot be procured within a reasonable limit of time. I do not myself justify the withholding of a return: the order of the House ought to be obeyed, and I certainly have exerted myself to the utmost to obtain returns from the various departments, and I hope to have, within a day or two, all the returns that have been called for. In asking what was the practice of the late government with reference to those returns, I said to the clerk, "Get the facts," and I found, to my great surprise, that only a small proportion of the returns called for by this House each session were produced. I have a list of them which I shall submit later on. I cannot lay my hands on it at present. In view of that it is scarcely consistent or fair to throw out insinuations against the action of the present administration. The late government did not issue commissions: they simply dismissed without giving any reason or any explanation to parliament, and without bringing down the papers, so that we have no record to-day of the dismissals made in 1878. The late government were in power for some 18 years. During all that time it is to be presumed they appointed what, if the appointments were made from our side of the House, would be called "political heelers." They appointed those who had served the party longest and most earnestly. This government proposes to do the same thing whenever the opportunity occurs. They propose to appoint good men to office, but amongst their own friends, so as to somewhat equalize the service. Hon. gentlemen talk about the introduction of the United States "spoils" system. All the dismissals by the present government will not tot up, if you include all the canal labourers and railway labourers, three per cent of the employés of the government. Can it be said that we are adopting the "spoils" system, and that there have been wholesale dismissals when less than three per cent of all those in the service of the government have been dismissed? It must be remembered that this large body of employés are, as a rule, Conservatives. There are very few friends of the Liberal party in the service, and therefore, the Liberal government is at a considerable disadvantage. I do not propose to cast any reflections on the civil servants, but it is quite natural that they should have their affinities and leanings. They are human and they are no doubt more friendly to those who appointed them than to their opponents, and it is scarcely becoming to charge the government with introducing the "spoils" system when the number of dismissals is limited to so small a percentage of the service. With reference to this particular case, I shall read an extract from the Order in Council dispensing with the services of this man. It is as follows:

On a report dated 4th March, 1897, from the Minister of Marine and Fisheries, stating that the keeper of the light at Fish Island in Malpeque Bay, Prince Edward Island, died some time last year, and that after his death the light continued under the control of his widow, Mrs. McClelan as caretaker who up to the present time has remained in that position, recognized by the Department of Marine and Fisheries as keeper, provisionally, although at present she lives at Indian River, and the light house is closed up during the winter. The Minister further states on the 6th day of July, 1896, your Excellency's then advisers recommended to you for appointment to the keepership of said light, one Chas. E. Macdonald, a young man about 19 years of age, and that your Excellency by memo. agreed to sanction such appointment, but that your Excellency has not yet officially signed same. That the young man, Macdonald, was a relation of the widow McClelan, and was by her employed as an assistant or helped about said light, without any sanction by the Department of Marine and Fisheries. That grievous complaints had been made to the department of the unsatisfactory character of Macdonald's appointment, of his inability to discharge the duties of lightkeeper properly. That on one occasion last summer while he was engaged by Mrs. McClelan, as assistant, a fishing boat was upset and sunk a short distance off the lighthouse, the fishermen clinging to the mast head to escape from drowning, from which perilous position they were rescued by a boat from a lobster factory some distance away, and although their perilous position was seen by Macdonald, and no steps were taken by him to rescue them, although a small boat was at his disposal at the time, which it appears to the Minister had he been an efficient lightkeeper he would have made use of for such rescue.

The Minister adds that the agent of the Department of Marine and Fisheries in Prince Edward Island has reported that the present arrangement is most unsatisfactory, and that the light is of such great importance in his opinion as to require the appointment of a responsible and experienced man as keeper, the person named Macdonald being, in his opinion, too young and inexperienced and quite unfit for this position. There is a comfortable cottage in connection with the lighthouse in which a married man could live with his family, and in the opinion of the Minister it would be preferable to have such a man appointed to this position.

The Minister having made inquiries as to a suitable man to fill the position recommends that the Order in Council for the appointment of Chas. E. Macdonald be not signed by Your Excellency, but be cancelled, and that Wm. Sinclair, of Hamilton, lot 18, P.E.I., be appointed keeper of Fish Island Light, at a salary of $250 per annum, being the same as allowed the late keeper.

The committee submit the above recommendations for Your Excellency's approval.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—There must be some mistake as to Mr. Macdonald not acting as lighthouse keeper. I am surprised that such a report should come from the department.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—It says that McClelan's widow continued to live there.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—I do not think she continued to live there.

Hon. Mr. ARSENAULT—I know the case of the lighthouse keeper. This young man was two years employed about the lighthouse while McClelan was ill. He was a grandson of the lighthouse keeper, and he kept the light for two years before the old man died. After McClelan's death, some time in the fall, he kept the light until winter. He was an able young man and gave satisfaction. I know all about it, and because a boat upset near the lighthouse and this young man did not go to the rescue, he is dismissed. He may not have had a boat—

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—The report says he had one.

Hon. Mr. ARSENAULT—He may not have seen the boat upset. I know of a case where a man was appointed who is deaf. He cannot hear anything, and one might drown near him and a lighthouse keeper could not hear his cries.

Hon. Mr. FERGUSON—Who was the man?

Hon. Mr. ARSENAULT—A man named Wiggens. This man Macdonald is a good man, and there was no reason for dismissing him. Of course they had to do it, but no investigation took place. It is the same in this case as in others. At Wellington there was a man who had charge of the post office for fourteen years. No fault was found with him. He was a faithful man, yet he was dismissed without notice and without investigation, and they appointed another man who came there six months before his appointment—a young man who has no standing in the place and will not be able to remain there.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—It is not my intention to weary the House by following the hon. Secretary of State in reply to the statement he has made, but I will call attention to the statement made by him, and that too, with the book in his hand, that there was no reason given for the removal or superannuation of those whose names he read out.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I mentioned specifically that I did not refer to any except those who were dismissed, and I gave the reason for dismissal.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I think, on reference to the official return, the hon. gentleman will find that my statement is absolutely correct. He said that a large number had been dismissed, and no reasons were given for the dismissals, and he said further they were of course all his political friends. I find among the names he mentions was Lieut.-Col. Maxwell Strange. I wonder if there is anybody in Ontario who is not acquainted with Lieut.-Col. Strange, of Kingston, who represented that city in the local legislature. Will the hon. gentleman tell me that he was a Grit or had any Liberal tendencies?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I think he had. I was in the House with him.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—What? Liberal tendencies?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Yes, so far as provincial politics are concerned.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I had the honour of his acquaintance and I know the position he held in this country, and it is a libel on his character to say that he is a Liberal. With every name that the hon. gentleman read the reason for his removal was given in this return that he held in his hand.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I gave all the reasons—I read them.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Then why did the hon. gentleman say that no reason was given?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Where no reason is given I stated it.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—There are very few instances in which no reasons are given. The hon. gentleman and his party so crammed each department of the government with hungry politicians who desired office, that when the government came into power in 1878 they were obliged, in the public interest, to dispense with them. The hon. gentleman says also that no commission was issued: the very cases to which he refers, those of McKechnie and Cunningham, were investigated by commission. A commissioner was appointed to inquire into the expenditure and working of the Prince Edward Island Railway, and it was on his report that these two offices, to which the hon. gentleman referred, were abolished and one person was placed in office to transact the business at the salary of one. Murphy was removed for the same reason, but in all such cases gratuities were given to those whose services were no longer required, there being no work. Another man was dismissed for intemperate habits. In the cases of McKechnie and Murphy, the reasons are given why their services were dispensed with. In three or four instances in Prince Edward Island three or four offices were combined in one. The hon. gentleman failed to point out to the Senate that a single official had been appointed in the place of those whose services were dispensed with on account of there being no work, for which reason their services were no longer required. One case occurred in my own department to which the hon. gentleman referred as being a dismissal without reason—that is, the appraiser at Summerside. I have a distinct recollection of that removal, and it was simply because the office was overstocked and there was no necessity for such an officer, and there never has been one since. The hon. gentleman called attention to the case of the bridge inspector. That was an office which was abolished, and the expenses of it saved to the country, and it has been vacant for eighteen years. Only the other day the government, of which the hon. gentleman is a member, filled it up again by appointing Mr. Killam, the defeated candidate for Westmorland. Is it possible that this office is required at this particular time, or is it because they desire to find a place for a defeated candidate? I do not say that Mr. Killam is not fit for the position. If I have any recollection of the gentleman,—and I think I have met him on a number of occasions—if the office was required he is eminently fitted to fill it, but what I want to point out is (if it were not unparliamentary to say it) the dishonest manner in which these facts are laid before the Senate. When we have a statement read to the House the whole of the facts should be given, in order that they may go to the public with the reasons for the dismissals. There are not a half dozen instances in the whole of that return, so far as I had an opportunity of looking at it, where the reasons for the removal are not given—either that the office was not required in the interests of economy, or the joining together of a number of offices and embodying them in one, or some good and sufficient reason for the course pursued. If the hon. gentleman had pointed out to the Senate that the late government had dismissed all these people and then appointed others in their stead, without reason other than their political tendencies, he would have made a point. I am surprised that any minister of the Crown should constantly refer to what he calls the dismissals of the inspectors of weights and measures. The official returns show that inspectors of weights and measures had been appointed by the Mackenzie government, extending from Manitoulin Island down to the Labrador coast, and that the inspector of weights and measures for the Labrador coast had been drawing his salary for a year or two and never had the instruments in his hands; even if he had, there was nothing to weigh except a few fish caught in those localities. I am not going into the subject now, though I have the statement before me. Yet we are told, because the late government saved to this country at one stroke, some $60,000 or $70,000 which had been squandered, that they dismissed men on account of their political tendencies. There never was a more accurate statement made by my hon. friend to my right than when he stated that pressure was being constantly brought to bear on the late government—I experienced it in the Customs department—for the dismissal of officials in the maritime provinces, particularly in Prince Edward Island, and this pressure was constantly resisted. It was contrary to my own views of the management of a department, or the principles upon which any government in a British colony should be carried on, and I can say for the late Sir John Macdonald, that in no case did I know of a position in which he did not put his foot down in the most peremptory manner and refuse his consent to the removal of any man, unless it was for good and sufficient cause. There was one appointment as to which I must correct myself and explain, so that I may not be misunderstood. It is one that has been referred to repeatedly, and that is the case of Mr. Buckingham. He was known to be a very violent politician. He was known to be a man who had made himself extremely unpopular in the position he held under the late Alexander Mackenzie when that gentleman was premier. I knew Buckingham very well; we were both connected with the press and I had often met him. It was always alleged that if anything tended to make the department over which Mr. Mackenzie presided unpopular it was the domineering manner and the insolence of his private secretary, Mr. Buckingham. Just as the Mackenzie government left office they promoted him to a deputy ministership in the Department of the Interior. Sir John Macdonald said he had no confidence in him, and would not submit any confidential work to a man who had acted to his own chief as he had done. Sir John did not dismiss him, but transferred him back to the position of chief clerk, which position he had formerly held in the Public Works Department. That is the only case on which my hon. friend can lay his hands and say that a man was removed by Sir John Macdonald from any position he had held. I regret exceedingly that I feel it my duty to rise again to speak on a question of this kind, but I could not allow the statements of the Secretary of State to go to the country in the bald manner in which they have been made.

The motion was agreed to.

CONFERENCE WITH THE PAPAL DELEGATE.

INQUIRY.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY rose to inquire:

1. Has the present government or any member of the present administration had any interview or conference with His Excellency Monseigneur Merry del Val, the delegate from the Holy See to Canada, on the subject of the Manitoba school difficulty, with a view to lead through his intervention, the Catholics of this country to accept the Laurier-Greenway compromise?

2. When did this interview or this conference take place?

3. Has the government or any member of the present administration discussed at any time with the Apostolic delegate, the constitutional side of the Manitoba school question, and has it or he really given His Excellency the assurance that all constitutional agitation to restore to the minority its rights guaranteed by a parliamentary compact would cease on the part of the legislature, Protestant as well as Catholic, from the moment that the Laurier-Greenway compromise should be declared acceptable?

4. Has the government or any member of the present administration, as a matter of fact, given His Excellency the Apostolic delegate the assurance that the violation of the constitution in so far as it concerns the rights of the Manitoba minority if it is accepted by the Catholics of this country, would not in any manner constitute a dangerous precedent for the minorities of the other provinces of the confederation?

5. Has the government or any member of the present administration, at any time, undertaken any engagement with His Excellency the Apostolic delegate on the subject of the Manitoba school difficulty or of the Catholic minority of Manitoba, or of the minorities of the other provinces, and what is this engagement?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—My answer to the first question is that no interview or conference by or on behalf of the government has taken place between His Excellency and the government on the Manitoba school question. Conversations on this question between His Excellency and individual members of the government have no doubt taken place, but such conversations have been unofficial. The second question is covered by the answer to the first. In answer to the third question, the government has not discussed at any time with the Apostolic delegate the constitutional side of the Manitoba school question. Individual members of the government have no doubt discussed the question with the delegate. The individual opinions of members of the government on a hypothetical question are not a proper subject for inquiry. To the 5th question the simple answer is, No.

EMPLOYMENT OF CHILDREN BILL.

SECOND READING POSTPONED.

The Order of the Day being called:

Second reading Bill (A) "An Act respecting the employment of children."

Hon. Sir OLIVER MOWAT moved that this Order be discharged and be put on the Order paper this day two weeks.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Why not pass the second reading to-day, and take the next stage when the House meets after the adjournment?

Hon. Sir OLIVER MOWAT—The reason I do not wish the second reading to take place to-day is that I have grave doubts as to our jurisdiction to pass the bill. It is a desirable thing to have some legislation of this character. In some of the provinces there is no legislation, and in other provinces the legislation is different. I have thought that I might alter the bill in such a way that we would have jurisdiction. But I should not like to ask the House to pass the second reading at present.

The motion was agreed to.

TRIAL BY JURY IN NORTH-WEST TERRITORIES BILL.

SECOND READING.

Hon. Sir OLIVER MOWAT moved the second reading of Bill (D) "An Act respecting trials by jury in certain cases in the North-west Territories." He said:—The North-west Territories Act legislation of the parliament of Canada provides that the judges of the Supreme Court of the Territories shall determine all questions of fact as well as of law without a jury, except in certain specified cases. One of these cases is where the claim, dispute, or demand arises out of a tort, wrong or grievance and in which the claim exceeds $500. Where the claim is a large one, exceeding $500, the trial is to be by jury if either party demands it. Since the passing of that Act some years ago, the Legislative Assembly of the North-west Territories passed an ordinance, I think it was in 1893, providing that an action for slander, theft, false imprisonment, malicious prosecution, seduction, breach of promise of marriage, should be tried by jury without any limit as to amount claimed. These are all actions of tort, and are within the terms of the Act passed by the parliament of Canada. The assembly has undertaken to say that all those cases are to be tried by a jury, even if the amount is less than $500. That is the substance of what has been done. I think that it is very reasonable we should assume that the legislative assembly of the Territories could best judge as to what would be proper to do as to the mode of trying such cases. The ordinance appears to have been acted upon, and I am not aware that any doubt has been raised as to the jurisdiction of the assembly to pass it until quite recently ; but it has now been doubted, and decisions to the contrary have, I understand, been actually made. I propose to confirm the ordinance, to give it the same effect as if it were an Act of parliament, and to do that as of the date of its passing. It was the Act of the people of the Territories ; it was acquiesced in and acted upon ; and there is no reason why we should not give the effect of law to what in this matter the assembly thought reasonable and proper and in the interest of the country. That is the only explanation of the bill which seems to be necessary.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—My hon. friend the Minister of Justice will doubtless remember that I pointed out to him some time ago the desirability of there being some uniformity in legislation in the North-west Territories regarding juries, I suggested—and I think my hon. friend entirely agreed with the propriety of the suggestion—that if any further legislation should take place upon this particular subject, entire power should be given to the North-west assembly to legislate upon the subject, and I did understand from my hon. friend at that time that he would so frame this bill as to vest in the assembly the necessary power to enact legislation regarding juries. At the same time I pointed out that there was already upon the territorial statute-book law—an ordinance respecting juries which has never come into operation, owing to the fact that the federal government having legislated upon the subject the territorial assembly is thereby precluded from bringing into operation legislation regarding the same subject, and which apparently would be in conflict with the legislation of this parliament.

Hon. Sir OLIVER MOWAT—Is there another ordinance besides that set forth in the bill ?

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—Yes, there is a complete ordinance regarding juries which has been on the statute-book for some years, pending the action of the Department of Justice in the matter of recommending to parliament the repealing of certain sections in this Act, so as to permit of that ordinance coming into force : and I furthermore would point out to the Minister of Justice the impolicy of two legislative bodies dealing with the same question, and necessarily as I think coming into conflict with each other in the matter of legislation. Of course it is conceded without any question that at the present time all legislation regarding juries' cases must emanate from this parliament. It is now proposed to practically vest in the assembly a like power to legislate upon the same subject. I need not point out to my hon. friend the many difficulties which have arisen by reason of the conflict of the exercise of legislative powers between the federal authorities and the provincial authorities. It is therefore very desirable that this should not occur in regard to this matter, because enough complications have ensued in the Territories owing to the peculiar situation in which we are placed, rendering all legislation of the Territories subject to federal legislation. I understand that this is simply the second reading of the bill and that we are not going into committee to-day upon it. Might I point out to my hon. friend also this fact, that the Minister of the Interior has brought down, or is about bringing down, a very comprehensive bill regarding many amendments to the North-west Territories Act, including amendments dealing with the administration of justice both civil and criminal, in the Territories, and it seems to me if the disposition of the government be to amend the Act relating to juries, that this legislation should be embodied in that bill. There are already clauses in the bill prepared by the Minister of the Interior dealing with the question of juries. And as it will operate as an amendment to the North-west Territories Act, this legislation should be embodied in that Act, but if my hon. friend will permit the matter to stand I shall be very glad to go into the matter with him personally.

Hon. Sir OLIVER MOWAT—I should like to take the bill one stage to-day. I have been considering with the Minister of Interior the bill which he intends to bring into the other House. It is still under consideration—and I am not aware that we are likely to have a difference of opinion about it, but there is a good deal to be considered as to how far it should go, and so on, and the bill is not ready. I am expecting that we shall put that bill through this session, but it was thought extremely desirable at the time I brought this in that the matter mentioned in it should be settled at all events and therefore I have drawn this bill for that purpose. I quite agree that if the other bill is brought in and passed this session this bill should be dropped, what it provides for being contained in the other bill. My hon, friend suggests that it is not desirable that there should be a possibility of conflict between the Dominion parliament and the local assembly on matters with which the local assembly has to do, but that possibility is not to be avoided. We cannot divest ourselves of the jurisdiction which parliament has now with regard to the North-west Territories, and whatever power parliament has to deal with these subjects will necessarily continue. The bill which is contemplated by the Minister of the Interior and myself is a bill which would give power to the assembly to deal with this particular subject, but then the conflict which my hon. friend suggests as a thing to be avoided, it is not possible to avoid. There will still be jurisdiction in parliament if it chooses to exercise it, as well as in the legislative assembly. My hon. friend has referred to another ordinance dealing with the subject of juries, and much more extensive, it seems, than the one which I have mentioned. I have not had my attention called to that other ordinance, and I do not know that it is desirable that it should be confirmed. He prefers that a large jurisdiction should be given to the assembly in order that they may make such ordinances as they deem necessary on the subject. I am quite in favour of the assembly having the jurisdiction in regard to property and civil rights which the provinces have. I do not see any reason why they should not have that enlarged jurisdiction ; and probably the bill of the Minister of the Interior will so provide If this bill becomes unnecessary in consequence of that other bill, then, as I said before, this bill will be dropped. Meanwhile, I should like to take it a stage to-day.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—Might I suggest to the hon. the Minister of Justice the wisdom of providing in the bill that it shall not affect pending cases? My hon. friend will doubtless remember that I suggested that when the bill was first brought down.

Hon. Sir OLIVER MOWAT—I think we may discuss that. It does not strike me at present that it should not affect pending cases. If parties to such cases wish them to be tried by jury, I do not see why they should not be. However, I will look into that matter further.

The motion was agreed to and the bill was read the second time.

SECOND READING.

Bill (I) "An Act respecting interest."—(Sir Oliver Mowat.)

The Senate adjourned.

THE SENATE.

Ottawa, Friday, 21st May, 1897.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

Prayers and routine proceedings.

RESIGNATION OF JUDGE JONES.

MOTION.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL moved :

That an humble Address be presented to His Excellency the Governor General, praying that His Excellency will cause to be laid before the Senate, a copy of the resignation of S. I. Jones, Esquire, late judge of the county court of the county of Brant, together with all correspondence with any department of the government, in reference to, or in connection therewith; also, a copy of all petitions sent to the government praying for the appointment of A. D. Hardy to the position made vacant by the resignation and superannuation of the said Judge Jones.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—There is no objection to the address.

The motion was agreed to.

DISMISSAL OF MICHEL ST. PIERRE.

INQUIRY.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY inquired:

1. Was Mr. Michel St. Pierre on the 23rd of June, 1896, postmaster at St. Paul du Buton, in the county of Montmagny?
2. Has he been since that date discharged from his work by the present administration?
3. When, why and upon whose complaint?
4. What is the nature of the charge brought against him?
5. Has the charge been proven?
6. What is the nature of the proof?
7. If no proof exists, has the accuser at least a diploma of infallibility? Granted by whom?
8. Has the accused been made aware officially of the charge brought against him, and has he had an opportunity to refute it?
9. What was his reply?
10. Has the Post Office Inspector been required to hold an inquiry and to make a report?
11. Has an inquiry taken place, and what is the report of the officer making the inquiry?
12. If the person dismissed protests his innocence and completely denies the truth of the accusation, is it the intention of the government to grant an inquiry or to refuse all justice?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Mr. Michel St. Pierre was, on the 23rd June last, postmaster of St. Paul du Buton, in the county of Montmagny, and after the last general elections satisfactory evidence was furnished showing that the postmaster in question, during the election, had conducted himself as a political partisan, using vulgar and insulting language towards Mr. Laurier and Mr. Choquette, the member-elect for Montmagny, charging them with being traitors to their race and religion; that the postmaster used his office as a political committee room and distributed from it election literature, and after the election charged Mr. Choquette, M.P., with having been guilty of illegal acts in connection with the election. Therefore Mr. St. Pierre was relieved of his office on the 23rd November last. The charges were substantiated by the statement of Mr. Choquette, M.P. No public interest would be served by re-opening the matter.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—I just bring to the notice of the hon. Minister this fact that the post office was never made a committee room. There was a discussion at the door of the post office between Mr. Choquette and myself by general consent, but Mr. Choquette having himself spoken on the gallery of the post office in a public meeting, the government should not claim the right to-day to dismiss that postmaster.

THE DISMISSAL OF XAVIER SIMONEAU.

INQUIRY.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY inquired:

1. Was Mr. Xavier Simoneau on the 23rd of June, 1896, an employé of the government as section man on the Intercolonial Railway in the county of Montmagny, and was he fulfilling his duties to the satisfaction of his chief?
2. Has he been since that date discharged from his work by the present administration?
3. When, why, and upon whose complaint?
4. What is the nature of the charge brought against him?
5. Has the charge been proved?
6. What is the nature of the proof?
7. If no proof exists, has the accuser at least a diploma of infallibility? Granted by whom?
8. Has the accused been made aware officially of the accusation brought against him, and has he had an opportunity to refute it?
9. What was his reply?
10. If the person dismissed completely denies the truth of the charge brought against him, protests his innocence and offers to make it clear, is it the intention of the government to grant an inquiry or to refuse all justice?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Yes, Mr. Xavier Simoneau was employed as section man on the Intercolonial Railway in the county of Montmagny, on the 23rd of June, 1896. His services were dispensed with on the 1st September, 1896, at the request and on the representation of Mr. Choquette, M.P., that the said Simoneau had taken, to his personal knowledge, an active and offensive part in the recent elections.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY—That violent political partisan wrote a letter to the Department of Railways and Canals asking for an inquiry and he has not received an answer yet.

THE MANITOBA SCHOOL QUESTION.

INQUIRY.

Hon. Mr. BERNIER rose to call the attention of the government to the following paragraph published in the Montreal Star, on the 12th May instant:

Honourable Charles Fitzpatrick, Solicitor General, passed through the city this morning en route to Ottawa. He expressed himself as more than satisfied with the result of the elections; there were a few results which he would like to have changed, as for instance, Quebec West and Gaspé, but, on the whole, the Solicitor General was a very happy man. He was extremely sorry to learn of Mr. Charles Marcil's defeat in Gaspé, while full of praise for the gallant fight he made. Mr. Fitzpatrick now considers the school question as buried for ever. "The people of Quebec have once more shown the rest of Canada, and the world, that they are on the side of liberty—liberty of thought and liberty of conscience."

And inquire:—

1. Whether the words and the views attributed to the Honourable Solicitor General in the above paragraph are correctly reported; if not, what did the honourable gentleman say on that occasion?

2. Whether the above paragraph does represent the views of the government on the Manitoba school question? If not, what is the policy the government of Canada intends to pursue henceforth with regard to that matter?

3. Is it the opinion of the government that the definite solution of the Manitoba school question is to be made dependent upon the result of the elections in any of the provinces of the Dominion?

4. Can the electorate, in the opinion of the government, alter the rights of the minority?

He said: I have no intention of raising any debate on this matter to-day. I merely inquire whether the words and the views attributed to the hon. Solicitor General are correctly reported.

Hon. Sir OLIVER MOWAT—I am informed by the Solicitor General that he never allowed himself to be interviewed, and never said anything on the subject of the late elections in Quebec and their bearing on the Manitoba school question. The views and policy of the government on the Manitoba school question have been repeatedly stated, and I have nothing to add to what has been publicly stated on the subject. It is not the opinion of the government that the definite solution of the Manitoba school question is to be made dependent upon the result of the elections in any of the provinces of the Dominion. The majority of the electorate, through their representatives, and within the limits of the British North America Act, but not beyond those limits, can alter the legal status of any legal rights theretofore possessed by a minority of the electorate on any subject. Of course, the electorate cannot (as a rule) alter the moral obligation of moral rights as such, which may belong to any of their number. I do not understand that on either of these questions as to legal and moral rights there can be any difference of opinion.

A SUPPLY BILL.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Before the Orders of the Day are called, I desire to make the announcement that it is quite important that a supply bill, to the amount of $26,000, should be passed by parliament in order that the Jubilee Contingent may leave for England and take part in the jubilee proceedings there. I understand the House of Commons is about to pass a bill of that kind, and I would ask, if it comes up this afternoon, that the Senate should agree to suspend the rules and pass the bill, in order that His Excellency may come down at five o'clock, or whatever time is convenient, and give his assent to it.

SUPREME COURT OF ONTARIO BILL.

SECOND READING.

Hon. Sir OLIVER MOWAT moved the second reading of Bill (J) "An Act respecting the Supreme Court of Ontario and the judges thereof." He said: The object of the bill is to limit the appeals from the Ontario courts to the Supreme Court of Canada in certain cases, according to the amount or value of the disputed claim. There are such limits with regard to every province, I think, except Ontario, but it was thought that there was no occasion for any limit as far as the Ontario courts are concerned. The people are finding, however, that there are too many appeals provided for the law in that province, and some years ago its legislature passed an Act providing that appeals should take place in certain cases only. It has been held by the Supreme Court that a provincial legislature has no power to pass an Act of that kind—that if it had the power of limiting appeals it would have the right of preventing any appeals at all, that no line could be drawn, and that such a matter ought not to rest with the provincial legislatures. Last session the Ontario legislature repeated its former legislation on the subject, but differently expressed, under the hope that the language now employed would remove the difficulty in regard to jurisdiction. I do not think it has removed that difficulty, but the limitations being very proper limitations, and being in accordance with public sentiment, and having an analogy to what has been done for the other provinces, I propose to ask parliament to adopt the limitations desired by the Ontario legislature. That is the first clause of the bill. The bill contains a second clause which I will state the object of. At present there is no law in Ontario requiring judges of the High Court or of the Court of Appeal (those two courts constitute the Supreme Court of Ontario) to reside in the province or at its seat of government. They have always so resided until lately. Sometimes one and sometimes two have resided elsewhere lately, and this has been complained of by suitors and lawyers and judges too. Both the Exchequer Court and the Supreme Court of Canada are limited with regard to the residence of the judges. These judges must reside in Ottawa or within five miles of Ottawa, and I propose that a similar provision be adopted with reference to the Ontario judges of the High Court and the Court of Appeal—in other words, of the Supreme Court there. Those are the two clauses of the bill.

The motion was agreed to, and the bill was read the second time.

NATIONAL LIFE ASSURANCE COMPANY BILL.

SECOND READING.

Hon. Mr. McINNES (B.C.) moved the second reading of Bill (74) "An Act to incorporate the National Life Assurance Company of Canada." He said: I think the bill only contains the usual clauses in the Acts of incorporation of such companies. There is nothing out of the ordinary in it, so far as I have been able to see.

The motion was agreed to, and the bill was read the second time.

ONTARIO ACCIDENT INSURANCE COMPANY'S BILL.

SECOND READING.

Hon. Mr. ALLAN moved the second reading of Bill (78) "An Act respecting the Ontario Accident Insurance Company." He said: This is a bill respecting the Ontario Accident Insurance Company. It seeks to enlarge the scope of the insurance contracts of that company by giving them permission to insure not only against accident, but sickness resulting from accident, and also to insure against sickness not ending in death. These are the objects of the bill.

The motion was agreed to, and the bill was read the second time.

LES CISTERCIENS RÉFORMÉS BILL.

SECOND READING.

Hon. Mr. BERNIER moved the second reading of Bill (88) "An Act to incorporate Les Cistérciens Réformés." He said: This bill relates to the Order generally known as the Trappists. They are associated for religious purposes, and they want incorporation for the management of their property.

The motion was agreed to and the bill was read the second time.

MYCENIAN MARBLE COMPANY'S BILL.

SECOND READING.

Hon. Mr. McMILLAN moved the second reading of Bill (83) "An Act to confer on the Commissioner of Patents certain powers for the relief of the Mycenian Marble Company of Canada, Limited." He said: The object of the bill is to renew a patent which, through an inadvertency, had been allowed to lapse. The parties mentioned in this bill are the owners, by transfers, of the patent, which was originally obtained in the year 1891.

The motion was agreed to, and the bill was read the second time.

FORGED ENDORSEMENTS OF BILLS BILL.

SECOND READING.

Hon. Sir OLIVER MOWAT moved the second reading of Bill (F) "An Act respecting forged or unauthorized endorsements of bills." He said:—The principle of what is proposed by this bill is in accordance with the probable intention of the statutory enactments now in existence, and also with imperial enactments, but the provision on the subject in the Dominion Act does not correspond with the English legislation, and has been found extremely defective. It either does not go far enough, or goes too far, and is open to objection upon other grounds. It is desirable to make the law clear. The subject is one of great practical importance amongst traders and others. The bill as expressed will strike anybody, I suppose, as being extremely reasonable. If necessary I may point out wherein the present law is defective and requires some such provision as this bill proposes. The important clause of the bill is this:

> If a bill bearing a forged or unauthorized endorsement is paid in good faith and in the ordinary course of business, by or on behalf of the drawee or acceptor, the person by whom or on whose behalf such payment is made shall have the right to recover the amount so paid from the person to whom it was so paid.

That is very reasonable; if the person to whom a bill was paid had no right to receive payment, it is reasonable that he should repay what he had no right to receive. If he got paid in consequence of a forged or unauthorized endorsement, he was not entitled to the money. Then, it is provided further that the money pay should be recoverable from any endorser who had endorsed the bill subsequently to the forged or unauthorized endorsement. That is in accordance with the principle that every endorser guarantees the previous parties to the bill, and, every subsequent endorser is liable to make good the weakness arising from one of the previous endorsements being either forged or unauthorized. The rest of the bill is to make provision to prevent any unjust use being made of what I have read:

> Provided that notice of the forged or unauthorized endorsement is given to each such subsequent endorser within the time and in the manner hereinafter mentioned; and any such person or endorser from whom said amount has been received shall have the like right of recovery against any prior endorser subsequent to the forged or unauthorized endorsement.

And that notice must be given within a reasonable time. The substance of the proposed enactment is the law in most foreign countries, and is the law likewise in the neighbouring states. These are some of the objections to the present law which we propose to remove by the bill; first, the existing enactment applies only to a cheque. There is no reason why the enactment should be confined to cheques. A cheque is, by section 73 of the Act, defined to be a bill of exchange drawn on a bank payable on demand. The enactment should cover a bill of exchange, whether drawn on a bank or on any other institution or person, and should not be confined to bills payable on demand; a bill payable at or after sight, or after date, etc., should be included. A second objection to the existing law is that it is confined to the case of a forged endorsement. There is no reason why this should be so. A forged endorsement does not in its result differ from an unauthorized endorsement, and the English Act covers both. For example, where a clerk or agent of a firm who was not authorized expressly or impliedly to endorse bills for the firm chose to do so and gave the money and misapplied it. In a case of that kind there is no reason why the same remedy should not exist at the hands of the banker as in the case of forgery. The existing enactment declares that if the drawee of the cheque pays the amount, &c., he shall have all the rights of a holder in due course for the recovery back of the amount so paid from any endorser who has endorsed the same subsequent to the forged endorsement, &c. It will be observed that the right to recover back is given if the drawee pays. The English Act contains the words "in good faith and in the ordinary course of business," and I propose that this be qualified in the Canadian law.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B. C.)—Is there no right of that kind to recover?

Hon. Sir OLIVER MOWAT—I am explaining that our present law does not render it necessary to show that payment was made in good faith or in the ordinary course of business. If a banker or any person else on whom a bill is drawn is to be relieved it should only be if he acted in good faith and in the ordinary course of business. If the "rights of a holder in due course," here referred to, are merely the ordinary rights of a holder of a bill, they are confined to a remedy upon the bill itself against the prior endorsers. Now before the holder of a bill can sue a prior endorser the bill must have been presented for payment on the day when due and must have been dishonoured and notice of the dishonour must have been given within the limited time to the endorser sued. If the section means this, then the bank paying the cheque is practically given no relief whatever, as the cheque was not dishonoured, and in probably 99 cases out of a 100 the forgery would not be dishonoured in time to enable notice to be sent to the endorser or person receiving the money. If this is the effect of the section, then it does not go far enough and gives no practical relief. On the other hand, if the section intends to give the bank paying the cheque the right to recover back the amount from the endorser, &c., without giving notice within any limited time, then the section goes too far. I do not know that I need point out the other defects. In committee of the whole I shall give any details that may be desired and any further reasons there may be for the provisions proposed. I believe they will bring the law more nearly in conformity with the English law now, more nearly in conformity with the commercial laws of countries generally, and more nearly in conformity with what must strike all as just rules on this subject.

The motion was agreed to and the bill was read the second time.

RED DEER VALLEY RAILWAY AND COAL COMPANY'S BILL.

SECOND READING.

Hon. Mr. BOULTON moved the second reading of Bill (K): "An Act to amend the Acts relating to the Red Deer Valley Railway and Coal Co." He said: This is a bill for the purpose of extending the time for the completion of this railway, and also an amendment giving them the right to enter Calgary by way of the Calgary and Edmonton Railroad, as well as by way of the Canadian Pacific Railway.

The motion was agreed to and the bill was read the second time.

The bill was read the first time.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT moved that the rules be suspended so far as they relate to this bill.

SUSPENSION OF THE RULES.

Rules 49, 50, 53 and 54 having been suspended in so far as they related to certain bills,

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.) said:—Hon. gentlemen will observe the wholesale suspension of rules with reference to many bills from the other chamber. It is all owing to the conflict between our rules and the rules of the House of Commons. The House of Commons rules only require notice in the Canada Gazette, while ours require notice in all the provinces where the bills are going to operate, and many people simply look at the rules of the House of Commons and present petitions accordingly, and the result is that all this conflict takes place. I would suggest that we should appoint a committee to confer with the House of Commons so that we can arrange the same rules for both Houses. As it is now, all this suspension of the rules takes place on account of the difference in the rules of the Houses. I do not know what would be the best way of removing the difficulty, but I think a conference would be desirable.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I was under the impression that an advertisement in the Canada Gazette applied equally to both Houses.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.)—So it does, but under our rule notice must be given in every province where the bill is going to operate.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—But I have always understood that the interpretation put by the House of Commons Committee on the rule, or on the advertisement, was that they must advertise in the different provinces where the enterprise is to be carried on.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.).—No. About twenty bills were brought up here to-day, and they passed the Commons, and were only advertised in the Gazette.

HER MAJESTY'S JUBILEE.

MOTION.

Hon. Sir OLIVER MOWAT—It is, I am sure, the common sentiment of all of us that the Parliament of Canada should, on behalf of the Canadian people, unite with the other parliaments and legislatures and peoples of the Empire in presenting congratulations to our Gracious Sovereign on the happy event of her attaining by the good Providence of God the sixtieth year of Her Reign—the longest and most glorious reign in our nation's history; glorious as regards progress in everything which constitutes a nation's greatness and a people's well-being. As respects our Queen herself, Canadians rejoice to recognize her many excellences; the practical wisdom and prudence which during all her long reign she has manifested; her unceasing interest in the welfare of her subjects everywhere; the noble example which she has always shown to them and to the world; and the good influence which she has exerted as a Christian, as a sovereign, as a wife, a mother and a personal friend. I am about to move, seconded by my hon. friend opposite, that an humble address be presented to Her Majesty giving expression to these sentiments.

One delightful thing about Her Majesty's long reign is, that compared with any similar period of British history, her reign of sixty years has been pre-eminently a Reign of Peace. There has, during her time, been but one war between Great Britain and any European nation; and it is specially pleasant here in Canada to remember that the two countries to which the great majority of our people belong by birth or descent were in that war allies, and that throughout the war British and French soldiers fought side by side in a common cause. It is pleasant for us further to remember that between the two nations there has been peace for eighty years and more; that for as long a time there has been peace with the neighbouring Republic also; and peace with all other nations of the world which have any considerable representation in our population. Need I say that every Christian hopes and prays that this peace may be lasting? It was as a step towards making it so that the official representatives of Great Britain and the United States recently agreed on a treaty which provided for the settlement of future differences by arbitration instead of by war, and good men and good women of both nations rejoiced greatly when the agreement came to their knowledge. Unhappily, the treaty has not been accepted by one of the representative bodies whose concurrence is necessary on the part of our neighbours. But it is the glory of our nation, that its Queen and its parliaments and its peoples hailed the agreement with unanimous approval. If it had gone into effect there was and is every reason to believe that the example would soon have been followed by other civilized nations; and the time thus hastened, of which the Holy Book speaks, when men everywhere shall beat their swords into ploughshares, and their spears into pruning hooks; when nation shall no longer lift up sword against nation; and men shall not have occasion to learn the art of war any more. Meanwhile our nation stands as high as it ever did in ability to cope with foreign foes whoever they may be; and in ability to maintain the country's high position in the world. The number of its people and the resources of the empire have, during the sixty years, increased relatively more than those of the other nations of Europe; and the nation has not fallen behind in anything of what in modern warfare is necessary or useful for attack or defence; but its people, I hope, do not love war as in less enlightened times they may have done; nor do other civilized peoples. Men of patriotism and humanity and intelligence everywhere, realize more than in former times what a dire calamity a great war is; that it is a calamity generally to both the successful nation and the unsuccessful. They realize how burdensome to a nation is the cost of war; how intense the individual sufferings which it occasions; how great and extensive the miseries which it creates on both sides; and, above all, how it intensifies and perpetuates international hates; and what a setting back it generally gives to human progress.

I have said that the Queen's reign as compared with any previous period of the same length has been a Reign of Peace. It has also been to the nation a reign of great material and moral progress. The territory of the empire has been greatly extended; its population has enormously increased; and its wealth has multiplied, and has at the same time become somewhat more widely diffused. Of territory, several million square miles have been added to the empire, part in Asia, and part in Africa. Russia is the only country in the world which now compares with it in extent; and the area of even Russia is somewhat less. As regards population, the advance is still more striking. It is a common notion that on this side of the Atlantic alone nowadays do cities grow much. But take some of the great cities of England. During Her Majesty's reign the population of London proper has increased from 1,700,000 to about 5,000,000; Liverpool has grown from 200,000 to 600,000; Manchester from 220,000 to 405,000; Newcastle from 68,000 to 190,000 and so on. Take the Island of Great Britain as a whole, its population has more than doubled during this one reign. Or adding Ireland, the population of the United Kindom has advanced from 26 millions to 40 millions, or nearly double, notwithstanding a large emigration. Such has been the advance of population. In developed wealth, the increase has been much greater. If in the Queen's reign the population of the British Islands taken together has increased from 26 to 40 millions or about 50 per cent, their wealth according to the best estimates has increased during the same period, not by 50 per cent, but by not less than 200 per cent, and even according to some estimates, by not less than 300 per cent. The exports and imports are in value about five times or perhaps six times what they were in 1837. An interesting illustration of the comparative wealth of the nation is, that while nearly all other nations have in the present generation increased their debts with appalling rapidity, Great Britain since the Crimean war has actually paid off nearly £160,000,000 of her debt. She paid off £8,500,000 in the fiscal year just terminated. Her credit as a nation stands at this day higher than it has ever done before, and higher than that of any other country. Besides the money needed for her own domestic and national uses her people have been able to lend to other nations upwards of £2,000,000,000 sterling. It is a matter for patriotic rejoicing that thus in spite of partial and severe trade depression and other drawbacks, every test of national prosperity continues to indicate a high standard and steady progress of well-being in the beloved parent land.

Look for a moment at some of the more prominent matters in the nation's progress. Take railways. It was in Her Majesty's reign that there was opened the first important British railway on which the locomotion was by steam; and now the British Islands alone have over 20,000 miles of railway; and the railways in the great colonies and possessions of the Empire aggregate a still larger mileage. The total expenditure on the railways of Great Britain before Her Majesty came to the throne had been £30,000,000 stirling. The capital now invested in its railways is estimated at seven times that sum, or £200,000,000 stirling. The investments in Canadian railways are as great; not to speak of other parts of the Empire.

Take again the case of ocean steamships, which during Her Majesty's reign have come to be regarded as a necessity of ocean navigation for both passengers and freight. I allude to this subject with all the greater interest because the first steamship which steamed across the Atlantic was one of Canadian build and Canadian ownership—the "Royal William." This occurred shortly before Her Majesty came to the throne, and some years before the Atlantic was crossed by the "Great Western" and the "Sirius"—the steamships which I believe are usually assumed in Britain to have been the first steamships that successfully performed the voyage. Of these three ships the "Royal William" was a ship of but 363 tons; her engines were of but 200 horse power; and she took 19 days to make the trip from Pictou to London. The "Sirius" was double the size and had double the power of her Canadian predecessor, her tonnage being 700 tons, and her engines having the power of 700 horses; she made the trip from Cork to New York in 18 days. All three ships were wonders. The steamships now crossing the Atlantic are very giants in comparison; some of them having a tonnage of 12,000 tons or more, and the power of 30,000 horses, and making the passage in less than six days. So again, in the early years of Her Majesty's reign the commercial steamfleet of the nation had an aggregate capacity of 87,000 tons, now its aggregate capacity is nearly six million tons. Another illustration of the changes in this department is, that while in 1837 ships were almost exclusively built of wood, now every vessel of any size is built of iron or steel.

Going on to some of the other great facts which distinguish the present year as compared with sixty years ago, there is the telegraph. Accustomed as most men now living have been to there being telegraph lines everywhere, it is difficult for them to realize that sixty years ago there was not one electric telegraph line in the Empire. Now, these lines are everywhere in the United Kingdom, and are in all other parts of the Empire as well, facilitating business, facilitating travelling, facilitating communication for all purposes, bringing every part of the kingdom within an hour or so of every other part, and closely connecting with the parent land its most distant colonies and possessions. To such a condition has the telegraph from time to time been improved that it has become practicable to send on one wire six messages at the same time—three each way—and to send them with a speed of 600 words a minute; while a speed of 400 words a minute is said to be usual. When such facts are first related the imagination almost fails to take them in. The invention of the telephone followed that of the telegraph, and is still more wonderful; and there are other well known applications of electricity during this reign no less wonderful and beneficial than the telegraph and the telephone.

Amongst the many other striking examples of national progress during Her Majesty's reign, I do not know one more important or more significant than the Penny Postage system of Britain, and the three-cent postage system of Canada. A penny now carries a letter from one end of the United Kingdom to the other; and in Canada three cents carry a letter from any part of Canada to any other part of Canada or any part of the United States. The old postage rates are forgotten by the present generation, but some of us recollect when in Canada it cost us 7½ cents to send a single letter sixty miles or any less distance, however short. The charges increased with the distances; and with the rates then charged a letter from Halifax to Vancouver would cost nearer $3 than 3 cents. High rates are to a large extent a bar to correspondence; cheap postage facilitates trade, promotes friendly communication, and makes life more comfortable in a hundred ways. Its value to the people of the motherland is illustrated by the fact that 18 times as many letters are annually delivered now as were sixty years ago. In Canada the increase has been still greater, in fact very much greater.

In the case of these great departments of progress and of many others, it is delightful to know that all classes of the community share the advantages, both directly and indirectly. The progress made in so many new enterprises has afforded to multitudes of the people new avenues of employment, and, to multitudes more, has afforded advantages, directly or indirectly, in a hundred other ways. Looking at the developed wealth of the country as a whole, it is a happy circumstance to know that, while this wealth is still in fewer hands than every intelligent lover of his race would like it to be, the comparative number of the wealthy has largely increased during the last sixty years both in the old lands and in the rest of the Empire; the number of persons of moderate means has increased still more; and, what is much more important than even these facts, the condition of wage-earners has greatly improved. Statistics show that, in proportion to the population, more persons of the class of wage-earners get employment than in former days; and, when employed, most of them, as a rule, receive higher wages than they used to do. In addition to this, the money they receive for their work in the old land has a greater purchasing power there than the same amount of money had sixty years ago. The consequence is, that in the old land the wage-earners or working classes are better fed and better clothed than they were before Her Majesty's reign; that they are also being better educated, and thereby better prepared for the battle of life, and better fitted, too, for the right exercise of the political power which, in this auspicious reign, they have received. In Canada, the masses are, I presume, taking all things into consideration, much better off now than in the parent land.

As a further illustration of the progress which we rejoice over, it is interesting to know that, though the population of Great Britain has more than doubled since Her Majesty came to the throne, the number of paupers in the island receiving relief from the poor rates has not only not increased, but has actually diminished by several thousand persons; the number of poor receiving relief sixty years ago was upwards of eleven hundred thousand and by the last returns the number has gone down to eight hundred thousand. It is lamentable that there should be so many as even this reduced number. The future, however, is hopeful. I see no reason why the diminution should not go on until, for those able and willing to work, poverty shall have disappeared from the earth. Who does not wish that this may be soon? The education of the people is calculated to greatly help this much desired result; and increased attention to the education of the masses is being given everywhere throughout the British Empire. Take on this subject the case of England. It was in Her Majesty's reign that the Imperial Parliament made its first state grant for promoting education, and the amount of it was but £30,000 sterling. Now the annual state grants in England are nearly £9,000,000 sterling; and the chief benefit of this large sum goes to the poorer classes of the British community.

More important still than all these matters is the progress of the nation in religion and morality. If there is more infidelity now than there was sixty years ago, there is still more of deep faith in Christianity, more of spiritual life, more of religious zeal, more of active morality, and more liberality in contributing to religious objects. There never was a time which more abounded than do all these to-day in the British Empire. One of the signs and results of this state of things is furnished by the criminal statistics. Thus, shortly before Her Majesty's reign began, the convict population of Great Britain was estimated at 50,000. The population of the country has doubled since then, but instead of the number of the convict population having doubled, and being now 100,000, the number has actually dwindled to 6,500; and this number includes convicts who are out on tickets of leave.

During the last sixty or seventy years, the Imperial parliament has passed very much valuable legislation. Of the measures so passed none are more important than those for the extension of the franchise to which Her Majesty has given her assent and thus made law. These measures have extended the franchise far beyond what had previously been accomplished by the celebrated Reform Bill of 1832, though that bill was regarded by many at the time as revolutionary, and by its illustrious author as at all events a finality. The extension of the suffrage in the fatherland is leading, in connection with other causes, to increased thought being given by an increasd number of capable and benevolent thinkers to the condition and improvement of the masses. Common sense rejects many of the theoretical schemes and suggestions of socialists and others, but humanity hopes that the problem may not be found insoluble of ameliorating much further than hitherto the condition of the masses, and therein of affording full employment at fair wages for all men and women able and willing to work. In the interest of humanity all of us would like to believe that the solution is not only practicable, but is not far distant.

I have so far been speaking chiefly of the Empire as a whole, or of that part of it which to most of us is the Motherland. Let me say a few more words about our portion of the Empire. Canada has had its share in the sixty years' race of progress. What was the condition of Canada when our Queen came to the throne? This great territory which is now Canada consisted then of some scattered provinces, and of a vast undeveloped and unsettled territory outside of these provinces. The provinces had but little intercourse with one another, and I am afraid felt but little interest either. In one of the two greatest of them there were racial antagonisms of the bitterest and most formidable kind. Lower Canada had then a population considerably greater than Upper Canada had, and politically and socially almost all the French-speaking population were on one side, and almost all the English-speaking population were on the other. That miserable condition of things has since passed away, to the advantage of all; a large degree of mutual esteem and respect now prevails amongst the different races which compose our population; and mutual good will is increasing amongst us year by year. As bearing on this subject let me, as a Canadian of British ancestry and a Protestant, say here that some of the most patriotic, loyal, amiable and able men that I have ever met in public life have been French Canadians and Roman Catholics. There was no such race antagonism in the other provinces as there was in Lower Canada, but there was in them all much political discontent. In both Upper and Lower Canada the discontent broke out in rebellion on the part of a portion of the inhabitants. There was certainly much reason for the discontent, though most of us think that rebellion was not the remedy. There was no responsible government in any of the provinces. The wishes of the people expressed in a lawful way through their elected representatives in matters of both legislation and executive government were disregarded. The legislative council of every province—the second chamber—consisted wholly of nominees of the governor of the province, or of the English government looking on at a distance of 3,000 miles, and was often or generally not in sympathy with the sentiments of the people of the province, and vetoed the legislation which the people's elected representatives desired. Then again, the executive administration of public affairs was wholly in the hands of persons owing no responsibility to the people. The people or their representatives had no control over appointments to the legislative council or to other public offices. The proper method of governing British colonies was not then understood. It has been learned during Her Majesty's reign; home rule is its principle; and home rule was established in the British provinces not long after Her Majesty had begun to reign. The first step towards it in British America was the union of the provinces of Upper and Lower Canada; responsible government was soon afterwards conceded to the united province, and subsequently to the other provinces. The provinces thereby became self governing; and it is an historical fact that from that time disloyalty, and discontent with the political situation, gradually disappeared. It was in about the middle of Her Majesty's reign that the next great movement in the constitutional history of the country took place, the Confederation of all the provinces of British North America except Newfoundland. The Confederation was at first of the three principal provinces only, and these became one Canada. The remaining British territory was soon afterwards added by the Imperial Parliament without money and without price; British Columbia and Prince Edward Island successively joined the Confederation afterwards; and the result is that Canada now has an area capable of maintaining a great nation; an area equal or more than equal in extent to the area of the United States; and nearly as large as the whole of Europe, the seat of so many great nations. Our constitution was of our own choosing and preparing, but its framers were human and could not foresee all the future results of the provisions of the Constitutional Act. Some of us think that our 30 years' experience of the working of the Canadian constitution has shown it to have defects which might and should be removed; and some of us—a minority in this honourable House—think that the laws passed during the 18 years of continuous rule by one of our political parties were not always such as they ought to have been; and that the administration of public affairs during the same period was—not what it should have been. But I refer to these things now for the purpose only of adding that, however strongly some of us feel these matters, we at the same time feel and rejoice to acknowledge that even with the constitution unamended, no country or state has a constitution which on the whole is superior to ours; that none has a better parliament than our parliament is, notwithstanding what we consider its defects and shortcomings; and that none has on the whole a superior body of legislation take it all in all.

If, as some of us think, many things have in past days been faulty on the part of parliament and government, and if we think that our prosperity has thereby been much less than it might have been, yet, we rejoice as Canadians that, notwithstanding all drawbacks and difficulties, things are not worse than they are, and that during Her Majesty's reign Canada has been going ahead in constitutional freedom, in extent of territory, and in most other important respects; and that its progress has not been slight, if not so great as was hoped. In illustration, take our growth in population. This has been less than we had all hoped for and expected. But yet, from 1,400,000, which was the population when our Queen's reign began, it has become five millions. What the population produces year by year has increased far more than the population has The wheat now raised every year is said to be forty times what the territory which is now Canada produced sixty years ago. There has been a remarkable increase in other grains also; and in agricultural products generally; an enormous increase likewise of timber cut in our forests, of minerals taken from our mines, and of fish taken from our waters; and an increase also of goods manufactured in the country. Take a few other particulars of progress. Sixty years ago there were but fourteen miles of railway in all Canada—one can hardly realize the fact. This was the railway from Laprairie to St. Johns, which was opened in July, 1838. Now, there are 16,000 miles in operation in Canada; and a thousand million dollars have been expended in building and equipping these railways. Then again, sixty years ago Canada had not a single steamship on the route between Canada and Europe; for the "Royal William," on arriving in England, was sold there, and was put by the purchasers on other and better paying ocean routes. Now Canada has 14 distinct lines of steamships crossing the Atlantic to and from the ports of Montreal and Quebec.

Another of the many striking illustrations of Canadian progress is furnished by the postage system of which I have said something already. Take one fact of many. It was in 1851 that the control of the postal system was transferred by the Imperial government to the provinces, and a reduced rate adopted of 5 cents per ½ oz. on letters. Subsequently the rate was further reduced to 3 cents. The number of letters which had previously been sent through the post office annually was 86 thousand; the number now is 115 millions. In other words while the population has little more than doubled the number of letters sent has increased more than 1,300 times. Think of all that is implied in this enormous increase of correspondence, both as affecting business of every kind, and as affecting friendly communion among our people.

There has been a like enormous increase in newspapers. The number sent through the post office previous to its transfer to provincial management was 101,000; it is now 124 millions—an increase almost as great as in the case of letters. Newspapers, take them all in all, are valuable educators of the people. In other educational agencies also there has been great progress; and the results are illustrated by the agreeable and promising fact that while the number of children attending school 60 years ago in the whole territory, which is now Canada was 92,000, the number now is nearly a million, or say 10 times the number attending school 60 years ago.

Canadians are a mixed people. Besides the two great nations from which most of our population is derived, there is amongst us a representation of many other nations and races; and all our people, to whatever nationality or race they belong, unite in respect and affection towards our country's Queen. We all believe and know that she has been a blessing to the nation. And not to our nation alone. By her wisdom and thoughtfulness and firmness, she has repeatedly been instrumental in preventing war, from which the nations engaged, including our own, could not but have suffered much, the victors as well as the vanquished. Her own subjects in every land she has cared for and loved, as they have loved and revered her. She has rejoiced when they have rejoiced, and has sorrowed when they have sorrowed. In every relation of life, she has been an example of good as regards every duty. Those who have been her constitutional advisers, and thus been brought into closer intimacy with her, in public matters, than others, testify to her keen sagacity, her clear intellect, and the careful personal attention which she gives to public affairs. In executing the functions of her high office, she has adapted herself frankly and cordially to the requirements of popular government, and she has thereby, as well as by her whole conduct public and private, greatly strengthened the British monarchy in the estimation of her people. Nor is it only amongst her own people that she is held in high regard, but also in every civilized nation in the world, monarchical and republican. When in God's good time Her Majesty shall have passed from this world to another, she will long be remembered here as Britain's good Queen Victoria. In common with British subjects everywhere, Canadians thank God for the long and blessed reign of Canada's Queen.

To the Queen's Most Excellent Majesty:

MOST GRACIOUS SOVEREIGN:

We, your Majesty's royal and dutiful subjects, the Senate and of Canada in Parliament assembled, beg to offer our sincere congratulations on the happy completion of the sixtieth year of your auspicious reign.

When, on the memorable occasion of your Majesty's Golden Jubilee, the representatives of your loyal Canadian people joined those of other parts of the empire in expressing their heartfelt pleasure that by the grace of God the nation had for half a century enjoyed the inestimable benefit of your Majesty's constitutional and beneficient rule, they stated their earnest hope that your Majesty might be spared for many more years to reign over your loyal subjects.

A decade has since passed, and to-day we contemplate with renewed satisfaction the fact that your Majesty is still the head of the state. Not only have none of your illustrious predecessors sat on the throne of our country for so extended a period, but in the history of the nations of the world few monarchs have ruled so long, and none have been so universally honoured and revered.

Looking back across the sixty years which have elapsed since your Majesty ascended the throne, it is impossible not to be impressed with the immense strides which during that period have been made by the civilized world in all that constitutes the moral, intellectual and physical well-being of mankind. The Gospel of our Divine Teacher has been preached in the remotest corners of the earth; temperance in all things has become more than at any previous period an accepted rule of human conduct; more adequate provision has been made for suffering humanity; the administration of justice has been placed upon a more humane and otherwise satisfactory basis; great advances have been made in science and the arts; and the literature of the Victorian era surpasses that of any former period in breadth of thought and general excellence, as well as in volume and popular appreciation. By the establishment of railway and steamship communication, the inauguration of an improved postal system, the invention of the electric telegraph and telephone, as well as the general utilization of electric power, and by an infinite number of other agencies, the comfort and convenience of the people have been immensely increased. During the same period the empire has been enlarged, and its scattered members brought into more intimate fellowship with one another and with the mother land. Your Majesty's colonies in North America have, with but one exception, been gradually consolidated into a united Dominion, the people of which have been, and we believe will continue to be, amongst the most loyal of the races and peoples owing fealty to the British Crown.

We trust that we, and your Majesty's subjects in other parts of the empire, may continue for many years to come to enjoy the benefit of your gracious and peaceful rule; and we earnestly pray that He who is the supreme King of kings may endow your Majesty with every blessing in what remains to you of this life, and with everlasting felicity in the life to come.

Hon. Mr. MASSON—I, in common with other members of the Senate who remained seated during the reading of the address, do not wish it to be understood that we wished to show any disrespect in remaining in our seats. I think the proper course is not to rise. The hon. gentleman speaking, is moving the address, and this is simply a motion. I wish to make this explanation because some of the members of the Senate remained seated.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Honourable gentlemen, in seconding the motion for this address to Her Majesty, I, in common with the Minister of Justice who has moved it and many others present, have been privileged to live through the long period of the Queen's reign and, therefore, have been a witness of all the memorable events we now desire to commemorate, and to which the honourable mover of the address called attention. There is also this somewhat pathetic element in this celebration, namely: That in the nature of things we must contemplate the close, at a period which after sixty years of rule we sincerely hope to be remote, of one of the most memorable, and beyond all the most beneficient, reigns in our history. It was the boast of one of the Roman emperors that he found the city brick and left it marble. His boast was confined to a single city, which, great as it was, was yet but a small part of the empire over which he ruled. Queen Victoria, if in the mood for boasting, might exclaim, that she found her empire comparatively weak and will leave it widespread and strong beyond the dreams of any Roman ruler of them all. It would be gross flattery to contend that the progress of the empire to greatness was due to the special or exclusive exercise of the Queen's abilities. That progress has been the result of the labours of statesmen and soldiers, of merchants and missionaries, of manufacturers and traders, of those that go down to the sea in ships, and those who have felled the forests and tilled the fields all over the empire. But it may be claimed for the Queen that she has been one of the hardest labourers in the common cause of an advancing British civilization. She has utilized the genius and reconciled the jealousies of statesmen. She has watched keenly the career and rewarded the labour of soldiers. She has encouraged enterprise; and her authority has followed and protected the pioneer, the settler, the husbandman, in every region which has been filled by their labours. More than this may be said. Is it not true that in a long reign of sixty years the Queen's name, the Queen's influence, the Queen's authority have never been exercised to postpone or prevent the accomplishment of any project of law or of policy, which in the opinion of her legitimate advisers, was for the good of her people or the strength of her empire? We must not suppose that the Queen's authority is small or that it cannot be exercised. No public man who has had any experience or has studied our constitution can be ignorant of the ever alive and ever present powers of the Crown. The reign of George III. was marked by constant personal rule and constant conflicts with ministers. The reign of George the IV. was marked by the King's determined hostility to measures which the good sense of later generations approved of as essential. The reign of William the IV. was marked by the King's very vigorous hostility to the popular demand for enlargement of the franchise, which aroused bitter and dangerous ill feeling among his subjects. But during the reign of Victoria, Her Majesty has never stood in the way of what the general opinion of the country considered the path of progress. Her Majesty has been indeed a great stateswoman. All the qualities which we usually attribute to a great statesman have been and are hers. To be patriotic—to be humane—to be far-seeing—to be industrious—to have knowledge, courage, convictions and faith—to be conciliatory—to be fond of peace, yet ever ready for war—to be prompt and vigorous in defence of the national honour—to be sincere and sympathetic in regard to national sufferings, whether at home or abroad—these are some of the attributes of statesmanship, and with pride we may assert that Queen Victoria possesses them all. The leader of the government in this House has already given us in his address a relation, in brief, of the great progress the empire and the colonies have made during Her Majesty's reign. It is not necessary that I should follow him and repeat that tale of material progress, so great and so rapid, that language and figures fail to give it fit utterance. There are many amongst us still who remember how at the commencement of Her Majesty's reign, this country was in the throes of a disastrous rebellion. Now, the contingent which will represent Canada at the Jubilee Celebration will represent one of the most loyal portions of the empire. There are still more who remember that at a later period the vast region of India was ablaze with revolt. To-day, the contingent from India will represent the vastest population of loyal people—suffering though they have been—that any monarch ever ruled.

There are those who remember that at the beginning of the Queen's reign, the Australasian Colonies had hardly begun to exist. To-day they are the homes of large populations, vigorous, progressive and loyal, having survived and surmounted the perils to which ambitious young nationalities are exposed. We all can read, and many can remember, how at the commencement of the Queen's reign she was but a young girl taking her place, alone, inexperienced and timid upon the throne. After sixty years filled with many joys and sorrows, Her Majesty is once more (as she has been these many years) alone, but with an experience, knowledge and wisdom greater than are possessed by any of those who may form her government. Then, she had to receive counsel and advice. Now she can confer them. Then, she depended for support upon the loyal assistance of statesmen and the loyal devotion of her people. Now, she is in a position still to command that assistance and that devotion in an ampler measure. Sixty years of rule enable her to recall with pride the faithfulness of her people. Sixty years of experience enable the people to recall with pride the royal devotion of their Queen. In common with hon. gentlemen opposite, in common with all the people of this country, I and those with whom I act, have peculiar pleasure in giving assistance in the passing of this address by which we recognize and commemorate the sixtieth year of Her Majesty's glorious and beneficent reign. With unfeigned pleasure and devotion to the throne, and a sincere wish that Her Majesty may long be spared to reign over a happy and contented people, I second the motion.

Hon. Mr. BERNIER—(in French)—It is not often that the French language is heard in this chamber. When I have occasion to speak, I generally address the House in the language of the majority; however, this is, it seems to me, an occasion when the populations who enjoy the protection of the British flag should express in their native languages their sincere homage to the woman and to the Queen who has for the last 60 years, adorned the British Throne. When Her Majesty ascended the throne, our Canadian land was suffering from a serious agitation, but the agitation soon passed away, and with peace the country advanced in the path of prosperity and extension, so much so that we can boast to-day of being the jewel colony of England. Loyalty has also increased in the hearts of every class and of every citizen. But the French Canadians did not wait until this reign to give tokens of their loyalty to the new flag which floated over their heads. At the time of the American revolution, while the New England colonies hauled down the British flag, the French Canadians remained loyal and went to the front, and in fact saved Canada to England. Again, in 1812 and 1813, their loyalty was put to test and again it proves to be true loyalty, and through that loyalty this country of ours could remain a portion of the empire. On one occasion it was said that the last shot that will be fired in defence of the British flag on this continent will be fired by a French Canadian. And to-day, should a plebiscite be taken, the French Canadians would declare their satisfaction to remain under the flag which protects their nation. When we remember the personal influence of Her Majesty, her solicitude for the welfare of her people, it seems to me a proper occasion to express a wish, in connection with the agitation which is now prevailing in the land. In the distant province of Manitoba, a portion of Her Majesty's subjects are denied the enjoyment of well defined rights and liberties. Let us hope that Her Majesty, before handing over to her successors the reins of power, will deem it worthy of her solicitude to accord to that portion of her loyal subjects that justice which always engenders peace, and thus endear herself all the more to us.

The motion was agreed to.

Hon. Sir OLIVER MOWAT moved:

That the said Address be engrossed, and that His Honour, the Speaker, do sign the same on behalf of the Senate.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.) The House has been completely taken by surprise in this matter. There has been no notice of motion, and many senators who might have spoken on this subject are quite unprepared. I find the mover and the seconder of the motion fully prepared to do justice to the subject. It is placing the House at a disadvantage to spring the matter upon us without notice.

Hon. Mr. MILLER—The usual parliamentary course in a matter of this kind is for the address to be moved by the leader of the government in this House and seconded by the leader of the opposition, and the discussion has been confined to them.

The motion was agreed to.

Hon. Sir OLIVER MOWAT moved :

That a Message be sent to the House of Commons by one of the Masters of Chancery, to acquaint that House that the Senate has voted the said Address to Her Most Gracious Majesty, and to request their concurrence.

He said :—In reply to my hon. friend from British Columbia, I may state that I found on inquiry that no notice had been given of the address passed ten years ago. The debate on that occasion was confined to the mover and seconder, and I thought that that was the usual course.

The motion was agreed to.

Bill (104) "An Act respecting the Ottawa Gas Company."—(Mr. Clemow.)

Bill (87) "An Act to incorporate the Columbia River Bridge Company."—(Mr. McInnes, B.C.)

THE MANITOBA SCHOOL QUESTION.

INQUIRY.

Hon. Mr. LANDRY inquired :

1. Did the present government, or any member of the present administration, upon learning of the sending of an Apostolic Delegate to Canada, enter into communication with the government of Manitoba and ask or suggest to it the convenience or the expediency of delaying the adoption of the law giving force and effect to the Laurier-Greenway compromise with respect to the school question?

2. As one of the parties to the compromise, was the Federal government able to manifest to the government of Manitoba its desire to see the adoption of the legislation which was the consequence thereof deferred until after the arrival of the Apostolic Delegate? And did it manifest this desire?

3. What was the reply of the government of Manitoba?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—The answer to the first question will be simply no, and it follows, as a matter of course, that the answer to the second is that no action was taken by the federal government.

THE JOINT COMMITTEES OF PARLIAMENT.

MOTION.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL moved :

That rule 80 of the rules, orders and forms of proceedings of the Senate be amended by substituting for the paragraphs thereof numbered 1 and 2, the following :—

1. The Joint Committee on the Library of Parliament, whereto there shall be appointed in the first instance at least seventeen senators and such further number as may be necessary at any time to make the number of senators appointed thereto equal to that of the members appointed thereto on behalf of the House of Commons, if the latter form a majority of the committee.

2. The Joint Committee on the Printing of Parliament, whereto there shall be appointed in the first instance at least twenty-one senators, and such further number as may be necessary at any time to make the number of senators appointed thereto equal to that of the members appointed thereto on behalf of the House of Commons, if the latter form a majority of the committee.

He said :—Since I placed this notice upon the paper, it has been suggested by one of the older members of the Senate that instead of putting it to a vote, or passing it, I should suggest to the leader of the government here that he interview the premier, or the leader of the government in the Commons, to ascertain whether an understanding cannot be arrived at by which an equality in numbers of the members composing these two committees, should be the rule for the future. My only object in placing the notice on the paper was to prevent one House or the other having a preponderance in number on the joint committees. If the hon. leader of the government should think well of my suggestion, either himself or his colleague in this chamber could interview the premier in the other House. I would rather that the matter should drop than put the Senate to the necessity of reprinting all its rules again. I have no doubt the suggestion I have made, which I have done at the instance of some of my older colleagues, would be carried out if an interview were to take place between the leader of this House, or his colleague, and some minister in the other House.

Hon. Sir OLIVER MOWAT—I shall be glad to take the opportunity of conferring with the leader of the government in the other House on the subject.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Then it will be dropped.

The motion was then dropped.

CRIMINAL CODE AMENDMENT BILL

POSTPONED.

The Order of the Day having been called,

Committee of the Whole House on Bill (H): "An Act further to amend the Criminal Code of 1892."

Hon. Sir OLIVER MOWAT said:—I propose to ask the House to postpone this order until to-morrow, and I also propose that the three following orders which stand in my name be postponed.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Before the motion is put to postpone these orders, I would ask the leader of the House if he proposes to go on with the bills. First, there is one on the Criminal Code, and then there is the Trial by Jury in the North-west Territories, and also one respecting Interest and one relating to the Supreme Court.

Hon. Sir OLIVER MOWAT—The one respecting Interest I think we will take up the day after to-morrow. I will not take up the second order to-morrow, but I propose to take up the first order, the Criminal Code Amendment Bill, and, if there is time, the fourth order.

PROTECTION OF NAVIGABLE WATERS ACT AMENDMENT BILL.

SECOND READING.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT moved the second reading of Bill (105) "An Act to amend the Act respecting the protection of navigable waters." He said:—This bill is simply to make provision, in the event of a wreck or any object obstructing navigation, that full power be given the Minister of Marine and Fisheries to have the wreck removed and, if necessary, to place a signal there during the time the wreck has not been removed; and if the parties who own the wreck fail to remove it within a given time and the government is put to the expense of the removal, that the cost of removing it can be recovered from the party who fails to remove it.

The motion was agreed to and the bill was read the second time.

DELAYED RETURNS.

INQUIRY.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Might I ask the hon. Secretary of State when I may expect that return for which I moved about two months ago?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I had a letter from one of the ministers saying that it appeared to be quite impossible to bring it down in any reasonable time. A large amount of the information is not in the department at all. The proceedings before the commissioners have not in many instances been terminated, and the names of the witnesses are not within the knowledge of the departments and the names of the attorneys who may be retained by the parties charged is not within our knowledge. There is a vast amount of information which we cannot get.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I shall be satisfied if we can get it by the opening of the next session, provided the hon. gentleman will add to the return the number of dismissals and the reasons, and the commissions appointed since the date of the address for which I moved, and up to the date at which the return is presented to this House, which would make it complete.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Yes.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Is that the understanding?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Oh, yes.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—That you will bring it down the first day of next session?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I hope so.

RED DEER VALLEY RAILWAY AND COAL COMPANY'S BILL.

THIRD READING.

Hon. Mr. VIDAL, from the Committee on Railways, Telegraphs and Harbours, reported Bill (K) "An Act to amend the Act relating to the Red Deer Valley Railway and Coal Company," with amendments. He said: It is well that I should explain the alteration which has been made. Although it was thought expedient to strike out the whole clause and insert a new clause, the committee considered it to be preferable to make an amendment. This amendment merely changes the time. As the bill came to the committee, the term of three years was inserted as applying to the commencement of the time of paying of the percentage and the completion of the road. The committee in their judgment thought it better to make an alteration here, and they have made it two years from the commencement of the paying of this first percentage, and they extended the time for the completion to four years. That is the substance of the amendment. The length of it is simply in order to give phraseology and in order that it may be easily read. I move that the amendment be concurred in.

The motion was agreed to.

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—I move the suspension of the 70th rule in regard to this bill. It has been introduced in the Senate and there is no telling exactly how long the session will last and the promoters are anxious to have the bill sent down to the House of Commons. I shall not be here to-morrow and therefore make the motion now.

The motion was agreed to.

Hon. Mr. BOULTON moved the third reading of the bill.

The motion was agreed to and the bill was the read third time and passed.

BILL INTRODUCED.

Bill (M) "An Act to amend the Companies Act." (Sir Oliver Mowat).

A CANADIAN MINT.

MOTION.

Hon. Mr. McINNES (B.C.) rose to move:

That in the opinion of this House, it is both desirable and expedient that the government should, at the earliest possible date, establish a mint in Canada, for the purpose of coining all the gold, silver and copper currency necessary to meet the commercial requirements of the country.

He said:—I am sorry that the advocacy of such an important question as the establishment of a Canadian mint, has not fallen to the lot of some one better qualified and more familiar with the monetary institutions of this and other countries than I am. I am fully aware of the fact that many of my hon. colleagues in this chamber, are, or have been, presidents, vice-presidents, directors and managers of banking institutions, and many others who are not, or who have not been directly connected with banks, have had long and varied business experience, I therefore know and feel that my audience this afternoon is a most critical one. However, having twice within the last nine years, called the attention of this branch of parliament—a branch, in my judgment, better qualified to consider a question of this kind, than the Commons—to this subject, I shall again endeavour to present such data, yes, such incontrovertible evidence, as, I believe, will convince every hon. gentleman of the urgent necessity of at once carrying out the object of the resolution before the House. Each year makes it not only more apparent and desirable, but also more imperative, that the government should establish such an institution in our country—our country, Our Lady of the North, not "Our Lady of the Snows" as Mr. Kipling has libellously called our beloved country. Of all the great and beautiful daughters of the mighty mother of nations, there is none so great, none so beautiful and altogether lovely as our Lady of the North, Miss Canada. I propose, in the first place, to lay before you such facts as will put it beyond all doubt, beyond all cavil, that a mint can be established and operated at a direct profit, that it can be made a paying institution, a source of considerable revenue, and not a drain on the treasury as some people suppose. In the second place, I will show that there is no country in the world with an equal population, or of anything like the same commercial importance, or producing the precious metals in such quantities—to say nothing of our illimitable resources and possibilities—but has its own mint and coins its own money. By reference to the report of the director of the mint of the United States for 1896, page 26, hon. gentlemen will find, though the coinage of silver has been greatly restricted for the last few years in that country, that the net seigniorage or profit on silver alone was last year no less than $2,503,056. And the net profit on silver since 1878 has amounted to the enormous sum of $78,145,603. So far, I have been unable to get accurate returns showing the profit made on the coinage of nickel and copper, but we all know they are much greater than on silver, and must have amounted to several millions during the period I have just named. The foregoing figures will give some idea of the immense profits made on the coinage of silver and the profitable use to which our neighbours to the south of us have put the principal portion of their silver bullion. Now, I will take hon. gentlemen a little nearer home and show what our government has done in the matter of buying silver bullion and copper and having it coined in England. I have here a detailed statement furnished by the Finance department, covering a period of fifteen years from 1881 to 1896, showing the amount of silver and copper coined in England and the profit made thereon, and I have no doubt the figures given will surprise hon. gentlemen just as much as they surprised your humble servant when he first saw them. Here it is:—

Nearly one million dollars net profit. These figures show that our government has made an annual net profit of $66,540, for the last fifteen years in having its silver and copper coined in England, notwithstanding we had to pay the royal mint three per cent for coining our silver, and a Birmingham manufacturing firm ten per cent for coining our copper. We paid the royal mint $103,863 and the Birmingham firm $24,252 or a total of $128,115 for coining our silver and copper for the last fifteen years, an annual average of $8,540 for work which, I submit, ought to have been done here at home and which, if done here, would have been to the manifest advantage of Canada, as I will show later on. The gold product of Canada has been over $73,000,000 in the last thirty-eight years. Of this large amount the Pacific province contributed over $61,000,000, Nova Scotia over $11,000,000, Ontario, Quebec and the Territories the balance. Nearly all of this immense amount of bullion has been shipped out of the country—principally to the United States—at a loss of over five per cent to the producer. I believe you will all agree with me when I say that the principal portion of that gold should have been coined and retained by us for the purpose of developing and enriching Canada instead of a foreign country. Since I gave notice of this motion I have been frequently asked what seigniorage or profit is made on the coining of gold. There is practically no profit made on the coinage of gold in either England or the United States, other than enough to cover all expense in connection with mintage, the degree of fineness of the gold coin of both countries being almost identically the same. The profits made by the mints of those two countries are not derived from the mintage of gold, but from the coinage of silver, nickel and copper. As to the cost and operation of a mint, I find there is a general impression abroad that it would involve the expenditure of a very large amount of money. That impression is an erroneous one. A New England firm that manufactures all the machinery and dies for the United States mints has offered to supply all the plant necessary to mint two million pieces annually, for $25,000. Add to that say $50,000 for a suitable building, and the total cost need not exceed $75,000 to establish a first class modern mint capable of coining all the gold, silver, nickel and copper currency necessary to meet all the commercial requirements of this country for many years to come, and the annual cost of operating such an institution should not exceed $8,000 or $9,000 or more than we now pay annually for minting our silver and copper in England. We once had a mint in Canada. Immediately before the union of the two crown colonies—Vancouver and British Columbia—in 1867, a mint was established in New Westminster, and I am credibly informed that the entire cost of building and plant did not exceed $20,000. After striking off a few $2.50, $5, $10 and $20 gold pieces, the mint was ordered to be closed by the late Sir James Douglas, who became the governor of the united colonies, and for no other or better reason, it is alleged, than it would be the means of allaying the intense jealousy that existed between the rival cities of Victoria and New Westminster. To the courtesy of Mr. Courtney, deputy minister of finance, and Mr. Toller, the head of the currency department, I am indebted for a great deal of valuable information bearing on the subject under consideration. Among other things they informed me there is about $10,000,000 in gold in the Dominion treasury, nearly every dollar of which is United States coin. As hon. gentlemen know, the government is required to keep in the treasury, at all times, twenty-five per cent in gold and guaranteed securities, of which fifteen per cent must be gold, against all Dominion notes issued up to $20,000,000. Over that amount dollar for dollar in gold must be kept on deposit. Again, from the same source of information I learn that our chartered banks have in their vaults over $8,000,000 in gold, all of which is practically United States gold coin. In round numbers, between the government and chartered banks, we have nearly $20,000,000 in foreign gold coin. I ask, is this creditable to Canada? Is it creditable to the government and people of a great gold and silver producing country? How much longer is this humiliating condition of affairs to continue? How much longer are we to be dependant on a foreign country for a gold currency? How much longer is a national spirit, a national sentiment to be checked or suppressed? How much longer withhold a Canadian gold currency which would be a token of our growing importance, and an evidence of our national prosperity? I ask, yes, I appeal to hon. gentlemen to assist in having this $20,000,000 of foreign coin replaced by a beautiful gold coin, on the one side of which there would be the profile of our venerable and beloved sovereign, and on the other our national emblems, the beaver and the maple leaf. Why, I ask, has our government made the United States gold currency a legal tender? Was it to avoid the trivial expense of coining our own gold bullion? If so, let us be logical and go one step further and make the United States greenbacks a legal tender also, and thereby avoid the trouble and expense of manufacturing Dominion notes. The entire cost in connection with the government currency is in the neighbourhood of $100,000 annually. To effect a saving in the cost of printing our paper currency, we have taken the note-printing contract from a Canadian firm and given it to a foreign company. The decision of the government was based on sound economic principles, and, I am satisfied, will meet with the approval of the tax-payers generally. If the economy could have been effected by transferring the contract from a foreign corporation to a Canadian company, the transaction would have met with universal approval. It is just such a course I ask the government to pursue in dealing with the coin in circulation, to transfer the coinage from foreign countries to Canada, and I have shown by facts and figures which cannot be controverted, that the policy which I advocate will not only establish a new industry in Canada, giving employment to our own people, but will result in an actual financial gain to the Dominion. There are two mints in Australia. The Sydney mint was established forty-three years ago, and the one in Melbourne about fifteen years later. India has also two, one in Calcutta and one in Bombay. All four are branches of the Royal Mint. The right of coinage has not been conferred on those self-governing colonies, and before a mint can be established, permission must first be obtained from the Imperial government. Canada is in a totally different position in this regard. Section 91 of the British North American Act gives us absolute control over currency and coinage. We have taken full advantage of the currency, but not of the coinage privilege. A couple of questions of detail have been frequently asked me within the last few weeks, namely,—Where would you have the mint, and what would be the denomination of the coins? My answer to the first is that the mint should be in that part of our country producing the principal portions of the metals to be coined, namely, British Columbia, unless some very good reason can be given to the contrary. If not in the Pacific province, then I unhesitatingly say it should be in Ottawa. My answer to the second question is this, taking everything into consideration, our gold coin should be precisely the same as that of the United States in degree of fineness and size, and, consequently, of exactly the same intrinsic value. The denominations I suggest are $2.50, $5 and $10, as being the most convenient. Such coins would doubtless circulate just as freely as do those of the United States. However, as I have said, these are matters of detail and give me little or no concern at present. What I am anxious about is to have a mint somewhere in Canada, the question of its location can be subsequently determined. The following is a statement showing the per capita amount of gold, silver, and paper currency in circulation in the thirty-four principal countries in the world:—

An analysis of the foregoing details shows that twenty-three out of the thirty-four countries have paper currency, and I am sorry to see that Canada stands sixth on the list. The countries that have a larger paper currency per capita are the South American States, $15.28; Portugal, $11.71; Belgium, $11.51; Netherlands, $6.77; Greece, $6.45; while Canada has $6.03. Eleven countries have no paper currency: three have no gold, all have silver. Only nine have less silver than Canada, fourteen have less gold, and twenty-eight have less paper. Australia has nine times as much gold per capita. Great Britain has more than five times as much gold and three times as much silver. France has over seven times as much gold and over twelve times as much silver. Germany has nearly five times as much gold, and nearly four times as much silver. The United States has nearly four times as much gold, and eight times as much silver. Per capita Canada stands only twentieth on the list as to the amount of money in circulation, having, between gold, silver and paper, only $9.82. We have nearly twice as much paper currency as gold and silver combined. We have not a quarter the amount of silver coin we should have. I know that the managers of the British Columbia banks complain bitterly that they cannot get anything like the amount of Canadian silver they require and apply for, especially fifty cent pieces, and the consequence is they have to send to Seattle and Portland for United States silver. The aggregate amount of gold, silver and paper currency in the thirty-four countries under review, is as follows:—Gold, $4,143,700,000; silver, $4,236,900,000; paper, $2,558,000,000, making a grand total of $10,928,600,000. Of that amount Great Britain has $584,000,000 in gold, $121,700,000 in silver, and $111,800,000 in paper; a total of $817,5000,000. France, $772,000,000 in gold; $492,200,000 in silver, and $78,000,000 in paper; a total of $1,342,200,000. Germany, $675,000,000 in gold; $207,000,000 in silver, and $126,100,000 in paper, a total of $1,008,100,000. The United States, $672,200,000 in gold, $631,400,000 in silver and $424,400,000 in paper. total $1,728,000,000. By these figures it will be seen that the four countries just named have about one-half of the money of the world. I will now call your attention, hon. gentlemen, to this fact, that since I first placed this notice on the order paper, I have had dozens of communications, letters and resolutions, passed by the different boards of trade from Victoria, B.C., to Sydney in Cape Breton, sent me. Over 42 of the boards of trade have expressed themselves, with only three exceptions, in unqualified approval of the establishment of a Canadian mint. I have their communications here, but I do not propose to read all of them to the House. I will take one as a fair sample of all, or nearly all, and that is from one of the principal, if not the greatest, commercial Boards of Trade in the Dominion. It is from the Montreal District Chamber of Commerce. I will read the memorandum that has been sent me, and also the resolution passed, approving of my course in this matter. It is a report of the Joint Committee on Finance and Legislation on the proposal for a Canadian mint, by Mr. J. X. Perrault. And I may say here that Mr. Perrault is the ex-president of the Chamber of Commerce, and a gentleman to whom I owe a great deal, on account of the valuable information he has furnished me, and also on account of his sympathy and courtesy in this matter. This resolution was adopted at the general meeting of the Montreal Chamber of Commerce on the 2nd April, 1897, and reads as follows:

THE MONTREAL DISTRICT CHAMBER OF COMMERCE.

General monthly meeting, Friday, 2nd April, 1897.

Mr. Jos. Contant, president, in the chair.

After debate.

The following report and resolution were unanimously adopted:—

Report of the joint committee of finance and legislation on the proposal for Canadian mint, by Mr. J. X. Perrault, adopted at the general meeting of the Montreal Chamber of Commerce, of the 2nd April, 1897.

It seems that the time has arrived for the Dominion of Canada to coin its own specie and thus free itself of the necessity of importing its gold, silver and copper coins, as it is done to-day.

Our gold, silver, nickel and copper mines which have recently so extensively been developed, are a sufficient indication that, having at home the raw material, manual labour asking for employment, it is the government's duty to create this new industry, which will benefit the whole country so extensively.

On the 1st of February last, we find in the official Gazette, that there was in the banks of Canada during January an average specie reserve of $8,544,645, If we add to this the government reserves and circulation, we easily arrive at an approximate total of $20,000,000.

In the United States, the coinage in 1896 was as follows :—

Gold coins.....	$58,878,490
Silver coins.....	11,440,641
Nickel and bronze...	869,327
Making a total production of.....	$71,188,468
Representing a total coinage of.....	78,330,772 pieces.

Knowing that this coinage of specie is a source for the state of considerable profit, besides giving profitable employment to a large number of people both in the workshops and in the offices, we are at a loss to understand why the government has not yet interested itself in this question.

Taking the experience of the United States as a point of comparison, we find that last year (1894) the receipts of the three government mints at Philadelphia, San Francisco and New Orleans have aggregated $3,384,069, and the expenditure, in which labour amounts to $805,351, amounted to $1,163,563, leaving to the government a net profit of $2,220,502 on the operations of the year 1896, equal to 190 per cent on the working expenses.

This profit is due to a large extent to the depreciation of silver, the price of which on the London market in 1896 has been maintained at an average of $0.67½ cents an ounce, equal to $0.52 per gold dollar, the equivalent of gold to silver being in the proportion of 1 to 30·58.

The price of coinage at the Philadelphia mint for each dollar worth of coins has been $0,009,386, and for the whole of the United States $0,011,452.

The Chamber of Commerce, at its last meeting, after approving in principle the establishment of a Canadian mint as entirely desirable, has been embarrassed by doubt with regard to the right of Canada to coin its own money.

The opinion of the Chamber's legal adviser, consulted on this question, leaves no doubt on this right, which has been exercised for years by the Australian government. Mr. Beaudin's opinion confirms in every way the opinion expressed by Mr. J. X. Perrault at the last meeting. It is based on clause 91 of the British North America Act, which states that amongst the subjects under the jurisdiction of the federal parliament are "Currency and Coinage" which can leave no doubt that Canada has the right to coin its own money.

RESOLUTION.

Whereas the federal government has so far issued only paper money which is printed in Canada, our silver and copper specie being coined in England and our gold reserve consisting entirely of foreign pieces—and

Whereas the coinage of Canadian money would give the government considerable revenue and profitable employment to our working men ;

Resolved, that the Hon. Minister of Finance be respectfully requested to put a stop to the importation of foreign coins by establishing a national mint for the coinage of the gold, silver and bronze coins required by the Dominion of Canada.

Here is the view of their legal adviser, dated the 24th of March, 1897, addressed to S. Coté, Esq., Secretary of the Chamber of Commerce, Montreal :—

MONTREAL, 24th March, 1897.

S. COTÉ, Esquire,
Secretary of the Chamber of Commerce,
Montreal.

SIR,—In answer to your favour of the 20th instant requesting that I should inform you if the Canadian constitution authorizes the federal government to establish a mint for the coinage of gold, silver and copper coins.

I have the honour to answer that I entertain the opinion that the federal government has that authority.

Referring to the British North America Act, 30 and 31 Vict. cap. 3, sec. 91, paragraph 14, I find that the exclusive legislative authority of the Canadian parliament extends between other subjects to the following :—currency and coinage. As to currency, parliament has declared what would be the money in paper or coins which would be adopted as legal tenders in Canada.

With regard to coinage, Canada orders its coins at the British mint by special arrangement between the two countries. But in examining the Imperial statute establishing the mint, I do not see that colonies are prohibited from coining their own money.

This Imperial statute is the 33 Vic., chap. 10, sanctioned in 1870, therefore posterior to the Confederation Act.

According to section 11 of this Act, paragraph 8, Great Britain has reserved the right for herself to establish branch mints in the several colonies, but I do not believe that this has been inserted in the Act with the intention of prohibiting the colonies from establishing mints for themselves. This disposition has the effect, according to my opinion, of allowing the Imperial Privy Council to establish by simple proclamation, a branch of the British mint in any colony which would make application for it. For, in referring to section 19 of the same Act, we find that it will apply to the colonies only in case that the Executive Council should issue a proclamation to that effect, which, from the context of the Act, could only be done by mutual arrangement between the colony and the Imperial Government.

Your obedient servant,

So that there can be no question as to the right of Canada to establish a mint for her own coinage. It will be remembered that a few weeks ago, in the debate on the Address in reply to the Speech from the Throne, I spoke of the mineral development taking place in the Pacific province. I know that several hon. gentlemen were of the opinion that I was a little too sanguine ; I thought myself that I was taking an exceedingly conservative view of the situation of affairs in the Pacific province. To show this hon. House that I was largely within the mark, I will quote from the annual report of the Department of Interior, since issued, some extracts from the reports of Mr. Ogilvie relating to the far North-west portion of our domain, which not only confirm what I said at that time, but go a great deal further. He has made several reports from time to time, at intervals of a few weeks, just as he could get carriers to take his despatches to the coast and have them transmitted through the mails to the department here. The first that I will quote is dated Fort Cudahy, Sept. 6th, 1896. He says:

News has just arrived from Bonanza Creek that 3 men worked out $75 in four hours the other day, and a $12 nugget has been found, which assures the character of the ground, namely, coarse gold and plenty of it, as three times this can be done with sluice boxes.

They worked that out with no other appliances than a common pan, such as a tin wash basin or milk pan. In another report dated 6th November, 1896, he says:

In the line of these finds farther south is the Cassiar gold field in British Columbia; so the presumption is that we have in our territory along the eastern water-shed of the Yukon a gold bearing belt of indefinite width, and upwards of 300 miles long, exclusive of the British Columbia part of it.

Again on 9th December, he reports:

Since my last report the prospects on Bonanza creek and tributaries are increasing in richness and extent until now it is certain that millions will be taken out of the district in the next few years.

On some of the claims prospected the pay dirt is of great extent and very rich. One man told me yesterday that he washed out a single pan of dirt on one of the claims on Bonanza and found $14.25 in it. Of course that may be an exceptionally rich pan, but $5 to $7 per pan is the average on that claim it is reported, with 5 feet of pay dirt and the width yet undetermined, but it is known to be 30 feet even at that; figure the result at 9 to 10 pans to the cubic foot, and 500 feet long: nearly $4,000,000 at $5 per pan—one fourth of this would be enormous.

Another claim has been prospected to such an extent that it is known there is about 5 feet pay dirt averaging $2 per pan and width not less than 30 feet. Enough prospecting has been done to show that there are at least 15 miles of this extraordinary richness, and the indications are that we will have 3 or 4 times that extent, if not all equal to the above at least very rich.

Then the last report he sent out on the 22nd and 23rd Jauuary, 1897, is as follows:

A quartz lode showing free gold in paying quantities has been located on one of the creeks, but I cannot yet send particulars. I am confident from the nature of the gold found in the creeks that many more of them—and rich too—will be found.

* * * * * *

Fort Cudahy, 23rd January, 1897.

I have just heard from a reliable source that the quartz mentioned above is rich, as tested, over one hundred dollars to the ton. The lode appears to run from 3 to 8 feet in thickness and is about 19 miles from the Yukon River. I will likely be called on to survey it, and will be able to report fully.

Placer prospects continue more and more encouraging and extraordinary. It is beyond doubt that 3 pans on different claims on Edorado turned out $204.00, $212.00, and $216.00, but it must be borne in mind that there were only three such pans, though there are many running from $10.00 to $50.00.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.)—How would it do if they had the mint there?

Hon. Mr. DEVER—If you had it there you would not pay anything for the gold.

Hon. Mr. McINNES (B.C.)—That, hon. gentlemen, will give you some idea of what our placer diggings in that northern portion of the country are. I believe without a doubt, from the report given by Mr. Ogilvie and other reputable information that they are the richest that have ever been found in any country. It is a very conservative estimate that I make when I say that the output of that province this year will amount to at least $10,000,000, possibly $12,000,000, and, as I mentioned a few weeks ago, the conditions are very favourable for mining in that country, and the area is enormous. All over that vast area, there is scarcely ten square miles where they are not unearthing large ledges of quartz-bearing gold, silver, copper and lead. The healthiness of our climate and the inexhaustible supply of water and timber, will enable us, I believe, to go on doubling and trebling our production until within the next ten years, we will be producing from forty to fifty millions in the precious metals, besides lead and copper. I believe firmly that within the next few years we will stand, if not at the head, certainly very near the head of any gold and silver producing country in the world. But what is the condition of affairs? We have no mint. All this bullion is shipped out of the country at a great loss. Where does the gold that is produced away in that Yukon country go? Is it to any bank in British Columbia, or to any bank in Canada? No; it is shipped direct to the mint in San Francisco, at a direct loss to the producer of from five to ten per cent. I believe, as far as the branch banks we have out there are concerned, that it would be a very considerable source of revenue if that gold bullion was taken down to our branch banks in British Columbia, and drafts made upon them for England and other parts of the world. We would, by that means, keep within our own borders, the gold and silver that we are producing.

We have a great and mighty country, and it is for us, who are directing the destini es of this country, to avail ourselves of every opportunity and every privilege and every right that we can in order to further and to make it that great and glorious country that I believe it eventually will become. We are all Canadians, either by birth, by adoption, or by naturalization. We love our country, and we delight in furthering her interests in every possible way that we can. We have, as Canadians, many things which we have just reason to be proud of and to be grateful for. We have a constitution, although not perfect, possibly the best that has ever been devised, combining as it does all that time and experience have proven or shown to be good in the monarchical and republican forms of government. We are proud of our educational institutions, which are equal, if not superior to anything in the world. We are proud, and justly proud, of our vast domain, covering as it does nearly three and one-half millions of square miles. We are justly proud of our incomparable natural resources, resources which, if only partly developed, will place us among the great nations of the world. Canada, though destined at no distant date to become a great nation, I firmly believe will not be a separate or independent nation, but a consort nation—a nation indissolubly united in the bonds of eternal love and affection to that great and glorious empire of which we are proud to be a part. Adopt the resolution before the House, and a Dominion mint will soon follow, which will contribute in no small degree towards hastening the realization of these, our fondest hopes and anticipations.

Hon Mr. DRUMMOND—I venture to offer this hon. House a few plain remarks upon the resolution or motion which has now been submitted to us by the hon. member for New Westminster. I feel myself entirely unable to rival, or even to follow at a discreet distance, the hon. gentleman in the poetic flights of his introduction and his peroration. I will begin at the termination of his remarks, and say that we are all ready to admit the wonderful mineral wealth of British Columbia and to congratulate ourselves and British Columbia, and all connected with that province, on the fact which, I believe, is indisputable. The extracts which the hon. gentleman read from the reports of Mr. Ogilvie sounded a great deal like circulars which we are all receiving at the present moment, inviting us to take stock in all sorts of enterprises, but, notwithstanding that, we all admit the substantial accuracy of the claims made for the mineral wealth of the Pacific province. The point at which I diverge from the hon. member is in his nostrum for utilizing that wealth and claiming imaginary profits for the realization of that wealth by the establishment of a mint. He seems to imagine that the moment you cut the precious metal produced in British Columbia into pieces and stamp it with an effigy of one kind or another you, by some process or another, increase its availability and its actual amount. That is an entire delusion.

Hon. Mr. McINNES (B.C.)—I did not say anything of the sort.

Hon. Mr. DRUMMOND—I am prepared to show that the claim made in the resolution, that we should establish a mint for the purpose of meeting the commercial requirements of the country, is an entire mistake.

Hon. Mr. McINNES (B.C.)—I did not make my argument for British Columbia alone. I was speaking for the whole of the Dominion of Canada, not for British Columbia alone, because my native province, Nova Scotia, has produced in the last few years eleven and a half million dollars of gold.

Hon. Mr. DRUMMOND—I understood the hon. gentleman to advocate it for the whole Dominion, and very properly so, and my contention is that there are no commercial requirements which are not at present satisfied and well filled by the existing arrangements. There is no demand in this country for gold coin as a circulating medium. The time may come. I should not like to put myself on record as saying that we should never have a gold currency. The time may come when we may want it, but at present there is no demand whatever from the public for a gold coinage. Not only so, but if we had a gold coinage, it would entail in wear and tear a loss more than equivalent to the circulating medium which exists at the present moment, and fortunately for us, at present the government notes and the bank bills which take its place are accepted as gold all over the country, and notwithstanding the financial trouble of our neighbours, have been held to be equivalent to gold not only within our borders but beyond them. The hon. gentleman narrated to you the enormous sums spent by this country for the coinage which at present exists. He told us that it cost us eighty-five hundred and some odd dollars per annum to make coinage, and I understood him to put it as a matter of economy that we should establish a mint of our own and save this amount, or a large proportion of it. Is that probable? I take that point first. He presented an estimate that would seem to amount to this, that the establishment of a mint, whether in British Columbia or in Ottawa, would cost $75,000. My own estimate of the amount somewhat exceeded that sum, and I think we should be fortunate if we equipped and built a mint at a lower rate than probably $100,000, but I accept his estimate as a basis of calculation. He has an estimate of $25,000 for the actual machinery necessary. There is no manufacturing enterprise with which I am acquainted—and the operations of a mint are strictly those of a well organized manufactory—but writes off from its plant a certain sum per annum for depreciation and various losses incidental to manufacturing, which every one is acquainted with. Ten per cent I write off from the $25,000, and you have a first charge of $2,500. Now, the operations of a mint are something novel in this country, and I do not pretend to speak as an expert, but, being acquainted with manufacturing, I can make a reasonably fair guess, and I should say, to make the start necessary for such a mint, would entail a salary list of not less than $8,500 per annum. Curiously enough, the estimate I put down before I heard my hon. friend's speech was just $8,500 per annum for wages. Then the fuel, insurance and other charges, inevitable as they are, would bring the whole annual cost of the mint, equipped for a reasonable production of coin currency, to about twelve or thirteen thousand dollars per annum. The hon. gentleman shakes his head. Could we start a mint and entrust to that mint gold and silver and other precious metals without putting in charge a gentleman of respectability and position? I think not. I estimate the salary for that man at $2,500 a year at the very least.

Hon. Mr. OGILVIE—That is not enough.

Hon. Mr. DEVER—No; $5,000 a year.

Hon. Mr. DRUMMOND—You could not imagine that anyone who could be employed to whom you would entrust vast sums would be paid a smaller salary than that. I put the salary of the manager at $1,500 a year; bookkeeper $1,000; chief engineer $1,500; assistant engineer $1,000 and other assistants $1,000, making up a total of $8,500 for salaries. I once more desire to say that I do not present that as anything but a vague approximation, but if we take the experience of any government—of this government in particular if you will—based upon, practically, almost universal suffrage, with patronage at its disposal and applicants and political adherents to gratify, I maintain that no such enterprise can ever be conducted on an economical basis. Passing over this question of economy which, after all, is a subsidiary one, the next point in the hon. gentleman's statement which appears liable to misconception is the statement of the enormous profits to be realized from a mint. Take the United States. He produced a statement from the United States authorities of the great profits which that country had realized from its mint. I have no hesitation in saying that those profits are practically and entirely fictitious and imaginary, and that the United States mint, in dealing with its silver coinage in particular, has made a loss, and no profit whatever. It is all very well to take the silver which goes into the constitution of a silver dollar and say that it cost in the open market as bullion 50 to 60 cents—something between the two figures, call it 60 cents and that it passes, when coined, as one dollar. That would look like a profit of 40 cents on the dollar for the mere putting of that silver in shape and stamping it, which is a mere fraction of the 40 cents Now, if the United States could issue that silver dollar and keep it out and never see it again—get somebody to pay them a dollar for it and be done with it—they would certainly have made a profit of 40 cents, but can they? How many millions of dollars in silver are lying in the treasury vault at Washington at this moment unused?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Five hundred millions.

Hon. Mr. DRUMMOND—They are no better or worse intrinsically than when they are silver bullion, and yet we are told that there is a profit made on the coinage of that silver at the rate of 40 cents to the dollar. On the coining of gold there is no profit whatever. The British mint will take your standard gold and turn it into sovereigns to an equal amount, with a small percentage of alloy to harden it, which pays for the cost of coining it. The hon. gentleman pictures to us that the gold produced in this country, in Nova Scotia and British Columbia, is wasted and thrown away, sold below its value, and claims that if we only had it in coins we would save the whole of that and realize a fortune. Nothing of the kind. The gold that goes out of the country fetches within an ace of its intrinsic value.

Hon. Mr. POWER—Within one-eighth of one per cent.

Hon. Mr. DRUMMOND—The position of the government at present is this: it takes a piece of paper and stamps on it $1, $2 or $4. The cost of each bill cannot be over five cents including the raw material, and the profit is therefore 95 cents. Take silver. We pay sixty cents for a dollar, coin it and pass it so far as the country will take it, and make a profit of 40c. So long as the country is contented with the paper currency, and rather prefers it, to a metallic currency, the country is better served by supplying printed notes than by circulating coin. That is beyond all question. If that is so, where are the profits of a mint? I do not see them. One point in the hon. gentleman's speech struck me as being very remarkable. He says there is not in the province of British Columbia one fourth of the silver coin which is wanted. Can that be?

Hon. Mr. McINNES—I said Canadian coin.

Hon. Mr. DRUMMOND—Can it be true that in the province of British Columbia not one-fourth of the silver coinage which is wanted exists? I know nothing whatever of the fact, and must accept it on the hon. gentleman's authority, but it is a very remarkable thing. There is a plethora of coin on this side of the Rocky Mountains. In the hands of the banks and of the Receiver General there is a million and a quarter dollars, or thereabouts, of silver coinage which is not wanted as the currency of the country. In 1870 our government procured three million three hundred thousand dollars worth of silver coin. The nation was starting in business at that time, and it needed coin. In the next sixteen years it coined just about the same amount, coming up to 1896, and now, as I happen to know for a fact, the government has been entreated to order no more silver coin because there is too much already. Not only is there enough for the business of the country, but there is more than enough in the coffers of the banks and they cannot get rid of it.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.)—There is more United States silver and nickel currency in circulation in British Columbia than Canadian currency. What the reason is I do not pretend to say, but it is a fact.

Hon. Mr. DRUMMOND—Then I draw the government's attention to the fact that they can make a profit of 40 cents on the dollar by substituting ours for the foreign coin, and the sooner that United States coin is turned out of the country and our own substituted for it, the better. The government have plenty of our own silver to supply the demand. Not only would the mint cost us at least fifty per cent more to produce what currency we require, but the mint itself would be idle for ten months of the year at the least. I do not follow the hon. gentleman with approval when he speaks of this proposed mint turning all the bullion of British Columbia into coin. Take the example of Australia, on which he relies. Everybody knows that the currency of Australia is the gold sovereign and shillings and pence, and it would be absurd not to have it coined in Australia. The position of Canada is different. If ever there is a surplus in Australia, it gravitates to England and is absorbed into the mass of British currency. You never go to London that you do not find Australian sovereigns about as plentiful as British sovereigns. At all events, I defy you to get any considerable amount of gold in your possession that is not part Australian. But our position would be entirely different. If we coined gold coin, not one single dollar of it would ever go out of this country. It would not go to England, and the Americans would take precious good care they did not take it.

Hon. Mr. McINNES (B.C.)—We would take precious good care that we did not take theirs. We would get rid of their $20,000,000 that we have here now, and substitute our own.

Hon. Mr. DRUMMOND—They would be very glad to get it back again. The exodus of it from that country was watched with very great jealousy. When a Canadian banker went down to New York and procured gold, it was regarded in New York and Washington as a disloyal act for which there should be some punishment in the future. We have certainly a good deal of United States gold coin here, but the government did not import it and do not hold it. It has an intrinsic value. We never lose any money by it, because if it went to England it would be melted and converted into British coin. I maintain, therefore, that the institution of a mint would not be a profitable operation at all. There is no demand for gold coin in this country, and there is enough silver money to serve our purposes. As for copper money, it is a nasty material which for my part I consider a necessary evil. The less said about it the better. I look upon the resolution before the House as utterly mistaken on a commercial basis. No commercial basis for a mint exists—neither economy nor anything else. If the resolution ended there, and were a pure academic resolution to which we might give our assent without occupying our minds much about it, all would be well. While I do not think that the hon. gentleman for New Westminster meant any more than he said upon the matter, I cannot fail to look with some degree of alarm upon the establishment of an institution in this country with all the apparatus and preparations for a silver agitation such as recently brought our neighbours to the south of us very close to bankruptcy, and upset them financially, politically and every other way. One result would follow the institution of a mint if one were in operation—naturally we should coin our own bullion. Not a soul would lift up his voice against that proposition. It is a reasonable one. But we could not possibly, unless we followed the example of the United States, utilize much more silver coin than we have at present, and the cry would be at once raised "here we have a mint. It is languishing for want of work. There is not more than two months' work given it in a year, and salaried officials are idle and being paid for doing nothing. Let us coin some more. Let us have an unlimited coinage of silver." Here, then, we have a full fledged bi-metallic agitation started in this country, and we have all our finances upset. Look to the south and see what it has done for the neighbouring republic. I said already that I acquit the hon. gentleman of any sinister motives whatever, but I am not so sure that the people who have aided him are not prompted by such motives, and I would not like to say—

Hon. Mr. McINNES (B.C.)—Who does the hon. gentleman suppose have aided me?

Hon. Mr. DRUMMOND—I cannot tell you, I acquit the hon. gentleman entirely.

Hon. Mr. McINNES (B.C.)—Here we have 42 boards of trade in Canada endorsing the proposition.

Hon. Mr. DRUMMOND—But you only quoted one. It was not the Montreal Board of Trade. It was the French Chambre de Commerce, and the gentleman who addressed him was Mr. Perrault, a man of extreme views, although I would not wish to say that myself.

Hon. Mr. McINNES (B.C.)—Is he a free-trader?

Hon. Mr. DRUMMOND—No, I do not think he is.

Hon. Mr. POWER—Would the hon. gentleman allow me to ask a question? I am asking for information, and I do not profess to know anything about it. Does it not strike the hon. gentleman that it is just as easy—much easier in fact—to print an unlimited quantity of irredeemable currency as to coin an unlimited quantity of gold?

Hon. Mr. DRUMMOND—It is easier in one sense, and it is not in another. We do not confer that privilege on anybody who desires it. The government would hold the mint under its control, and would stamp the metal. There is another question, and a very important one. The government has just seen fit to take the printing of its notes from a Canadian company, and transfer it to an alien company. Now we are asked, with that as an example, to do the exact converse and take the stamping of our metals from the mother country and bring it here, on national principles. I cannot see the least connection, except that the one balances the other. However, I do honestly think that the institution of a mint here would be a dangerous experiment, inasmuch as it would be the beginning and would furnish the appliances and the apparatus of bi-metallic agitation, which might do grievous harm to the financial position of this country.

Hon. Mr. POWER—Before the hon. gentleman closes, I wish to ask another question for information. It struck me, when my hon. friend from British Columbia was speaking, that probably the argument in which there seemed to be the most force, was that which was derived from the great disparity in Canada between coin and paper. The statistics which the hon. gentleman quoted show that the disparity was greater in this country than in any other civilized country, and I wished to ask whether there is anything in that.

Hon Mr. DRUMMOND—I do not think there is anything whatever in that. The proportion of actual currency, paper, gold and everything else, is smaller in London than in any other part of the known world. Do not let me be misunderstood. The statistics of the hon. gentleman did not cover that point. I believe that over ninety per cent of the actual commercial transactions in London are done without the passing of currency of any kind or description. They are done by exchanges.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—There is more than seventy per cent.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—It is ninety-seven per cent.

Hon. Mr. DRUMMOND—Then so much stronger is my argument. If you go to Paris, however, is it not so? The less civilized a community is, in a commercial sense, the smaller the margin its currency bears to the actual transactions. In Paris there is a great deal more gold exchanged than there is in London, and I do not think it is any indication of the prosperity of the country. So long as there is enough coin for the wants of a community that is sufficient. There is not a single place in this country where a man who has a dollar cannot get a dollar's worth for it. The government have one, two and four dollar bills lying in the Receiver General's office, and let them provide the currency out of that. The country is perfectly satisfied, not only with the Dominion notes, but also with the notes issued by the banking institutions. I do not deal with this matter as one at all affecting the banking institutions. I do not think the banking institutions, issuing a currency of their own, should have a voice in this matter at all, if it comes into contravention with the rights of the public, but I believe there is enough currency for this country.

Hon. Mr. McINNES (B.C.)—Do you think it would interfere with the circulation if we had a gold coin?

Hon. Mr. DRUMMOND—No, I do not think it would make any difference.

Hon. Mr. McINNES (B.C.)—Does the hon. gentleman think that the amount of paper money in circulation is no indication as to the commercial standing of a nation? If not, how is it that the South American republics, Portugal and Greece—countries that have the largest paper money circulation of any countries in the world—are practically bankrupt now?

Hon. Mr. DRUMMOND—They can easily bankrupt themselves if they like.

Hon. Sir OLIVER MOWAT—My hon. friend who has introduced this motion has, I presume, accomplished his object. He desired to have the matter discussed, and the facts which he had collected brought to the attention of the House and the country. The facts are very interesting. My hon. friend has evidently taken great pains in considering this question, and has possessed himself of very valuable material for coming to a conclusion upon it. Prima facie, to one who had not previously thought of the subject, he would seem to present a case of considerable force and one which needs attention. I am much obliged for the information he has furnished us. I am glad he has given the matter such attention. He has stated one side of this matter—the side which he thinks the correct one, and now we have heard the other side. I have not before had the pleasure of hearing the hon. gentleman from Kennebec speak in this House. I am glad that we have heard him now. He has evidently spoken on a subject on which he has a great deal of practical thoughtful information, and I am sure we are all glad to have his side presented in the manner in which it has been. We know now a great deal on both sides of this question, and the discussion is not one which will be fruitless in some respects. Having attained the object my hon. friend had in moving the resolution, I should suggest to him now that he had better withdraw it.

Hon. Mr. McINNES (B.C.)—I suppose I shall have to yield to the request of the leader of the government, although I must confess that I am loath to do so, inasmuch as this is the third time that I have brought this matter to the notice of the House, and, notwithstanding what has fallen from the hon. gentleman from Kennebec, I claim that he has not in the slightest degree answered or refuted any argument I have adduced. Designedly or otherwise—I suppose otherwise, he led the House to believe that a mint would be an expensive institution to carry on. The estimate that I have made—and I think I have given the subject a little more attention, with all due respect to the hon. gentleman, than he has—is that the total expense in connection with a mint is between eight and nine thousand dollars. As I stated during my main remarks, a great number of people have the idea that it requires a large amount of money to establish and operate a mint. Half a dozen of a staff could coin all the gold, silver and copper, that we would require here in Canada. The danger that he apprehends from the establishment of a mint is imaginary. I claim that there is nothing like the same danger of wrong doing in connection with a mint that there is in connection with issuing Dominion notes. I speak with some authority and personal knowledge when I say that a mint could be operated at a cost of not more than eight or nine thousand dollars for the whole year, inasmuch as we had one in New Westminster, which, had it been continued, could have been carried on at an expense of not more than $5,000 annually. Had that mint been allowed to go on, it would have furnished all the gold, silver and copper necessary for this country, and instead of having the $20,000,000 of United States coin in the Dominion Treasury and in the vaults of the banks we would have a beautiful Canadian coin. I repeat, if for no other reason than national sentiment, every Canadian ought to favour everything that will have a tendency to place us on a footing of equality with other countries. When travelling in the United States, and speaking on the subject of the gold currency, I have often felt humiliated when I have been asked "What is your gold currency"? and I have had to reply "we have none," that the only gold in circulation in my native country is United States coin. I contend that that condition of affairs should not exist any longer. We should be patriotic and true to ourselves as Canadians, looking not only to the present but to the future. We should have a mint and coin all the gold, silver and copper currency that we require. True, it might interfere to a certain extent with the notes issued by the banks. I believe the main opposition to the establishment of a mint in Canada proceeds from the chartered banks of this country, and the quicker the interests of the people of Canada, wherever they may conflict with those of the banks are consulted, the better. From the communications that I have received from every board of trade, forty-two in number, expressing hearty and unqualified approval of the project that I advocate, I believe that they will go on agitating this matter until the government, whether it happens to be Liberal or Conservative, will be compelled to accede to their request. With the permission of the House I would withdraw the motion.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Before the resolution is withdrawn I wish to say a word or two on the subject. Though the estimate of profit which the hon. gentleman has given to the House may be accurate enough, so far as the mere gold and silver circulation is concerned he overlooks the large amount of profit to the Treasury of Canada from the actual loss of Dominion notes in circulation, and which loss amounts to a great deal more than all the profits to be derived from a mint which the hon. gentleman has estimated.

Hon. Mr. McINNES (B. C.)—Whom does that fall on?

Hon. Mr. MILLS—It falls upon the party who held the notes. But let me point out the difference between the loss of a bank note or a Dominion note and the loss of a gold coin. If I lose a ten dollar gold coin, it is an actual loss to me and to the country. If I lose a ten dollar note it is a loss of $10 to me, but it is a gain of $9.95 to the bank. So that so far as the country is concerned, there is a loss of but five cents. That is a matter of some importance to take into consideration. Then just one other matter with regard to the bank note circulation. My hon. friend seems to think that it is a great misfortune to a country that paper should circulate to so large an extent—I think he said $6 per capita of the population—and that in this respect we are very nearly in as bad a position as the semi-barbarous countries that constitute the South American republics. I think there is a great advantage in a redeemable paper circulation. In this country the bank circulation is largely due to the very great confidence that the people of this country have in our banking institutions, and, if you were to substitute a coin circulation for a paper circulation, you would have a monetary system that would be altogether wanting in that expansibility which attaches to our present system. What are the facts? Take an ordinary banking institution in any one of the towns of this country in a great producing district. You have that circulation, at certain periods of the year, half a dozen times greater than it is at other times. Upon what is the circulation based? Is it upon the gold and silver coin that the bank is required to hold in reserve? Not at all. It is based upon the warehouse receipts which the banks hold from the parties engaged in business, and are paid when the produce is shipped, perhaps at Montreal or some other point. Now, the wheat we say is just as good a basis for that circulation as gold itself, because it is just as certain in its value, the market value at which it is purchased, and any system which would have the effect of driving out our paper circulation, if that were possible, and substituting for it gold or silver coin, would, in my opinion, seriously inconvenience the agricultural population of this country, at certain seasons of the year, when their products are put upon the market and the circulation is required to be larger than the gold or silver that the bank holds in reserve, or the capital that could be made profitable upon a full gold reserve. You are enabled to do a very large business on a moderate amount of capital, which you could not do under the other sytem. It would have to be money having an intrinsic value, which is not necessary under the system that we now have.

The motion was withdrawn.

TAXATION OF CANADIAN PACIFIC LANDS.

INQUIRY.

Hon. Mr. BOULTON rose to Inquire if the official legal opinion of the Minister of Justice was obtained to justify the reply given by the Minister of the Interior to Mr. Lister's question in regard to the exemption from taxation of the Canadian Pacific Railway lands, namely, that said exemption for twenty years dated from the issue of the patent for each individual parcel and not from the date of the letters patent incorporating the company?

He said:—I desire to explain to the Minister of Justice my reason for having given this notice of motion. This, to us in the West, is a very serious question indeed, and the position that the government takes upon the interpretation of the Act that gives an exemption from taxation for twenty years to the Canadian Pacific Railway is one of very great importance. I will read to you the question, which I saw reported in the public press, that was put by Mr. Lister to the Minister of the Interior. Mr. Lister asked:

LAND GRANTS TO THE CANADIAN PACIFIC RAILWAY COMPANY.

Mr. LISTER asked:

How much of the land grant to the Canadian Pacific Railway Company has been patented? Does the exemption from taxation on the land grant run from the date of patent for each parcel of land, or from the date of the letters patent incorporating the Canadian Pacific Railway Company and providing for land subvention?

The MINISTER OF THE INTERIOR (Mr. Sifton). I would like to let the first question stand. Information has been furnished to me by the department to answer the question, but I am not absolutely sure of its accuracy, and I wish to examine it more closely before the answer is given. As to the second part of the question, the exemption runs from the date when the patent issues.

Since the date of that reply, May 26th, the hon. Minister of the Interior has replied to the first part of the quettion that 1,425,925 of the C.P.R. land grant has been patented. I must take exception on behalf of our western country to the reply that has been given by the hon. Minister of Interior, because I think it is open to very grave question indeed whether that is an accurate judgment on the question or not. It certainly is not in the interest of the people whose interests we are supposed to represent —sixteen years out of the twenty have elapsed since incorporation and only about a million and a half acres according to the minister have come under the operation of the exemption clause of the charter. There is very grave doubt indeed as to what the meaning of the clause that gave that exemption is. It is, of course, a legal question, but if the government gives its adhesion to the principle that is laid down in the reply of the Minister of the Interior, then naturally the public who are the purchasers of the Canadian Pacific Railway stock, can hold the government to account for having announced the fact that that is the interpretation, and the correct interpretation, of the land grant as it was made in 1880. I see here in the Citizen of 29th of May, a telegram from Montreal as follows:

CANADIAN PACIFIC RAILWAY STOCK BOOMING.

MONTREAL, May 28.

At present Canadian Pacific Railway stock is attracting unusual attention, both among the local speculators and upon the London market. In fact, at the present time there seems to be more of a desire to deal in this security than has existed since the Baring panic in 1893.

In London this morning the stock was quoted at 58¾, which is the highest figure for 1897, it having sold as low as 46¾ on the war scare about six weeks ago. The price on the local market this morning was 57¼, which is just about equal to the London prices.

The reasons for the better feeling in Canadian Pacific Railway is the increased traffic earnings, which have recently averaged $60,000 per week increase, together with the improved western business.

Attorney General Cameron, of Manitoba, who is at present at the Windsor Hotel, said recently that the free land of that province is about all taken up, and this will naturally direct attention to the railway's holdings, which amount to something like 17,000,000 acres. These seems to be the reasons for the present better feeling, and the general advance.

Now, hon. gentlemen can readily see that if 17,000,000 acres of land now held by the Canadian Pacific Railway Company are to be exempt from taxation for twenty years from the date of the issue of the patent for each individual parcel of land, it enhances the value of that land grant over and above what it would be if the municipal taxation was to be levied twenty years after the incorporation of the company. It is contrary to the principles of government in our municipalities that we have instituted in our western provinces.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—Did you say 17,000,000 acres in the province of Manitoba?

Hon. Mr. BOULTON.—No; Manitoba and the North-west altogether.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED.—The lands in Manitoba are not exempt for twenty years.

Hon. Mr. BOULTON.—No, it is the land in the North-west Territories. When the province of Manitoba was enlarged to the twenty-ninth range, the Act that constituted the province and enlarged its boundaries provided that it should be subject to the terms of the contract of 1880, so that, so far as the point that my hon. friend from Calgary raised, that the province of Manitoba is not included, it is only that portion of Manitoba which formed the original province. In our municipal organizations we recognize that when anyone has acquired a right to a quarter section of land by entering it at the land office, his land then becomes amenable to taxation. When the country was handed over to Canada in 1870, all those who lived in the country at the time had no patents for their lands, but they came in under the principle of taxation without any patent being issued at all.

Hon. Mr. CLEMOW—Before the patent was issued?

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—Yes, before the patent was issued. Not only that, but when a settler in that western country enters a quarter section of land and has homesteaded it becomes liable to taxation, and at the end of the three years he becomes entitled to his patent. That patent may not be claimed, or may not issue for ten years after he is entitled to it, but the municipal authorities and the local government recognize that the land, notwithstanding that fact, and whatever rights a man may possess in the land are liable to taxation. More than that, when a pre-emption is secured, by the payment of $10, of the adjoining 160 acres, that also becomes liable to taxation so long as that man occupies it and closes it up from right of entry on the part of any one else. It is on that principle that we govern ourselves with regard to this point, because it has been a very important question as to how many should be included in the expense of maintaining our municipal organization. The clause granting exemption from taxes is No. 16 in the Canadian Pacific Railway Act of 1880. It provides:

16. The Canadian Pacific Railway, and all stations and station grounds, work shops, buildings, yards, and other property, rolling stock and appurtenances required and used for the construction and working thereof, and the capital stock of the company, shall be forever free from taxation by the Dominion, or by any province hereafter to be established, or by any municipal corporation therein; and the lands of the company, in the North-west Territories, until they are either sold or occupied, shall also be free from taxation for 20 years after the grant thereof from the Crown.

The ground I take with regard to that is that the exemption for a term of 20 years was given so long as the land remained in the hands of the Canadian Pacific Railway. The moment that the company sold—one year after or five years after the incorporation of the company—the lands became liable to taxation, but so far as the company's ownership of lands was concerned, they had the whole 20 years absolutely free from taxation. The ground taken by the Minister of Interior in his reply is that if the Canadian Pacific Railway postponed an application for a patent for their land for 15 or 18 years, as the case might be, they would still have the exemption of 20 years from that date. Hon. gentlemen will see that that is a very important point, so far as our western people are concerned, in the maintenance of the municipal organizations. If they have to sustain their municipal organizations, their schools and everything else for a period of 30 or 40 years, it will be a matter of very great difficulty and hardship to them. The wording of the clause is not twenty years after the issuing of the patent but for 20 years after the grant thereof by the Crown.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—Is not that a matter for the courts? The government cannot affect them one way or the other?

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—When a member of the government has announced to the world from his place in parliament, that the exemption is for twenty years after the issuing of the patent, it is necessary that we should protect the public who invest in the stock of the Canadian Pacific Railway so that they shall not come back to the government and say "that is your decision. We bought the securities on that ground and no protest was entered against it." It is also necessary to protect the settlers from a prejudgment of the case by a Minister of the Crown. It is to enter a protest against that position that I bring the question before this honourable House to-day. It is a question that we are justly entitled to consider for the protection of investers under the legislation of this parliament. My contention is that the taxation commences from the time the Canadian Pacific Railway Company was granted those lands. They have twenty years to run from the time they were granted, before being obliged to realize upon them or pay taxes, unless they sell them. Now, the question is whether that twenty years is to be extended to forty years in consequence of this interpretation, or until they are disposed of. My contention is that the grant was made to the Canadian Pacific Railway Company when they were authorized by parliament to issue land grant bonds, which they did, and that permission was incorporated in this Act of 1880. The Canadian Pacific Railway Company must have been granted those lands before they could issue land grant bonds. There can be no doubt of that whatever. They could not possibly issue $25,000,000 of land grant bonds unless the lands had been granted.

Hon. Mr. McKINDSEY—They were granted by statute.

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—Here is what the statute says:

17. The company shall be authorized by their Act of incorporation to issue bonds, secured upon the land grant granted to the company, containing provisions for the use of such bonds in the acquisition of lands, and such other conditions as the company shall see fit—such issue to be for $25,000,000. And should the company make such issue of land grant bonds, then they shall deposit them in the hands of the government, etc., etc.

The hon. gentleman will see by referring to clause 16 where it says "shall also be free from taxation for 20 years after the grant thereof from the Crown." In clause 17 I have just read, it reads "secured upon the land granted and to be granted to the company" the words "grant" have the same meaning in both clauses of the charter of incorporation, there is no reference to patents which are subsequent details of the grant—The company built as far as Oak Lake in 1881 and 500 miles farther in 1882. thereby becoming entitled to some ten million acres of the land grant.

There must be a limitation of the 20 years and I contend that that is from the date the lands were granted which commences with the release of land grant bonds as evidence of title. Now, these lands must have been granted to the Canadian Pacific Railway Company when they undertook to issue their land grant bonds. They could not possibly issue those bonds unless they were entitled to the lands and the lands had been granted.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Does the hon. gentleman contend that the granting of the lands to the Canadian Pacific Railway Company dates from the passage of the Act, or from the time they issued their bonds, or from the granting of the patent? If the 20 years is to commence from the granting of the lands, that is by statute. Then I should like the hon. gentleman to tell us how lands could be taxed which had never been set apart so that the municipal authorities could ascertain the lands on which to levy the taxes. Land grant bonds were issued in order to raise money, under the law placed upon the statute-book. If the lands were not set apart, or given to the Canadian Pacific Railway Company, before the patents were issued, how could a municipality by any possibility know the lands to tax until the patents had been issued, and they knew what lands belonged to the Canadian Pacific Railway.

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—I quite understand the position the hon. gentleman presents, but the statute has provided for that. I quite understand that the Canadian Pacific Railway Company may not yet have selected all their lands, but there is a period of twenty years which must be allowed to elapse before they can be subject to taxation, during which period they must select their lands, and the fact that they have not selected those lands for eighteen years after they were granted, under the conditions I have spoken of, does not entitle them to another twenty years after that time has elapsed. If their contention is held good on that 17,000,000 acres of land they still hold they are to have an exemption of forty years instead of twenty years. If that had been the intention it would have been set forth in the statute. I am quite aware that it is open to argument and is a legal question, but it seems to me it does not do to allow a question of that kind to go without entering a protest against the position that has been taken. I maintain, in the interest of that western country, if it is to be successful, it is impossible to keep 17,000,000 acres of land, the burden of which has to be supported in municipal organizations by settlers there, and allow a company which is enjoying the ownership of that 17,000,000 acres of lands to keep them from the market and hold them without sale until those settlers have created an accumulated value for them in that way, for a period exceeding what was intended by parliament in making the grant. The question arose something the same in the transfer of the country by the Hudson Bay Company. That company made a bargain with the Canadian government that they were to pay so much and the company were entitled to the selection of lands in the North-west to the extent of one-twentieth. There was a great difficulty in getting the Hudson Bay Company to accept those terms. They resisted and wanted a larger proportion of the lands, and they wanted better terms. Here is the reply in the letter by Lord Granville to Sir Stafford Northcote, dated

DOWNING STREET, 9th March, 1869.

SIR,—Earl Granville has had under review the correspondence which has passed respecting the proposed transfer to Canada of the jurisdiction and territorial rights of the Hudson Bay Company in North America * * * *

It is due, both to the representatives of Canada and to the company, to add—that these terms are not intended by Lord Granville as the basis of further negotiation: but a final effort to effect that amicable accommodation of which he has almost despaired, but which he believes will be for the ultimate interest of all parties.

If this be rejected either on behalf of the Dominion or the company, his Lordship considers that his next step must be to procure an authoritative decision as to the rights of the Crown and the company, and with this object, he will recommend Her Majesty to refer their rights for examination to the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council, whose decision will form a basis for any future legislation or executive action which Her Majesty's Government may find necessary.

* * * *

Lord Granville is aware that a proposal of this kind will require consideration; but he hopes you will lose no time beyond what is necessary in acquainting him with your decision.

I am, Sir,
Your most obedient servant,
FREDERIC ROGERS.

Sir STAFFORD NORTHCOTE, Bart., &c.

That arose from the fact that the Hudson Bay Company of those days made a claim for a far larger right to the sovereignty of that country than they actually possessed, and the Imperial government said: "If you are going to block the way and obstruct, by excessive demands, the policy which is now sought to be carried out, we will have to inquire into what your rights are by reference to the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council, in order to determine them, and if we find that your rights of sovereignty to the title of the land is confined to Rupert's Land alone," which was the settlement along the Assiniboine and the Red River for a certain distance and did not go beyond that, "if you demand more we will have to make an inquiry." This matter is just about in the same position. Here is an open question—a question that is of very great moment to the people in the North-west, whether this exemption is to lapse at the end of 20 years from the date the lands were granted—that is earned by the company when they became entitled to it in the same way that the homesteader becomes entitled to his land by virtue of an entry and payment of a $10 fee. The question is a live and important one. I do not think it is wise to go on and leave it open to doubt, because any gentleman can see the value of 17,000,000 acres of land, any portion of which is to be exempted from taxation for 40 years, is a much more valuable asset than if it were only exempted for 20 years. The patent, I consider, is a mere detail of the grant, and ownership is attained entirely upon the fulfilment of the conditions by which an individual settler, or railway corporation or any one else, become entitled to the land. It is for that that the grant which is referred to here. That is my opinion, and the people of the North-west are of the same opinion, from the principle of right and justice, from the principle of their own interest in the successful development of that country, and for that reason I think myself, that while there is a doubt, it would not be at all unwise on the part of the government to remove it by such a reference as I have already spoken of, to the Imperial government. In the meantime I make this inquiry in order to ascertain if the Minister of Justice takes the same ground. I do not ask for a legal opinion at all, but to ascertain if the Minister of Justice has given his official authority for the reply to Mr. Lister's question, or whether it was made upon the personal responsibility of the Minister of the Interior under whose official control the lands are. I want simply to take the question out of the arena of doubt by the interpretation of the officers of the Crown, which would remove from any municipality, or any provincial government, the right to contest the claim at some future period, and it is for this reason that I make this inquiry.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—The Minister of the Interior did not say that he had obtained the opinion of the Minister of Justice, and, as a matter of fact, the Minister of Justice has never given any opinion on the subject. I fancy that the only opinion which would be reliable, would be one from the courts.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I suppose the minister cannot shirk the responsibility, if I may use that expression, of the statement made by one of his colleagues. I understood the hon. member from Marquette to say that the Minister of the Interior had stated that the lands were not taxable for 20 years after the issue of the patent.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—The Minister of the Interior gave that opinion, based on a case that came up in court. He gave it as his opinion.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—As a layman, I think he is right.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I do not know whether the case went to the Supreme Court. It did not go to the Privy Council, but it was on the decision of the court which is probably not yet a final judgment.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—It could not have been under that section, because 20 years have not elapsed since the patent was granted.

A QUESTION OF PRIVILEGE.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—Before the orders of the day are called, I would like to call the attention of the Government to an extract from the Quebec Chronicle with reference to the Jubilee Regiment. I do not know whether my hon. friend has seen it, but I bring it to his notice in order that, if true, the defects in the selection of the volunteers may be remedied. It is under date June the 1st, and reads as follows:

> The first appearance of the Jubilee Regiment on parade on Sunday last, as hinted in yesterday's Chronicle, evoked considerable adverse comment. It includes a number of men, to whom it is no disrespect to say that they should never have been selected for the purpose. The regiment ought to be the best possible representation of Canadian manhood. Those members of it who do not enter into this category are, of course, not responsible for the fact, but the commanding officers who selected them are far from blameless. Either their corps must be most miserable ones as a whole, or favouritism would seem to have decided the choice of the men, for it is hard to imagine many of them as anything like the best possible representatives of their regiments. A number of them are of poor physique, others have a miserably unmilitary carriage, and a good few would stand quite a lot of brushing up and tidying. If, to all this, poor marching and ill-fitting uniforms are added, the result can be imagined. In short, our proposed picked Jubilee contingent, intended to do Canada credit, will fall far short of its object if some marked improvement is not at once visible. This criticism is made in no carping spirit, but for the best interests of all concerned and it is to be hoped that some better showing may soon be made, for Quebec is a military city and a soldier's faults are soon noticed here. Our representatives will rub shoulders with the best troops of the Empire and will need to be at their best. A large proportion of them are undoubtedly men to whom not the slightest exception can be taken and who would do credit to any country. But the crazy-quilt, patch-work appearance of the detachment is painfully apparent on parade and it is hard to say how the matter can now be remedied.

This is an editorial in the Quebec Chronicle of June 1st. I may add, I was told by a gentleman who saw the parade that he did not consider the description at all overdrawn. As an old volunteer, I should very much regret to see a regiment composed of men, as described here, going to London to represent the forces of Canada, and I am quite sure the leader of the government, who has a love for his country, and I am quite sure also has a very great respect for the volunteer forces in Canada, will come to the same conclusion that I have—that if this be correct, there has been a lamentable fault on the part of the officers, and that immediate steps should be taken to have it remedied.

Hon. Sir OLIVER MOWAT—I have heard nothing of the matter which my hon. friend has mentioned. It seems extremely improbable that the officers who are responsible for the selection of the men should have selected such persons as that extract described. It is possible, but extremely unlikely. I will communicate with the acting Minister of Militia. I quite concur with what the hon. gentleman, as a volunteer, has said, as an old lieutenant of Her Majesty.

Hon. Mr. SANFORD—I do not know that I quite heard or understood the paragraph, but if it refers, as I understood it did, to the uniform of the men, I will vouch for it that that uniform is in order, but as for the fitting, I can only say that the government requested that these articles should be prepared by measurement, which was specially sent up for every man for the force, and with a great amount of care and pains these articles were prepared at an actual loss to the company who were engaged in the manufacturing of about $200 or $300, the instructions being given simply to manufacture these in accordance with the desire of the department, without reference to their cost, that they shall be a credit and honour to their country, and a credit and honour to the company who were engaged in their manufacture. If there is any mistake with reference to the costume or dress of those men, it arises from the measurements and not from the manufacture; it arises from the men not standing in a soldierly manner, or stooping, or crouching, possibly in another form. There is a mistake somewhere. It does not belong to the government and it does not belong to the manufacturers.

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—I am glad the hon. gentleman has brought this matter to the notice of the government. I think it will be found to be an exaggeration. The selection was made from a diversity of corps. One hundred and fifty have been selected from all the corps of the Dominion, not having been selected as privates, but as sergeant-majors, sergeants, corporals, and so on, and of course in the city of Quebec, where they have been accustomed to seeing nothing but our regular trained soldiers, well set up, drilling together for a certain length of time, I think probably some of the criticism in Quebec may have resulted from that fact. I am satisfied the country may have confidence in the Adjutant General, who is an old soldier, and who will get the men together as rapidly as he possibly can, and I think Canada will have no reason to be ashamed of any of her sons.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—The reason I brought this to the notice of the government was in order that they might call their officers' attention to it, because it may not be true. I did not mention, nor is there anything in the article which I read which speaks at all of the quality of the clothes which these men had on. It said they did not fit. It is possible the manufacturers may have made to the orders given, and they may have been given to others whom they did not fit. That is presuming all the time that the article which I read is true.

Hon. Mr. McMILLAN—The clothes were made for larger men.

It being six o'clock, the Speaker left the chair.

After Recess.

PROTECTION OF NAVIGABLE WATERS ACT AMENDMENT BILL.

IN COMMITTEE.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on Bill (105) "An Act to amend the Act respecting the protection of navigable waters."

(In the Committee.)

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—The object of the bill is to enable the Minister of Marine and Fisheries to remove from navigable waters obstructions that may not possibly be in the way of navigation now, but that may be an obstruction in the future and may prevent the department from placing beacons at desirable points. I will just read the words that are introduced. Clause No. 4 in the bill is substituted for clause 4 in the present Act, and I will read the amendment:

1. Section four of The Act respecting the Protection of Navigable Waters, chapter ninety-one of the Revised Statutes, is hereby repealed and the following substituted therefor:—

"4. If, in the opinion of the Minister of Marine and Fisheries, the navigation of any navigable water as aforesaid is obstructed, impeded or rendered more difficult or dangerous by reason of the wreck, sinking, or lying ashore or grounding of any vessel, or of any part thereof, or of any other thing."

The words following are the new portion:

Or if by reason of the situation of any wreck or any vessel, or of any part thereof, or of any other thing so lying sunk, ashore or grounded, the navigation of any navigable water, as aforesaid, is, in the opinion of the minister, likely to be obstructed, impeded or rendered more difficult or dangerous, or, if in the opinion of the minister, any vessel or part thereof, wreck or other thing cast ashore, stranded or left upon any property belonging to Her Majesty in the right of Canada is an obstacle or obstruction to such use of the said property as may be required for the public purposes of Canada.

Those are the words inserted. One of the principal objects is to remove a wreck now in the harbour of Victoria. It is not exactly lying so as to obstruct navigation, but it is a great eyesore to the people of Victoria. It is lying at a point where the minister thinks a beacon ought to be erected, and the language of the clause as it stood would not enable them to remove that wreck. The rest of the clause is the law as it now stands.

Hon. Sir MACKENZIE BOWELL—I suppose there is no doubt as to the power to pass this Act and to put it in force in case it is passed. I know where the vessel to which my hon. friend refers lies, but it is outside the harbour. Whether it would be considered in the sea proper I do not know. It lies certainly within the three mile limit, if that has any force. The law would probably have some effect. This is a question that has been before the House a number of years. I remember, when occupying a seat on the other side of the House, introducing a somewhat similar bill, but for some reason it did not become law. I am aware that the wreck in Victoria harbour is an eyesore, but it is a splendid place to erect a beacon and it is a beacon itself to keep people from running on the rocks. No one can understand how the wreck took place, except through carelessness or dense fog, because it lies not a great distance from shore. My reason for referring to it is that I suppose the government has considered the question as to the power which they would have to remove the vessel, because it is not in the channel—it is in a place where she never ought to have gone, I take it for granted if she were removed, no other vessel, knowing where the rock was, would run upon it.

Hon. Mr. BERNIER—Would the bill include the saw-dust in the Ottawa River?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—I am afraid not. The changes made in clause 5 are in harmony with those in the preceding section. In the fifth line, it reads:

"In manner aforesaid likely to be occasioned"—they are the new words and also from the word "thing" in the seventh line:

Or, with such authority has caused to be removed any vessel or any part thereof, wreck or other thing cast ashore, stranded or left upon any such public property as in the last preceding section mentioned.

Hon. Mr. MILLS—Is it a charge upon the public revenue?

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—No, this is simply an authority to remove it. They must have the power from parliament to expend the money. It is simply taking the power. The expenditure may not be incurred.

Hon. Sir. MACKENZIE BOWELL—I think under the general law the owners of the vessel would be responsible.

Hon. Mr. SCOTT—Yes.

Hon. Mr. DRUMMOND, from the committee, reported the bill without amendment.

CRIMINAL CODE AMENDMENT BILL.

IN COMMITTEE.

The House resolved itself into a Committee of the Whole on Bill (H) "An Act further to amend the Criminal Code, 1892."

On the second clause.

Hon. Sir OLIVER MOWAT—The second clause is expressed in two lines, and refers to the schedule. We will have to take up the schedule:

The Criminal Code is hereby amended in the manner set forth in the following schedule.

The first part of the Criminal Code which I propose to amend, is the third section of it.

Hon. Mr. ADAMS—I would suggest to the hon. the Minister of Justice that the bill now proposed to be dealt with by this committee is somewhat of an important one, and touches particularly the individual, and also calls for consideration from the legal fraternity. Would it not be well if the Minister of Justice, in view of the important legislation now intended to be submitted here and carried through, were to allow the privilege of handing to every member in this chamber a copy of the bill with the right to examine, and at the next session of parliament to make such amendments to the Criminal Code as would be approved of by the country? I do not claim that I am held in very high reputation as a lawyer, yet I have had the privilege of dealing with criminal cases under the criminal code of New Brunswick, as also under the criminal law of Canada, and I can see great objections to the passing of such a general Act as this, notwithstanding it has been submitted to us by the Minister of Justice. I make the simple suggestion, with all due respect, because I have recognized indeed the wealth of his information and the strength of his judgment, not only in reference to criminal matters, but having read his decisions on other matters of grave importance, where questions of law between one and the other have arisen, and I would think that this body should not deal with an Act such as is presented to us, without the gravest consideration and without the wisest prudence, and the submission to each person of a chance at least to personally consider and make our objections if we can have an opportunity. I only desire that. In dealing with the Criminal Code of the country it is not advisable to take hasty action. There are clauses in this bill that unfortunately are not the result of deep consideration, but which seem to me to be the result of imprudent thought. I would suggest to the Minister of Justice that if I am entirely correct—(and if not,) I would be disposed to be properly reproved and properly brought to order—that with such legislation as this, it would be better for us to have a committee of the best legal minds to consider same, and not change the law of the land immediately, but with the very best and wisest and most prudent consideration to make such amendments if they should be found necessary, but not for the mere purpose of gratifying some—I was going to throw in an adjective there—some person who comes along and says, "You cannot walk on a Sunday" and "You must not have an exhibition of so and so," that it would be better to refer a bill of such a character as this to the wisest consideration of the best legal minds we can obtain selected from both Houses. I simply throw out the suggestion, and whether it be good or bad, I am willing to obey the decision of the House, but the Criminal Code of the country should not be made on the mere ipse dixit of somebody who imagines there is crime committed and not provided for and the legislation of the country should not be made on the application or peculiar whim of any one body; the liberty of the subject should not be taken away in that manner, and so, for that reason, I think the bill should be referred to a committee, and we could then deal with the matter at the next session.

Hon. Sir OLIVER MOWAT—I am not quite sure that I understand what my hon. friend wishes to do here. He seems to refer to some particular portions of the bill to which he has objections. When we come to those portions his objections may be stated. There are portions of this bill that lawyers may be necessary in order to judge of their propriety, but there are other portions that are matters of policy of which anybody can judge quite as well as a lawyer can. My hon. friend wishes the bill to be considered by the ablest lawyers we can find for the purpose. I certainly do not belong to that class myself, but there are members of this House who do belong to it, and we shall get the benefit of their judgment as we go through the bill. There are also other lawyers in the House of Commons, and when the bill goes down to them those able lawyers will consider it. I think we are quite competent to go on with the various clauses of the bill, and if there are any of them that there is a special difficulty about, and that the House do not see the propriety of passing just now, these can be omitted without delaying the whole of the bill. I propose, therefore, to go on with the bill, if the Senate permits me, and to explain each of the clauses as I move it. The first amendment is in the third section of the Criminal Code of 1892. In section Y of the clause there referred to I find these words:

> The expression superior court of criminal jurisdiction means and includes the following courts in the province of Ontario, the three divisions of the High Court of Justice.

Since the passing of that code those divisions have been abolished. There are no divisions now of the High Court of Justice, and it renders the Act therefore inapplicable to the present condition of the High Court and of the judges there under the legislation which the Ontario legislature has passed, and which was within their jurisdiction to pass. The change requires a very slight amendment. Instead of the words I have read the clause will read:

> In the province of Ontario any divisional court of the High Court of Justice.

That may seem to hon. members who have not followed the legislation on the subject to be not a very material difference, but the difference is very essential. Before the change there were in fact three branches of the high court. Each branch had its own judges. That is no longer so. There are no branches now, and courts are held from time to time by such judges as are prepared to attend to them. The judges do not now belong to one court more than to another and when they sit in that way they are called a "divisional court."

The clause was agreed to.

Hon. Mr. POWER—With respect to the clause which we are just coming to I would suggest to the Minister of Justice that it might be better to postpone the first portion, that marked 92, because I understand there is a good deal of opposition to the next, 97*a*, and if 97*a* is not adopted by the House, then 92 will not be necessary.

Hon. Sir OLIVER MOWAT—I quite approve of the hon. gentleman's suggestion. I never thought of going on with 92 except in connection with 97*a*. The only object of 92 is to make a definition, which we already have, of a prize fight applicable to the use of that term in 97*a*. The question is whether the Senate is prepared to adopt the principle of 97*a*, and that is a point on which I now proceed to make some observations. The House will observe that I am not introducing any new definition of what a prize fight is. I am proposing no change in the law in that respect. I am proposing legislation about a prize fight, but mean nothing more by the prize fight than the law means now. It has a bearing upon the propriety of passing 97*a* to know exactly what the law does now forbid as prize fights. Sections 93, 94, 95 and 96 show this. These sections have been in the law for very many years—since, I think, 1881. They were introduced then by the hon. leader of this House, Sir Alexander Campbell, in a government measure. My hon. friend opposite was a member of the government, and no doubt gave his hearty support to what was done then. The bill passed this House and went to the House of Commons, and there was again in the hands of a member of the government as a government measure. What was it that was forbidden? Prize fights. The clause which I am now introducing to the House makes the representation of prize fights by a certain method, a criminal offence—the exhibition in that way of prize fights such as are now illegal. The prize fights which are dealt with are now illegal, and being illegal it is proposed that this representation of them should be made illegal also. It is believed that a large part of the evil that arises from a prize fight itself will arise also from a representation of it by means of these wonderful machines which have lately been invented. We are, of course, making no objection to the use of these machines. Thousands of harmless scenes are or may be represented by them. What we propose to the House to render illegal is the representation of an illegal thing—namely, a prize fight. These prize fights are admitted on all hands, I believe, to be brutal exhibitions which ought not to be sanctioned in any civilized country, and our law on the subject corresponds with what has been done in various states of the neighbouring country. I believe there is only one state in the union which permits prize fights, so general is the impropriety of them recognized. I shall read the sections of the existing Act to show how prize fights are dealt with by our laws, to show the propriety of our forbidding also the representation of them by one of these new inventions. The law renders guilty of an offence under the Act and liable to punishment any one who > Exhibits or publishes, or causes to be sent or published, or otherwise be made known, any challenge to fight a prize fight, or accept any such challenge or causes the same to be accepted, or goes into training preparatory to such fight, or acts as trainer or second to any person who intends to engage in a prize fight.

Now, that is going a great way, but in 1881 both sides of the House, and both branches of parliament were satisfied that the public interests required that enactment —that prize fights were such bad things— that they were so immoral and did so much harm, that a challenge to a prize fight should be made a crime, that accepting a challenge should be ma le a crime, that any endeavour to procure an exhibition of it should be made a crime. Then, the 93rd section makes it an offence to be engaged as a principal in a prize fight. The 94th section makes it an offence to be present at a prize fight as an aid, second, surgeon, umpire, backer, assistant or reporter, or who advises, encourages or promotes such fights. I have no doubt the hon. members of this House who were present then, and who approved altogether of these sections, will answer the objections that may be made to them by any other hon. member; and I observe amongst those who were present was my hon. friend behind me (Mr. Power) who spoke when the matter was going through the House and concurred in what other hon. members said against prize fights, except, I think, he was rather in favour then of a surgeon being permitted to be present. What the House ultimately determined on that point was that he could not be permitted to be present at the fight, but that there was no harm in his coming in afterwards to remove the consequences of any wounds that were received. Then the 96th clause makes it an offence to leave Canada with the intention to engage in a prize fight without the limits of Canada. If any hon. member desires to look at what took place in this House when the bill on this subject was before the House, he will find it in the Senate Debates, session of 1881, at page 53 and the following pages. My hon. friend behind me (Mr. Power) says now that he should rather like to be at a prize fight if he could get a good seat there, but he knows it is a bad thing and objects to prize fights being permitted. Amongst his observations in 1881 he said this: "If a reporter was allowed to attend his presence would encourage the fight." My hon. friend, therefore, was against reporters being permitted to be present, because their presence would encourage the fight. Anything that would encourage the fight my hon. friend would object to. I think there is great force in that view, although I am not sure it was acted upon in the bill that was passed. But my hon. friend failed to see how the presence of the surgeon would lend any such encouragement.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—It would have rather a depressing effect.

Hon. Sir OLIVER MOWAT—My hon. friend said further on that occasion that prize fights were frequently attended by more serious consequences than duels on the continent. My hon. friend thought, in some respects, they were still more objectionable than duels. I am glad to know how strong my hon. friend's views are on this point, because an observation of his to which I have referred just now has misled people as to his attitude with regard to these prize fights. Every one who spoke when the matter was up in 1881 condemned prize fighting in very strong language. The bill went down to the House of Commons, and the members there concurred in the propriety of the provisions in the bill; and, after some discussion in regard to one or two of the clauses, the bill was passed in the form in which it came down from this House. Some members of the House of Commons were very strong in their expressions in regard to these exhibitions and the evils arising from them. One hon. gentleman, Mr. Wright, spoke of their being "brutalizing" exhibitions. "They are survivals," he said, "of a barbarous age, the relics of a bygone time when cock fights, bull fights and bear baiting were popular amusements." The bill was in charge of the Minister of Justice, Mr. Macdonald of Pictou, and in his speech he dealt with several points showing the strong opinion he entertained against these exhibitions. He said: "My own impression is that after this bill passes, should a reporter be sent to it from my hon. friend's newspaper (that is the Mail), both the reporter and the hon. gentleman would deserve the punishment which the bill seeks to impose." Mr. Plumb said:

I think that one of the worst features of the prize fight is the brutal report of it which frequently appears in the newspapers, and these reports are all the more to be reprehended because if they were not published, those who engage in them and attend these contests would be deprived of one of the chief incentives to such encounters.

Then again he spoke of them as "brutal and demoralizing contests," and a little later on speaks of the "disgusting and demoralizing details." "I do not think," he said, speaking of one of the other members, "he would lend his countenance to such contests, and I think he would be one of the first to prevent the perusal in his own family of the brutal and disgusting details of the semi-savage encounters of the prize ring."

I have heard the objection suggested that these details in the newspapers were bad, and that if we dealt with the exhibition struck at by the bill we should also forbid those newspaper details. That may or may not be true. It is quite clear that the representatives of the people and the hon. members of this House thought it very objectionable to publish all these details. But if newspaper reports are objectionable much more so are such exhibitions as this clause proposes to forbid. They are open to all the objection which the newspaper details are open to, and stronger objections because they represent the fight in a vivid way. All the characters are represented as large as life; and every blow that is struck, every motion of the body, every expression of the countenance is represented, not as it would occur at one moment, but the whole scene is there, from beginning to end, and people see it all as if they were present at the fight itself. Now, if the fight is a wrong thing, a representation of it in this way must be wrong also. This bill to prevent the exhibition of these prize-fight pictures is a corollary to the law which forbids the fights themselves. The machines by which the exhibition is made have only been invented very recently. In 1881 it would not have been thought such things were possible. Let me read a few sentences more.

Another hon. member said:

We usually find that persons who attend such exhibitions are of a most degraded description; men of vicious propensities and accustomed to sensual indulgence of almost every kind.

Another said:

Do not understand me to be saying anything in favour of the degrading spectacle of prize fighting.

And you get that "spectacle" as distinctly from these representations as you would from the prize fight itself. This hon. gentleman goes on to say, speaking of prize fighting:

It must be so shocking that I am sure if the member from Annapolis has seen one he will never go to another * * * * The quicker we do away with these disgusting exhibitions the better. The quicker we can arrange to settle our disputes by some other means than by fighting them out by mere brute force, the better it will be for society.

I suppose hon. members quite understand the nature of these various machines and what they accomplish. It is wonderful. Those who have seen them say it is startling to see how exactly they reproduce moving scenes. One lady speaking of it, and whose words I find recorded, said that at an exhibition by one of those machines, not of a prize fight but of a railway in motion, she could hardly help screaming, because it seemed as if the locomotive was coming down upon her. The picture was as large as the car, and had every appearance of being the very thing it represented. I have introduced these clauses for the consideration of the House at the instance of persons that we must all respect. The clergy of various denominations have written to me on the subject. The last letter I received was from the Anglican clergy at Kingston, where one of these exhibitions, the first to take place in this country, was to have taken place yesterday. I do not know whether it has taken place or not. It was advertised as the prize fight between Corbett and Fitzsimmons, but I believe it was really another prize fight altogether, I am not quite sure that the artist was successful in taking the representations of the prize fight which has excited so much interest lately. I do not see how any one can doubt that if a prize fight is such a bad thing, as all seem to agree it is, such legislation as is now proposed should not be adopted. Every state in the union except Nevada excludes prize fights. Elsewhere prize fights take place by stealth when they do take place, and every one present is liable to be arrested and severely punished. I do not see how any one can doubt that this representation of prize fights is injurious. Many persons would go to the representation of them, attracted by the wonderful machine by which they are represented, who would not be present at the fight itself. To illustrate the immense harm that is done by them, I may mention that I read shortly after this fight of two fights between boys, one in Pniladelphia and the other I think at Sault Ste. Marie in our own country. In one of these fights one of the boys had his arm broken, and in the other one boy was killed on the spot. Those instances just illustrate how important it is that boys should not be encouraged by any means to engage in this sort of fight. If boys quarrel and fight out their quarrel, the law does not forbid that, and I am not asking that the law should forbid it. The letters from Kingston implore me to if possible to get this bill passed in time to prevent the exhibition to which I have referred. That of course was impossible. I have letters from various benevolent and religious societies in all parts of the country, and I presume that we all regard with respect those societies. They are instituted for the purpose of doing good to their fellow creatures, and there is no class more entitled to our sympathy and respect. I have had resolutions and memorials from all parts of the country. Religious newspapers have taken up the subject in the same way. I have letters from mothers imploring me to not put in the way of their children encouragement to the harm which is received by attendance at such exhibitions. The most moral and religious part of the community have a strong opinion that these representations should be prevented. There are one or two other things connected with preventing them now which are worth observing. There is no vested interest now in representations of this kind. None of our people have any pecuniary interest in them, and, there is no difficulty in the way of the kind we are often met with. I daresay many newspaper proprietors would be very glad if the law prevented any of the details of a prize fight being given in the newspapers. A newspaper is obliged, or the proprietor thinks is obliged, to publish these details when other newspapers do it; but some of them would be very glad not to have to do so. Other proprietors of newspapers which have not this feeling do not want them to be made illegal, because the publication of reports of prize fights add to their profits. But there is nothing of that kind which could be said to stand in the way of the legislation I am now proposing. I therefore ask the committee to agree that every one connected with such exhibitions shall be guilty of an offence and liable to whatever penalty may be thought reasonable. I put in the bill the penalty I find in some of the bills introduced in the state legislatures of the United States. Bills of this kind, since it was known there were to be such exhibitions, have been introduced in most if not all the state legislatures which are in session; and a like bill has been introduced into the United States Congress, the bill in Congress having reference to the District of Columbia and the Territories which are not yet states, and over which Congress has jurisdiction.

Hon. Mr. LOUGHEED—Have they been passed?

Hon. Sir OLIVER MOWAT—I am informed that they have been passed, in Maine and Michigan, by the last account, and perhaps in other states since, but they have, at all events, been passed by those two states. I have named five thousand dollars as the penalty. That should not be thought too much, because we want to prevent those exhibitions. By putting a heavy penalty we are sure to prevent them, and the penalty will never be invoked, because it will effectually prevent the entertainment being given. But if we put a low sum the exhibitors will say, "we shall make by this exhibition so much that we can afford to pay two or three hundred dollars, perhaps five hundred dollars in a large city." I am, myself, in favour of the large penalty, such as we find in some of the United States bills. The penalty is not to exceed five thousand dollars and not to be less than five hundred dollars, and imprisonment, not exceeding twelve months, with or without hard labour.

Hon. Mr. MACDONALD (B.C.)—That section, in my opinion, does not touch the most demoralizing part of this whole affair. I think the detailed reports in the newspapers are far more demoralizing than the kinetoscope pictures. The pictures only give the attitudes, but in the newspaper you have all the brutal details of the slugging. I should like to see the Minister of Justice add to the clause a penalty for publishing details. The boys that the hon. gentleman referred to did not see the vitascope pictures of the fight, but saw the details in the newspaper, and they had a miniature fight and one was killed. The boys read those reports with avidity. I would not only impose a penalty on our own papers, but confiscate newspapers from the United States containing such reports.

Hon. Mr. MILLER—I agree with the greater portion of the remarks which have fallen from the hon. Minister of Justice, and I have no doubt also that this House agrees with him in the greater portion of what he has just now said. Prize fighting we have by our laws made a criminal offence. We know it to be brutal and demoralizing, and therefore it ought to be discouraged by the laws of any civilized country. While, however, I agree fully with the hon. gentleman on principle with regard to the character of these brutal exhibitions, and consider that, logically, condemning prize fighting we should also condemn anything which would give it notoriety or make it attractive, or which would spread its demoralizing influence, such as these representations mentioned in the clause under consideration would certainly do, we must logically also approve of any such enactment as is here contemplated for that purpose, but I think that the punishment attempted to be enacted is altogether out of proportion to the offence. Our law, as it stands at present, is severe enough, and when this law was being enacted I thought its provisions were quite severe enough, and I so expressed myself, and my view will be found in the debates of that day. But the law for the prevention of actual prize fighting is not as severe as the bill now attempted to be enacted for the representation of it, or for sending through the mails, or having in one's possession, a photograph of any such exhibition. Clause 94 deals with the punishment of those engaged in a prize fight, as principals, backers, seconders, or as reporters, and the punishment is not as severe as the punishment imposed by the present clause on those who exhibit pictures of a prize fight on the kinetescope.

This clause provides the penalty to be imposed upon the backer, seconder or encourager in one of these prize fights. I think the House will agree with me that that offence is certainly a more serious one than the offence attempted to be prohibited here. This 97th clause says:

> Every one is guilty of an offence and liable on summary conviction to a penalty not exceeding $5,000, and not less than $500, or to imprisonment for a term not exceeding twelve months, with or without hard labour, or to both, who exhibits by means of the biograph, vitascope, kinetoscope, kinematograph or any kindred device or machine, any picture or representation of a prize fight.

This offence is not as serious as the one prohibited in the statute, and it is punished with greater severity. Then the clause proceeds:

> Brings into Canada or procures to be brought into Canada to or for him, or posts for transmission for delivery or through the post any picture or other material or appliance to be used in such an exhibition as is described in the next preceding section.

To punish such an offence as that with a penalty of five thousand dollars or two years imprisonment, would be reverting to the days of the blue laws in some of the United States. We can trace in this extreme penalty the influences which the hon. Minister has told us have been at work in promoting and securing this law, and we know these people are the very worst advisers in cases of this kind. They generally make fads of these questions, and all faddists are sure to go to extremes. It is not necessary for me to do anything more than to point out the unreasonableness of the penalty proposed, the want of proportion to the offence defined in this clause to convince the House that it would be very unwise to pass that clause in its present shape. Instead of five thousand dollars five hundred dollars would be quite enough, and if the clauses stands as part of the bill, I would ask to have it amended to read this way:

> Everyone is guilty of an offence and liable on summary conviction to a penalty not exceeding five hundred dollars and not less than five dollars, or to imprisonment or a term not exceeding three months—

I would not say hard labour.

who exhibits by means of the biograph, vitascope, kinetoscope, kinematograph or any kindred device or machine, any representation of a prize fight.

I think that punishment would be quite adequate to the crime, and believing as I said just now, that logically we ought to punish this offence in connection with prize fighting, if we condemn prize fighting itself, I think some punishment should fall upon the persons who do anything to spread the demoralizing effects of prize fighting amongst the people. I shall, before we adopt the clause on this subject, move the amendment as I have just read the clause, unless another motion to strike out the clause altogether be carried. In that case there would be no need for my amendment, but I would vote against any motion to strike out the clause.

Hon. Mr. POWER—The hon. Minister of Justice has made special reference to me in connection with this matter, and perhaps I may as well say a few words to justify my position. I do not approve of prize fights. They are very objectionable; and I think the law which we have on our statute-book is a right and proper law, but I do not think that the clause which is now before us, is such a clause as should become law. It is, no doubt, very desirable that all people should be religious and should say their prayers morning and evening, but we cannot legislate to bring about that very desirable result. It is a very desirable thing that all people should have refined feelings, but we cannot change their feelings by legislation; and as my hon. friend from Richmond says, the clergymen and refined ladies, who take an interest in the public welfare, are undoubtedly some of the best people in the world and the best meaning people, but it would be unfortunate if our legislation were put in the hands of people of that class, because, after all, the laws which we make have to deal with the ordinary, everyday human being who is a mixture of good and bad. We do not make all sins crimes. There are a great many sins which are not made crimes by law, and as the hon. gentleman from Richmond said, this legislation runs in the direction of that Connecticut law which made it an offence for a man to kiss his wife on a Sunday. The Puritans, so called, who came after Charles the First, and before Charles the Second, and who governed the country between the time when Charles the First ceased to reign and the time when Charles the Second began to reign, were, no doubt, the majority of them, well meaning people. They were God-fearing people, but they made religion so odious that, for the next fifty years at any rate, immorality and general blackguardism were popular in England; and I fear that, if we in Canada go on with legislation of this kind, going as far as this legislation proposes to go, we shall tend to make virtue, in a certain sense, unpopular, and certainly to make the law unpopular, which is something that should not be done. Now, hon. gentlemen, I contend that a fight in itself is not a thing which is improper to look at. The fighting instinct is very strong in human nature, and one of the favourite amusements or recreations of mankind from the very beginning has been to look at a contest of one kind or another.

Hon. Mr. ALLAN—Roman gladiators for instance.

Hon. Mr. POWER—We know, from our spiritual reading, that the life of man is a perpetual warfare; and that is a kind of fighting which of course is a duty with us, but there are a great many other kinds of fighting. For instance, in the classic days of Greece, amongst the games which were looked at by the cultivated Greeks was boxing. That boxing was not altogether like the prize fighting which is condemned by our statute. The fight was not for money. It was for a crown of leaves, or something of that kind; and it was never claimed, and has not been claimed in modern times, that there was anything specially degrading in the Greek boxing or that it was an improper thing to look at a boxing match in those times, any more than it was improper or degrading to look at a wrestling match, or a rowing contest, or any other test of strength or skill. Then, under the Romans, we had gladiatorial combats, which were objectionable, inasmuch as they involved human life as a rule. In the middle ages there were tournaments, mock battles, and occasionally people were killed at those tournaments, although not very often, and they were looked at by the most refined people of the time, and statesmen and warriors took part in them, whilst the highest ladies in the country where they were held looked on. Probably we are better off without them now, but I do not think the tournaments demoralized the population very much. There are other kinds of offences which are more calculated to demoralize than tournaments.

The hon. leader of the House is a man of peace, undoubtedly, but he has been engaged in contests of a very exciting and interesting character. The hon. gentleman has engaged in many election contests, and to use the language of the ring, has always knocked out his opponent. While fighting is not a bad thing in itself, the question is whether those representations are bad. I contend that in itself a fight between two men, who have been trained carefully, is not such a bad thing; and I do not think it is particularly hurtful or demoralizing to look at. I dare say there are several hon. gentlemen here who, in their earlier days, have taken lessons in sparring. While a sparring match between two students at a university, for instance, is not looked upon as objectionable, while no state undertakes to condemn the learning of sparring in universities and colleges, yet as far as regards the appearance of the thing, a contest between two evenly matched students in a university is very much the same as a contest between two equally matched pugilists, And then the danger in a prize fight is not particularly great. There is really more danger to human life and limb in a game of Rugby football than there is in the average prize fight. Now, what is the thing that makes the prize fight objectionable? It is that the fight is fought for money, and as a result of that, all sorts of low and rascally elements gather around the ring. Drinking and gambling, the use of bad language and all sorts of demoralization gather round the ring just on account of the money which is involved. Now there is not any money involved in the kinetoscope—I mean the people who look at the kinetoscope are not influenced by any of these things. They simply see a representation of a fight. The money element does not come into it, as far as they are concerned; there is none of the gambling, swearing or drinking or any of the other demoralizing practices which usually accompany prize fights. They simply see a representation of two men engaged in sparring, and there is nothing, as far as I can see, any more improper in looking at it than looking at two men in a university engaged in the same sort of exercise. I cannot understand how the hon. gentleman who thinks that it is so demoralizing that these representations should be looked at fails to see that, according to his own logic, it is much more necessary to prohibit the publication of the reports of those prize fights than it is to prohibit those representations, for the reason, as I said when the bill was being read the second time, that for one person who will look at the kinetoscopic representation of a prize fight, 100 or 500 will read the detailed account of the prize fight in the newspapers, and the fact that these newspaper reports are published in that way and read shows that the old Adam is in most of us still. I do not know that the leader of this hon. House ever reads the accounts of the prize fights in the newspapers, but I dare say there are a good many gentlemen who probably would vote for a measure like this, who do see and read the reports. There is another feature about the representations which are dealt with by this clause under consideration; a refined lady, or gentleman, whose taste does not lead that way, has no temptation; there is no temptation to go and look at the kinetoscopic representation of a prize fight, but that lady or gentleman has the newspapers in her or his hands every day, and those written accounts of prize fights are very hard to avoid. In every way, hon. gentlemen, the reasons for making it a penal offence to publish reports of prize fights are stronger than the reasons for prohibiting the kinetoscope views. I feel that we should not make offences of things which do not seriously interfere with the public welfare, even though they may not be desirable things. I do not think we should make them crimes and then visit them with such very heavy penalties as are inflicted by this clause, and for that reason I propose to vote against the clause.

Hon. Mr. ALLAN—When my hon. friend began to speak it seems to me the effect of his observations was simply to make the House believe that there really was no difference between a boxing match, or a match with the gloves at a school or a college, or even a fight between two school boys, and one of these regular prize fights.

Hon. Mr. POWER—Between the representations.

Hon. Mr. ALLAN—But before the close of his speech he characterized these prize fights in as strong language as the hon. leader of the House had done. I quite agree with my hon. friend opposite, that you cannot by legislation make people religious. You have to employ other methods for that, but you can do a great deal in the way of legislation to preserve the morality of our people, to prevent them from taking an interest in low and vicious contests, and in that way we can, by legislation, do a great deal for our country. I do not see how it is possible to agree that the legislation which has already passed both the Senate and the Commons on previous occasions with respect to prize fights is sound, without its following logically that the proposal which is now made by the hon. Minister of Justice in these clauses should be enacted. The hon. gentleman says it would be far better, or at least there is much greater necessity, for legislation which would prevent the publication of a full account of these prize fights with all their outrageous details appearing in the papers where they will be read by so many people. But my hon. friend will find that there is no more popular exhibition in our towns now than the exhibition of the kinetoscope. Old and young go to see it. Large numbers of people with their families, and large numbers of children go to witness these exhibitions and it would not be known before hand whether, in the course of these exhibitions, you would not have one of the prize fight pictures brought out. If my hon. friend has ever been present at any of these exhibitions, he will know that they are very often illustrated by word of mouth by the exhibitor. While I partly agree with what has fallen from my hon. friend opposite from Cape Breton, that the penalty is rather severe, yet we must remember that these kinetoscopes are money-making machines, and that unless you make the penalty sufficiently onerous, they will be very much inclined to run the risk and pay the penalty. That is a view of the case which ought not to be overlooked. I would like to mention in connection with this subject that I have come in contact a good deal of late with gentlemen who have taken a very active interest in matters connected with juvenile offenders, and with the juvenile population in our large cities and towns, and their views in regard to the pernicious effect of low and debasing subjects are very strong and decided, and they refer especially to what is the custom now—I am sorry to say, in the city of Toronto—to placard the walls in every direction with the representation of these wretched plays that are produced in some cheap theatres, and it has been found over and over again that with some of the juvenile offenders they very often have their first lessons in vice and crime largely helped on by the exhibition of these large painted posters, inducing them in that way to go to these penny theatres and making them familiar with what is certainly a very low state of morality indeed. Now, in regard to these prize fights, I cannot conceive, from what I have seen myself of the kinetoscope, anything more thoroughly real than the exhibitions which take place there, and in my judgment, those who witness them see as much of the thing as if they were at the prize fight themselves. I cannot think that exhibitions of that kind can be otherwise than demoralizing, or that there should be a strong effort made to put them down. At the same time, a penalty of $5,000 is excessive, and I should be disposed to put that at a much lower sum, but I would not reduce it to $500, because that would make it inoperative; but if the first penalty was either $1,000 or $500 and the other $100, it would commend itself to the House and would be better than as the bill stands at present. I do sincerely hope that the House will give its approval to both of these clauses.

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—It seems to me this clause which we are now discussing is a necessary corollary to legislation we have already passed in regard to prize fights. We have put legislation on the statute-book that prize fighting is demoralizing and brutal, and should be banished from the country, and this clause is now brought into existence in consequence of a new state of affairs, through the recent electrical inventions of the vitascope, etc., which produces in life-like form the whole scene of the prize fight before us I think myself that there may be a limit to the class of legislation that we are now seeking to place upon the statute-book; whether that limit is reached or whether we are going beyond it may be an open question in the minds of a great many people. I certainly think it is not reached yet until we put this clause upon the statute-book. I thoroughly approve of the art of self defence. I thoroughly approve of our young people learning how to defend themselves, not for the purpose of developing meaner passions and using powers which the art of self-defence gives them except for the defence of right and the defence of their weaker brethren. To that extent it is a noble art, but prize fighting, as it is carried on, is debasing and demoralizing and develops the evil passions that are in our natures. It is for that reason that all civilized countries legislate against it, and I think the necessity for this clause is made quite apparent if we believe that to be the case. The whole scene is put before us in life-like form. You have only to add the phonograph to the vitascope and there you hear the utterances and probably the oaths and everything else contingent upon the prize fight. Some people think our legislation should not be of too paternal a character, and I saw in the Citizen this morning quotations from Lord MaCaulay, a man of very high authority in the past, who spoke of paternal legislation and the undesirability of its proceeding too far. But we have to recognize this, that the world is advancing all the time; the world, I am thankful to believe is getting better all the time. The hon. gentleman from Halifax went back to the days of the Romans and Greeks, but the world is very different to-day from what it was then.

Hon. Mr. McCALLUM—In regard to their muscle?

Hon. Mr. BOULTON—Yes, muscle is all right, but anything that develops the evil passions is wrong. I have been where the bull fights were on constant exhibition, and have seen 10,000 ladies and gentlemen witnessing a bull fight. The horses, of a very wretched class, were gored and were treading upon their own entrails, and it was the most disgraceful exhibition, as far as the unfortunate horses were concerned, that you could imagine. There was a certain element of danger from the bull to the men, but ten or twelve helpless horses were killed in every fight.

Hon. Mr. ADAMS—Why were you there?
