Mr. DOHERTY: Certainly, because it is supposed that the Clerk of the Crown in Chancery, having the address of the man, will be able to determine exactly what his electoral district is. It was first suggested that we should put in the electoral district, but it was pointed out that the soldier might not know the electoral district in which he was entitled to vote. For instance, in the city of Montreal, a soldier would know perfectly well where he had resided, the street and number, but he might not know precisely which of the electoral districts it was in, and to avoid the possibility of doubt about that, we substituted the address of the place where he had lived. It was intended—it is a mere omission in the form—that the address should appear on the certificate on the back of the envelope, and from that the Clerk of the Crown in Chancery will easily be able to ascertain what the electoral district is, and see that the envelope goes to the right electoral district.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Of course, I did not know what errors the minister had made or what omissions there were; I was merely speaking of the Bill as we have it.

Mr. DOHERTY: The hon. gentleman is entitled to speak of the Bill as it stands. Of course, a matter of that sort might more properly be dealt with in the committee. It could hardly be held as touching upon the principle of the Bill.

Mr. PUGSLEY: I think it does, because we have to point out the difficulties that surround the carrying out of the proposed measure. It was stated here that British officers could be trusted to see that the private marked his ballot paper, that we could safely rely upon their fairness, and that we need not be anxious to have any precautions taken. As was pointed out, this Parliament would have no right to impose any duty upon a British officer, and apparently the Minister of Justice has had that in mind, because, while in subsection 2 it is left to the discretion of the High Commissioner for Canada to determine what officers these ballots shall be sent to, and while there is nothing in the Bill to state who the officers shall be, it is provided by section 4 that the ballot must be marked in presence of a commissioned officer in the Canadian military forces.

That absolutely excludes a British commissioned officer because a British officer is not a commissioned officer in the Canadian military forces. The officer must be a Canadian officer and is it possible that my hon. friend and those on the committee who assisted him in framing this Bill had in mind that there are in England to-day some officers of the Canadian forces, who, as some English newspapers asserted, were selected because of their political claims rather than of their military fitness? Is it possible that the minister has in view some officers who are still in England, who have not been sent to the front, whom General Alderson has no thought of sending to the front, whom he deems incapable of taking proper command and in whose care he would not entrust the lives of Canadian soldiers? Is it possible that the minister thinks that those gentlemen might be very good men to appoint as officers to whom the ballots might be sent?

Mr. MEIGHEN: Do I understand the hon. gentleman to argue that the officers who did not receive appointments under General Alderson and who returned were political appointees?

Mr. PUGSLEY: Yes, quite a number of them.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The only one whom I happen to know, and who I understand led back the officers who were not appointed by General Alderson, was a Liberal who was defeated in the local elections in Manitoba.

Mr. PUGSLEY: That might be. I was not speaking particularly of those who came back to Canada; I was speaking rather of those who remain in England, whom General Alderson has not sent to the front and whom, if rumour is true, he will never send to the front. Is that why the minister has given this wide discretion that these affidavits may be made before and ballots marked in presence of any Canadian commissioned officer in the military forces? Is that why he has not limited it to officers who are in command of the forces, because it must be apparent to the House that under this any commissioned officer, who has gone over to England and who may or may not be serving with the forces at the front may be appointed by the High Commissioner for the purpose of taking these affidavits and receiving the ballots. I do not hesitate to say that, in respect of some of those officers at all events—and they are rather well known to members of this House—I would desire to see some safeguards placed around the marking of the ballots and their being returned to Canada. I am not at all afraid to say that, and gentlemen who realize whom I have in mind, I think will be disposed to agree with me.

It is provided not merely that ballots shall be given to those soldiers who ask for them, but that any quantity of ballots may be sent to the High Commissioner and any quantity distributed. We have no safeguard whatever provided in this Bill as to the ballots being marked by those who are entitled to vote, or as to the ballots which are so marked finding their way back to the Clerk of the Crown in Chancery. That is a fundamental objection which I find to the Bill in making provision for soldiers who are out of Canada voting at a Canadian election. The hon. member for Red Deer (Mr. Clark) has pointed out in language much stronger and clearer than any I can employ what, from a military standpoint, from the standpoint of the interest of the Empire and from the viewpoint which Lord Kitchener is likely to take of the matter, seemed to me an insuperable objection to having the vote taken at the front. It may be asked of me, how, in case I think it would be desirable to give soldiers the right to vote, I would have provided for it. I would have provided for it at the session of Parliament which was held in August before the soldiers went to the front, and I would have made provision for those who were going away to vote by marking their ballots before they left the country. In that way the matter might easily have been accomplished, and proper safeguards would have been thrown around the voting, and that is the way in which for the most part I believe the New Zealand Government has provided for voting. My hon. friend the Minister of Justice read a despatch from the Prime Minister of New Zealand, in which it stated:

> In reply cable 28th from your clerk House of Commons Bill referred to passed and votes of all soldiers who left before general election recorded, total votes 10,000.

My hon. friend, as I thought, led the House to believe that total of 10,000 must be made up of soldiers who had actually gone to the front before they had recorded their votes. An examination of the Bill, a copy of which I have before me, does not show that, because it provides that electoral officers in New Zealand shall receive the votes of the soldiers. It is true it provides that the New Zealand Government may appoint electoral officers outside of New Zealand, but for the purpose of taking the votes not of those who had not left New Zealand before it had passed, but of those who had left New Zealand before it had passed, therefore showing that in the opinion of the Parliament and Government of New Zealand, it was only to meet the case of soldiers who had left before the Act had passed that they thought it desirable to allow this provision, but soldiers who might leave after the Act went into force must register their votes in New Zealand, and if they did not do so, they could not do it after they had gone abroad. Therefore, if I am right in this—and I will endeavour to show the House that I am right—it is possible that the whole 10,000 votes recorded were recorded in New Zealand after the Act passed, but before the soldiers departed from New Zealand to engage in the war.

Let me call the attention of the House to the provisions in the New Zealand Bill. By paragraph (f) of subsection 1 of section 3 it is provided as follows:

> A voting paper in the form in the schedule hereto shall be supplied by an electoral officer appointed for the purpose by the chief electoral officer to every member of the said forces who applies for the same.

The Act is speaking here evidently of electoral officers in New Zealand, not of people who might be appointed out of New Zealand.

By paragraph (g) it is provided:

> When the voter has marked his voting paper as aforesaid he shall enclose it in an envelope addressed to the returning officer of the electoral district in which he resided immediatley before he joined the force, and having sealed the envelope, shall deliver the same to the electoral officer, who shall forthwith forward it to the chief electoral officer at Wellington.

This provision is entirely for soldiers who were then in New Zealand and before they left that country.

Then, we find by section 8, a provision for the polling of votes of members of expeditionary forces sent out of New Zealand before the passing of the Act:

> Electoral officers may be appointed out of New Zealand for the purpose of enabling any person to record his vote under this Act who is a member of any expeditionary force sent out of New Zealand before the passing of this Act.

I think it must be clear to the minister that he is in error in stating to the House that this whole ten thousand votes must have been of soldiers who were out of the country at the time they marked their ballots. On the contrary, it provides for the marking of ballots by soldiers who leave the country after the Act was passed. These men are to vote in New Zealand. And it distinctly provides, contrary to the terms of this Bill, that any soldier who leaves the country after the Act is passed must register his vote before he leaves or he will not be allowed to register it at all.

Mr. DOHERTY: Will the hon. gentleman allow me a word? He says I was mistaken, and he reads section 8 to prove it. But section 2 provides for all expeditionary forces sent from New Zealand to serve in the war, and they have the right to vote. There is further information on this point which I give now so that the hon. gentleman may know just upon what I rely. If he will turn to the London Times of the 12th December, he will find the following, dated Wellington, N.Z.:

> According to the latest parliamentary returns, 38 Government, 30 Opposition and 8 Labour members have been elected, including Social Democrats. As the Labour members support the Opposition, this makes the parties equal. But the votes of absentees and of members of the expeditionary forces have not yet been counted, and they may affect the result in several cases where the vote is close. There are about 10,000 voters in Egypt and Samoa, and 2,000 are encamped in the Dominion.

The figure of 10,000 in Egypt and Samoa, my hon. friend will notice, tallies exactly with the number of voters mentioned in the telegram of the Prime Minister of New Zealand.

Mr. GERMAN: But if the hon. minister will follow the Times he will find that up to the 24th of September these 10,000 votes were not yet returned to New Zealand.

Mr. DOHERTY: But that does not say that they were not registered in Egypt and Samoa.

Mr. PUGSLEY: That does not answer the criticism I made. What I pointed out was that my hon. friend sought, it seemed to me, to convey the impression that the New Zealand Act only applied to soldiers who were at the front. For he said they already had an Act relating to absentee voters which would apply to the case of others. That to which I wish to call his attention, and which I wish to emphasize, is that the New Zealand Act is intended to give to soldiers the opportunity to vote before they leave for the front; and it expressly provides that if they go to the front after the Act passes they must vote in New Zealand or they will not be permitted to vote at all. In that respect it is different from the present Bill, because this Bill provides that members of future contingents that leave for the front need not vote before they go—indeed there is no provision, as I understand it, for their marking their ballots before they go—but that while they are at the front, any Canadian commissioned officer whom the High Commissioner for Canada, Sir George Perley, chooses to appoint, may take the ballots to them, have them mark the ballots, make the necessary certificate and send the ballot back to the returning officer. In that respect this Bill is entirely different from the Bill which was submitted to the New Zealand Parliament. The quotation from the New Zealand Bill shows that in the opinion of that Government and that Parliament it was not desirable to give the vote to soldiers at the front engaged in actual warfare, but, they apparently thought that, because they were providing for soldiers who left in future registering their votes before they went away, ex necessitate but erroneously I think, that they must provide that those already abroad should be allowed to vote in the way proposed. Thereafter, however, any soldier who left for the front without marking his ballot before leaving the country could not be permitted to vote.

Now, I submit that we cannot with very great safety follow the example of New Zealand in this matter. We know that they have some other provisions of a most novel character in their election law, provisions which we have never sought to adopt in this country. They make provision, for instance, for the voter who is absent upon his ordinary business being allowed to vote. In this country we should not think of such a thing, because we realize that in carrying on the elections here it is desirable to have safeguards surrounding the depositing of the ballot which could not be thrown around the recording of the votes of absentees. The Solicitor General (Mr. Meighen) made the statement that we could safely follow New Zealand because it is a British country. But we are in the habit of following as far as we can the example of the Mother Country. The people of Canada realize that the example set by the Parliament of the Mother Country in most matters is a safe one to follow. It is a significant fact and one to which we should give great weight in dealing with this question that, though Great Britain has been engaged in many wars, yet never has it occurred to any one that it would be desirable to have a Bill passed by the British Parliament such as is now before this House. The Solicitor General said he doubted if there were any soldiers at the front in Britain's wars, who, if they had been in England would have had the right to vote. I doubt that statement very much. We know that it has been the glory of England that her young men of wealth, as well as those without wealth, have always been willing to go to the front. He knows that always many men of wealth who had commissions in the army have been ready to go to the front. It would seem to me most extraordinary if that statement of my hon. friend could be supported. The hon. gentleman said that during the Boer war the British Government had no thought of an election. The hon. member for Red Deer (Mr. M. Clark) called his attention to the fact that an election was held while the Boer war was in progress. Instead of answering the hon. member for Red Deer, the Solicitor General with that cleverness shall I say with that smartness—which I have sometimes seen in the police court when the police court lawyer turns and makes a flippant remark to the crowd of unwashed on the back benches to provoke laughter, said, "Well, you must not talk any more about not having elections during the war."

My hon. friend, instead of answering the hon. member for Red Deer, sought to turn the point in a flippant manner in order to provoke the laughter of his supporters. I do not think that that was very creditable on the part of the Solicitor General; I should have thought that he would answer the question of the hon. member for Red Deer. If there were any answer to be given, my hon. friend was capable of giving it; the only inference that we can draw is that no reasonable answer could be given.

My right hon. friend the Prime Minister, and, I think, the Minister of Justice, referred to the fact that 50,000 Canadians are or soon will be fighting the battles of the Empire, and suggested that it would be outrageous if they should be compelled to make the sacrifice, in addition to risking their lives in the defence of their country, of losing the opportunity of voting in connection with questions which may affect the future government of this country. It has been pointed out that there is one way in which that condition need not be brought about. This Parliament will not have run its five years until very late in the autumn of 1916, and there can be one or even two sessions of Parliament before it will be necessary for the Government to go to the country. What question of great importance looms up to-day which would cause the Government to feel that they can properly advise His Royal Highness to cause this country to be plunged into the turmoil of an election contest? What reason is there why all these questions—questions respecting the navy; questions respecting the general administration of affairs; questions respecting the responsibilities for the scandals with which the atmosphere of the whole of this country from the Atlantic to the Pacific is tainted—should be put before the people at this time? Is there any reason why this deplorable state of affairs should be brought about? Hon. gentlemen pretend that when we make suggestions of this kind, we are indicating that we fear to meet the electorate. Let me say to hon. gentlemen opposite that so far as hon. gentlemen on this side of the House are concerned, our political success or failure is a matter of little importance to us as compared with the desirability, while this great war, which is shaking the Empire to its very foundations, is in progress, of not diverting the attention of the people from the serious questions relating to the war to the petty consideration of the triumph of one political party or the other. More than that, I believe that if hon. gentlemen, without reason save that of a desire to secure party triumph, throw this country into the turmoil of an election, that is the feeling which will be expressed by the people. In the session of August last, when Parliament was called for the purpose of considering measures which it was desirable to pass by reason of the war that had broken out, if the Government had then thought it desirable to give the soldiers the right to vote, that was the time to have passed this legislation and to have made provisions, with proper safeguards, for the recording of the votes of the soldiers. In the various villages and towns where the soldiers were massed, opportunities could easily have been given for the marking of the ballots by the soldiers in the presence of scrutineers, and these ballots could have been kept, to be used when the election should take place. But the Government did not do that.

Mr. WILCOX: What about the soldiers who, having voted, were subsequently killed?

Mr. PUGSLEY: The hon. gentleman asks a question which he might well ask of the Minister of Justice. Suppose many hundreds of soldiers are killed between the time they mark their ballots and the time the ballots reach the Clerk of the Crown in Chancery; what would happen then?

Mr. WILCOX: Their votes would be counted.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Then my hon. friend asserts that the votes of dead men would be counted.

Mr. DOHERTY: The votes counted would be the votes of men who had voted during the course of the election, not the votes of men who had voted months or years previous to the election.

Mr. PUGSLEY: That does not make any difference, because the Minister of Justice is providing not for voting for a particular person, but for voting for the Government or the Opposition, and the merits of either party might not change very much in the course of a few months—although, again, they might. I raised a question this afternoon when the Minister of Justice was speaking and I think it is a question which is worthy of consideration—as to the merits of the proposal to have soldiers vote while they are at the front. The casting of one's ballot is one of the most serious acts which a citizen can perform. It is a sacred right; it is also a sacred duty. To enable the elector to cast his vote intelligently and conscientiously, it is desirable that he should be informed upon the issues which are presented in the country. How is it possible for soldiers who have been for several months at the front, out of touch altogether with Canadian affairs, intelligently to vote upon the different questions which will necessarily influence the electorate when the election takes place? The hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce told a Toronto audience the other night that they must remember that politics is not all boots and binoculars. Politics is not all boots and binoculars, yet the question of the scandals connected with the purchase of supplies for the war department, the question of the purchase of boots and binoculars and horses, the question of the employing of members of Parliament to make these purchases, the question of the excess prices which were charged—all these are matters which, to a large extent, will necessarily be considered by the electorate. What does a soldier at the front, who has been absent from the country for four or five months, know about these questions? It may be said: What does he care to know about them? Well, he will care to know about them if he wishes to cast his ballot in the best interests of his country and to perform his duty intelligently. I think it was the Minister of Justice who said that Lord Kitchener may be relied upon to prevent the soldiers from getting campaign literature. I do not know, however, that Lord Kitchener would be able to control that, if the partisan pamphlets were sent through the mails. I do not know that he would be aware of what kind of literature was being sent; besides I fancy that Lord Kitchener has something else to do. The officers who are at the front, Sir John French and others, have too much to do to pay attention to the letters or literature which might be sent to the soldiers. I am afraid that if this measure passes in its present form and the soldiers who are at the front are given the right to vote, you will find that at the time when all the best thought that a soldier can give to anything should be given to fighting the foe, there will be hostile camps among the soldiers, Liberal officers will be canvassing Liberal or Independent or wavering soldiers, and Conservative officers will be canvassing for their side, each endeavouring to explain to the soldiers his view of the issues which are before the people of Canada. Is that desirable? Of course that raises the whole question as to whether among the men who are at the front and whose first duty would be to devote all their time and attention to fighting in the interests of their country, it is desirable to introduce political contests and political partisanship and feeling. I do not see the same objection to providing that soldiers who are going to the front shall be allowed to mark their ballot before they go. If the Bill had proposed to go only that far I would have been glad to support it and to give whatever aid I could towards perfecting the measure, towards surrounding the marking of the ballot of the soldier with every possible safeguard. But so far as those already gone are concerned, the Minister of Justice has lost the opportunity. Instead of bringing this measure in as I have said, in August, as he ought to have done if in the opinion of the Government it was desirable to pass a measure of this kind, he has waited until some 30,000 or more of our young men have gone to the front and he has lost the opportunity of giving them a reasonable and fair opportunity to cast their ballots. If, however, at this late date, the minister amends his Bill so that it will apply only to those who are hereafter to go to the front and give them an opportunity to mark their ballots before they go, then I will be heart and soul with him and will assist him in throwing safeguards around this measure, as I believe safeguards can easily be thrown around it. You can make provision and supply safeguards for soldiers voting in this country before they go to the front, but you cannot after they have gone to the front. Then too the same objection would not obtain as to introducing politics in the trenches. With soldiers voting here you can have scrutineers and proper arrangements made without great difficulty, and in that way I think there would be no complaint on the part of anybody. As my right hon. friend pointed out in those cases where the marking of the ballot is done in Canada you would have control over the officials whose duty it was to see that the ballots were properly marked, marked in secret and forwarded to the Clerk of the Crown in Chancery. All that could be provided for and persons who might commit violations of the law could be punished. But here you propose to send ballots to Belgium, France and, as my right hon. friend said, possibly even to Germany, to send ballots broadcast and place them in the hands of people who may commit wrong and who cannot be punished. You give an opportunity for the commission of any crime of forgery, any crime of substitution of ballots, outside of this country and by persons over whom the Canadian courts would have no jurisdiction. With reference to the franchise, as my right hon. friend in the unanswerable objection which he made to this Bill in its present form stated, this Bill gives a new franchise. It practically repeals the Provincial Franchise Act, under which the elections in Canada are held. The provincial Acts provide that a man must be resident in the province generally for a period of 12 months. This Bill provides that a man who happens to be a British subject, but who had lived previously in the United States, if he happened to be in Canada even while recruiting was going on, even while he was arranging to join the militia, even for 30 days, shall have the right to mark his ballot. What knowledge would a gentleman from the United States, who had come here to join the Canadian forces to fight for the Empire, have of the issues on which the Canadian people are divided? What reason is there in giving to those men who have not been citizens of Canada, who have not been permanent residents of Canada, who happen to have been in the country for 30 days, votes, when we deny them under ordinary circumstances to men whose residence has been as short as that?

Mr. MEIGHEN: How could such a man have a vote under this Bill when he had only been 30 days in Canada?

Mr. PUGSLEY: Every male British subject—

Mr. MEIGHEN: How would he get to be a British subject if he had only been in Canada for 30 days?

Mr. PUGSLEY: In the United States there are thousands of British subjects who have no interest in Canada whatever, but who have come to Canada, and they have been here 30 days before joining the Canadian forces, and have gone to serve the Empire. They go because they are British subjects. After the war is over they will go back to the United States. But what reason is there in giving to these men, who, even though they may be true British subjects, are strangers to Canada and strangers to the issues on which our people are divided, the right to decide as between the two parties, or to vote upon the issues which are dividing the Canadian people? The reason why the legislatures of the different provinces have required a considerable period of residence, is that a man who wants to cast his ballot may be interested in and informed upon Canadian questions, and may therefore vote intelligently on the issues before the people. In New Zealand there is no alteration in the franchise; no man can vote under the New Zealand Bill except a man who had a right to vote independently of that Bill altogether. It makes no change in the franchise, as this Bill does.

Mr. R. B. BENNETT: It is a manhood franchise there.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Manhood franchise? But manhood franchise requires probably a certain period of residence in the country.

Mr. BENNETT: Registration only.

Mr. PUGSLEY: At all events, all provinces of Canada have required a certain period of residence in order to entitle a man to be registered as a voter. We have manhood suffrage in this country, and we require that there shall be a certain definite period of residence before a man may be registered as a voter.

For these reasons I am opposed to the Bill in its present form. I desire to be understood that, so far as I am concerned, I would support a measure which would provide that soldiers, before they leave Canada for the front, would be enabled to mark their ballots so that if an election came on during their absence the ballots would be cast by the returning officers under proper supervision. I would not have the Bill absolutely without safeguards as this Bill is; I would see that reasonable safeguards surrounded the voting. If that provision was made and the Bill was limited to that, I would feel that I could heartily support it; but in its present form I cannot support it. There is another objection to this Bill. Unlike the New Zealand Bill it is not limited to a general election. It is to be permanently attached to the Dominion Elections Act. It provides that ballots may be cast in a by-election, so that if at any time between now and the next general election there should be a by-election all this performance would have to be gone through, just as if it was a general election. I do not know whether the Government mean that, but that is one of the provisions of the Bill; and in that respect it differs most materially from the New Zealand Bill, which provides "that this Act shall be deemed to be repealed on the completion of the general election." This provision in regard to by-elections certainly seems to me to be contrary to reason, and on this ground alone, if on no other, the Bill ought not to commend itself to the House in its present form. I have the right to assume that when the Government brings down a Bill applying to by-elections as well as general elections, they mean what the Bill says. If they do not mean it, of course the Minister of Justice will tell us so; and no doubt the Bill will then be changed simply to meet the case of the general election.

Mr. R. B. BENNETT (Calgary): I was a member of the committee that was charged with the responsibility of preparing the Bill that is now submitted to the House. It does appear to me that the discussion that has taken place, during the last few moments at least, has overlooked the object for which that committee met, and the object that it had in view in endeavouring to provide votes for soldiers. The question it seems to me is a very simple one. Shall a portion of our population that is absent from Canada for a great cause be deprived of its franchise? Put in another way it is this: Shall thousands of our citizens who are exercising the highest obligation of citizenship be deprived of its highest privilege? In other words it is this: Shall those who are offering their lives as a willing sacrifice for us who remain at home be deprived of the right of expressing their view as to how we who remain conduct the affairs of our common country? Put in another way it is this: shall men who offer their lives for their country be punished by being deprived of their highest civil right? Now, considering these questions from any standpoint it seems to me there is only one answer; and in considering the answer that must be given to any one of these questions I submit that we must have regard to the constitutional conditions under which we live. No less a man than Lord Morley of Blackburn, in one of his admirable essays pointed out that it would never be possible for the residents or citizens of the overseas dominions to fight for Britain in a cause in which they had no special interest; and, strange as it may seem, he took as an illustration the possibility of citizens of overseas dominions fighting for the neutrality of Belgium. The very illustration that he took for what he said might not happen has happened; and today Canadians, New Zealanders, and Australians are fighting side by side with the regular troops of Great Britain for the maintenance of the neutrality and integrity of Belgium—a living demonstration of the lack of prophetic vision on the part of that great man.

Under our present constitutional system we had nothing to say directly as to whether we should engage in these hostilities. Our citizens who are offering their services are in no sense conscripts; they are under no obligation to render their service to the Empire. They are volunteers, and to that extent they are citizen soldiers, offering their services on the plains of Europe for the maintenance of a common democracy. That being so, the simple question is this: Shall citizen soldiers be deprived of the exercise of their civil rights, merely because as citizen soldiers they have offered their services on the fields of Europe? That was the question that was before the committee. We discussed it, and dealt with it from various standpoints, and there seemed to be in the mind of that committee but one answer to that question, and it was this: That a citizen of Canada, who is only a soldier by sentiment, by loyalty, by patriotism, and by a high regard for democracy and the cause of humanity, should not be deprived of the right to use his franchise merely because under extraordinary conditions he happens to be absent from this Dominion. I do not say that the committee was unanimous in arriving at that conclusion, but no member of it stood up and said: I say the principle is wrong. On the contrary every member of the committee felt that it was his bounden duty to give effect so far as it was possible, to the principle that a citizen of Canada who is absent from our shores under such extraordinary circumstances, and on so great and glorious a mission, should not be deprived of his civil rights. Having arrived at that conclusion, the next question that confronted the committee was: How shall we give effect to that conclusion? I will admit at once that it is not an easy thing to give effect to such a conclusion. That is the reason why the committee considered the matter at such length; that is the reason that they had recourse to precedents from other countries; that is the reason that they studied the legislation, for instance, of the States of the neighbouring republic; that is the reason that they studied the legislation of New Zealand. Why, Sir, during the last year there has been passed in many of the states of the United States legislation that will enable absentee voters to vote on election day, regardless of the cause on which they might be absent; and postal voting has been established in some of the King's Dominions, not in the republic to the south of us but in the King's Dominions, the principle being that mere temporary absence from the country should not deprive a man of the exercise of his franchise. No hon. gentleman opposite will deny that the whole trend of legislation to-day, so far as the exercise of the franchise is concerned, is to make possible the exercise of that franchise by every man who is entitled to exercise it under the laws of the country in which he lives. That is the whole trend of democratic legislation. If you look at the last American Year Book, to which I had occasion to direct the attention of the committee during the discussion of this measure, you will find that in various states provision is being made to meet that very point; namely, that some provision should be made whereby the man who has a right to vote, but who is temporarily absent on election day, should be able to declare whether he favours or opposes particular Bills, or parties, or governments, or legislation. That being so, we endeavoured to find some method by which a well-recognized principle of democracy might be maintained in all its strength, and whereby our fellow Canadians not temporarily absent in the ordinary sense of the term, but absent for the greatest cause for which Canadians have ever gone away, should be given every chance of sharing in the Government of this country. That is all.

What do we propose? First of all we propose that every British subject of the age of 21 years shall have a vote. Why? It is the universal law in this Dominion that every British subject of the age of 21 years shall have a vote. In Ontario, Alberta, Manitoba, Saskatchewan, British Columbia, Quebec, in all the provinces, the same provision applies. Instead of making a new franchise we are endeavouring to recognize the fact that in each of the provinces men of that type have votes, and because of the fact that this legislation is for a Dominion franchise, we made the broad declaration that every British subject of the age of 21 years shall have a vote.

My hon. and learned friend from St. John has just directed attention to the fact that there is an extraordinary provision in the Bill whereby residence of a British subject for thirty days prior to enlistment shall constitute residence necessary to vote, and he directed attention to the fact that in the New Zealand Bill no such provision appears. Surely my hon. friend is not serious?

Mr. PUGSLEY: What I said was that in the New Zealand Bill the franchise was not altered in regard to residence.

Mr. BENNETT: My hon. friend did hardly say that.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Yes.

Mr. BENNETT: He went a step further. What does section 2 of the New Zealand Act say? It says:

Every member of any expeditionary force sent from New Zealand to serve in the war in which His Majesty is at present engaged, shall be entitled to vote.

I do not attach any importance to what they do in New Zealand. It is merely a precedent, because there happened to be a general election. It became necessary to preserve the rights of the citizens to vote and in order to preserve that right they passed that legislation, but I do not attach any importance to what they have done in New Zealand in so far as Canada is concerned. The problem we had to deal with was a problem of our own and we only refer to New Zealand in so far as its action throws any light upon the question. It is merely referred to by the Government as showing what others have done. We have different conditions.

We have endeavoured to preserve the provincial franchise. We felt that any man who is a subject of the King and Emperor, who had come to this country and resided in it for thirty days, who would ordinarily have acquired the franchise and who, instead of extending his residence for three months or six months or twelve months, was still in theory a Canadian citizen while serving under the colours in Flanders or in France, should have the vote. We provided that if he had been for thirty days in Canada he should have a vote provided that if that man had a vote in any other portion of Canada he should vote just where he had that vote in accordance with the provincial list and not otherwise. We have made no new franchise, we have endeavoured to substitute no new Act for the existing Acts, but we merely say that we will recognize existing rights. The provincial franchise must be exercised. But the committee felt that a British subject who had lived thirty days in Canada, although having his residence insofar as the fact is concerned with the colours in France or Belgium, should be given the franchise. At one time we discussed the possibility of preparing a list, but many difficulties were pointed out, and that idea was abandoned. Then the committee submit to Parliament a measure by which they say: We shall send ballots forward for the purpose of enabling our citizen soldiers to express their will at the polls. If you admit that we should answer the question as to whether they should have a vote in the affirmative, and if it be answered in the affirmative, and that we should preserve as far as possible the existing franchise, the next thing to be done was to see that they exercise that franchise under proper safeguards. That was discussed, and it was concluded to adopt the very simple method provided by the Bill. It is proposed that we shall prepare the ballots and send them forward. They will be distributed among the men, they will be placed in an envelope with an affidavit, because we must have some safeguards. This envelope will be sent back to the Clerk of the Crown in Chancery and the Clerk of the Crown in Chancery will send the envelopes to the various electoral districts where the ballots will be counted. We felt that there should be legislation to provide against the very difficulty that the Minister of Justice has pointed out, namely, uncertainty as to the result of the elections. We said that if these ballots reached the returning officer after the polling day they should not be counted. We felt that the uncertainty that prevailed in New Zealand in consequence of the manner in which the soldiers' votes had been transmitted after they had been cast in Egypt and Samoa caused a great deal of difficulty and we said that if the votes of the soldiers reached the returning officers in the various constituencies in Canada after the day of election they should not be counted. Then we provided that some time during election day, but after the close of the poll, so as to obviate the possibility of there being some knowledge in the mind of the electors as to how the poll was going, these ballots should be counted and placed in the ballot box and added to the general results. I do submit that that is fair, that it is a recognition of the obligation on the part of the Canadian people and Parliament assembled to give some countenance and support to the very proper claim that was made by the soldiers that went from my constituency to myself that they should be enabled to cast their votes if a general election should happen during their absence, and that they should not be obliged to lose their civil rights because they exercised the higher obligations of citizenship.

What complaint can be urged against that? Two complaints are urged against it. One is that it opens the way to fraud, and another is that you have not the safeguards that should surround the exercise of the franchise. Living as I do in western Canada all I can say is that under the legislation we have before us Canada's soldiers cannot do anything in the way of fraud comparable with what I have seen. I am not saying that in a cavilling spirit. That happened in the last general election in the province of Alberta? In one constituency the ballot box was opened and the votes taken out and to this day the offender has not been punished. Would you sooner trust the British officer, one of our fellow Canadian officers, who has before him the grim responsibilities of his position with death staring him in the face, to do the decent, honest thing, or would you rather trust a returning officer where a ballot box was opened, as in Medicine Hat last election? Which would you rather have, which would the people of Canada sooner have, which would any reasonable man sooner have?

Then my hon. friend goes a step further and he says: Why, surely, you would not permit a British subject who has come in from the United States and has only been thirty days in Canada to vote in Canada? Oh, no! Come with me to the province of Saskatchewan. At the last general election you could have seen thousands of aliens voting as they were told. And that is not all. Come with me to any poll in the province of Alberta where we have naturalized Germans and Austrians and tell me whether you would prefer the vote of a British subject who lived thirty days in Canada to that of the naturalized alien whose instincts and sympathies are still with what he calls his fatherland.

Come with me and tell me whether or not you would sooner trust the Briton who has lived thirty days in Canada than the authors of the splendid pamphlet that I hold in my hand that is now printed on one side in German and on the other in English upon a printing press controlled, I believe, by the hon. member for Edmonton (Mr. Oliver), commending: Canada first; down with participation by Canadians in the wars of the Empire; preserve Canada for the Germans and the Austrians and all those other foreign people who come here and make it their home; but never mind Britain, because she and her King can take care of themselves. Would you trust those naturalized foreigners or would you trust the thirty-day resident British subject who came from the United States in order that he might offer his life as a sacrifice for your safety and mine? I commend my hon. friend from the old loyalist city of St. John (Mr. Pugsley) to go back and ask his electors whether they would prefer to see the franchise for this great Dominion of Canada exercised by the men who had journeyed over from Massachusetts or Vermont or Maine and lived here for thirty days that they might fight for our country and Empire or the men I have mentioned. Let him go and ask the descendants of the founders of St. John. I leave it to the electorate of St. John to deal with my hon. friend as they will.

After dealing with that as I have stated and after having arrived at the conclusions which I have mentioned, we found it necessary to surround the franchise with such safeguards as we could suggest, and I think the safeguards in the Bill are adequate for the purposes intended. In the province in which I live all that is necessary for a man to do to exercise his franchise is this: He walks into a polling booth and the returning officer says: "What is your name?" "John Jones." "Where do you live?" "Well, just west of Edmonton," or "just west of Calgary." "Where?" "Oh, not far from Edson," or "not far from Morley." "Well, your name is not on the list." "That is all right, partner; let's swear." That is the way the thing goes on. The man puts his hand upon the Bible, and he swears that he is a British subject; that he is 21 years of age, and that he has resided one year in the province of Alberta and three months in a particular electoral district. He gets the ballot; goes out; fills it up; comes in and puts it into the ballot box, and you may seek in vain for John Jones next day. The place that knows him knows him no more, and the place that knew him knows him no more. Yet you are going to tell me that the 12,000 electors from the Province of Alberta that are now fighting or getting ready to fight for this Empire, some in Europe and some in England and some in Canada, cannot vote, but that this John Jones can vote. Out in yonder trenches the man goes up and swears an affidavit before his commanding officer, and we have the record of that man from now until the time that he is discharged or until he offers his life for his country. His name is there; it is enrolled upon the records; we know him for all time; his history will be the common heritage of us all. We know that man, but who knows anything of John Jones who came in on the train and put up at a hotel? Yet he must vote, but my friends from Calgary cannot vote; my hon. friend's friends from Edmonton cannot vote. Why? Because my hon. friends opposite say that there are not sufficient safeguards when the soldier makes his affidavit. He marks his ballot and next morning perhaps he is offering his life for his country. His ballot is put into an envelope and sent back, but it cannot be counted because there are no safeguards! I am sure my hon. friend from Edmonton will not support any such doctrine as that which my hon. friend from St. John advocates. I am sure he will not permit himself for a single moment to go back on his old and tried and true friends who are now fighting in Europe and who would like to have a chance to vote, any more than I shall go back on those who have voted both for and against me and who in the trenches have a desire to vote. The safeguards which are thrown around the voting by the men in the trenches are better than the safeguards as regards voting in the province of Saskatchewan or of Alberta are to-day or to-morrow.

Oh, my hon. friends perhaps will say: It is going to interfere with military operations and Lord Kitchener will veto the measure. In any event, it will not be Lord Kitchener that will veto the measure; it will be Sir John French or whoever is in command of the British forces. Assuming, however, that by virtue of military exigencies and necessities, our soldiers cannot vote, does that lessen the obligation of their fellow-Canadians to give them the right to vote if they want to? I do not for a single moment say that our soldiers will vote, but I know that some of them want to vote. I do not say that they will have the opportunity to exercise the franchise that they would like to have, because it may be that the military exigencies and necessities of the war will prevent them from doing so; but I would be recreant to my duties and this House would be recreant to its duties and to the trust reposed in it by its Canadian fellow-citizens thousands of miles from here, if we did not afford them the opportunity to vote if they wish to do so. When men tell me that some one is going to veto something or that something is going to interfere with something else, that does not interfere with or lessen the right of this Parliament to do its plain and obvious duty. I do not for a single moment doubt that if an election came at a certain date, there might be great difficulties; but we have not said on what day the soldiers shall vote. As soon as it is known there is going to be an election, the ballots will be transmitted to Europe and circulated, and although it may be that some of the soldiers will say: I am not going to be bothered about an election, and they will throw the ballot away, there may be ten men out of a company of a hundred who want to vote. I intend to use such power and influence as I have to give those ten men the right to exercise the franchise if they so desire. Why should there be any magnifying of the seriousness of the situation? Why should there not be a common desire on the part of this Parliament on both sides—Government and Opposition—to say: We are going to give the men an opportunity to vote, and we will make this measure as perfect as possible. When I think of the labyrinths of the mind of my hon. friend from St. John, I am sure he can devise safeguards to throw around this voting, and may I say that with his large experience and great knowledge of the law, it would be his manifest duty, as coming from the old loyalist city of St. John, when we are sitting here in committee, to give that splendid talent of his to make perfect this measure and to see that his fellow-citizens shall have the right to vote if they so desire. This is not a provocative nor a contentious measure; this Bill enanated from the committee as quite the opposite and we discussed it in the most friendly and amicable manner possible. Some hon. gentlemen opposite say that it is absolutely impossible to carry this legislation into effect. I say nothing is impossible to a Parliament that desires to achieve a given result or end, and although the measure may not be as perfect as it should be, that does not deter me from using my influence to have something placed upon the statute-book that will make possible the end which we have in mind and which should be effective. My hon. friend says: I am in favour of letting the soldiers in the country have a vote, but once they go out of the country, I am not. Is a soldier who is garrisoned at Halifax who comes from Alberta in any better position than a soldier who comes from Calgary who is garrisoned at Bermuda? Is a soldier who came from Edmonton and is now garrisoned at, let us say, Winnipeg, in any better position than the soldier who came from Edmonton and is now garrisoned at Alexandria, Egypt, or on Salisbury Plain or in Tidworth barracks?

If we admit that, let us go a step further. Is such a soldier in any worse position if he happens to be with the second division, or brigaded with certain British regiments at some point in France? You say: the difficulties are multiplied because these men are in the trenches, but men do not stay in the trenches all the time; they go to their base. Suppose there are two hundred of them—a double company with a major in charge, the major sees to it that these two hundred men are handed their ballots. In due course each makes his affidavit before the commissioned officer who is authorized to administer the oath, and the ballot is put in an envelope, the officer certifying that the man entitled to vote had actually marked that ballot. That ballot comes out to Canada and in due course finds its way to Calgary. Is there any difficulty about that? Why magnify these difficulties and go into mock heroics about the dangers of the trenches? Why discuss these sanguinary differences between two contending armies, when the vote is not being cast there at all? Why not look at this reasonably as practical men? It does seem to me it is possible to be done. Why innoculate this discussion with talk about scandals in boots?

If this Government were desirous of covering alleged scandal about improper equipment, do you suppose they would be so anxious that the men who wear the boots should have the vote? If this terrible condition exists that the hon. member for St. John city imagines—and it is pure imagination—does he think for a moment that the soldier wearing paper upon his feet instead of boots would vote for the Government? You would think the hon. gentleman would almost exhaust his energy in giving that soldier the right to vote. Either the hon. gentleman does not believe the boots are bad, or else there is something else behind all this to cause him to prevent the soldier from having the vote. What is it? Why does the right hon. leader of the Opposition (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) desire that the soldiers should not have the vote? Why does the hon. member for St. John city take the same view? Why do hon. gentlemen opposite generally offer such opposition to this legislation? It must be that they remember that the soldiers have memories. It must be that they recollect that the men who are fighting for Canada at this time bear in mind the political history of their country. Their knowledge and recollection will induce them to mete out to the right hon. gentleman and those who sit beside him that measure of justice which these recollections would entail. No doubt some of these gallant soldiers in the trenches have read the utterances of some of the hon. gentlemen opposite. They cannot fail to have taken note of the noble sentences that decry British diplomacy and look forward with joy to the day when, so far as Canada is concerned, it shall be no more. They cannot fail to remember having read in text books of elections in this country that Canadians would never fight for Britain in Britain's wars, Canada not being interested. Remembering these sentences that have fallen from the lips of stalwart leaders of their party, peradventure, these hon. gentlemen opposite think: If we give these men the vote, they may remember this against us. I wonder if that is the reason. Far be it from me to suggest that to be the reason, because I know that hon. gentlemen opposite are dominated by a higher spirit of patriotism than that. There must be another reason. I fain would know it. But, after having listened to the speech of the right hon. leader of the Opposition and of that great legal luminary who sits to his right, I fail, absolutely fail, to ascertain that reason. There is a mystery about it, and I would like to see that mystery solved. No doubt many other people in Canada would like to see it solved. Why should a simple little Bill that offers our fellow-Canadians the franchise cause all this trouble? One would think that hon. gentlemen opposite would be falling over one another in their support of this measure. Their statements will be read in the morning with great pain, and I am sure it will cause many an anxious moment to Liberals in the country that I come from when they find that their brothers are denied the franchise by the acts of hon. gentlemen opposite. And many a wife who has given her husband to the war will sorrow and be exceeding sad to know that her husband, because he is in France fighting for Canada, cannot vote in the next election. I wonder how the hon. member for Edmonton is going to feel when these two thousand men from his constitutency learn that he voted against this measure. I cannot understand hon. gentlemen opposite to-night. Their conduct is really passing strange. And I do not think anybody will be able to understand on what principle they have arrived at such conclusions as they have expressed here. They talk about boot scandals, and yet they will not trust the soldiers to judge their own boots. They talk about horse scandals, but the only horse I have seen ridden around here is one that, I think, will not accomplish much—the scandal horse. They are disappointed because the Government has called for a full inquiry; because there is no blockers' brigade, because there is no dark lantern brigade; and, to fill up their cup of bitterenss—

Mr. SPEAKER: I think the hon. gentleman is not confining himself closely to the Bill under discussion.

Mr. BENNETT: Possibly I have wandered far from the subject because the hon. member for St. John city was discussing scandal, and, as he is an expert in that matter, I wished to remind him of certain things. I had almost thought that perhaps the soldiers would remember the sawdust wharves and other things of that sort.

Mr. PUGSLEY: That is thoroughly non-partisan.

Mr. BENNETT: The hon. gentleman says the wharf is non-partisan. In that, I think, he is altogether right. The committee in the preparation of this Bill did not have in mind an immediate election, and that I can say with all certainty. The hon. and learned gentleman who presided over the committee, the Minister of Justice (Mr. Doherty), brought to bear upon the measure every consideration he could to make it fair and workable, and the other members of the committee did not prepare the Bill with regard to an immediate election. The hon. member for Red Deer said that this measure emanated from the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Rogers). If all the work of the Minister of Public Works is as good as this—and I do not think he appeared before the committee—he has every reason to be proud of his handiwork in trying to give his fellow-Canadians at the front a chance to exercise the franchise. The committee had regard to what had been done in other colonies and dominions. Members may not have been altogether forgetful of the fact that challenges had been issued from the other side as to the possibility of an election. After these challenges I received letters from soldiers from my own constituency who were leaving for the front and from those who had already left, pointing out that it was said we were going to have a general election.

They had heard that the Opposition had said that we dare not have an election, and they expressed a desire to have an opportunity of recording their votes. I do not doubt that they desired to have a vote in order to vote against the party that dared challenge us to have an election at this time. All I have to say to the hon. member for Red Deer, when he talks in high-flown and heroic terms about an election at this time, is that if he would make an attempt to have his own party refrain from making challenges about elections and from talking about elections and appeals to the people, he would be accomplishing a great deal more than he is doing by offering his advice as to whether or not we should have one, while at the same time sending out ammunition in the shape of campaign literature. In my town that ammunition is all in shape, ready to burst the moment the word is given. This partisan shell has a time fuse; just what time has been fixed, I do not know, but it is ready to be exploded at the proper time. A friend of mine, writing to me the other day, told me all about this. Our people have not any of this campaign ammunition in readiness, so far as I know; perhaps we do not need any.

I have pointed out the considerations that influenced the committee in endeavouring to arrive at a conclusion in this matter, and I have pointed out the safeguards with which we have endeavoured to surround the exercising of the franchise under the conditions proposed. I am not unmindful of the fact that any election law that may be placed on the statute book can be circumvented and broken by crooks, but it remains for hon. gentlemen opposite to insinuate that the officers who are offering their lives, and who may face death the next day, are going to do a fraudulent, dishonest and dishonourable thing in giving effect to this legislation. I do not believe it, and I do appeal to the members on the other side of this House for once to forget partisanship, provocativeness and contentiousness, and to unite with us in putting upon the Statute Book a measure of which Canada may be proud. It is not enough that those who go to the front to fight for us should make us proud of them; we who remain behind to legislate and to deal with the great problems which surround us every day should make these men, when they come back from the trenches, proud of us. I do not believe that Canadians should be deprived of the privilege of exercising their civil rights merely because freely, voluntarily, without conscription, without restraint, without coercion, without in any sense being requested or asked so to do by legal authority, they have offered their services to their King and Empire. Twelve thousand soldiers from the province of Alberta ask that this measure of justice shall be given them. Twelve thousand men, their brothers and sisters, their wives and other relatives, ask that this measure of justice shall be given them. Even if the legislation is not surrounded by all the safeguards that you would wish, they ask that we place upon the statute book something which will enable the men who are offering their lives as a sacrifice to-day to exercise their rights, for or against this Government. Let us do this thing, in the name of justice, of equity, of fair play, of that righteousness which exalteth a nation, of that spirit which pervades those who are offering their lives as sacrifices for us. That is what animated the committee, and the legislation, I do submit, is as fair and reasonable as it possibly could be, having regard to the circumstances and to the difficulty of the task which the committee undertook to perform.

Hon. FRANK OLIVER (Edmonton): I am sure that if there had been any doubt in the minds of hon. gentlemen of the House as to the character and purpose of this Bill, the speech of our hon. friend has set that doubt at rest. We understand now beyond any question that this is a political measure, for partisan purposes, and for partisan purposes only. I do not wish at the moment to follow my hon. friend in the course of his devious remarks. I shall confine myself rather to the argument that preceded his. I wish at first to draw attention to the difference that exists between the conditions surrounding the bringing forward of the New Zealand Bill and those surrounding the bringing forward of this proposed legislation. I wish to point out that there is no comparison between the conditions surrounding these two Bills. In the case of the New Zealand Bill, an election was compelled in the immediate future by effluxion of time; in the case of this Bill, no election is compelled in the immediate future by effluxion of time. There was a definite reason why the New Zealand legislature should take some action in regard to the votes of soldiers; there is no reason why this Government at this time should take such action, unless it be the intention of the Government to bring on a general election during the course of this war for the purpose of enabling its followers to make addresses throughout the Dominion of Canada of the kind and character that my hon. friend has just favoured us with. If the right hon. the Prime Minister calls a general election and turns his followers loose on the platforms of this country with such talk as my hon. friend has engaged in here to-night, how far is that going to urge Canada to do her full share in the matter of rendering assistance to the Empire during the course of this war? I ask the Prime Minister whether, if Canada is to do her part, this is not a time when Canadians should be united; when there should be as few differences introduced into the public mind as possible? We are bound to assume, from what we have heard to-night, that he has it in mind, without cause or justification, except the probability of securing a partisan advantage, to throw a general election upon the country and to set Canadians against each other—as my hon. friend the hon. member for Calgary has himself said; against me and against my friends—at a time when men should be looking forward only in one direction, and that to the giving of whatever assistance they can to the Empire.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: I should like to say to my hon. friend, since he has appealed to me, that the question of a general election will stand on its own merits when the time comes. There has been no decision either to hold an election or not to hold an election; we have been too busy with other things. But I desire to tell him this: that, including the vote of want of confidence which his leader moved and which he supported, in their every move during the past six weeks in this House, hon. gentlemen on the other side have been actuated purely by a desire to obtain partisan advantage at the expense of that unity which the hon. gentleman so greatly lauds at the present time. Any man who has followed the course taken by hon. gentlemen in this House and in the committees of this House during the past six weeks, knows absolutely the truth of what I have just said.

Mr. GRAHAM: We do not know anything of the kind.

Mr. OLIVER: I may be permitted to deviate for a moment from the course of my remarks to follow what the Prime Minister said. The only occasion on which the course of the Government has been challenged in this House at this session was on the occasion of the Budget, on the occasion of a reversal of the fiscal policy of Canada; and I ask him if he considers that in a country under representative institutions and under responsible Government, if we held views different from those advocated by himself, we would have been doing our duty to the country if we had done less than we did. I cannot imagine that unless my hon. friend is taking the position that he has been elected the Czar of Canada—

Mr. GRAHAM: The Kaiser.

Mr. OLIVER: I beg pardon; yes, the Kaiser, and that there must be no difference of opinion and no expression of any difference of opinion when once the mind of the Government has been made up. If that is the condition it is most extraordinary, and I for one had never understood that to be the position, even as the Prime Minister himself understood it or ever thought of enforcing it upon the country. I would say this to him, if I may be permitted, that if he thinks that the excuses he has given here to-night will excuse him before the people of Canada if he throws this country into the turmoil of a general election when he does not need to while this war is on, he mistakes the opinion of the people of this country and mistakes it very seriously. However, from what has passed here to-day, while the Prime Minister has said that he has not decided yet to hold a general election, we are bound to assume from what he has said that a general election while the war is on is entirely within the range of possibility or even of probability; and I am entitled then to conclude that this legislation is introduced distinctly with that object in view.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: Hear, hear.

Mr. OLIVER: That it is, in its nature and essentially, partisan legislation introduced for a partisan purpose in order to further the interest of purely party politics.

Let me say further in regard to the New Zealand case, where provision is made for the taking of a vote for the election of members of the Legislaure and where the vote is not cast for the individual member, but cast for or against the Government or the Opposition or Labour party. But there was another vote provided for, a vote on the great question of prohibition. Provision is made for the taking of a vote on prohibition at the same time as the vote on the general election. It was necessary, I understand, under the arrangement that had been made that these two votes should be taken at the same time. I am prepared to argue that instead of the Dominion of New Zealand providing as they did for the taking of the vote of soldiers during their absence from the country for the sake of getting the soldiers' vote, they made the provision for the purpose of getting the definite opinion of the people of New Zealand in regard to the question and principle of prohibition; and that if it had not been for the submission of the question of prohibition there is no reason to believe that the Government of New Zealand would have made a provision that would have called for a declaration on the part of a voter that he votes for or against the Government as an exercise of his franchise; because it is not an exercise of his franchise. I think the difference in these two points is sufficiently important to emphasize, first that the vote in New Zealand was primarily ordered for the purpose of deciding the prohibition question, a question that had not to do with men but only with principles and, secondly, that the election had to be held. In the case of Canada the election does not have to be held for another period of about 18 months. There is this further difference, that New Zealand is a small country with a comparatively small population, a compact country with a compact people of like race and language and interests and ideas from end to end of the dominion. It is more reasonable that the voters of New Zealand should satisfy their aspirations as to the expression of their political views by voting merely for or against the Government or Labour party than that this should be done by the people of the Dominion of Canada, spread over the width of a continent, of many different provinces, including many different races of people and many different conditions of life. There is no way that the elector of the Dominion of Canada can express his views in regard to the government of this country to the satisfaction of his aspirations in controlling the affairs of the country unless he votes for a man, unless he votes for somebody as well as for something; and when the hon. the Minister of Justice or the other members of the House who have spoken in support of this Bill, suggest that by the passing of this Bill they are giving to our soldiers who are or will be in Europe the opportunity to exercise their franchise on an equality with their fellow-citizens in Canada, they are simply stating what is absurd on its face. It is not, however, in regard to that feature of the voting that I wish to speak. It is not the provision for the voting of the soldier who is in Europe that I wish to criticise; it is the provision for the voting of the soldier who is in Canada. The other feature of the question has been already very fully dealt with. I find that in this Bill the soldier who is still in Canada, who surely should be entitled to exercise his franchise just as any other citizen of Canada, and should have the same safeguards thrown around the exercise of that franchise, is compelled to cast his vote just as the soldier who is in Europe. He does not vote for a candidate, he votes for the Government or for the Opposition as the case may be, although he is living right in Canada, and his vote must run the gauntlet of people holding the same view in regard to election proceedings, as my hon. friend from Calgary has told us, are so numerous in Western Canada. The fact that these people—for they are the same people—are in uniform does not necessarily change their character or their intentions or their views, but it does in a large measure give them immunity from those restrictions, or, in case of necessity, immunity from those penalties, to which civilians acting in the same way would be subject.

My hon. friend from Calgary has alluded to the fact that there are 2,000 soldiers in barracks in or near the city of Edmonton with whom I shall have to reckon when election day comes. I shall be glad to reckon with these 2,000 soldiers, as I certainly will have to, if I could be sure that when these men vote they will vote on election day, and vote for candidates that are offering in the several constituencies, and that their votes will be taken by officials, who will be subject to the ordinary procedure of the courts and not enjoy immunity in any degree, as they certainly will under the provisions of this Act. In other words, I want the 2,000 men to vote, but I want to be sure that their votes will be counted the way they want them to be counted; and I am not sure of that under the terms of this Bill. I want to say—and if I go outside the rules, Mr. Speaker, I am sure you will check me—I say, on the statement of the hon. member for Calgary, and on the statement that I have given here to-night, that this Bill is for the purpose of stealing the election, and that that is all it is for. I ask you, Mr. Speaker, whether this Government has the right to turn 2,000 voters loose in my constituency without proper check as to scrutineers, as to qualifications, or as to any other restrictions except what are contained in this Act? I say that it is a piece of electoral villainy that has been planned and produced in this Act.

Mr. SPEAKER: I must remind the hon. member that it is not permissible for a member to impute improper motives. No rule is more clear than that, according to the rulings of both English and Canadian speakers.

Mr. OLIVER: I desire to bow to your ruling, Mr. Speaker, and beg to withdraw the assertion unreservedly. I have no doubt that I trespassed on the rules of Parliament, although I was speaking according to my own belief, and I think quite within the actual facts of the case. That is the condition prevailing under this Bill as it applies to the case to which my hon. friend from Calgary has himself alluded. My hon. friend from Calgary has in effect threatened me here in this House with what will happen to me at the hands of these men if I dare to oppose this Bill. Mr. Speaker, there have been some strange things done in the Parliament of Canada; there have been some strange things done in Canadian politics; but I venture to say that no stranger thing has been done than the production of a Bill such as this, backed by a threat such as that. I agree that every citizen of Canada who is entitled to vote should vote whenever and wherever the opportunity can be given or found that will ensure that his vote, when given, shall be counted as he intended it to be counted; and if the Minister of Justice will produce a Bill that will give our Canadian citizens in France or in Flanders or in Germany or wherever they please, the right to express their views and to cast their votes for the candidates standing in the Dominion election, and if provision is made that that vote when cast shall be counted as it was intended to be counted, that Bill will have my hearty support. I do not object to the voting of the soldiers; but I object to the counting by the Government. I say that it is—well, I will not say what I was going to say, but I say that if the soldiers are to mark their ballots in Belgium and our friends here in Ottawa are to count them without any more restrictions or provisions for an honest count than are contained in this Bill, the soldiers will certainly not be getting what some of the speakers here to-night have held out as being given to them. I am not going to tell the House, for my hon. friend from Calgary has told us to-night how corrupt are the election transactions in the province that he and I come from, and how much more corrupt they are in other provinces. I ask you, Mr. Speaker, to take the hon. gentleman at his word. Only take him at his word, and then read the provisions of this Bill, and say what chance there would be for the man who voted in Flanders of having his vote counted against the Government in Canada. Why, this Bill is an inspiration! Fifty thousand votes to be collected and distributed throughout the various constituencies of Canada wherever they will do the most good! The possibilities are magnificent,, and no doubt they appeal to the brilliant imagination of my hon. friend from Calgary. I could easily imagine how industriously he worked on the terms of this Bill when I heard how enthusiastically he supported its provisions. Why, there would be nothing to an election with a Bill such as this in the hands of the Government. Will I deny that the electoral proceedings in my hon. friend's constituency are as corrupt as he said they were?

Mr. R. B. BENNETT: The hon. gentleman is mistaken. It was a Liberal returning officer, under the auspices of a Liberal Government, that opened this ballot box, not in the constituency of Calgary but in the adjoining one of Medicine Hat.

Mr. OLIVER: I do not wish to put on a variety entertainment in this House, following the lead of my hon. friend from Calgary, but I may say for the information of the House, seeing that he has been so very personal, that I was informed by the gentleman who had charge of the Liberal side of the campaign that, after my hon. friend was elected to this House from the constituency of Calgary, they sent out letters to 2,500 addresses on the voters' list, persons who had presumably supported my hon. friend, and they never got any replies.

Mr. R. B. BENNETT: The lists were prepared by the Liberals.

Mr. BLAIN: What was the majority?

Mr. BENNETT: The majority was 3,000.

Mr. OLIVER: My hon. friend knows whereof he speaks when he speaks of electoral corruption in Alberta.

Mr. BENNETT: No man has suffered more from it than myself.

Mr. OLIVER: I think that after hearing my hon. friend the House will bear me out when I make the suggestion that the hon. gentleman has suffered more from himself than from anybody else. My hon. friend made allusion to a paper which he held up and which he intimated was printed on a press owned and controlled by myself. It does not make any difference to the House, I presume, whether I owned or controlled the press or not, but for the information of the House I may say that I do not own or control the press nor have I had any control over it for some months past. I did have some interest in a German paper published in Edmonton, and I think my hon. friend had an interest in a German paper published in Calgary.

Mr. R. B. BENNETT: No.

Mr. OLIVER: I understood he had, but that the finanical results were something like the financial results in Edmonton, and that ultimately the connection ceased. It certainly did in my case, and I presume it was the same in his.

Mr. R. B. BENNETT: That is right. It was a Liberal paper in which I had $200 worth of stock, subscribed under misrepresentation and I lost every dollar.

Mr. OLIVER: So I lost mine.

Mr. BENNETT: The honours are easy.

Mr. OLIVER: Yes. I have laid the burden of establishing the position of the Government on the speech which the hon. member for Calgary delivered to the House. I am sorry I cannot restrict my allusions to the hon. member for Calgary. I said in the beginning of my remarks that this Bill was evidently intended as a partisan measure, introduced with a view to an impending election and that it was brought forward by the Government for the express purpose of unduly and improperly affecting that election. Is this Government above suspicion in matters of that kind? Is it unfair to make such a suggestion? I see that my hon. friend from Bruce (Mr. Clark) nods his head. Does he say it is?

Mr. HUGH CLARK: I am curious to know whether the hon. member thinks that the ballots that are marked in Flanders, in France, or in Germany will not be counted properly.

Mr. OLIVER: My hon. friend from Calgary has complained vociferously in regard to the mishandling of ballots in elections and I say that these same people will be the people who will handle the counting of the ballots from Flanders. I have no more reason to believe that that count will go straight than the count that my hon. friend has spoken of, assuming that what he said was true.

Mr. H. CLARK: He was speaking of elections controlled by Liberals.

Mr. OLIVER: That brings me about where I wanted to get. This election is being controlled by Conservatives, it is being controlled by this Government, and inasmuch as it is going to be controlled by this Government, it is going to be a square election and these men are going to have their ballots counted properly—is that what I am to understand?

Mr. H. CLARK: That is it.

Mr. OLIVER: What have we before the country to lead us to believe that the country is going to get a square deal at the hands of this Government?

Mr. H. CLARK: It will be controlled by British officers.

Mr. OLIVER: By what officers?

Mr. H. CLARK: British officers.

Mr. OLIVER: If my hon. friend will show me something in the Bill to say that it will not be controlled by Canadian officers perhaps there may be something in his argument, but we heard to-day that it was to be controlled by Canadian officers, and certainly it is only reasonable that it should be Canadian officers. I do not know that Canadian officers change their character very much because they become officers or because they are resident in Flanders instead of Canada. I am only taking the case as the hon. member for Calgary has put it. My hon. friend from Bruce must settle it with the hon. member for Calgary if he has any fault to find with my remarks. What right has this country to expect a square deal at elections or in anything at the hands of this Government? If this Government and party on the other side have any principle which they stand by, which they vociferate, it is the principle of loyalty to Britain. Is that right? How have they shown their loyalty to Britain? They have borrowed $50,000,000 from Britain for the purposes of war. What have they done with it? How have they used it? As soon as Parliament rose in August last, from end to end of Canada, the evidence is plain, their jackalls were turned loose, they were told to "go to it."

Mr. SPEAKER: Order. I am afraid the hon. gentleman is forgetting that it is the principle of this Bill that is under consideration at present.

Mr. OLIVER: My hon. friend from Bruce asked me a question. I was desirous of elaborating the point, and I wanted to show why the Government could not be trusted to count these ballots honestly. If I may proceed with all moderation; from the purchase of motor trucks to the purchase of hospital supplies, it is on the records that there has been nothing but graft and corruption from beginning to end. Is that loyalty? That is the kind of patriotism we are getting at the hands of this Government; that is the kind of honesty that we have been getting at the hands of this Government. If this Government cannot be trusted to buy bandages for sick soldiers at an honest price and of an honest quality, can they be trusted to count the votes cast in Flanders? I think not. If they cannot be trusted to buy boots that will keep the soldiers in fair condition, if their manufacturers supply leather doubled in order to make it strong instead of honest single leather; if they are able to charge from thirty cents to fifty cents per pair more for the boots supplied than they are worth, according to sworn evidence, and if the Government allows them to do that, is that the Government that is going to give us an honest count of these ballots? I say, no, and we do not expect it. The Government who sent their members of Parliament out to buy horses are the honest patriots who are going to count the votes of the soldiers in Flanders.

Mr. SPEAKER: I would like to say that the hon. member is offending against the rules in two particulars. One is that he is not discussing the principle of this Bill, and the other is that he is referring to matters in committee which are not reported to this House, and therefore cannot properly be referred to in this House.

Mr. OLIVER: I have concluded my remarks, and I beg to apologize for having offended.

Mr. WILLIAM F. NICKLE (Kingston): At this particular time I doubt if I should have made any remarks upon the principle of this measure, had it not been for the extreme, and to me as an easterner, the violent language of the hon. member for Edmonton (Mr. Oliver).

Mr. OLIVER: Might I ask if the hon. member was offended by the language used by the hon. member for Calgary (Mr. R. B. Bennett)?

Mr. NICKLE: To one coming from the East, that an hon. member of the House should describe a measure of this kind as a type of stealing and a type of electoral depravity or electoral villainy is certainly surprising. When a question of an election was mooted last autumn, my attention was then directed to the fact that complications might result if those who had gone and those who were going overseas had not an opportunity to vote. Coming from a city that has been for a century a military headquarters, a city that has sent more than its quota to this war, a city in which the number of electors who have gone to serve the Empire more than equals the average majority of any candidate ever elected, there, I felt it my duty to take into consideration whether some method could not be devised as to how those men might exercise their franchise. To-night I have listened with considerable interest to the speeches made on the other side of the House and as I have listened to the utterances from one hon. member opposite and then from another, I have been struck by the fact that they thoroughly failed to hang together in their arguments although the general tenor of their complaint is that this Bill should not pass. One offers one objection, another offers another, but all are in accord in saying: this measure should not become law.

The hon. member for St. John (Mr. Pugsley) in addressing the House, took the liberty of drawing our attention to the fact that in his judgement a Bill should have been passed at the last session in August by which the men who went overseas (before they left Canada), would have had an opportunity of voting for the Government or for the Opposition, and hardly had the echoes of his words ceased to resound through this Chamber than he made complaint that this Bill should not come into force because the men in the trenches would not have an opportunity of discussing the issues before the country and being advised on them. How in the world could the men who went to the front in August have an opportunity of considering the issues if they could not have that opportunity under this Bill? Let us take a broader view of the question. If there is one thing that has impressed us in this country more than another in regard to this war, it is the wonderful spontaneity of Canadians in volunteering for service. We had no conscription; we had no great military class; we had no militarism in the broad sense of the word; but we did have an appeal made to the citizens of this country that they should rally to their flag, to their King, and to their country, because we felt that this war meant much to Canada. I do not know how many of us were impressed by what the war might mean to the world at large, although it means much. We were, however, impressed by this fact, that no country in the world would be more affected by this war than the North American continent, because we never had conscription here, and we always had opportunities for individual liberty, and it followed surely, as the night the day, that if the Germans were successful conscription and militarism must for our future protection and safety be brought into force in this country. It is, therefore, I say, that the spontaneous response of our countrymen was praiseworthy

But, my hon. friends opposite say: Although our citizens responded liberally and well, we should not recognize that; because a man risks his life in the service of the State we should deprive him of the greatest civil right a man has—the right of expressing himself on the public questions affecting the well-being and good government of the State. Is not the greatest test of the zeal of the people for their country their willingness to do and die for the ideals and the principles they hold dear? If, then, men who have volunteered to go to the front are willing to risk their lives in this cause, why should those of us who stay at home be unwilling (should there be an election?) to give them an opportunity of voting upon national issues. It seems to me that if we are to properly recognize the worth of the men who have volunteered, we should be consistent and give to those who have gone to the front an opportunity to vote. It is quite true, as the hon. member for Calgary (Mr. Bennett) has said that all men may not take advantage of the opportunity, and that all men may not be in a position to vote. No one knows whether or when an election is to be held, and when the day comes it is quite possible that the men who are in Flanders to-day may not be in a position to vote; but those of us who stay at home, and who are reaping the advantage of the services which those men are giving at the front, those of us at least who are in Parliament, will have the satisfaction of saying: we did what we could to place the franchise at your disposal; if the exigencies of the war prevent your taking advantage of the opportunity, we regret it, but we did the very best we could.

Suppose this Bill were not to be passed look at the anomalies and incongruities that there are going to be. By section 157 of the Dominion Elections Act, every man who was a volunteer, no matter where he was in Canada, would be entitled to vote in the electoral district in which he had been living, provided he was on the list and could get there to vote. See what is going to happen from one end of Canada to the other. You are going to have a large number of volunteers who would have the right to vote, but who could only vote provided they could return to the place whence they came. Where would there be discipline then? The men who came from Vancouver might be in Halifax; the men who came from Winnipeg might be at Petawawa, and are all those men to be returned to their homes? If that were so, then for a month the military camps of Canada would be in a turmoil.

Section 159 provides that even though a man were not on the electoral list he should be entitled to vote provided his not being on the list resulted from the fact that he was engaged in active service when the list was prepared. In other words, the man who has been in active service abroad, on returning to Canada would be entitled to go to the deputy returning officer and swear in his vote. The man in Canada who had not gone abroad, though his name were on the list and by the provision of the Ontario law, there is a form of registration that would permit many men to go on the list by virtue of a friend making the necessary affidavit that he is a British subject, and has been twelve months in Ontario, and three months in the district—could qualify and vote. But the men who have actually faced the enemy, the men who have been in the shadow of death, are to be deprived of their votes, being unable to vote in person because of the miles of water between England and Canada. That struck me as radically unfair, and the question pressed itself upon me: how are these men to vote? There were various ways by which it might be done, and a number of ways were suggested in the committee. In the opinion of the Minister of Justice the way provided in this Bill is the best that can be devised and it seems to me a fair and reasonable solution of the difficulty.

I cannot see eye to eye with the hon. member for Edmonton (Mr. Oliver) who insinuates that men who are fighting in the shadow of eternity are going to do corrupt and iniquitous things. I know nothing about his western electoral methods, but I do know there are honourable officers at the front, men who would discharge their sacred duty—for so it is—of performing with honesty their part in the electoral machinery of Canada and who would, when required, see to it that the soldiers who came before them had the opportunity to mark their ballots as they desire without fear and free from intimidation. And these ballots, having been marked and properly enclosed in an envelope, would be sent forward to the Clerk of the Crown in Chancery, without interference and without irregularity. I am satisfied that once these ballots reach that officer there would be no difficulty whatever in elaborating plans that would prevent any irregularity in regard to the votes being received by deputy returning officers and counted. If the hon. member for Edmonton is sincere, and if he is willing to facilitate the measure, why does he not admit the principle, and, then when the Bill comes to Committee of the Whole it will be a simple thing to insert a provision that when the Clerk of the Crown in Chancery sends the ballots forward to the deputy returning officer, notice should be sent to each candidate of that fact, and the ballots should be on receipt sealed with the seals of the candidates, and not opened until both candidates or their agents are present to see them counted. There is no difficulty in working out the machinery if you want to work it out, but there is great difficulty if you do not want to secure results.

I believe hon. gentlemen opposite are not sincere in their opposition to this Bill. I am one who has not always supported the party to which I belong, but I do believe that in a great measure of this sort, where recognition is being given to a class of people who are willing to risk their lives for a principle which they hold dear, we should set to one side party politics, get down to realities, and try to draft a measure that would prevent fraud, and that the men who are at the front would realize that there is no politics in being a soldier, but that every soldier, being a volunteer and a free man, should have the right to exercise his franchise, and that in joining the King's colours he did not take from himself that which we all hold most dear, the right to express himself by his vote on the conduct of his country's affairs.

Mr. W. M. GERMAN (Welland): My hon. friend from Kingston (Mr. Nickle) spoke of himself as one who has not always been in accord with the policy of his party and yet was in favour of this Bill. I feel it incumbent on me, being one who has not always been in accord with the policy of his party, to declare myself as absolutely opposed to this Bill. I am not opposed to it because it is introduced by this Government; I would be equally opposed to it if it were introduced by the right hon. leader of the Opposition (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) were he Prime Minister. My reasons for being opposed to the Bill may not be exactly those expressed thus far in the discussion. I do think the right hon. Prime Minister (Sir Robert Borden) has been too inflammable, if I may use that expression, during this session of Parliament. He began the session with a threat that if we on this side of the House dared—he did not use the word "dare," but that was the effect of his suggestion—to criticise the policy of the Government, he would carry the attack into our ranks and show that we were no better than they. I do not think that that made for unity of purpose at this particular crisis of the affairs of the Empire. To-night he has reiterated that proposition, saying that he had no knowledge at present that there would be an election in the near future, but the action of the Opposition tended to show that they were carrying a chip on their shoulder and rather wanted to have an election. The effect of an election upon me personally is not of the slightest interest; but in its effect upon the people of this country I think an election during the progress of this war would be a catastrophe. I would suggest to the Prime Minister that if he wants to go down in history as one of Canada's greatest statesmen, and one of the Empire's biggest men, he should now declare that during the progress of this war, so far as he is concerned and so far as his leadership of the Conservative party goes, there will be no election until this war is over. I can assure him that a proposition of this kind, emanating from him, will make for him more friends in the province of Ontario than any other course he could pursue, for the people of the province of Ontario, at least ninety per cent of them, irrespective of politics, do not want an election—of that I am absolutely certain. What were we on this side to do or to consider? Last fall we heard threats and talk of an election.

Mr. SPEAKER: I would remind the hon. member that the question before the House is the second reading of a Bill and not the question of an election.

Mr. GERMAN: Mr. Speaker, I will keep as close to the subject of debate as I can, and if I encroach upon the rules in the remarks I am making, I will go no further, except to say this, that, unless there is to be an election before another session of Parliament, there is no necessity for this Bill. If there is to be another session before an election, then, next session, if it is thought necessary that the soldiers abroad should have votes, let us get together and devise some scheme whereby they can have votes under all safeguards, which parties on both sides of the House will agree to.

The fact that this Bill is introduced at the present time and that the term of this Parliament will not expire until September, 1916, would lead one to believe that an election will take place before another session of Parliament is held. We are led to believe that there will be an election this summer, and that that is the object of the Government's bringing forward this legislation. That being the case—and we can draw no other conclusion—why am I opposed to this Bill? Because it is founded on sentiment, not on sense, and, if worked out at all, it will be worked out in absolute ignorance on the part of the voters, and with an entire absence of good results. Sentiment enters into the actions of most people, but in a case of this kind it seems to me that we should be governed by something more than sentiment.

It has been urged that we would be well advised if we should follow the example of New Zealand in the matter of legislation of this kind. I quite agree with the hon. member for Edmonton that the New Zealand Bill was passed for quite another purpose. The New Zealand elections were announced early in November last, and the elections were held on December 10. On December 24, notwithstanding the fact that the parties in the New Zealand Legislature were pretty evenly divided, the votes cast by the soldiers had not been returned to New Zealand. If the soldiers who voted in Egypt were given the privilege of voting in order that they might decide the political situation, surely the votes would have been returned to New Zealand long before they were. Whether or not they have yet been returned, I do not know. The London Times gives the bald fact that about 10,000 New Zealanders voted in Egypt, but on December 24 those votes had not been returned to New Zealand, so that they were of no use in deciding the political contest between the parties in that Overseas Dominion.

The people of Canada during the past winter have been striving unitedly and energetically to raise an enormous patriotic fund. Every person in Canada, from one end of it to the other has been striving to the best of his ability, energy and influence to assist in the establishing of a patriotic fund to support the families of the brave men from Canada who have gone to the front. That work is still going on, and will continue until this cruel war is over. Let us assume that there is an election in June, as there may be, or that there is to be an election before the war is over, as there is likely to be, judging by the fact that this Bill has been introduced. Suppose that in a close constituency one representative is returned by the vote of the resident people, and at five o'clock on the eve of election day the residential vote declares a certain man elected. That night or the next day the vote of the soldiers is counted, and that count reverses the verdict.

Mr. WILCOX: How can it be counted the next day?

Mr. GERMAN: It is counted after the poll is closed; it cannot be counted before.

Mr. ROGERS: All votes are counted after the poll is closed.

Mr. GERMAN: All votes are counted after the poll is closed, but the vote of the soldiers is not counted until after the residential vote is counted. I was assuming that in several counties the residential vote should declare one way and the soldiers' vote, sent from Belgium, Flanders or Germany, should change the result of the election while the war is in progress. Would any hon. gentleman say that that would tend to make for unity of thought and harmony of action in the constituency concerned in the matter of the raising of funds to care for the families of the soldiers who are abroad? From the county of Welland about 600 brave men have gone to the front. We in the county of Welland are loyally, faithfully and industriously doing our duty to look after the families of these men, and intend to continue doing so. I am not afraid of the vote of the young men who have left the county of Welland, but assuming that, in some other county, changes are made by reason of the votes which are cast by the soldiers, I say that the condition which would bring about that result is a wrong principle to introduce into the policy of this country at a time when a great war is raging and when every man's mind and heart and soul and interest and industry should be centered on one object: the success of the allied troops and the maintenance of British supremacy. The soldiers at the front cannot possibly know the issues that will be involved in the election. Further, the personal equation in elections counts for a good deal. I do not think that the right hon. the Prime Minister or the right hon. the leader of he Opposiion should arrogate the vote of the people exclusively to themselves, or to the parties which they represent. Very frequently votes are cast for the representative himself; often the personal equation enters into the election contest more strongly, perhaps, than the policy of a party. How can the man at the front know for whom he is voting? He has to vote for a Government, or an Opposition, or an independent candidate. He does not know who will represent him in Parliament. Probably if he knew the Government candidate he would not vote for him; probably if he knew the Opposition candidate, though the voter might be a Liberal, he would not vote for him, thinking that the candidate would not be fitted to represent him and his views in Parliament. I contend that the soldier under these conditions would vote in absolute ignorance of the situation. I defy any gentleman in this House to say that any soldier has ever asked to have a vote. The Minister of Justice was asked a question in that respect, which he has not yet answered. Will the Prime Minister, if he can, state one instance in which the soldiers have asked that they be allowed to vote. They are going to the front to fight the battles of Canada and of the British Empire. They are not thinking about votes half so much as the politicians are thinking about giving them votes. I trust that the politicians are not thinking about controlling the votes after the ballots have been marked. I would not accuse any one of that. But, at this time, when this war is in progress, I say leave this over until another session of Parliament. Then, when we meet together, if the soldiers are still in the trenches and it is thought necessary that they should have votes, let us get together and devise a scheme whereby they can vote intelligently, vote under proper protection, and I for one will aid in that purpose as well as in any other purpose which I consider to be to the advantage of Canada. But at the present time I am opposed to the idea of an election, I am opposed to the idea of flinging the soldiers into the arena of politics, I am opposed to the proposition of bringing about a contention in this country that will break the harmony which now prevails and the unity which now exists. I say, let us go on with one heart, one hope and one endeavour to reach if possible that wealth of freedom which British victory will secure.

Mr. A. C. MACDONELL (South Toronto): Just a word, because I realize that the hour is late and much has been said. One cannot have heard the discussion that has taken place on this Bill and read the Bill without being conscious that this committee has laboured long and faithfully to bring about a result which would be agreeable to this House and to the country. The committee was a non-partisan committee. It was open for any hon. gentleman or anybody else to appear before it and give his views, and apparently until this Bill was brought into this House and the second reading was asked for, the committee made no objection nor was there any difference in the opinion of the committee in regard to the measure now before the House. Where are the hon. gentlemen who represented the Opposition in the House on this committee? They are not here to-night. There has been no complaint from these hon. gentlemen, there has been no minority report, there has been nothing except the appearance of perfect harmony with respect to the provisions of this Bill. I quite approve of all that has been said upon the line of the desirability of observing perfect neutrality in a matter of this kind, and I second the sentiment expressed by the hon. gentleman who has just sat down (Mr. German), that there should be but one heart and one sentiment and one will behind this war. I say that this very Bill will do all that we can do that we have not already done in the matter of giving our soldiers who are at the front heart and courage and encouragement of all kinds from this House and from this country. What are we doing? Are these men aliens? They certainly are not, they are British subjects, 99 out of 100 probably are Canadian citizens; and all that this Bill provides is that they shall have the right to vote. Does any hon. gentleman in this House believe now that they are not entitled to vote? Because nine out of ten of them are on the list already. The Bill does not go as far as I would like to see. Personally I would like to see it give every man who is fighting a vote whether he be of age or under age. If he is a man performing the functions of a man for our country and our Empire he should have a vote. But the Bill has stopped short at men of 21 years of age and only those vote. What good purpose can be served by putting any impediment or barrier in the way of these men voting?

The hon. gentleman who has just sat down agreed with the spirit and principle of the Bill. His opinion is apparently that this is not the time or the opportunity to deal prudently and in a cool and deliberate manner with it. His opinion is that there should be a Bill of this kind at another session. Then, of course, if a Bill of this kind is at any time passed either at this session or at a future session, it must be in contemplation of an election, otherwise it is useless waste paper. A Bill of this kind, if passed, must contemplate its being used in the election. If one were to look for any reason why the Opposition in this House is opposed to this Bill it would be very difficult to find any concrete argument that has been made by any of these hon. gentlemen either individually or as a whole. The hon. gentleman who has just sat down is in favour of the principle of the Bill and would favour passing it at another session. The hon. member for Edmonton (Mr. Oliver) says: Oh, yes, let us pass this Bill but only in so far as it will apply to soldiers who have not gone to the war. I understood that to be his argument.

Mr. OLIVER: Oh, no, I do not wish to be understood in that way at all. My objection to the Bill was that the provisions in regard to the soldiers who had not gone to the front were not suitable to the case; that they lent themselves absolutely to improper handling.

Mr. MACDONELL: It comes to the same thing very largely, he would give votes to those who have not gone to the war if that were done then when they went to war some provision of this kind would have to be made giving them a vote.

Mr. OLIVER: I do not object to those who have gone to the war having votes, but I wish to see proper safeguards as to the method of voting.

Mr. MACDONELL: That comes down to the great body and burden of opinion on the opposite side; it is a matter of detail. Everything that has been said by way of criticism on the second reading of this Bill could be dealt with and properly dealt with in Committee of the Whole, if the hon. gentlemen who are expressing these opinions are honest and sincere with them. But we find, that a good deal of criticism on this Bill comes from those who see evil in it. We know the old motto, evil be to him who evil thinks, "Honi soit qui mal y pense." That might very well be applied to much of what has been said against this Bill. I wish to point out what is known to hon. gentlemen in this House, that of all classes of the community who poll their votes faithfully the soldiers stand at the top of the list. I know of no element or part of the community that values its vote more than the military, either the regular soldiers or the volunteers. But we find that in a measure and in a certain sense this very principle is now adopted and applied. As has been said by the right hon. leader of the Opposition, there is no Franchise Act now in Canada as a whole. There was one, but there is none now. Each province has its own law. In the month of June, when the registration for the voters' lists takes place for Dominion or Provincial purposes, if the soldiers are in camp, as they frequently are in that month, they register themselves by the thousands simply by making affidavits very similar in principle to the affidavit called for by this very Bill, or by having comrades make affidavits on their behalf, so that they are now advanced to at least one-half of the privileges which this Bill gives them, they have, by the law of Ontario—and I fancy this is fairly general throughout the Dominion—the right to register although they are not at the place of registration, in the way I have indicated. What is the use of talking about qualifications nowadays and saying this Bill provides no qualifications? We all know that manhood suffrage to-day prevails throughout Canada and that is all that this Bill contemplates. Every man of 21 years of age who is a British subject and resident a certain time in any community is entitled to vote. So we are by this Bill merely giving manhood suffrage, which is the law to-day practically throughout Canada, to the people who are now entitled to vote, and the only difference between what the law is now and what it will be after this Bill becomes law is that those who are away on active service shall be permitted by some lawful means to transmit a vote into the ballot box and have it counted on election day. The hon. member for Edmonton was very apprehensive about corruption. He was one of those who saw bogies everywhere. But I should like to point out to him that under this Bill the ballot papers will be sent by the Clerk of the Crown in Chancery to the office of the Canadian High Commissioner in London, who in turn will send them to the proper officer or officers who will give the necessary papers to each volunteer entitled to vote. Every safeguard has been provided for, from the time the ballots leave Ottawa until they get back. Every precaution has been taken for ensuring secrecy. The hon. member for Welland (Mr. German) was was anxious as to the counting of the votes afterwards, and he referred to the case of New Zealand. In New Zealand the votes did not arrive for some days after the poll was held. But no such condition could arise under this Bill, for it provides that the votes shall be counted on polling day. I should be very sorry to see what the hon. member for Welland has in his mind's eye, namely, the civilians voting one way and the soldiers another. The people of this country are all one, whether soldiers or civilians. Nine-tenths of the soldiers are civilians anyway, who have gone to fight for the Empire from patriotic and manly motives. They will come back to their ordinary vocations with the honours and prestige that attach to men who have been engaged in a noble cause for their country in time of need. The hon. member for Bruce (Mr. H. Clark) reminds me that every vote has the same value whether it is a civilian's or a soldier's. The vote of the civilian should be worth 100 per cent, and so should the vote of the soldier; and the soldier's vote will be worth 100 per cent under this Bill. A great deal has been said to-night about liberties, British institutions, democracy and so forth. But where would democracy be if it were not for the soldiers who are fighting the battles of the country at the front? Who, I ask, is entitled to greater consideration at the present time than these men who are preserving the liberties and freedom of this country? And I am referring not only to our own soldiers, but to the men from all parts of the Empire, the Old Country included. It seems to me that if the soldiers of any part of the Empire are entitled to a vote or to any great consideration it is the soldiers who have gone from Canada. I do not desire to belittle the efforts of men who have gone to the front from other parts of the overseas dominions, but Canada, of all the dominions, is the only one that has no material interest in this war. Her only interest is loyalty to the Empire and to herself. All the other dominions have as neighbours German colonies by which they have been menaced, and it is only natural to expect that after the war these German colonies will form part of the nearby British Dominions. It is quite possible anyway. But the soldiers of Canada have gone from loyalty to the Empire and to Canada, loyalty to liberty and to everything that is right and proper in mankind.

On referring to my notes I am afraid I have attributed a remark to the hon. member for Edmonton (Mr. Oliver) which was made by the hon. member for St. John (Mr. Pugsley). I think it was the hon. member for St. John who was in favour of giving a vote to the soldiers who hereafter go to the war, but not to the soldiers who have already gone. What are we to make of this patchwork of opinions from the Opposition side of the House? One hon. gentleman says they should all have votes, another says that none of them should have votes, another says give half of them votes. What harmony is there in that? I think some of the criticisms of the right hon. gentleman who leads the Opposition were trifling, if he will permit me to say so. One great objection that he had was that we were creating a franchise. I can recollect as a boy, and my right hon. friend can recollect better than I can, when we had a whole week's open vote at election time. Was it desirable to change that practice? I think so. And shall we not change our practice from time to time as democracy progresses? Are we to stick forever to a certain method of voting? Surely not. Suppose that we are creating a franchise, which I deny, what evil is there in that? I see no harm in it. I do not think my right hon. friend's objection will appeal to many hon. gentlemen in this House or out of it. Then he likened the soldiers to railwaymen or fishermen or lumbermen whose vocations take them away from home, but who have a permanent residence and a vote in Canada. I should like to point out to my right hon. friend that these men he speaks of are all entitled to vote; they can return to their homes on election day. But the soldier cannot do that, and that is just the difference between the two classes. Another reason that the right hon. gentleman gave for not giving soldiers votes was that they were being well treated already, and he pointed out that they were to have pensions. Surely every civilized country in the world treats its soldiers well, and gives them pensions. That is not an over-humane act. Surely it is the least we can do. I do not think that the people of this country will consider that in giving votes to the soldiers we are treating them magnanimously.

So far as I can sum up the opposition to this Bill it is this: hon. gentlement opposite trust nobody, not even the soldiers. They are afraid that the soldier will not exercise his franchise with that secrecy and propriety which is ordinarily required in the polling of votes. As I have pointed out, the Bill provides a complete chain of safeguards from the time the ballots leave the office of the Clerk of the Crown in Chancery until they return to Ottawa. No reasonable objection has yet been made. The Bill is founded on motives of propriety, and I believe the people of this country will demand it. Furthermore, I believe that the soldiers who have left the country understood that they were going to be given an opportunity to vote; so that in passing this Bill we are doing no more than carrying out the spirit of what was generally believed to be an implied agreement entered into between the public of this country and the men who are fighting at the front. That is, that they shall have every good treatment that can be given to them and an opportunity of voting was certainly considered to be something that they would enjoy. I appeal to hon. gentlemen to pass this Bill and to do the proper thing. If there is any detail of the Bill that can be improved the time and place to do it is in committee. Let the Bill leave committee in such shape that it will be agreed to by both parties and I believe it will meet with the approval of every person in the country.

Mr. E. M. MACDONALD (Pictou): Mr. Speaker, my hon. friend (Mr. Macdonell) has made reference to some hon. gentlemen on this side of the House who were members of the committee who considered this measure. I do not know that I would have risen were it not that my hon. friend the junior member for Halifax (Mr. A. K. Maclean) desired me to say, owing to the fact that he was called away this morning, that he did not consider this measure as it was submitted to the House a proper solution of the problem as to how the soldiers should have their votes polled and that had he been here he would have voted against the measure along those lines. It is a very peculiar measure. In the face of the greatest war that was ever waged, in view of the demands that are being made upon every citizen in the Empire and upon every man with a drop of British blood in his veins, hon. gentlemen on the other side of the House turn aside from the consideration of their responsibilities as British citizens, and as having to do with the Government of Canada, and the part which Canada has to play in this Empire, and sit down and try to devise some method by which votes may be polled. This is purely an election measure. There is no precedent for it. The idea that a Government should provide for going into another country where the enemy are engaging in battle with our sons to hold a poll has never been suggested anywhere. You will search the history of England in vain to find any precedent for the action which is now being taken. We are having this done here for the first time. Were it not for the fact that hon. gentlemen are intending to have an election we would not have this Bill before us at all. You see it on the face of the Bill itself. The first section creates a franchise and the second provides that the Clerk of the Crown in Chancery, shall immediately send to the office of the High Commissioner in Great Britain a certain number of ballots. It says that he shall send them right off and, the language being peremptory, this is a duty imposed upon the Clerk of the Crown in Chancery which he must immediately fulfil. Why is it that we are to have an election? The right hon. Prime Minister (Sir Robert Borden) intimated that because of the conduct of the Opposition, because we ventured to criticise the Government in connection with the purchase of boots, and because of something that was happening in the Public Accounts Committee, although he had not thought about an election he was now thinking about it. Since the 16th day of February I have been sitting in the committee appointed for the purpose of investigating the supply of boots to the soldiers but I am not sitting in that committee on account of any action on the part of hon. gentlemen on this side of the House. It is on account of the right hon. gentleman's own action. He moved the committee and declared it to be necessary. Therefore, why should he complain? If things come out in that committee why should he complain about it? Does he suggest that the hon. gentlemen who happen to compose that committee are to sit there and register his decrees in regard to the question which the committee has to deal, that we are to cease to perform our functions as members of Parliament and members of that committee? Why? Hon. gentlemen behind him were deliberating as to how, in the midst of this great war there could be some political scheme devised in regard to votes and that is why they were not doing anything in regard to boots or criticising anything that had been done.

My right hon. friend intimated on the day that the address was debated on the opening of this session of Parliament that every hon. member of this House and the country at large were entitled to the fullest information with regard to all expenditures of a military character. When, adopting his own suggestion, there were referrered to the Public Accounts Committee expenditures for military purposes, my right hon. friend proclaims that because hon. gentlemen have been performing their duties as members of Parliament they have been doing something which is trespassing upon the position which the Government occupy and doing something which warrant my right hon. friend, in the face of this war, in plunging this country into a general election. There is not much use in discussing the question of where he personally stands upon this matter of a general election. Every one who has been through an election knows that these things are in the hands of the fates.

But if my right hon. friend wants to divide up this country, if he wants to stop recruiting, if he wants to stay the hand of generosity, if he wants to chill the response to the appeals which are being made to the patriotism of our people in every part of the country, if he wants to paralyse the efforts of those who are trying to do all they can for Belgium and the wives and children of the men who have gone to the front, if he wants to turn the people in every hamlet from the peaceful avocations which they have undertaken for the purpose of doing their part in dealing with the situation and doing their duty to the Empire, he will bring about this internecine struggle which will have as a result the tearing asunder of the good feeling which exists and which is contributing so greatly to the cause that all British subjects have so much at heart—if, I say, my right hon. friend wants to do these things he can get offended at what was done in the Public Accounts Committee and the Boots Committee.

My right hon. friend does not respond to the appeal which was made by my hon. friend from Welland (Mr. German) and he foregoes the opportunity of putting himself on record as being the big man in this country. The time will come when the people will estimate him at his true worth. It is because there has been all this talk about a general election that we have this Bill. The second clause provides that the Clerk of the Crown in Chancery shall send ballots across the ocean at once for that particular reason. What is the use of discussing the abstract question as to whether soldiers should have votes or not in the way in which the hon. member for Calgary (Mr. Bennett) did? The soldier who is a citizen of this country has a right to vote; there can be no question about that. Who can question that, and why should we take up the time with platitudes about Parliament wanting to provide for his voting? But this fantastic measure of the hon. Minister of Justice (Mr. Doherty) is another thing altogether. There is a great deal of difference between the abstract proposition that a soldier who is a citizen of this country should have a vote and the method by which the Minister of Justice proposes to enable him to vote. In the first place, this measure is altogether so unique in its character, having regard to the war situation, that one might well ask that why is it that over in the Imperial Parliament, which is sitting just now, we have never heard that the great statesmen who are considering this war problem have proposed any scheme by which the men who live in the British Islands, and who are now across the channel fighting for the Empire, shall record their votes in a general election? Why is it that we have never heard of it? Nobody has ever suggested the possibility of it. Therefore, why is this measure introduced at all? If we are not going to have a general election, as my hon. friend from Welland says, we do not need this Bill.

If we are going to have a general election, then the soldiers are entitled to vote if their votes can be recorded under proper safeguards and under proper conditions. Parliament since Confederation has time and again taken up days and weeks and months deliberating questions of the franchise and of the proper method of safeguarding the manner in which the voting of this country shall be carried on. My hon. friend proposes to dispose of those safeguards with one fell swoop. It does not matter to him that we have no regard to what Parliament has done in the past, whereby even in the quiet hamlets of this country it has provided for the greatest possible secrecy and honesty in polling. He says: We are going to provide a scheme here absolutely unique and novel in its character, because we want a general election, and we are going to have this measure passed whether you like it or not; if you say anything, you are disloyal and you do not want the soldiers to vote. This was the text of my hon. friend from Calgary (Mr. Bennett) to-night. If it was not, I do not know the English language. It is time that full-grown men in this country, who have reached the position of being representatives of the people, should give up reiterating in this House speeches which they make only in localities where they presume upon the ignorance of the audience they are addressing. If they would make fewer of such speeches and more attempts to consider cold facts, instead of hurling across the floor from time to time taunts that hon. gentlemen on this side are disloyal, because we do not see eye to eye with them on every proposition they may bring forward, it would be better for the dignity of this Parliament and more for the honour of this country, and, as British citizens and parliamentarians, we would have more pride in ourselves if we looked at questions in that way. That is the way in which I would like to look at this proposition to-night. Shall our soldiers who are fighting for their country have an opportunity of exercising their franchise? I say, yes, if you can provide honest and proper methods by which those votes can be dropped into the ballot box, without disarranging the whole electoral machinery of this country, without violating all the canons of the election law, without disregarding every principle which has characterized British parliamentary Government ever since we have had parliamentary government. Why was it that in the days of the Crimean war, and during all the various wars of the last three-quarters of a century, the English Parliament never passed a measure of this character? My hon. friend the Minister of Justice this afternoon read the provisions of a measure which he said had passed the second reading in the English Parliament, and he went on to say that because that Parliament was so busy the measure was never heard of again. If that is the way in which the statesmen who guide this Empire carry on its affairs, it is time we found it out. If they are too busy to pass measures of the greatest possible importance in the interests of the country, then they are not performing their duty. My hon. friend the Minister of Justice knows full well that that is not the reason, and that the reason why the measure was not passed is because the mature judgment of the Imperial Parliament in considering this question was that it was absolutely impracticable. I presume this Bill will pass from its second reading to the Committee of the Whole, in which each one of the details can be discussed; but the hon. member for Kingston (Mr. Nickle), who discussed this matter with his usual earnestness, appealed to the House to do one thing —to put the Canadian people in the position of saying: Although we do not expect that any of these votes will ever be recorded in Flanders, or Belgium, or Germany, we shall be able to say that we did what we could to give our soldiers an opportunity to vote. That is a very nice thing to be able to say; but let me point out that, if we have any responsibility here as public men, when we are endeavouring to place upon the statute books of this country any measure dealing with such an important question as amending the Dominion Election Act, we are not doing so because we want to be able to say to some one else that we tried to do the best for them, although we could not effect anything. If we cannot put on the statute books a measure that is absolutely workable in every respect, having in it all those safeguards which Parliament in previous years has always regarded as being absolutely essential to the proper recording of votes in this country, what is the sense of putting a measure on the statute-book which will enable us to say we did what we could?

Mr. MACDONELL: Is the hon. member in favour of the principle of the Bill?

Mr. MACDONALD: I am in favour of giving votes to our soldiers if we can provide the proper means of doing so and the proper safeguards. This measure does not offer a possible, even a plausible condition by which that can be done. When we come to discuss the question in its details, the anomalies and difficulties in regard to the measure can be very readily pointed out. Therefore it seems to me that we are discussing on the second reading, not the details of the measure, because they will be discussed later on, but the wisdom and the advisability of putting on the statute-books in this year of grace, 1915, this peculiar legislation which has never before seen the light in all the long past of the parliamentary government of this Empire. This legislation should not be put upon the statute-book, because the right hon. gentleman, who is responsible to the people of this country for the advice which he gives His Royal Highness, knows as well as I do that if he throws Canada into the throes of an election contest, he produces a condition under which will be utterly destroyed all those feelings of unity and of devotion to the flag which today animate the Canadian people to a greater degree than ever before in our long history. He will stop recruiting; he will disarrange all the conditions, and of course he will have to take the responsibility. It is because my right hon. friend is thinking of having an election that we have this measure. If he were not thinking of having an election, we would not have this Bill at all, and therefore, I say on the second reading of this Bill that it is totally unnecessary, utterly uncalled for and without the slightest justification. When it passes to the Committee of the Whole, as I assume it will, I shall be prepared to discuss the details, and point out at greater length what seem to me to be the anomalies of this measure, but do not let it be understood that hon. gentlemen on this side are opposed to any man who happens to wear the King's uniform having a vote.

Mr. MEIGHEN: You have said so several times.

Mr. MACDONALD: Who has?

Mr. MEIGHEN: The hon. member for Red Deer (Mr. Clark).

Mr. MACDONALD: The hon. member for Red Deer can speak for himself in regard to that.

Mr. MEIGHEN: My hon. friend is trying to speak for him.

Mr. MACDONALD: My hon. friend from Red Deer, if I understood him aright, pointed out the anomalies of the men who are fighting in the trenches in Flanders going and recording their vote, and he said that they should follow Kitchener's principle. He argued that the men in Flanders were thinking more of fighting the Germans than of voting.

Mr. GERMAN: The hon. member for Red Deer has a son in the trenches.

Mr. A. A. McLEAN: In the garrisons at Halifax, Sydney and Canso, there are something like 1,200 men, 300 of whom come from Charlottetown and Prince Edward Island generally, and four or five hundred from New Brunswick.

These men cannot leave the garrison to go to vote. They are farmers' sons, many of them men of substance in their several provinces. Would it be just or right to deprive these men of the franchise?

Mr. MACDONALD: These men will not be deprived of their franchise unless my hon. friend's leader wants to bring on an election this year. My hon. friend the casuist from Portage la Prairie, the Solicitor General (Mr. Meighen), will hardly be able to distort the remarks of the hon. member for Red Deer (Mr. Michael Clark) into an intimation of a policy on the part of the Liberal party to prevent the soldiers from having votes. As to that, I wish to say that the hon. gentleman belongs to the school on the other side whose particular business seems to be to throw out imputations on the score of loyalty and patriotism. I do think that, as the rising hope of the Conservative party, as he is, he ought to be a little more ambitious to rise to higher lines than to indulge in such claptrap as that which, if he must use it, should be used only in the backwoods of his constituency. It is not worthy of the hon. gentleman.

Mr. SPEAKER: I think it is out of order to speak of the utterance of an hon. member as unworthy.

Mr. MACDONALD: Mr Speaker, of course I bow to your ruling in regard to that; but I would point out that the language which one has to use to characterize actions of that kind must be more vigorous than ornate. I reiterate that, as I understand the views of hon. gentlemen on this side of the House, we hold this measure as entirely unnecessary, unless hon. gentlemen opposite are going to have an election. That is the preliminary question at the basis of this whole measure. The soldiers who are abroad, like the soldiers who are at home, as Canadian citizens should have votes, if those votes can be recorded with due regard to the safeguards which are thrown around elections in this country. And this Bill does not provide such safeguards.

Mr. W. F. KAY (Missisquoi): It is not my intention at this late hour to occupy much of the time of the House, but I feel it to be my duty to express my reasons for opposing this Bill. Let me say at once, I am strongly in favour of giving the soldiers votes, but I am in favour of giving them votes when they come back victorious from France and Germany. As has been said, if this Government does not intend to have an election, there is absolutely no need for this Bill. If we grant that, we must acknowledge that this is nothing but a political measure. It is offered here with the idea of winning votes in this country from the friends and relatives of the soldiers at the front; it is offered here with the idea of affording the Government party from one end of the country to the other an opportunity to go forth and wave the flag as they have done so often before. I do not like to impute motives of this kind against any Government, but I consider it perfectly clear that this Government are glad that we are opposing this Bill. We have evidence of that from the gentlemen on the other side who have already spoken, because, without exception they have accused the members of the Opposition of being opposed to the principle of a vote for the soldiers. We on this side have without exception stated that we are not opposed to the soldiers voting but that we are opposed to the provisions of this Bill which do not safeguard the secrecy of the ballot or the rights of the voters.

It is possible, in fact it is probable, that if this war should continue, I myself shall be at the front. I have already offered my services to Colonel Baker when he was forming the 5th Mounted Rifles, and although I was not accepted, I should like to say to the Minister of Militia that at any time he requires my services or would like them, they are absolutely at his disposal. I have had some experience in military life, and I feel perfectly sure that if I ever land in the trenches, be it in Belgium, or France, or Germany, the very last thing I shall want to bother my mind about will be an election in Canada. Like the men who are there now I shall have on my mind greater things than that. Those men are busy day and night in defence of this country, in defence of this Empire. They will not have time or disposition to read party literature, or to hear political discussions from their officers; nor will their officers if they fulfil their duty, have time to collect ballots or discuss politics with the soldiers.

Mr. EDWARDS: If this Bill passes, will the soldiers have to vote?

Mr. KAY: I should imagine, Sir, that under some of the officers, they would.

Mr. EDWARDS: Perhaps the hon. gentleman would name some of those officers. If I may be permitted, I should like to say that an hon. gentleman who would cast a slur like that upon officers ought to be willing to name them.

Mr. KAY: As I was saying I feel that if I get over there, I shall not care one jot whether this Government is returned or whether this Government is defeated. I shall expect if I am there, that this Government will do its duty to this country as I shall be doing mine.

I shall not expect them to waste their time in the political strife which would be involved in a general election. They will have quite enough to do if they devote their energies and abilities to carrying out the tremendous task which is now imposed upon them; if they direct their energies towards seeing that contracts are honestly and faithfully carried out and that the evildoers, grafters, and political heelers have no opportunity of wrongfully obtaining the money of the people of Canada.

I am not in favour of the details of this Bill; I do not think that the proposed method of obtaining the votes of the soldiers is such as to carry out the objects of the promotors of the Bill. When this Bill is considered in committee, its details may be more fully discussed. If the right hon. Prime Minister is sincere in the remarks which he made to-day with regard to voting by the soldiers, why does he not declare that there shall not be an election until the war is over, or until the term of the present Parliament expires? If he should do this, he would show his absolute sincerity; he would give evidence of the fact that he puts his country above his party, and that he really believes that the soldier should have a vote. I quite fail to see how, under this Bill, the soldiers would be enabled to vote for any particular representative. It is all very well to say: vote for the Government or vote for the Opposition; but it should be remembered that many voters vote not for the party, but for the man. There is no hurry for the passing of this Bill. The Prime Minister has said to-night that an election has not been decided upon; that the matter has not been discussed. I think it would be reasonable, therefore, to expect the Prime Minister to explain to this House how it is that he allows the hon. Minister of Justice to bring down a Bill which can only have in view the holding of an election this year.

Mr. H. H. McLEAN (Sunbury and Queens): I do not intend at this late hour to take up the time of the House by restating the arguments that have been advanced in favour of the principle of this Bill, or in giving at length the reasons why I am in favour of votes for soldiers. I wish simply to place myself on record as being strongly in favour of votes for soldiers. When the Bill is under consideration in committee, I shall be able to discuss its provisions at greater length, and, perhaps, to go fully into the details of the Bill.

Mr. W. S. LOGGIE (Northumberland, N.B.): I wish to endorse what has been said by the hon. member for Mississquoi (Mr. Kay). I have two sons who are engaged in this conflict; my eldest son is with the second contingent in St. John, and my youngest son is with the Mounted Rifles in Sherbrooke. While I am desirous that the soldiers of our Dominion should be enabled to cast their vote, unless that can be done in a reasonable way and with all proper safeguards, to my mind we had better leave well enough alone. There is a good deal in what has been said by the hon. gentleman that the soldiers will not know the issues of any election that may be held. Further, I am afraid that undue influence may be brought to bear upon the soldiers in the trenches. We were assured to-day that canvassing would not be allowed, but we are aware of the fact that there is an indirect means of canvassing a voter. I do not see how it would be possible to prevent literature from getting into the hands of the soldiers. During the election of 1911 I practically received a letter appealing to me as a Liberal—that letter was sent broadcast throughout this country, and was signed by R. L. Borden—to vote Tory and save Canada for the Empire. Is it not possible that a similar letter may be sent, appealing to the Liberals to sustain the Government, along the lines of the speech delivered by the right hon. gentleman in the debate on the budget? Portions of that speech, reflecting on the Liberal party, have been used by the press of the Conservative party as campaign literature. I am afraid that this matter will come down to active partisan politics, and it would be a great injustice to the people of Canada to take active partisan politics into the trenches. I think it would be unwise to have an election while the war is in progress. And if we are not to be called upon to exercise our franchise, why is there the need for the Bill now before the House? It seems to me that we might very well follow the example of the United Kingdom and keep these matters out of active politics. A remark was made by the Minister of Finance during the Budget debate which I was sorry to hear. It was to the effect that however much loyalty my right hon. friend who leads His Majesty's loyal Opposition exercised at the present time it would be a long time before the people of this country would forget what he had done—referring to the Naval Service Act. To my mind that was uncalled for and I think the right hon. gentleman might very well have retorted to the Minister of Finance that it would be a long time before the people of Canada would forget the fact that when the right hon. gentleman had behind him unanimity of opinion in the Dominion of Canada upon the establishment of the naval service the Conservative party threw that question into active politics. So I say now it would be better, if at all possible, to leave this matter over and let us hope that the soldiers will have a vote in due time. I would go so far as to say that if the war is not concluded in 1916 I would ask the Parliament of the United Kingdom to extend the duration of this Parliament so that we might have no election until the war is over and then our soldiers, I hope a large majority of them at any rate, will return to exercise their franchise in this young nation, a nation that to me is a greater nation in a way than the nation to the south of us. There are features in which our system of Government excels that of our neighbours to the south and I say we would do well if possible—although this is a matter entirely in the hands of the Government—to avoid an election during the continuance of the war.

When the Bill is considered in Committee of the Whole I shall have some remarks to make on its details—I notice, for instance, that no provision is made for the case where two candidates of one party may be running in a constituency with no candidate for the Opposition. A by-election was called in Terrebonne where two Liberal candidates ran on an issue on which the Liberal party were divided, and there was no Conservative candidate. It is quite possible that a similar case might occur.

I am heartily in favour of granting a vote to every Canadian citizen, especially those who are absent from Canada fighting for the protection of our homes and of the greatest young nation, shall I say, and for the greatest Empire that the world has ever seen.

Mr. W. H. BENNETT (East Simcoe): There is not now that unanimity among the members on the other side of the House that seemed to prevail before six o'clock this evening. I listened to the hon. member for Red Deer (Mr. Michael Clark) and one could only understand from his statements that he was determinedly opposed to giving soldiers votes, while the gentlemen who have followed lately have seemed to veer in a contrary direction; in plain parlance they are letting themselves down as easily as possible. My reason for rising to support the Bill is that I have the honour and pleasure of representing a riding that adjoins the constituency of North Simcoe. The member who represents that riding (Mr. Currie) is not here to-night owing to the fact that he is in the firing and not in the talking line. One result of his going to the front as he has done has been that he has taken with him from the riding of North Simcoe the pick of the young men of that riding. They are business men, men who have left their businesses behind; they are farmers' sons who have their rights in that riding, they are intelligent men who know everything as to the issues to be put before the people just as well as we who may be here on the spot. Then I ask why should not these men have votes. To say that they will not know the issues is idle. They are not unintelligent men and to say that they will not know the candidates is equally idle. The hon. member for Welland (Mr. German) dwelt a great deal on the personality of the candidates. These young men will receive letters from their friends, they will receive the public press of the country; and long before polling day they will know of the candidates in their ridings. One reason for which hon. gentlemen oppose the Bill was told by the hon. gentleman from Missisquoi (Mr. Kay) and that is that the Bill is so popular in the country that it will attract votes of Liberals who are not away, who are resident in the country and will be here at the time of the election. There can be no mistaking his words, their purport was that every man who is in the fighting line and his friends left in Canada, Liberal or Conservative, will be voting for this Government because it is giving the vote to the soldiers here. I tell the hon. gentleman that many men will vote for that reason.

Mr. KAY: I think the hon. member misunderstood me. I said the desire of this Government was that they should get the vote of the friends of the soldiers who are in this country. I did not mean that they will get them.

Mr. BENNETT: With all due deference, I think the hon. gentleman's fear is that they will get them too. This is a popular measure in the country and hon. gentlemen apprehend that; and I think that is what the hon. gentleman had in his mind at the time. So far as the personality of the candidate goes, every soldier who votes over there will know exactly the candidates on either side in the constituency where his vote will be ultimately recorded. The hon. member for Missisquoi being not only an hon. but a gallant gentleman, I think casts rather a reflection on the officers who are in the lines. Is it to be said that a man who will risk his life over there—the hon. gentleman does not seem to be doing that at present although he is a major in the force—

Mr. KAY: I do not wish to sail under false colours, I would say I am only a lieutenant.

Mr. BENNETT: Well, there are many lieutenants over there and there is still room for one.

Mr. NESBITT: The hon. member has offered his services.

Mr. BENNETT: Hon. gentlemen opposite say that officers will canvass the soldiers. Well, it is not our fault if the bulk of the officers who have gone to the front from this House are Conservatives. Surely the hon. member for North Simcoe (Mr. Currie), who is in the firing line to-day, cannot be blamed for being over there. Nor is it any more reprehensible that the hon. member for Thunder Bay and Rainy River (Mr. Carrick), who is also at the front, should be over there. If the hon. member for York, N.B. (Mr. McLeod) is at the front, he is not to be blamed for that; and the hon. member for Brome (Mr. Baker) will be over there by June at all events. Surely the hon. gentleman should not complain if all the officers have come from this side of the House. I think that is all the more to their credit.

Mr. GERMAN: Do I understand the hon. gentleman to say that all the Canadian officers at the front are Conservatives? I can tell him that there are as many Liberal officers as Conservatives.

Mr. BENNETT: I was speaking of the members of this House who are officers in the Canadian forces. I was not speaking of the officers on the whole staff. All I can say in regard to these officers who have gone from the House of Commons is that the country will admire them more than if they had remained at home.

Mr. GERMAN: I would suggest that my hon. friend's statement will not make for unity of feeling in this country, and certainly it will not help the patriotic funds.

Mr. BENNETT: The hon. gentleman has mentioned that point before. We have had elections before in this country, but after the elections people have gone back to their vocations just as usual; and surely the same thing would happen if an election were held now. I think the hon. member for Welland is looking through a glass very darkly when he says that if the Conservative party should win in an election this coming summer, the bowels of compassion of the people all over this country would be closed, so that they would not give a dollar, when requested, to the Red Cross or any other patriotic fund. The people of Canada, Liberals and Conservatives, will not be so small or so narrow as to stop contributing to the patriotic funds so long as the money is required, simply because one party or the other has been returned to power.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the second time.

On motion of Sir Robert Borden, the House adjourned at 11.58 p.m.

Friday, April 9, 1915.

The House met at Eleven o'clock, the Speaker in the Chair.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

RETIREMENT OF ACCOUNTANT.

Mr. SPEAKER: I have directed the Clerk of the House to lay upon the table of the House my recommendation and his report on the subject of the retirement of Mr. D. C. Chamberlain, Accountant of the House, and of the promotion of Mr. D. W. Cameron, Assistant Accountant, to the position of accountant.

SOLDIERS' VOTING BILL.

On motion of Hon. C. J. Doherty (Minister of Justice), the House went into committee on Bill No. 111, to enable Canadians on active military service during the present war to exercise their electoral franchise; Mr. Sevigny in the Chair.

On section 1—soldiers entitled to vote:

Mr. H. H. McLEAN: It was suggested by the Prime Minister that all British subjects who are enlisted in the Canadian forces should be entitled to vote, whether or not they have attained the age of 21 years. I suggest that this section be amended by striking out the words "of 21 years of age or upwards" after the word "subject" in the first line. All those who have enlisted are doing men's work, and I think that they should be entitled to vote.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: As the hon. member knows, this Bill did not come down originally as a Government measure, but was reported by a committee to whom certain of the laws relating to elections were referred for amendment. Consequently, the Bill has not received the consideration of the members of the Government as a whole which such measures usually do receive. I expressed an opintion which has just been made by my hon. friend, and I am still of that opinion. I shall be glad if the section is allowed to stand until the afternoon, in order that it may receive a little further consideration at our hands. I think there is a great deal of force in the hon. member's suggestion.

Mr. OLIVER: It seems to me that this provision does not adequately define where the soldier shall vote.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: You mean where his vote shall be counted?

Mr. OLIVER: Yes. I think that should be made considerably more definite than it is. As I read the section, it would seem practically to permit the soldier qualified to vote in two places to vote in whichever place he chose. I am aware that the section does not say that, but I do not see how he is prevented from making whatever choice he pleases. I would be very much better satisfied if the section said the soldier should vote in the place where he resided for thirty days before his enrollment, and let that be his definite qualification. Then we would know where we were at; but by the proviso the qualification is shifted from one leg to the other, and it is a most undesirable situation in which to find the law.

Mr. DOHERTY: It seems to me that the proviso makes it perfectly clear that if a man, irrespective of being a soldier, is a qualified voter in any particular electoral district, he shall vote in that electoral district only. He does not have a choice; he is, under the proviso, to vote in the electoral district in which he is qualified. It seemed to us in the drafting of the Bill that, as far as possible, we ought to leave things in the constituency in their normal situation and interfere with the normal situation only to such extent as might be absolutely necessary in order to carry out the provision that gives every soldier a vote. Under the clause as it stands the soldier who is a qualified voter in any particular electoral district remains a qualified voter in that particular electoral district just as though this Act had not been passed, and all that he gets out of this Act is the method furnished to him by which he can exercise that right. It seemed to us more proper that the man who is a voter in a particular electoral district ought not to be allowed to transfer himself to another electoral district. If, as the hon. member suggests, you make it imperative that all soldiers shall vote in the places in which they resided 30 days before enlistment, you make a situation where, in some particular place, where enlistment was carried on upon a large scale, you will have transferred into that electoral district from a number of other electoral districts a very large number of votes which may, under conceivable circumstances, override the vote of the ordinary voters in that district; and, on the other hand, you may take out of the electoral district to which each of these soldiers as voters belonged under the general law, a very large number of persons entitled to vote in that district. The effect of doing these two things might be to entirely modify the complexion of one or more constituencies. As far as it was possible to do so consistently with giving the soldiers a vote, we sought not to disturb the conditions in the different constituencies; and, notwithstanding what the hon. gentleman has pointed out, it seems to me that the policy of the section, if I may use that term, is very much preferable to a system that would make this law operate to take all soldiers who are actual voters in a particular electoral district forcibly out of that district and transfer them to some other district where they might happen to have been residing before enrollment. The clause as it stands, with the proviso, seemed to us to so operate as to cause the least possible disturbance of existing conditions, and that seems to me to be a very desirable thing.

Mr. GERMAN: It seems that the Minister of Justice has just now struck the crux of this situation which makes it bad. All his suggestions imply that an election is to be held on the voters' list as it is at present constituted. But supposing an election is held, not this year, but on the voters' list which is prepared this year, what does he say about these absentees from each electoral district who may be on the voters' list now, but who, when the lists are revised this coming summer, will be struck off in consequence of their absence? Do these parties remain on the voters' list because they are soldiers abroad? The Bill does not provide for that. If the Bill provides that because a man may be non-resident in a district through being abroad on war service he is to be considered an elector in that electoral district, you may then possibly overcome this difficulty; but these votes will be counted on the evening of polling day, after the other votes throughout the whole electoral district are counted.

Mr. R. B. BENNETT: They would all be counted at the same time, after the poll closes.

Mr. GERMAN: They cannot all be counted at the same time because the Bill provides that the returning officer is to fix a time after the poll is closed to count the vote. Every one knows that the vote is counted in each electoral polling subdivision as soon as the poll is closed. The return is immediately and as quickly as possible sent to the county town or wherever the central office happens to be. These returns would show that one candidate was elected by a small majority. As I suggested last night, here is where one of the difficulties will come in.

Mr. R. B. BENNETT: The hon. gentleman misunderstands the Bill. Supposing there are twenty polls in an electoral district. Then the counting of the soldiers' ballots by the returning officer makes the twenty-first poll, and the return from it will come as quickly as the others, the returning officer himself being the person who counts the soldiers' ballots and not the deputies.

Mr. GERMAN: I may not have the superabundant ability of the hon. member for Calgary, but I think I understand this Bill and I feel very confident I understand the effect it will have. When the vote is polled the candidates or their representatives can be present and see the vote counted. When the returning officer opens the envelopes to count the votes, he sees the name of some man. What does he do? He must look over the voters' list to see whether or not that man is on the list and entitled to vote in that district. He does not find his name on the voters' list; his name need not be on the list if he swears he is a resident. How do you know whether he is a resident there or not? There is where the great difficulty and uncertainty will come, and that is the very point that will create all the dissatisfaction in the event of the soldiers' vote changing the result of the poll in that particular locality.

That is my objection to this Bill. Of course, if an election were held on the present voters' list the difficulty would be overcome to some extent. I shall be very sorry if the Government do have an election this year—and it looks as if that is what they intend—but it will certainly overcome part of the difficulty. But, if the election is not held this year, the name of every soldier on the voters' list now for any particular district will be struck off, unless there is a clause in the Bill providing that their residence shall be assumed on account of their being away as soldiers.

Mr. OLIVER: I wish to follow the remarks of the Minister of Justice. While his statement of the intent of the section is, of course, to be accepted as a pious declaration, there are no means of insisting that that intent shall be carried out. The volunteer signs a declaration that he has not cast any other ballot paper, but there is nothing to show the elector in Saskatchewan or Alberta, where we have no voters' lists, whether he is qualified or not to vote in any particular locality. He could claim qualification to vote in a certain locality where he is not entitled to cast his vote, and he might do that quite conscientiously. If this is to be a legitimate attempt to count the soldiers' vote the way he gave it, there should be a definite knowledge as to where the soldier is entitled to vote, and his vote should be confined to that locality. I quite appreciate what my hon. friend said about the undesirability of unhinging the voting representation of an electoral district; but it is far better that the representation should be unhinged, and that we should know definitely what the rights of the voters are and with whom we have to deal, than that it should be unhinged just the same, and nobody should know the limitations of their rights, or how they can keep those rights within those limitations. If we have to go up against a proposition like this, in all conscience let us know exactly what we are going up against. Do not let it be a case of thimble and pea—maybe it is here, and maybe it is not.

Mr. R. B. BENNETT: I think I can make clear that provision has been made to meet the objection raised by my hon. friend; for I also was impressed with the necessity of making such a provision. This section was drawn with the intention of providing for two classes: it provided, first, that those who resided in the locality for thirty days prior to enlisting should have a vote in that locality; and, secondly, that those who had been continuously resident in some locality before they enlisted, should have their votes where they had always had them. I think that is what my hon. friend desires.

Mr. OLIVER: I am not urging one way or the other; but I say it should be one way or the other.

Mr. BENNETT: My hon. friend will pardon me for saying that that is what he desired, for he does not desire anything. The affidavit as drawn did not make clear the distinction to which he has directed attention. I happened to be out of the city when the Bill was finally drawn, but I have since submitted an alternative to the affidavit on page 6, by which it will be made clear that if the soldier has resided in a community for a longer period than thirty days his vote will be counted at that place where he would have exercised his franchise had be been home. Let me take a concrete case. One of the electors in West Calgary, we will say, is voting under this Act. He will vote in West Calgary. But if he happened to enlist in Edmonton, and had resided in Edmonton for thirty days prior to enlistment, his vote would be counted in Edmonton. I am quite as anxious as my hon. friend to meet the objection he has raised; and, as I have said, we are adding a paragraph to that affidavit which will meet that objection. I realized that one could not ask for a specific provision for our two provinces, but that such a provision should be inserted in the affidavits as would allow a residence vote to be counted in the constituency in which the soldier has lived, unless his residence at the point of enlistment qualified him for a vote at that place only. Have I made myself clear?

Mr. OLIVER: Yes, but the fact still remains that there is no possible means of checking the right of a man to vote in one place or the other.

Mr. BENNETT: We are introducing this affidavit into the Bill so that when the clerk of the Crown in Chancery looks at the envelope in the first instance, he will be able to allocate the votes to West Calgary or East Calgary or West Edmonton or East Edmonton as the case may be.

Mr. KNOWLES: How will he know?

Mr. BENNETT: On the back of the envelope there will be certain information to enable him to do that. When the affidavit is finally checked by the returning officer, in the presence of scrutineers of both parties, and it appears that a ballot has been improperly allotted to Edmonton, then of course it will be rejected and returned to the Clerk of the Crown in Chancery. The very difficulty that my hon. friend has mentioned was anticipated by the committee, and dealt with in the manner I have indicated.

Mr. KNOWLES: How does the envelope or affidavit show to what constituency the vote should go?

Mr. BENNETT: The voter has to make in the affidavit a distinct statement of what his residence had been for the thirty days prior to enlisting, and also if he had only resided there for thirty days. He will have to say: For thirty days prior to enlisting I resided at such and such a place. And if it is a longer period than thirty days, he will have to say, for instance: I resided at 1210 Sixteenth street, Edmonton. Then it will be aparent that he resided in West Edmonton, and should vote there.

Mr. KNOWLES: Take people who are close to the line between two post offices.

Mr. BENNETT: That was traversed in the committee, and it was felt that in such a case there might be a mistake in the ballots. In some cases men have lost their votes under the existing law. But this is not the average case.

Mr. KNOWLES: I was speaking about the definiteness of the information. There will be a multitude of people who have to come fifteen or twenty miles to a post office, and who do not know what riding they are in.

Mr. BENNETT: It was felt that on the instructions there should be a note to give with as much definiteness as possible the residence, section, township and range. The very point that my hon. friend from Moosejaw (Mr. Knowles) has mentioned was discussed in the committee. I myself brought the matter up, because in our western country men have to go sometimes fifteen or twenty miles for their mail, and I thought that might cause confusion.

Mr. KNOWLES: The Government ask a great deal of us when they ask us to vote for a Bill of such a nature as this—I will not say of such a suspicious nature, because I want to be courteous—and trust to its being carried out properly because there will be a little note attached. I would as soon the note were left off, because no one knows what kind of a note it will be before it is done with. I would rather legislate in such a definite manner that notes would be unnecessary.

Mr. DOHERTY: The requirement of the Bill as it stands is that a man shall give his address. What we had in mind was his address as definitely as he possibly could give it. There can be no objection to inserting in the form that he shall give his address as definitely as it is possible for him to do. We contemplated that if a man lived in a place where they had streets and numbers he would give these or that if he lived in a rural section, he would give the section and range, so as to enable the Clerk of the Crown in Chancery to ascertain what electoral district that was in. Of course, notwithstanding all that, there might be cases where a man would not succeed in giving a sufficiently definite address, and unfortunately that man would lose his vote. Under any system there are men who, through errors and mistakes, lose their votes, and all we can do is to provide the best possible machinery to enable men to secure their votes. That there will be mistakes in connection with it by which some will lose their votes I suppose we will have to admit, but I am quite ready to specify as minutely as we possibly can the information that we want each man to give.

Mr. GRAHAM: That course applies not only to the western provinces; it applies in a degree to the province of Ontario as well. In the constituencies in Ontario we have registration. There are scores of voters in many counties who are not on the list at all. They are not on the list until registration is called within thirty days of polling. Therefore, the same difficulty might arise in Ontario that arises in the West where they have no regular voters' list. If being on the voters' list is the qualification, there are plenty of young men who are not qualified in the province of Ontario. There are hundreds of young men in Ottawa from various ridings in Ontario. Does the Bill mean that these young men, unmarried, with no place of residence, whose residence is wherever they are if they are not living with their parents, will be added to the Ottawa voters' list if they have been here for thirty days?

Mr. DOHERTY: It means prior to enlistment.

Mr. GRAHAM: We want to be careful as to what constitutes enlistment.

Mr. R. B. BENNETT: Taking the oath.

Mr. GRAHAM: Several men went to the centres and were not formally enlisted until quite a while after they arrived there. Unless great care is exercised the result of the election in these Ontario constituencies may be altogether changed by soldiers' votes. My view is that men—particularly young men—who are at any centre ought to be compelled to have their votes registered at the place where they reside, or where they would be entitled to vote had they not enlisted at all. That situation is just as acute in Ontario as it is in the western provinces. In some of the other provinces it may not be the case, but where we have registration we have many voters who are not qualified if being on the list is their qualification. These should be protected in their right to vote.

Mr. GERMAN: Registration only applies to cities in Ontario.

Mr. HUGH CLARK: Not to towns?

Mr. GERMAN: Towns of over 10,000 or something of that kind.

Mr. GRAHAM: I think it is 9,000.

Mr. GERMAN: There are large towns in which there is no registration. In Welland, which is not a city, there is no registration. In the city of Niagara Falls there is registration, and that is the only municipality in Welland county in which there is registration. Large numbers of young men have gone from Welland and other urban municipalities in the county of Welland to the war. These young men at the present time are on the voters' list, or a large number of them are. When the voters' list comes to be revised this present year, in August or September, what is to be done with these young men? They are not residents. The provincial Voters' Lists Act requires that they cannot be on the voters' list unless they are resident. Are you proposing by a clause of this Bill to say that there shall be a separate voters' list made out, which will be called a Dominion franchise list, and which shall contain the names of the soldiers? If that is not done the names of these young men will be struck off the provincial list and they will not have a vote for the provincial legislature. Why should they not have a vote for the provincial legislature as well as for the Dominion Parliament? If these young men are at the war they are struck off the provincial voters' list, and if there is a provincial election they are debarred from voting for candidates for the provincial legislature. They have a vote in the Dominion election if they swear as to their residence.

Mr. DOHERTY: Sections 157 and 158 of the Election Act as it now stands, I think, protect a man who is prevented from being present and getting registration because of his absence on military duty. Section 157 provides that:

> Notwithstanding anything contained in any Act of Parliament or in any Act of a provincial legislature, no person otherwise qualified to vote at an election of a member to serve in the House of Commons shall be incompetent to vote at such election by reason only of his having been absent from the electoral district in which such election is held, on account of his serving with or being attached to any corps despatched from Canada for military service, or performing military service within Canada, whether as an officer, a non-commissioned officer or a private, or in any other capacity, or while serving His Majesty in any military capacity, or acting as a war correspondent in connection with any war in which a Canadian contingent is serving.

Section 158 says:

> From any oath which any person tendering his vote at such an election may be required to take, there shall, in the case of any person within the meaning of the preceding section, be omitted any statements as to residence which such person cannot by reason of such absence as aforesaid truthfully make—

Mr. GERMAN: That only gives him the right to vote if he is on the list. What about the fact of his being struck off the list in the revision? He would be struck off. He cannot stay on because he is an absentee. There is nothing in the Voters' List Act of Ontario which will allow him to stay on if he is serving at the front.

Mr. HUGH CLARK: Yes, there is.

Mr. GRAHAM: They can vote if they are on, but it does not put them on.

Mr. HUGH CLARK: They will not be struck off, because they are in the same class as sailors, lumbermen and fishermen. Their absence as soldiers counts for residence.

Mr. DOHERTY: I think there is a provision in the Ontario Act covering their case and providing that their names shall be kept on the list. I have sent for the Act.

Mr. GRAHAM: It may be that in the Ontario Act they are covered, but not in the Dominion Act.

Mr. KNOWLES: Ontario is not the whole Dominion; there are Manitoba, Saskatchewan and the other provinces.

Mr. NICKLE: A man's name cannot be struck off the Ontario list by virtue of the fact that he is only temporarily absent. So long as he retains his domicile his name goes on the list. In the particular case under review his name would go on the Ontario list by virtue of the Ontario Act; he being a sailor or a soldier the assessor must still keep his name on the list.

Mr. GRAHAM: I was not sure that the exception in the Ontario Act applied to soldiers; I know it does apply to sailors and lumbermen.

Mr. COCKSHUTT: What would happen in the case of a young man who, in the interval has attained the age of twenty-one years, but who has not been on any voters' list because while he was at home he was not twenty-one years. He could not be struck off the list by the assessor because he was not on the list, but had he remained at home he would have become a voter, in cities where there is registration.

Mr. SINCLAIR: I had the idea when I read this Bill first that it qualified every young man of twenty-one years, who is a British subject, but it appears it does not. There must be thousands of our young men serving in the forces who would not be qualified under this Bill. For example, if one of my constituents goes to Halifax and enlists at the barracks there, he may have been only one day in Halifax and not thirty days, and not being on the list in the constituency from which he came, he would not have the right to vote.

Mr. DOHERTY: He must have been in some constituency thirty days before he enlisted. He may have been only one day in Halifax but he was thirty days in Guysborough, and he would be qualified in that constituency. If you can conceive the case of a man who cannot locate himself anywhere for thirty days of course, he would not be entitled to vote.

Mr. MARCIL: There has been a large enlistment in the province of Quebec, which took place mostly in the cities of Montreal and Quebec, but in the eastern part of the province some of the men went over to New Brunswick and enlisted there. What will happen to men from rural districts who enlisted in Montreal and Quebec, and the Quebec men who enlisted in New Brunswick, who were not voters in their own ridings when they left home? Some of these men, for example, remained around Montreal for a long time, perhaps more than a month, waiting for medical examination and so on. What would happen under such circumstances.

Mr. DOHERTY: The man who came to Montreal, for example, was a voter in some other electoral district or he was not. If he was a qualified voter in some other electoral district he continues on the list, and his qualification as a soldier will be as a voter in that district. If he was not a voter in another district when he came to Montreal, and he resided in Montreal for thirty days before he enrolled, then, under this Act, he will become a voter in that electoral district in Montreal in which he resided during these thirty days. Anything he does after he has enlisted does not affect in any way the district in which he is to vote. The fact that he went to New Brunswick and enlisted there does not affect it at all, because he will be attached either to the electoral district in which before enlistment he was a qualified voter, or if he was not a qualified voter in any district his vote will be assigned to the place in which he resided for thirty days before he enlisted.

Mr. EDWARDS: I assume from what the minister says that if he was in Montreal for thirty days before he enlisted he would be placed as a voter in Montreal, but suppose he was in Montreal only twenty-eight days, would he be a voter in the part of the country in which he had formerly resided?

Mr. DOHERTY: As I understand it, he will vote in any electoral district in which he had resided for not less than thirty days before he enlisted.

Mr. MARCIL: There will be eleven ridings upon the island of Montreal next election, and supposing this man while waiting in Montreal to be enlisted shifted his residence around between different constituencies during the thirty days. I suppose that one-half of those who enlisted were young men and were not voters at all.

Mr. DOHERTY: If a man is so much of a rolling stone that he cannot find an electoral district in which he lived for thirty days, I am afraid he will have to do without his vote.

Mr. MARCIL: He may have been in Montreal for the thirty days, but he may have lived between one constituency and another.

Mr. DOHERTY: If he was in Montreal for thirty days and he cannot locate himself in one electoral district for thirty days, I fear he will have no vote.

Mr. MARCIL: Is not that an injustice to him?

Mr. DOHERTY: Would it be fair to an electoral district to allot to it a man who has resided in it only two days? We have got to get a limit of some kind, and you can conceive all imaginable cases such as are suggested where a man will not meet the requirements, but it all comes back to this: is it a reasonable requirement to ask that a man should be thirty days in an electoral district in order to look upon him as so attached to that district as to entitle him to vote there? The pointing out of the fact that persons who do not comply with this disposition will not get votes, does not seem to be an argument against this provision of the Bill. If the provision be open to criticism, I should have thought it would come from the direction that thirty days was not long enough, and not from the point of view that because a man has travelled from one electoral district to another during the thirty days he will not get a vote. Under the franchise law in the provinces generally, some period of residence much longer than thirty days is required for a man to get a vote in that district. A man may have lived in Montreal for years, but if he is like the supposed soldier of my hon. friend (Mr. Marcil) and has been flitting from one to the other of the electoral districts, so that he has not lived the precise period in any one district, such a man would have no vote. For the benefit of the soldier we have reduced the required period of residence down to what I think is a fair minimum. I do not think we could be expected to meet the case of a man who has had no local habitation for a period of thirty days.

Mr. VERVILLE: The Montreal lists are made, as the Minister of Justice knows, every two years in December. Regardless of a man's length of residence in the district, if he has a domicile even for one day prior to the date when the lists are made out, if he registers he is on the list and entitled to vote.

Mr. DOHERTY: Does the hon. gentleman say that he need not have any period of residence in the district?

Mr. VERVILLE: He resides in the city of Montreal. But suppose that the day before the 20th of December, when the lists are made out, he moves from one district in Montreal to another district in Montreal. He registers, giving his domicile at the number and street to which he has moved. He goes on the list, and in any election after that he votes as domiciled at that street and number, no matter where he actually lives.

Mr. DOHERTY: That is quite true. Everybody who is on the list to-day is a competent elector for the next two years in the district upon whose list his name appears.

Mr. BUREAU: Suppose that a man is on the list in the city of Montreal, that list being good for two years. That man moves to a rural district where a revision takes place every year in September. He has his principal residence in the rural district. Will the minister tell me that that man has the right to vote in Montreal?

Mr. DOHERTY: Under the law as it stands you have the principle of one man one vote, and a man is not entitled to cast two votes.

Mr. BUREAU: Then, where will such a man vote?

Mr. DOHERTY: The hon. gentleman is putting forward something of a conundrum.

Mr. BUREAU: But the law solves that conundrum. It says that a man votes where his principal place of residence is.

Mr. DOHERTY: Is that material to our present question? I did not come here this morning prepared to determine all the possible questions that might arise in all the laws of all the provinces. But, in answer to the hon. member for Maisonneuve (Mr. Verville), I would point out that, eliminating the case of a man who has become a voter somewhere else, and dealing with the people who live in Montreal, the man who is to-day on the electoral list of a particular electoral division of Montreal, is a voter in that division for the next two years. If he presented himself at the poll, his name would be found upon the list, and, subject to objection that might be taken by reason to his being entitled to vote elsewhere, prima facie, he is a voter in the electoral district. Therefore, so far as the city of Montreal is concerned, and the flitting of people from one electoral district to another within the city, I do not think there is occasion to apprehend difficulty in the application of this Act. A man who has gone to the front has not gone to a rural district and acquired a residence. So, the case the hon. member for Three Rivers (Mr. Bureau) suggested can hardly arise.

Mr. BUREAU: The families of those who have families may move: the residence changes.

Mr. DOHERTY: My hon. friend is tackling a very large question now. There is a very material difference in meaning between domicile and residence.

Mr. BUREAU: Well, I will use the word "domicile."

Mr. DOHERTY: I must decline to enter into a discussion upon such very fine points as the definition of what constitutes domicile and what constitutes residence. If this Bill is to be dealt with, it must be dealt with realizing that after all it will have to operate under the law as it stands. I do not pretend to be able to indicate in advance just how, in exceptional and individual cases, it may operate. But, speaking generally as regards the city of Montreal, and the man who to-day is on the list and goes to the front, I am satisfied you will not find as many as one-half of one per cent of cases in which these men will not continue to be qualified electors in the electoral districts upon whose lists their names appear. So, with regard to the people moving from one district to another, which is the case presented by the hon. member for Maisonneuve, I do not think there is any practical difficulty.

Mr. VERVILLE: There are a great many soldiers in Montreal at the present time. They come from many different places. Prior to the passing of this Act they will have been more than thirty days in the city of Montreal. They are living in different parts of the city. I am sorry to say that very often they do not live thirty days in one place. I do not like to say why, but I know that it is so. What position would these men be in? Are they to have the choice where they shall vote?

Mr. DOHERTY: I understand the hon. gentleman is speaking of men who, having enlisted, reside in different districts. I would point out that what takes place after enlistment has no bearing on the question. Thirty days after enlistment, or a year after enlistment, does not affect the matter: it is prior to enlistment.

Mr. SINCLAIR: What force does the hon. gentleman give to the word "immediately" in relation to residence? If a man is twenty or twenty-five days away from his ordinary residence, can he swear that he resided in a certain place for thirty days immediately before the date of his enlistment?

Mr. DOHERTY: Where does the hon. gentleman find the word "immediately"?

Mr. SINCLAIR: In the affidavit, page 6.

Mr. DOHERTY: The section does not make the requirement that it should be immediate. The affidavit was apparently copied from a form in the present statute, and I do not think that that word "immediately" should appear therein. However, that will be a question to be considered when we come to deal with the form itself.

Mr. COCKSHUTT: The latter part of this section reads:

> Provided that if any person was, at the time he was so appointed, enlisted or enrolled, qualified to vote in any other electoral district in Canada, he shall vote in such other district only.

The question I raised was as to the position in which a young man would be, who, at the time of enlistment, was not enrolled or qualified to be enrolled, but who, between the time of his enlistment and the time of the election, qualified for enrolment. I have a son who, though he was not 21 years of age when he enlisted, is 21 years of age now and is away from the electoral district to which he belongs. How will this provision apply to young men between the ages of 18 and 21 who have enlisted—and there are many of them—and who may in the meantime have become properly qualified to vote if at home?

Mr. DOHERTY: There is no doubt that, under the conditions which the hon. member indicates, the young man in question, when he enlisted, was not qualified to vote in any electoral district. The proviso does not entitle him to vote in any particular district, because he was not qualified to vote there at the time of enlistment. Under the section as it stands, that young man could become a qualified voter only in an electoral district in which he had resided for 30 days prior to his enlistment. I would fancy that in the majority of cases the district in which such a young man resided 30 days before he enlisted would be the district of his home. There will be cases where that is not so, but hon. gentlemen will remember that the 30 days is a period not before leaving this country, but before enlistment.

Mr. COCKSHUTT: Immediately prior to enlistment.

Mr. DOHERTY: It need not necessarily be immediately prior to enlistment; the section of the Act does not say "immediately." I think possibly it may require some little consideration as to whether that word "immediately" should stand in the form or not. Under the operation of this section, a young man in the position mentioned by the hon. member would not have the right to vote in his own home district, because he was not a qualified voter there when he enlisted.

Mr. COCKSHUTT: If he should go abroad, he would not be entitled to have a vote anywhere.

Mr. DOHERTY: He will have a vote if he had resided for thirty days immediately before enlistment in some place in Canada, but if you leave out the word "immediately," which is a matter that I should like to have stand for further consideration, then a man who fulfilled this requirement twenty years ago would be entitled to vote.

Mr. COCKSHUTT: I am speaking now of young men who have just attained the age of twenty-one years, of which there are quite a number at the front.

Mr. DOHERTY: According to the present provisions, a young man who has lived thirty days in Canada will have a vote. I do not think that we can secure that that young man's vote shall be in the district of his home, unless the district of his home be the place where he has lived during the required period. We have two classes to deal with: persons who, when they enlisted, were qualified to vote, and persons who, when they enlisted, were not qualified to vote. In respect of the latter class, I do not think that we can do any better than give them a vote in the place where they had their residence for the thirty days. The others will have the right to vote in the district in which they are qualified to vote. I think that in the majority of cases it will work out that the provision will give the young man a vote in the place which is his home.

Mr. KNOWLES: The right hon. Prime Minister this morning intimated that he is in sympathy with the suggestion that votes should be given to minors who are at the front. The reasons given for that are the reasons which were elaborated so fully yesterday afternoon and evening, namely that this Government has such a responsive and appreciative feeling for the boys at the front that nothing is too good for them. Hon. gentlemen opposite spoke in eulogistic terms last night of the lads who have gone to the front, in support of the view that any one who is fit to carry a gun surely is fit to cast a vote. If hon. gentlemen opposite accept the view that lads of 16 and 17 should be entitled to vote, I suggest that there is just as much reason for giving the suffrage to the nurses who have gone to the front as there is for giving it to lads under 21. Many persons believe that all women who have reached the age of 21 years should be given the suffrage. We heard hon. gentlemen on the Government side slobber over the soldiers last night; the Prime Minister pointed out how disappointed the fathers and mothers would be if this privilege were not granted to the soldiers. It is my belief that the Prime Minister cares not so much for the mothers as he does for the fathers and brothers, especially those who have a vote. I am not going to slobber over the nurses; enough slobbering was done yesterday. I contend that girls and women who risk their lives to perform work that men cannot do, for the good of their country and the honour of civilization, have just as much right to vote as lads of 16 and 17 have. I myself am not very far from being a supporter of woman suffrage, but I shall not raise that question on the present occasion. I do say that if you are going to give the vote to boys of 16, 17 and 18, you should give it to the girls who have gone out there to do this great work. Surely a cheap, slobbering desire to get votes is not all that is left to us; surely we are gallant enough and chivalrous enough to say that votes shall be given to these women as well as to the boys and men. If the Government are going to go ahead with this burlesque measure, they should take it into their serious consideration whether they should not give votes to these women who, in many cases at great sacrifice, have gone to the front to carry on this noble work.

We in the Dominion of Canada would then stand out before the world as showing our appreciation in a very unique way, not in a vote-catching way—because I think the women would not vote as the Minister of Public Works has suggested, but would vote pretty squarely, and I do not think you could monkey with their votes—and would do itself credit by thus showing its appreciation of the women who have gone out, especially in the Red Cross work, and would thus encourage others to enlist in that noble service.

Mr. DOHERTY: I gave credit to the hon. gentleman for not having slobbered over the nurses and also for a disinclination to monkey with the women's votes. I further take note of his request that the Government should take the suggestion into consideration, and beg to assure him that the Government shall give it its most serious consideration.

Mr. VERVILLE: While we are speaking on this question of giving votes to young men who have not reached their majority of 21 years, because they are going to the front, we should remember that there are other young men who have not gone to the front, but who are possibly as useful to the war as those who have gone. You will find many young men to-day who are supporters of families, who are working in different factories, making shells and other things that are necessities of war; and if you are going to give the right to vote to these young men because they are going to the front it is absolutely unfair not to give it to other young men here of the same age. You will find such young men in many industries to-day throughout Canada, even on the farm. I do not care where it is, these young men are producers of different things that are keeping our soldiers at the front, whether they are producing money to support the affairs of the country or manufacturing different articles that are necessary for the war. If we want to be fair we should not give the vote only to young men who are going to the front. Lower the limit to 18 years if you like, but give the vote to these other young men.

Mr. DOHERTY: I would ask the hon. gentleman to give a little further explanation of his position. The suggestion to give votes to young men under 21 years of age stands for further consideration this afternoon; but, because I would like in that consideration clearly to apprehend the view of the hon. gentleman, I would be glad if he would tell me whether I am correct in understanding that he does not consider that the alteration in the Bill withdrawing the requirement of 21 years should be made; or does he think that we ought to do it with regard to the soldiers and also with regard to the other young men he speaks of?

Mr. VERVILLE: My suggestion is that if we are going to grant the vote to soldiers of less than twenty-one years of age, we should also grant the vote to other young men in the country who are also working for the war.

Mr. DOHERTY: I really would be glad to know what the hon. gentleman's view is as to the desirability of giving votes to soldiers who are under twenty-one years, because that is a matter that we have to consider practically. I understand he says if we do that we ought also to give it to other young men. But I would be glad to know whether he thinks we ought to do that.

Mr. VERVILLE: The Government can give the vote as much as they like; it makes no difference to me, provided they make no exceptions and are fair with everybody.

Mr. SINCLAIR: If there is to be any enlargement of the scope of the Bill to include parties not now mentioned in it, I think the minister ought to consider the case of the sailors who are engaged in the mercantile trade of the North Atlantic. At the present time that is a very dangerous pursuit. Everybody knows that a ship cannot arrive at a British port to-day without risking the lives of her crew. That service is almost as dangerous now as service in the navy or in the trenches. I know of many young men who are manning our ships which are carrying food and supplies to the Allies at the present time. They sleep with their clothes on, with the boats hung over the side of the ship ready to jump into them, they are expecting the torpedo to strike their ship, all through the long night. It is a most anxious time with those men, and if the Bill is to be enlarged so as to take in parties not now included, I would suggest that the Government ought to consider the cases of those thousands of men engaged in the mercantile service on the Atlantic ocean.

Mr. MARCIL: What is the difference between enlistment and enrollment? A recruiting officer was sent from New Brunswick into my constituency. He visited different parishes and took the names of a number of people who did not actually move away with him, but who ultimately left, and, when they had undergone medical examination and other formalities, were included in the forces. What is the difference between enlistment and enrollment? Is this to be reckoned from the date the recruiting officer first appeared in the constituency or from the date on which the engagement was completed in New Brunswick, perhaps some weeks afterwards. It would make a difference as to whether the voter would belong to his own county or to the new county.

Mr. DOHERTY: The 30 days are counted as from the appointment, which I understand is the proper term for any person joining the force as an officer. I must confess that I am not absolutely clear on the terminology, but I understand that when a man first presents himself he is enlisted and takes an oath. After he has undergone medical examination and complied with other formalities he is then enrolled. It might perhaps have been sufficient to mention enlistment only, but I presume there might be a case where a man would be immediately enrolled for one reason or another and this was only to make quite certain that the 30 days is to date from whichever event occurred first.

Mr. H. H. McLEAN: I think it might be advisable for the Minister of Justice to take the opinion of the Militia Department on the use of these words. As I understand, as a practical man with some experience, a man is enlisted when he first signs. In order to complete his enlistment he has to pass the doctors and certain preliminaries. He has to take the oath of allegiance. Then he signs his name to the service roll and that completes his enlistment. The adjutant puts his name on the book and it is sent to headquarters. He then becomes a regular member of the militia, his term of service is three years and he becomes liable to military law. I rather think that the word " enrolled" should be struck out. It is superfluous and does not add to the meaning or to the strength of the section.

Mr. DOHERTY: I would be very glad to act on the suggestion of the hon. member; I have no doubt his description is correct. Subject to the verification by the Militia Department of the suggestion made it would seem to me that the word "enrolled" probably is superfluous. It was doubtless put in there as a result of too much precaution. Certainly the intention is that the 30 days should be before whatever is the first step in making him a soldier.

Mr. MARCIL: When he gives in his name.

Mr. TURRIFF: I wish to draw the minister's attention to one class of men to whom it is proposed to give votes under this Bill. A British subject living in the United States may make up his mind to go home to England to fight with the British army. He has been some time away from England, and has no vote there. Although he has lived in the United States for a long time, he has not taken out his papers, and so has no vote there. Before he goes over to England he learns that the Canadian soldiers are paid $1.10 a day, while the soldiers in Britain are paid only 25 cents. So he crosses the border with the intention of joining the Canadian forces. But he is delayed for thirty days in this country before he enlists. This man is a British subject who had originally intended to join the English army. He has no particular interest in Canada except that it is a part of the Empire. He has joined the Canadian forces in order to get the better pay, which he is perfectly justified in doing. Now, because that man happened to live in Canada for thirty days before enlisting the minister proposes to give him a vote. I appeal to the minister whether that is a reasonable thing to do. The man knows absolutely nothing about Canadian politics.

Mr. DOHERTY: Even if that be a very great evil, I hardly think it will happen in a large number of cases.

Mr. TURRIFF: Not in many cases.

Mr. DOHERTY: We have always to make laws under which we are going to find hard cases that will come up. Almost any law it is natural though perfectly just in its application in the great bulk of cases is liable to give rise to anomalies in isolated cases; but I hardly think that that is a reason why we should not be prepared to adopt a law that in the great general sense will give a vote to the man who is a Canadian and a member of the Canadian forces. After all, what we do is this. We assume that the man who becomes a Canadian soldier does so because he is interested in Canada; he gives the most tangible, prima facie evidence of interest in Canada. There may be an odd man who joins the Canadian forces to get $1,10 a day instead of the 25 cents which he would get in Great Britain; and if we could get at the motives of every individual man perhaps we ought to make a distinction and not give that man a vote. But I suggest that it is not a practicable thing to draw that distinction, and, after all, no material evil can result from a few isolated cases such as my hon. friend has mentioned. After all, the hon. gentleman speaks of him as a man who wants to fight for Britain. Well, in this particular condition of affairs the man who wants to fight for Britain, and fights for Britain, wants to fight for Canada, and is fighting for Canada.

Mr. MARCIL: Has the minister given any consideration to the hundreds of Frenchmen living in Canada who are now fighting under the French flag? There have been hundreds of these men in Montreal. They are British subjects, but descendants of French parents. I could name hundreds who have been called back to fight with the French army; members of the Bar and of almost every other profession have gone back to France from Montreal. The city engineer of Montreal, Mr. Janin, who was through the whole campaign of 1870, is going back now at the age of 62. Has the minister given any consideration to this class of men?

Mr. DOHERTY: Consideration has been given to it. Although the gentlemen indicated may have become naturalized, they are undoubtedly people who, under the operation of the different laws in the different countries, find themselves with a double nationality; otherwise they would not be called upon to return to the colours of France. Finding themselves with that double nationality, and recognizing their obligations as citizens of the French Republic, it seems to me that we cannot do otherwise than assume that they have made their choice as between these two nationalities. I am not criticising them for having done that, but they have done it. Being entitled to be French cittizens or British subjects, or both so far as they can consistently be both, when the time comes for action they choose to range themselves as French citizens.

Mr. MARCIL: The cause is the same.

Mr. DOHERTY: The cause is the same, but if we are going to give votes to all who are fighting for that cause we shall have to extend the Bill to all the soldiers in all the armies of the Allies. It seems to me that the action of these men has settled for the time being what is their national status, and while I should be glad to recognize in a proper way the fidelity that these men have shown to their original country by returning to take their places in the ranks of its army, I hardly think that the proper way of recognizing that fidelity would be to give them the franchise of the country which they have made clear that they consider, as between the two, the secondary country. There would be this further difficulty in the way. We do not propose to give a vote to the man in the armies of Great Britain who may have some connection with Canada. In dealing simply with members of the Canadian forces, we have the advantage that we are dealing with men who, while they are serving as a part of the Imperial army, are men organized as Canadians, and organized to a very large extent, though not entirely, under Canadian officers. We are dealing with organizations with regard to which it is more easy for us to create a system which we can hope to have carried out, than if we endeavoured to ask for co-operation on the part of officers of the armies of totally different countries—countries which, though our Allies, and though we respect them as such, are nevertheless absolutely distinct countries.

Mr. MARCIL: I should just like to say a word for the Belgian colony in Montreal. I do not wish to add anything further to what I have said about the French reservists, except to say that these men are Canadians and will come back to Canada after the war is over. The same thing applies to the Belgian colony of Montreal, which sent over 1,000 men to Belgium. These men have taken part in the campaign, but they will lose their votes simply because they are not members of the Canadian forces.

Mr. THOBURN: This Bill opens up a question that I have discussed with friends of mine for some time past. I should like to ask the Minister of Justice if there is any clause in this Bill dealing with what might be called absentee voters. There are thousands of voters in the Dominion of Canada who are disfranchised, who have no vote, simply because they do not happen to be in the locality; they have left their homes where their names appear on the voters' list, they have moved away perhaps one hundred miles. They are bona fide voters who have lost their votes because they have moved to places where there is no registration, and there is no registration except in cities or towns of a certain population. A workman who is away from home, for instance, has no vote where he is located, he cannot afford to pay his way back to vote at his own poll, and the candidate is not allowed to pay his expenses. The consequence is that the man is disfranchised. My hon. friend the Minister of Justice is putting into force machinery to record the votes of the soldiers who may be in the trenches, but I am perfectly satisfied that very much more simple machinery would suffice to record the vote of the man who is still a resident of Canada, but who, from the fact of his being a distance from home, is unable to record his vote. There is another case even simpler than that to which I have referred, and that is the case of a man who moves out of one county to an adjoining county, and he happens to move out of the county in which he was a resident after the voters' list is completed. He moves into the new county too late to be placed on the list in that county, and when the election takes place he is disfranchised. I am satisfied that the minister could put a clause in this Bill to deal with the absentee vote, protecting the right of the bona fide voters who have not moved out of the Dominion. They have their residence in some part of the Dominion, but owing to their having moved away and not being able to pay their expenses back home they are disfranchised. The same thing applies to the man who has moved out of one county into another and who, because he is too late to be put on the voters' list in the county into which he has moved, is disfranchised.

Mr. DOHERTY: There is no doubt that there is very much in what the hon. gentleman has pointed out. The adoption of his suggestion would result in the establishment in this country of laws similar to those which have been enacted in a number of countries providing special provisions for the absentee vote, or as it is sometimes called the postal vote. In looking into different matters in connection with the present Bill I must say that I have formed a very favourable impression of the possibility of such a provision being carried out. The measure which is now proposed is the first step in that direction. Perhaps it might very properly be said that the reasons for providing for this method of voting in this particular case are stronger than they are in support of a general system, but this is one step in that direction. We are providing a method for the absent voter, and if this should work out as satisfactorily as we hope it will I certainly would be disposed to look very favourably upon some measure to remedy the evils which the hon. gentleman has mentioned.

Mr. OLIVER: Some time ago, when questions were put to the Minister of Justice as to the effect of this law as applied to the different voters' qualifications in the different provinces, he brushed the matter aside by saying that he was not going to undertake to describe the limitations or applications of the law under all possible circumstances.

Mr. DOHERTY: I do not think that I brushed it aside, or that I would not pay attention to it. It seemed to me that the hon. member for Three Rivers (Mr. Bureau) was rather refining the distinctions and I said that I did not come here, and that I did not pretend to be prepared, to deal with all the niceties and distinctions of the law. I said that I was endeavouring, of course in a general way, to make this law so operate as not to produce anomalies by reason of the conditions of the laws in the different provinces. I shall be very glad to have anything pointed out to me in regard to the law of any province which might call for a modification of any provision of this Bill.

Mr. OLIVER: Perhaps the minister has misunderstood the point I was trying to get at. I do not wish to criticise what he said but I wish to take his expressions as giving the main reasons for the criticism that I find against his Bill and particularly against this section. It undertakes to define certain rights. It defines them, if I may say so, in a very indefinite way as will be found to be the case when these definitions come to be applied to the different conditions throughout the provinces. That this is the best that can be done, we admit, but that being the condition, the circumstances under which the vote is taken, absolutely preclude the ordinary safeguards that guarantee both to the voter who votes, and his fellow citizens, that his vote shall be cast according to the rights that he holds. On these points the minister does not feel himself able to present any opinion to this House and therefore the individual voter is the sole judge of his action in regard to them. That is not a fair proposition. That is not right. It is essentially wrong that it should be the case. In the ordinary circumstances of the election law, in the first place, the right of the voter is defined as definitely as words can define it. Beyond that there is a procedure laid down guaranteeing to the electors generally, as well as to the voter, that while he shall have the benefit of the rights conferred upon him by the Act, he shall not go beyond those rights —he shall be kept within those limits. That is not possible under the conditions set out in this Act; at any rate, there has not been provided that machinery, that procedure, to safeguard the public against the misuse of the right of the franchise. The voter himself is the sole judge as to where his rights shall rest. If the Minister of Justice finds difficulty in deciding on that point, how much more is the voter liable to take a view that is not warranted by the law and is not according to the intent of the law? My hon. friend may ask: What is the practical objection to it? The practical objection is this: In his earlier remarks, when we were discussing this proviso, the minister pointed out very clearly and very properly that it was the object of the law that there should not be an undue disorganization of the strength of the voting population, that matters, in so far as voting was concerned, should remain as much as possible as they were. That is perfectly right but by reason of the indefiniteness of the law in prescribing the exercise of the right of the franchise it will be entirely possible to mass the votes in this direction or in that in large measure and so produce that very disorganization which the minister stated was undesirable and which it was the purpose of the law to avoid. That is to say, the minister has undertaken to deal with a vastly important subject and he has not provided the machinery to deal with that subject according to the principle he himself has laid down. He may answer that it is impossible to provide that procedure, and that is the very point upon which we take issue. We say that if the rights of the franchise are not to be exercised with due regard to the right of the public as well as to the rights of the voter, then the right of the public should prevail.

Mr. DOHERTY: In the hon. member's own province, if one of these soldiers were at home, he would walk into the polling-booth and he would swear to his own qualification, and to his qualification in a particular district, and he would then be allowed to vote.

Mr. OLIVER: Sure.

Mr. DOHERTY: Now, we are requiring of that same soldier voter, who happens not to be at home, that he should swear to these very same things. The criticism of the hon. member of the sufficiency of the safeguards for the soldiers voting as proposed by this Bill, apply absolutely to the safeguards provided under the general law with regard of the votes of the voters in the province of Alberta. So far as that province is concerned, we require from the absent soldier all that would be required from him if he were at home and voted. As regards the other provinces where there is a system of lists established, there is a method of checking the statement of a man who is a qualified voter in a certain district. I do not think there is any less safety in the respect pointed out by the hon. member in the manner in which this soldiers' vote is to be taken than there is in the manner in which the ordinary vote is to be taken in certain parts of the Dominion. There was a suggestion made by the committee which had the consideration of these election matters that the law under which a man may give his vote in Alberta by merely swearing to his qualifications should be repealed, and when that provision came to the House we found that the opinion of all the members from that province, and a large number of others also, was that under the conditions in that province it would not be fair to repeal that law, and that in order that a man should be fairly treated there, it was essential that that principle should prevail which allowed men to vote upon their own affidavits as to their own qualifications. Surely the conditions under which our soldiers find themselves ought to be considered sufficient to justify that the same principle be applied in their case.

Mr. OLIVER: I am sorry to prolong the discussion, but I am compelled to point out that in the case of the ordinary Alberta voter at the ordinary election there is only one question of his qualification, and all he has to answer to decide on his vote is whether he resided in a certain electoral district or whether he did not. Under this legislation the voter has two things to do; he has to decide as to whether he must vote under his term of enlistment, or under his former residence, and that is a radical and important difference. There is another difference, and it is that the voter who comes into the poll to cast his vote in an ordinary Alberta election does so under circumstances, and conditions, and procedure, framed especially for the purpose of safeguarding him in the exercise of his right, and of taking proceedings against him should he go beyond that right. There is no provision in this Act for taking the same measures of precaution in the case of the soldier voting, nor is there any possibility of such precautions being taken. The two cases are not by any means alike and the difference is so great as to warrant my suggestion that the minister has undertaken to do something that it is not possible to do. The minister has undertaken to give a right to a certain man to which he certainly is entitled, but he has to give it to him under such circumstances that he cannot protect the right of the body politic.

At one o'clock, the committee took recess.

The committee resumed at three o'clock.

Mr. McKENZIE: As I understand it, the purpose of the section now before the committee is to provide that those of the active forces abroad who are qualified to vote at the time they enlisted shall be afforded means of casting their vote. But the form of oath provided in the Bill does not seem to apply to all cases. The form of oath is "that immediately before I was enlisted in the military forces of Canada I was qualified to be a voter." But a great many of the persons supposed to be enfranchised by that Act cannot take that oath. If this law is to become operative it will be necessary to make some slight change in the form of affidavit.

Mr. DOHERTY: The hon. gentleman will observe that there are two paragraphs in the form of affidavit given. The first is for the soldier who is enfranchised under this Act, the other is for the soldier who is already qualified to vote in a particular district.

Mr. McKENZIE: As I understand it, it does not say anything about the qualification in the first paragraph.

Mr. DOHERTY: No, because all that is required for his qualification is that he should be a British subject, twenty-one years of age, and should have resided for thirty days in some particular location in Canada before enlisting. If, on the other hand, he was, apart from being a soldier, qualified s a voter in a particular district, he will swear to the second paragraph, leaving out the other.

Mr. McKENZIE: It was hinted that we were able to legislate in this Parliament with regard to the men who would go to the front, but that once a volunteer goes from our shores and gets to the other side, he goes under control of the British War Office, which places him in such regiment or elsewhere as it may think proper. There is no such body known to the law as the Canadian military service. Our military forces, when they get to the other side, are scattered among as many regiments and battalions as is deemed proper. As I understand it, there is no entity in the army today which can be called a Canadian contingent or Canadian military force. I submit that the term the minister used in the Act is somewhat speculative, to say the least. If this law were one to confer the franchise upon the militia force of Canada, there is such a body recognized by the Militia Act. But the force that we send out is a force of volunteers who, of their own volition and without compulsion of the Government, became part and parcel of the British army. Therefore, I submit, we have no jurisdiction to follow the volunteer into the position in which he puts himself; we can only leave him to the control of the British army, and the British army law, until such time as he is released and comes back. I submit that Parliament is asked to legislate for a body that does not exist at all. I do not hesitate to put myself on record here—I did not speak on the second reading of the Bill—as being opposed to the measure. I believe that it is not workable and that it will only add to the difficulties already existing at the front. The soldiers when they go to the front take upon themselves certain responsibilities, and we repose certain trusts in them. They are to do the fighting for us, and we are to provide for them in every way that we can. Their minds are not to be bothered about political or municipal affairs; they must have a free hand to deal with the very arduous and important matters they have before them. On the other hand, the soldier has to trust to the friends whom he leaves behind and to the people of the country that in his absence political matters shall be kept on an even keel. As we trust them at the front, they have to trust us here. The one argument put forward is that the soldier is entitled to exercise the franchise. There may be some argument in that so far as the soldier who had the right to the franchise before he left his home is concerned. It might be said: You are depriving the soldier of the right which he would be able to exercise if he were at home. While it would, perhaps, be desirable to let the soldier who was a voter at home vote abroad, if that could be done in the right way, we are not called upon to create a new franchise in order to give votes to persons who could not vote if they were at home. I am opposed to this Bill because I do not think that it provides for a method whereby the soldiers may vote as they ought to vote. A person who expresses his opinion at the ballot box is in a somewhat similar position to the man who sits on a jury. If the minister were on the bench, and, as he was about to charge the jury, one of the jurors came in and took his place, he would say to that juror: You have not heard the evidence, and you are not in a position to give a verdict in this case. He would thereupon either order a new trial, or direct the juror, leave the box. This is what would be done in a case where persons are called upon to decide upon the facts, and an election is the highest sphere in which the people are called upon to decide upon the facts. The men to whom it is proposed to give votes are away from this country, and will be away perhaps a year or eighteen months, or two years, before they are called upon to exercise their franchise under this Act. They know nothing about the changes that have taken place in this country since they went away; they know nothing about the conduct of the Government since that time. They are deprived of the privilege of voting for the representative. A strong and eloquent plea was made the other night against granting to the man who received the minority vote in a constituency the right to take a seat in Parliament, for the reason that he was not the choice of the people. I agree, to a certain extent, with that view; yet under this proposed legislation we are called upon to give the right to vote to men who are far away from home, who are out of touch with the issues that will be threshed out in an election, and who have no knowledge of the qualifications of the candidates. Without taking shelter behind the assertion that I am not opposed to voting by soldiers, or behind any other shelter, I say that I am absolutely opposed to this Bill, and, so far as the soldiers who are my friends at the front are concerned, I take the responsibility of telling them that I do not think that this legislation is right or necessary. I am sure that the soldiers are not asking for it, and do not expect it.

Section stands.

On section 2—distribution of ballot papers:

Mr. GRAHAM: The soldiers may be divided into two classes, those who are in Canada and those who are outside of Canada. I see no reason why the soldiers who are in Canada at the time of an election cannot vote under the ordinary machinery and subject to the ordinary restrictions and regulations that are now in force. There is no reason why the deputy returning officer should not take the votes of the soldiers in the different localities in which they are stationed, and forward them to the constituencies to which they belong. Take the city of Ottawa: there could be one or two polls for the soldiers only. The votes could be recorded by the deputy returning officer, under the usual conditions and subject to the usual safeguards as now provided, and afterwards be sent to the proper constituency. There is another feature of this matter to which I think the attention of the minister ought to be directed. Several of the officers to whom these ballots will be sent for distribution and who, under this Act, will take the votes of the soldiers, are now or will be candidates for election to this House. It is not impugning their honesty, or anything of that kind, to point out the anomaly that will exist if men act as returning officers and handle votes that are cast for or against themselves. I imagine that no one of the officers to whom I refer would care to be placed in a position of that kind, and I think that some provision ought to be made by which in no case shall an officer who is himself a candidate be a returning officer or have anything to do with the ballots. These are the two points which I wish to impress strongly upon the minister in connection with this section of the Bill.. First, there is no need for all this machinery for the casting of the votes of soldiers who are in Canada; they could be taken with our ordinary machinery without removing any safeguards; and, secondly, no man should be allowed to handle ballots who is a candidate in an election.

Mr. DOHERTY: There is much that commends itself to one's judgment in the suggestion made by my hon. friend with respect to soldiers who are at home. In the committee we endeavoured to deal with the soldier vote as a whole and it is possible we did not give sufficient attention to the difference in methods necessary for those at home and those abroad. Would the hon. member contemplate that soldiers, say at Quebec or Halifax, whose votes would have to be sent to distant electoral districts should vote on the election day or sufficiently before the regularly appointed election day to allow of their ballots reaching their destinations by the polling day?

Mr. GRAHAM: I did not think out the details, but personally I would see no objection to having a polling day for the soldiers which would be sufficiently early to permit of their ballots reaching their home constituencies before the regular polling day. Of course it would be all secret and no person would know anything about the ballots until the close of the general poll.

Mr. R. B. BENNETT: The difficulty pointed out in that scheme is that in some cases it would be physically impossible for the soldiers to vote after nomination day and still have their votes reach their home electoral districts on election day. In most parts of Canada the matter could be worked out, but there would be great difficulty in regard to Vancouver troops who might be at Halifax, and it would be impossible for the votes of Victoria soldiers who might be at Halifax to be cast after nomination day and be received in the home constituency before polling day. It could be worked except for constituencies west of the Rockies.

Mr. GRAHAM: It would work out with the great majority of voters anyway.

Mr. DOHERTY: I suppose the vote might be taken on nomination day?

Mr. BENNETT: There was some discussion as to their knowing who the candidates were.

Mr. TURRIFF: I am opposed to this Bill, more particularly to clause 2, because I do not see any possible way in which the votes can be taken fairly so that there can be any certainty that they will be delivered as cast. Let us look for a moment how it works out in particular constituencies. In Edmonton the Conservative candidate is the commanding officer. Does the Minister of Justice think that it would operate satisfactorily in a case such as that, where there are hundreds of men brought in from the surrounding constituencies of Alberta, a great many of whom will be there long enough to qualify in Edmonton, but who will also have votes in their home constituencies? These men could vote in Edmonton by securing a half-day off on election day, go out in civilian clothes, take the oath that they were voters in Edmonton, and so cast their votes there. Even granted that a commanding officer who was a Conservative candidate would not care to act as returning officer for his own election, he would appoint somebody under him in the military force to do so. Let me ask, in all candour, is there a man in this House on either side who would want deliberately to put the ballots for his election in the hands of any candidate opposed to him, to let him deliver them or not deliver them just as he saw fit, without more safeguards than have been provided in this Bill? The more the Bill is discussed, the more utterly and absolutely absurd it seems to expect that the votes will be delivered and counted as they were given. If I was reasonably sure that the vote as cast would be delivered, I would hold up both hands for this Bill. I have a large number of men from my own constituency at the front, two out of three of whom are supporters of my own; but, under the circumstances, scattered, as they may be, in Turkey, Egypt, Bermuda, England, France, Belgium, and I hope in Germany, I would not have one hope in a thousand that their vote would be delivered in Canada at the election as they were intended to be. Who has asked for this legislation, might I ask the minister? We have not been able to hear yet of anybody who has done so. Has any section of the army, has any section of the militia forces asked for this legislation? For my part I do not believe that the Government has any expectation that this will ever become law; and it is all done to enable them to wave the flag that the Liberals were against allowing the soldiers to vote. We are not against allowing the soldiers to vote, but we are against allowing the Government to count the votes after they are cast. The Prime Minister yesterday spoke of the difficulty of getting honest elections in Canada. Let us talk plainly. We know on both sides of the House that there is a great deal of difficulty in getting the votes counted properly, with all the restrictions with which the best men in the country have been able to hedge about the Election Act during the last 50 years. We know what the results are. My right. hon. friend yesterday made some remark on that line which I will read to the House:

> I recall that with all our safeguards and legislative provisions, a deputy returning officer and a poll clerk went forth in one of our western provinces, pretended to journey into the north 100 or 120 miles, but went in reality only 20 or 30 miles, where they sat down under a tree, filled in 150 names, deposited as many ballots, and came back with the story of a unanimous Liberal vote in that remote part of the constituency. It is impossible to prevent fraud absolutely by legislative enactment.

I think my right hon. friend would have done himself more credit if he had told the whole truth in that connection. We all know that the Liberals suffered by the barefaced rascality which was practised on that occasion. That was the first and only time in the history of Canada that a Government deliberately brushed aside all technicalities. They would not call for a new election when they could have won easily, but they took steps to hand over the seat to a Conservative candidate.

Mr. BRODER: They simply gave back the stolen goods.

Mr. TURRIFF: Certainly, but did hon. gentlemen opposite ever suggest doing anything of the kind? Only last summer three constituencies were absolutely stolen in the backwoods of Manitoba, and the candidates were all confirmed in their seats. There was no restitution there of the stolen goods, not a bit of it.

Let me tell my hon. friends what took place in my constituency in the last Dominion election that hon. gentlemen opposite had the running of. That was in 1896. At that time we had almost the same system of voting that we have at present. The Elections Act did not contain the provision that enables a man to cast his vote on election day whether his name is on the list or not, the provision which the Minister of Justice and my hon. friend from Calgary (Mr. Bennett) suggested should be struck out only a few days ago—and I quite absolve both of them from having any wrong intention in making that proposal. Several days before the election took place, and after the ordinary pen and ink lists for the polling division had been posted up, men were sent out from the Conservative headquarters in Moosomin to instruct every enumerator throughout the constituency to strike off the list a certain percentage of Liberal names. These men were sent out by the men in charge of the Conservative campaign in that constituency. One of these men, whom I know very well, went to one of the Conservative enumerators in my constituency and suggested that he should strike off 25 per cent of the Liberal names on the list. The enumerator, as straightforward a man as ever lived, absolutely refused to do it. He sent for me and told me what had been suggested. He said that he told me not because he wanted it blazed abroad, but that my friends in the other divisions should be on the look out for trouble. What happened at the next polling subdivision? The enumerator there, the night before the election, struck off twenty-five Liberal names, and then cleared for parts unknown; so that the next day there was nobody to put the names on the list again. My hon. friend from Qu'Appelle (Mr. Thomson), who was in the same constituency at that time, knows something about it, for he had a somewhat similar experience. When polling day came there was almost a riot in the next town to where I live. They had a rope ready for the enumerator, and if they had found him they were going to drag him through a pond close to the town. But he could not be found. I must say, however, to the credit of the Conservatives in that polling subdivision that we did not lose many votes through it, for afterwards man after man told us that they voted for the Liberal candidate because they would not stand for such work as had been going on.

I point this out to show that with all the safeguards we have, it is possible that an honest vote may not be recorded. What can we expect then when the vote is taken thousands of miles away, when the men at the front are not so likely to be as careful as they would be if at home, and when the commanding officers are in many cases candidates! Suppose the commanding officer hands over the work to somebody beneath him who is looking for promotion and wants to stand in with the powers that be. What is likely to happen? So far as I can see, this Bill provides no penalties for the man who does not send in all the votes, or who misdirects them. There are many ways in which the intention of the voter at the front could be defeated. The more you look at this Bill the more difficulties you see in it; it simply bristles with difficulties from one end to the other. Why is the Minister of Justice so anxious to give votes to the soldiers? He knows that 35 or 40 per cent of the voters of Canada do not take the trouble to vote anyway, and I am sure that some of the soldiers who are to be provided with votes would not take the trouble to vote if they were at home. On the other hand, many no doubt would like to vote, even at the front, and I for one would like to give them the opportunity of voting. I would hold up both hands for any Bill that would ensure that the votes would be counted as the voters intended.

Again, no hon. member of this House has yet shown that there has been any considerable demand from any part of the militia for soldiers' votes. There is one certain and easy way of getting over this difficulty. Why does not the Prime Minister do the straightforward, honest and patriotic thing, and say that there shall be no election until the war is over, or until the end of the term of Parliament. Nobody would object to that, and if the war was not over when the end of the term of Parliament came I venture to say that every man in this House would be willing to extend the term of Parliament until the war was over. To my mind, it is an outrage to throw this country into the throes of a general election right in the middle of this war, when every bit of energy in the country is required for conducting that war properly. In this easy way the Prime Minister and his followers could settle the whole difficulty. Why do they not do the decent and patriotic thing, and tell the country straightforwardly that there shall be no election before next session at all events? We have every reason to believe that in a year from now the war will be over and our soldiers back in Canada. But I think that hon. gentlemen opposite do not want the soldiers to have votes when they are back in Canada They would rather not have the votes of the soldiers when they come back. A good deal has transpired in the last two months that could lead one to take that view. Therefore, we find the Government anxious to railroad this Bill through the House to give votes to the soldiers and at the same time to provide practically no safeguard which would justify us in the expectation that the votes, as they are given in the firing line, will be delivered in the constituencies where the men come from in the way intended.

Mr. H. H. McLEAN: I am very glad to hear the hon. gentleman who has just taken his seat (Mr. Turriff) make the statement that he is strongly in favour of votes for soldiers. I find that a great many hon. members on this side of the House are in favour of votes for soldiers. The difficulty seems to be to provide the necessary machinery to have the votes taken and also to provide the necessary safeguards. It does seem to me that there is sufficient legal ability in this House to draft a Bill that will provide the necessary machinery as well as the safeguards.

With some diffidence, I would suggest to the hon. Minister of Justice (Mr. Doherty) certain changes. I approach this question with an open mind. These suggestions have just come into my mind to-day, and it may be that they will be found to be very crude. Sections 2 and 3 perhaps ought to be considered together. They provide for the casting of the votes. Section 2 provides that the envelopes for holding the votes shall be sent by the Clerk of the Crown in Chancery to the officer in command of each military base in Canada in which volunteers are serving and also to the office of the High Commissioner for Canada in London. Then, section 3 provides that, on the election being called, the Clerk of the Crown in Chancery shall communicate with the officer commanding the corps in which the volunteer is serving and that the commanding officer shall provide each volunteer with a ballot paper. That is for the men in Canada. As regards the men in Europe, the Clerk of the Crown in Chancery shall notify the secretary of the High Commissioner of the issuing of the writ and the secretary shall thereupon send a sufficient number of ballot papers, affidavits and envelopes to the proper officer or officers, and such officer or officers shall give each volunteer entitled to vote a ballot paper, affidavit and envelope.

The provision in regard to the duties of the commanding officer are very crude. We have to consider what men are entitled to this vote. First, we have the body of men in Canada. We will have under training in Canada about 20,000 men; they will be scattered about—10,000 at Valcartier and perhaps 5,000 at two other camps. Surely some simple means could be provided for taking the votes of these men in camp. The machinery ought to be simple and effective for that purpose. Next, we come to the votes of the soldiers in England. We are told that we will have at the base in England 20,000 men. The men in England, with the exception of those who are in the hospitals, are altogether in one place, under efficient military organization and under the control of our Militia Department. The third class comprises the men at the front. I am told by my hon. friend the Minister of Militia and Defence (Major General Hughes) that we have 38,000 men at the front and that number will be raised shortly to 50,000 men. Our men at the front will be in two divisions. They are now in one division. That division is under the command of General Alderson and the Canadian officers and staff under him. These men are assembled close together or within a very few miles. With these men all together, or within a very limited area, there should be no difficulty in taking their votes. Many of my friends who have spoken say that these men are at the fighting line. We are led to believe that these men are engaged absolutely in battle night and day. I am told, and you will see it in the reports that come from the front, that trench work consists of one day in the trenches and two days out of the trenches. If they put in two days in the trenches they have four days out of the trenches. They go back to the base, where they are assembled, and there should be no difficulty while they are there in taking their votes. Of course, I can see that there will be a number of men whose votes it might be difficult to take, but we have to face that fact.

I think the machinery provided under sections 2 and 3 is defective. You start right off, and, as soon as the election is announced, you say that the secretary of the High Commissioner shall take action. What shall he do? He must give instructions to the officers commanding the different corps and units and send them ballot papers, and they are to carry out these instructions. We know that no civilian can give instructions of any kind to military officers. We know that the military officers at the front could not possibly take any commands, orders or instructions from a civilian like the secretary of the High Commissioner. That would be impossible. Then, remember how difficult it would be for him to find out who are the officers commanding these different units. It is very difficult. For example, in England there are the hospital corps, the army service corps, the paymaster corps, the divisional corps, the artillery, the ammunition corps, cavalry, and what is called the base or recruiting camp. You have all these different units divided into many different parts and having amongst them many commanding officers. It would be almost impossible for the secretary of the High Commissioner, in the short time allowed him to get the necessary information and even to get the proper postal addresses. By the time he got the information changes might be made. Then there is this further consideration: he has not been in the habit of communicating with the officers commanding the different units; he has not been transmitting information to them, and he has not been receiving reports from them.

It may be asked: how can we work this out effectively? It would seem to me that we have the most perfect machinery possible provided for us now. The Militia Department, or the Militia Council, have control practically of all the Canadian troops in England and at the front. Our paymaster's department is a Canadian department. The paymaster's department, now that it is in proper working order, has proved to be most efficient. They have to communicate directly with every officer commanding the different units and they have to directly put the pay into the pockets of every man at the front and of every man in England. This is a direct channel of communication, not only with every officer commanding every unit but with every man in Canada, at the front or in England. Pay is the most effectual way of communicating with the men. We have there a perfect channel of communication under proper direction.

It has been said that it would not be necessary to have this legislation, if the Prime Minister and the Government would say that no election should be brought on until after the war. I have a firm and honest belief that the Government of this country will not have an election until after the war. I believe their duty at the present time is to carry on the business of the country, but their first and prime duty is to prosecute this war with their full energy and all their ability, and to allow nothing to interfere with that. They have the precedent of England for the adoption of this policy. I am glad to have seen that the Opposition has given to the Government during this session, and during the special war session as well, every assistance in their power to conduct public business without party controversy. But there is this to be considered: suppose the war should end in a year, and a truce be declared, we know very well that our troops would have to stay in Europe after that, for five or six or perhaps eight months, as in South Africa they had to remain for almost a year. Until all the preliminaries are carried out, the indemnities arranged for, and the treaty entered into, our soldiers could not return to Canada, and in the natural course of events, the time for a general election would come before then.

As I have said, the Militia Department has the most perfect machinery and the most perfect channel of communication to reach effectually every man and every officer at the front. We have provided the soldiers with their clothing, and we are providing their pay, and when promotions are made by General Alderson, he reports at once to the Militia Department here, and every detail at the front is practically arranged through the Militia Department in Canada. My suggestion then is, that the ballot papers should be sent to the secretary of the Militia Council, and that there should be imposed on the Militia Council the duty of forwarding these ballot papers to the proper officers, because they know the commanding officers of the different units, their location, and everything about them. The Militia Council could give the necessary military instructions that would be promptly obeyed by the officers of the different units, and then the ballot papers could be returned sealed to the Militia Council, to be handed over to the Clerk of the Crown in Chancery. This, Sir, is my suggestion.

Mr. DOHERTY: I have heard with interest the admirable suggestion made by the hon. member (Mr. H. H. McLean). I had in mind, when we come to the section which describes the officers to whom the ballots are to be sent from the Secretary of State, that the officer on the other side who is in the best position, as I have been informed to have these ballots effectively transmitted to the bases where they can be used, would be the chief paymaster of the Overseas Canadian Expeditionary Force. He is an officer already appointed, and he would do this work ex-officio, and not because the Government has selected him. Those of us who have been concerned with the introduction of this Bill have been most anxious, so far as possible, to make its operation independent of personal selection by the Government, and the utilization of the machinery of the paymaster's department would operate to make an officer, and not a particular individual, the intermediary through whom these ballots would be forwarded. I know that during this discussion very improbable and far-fetched grounds have been invoked to base suspicion upon, and if we were to designate the Militia Council to be in any way connected with controlling the return of the ballots, it might give rise to the suggestion that in some way or other the Govenment would be enabled to control the selection of particular men. I am anxious to avoid that, so far as I possibly can, and to my mind it might be better not to utilize the officers of any department of Government to return the ballots.

Let it be assumed that whatever machinery we devise here—and we are ready to adopt any well-reasoned suggestions in that respect—may sufficiently secure a genuine vote by the soldier, then it is my belief that once you get that properly sealed into the post office to be transmitted to the Clerk of the Crown in Chancery, it will be the safest way for the ballots to be returned here. I think that the fewer people through whose hands these ballots are going to pass, the better it will be. Every day we send through the post office things the secrecy of which is most important, and once you get the ballot properly marked and properly deposited in the post office, it is to my mind the best way to secure its not being tampered with in any way. Then, it being addressed to the Clerk of the Crown in Chancery, when it reaches him here it is in the hands of a responsible officer. It comes to him sealed—and I propose to make that more absolutely clear—and verified, so far as such things can be verified. It is made his duty to put that in a sealed package. He seals it with his own seal, making a package for each electoral district, and he forwards it either by mail or by special messenger to the returning officer; and the returning officer has to produce that in a sealed condition in the presence of the candidates or their representatives. The returning officer puts these ballots in the ballot-box, just as the deputy returning officer puts other people's ballots in the ballot box, and that returning officer will count those ballots. The hon. member for Assiniboia says that all he objects to is the Government counting the ballots. Where he finds in this Bill any provision for the Government counting the ballots, I must say, passes my comprehension. The ballots will be counted by the returning officer. Other ballots are counted by the deputy returning officer. Surely, the returning officer is as much to be trusted as his deputies are. In effect, this is just one more additional deputy returning officer who is the returning officer himself. He will count these ballots at the close of the poll. It was suggested this morning that the provision of the Bill that he shall count these ballots at the close of the poll did not mean, as it does in other Bills, at once after the closing of the poll. We will make that clear. So, the only difference will be that at five o'clock in the afternoon of polling day, say in the hon. gentleman's constituency, if there be soldiers' votes, those votes will be counted just as other votes will be counted, in the presence of the candidates or their representatives. Surely, it is impossible to suggest that the Government is going to count the ballots.

So far as those ballots getting back to Canada is concerned, one thing strikes me with regard to the suggestion that they come through the Militia Department or any other department. I would like to avoid even the semblance of these ballots after they are marked being in any way in charge of the Government as a Government. The election is in charge of the Clerk of the Crown in Chancery. He is not our instrument in any way; his duties are clearly prescribed. As to that part, I think the hon. gentleman should absolve us from the suggestion that we are trying to "count the ballots."

Mr. TURRIFF: In using the expression "counts the ballots" I had not in mind the mere fact of ascertaining the number of the ballots for the several candidates after the close of the polls. I was thinking of the whole course of collecting the ballots, forwarding them and counting them,—the whole proceeding from beginning to end.

Mr. DOHERTY: Will not the hon. gentleman admit that the one thing the Government has to do is to reach a determination as to the man on the other side who shall take the ballots and post them? I do not understand the hon. gentleman to suggest that the Government controls the Post Office; I hardly think he will suggest that. We are trying to meet any difficulty that may be raised by putting this into the hands of a permanent official who must be trusted with everything that has to be done with regard to an election. Let me say further that any other suggestion, short of refusing the soldier his vote, that will tend to prevent the Government from having any control of this operation, I will accept with great pleasure, and I am satisfied that my colleagues will endorse me in that statement.

The hon. member who last spoke (Mr. H. H. McLean) has pointed out that there is no necessary connection between this Bill and an election now or later. He has given a very good and conclusive reason for that. Might I point out another? We dealt the other day with the Elections Act. Did anybody come forward and say: Unless you are going to have an election there is no use of amending the Elections Act? The hon. member for Halifax (Mr. A. K. Maclean) last year, before the war began, moved for a committee—and we were very glad to assent to that motion—to consider and improve the Elections Act. Did anybody suggest that that hon. member must have come to the conclusion that an election was to be held right off and that otherwise he would not have proposed the amendment of the Act?

There is only one question here—we cannot get away from it; we always come back to it—and that is: should the soldier have a vote, and should the machinery for registering that vote be provided? If he should not have a vote, we should not do anything about it now or later. If he should have a vote, now is the time to provide the machinery by which that vote can be registered. What other class in the community would stand for it, if, being entitled to a vote—and I am assuming for the moment that this is admitted in relation to the soldiers—and if the law as it stands did not provide the necessary machinery, they were told: There is not going to be an election at once; there may be no election, and therefore it is not necessary to do anything? If there is a right there should be in the law means provided for the exercise of that right. As to the suggestion that the Prime Minister should say that there will be no election for a certain length of time, I can hardly see how hon. gentlemen can be serious in such a thing. Is the prerogative of the Crown to dissolve the House if conditions require it to be renounced for a definite period? Yet, that is what hon. gentlemen are asking for.

Now, to come back to the objections made to the details of the Bill. If I followed the hon. member for Assiniboia (Mr. Turriff)—and I do not propose to discuss with him past stories of scandal; what we are concerned in, I believe, is how we are going to make this proposed legislation effective—he suggested that a soldier in barracks in Edmonton, might, under the existing law in that province, and without legislation at all, take the necessary oath and register his vote. I quite recognize that that is possible. Before the hon. member for South Renfrew (Mr. Graham) made his suggestion, in considering the matter I had come to the conclusion that there should be added to this Bill a provision that nothing contained in it should prevent the soldier, in a case where he found himself in a position to do so, from exercising his franchise in the ordinary manner, and, further, that when he found himself in that position, he should so exercise his franchise. This would make it quite clear that this Bill is to apply only to the class of people to whom it is intended to apply, that is, persons who, by reason of their military duties, are prevented from exercising their franchise in the ordinary way. I do not propose to ask that this section be passed at the present time, because I recognize fully the value of the suggestion made by the hon. member for South Renfrew. I want to put the operation of this proposed legislation, so far as it is possible to do so, in a position where even a suggestion of improper control by anybody may be rendered an impossibility. So also do I wish to make this Bill operate to give the soldiers a vote with as little disturbance as possible of the conditions that surround voting generally. If we can find the means whereby the vote of the soldier at home may be taken at polls, or at other places appointed for the taking of such votes where the soldiers are stationed, and the ballots then distributed to the electoral districts where they belong, I shall certainly be very glad to modify the Bill so as to bring about that result. That would reduce the danger pointed out in the method suggested absolutely to the case of men who are overseas. With regard to that, I am glad to have the suggestion for the hon. member for Sunbury and Queens (Mr. H. H. McLean) and I shall be glad to have any suggestion from any member that will provide further precautions with which to surround the giving of that vote, and more particularly that will aim to meet the suggestion that there is any possibility of this Government in any way manipulating or countenancing or conniving at manipulation of the ballots.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: My hon. friend, in the course of his observations, stated that the Government could not make any declaration as to the exercise of the prerogative of the Crown with regard to dissolution. I have not uttered a word up to this time upon this subject, nor do I intend to do so. The Government will have to take their own course with regard to dissolution, and, when they dissolve Parliament, whether it be this year or later, the people will be the judge as to whether the reasons for dissolution were or were not sufficient, and whether that course was inspired by patriotic motives, or by motives which were not patriotic. As to the exercise of the prerogative of the Crown, and the assertion of my hon. friend that the Government cannot be expected to make any statement on this point, I want to take complete issue with him. It has been done elsewhere: it has been done, more or less formally, in England. The statement has been made, though not formally, that there was no cause for an election; that it would be better to have no election during the war. This statement has been made by ministers and by members more than once in England. But this Government, the Government of Canada, have again and again declared to the people that there is no occasion to exercise the prerogative of dissolution. Not later than last year this was done by the Government. My hon. friend will recall that a statute was passed some years ago by Parliament providing that in the province of Manitoba the election lists shall be prepared every year by a board of judges. The same statute provides also that in the unorganized districts of the province of Ontario a board of judges shall prepare every year, in the months of July and August, the electoral lists. This power is to be exercised mechanically by the board of judges, without an injunction from the Government, but the exercise of that power may be dispensed with by Order in Council passed by the Government. An order was passed last year that there should be no revision of the electoral lists in the unorganized portion of Ontario and in the organized polling districts in the province of Manitoba. The Government last year, therefore, intimated that there would be no election. This being the case, there is no reason to believe that the Government may not be called upon to give an intimation as to whether or not the prerogative of dissolution shall be exercised. I repeat that, whether we have dissolution or whether we do not have dissolution, the action of the Government will have to be judged when the time comes.

Mr. DOHERTY: I have a profound respect for any opinion on a question of this kind emanating from the right hon. gentleman, but I entirely fail to see why a provision made by the statute, and the exercise by the Government of the power conferred by that statute, in any way implies that the Crown or any responsible ministers advising the Crown can bind themselves that for a certain period of time, without regard to what conditions may arise within that period of time, they will not perform what those conditions might make it their duty to do. I have already seen, as emanating from the right hon. gentleman, a statement that the fact that the Government exercises the power which it has to exercise some time in the month of June or July, if my memory serves me, whereby it dispenses with the making of the lists for certain districts, binds the Government and the Crown that for a year after that there shall be no dissolution of the House. I must confess that I cannot see any ground for drawing that conclusion. I presume that it would be a fair inference that when a government in the month of June or July, or whatever is the period within which it may do so, does exercise the power of dispensing with the preparing of the lists, it does so because at that time it does not anticipate that there shall be an election. But to conclude from that, that for a year to come the Crown has forfeited its prerogative right to dissolve Parliament and that the ministers have become relieved of what the conditions in the country arising after that action might make it their duty to do in the way of advising the Crown, I must say seems to be an absolute non sequitur. Surely it would be a less deplorable consequence of the exercise of that power that a limited district in the country might, perhaps, find itself without lists than that for a year the Crown's prerogative should remain in abeyance, and that no ministry, no matter how imperative might be the reasons for giving that advice, would be free to advise a dissolution of Parliament. I have great respect for the right hon. gentleman's views, but I certainly cannot concur in that. The right hon. gentleman says it has been done before, but I notice that when he referred to what had been said in England he said "not formally," and that what was said in that country was that there was no occasion for an immediate dissolution and perhaps no cause for dissolution there until after the war. I made no reference to any statement of that kind; I was referring to what I understood to be called for by different gentlemen last evening—an assurance that there would be no election for a certain period of time. I am expressing no opinion whether there ought or ought not to be an election; I only desire to point out that it seems to me that so long as we are going to continue to be governed in accordance with the constitution, no such undertaking can be properly given.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: I do not know that I wish to contradict very much of what my hon. friend has said. I do not contend that the fact that the Governor signs an order to dispense with the necessary formalities for an election is binding upon the Government that there is to be no dissolution; but I say that my hon. friend himself has given the interpretation of that act. It is an expression of the opinion of the Government that there is no cause for an election. Of course, even after the Government have taken such a course as that, occasions may suddenly arise which may compel dissolution, but my hon. friend will agree with me that when the Government dispense with the necessary formalities which must take place before an election, it is a statement to the public that, in the opinion of the Government, there is no cause for a dissolution, and a subsequent dissolution could not be justified unless a new cause compelling a dissolution had arisen which did not then exist. That is the point which I make, and therefore I say that the Government has more than once stated its opinion that there should be no dissolution. It does not follow that there might not be a dissolution if the power of dissolution exists at all times; but it has to be exercised on proper occasions and under proper circumstances. All I say to my hon. friend is that when the Government, as they did last year, pass an Order in Council dispensing with the formalities which must take place in Ontario and Manitoba before an election, no dissolution should take place unless there is a cause which did not exist when the order was passed. Something new, something which could not have been foreseen, might cause a dissolution. That is all the Government can undertake. To-day the Government can declare that they see no cause for an election, or that they see cause, or they may say nothing. That is their prerogative and their privilege. I do not ask the Government what they will do; it is their own secret; they may do what they please; but if they dissolve or do not, whatever action they may take, they will have to account for it to the electors; and if they dissolve, they will have to give a sufficient reason to the electors to justify a dissolution.

Mr. TURRIFF: I can give an instance in point. Last year, when the Legislature of Saskatchewan was called together for what was known as a war session, the programme was laid before the House and the leader of the Opposition in the legislature asked whether, if the Opposition concurred in everything and went in for a short session and brought up none of the subjects that are usually brought up in an ordinary session, there would be any certainty that there would not be an election before another session of the legislature was called. The Prime Minister of Saskatchewan promised absolutely that as far as he could see there was no intention whatever of having an election, at least until after there was another session of the legislature.

Mr. DOHERTY: That only proves that the Prime Minister of Saskatchewan and I do not agree upon this subject.

Mr. HUGH CLARK: It is immaterial to me and perhaps to others when the elections are to be held or whether they are held at all. But it is utterly absurd for any person to suggest, at a time when we are endeavouring to pass a measure to give votes to soldiers who are at the front that there should be no election until after the war is over. This Act contemplates an election during the war.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: Hear, hear.

Mr. CLARK: There is no doubt about it. What is the use of the measure if no election is likely to be held.

Mr. OLIVER: Hear, hear.

Mr. CLARK: Hon. gentlemen applaud. I tell them they are wasting their time discussing this measure if there is to be no election and no chance of an election during war time.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. CLARK: We do not know how long the war will last, but the Bill cannot be made of any use unless an election takes place during the war. Hon. gentlemen opposite appear to be very much afraid that there will be an election.

Mr. MICHAEL CLARK: Not at all.

Mr. HUGH CLARK: I can recall an occasion two years ago when they kept us up here night and day trying to force an election when we were endeavouring to prepare for this war. We endeavoured at that time, as we all remember, to do our share towards naval participation in the war that we saw coming.

Mr. OLIVER: That you saw coming!

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Mr. CLARK: We were then within a year or two of the previous election, and yet hon. gentlemen opposite were determined to have an election at that time. But they do not want an election now, two years later. The position they take seems to me to be absurd.

Mr. KAY: Does the hon. gentleman think we should have an election this year?

Mr. CLARK: I am not concerned whether we have an election this year or not. I said at the start it was immaterial to me when we had an election. The objections that I have heard so far to this measure come from hon. gentlemen who are suspicious that something crooked is going to be done in the taking of votes at the front.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Hear, hear.

Mr. CLARK: I cannot understand the fury and vehemence of the hon. member for Assiniboia (Mr. Turriff), backed up by the hon. member for Edmonton (Mr. Oliver), who appear to be exceedingly suspicious that something crooked is going to be done in connection with the counting of the ballots. The one thing that these gentlemen ought to suspect most is their own suspicion. There is absolutely nothing whatever in it, and no justification whatever for that suspicion. I would like to know what the Conservative party has done, what this Government has done, to justify any such suspicion. The Conservative party has not conducted a federal election in this country for twenty years. Every federal election in that time has been under the control of hon. gentlemen opposite. The hon. gentlemen composing this Government have never been guilty of any such actions as would justify hon. gentlemen opposite in suspecting that they were conniving at anything in the way of crookedness in connection with this vote. Not only that, but if we take into consideration the Redistribution Bill passed last year, and the fair and just way in which it was made, I think hon. gentlemen ought to give a little more consideration to the Government. As far as the province of Ontario is concerned, I say the Government waived a great many legitimate advantages that they could have had from a redistribution.

I do not think that hon. gentleman opposite have any reason to complain about the redistribution, and I do not think they do complain about it. I think it is only right that they should give this Government credit for fairness in regard to redistribution; and the way that redistribution was made should convince them that the election will be conducted fairly and squarely. In the province of Ontario the Conservative party has been in power for ten years, during which time three elections have been held; but not one single charge of crookedness at elections has been made against the Government; not one protest has gone to trial; there has not been one solitary charge of ballot-switching or crookedness at the polls during all that time.

Mr. R. B. BENNETT: What about the ten years previous?

Mr. CLARK: I do not want to refer to the past. I do not like the suspicions and insinuations of hon. gentlemen opposite against the officers who are to take the vote at the front. I do not see an hon. gentleman opposite whom, if he were an officer, I would not trust with ballots cast in my favour. I do not believe that there is any more justification for suspicion against the officers at the front than there is for suspicion against the gentlemen in the Dominion of Canada who will be appointed returning officers and poll clerks. These officers at the front are not only officials of the Government for the purpose of taking the vote, but also officers in His Majesty's service; and I have every confidence that the vote will be taken properly, and I think hon. gentlemen opposite ought to have the same confidence.

I agree with the hon. member for St. John that the question bristles with difficulties; but these difficulties can be surmounted, and the discussion in committee is bound to have that effect. I think all of us will agree that the soldiers should have votes; it is therefore our business to see that they get votes. Proper safeguards must surround the voting so that no crokedness can take place. But I am not apprehensive that there will be any bogus ballot boxes or anything of that sort, and I do not think hon. gentlemen opposite should have any suspicions in that regard. I have the greatest confidence that the officers who will be appointed to take the vote will conduct it properly.

Mr. NESBITT: I have not been in the House very much for the last few days, and have not heard much of the discussion. I did, however, hear the hon. member for Calgary (Mr. Bennett) speak last night. The other day I asked the Minister of Justice if there had been any demand for this Bill from the soldiers themselves. Although I did not think it was a very serious question, the Speaker thought that it was, and ruled it out of order; and the minister did not answer. I understood the hon. member for Calgary to say last night that 12,000 men had enlisted from Calgary, and that every one of them had demanded the vote.

Mr. R. B. BENNETT: I said that 12,000 had enlisted from Alberta. If I said that they had all demanded the vote I certainly did not intend so to state. I said that a very large number of the men that I knew had asked that that provision should be made. Of course I do not know the whole 12,000.

Mr. NESBITT: I beg the hon. gentleman's pardon. I understood him to say that they had all come from Calgary, and had all demanded the vote; and it struck me at the time that that was very different from what had occurred in my section of the country. So far as I can recollect, about 300 men enlisted from the city of Woodstock and district. One of the contingents has gone to London, another to Guelph, and the first went abroad. I have met many of these men on the street in Woodstock, but not one of them has suggested that he would like to have a vote; nor have I had any post-cards, letters, or communications of any description from those who have enlisted from Woodstock asking for a vote. I do not say that they would not accept the privilege of voting if they had the opportunity. But I have been wondering where the demand for this Bill came from. If I were at the front, I think I should be kept busy dodging bullets; I should certainly dodge as many as I could.

I notice that the first section of this Bill provides that the soldiers will have the right to vote for a certain electoral district. I would like to point out to the minister that a good many of the men who enlisted in Woodstock do not live there. I understand from the papers which give the news of the recruiting that many came from the south riding. I think that a lot of the members of the last contingent enlisted in Tillsonburg or Ingersoll, which are both in the south riding. I know that a number of those who enlisted in Woodstock for the first two contingents are not familiar with our expressions with reference to elections. For instance, a number of these men would not know the difference between the south riding and the north riding. I am not jealous of these men having votes. I would have no objection whatever, if we could be sure that the votes would be counted exactly as the soldiers wished them to be counted. I am pleased to say that many of the native-born who enlisted from my section of the county are friends of mine anyway. But we all know that most of those who enlisted from Western Ontario were natives of the British Isles. They have a perfect right to vote, so far as I know, and I think most of them have been in this country long enough to be entitled to vote and so far as Woodstock is concerned, I think most of those who enlisted would have registered if they had been home at the time of the election. I see that section 1 provides that a volunteer shall be entitled to vote who has been a resident of any place in Canada for a period of not less than thirty days. If my memory serves me right our law requires a residence of three months in a locality.

Mr. DOHERTY: The provincial law requires a longer period than thirty days.

Mr. NESBITT: Somebody has said that there would be no necessity for this Bill if it were not the intention of the Government to bring on an election. Whether that be true or not I shall leave to the committee to determine. But, if a number of these men are still in Canada, there is no reason why they should not be voted in the ordinary way. Why should they not be sent back to their own districts? Take districts like Guelph and London; there is no reason why these men should not be sent back to poll their votes.

Mr. DOHERTY: The hon. member for South Renfrew (Mr. Graham). earlier in the afternoon, made a suggestion looking to provision being made that those who are still in Canada should register their votes in Canada. That would apply to cases where they were near to their own districts. The suggestion was also made that where they were a great distance away we should arrange to take their votes at the places where they may be encamped subject to sending their ballots back to their districts. I do not propose to ask that this particular section be adopted until that suggestion has had the fullest consideration, and I hope we will be able to adopt a system which will substantially meet that view.

Mr. NESBITT: I did not hear my hon. friend from South Renfrew (Mr. Graham), but in reading the Bill I could not see any reason why something of the kind could not be done. As to the man actually in the fighting line, we know that the people of this country are very strong on sentiment and are very eager to provide everything for the soldier. Now we see that the minister is going to provide votes for them. We have been diligently providing everything that is required to eat or wear and we have been very anxious to contribute in every way possible to their comfort. I cannot conceive that these men either in England or at the front will be worrying themselves about the election if an election comes on. They will have other things to engage their attention if they are really at the front and on the firing line. However, personally, I would have no objection to their voting if it can be done in a feasible way. My hon. friend will readily appreciate that even a person with a non-suspicious mind like I have—rather a stupid one—would not very much like some commanding officer to have the absolute control of how men were to vote either at the front or in Canada. The minister, for whom I have a sincere regard, can quite well appreciate that even people of a non-suspicious mind would not like to be put in that position. We all quite agree with the hon. gentleman who spoke a moment ago that the officers in command of these men are honorable. I know a good many of them who are highly honorable. Still, you know that in politics there is an awful temptation to get the better of the other fellow if you can. There is small blame attached to a person who does that. While I have a high idea of the officers at the front, they would, after all, have the control, practically speaking, of how the men in their regiments were to vote. Nobody would be brutal enough to say to his men that they must vote this way or that way, but they would suggest in some way that would be kindly how the men could vote. You cannot drive a man, but you can coax him very readily. There is a strong objection to having the votes taken in the way proposed. I am not, as I said, of a suspicious turn of mind, but really, is it not asking a good deal from both sides of this House that the officer in charge, whatever his politics may have been before he went to the front, should have the absolute say and control as to how the men under him should vote? That only applies to the men at the front or in England. It strikes me, and I am glad to see that it has struck the minister in the same way, that it would be absolutely unnecessary to provide for voting in that way with respect to the men who remain in Canada. I am glad to see that the minister agrees with the position I take on this matter.

We have all been anxious to close the session and get away home. This session has not been long in comparison with ordinary sessions, but there seemed to be a feeling in the air when we first came here that the session would be of a non-partisan character. Sometimes it has drifted down to party discussion. Last night it was very strongly on the border line of straight party discussion. We all came here with the idea that it would be a short session and that we would get home early. When we thought we had everything done this Bill came up. It gives special privileges to a class of the community even if this class is made up of soldiers whom we all honour. I am glad to see that everybody does the same. I dislike, personally, hot-air loyalty. Hot-air-and-champagne loyalty never did go down with me worth a cent. I dislike to hear it, but I have no doubt that we are all ready to acknowledge our indebtedness to the soldier who has gone to the front to risk his life. I confess quite freely that I am too big a coward unless I had to do so, but I have a great appreciation of the fellows who do. I endeavour to do my duty as nearly as I can in other ways. We are going to pass a Bill here that gives a special privilege. Is it asked for? If it is not specially asked for, why press it? If it is asked for, let us sit down and work out how the soldier can get a vote if he wants it. If he does not want it why bother with it? What demand has been made? If there has been a demand what kind of a demand has been made?

Mr. SUTHERLAND: Mr. Chairman, I would like to say a word or two with regard to the last remark made by the hon. member for North Oxford (Mr. Nesbitt). He claims that this is a special privilege that we are giving to a section of our people. I claim that it is not a special privilege, but it is simply giving them the same rights that we who remain at home exercise.

Mr. NESBITT: The ordinary registered voter has to be three months in the locality, this provides thirty days. That is the special privilege that I was referring to.

Mr. SUTHERLAND: I am glad to have some explanation from the hon. gentleman, because he repeated the remark that it was a special privilege. Thirty days' residence in this country applies only to British subjects. If that is the distinction that he, made, I am glad to learn that that is what he meant.

Mr. NESBITT: My hon. friend will also recognize that he and I can only vote where we live.

Mr. SUTHERLAND: And we can only vote once, and without this very legislation our Canadian soldiers, who, above all others, have the highest sense of their duty to their country and to the Empire, would be deprived of votes. It is to that I take exception. We have heard during this session talk about frauds being perpetrated on the country, and about injustice having been done to our solders, in the matter of their equipment, and, Sir, that is one important reason why, to my mind, the soldiers on whom these wrongs are alleged to have been perpetrated should have an opportunity of expressing their views. At all events, the fact that the Government has introduced a measure of this kind is evidence that they are not afraid of the votes of the soldiers, and that they believe they have treated them justly and fairly from the very first day they were mobilized in Canada, and since they have been placed side by side with the soldiers of the Empire. We have heard much about the boot scandal, and those of us who saw the men at Valcartier, trudging in the mud and the wet—

Mr. MACDONALD: I rise to a point of order. I submit that it is not open to my hon. friend to discuss the boot question, which is before a committee of the House.

An hon. MEMBER: Oh.

Mr. MACDONALD: The hon. gentleman opposite will have all the opportunity he wants to discuss the boot question when the report of the committee comes down to-morrow.

Mr. SUTHERLAND: The very fact that these investigations have been held is to my mind sufficient justification for extending the franchise to the men who best know all the circumstances. The hon. member for Edmonton (Mr. Oliver) and the hon. member for Pictou (Mr. Macdonald) have expressed themselves as being very suspicious that some wrong would be perpetrated if the Government should have supervision over the votes of the soldiers, but has not the Government in office always had supervision over elections, and are they not held responsible in every instance for the manner in which the elections are conducted? We are doing in this case simply what is done in all other cases with respect to elections. I most emphatically declare that if any men are to be deprived of the franchise it should not be the men who go to the front to fight our battles, and who have the highest conception of their duties and responsibilities to their native land. There have been appeals from hon. gentlemen on the other side that no election should be held during the continuance of the war, but whether we will it or not an election may become necessary, and it is only in the event of an election taking place when these men are at the front that this measure has been introduced. The obstacles which some hon. gentlemen opposite endeavour to conjure up against this Bill are purely visionary. I wish anything I might say could convince these gentlemen that the officers in command of our troops are honourable and responsible men, and I have enough confidence in them to believe that the vote to be taken at the front will be the purest vote cast in any election throughout the length and breadth of the Empire. I have the most absolute confidence in the men who are facing death in the trenches for our sakes, and I would be ashamed to refuse to place the utmost responsibility in their hands.

The hon. member for North Oxford (Mr. Nesbitt) has taken exception to the vote being given to men who have been in Canada for a few months only, and he says they cannot understand the issues in an election. Let me point out to him that these men will be voting for or against the Government, and not on the individuality of the candidates. I believe in that respect a fairer test of public opinion may be secured than in the ordinary case where two candidates are voted for, one of whom, because of his personality, may command support from the electors which does not represent the feeling of the community on the policy of the party he supports. It is in my opinion more desirable to have a fair test of public opinion on the issues before the people, than it is to have a test of the personal standing in the community of individual candidates, and in that respect I can see many advantages in taking the vote for or against the Government, or for an independent candidate, as the case may be. I did not intend to offer any remarks on this subject nor would I had not the discussion been so prolonged. I could not imagine that there would be a man found in this House who would take any serious objection to giving the franchise to the men who are to-day in arms for the defence of the Empire. I know that from many constituencies a large number of men have gone to the front, but I am thankful that I have never concerned myself about what their political affiliations may be. I have heard some persons express the opinion that most of the officers are of the Conservative faith, but I do not agree in that view and I hope it is not so. I do believe that in the appointment of officers there has not been the slightest discrimination made on political grounds. The first intimation I had that war had been declared between Great Britain and Germany was from an officer in my county who called me by telephone and asked me to announce at once to the Minister of Militia that he offered his services to go to the front in any capacity that might be desired, and I assume that he was but one amongst hundreds of the officers of the active militia. I believe, Sir, that there are many Liberal officers at the front who will be called upon to look after the method in which these votes are recorded, and hon. gentlemen opposite need not insinuate that there is going to be such a terrible danger that Conservative officers only will be placed in charge of this work.

Mr. GERMAN: The hon. member for South Oxford (Mr. Sutherland) thinks there has been too much discussion already on this Bill, but let him remember that as to the very first clause which we have been considering most of the day, the Minister of Justice has admitted that it was presented in such a crude state that it is necessary to allow it to stand for further consideration. The discussion of the Bill has not been in vain. In my opinion, this Bill is bristling with difficulties and every section will have to be considered carefully, so that I apprehend that it will take not only to-day but perhaps several other days to get it into shape, so that the soldiers at the front, the soldiers in Bermuda, and the soldiers mobilized in Canada, can vote properly and have their vote surrounded with such safeguards as to afford that protection which every honest voter desires. The hon. gentleman, therefore, is mistaken in thinking we have taken up too much time in discussing this Bill.

Mr. SUTHERLAND: The hon. gentleman misunderstood me; I did not refer to the discussion on the details of the Bill, but to the objections raised by hon. gentlemen opposite to giving soldiers votes.

Mr. GERMAN: So far as any objection to giving soldiers votes is concerned, that was decided when the second reading of the Bill passed, and we are now in committee endeavouring to provide some workable machinery to carry it out.

I would just call the attention of the Minister of Justice to one possibility under section 2. This section provides that the Clerk of the Crown in Chancery shall send to the officer in command of each military base in Canada in which volunteers are serving in the present war, and to the officer in command of the Canadian troops at Bermuda, the necessary ballot papers, affidavits and envelopes. As stated by my hon. friend from Queens and Sunbury (Mr. H. H. McLean), sections 2 and 3 are so closely dovetailed that they must be considered to some extent together. Has this contingency suggested itself to the Minister of Justice? The Clerk of the Crown in Chancery sends these documents to the officer in command of the Canadian troops in Bermuda, let us say, immediately after this House is prorogued—no time is fixed, and these papers could be sent as soon as printed. We understand that there are twelve hundred Canadian troops there who would have a right to vote under this Act. That officer is supposed to keep these ballots, affidavits and envelopes, in his own possession until the writ for the election is issued. Suppose, as might very easily be the case—and we must provide as well as we can for all contingencies—the officer in command of the Canadian troops in Bermuda is exchanged. He wants to go to the front, and he is sent to the front while the Canadian troops are left in Bermuda. Suppose he takes these papers with him. There is no direction as to what the officer shall do with these ballots, affidavits and envelopes. Nothing is provided in this Act, and I take it that no command from the Clerk of the Crown in Chancery can affect the officer. He acts voluntarily, and he can use these papers or not, as he sees fit. Suppose a British officer is sent to take command of the Canadian troops in Bermuda, one who knows nothing about this Act. The change is not called to the attention of the Clerk of the Crown in Chancery. When an election is called, the Clerk of the Crown in Chancery sends this cablegram: "Writ for election is issued." But the officer in command who receives that cablegram knows nothing about it; he has no ballot papers and no knowledge of this law—does not know what has taken place nor what his duties are. There is no authority in this Parliament to impose on him any obligation to do anything with regard to these papers. In that case will the vote of the soldiers in Bermuda be taken? This section will have to be changed, it seems to me, to provide for a contingency of that kind.

Mr. DOHERTY: There are many contingencies that might be suggested. All these voters might die before the elections.

Mr. GERMAN: Does not the minister think that is rather far-fetched?

Mr. DOHERTY: It is almost as far-fetched as the suggestion of the hon. member, but not quite. The officer in command, if he is called to England, will cease to be the officer in command. He will have received these papers in his official capacity. No doubt he has other documents in charge in his official capacity. He will receive under another provision of this Bill, copies of this law. I think we can safely assume that he has sufficient intelligence and sufficient honesty—

Mr. GERMAN: I am not questioning his honesty.

Mr. DOHERTY: —and sufficient ordinary everyday common sense not to take these papers to England. Equally so I think we can assume that the new officer coming to take over the command will take possession of these documents under the law and will ascertain what his duties are. Moreover, these changes in commanding officers will be known to the department here, and we can assume that if it is necessary to communicate the fact of a change of officers, that communication will be made to the Clerk of the Crown in Chancery. I must say I am lost in admiration at the ingenuity with which the hon. gentleman discovers things that might happen to defeat this law. There are many things that might happen to defeat the law, but I do think that there is no ground for serious apprehension in relation to the particular difficulties he suggests.

Mr. GERMAN: The hon. gentleman must remember that every contingency of that kind is provided for in the Elections Act of Canada.

Mr. BUREAU: I desire to ask the minister a question. Section 2 provides for "a sufficient supply of ballot papers in form A." Turing to form A, I find that three places are provided for marking the ballot: first, "I vote for the Government;" second, "I vote for the Opposition;" third, "I vote for the independent candidate." Is there any special reason, or was any special reason adduced before the committee, why it should read, "I vote for the Government," and, "I vote for the Opposition," instead of, "I vote for the Conservative candidate," "I vote for the Liberal candidate?" Did the hon. gentleman think it was a better lure to say "Government" and a bigger scarecrow to say "Opposition" or was there some other special reason?

Mr. DOHERTY: Speaking for one member of that committee, I can say he did not think about lures, still less about scarecrows.

Mr. BUREAU: We may think anything.

Mr. DOHERTY: Yes, the hon. gentleman is absolutely at liberty to attribute to the Government and to myself all sorts of schemes and contrivances which his vivid and powerful imagination may suggest. But, as he asks me the question, I answer absolutely and unqualifiedly that, as I have said, I gave no thought to lures or scarecrows. I never thought that it would make any difference to the intelligent voters for whom the ballots are intended. It evidently makes a difference to the hon. gentleman, but it never occurred to me that to the intelligent voter it would make the slighest difference whether I said "Government" or "Conservative party," "Opposition" or "Liberal party."

Mr. BUREAU: The super-intelligence that framed this Bill might be too high for apprehension of an idea that would strike an ordinary mind. Let me give the Minister of Justice a case in point. In 1911 we had a general election. In the province of Quebec we had deferred elections; one in Chicoutimi and Saguenay. Before September 21 the Government was a Liberal Government, but after September 21 the Liberal party, who had nominated a certain gentleman as a candidate, found that he had slipped through their fingers. I am not personally aware of the fact, but I was told that he had wired the right hon. leader of the Government that he wanted to be on the Opposition side until the new Government was sworn in. Practically speaking, the Liberals, although not in power, were running the affairs of the country until October. When the election started there was a Conservative and a Liberal candidate in the field. What about the case where the soldier or absentee voter votes for the Opposition and there is no Liberal candidate in the field? The hon. Minister of Justice may be witty or funny in this matter, but I want an answer to my question.

Mr. DOHERTY: The hon. member's question was: did I see a lure in the word "Government" and a scarecrow in the word "Opposition"?

Mr. BUREAU: I did not say that; I asked why you provided for the forms "vote for the Government" and "vote for the Opposition." I must be right, because the hon. gentleman flares up at the words "lure" and "scarecrow."

Mr. DOHERTY: I was a moment ago accused of being witty; now I am accused of flaring up. Which did I do?

Mr. BUREAU: Both.

Mr. DOHERTY: Then I can counterbalance the compliment to my wit against the criticism of my flaring up, and thus dispose of both. The hon. gentleman wants to know why it is that we provide for the voting in this way. We all know under the law what the Government is, and we also know what the Opposition is. When we go to the country, the great issue before the people will be whether the Government has been administering the affairs of this country for the last few years in such manner that it is deserving of the continued confidence of the people. Therefore it seemed to me that we were providing, in as effective a way as we could devise, for voting upon the great substantial issue between the parties.

Mr. BUREAU: What about the independent candidate? He is not recognized by law.

Mr DOHERTY: We conceived that there might be a candidate in some cases who did not claim to support either the Government or the Opposition, and while the law does not deal with such candidate, that is a condition which, I think, should be intelligible to anybody without explanation. I am quite sure that the hon. member for Maisonneuve might have complained that we had forgotten him if we had not provided for an independent candidate. The soldiers, as intelligent men, will know that there may be an independent candidate who does not take sides as between Government and Opposition.

Mr. BUREAU: How would the minister act in a case such as the one which I have mentioned in regard to the election in Chicoutimi and Saguenay in 1911?

Mr. DOHERTY: There is a provision in the Act that when any difficulty or doubt arises as to who is the candidate entitled to be designated as the Government candidate or who is the candidate entitled to be designated as the Opposition candidate, the matter shall be determined by the leaders of the respective parties.

Mr. BUREAU: How would you advise the returning officers to count the votes in a case like the one which I have cited?

Mr. DOHERTY: The Government is undoubtedly the Government that goes to the country; that is the way I would decide it.

Mr. VERVILLE: One of my objections to this Bill is its provision that the voter shall vote for the Government or for the Opposition. At the next general election you may have as candidates, socialists, nationalists, labour men, who are very proud of their respective parties. It has been suggested that it is better to vote for the party than for the man. I take issue with that view; I do not believe in it. The policy of a Government is liable to change in a very few months. While the soldiers who have gone to the front may have known something about the policy of the Government when they left, if the policy of the Government changes—as a matter of fact, the policy of the Government has changed since the soldiers left—they may vote for what they believe to be the policy of the Government, but which really is not the policy of the Government. Suppose you have an election in this country and the fiscal policy of the Government has changed very materially. The fiscal policy is everything with the people; it is the fundamental basis of the cost of living. These men may vote for the Government, believing that the Government still adhere to their old policy, whereas if they knew of the change they would vote against the Government. Of course, it would be difficult to have meetings in the trenches, and as to sending literature to the soldiers, I have seen so many kinds of literature that I do not believe in it. As to the soldiers who are in Canada, I ask the minister if he will allow me or anybody else to go among the soldiers and explain what has happened during the last few months, or further back? It is not more than fair that this should be done. It has been stated that if you adopt the principle of this Bill you open the door for discussion among the soldiers. These men are entitled to know before they cast their votes what really is the policy that they are voting for. It may be said that they will be allowed to attend political meetings during the course of an election, but I am not sure that they would be allowed to attend meetings of that kind. Besides, if the minister attempts to trespass on the rights of the Minister of Militia he will have a hard time. The Minister of Labour knows something about that; he knows what it is to try even to do his duty in respect of labour conditions when the Minister of Militia has something to say in the matter. I suppose, therefore, that the soldiers will be forbidden to attend any such meetings. In case of a general election next summer those men would not know the fiscal policy of the Government. I emphasize that, because I claim that the new fiscal policy of the Government, with the increase of tariff, is far more important than many of the people of Canada imagine. It is the basis of the cost of living, and I will explain this in my neighbourhood to the best of my ability. It makes no difference to me whether soldiers' votes are polled in my constituency. I am not in favour of having men vote for or against the Government, because, as many men on both sides of the House who will acknowledge, the personality of the candidate has a great deal to do with the result of an election. For this reason I think that we should vote not for the Government or the Opposition, but for a representative. We are voting for the man who we believe will best represent our ideas in Parliament. The man has everything to do with it. In effect this Bill says: simply choose anybody, whether he can speak or think makes no difference provided he is a man who belongs to the Government side or the Opposition side. Then if he gets a majority of the vote, under this Bill he is elected. I do not think that is right. I claim that the people in St. Anne vote for the Minister of Justice they do not vote for his party; they vote for the man, and he knows it; of course he does. Those soldiers who are in Canada should surely have a chance to vote not for the party, but for the candidate. This is very important and it seems to me that we should have a chance to speak to these men before the election. I am not speaking for myself; the Government may bring on an election to-morrow so far as I am concerned; I am ready. I have even got my lists ready; I did not even wait for the Government. Put in 500 soldier votes against me in my division and it will make no difference. I am pretty safe, so far as that is concerned. I claim that we are in duty bound to explain the policy under which the country is going to be administered in future years. That is exactly what our soldiers on the other side will not know anything about. My hon. friend knows that they are not allowed to read the papers every day. Where will they get time to read the papers? The fact is that it may be better for them not to read the papers. They are under discipline and must submit to that discipline. Then, in many cases the men may consult the commanding officer as to how they should cast their votes; they may ask him if he knows anything about the Government, what has been done, whether there has been any change in the situation. If a commanding officer is consulted in this way, what will he say? Will he say: I do not know anything about it? If he says that the soldiers may say: Well, we do not know anything either, and we will not vote. Suppose the Minister of Justice were an officer, with all due respect for him, and he had a certain number of men under his command and some man came to him and said: Officer, I would like to know something about this election: I have a ballot here and am supposed to cast my vote for or against the Government but I know nothing about it. Then the minister might be tempted. By all means let him tell the man the conditions; but it is possible that if he happened to be either a Liberal or a Conservative he would lean towards that side in his explanations. That is human nature.

Mr. DOHERTY: Would he not do that if he were at home?

Mr. VERVILLE: Yes.

Mr. DOHERTY: Is the soldier in the trenches in any different position as to voting from the man at home? Any man who happens to be a Liberal or a Conservative may say to the voter at home what he thinks about the situation. If an officer in a regiment at home were asked by a soldier what he thought, he might express his political views. Is it any worse for him to do so when he is abroad? Surely it would not be suggested that we ought to stop all conversation on political questions between the officers and their men.

Mr. VERVILLE: We must bear in mind that the officer will be indirectly a kind of returning officer. He will have the ballots to distribute and so will be indirectly a returning officer. I do not want to deal with that side of the question so much, because I know the difficulty we are up against. I would like to see a change in the provision respecting those soldiers who will be in the country at the time of an election. It seems to me that they should have the full power to go and vote where they have a right to vote, or that the machinery should be arranged in such a way that they could be made thoroughly familiar with the real conditions and then have a chance to vote for the condidate and not for the Government or the Opposition. Why should we not give a chance for the Socialists, who are numerous in British Columbia, to vote for their own candidates? They should be permitted to vote for their own men. Then if there are Nationalists in Quebec, they should also be given a chance. We have some twenty of them in the House, that is, so-called. Let us give them a chance wherever they are. Such a plan would be more applicable to the real conditions existing in Canada to-day.

Mr. DOHERTY: I do not know whether the hon. member was in at the time, but in response to a suggestion of the hon. member for South Renfrew (Mr. Graham) I did say that we would consider a suggestion which he made which looked to providing machinery whereby soldiers still in Canada at the time of an election would vote as nearly as possible as they would vote in the ordinary course. It may be possible that they would have to do that voting not in their own district, but the idea was that means should be provided to collect their ballots. As to the opportunities of soldiers of that class to hear discussions, I am quite sure that neither the Minister of Militia nor any of the military authorities would seek to interfere with soldiers attending such meetings as they desired to attend, when they were not on duty. As to the question whether they will have time from their duty to attend meetings, after all, they will be in the same position as all other employees who have to take time from their occupations to attend meetings. I am anxious that the soldier shall have every opportunity of informing himself like everybody else, and I certainly think that soldiers here in Canada would be as well informed on current events as any other men. As to the soldier on the other side, I think that some hon. gentlemen have an exaggerated idea of the absolute persistency with which he is supposed to be in the trench shooting or being shot at.

Mr. VERVILLE: I did not say that.

Mr. DOHERTY: From the point of view of his having time to read or get information, I may be quite mistaken, but I am not aware that there is any disposition to prevent information from reaching the soldier. I think hon. gentlemen have quite an exaggerated idea of the depth of ignorance of the soldier on the other side as to what is going on here in Canada. The soldiers receive letters and, I have no doubt, newspapers and other documents from their friends in Canada, and I am sure that they will be fully informed on events in this country. If any of us were away from Canada under the same circumstances as they are, we would be only too glad and happy to avail ourselves of every source of information in regard to events at home. I think that the soldiers over there will be fairly well informed as to what is going on here.

Mr. PROULX: One defect in this Bill, which has already been pointed out by the hon. member for Three Rivers (Mr. Bureau) and by the hon. member for Maisonneuve (Mr. Verville), is that it provides only for a vote for or against the Government or for an Independent; and it gives the leader of the Government and the leader of the Opposition power to elect representatives to this House. It might easily happen that both candidates in a constituency were of the same party. It happened in my own constituency in 1908; my opponent was a Liberal. Suppose that there are only a few votes difference between the two candidates, and that there are enough soldiers' votes to decide the election. Then the party leader has power to say which candidate shall be elected; the candidate in that case would be selected, not by the electors, but by the leader of one of the parties. This is not a democratic measure.

Mr. DOHERTY: Those soldiers have said that they want to vote for the man who will follow that leader, and that leader determines which is the man who will follow him.

Mr. PROULX: Under the British constitution and under our own, which is modelled on the British, the personal equation has to be taken into consideration. When the candidates ask for the suffrages of the electors, the electors vote for the one in whom they have confidence, and who they think will support one particular party. But still they are not sure that he will support that party; for after the candidate is elected he has carte blanche; he is perfectly at liberty to decide which party he will support. The electors, however, have confidence in him; but under this Bill they would have to trust the party leader.

Mr. DOHERTY: If it were possible to secure a situation where all the soldiers should actually know who were the candidates, I do not suggest that under those circumstances this measure would be preferable. This method is suggested only because, as regards the men who go overseas at all events, it seemed impossible to devise an arrangement whereby they could have knowledge of who it was that had been nominated, and then send in their votes in time to be counted on election day. When we were considering the matter in the committee, a suggestion was made which, if I had been alone in the committee, would have been acted upon, that we should give the man a fourth alternative; that is to say, that we should put a fourth space giving the soldier the privilege of saying: I vote for So-and-so, leaving a blank space so that the soldier could fill in the name of the man for whom he wanted to vote. If that commends itself to this committee, I should be disposed to do that, because it would give the soldier an opportunity to vote for a particular man; and though, of course, the soldier would be voting without the certainty that the particular man would actually be nominated, at the same time, with regard to a considerable number of electoral districts, he would be fairly safe in his anticipation that that particular man was to be a candidate. I shall be glad to get as near as possible in every respect, so far as the soldiers overseas are concerned, to the conditions that would prevail if they were at home and able to exercise their vote; but the suggestion of voting for or against the Government or for an independent candidate was thought to be the nearest thing that could be done in cases where it was impossible for a man to know who the candidates were. I might say that this method was followed in the New Zealand Act.

Mr. OLIVER: When I was speaking some time ago I used the expression that I was willing to let the soldiers vote, but unwilling to let the Government count the vote. That expression has been taken up by other members, and the Minister of Justice has challenged the correctness of the phrase, and suggested that there is no provision in the Bill whereby the Government can count the vote. I wish to take issue with the minister on that point. I ask him who does count the vote if it is not the returning officer, who is an appointee of the Government? Therefore, the Government does, in fact, count the vote.

Mr. DOHERTY: The Government counts all the votes.

Mr. OLIVER: Yes. But let me point out the difference between the conditions under which the Government, through the returning officer, counts the votes cast under this Bill, and the conditions under which the returning officer counts the votes under ordinary circumstances. In an ordinary election the ballots are marked and put in a ballot box under the active and direct supervision of scrutineers, sworn and bodily present, who watch the proceedings very carefully to see that what is intended by the voter shall be carried out by the deputy returning officer. When the poll is closed in the presence of those scrutineers, the ballot box is opened and the ballots counted in the presence of those same scrutineers; so that the country is not dependent upon the honesty of the deputy returning officer for an accurate count. He is subject to the check of the presence and activity of the scrutineers of the interested parties. But in the case of this Bill the ballots are sent to the returning officer at some time previous to the day of the count, and they are in charge of the returning officer for the intervening period. I need not enlarge upon the possibilities of what might be done by the returning officer during the period in which those ballots are exclusively in his charge without let or hindrance or observation from any other person whatsoever. My hon. friend will say that I am casting an aspersion upon returning officers. Well, Mr. Chairman, we have had experiences of returning officers, and of actions by our Government, that warrant us in being suspicious under those circumstances.

Mr. ROGERS: What experiences?

Mr. OLIVER: I will come to that presently. If it were proposed to insert in the Dominion Elections Act a provision parallel to this, whereby the ballots which have been cast on election day should be sealed up and remain in the charge of the returning officer without any observation by the scrutineers, would the minister approve of such an amendment? Would he not be ready to admit that we were placing responsibility upon or confidence in the returning officer that we should not place upon or in him? Now what is the difference between the returning officer under ordinary circumstances and the returning officer under the circumstances contemplated by this Bill?

Mr. STEVENS: Under our present law is it not the practice for the returning officers to bring in the ballots from distant points—at all events, in Western Canada and Eastern Ontario?

Mr. OLIVER: My hon. friend surely knows how the balloting is conducted. The ballots are marked and handed to the deputy returning officer or the poll clerk, in the presence of the scrutineers of the different parties. They are placed in the ballot box in the presence of those scrutineers, and when the polls close the ballot box is emptied and the ballots counted in the presence of those scrutineers, and the count is forthwith issued. The process is entirely under the scrutiny of interested parties, and there are no chances as to what shall occur before the ballots are given, at any rate, their first count; whereas, in the case of this ballot, the box remains in the hands of the returning officer from the time he has received it until the poll is closed on polling day.

Mr. GERMAN: The ballots are not in a box?

Mr. OLIVER: No, they are not. That is not a proper protection for the people of Canada in the conduct of an election.

Mr. BLAIN: When are they counted?

Mr. OLIVER: When the poll is closed on polling day, the returning officer opens these ballots and counts them.

Mr. BLAIN: In the presence of whom?

Mr. OLIVER: In the presence, I presume, of the scrutineers.

Mr. BLAIN: The same as with other ballots?

Mr. OLIVER: I do not know whether that is so or not, but that makes no difference to my point. My point is that these ballots have been in the possession, and under the sole responsibility, of the returning officer for an indefinite period, and none of the parties to the election besides himself has any means of preventing these ballots from being tampered with.

Mr. DAVIDSON: Is that not so in the case of a recount under the present condition?

Mr. OLIVER: Yes, but the ballots have already been counted in the presence of the scrutineers before the appeal is taken.

Mr. DAVIDSON: In the case of a recount, while the final count is pending, the ballots are still in the custody of the returning officer, and may be tampered with?

Mr. OLIVER: Undoubtedly, but the ballots have be n counted in the presence of the scrutineers, and a certificate has already been issued as to the result of the polling. There is no question as to the actual count, because in such a case there can be no dispute, but as to the ballots as to which there may be some measure of dispute, all these ballots are counted in the original count by the deputy returning officer before the scrutineers, and if they are not found in the ballot box when the recount takes place it is absolute evidence that the ballot box has been tampered with.

Mr. BLAIN: After the soldier votes the ballot must be returned to some individual. Whom would my hon. friend (Mr. Oliver) suggest in place of the returning officer? Has my hon. friend any suggestion to make as to the form in which the ballot should be returned, if this proposal is not satisfactory?

Mr. OLIVER: I am not making any suggestions. I am replying to the assertion of the minister that the Government does not count the votes, I am pointing out that the Government does count the votes.

Mr. BLAIN: My hon. friend takes objection to the Bill as it has been introduced by the minister particularly because in this case the ballot is left in the possession of an individual. In what other way would my hon. friend suggest that it should be taken care of which would give greater security?

Mr. OLIVER: I am not making suggestions at this moment, but at the beginning of the consideration of the Bill I did make the suggestion that if it was desired that the soldiers should vote, and that they should vote under ordinary conditions, they could be given their qualification to vote wherever they were on election day.

Mr. BLAIN: What about the old country?

Mr. OLIVER: I was speaking, of course, only of those in Canada. That is the only way I can see to actually protect the public right as well as the right of the individual soldier. In that way it would be absolutely protected. There are reasons against that being done which were stated by the minister, and I am not arguing on that point. But I have pointed out to the House a method whereby a soldier in Canada might exercise his franchise just as any other citizen would do, or as he would do if he were not a soldier, and the right of the public in regard to the casting of his ballot is protected.

Mr. DOHERTY: I would like to get clearly just what the method is. Does that mean that a soldier in Halifax should be allowed to go to Vancouver?

Mr. OLIVER: No.

Mr. DOHERTY: Then I understand it to mean that on the lines of the suggestion of the hon. member for South Renfrew (Mr. Graham) we should provide at the military place where the man is, means by which he can vote in Canada.

Mr. OLIVER: In regard to the suggestion made by my hon. friend from South Renfrew, I might point out that there is just that undesirability I have already mentioned, that if a ballot is marked in Halifax to be counted in Vancouver, it must necessarily be sent to Vancouver and be held in the hands of the returning officer without check by any other party for such an indefinite period that there will not in my mind be proper or adequate protection for the sanctity of the ballot.

Mr. DOHERTY: Has the hon. gentleman any suggestion to make in addition to that?

Mr. OLIVER: I did make the suggestion at the beginning of the consideration of the first paragraph that if the soldier were allowed to cast his vote at the place, and in the electoral division, in which he was situated at the actual time of voting, exactly as any other citizen and under the same conditions and safeguards, his right and privilege would be protected and the public right to a proper exercise of the franchise would also be protected. I am not making that suggestion to the minister; I am stating a simple fact. The minister shows reasons why that would not be a good way to deal with the question and I appreciate his reasons. My hon. friend from South Renfrew made another suggestion which has in it certainly very many elements of advantage, a number of which advantages the Minister of Justice suggested. But there is still that difficulty that I mentioned and I do not think that it would be proper for me to agree to the provisions of the Bill unless I drew the attention of the minister to it. I do not wish to argue that point at the moment, but I was merely arguing the point that, as a matter of fact, the Government does count the votes. That is the point I want to put forward and that is why I say I object to the Bill. I do not object to the soldier voting, but I do object to the Government counting the votes when nobody else has a chance to check the Government or its officers in doing so.

In sections 2 and 3 it was provided that the ballots shall be sent to the commanding officer, and then that they shall be distributed by the commanding officer to some other officer, who shall, as a matter of practice, act as the deputy returning officer. He will hand out the ballot to the soldier and will receive back the ballot and the necessary affidavit. As the section reads, certainly the Government has the authority and the responsibility without let or hindrance of deciding who shall be the deputy returning officer who shall actually hand out these ballots, receive them and forward them in. I do not wish to make suggestions, but I think there was a suggestion made by the hon. member for Sunbury and Queens (Mr. H. H. McLean) that there should be some specific officer who, without the choice of the Government, would automatically be the man to handle that responsibility. That, I think, would be a very decided improvement, but I am taking the Bill as it is, not as it is going to be improved, and I say that when the Government takes the right to pick out whomever it pleases amongst its officers on the ground to act as deputies it is most essentially taking measures to see that only the right votes come in.

Mr. DOHERTY: I am sure the hon. gentleman (Mr. Oliver) does not wish to be unfair, and I would like to point this out to him. If he will look at the Bill he will find that, while the proposition may not be an effective proposition in his view, it does not take into the hands of the Government the selection of particular officers. We even exclude the High Commissioner from intervention, so that nobody who is of the Government should figure in this, and we made the secretary of the High Commissioner—an officer whom this Government did not appoint—the man who ex officio would take this thing on himself. We left it in his hands—although it may not be sufficiently definitely stated in the Bill—to transmit these ballots to the proper officers for distribution, and then we provided that any commissioned officer might do this. I think as drafted the Bill is too indefinite on that point and that it requires to be made precise, but it certainly does not afford grounds for the very serious imputation the hon. gentleman has put upon those who drafted the Bill. I have asked my hon. friend (Mr. Oliver) for suggestions as to other and better safeguards, and I am willing to put them in, but he persists in saying that this is a deep-laid scheme to find a way by which the Government will control the men, when all that I am looking for is a method by which this can be done by persons acting ex officio and not those whom the Government would pick out. And the hon. gentleman does all this to get to the very remote conclusion that the Government counts the ballots. He seems to think there is something criminal about that. I would like to point out to him that perhaps the Bill does not provide proper machinery to take care of the ballots on their way to be counted, but the Government certainly does not count them any more than it counts all the ballots in all the elections, which are counted by the returning officers; and these ballots are also to be counted by the returning officers. I am satisfied that the hon. gentleman does not want to be unfair, but I hardly think it is fair for him to continue putting the imputations on those who drafted this Bill, of having drafted it with a view of manipulating it in the most absolutely and utterly dishonest way conceivable, and with a view of placing themselves in a position where, if the suggestion of my hon. friend has any foundation, they are supposed to go out and see if they can find among our military officers men capable of every trick and device to destroy the genuineness of these ballots. I hardly think that is a fair line of argument.

Mr. OLIVER: There is no member of this House against whom I would be less inclined to make aspersions than the Minister of Justice. I am sorry that what I have said seems to have created on him the impression which he has stated to the House. But we are here on very responsible business; we have very serious duties to perform and while I want to eliminate any personal idea from what I have to say, I must take facts as I find them. I do not wish to show any personal animosity.

Mr. DOHERTY: There was most certainly no intention of any personal animosity on my part.

Mr. OLIVER: I know that, and I know that the minister has been very fair and very reasonable in everything he has said, but I must take this view: this is not the Bill of a committee; this is the Bill of the Government of which my hon. friend is the Minister of Justice, and of which Bill he is the responsible father. This Bill was introduced by resolution on the authority of His Royal Highness the Governor-General.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Six o'clock.

Mr. DOHERTY: It is not convenient to proceed with this Bill this evening, and I therefore move that the committee rise.

Mr. ROGERS: The reason being, that following the usual custom we will take private bills after eight o'clock and then Estimates, as we want to get through the balance of the Estimates.

Progress reported.

At six o'clock, the House took recess.

The House resumed at eight o'clock.

SUPPLY.

The House in Committee of Supply, Mr. Sevigny in the Chair.

Post Office Department, 1913-14—contingencies—clerical and other assistance—further amount required, $2,500.

Mr. GRAHAM: That money has been expended, I suppose?

Mr. CASGRAIN: Yes.

Mr. OLIVER: Will the Postmaster General please tell me who is the postmaster at Grande Prairie, what is his salary, from whom is the post office building rented, and what allowance does he receive on account of it?

Mr. CASGRAIN: I have not that information here. I will send it to the hon. gentleman to-morrow.

Post Office, 1913-14—outside service—salaries—further amount required, $372,600.

Mr. CASGRAIN: This money is nearly all expended. The Estimates were made up in September, 1913, and in consequence no provision was made for the salaries of the current year for those taken on after that date. By reason of the expansion of the service, as I explained on my Main Estimates, we were obliged to take on a number of employees, and this is the amount required to pay them.

Mr. MARCIL: Would the hon. minister please give particulars?

Mr. CASGRAIN: The new employees were distributed as follows: railway mail clerks, 100; mail transfer agents, 30; clerks and messengers in superintendents' offices, 17; clerks, messengers and porters in inspectors' offices, 39; clerks, letter carriers, messengers and porters in city post offices, 726.

Mr. MARCIL: Are these appointments all permanent?

Mr. CASGRAIN: Yes.

Mr. MARCIL: Has the department still the system of taking on so-called labourers as temporary employees and afterwards drafting them into the permanent service?

Mr. CASGRAIN: No, we take on temporary clerks.

Mr. MARCIL: Can one of these be appointed to the permanent service without examination?

Mr. CASGRAIN: He is appointed for six months as a provisional clerk, after which he passes an examination.

Mr. MARCIL: Has the minister had time to look into the question I brought to his attention regarding a postal sub-office on Sherbrooke street in Montreal?

Mr. CASGRAIN: The inspector is now making an investigation of the matter, and we are awaiting his report.

Mr. MARCIL: I have received letters from a number of those interested, including Lt.-Colonel Baker, who took a great interest in the matter and worked unceasingly on it, calling on postmasters in Montreal and getting numerous petitions asking that some postal convenience of this kind be given to this district. At present, except for the ordinary letter-boxes on the street, there are no postal facilities. Sherbrooke is a main thoroughfare and a very busy one, yet it is without postal facilities. Also I have a letter from a leading citizen of Westmount with regard to the post office at the corner of Victoria avenue and Sherbrooke street. This gentleman, who is a former alderman and a leading citizen of Westmount, and greatly interested in the locality, makes the suggestion that when the department decides to provide better post office accommodation for his locality, it should place the post office on Sherbrooke street instead of on Victoria avenue, because Victoria avenue is not of such great relative importance as formerly.

Mr. CASGRAIN: We will certainly consider the hon. gentleman's suggestion.

Mr. VERVILLE: I would suggest to the Postmaster General that in future when he opens a small post office in Montreal, it should not be in a store that is closed three nights a week at six o'clock, and early in the other evenings. I do not want to complain of those already there, but the hon. gentleman knows that very often post offices are placed in drug stores which is a convenience to the public, as these stores are open in the evening. One change was made for which I was very sorry. The Government thought they were taking the post office away from a Liberal. As a matter of fact, the man was a Conservative. It is true, I recommended him, but I did so because his store was the best situated place in the parish for a post office.

I desire to put another question for information. Suppose that a person desires to send a registered letter to a member of the House, is it necessary for him to put on it a two-cent stamp and a five cent stamp for registration?

Mr. CASGRAIN: As to the latter question, it is not necessary to put a registration stamp on a letter addressed to a member during the session. As to post offices in stores that are closed in the evening, the hon. gentleman will realize that it is not always possible to find a store conveniently situated for a post office that is open after six o'clock. Where possible the department places post offices in drug stores, because they are kept open in the evening. That is the policy of the department. I think that what the hon. gentleman says is correct, and I will try to carry out his suggestion.

Mr. VERVILLE: They took a post office away from a drug store the proprietor of which happened to be a Conservative.

Mr. CASGRAIN: When?

Mr. VERVILLE: A couple of years ago; it was not under the administration of the present minister. A requisition bearing many names was sent to the department for the opening of a post office, in a drug store which was on the corner of a street. The post office was opened in a dry goods store, three hundred feet away from the corner.

The reason why I asked as to the sending of a registered letter to a member of the House is that at the very post office to which I referred they compelled a correspondent who was sending a letter to me to pay two cents for postage and five cents for registration. In answer to my correspondent's question, I said that this was absolutely unnecessary.

Mr. MARCIL: I desire to ask with regard to the sale of stamps on Sunday when, as the minister knows, in Montreal, cigar stores and fruit stores are open. I applied for a stamp at a fruit store and was told that they were not sold on Sunday. Has the department any rule to that effect?

Mr. CASGRAIN: I see no objection to the sale of these stamps by tobacconists and druggists.

Mr. MARCIL: What I want to know is whether it is against the law to sell these stamps on Sundays?

Mr. CASGRAIN: No, it is not.

Mr. MARCIL: Are the war stamps out yet?

Mr. CASGRAIN: Yes, we are issuing them now.

Mr. MARCIL: Are they to be used at once?

Mr. CASGRAIN: Not until the 15th.

Mr. KAY: At the present time rural mail carriers and stage drivers are paid only once every three months. As a rule their salaries are small, and in many cases they have to discount their cheques, as it were, in order to deal with the storekeeper and the moneylender, and when they receive their cheques they have to pay a considerable amount in the way of interest. I would suggest to the minister that he take into consideration the advisability of paying these men every month.

Mr. CASGRAIN: I am informed by the officers of my department that reports are made by inspectors before the mail carriers are paid; and it would be impossible, with the service that we now have at our disposal, to have reports made and the men paid every month.

Mr. MARCIL: I would call the attention of the minister to the fact that no rural mail route has been established in my constituency. A few years ago a route was laid out by the late Postmaster General from New Richmond railway station around to New Richmond and Little Cascapedia. Tenders were called for, but no contract was awarded, because the amount proposed to be charged for the service was too high. This is rather disappointing, as New Richmond is one of the most promising localities in the constituency. Has the minister taken any steps in the matter, in the way of calling for tenders or introducing a service in that district?

Mr. CASGRAIN: I am told that it was impossible to make a contract at a reasonable price for the carrying of the mail. There may be some very special circumstances why this has been the case, and if my hon. friend can give me any information on the subject I shall be glad to look into the matter.

Mr. MARCIL: I understand that the lowest tender was $1,000, and that the department considered that to be too high. Has the department taken no steps since then?

Mr. CASGRAIN: I am informed that nothing further has been done. The $1,000 was considered by the department to be too high.

Mr. MACDONALD: I received a letter from my constituency with reference to a condition that has been created by the establishment of a rural mail delivery in that district. The minister will remember that I was in communication with him in regard to a rural mail delivery route which was asked for last year, and in respect to which, through some error, the answer was given that this route had not been applied for. In the adjoining district a rural mail route has been laid out from River John through the district of Hodson, returning to the village of River John. It was probably intended to afford facilities to a number of the people who have been getting their mail from Hodson post office through this rural mail delivery route, which is still hung up. With the establishment of the rural mail route from River John to Hodson, the Hodson post office has been closed, and the result is that ten or fifteen people who are not on the rural mail route and who would be on the proposed route if it were established, are not supplied with facilities for getting their mail and are obliged to go a long distance to the nearest office. I would suggest to the minister that the post office at Hodson be opened until the matter respecting the proposed rural mail delivery route to which I have referred is satisfactorily arranged.

Mr. CASGRAIN: I think that that is a reasonable request, and I will look into it immediately.

Mail service—ordinary land service, including rural mail delivery; further amount required, $365,000.

Mr. OLIVER: I would ask the minister to urge on his colleague the Minister of Public Works the desirability of spending the appropriation that has been in the Estimates for the last three or four years, a small matter of $5,000, for the erection of a building at Athabaska Landing which will accommodate the post office and telegraph and land offices, on the ground that the accommodation is urgently necessary for post office purposes.

Mr. ROGERS: I am sorry that the hon. member for Edmonton should be in doubt about this matter; I thought I made a definite promise the other night that I would go on with that work.

Mr. OLIVER: I hope I may take this as a definite promise.

Mr. ROGERS: It was definite before.

Mr. CASGRAIN: I will endeavour to see that my hon. friend keeps his promise.

Mail service by railways—further amount required, $300,000.

Mr. OLIVER: I presume that the Postmaster General is aware of representations that have been made in regard to the carrying of mails to Prince George. For some time after the opening of the railway the mail was carried from Vancouver to Prince George by all-rail route via Edmonton. I understand that recently that has been abandoned and the old route by stage from Ashcroft has been adopted. It has been represented to me by the Board of Trade of Edmonton that the change is not in the interest of Prince George or more particularly of Edmonton, that the service by way of Ashcroft is not nearly as efficient or as satisfactory and that the former conditons should be reverted to. It is further represented that whatever is done between Ashcroft and St. George the mail service by way of Edmonton should have the preference.

Patrol of the northern waters of Canada—further amount required, $50,000.

Mr. MARCIL: Would the minister explain that?

Mr. HAZEN: I explained the matter to the House when my Main Estimates were on. The trouble was that our appropriation last year was not large enough for the purpose, and we require $50,000 more in consequence of the loss of the Karluk. The loss of the Karluk with the supplies carried by her necessitated the purchase of the steamer North Star and a quantity of supplies to complete outfitting. The relief of the party from the Karluk also necessitated certain expenditure not anticipated when the Estimate was made up for the present year. To meet these disbursements it is necessary to obtain a supplementary vote of $50,000.

Mr. OLIVER: Would the minister give some more definite particulars than he gave on a former occasion in regard to the number, character, disposition and purpose of the vessels still in commission under that vote?

Mr. HAZEN: I thought I made a fairly definite statement, but I will give a further statement since August, 1913. In the month of August, 1913, the auxiliary schooner Karluk, carrying about half the members of the expedition and a large quantity of supplies, scientific outfits, etc., was caught in the ice some thirty miles off the Arctic coast of Alaska. The ice conditions that year were extremely bad in the Arctic, and no vessel was able to penetrate as far as Herschel island, the ships being held up to the westward of the boundary line between Alaska and Canada. After the Karluk had been held in the ice for some time it was presumed that she was stationary for the winter, and Mr. Stefansson, with three companions, Messrs. D. Jenness, A. McConnell and B. W. Wilkins, left the ship for exploring and hunting purposes and landed on the Alaskan shore. A heavy storm sprang up, the ice near the shore broke away and the Karluk drifted off and for the rest of the winter was carried by the ice in a westerly direction.

On January 11 the Karluk was crushed in the ice and sank. Every preparation had been made for such an event and the party landed safely on the ice with a full supply of provisions, munitions, fuel, etc., and a comfortable camp was established. At that time the sun was still below the horizon, which made travelling on the ice extremely difficult, and it was decided not to make for land until the return of the sun made travelling easier and safer. Land was visible from the shipwreck camp, which was presumed to be Wrangell island, but which turned out later to be Herald island.

Some members of the party chafed at the enforced inaction and were anxious to make an immediate move. Some of these men left the main party and in two detachments ventured out on the ice in an effort to reach land and safety. The members of these two detachments were never seen afterwards, although parties explored the ice and endeavoured to reach Herald island, and there is no doubt that, unfortunately, the eight men comprising these two detachments have perished.

The main party left camp on February 19 and reached Wrangell island on March 12. They brought up a large quantity of the supplies taken from the ship, built a house and camped there for the winter. Captain Bartlett, with one Eskimo and a dog team, left almost immediately for Siberia, which he reached after an arduous and venturesome journey across extremely rough ice with many open leads. After 17 days' travelling on the ice he landed about 50 miles west of North Cape on April 4. He then proceeded along the coast of Siberia and finally reached Emma harbour on May 16. Captain Bartlett's trip was a wonderful performance and is evidence of his courage and determination, and there is no doubt that the survivors of the Karluk owe their lives to his enterprise and endurance in his remarkable trip across the ice and along the coast of Siberia.

From Emma harbour Captain Bartlett was taken across Behring strait to St. Michael, Alaska, on the whaling steamer Herman, owned by Messrs. Liebes & Co. of San Francisco. This ship interrupted its trading and whaling venture to carry Captain Bartlett to a port from which he could communicate with the Canadian Government, and the thanks of the Government are due to the owners of the vessel for the kind act performed. Captain Bartlett immediately communicated with the Department of Naval Service at Ottawa and arrangements were promptly made for the relief of the marooned party. As a result of these arrangements during the summer of 1914 four ships endeavoured to reach Wrangell island to take off the wrecked men. These ships were the United States revenue cutter Bear, engaged in the patrol of northern waters, the Russian Government steamer Taymur and the ice-breaking steamer Corwin and the trading and hunting steamer King and Winge. After several attempts had been made by these vessels to reach Wrangell island, the King and Winge managed to reach the island in September and took off the survivors of the crew of the Karluk and a couple of days later transferred them to the United States revenue cutter Bear, which brought the party to Victoria.

To come back to Mr. Stefansson and his three companions, who landed from the Karluk in September, 1913, this party joined the other members of the expedition under Dr. Anderson who, with their ships, the Alaska and the Mary Sachs, were wintering at Collinson point, Alaska. A programme was then drawn up for the subsequent work of the party. It was arranged that in March, 1914, Mr. Stefansson would undertake an exploring trip on the ice in the Beaufort sea, with the intention of returning within about a month. Mr. Stefansson started on this trip rather late in the year and the ice was beginning to move. He intended proceeding north for a certain time and then returning to his starting point if possible. If, however, ice travel became difficult in that direction, he intended to travel to the east with the intention of reaching Bank's Land in the winter of 1914-15. He left instructions that in the summer of 1914 a vessel should be sent along the shores of Bank's Land to establish depots and erect beacons that would guide him on his return trip in the spring of 1915 if he was unable to reach the mainland before that date. These directions have been carried out. The vessel Mary Sachs, under Mr. Wilkins and Captain Bernard, left Herschel island in the early part of August and touched at Baillie island on August 19; then headed for Bank's Land to carry out Mr. Stefansson's instructions. The second party, under Dr. Anderson, left Herschel island on August 10 and Baillie island August 21, on the vessels Alaska and North Star, and established headquarters on Coronation gulf, where they expected to carry out scientific investigations during the fall of 1914, the following winter, and the summer of 1915. It is expected that the expedition will return in the late fall of 1915 or the following winter.

The loss of the Karluk with the supplies carried by that vessel, necessitated the purchase of another ship, the North Star, and a quantity of supplies, in order to complete the outfit of the party. The relief of the party from the Karluk also entailed certain expense, and to meet these various disbursements it will be necessary to obtain a supplementary vote of $50,000.

Mr. OLIVER: When was the last word received from the North Star and the Mary Sachs?

Mr. HAZEN: It was some time ago, I do not remember the date exactly.

Mr. OLIVER: Would it be after or before the close of winter?

Mr. HAZEN: Before.

Mr. OLIVER: And no word has been heard since winter set in?

Mr. HAZEN: I do not think so. The department is expecting to hear word at any time. I will get the facts and give them to my hon. friend to-morrow.

Mr. OLIVER: What is the size and character of the North Star?

Mr. HAZEN: It was purchased at Demarcation point from Mr. Anderson at a cost of $13,000. I have not the tonnage here.

Mr. OLIVER: Is it the same kind of boat as the Karluk?

Mr. HAZEN: I think it is a little larger, but I am judging by the price only. The Karluk cost $10,000, and the North Star $13,000. Other circumstances, of course, may account for the difference in price. Still, the North Star is a substantial vessel.

Mr. OLIVER: From what the minister has read, there would seem to be no reason for alarm in regard to the safety of Stefansson and the two men with him.

Mr. HAZEN: Alarm is felt for the safety of Stefansson, but not for those members of the party who are on the Mary Sachs, the Alaska, or the North Star. The hon. gentleman is probably aware that Captain Bartlett was in Ottawa after his return from the North, and he thinks it possible that Stefansson is safe; in fact, he says he will not be at all surprised if Stefansson is found; but at the same time I think there is reason for apprehension.

Mr. OLIVER: According to the programme mentioned by the minister, Stefansson was not expected to return until 1915. Have the preparations been made that he requested?

Mr. HAZEN: Everything has been done.

Mr. OLIVER: This is a matter of more than ordinary interest. Would the minister be good enough to inform the House upon what information from Captain Bartlett he thinks that Stefansson is possibly lost?

[Mr. Hazen.]

Mr. HAZEN: Captain Bartlett's idea, if I remember correctly, was that Stefansson should have reached the mainland at an earlier date. I gathered from Captain Bartlett that it was on that account that he thought there was reason for apprehension for Stefansson's safety.

Mr. OLIVER: Have arrangements been made or are they being made to have one or more of the vessels up in the North make an attempt to trace Stefansson during the coming summer?

Mr. HAZEN: Instructions have been given to that effect. In addition to that, all vessels that were known to be going up North, whether belonging to the United States or any other country, were asked to be on the look-out for any trace of Stefansson.

Mr. OLIVER: Which particular vessel will have charge of this search on behalf of the Canadian Government, and who will be in charge of it?

Mr. HAZEN: The Alaska, the Mary Sachs, and the North Star are up there now. I forget the names of the officers who are in charge, but whoever they are they will do all they can.

Mr. OLIVER: All three vessels have received instructions to make that search?

Mr. HAZEN: Yes.

Mr. OLIVER: At what time were these instructions sent up North? It is a long road up there.

Mr. HAZEN: The instructions have been sent, but I could not say just when.

Mr. MARCIL: I was rather surprised to learn from an answer given by the minister a few days ago, in reply to a question of mine, that the minister did not see his way clear to compensating the fishermen of Gaspé and Bonaventure who suffered by the severe storm on the 4th of June last.

Mr. HAZEN: We have an item here.

Mr. MARCIL: But that is to compensate the relatives of those who were drowned. The minister, I understand, has decided not to allow anything to those fishermen who lost their boats and fishing gear. Many of these fishermen lost their boats and all their fishing gear right at the opening of the fishing season, and the loss handicapped them for the whole season. The minister knows that these fishermen are not very wealthy, and I think it was rather unfortunate that he did not see his way clear to allowing them something. The storm was of unusual severity, the severest for many years, Dr. Wakeham says. The case of the fishermen is a most deserving one, and I think the minister should have allowed them something.

Mr. HAZEN: My hon. friend is referring to the storm of unusual violence that swept over the northern part of New Brunswick and the Gaspé peninsula on the 4th of June, 1914. There was some discussion of this matter on the day the House prorogued last year, but the facts were not then known. While there was serious loss of gear on the Quebec side there was no loss of life; but in Gloucester county, N.B., twelve fishermen were drowned. In two instances, a father and his two sons, and in another, a father and a son perished. Of the twelve persons who were drowned, six left widows. It has been represented that the conditions were such as to call for assistance from the Federal Government, and it was urged that compensation should be made for loss of gear as well as assistance given to the widows and heirs of those who were drowned. My hon. friend knows that storms of considerable severity visit the different parts of the coast practically every year and cause serious destruction and loss of fishing equipment. While the storm my hon. friend has referred to was much severer than usual, if compensation were given for gear lost, similar consideration would have to be accorded to all fishermen who lose gear on account of stormy weather. It was considered that assistance could reasonably be given only to the heirs of the twelve persons who were drowned. The storm occurred at the beginning of the fishing season, so that those who might be depending on the persons who were drowned had received practically no earnings from them that year. The sum of $200 was paid to the widows, families or lawful heirs of each person drowned during that storm. The following is a list of the names and the amounts paid:

Name of Fisherman.	Paid to.	Relationship.
Prospère Albert	Mrs. Prospère Albert	Wife.
Martin P. Albert	" Martin P. Albert	"
Oliver Paulin	" Oliver Paulin	"
Joseph Thériault	" Joseph Thériault	"
M. LeBouthillier	" Augustine LeBouthillier	"
Joseph D. Boudreau	" J. D. Boudreau	"
Pierre LeBouthillier	" Augustine LeBouthillier	Mother.
Fred Chasson	" Fred Chasson	Wife.
J. B. Albert	" Prospère Albert	Mother.
J. Tériault	" Jos. Terriault	"
Fred Terriault	" Jos. Terriault	"
Théophile Dugas	Mr. Herbert Dugas	Father.

Cheques were made out to the names given in the list and forwarded to the fishery officer for distribution. The feeling was that if we gave compensation for loss of gear in this case we would be bound to make compensation for loss of gear in every storm that might take place. That principle has not been acted upon by this Parliament in the past, and I hesitated to establish a precedent.

Mr. MARCIL: I quite agree with the statement of the minister. Although I regret that he was unable to see his way to make compensation to these people for the loss of their gear. The amount allowed is very small, although it is considerable to some of these poor people. It must not be forgotten that the Government encourage the fisheries and pay bounties to the fishermen engaged in that calling. The trade of the fisherman has been growing smaller and smaller every year. The fisheries of Canada are supposed to be one of the important resources of the country, and I think the department would have been justified in giving favourable consideration to this claim. I do not assert that every fisherman losing his gear should make a claim upon the department, but in this case where the storm was very severe the refusal to grant assistance to those who have lost their property was rather hard treatment. When the fisherman gives up his calling and takes up another occupation it is hard to get him back. I know the minister realizes the importance of these fisheries and the desirability of their proper exploitation. I think that the minister, considering all the circumstances, might have given them something, but I suppose it is too late now to argue the point further.

Another thing I want to ask the minister about is the salmon pond at New Mills. This pond was on the Restigouche on the broadlands above New Mills, but I am told that the experiment was not as successful as it should have been. Would the minister kindly state the reason of the removal to New Mills?

Mr. HAZEN: My hon. friend moved for the papers, and I am sorry they are not before the House. The change was made, I believe, on the recommendation of the fishery officers of the department. There had been trouble with the pond further up the Restigouche river where it was at Flatlands and it was felt that the work could be more successfully carried on where the pond now is at New Mills. The hon. gentleman is quite right; the first year's experiments at the pond were not an unqualified success. There was some trouble in consequence of the collection of sediment and dirt in the pond that interfered with the health of the salmon. That has all been overcome and my information is that the results are now most satisfactory. Last year they were fairly satisfactory, a considerable number of salmon fry being obtained in the pond and there is every reason to believe that it will be successful now. The papers will show all the correspondence and I hope they will be before the House to-morrow or at the latest on Monday.

Mr. MARCIL: Has any understanding been arrived at with the Government of Quebec in regard to the issue of fishery licenses?

Mr. HAZEN: Correspondence on this subject is now taking place between the Department of Justice and the Department of the Attorney General of the province of Quebec. I have not seen Mr. Newcombe for several days, but when I last spoke to him an arrangement had not been arrived at although I believe there was reason for hoping that an arrangement would be arrived at soon.

Mr. MARCIL: I understand that for the present year the existing condition shall continue and that no licenses will be issued by this department?

Mr. HAZEN: No such agreement has been arrived at that I am aware of.

Mr. MARCIL: That was the suggestion made.

Mr. HAZEN: We contend that the decision given in the British Columbia case is applicable to the province of Quebec, the decision being that there is a public right of fishery existing in tidal waters and, that being the case, that the administration of this fishery is in the hands of the Federal government. The government of Quebec contend that Magna Charta, under which this public right is given, does not apply to the province of Quebec, that Quebec does not come within the terms of Magna Charta. We are advised by the Department of Justice that that position is not well taken. However, the Government at Quebec does take the position very strongly that the judgment of the Privy Council does not apply to Quebec and we think it very desirable that there should be a judgment of the Privy Council finally disposing of the matter. We suggested to the authorities at Quebec that we should arrange to have a case stated to the Supreme Court of Canada and to the Privy Council that would absolutely decide whether the regulation of the fisheries shall come under the federal or provincial authorities. That was not accepted by the province of Quebec. There has been some correspondence under which the provincial authorities propose that they should go ahead this year and administer the fishery as they have been doing for a good many years in the past and that we should take steps, by arresting some one for violating the law of fishing without a license for the Dominion to bring the matter to the consideration of the courts again. The last correspondence I saw on the subject shows that the discussion has taken place along that line and I believe that an arrangement may be come to. It may be that my hon. friend has information a little later than I have that an arrangement has been come to.

Mr. MARCIL: I am sorry to say that I have not, but I hope that an understanding will be arrived at between the two Governments because it will be unfortunate if the population down there find themselves occupying a position between these two authorities and not knowing which has the jurisdiction. I would like to draw the minister's attention to a peculiar state of affairs in connection with the salmon fishery on the Baie de Chaleur and Gaspé coast. The minister knows the great importance of the salmon fishery in the Baie des Chaleurs in the months of May, June and July. The fish are brought up to Dalhousie and Campbellton and placed in cold storage to be kept until ready for shipment to market. Until last year we had a semi-weekly service which collected this fish along the Gaspé basin and took it to Dalhousie and Campbellton, there to be put in cold storage. Last year the semi-weekly service between Montreal and Gaspé was discontinued and we were given a weekly service. This year the people of the coast generally, who found the service so useful to them in shipping to Quebec and Montreal, find that it is now of no use to them for the purpose of exporting their fish in May, June and the beginning of July. The result of the change in this service is that we have thousands and thousands of the most valuable Gaspé salmon, that are fished for all the way to a point below Grand river and along the coast of the county of Gaspé, lying there without means of shipment except by railway. The railway has no cold storage cars and can provide no proper facilities and the result is a great deal of trouble and an immense amount of loss. The last time that the Estimates of the hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce (Sir George Foster) were up I asked him a question on that point and he told me that he was practically powerless. This company, the Baie de Chaleur Steamship Company, has a two-years' contract for a weekly service from Montreal to Campbellton, and it has turned out to be nothing but a freight service. The boat is very uncertain and the people do not know whether it will pass on Monday, Tuesday or Wednesday. The fishermen cannot afford to allow their fish to remain on the wharf waiting for the boat. Consequently, they have to resort to the railway and great loss has been occasioned. I thought that the minister might perhaps bring pressure to bear upon this company as the result of which they would give a semi-weekly service during May and June. This valuable salmon must be kept in cold storage and placed on the market at as early a period as possible and in the best possible condition if an adequate return is to be made to the fishermen.

Mr. HAZEN: I shall be glad indeed to urge the matter on the Minister of Trade and Commerce.

Naval Service—to provide a further amount for the removal of obstructions in the Fraser river, B.C., Governor General's warrant, $50,000.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Why was this work made necessary?

Mr. HAZEN: The obstruction was formed in the first place in 1913 by the building of the Canadian Northern railway road-bed along the bank of the river at Hell's gate and vicinity. It completely blocked the ascent of salmon to their spawning beds. In view of the great value of the salmon fisheries, immediately following the discovery of the blockade in the fall of 1913, work was started in making temporary channels to meet the changing heights of the water, and thus many salmon were enabled to pass up. The Canadian Northern railway was then called upon to restore the river to its original lines during the time of low water in February and March, 1914. This they finally started to do in a rather leisurely manner in February, 1914; but they had hardly got under way when a terrific slide came down from the side of the mountain at Hell's gate, and made conditions very much worse than ever. As it became obvious that only by the exercise of the greatest possible energy could the obstructions be sufficiently removed to enable the ascent of the salmon during the coming season, a conference of engineers on the spot was arranged for. The engineers were the department local engineer in charge of the removal of obstructions in rivers, the engineer of the New Westminster Harbour Commission, and the engineer of the Provincial Department of Public Works. They estimated the cost to be at least $60,000, and recommended that the work be placed in the hands of the Pacific Dredging Company, which was best equipped to carry it out. This was done, the company to receive ten per cent of the cost as profits, plus rental for the machinery. The work has proved of much greater magnitude than was anticipated, and has been going on ever since. It is expected that it will be finished in April. By the installation of a temporary sluice and temporary channels, the fish were passed up this year. Representatives of the Canadian Northern have been in Ottawa and they have taken the matter up with my department. I understand they admit their liability in connection with the first obstruction, but they claim that the second slide was not due to any work of construction on their part. That, of course, will have to be fought out with them.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Has the work been finished?

Mr. HAZEN: No.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Including this sum of $50,000 and $30,000 in the Main Estimates for next year, there would be a total voted of $140,000 altogether.

Mr. HAZEN: We are assuming that it will cost $30,000 for the work done since February. There was a miscalculation as to the cost of this work. We were first told that it would come to $60,000, and I had $60,000 placed in the Estimates, but to our surprise we found that was not enough. We think this vote will cover the full amount.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Does the minister know who the Pacific Dredging Company are?

Mr. HAZEN: No.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Does he know that they are in any way a part of Mackenzie & Mann?

Mr. HAZEN: I do not think they are.

Mr. PUGSLEY: It has been intimated to me that this company is controlled by Mackenzie & Mann.

Mr. HAZEN: I do not think so, but we had the report of a board of the very best engineers we could get, namely, our own engineer, the engineer of the New Westminster Harbour Commission, and the engineer of the provincial Department of Public Works in British Columbia, and it was on their report we placed the work in the hands of this dredging company.

Mr. PUGSLEY: What proportion of the cost is the Canadian Northern Company willing to pay; I understand they are willing to pay for the obstructions caused by their own works?

Mr. HAZEN: The engineer of the Canadian Northern Company has had communication with the deputy minister, Mr. Desbarats, and I understood they had a preliminary talk over the matter, and the Canadian Northern agreed that for the first obstruction they were liable, but they disputed their liability for the second. The opinion of our engineer is that the last slide was caused by the building of the railway along the river bank at the foot of the hill and disturbing it.

Lighthouse and Coast Service—agencies, further amount required, $7,000.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Has the minister any information with regard to the purchase of coal in Vancouver; I am informed that it is purchased without tender?

Mr. HAZEN: Does my hon. friend refer to the coal purchased for the Marine and Fisheries Department or for the Department of Naval Service?

Mr. PUGSLEY: My informant says that the Marine and Fisheries Department and the Quarantine station—that of course would be in the Department of Agriculture—do not call for tenders for coal, and I should very much like to be advised as to the prices paid. Perhaps the minister will tomorrow give information as to that?

Mr. HAZEN: I shall be glad to; but my impression is that they do call for tenders. We certainly do on the Atlantic coast.

Mr. PUGSLEY: I submit this statement to the minister and he promises to give me the information.

Lighthouse and Coast Service—administration of pilotage and maintenance and repairs to steamer Eureka—further amount required. $7,000.

Mr. BOULAY (Translation): About three weeks ago, when the first Estimates of the hon. minister were laid before the House, I called his attention to the fact that two ships had met with ill-luck off a place called Sainte-Félicité. The hon. gentleman promised at the time that he would furnish detailed information as regards that casualty. I would like to know whether he is now in a position to supply that information, and also whether he has made enquiries as regards the placing of a buoy at that place and has made up his mind to place one there, or take some means of avoiding such casualties henceforth.

I understand that last summer two ships met with accidents. I would like to know whether the department was notified of such occurrences. A large number of ships pass there and if no aids to navigation are provided, ships may meet with disaster and become total wrecks.

I may further point out to the hon. gentleman that, to my mind, the danger signal which has been placed about one mile west of the church of Ste. Félicité, does not fully answer the requirements of navigation. If a lighthouse or danger signal were placed at Cap à la Baleine, a short distance from there, I think it would be the means of avoiding accidents such as those which occurred last summer. I would like to know whether the department has been notified of such occurrences.

Mr. HAZEN: I understand my hon. friend to refer to what he claims to be the insufficiency of certain aids to navigation on the St. Lawrence, and speaks of a buoy being needed at Ste. Félicité and some further signal stations being required there. I do not know whether he has called this to my attention before, so that I have referred it to the Lighthouse Board, or not. But, if not, I should be glad to call the attention of the Lighthouse Board to the matter and ask for their decision.

Mr. MARCIL: Does the minister contemplate any work in the way of lighthouse service on the Baie des Chaleurs?

Mr. HAZEN: I gave information on those points when my Main Estimates were under discussion. I have not the facts before me now, but I can get the information for the hon. member.

Mr. BOULAY: Last year an investigation was held at Father Point into the case of Captain Belanger. I noticed there was a gentleman there attending the investigation who seemed to be very much interested in it. But still he had no business to be there. I inquired who he was and found that his name was Capt. Lindsay. He was there three or four days doing nothing at all, understanding nothing of what was going on. I should like to know from the minister if Captain Lindsay was there by his orders or was he there at his own wish?

Mr. HAZEN: I do not recollect whether I personally gave orders to Captain Lindsay to attend or not. He may have attended by the order of his superiors in the department. He is the Superintendent of Pilots on the St. Lawrence, and he may have considered that when an investigation of this sort was taking place—and I would not say he was wrong—it was his duty to be present to learn what went on and what action should be taken.

Construction of a vessel to replace the Scout —further amount required, $43,000.

Mr. HAZEN: That is on the St. Lawrence, running from Kingston to Prescott.

I promised an hon. gentleman that when my Estimates were before the committee I would lay on the table a statement of what had been done respecting steam trawlers. Though the present vote does not relate to this subject, perhaps I may be allowed this opportunity to put this statement with regard to steam trawlers on record.

Statement re Steam Trawling.

As steam trawlers from France and the United States, as well as those that operate from Nova Scotia ports, fish on this side of the Atlantic, and as even the inshore boat fishermen usually fish more than three miles from shore, it is obvious that the only permanently effective way of controlling this fishery is by an international arrangement.

In 1910 it was recommended to His Majesty's Government that a conference of representatives of the countries interested, should be called, with a view to reaching an arrangement for the entire prohibition of steam trawling on this side of the Atlantic.

In 1911 a reply was given in effect, that His Majesty's Government would find it difficult to support such a conference, but suggested that one might be called to consider the regulation of the fishery along the lines of the North Sea Convention.

While there were many reports of destruction of the gear of ordinary fishermen, interference with their operations and injury of fishing grounds, etc., there was little or no positive information in the premises before the Government. Moreover, while the majority of those engaged in the industry were opposed to trawling, there were those who strongly favoured this method of fishing as an improved one that should be encouraged, and the only one by which a constant supply of fish to meet the demands of an increasing fresh fish business in Canada could be supplied. Hence it was considered best to have the affects of such steam trawling as was being carried on investigated before going into conference. In the spring of 1912 it was arranged with the United States and Newfoundland authorities that during that season such investigations would be carried on independently, the understanding being that, immediately following the completion of such, His Majesty's Government would be asked to call a conference.

The investigations in Canada and the United States were carried out under precisely similar instructions to the investigators; but the United States took much longer to complete its investigations than was at first anticipated. The report of its investigators was submitted only a short time ago.

It is now feasible to ask His Majesty's Government to invite a conference, which it is proposed to do forthwith.

As, however, the conclusions of such conference could not be reached in time to be made effective this year, and as it seems possible that a considerably larger number of trawlers than heretofore will come to this side this year, it is eminently important that some means be taken to protect the ordinary fishermen.

In recent years there does not appear to have been destruction of the gear of the ordinary fishermen on the banks by trawlers. Therefore, if the inshore fishermen are amply protected, there would not likely be difficulty during the present year.

After careful consideration of the matter, it has been decided to do this by a regulation under the Customs Act, whereby the master of any steam trawler will be required, before he is granted a clearance for the fishing grounds, to give the customs officer a declaration that he will not fish within at least 12 miles from shore. This will apply to French trawlers operating from Canadian ports, and those that do not, do not fish in the immediate vicinity of our coasts. Failure to comply with this requirement or a breach of the understanding will render the master and the vessel liable to the penalties prescribed for a violation of customs regulations.

As boat fishermen do not operate more than nine or ten miles from shore, this regulation will assure them full protection.

The regulation will apply to all trawlers clearing from a Canadian port on the Atlantic coast. While the United States trawlers do not clear from such ports, their operations so far have not extended beyond the Georges Banks, and there is nothing to indicate that they will during the present year.

That matter was duly considered by the Commissioner of Customs, the deputy minister and myself, and accordingly an Order in Council was passed along the lines mentioned in the statement which I have just read.

Mr. MARCIL: Are these trawlers allowed to operate in Baie de Chaleur?

Mr. HAZEN: I do not think any have ever gone into the Baie de Chaleur.

Mr. MARCIL: There was one there three or four years ago.

Mr. HAZEN: They cannot go in under this regulation.

Mr. SINCLAIR: Does the minister consider that he has legal authority under the Customs Act to make and enforce this regulation?

Mr. HAZEN: It is the view of the Commissioner of Customs and the department that they have full authority to enforce it.

Mr. SINCLAIR: This regulation will be useful to some extent as applied to the Gulf of St. Lawrence, where trawlers are operating along the coast. It will be of no service, of course, to those who fish on the banks of Newfoundland. Does the minister feel certain that he has not power to enforce the regulation adopted two years ago?

Mr. HAZEN: While I have not an opinion in writing from the Justice Department, the opinion of the Justice Department, having heard the representations made by the Government of France through their consul general in Montreal, is that it would not be desirable, from the legal standpoint, to attempt to enforce it. My hon. friend the Minister of Justice himself gave careful attention to the matter, and conferred with his deputy minister and with me about it, and the conclusion arrived at was that it would not be safe to attempt to enforce that provision. There is a treaty with Japan under which their vessels have certain rights in Canadian ports, and the French Government, being a favoured nation, has the same rights as are given by treaty to Japan.

Mr. LEMIEUX: Do I understand the minister to say that this regulation will not be enforced against French fishermen?

Mr. HAZEN: That is right, if my hon. friend refers to the Act passed two years ago.

[Mr. Hazen.]

Mr. SINCLAIR: There is no reason why Canadian or British trawlers should not be prevented from operating.

Mr. HAZEN: Not at all. Canadian trawlers are not allowed within the three mile limit.

Mr. SINCLAIR: They are allowed to clear from Canadian ports and to operate on the banks.

Mr. HAZEN: Under this regulation they will have to undertake not to fish within twelve miles from the shore.

Mr. SINCLAIR: The minister says that we are not in a position to prevent French trawlers from operating on the banks, owing to the Japanese treaty. My point is this: is my hon. friend not in a position to prevent trawlers registered in Great Britain and in Canada from operating on the Banks, irrespective of any treaty that may exist?

Mr. HAZEN: I think we could, but we would not accomplish much by doing that. If you do not stop the French trawler, there is not much use in stopping the British trawler.

Mr. SINCLAIR: It depends upon the number that operate. If a large number of British trawlers should come across and operate on the Banks, it would be very important to have the power to apply the restriction to them.

Mr. A. W. CHISHOLM: I understand the minister to say that his department enforced the regulation with respect to the operations of these trawlers within the three-mile limit, and that he had no complaints of any kind within the last year. I may tell the minister that he is not properly informed on that point. It is a fact that steam trawlers operated in the Gulf of St. Lawrence along the coast of the county of Inverness last season and the season before. They have adopted a method by which they can evade the regulations and carry on operations without difficulty. They leave port after dark, and begin their fishing along the coast within the three-mile limit before daylight. The minister says that he is going to enforce the regulation to prevent steam trawlers clearing from ports in Canada from operating within twelve miles of the shore. I wish to point out that the vessels of the protection fleet must exercise greater vigilance than they have exercised in the past if they wish to accomplish anything, not only in enforcing this regulation, but in enforcing the regulations which at present exist. The fact of the matter is that the existing regulations prohibiting the operation of steam trawlers within the three-mile limit have not been enforced. and the result is that half the fishermen along the coast of Inverness county have abandoned fishing altogether. My hon. friend knows that the equipment which these fishermen require is quite expensive, and they have had such sad experiences in the past in the destruction of gear, nets and trawls that they will not now take any further risks. These trawlers leave Port Hawkesbury or some other point in the Strait of Canso after dark; they drop their gear, pursue their course to the Gulf of St. Lawrence and are outside the three-mile limit before daylight. The information which the minister has with respect to the enforcement of these regulations is not correct. The vessels that he sends down there to enforce the regulations, if they wish to accomplish anything, must pursue a vigilant policy, and not remain tied up in port. The only suggestion made by the fishermen along the coast is that the protection fleet should be on duty at night; this is the only way of discouraging the practice which the steam trawlers have of operating within the three-mile limit. Seven years ago, when first I came to this House, I took occasion to criticise the late Government for their laxity in the matter of enforcing these regulations. I have repeated the same charge since then, and I repeat it again now. The protection vessels cannot accomplish their purpose if they are not right on the spot before daylight.

Mr. HAZEN: The hon. member has made the statement very positively, and I do not wish to question what he says, but if he is right the officials of my department who make reports to me are wrong. So far as I know, the gentlemen who are in the department, and who are the same gentlemen who have been there for a number of years, are thoroughly competent, and are trying properly to discharge their duties. The statement they make is that practically no fishing was done last year by trawlers within the three-mile limit, and in support of that they refer to the fact that during the last year practically no complaints on that score have reached the department. I do not question the hon. gentleman's statement; he has made it more positively than I ever heard it made before. I will at once call the attention of my officials to his statement, and see what they have to say in regard to it. But their reports have been such as to convey an entirely different impression from that which the hon. member's positive statement to-night would convey to the House.

Mr. A. W. CHISHOLM: My information comes from the fishermen, and they will be very much surprised to find from to-morrow's Hansard that the minister is so ill-informed, I care not what official gave the information. I took occasion in this House to find fault with the late Government for their failure to enforce the regulations, and I say most emphatically that in this case I have the information from the fishermen. I am not surprised to hear the minister say that he has had no complaints this last year or the year before. The reason for that is that the fishermen are discouraged because their complaints were not heeded in the past in this regard and are abandoning the fishing. They cannot afford to buy gear and have it destroyed before daylight by steam trawlers. The fishermen are at my back in this matter.

Mr. SINCLAIR: This is a question of very great importance all around the coasts of the Maritime Provinces, and if the minister would be kind enough to put the text of the regulations on Hansard it would be very interesting. We would like to see his new regulation.

Mr. HAZEN: I shall be very glad to bring it down to-morrow.

To defray expenses in connection with the preparation, etc., of a Dominion Electoral Atlas based on the Redistribution Act of 1914, $8,500.

Mr. MARCIL: What does the hon. gentleman intend doing in regard to the Dominion electoral atlas for the new constituencies? Will it be distributed to members of the existing Parliament as well as to members of the next Parliament?

Mr. CODERRE: Five thousand copies are to be printed. Members of this Parliament will have one copy each, and so will members of the next Parliament.

Mr. MURPHY: Have arrangements yet been made for the work.

Mr. CODERRE: Yes.

Mr. MURPHY: With whom?

Mr. CODERRE: The Dominion Geographer and the King's Printer.

Mr. MURPHY: Who is to do the publication?

Mr. CODERRE: The King's Printer. The intention is to have it printed in the bureau.

Mr. MURPHY: Has any arrangement been made to that end?

Mr. CODERRE: I am informed by the Clerk of the Crown in Chancery that this is being done now.

Mr. MURPHY: All the work is being done in the Printing Bureau?

Mr. CODERRE: The arrangement is being made with the Printing Bureau.

Mr. MURPHY: Does that mean the work?

Mr. CODERRE: The work is not started yet.

Mr. MURPHY: Then it does not mean anything?

Mr. CODERRE: The lithographing is to be done outside and the other part in the Printing Bureau.

Mr. MURPHY: Has any arrangement to that end been entered into?

Mr. CODERRE: There is no arrangement yet, so far as I know.

Mr. MURPHY: Have tenders been asked?

Mr. CODERRE: No.

Mr. MURPHY: Will tenders be asked?

Mr. CODERRE: Yes.

Mr. MURPHY: From whom?

Mr. CODERRE: I do not know.

Mr. MURPHY: From whom can we get that information?

Mr. CODERRE: I do not know yet who will be called upon to tender.

Mr. SINCLAIR: Why not open it to the public and permit any one to tender?

Mr. CODERRE: Really this matter does not come under my department. This will be done, I am told, by the Dominion geographer.

Mr. MURPHY: He will only prepare the copy; he will not do the work. That will be done in some printing or lithographing establishment.

Mr. CODERRE: The printing and lithographing are done as I have said.

Mr. PROULX: How was the last one made?

[Mr. Murphy.]

Mr. CODERRE: By the Printing Bureau.

Mr. PROULX: The plates have been preserved?

Mr. CODERRE: I am told that they are of no use. In the province of Quebec there will be many changes in the new atlas.

Mr. PROULX: In many counties there are no changes and the old plates would do for them.

Mr. CODERRE: There will be many changes because we will give all the municipalities in the atlas this year.

Mr. MARCIL: Will it be the same size as the last one?

Mr. CODERRE: A little larger. It will have a history of each district on the back of the map.

Mr. MARCIL: I understand that one copy was given to each member of the House last time and if he required additional copies he had to pay $2 apiece. What is the policy of the department in that respect?

Mr. CODERRE: They have to pay $2 for each copy above the one given to them.

Mr. MARCIL: Outside of members of the Senate and House of Commons, who are to get copies? The newspaper press?

Mr. CODERRE: Parliamentary distribution as usual.

Mr. MARCIL: What does that mean?

Mr. CODERRE: Distribution to newspaper men.

Mr. MARCIL: The same distribution as the last time?

Mr. CODERRE: Yes.

Mr. MARCIL: When will the work be ready in book form?

Mr. CODERRE: About the 1st of June.

Mr. MARCIL: And will the distribution take place then to members of this Parliament?

Mr. CODERRE: Yes.

Mr. SINCLAIR: The minister has not yet answered my question. I would like to hear him say that this work would be put up to public tender and printers would all have a chance to bid on it. It appears that under this Administration the old system of tender and contract has practically been abandoned. They appear to have a list of favourites in each of the departments to whom letters or telephone messages are sent whenever work is to be done; and the general public have no chance. I do not think that should be the rule in Canada; it should be the exception; I know that in some cases it may be the best thing to do. Last year I picked out at random four cases from each of three departments, and I asked a question in the House as to what papers the tenders had been advertised in. The answer was that the tenders were not advertised in any papers at all, that there was no publication whatever. That appears to be the rule under the present Administration. I should like to ask the minister to see that for once some work is thrown open to the public, and given to the lowest or the best tenderer. Let us make an exception in this case, and have the work done without graft.

Mr. SCHAFFNER: That sounds good, but it would be something brand-new. It was never done in the past in this country.

Mr. OLIVER: If it is good, why does my hon. friend object simply because it is new?

Mr. SCHAFFNER: I did not object.

Mr. CODERRE: Of course, this does not come strictly under my control. I am told that tenders were never called for in cases of special work of this kind.

Mr. MURPHY: I have only to say that if my hon. friend acts on that advice, he will get into more trouble than he ever dreams of. Tenders were called for.

Mr. MARCIL: How many copies are to be bound, and how many to remain unbound?

Mr. CODERRE: There will be 1,000 bound in cloth, 1,000 in paper, and 2,000 unbound.

Mr. BOULAY (Translation): Mr. Chairman, I may be allowed at this point to offer a suggestion. For some years past I have taken an interest in elections, and it strikes me that since the Dominion Government has taken over the making of the voters' lists, many errors have crept in the lists for the county of Rimouski. As a result of such oversights, it often happens that voters are deprived of their franchise, and inconvenienced in other ways. It seems to me that such hardships might be obviated by having the lists made by people who are familiar with the names of French voters in the province of Quebec. I realize that people who are familiar with the English language only, are liable to make such mistakes, especially as regards surnames, and mistakes as regards surnames are, of course, the most objectionable. All such oversights would be avoided if people thoroughly familiar with the spelling of French names were appointed to make the lists. As I have just stated, errors concerning surnames are the most misleading, and they might be avoided by following the course I have suggested.

Supplementary Estimates for 1915-16—to provide for payment of the full sessional indemnity of members of the House of Commons —days lost through absence caused by illness or public business during the present session— notwithstanding anything to the contrary in chapter 10 of the Revised Statutes of Canada, an Act respecting the Senate and House of Commons, or any amendments thereto—payment to be made as the Treasury Board may direct, $19,000.

Mr. LEMIEUX: Can we have a list of the names? I simply inquire to make sure that the name of Dr. Béland is not forgotten.

Mr. ROGERS: I have not the list here, but I can assure my hon. friend that Dr. Béland is not forgotten.

Mr. LEMIEUX: Is the late Mr. Richards on the list?

Mr. ROGERS: I have not the list here.

Mr. OLIVER: What is the definition of public business? I understand that this is to provide for the payment of indemnity to members who are absent on account of illness or on public business. I can understand that members engaged in military affairs are certainly entitled to this consideration. Is there any other class of business that is considered public business which would entitle members engaged in it to the payment of their indemnities?

Mr. ROGERS: I understand that great care is exercised by the committee that has this in charge. Any man, like Sir Edmund Osler, who is engaged with his own business is docked for every day he is absent. I do not think there is any definition of public business. I suppose it would mean business such as that in which Colonel Currie, Dr. Béland and others are engaged.

Mr. MARCIL: How many members are at the front?

Mr. ROGERS: I have not the list before me, but I think we all know which of our colleagues are in the fight.

Mr. MARCIL: I think the names should be given, as it is a credit to the House. I can recall five members: the hon. member for York, N.B. (Mr. McLeod); the hon. member for North Simcoe (Mr. Currie); the hon member for Brome (Mr. Baker); the hon. member for Beauce (Hon. Dr. Béland), and the hon. member for Thunder Bay and Rainy River (Mr. Carrick).

Mr. STANFIELD: I might say that in this matter the Whips are consulted by the Accountant of the House. We both prepare a list and see that no person is put on except those who are absent through sickness. The accountant tells me that Dr. Béland is not entitled to be paid out of the military vote for those who have gone to the front. Therefore his name is included in this vote. The same thing applies to Sir George Perley and Colonel Baker, the hon. member for Brome.

Mr. MARCIL: Was not Dr. Béland appointed to the Canadian medical corps by the Minister of Militia and Defence?

Mr. STANFIELD: I understand that he is a prisoner.

Mr. MARCIL: At present, but he was appointed to the Canadian medical corps.

Mr. OLIVER: I would like to ask the hon. gentleman if any other kind of business than military business is recognized within the meaning of this vote, and, if so, what?

Mr. STANFIELD: Nothing but Government business is recognized. Sir George Perley is away on Government business, and the Hon. Mr. Burrell's name was also included, because he was away for nearly a month at the San Francisco exposition.

Miscellaneous—to provide for the purchase of 400 copies of the Life of Sir George E. Cartier, by John Boyd, $2,000.

Mr. PROULX: Who, besides the members, will get a copy of this work?

Mr. CODERRE: I have arranged to give a copy to the members of the press gallery, and there are a few copies left.

Distribution of Parliamentary documents—further amount required, $1,000.

Mr. MARCIL: Two electors of mine applied for copies of the Auditor General's Report. One was an English-speaking elector and the other a French-speaking elector. I sent to the English-speaking elector the report for 1914, and when I applied for the French version of the report I was told that the report for 1914 had not been printed in French, and that only one volume of the 1913 report had been printed in French. If we are going to have these blue-books we ought to have them in reasonable time; otherwise it is wasting money to no purpose. I want to know if any action has been taken to bring the publication of these reports up-to-date.

Mr. CODERRE: The last two volumes of the French version of the Auditor General's Report for 1912-13, and the French version of the Auditor General's Report for 1913-14, are just being printed, and I expect them to be ready for distribution within three months.

Mr. MARCIL: Why was not the report for 1912-13 printed before this?

Mr. CODERRE: Because it is impossible to print the two versions together.

Mr. MARCIL: You are not doing that in the case of the English version for 1913-14. If these blue-books are to be of any use they must come out in a reasonable time; otherwise it is a sheer waste of public money to issue them.

Mr. CODERRE: The King's Printer tells me that when he came in the French version of the report for 1912-13 had not been commenced. He is attending to that matter, with the result that I have stated.

Mr. MARCIL: I understand the minister has organized a staff especially for the translation of the Auditor General's Report?

Mr. CODERRE: Yes, the money was voted last year.

Mr. MARCIL: How many translators are there?

Mr. CODERRE: Three.

Mr. MARCIL: Are they stationed in Ottawa?

Mr. CODERRE: Yes.

Mr. MARCIL: Is the printing being done at the Printing Bureau in this case?

Mr. CODERRE: Not of the 1913-14 report.

Mr. MARCIL: Where?

Mr. CODERRE: Montreal.

Mr. MARCIL: By contract?

Mr. CODERRE: No contract, but at Bureau rates, as usual.

Mr. MARCIL: Who is printing it in Montreal?

Mr. CODERRE: La Patrie.

Mr. PROULX: Why is it necessary to send so much printing and lithographic work outside? When you look at the Auditor General's Report it is astonishing to see the amount of money that is spent by the Government for outside printing. There is a lavish distribution amongst outside printers. La Patrie must have got thousands of dollars and different newspapers in different provinces are treated with almost equal liberality. Cannot the Printing Bureau do the work for the Government?

Mr. CODERRE: No.

Mr. PROULX: I am inclined to think that a lot of this money is wasted. For some little public work the Government will advertise in fifteen or twenty-five newspapers. It is a waste of money. They spend more money sometimes in advertising than the whole work is to cost.

Mr. CODERRE: Advertising is done outside of the Printing Bureau.

Mr. PROULX: I do not refer only to advertising; I refer also to printing and lithography.

Mr. CODERRE: Last year we had an increase of $300,000 in the amount of printing, $200,000 of which was done in the Bureau and $100,000 outside. Although we have the same accommodation the work is increasing every day. That is the reason why so much work is sent outside. There is a part of this work which never has been done in the Printing Bureau and which cannot be done at present because we have not the necessary plant. We have not the plant to do the lithographic work, and it is absolutely necessary to go outside. That represents the largest amount of work done outside.

Mr. PROULX: Are tenders called for this work which is given to different printing companies?

Mr. CODERRE: In some cases tenders are asked for, but generally not. We pay according to the rates which have been established for years and which are known as Bureau rates.

Mr. PROULX: Do you discriminate amongst the newspapers?

Mr. CODERRE: I give to those who ask.

Mr. PROULX: The Liberal papers do not ask?

Mr. CODERRE: They do not.

Mr. PROULX: They are very reasonable.

Mr. MARCIL: Has any action been taken on the report of the commission appointed last year to deal with the printing and distribution of public documents, and which suggested that there was great waste in printing useless blue-books which were for the most part thrown away. That commission consisted of Sir Joseph Pope, Dr. Doughty and another gentleman?

Mr. CODERRE: That commission was in connection with the Archives, and the commissioners visited all the departments and ascertained that there were a number of documents worth preserving, as a result of which there is a vote in the Main Estimates this year for $100,000 to enlarge the Archives building, so as to accommodate these documents.

Mr. STANFIELD: My hon. friend (Mr. Marcil) is thinking of the joint report of the Printing Committee on that matter.

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. member (Mr. Marcil) is quite correct in what he says. That commission incidentally reported in reference to the number of blue-books which were printed and never used, and they made a recommendation in that respect. Recently I submitted to the Joint Committee on Printing of both Houses a proposal to reduce the number of some of these publications, and the committee dealt with the matter so far as they could in a report to the House, which was adopted yesterday. I have considered the matter carefully for some time, and it is my view that a committee should be appointed to take up the whole question of printing and distributing reports and parliamentary documents, so that it may be done on a more businesslike basis than is pursued at present. In my judgment, hundreds of thousands of dollars could be saved every year if the printing and distribution of these publications were curtailed. One of the recommendations of the commission to which my hon. friend (Mr. Marcil) has referred was a very good one: it was to the effect that the present system of distributing the blue-books should be done away with. These publications are now carted from the Printing Bureau to the distribution office of the House of Commons, and men are employed to carry them around to the rooms of the members, who often refuse to take them, and they have to be piled up in the corridors. It was recommended that a post office or postal station should be established in or close to the Printing Bureau, from which officers of the Post Office Department could send the publications by mail, as a supply for the House of Commons and Senate, and thus save a lot of unnecessary labour and expense. Copies of these publications could be kept in a small library or distribution office in the House of Commons for the use of members of the Senate and House of Commons during the session, and a couple of employees could be placed in charge of them. There are now sent to each member two copies of each report published, which are duplicated in the Sessional Papers, 24 copies of the Trade and Commerce Monthly Report, two copies of the same, in the Customs reports, and two copies of all other reports. It seems to me that there is a great waste of money in this, and that a good business committee composed of one or two of the deputy heads of departments, together with the King's Printer, the Superintendent of Printing, and a Minister of the Crown, would be able to recommend a commonsense basis on which this distribution should be made. The present system is unbusinesslike and extravagant, and serves no good purpose. I have been told that some of these publications are not taken out of the post office by parties to whom they are granted, and have to be burned, which of course costs money.

Mr. MARCIL: The House is grateful to Mr. Speaker for the attention he has given to this matter, and while the same complaint existed in my time as Speaker I think it has grown even worse since. The French-speaking members of the House have even greater reason to realize the waste, because when the blue-books are printed in English two copies of each are sent to them, and then a year or two afterwards when the translation is made they get another dose of the editions in French. Some of these are technical books and of no earthly use for any general purpose. The recommendation of the commission to which I referred, and the further recommendation of His Honour the Speaker tonight, are worthy of the attention of the Government. I wish to know if the minister has taken any action or intends to take any action in the matter.

[The Speaker.]

Mr. SPEAKER: I recently submitted to the Joint Committee on Printing that we could very well cut off half this waste by distributing in future one copy of these documents to each member instead of two copies as at present. If a member required further copies he could send a post-card to the Printing Bureau and get them in reasonable number. The Joint Committee on Printing recommended my suggestion to the House, and the House concurred in that report yesterday. Several members of the House have informed me that they do not want these reports at all, and in that way the waste can be still further lessened. In my judgment, that rule should apply to the distribution of the bound copies of Hansard as well, because I think that one bound copy of Hansard for each member instead of two would be quite sufficient.

Mr. CODERRE: I have before me the report of the Department of Public Printing and Stationery, in which the King's Printer makes a suggestion to the same effect as that made by Mr. Speaker.

Miscellaneous printing—further amount required, $50,000.

Mr. CODERRE: This amount is required to pay for printing done during the year, mainly of departmental reports. It is not possible, under our present system, to estimate in advance what will be the amount spent on this service. Let me give an illustration. By an Order in Council the Department of Agriculture is authorized to print as many copies of its report as it desires. Last year they caused to be printed 80,000 copies of a report of about 900 pages. This year, we have had to print 100,000 copies of a report of 1,500 pages, the report of the Central Experimental Farm. So, it is impossible for my department to foresee what will be the amount required during the year. I make this explanation to show how it comes that we are asking for this supplementary vote of $50,000.

Mr. MARCIL: There should be some control over the number of books printed, and only as many should be printed as are needed in the public interest, so that there may not be a printing of thousands on thousands of books that are unnecessary.

Mr. PUGSLEY: It seems to me that the charges for printing should be grouped under one head. At present, without very great labour, one cannot ascertain what is the cost of printing to this country. Every department pays for its own printing?

Mr. CODERRE: Not for the annual report.

Mr. PUGSLEY: But for a great deal of printing they do pay?

Mr. CODERRE: Yes.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Besides all these other items, we have this amount of $50,000, a further amount required for the printing of the year. The items for printing should be so arranged that on consulting the Auditor General's Report we could see what printing costs the country. If anything is paid for printing documents for the House of Commons or the Senate, let that appear among the items in its proper place.

Mr. McKENZIE: I desire to make a suggestion to the minister about printing. When printing of a special nature has to be done it is hardly worth while to call for tenders, because you have to deal with those who supply these specialties. But it would be well that the minister should have a plant for these special kinds of work. Then, when he has ordinary printing to do, such as any newspaper concern can turn out, let him call for tenders. He will thus get the benefit of market prices and will not be at the mercy of a few who seek to monopolize this class of work.

Mines and geological survey—Mines branch—to provide for the cost of experimental tests of low-grade magnetic iron ores with a view to making pig steel direct therefrom on a commercial basis, $10,000.

Mr. CODERRE: A committee of the members of the Geological Survey and the Mines Branch, appointed in September last, to investigate and report on the iron mining industry of Canada, and the metallurgical treatment both local and foreign that might be applicable to Canadian iron ores, recommends that a series of practical tests be made to demonstrate the possibility of making pig-steel direct from selected non-marketable ores, or ores now marketable with difficulty, and suggests that such tests be made at the Moffatt-Irving Electric Furnace, Toronto, as will best demonstrate the possibilities of a convenient method towards developing and utilizing some of the low-grade magnetic deposits of this country on a commercial basis.

The cost of this work is estimated as follows: a series of experimental furnace runs for thirty days, $3,000; labour, power, electrode consumption, $1,000; supervision, analyses, providing ore, coke flux, etc., $3,000; unforeseen expenses, $3,000; total, $10,000.

Mr. MARCIL: Where are these low-grade ores obtained?

Mr. CODERRE: In Ontario and Quebec.

Mr. MARCIL: I am told that along the shores of the St. Lawrence immense quantities of these low-grade ores can be obtained.

Mr. CODERRE: Experiments will be made with that ore.

Mr. GRAHAM: There is a lot of it in the Timiskaming country.

Mr. CODERRE: When the matter came up last year, one of the parties interested in the ore industry in Ontario came here to ask for a bounty from the Government. Instead of paying a bounty the Government appointed a commission to investigate and report. This commission was composed of officials of the Mines Branch and of the Geological Survey. They made a partial report, advising the department to make experiments or tests by the Moffat-Irving process, and this amount is now asked for to provide for such experiments and tests.

Mr. GAUVREAU: From what part of Quebec is that ore obtained?

Mr. CODERRE: On the north shore, opposite Anticosti island.

Mr. GAUVREAU: Large deposits of the best iron ore can be obtained in Rimouski and Temiscouata.

Mr. CODERRE: That ore will be examined by the commission.

Adulteration of food, and the administration of the Act respecting fertilizers, fraudulent marking and commercial feeding stuffs, $51,000.

Mr. GRAHAM: How is this inspection in the matter of adulteration of foods carried on? I remember when there were officers in every town, and the officer in my own town was engaged in canvassing for my opponent practically eleven months of the year. He really did but little work in the line of inspection; he had charge of the voters' lists for the riding. How many employees has my hon. friend in this business?

Mr. BLONDIN: In all, for preventive service and survey of adulteration of foods, about 250. No report of any such condition as my hon. friend has suggested has reached me.

Mr. MARCIL: Has there been any increase in the number of inspectors?

Mr. BLONDIN: No.

Mr. MARCIL: How are these men paid?

Mr. BLONDIN: By the year.

Mr. MARCIL: What is the average salary?

Mr. BLONDIN: About $600.

Mr. MARCIL: Does the minister appoint officers in rural constituencies, or only in towns and cities?

Mr. BLONDIN: Inspectors are appointed in the cities, and make survey of the food in the various districts. Most of the inspectors live in the cities.

Mr. MARCIL: What work is performed by the ordinary inspector in the rural districts of the province of Quebec?

Mr. BLONDIN: They go around and collect all kinds of samples for analysis and inspection.

Mr. MARCIL: From merchants and farmers?

Mr. BLONDIN: From every dealer.

Mr. ROBB: Has the minister had any complaints from milkmen of inspectors stopping milk wagons on windy days, emptying a sample into a package and then sending the package to the department with the result that the milk is reported as dirty?

Mr. BLONDIN: I am not aware that anything of the kind has come to my department.

Adulteration of food, etc.—proprietary or patent medicines, $1,500.

Mr. GRAHAM: Are these sent to the department?

Mr. BLONDIN: No, the manufacturer has to apply for a license number and to make a declaration that the medicine does not contain certain harmful ingredients. This is in order to enable the department to follow a patent medicine in case it is found hurtful to public health.

Department of External Affairs—salaries, $27,200; contingencies, $9,500.

Mr. GRAHAM: Sir Joseph Pope is at the head of this department. What are the exact duties of the department?

Mr. ROGERS: He has charge of all diplomatic correspondence and work of that kind. He has naturally had a very busy time during the present year. It is a very busy department.

Mr. GRAHAM: If the Post Office Department had negotiations in connection with the postal service between the United States and Canada, would the Postal Department hand their brief to Sir Joseph's department and have him conduct the correspondence?

Mr. ROGERS: Not necessarily.

Mr. CASGRAIN: We do that ourselves.

Mr. ROGERS: For example, when we had the case of shooting in Ontario, Sir Joseph went to Washington and arranged the matter. He arranged a settlement there.

Mr. GRAHAM: I remember trying to have some correspondence with the Interstate Commerce Commission of the United States as well as with the Imperial Government. We carried on a kind of semi-private correspondence for some time, but when it became official correspondence between the two Governments we had to hand it over to the Department of External Affairs.

Mr. ROGERS: You are quite right in that.

Office of the Conservation Commission—salaries, $39,500.

Mr. GRAHAM: Are there any changes in the officials of the Conservation Commission?

Mr. ROGERS: No. The commission is doing very important work and has been very active and energetic in connection with the surveying and development of the natural resources of the various parts of Canada. I believe that under Mr. White a work very valuable to the Canadian people is being carried on. Mr. White is a very energetic and active man, doing very good service.

Mr. MARCIL: Are the recommendations of this commission taken up by Council and followed, or are they merely printed and embalmed.

Mr. ROGERS: As far as I know they are always given effect to.

Mr. GRAHAM: Usually when this item is up we are given the names of the staff with their salaries and some details of their work. It is really a department of Government carried on in an semi-independent way, but the people are greatly interested in it. I had some correspondence with the commission this year myself. The sum of $39,400 is asked for in a lump without a word of information as to the personnel of staff or the work they are doing. I have no desire to criticise the commission, but unless we have details of this kind we are not in a position to intelligently vote the amount. I am satisfied that the commission are doing a good work; but we may be asked throughout the country about men on the Conservation Commission and their duties and salaries, and unless we are able to give the information it will be thought that we do not know very much about the management of the country's affairs.

Mr. ROGERS: I will see that a detailed report from the deputy minister is placed on the table to-morrow.

Mr. ROBB: For the last few years the Conservation Commission have had throughout the country a number of demonstration farms. They get farmers to cultivate portions of their farms under the direction of superintendents employed by the commission. I understand that this year that work has been transferred to the Department of Agriculture. Can the minister tell us whether that is correct? Who paid the expenses heretofore? This amount seems rather small for the work they are doing.

Mr. ROGERS: I understand that some arrangement was arrived at between the Conservation Commission and the Department of Agriculture in order that the work should not be duplicated. but just what it was I do not know.

Miscellaneous—Expenses under the Naturalization Act, $20,000.

Mr. MARCIL: I brought up this question of naturalization some two or three weeks ago, particularly with reference to repatriating Canadians, and the Secretary of State said that he would make a statement on the subject, but he would first have to cable for certain information to England.

Mr. ROGERS: We will let the item stand until he comes in.

Miscellaneous—grant towards defraying the preliminary organization expenditure of the Canadian Peace Centenary Association—revote, $10,000.

Mr. GRAHAM: It was announced that some celebrations were to take place in different localities in connection with the Centenary of Peace. Will they take place this summer?

Mr. ROGERS: Nothing has been settled. I am sure that the one-hundredth anniversary of the establishment of peace between Great Britain and her great American daughter, the United States, is a source of great satisfaction to us all. This amount is asked for to defray any expenses incidental to the celebration.

Miscellaneous—special allowance to the Chief Justice of the Supreme Court of Canada, to cover travelling and other expenses in connection with his services while acting as deputy to His Excellency the Governor General, $2,500.

Mr. GRAHAM: Has the Government ever seriously considered the question of appointing a regular representative at Washington? I do not mean a British representative, as we now have, but a Canadian one. This matter has been discussed in the House on several occasions, and different views have been expressed. Personally, I am not prepared to express any views, but I should like to know if the Government have seriously considered this matter.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: I do not think that the subject has ever been very much considered, at least by the present Administration. A great many things would have to be taken into account before a proposal of that kind could be carried out. The status of any such Canadian representative in relation to the British Ambassador would involve a great deal of consideration. One of two courses would have to be adopted: one would be to attach the Canadian representative to the British Embassy, and the other would be to have an entirly separate representation. The difficulties which would arise in case either course should be adopted are sufficiently obvious to make it unnecessary for me to dwell upon the subject.

Miscellaneous—grant towards the maintenance of the experiments with reindeer in the Canadian Labrador, under the direction of Dr. W. F. Grenfell, $1,000.

Mr. GRAHAM: How big a herd of reindeer have we up there?

Mr. ROGERS: I am afraid that is rather a difficult question to answer. The reindeer were introduced into that country by my hon. friend the ex-Minister of the Interior. They have been up there for a number of years, but I am afraid have not prospered very well.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: I have taken a little interest in this subject, and have had the advantage of reading a very interesting monograph thereon, prepared by an officer of the Department of the Interior whose name I cannot recall at the moment. It might be worth while at some later date to lay it on the table of the House for the information of the members. There has been a good deal of correspondence on the subject, and a good many representations have been made to the Government with regard to it. If I am not mistaken, there are in the northern parts of our western country immense herds of caribou, and one gentleman who has paid a good deal of attention to the subject made what seemed to me a pretty sensible suggestion, that more could be accomplished with the caribou in that region than with the reindeer. He made the further suggestion that if some attention were given to the utilization of these herds a great supply of meat might be derived from that northern country. As far as I can recollect, the suggestion was that if the wild animals which preyed on the caribou could be checked in some effective way an enormous source of meat supply might be opened up in that northern country. I was a good deal impressed by the suggestion, but in the hurry and rush of a great many affairs demanding one's constant attention, particularly during the past year, I have not been able to give to it the consideration that it deserves, or call it to the attention of my colleagues as I wished to do.

Miscellaneous—Grant to the Medical Council of Canada, $15,000.

Mr. PROULX: When this matter came up some time ago I asked my hon. friend whether the council had made a report to the Government and he promised to make inquiries.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: I am afraid that I have not been able to ascertain that, but I will endeavour to do so. I did write to the gentleman who is representing the council in the absence of Dr. Roddick to obtain some information as to the disposal of these moneys, and the purposes to which they were applied. I have his letter, though not immediately under my hand, and I think he gave a reasonable explanation of the necessity for some assistance under present conditions. It is hoped that as the system becomes more general, which was inaugurated by the Bill introduced by Dr. Roddick, and as more medical practitioners avail themselves of the opportunities afforded by that Act, the funds of the Council will become very much more self-sustaining than at present. In the meantime, while examinations must continue to be held, although possibly very few people apply to be examined, it does seem necessary that some assistance should be given to the association's work. I think we all agree that the purpose to be served by the Bill and the work which the association is carrying on are very laudable.

Mr. PROULX: I have been informed that the examination fee has been $100 and that the council holds two examinations a year in different cities. If the Council is to receive a grant of $15,000 I should think that it could reduce the examination fee, and I hope it will. In addition to the fee of $100, the candidates have to undergo considerable expense to attend the examinations. At one time the examination was held at Winnipeg, and the students from the East had to travel to Winnipeg for the purpose of undergoing the examination. If the examination is held in Montreal the candidates from the West have to travel to Montreal. I hope that with the aid of this grant the association will be able to reduce by half the examination fee.

To provide for the salary of a private secretary, A. Hinds, $600, and clerical services to the Hon. J. A. Lougheed, a member of the Cabinet and leader of the Senate, $1,200.

Mr. W. T. WHITE moved that the resolution be amended to read:

To provide for the salary of a private secretary, and clerical services to the Hon. J. A. Lougheed, a member of the Cabinet and leader of the Senate, $1,200.

Mr. GRAHAM: The effect of the amendment is to strike out the name of the secretary. This may change the destination of the grant. I suppose that in reality it goes to the secretary and not to any individual.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: I do not know who the secretary is.

Mr. GRAHAM: The name is mentioned, but my hon. friend the Minister of Finance moves to strike it out.

Amendment agreed to.

British Columbia—Better Terms Commission, $40,000.

Mr. GRAHAM: What about this Better Terms Commission?

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: There has not been a great deal of progress made since I last reported to the House on this subject. I think it would have been possible to have done so had it not been for the outbreak of the war, although at first sight there does not seem to be a great deal of relation between the one matter and the other. It was arranged that one commissioner should be appointed by the Federal Government, another by the provincial government, and that the third should be selected by the two so appointed, or, in default of their agreement, that he should be selected by the Secretary of State for the Colonies. We had some correspondence with the Secretary of State for the Colonies, his intervention having become necessary, and we were asked to indicate the length of time for which the services of the third commissioner would be required, and also some other particulars. We were in communication with the British Government on the subject shortly before the outbreak of the war. It will be perfectly apparent to hon. gentlemen that since the outbreak of the war there would be very great difficulty in securing the services of men who would be very suitable for the discharge of such duties and who would have been available under other conditions. Then some question arose with the government of the province as to the exact scope of the reference, as to which there would not have been any difficulty, I think, except that the subject became more or less submerged in view of the exceedingly pressing questions that have demanded the undivided attention of the members of the Government since the war broke out.

Mr. GRAHAM: The war has produced a peculiar situation. It has rendered the needs of the province greater and the ability of the Dominion to satisfy them less, but as there is no report from the commission I presume there is no use of discussing the matter now.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: The commission is not really fully constituted for the reason I have mentioned.

Mr. McKENZIE: Do I understand that two commissioners have been appointed?

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: Yes.

Mr. McKENZIE: Would the right hon. gentleman have any objection to saying who they are?

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: Mr. Bodwell, K.C., was named by the province and Mr. Lash, K.C., by the Federal Government.

Liquidation Union Life Assurance Company—additional amount required, including charges of counsel representing the Department of Insurance at prosecution of directors, $6,606.74.

Mr GRAHAM: That is all the expense connected with it?

Mr. W. T. WHITE: That is the balance.

Mr. GRAHAM: I presume the matter has been settled satisfactorily to all parties?

Mr. WHITE: This is the balance required to pay the liquidation expenses and the fee of counsel representing the Dominion on the prosecution of certain directors of the Union Life Assurance Company. My hon. friend remembers that the Union Life had some 130,000 or 140,000 policy-holders throughout Canada, and its affairs got into a very bad condition. We threw it into liquidation and the court appointed, at our instance, an official of the Insurance Department, now the Superintendent of Insurance, Mr. Finlayson, as liquidator. At my special request as Minister of Finance, the Metropolitan Life Insurance Company assumed all the policies. We felt rather obligated to them for doing so, because they paid about $400,000 more than the business was worth on an actuarial reinsurance basis. The only ground for the Dominion assuming the expenses of the liquidation was the widespread character of the disaster which would have resulted to the 130,000 or 140,000 policy-holders throughout the Dominion. The Metropolitan Life was unwilling to pay the expenses of the liquidation. The Government thought that we were justified in saying that we would assume those expenses. They have amounted to about $25,000 or $26,000. This amount of $6,606.74 will complete the payment of the expenses of liquidation.

Mr. GRAHAM: All the policy-holders are protected?

Mr. WHITE: They are all protected; they are all taken care of.

Mr. ROGERS: Would my hon. friend from Bonaventure (Mr. Marcil) renew his question about naturalization, and the Minister of Justice will give him the information?

Mr. MARCIL: I asked if there had been any change in the law affecting the naturalization of former Canadians residing in the United States who returned to Canada.

Mr. DOHERTY: Does my hon. friend refer to former Canadians who have become naturalized citizens of the United States?

Mr. MARCIL: Yes.

Mr. DOHERTY: As I understand it, under the law prior to the Naturalization Act of last year there was a special provision for a person re-acquiring British nationality who has abdicated it by naturalization in a foreign country. Under the law as enacted last year I understand that such person would have to be naturalized now just as though he had always been an alien. The provision which dealt specially with the repatriation of persons who formerly had been British subjects has disappeared under the new Act, and the person now who has lost his British nationality by becoming naturalized in a foreign country must become naturalized as any other alien. I am speaking purely from memory on a question of law, but I think I am correct.

Department of External Affairs—to provide for the salary of one clerk in first division, subdivision B, from October 1, 1914, at $2,800 per annum, $1,400.

Mr. GRAHAM: Who is the new clerk?

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: H. C. Borden, private secretary. The work in the office of the Prime Minister is ordinarily very heavy, but during the past eight months it has been exceptionally so on account of the great number of confidential telegrams and other communications despatched from day to day, and on account also of the very great work which is entailed in coding and deciphering the correspondence, which, in many cases, is of a highly confidenial character. The former secretary, Mr. A. E. Blount, who has discharged these duties, with clerical assistance, during 10 p.m. the first three years of the Administration, was much overworked, and I have found it necessary almost to station a policeman at the office door to forbid him from attendance when he was seriously indisposed. Finally Mr. Blount was practically on the point of giving up his position and seeking some other work which would be less severe, but I made an arrangement with him to stay, on condition that he would have assistance. I made application in various quarters and I have had a great deal of difficulty in securing a person with the requisite knowledge and experience and qualities for the position, but eventually I succeeded.

Office of the Auditor General—contingencies—temporary clerical assistance—further amount required, $5,000.

Mr. BOULAY (Translation): Before passing this item, I deem it my duty to make a few remarks for the benefit of those authorities whom it may concern.

A certain parable in the Gospel states that it is as difficult for a thief to enter the Kingdom of Heaven as for a camel to pass through a needle's eye. I believe the Auditor General has in mind that parable in so far as his employing French Canadians in his department is concerned. At the door of his office stands a cerberus who keeps a jealous watch in order to stop any French Canadian from entering. The Civil Service list of 1913 reveals the fact that out of 90 employees in his office, only two French Canadians are to be counted. I should think that if the situation was reversed and the English-speaking employees were in such a minority, the walls of this House would crumble away under the vehemence of the remonstrances of some of my hon. friends opposite.

I deem it my duty to protest strenuously against the perpetuation of such discrimination against the French Canadians in a department of the public service. I hope the authorities who are at the head of that department will see to it that a stop is put to such a practice. I should not be astonished to be told that those two employees are merely translators or stenographers.

Miscellaneous—investigations under the Inquiries Act—further amount required, $2,500.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Is this in connection with the commission of which the gentleman from Newfoundland was a member?

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: This is merely a general vote; I do not think that it has relation to any particular inquiry.

Mr. GRAHAM: Is it for inquiries that were made last year?

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: I think so.

Miscellaneous—to provide for the expenses of the Acting High Commissioner, London, England, $13,000.

Mr. GRAHAM: Can the Prime Minister tell us now if he has made up his mind as to who is to be the permanent High Commissioner?

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: I have been so busily occupied ever since that I have hardly been able to give the subject consideration. The office of High Commissioner has been of special service to the Government under the conditions that have prevailed during the past eight months. Of course, the status of Sir George Perley as Acting High Commissioner is different from that which has been enjoyed by any High Commissioner in the past, inasmuch as he not only discharges the duties of that position, but he is a member of the Government as well. I think that I have suggested on previous occasions, both in this House and elsewhere, that some closer form of co-operation as to certain matters might possibly be found in adopting that as a permanent policy. Nothing that has happened during the period in which Sir George Perley has discharged very efficiently the duties of that office would lead one to the conclusion that it would not be a wise policy. I would not, however, desire to be understood as suggesting or intimating that any absolute and definite conclusion has been reached on that subject. The only thing that can be said in the meantime is that the experiment, if one can call it an experiment, has proved to be a highly successful one under the conditions which have prevailed during the past year, and that very valuable service has been rendered not only to the Dominion, but, I think, to the Empire as well, by Sir George Perley in London.

Militia and Defence—salaries and wages—further amount required, $14,000.

Mr. PUGSLEY: I should like to call the attention of the Minister of Public Works, who, I think, is looking after this item, to a memorandum which I have received from British Columbia, and which I should like to read to him in order that he may give the committee some information on the subject. I am informed that in March, 1914, tenders for a supply of coal were called for by the Department of Militia, I think in Victoria. The contract was awarded to Messrs. Kirk & Company at $7.10 a ton. There are two other tenders, one at $6.90 and another at $6.75, so that Kirk & Co.'s tender was the highest. The lowest tenderer was not awarded the contract, but the coal to be supplied under one of the lower tenders was from the same mine as that which Kirk & Co. were supplying. Thus there can be no question of the quality of the coal. I am informed that at a meeting of coal dealers held in Victoria, Mr. Kirk admitted, in the presence of six others, that he gave a commission to the secretary of the Conservative Association of the city. That is a matter which is worthy of investigation by the Government, as it seems to me that it is very reprehensible. It is not good administration to pass over the lowest tenderer where tenders are called and give the contract to a higher tenderer.

Mr. ROGERS: What is the difference?

Mr. PUGSLEY: The lowest tender was $6.75 per ton; the next $6.90 per ton; and the next $7.10 per ton. The contract was given to Kirk & Co. at $7.10, the highest tender. That is the information which I have, and I would be glad if the minister would have the tenders submitted tomorrow. I do not like to trouble him so late in the session, but I received the information only a few days ago. This is the first time since then that any item of Militia Estimates has been under discussion.

Mr. STEVENS: Will the hon. gentleman give me the name of the party to whom the payment was said to have been made?

Mr. PUGSLEY: Are Kirk & Co. in Vancouver or in Victoria?

Mr. STEVENS: They are in Vancouver. They may be in Victoria too. Many of these firms are in both cities.

Mr. PUGSLEY: My memorandum does not say whether it is in Victoria or Vancouver. I think the letter referred to the fact that information was given to my informant while he was in Victoria. Therefore I would assume it was in Victoria.

Mr. STEVENS: I would not like for a moment to have it go on record that that occurred with the secretary of the association in Vancouver.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Is Mr. Price secretary of the association in Vancouver?

Mr. STEVENS: No. I want to say most emphatically that, so far as I am concerned, we never allow anything of that type to go on. I have never had any knowledge of a practice of that kind going on in Vancouver. There are four firms in the coal business there—Evans, Coleman Evans, Macdonald & Marpole, Vancouver Coal Co., and Kirk Coal Co. They always tender at exactly the same figure, $7 a ton, on coal for the Government, and the orders are usually divided up among the four firms. The hon. member is aware that the firm of Macdonald & Marpole are strong supporters of his party, so there is no complaint on the ground of political patronage.

Mr. PUGSLEY: It must be very clear that this is Victoria, because Mr. Price is mentioned as secretary of the association.

Mr. STEVENS: That is not Vancouver.

Mr. PUGSLEY: I judge that is the case also from another statement, because it says: "If you remember, I gave you all the particulars in reference to this when you were in Victoria." My hon. friend is entirely right in insisting on that course; where tenders are called for it is a matter of obligation on the part of the department to give the contract to the lowest tenderer, else it is a farce to call for tenders. But, as it has been stated here, the Militia Department, having called for tenders, instead of giving the contract to the lowest tenderer, gave it to the highest. A very objectionable feature of the case is that it seems to be admitted that the gentleman who got the contract made a contribution to the secretary of the Conservative Association, and people will naturally assume that this was a consideration for his insisting on the contract going to the highest tenderer. That is the inference one would naturally draw. Perhaps the minister would, to-morrow, bring down copies of the tenders with the name of the party to whom the contract was awarded?

Mr. ROGERS: I shall be glad to bring to the attention of the Militia Department to what my hon. friend has stated, and to have placed on the table to-morrow their explanation.

Mr. CARVELL: Before this vote passes, I want to ask a question of the Prime Minister. Perhaps this is not the proper time to do it, but I am not able to be in the House frequently. What method was adopted in paying Canadian soldiers in England? Were they paid by our own cheques or was the money sent to England and paid there? The reason for asking this is that I have received a letter from a constituent enclosing an original letter written by a soldier to a friend in New Brunswick. This soldier says:

> There is a general kick among Canadians in general about pay. They cheat us out of 15 shillings to 18 shillings every month and tell us that it takes that much of every man's pay to pay for the exchange on Canadian money to England. You know and everybody else knows that it don't take that much. Somebody is making quite a fortune out of us fellows.

I shall send the letter to the Prime Minister if he wishes to see it. It is an ordinary letter written to New Brunswick. It was sent me by a gentleman in New Brunswick to find out what it means. I had supposed that the money would be transferred to England and paid there in English money, but evidently some other course has been adopted.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: I did make some inquiry as to the system of payment carried out in regard to men at the front. A Mr. Ward, who had had considerable experience, I believe, as paymaster in the navy and who some years ago was appointed Assistant Accountant General and Paymaster in the Department of Militia, was sent to Great Britain with the first expeditionary force to act as overseas paymaster with headquarters in London. The Department of Militia places sums to the credit of the High Commissioner's office, requisitions are made upon the High Commissioner's office by the overseas paymaster general and he transmits the sums to the regimental paymaster. I understand there is a paymaster for each regiment. The regimental paymasters attend to the payment of the men.

Mr. CARVELL: It would seem then that they would be actually paid in English money.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: I would understand so.

Mr. CARVELL: This letter is dated as late as March 21. Has the Prime Minister had this question brought to his attention before, or has he received any protest?

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: No. I have not had the subject brought to my personal attention before. It may have been brought to the attention of the Minister of Militia, but not to my attention.

Mr. CARVELL: I hope the Premier will look into the matter, because if it be true, and I have no doubt at all from the tone of the letter that it is true, there is evidently mismanagement somewhere.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: I am obliged to my hon. friend for bringing the matter to my attention. If he will send me the letter I will transmit it at once to the paymaster of the Department of Militia and ask for a statement from him in regard to it.

Mr. MEDERIC MARTIN (translation): Before this item is passed I would like to ask the hon. Prime Minister a question. Has he received a letter from the mayor of Montreal in which I requested him to do something to help the "out of works" in that city?

I do not know whether the Hon. Prime Minister has received that letter, but this I can say, it remains without reply to this day. I should very much like to know why.

I have spoken in French because my right hon. friend understands that language. I have had no answer to that letter which, as mayor of Montreal, I wrote to my right hon. friend.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: I remember receiving it, but, as my hon. friend had published it as an open letter, I did not understand that he expected any reply; and for that reason, and without the slightest desire to be discourteous, I did not reply.

Mr. MARTIN: I think the least thing my right hon. friend could have done was to answer. I was rather surprised at not hearing from him, because every letter calls for an answer.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: I did not really understand it in that way, because my hon. friend published it as an open letter. It appeared in the papers, I think, before I received it. So I suppose it would be proper for me to regard it in that sense, and not as an ordinary letter written from one gentleman to another, and which of course would demand a reply.

Mr. MARTIN: The object of the letter was to induce the Prime Minister to do something for the unemployed of Montreal. I am 46 years of age, but this is the first time I have written a letter to a gentleman, especially the Prime Minister of Canada, without getting a reply.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: I would also say that this is almost the first time that I ever received a letter which had first been published in the papers of the country.

Mr. MARTIN: My letter contained a suggestion to the Prime Minister to bring down some legislation to help the unemployed of the city of Montreal, where there are 50,000 men out of work. If I could be here every day I would have brought the matter up in the House myself.

(Translation.) I would like to mention here, that in my official position as mayor of Montreal, I am the representative of one-seventh of the entire population of Canada and it seems to me that I am at least entitled to a reply from the hon. Prime Minister.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: I appreciate the importance of any communication from my hon. friend acting in his capacity as Mayor of Montreal. Because I did not make a reply to the letter, for the reason already mentioned, I do not wish him to think that I did not give my best consideration to his representations. I have been in communication with the Harbour Commissioners of Montreal, and also with my hon. friend the Minister of Public Works, for the purpose of endeavouring to provide as far as possible any work for the unemployed in Montreal. I am sure my hon. friend realizes the difficulties of the situation—one which has been experienced not only by municipalities, cities and provinces, but generally, under the difficult financial conditions which have prevailed since the outbreak of the war.

Mr. MARTIN: Another open letter was sent to the Prime Minister by Commissioner MacDonald, and according to the newspapers it was answered, although perhaps we should not believe all that the newspapers say. This was two or three days afterwards.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: I think my hon. friend's letter was the first.

Militia and Defence—Gratuities to professors of the Royal Military College on retirement, $15,190.

Mr. PUGSLEY: On what grounds are gratuities given to professors retiring?

Mr. ROGERS: This is simply following the usual practice. Professor Butler and one or two others have retired this year.

Special allowance to the Chief Justice of the Supreme Court of Canada, to cover travelling and other expenses in connection with his services while acting as Deputy to His Excellency the Governor General—Omitted from Main Estimates, $2,500.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: This is necessary on account of the item in the Main Estimates not being the usual amount that has been granted of late years. I think the amount has been $5,000.

Mr. PUGSLEY: I have never understood that $5,000 was allowed. I understand that the duties of deputy to His Excellency the Governor General simply mean attending the opening and closing of Parliament. I think $2,500 is the usual amount, but possibly it may be more.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: I will get the Estimates of last year, and endeavour to look it up.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Let the item pass, and my right hon. friend find out afterwards.

To provide for the salary of a private secretary, and clerical services to the Hon. J. A. Lougheed, a member of the Cabinet and leader of the Senate (payment may be made to a member of the Senate staff notwithstanding the Civil Service Act)—further amount required, $600.

Mr. GRAHAM: This is in addition?

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: It seems to be the $600 which is usually allowed to private secretaries in addition to their salary as clerks.

Mr. GRAHAM: Perhaps before we rise the Prime Minister would give the explanation he promised in reference to the Northwest Mounted Police?

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: The amount of $60,000 is explained to me by the Comptroller of the Royal Northwest Mounted Police as follows. It consists of three items: The first item of $40,000 is to provide for the expenses of the Baker lake expedition undertaken to inquire into the murder of Messrs. Radford and Street by Eskimo in 1913. The sending of this expedition was not decided upon until after the Estimates for the current fiscal year had been prepared and passed, and the expenditure, including the purchase of a schooner, amounted to $40,000. I made some explanation in regard to this matter last year. These two men were murdered in the North, and after a good deal of consideration of the subject, and after I had consulted with my right hon. friend the leader of the Opposition (Sir Wilfrid Laurier), we decided to adopt this course instead of undertaking to arrest the Eskimo. There was evidence which had come to us from reliable quarters that the men who unfortunately met their fate there had contributed probably to the result by undertaking unusual punishment of some of these Eskimo. I have looked into the report of the Royal Northwest Mounted Police as to the expedition but it does not seem that any report has yet been made; at all events it is not in this year's report.

Then there is an item of $10,000 for transport. Owing to the outbreak of the war and to looking after the alien enemies in the provinces of Alberta and Saskatchewan, the item of $50,000 for transport, included in the current year's Estimates, was found insufficient and a further sum of $10,000 is required to complete this service. There is another item of $10,000 for billeting, subsistence and forage. The price of provisions both where men are billeted and for those living in barracks, has increased considerably owing to the outbreak of the war and the failure of the crops in certain portions of the provinces has caused an increase in the rate of both hay and oats. The sum of $10,000 is required to complete this service. These three items make up the total of $60,000 which is asked.

Mr. GRAHAM: The Royal Northwest Mounted Police are a body of men who are a credit to this country. It is really beyond the comprehension of strangers to understand how the presence of one member of the Mounted Police force in a locality in the west maintains order. I have been through that western country and where great crowds were gathered two mounted police would be enough to maintain order, whereas, in the eastern country, you would require a dozen or more to do the same work.

Mr. ROGERS: They are all very well behaved.

Mr. GRAHAM: When the Mounted Police are present I suppose they are, and no doubt at other times also. The Mounted Police have no superiors in the world.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: I am very much obliged to my hon. friend (Mr. Graham) for his appreciation, in which I entirely agree. As I stated in an earlier part of the session, the men who were recruited to the number of 500 last summer have proved to be a very fine body of men who, in their training and discipline, have made excellent progress and are well up to the standard of the former force.

Mr. LAFORTUNE: Mr. Chairman, will you permit me to call the attention of the hon. Minister of Public Works to an item in the Main Estimates of $15,000 for the construction of a post office at St. Jacques l'Achigan in my riding? When his Estimates were up I brought this matter to the attention of the hon. Postmaster General, and he was kind enough to refer me to the Minister of Public Works, who, he said, was very kind, obliging and just, with the assurance that I would succeed in securing his assent to the construction of this post office. In 1909, when I was elected for Montcalm, the late member for that riding, Mr. Dugas, now judge of the superior court of the district of Joliet, asked me very earnestly to see to the completion of that building. A vote of $15,000 was passed but to my great surprise that sum was taken away in the following sesion of 1911. I asked to have it replaced in the Estimates, but I had no success. In 1912 I came back and asked the same thing with no success. It was only in 1913 that the then Postmaster General, now a judge of the superior court of Montreal, at my request, replaced the item of $15,000. Still, there has been no construction. A lot was bought and paid for, the plans were made, everything was ready and I was waiting for the tenders to be called for but no tenders have been called for yet. I would like to appeal to the justice of the Minister of Public Works and to ask him to order the construction of that building. St. Jacques l'Achigan is a very large and a very nice place. There are two banks, one college, a tobacco manufactory, and a good population, and it is altogether a very flourishing place. The Administration having decided that this post office should be put up, I think that this Parliament might do me the favour I ask. I do not want the building for myself. I am living in Jacques Cartier near Montreal, and I do not need a post office for my correspondence but I simply ask that the building be erected as a matter of justice to my electors. I hope that the hon. gentleman, who is here to do justice to every one, will see that the building is soon put up. I draw his attention again to it.

Mr. ROGERS: I am sure that I appreciate the generous appeal of my hon. friend (Mr. Lafortune) in regard to this post office, and I am glad to know that he does not require the building for his own particular use. I am afraid that he is a little in error when he says that the first time that this item appeared in the Estimates was in 1909. I think that if he will look up the Estimates he will see that it appeared previously to that. It did not appear to meet with much success for evidently my predecessor thought that in view of the fact that so little attention was paid to the construction of the work it should be dropped from the Estimates. However, my hon. friend was very pressing in his representations from time to time and he succeeded in having that amount replaced in the Estimates in 1913. It is true that at the close of last session, some time in June, this matter was under discussion and it was hoped at that time that we would be able to prepare the plans and go on with the construction of the building. But little work was under way before the 1st August and this building was in the same position as several others in various parts of the country. From that time on very little new work has been undertaken, but I can assure my hon. friend that whenever the opportunity presents itself, and I trust it will be in the near future, we will undertake to provide for the requirements of the locality of which he speaks in the matter of post office accommodation.

Mr. LAFORTUNE: I might make another remark in justice to the late Minister of Public Works, my hon. friend from St. John (Mr. Pugsley). Everything was ready before the election of 1911 and the tenders were to be called for but there was a difference as to the line between the lot that the Government had purchased and the neighbouring property. The department was ready to call for tenders, but a dispute arose between the Government and the adjoining proprietor which prevented that. I am thankful to you, Mr. Minister, and having heard of your good disposition I know that you will keep your word, and I will find my post office erected before the general election.

Mr. ROGERS: I can assure my hon. friend that he can absolutely depend upon it, that he will probably be in a little better position at the next general election than he was at the last.

Mr. PUGSLEY: When I was Minister of Public Works the necessity for a public building in this town was strongly pressed on me, and after giving it most careful attention, I concluded that the town, because of its population and importance, was much more entitled to a public building than many others which had secured public buildings. I had an appropriation put in the Estimates and I actually purchased the site, but delay was caused by some legal dispute which arose regarding the boundaries of the property. Had it not been for the unfortunate result of the election, that building would have been erected long ago.

Resolutions reported.

SUPPLY—CONCURRENCE.

The House proceeded to consider certain resolutions reported this day from the Committee of Supply.

Mr. SPEAKER: It is not the usual practice to receive a report from the Committee of Supply on the same day as that on which the resolutions have been agreed to in the committee, but it is stated in Bourinot that at the end of a session, when there is urgency, it is occasionally done in the Canadian Parliament, though never in the English Parliament. I think it well to let the House have knowledge of what is being done.

Mr. GRAHAM: That was my understanding, but the Clerk of the House informed me that it was customary in the Canadian Parliament, near the close of the session, and that it was done last year.

Mr. PUGSLEY: With the unanimous consent of the House.

Resolutions concurred in.

WAR SUPPLIES—PURCHASE OF BOOTS.

Mr. W. S. MIDDLEBRO (North Grey) presented the report of the Special Committee to which was referred the report of the Board of Inquiry respecting boots supplied to the Department of Militia and Defence, and all matters pertaining to such boots.

On motion of Sir Robert Borden, the House adjourned at 12.05 a.m. Saturday.

Saturday, April 10, 1915.

The House met at Eleven o'clock, the Speaker in the Chair.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

APPOINTMENT OF CHIEF ACCOUNTANT.

On motion of Sir Robert Borden, the recommendation of His Honour the Speaker, laid on the table of the House on the 9th inst., respecting the appointment of Mr. Douglas W. Cameron to the position of Chief Accountant of the House of Commons, was concurred in.

COMMISSION OF CONSERVATION.

STATEMENT OF THE YEAR'S WORK.

On the Orders of the Day being called:

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: Perhaps I might be permitted to give to the House some information with regard to the Commission of Conservation, which was asked for while we were in Supply, but which was not available at the moment. The following memorandum has been handed to me by the secretary of the Commission:

The work to be carried on in 1915-16 can best be described as being, substantially, a continuation of that undertaken during the year which has just elapsed, although investigatory work of a nature not entered upon heretofore is being instituted by one of two committees and later developments may further modify the proposed work. In 1914-15, investigations have been carried out under the direction of the various committees as follows:

Waters and Water-powers.

The preparation of reports based on information secured by field work conducted by the commission in preceding years constituted the main task of this committee during 1914-15. Mr. Denis has been engaged in assembling and arranging in proper form the material to be embodied in a comprehensive report on the water-powers of Manitoba and Saskatchewan and Alberta. The collecting and collating of data from all available sources to supplement that obtained from reconnaissance surveys has been a task of considerable magnitude. The report is now being passed through the press, as expeditiously as possible.

Mr. Denis has practically completed the preparation of a second edition of "Water-Works of Canada," which, it is anticipated, will be published early in the ensuing year. In addition to the original material, revised and corrected, the new edition includes information relative to sewerage and sewage disposal.

Special effort has been made to advance the completion of the proposed report dealing with the water-powers of British Columbia. The work of collecting data has been completed and Mr. A. V. White will direct his attention to the preparation of the manuscript for the printer.

Forests.

Early in the past year, the Trent watershed report was issued. It is of special value in respect to the conservation of the water-supply of the Trent canal and of the water-powers along the Trent river. The area selected also typifies the large portion of central Ontario which has been nearly denuded of forest wealth; fires have raged practically unchecked and nothing has been done in the way of reforestation, although the agricultural resources are known to be extremely limited.

During the past summer, Dr. Whitford and Mr. Craig continued the inventory of British Columbia's forest resources commenced in 1913. Data respecting over 200,000 square miles has now been secured. During the summer, Mr. J. C. Blumer was engaged on similar work in Saskatchewan. In British Columbia, the provincial forestry branch, and, in Saskatchewan, the Dominion forestry branch are giving valuable assistance. It is hoped to complete this work in the coming year.

Dr. Howe has submitted a report embodying the results of his studies undertaken in the summer of 1913, with special reference to the rate of growth of timber trees and to the damage done by the disastrous fires of 1913 in the Trent regions. It will be published shortly together with the results of an investigation conducted last summer by Dr. Howe to determine the most favourable conditions for the reproduction of commercial tree species in the coastal regions of British Columbia, more particularly of Douglas fir, the most valuable and most widely-distributed species in the province. Dr. Howe emphasizes that reliance cannot be placed on nature alone to provide adequately for the replacement of commercial forests on cut-over and burned-over areas.

As chief fire inspector of the Railway Commission, the chief forester, Mr. Leavitt, has again supervised the patrol work of the railway lines of western Canada, the immediate supervision being entrusted to the field staff of the Forestry Branch of the Department of the Interior, and of the chief forester of British Columbia. In organizing this work throughout the Dominion, co-operation has been effected with the governmental fire-protective forces of every province, except Nova Scotia. Through the action of the provincial governments and through the reorganization of the Canadian Northern railway system, nearly all provincially chartered lines have been subjected to fire-protective requirements similar to those imposed by the Railway Commission upon lines operating under Domnion charters.

Public Health.

The outstanding feature of the work of this committee last year was the development of town-planning activities. In May the commission acted as host to the National Town Planning Association at the convention held in Toronto. During the early part of the year, Dr. Hodgetts was engaged chiefly in the study of town-planning legislation until called in September to take the place of Colonel Burland as Canadian Red Cross Commissioner to England. His absence has necessitated the temporary abandonment of public health work of the nature usually undertaken. Subsequent to the convention in May, it was decided to create a town-planning branch of the commission, and the services of Mr. Thomas Adams, the foremost English authority on the subject, were engaged. Since taking up his duties in October, Mr. Adams has been investigating Canadian problems and conditions and has conducted an educational and publicity campaign. His services and advice have been eagerly sought by municipal and provincial bodies.

Lands.

An agricultural survey has again been carried on, the work being conducted along the same lines, in the same districts and by practically the same staff as in 1913.

The illustration farms, thirty-three in number, have been carried on as in the previous year. The travelling instructors visited the farms as often as possible to confer with and discuss methods and results with the farmer on each one. During the summer months, meetings were held on many of the farms and the work undertaken by the farmers was closely supervised and inspected. As the purpose of the commission has been achieved in placing this illustration work on a sound basis, the farms have been turned over to and will hereafter be conducted by the Department of Agriculture. The commission intends to continue the survey work, although along lines somewhat different from those hitherto followed.

During recent months the agriculturists of the commission's staff have participated in the platform work connected with the "patriotism and production" campaign.

Mining.

A report on "conservation of coal in Canada" was published early in the fiscal year. During the year, substantial progress has been made by Mr. Dick on a power survey of Canada. The information collected will be published in a report showing the amount, proportion, source, cost and purpose of utilization of the various kinds of power, water, steam, electric, etc. The completion of the report will require the greater portion of the ensuing year. During 1914, the mining engineer has furnished brief reports relative to briquetting of coal in Western Canada, mine-rescue work, first-aid, trade with Germany, etc.

Fish, Game and Fur-Bearing Animals.

A third edition of "fur-farming in Canada" has been issued. Two editions of this report, first published in 1913, had been quickly exhausted and the third edition, thoroughly revised and somewhat enlarged, has met with a heavy demand despite the check imposed upon the expansion of the fur-farming industry by present financial conditions.

Special attention has recently been paid by the editorial staff to fisheries questions, particularly to a publicity campaign to popularize the use of fish for food purposes. In the ensuing fiscal year, the committee intends to prosecute active study of practical fisheries problems.

Press and Co-Operative Associations.

The value of the commission's investigatory work depends largely upon efficiency in publishing and distributing reports embodying the results of the field investigations. During the ensuing year the publishing work will be unusually heavy. Manuscript for the following reports is now either being passed through the press or undergoing final preparation for that purpose: Sixth Annual Report, Water-Powers of Manitoba, Saskatchewan and Alberta, Forest Protection in Canada, 1914, Water-Works of Canada (2nd edition), Water--Powers of British Columbia, and Power Survey of Canada. In addition to these bound reports, two periodical bulletins, Conservation, a monthly, and Conservation of Life, a bi-monthly, are published and widely circulated.

I beg to submit herewith the estimates for salaries for the Commission of Conservation for the fiscal year, 1915-16, which includes recommendations for increase of salary.

The present staff, with salaries recommended for 1915-16, consists of:

MILITIA COAL PURCHASES IN VICTORIA.

On the Orders of the Day being called:

Hon. ROBERT ROGERS (Minister of Public Works): I desire to make a statement in reference to a memorandum read by the hon. member for St. John (Mr. Pugsley) last night in respect to tenders which it had been represented to him had been called for in Victoria for supplying coal to the Militia Department, and which stated that the lowest tender had not been accepted. I asked the department for a statement in connection with the matter, and have received the following:

The last contract made was for the twelve months beginning April 1, 1914. In February, 1914, tenders were invited by newspaper advertisement, the last day for receiving tenders being March 10, 1914. The only tender received at that date was that of Kirk and Company, Limited of Victoria, whose tender was accepted at the following prices: Washed nut, $6 per ton; Smith's coal, $10 per ton; steam coal, slack, $3.55 per ton; steam coal, double screened, $7 per ton; run of mine, $6.75 per ton; screened house coal, $7.10 per ton.

Three other tenders were received late, on the 16th March. These were as follows:

J. E. Painter and Son: Washed nut, $5.75 per ton; Smith's coal, $10 per ton; steam coal, slack, $3.50 per ton; steam coal, double screened, $6.75 per ton; run of mine $6.45 per ton.

Victoria Fuel Company: Washed nut, $6.15 per ton; steam coal, slack, $3.65 per ton; steam coal, double screened, $6.93 per ton; run of mine, $6.45 per ton.

J. Kingham and Company: Washed nut, $6 per ton; steam coal slack, $3.50 per ton; steam coal, double screened, $6.75 per ton; run of mine, $6.50 per ton.

Tenders for the new contract for the year beginning April 1, 1915, were invited in the usual way, by newspaper advertisement, in March last, the last days for receiving tenders being the 25th and 28th March. Tenders were duly received, opened and scheduled; but owing to extreme pressure of other work, no contracts have yet been made.

H. W. Brown,
Director of Contracts.

[Sir Robert Borden.]

ROYAL NORTHWEST MOUNTED POLICE.

On the Orders of the Day being called:

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: I should like to give some information in respect to an inquiry made by the hon. member for Medicine Hat (Mr. Buchanan) on Monday, the 22nd of March last, with regard to members of the Royal Northwest Mounted Police who, as he understood, had volunteered and gone to the front on active service. The Comptroller of the Royal North-West Mounted Police has given me the following memorandum on the subject, which is in accordance with the information I then had.

(1) No members of the Royal Northwest Mounted Police are serving with the forces at the front. The duties of the police in preserving law and order in the provinces and looking after the alien enemies rendered it impossible to allow them to volunteer for service in the war and all applications were refused.

(2) At the outbreak of the war an Imperial proclamation was issued calling upon all Imperial reservists, both of the Navy and Army, to report themselves for service with the colours, and 54 army reservists then serving in the police were granted free discharge for that purpose and their expenses from the west were borne by the Imperial Government. Two non-commissioned officers who previously held commissions in the Imperial Army, were, on the assurance of the War Office that they would be re-commissioned, granted a free discharge.

SASKATOON POST OFFICE SITE.

On the Orders of the Day being called:

Mr. OLIVER: On behalf of the hon. member for Saskatoon (Mr. McCraney) I should like to remind the Minister of Public Works that he promised to give certain information in regard to a post office site at Saskatoon.

Mr. ROGERS: The site in Saskatoon was purchased on February 24, 1914, from Anthony Legum, for $122,500.

Mr. OLIVER: I think the hon. member also wanted to know what payments had been made on the property to date.

Mr. ROGERS: I understand the whole amount has been paid.

Mr. OLIVER: He also wanted to know what progress had been made in dredging in Saskatoon.

Mr. ROGERS: I do not remember that he asked me for that information, but I will look it up.

SUSPENSION OF LIQUOR MANUFACTURE.

On the Orders of the Day being called:

Mr. MACDONALD: I have received a number of resolutions from different bodies in the province of Nova Scotia asking for a suspension of the manufacture of liquors during the war. Has the right hon. the Prime Minister received a copy of any of these resolutions; and, if so, has he any statement to make?

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: I have received a number of such resolutions from Nova Scotia, and I think from other parts of the Dominion, but at present I have no statement to make on the subject.

REPRESENTATION IN SENATE AND HOUSE OF CMMONS.

PROPOSED AMENDMENT OF B. N. A. ACT.

The House proceeded to consider a message from the Senate relating to the joint Address to His Most Excellent Majesty the King, praying him that he may be graciously pleased to give his consent to submitting a measure to the Parliament of the United Kingdom to amend certain provisions of the British North America Act, 1867.—Sir Robert Borden.

Right Hon. Sir ROBERT BORDEN (Prime Minister): This order relates to a matter that was under consideration by this House and by the Senate last session as well as this session. The resolution which was passed by this House on both occasions prayed that certain amendments should be made to the British North America Act, 1867, by which a new division or district for the purpose of representation in the Senate should be constituted by the four western provinces of Canada, and that each of these provinces should be represented in the Senate by six members instead of the number that is now assigned to each of them. The address also prayed that the British North America Act should be amended by providing that a province shall always be entitled to a number of members in the House of Commons not less than the number of senators representing such province. The address passed the House of Commons unanimously in 1914 and also passed the House of Commons without dissent when it was introduced a few weeks ago. In 1914 the Senate modified the resolution by a certain provision which declared that the Act should not take effect until the termination of the now existing Parliament. For reasons which I then communicated to the House, and to which I still adhere, I asked the House not to concur in the amendment which the Senate proposed, and this House, without any dissent whatever, concurred in that view, and a message was accordingly sent to the Senate, who adhered to the opinion expressed in the message which they had sent to us. So the question dropped at the last session.

The matter now under consideration is a message from the Senate in which they propose an amendment almost but not quite in the terms of their amendment of last year. They propose to add to the resolution a section to be number 3 in the amended Bill, which is as follows:

> The first section of this Act, paragraph 1 to 6 inclusive, shall not take effect until the termination of the now existing Canadian Parliament.

The difference, if there be any difference, between the amendment proposed by the Senate last year and the amendment which they now propose is that the postponement affects the number of senators in the western provinces but does not affect the proposal in regard to the representation in the House of Commons. As I have already said, I adhere to the views which I expressed in this House and elsewhere as to the action of the Senate last year being undesirable and without good reason; but it seems apparent that the majority of the Senate are determined to insist upon the postponement which they desire, for a very obvious reason. Under the circumstances, as it seems impossible to get desirable and necessary legislation passed without an amendment which we think entirely unnecessary and to a certain extent obstructive, I am disposed to accept the Senate amendment; and therefore I move:

> That a message be sent to the Senate to acquaint their Honours that this House doth concur in the amendments made by the Senate to the joint address to His Most Excellent Majesty the King, praying that he may be graciously pleased to give his consent to submitting a measure to the Parliament of the United Kingdom to amend certain provisions of the British North America Act, 1867.

Right Hon. Sir WILFRID LAURIER: My right hon. friend has just stated that it is with some reluctance that he has agreed to the amendment which was suggested last year and renewed this year by the Senate. It is with some reluctance also that I agree to the motion that we should accede to the amendment made by the Senate, not, however, for the reasons which have been stated by my right hon. friend, but for another reason—because the Senate this year has incorporated in the resolution another amendment which was not in the resolution of last year, and which is to this effect:

> Nothing herein contained shall affect the powers of the Parliament of Canada under the British North America Act, 1867.

By this amendment the powers which are conferred upon the Canadian Parliament by the Act of 1886 are continued. Without this amendment I apprehend that the Act of 1886 would not have been kept in force. The Act of 1886 is very wide in its terms, and in some respects, however useful it may be, in my opinion it goes further than it should go. The Act of 1886 provides for admitting new provinces into the Dominion and also for giving representation to the territories which have not yet been organized as provinces. To this I have no objection at all; but it has always seemed to me that the powers which were conferred upon the Parliament of Canada are altogether too great in that the Act puts no limit whatever upon the discretion of Parliament as to the representation of these territories in the Dominion Parliament. By the terms of that Act, no limit is put upon the number of senators and members who can be given to the territories. It would seem to me, then, that the representation which was given to the territories in 1887 was altogether out of proportion to their actual population. In this respect the Act has always seemed to me to be deficient, and as this deficiency is continued in this legislation, in my judgment the Senate has taken some responsibility upon itself, which for my part I would have been disposed to dispute. But still, as my right hon. friend has said, this is a matter upon which we cannot all have our own way, and I am disposed to agree to the resolution.

To the other part of the resolution to which my right hon. friend has just agreed I take some exception, and I certainly object to the insinuation—I emphasize the word—which he made when he said that the Senate added the paragraph to which we are now agreeing "for obvious reasons." I do not admit that there is any occasion for such a slur—if my hon. friend will pardon me the expression—upon the Upper Chamber. It has been intimated in the press, and I think my right hon. friend rather conveyed the impression also, that the amendment of the Senate would postpone the appointment of senators until after the next election, implying that if there were a change in the verdict of the people the appointment of senators would be by the incoming Administration. Such is not the case. The appointment can be made immediately after dissolution, as my right hon. friend well knows, and there is therefore no necessity of postponing the appointment of the six senators until after the general election. The object of the Act that we passed last year was to increase the representation of the House of Commons in the new provinces, and it seemed to me reasonable that the representation should be increased in both chambers at the same time. This view was taken by the Senate, and I think everybody must on reflection agree that there is a good deal in favour of it. However, this is an academic debate, because, after all, both parties have agreed to the resolution and it will become law. The position of the Government is not in any way prejudiced; they can make the appointments as soon as Parliament is dissolved.

Hon. ROBERT ROGERS (Minister of Public Works): Seldom, if ever, in the history of this Parliament, for the forty-eight years of its existence, have the elected representatives of the free people of Canada been faced with a more humiliating condition than that which faces us to-day, in the consideration of the message from the Senate now before us. The position is humiliating, Mr. Speaker, beyond description, by reason of the fact that although we are elected representatives of the free people of Canada we are not to be allowed to carry out our form of democratic government under our own constitution and our own law, by reason of the action of the Senate. That means, if it means anything, that our constitution and our law are to be set at defiance to suit the purposes and the will of the majority of the Upper Chamber, which, I presume, is in keeping with the principles which my right hon. friend, the leader of the Opposition, represents. Our constitution has been approved, as hon. gentlemen well know, times without number by the Canadian people; our constitution carries the stamp of the approval of the Parliament of the United Kingdom of Great Britain as well, and under that constitution we have laid down for our guidance the form under which senators are to be appointed. Let me say to the right hon. gentleman (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) that his statement of the representation in both Houses should go together is not in keeping with the law and the constitution of our country. Under our constitution, there is provided in section 51 of the British North America Act the conditions under which this Parliament is to have its representation re-adjusted at certain specified times. Under clauses 24 and 25 of the British North America Act the Governor General, with the approval of His Majesty, under the great seal of Canada, has the right to name who shall be appointed to the Senate and when they shall be appointed. But, Sir, the message from the Senate which we are obliged to accept to-day, places at defiance that law, and places at defiance the right of the Governor-General, with the approval of the King, under the great seal of Canada, to make appointments to the Senate, and for no other purpose save and except the purpose of advancing the principles which hon. gentlemen opposite represent in this country. In order to do this the Senate has set at defiance the free will of the Canadian people.

The right hon. gentleman has stated that the insinuation of the Prime Minister with respect to the upper chamber was uncalled for. But what are the facts? We had before us a year ago in this House of Commons the question of the redistribution of seats, and while we were considering that measure we were told in the most explicit and express terms: that if a satisfactory arrangement were arrived at in respect to redistribution of seats in the House of Commons, the proposals for increased representation in the Senate would be agreed to, or otherwise it would be opposed. The manner in which we carried out the arrangement for the re-adjustment of seats in the House of Commons is within the knowledge of every member of this House. It is well known that we carried out that redistribution in an honourable and creditable manner. We on this side of the House took the ground that there never was a time in the history of this country when we were afraid to meet the free will of the people upon any fair redistribution of seats. That was our position then; that is our position to-day. We yielded liberally and generously to the wishes of hon. gentlemen opposite in respect to the redistribution of seats, but they failed to carry out their part of the contract. The leader of the Opposition knows that the Prime Minister trusted hon. gentlemen opposite; trusted them that good faith would be kept, but good faith was not kept, and good faith is not being kept to-day.

These are the conditions of which we have to complain, because, when my right hon. friend states that the representation in the upper Chamber and the representation in this Chamber should go hand in hand, he takes an entirely different position from the one which he took last year when this matter was under consideration; for when the message came back from the Senate last year, my right hon. friend said that appointments to the Upper Chamber bore no relation whatever to the election of members to this Chamber. He said also that the majority in the Upper Chamber were unable to give any good reason why they were taking the course which they did in defeating the will of the Canadian people as represented in this chamber, and this is the stand which my right hon. friend and every hon. member sitting behind him took in this House last year when they sent that message back to the Senate unapproved. He said further:

> Appointments to the Senate have no necessary or appropriate relation to the date of the election of members to serve in the House of Commons.
> In respect of certain of the western provinces the proposed increase of representation in the Senate has relation solely to the result of the last decennial census, which result has been ascertained.
> The said amendment is inappropriate and incongruous.
> No sufficient reason can be adduced for the delay effected by the said amendment.

This was my right hon. friend's position last year, and we would like to know why he has changed and why he to-day approves the action of the majority in the upper chamber in setting at defiance the law and the constitution of this great Dominion?

We have heard something in this House about German autocracy. If in this Parliament and out of it we have condemned what we call German autocracy, we have done so because of certain statements and certain actions of the Emperor of Germany; and as far as I have been able to learn, no statement ever made by the Kaiser of Germany has been more strongly condemned by the people of the United Kingdom than the one he made about a year ago when he attended the launching and christening of one of his great battleships, when he used the following words:

> The ocean teaches us that on its waves and its most distant shores no great decision can be come to hereafter without the consent of Germany and the Kaiser.

In that strong statement the Kaiser was willing to acknowledge the support and the rights of Germany herself; but what have we in our own Canadian Parliament? We have a condition that outclasses the autocratic rule of the German Emperor himself, because we have here the action of the upper chamber which, in dealing with this matter in defiance of our laws and constitution, which provide that representatives are to be appointed from time to time to the Upper Chamber upon the recommendation of the Governor General approved by the King and under the seal of this great Dominion, says that notwithstanding that we have observed this provision, the great seal of Canada, the Governor General and the King must not be allowed to carry out the provisions of our constitution because the upper chamber believe that in this matter there is a political advantage to a party in this Dominion. It is a sorry condition for the people of this Dominion. But we are told that there is a time when that autocracy may be abandoned. My right hon. friend has told us this morning that that day and that hour will come with the dissolution of this Parliament. His declaration means that until then we cannot under our constitution carry out our form of democratic government in Canada, and that we are unable to give effect to the free will of the Canadian people by reason of the action of the Upper Chamber. Is it, then, any wonder that the cry comes, from every individual that one meets and that understands the conditions, in tones louder than thunder, demanding that this Parliament be dissolved and that the rights and liberties of the people of this Dominion be granted to them under our form of democracy, and that that form of democracy be restored to them?

Mr. MARCIL: Is there any public reason why the vacancies now existing in the Senate have not been filled?

Mr. ROGERS: None whatever.

Mr. MARCIL: I would like to have an answer to that question if it can be answered.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: I will give an answer to my hon. friend presently.

Hon. FRANK OLIVER (Edmonton): It is not often that the Minister of Public Works favours us with such an outburst of oratory as he has done on this occasion, and I am sure we all appreciate very much what he has said.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: I hope you will also profit by it.

[Mr. Rogers.]

Mr. OLIVER: We will profit by it in due course. It almost strikes one, in view of the appeals which my hon. friend has made to the spirit of democracy and the suggestions which he has given of the necessity of an appeal to that democracy at an early date, that something has occurred that, in his capacity as minister of elections has struck him near the solar plexus, and has caused the outburst we have heard. My hon. friend's complaint I understood to be addressed rather against this side of the House and the leader of the Opposition. May I suggest to him that his complaint was not properly directed; that it should have been directed against the fathers of Confederation, who were the parties guilty of establishing the conditions which he finds so objectionable at the present moment. If we have not now in this country that democracy for which he cries, it is because the Fathers of Confederation saw fit to constitute a Parlia- cries, it is because the fathers of Con- should have certain established authority.

My hon. friend's complaint is that one of these bodies has exercised the authority with which it is vested. I am not at the moment going to question whether the fathers of Confederation acted wisely or unwisely; whether their establishment of the Senate, with its authority, was in the interests of democracy or not, but I do say that the Senate was established for certain definite and special reasons relating to the government of this country, and that unless there had been a Senate with such authority as has been given to it and with such authority as it has exercised, there could not have been any Confederation. Because the Senate has exercised its authority within the limits which are constitutionally unquestionable, my hon. friend declares not that he proposes to move that the Senate be abolished; not that he proposes that this bar against the full exercise of the privilege of democracy shall be removed, but that the leader of the Opposition has, in some way, controlled the Senate and caused it to stand in the way of the realization of my hon. friend's proposals. That is a matter which he must settle with the Senate in due course, and with the people of Canada in due course. Every senator is appointed under certain specific rights and privileges, and no body of men exercising authority in this or any other country is so absolutely independent of any possible outside influence as is the Senate of Canada. When my hon. friend suggests that the majority in the Senate of Canada are under the direction of anybody else, it is because he and they are like-minded in regard to what is right and what is wrong. When my hon. friend, in the exercise of his authority, because he has a parliamentary majority behind him, undertakes, in the slang of the day, to put something over the people of Canada, and finds that he cannot do it, he rages and blames the leader of the Opposition. Let him blame his proposals, which do not appeal to the minds of the honest men who at the moment constitute the majority of the Senate.

My hon. friend said something about Kaiserism; that the Senate is another Kaiser. My hon. friend objects to the exercise of constitutional authority sanctioned by the wisdom of the men who framed this Confederation; he protests against the exercise of that right in the interests of the people of Canada. I ask, who is the Kaiser, the Senate, acting within the authority of the constitution, or the Minister of Public Works, making a demagogic speech in this Parliament declaring against the constitution? If my hon. friend believed what he has said, then let the Prime Minister amend the resolution that he proposes to this this House, and move for the abolition of the Senate and for the establishment of authority only by this House of Commons. That will show whether or not my hon. friend believed in what he said. It is not satisfactory that he should declare that the people of the West have been robbed of their rights because the Senate did not agree to the proposal of the appointment at an improper time of an increased number of representatives. My hon. friend cannot justify that argument so long as the vacancies in the Senate, which he has a right to fill, remain unfilled. The people of the West are entitled to their rights under the constitution; they claim that and nothing more. If we get our senatorial representation at the same time as we get our parliamentary representation, we certainly shall be very well satisfied.

My hon. friend has had something to say about the honesty and fairness of the Government in regard to redistribution. Admitting, if my hon. friend likes, that the Government have been honest and fair; admitting that they have provided a fair and reasonable Redistribution Bill, is that any more than the Government ought to do? Is that any more than the people of Canada have a right to expect at the hands of the Government? Surely it is not necessary to claim that in order to get justice at the hands of the Government as to the redistribution of seats in the House of Commons, it was necessary to have an understanding as to some action that would be taken in the Senate. Surely nothing of that kind was necessary.

I am not so sure that there is good ground for the claim that my hon. friend has made as to this redistribution measure being very fair. I think I can produce members of Parliament who are thoroughly satisfied that there was a full intention on the part of the Government majority on that Redistribution Committee to butcher their chances of election.

Mr. ROGERS: I do not believe the hon. gentleman can.

Mr. OLIVER: I think I can; I think I can find one right here now who will stand up and give my hon. friend the information.

Mr. ROGERS: Bring him up.

Mr. SPEAKER: I am afraid that the hon. member is departing from the question before the House.

Mr. OLIVER: I do not wish to trespass, but my hon. friend did lay some stress on the question of redistribution, and I thought it was only fair to follow him. However, I do not wish to dwell on that point. I say it is a most unheard of proceeding that a minister of the Crown should stand in his place in Parliament, and, on the strength of the facts laid before us, give the reasons which he has given to-day for throwing this country into the turmoil of a general election while a world war is in progress. I assert that the reasons which he gave will not be accepted by the loyal people of Canada.

Mr. A. A. McLEAN: Mr. Speaker, on behalf of my constituents and the people of Prince Edward Island, I wish to thank the right hon. gentleman for this modicum of justice which is conceded to Prince Edward Island by the passing of the second part of this resolution. Of course it applies to other provinces, but the one to which it particularly applies at the present time is the province of Prince Edward Island. We have for 40 years attempted to have the terms of Confederation carried into effect, that is the terms of Confederation as we thought and believed them to be, and as we believe to-day should have been carried into effect in 1873 and then enacted into law in the Confederation terms. We have placed before this House on many occasions the contention of the people of Prince Edward Island. We claimed that the terms of Confederation were that we should be represented in this Parliament by six members. Resolutions were introduced in this House on many occasions with reference to that matter. In 1907 the first resolution was introduced in terms with the one contained in the paper now in your hand. The right hon. leader of the Opposition was then leader of the Government and he coolly turned down the proposition. He would concede nothing to Prince Edward Island.

Mr. SPEAKER: The hon. member is rather departing from the usual rule followed in this House. The question before the House is concurrence in the amendment made by the Senate, and to that so far as I can see, the line of argument of the hon. gentleman has very little relation.

Mr. McLEAN: The Senate passed a resolution or an address to His Majesty, in which it is stated that the number of members for this House shall not in any province be less than the number in the Senate.

Mr. SPEAKER: The only question before the House is concurrence in the amendment. I imagine that the hon. member has it in his mind that the original resolution, with this amendment, is equally before the House and equally open to debate. But the rules of the House do not permit that; they require that members shall speak only to the amendment, the last motion put to the House.

Mr. McLEAN: I was just following the course that was taken by other hon. gentlemen. Of course, if they were wrong I am wrong, and I must give way. As you, Mr. Speaker, will not allow discussion on anything except the question which is now before the House, I shall simply repeat that although the second part of this resolution or address is now being put into law we in Prince Edward Island will not give up the fight to have the representation which we consider we should have had since 1873.

Hon. J. D. HAZEN (Minister of Marine and Fisheries): Mr. Speaker, there was an old established principle of Liberalism, one I often heard referred to in my boyhood days by those engaged in fighting the battles against the Family Compact and the battles for responsible Government in the different provinces of Canada, that the Government of a country should be according to the well-understood wishes of its people as expressed through their elected representatives in Parliament. I am afraid the hon. member for Edmonton (Mr. Oliver) has no respect for that principle of Liberalism as enunciated in the past. Judging from his remarks to the House this morning, the hon. gentleman's idea is that government should be according to the well-understood wishes of the leader of the Liberal party in this House, as expressed by the partisan majority in the Senate of Canada. My hon. friend has said that the hon. the Minister of Public Works, if he has any complaint at all, has a complaint against the Fathers of Confederation who provided and recommended the constitution which this country now enjoys. I would ask you, Mr. Speaker, I would ask the members of this House, if they think it possible that the fathers of Confederation, in the wildest flights of their imagination, could ever have believed that the time would come when the Senate of the Dominion of Canada, instead of being an independent body, a body viewing legislation only from the public standpoint, would become more partisan than the House of Commons itself. Because I think the assertion can be made safely and without fear of successful contradiction that the Senate of Canada as it exists to-day is a more partisan body than the House of Commons. We have found during the last few years the Senate turning down measures that have been approved by this Chamber, and turning them down because they believed they saw some advantage to the Conservative party if those measures became law. We had an illustration of their course in their amending a Bill passed by this House authorizing the taking over of the branch lines of the Intercolonial, passed after amendments usggested by hon. gentlemen opposite had been inserted in it, thus, in effect, killing the Bill. They refused to endorse the unanimous feeling of this House, because they believed the passage of that Bill would be to the advantage of the Conservative party in this country. We have the fact that they defeated a Bill designed for the purpose of improving the highways of this country, and one reason for doing so and no doubt the underlying one was given from the public platform in the province of New Brunswick by a member of the Senate, who said they did not want to pass the Bill as it would prove of great advantage to the Conservative party. So I think my hon. friend, in stating that the Minister of Public Works should find fault with the fathers of Confederation and not with the Senate as it is constituted to-day, must have lost sight of the fact that the fathers of Confederation believed that the Senate would be an independent body, composed of a superior class of men, men of a judicial cast of mind, giving fair consideration and judgment to questions brought before it, irrespective of political considerations, and would not degenerate into a body which paid more attention to party politics and was more partisan in its action than the House of Commons. Every one, I think, knows that the majority in the Senate to-day are influenced solely by partisan considerations; and there has been no more striking illustration of this fact than the example that we have before the House and the country to-day of their refusing to give to the western provinces of Canada that representation in the Senate to which they are clearly entitled under the Constitution, and which, Mr. Speaker, with all respect to the statement made by the right hon. leader of the Opposition, I say they are entitled to at the present time. There is nothing in the Constitution requiring them to wait until after a general election has taken place. Under these circumstances, I contend that the Minister of Public Works is absolutely within his rights, and not only within his rights but within the facts, in calling attention to the partisan conduct of the Upper Chamber as it is now constituted.

Hon. WILLIAM PUGSLEY (St. John): Mr. Speaker, my hon. friend the Minister of Marine and Fisheries, I think, has done the other branch of this Parliament a grave injustice by charging them with being influenced by partisan motives. I think that before my hon. friend makes a charge of so serious a character as that in reference to what ought to be, what I believe is, an independent branch of this Parliament, he ought to give some evidence of partisanship. What is the evidence which my hon. friend gives? He says that they ignored the voice of this House with regard to a Bill to enable the Government to acquire branch lines of the Intercolonial railway. Surely my hon. friend is aware that the Senate have treated the legislation introduced by this Government into a Parliament where the Conservatives are in a majority in the House of Commons far more leniently than they treated the Bill which was passed when the Liberal Government was in power. My hon. friend will recall that the Senate amended in a very drastic manner the Bill which was passed by this House in 1910. That amendment provided that before any branch lines should be taken over, there should be full and complete reports from the Board of Management of the Intercolonial and from the Chief Engineer, and that before the Government should be permitted to enter upon the operation of any branch lines it must ask Parliament for ratification of the terms of any agreement of purchase, or even of any agreement of lease. How much more drastic was that treatment of a Bill passed under a Liberal Government than the treatment which the Senate gave to the Branch Lines Bill at the sesion of 1912-13? Surely my hon. friend will remember that Branch Lines Bill when first introduced by the Government at the session of 1912-13 was very broad in character, giving the Governor in Council power to acquire lines of railway anywhere in Canada, whether connected with the Intercolonial or not. The Bill was amended in this House, and when it reached the Senate all that they did was to provide that any contract for lease or purchase of any branch line should first be submitted to Parliament for ratification. That was all; and I think it was a very reasonable provision to put in. I myself was desirous that the Bill should pass, and therefore supported it, because from the standpoint of the province of New Brunswick I felt deeply interested in the acquisition of branch lines; but I felt that for the Government to provide that it could acquire branch lines without the contract being submitted to Parliament for ratification was an extreme step to take. This House by a majority declined to accept the Senate's amendment. At the present session the Government came forward with two resolutions authorizing contracts for the lease and purchase of two branch lines of railway, in which they adopted the very principle that had been laid down by the Senate two years ago, namely, that the agreement should be submitted to Parliament for ratification. This Government made an agreement with these two railway companies and submitted the measure to Parliament, thus recognizing that the very thing the Senate had suggested was not an unreasonable thing to do.

Mr. R. B. BENNETT: What else could they do?

Mr. PUGSLEY: What else would they think of doing? No one can find fault with the Government for having acted in this way. The principle has worked out in a very satisfactory manner. The Government did not ask for authority first; they made an arrangement which was binding on the railway companies, and then came to Parliament to have the contracts ratified. And that is all that the Senate asked the Government to do in 1913.

Take their action this year. On the suggestion of my right hon. friend the leader of the Opposition, that portion of the Bill which gives general authority to acquire branch lines, was amended to provide that the purchase price should not be paid until there was a vote of Parliament. That was recognizing the authority of Parliament to deal with the disposition of the moneys of the country. That Bill passed this House unanimously, and when it went to the Senate was concurred in unanimously, so I think that so far as branch lines legislation is concerned there is no evidence of partisanship.

My hon. friend says that they also threw out the highways measure. They did nothing of the kind. They improved the Bill by providing that the money which was to be given by this Government in aid of highways should be divided among the different provinces in the same way that the British North America Act provides that subsidies shall be apportioned, namely, according to population as determined by the last census. I think that if we were to make an argument on the question, the most reasonable men in this country would say that that was a proper provision to make, because under the terms of the British North America Act all federal aids to the provinces in the way of subsidies, of which this highways measure was necessarily one, must be divided according to the population of the various provinces. I can see no evidence of partisanship in that, but my hon. friend says that a senator stated in New Brunswick that, if the Bill passed it would be a great aid to the Conservative party. I venture to say that my hon. friend has incorrectly summarized the statement which that senator made; I do not think he has given the meaning of what the senator said; and I am inclined to think that if he got a copy of that gentleman's speech he would find that the senator expressed the view that if the Bill had become law in the form in which it passed this House, it might be made a vast engine of corruption in the interests of the Conservative party. I have heard of senators making that statement, and I have no doubt that if the senator referred to made any reference of the kind at all, it was along those lines. If the Minister of Railways could spend the money wherever he pleased, without any regard to population or the requirements of the different provinces, my hon. friend can see that the Act might be made a great engine of corruption in the interests of the Conservative party; and if my hon. friend would search in his own heart he might feel that that was perhaps one of the strong reasons which induced him as a member of the Government to agree with the measure in that form, for he must have realized what an engine for improper influence it might be.

My hon. friend has given no other evidence of partisanship; but he says the Senate is a partisan body. Was it a very partisan body when the question of the Farmers' Bank came up? That Bill passed this House, and when it went to the Senate Liberal senators and Conservative senators, if there are any such—perhaps I should say senators appointed by the Liberal Government, and senators appointed by the Conservative Government—joined in defeating the Bill which they thought involved a most dangerous principle.

Mr. A. A. McLEAN: I think the hon. gentleman is not speaking to the question. I was ruled out of order a few moments ago, and I would like a ruling from the Chair whether the hon. gentleman has any right to digress from the subject before the House, as he is doing.

Mr. SPEAKER: I am afraid that the point is not well taken.

Mr. PUGSLEY: It has been stated by my hon. friend the Minister of Public Works that the amendment made by the Senate is contrary to some understanding which was arrived at during the session of 1913-14. I have heard that statement made before, and I have seen it in newspapers; but I think that some evidence ought to be given that any agreement was made, or else hon. gentlemen ought to cease to refer to it, and newspapers to talk about it. I put this forward as a reason why this amendment should be concurred in. I think I can show that the Senate has done the only proper thing which could be done in the interests of democracy in this country. When this matter came before the House in the session of 1913-14, in the presence of my right hon. friend the leader of the Government, and after he had spoken in favour of the resolution, I rose in my place and urged that the Act should only come into effect upon the dissolution of this Parliament. I urged that in the presence of my right hon. friend the Prime Minister and in the presence of my right hon. friend the leader of the Opposition. If there had been any understanding that the resolution was to go through the Senate just as it was presented to this House, was it not the duty of my right hon. friend the Prime Minister to rise and refer to that understanding? Neither by myself, nor, I venture to say by any member on this side of the House, was there any knowledge of any such understanding expressed or implied. There was the opportunity; why did not my right hon. friend get up and say to me that it was not quite fair, not quite in order, that I should urge such an amendment to the resolution because there was an understanding in connection with the Representation Bill that the resolution should go through Parliament in the way in which it had been presented to this House? I have never heard of any such understanding, and I believe that no other member on this side of the House has ever heard of it either.

The argument which I made then, the argument which I make to-day in favour of the amendment that is made by the Senate, is that in this Parliament the people of this country, the democracy, is represented. This House is the mouthpiece of the people. Whom does the Senate represent? Does the Senate represent the people, the democracy? No, Sir, the Senate represents the Crown. The senators are the appointees of the Crown. This is the popular branch of Parliament, the senators represent the Crown and they are appointed upon the advice of the Government. They are independent of the people. They hold their positions for life, and no one has the right to question their votes, because they are not responsible to any one or to any body, but are simply responsible to their own consciences for the manner in which they discharge their duties.

It occurred to me that as, by reason of the increase in the population, there ought to be an increase in the representation of the democracy in this House, and an increase in the appointees of the Crown in the other branch of Parliament, it was only reasonable and proper that the increase in the number of the appointees of the Crown should take place concurrently with the increase in the number of those who represent the democracy in this House. That seemed to me to be a reasonable proposition, and so far from the action of the Senate being against the democracy, against the views of the people having expression in Parliament, it seems to me that their action is in favour of a fuller expression of that opinion, because they say that the appointees of the Crown, and therefore the authority of the Crown, shall not be extended until the authority of the people in this branch of Parliament is extended and that both shall take place concurrently.

Mr. R. B. BENNETT: How does the hon. gentleman reconcile his observations with the remarks of his leader last year?

Mr. PUGSLEY: I do not remember what the remarks of my leader were.

Mr. BENNETT: That shows a very great oversight on the part of the hon. gentleman.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: I made no remarks then.

Mr. BENNETT: I think I remember the remarks of my right hon. friend.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: I made none.

Mr. PUGSLEY: At all events, it is the view which presents itself to me, and this is the reason which will actuate me in concurring in the amendment made by the Senate. The hon. the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Rogers) has rather intimated that he would like to have an election to take the view of the people on this question as to when an increase in the Senate should take place. With my hon. friend the war counts for nothing. With my hon. friend the tragedy which is affecting this whole Empire, and no part of the Empire to a greater extent than Canada, counts for nothing compared with having his nominees appointed to the Senate at as early a date as possible. My hon. friend thinks it would be right to throw the people of the country into the turmoil of an election contest simply because he will be delayed a few months in having his friends appointed to what he hopes to be the vacant positions in the Senate. As has been pointed out, there is apparently no immediate need for an increase in the Senate because the Government has allowed many months to pass since vacancies have occurred without taking steps to fill them, and there are now some nine vacancies in the other branch of Parliament. Yesterday the hon. Minister of Justice (Mr. Doherty) was not able to say as to when there would be a dissolution. Has the Government changed its mind in the night so that it is possible to-day for the hon. gentleman, who in some quarters, even by many of the friends of the Government, is called the master of the Administration, to announce a different decision? Is it possible that the hon. Minister of Public Works has induced the Government to change its views in the night, and that the intimation which he gives to-day is made with the authority of his colleagues?

Whatever the Government may do they will not terrorize any of us who sit upon this side of the House. In this, as in all other matters, we shall endeavour to do our plain duty as we see it and in respect of this resolution, I, for one, believe that the Senate has taken the proper, constitutional and reasonable course, and that the amendment which it has made ought to commend itself to the members of this House, as I am sure it will commend itself to the good judgment of the people of this country.

Mr. LEVI THOMSON: Mr. Speaker, if I am not out of order, I would like to reply to a remark made by the hon. Minister of Public Works (Mr. Rogers) in regard to the late redistribution. He has intimated that it was fair and satisfactory to every one.

Mr. SCHAFFNER: More than fair.

Mr. THOMSON: I say it was not fair.

Mr. SPEAKER: I do not think that question can properly be discussed on this motion.

Mr. THOMSON: I am replying to some remarks made by the Minister of Public Works.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: The statement was made by the Minister of Public Works that it was fair.

Mr. SPEAKER: The statement may have been made, but I do not think that it involves the right to go into an analysis of another Bill while dealing with the question before the House.

Mr. THOMSON: If you rule, Mr. Speaker, that I am not in order, I will accept your ruling.

Mr. KYTE: In view of your ruling, Mr. Speaker, I am also debarred from participating in this feature of the debate, but I do not wish the statement of the Minister of Public Works to pass unchallenged that there have been no complaints in respect to the Redistribution Bill passed at the last session of Parliament.

[Mr. Pugsley.]

Mr. R. B. BENNETT (Calgary): Mr. Speaker, I submit there is a principle involved in the discussion of the question of concurrence in the amendment of the Senate to which attention should be directed. This Commons House of Parliament came into existence in September, 1911, shortly after which this Government was formed. There is no doubt but that the hon. gentlemen opposite always contended that the election of this Commons House of Parliament was an election that did not properly represent the will of the people. They have never believed they were defeated. They have always assumed that they were still in power, and in the desperation and bitterness of their disappointment they have sought measures and means to give effect to those views and that opinion. It is common knowledge throughout Canada, and it has been indicated by statements and speeches not of a public character, by members of the other branch of this Parliament, that this Government would never be permitted to give effect to its large measures of policy affecting the well-being of Canada until there had been another election.

That is commonplace knowledge, and the right hon. the leader of the Opposition and his followers have relied upon the will of the members of another branch of this Parliament to give expression to those views. They have endeavoured to destroy and to minimize the efforts of this Government to place in concrete form upon the Statute books of this country its policy as enunciated and declared before the elections of 1911. I am not going to travel the ground covered by my hon. friend from St. John (Mr. Pugsley), but illustrations multiply. From the very first day this Government assumed office, from the time it began to give effect to its promises to the electors, from the moment it introduced into this Parliament a Bill providing for a Tariff Commission up to the time it carried through this House its most important legislation making for the strengthening of the naval defences of the Empire, hon. gentlemen opposite, with the aid of another branch of Parliament, made it their boast that they would not permit this Government to give effect to its policies until after there had been another election. I have stated it publicly and I repeat it in this House, that such action on the part of the Liberal party and of its majority in the Senate is a standing insult to democracy. These gentlemen opposite talk about democracy, and they thwart its will whenever it pleases them; they rely upon an irresponsible body in another chamber to restrict and restrain democracy. We on this side of the House have not attacked publicly or privately the Senate of Canada because it is part of our constitutional fabric and our system of Government; we made no such promises as hon. gentlemen opposite made while in opposition as to what they would do to the Senate when they came to power. They talked about reforming the Senate and they were content to reform it by sending to it gentlemen whom the member for Edmonton has assumed to be more honest than the members of Parliament.

Mr. OLIVER: I said nothing of the kind.

Mr. BENNETT: The hon. gentleman referred in the House this morning to honest members of the Senate as distinguished from the members who sit on this side of the House, to whom he referred to as being actuated by corrupt motives in introducing legislation.

Mr. OLIVER: I never used such language; I never used language that could be construed to convey any such idea.

Mr. BENNETT: I am bound by the denial of the hon. gentleman, but the words he used were "honest members in the Senate."

Mr. OLIVER: I beg to repeat that I believe the members of the Senate are honest men.

Mr. BENNETT: And the language that he used just before that was that the members on this side of the House were influenced by corrupt motives and desires in endeavouring to pass certain legislation. If there is any one man in this House who should not make observations such as that it is the hon. gentleman from Edmonton, and that is all I have to say about that—so far as I am concerned.

Mr. OLIVER: The hon. gentleman is making an insinuation now, and I would like him to put it in plain words.

Mr. BENNETT: I am making a direct statement, as shown by Hansard. The hon. gentleman will surely understand what that means.

Mr. OLIVER: Will the hon. gentleman repeat his direct statement?

Mr. BENNETT: The direct statement is, that if there is any member in this House who should not make statements such as those he has made, it is the hon. member for Edmonton. That is my statement exactly.

Mr. OLIVER: Mr. Speaker, is that a fair comment on anything I have said?

Mr. HENDERSON: I think you had better take it.

Mr. OLIVER: I want to say that my memory is that I did not use such language as the hon. member has stated I did use in regard to members on the other side of the House.

Mr. BENNETT: I am bound by the observations of the hon. gentleman, and I hope he will now withdraw his statement.

Mr. OLIVER: I am willing to do so under proper circumstances, but what I deny is that I used these words during the remarks which I made here to-day. If my hon. friend asks me what my opinion is in regard to himself or in regard to members on the other side of the House, I am quite ready to give it, but that has nothing to do with the discussion.

Mr. BENNETT: I have heard the opinion of the hon. gentleman on many occasions, but it is not a matter of very great importance. I hope I may be able to exchange opinions with him during the next few weeks, or the next year or two, in a manner that will not be disconcerting to me, however interesting it may be to him.

I say that the instances multiply as to what the disposition of the Senate is towards the legislative enactments of this Government, and the records of the Senate show it. I rose as a representative of a western constituency to say that so far as I am concerned I agree with the statement made by the right hon. leader of the Government when he reluctantly asked this House to concur in this amendment. It is insulting to this House in the sense that the Senate asks us to subordinate the will of the Commons branch of this Parliament to the arbitrary will of a non-representative and irresponsible body. That I can say with safety and assurance, and about that there can be no doubt. But the feature that I desire to protest against is that this Government has not been permitted, by the deliberate, by the considered, and by the well-advised conduct of the Senate, to give effect to that legislative programme which it had designed and which it should have been permitted to carry out. My country has suffered by the conduct of the Senate; western Canada has suffered by the action of this irresponsible body, and whenever farmers endeavour to carry grain from their farms to the railway stations in order that they may not pay ten or fifteen cents to haul a bushel of grain to the market, they will think, and they will properly think of the action of that irresponsible body which thwarted the will of democracy, as expressed by this House of Commons.

I protest against the destruction of the legislation for a Tariff Commission, a Highways Act, a Naval Aid Act, and all those Acts that represented the well-considered legislative programme of this Government. The people of western Canada protest against it, because they have been deprived of proper representation in the Senate. And, because we protest against it this Government must reluctantly be compelled to acquiesce in the amendments now proposed. The language used last year in a message from this House to the Senate fairly indicated that there was a unanimous opinion on the part of this House of Commons against the action of the Senate, and that unanimous opinion of the Commons should not lightly have been set aside by the Senate. But, of course, it is in furtherance of that scheme and plan that was formed and framed at the very moment that this Government came into existence—

Mr. PUGSLEY: Order. I venture to say, Mr. Speaker, that the hon. gentleman is using language in reference to another branch of this Parliament which is contrary to the rules. He said that the action of the Senate in respect to legislation has been to pursue a scheme which was devised when this Government came into power. That is insulting to the other branch of Parliament and is contrary to the rules.

Mr. BENNETT: My hon. friend has entirely misunderstood my observation. I did not say the scheme was planned or framed in any branch of this Parliament; I said that in furtherance of a well-defined scheme or plan that the will of this Government, as expressed by the majority of members in this House of Commons, was thwarted and destroyed and rendered nugatory by the action of an irresponsible and partisan majority in the Senate. That is what I said and that is all I have to say.

Mr. PUGSLEY: That is contrary to the well-understood rule of this House, and the hon. gentleman should withdraw the language he has used in regard to the other branch of Parliament.

Mr. SPEAKER: I do not think, as the phrase was given to the House, that it is exactly within the rule which would compel me to ask the hon. member to refrain from making reflections upon the other branch of this Parliament, but I do think that it ought to be a well-understood principle that it is not in good taste to reflect on the other branch of this Legislature.

Mr. BENNETT: I entirely concur in your decision, Mr. Speaker. I do not desire to reflect on the other branch of this Parliament; I merely desired to make certain observations as to its conduct and to let the public make the reflection.

Mr. E. M. MACDONALD (Pictou): One is at a loss, when we are considering in this Parliament a question as to whether the constitution of this country should be amended, to understand why all this violence should be exhibited by hon. gentlemen opposite, because another branch of this Parliament undertook to express a view as to the wisdom and the methods by which that change in the constitution should be carried out. We must remember that the proposition contained in this resolution is a proposition to amend the constitution of Canada.

If there is any subject upon which both Houses of Parliament have the most perfect and absolute right to express their views and to exercise their judgment, it is upon a question of that character. My hon. friend (Mr. R. B. Bennett) has made a general attack upon the Senate because he alleges that it has entered into a conspiracy for the purpose of setting aside all Government measures. He or any other hon. gentleman opposite who speaks of the lack of wisdom, as they call it, on the part of the Senate with regard to Government measures, is really saying that the Senate should be a body existing solely and wholly for the purpose of registering the decrees of the Government of the day. Hon. gentlemen opposite declare that there should be a second chamber because, although they have been in power for four years, we have had no suggestion from any one of them requesting that an address be presented to the Imperial Parliament asking that the constitution of the Senate should be amended, or asking that it should be abolished, or anything of that kind. Therefore, we are bound to assume that hon. gentlemen opposite accept the constitution of the Senate as laid down by the British North America Act and the various amending Acts. If the second chamber constituted in 1867 is to exercise any part in the functions of Government, it is not open to hon. gentlemen who do not dispute its right to exist to say that it should be condemned because it chooses to differ from the Government of the day. The rights of the second chamber under the British constitution are well recognized; every book on parliamentary government has laid down its rights as to the measures with which it may or may not deal, and in regard to the various measures on which the Senate may choose to take certain views and to submit certain amendments, and no hon. gentleman opposite, whose knowledge of constitutional law is of any value whatever, will dare to say that the Senate does not exercise the functions which Parliament and the constitution intended it to have the right to exercise when it was constituted in 1867. If that is so, why do hon. gentlemen speak of Kaiserism? Why does my hon. friend the Minister of Public Works fan himself into a fury because, as he says, the Second Chamber of this Parliament, which has as much right to exist and to express its views within the four corners of the charter which constitutes it as we have, has chosen to express its own opinion, in regard more particularly to this matter under review. This House did not try to pass any legislation; it initiated a resolution which had within it two purposes: First, that the constitution of the Senate should be amended by the creation of a new area in the West which is entitled to senatorial representation, and, secondly, that the representation of the province of Prince Edward Island in this House should be increased. This latter part of the resolution involved an amendment of the British North America Act, because it changed the interpretation placed upon that Act by the Privy Council and interfered with the arrangement which the Privy Council declared was the original intention of the Act. That it should have been in any way associated with the other provision regarding senatorial representation was quite out of place; but the right hon. gentleman leading the House chose to make in the draft of the resolution which he submitted to Parliament this provision in regard to amending the representation in the Senate. When that resolution went to the Senate, was there any matter upon which the Senate would have more right to express an opinion than on a matter in regard to itself? Supposing the right hon. gentleman had asked that the constitution of the Senate be changed by lessening its number to fifty instead of by increasing it as he proposed to do; would he expect that the Senate would refrain from expressing its views as to whether or not its usefulness would be interfered with by that reduction? But because hon. gentlemen opposite have got into power, much to their own surprise, and because they want to impose their will upon the people of Canada in regard to the constitutional rights which were given to this Second Chamber, they affect the attitude taken by my hon. friend the Minister of Public Works, who does not like to have his will interfered with, who does not brook opposition with any good spirit, and who, if he finds that the constitution stands between him and the gratifying of his wishes, says: Let us smash this constitution to pieces, if necessary.

Mr. ROGERS: When did I say that?

Mr. MACDONALD: That is a metaphorical concentration of my hon. friend's speech. I was giving the intent which existed in the hon. gentleman's mind when he spoke.

Mr. HENDERSON: He did not say that.

Mr. ROGERS: My hon. friend had better apologize.

Mr. MACDONALD: For what?

Mr. ROGERS: For making a statement that is not correct.

Mr. MACDONALD: For making the statement that, when my hon. friend does not find an opportunity of gratifying his will on account of constitutional impediments, he makes the statement that the Senate is a bad body and ought to be condemned by the people of this country?

Mr. ROGERS: There is no constitutional difficulty except in the mind of the Senate.

Mr. MACDONALD: Are the senators so many automatons who jump at the hon. gentleman's will, who act when he pulls the string? My hon. friend says there are no constitutional impediments except in the mind of the Senate, even though it is acting under its constitutional rights.

Mr. ROGERS: It is not doing so.

Mr. MACDONALD: Does my hon. friend say that, when the proposition before Parliament is whether or not the constitution of Canada should be amended in any degree, I care not how slight, the other portion of this Parliament has no right to express its opinion?

Mr. ROGERS: No, but this matter was one of agreement.

Mr. MACDONALD: My hon. friend has spoken about matters of agreement. We do not know anything about agreements, and who on the part of the Senate made any agreement or bargain in regard to the question? I would like my hon. friend to tell us. It is unwise, imprudent and entirely undignified for hon. gentlemen occupying the position which the members of the Government occupy to say that another portion of this Parliament has no right whatever to express its views with regard to legislation which the Government proposes. Do hon. gentlemen fancy that when they propose legislation to this House and it goes to the other chamber, the eighty men sitting there, appointed under the great seal of the Dominion of Canada, are to say nothing in regard to it? Have they no right to amend it or to offer any opinion in regard to it, no matter how important it may be?

My hon. friend from Calgary (Mr. R. B. Bennett) spoke of the importance of the legislation that was to be amended. By just so much as legislation is important, by just so much it becomes the duty of the Senate to consider carefully that legislation; and unless the other portion of this Parliament is to abdicate its functions entirely and declare that it has no right whatever in any way to interfere with legislation proposed by this Government, no matter what it may be, then the argument of my hon. friend the Minister of Public Works is simply an appeal of a rather demagogic character and entirely baseless, so far as any rights under our constitution are concerned. That the Senate has a right to express its views on this proposition no one can deny, as a matter of constitutional practice and law, and my right hon. friend, to-day accepting the conclusion which the Senate came to last year, that the representation of the Second Chamber should be changed at the same time as the representation of this Chamber should be changed, is simply accepting a proposition that will commend itself to any one who looks at this constitutional question from a reasonable and practical standpoint.

At one o'clock, the House took recess.

The House resumed at three o'clock.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: If no other hon. gentleman desires to address the House, I should like to say a few words. My right hon. friend the leader of the Opposition seems to have some doubt as to the propriety of the Senate's action in proposing an amendment to the resolution by which the powers conferred upon this Parliament by the British North America Act, 1886, will be preserved beyond question. It had not really come to my attention—at all events, it had escaped my attention at the moment—that that amendment had been made. I am, however, entirely prepared to accept it, and I do not think that there is any ground for apprehension. The powers conferred by the British North America Act, 1886, are conferred not upon the Government of the day, but upon Parliament, and no provision can be made for the representation of the Territories in Parliament except by the authority of Parliament. More than that it would seem to be undesirable that all provision for representation of the Territories in Parliament should be removed from the British North America Act. At present the only territory represented in Parliament is the Yukon, but later we may find in the northern and western part of Canada which is not yet placed within the limits of any province, a considerable population which, before the erection of such territory into a province, may very properly be represented in both branches of this Parliament. I think that such representation may safely be confided to this Parliament, for the reason that the Imperial Parliament would undoubtedly act upon a resolution of both branches of the legislature for the purpose of giving representation to such territories. The preservation of the powers contained in the British North America Act, 1886, merely means that instead of taking a roundabout way of giving representation to those territories in Parliament, we adopt a direct and more expeditious method.

I do not desire to dwell upon some matters which have been dealt with in connection with this resolution, but I do find it a little difficult to understand why hon. gentlemen on the other side of the House, particularly the right hon. leader of the Opposition and the hon. member for St. John city, should take ground at the present time which is absolutely the reverse of that to which they committed themselves at the last session of Parliament. In order to make myself perfectly clear, I will read the resolution to which they unanimously assented when proposed by myself. It is as follows:

That a message be sent to the Senate to acquaint their Honours that the amendment made by the Senate in the proposed joint address to His Most Excellent Majesty the King be not concurred in, for the following reasons:

1. Because appointments to the Senate have no necessary or appropriate relation to the date of the election of members to serve in the House of Commons.

2. Because in respect of certain of the western provinces the proposed increase of representation in the Senate has relation solely to the result of the last decennial census, which result has been ascertained.

3. Because the said amendment is inappropriate and incongruous.

4. Because no sufficient reason can be adduced for the delay effected by the said amendment.

The Senate's amendment of last year was rejected on these grounds by the unanimous voice of this House; yet we have the spectacle of my hon. friends on the other side of the House now declaring that the reasons put forward last year by the unanimous consent of this House for rejecting the amendment of the Senate were absolutely fallacious and unsound. It would be well, perhaps, if they had acquainted us with the time at which and the reasons for which they came to a conclusion so absolutely inconsistent with their record of last year. Up to the present time, we have had no information on that point.

Motion agreed to.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN moved:

That a message be sent to the Senate to acquaint their Honours that this House hath agreed to their Address to His Royal Highness the Governor General, respectfully requesting that His Royal Highness will be pleased to transmit the joint address to His Most Excellent Majesty the King, most humbly praying that he may graciously be pleased to give his consent to submitting a measure to the Parliament of the United Kingdom to amend certain provisions of the British North America Act, 1867, by filling up the blank therein with the word "Commons."

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: There can be no opposition to this motion; it is simply a necessary corollary of the motion which has just been adopted. It gives me, however, an opportunity of explaining the attitude, since it has been challenged, that I and other hon. gentlemen on this side of the House have taken on this matter.

I may remind the House that last year, when the right hon. gentleman introduced a Bill to increase the representation of the Senate, I suggested to him that the only way to do that was to adopt an Address to the Imperial Parliament asking for an amendment to the constitution. My right hon. friend, seeing that the opinion that I expressed was well founded, brought down a resolution accordingly. To this resolution I gave my entire assent. The resolution went through this House as an expression of the unanimous opinion of both sides of the House that the amendment sought to the constitution should be granted. The Senate, for reasons of their own—reasons in which I believe there was an element of soundness—saw fit to provide that this amendment of the constitution should not come into force until such time as the increased representation in the House of Commons was effected. In other words, they so amended the Bill as to provide that the voice of the people and the voice of the Crown in the matter of representation in the Canadian Parliament should be heard at the same time. I will not discuss at this time whether that was judicious or not judicious, sound or unsound; at all events, it will be agreed that even if we dissented from the view taken by the Senate, it was one of those differences of opinion which involved a matter not of principle, but simply of expediency. The opinion of the Senate was rejected by this House, and the same view has been taken to-day by the Government. My right hon. friend, who finds fault because this year I do not assent, has himself accepted the opinion of the Senate on this occasion. He says that we must make concessions, he recognizes that the voice of the Senate must be heard, and he thinks that for the sake of the good which is to be accomplished, he should sacrifice his opinion. For the common good I also sacrifice some of my own opinion. But, after all, if we are to have a double legislature, if we are to have two chambers, is it to be apprehended for a single moment that the upper chamber is simply to be the recording clerk for the House of Commons? Is it to be said that it is to have no opinion of its own? It is needless to put the question. The question answers itself. My only desire is to repel the slanderous imputation which has been made against the Senate that, because it so happens that at present the majority of the members of the Senate are in sympathy with me, they have acted from partisan motives. What partisan motive could there be when they amended not only the opinion of my right hon. friend but my own opinion also? My hon. friend has stated that the resolutions of this House had been passed unanimously. They were passed unanimously, I admit; but the Senate, who have been stated more than once to be the slaves of the leader of the Opposition, did not consent to pass the views of the leader of the Opposition, but modified the advice both of the leader of the Government and that of the leader of the Opposition. Could the Senate have given a greater, a nobler, a more manifest example of their independence, not of one party merely, but of both parties? In the face of this record I think the insinuations that have been made against the Senate are absolutely without foundation.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: My right hon. friend says he will not vouchsafe any opinion as to the action of the Senate last year or this year. But I was a little surprised last year, within a few weeks after the Senate had taken this action, to find my right hon. friend giving reasons which in his judgment made that action of the Senate perfectly sound, although in the House of Commons about ten days before he had committed himself in the most distinct terms to the proposition that the action of the Senate was absolutely unsound and improper.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: In what way?

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: I will read it to my right hon. friend again. He said on the 12th day of June by his vote in this House—

Mr. PUGSLEY: There was no vote.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: There was no vote?

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: No.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: That is a new constitutional doctrine. I had understood that members of this House who sit silent and assent to the passing of a motion unanimously are as much committed to it as if they had voted for it; and I had also understood that they had, in effect and in every substantial way, voted for it. That has been my understanding up to the present moment of enlightenment by hon. gentlemen opposite. The right hon. gentleman by his vote said that:

> Appointments to the Senate have no necessary or appropriate relation to the date of the election of members to serve in the House of Commons.

He said that:

> The said amendment is inappropriate and incongruous.

[Sir Wilfrid Laurier.]

He said that:

> No sufficient reason can be adduced for the delay effected by the said amendment.

That was on the 12th day of June. A few days afterwards on the 19th day of June, my right hon. friend said, in a published statement which I presume emanated from him:

> The law makes it compulsory to have redistribution after every census but it does not say it should go into effect at once. In 1892 a Redistribution Bill was passed but the increase did not go into effect until the general election of 1896. It is the same in this case, the increase in the representation of the Commons does not go into effect until the next general election, and the increase in the Senate should not go into effect until then either. "I leave it to any one to say whether my position is a correct one or not," said Sir Wilfrid smiling.

I suppose the smile was induced by the fact that only a week before he had said precisely the opposite to what he said in this interview. So in the circumstances I do not think my right hon friend has yet made it very plain to this House or to the country why it was that he committed himself distinctly to one line of action on the 12th day of June and a week afterwards, on the 19th day of June, stated that the reasons which he had so endorsed by his action in this House were absolutely fallacious and unfounded.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: Do I understand my right hon. friend to mean that, whenever a proposition is mooted in this House, whether in the form of a Bill or otherwise, voting for it implies assent to every line of it?

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: I have always understood that when any hon. gentleman dissented from a motion of this House he either called for a vote or asked that it should be recorded as "carried on division".

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: Yes, and on this very day my right hon. friend has moved a motion in which he himself does not believe.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: I beg the right hon. gentleman's pardon, I have done nothing of the kind. I said that owing to the tyrannical and unjust action of the Senate it was necessary for us to adopt this course. And I would like to say this one thing more: the right hon. gentleman has said that the Senate ought not to degenerate into being a recording clerk of the House of Commons.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: Hear, hear.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: There is just one thing worse than that—to have the Senate degenerate into being a recording clerk of the minority in the House of Commons.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: The Senate did not, because in this matter there is no minority.

Motion agreed to.

SOLDIERS' VOTING BILL.

The House again in committee, Mr. Blain in the Chair, on Bill No. 111, to enable Canadians on active military service during the present war to exercise their electoral franchise.—Hon. C. J. Doherty (Minister of Justice).

On section 1—soldiers entitled to vote:

Mr. DOHERTY: I think that the principal suggestion made looking to the amendment of this section was that we should omit from the requirements of qualification the requirement that the soldier shall be 21 years of age. Quite a number of gentlemen said that this appeared to them to be an unnecessary requirement, and that once a man was of the age where he was competent to take an active part in military operations, more particularly in fighting operations, he might very well be considered to have attained a sufficiently mature age to be allowed to vote. No doubt a very great deal is to be said in support of that view. On the other hand, assuming us to abandon the requirement of a man's being of age, unless it were possible to fix some other specific age, the result might be that very young boys would be qualified to vote. That creates a situation which makes it necessary for us to fix some age limit, and once a limit has to be fixed it seems to us best to adhere to that limit of age which in the view of the law with regard to matters generally, constitutes the age at which one may look for maturity. In consequence, I have reached the conclusion, in which I think my colleagues agree, that the section should in that respect stand as it was originally introduced. There are, however, some verbal modifications that require to be made in order to make the section more clear, and to avoid the use of at least one unnecessary expression. In order to make more clear the description of the period required in order to qualify the soldier to be entitled to vote, I propose to provide that the designation shall be "a period of thirty days anterior to the date of appointment or to enlistment in the forces." I propose to strike out the word "enrolled" in the expression "appointed to or enlisted or enrolled in such forces," and also where it occurs further down in the section. I further propose to modify the wording of the section in view of a consideration that I am not quite sure was pointed out, but which occurred to myself at all events, and that is that under the section as originally introduced, the fact of residence in any electoral district in Canada prior to enlistment being made a qualification might result in a man being qualified to vote who had resided thirty days in Canada twenty years ago. The affidavit which was made part of the section would, however, have corrected the section in so far as the objection I have suggested is concerned, because it required that the person claiming qualification should swear he had resided in Canada for thirty days immediately preceding his enrolment. But when I came to look into that, I found that if the affidavit removed the one objection it might create this situation, which I think one hon. gentleman has already pointed out, namely, the possible existence of the situation where a man who had lived thirty days or more in some particular district might have gone to some other district for the purpose of enlisting and been delayed there for a few days, so that he could not say that he had resided in either the one or the other district for the thirty days immediately preceding. I thefore propose to offer an amendment the effect whereof will be that a man who has resided in any electoral district for a period of thirty days within the six months preceding his enlistment shall be entitled to vote in that electoral district, and, inasmuch as it is possible that a man might reside in two separate electoral districts for a period of thirty days within that six months, that it shall be the electoral district in which he last resided for a period of thirty days. Perhaps the best way of making these amendments, which do not alter the substance but are made only to make the provision more clear, would be to substitute for the clauses introduced the corrected clause, and I therefore beg to move that section 1 of the Bill be struck out and replaced by the following:

1. Every male British subject of twenty-one years of age or upwards serving in the military forces of Canada in the present war (hereinafter called "volunteer"), who, within six months immediately preceding the date when he was appointed to or enlisted in such forces, had been resident in any electoral district in Canada for a period of not less than thirty days, shall be entitled to vote in the electoral district in which he was last so resident in the manner hereinafter set out, notwithstanding his absence from such electoral district or from Canada. - Provided that if any person was, at the time he was so appointed or enlisted, qualified to vote in any other electoral district in Canada he shall vote in such other district only.

That leaves the clause precisely as it was except for the modifications which I have pointed out.

Mr. OLIVER: In regard to the age limit, there is no doubt that theoretically the view taken by the minister and shared in by his colleagues is correct, namely, that under ordinary circumstances it is not advisable to vary from the rule as to the age limit being one qualification. But I submit that we are dealing with an extraordinary situation, and that it is only right that we should consider the difficulties that surround it. If the fact of enlistment is the qualification, then there is no question that every man who has enlisted is a qualified voter and may exercise his right as a voter. But if we have an age limit of 21 years, under the peculiar circumstances under which it is proposed the vote shall be taken, there is room for difficulty, which I do not wish to emphasize or enlarge upon, in establishing the right of any voter to vote if he is about the age of 21 years. The ballots are in the hands of the officer. The officer is in control of the men. He has his political predilections, and possibly is aware of the political predilections of his men, or of some of them. If there is an age limit, there is a question for argument as to whether he is over 21 or under 21, and in an argument between the officer and the man, I need not point out to my hon. friend, who has himself seen service, to my personal knowledge, and with all credit to himself, that the man is not in a position to argue the point with his officer. For that reason I would be favourable to basing absolutely the right to vote on the fact of enlistment or appointment, although I am not in theory favourable to a lowering of the standard. In the peculiar circumstances I would take the liberty of placing that view before the committee.

Mr. DOHERTY: When we come to a subsequent section the hon. gentleman will see that the argument he anticipates is to be settled by the affidavit of the man. The man is to get a ballot when he makes the affidavit, so that he will settle the argument himself.

Mr. OLIVER: So long as it is absolutely settled I am satisfied.

Mr. MARCIL: Is the minister in a position to tell me what is the youngest age at which these volunteers are accepted? Is there an age limit fixed by the department?

Mr. DOHERTY: I cannot say absolutely that there is an age limit fixed by the department, although I think that ordinary soldiers enlisting are accepted at 18 or 19 years of age, but there are buglers, drummers and boys acting in different capacities.

Mr. LEMIEUX: Are there any scouts?

Mr. DOHERTY: There are no boy scouts that I am aware of.

Mr. LEMIEUX: I think there are.

Mr. DOHERTY: There may be; I only say that there are none that I am aware of. But there are quite young boys in the position of doing military service, in regard to whom I think the general consensus of opinion would be that they would hardly be of an age at which they could be expected to exercise a mature judgment. Unless for very strong reasons to the contrary, it seemed to those who were responsible for the introduction of the Bill that we must have some degree of maturity, and although it may perhaps be a little beyond what is absolutely required, we thought it the safer course to adhere to the age fixed in the law generally as being the age limit.

Mr. MARCIL: Eighteen is the age fixed in the Militia Act for enlistment; I am speaking of the volunteer and not of buglers, drummers or boy scouts. In this case you may have a large number who have enlisted, but who, not having taken the oath as to age, would not become voters. An injustice is being done to the boy of 18, 19 or 20 years, who has enlisted, and who undergoes all the hardships and risks of war, if he is cast aside. I think he will feel that injustice very much, because he knows that he can get the Victoria Cross, the highest distinction for valour, no matter what age he is. I am in favour of the principle of giving the soldier a vote if he is a voter. I am also in favour of giving him a vote if he is not a voter, because the service he is rendering to his country entitles him to that consideration, but I am opposed to this Bill, because I do not think it guarantees that the ballot which the soldier casts will be the ballot which we will receive here. A very great injustice is being done to the boys of over 18 years of age by depriving them of their votes. The minister knows the old verse:

> Mais aux âmes bien nées,
> La valeur n'attend pas le nombre des années.

Boys of 18, 19 and 20, who have the spirit to enlist for the defence of their country, ought to be trusted to cast an intelligent vote. Napoleon Bonaparte was a general in chief of the army at 25. A young man of 18 should be given this right.

Mr. DOHERTY: The boy under 21 years who, being a soldier, is not given the right that is given to a soldier who is over 21, suffers exactly the same injustice as the boy in civilian life of 19 or 20 suffers as compared with the man over 21 who may be in precisely similar circumstances of merit or demerit and who has his vote while the boy under the age of 21 has no vote. It is not only in military careers that I think we have had cases of early maturity in civil life, one very prominent case being that of a gentleman who became Prime Minister of Great Britain at the age of 21. If the reason of the hon. member is right as regards military circles it ought to be equally right when applied to civilian circles. If it be a good argument that, because we find exceptional cases of maturity developed beyond what one's years would apparently lead one to look for, we should make a general rule departing from the age of 21 years, it would be as applicable to civil life as to military life. I am sorry to hear the expression used that any injustice is intended because after all from the voting point of view all that is to be said is that the boy of 18 does not gain something as compared with the soldier of 21 which he would not have gained had he not been a soldier as compared with any other man in the ordinary walks of life and 21 years of age. Perhaps we have not given, but we have not taken away.

Mr. MARCIL: My sole reason for saying that we should give these boys the right to vote is because they have enlisted. That is the main reason for the wrong, if wrong there be. I do not see why a boy who is capable of bearing arms and serving his country at the age of 18 or 19 years should be debarred from exercising the franchise. The issues of the election may be more fully comprehended by the young man than the man of maturity. I am sorry that the minister has not extended common justice to those in the ranks above 18 years of age.

Mr. GERMAN: Would the minister state whether or not, in his opinion, this measure would apply to medical doctors who are not serving in the active militia force, but who are in hospitals? I know of two doctors from the town of Welland and one from Niagara Falls who have gone over. One is an active militiaman and he probably will be at the front though serving in a medical capacity. The other two are serving in their medical capacity, but are not, I believe, members of the militia force. Would this Bill, in the minister's opinion, allow these gentlemen to vote?

Mr. DOHERTY: In my judgment the wording is sufficiently broad to cover such persons. This Bill does not deal with the militia at all; it deals with the military force of Canada and gives a vote to everybody who is serving in it without distinction as between the classes of service that are being given. I understand the Bill to cover the gentlemen that the hon. gentleman has mentioned.

Mr. PUGSLEY: The Bill as introduced apparently provides that it shall apply to any by-election which may take place after the Act comes into force. Does the minister understand it in that way?

Mr. DOHERTY: As the Bill was introduced there is no restriction, but it will be made clear that the whole Bill is intended to apply only to a general election.

Mr. SINCLAIR: The Bill provides for two classes of voters, the first class being those who have now no vote in Canada but who are enfranchised because they are in the military forces and are twenty-one years of age and British subjects; the second class comprising those who already have votes in some province of Canada. When the soldier is confronted with the affidavit, he is asked to swear that he is qualified, and to my mind that appears to be a legal question which it would be difficult for the soldier to answer. In Nova Scotia, a man cannot vote unless his name is on the list. The lists are made once a year and completed on the 5th of April, so that the list completed the other day will prevail in Nova Scotia in any election which takes place until the 5th of April next year. Therefore, a man might be qualified to vote and still not be on the list. Unless there is a list in the possession of the officer, and the soldier can see if he is on that list, he would not be able to say on oath whether he is qualified or not. I would suggest that instead of the word "qualified" the word "entitled" should be used, as the soldier might be in a better position to say that he was entitled to a vote. The word "qualified" implies a legal question, which the soldier should not be asked to swear to.

Mr. DOHERTY: In the affidavits provided under the Dominion Elections Act, there is a similar requirement, and I think it has been generally understood as calling upon the man to swear merely from the point of view of the fact. It has to be supposed that a man would not swear he is qualified unless he had knowledge which fully justified him in saying he was. If he has any doubt about his qualification in the other respect, he will have a qualification in virtue of the thirty days' residence. The purpose of requiring a distinction in the affidavit is really as far as possible to secure that men who are qualified in a particular district shall vote there, and to avoid a possible consequence of depleting some one or more electoral districts, and perhaps overloading the electoral districts in which the men have been just before they enlisted. I see no particular objection to substituting the word "entitled," as suggested by my hon. friend, for the word "qualified," but it seems to me it will amount to practically the same thing. A man who swears that he is entitled to something has to determine a question of legal right on his part, just as much as if he has to swear he is qualified. Both expressions are open to the objection that analysing them strictly they imply not only a statement of fact but of judgment by the person making the statement of fact, that that fact, by law, qualifies him or entitles him to a certain thing. I think there is no great risk involved in using in these affidavits with regard to our soldiers the words which are used in other affidavits with regard to people generally. I think experience goes to show that those who are called upon to take oaths of this kind realize that what they are swearing to is as to the existence of a particular fact upon which, as they understand it, their qualification rests.

Mr. OLIVER: While I am quite willing to accept the explanation of the minister with regard to the age limit, I am not willing to accept the reasons he gave. The Minister of Justice has said that because a young man in civilian life is not entitled to a vote until he becomes twenty-one years of age, therefore he should not be entitled to a vote in soldier life until he reaches that age. That is entirely contrary to the spirit on which the Bill is founded, which is, that the young man who is serving his country is entitled to special consideration in regard to the exercise of his franchise. That being so, the young man who by reason of his being of an age sufficient to give the full service to his country that he would if he were twenty-one years or over, is surely entitled to the same advantage of franchise as if he were twenty-one years or older. The civilian qualification is based upon certain well set out conditions, the young civilian on attaining the age of twenty-one being liable to certain legal conditions. There is a change in his status between 20 and 22, which makes the difference between the civilian voter and the civilian non-voter by reason of age; but there is no such difference in status between the boy of eighteen and the young man of twenty-two in regard to his military service. I merely wish to draw attention to this fact; I am not wishing to make legislation for the Government or for the minister; but while I am willing to let the matter go as he has explained it, I do not wish to be understood as agreeing to the reasons he gave.

In regard to the residence qualification, I took exception to this proviso when the Bill came to the House first; and, after all has been said, I still maintain that this proviso is unnecessarily confusing in the proper exercise of the right of the voter. It is quite true that if the voter has a right to vote in a certain district, he can cast his vote in that district; but when you come to make a distinction between the man who has a right to vote in a district and the man who has not a right to vote in a district, you practically give an opportunity of switching ballots, which is something that is not desirable, I am sure, from the point of view of the minister. We must do the best we can under the circumstances we have to meet; and my contention is that we shall have a law that will give to the soldier the right to cast his ballot if we strike out this proviso, and by striking it out we shall be much more certain that the ballot will be cast in one case as it is in the other; that is, that there will be a similarity of treatment and action of the soldiers in the direction of where their ballots will go. I do not wish to introduce personal matters into this discussion, but let me do it merely in order to illustrate my point. There are in training now in Edmonton and its immediate vicinity two regiments of infantry and a squadron of cavalry, the men having been recruited from the country surrounding Edmonton. Owing to the delay in enlistments for the second and third contingents many of these men were residents of either East Edmonton or West Edmonton for thirty days before they enlisted.

I am speaking now of the constituency of West Edmonton, for which I have received the Liberal nomination. The soldiers may have had the right to vote in other districts, or they may not have had that right; but when their votes come to be cast, there is a very great possibility in one constituency of the votes being massed to be cast in that constituency, and in the other constituency of the votes being distributed over the localities from which the men came. This is not a sound principle; it is neither necessary nor right. As I have said, I do not wish to make this matter personal; but the candidate nominated by the Conservative party in the constituency of West Edmonton is the senior colonel of the two regiments to which I have referred, so that the matter is entirely under his control. I do not wish to make any suggestion against this gentleman, that he is likely to take particular advantage of his situation but I am saying that that is the situation, and not only do I think I am doing what is right when I bring the concrete facts before the House, but I think the minister will be wise to consider the situation in the light of the facts I have stated to him. The political conditions in this Bill go pretty close home to the city of Edmonton, and that is why I am venturing to take up the time of the House and the minister in discussing this Bill.

4 p.m.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I am not sure whether I have understood the hon. member sufficiently clearly to reply to him, but I do not see how the ambiguity arises that he fears. A man on the list who has a right to vote in any constituency has no option thereafter. He is bound to exercise that right.

Mr. MARCIL: There are no lists in Alberta.

Mr. MEIGHEN: There are no lists now. Lists, of course, are to be made up. Do I understand the hon. gentleman's remarks to apply to certain districts in which there is the right to swear in on election day?

Mr. OLIVER: In those provinces where there are no standard lists, there is no way of checking beforehand the status of the voter; it is all a matter of enumeration immediately before the election, and therefore there is not the same possibility of verifying any condition in regard to any voter, on the part of himself or on the part of any one else, that there is in other parts of the country. Apart from that, the condition is the same in all parts of the country.

Mr. MEIGHEN: If I understand the hon. gentleman aright, he says that the right in Alberta and Saskatchewan of a man to swear in if his name is absent from the list, taken in conjunction with this Bill, leaves that voter, if he is a volunteer, in a position practically to elect where his vote shall go.

Mr. OLIVER: Yes.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The minister is more able to deal with such details than I am; but it appears that in so far as this Bill may not provide certainty it is incidental to the system of list-making in Alberta and Saskatchewan.

What I arose chiefly to do was to put before the committee my own view as to the question raised by the hon. member for Bonaventure (Mr. Marcil) and repeated by the hon. member for Edmonton (Mr. Oliver), as to the extension of the franchise to all soldiers although they may not have reached their majority. I take the view that the Bill in that respect is right. I do not look on the extension of the franchise to the soldiers as in any way a quid pro quo, as in any way a benignant action on the part of the state to him in virtue of his soldiership. It appears to me that in regard to the British franchise the law presumes, that if the individual man has a real patriotic interest in his country's affairs, and secondly, if he is competent to express that interest, that man is entitled to vote. We take certain precautions to ascertain whether he lives up to these two requirements—whether he has a real patriotic interest in his country's affairs and whether he is competent to express that interest. We say that he must be a resident, that he must live so long in a certain locality. If he is a rolling stone, we cannot presume that he has that fixed and determined interest that he otherwise will have. On the other hand, in order to ascertain whether he is competent to express his vote or not, we fix the age of twenty-one as the age of maturity at which he arrives at competency. Then we say that a judge by virtue of the restraints of his office is incompetent to express his interest. Then we come here and make an extension of the franchise in one respect; that is, we do not insist upon the condition of fixed residence. To that extent and no more, there is in this Bill an extension of the franchise.

Why do we make that extension? Have we a right to presume that real interest in the affairs of this country which ordinarily is considered proved by fixity of residence? I think we have. The very fact of his enlistment, even though being a British subject he comes from the United States, and has not fulfilled the requirement of three months' residence in the locality or a year's residence in the province, gives us the right to presume that he has a patriotic interest in the affairs of Canada. Consequently, we do away with the old requirement.

But the hon. member for Bonaventure says we ought to do more; that we ought to presume that he is competent to express his interest even though under age because he has enlisted.

Mr. MARCIL: Provided he is at least 18 years of age.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Provided he is 18. I do not see that the fact that he enlists should in any way convince Parliament that he has reached a higher degree of mental maturity than other men. His enlistment undoubtedly is an expression of a loyal interest in the affairs of the country, but it is an expression of loyal interest only; it is not proof that he has a greater mental development than his fellows. I think the right hon. leader of the Opposition is wrong when he says that we should bann this measure because it extends the franchise. It extends the franchise only in a direction where we have a right to presume the requirement fulfilled which otherwise we demand of the voter, namely, an interest in his country's affairs. I think the hon. member for Bonaventure is wrong when he complains not that we are extending the franchise, but that we are not extending it far enough, because the direction in which he wishes it extended is a direction as to which no presumption by virtue of enlistment arises at all.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: Never since 1897 have we undertaken to define the franchise. That has been left entirely to the provinces, and in view of the fact that you are extending the franchise to those who go to fight, you are not in a position to answer the contention of the hon. member for Bonaventure. The Government are determined that they will not alter the qualification of voters with respect to age. But what I rose particularly to deal with is a statement which I have just heard on the the part of my hon. friend, namely, that lists will be made. This is the first intimation we have received that lists are to be made in connection with the voting of the soldiers.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I did not say that; I do not know what sentence my hon. friend refers to.

Mr. MARCIL: I had said that there were no lists in Alberta.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: I understood that the hon. gentleman said that lists are to be made.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Lists must be made in Alberta and Saskatchewan under the present Act.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: There are no lists in Alberta and Saskatchewan.

Mr. MEIGHEN: But they are made by enumerators prior to the election.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: Exactly. If no lists are to be sent to the front, matters will be further complicated, and that is why I want to inquire as to whether or not lists are to be made. If the lists made in Alberta and Saskatchewan are not to be sent to the front, how will the soldier be able to establish that he is qualified to vote? This only goes to show how many difficulties there are in this proposed legislation. Parliament has decided in favour of the Bill; therefore I shall not press any objection as to the principle of it; but my hon. friend the Minister of Justice has invited suggestions, and I may tell him that I am prepared to offer an amendment. The great objection to this Bill is that it puts aside altogether the safeguards which we have considered to be necessary in connection with elections in this country. If we have an election—and the hon. Minister of Public Works this morning, during the course of his speech, gave us due warning that we are going to have an election—every vote that is cast in Canada will be surrounded with all the safeguards that it is possible to provide. Yesterday I was struck with the speech of the hon. member for Calgary (Mr. R. B. Bennett), who told us that notwithstanding all the precautions with which the law has endeavoured to surround the sacred rights of the franchise, fraud after fraud has been committed. At election time, party spirit runs very high. I stated the other day—and I do not believe that any hon. gentleman will question my statement—that during the course of an election offences are committed against the law, actuated by party spirit, which would not be committed by a man in connection with his private affairs. Am I wrong in this? Is any one prepared to say that I am not right? It is the experience of every man in this committee that during elections the law has been violated by most respectable citizens, who did for their party what they would not have done for themselves. It is said by hon. gentlemen opposite that the men who go to the front and who are ready to shed their blood for their country will not do anything wrong in this respect. I have the greatest possible confidence in the men who have gone to the front; but, after all, they are but flesh and blood, and are subject to the same temptations to which other men are subjected. Every day, in the prayer which is said in this House, we say, "Lead us not into temptation;" yet it is proposed to put temptation in the way of these men, and to trust that everything will be done correctly. I ask fairly and with all sincerity, is that business? Is that proper legislation? Should not at least more precautions be taken in order to ensure that this method of voting shall be carried out with some degree of honesty and faithfulness? I have a good many friends at the front; hon. gentlemen opposite also have many friends at the front. I have great confidence in them, but I am not prepared to say that there shall not be some delinquency; I have yet to learn of any human activity in connection with which, at some time or upon some occasion, there has not been delinquency. All I ask is that more precautions be provided in connection with this proposed legislation. If it is not possible to take some of the precautions adopted in connection with elections at home, give us some precautions which will ensure that the franchise shall be exercised with the same degree of fidelity and faithfulness as we expect it to be exercised in connection with the voting in this country. As the Bill is now drafted my hon. friend cannot tell me who will be the officers who will take the oath and do the recording.

Mr. DOHERTY: I concede that under the Bill as drafted I could not tell that. I have made more precise the disposition to deal with that.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: Very good; he has made the language more precise. Has the amendment been printed?

Mr. DOHERTY: No, it has not been possible to have the amendment printed.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: My hon. friend has probably made an amendment to his draft to say that either the colonel, or the major, or the captain, or the lieutenant is to take the vote. But whoever takes the votes takes them without any check upon him. Would my hon. friend the Minister of Justice think of having the votes which are going to be recorded in Canada by the returning officers cast without any check upon the returning officers, without administering any oath to them and without having any scrutineers over them, with no protection to assure that the vote of the electors would be properly recorded? He would not think of doing so. If it were attempted every one would say it was an outrage. No Government has ever done it. Now, the limit of my hon. friend's amendment to the present draft is that he will delegate somebody in the army to take the vote. Since the vote has to be taken as a vote for the Government or for the Opposition, a disposition which I do not like but to which we have to submit, will my hon. friend agree to a commission of two, appointed by the Government to represent both the Government and the Opposition, to go to the front and take the vote? Then these commissioners will check one another and will ensure that the vote is honestly taken. That is not an extraordinary precaution. The vote in Canada we can deal with later; we are most concerned with the vote to be taken in Europe, because there are more of our soldiers there. I suggest to my hon. friend that he would singularly improve this Bill if he were to provide that the vote shall be taken by two commissioners appointed under it to represent both the Government and the Opposition, and to ensure, after all, some degree of absolute faithfulness in the discharge of these duties.

Mr. DOHERTY: Before I answer the suggestion I would like to say one word with reference to some observations of the hon. member for Edmonton (Mr. Oliver). I do not propose to repeat anything I have said with regard to the age qualification But the hon. gentleman expressed what I might call his apprehension that in the particular case in which he is especially interested the colonel might be an undesirable element, from his point of view, if he had any control of these votes. The proposal I intend to make with regard to the method of the ballot reaching the soldiers and the vote being taken would pass quite by the colonel, leave him quite on the outside, so that in that especial respect my hon. friend has nothing to fear. What we propose to suggest is to utilize the machinery whereby these men are paid and have these ballots given to them through the paymasters. The paymasters are not combatant officers. I have ascertained from the Paymaster General here that there exists a system by which these ballots could pass to the paymaster in England, and from there the assistant paymasters and the regimental paymasters would bring them to each smaller unit, that is the squadron or the company or the battery. They bring the men their money, and surely they could bring the ballots to them. These ballots would in that way reach the officers commanding the companies or squadrons or batteries, according to the nature of the force. With regard to the suggestion the right hon. gentleman has made, of course I would not do otherwise than consider any suggestion the right hon. gentleman would make. The first objection to the suggestion that occurs to me at the moment is that I doubt its practicability. We have to remember that we have to reach a large number of men, 30,000 or 40,000 or 50,000, scattered over a considerable territory; and for any two men to gather all the votes of these men, I am afraid would take a very long period of time, longer I may say than the interval that would elapse—

Mr. MARCIL: Ordinarily there is 30 days between the issue of the writ and the voting.

Mr. DOHERTY: Let us take 30 days. We have to bear in mind that these ballots have to get from London to the men, and that after the vote has been taken they have to get back here to Canada again, and I would be afraid it would not be practicable to have that looked after by two men. If the idea could be put into practice it would be necessary that we should have a number of couples of men who could divide the work between them. That might work out in a more practical way. If they are to go two, whose report is to prevail? Supposing they go two, and as they started out in disagreement I suppose that we have some reason to expect that they would return in disagreement, whose report would be final? I do not know whether it is intended simply that they should bring back the ballots or that they should make a report. I would have great fear that we would not get any agreement between the members of such a commission.

Mr. MACDONALD: What would they differ about?

Mr. DOHERTY: I did not just grasp what it is they are to report.

Mr. PUGSLEY: They would put the certificate on the envelope and send it to the Clerk of the Crown in Chancery.

Mr. DOHERTY: Might I suggest that we should consider this when we come to the section dealing with the method in which the votes are to be taken?

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: Yes. I threw it out in advance so that we might take it up when we reached that section.

Mr. GRAHAM: Reverting to section 1, this is a matter on which each has his own personal view. A good deal of our difficulty would have been obviated as to the qualification, if the Government or the committee had adopted the principle that the going to the front of the soldier should not deprive him of any right which he had before he went. That would leave the qualification the same, and would get rid of a great deal of difference of opinion as to what that qualification ought to be; and it would not open up the question of an enlargement of the franchise. I am strongly of the opinion that 21 is the proper age. I admit that if you change the age to something else, you can keep on changing it by the same argument. I h ve not heard any good reason advanced why we should change from the age limit that we have always had. After mature deliberation it has been decided in this country that a man has not reached the proper years of maturity at which he is able to vote until he is 21. I do not think the fact of his going to the front changes the principle at all, for a man of 21 years of age is the same at the front as he is at home, loyal and brave and patriotic though he may be. I think we should get rid of a lot of the difficulty if we took the ground, which several speakers on the Government side of the House as well as speakers on this side have taken, that the men who have gone to fight for their country should not be deprived of the rights of citizenship which they had before they went.

Mr. DOHERTY: I recognize that there is force in that. But this consideration was impressed upon the minds of the committee: that a large number of men who, when they left home, were not qualified voters would, if they had stayed at home, have been in a position to complete what was required to enable them to get a vote. For instance, I understand that in the large cities of Ontario at all events, there is, after the election has been called, a registration which brings in a large number of people, and they get their votes. Now every soldier who would have been in a position to avail himself of that opportunity is deprived of it because he is away; and this applies not only to Ontario, but to the western provinces, where enumerators are appointed to make out lists after an election has been called. Now there will be many soldiers who if they had stayed at home would have been enumerated and got their votes—that is those who had the proper qualifications—and even if they were not enumerated they could get their votes simply by walking in to the poll and swearing to their qualifications. I think it is generally recognized as being true that we have a large proportion of recruits from those western provinces, and that the cities in the East have contributed at all events a highly creditable proportion; and if we are correct in our assumption that many of these would have got their votes but for their absence on military affairs, we reduce to a comparatively small number those who would not have got the vote if they had been at home, and are now getting it because of being soldiers. For myself, I am glad to see them get votes, but if there be objection with regard to that, there is this to be said in support of it. The hon. gentleman says that it would simplify things to let only those vote who were qualified to vote; but it seems to me that if you are willing to take in the man whose absence of qualifications results solely from his absence from the country, it is not worth while, in view of the presumably small number left, to create the necessity of distinguishing betweeen your soldiers. In this Bill we get a distinction as between those who are over and those who are under 21, but we are adhering to the view that a man is a man when he is 21. We certainly should not be able to find out who were the men who, not having qualified at the time they enlisted, could have got themselves registered if they had been at home; and if we said that only those should vote who are now qualified we should be excluding not only those who if they had been at home would not have got a vote, but also a large number of those who if they had been at home could have got a vote. The simplification of the thing was one consideration that weighed with us, and we came to the conclusion that not only the proper way but the simplest way was to give every soldier a vote.

Mr. GRAHAM: I do not wish to prolong the discussion, but I wish to make clear that I am in favour of giving every man a vote who would have had the right to a vote had he remained at home. I meant to cover that class of men.

Mr. DOHERTY: We could not ascertain that.

Mr. HUGH CLARK: This Bill is to give soldiers who are away from home an opportunity to vote if an election takes place during the war. That election may or may not take place during the war, and I should like to ask the minister whether he has ever considered the advisability of looking after the suffrage of the soldier after he returns from the war. A great many of these soldiers will not be on the voters' lists when they return. They will not be entitled to vote as soldiers, and I think a great many of them will be disfranchised. I think that we should be just as solicitous in looking after the suffrage of the soldier after he returns from the war as when he is at the war.

Mr. DOHERTY: I may say that the question that was referred to the committee was: What could we do in the way of giving votes to soldiers who were out of the country or away from home? and I have to admit that we did not get beyond the question that was referred to us; and perhaps some things that have been seen and heard would indicate that we did not need to look for further difficulties, but that quite a few presented themselves within the bounds of the question referred to us. I quite recognize that the situation that my hon. friend has spoken of is one that will call for action, if that is possible, before we are confronted with it, but I am afraid I can hardly undertake to deal with it just now.

Mr. GRAHAM: I think that there need be no apprehension so far as Ontario is concerned. Looking over the statutes I find that I was wrong. The statute has been amended since my time, so that those absent on militia service can be retained on the list. If I could show that my son or brother was absent on militia service, his name would be retained on the list.

Mr. COCKSHUTT: What if he was not on the list?

Mr. GRAHAM: That would not make any difference; he could be put on the list.

Mr. COCKSHUTT: He has to appear in court and prove that he is 21 years of age and a British subject.

Mr. GRAHAM: Not under the law of Ontario. If he is absent on militia duty, or through his duties as a fisherman or lumberman, his father can put him on the list. That covers the unmarried man. As to the married man, his residence does not change so long as his family continues to live at the same place; so he would be kept on the list, or if he was not on the list he could be put on. I think the point raised by the hon. member for North Bruce (Mr. Hugh Clark) is covered by the Ontario statutes at the present time. I did not think that was the case the other night when I spoke.

Mr. NESBITT: I understand there have been some amendments to clause 1. Will you, Mr. Chairman, please read them?

Mr. DOHERTY: It is proposed to substitute a redraft for section 1. We strike out the words "or enrolled" in fixing the period of time for residence anterior to date of enlistment or enrolment. It was pointed out that the word "enrolled" added nothing to the word "enlisted." The second change is intended to make clear that the thirty days' residence in a place required to give qualification under this section must be within the last six months preceding the enlistment. In view of the possibility that a man might have resided in more than one place for a period of thirty days within the last six months preceding his enlistment, it is provided that the place in which he shall be qualified shall be the place at which he last resided for thirty days during that last day six months.

Mr. NESBITT: Suppose he only resided two or three days where he was enlisted?

Mr. DOHERTY: If he only resided two or three days where he was enlisted he will not get a vote from there but, if there is any other place within an electoral district in Canada in which he has, within six months previous to his enlistment, had a residence for thirty days, he can qualifiy in that electoral district. Some one pointed out the other day that it might happen that a man, having lived thirty days, or perhaps a year, in a particular constituency, might, for the purpose of enlistment, go down to some other place and be there three or four days before enlisting. He could not say that for thirty days immediately preceding his enlistment he had been in the original place and as he had not been thirty days in the place where he was enlisted he could not qualify there.

Mr. CARVELL: We are not talking about residence; we are talking about a legal term. There has been many a case threshed out in the courts of Canada as to what constitutes residence. The condition in my own province is very much the same as it is in the province of Quebec. We have a list prepared once a year and when that list is closed there is no possibility of getting another name added to it. Any man who has resided in the province of New Brunswick for six months prior to the 24th day of August is entitled to have his name placed on the list in the district in which he then resides. Take a young man who has no home or take, for instance, an immigrant. He has lived, we will say, in the county of Carleton for a few weeks or months—no home, no wife, no friends; he has worked somewhere for a few weeks; he has moved from there to the county of York; perhaps he has worked in the shanty for a few weeks; he has moved from there to St. John; he has happened to be there for five weeks and he has enlisted at St. John—as I understand this provision, it would give him the right to elect that St. John would be his residence.

Mr. DOHERTY: Yes.

Mr. CARVELL: The difficulty is that that man, under the law of New Brunswick, would not have a right at all to be on the voters' list on the score of residence, not having had a fixed residence for six months prior to the 24th of August.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Although he would not otherwise have the right, the very fact of his enlistment would justify us in giving him that right, would it not?

Mr . CARVELL: That is the whole question that we have been discussing here. I am now discussing this first clause, and I am pointing out the difficulty of knowing where this man's vote would be cast. In my opinion this only makes it easier to have these votes distributed where they are most needed.

Mr. DOHERTY: It is quite true that we are giving the vote to a man for a thirty days' residence. We have never pretended to give the vote only to a man who would be qualified under the provincial franchise. What we have endeavoured to do is prevent him from making a choice of the place he shall give as the place of his thirty days' residence. We get at the proof of the thirty days' qualification in the same way as it would be got at under the provincial franchise, and if a man is truthful in his affidavit, we tie him down to the last place in which he has resided for thirty days.

Mr. PUGSLEY: This Government ought to do one thing or the other. They should either simply give the right to soldiers to vote at the election provided they would have the right to vote if they had been at home. That would be in accordance with the argument which has been made by gentlemen who support the Bill and who say that it would be a great hardship to deprive a man of his right to vote simply because he happens to be abroad in the service of his country. But you confer the right to vote upon soldiers who, if at home, could not have a vote and you are including a class of people to whom you give a greater right than would have been given to them if they had remained at home. I think you should either limit this right to those who, if at home, would have the right to vote or extend it to all soldiers who are engaged in the Canadian forces, no matter whether they are under 21 years or not. That is the logical position to take. The Minister of Justice admits that he is giving a new franchise to the soldiers. He is giving those the right to vote who, under the present electoral law, would not have the right to vote in many cases if they were at home. He is allowing soldiers who have not been residents of Canada at all, who may simply be temporarily in the country, who may have come from the West Indies, or the United States, or other countries, to serve under the British flag and who have found it convenient to enlist in the Canadian army, the right to vote simply on the ground that they have been in Canada for a period of thirty days. He justifies that on the ground that men who are willing to go to the front and risk their lives in defence of the country should be recognized by giving them right of citizenship. After all, the privilege of casting the ballot is the highest expression in the law of the right of citizenship. This Bill proposes to give the right of citizenship to many soldiers because they have gone to the front and risked their lives for the defence of the country. If that is the principle upon which the minister is proceeding, why not give that same right of citizenship to all who are deemed by the Government to be capable of bearing arms, worthy to be sent to the front and worthy to take their share in the defence of the Empire? The Solicitor General says that the age of 21 is looked upon as the age of maturity. How absurd it is to say that it shall be deemed the age of maturity as to the casting of a ballot, and that it shall not be deemed the age of maturity in respect to the soldier who goes into training, goes to the front and is thought to have sufficient judgment to make a good soldier. It requires good mentality for a man to become a good soldier, and the law deems a man over 18 years of age fit to be a good soldier and to fight for his country. Why not give to the young man who has lived all his life in Canada this highest right of citizenship, if you are going to give it to a soldier who has been only within our gates for a few days, and who may know nothing about the issues which divide the people, and to whom in many cases it would be a matter of supreme indifference whether he cast his vote for the Government or for the Opposition.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The hon. gentleman characterized my statement as absurd when I said that the age of maturity for the purposes of exercising all the functions of citizenship might well remain at twenty-one years, and that that was not inconsistent with permitting a citizen at eighteen years of age to enlist to take his part in the war. In thus disagreeing with me, I do not think that the hon. gentleman meets with concurrence on the part of his own associates.

Mr. PUGSLEY: I deny that in considering this Bill I have any associates except all the members of this House. I understand that this Bill is not introduced as a party measure, and I am expressing my own views irrespective of what others may think.

Mr. MEIGHEN: That is exactly what I am pointing out, namely, that it was the hon. gentleman's own view to disagree with me, and that in it he is not supported by those usually associated with him. I have often thought it strange that the hon. member for St. John cannot disagree with anything without denouncing it as absurd.

Mr. PUGSLEY: I do not think I used the word "absurd."

Mr. MEIGHEN: A reference to Hansard will be a wonderful revelation to my hon. friend.

Mr. PUGSLEY: I do not think I used the word.

Mr. MEIGHEN: If it is absurd to say that twenty-one years is a proper age for exercising the function of citizenship, and at the same time that eighteen is a proper age to enable a man to enlist as a soldier, then this absurdity has stood on the statute books of Canada all the time my hon. friend was minister, and all the time that his Government was in power. The Militia Act is there to say that a man may enlist at the age of eighteen.

Mr. PUGSLEY: A measure like this was never proposed before.

Mr. MEIGHEN: What has that to do with what I am discussing?

Mr. PUGSLEY: It has a great deal.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The hon. gentleman said it was absurd to recognize twenty-one years as the age of full citizenship and eighteen years as the age of a soldier, and I say that principle had been recognized, and properly recognized, by his Government for fifteen years, and further, that it has been recognized by every Government in the civilized world.

Mr. CARVELL: During these fifteen years, has the Solicitor General ever known that membership in the Canadian militia was considered sufficient to give a man the right to vote?

Mr. MEIGHEN: What has that to do with what I am discussing?

Mr. CARVELL: I would like to have an answer to my question.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Because the question never arose in these fifteen years; but can you describe as absurd the law of the United States, or the law of Great Britain, or the law of every civilized country, because it determines that a man may be a soldier at eighteen years but may not reach the full maturity of citizenship until he is twenty-one years? What I argue is that the fact of a man's enlistment does not raise any presumption that he is any more in a fit position to express more intelligently his views on public questions, at the age of eighteen, than is his cousin of the same age at home. It is true that at the age of eighteen there are many soldiers as there are many civilians much more fit than those who have reached the age of forty to be entrusted with the franchise. But, you cannot base on the mere fact of his enlistment the presumption that he is fit to exercise the franchise at the age of eighteen. That is all I argued, and it does seem to me sound sense. At all events, that argument had the support of the hon. member for Renfrew (Mr. Graham) in very explicit language. I do not find any fault if one disagrees with me, but I do not think that the enunciation of so moderate a theory can be characterized as absurd. If a man enlists at the age of eighteen, the presumption is that he takes a more vital and patriotic interest in his country's affairs than if he had stayed at home, but the presumption does not arise that he is more developed mentally and thus more fitted to exercise the franchise than a person who has attained the age of twenty-one years. It does not seem fitting that the view which I have taken, and which is expressed in the legislation of many countries, should be lightly characterized as absurd.

Mr. PUGSLEY: I regret if I used the word "absurd," and if so I apologize. What I pointed out was that it was inconsistent for the Government to say that in respect to the votes of the soldiers, they will ignore all existing law, simply because the man is a soldier, except the law as to the age limit, and, when it comes to the age limit, that they will adhere rigidly to the existing law. The Solicitor General says that after all the question of importance is as to whether a man has arrived at the age when he may be reasonably expected to take an interest in his country's affairs, and what I argued was that a man of eighteen, who was patriotic enough and intelligent enough to volunteer for overseas service, having lived in Canada from the day of his birth may reasonably be presumed to have a better knowledge of the best interests of this country, and to be better able intelligently to cast his ballot, than the man who has had no home in Canada, who has not spent any part of his life in Canada, who may have come from any part of the world, and who, being a British subject, although an entire stranger to Canada, is given a vote simply because he has resided somewhere in Canada for the short period of thirty days before he enlisted. That is my argument, and it seems to me it is impossible for any satisfactory answer to be given to it. If the Government insists upon conferring a new citizenship upon a great many men who are soldiers, they should extend it further, and they could, with the utmost safety, extend it to all those who do go to the front, whether they happen to be twenty-one or eighteen years of age.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Would my hon. friend extend the franchise to the bugler of fourteen?

Mr. PUGSLEY: Buglers do not bear arms.

Mr. MEIGHEN: They are at the front.

Mr. MARCIL: I brought up the question; and, so far as I am concerned, the Solicitor General will understand that I want the vote given to all soldiers. If I have urged that the boy of eighteen should be given the right to vote, it is because he is just as well qualified as the boy of nineteen or twenty or twenty-one. Before the boy of eighteen can enlist, he is thoroughly inspected, mentally and physically; he is physically inspected from the top of his head to the bottom of his feet, and he must be found in every respect a fit subject for bearing arms and intelligent enough to comprehend and understand military movements of all kinds. If he is found physically or mentally unfit, he must stand aside, so that the young lad of eighteen who is competent to enlist is in every respect a perfect man who is doing the same duty as the man who accidentally happens to be a few months older than he is, and yet you are depriving him of the franchise simply because of an accident of birth.

Mr. MEIGHEN: It is recognized that the volunteer is so inspected and that he is passed on as physically within the requirements of the law and as mentally sound; but similarly a lad of five is just as mentally sound as a lad of eighteen, and in so far as military requirements are concerned, would on that score pass the examination just as well as would the lad of eighteen. Therefore there would be just as much reason for admitting the youth of five to the franchise, provided there was some capacity in which he could serve at the front, as there would be for admitting the youth of eighteen. I do not like to be arguing against the extension of the franchise to any man who volunteers for such a great war as the one in which we are now engaged; but I do not see any reason for presuming that because a man goes to the front, he is necessarily further advanced mentally and that he has a more thorough knowledge and a more competent power of expressing his interest in his country's affairs than the man who stays at home. The hon. member for St. John (Mr. Pugsley) says: What right have we to presume that because some one comes from the United States and lives in some part of Canada for thirty days, he has any interest in the affairs of Canada and should be given a vote? We have a right to presume it because he has come here to fight the battle of Canada.

Mr. PUGSLEY: The battle of the Empire.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Any Britisher who has sufficient interest in the Empire—and Canada is a part of the Empire—to come here to enlist as a soldier to fight the battle of the Empire in Europe is sufficiently interested in Canada to know how to vote.

Mr. OLIVER: The hon. gentleman does not give him the right to vote unless he is a British subject.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Certainly not. Does the hon. gentleman argue that we should give it to those who are not British subjects?

Mr. OLIVER: The hon. gentleman has argued that himself.

Mr. MEIGHEN: I am not arguing that. Naturally a subject of His Majesty who comes here from the United States or anywhere else who wishes to serve the country to which he belongs and who is willing to expose his life in that service, demonstrates that he has sufficient interest in the affairs of this country to entitle him to vote.

Mr. PUGSLEY: But you will not give the vote to a youth of nineteen who has lived in Canada all his life?

Mr. MEIGHEN: Not because he has not sufficient interest—I made that very clear when I spoke first; he has sufficient interest and he has demonstrated that in the most convincing way that any man could demonstrate it—but because he has not reached the age when by the laws of our country he is competent to express that interest. If we could presume that merely because he enlisted he was further advanced than he would otherwise be in his mental competence, then we would give him the right to vote.

Mr. PUGSLEY: In the case of a civilian, the law requires a residence, we shall say, of a year. Do you not presume that a man, because he goes to the front, has a more active and deeper interest in the welfare of his country than the civilian has? You allow him to vote simply on a short term residence of thirty days.

5 p.m.

Mr. MEIGHEN: That man by going to the front demonstrates that he has that interest which is at the bottom of our franchise.

Mr. GERMAN: What more interest has he in the welfare of Canada than the man who stays at home and does his duty at home by the soldiers at the front?

Mr. MEIGHEN: Now we are on another point. There may be many at home who are not doing their duty at all; but if we extended the franchise and made it universal applicable to wanderers with no local habitation, they all would also have the right to vote. We have no right to presume that merely because a man stays in Canada he has that interest in his country's affairs which is at the bottom of the franchise; but we have a right to presume that because a man goes to the war, he has that interest. I do not think I could express my own mind better if I spoke longer.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: Hear, hear.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Nor what is in the mind of the right hon. leader of the Opposition.

Mr. OLIVER: If a citizen of the United States of America comes across the boundary line and enlists in the army of the Empire through Canada and takes the risks of war, inasmuch as he has rendered all the service to this country that he can render; that he is making the supreme sacrifice that any man can make, and that he is making it for Canada and for the Empire, why should that man not be recognized as having a reasonable and sufficient interest in Canada to allow him to vote? If any man is to be recognized as having done any special service to the country entitling him to special recognition because of his enlistment, I say: Why is not every man entitled to that same recognition?

Mr. MEIGHEN: I will answer my hon. friend in this way. The fact that an American citizen comes to Canada and enlists for the war goes to show that he has some interest in Canada and the Empire. The question is: does it go far enough? The hon. member for Edmonton will agree with me that a British subject should have higher rights to citizenship in Canada than an alien, and that the fact that a man is an alien creates the presumption against him and makes the usual adverse presumption founded on non-residence here much more difficult to be overcome. The fact that a British subject resides in the United States raises the presumption against him that he has not an interest in Canada's affairs unless he overcomes that presumption by some act. If he comes here and volunteers for the front, then we say it is overcome; but if he is an alien, if he is not only a resident of the United States, but a citizen of that country, then the fact that he volunteers is not to my mind sufficient to overcome the presumption.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Take a Sikh from India or the other immigrants from India who have been coming into British Columbia. My hon. friend would propose to give them the right to cast their ballot simply because they happened to arrive thirty days before enlisting, although the young man of eighteen or nineteen or twenty, who as I said has lived all his life in Canada, knows a thousand times more about the real interests of Canada and the issues dividing the parties than a stranger could possibly know, be cause no man coming into this country and residing simply for thirty days can become seized of the issues which affect the two parties unless he has an intellect far and away beyond that of the ordinary citizen. Surely my hon. friend must see that, either we ought not to extend the franchise at all, or if we recognize that the fact that a soldier goes to the war is a reason for extending his right of citizenship, we ought to give the same right to the young man between eighteen and twenty-one who goes to the front and risks his life just the same as any other soldier does.

If we extend the franchise to those who enlist for service abroad, we should also extend it to the young men of Canada who have lived in this country all their lives, whose hearts are with Canada and who are in a position to vote more intelligently than strangers who have been in this country only for a short period of thirty days.

Mr. OLIVER: I have repeatedly given the reasons why I object to this provision, and I desire now to move to strike out the proviso of section 1.

Mr. MARCIL: Aside from the Niobe, the Rainbow and the submarines, there are other steamers and vessels belonging to the Government upon which are serving a large number of persons who are qualified to vote in the maritime constituencies of Canada. They have always found it difficult to register their votes at the time of a general election. I do not see why it should not be possible for these boats to be in the harbour of Esquimalt, Vancouver, or some other port, so that the men serving on them would not be completely debarred from casting their votes. There must be 50 boats in the naval service, the crews of which lose their votes at every election. Is no provision being made for them?

Mr. DOHERTY: The provision which the hon. member desires is not peculiar to the present situation. No doubt we may sometime devise provisions whereby absentees may vote; the experience of other countries which have adopted such legislation indicates that it is not an impossibility. So far as the naval force is concerned, the number of men serving on the different vessels who would otherwise be voters is not very large, while the soldiers are people who would have been entitled to vote if they had been at home.

Mr. McKENZIE: It is provided here that when a soldier comes to register his vote, the official who receives it must decide whether the soldier has a right to vote anywhere else. I cannot see that any machinery is provided by which that difficulty is to be settled.

Mr. DOHERTY: Precisely the machinery that is provided when that situation arises before a deputy returning officer and where the man is sworn.

Mr. OLIVER: There is this difference: when the voter comes before the deputy returning officer and is sworn, witnesses and other persons are present, the act is a public act which renders the man liable within the knowledge of those who represent either one candidate or the other. There is a restriction there, in the public interest; under this legislation there is no such restriction, and there is no possibility of there being any. My hon. friend may say: you are unjustly imputing impropriety of some kind. I say we are not imputing any more impropriety than we are when we enforce the provisions of the Elections Act. The vote counts just the same, whether it is cast under the very loose conditions provided by this Bill, or under the conditions provided by the Elections Act. We are dealing with something in which is involved the control of the affairs of Canada, and I think that when the Government comes forward with a measure that undertakes to introduce an entirely new principle and an entirely new method of procedure, we are entitled to say that we require adequate safeguards, of the same purport and effect as those cast around similar proceedings under the Elections Act. This proposed legislation absolutely fails in that regard, and in order to relieve the situation as much as possible, I want to reduce the possibility of varying the conditions unfairly or unjustly. That is why I move that this proviso be struck out. The amendment which the hon. minister has made with regard to the qualification of thirty days' residence provides that every man who is entitled to vote shall vote; it gives him the right to express his view. When you have done that, you have done what you can for the soldiers; now I ask you to do what you can for the body politic by ensuring that there shall not be any switching of ballots. This is an unpleasant subject to deal with, and I do not intend to go into the details. I have already pointed out to the hon. minister the conditions which prevail at Edmonton, Calgary and many other places, and if this provision remains in the Bill, there is an opportunity to switch the ballots where they will do the most good. My hon. friend knows that that is not desirable and proper; I assume that it is not his intention that it shall happen, but the provisions of the Bill make it entirely possible.

Mr. DOHERTY: The remedy the hon. gentleman offers seems to me to be intended to prevent the possibility of switching any ballots by providing by law to switch all the ballots. I think, looking at it from the standpoint of the interest of the body politic, that interest is that we should do everything we can do to keep these votes in the district to which they would naturally belong. The remedy the hon. gentleman suggests is to take them all, holus bolus, out of that district.

Mr. OLIVER: No.

Mr. DOHERTY: I cannot agree with him that that would be the best way to remedy the difficulty. As to the discussion about precautions, we can best deal with that when we come to the section which deals with the method of voting.

Mr. OLIVER: I wish to take exception to the comparison made by the minister that instead of part of the ballots being switched all should be switched. There is no such proposal as to switch all the ballots by striking out this proviso. A large proportion of voters were resident in the districts in which they were entitled to vote for 30 days before their enlistment. While, theoretically or on the face of it, the hon. minister might be warranted in using the expression he did, as a matter of actual practice there is no sufficient warrant for his sweeping statement. I maintain that while there might be some restriction of the right of the voter to vote in the district in which he was entitled to vote originally, that would be very limited under the very desirable provision that he has made in regard to 30 days' residence. I think that the amendment which he proposes has relieved the situation so that this proviso, even from his own point of view, is not really necessary or advantageous.

Mr. McKENZIE: The minister states that the difficulty I pointed out as arising from that proviso is met easily and effectively by some affidavit that can be prepared of the voter. I can find only one affidavit here dealing with that. With regard to putting safeguards around the vote, we might as well try to put safeguards around the rays of the moon and keep it from shining on the earth as to put safeguards around this poll. We have to be very careful that we do not use any strong language. The word "absurd," for instance, is prohibited and some other adjectives; but I venture to say there are no adjectives known to Worcester, Webster or Walker that would do anything like justice—

Mr. DOHERTY: I suggest that the hon. member try the Century dictionary.

Mr. McKENZIE: There is not much new in Webster, Worcester or Walker, and if it will please my hon. friend I will add the Century to Webster, Worcester and Walker.

Mr. DOHERTY: You ought to try it first.

Mr. McKENZIE: And I may say to my hon. friend and to the hon. member for Calgary who have fathered this thing, that it is a thing of beauty in itself which both of them could fall down and worship without any fear of being guilty of any idolatry, for it is not like anything in the heavens above nor on the earth beneath nor in the waters under the earth. The minister said yesterday that the affidavit was copied. Well, perhaps it was. I believe the minister when he said the Bill was not copied. I can readily understand that, because they certainly could not find anything like this to copy. It is a most serious thing for us to conceive that some 25,000 or 30,000, perhaps 50,000 men, of the most heterogeneous character of people that could be conceived of, and under the most adverse circumstances to obtain order or regularity, shall be let loose on polling day. They will be all scrambling for some position where they can poll their votes. There will be nobody there who will know them, nobody who can keep the slightest check as to who they are. As a rule, in towns and particularly rural districts, the presiding officer at the poll is well known and knows everybody in the district; and the presence of a respectable man sitting at the poll box is to some extent security for those who are interested in the election to see that the right thing is done. But here we are in the forests of northern France or somewhere with these men casting their votes before a stranger who knows nothing about them or where they should vote. One man could come in 30 times and vote if he was bad enough to do so. These men will be no better there than at home, and they would do it at home. The minister knows that there is personation by the hundred thousand in elections. If he does not, I tell him it is done. I tell him it was done in my county a year ago last February by his party, done over and over again; and now we are told upon the faith of the goodness of the people, because they crossed the Atlantic they lose all their sin and iniquities, they are washed away in the Atlantic, and these men are now so pure, honest and good that we offend the minister by suggesting that some safeguard should be thrown around this poll. He tells me there is an affidavit here that will prevent them from representing themselves as voting in one place whereas in truth they belong to another. I cannot find it. I think I should ask if there is such a proviso, and in doing so I to some extent relieve my own responsibility by giving another slight conception to the minister of my aversion to this Bill from stem to stern, and to everything about it.

Mr. DOHERTY: The observations of the hon. gentleman will come in better when we come to deal with the methods and precautions provided. I want to assure him, for the moment, that if I had had any conception that I was providing for votes for "hydrogeneous" people, I certainly would never have introduced this legislation. When we come to deal with this matter I shall certainly see that anything that gives votes to hydrogeneous people is eliminated.

Amendment of Mr. Oliver negatived; amendment of Mr. Doherty agreed to, and section as amended agreed to.

On section 2—distribution of ballot papers:

Mr. DOHERTY: The Bill originally provided for the sending of ballots not only to the commanding officer in Bermuda and to the secretary of the High Commissioner in England, but likewise to the officers commanding the forces at military posts in Canada. It is proposed by the amendments that will come in their proper order to provide that all soldiers in Canada shall vote on the ordinary election day in the ordinary and usual way, with this exception simply, that the ballot shall be provided for them at the places where they are and that they shall be allowed to so vote outside of the electoral districts in which they are to vote. I therefore propose to amend this section by striking out all reference to commanding officers at the bases and camps in Canada, and it will then read as follows:

2. A sufficient supply of ballot papers in form A of this Act and of envelopes for holding the same with affidavits in form B printed thereon shall be sent by the Clerk of the Crown in Chancery to the officer in command of the Canadian troops at Bermuda and to the secretary of the High Commissioner for Canada in London, England, and such papers and envelopes shall be kept by such officer in command and the secretary of the High Commissioner.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: As I read the section, no date is set when it becomes the duty of the Clerk of the Crown in Chancery to send out these ballots. Is it the intention that he shall send them out as soon as the Bill becomes law?

Mr. DOHERTY: It might be so. I had not in mind the necessity of fixing any particular time for doing that. The idea of this Bill is to create a situation where, if an election did come on, things would be in such shape that it would be possible for the soldiers to exercise their votes. Under the Bill it is proposed that these ballots shall be in the possession of the secretary to the High Commissioner, and of the officer at Bermuda, for use should occasion require. I would understand the Bill to mean that the ballots will be sent whether or not any one concerned contemplates an election in the near future.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: There is a period of five or six weeks between the issuing of the writ and polling day. It seems to me that is quite sufficient.

Mr. DOHERTY: If the thing is to be effective at all it is very important to do what can be done to make sure that the ballots get back in time. As regards Bermuda, it might be possible to send out the ballots and get them back within the five or six weeks; but it is difficult for us to calculate just how long it would take to send them across the ocean to the secretary of the High Commissioner, and then across the Channel, and into France, and so on. What we can do to reduce to a minimum the risk of those ballots not being back in time, I think we ought to do. I cannot see that any evil is likely to result from putting a certain number of blank ballots in the hands of persons designated in this section. It simply puts us that much more forward at the time of the election writ. The ballots would remain in London. Another section provides that upon communication with the secretary of the High Commissioner, the machinery for getting these ballots to the proper officers can at once be set going. It is of course uncertain how long it may take to get the ballots to the soldiers and back here again. This provision was made simply because it was thought that there were advantages in avoiding delays so far as we could, and that no harm could come from having a certain number of blank ballots entrusted to the secretary of the High Commissioner.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Should not this section be considered in connection with the suggestion which the right hon. leader of the Opposition has made, and which the minister said he would take into consideration. I doubt very much whether it will inspire public confidence to have a large number of printed ballots sent to the office of the High Commissioner, who is a member of the Government. We know how carefully ballots have always to be preserved, because one of the things which might be done by persons who took an interest in political matters, would be to have the ballots switched. There is no safeguard for keeping the marked ballot attached to the affidavit. That could be changed by a person desiring to do it. And, therefore, if there are to be commissioners, it seems to me the ballots ought to be placed in the custody of the two commissioners and kept in a place of safety.

Mr. DOHERTY: Of course, these ballots have no value in themselves until they are marked. While the office of the High Commissioner is mentioned in the Bill, a modification has been made to provide that they shall go to the secretary of the High Commissioner, and shall be kept by him. We were endeavouring to select a permanent official. After all we are trusting the Clerk of the Crown in Chancery to have these ballots in his possession. Is there any more danger in entrusting them to the secretary of the High Commissioner?

Mr. NESBITT: Except that he is a servant of the Parliament of Canada.

Mr. DOHERTY: Yes, I think the secretary of the High Commissioner is the servant of the people of Canada.

Mr. NESBITT: The servant of the High Commissioner.

Mr. DOHERTY: Of course, the High Commissioner is the chief officer, but I do not understand that he appoints or dismisses the secretary at his will. So far, the secretary has certainly been treated as a permanent official. I suppose I am lacking in the capacity that enables one to see so far into a milestone as some people can, and to be quite as suspicious as it may be quite justifiable to be. But frankly, I am at a loss to know why it is more dangerous to have these blank ballots in the hands of the secretary to the High Commissioner than it is to have them in the hands of the Clerk of the Crown in Chancery described as the secretary of Parliament as distinguished from the secretary to the High Commissioner, who is the servant of the people of Canada. But if anybody is afraid, and if I can work it out so that I shall not be depriving the soldier of his vote because of the delay in sending over these ballots until the last minute, I shall be glad to join in the distrust of the secretary. But, to be perfectly frank, I do not grasp why it is objectionable.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: The reason is this. First of all, I may say that I know Mr. Griffiths, the secretary to the High Commissioner. I think he is a very honourable man, and I would not at all find fault with him. But we are not discussing the merits of this or of that individual. There is a great difference between the secretary of the High Commissioner and the Clerk of the Crown in Chancery, who is an independent officer so far as he can be. I think that he is a servant of the House, and is dependent only on the House. The same thing is not to be said of the secretary to the High Commisioner. I repeat that I know the secretary is a perfectly honourable man who would be unable to do anything wrong. So far so good. We will come to that later. If my hon. friend thinks that the delay which I have just mentioned would be sufficient to enable the Clerk of the Crown in Chancery to send the ballots over after the dissolution takes place it is not worth while discussing the point; I am quite satisfied to leave it as the Bill contemplated. I imagine that these ballots would have to be printed by the King's Printer upon special paper.

Mr. DOHERTY: Yes.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: And I suppose you would have to take the ordinary precautions. I do not see there is any provision in this Bill for a special count to be made of the ballots. The Clerk of the Crown in Chancery has to answer for what he does and whenever he sends ballots out of his office he keeps a record of how many have been taken and the party to whom the ballots are issued has also to give an account of the number that he has received, the number that he has used and the number that he has returned. These precautions are enjoined upon those who have to do with the voting in an ordinary election and it seems to me that similar precautions ought to be required in this Bill.

Mr. PUGSLEY: I have noticed that in the New Zealand Bill they seem to have thought it necessary to take some precaution in regard to the ballots because they provide that the electoral officer shall issue ballots only to those who make application for them. This Bill provides that whether the soldier is given a vote or not the ballot is to be distributed and it may be that these ballots may get into the hands of those for whom they were not intended.

Mr. DOHERTY: While I cannot claim to have foreseen everything in the drafting of this Bill, I can claim to have learned something from some of the observations which have been made. There would be some advantage if hon. members would let us get to the sections that deal with the matters in regard to which they have apprehensions so that I could explain them and we could make some progress. Hon. gentlemen are perfectly justified in criticising the Bill as it is before them and in the form in which it was presented, but if that criticism were made when we came to the sections dealing with these particular subjects, I would be able to point out that we have improved upon the Bill as originally presented by providing that the ballot shall only be handed by the officer to such volunteers as take the affidavit. I must say that in thinking the matter over myself it did strike me that a very dangerous situation might result from distributing ballots around and I therefore propose to provide an amendment that shall require that a soldier, in order to receive the ballot, must first take the affidavit.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Does not the minister think I ought to be forgiven when I take the Bill as we have it?

Mr. DOHERTY: I not only think you ought to be forgiven but I assure you you are forgiven.

Mr. PUGSLEY: The Bill has been all torn to pieces by the minister. He comes to-day with a new Bill which has not even been typewritten, which is not printed; none of us knows what it is, we are groping in the dark, and the minister is unfolding to us this wonderful production which none of us has had an opportunity of seeing.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: I think there is some force in what the hon. gentleman says about the printing of the proposed amendments, which, as I understand, are very important.

Mr. DOHERTY: Yes, they are.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: So, I think that at six o'clock we will rise and proceed with some other business.

Mr. DOHERTY: I think I perhaps owe some apology to hon. gentlemen for the fact that the Bill is not printed. I can understand that some inconvenience may be occasioned by it, but we would have avoided some of that inconvenience if there had been a greater readiness to deal with the Bill section by section. I admit that the Bill has called for a great deal of amendment. I am quite willing to admit even that some of the tearing to pieces of the Bill, which the hon. gentleman attributes to me, was contributed to by hon. gentlemen on the other side of the House, and perhaps I ought to thank them for it. I announced at the beginning that I was willing to learn, and I am not ashamed to say that I have learned very many things. I suppose my hon. friend will not be offended if I say that I have learned some things from them, and I am trying to put these things into operation. I would have been glad if time had made it possible for the Bill to be reprinted. I did ask to have a certain number of typewritten copies.

Mr. PUGSLEY: If there were some typewritten copies it would be an assistance.

Mr. DOHERTY: I trust my hon. friends will forgive me for this.

Mr. PUGSLEY: I will forgive you.

Mr. DOHERTY: In view of such kindly forgiveness, might I suggest that this second section be allowed to pass?

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: Hear, hear.

Mr. PUGSLEY: I am sure I am satisfied.

Mr. DOHERTY: If you can find a method by which these ballots can be improved later on, we certainly will be glad to consider it.

Mr. PUGSLEY: I hope the right hon. the Prime Minister will not in future say that this House unanimously agreed to the section because we allow it to be carried.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: If you allow it to carry unanimously, I shall certainly not.

Mr. MARCIL: Some other inscription should be put on the ballot—something designating that it is for a Dominion general election or that it is for a soldier's vote.

Mr. GERMAN: I understand from the right hon. Prime Minister that we may rise and finish the Bill later, because clauses 3 and 4 are what I might call the iniquitous clauses of this Bill. The Minister of Justice has had two days on this Bill now, and he is only beginning to see light through it. I am afraid that before he gets through at all many days will have elapsed. I would suggest to the minister that he had better abandon it.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: If it is going to take so long in the future there is all the more reason for utilizing the twenty minutes before six o'clock.

Mr. GRAHAM: There are two things I mentioned yesterday that I want again to draw to the attention of the minister. I refer, first, to a member of the paymaster's staff or an officer who is himself a candidate having to do with the taking of this vote.

Mr. DOHERTY: I have a clause providing for that.

Mr. GRAHAM: The next matter to which I want to draw the minister's attention has reference to taking the votes of the soldiers in Canada. I want to urge upon him the necessity of providing all the safeguards that we have in an ordinary election when taking this vote.

Mr. DOHERTY: I think the clause I have in my mind will carry out the two suggestions which the hon. gentleman made yesterday. I propose to provide that no officer who is a candidate shall act in any capacity in carrying out this Act. Another provision in regard to the soldiers at home is that they shall vote under the same conditions as the ordinary voter votes with this exception that we will provide returning officers and polling places at the camps where the men can vote and register their votes although these votes will be applicable in other districts. In substance, the entire procedure provided for by the Dominion Elections Act is followed except in two things. For instance, the returning officer will not have to hold a nomination and he will have to take some means of ascertaining who the volunteers in the camp are who claim the right to vote, where they claim the right to vote and so forth. But in so far as the method is concerned, when it comes to the actual voting, we provide that the deputy returning officer shall proceed as in an ordinary election and on the ordinary election day. When it comes to actual voting we propose to provide a deputy returning officer who would take that vote as nearly as possible as it is taken in ordinary elections, and to take it on the ordinary election day.

Mr. McKENZIE: It will be taken on election day?

Mr. DOHERTY: Taken on election day.

Mr. GRAHAM: It has been represented to me that the censorship which is over all communications from the trenches might interfere with the secrecy of the ballot. The ballot is supposed to be absolutely secret and a man might write anything he likes upon it and some persons have represented to me that it will be liable to interfere with the strict censorship that is on everything that comes from the trenches.

Mr. DOHERTY: It is possible that if the censors thought there were any occasion to censor correspondence addressed to the Clerk of the Crown in Chancery they might open the ballots, and censor them, but that is rather a remote possibility, if it be a possibility at all. Of course, if necessary, the censorship authorities might be communicated with, and I fancy they would not be adverse to letting the ballots come to the Clerk of the Crown in Chancery.

Mr. GRAHAM: It would not do to let the censors open the packages, because the secrecy of the ballot would be destroyed.

Mr. DOHERTY: If these ballots, when they arrive, indicate that they have been opened they will not be counted.

Mr. PROULX: As I understand it, there will be only one day set for taking the vote.

Mr. DOHERTY: Do you mean in Canada?

Mr. PROULX: No, in the trenches.

Mr. DOHERTY: We do not propose to take these votes on election day. The ballots will be sent to the officers who will issue them and take the affidavits and receive the votes and mail them back, but there is no provision that that should be done on one day, or as to when it should be done. If these ballots get back to the Clerk of the Crown in Chancery in time to be forwarded to the returning officer of the different electoral districts by polling day they will be counted; otherwise they will not.

Mr. MARCIL: The return of the candidate will not be delayed by waiting for the ballots?

Mr. DOHERTY: That is not proposed.

Mr. NESBITT: Suppose certain ballots should come to the returning officer in a riding, and the returning officer and the candidates and everybody knows that the votes sent there do not lawfully belong to that electoral district, and the proofs are positive as to that, what would happen?

Mr. DOHERTY: The remedies in that case would be just the same for the soldier vote as they are with regard to the votes polled at any election which are polled as a consequence of a false oath. I have no doubt that, under such circumstances, upon a protest, the votes would be struck out.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: But if that offence were committed in this country, the man could be prosecuted for perjury?

Mr. DOHERTY: To be perfectly frank, I do not contend that we could convict a man in this country for having committed perjury in France or Belgium.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: And therefore you provide a penalty that you cannot enforce.

Mr. DOHERTY: The penalties may not reach everybody, but they are provided for offences, which I think the right hon. gentleman will find are quite susceptible of being committed in Canada.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: And out of Canada.

Mr. DOHERTY: And out of Canada. The law will reach anybody within the limits of Canada, so that the penalties provided are not wholly nugatory. I do not think we would be justified in leaving out these penalties because they do not extend so far as we would like them to.

Mr. OLIVER: If an offence in connection with this Act should be committed by a soldier in Canada, could the legal punishment be applied to him?

Mr. DOHERTY: I know of no reason why the punishment is not susceptible of being applied to a soldier. There may be conditions prevailing in this country which might justify the military authorities resisting any attempt of the civil power to proceed against a soldier, but as an abstract proposition, when a man becomes a soldier he becomes bound by the military law, but he does not cease to be bound by the civil law.

Mr. OLIVER: As far as an abstract proposition is concerned, of course the minister is right, but as a concrete proposition I am afraid he is not right; that is to say, as my hon. friend is aware, it would be a matter of very serious difficulty to undertake to enforce the law against a soldier on active service in Canada who by the terms of this special legislation is given the right to vote, and who contravenes the ordinary law of the land.

Mr. DOHERTY: I may be ignorant on the subject, but I am not aware of that. I do not think that in any conditions that we can foresee at the present time in Canada, if a soldier violates the criminal law of the country, he will not be amenable to the civil tribunal. I have had occasion comparatively recently to look into the question with regard to certain things that have occurred; and so far as my opinion may be valuable, I would say that taking conditions as they stand to-day in Canada, the soldier who would be guilty of a criminal offence would be liable to be tried before our ordinary criminal courts and dealt with accordingly. I may point to the instance of the militiamen who, for an act performed ostensibly in the course of their military duties—I refer to the recent unfortunate shooting accident at Fort Erie—were brought before the criminal courts, and although it is true the jury found no bill, all that means is that the civil tribunal decided that there was no cause of action; but the fact that they were brought before those courts—and there has been no suggestion made that they were not amenable to those courts—shows that in the judgment of those courts there was no question as to their responsibility before a civil tribunal. In connection with another unfortunate instance of the same kind which occurred in Montreal, I had occasion to look as carefully as I am capable of looking into the question, and I certainly reached the conclusion that in that instance, if it had been possible to reach the man concerned, he would have been liable to be prosecuted before the criminal courts of the country.

Mr. McKENZIE: The principle of the law which the minister has laid down is well recognized, that is, that a soldier can be tried before our civil courts; but the the case which the hon. minister mentioned is a case where the crime was committed within Canadian territory. I do not suppose the minister says that if a soldier committed a crime beyond Canada, the criminal courts would take hold of him after he came back to Canada.

Mr. DOHERTY: I said to the right hon. leader of the Opposition that we do not pretend to say we could prosecute a soldier or any other man in Canada for a crime committed outside of Canada.

Mr. OLIVER: There is a jurisdiction of the military authorities in civil matters to some degree. I am not altogether wrong in making that suggestion.

Mr. DOHERTY: I do not say that there is no military jurisdiction, but a man may find himself subject to both military and civil jurisdiction. We might also have conditions in this country which would justify the military authorities in refusing to allow interference on behalf of the civil court. I hope we shall not have those conditions, and I see no reason to indicate that we shall have them in this country. I do not wish to be too dogmatic in any sense upon this subject; all that I would like to say is that the fact that a man becoming a soldier may become subject to military law and therefore perhaps liable for an act which he has done under the military law and punishable for it, does not relieve him of the liability to be tried under the civil law, if that same act is an offence under the civil law.

Mr. OLIVER: I quite appreciate that; but I am trying to draw attention to the particular condition of men in military service who have transgressed the civil law more or less unintentionally, where the parties aggrieved assume to take action against them. My hon. friend has said that that action can be taken. I desire to say that there are serious difficulties in taking such action, and there are certain reasons of public policy which may be very well appreciated why that action should not be taken, and to that extent, the condition is not the same as in the case of an ordinary elector.

Mr. DOHERTY: I do not want to suggest that a soldier is not in any respect under any circumstances in any different position from a man who is not a soldier. It would be pretty difficult to get down exactly what the different circumstances are. I move that the committee rise and report progress, and ask leave to sit again.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: When will this discussion be resumed?

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: On Monday, if possible. I understand that there was to be some discussion with regard to the report of the committee appointed to investigate the question of boots.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: That is the first order, but the next order will be this?

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: Yes.

Motion agreed to, and progress reported.

At six o'clock, the House took recess.

The House resumed at eight o'clock.

THE CANADIAN EXPEDITIONARY FORCES.

PRESENT MOBILIZATION AND ORGANIZATION.

The House in Committee of Supply, Mr. Blain in the Chair.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: I moved the House into Committee of Supply for a purpose which I mentioned to the right hon. leader of the Opposition at six o'clock. It seemed to me desirable that some information should be afforded to the House as to the present condition of mobilization and organization of the Canadian expeditionary forces. I do not propose to introduce any unnecessary matter; and I will premise by giving a brief statement of what was announced last autumn as the intention of the Government, immediately after the departure of the first contingent.

On October 19, an announcement, which was carefully considered, was made to the effect that from that time until the end of the war, or so long as the War Office should deem it advisable, Canada would keep continuously in training and under arms 30,000 men. It was also announced that further contingents should go forward from time to time as might be required, and as the War Office should be in a position to receive them; and that upon each contingent going forward a number of men equal to the number which had been so despatched should be further enlisted, so that from time to time, during the continuance of the war, contingents would go forward as required, and 30,000 men would be kept continuously under training in Canada.

About a month later, on November 23, a further announcement was made that the number of men so to be kept continuously in training in Canada should be increased from 30,000 to 50,000. It was then pointed out that the number of men that could be usefully trained in Canada was limited by the following considerations:

1. Provision of necessary accommodation for them during the winter.

2. Provision of arms and equipment. Training for a lengthy period without arms and equipment is not considered very effective.

3. The necessity of organization by different arms and branches: infantry, cavalry, artillery, engineers, supply, transport, and medical services. A large surplus of some particular arm may be available, but is practically ineffective in itself.

4. The ability of the British Government to receive and finally train expeditionary forces from Canada, in view of their enormous task in training an immense army in the British Isles,

In the same announcement, it was laid down as above mentioned, that after taking into account all these considerations, it had been determined that the number of men under training could be increased in the immediate future to 50,000 in addition to about 8,000 troops engaged in garrison and outpost duty; and that instructions would immediately be given that the additional number thus proposed should be enlisted forthwith. It was further announced that as soon as the second contingent should go forward, a further enlistment of 17,000 men would be made, bringing the total up to 108,000 men. It was also explained in the same memorandum, which was made public, that the forwarding of further expeditionary forces from time to time would be followed by the enlistment of men to take their places for training in Canada, as arranged in the proposals which had been made public on October 19.

I have very great pleasure in informing the committee that this programme has been carried out up to date. The result as given to the Minister of Militia by the Adjutant General shows that there are under arms and in training, including all ranks in Canada and abroad, the following numbers:

Overseas: the first contingent of the Canadian expeditionary force and the reinforcements which have since been sent forward, 35,420. In Bermuda, the Royal Canadian Regiment, 982. In St. Lucia, detachment for garrison, 100. In Canada, the second contingent of the Canadian expeditionary force, 22,272. Reserve Infantry battalions and Canadian Mounted Rifles, 27,079. Recruited and organized for overseas service, but not mobilized, 3,500. Total overseas forces, either abroad or organized at home, 89,353 men. In addition to this there are in Canada units of the active militia on active service, garrison and outpost duty, 9,777 officers and men, and the permanent force, 2,430 men, making a grand total of 101,560 men now under arms, either in Canada or abroad.

In order to enable the committee to estimate the numerical strength of that force, I may point out that it constitutes a force more than four times greater than the British force under Wellington's command at Waterloo; and it is nearly double the total force of either Wellington or Napoleon at Waterloo. I think that the House and the country may congratulate themselves that, in a period of not more than eight months, so great a force as this has been organized, and to a very considerable extent armed and equipped. The number of guns which went abroad with the first contingent is nearly as great as the total number of guns that Wellington had at his disposal in the battle of Waterloo. Of course, it is not a great army, compared with the enormous armies that have been marshalled on the plains of Europe; but considering the fact that this country has never intended or desired to possess a great military organization, I venture to say that the results achieved during that comparatively brief period may be regarded as thoroughly satisfactory, in view of the conditions of urgency under which the undertaking was carried out. We must not forget that a modern army is, to a very considerable extent, a great business organization. It is useless to have men without drill and training. It is equally useless to send them into battle without thorough organization in all the arms of the service to which I have alluded. It is also useless to organize an army without a thorough equipment of rifles, ammunition, guns, stores, supplies, commissariat, medical services and everything that goes to make up the wonderfully complex organization of a great modern army.

To summarize, there have been sent abroad over 36,000 men and in fulfilment of the programme laid down last autumn there are in training in Canada for further expeditionary forces about 53,000 men; or if account is taken of the units of the active militia on active service and of the permanent force, there are in Canada now in training or under arms over 65,000 men.

I would like to observe also that the physique, character and intelligence of these men, both those already sent overseas and those now in training in Canada, are all that could be desired and such as reflect the greatest credit upon this country. Those of us who have had the opportunity, which has been afforded to me, to see the various regiments in different parts of Canada, and those who have had merely the opportunity to see those regiments which have passed through Ottawa or to observe the men who are carrying on their training upon the grounds of Parliament, must certainly feel that Canada has every reason to be proud of her sons who are about proceeding to the front to represent her cause and defend her interests upon the battlefields of Europe.

For further information I may refer to a memorandum which has been prepared for the Minister of Militia by the chief of the general staff. The first division under General Alderson and the Princess Patricias Canadian Light Infantry and a number of administrative units are in France. The Royal Canadian Regiment is in Bermuda, and a detachment of Canadian artillery has been sent to the West Indies. The Royal Canadian Dragoons, Lord Strathcona's Horse and the Royal Canadian Horse Artil lery have been included in a mounted brigade which, under the command of General Seely, remains for the present in England. The second Canadian contingent, that is the second Canadian division, with certain units required for administrative purposes, is still in Canada; but as soon as it can be suitably accommodated in England its embarkation will proceed.

It is proper that I should make here a statement which may set at rest more or less comment in the press and more or less surprise which has been manifested from time to time at the delay which has taken place in sending forward the second contingent. That contingent could have been despatched so far as we are concerned, at least three months ago; and the War Office was fully informed of that fact and has been kept advised from time to time that it could be sent forward whenever desired. The date at which it shall go forward was arranged some two months ago. Hon. members will of course understand that it would be absolutely contrary to the public interest that I should give to them any information as to that date. I desire to make this statement for the purpose of setting at rest any suggestion that this contingent is not ready to proceed or that it has not been ready to proceed for the last three months. We know perfectly well the reasons on account of which the War Office have thought it not desirable that the second contingent should proceed to Britain at an earlier date. Those reasons commend themselves to the judgment of the authorities of the War Office and we have seen no reason whatever to differ from the view they have taken. Hon. gentlemen will remember that there are a great many essentials to be taken into account before an army can be sent to the front and all the different arms of the service organized. They will remember also that the enormous numbers of men now under training in Great Britain render it not the easiest task in the world for the authorities of the War Office to make provision for the proper accommodation and training of contingents coming from the overseas dominions; and they will perhaps readily believe that owing to the unfortunate conditions which confronted our men during the past winter upon Salisbury plain the authorities of the War Office and specially Lord Kitchener himself are thoroughly anxious that when the second contingent of the Canadian expeditionary force does go forward there will be no room for any possible criticism in that regard.

[Sir Robert Borden.]

In the meantime it has been thought by the War Office that the training of the men could proceed as effectively in Canada as in Great Britain; and thus the date at which they are to go forward has been delayed. In all this we have followed precisely and absolutely the desire and the expressed wishes of the authorities of the War Office.

Up to the present no call has been made on the Canadian Mounted Rifles; but their turn is likely to come whenever the tactical situation changes in the western theatre of operations. I am informed by the Minister of Militia that we are within reasonable distance of the time when a Canadian expeditionary force of some 50,000 men will be serving overseas; and the chief of the general staff further advises him that in order to maintain that force in strength and efficiency a continuous supply of reinforcements, properly trained and fully equipped, will need to be provided; to say nothing of remounts and constant replenishments of material of every kind. The total necessities cannot be absolutely determined, because it is impossible to say with anything like certainty how long the war will last; and it is obvious that the conditions which at present govern the conduct of the campaign in Europe are likely to change in the course of time. But we know there are certain data upon which the necessities of war can be calculated, and reinforcements must be prepared on a corresponding scale.

Now, with a view to this the Minister of Militia and Defence, in consultation with his officers, has made provision for the establishment of overseas training depots, one or more for each arm of the service. Already some of the surplus units which embarked with the first contingent are being utilized for the purpose. These depots will be kept supplied by units maintained in Canada, and will furnish drafts for the units serving at the front. So far as can at present be foreseen, we are informed by the general staff that a total of 150,000 men will be required if the war should last another year: That is to say, an original force of 50,000; in addition to that 50,000 men sent overseas for reinforcements; and in addition to that 50,000 men kept under training in Canada, according to the announcement which was made in November last. It must be obvious that this is a very considerable undertaking, and that anything in the way of an absolutely cut and dried plan cannot be laid down at the present moment beyond that which I have already indicated to the committee. In war the unexpected often happens, and our own arrangements must be subordinated to the needs of the Empire as a whole.

I should like also to read for the information of the committee a memorandum which goes into the whole subject in somewhat more detail, and which has been prepared for the Minister of Militia by the Chief of the General Staff. There are certain tables annexed to this report in the form of an Appendix which I would like the committee to excuse me from reading, and as to which I would also ask the consent of the committee that they may appear in Hansard, as I think they will be useful for the information of the House. I mentioned this suggestion to the right hon. leader of the Opposition at six o'clock, and he told me there would be no possible objection to it. However, I will read the main part of the memorandum, and all that I think will be of interest at the moment.

The following units accompanied the 1st Division but are not included in it:

The Royal Canadian Dragoons and Lord Strathcona's Horse, "A" and "B" Batteries, Royal Canadian Horse Artillery, an automobile machine-gun brigade, and six battalions, including the Princess Patricia's Canadian Light Infantry.

The cavalry and horse artillery have been posted to a mounted brigade commanded by Brigadier-General the Right Honourable J. E. B. Seely, D.S.O. The brigade is still in England.

So also, it is believed, are the automobile machine-gun batteries.

Of the infantry, the 6th, 9th, 11th, 12th and 17th Battalions are in England. The 6th, composed exclusively of detachments from mounted corps, serves as a depot for the purpose of providing cavalry reinforcements; the 9th, 11th and 12th furnish reinforcements for the infantry; and the 17th, to which no special rôle has been assigned, forms a general reserve.

The Princess Patricia's C. L. I., allotted to the 27th Division, is in France, where it has already distinguished itself.

III. Canadian Mounted Rifles.

When the Army Council decided on the form which assistance from Canada should take, disappointment was felt, especially in the West, at the exclusion of cavalry and mounted rifles.

So long as trench fighting continued, mounted troops were not required on the European continent, in the western threatre of operations. But they were required in Egypt, which was threatened with invasion; and it was not unreasonable to suppose that before long the tactical situation in Belgium and France would undergo a change. Therefore it was decided to proceed with the organization of a body of mounted rifles; and thirteen regiments, as detailed below, are being mobilized:

IV. Infantry Reserve.

In Canada, in addition to the twelve "first line" battalions included in the 2nd Division, C.E.F., there are twenty-four "reserve" battalions in various stages of development.

They are (or will be) distributed as follows, and up to the present they have not been brigaded:

The foregoing battalions will be utilized as circumstances require; in Canada for draft-giving purposes, or in England as training depots, or as complete units at the seat of war.

V. Depots.

In England, as previously stated, three infantry depots and a cavalry depot have already been provided for the 1st contingent; the 23rd, 30th and 32nd Battalions have lately been sent over to serve as depots for the infantry of the 2nd Division; depots have also been formed for artillery, engineers, army service corps, etc.; and in Canada there are recruiting and training establishments for each of the units which the permanent force contributed to the 1st contingent and to the garrison of Bermuda.

An analysis of the numbers of the various forces, supplied by the Adjutant General, is hereto appended as Appendix "A".

I venture to hope that the hon. members of the committee will not think that I have trespassed unduly upon their time or upon the time of the House in placing this information before them. We have been some months engaged in this war for the cause of liberty and democracy, in which the people of this Dominion in common with all the citizens of the Empire take so deep and absorbing an interest. The vast work which has to be carried on for the training organization and equipment of even one division so that it can effectively take the front can be better appreciated by those who have had something to do with it than by those who have had no such experience. But when one comes to the organization of a force which at the present time comprises more than 100,000 men operating at the front or in training or upon duty in Canada, I venture to think that the House and the country will realize that a work of very considerable magnitude and importance has been performed in Canada during the past eight months.

Let me conclude by expressing, as I have on many occasions in the past expressed, the very deep appreciation which I am sure is shared by all my fellow citizens, of the magnificent response which has been given in this country from the Atlantic to the Pacific to the call to arms. No one of us doubted that when the need came the people of Canada would be ready to respond to the call but we rejoice that in every province and, indeed, in every community in Canada the response has been so warm, so loyal, so splendidly patriotic that every one of us feels to-day more proud than ever he did before of this great Dominion.

Hon. FRANK OLIVER (Edmonton): I do not know that it would be out of place if one whose business in Parliament it is to criticise should endeavour to express appreciation of the tremendous task that has lain upon the shoulders of the Government of this country since the beginning of the war, and in measured terms and with all due reservation express appreciation of the manner in which those great responsibilities have been carried out. We do not at all forego our right, or, I should say, our duty of criticism.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: Hear, hear.

Mr. OLIVER: We desire to be considered as at one with the Government in every endeavour they have made to see that Canada takes her proper part in the tremendous struggle which is now in progress. We realize, as we believe our colleagues on the other side of the House realize, that this is not a fight in which Canada is taking part as an outsider, but that it is a fight in which Canada is taking part for her existence and for her liberty, as a part of that Empire which stands for liberty, and has stood for liberty for a thousand years. The failure of the arms of the Allies in the present struggle would undoubtedly mean the destruction of the autonomy of Canada and the liberties that we enjoy. This is not a fight to preserve the neutrality of Belgium; this is a fight to preserve the existence of the British Empire, and every man who feels that the power and the prestige of the British Empire is the best guarantee of the liberty of Canada and of the principle of liberty throughout the world, has only one duty in this war, and that is to do everything that he can to support those who are taking part in it.

At the moment the responsibility of dealing with Canada's share in the war rests upon our friends on the other side. We may criticise what they are doing, or the way they are doing it, but when we do make that criticism it is not with a desire of hampering their efforts, but rather with the hope that whatever has been done may still be done, and, if possible, done better. May I say that the details of the work of creating an army as large as my hon. friend has said, and much larger, in fact, than that which decided the fate of the world at Waterloo, is in itself a great task. In a country with a widely scattered population, in a country whose people for a full hundred years have had virtually no practical knowledge of war, where we have had our attention entirely occupied with advancing material interests, when the occasion arose, and when the business of war had to be taken up, it necessarily took some time for the change of ideas to penetrate the public mind. It was hard for those who had been born in times of peace, whose fathers had lived in times of peace, whose grandfathers only could remember a condition of war, to realize that we were face to face with circumstances which called for the sacrifices of warfare. I doubt if our people have fully realized yet how terrible this war is or how terrible the urgency of it is, but from day to day there has grown upon our people that realization, and I feel and believe with my right hon. friend the Prime Minister that Canada has responded nobly to the call as far as it has gone.

However hopeful we may be of the early and victorious closing of this tremendous struggle, we can have no assurance as to the date at which it will take place. It is more than possible that, in so far as Britain is concerned, the war is only beginning, and it is only in the months that are to come that we throughout the Empire, and particularly here in Canada, will be able to realize to the full what the horrors and sacrifices of war are. I have every confidence though, that, whatever occasion arises, our people will meet it with a good heart, and that we will face whatever fate brings us with a courage and a devotion that will ultimately bring victory.

SUPPLY—CONCURRENCE.

The House proceeded to consider resolutions reported from Committee of Supply.

Resolutions concurred in.

WAYS AND MEANS—THE SUPPLY BILL

On motion of Hon. ROBERT ROGERS (Minister of Public Works), the House went into Committee of Ways and Means, Mr. Blain in the Chair.

Mr. ROGERS moved:

Resolved, that towards making good the supply granted to His Majesty, on account of certain expenses of the public service for the financial year ended March 31, 1915, the sum of $14,766,499.39 be granted out of the Consolidated Revenue Fund of Canada.

Motion agreed to.

Mr. ROGERS moved:

Resolved that towards making good the supply granted to His Majesty on account of certain expenses of the public service for the financial year ending 31st of March, 1916, the sum of $156,496,333.73 be granted out of the Consolidated Revenue Fund of Canada.

Motion agreed to.

Resolutions reported and concurred in.

THE SUPPLY BILL.

Mr. ROGERS thereupon moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 123, for granting to His Majesty certain sums of money for the public service for the financial years ending respectively the 31st March, 1915, and the 31st March, 1916.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the first and the second time, considered in committee and reported.

On motion of Mr. Rogers, the House adjourned at 9.53 p.m.

Monday, April 12, 1915.

The House met at Eleven o'clock, the Speaker in the Chair.

WAR SUPPLIES—BINOCULARS.

Mr. H. B. MORPHY, acting chairman of the Public Accounts Committee, presented the fourth report of said committee, as follows:

Your committee have had under consideration the purchase of binocular glasses for the Canadian expeditionary force, and beg to report to the House the evidence and documents in connection therewith.

From the evidence it appears a number of binocular glasses were of poor quality, low range and inferior effciency, but passed inspection and were paid for at an excessive price; and this was due to misrepresentation and inadequate inspection. Your committee therefore recommend to the House that the said evidence and all documents connected therewith be referred to the Department of Justice, with instructions to enforce restitution and to take such further proceedings as the law will permit.

SUPPLY BILL.

THIRD READING.

Hon. W. T. WHITE (Minister of Finance) moved the third reading of Bill No. 123, for granting to His Majesty certain sums of money for the public service of the financial years ending respectively the 31st March, 1915, and the 31st March, 1916.

Mr. MARCIL: Since the winding up of the Union Life Insurance Company, I have received several communications asking me to inquire from the minister whether he was satisfied that the Insurance Department had been properly reorganized since the superannuation of Mr. Fitzgerald, and whether it was properly manned and equipped for the performance of the duties it is called upon to discharge. The minister is familiar with the large interests the Canadian people have in life and other insurance companies, and the fact that this company had to be wound up has directed attention to this peculiar feature of our financial life. I am sure that an assurance from the Government that the interests of the public are being properly safeguarded would be very much appreciated.

Hon. W. T. WHITE: My hon. friend's question rather surprises me. If the Government had not confidence in the Insurance Department, we should certainly take such steps as would give us confidence. My hon. friend no doubt knows that the troubles of the Union Life go back some seven or eight or more years, the company having got into difficulties in 1909. Just at present I am not prepared to say that the Insurance Department was culpable or negligent in any way. On the contrary, a careful consideration of the whole question goes to show that the troubles of the Union Life were due to negligence or worse on the part of its directors and officers, and to the fact that under our insurance laws very wide discretion is given to directors in the investment of moneys of insurance companies. I have it in mind to introduce a Bill, of which I have already given notice, which I think will result in obviating a recurrence of certain of the troubles into which the Union Life Insurance Company got owing to the circumstances I have mentioned. In answer to my hon. friend's question, I may say that we have no reason at all to doubt that the Insurance Department is competent, or that it is giving proper attention to the duties that devolve upon it by statute.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the third time and passed.

WAR SUPPLIES—BOOTS.

REPORT OF COMMITTEE OF INQUIRY.

Mr. W. S. MIDDLEBRO (North Grey) moved:

That Report A of the fourth report of the Special Committee to which was referred the report of the Board of Inquiry respecting boots supplied the Department of Militia and Defence be concurred in.

The said report is as follows:

The Special Committee, to which was referred the report of the Board of Inquiry consisting of Lt.-Colonel W. H. Hallick, E. A. Stephens, Esq., and Theo. Galipeau, Esq., respecting boots supplied to the Department of Militia and Defence and all matters pertaining to such boots, beg leave to report as follows:

(1) The order of reference and the authority of this committee is contained in the following resolution:

House of Commons,

Tuesday, February 16, 1915.

Resolved, that the report of the Board of Inquiry consisting of Lt.-Colonel W. H. Hallick, E. A. Stephens, Esq., and Theo. Galipeau, Esq., respecting boots supplied to the Department of Militia and Defence, a copy of which report was laid upon the table of the House on the 15th instant, and all matters pertaining to the boots so supplied to the said department, be referred to a special committee of seven members with instructions to investigate the matters aforesaid and to report thereon to this House.

That the committee have power to send for persons, papers and records, to examine witnesses on oath or affirmation and to report from time to time. That the following members shall constitute the said committee, namely: Sir James Aikins and Messrs. Lemieux, Macdonald, McCurdy, Middlebro, Nesbitt and Rainville.

Attest.

Thos. B. Flint,

Clerk of the House.

Monday, February 22, 1915.

Order.—That the name of Mr. Murphy be substituted for that of Mr. Lemieux on the said committee.

Attest.

Thos. B. Flint,

Clerk, House of Commons.

Your committee so appointed have held fifty-one sessions and heard the evidence on oath of eighty-seven witnesses.

Board of Inquiry.

Your committee find that the report of the Board of Inquiry particularly referred to it by the foregoing resolution is not complete, satisfactory or to be relied on, as the investigation made by that board and upon which its report is based was of a meagre and superficial character. The only persons called upon to give evidence, which was not given under oath, were four officers of the Department of Militia, three of whom were examined by your committee as were also all the members constituting that board. The board wrongly assumed that the boots to be supplied to the department were to be made according to a certain specification found in the department and judged them to be proper or defective as they complied with or departed from such specification, whereas the fact is that the boots were contracted to be made not according to specification but according to samples furnished or approved by the department.

Compliance with Contracts.

Your committee find that the boots contracted for after the beginning of the war and supplied to the Department of Militia and Defence under such contracts substantially complied with the samples provided or approved by the department according to which the boots were to be made.

Result of Inspection of Condemned Boots.

With a view of arriving at an accurate conclusion, as to the service which the boots in use by the solders training in Canada had given them, and as to the present condition of the boots, your committee ordered that all available used and discarded boots which had been condemned by various Regimental Boards of Inquiry throughout Canada be forwarded to the committee at Ottawa, your committee unanimously appointed two independent expert persons, one a large customs shoemaker and cobbler, and the other an experienced shoe manufacturer who had no contract with the Government, for the purpose of making a personal inspection, classification, and report of every pair of such condemned shoes so forwarded to the committee, and their full report is printed as appendix hereto. This report shows:

Number of said condemned or discarded boots forwarded and examined by such inspectors, of which there were 384 singles and 1,365 pairs		1,713
Of these there were rendered useless by the soldiers burning them		112
		1,601
Among them there were repairable boots to the number of, say		1,448
Leaving unrepairable		153
Of these unrepairable ones the condition was due to the following causes:
Cut by toe nail	48
Cut by knife or spur	22

While 68 had not originally been equal to sample chiefly by reason of being too light in the backs.

At the conclusion of the above inspection and of our proceedings, the sealed sample number "12" which was the standard sample of the department was cut open by those two expert inspectors appointed by this committee, and one of them, Inspector Hoare, in the presence of the other inspectors swore that it was a good boot, the uppers of good calf, the outer sole of No. 1 tan up to gauge, with a leather counter and shank and all fully up to the said departmental specifications, and that in making their inspection and report they had made their findings on the basis of this sample boot as the standard.

According to statistics furnished to us by the department the total number of boots condemned in Canada by the various regimental boards to date is 7,807, of which the above boots examined by our inspectors formed part, and assuming that upon examination we classify the total number upon the same basis and in the same proportion as above, the result would be about as follows:

Repairable boots	6,599
Boots injured by burning	510
Boots mutilated by knife, spurs and toe nails	319
Leaving balance useless due to other causes	379
	7,807

Your committee, therefore, having in view the fact that the above represent the condemned boots, out of the great number, 86,000, issued to and worn by those now in training in Canada; and having in view also the fact that in the earlier months of training no regimental cobblers or dubbin had been provided by the department, find that our inspectors' report corroborates the view that the boots supplied by the manufacturers were up to sample.

Sample Militia Boot.

The pattern and sample boot of the department, referred to in the evidence as Exhibit 5, 12, 55 and 57, which are substantially identical and constructed on the same specifications is made of chrome tanned, winter calf in vamp and top, unlined, of "E" and "F" widths, with solid leather counter, leather shanks, outsole English or Canadian oak, ten gauge thickness, slip sole of the same material six gauge thickness insole of similar material, the heel solid leather lifts compressed, Goodyear welt, the bottom filling "Fillo" composed of ground cork treated with cement, durable and waterproof.

We find from the evidence that in material and construction the boot is a good one.

The military boot adopted by the Department of Militia and Defence about 15 years ago was similar to the present boot, Exhibit 5, 12, 55 and 57, according to which the latter boots ordered and supplied since the outbreak of the war were in compliance. Many of the boots contracted for, however, were made with wider lasts but otherwise substantially like the said sample. Owing to a claimed shortage of winter calf contractors were permitted to use side leather in the later deliveries of the first orders. There is a dispute among experts which is the better for a military boot. The evidence shows that some improvements were made from time to time in the original sample boot but its general character was maintained. The boot so adopted by the department was used by Canadian soldiers in the South African campaign where, according to the evidence of Sir William D. Otter, it proved satisfactory.

Both before and after the South African war the question of adopting the British army boot had been taken up by the department, who declined to adopt it and adhered to the Canadian boot. In 1905, with the experience of the South African campaign, specifications were drawn and approved, and a sealed sample boot conforming thereto and similar to the..... present sample was again adopted by the department.

In February, 1910, the committee on ankle boots, having discussed several complaints regarding their quality, brought to the notice of the Secretary of the Militia Council by District Officers Commanding, recommended "a few pairs of 'boots, ankle, steel billed' as used in the British service, and a supply of samples or the leather used in the manufacture of British army boots, be obtained from the War Office, and that 100 pairs of boots be made, as nearly as possible up to the style, weight and class of leather, etc., in the British samples."

On March 1, 1910, Brigadier General Macdonald, the Quartermaster General, again favoured the Canadian boot and said: "I do not approve of the proceedings of the board. I am of opinion that if the boots are delivered up to the pattern as previously approved no complaint should arise as to these articles. The original supply of these boots gave every satisfaction."

From March, 1910, till February of the following year, modifications on the boot and a revision of the specifications were considered by the officers of the department and C. E. Slater acting with them, samples were submitted with steel bills which were not approved. On the 4th February, 1911, the revised specifications prepared by the said C. E. Slater, together with samples made according to these specifications were again sealed as the pattern for the Canadian boots, and these remained the approved pattern of the Canadian boot down to the outbreak of the war in August, 1914, notwithstanding the fact that in April, 1914, some suggestion was again made of adopting the British army boot, which pattern was then submitted to the department for its information, and on the 24th April the Director General of Clothing and Equipment in his report said: "The British army boot appears much too heavy for wear in Canada," and Colonel Brown, the inspector, on the 30th of April, 1914, concurred in this opinion.

See pages 29 and 45 to 55 of appendix and evidence.

As previously pointed out, it was a boot similar to the Canadian military boot, Exhibit 5, 12, 55 and 57, which was used with satisfaction in South Africa by the Canadians, and General Sir William Otter, in his evidence before the committee said:

Q. How long were you in South Africa?—A. Fourteen months.

Q. In active service all the time?—A. All the time.

Q. What boots did your regiment have during that time?—A. It was a boot issued by the department before we left.

Q. How did that boot answer the purpose in South Africa?—A. Well, it answered very well. I have no fault to find with it.

Q. How did it compare with the English boot?—A. Personally I liked it better for the simple reason that it was a bit lighter. Our men were not accustomed to wearing heavy boots like the English boot, but they had to wear it at times because we got the English boot eventually as our own wore out. My experience, however, is that our own men were better satisfied with the boot they brought out, with the Canadian boot, because it was lighter.

As will be seen later on in this report, all the soldiers who were at Salisbury Plain on active service who appeared before the committee and gave evidence were favourable to the Canadian boot which they wore and compared with the English army boot expressed a preference for the Canadian.

The Canadian sample boot and those made according to it do not appear to have been suited to withstand the severe and exceptional weather conditions and other unusual circumstances to which they were exposed and the rough usage. Only a boot specially constructed for that purpose like a larrigan or bushman's boot might be sufficient. It must not be forgotten as the evidence demonstrates that even with such disadvantageous conditions created by the weather the Canadian boots were not at first given a fair chance owing to the impossibility of getting two pairs for each soldier within the limited time. The one pair was constantly on his feet and almost as constantly wet. There was no opportunity for drying and the leather then became soft and the soles easily worn away and the stitching of the soles in many cases loosened and caused a separation of the outer sole from the other part of the boot. Further, at first owing to the haste of mobilization a regimental shoemaker and kit and materials were not at hand to make needed repairs which would have prevented further rapid destruction of the impaired boots.

But because some of the boots were not sufficient to withstand such conditions and usage, boards of inquiry in different parts of Canada and at Salisbury condemned them. But these extreme tests are not fair tests for an average or suitable boot to be used generally by the soldier. The better test is—what military boot of reasonable cost is best suited to the general circumstances and conditions in which a soldier of a country on active service will be placed. Your committee were not asked to recommend a suitable military boot for Canadian soldiers nor were their inquiries directed to that end, but their investigations do show efforts made not only in Canada but in other countries to produce a satisfactory military boot. Those efforts have not yet been fully availing. The conceptions of each country as to the class of suitable military boot, conceptions influenced largely by the customs, conditions and climate of that country, vary and produce a boot considered to be best adapted to such usage, conditions and climate. So the British military boot is of one class, the American of a very different style, the French of another. The evidence given and the samples furnished to your committee show that the French and American military boots approximate more closely to the Canadian than do the heavy English military boot. Not only do the physical geography and climatic conditions of a country and the usages of its people enter into the determination of the class of boot required by its soldiery but the utility of the boot and the comfort of the soldier wearing it. The evidence before us shows that a heavy, hobnailed and inflexible boot will impede marching, weary the soldier and bruise or blister the feet, particularly of one not accustomed to such a class of boot, that a leather impervious to water by stuffing or greasing is also impervious to ventilation, evaporation of foot moisture and is to many feet injurious.

To indicate some of the many considerations necessarily involved in the selection of a proper military boot, extracts are given from a recognized authority, Edward Lyman Munson, Major Medical Corps, President of the American Army Shoe Board, in a book on "The Soldier's Foot and the Military Shoe," says:

"A good military foot covering should be well joined, strong, substantial and solid, yet at the same time sufficiently flexible to permit of the natural functioning of the joints. It must be supple, so as to avoid the undue loss of necessary energy in overcoming resistance of the leather with each step—likewise to reduce the liability to blister and other injury. To attempt to use a stiff, unyielding shoe will result in the early falling out of a large proportion of its wearers. No better example of this can be found than the tremendous disability which occurred among the Germans as a result of the use of a shoe of this character. The shoe must be comfortable. This is an absolute essential in military footwear, for uncomfortable shoes will inevitably diminish the ability of troops to march. The main wear of course falls on the soles. They cannot be increased in durability except by the use of double soles, which latter are unnecessarily heavy, stiff and hard on the feet. The foot covering should be as light in weight as is compatible with serviceability."

"The material of which the shoe is made, and the special treatment of the former, must be such as will facilitate evaporation of moisture from within, yet not to a degree by which the absorption of moisture from without is unduly favoured. Leather stuffed or saturated with oil was not used. The material or leather of the shoe upper must not be hard; otherwise it will cause blisters, callouses and corns. The 'brogans' formerly used in our service and the footwear of various foreign armies, have this defect. The sole should be sufficiently thick to prevent the foot from being injured by inequality in the ground. But if too thick, planter flexion of the foot is lost and dorsiflexion is much reduced."

In the House Documents of the 62nd Congress of the United States (1912), in the report of the Quartermaster General the following recommendations appear:

"That no shoe other than the official marching shoe in the form in which they may be adopted be used by officers or enlisted men when in the service uniform. That an order be issued to insure the proper fitting of shoes throughout the service, said order to cover the method of measurement, fitting and breaking in of shoes. That hereafter only vegetable tanned leather without oil stuffing be used in the manufacture of marching shoes, mineral tanned leather not being considered the equal of vegetable tannage for military service. That the specifications hereafter distinctly prescribe the minimum length of time in which shoes shall remain on the last."

Your committee conclude from the evidence given before it that for active service the sample boot would be improved by a second through sole instead of a slip-sole (this change was made before the second orders for the Canadian boots were given, and they were made accordingly); that it would be improved by putting more screws or nails in or quilting the outer sole so as to protect it from wear, and by making it wider at the toe (the large percentage of the boots supplied to the department since the beginning of the war were made on a last wider at the toe); and by protecting the heel by nails or other iron material.

Although your committee do not attach significance to the evidence of the manufacturer, Alfred Minister, yet as his statement that he refused to undertake to manufacture shoes such as he saw in the department and on specifications furnished because he did not want to make any money out of a man's life has been referred to by many people, and as he considered the prices of $3.85, $3.65 and $3.62½ for which others were furnishing boots on the same specifications were very low and as his higher offer for boots on the same specifications was not accepted, the following extracts from his evidence are given:

Q. In other words, you meant that you could and would make boots for the department at $4.85 after the war was on?—A. Yes I would.

Q. And it was on the specifications you had in your possession then that you made that offer?—A. So far as the material was concerned and workmanship.

Q. It was only a question of shape then?—A. Principally, so far as the boot we were going to make.

Q. I understand your main objection was to the shape of the boot?—A. That was the principal objection, and some little things in the workmanship.

Q. What were the other little things?—A. I did not think they were reinforced properly.

Q. What do you mean by reinforced properly; do you mean the soles were not reinforced?—A. Yes.

Q. Reinforced with additional nails?—A. Additional nails, and a different kind of nails.

Q. Anything else?—A. I do not know of anything else. (Page 694.)

Q. Well look at that shoe (Exhibit 12, departmental sample), what is your comment on that? First, as to the vamp leather, we will get the purpose afterwards?—A. That is a very fair shoe. (Page 694.)

Q. From your own experience in the Toronto Field Battery would you say that such a boot as Exhibit 12 was unsuitable for field battery work?—A. No, I guess that would have been all right for any work I had to do then. (Page 695.)

The evidence does not justify the committee in coming to the conclusion that with some such improvements as have been suggested the sample boot would not be a good, all round, serviceable Canadian military boot. Many witnesses of expert knowledge recommended different classes of boots, some a Standard Screw boot, others a Goodyear welt boot with more sole protection, some again a combination of the two. It is not a matter of surprise to your committee that the department has hesitated to depart from a sample which for about fifteen years has been approved by the Canadian Governments and given satisfaction to the Canadian permanent force and to Canadian soldiers in the South African campaign.

The Contracts for Boots.

We have shown the history of the Canadian military boot down to the outbreak of the war, August 4. Immediately thereafter the director of contracts received a requisition from the Quartermaster General (General Macdonald) for 65,000 pairs of boots, and on the 8th August he wired for tenders or had an interview with the following firms: Ames, Holden, McCready Company; Slater Shoe Company, both of Montreal; and Louis Gauthier & Company, Ltd., of Quebec; Tetreault Shoe Manufacturing Co., Ltd., George A. Slater, Ltd., both of Montreal; the Amherst Boot & Shoe Co., Ltd., Amherst, N.S.; Hartt Boot & Shoe Co., Fredericton, N.B.; and McPherson & Co., of Hamilton.

The first three mentioned firms had previously supplied the department with the militia boot, and the contract for this requisition of 65,000 was distributed as follows:

Ames, Holden & McCready, 20,000; Tetreault Shoe Co., 20,000; Louis Gauthier, 10,000; Slater Shoe Co., 1,000; Amherst Boot & Shoe Co., 2,000; John McPherson & Co., 6,000; and Hartt Boot & Shoe Co., 6,000, at $3.66.

All the boots under these contracts, which, with one exception, were dated on the 10th or 11th of August, were to be delivered in six weeks, and deliveries were commenced on the 21st of the same month, and continued as expeditiously as possible owing to urgent pressure from the department in order to enable the troops at Valcartier to leave at the earliest possible moment, during a very critical period in the history of the war, namely, the retreat from Mons.

Further, urgent orders were given in September and October to the following firms: Ames, Holden & McCready; Ballantyne & Martin; Cook & Fitzgerald; Western Shoe Company; Relindo Shoe Company; Wright Shoe Company; Aylmer Shoe Company, Murray Shoe Company; Humphrey Boot & Shoe Company; Perth Boot & Shoe Company; George Ritchie & Company; George A. Slater; Williams Shoe Company; E. T. Wright & Company.

The firms Ames Holden & McCready, Tetreault & Co., and Louis Gauthier & Co., manufactured from the sealed samples furnished to them by the department, but in all other cases the contractors manufactured from a sample presented by them to, and approved by, the department; and these manufacturers' samples we find were in all cases equal to, and in many cases superior to the department boot, by reason chiefly of their being a wider last and wider at the toe, the result being that the great majority of the boots furnished to the department had a wider last and toe than the departmental sealed pattern.

In all, boots were supplied to the department to the number of 80,600 pairs, in addition to large quantities of overshoes, rubbers and canvas shoes.

The contracts were made directly with the manufacturers who were asked to tender directly with the Government, on the boots in question, with the exception of some 5,000 pairs which were authorized and were purchased locally in Winnipeg for the men in training there, and 400 pairs purchased from a local firm at Esquimalt.

No commission was paid by the Government in any way, nor was it necessary for any middlemen or for any agent to intervene in order to secure such contracts from the Government, nor did any such intervene, although the evidence discloses that in one case an agreement was made in 1913, whereby Gauthier & Company agreed with one Charles E. Slater, who had formerly, as president of the Slater Snoe Company, done business for years with the Government, that Gauthier & Company should manufacture boots at an agreed factory price, and agree to supply them to the Government, adding thereto a certain commission, for the said Slater, which would be the difference between the agreed factory price and the price at which the said Slater, acting on behalf of the said Gauthier & Company, sold the said boots to the department less the freight and other expenses.

Slater represented to the minister that he was a partner of the said Gauthier.

That the only material variations made from the contracts by any contractors were a substitution of side leather in some cases for winter or storm calf; and this substitution in most cases was expressly permitted by the officers of the department; and that in any case, where such permission had not been obtained, a deduction was made from the contractor on account thereof.

We also find that the reason the officers of the department permitted the substitution in some cases of side leather for storm calf, was because the rush order for this quantity of boots had exhausted to a large extent the supply of storm or winter calf for a considerable time, during the period of delivery of the first contract for boots.

In the month of October the department also altered the boot contract and specifications by requiring a through double sole in all boots manufactured thereafter, instead of the slip sole.

We find that this requirement was a material and beneficial improvement in the Canadian military boot, all witnesses being unanimous on this point, and that subsequently thereto all boots ordered were made to conform to this requirement, and a further price of 15 cents or thereabouts per pair allowed to the contractors in respect thereof.

Urgency.

War was declared on the evening of the 4th of August, the Canadian expeditionary force was authorized by Order in Council on the 10th of August to be despatched at the earliest possible moment.

As stated above, two days before this Order in Council was passed, a requisition had been made on the Quartermaster General for 65,000 pairs of ankle boots. In addition to the boots the Director of Contracts and the Militia Department were asked at the same time to provide at once: 35,000 caps, 3,000 cloaks, 15,000 great coats, 40,000 jackets, 33,000 pairs of puttees, 6,500 pantaloons, 50,000 suits of service clothing, 100,000 suits of underclothing, 100,000 flannel shirts, 150,000 pairs of socks, and supplies of more than twenty other different varieties.

And whereas, it had originally been intended only to despatch 22,000 men from Valcartier over 33,000 men were sent, and subsequently it was decided to mobilize the second, third and fourth contingents, until to-day it is estimated by the Government, that nearly 100,000 men are in the trenches in France, in training at England, or training in Canada, or doing duty as home guard; and all have had to be supplied with boots.

The time limit for the complete delivery of boots for the first contract was six weeks, and 55,000 of these were delivered approximately within the six weeks, deliveries in some cases commencing within eleven days after the order was given, and owing to the great demand it was at first impossible to issue more than one pair of boots to each man. The demand for immediate delivery was insistent both on the part of the department and of the enlisted omcers and men. It was not desirable to purchase boots from abroad even if this could have been done.

The great urgency, especially at Valcartier where the men were still wearing their worn-out civilian boots which prevented them from drilling, prevented as deliberate and critical an inspection as might otherwise have been made; that there might not be delay, and that deliveries might be made direct from the factories to Valcartier, inspectors were placed in some of the larger factories, where inspection took place during the process of manufacture; while for the reasons above stated a comparatively small percentage of the boots was delivered without inspection, we have no reason to assume that these boots so delivered were any different from the rest as the manufacturer had no knowledge as to whether they would or would not be inspected and therefore would likely, and so far as we can ascertain did, use the same care in making these boots.

Exceptional Weather and other Conditions under which the Boots were Worn.

In the first place, the boots were delivered to the soldiers at a time of the year which necessitated their being worn in the fall and winter months, especially those for the second and third contingents. Those in training in Canada were drilling and doing route marching almost daily either on the hard and rough ground or in the rain, snow, and slush, of an exceptionally mild and changeable winter; and substantially all the witnesses agree that during fairly dry weather the boots gave fair satisfaction, but when subjected to drilling and marching in the wet and slush, without an opportunity for drying or dubbin, the boots gave way more rapidly, until they were supplied with a second pair which enabled them to wear their boots alternately and thus gave them a chance to dry and be dubbined and repaired from time to time, and that the life of the boot depends, to a very great extent, on the care taken of it by the wearer was demonstrated by the evidence of many witnesses.

Some evidence was given of the exhaustive labours of the American Shoe Army Board of 1912, of which Edward L. Munson was president.

Your committee endeavoured to secure his attendance as an expert witness, but owing to his absence in the Philippines, we were unable to do so.

As to the normal life of the army boot, Professor L. Munson in his work on the army boot, has this to say:

"During the ordinary campaign, under usual conditions of moisture and roughness of roads as found in this country, a pair of shoes may be expected to last about two months and be sufficient, with slight repairs, for a journey of 500 to 600 miles over ordinary terrain. But local conditions may very materially modify and reduce this estimate. Rocks and sharp gravel rub away soles rapidly, particularly if wet; while continued wetting for a fortnight or so may cause the stitching to rot and the shoe to fall apart and become unserviceable."

With only one pair delivered to him, and those being continually wet, through route marching, drilling and otherwise in the snow, ice and slush, it was to be expected that the soldier would, on returning to camp, endeavour to get his feet dry.

In doing this we find on the evidence that in many cases the injury to the boots was caused by getting them burned in the attempt on the part of the soldier to dry his boots; and we find that a boot may be badly burned without showing indication thereof on the surface soles, while the deterioration to the inner sole on examination has been very apparent, and sufficient to cause the sole subsequently to break entirely across.

The constant alternate wetting and heating of the shoes without applying dubbin, we also find in many cases, has caused the shoe to more rapidly deteriorate.

As to the conditions to which the boots were subjected at Salisbury Plain, the only direct evidence that we have received points conclusively to a most abnormal and exceptional climatical condition. This evidence consists of that given by:

(a) Private Ross, of the Queen's Own Rifles, who appeared before us, swore that he enlisted at Toronto, August 25th last, going to Valcar-tier. He sailed from Quebec on September 25; that after reaching Salisbury Plain it rained for 55 consecutive days, and the camp grounds were wet and muddy during the whole time he remained there, namely, up to the 18th of February, 1915.

(b) W. M. Bennett, of Walkerville, who was at Salisbury Plain once or twice a week between the 1st of November and the 16th of December, swore that the sun did not shine once while he was there that it was constantly raining, and that it was nothing but a quagmire of mud around the tents; that during the whole time he was there it was not possible for a soldier to step out on the ground around his tent without getting his feet covered with mud, and that the roads were in an even worse condition, there being from 1 to 14 or 15 inches of a thick batter of mud all over them.

(c) Wm. T. Nussey, sergeant of the Princess Pats, who was located at Salisbury Plain until the 13th of January, swore that he had talked with those living at Ainsbury, Fulford Market, Lavington, and Salisbury, and they informed him it was the worst weather they had ever experienced in 60 years.

(d) Corporal Edwards appeared before the board and swore: That he had been at Salisbury Plain as orderly to Colonel McDougal from October 10, 1914, till February 11, 1915; that it rained very nearly all the time except Christmas day; that he never knew a single day during that four months when the ground was not wet and muddy, and sometimes ankle deep, and that he had never seen such weather during his previous 20 years' residence in England.

(e) Major-General Hughes appeared before the board and swore: That he was at Salisbury Plain and saw the conditions of the camp there. The roads were so muddy one would go almost up to the knees in mud; that no boot ever made in Canada or England would stand the water and mud encountered at Salisbury Plain last winter, and that conditions at Salisbury Plain were no criterion by which to judge any army boots.

All evidence, then, as to the service the boots gave at Salisbury Plain, including the communications of Sir George Perley and General Alderson, to the effect that the boots were not suitable for the rough wear and wet weather of Salisbury Plain, must be read in the light of the above normal and exceptional weather conditions to which the boots were subjected.

The evidence, therefore, satisfied us that no boots under these conditions would remain water-tight, and that the conditions would constitute one of the severest strains to which any army boot could be put, and that it was to be expected that there would be complaints respecting the boots. Notwithstanding these conditions, however, the evidence of those who were in active service at Salisbury Plain who appeared before this committee proves that the Canadian boot stood the test well, and these witnesses were Sergeant W. T. Nussey, Private Ross, Corporal Edwards and Major-General Hughes.

Sergeant W. T. Nussey, above named, stated that he and his men were delivered 100 pairs at Valcartier and that up to the time he left Salisbury Plain in January, 1915, he had heard no complaints from his men respecting the boots; had worn his Canadian issue from Valcartier up to the time he appeared before the board, and was still wearing them, and left them with the committee as an exhibit. They were in fair condition, the uppers intact, and he had worn them continually without repair until the 6th of March, when he had them half soled and the heels repaired; and when giving his evidence described them as,—as good a pair of boots as he ever had on his feet; had worn both the British and Canadian army boot and preferred the Canadian boot, and that he had seen 12 years' service in the Imperial Army.

Private Ross, above named, swore: He had been issued his boots at Valcartier on the 30th of August, sailed for Salisbury on the 25th of September, was invalided home on the 18th of February, wore his boots during all this four months time with the exception of two weeks during which time he wore a pair of British boots and had his own re-soled, and the heels fixed with nails; that he discarded his British boots as he preferred the Canadian, and had been wearing his Canadian boots down to the 10th of March, seven months in all, that they were still in good shape with the exception of a few stitches in the back, and that he had never heard any of his companions complain about the Canadian boot, and that the English boot, which he wore for two weeks did not stand the water any better than the Canadian boot.

Corporal Edwards, mentioned above, when he appeared before the board was wearing the Canadian military boot which had been issued to him; he testified that he got them on the 5th day of October, after which he had gone to Salisbury Plain; that he had worn them ever since with the exception of a week, which would be nearly six months he had worn them in all, and about two months ago he had had them half soled; that they were still in good condition and he thought would last another three months; that before he had used the boots he had given them a good dubbin and had taken care of them ever since; that he had been wearing Canadian military boots for the last five years, and that he had not heard any complaints from the men at Salisbury Plain with respect to the boots.

Two pairs of British army boots were produced before the board by Major-General Hughes, and which he testified had been sent to him by Colonel Currie, commanding the 48th Highlanders, together with a letter from Colonel Currie stating that the boots had been in use for two weeks only; and, from an examination of these boots, we find that they have not stood the test as well as the Canadian boots worn by Nussey, Ross and Edwards.

In view of the evidence adduced before us and of our examination of samples of the standard British army boot, we are of opinion that it is not a suitable boot for adoption as the standard army boot of Canada.

Many of the boots which were condemned by the regimental boards at the various points in Canada have, since the regimental cobblers have been established, been repaired and are now in use. For instance, of 14,000 pairs issued at Toronto, up to and including the 19th of March, 1915, and of which 8,357 were issued before the New Year, only 413 pairs in all have been condemned, and of these 117 were repairable, leaving 296 unrepairable out of, say, 14,000, or about 2 per cent of the whole issue.

At Kingston of the total number of boots issued, 2,400 pairs, 430 pairs were said by the Departmental Board to have gone back up to the 3rd of December, all of these, however, have been repaired and are still in use, so that the whole 2,400 pairs are still in use with the exception of five pairs which were cut up for inspection purposes. And Lt.-Colonel Hughes stated that if the men had had two pairs of boots issued to them in the first place, they would have had no difficulty at all, as this would have permitted them to dry, dubbin, and repair the boots; and his statement was corroborated by many other witnesses.

At Quebec.

Colonel J. P. Landry, officer commanding the 5th Infantry Brigade at Quebec, of the Canadian expeditionary force, testified there were issued 5,500 pairs to the men of his Brigade and only 55 pairs were condemned by the Boards of Inquiry, and that all of these 55 have since been repaired and re-issued to the men, so that the whole 5,500 are still in use, after doing service for some months.

St. Johns, Que.

Lt.-Colonel A. Sabourin testified that the maximum number of complaints was 40, of which 15 to 20 were because of narrow sizes, but that the boots apart from those at St. Johns, Que., were worn for four months in all kinds of weather, in the wet and slush, in drilling, route marching, and that these gave good satisfaction.

There seems to be a very erroneous impression with some, that paper was used in the manufacture and composition of the boots delivered to the department since the war began. For instance, Captain Taunton, Quartermaster of the 27th Battalion, C.E.F., stated that he had personally examined many of the boots issued to the Battalion on November 3, 7 and 8, and that the soles were composed of paper, wood, cork and leather scraps, grindings and glue. A similar error was made by Quartermaster Underwood, and Taunton subsequently admitted his mistake. The error lay in supposing that the leather board part of the wood or stool shank, an approved shank and used generally by manufacturers in the construction of good boots, was paper. We find that no paper or other fraudulent material was used in the construction of the soles or uppers of the boots.

It is quite true that to fill up the space in the sole between the edges of the upper leather, turned under the sole, ground cork, cement and glue were used. The filling so used is a specially prepared one called "Fillo" or "Besto" and is to be found in almost all boots of a good class and was required by the Militia Department in the boots to be made for it. In a specification concerning the boots and according to which the sample.....boots were made bottom filling is provided for as follows:

"Bottom to be filled with a preparation called 'Fillo' which is ground cork treated with cement, very durable and waterproof. Another preparation which the evidence shows to be equally good is 'Besto'."

See pages

The evidence further discloses that the number of boots supplied by each contractor forms but a small proportion of the annual output of each contractor; that in many cases such proportion is less than one per cent; others, less than two per cent, and in no case that we found was it more than 4¼ per cent of their annual output. And, speaking generally, one may reasonably conclude, apart altogether from patriotic reasons, that the manufacturer would not care to risk his reputation, as such by supplying an inferior article to the Government, when the quantity supplied represented such a small proportion of his annual production.

The Suitability of the present Canadian Military Boot.

As before stated, the present boot is the evolution of over 15 years of thought by the permanent officers of the Militia Department. In evolving the boot, which was the approved military boot at the opening of the war, the department had also considered the British boot and the American boot, and had taken into consideration the opinion gathered, and the report made by the said American Army Shoe Board in 1912, and had before them the sample boot which was the product of the conclusions of that committee which went into the matter very exhaustively. The American boot was produced before us as an exhibit, and proved to be a boot somewhat lighter in general, and also in the soles, than the approved departmental boot, though it was built on a wider and more roomy last, especially at the toe. It was a Goodyear welt shoe.

Evidence was also adduced before us that the French, Belgian, Italian Governments use a Goodyear welt.

A number of Canadian manufacturers, who might be deemed experts, testified that the Goodyear welt, re-inforced with hob nails on the soles and plates on the heels was the proper shoe, for ease, comfort and dryness of the feet, but that to combine it with the Standard Screw would counteract well known advantages of the Goodyear welt shoe, although they admitted that the Standard Screw might wear longer, but would not keep out the water as well as the Goodyear welt, and was not as comfortable.

Other manufacturers, and other experts, maintained just as stoutly that it would keep out the wet and would wear much longer, and would be a much more serviceable boot; and they saw no particular objection to a combination of the Standard Screw and the Goodyear welt, but rather approved of it.

The department has appointed a Sub-Committee of Council, acting in conjunction with a Special Committee of experts, and had also appointed a special boot expert, with a view of finally and definitely arriving at a conclusion as to whether or not the present departmental boot could be further improved, and if so in what manner, and this matter is still under consideration.

Your committee held fifty-one sittings since their appointment, on the 16th of February last, and have examined eighty-seven witnesses whose names are appended hereunder, including permanent officials of the Militia Department; the members of the particular boot inquiry whose report was referred to us; the departmental boot inspector; many manufacturers; a number of experts; a great many officers of the Militia Department, from various parts of Canada, and men who have served in the ranks in Canada and Salisbury Plain, and have worn the boots in question. And every opportunity has been given with a view of placing the facts before the House.

Appended hereto are copies of the evidence taken before the committee comprising the exhibits submitted by the various witnesses.

Appended hereto, also, is a copy of the proceedings of the committee, dated Friday, April 9, 1915.

Appended hereto, also, is the list of the witnesses who gave evidence before the committee.

All of which is respectfully submitted.

April 9, 1915.

Mr. MIDDLEBORO said: Mr. Speaker, in moving the adoption of the report of this committee, I desire to say that it has held 51 sittings, possibly of an average of two hours each, and has examined over 87 witnesses. I also desire to testify to the patience and endurance of my colleagues on the committee, on both sides of the House, during the many weary hours we have spent in endeavouring to elucidate all the facts in connection with the supplying of boots to the Department of Militia and Defence. By reading the authority of the committee, which was by way of a resolution passed on the 16th of February, it will be found to be in the following words:

That the report of the Board of Inquiry consisting of Lieutenant Colonel W. H. Hallick, E. A. Stephens, Esq., and Theo. Galipeau, Esq., respecting boots supplied to the Department of Militia and Defence, a copy of which report was laid upon the table of the House on the 15th instant, and all matters pertaining to the boots so supplied to the said department, be referred to a special committee of seven members with instructions to investigate the matters aforesaid and to report thereon to this House.

That the committee have power to send for persons, papers and records, to examine witnesses on oath or affirmation and to report from time to time.

That the following members shall constitute the said committee, namely, Sir James Alkins, Mr. McCurdy, Mr. Middlebro, Mr. Rainville, Mr. Macdonald, Mr. Lemieux and Mr. Nesbitt.

Owing to the illness of the hon. member for Rouville (Mr. Lemieux), the name of the hon. member for Russell (Mr. Murphy) was substituted on the committee. It will be observed from this that the first matter that was referred to the committee was the report of what I might call the Hallick Board, and, I presume, it was our duty in some way to report on that report. The committee were unanimous in coming to the conclusion that we could not rely upon the decision of that board. We came to that conclusion because the witnesses who appeared before that board were not sworn and because the members themselves had neither sufficient nor adequate knowledge of the matters that were referred to them. That the House may be satisfied upon that point I will read from the evidence of the members of the board themselves which will show what experience they had and whether they were competent to judge of the quality or class of boots which they examined. Mr. Galipeau upon being examined said:

Q. Have you been a manufacturer?—A. No. I have been in the jobbing business.

Q. That is the wholesale trade?—A. The wholesale trade.

Q. In what capacity in the jobbing business have you been?—A. Well, in general goods, all kinds of shoes.

Q. What were your duties?—A. I was a traveller.

Q. Then I understand that your occupation during most of that period has been that of a traveller for a jobbing house?—A. Yes, selling goods.

Q. That has been mainly your experience?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. You have never been a manufacturer of boots?—A. No, I have never been a manufacturer.

Q. Or with the tanning of leather?—A. Yes, I had in the heavy leather, not in the leather being used in these shoes.

Q. In respect of the leather that was used in the construction of the shoes, you have had no large experience?—A. No experience as to that.

Mr. Stephens' evidence can be summarized in this answer:

During all those years you acquired, as you have told us, a general knowledge of boot and shoe making, but never actually engaged in the work yourself? A. I never did.

Q. The same remark, I suppose, applies to tanning leather? A. I never was a tanner, and never engaged in it.

The replies of Col. Hallick, president of the board, were as follows:

Q. Have you had any experience in the manufacture of boots?—A. None whatever.

Q. Or as a dealer in boots?—A. None whatever.

Q. Then your experience in boots comes from that which you gained as an officer in the Ordnance Department, and from the wearing of the boots.—A. And as a soldier.

Q. But you are not a boot expert?—A. No, I do not pretend to be that.

Q. Who was the expert in that inquiry upon whom you depended?—A. Well, upon my two assisting members, Mr. Stephens and Mr. Galipeau. They were appointed as members to assist me in the investigation.

So, I think it will be seen that we were right in putting aside altogether the report of Lt.-Col. Hallick and his board. In doing so we are not casting any reflection whatever upon the gentlemen who constituted that board. We believe that they performed their duties faithfully and that they arrived at their conclusions honestly, but they had not had sufficient experience, and in addition to that, they did not have sufficient boots before them to enable them to come to a fair and accurate conclusion as to the quality of the total number of boots which had been supplied to the department. The members of the committee who put in a minority report said in their report that:

> The witnesses before the Board were not sworn and were confined to department officials, all of whom with one exception have, however, been before your committee and given their evidence under oath. This Court of Inquiry in addition to hearing the witnesses, devoted themselves to an examination of the boots referred to in their report and their findings express merely the opinions of the different members of the Court.

Notwithstanding that, the minority proceed in the minority report now submitted to give some of the conclusions that were arrived at by the board. If we are not going to accept the report in toto we have no right to accept any part of it. The part which they accept in the minority report and which they wish to place before the public is this:

> The opinion of the Board may be summarized in so far as the character of the boot prescribed and supplied by the department, is concerned, as follows:
> That the boot was of unsuitable shape and make and that the leather contained no water-resisting medium;
>
> That the heels and soles are unprotected and sole-filling is often poor quality;
> That the boot was unsuitable for the soldiers and for the particular work for which they were provided;
> because,
> (a) The shape is such that the average foot has not room for the free movement of the toes and is thus not suitable for marching;
> (b) The leather is dry, containing no grease, and consequently quickly absorbs the water;
> (c) Soles and heels not being re-inforced with metal, soon wear down, especially when wet.

But this is expert opinion, and they are not experts. If they were justified in citing that portion of the report they should have cited also the portion of the same report in which the same board held that:

> The boots manufactured for the Canadian overseas division were generally speaking well made and of good quality (surprisingly so considering the very insufficient time given the contractors), but they were not suitable for the particular work for which they were provided. This, the Board considers, can be attributed to want of time, as the (comparatively speaking) enormous demand had to be met within a few weeks. Further, that owing to the same extreme urgency, it appears that there was not enough time in which to consider new specifications for a boot differing with that which though suitable for a dry climate has been found to be unsuitable in the abnormal conditions in England. Consequently the Board recommends the adoption of a heavier, sounder type of boot, similar to that used by the British Army.

I think the fairer way is to disregard the report entirely because we have had all the members of the board before this committee and placed them on oath in addition to all the witnesses whom the board heard, with one single exception, and, instead of coming to our conclusion upon a very small proportion of the boots supplied as they did, we have called for statistics from the department of all the boots rejected throughout Canada and have arrived at our conclusion upon that basis.

The next question that naturally arises is: Where did this standard Canadian military boot come from, what is the history of the standard boot which was in the department at the time of the declaration of war, and who is really responsible for that boot?

In the minority report, at page 599 of the Votes and Proceedings, I find this statement:

> The boot supplied to the soldiers who went to South Africa was a different boot from the sealed sample boot of 1914, and from the boots supplied to the overseas forces.

Well, let us see if it was a different boot. I will concede that it was a different boot in the respect that it was a better boot, and that the boot of 1914 was a great improvement on the boot of 1899, which went to South Africa. That there may be no dispute on this question, I shall read from the evidence of the witnesses who appeared before our committee upon this point. At page 928 of the evidence, General Otter testified:

> Q. How long were you in South Africa?—A. 14 months.
> Q. In active service?—A. All the time.
>
> Q. What boots did your regiment have during that time?—A. It was a boot issued by the department before we left.
> Q. Similar to Exhibit 12, that boot I showed you?—A. That description of boot, yes.

I may say that Exhibit 12 is the boot from which the manufacturers manufactured the boots in question, with the exception of those manufacturers who forwarded their own sample boot to the department, had it approved by the department and made the boots accordingly. General Otter's evidence continued:

> Q. How did that boot answer the purpose in South Africa?—A. Well, it answered very well. I have no fault to find with it.
> Q. How did it compare with the English boot?—A. Personally I liked it better for the simple reason that it was a bit lighter. Our men were not accustomed to wearing heavy boots like the English boot, but they had to wear it at times because we got the English boot eventually as our own wore out. My experience, however, is that our own men were better satisfied with the boot they brought out, with the Canadian boot, because it was lighter.

Q. I do not know whether you were personally present at Valcartier or Salisbury?—A. I was not.

Q. You heard of the conditions that existed there?—A. You mean the weather conditions?

Q. Yes, the weather conditions?—A. No. We had rain in South Africa, but the weather as a rule was hot there, dry and hot.

Q. So you cannot say how this boot would answer in winter campaign?—A. No.

Q. You are not in a position to say that? All you can say is that it answered the purpose very well in the campaign in South Africa and for the purposes of the permanent corps in Canada?—A. Yes.

By Sir James Aikins:

Q. Did you suggest any improvement to the department when you came back from South Africa?—A. No, I suggested no improvements, because personally I was quite satisfied with the boot.

Charles Slater in his evidence at page 899 says:

Q. Then when did you commence supplying boots to the Department of Militia?—A. At the time the South African war broke out.

Q. What class of boot did you supply at that time?—A Practically the same boot that is being supplied now.

Q. We will look at Exhibit 12 and Exhibit 67 (producing boots).—A. Well, they are practically both the same last.

Q. And Exhibit 57 (exhibiting boot)?—A. It has not been changed any except in some minor features. For instance, we made them what we call a viscolized sole, an oiled sole.

Q. So I take it from you that looking at Exhibits 12, 67 and 57 these are practically the same boot which you supplied in 1899 to the Government of Canada for use in South Africa?—A. Exactly so.

Mr. McCann, who has been in the Militia Department for a great many years, gives this evidence, at pages 1035-1036:

By Mr. Macdonald:

Q. When did the department make the issues of boots to the men who went to South Africa?—A. They began in October, if I remember rightly.

Q. How many were issued, could you find out?—A. I don't know that I could find out, but supposing two pairs were issued to every man, there would be 2,000 pairs. That is for the first contingent, which left in October, 1899.

By the Chairman:

Q. I suppose your object is to improve the boot from time to time?—A. That has been our object right along.

Q. And you think you have succeeded in improving it from time to time?—A. Well, speaking for myself, I think the boot (Exhibit 12) is a great improvement.

Q. That is, the boot, Exhibit 12, is a great improvement on this one (Exhibit 77)?—A. Yes.

By Mr. Macdonald:

Q. That is not a sample of the boots supplied?—A. It is a fair sample of the boots we got in those days.

Q. Your boot, then, in 1905, would have been an improvement on the boot in use in 1899?—A. Certainly, sir.

Q. No doubt about it?—A. No doubt about it whatever.

Q. No question whatever?—A. No question whatever.

Q. The 1905 boot, you think, was a great deal better boot than that of 1899?—A. Undoubtedly.

Q. And a great deal better than the boot that went to the South African war?—A. Infinitely better, to my mind.

Then, Major General Hughes, who was as we know in South Africa, gave evidence as follows:

By Mr. Macdonald:

Q. The Canadian people would support you if months ago you had got them a new boot?—A. No, I say the Canadian people supported this boot in South Africa—of course it is a dry country—and all through all the soldiers have supported this boot, and personally I like this boot, but would like a little more room across there (front) and I would like steel across there (toe). Personally that is the only change I would make in the boot.

By the Chairman:

Q. It was designed in 1910?—A. Certainly.

Q. The last revised specifications are 1910?—A. Yes, but we wore in South Africa exactly the same boot.

By Mr. Macdonald:

Q. That boot was never designed for active service?—A. Certainly for active service.

Q. That is designed for active service in the barracks in Canada?—A. It was designed for active service. That is practically the same boot we had in South Africa.

By Sir James Aikins:

Q. What do you say about that class of boot being worn in South Africa?—A. I do not say it is the same boot; I say it is a similar boot. Our fellows don't wear that heavy boot, like the English one.

Mr. McCann, again, in his evidence at page 1033, says:

Q. We have got a pattern sealed on 9th May, 1905?—A. Yes.

Q. Is that the sealed pattern that has been carried down to the present date?—A. Practically.

Q. Practically the same?—A. There are some slight difference I expect; I do not like to give a definite answer.

I want to show that from 1905 to 1910 that same boot continued to be the approved boot of the department. In 1910, on the 1st of March, some change was again suggested along the lines of the British boot, and the matter was taken up by the department, and we find that on the 1st of March, 1910, Brigadier-General Macdonald, the Quartermaster General, again favoured the Canadian boot, and in his letter he stated:

I am of opinion that if the boots are delivered up to the pattern as previously approved no complaint should arise as to these articles. The original supply of these boots gave every satisfaction.

We, therefore, have traced the history of this sample Canadian army boot down to 1910. On the 4th of February, 1911,

Charles Slater, who was then boot expert for the department, and to whom the department evidently looked for advice as to a proper standard military boot for Canada, again revised the specifications in respect to boots, and on these specifications other samples were sealed and they became the pattern boot for the department. In 1912, the American Army Shoe Board concluded its labours. The board had sat for a period of five years and it entered very extensively into the question of a suitable active service boot for the American army. I do not suppose any shoe board ever gave the same attention to details as to a proper boot for an army as was given by the American Shoe Board of which Professor Munson was the president. This board carried out extensive and practical tests all over the country; they examined the soldiers' feet by X-rays to see what position the feet occupied in the shoes, and they endeavoured to obtain all the expert medical and scientific knowledge obtainable, and their inquiry extended over a period of 4 years. The result of their labours was a standard boot which was exhibited before the committee and which had been considered by the Militia Department here. As the result of the report of the American Army Shoe Board, a military boot was evolved and adopted for the United States army, which was much lighter than the present standard boot of the Canadian Militia Department. Even as late as April, 1914, the question of adopting the British Army boot was again taken up by the Militia Department here, and I mention this to show that the department not only approved of the present standard of Canadian boot, but that it had very carefully considered all other boots. As late as April, 1914, a suggestion was again made that the new pattern boot of the British Army should be adopted by Canada, and a pair of these boots was sent to the department for inspection and consideration, and with the result that the following correspondence ensued. On the 27th of April, 1914, the following letter was written by H. W. Brown, Director of Contracts, to Lt.-Col. Macdonald, Director of Clothing and Equipment, with respect to the new pattern British Army boot:

Director of Clothing and Equipment:

Please see accompanying memorandum from Lt.-Colonel Brown, dated 15th instant., letter from George A. Slater, Limited, and newspaper clipping, all relating to the British new pattern chrome leather army boot, a sample of which is sent you herewith for examination, together with a pair of the Balata soles, referred to in the Slater Co.'s letter. Please return these after examination, as they were only loaned to Lt.-Colonel Brown by the company.

In this connection see also 96-10-30 sent you herewith.

(Sgd.) H. W. Brown,
Director of Contracts.

Lt.-Colonel Macdonald returned the letter to Mr. Brown with the following memorandum:

Noted and returned; thank you. The army pattern boot appears much too heavy for wear in Canada. As to Balata soles, the Q.M.G. does not approve of trying them out.

The new pattern British Army boot was returned to Lt.-Colonel Brown, chief inspector of boots, and he returned it to Slater & Company whence it originally came, and in the letter accompanying the boot, Lt.-Colonel Brown says:

April 30, 1914.

Gentlemen:

I am returning to you to-day via Canadian Express, prepaid, the one-half pair English army boots which you were kind enough to send me on April 9. The Q.M.G. considers it too heavy to issue to the men of Canada, and I think he is right.

This concludes the history of the boot right down to the opening of the war in 1914. Can any reasonable gentleman in this House or in this country say that this Government is in any way to blame for the approved sample of the departmental army boot which was in the department on the 4th of August, 1914, when war was declared? I do not think from the evidence that any reasonable person can say so. The boot was the product of the late Government, and it had done good service in the permanent force. A poorer boot had given satisfaction over the British boot in the only foreign service that we have ever had, that is, in South Africa. The American boot, adopted in 1912, after four years' deliberation, was a similar boot, although lighter and on a little wider last. When we came into power in 1911, we left in their positions all the permanent officials of the department appointed by the late Government, because they were men who had nine, ten, fifteen and some over thirty years' experience; but if we had changed those officials and had put in their places men who had not as large experience as they had, we would have heard of it to-day in the minority report. I am quite safe in saying that no person can blame the department for the boot to which I have referred being the approved boot of the department at the time that the war broke out. It was the practical active service army boot of the department; it is idle to say that it was anything else. We have heard some members of the committee describe it as the dancing pump. Well, if they allowed a dancing pump to be the active service army boot of the department for the fifteen years they were in power, they are certainly a great deal to blame; but it was not the dancing pump, it was the only boot provided by the department for the last fifteen years for any service, active or inactive, that the permanent force had. There cannot be any contention that the boot was anything but an active service army boot, and to set up that contention now is merely a weak afterthought.

Having proved this sample boot, we come now to the question whether or not the sample boot was the boot delivered to the manufacturers, and I do not think it is necessary to argue this point in view of the evidence I have already submitted. What took place was this; there had been some firms manufacturing boots for the department for a number of years prior to the outbreak of the war. Those firms naturally would have the departmental pattern and last on hand, and therefore could manufacture boots more expeditiously than any other firms could, and they were told to go ahead and manufacture according to Exhibit 12, which was the sample of the department. We required, however, such a great quantity of boots that we could not confine ourselves to those firms, and so other firms came forward and said: We have not the departmental pattern and last, but we have a boot here which is just as good and which we think is better than the departmental standard military boot. Their sample was submitted to and approved by the department, and the firms went ahead and manufactured boots according to that boot approved by the department. The evidence is that, so far as they are concerned, the boots that they manufactured were fully up to the sample. Exhibit No. 5, of which the House will hear a great deal, was the sample approved and sealed in 1905 and called the Slater sample, and it is the sample which the witnesses say is the boot continued down to the present day. The director of clothing and equipment swore that Exhibit No. 5 was supposed to be identical with exhibit No. 12. Colonel Brown, Chief Inspector of Boots, swore that Exhibits 12, 53, 55, 57 and 67, which were boots similar to the departmental standard manufactured by the firms who had departmental lasts, were selected by him out of stock boots and were as close as possible to Exhibit 5. I want, however, to give the last and most conclusive evidence that we have. After our inquiry was practically through, we employed two competent, practical boot experts to inspect all the boots that had been condemned, and on the last day of our inquiry we asked those two experts to cut up Exhibit 12, the boot from which some of the contracts were made, and the evidence shows conclusively that the boot Exhibit 12, was made according to specifications prepared by Slater in May, 1905, and that the boots were manufactured according to the approved samples. There was no opposition on this point, and hon. gentlemen opposite have practically admitted that—

Mr. MURPHY: No.

Mr. MIDDLEBRO: —that the boots were manufactured according to the sealed sample or according to the manufacturers' own samples submitted to and approved by the department; that therefore in all respects the manufacturers carried out their contracts and that the boots manufactured were equal and in many cases superior to the samples from which they were made. These two inspectors to whom I have referred were accepted unanimously by the committee. After they had cut up Exhibit 12, one of them, Mr. Hoar, in the presence of the other, Mr. Coté, gave the following evidence, as appears on the last pages of the evidence:

Q. What do you find with respect to the sealed sample No. 12. Take first the soles, after cutting it open?—A. The soles are 11 gauge.

And the specifications required only 10 gauge, so that the boots were better than the specifications in that respect.

Q. What sort of an inner sole do you find?—A. The insole is a good one.

Q. The insole is oak tanned?—A. Yes.

Q. What is the vamp?—A. Storm winter calf.

Q. What are the uppers?—A. The backs are of the same material.

Q. What are the counters?—A. The counters, oak tanned.

Q. And the heels you have already told us are of solid leather.—A. Solid leather, yes.

Q. What is the filling?—A. The filling is cork.

Q. Is that what they call Besto filling?—A. Yes.

By Mr. McCurdy:

Q. Cork and cement?—A. Cork and cement.

By Mr. Pringle:

Q. Having cut the boot open, what do you say as to the quality of the leather?—A. I say that it is a good boot.

By Sir James Aikins:

Q. What is the size of the outer leather?—A. 11 gauge.

Q. And the slipsole?—A. It is 7 gauge.
Q. The inner sole?—A. 7 gauge.
By Mr. Macdonald:
Q. Of course this information another manufacturer could not get without cutting the boot?—A. No, not unless be opened the boot.
By Mr. Murphy:
Q. What kind of a shank is it?—A. Leather shank.
Q. Solid leather?—A. Solid leather shank. There it is. (Exhibiting shank).
By Mr. Nesbitt:
Q. How near that type of boot did you calculate when you were judging whether a boot was up to the sample or whether it was not?—A. We had this boot. Exhibit 12, under consideration.
Q. You did not cut it open?—A. No. The boots we did cut open were up to sample, except in a few cases, as the report states.
Q. Did you judge them on the basis of what you found them to be?—A. Yes, sir.
By Mr. Macdonald:
Q. According to specification?—A. Exactly.

So that we have a minute description of the sample, and we have sworn and positive evidence that the sample was made according to specification; and the specication is the specification prepared by Charles A. Slater and approved by the department in 1905, and continued down to date.

Now, let us get some of the fundamental principles of a serviceable military boot. I take these from the report of the American Army Shoe Board. And I may say that we wired Professor Munson, the president of that board, and endeavoured to secure his services before this committee, but unfortunately he was absent in the Philippines, and thus we were unable to secure the benefit of his counsel.

An hon. MEMBER: Who is he?

Mr. MIDDLEBRO: He is president of the American Army Shoe Board who gave the conclusions of the board in 1912, and who was for some four years engaged in the investigations on the basis of which he arrived at his conclusions. Professor Munson says:

> The material of which the shoe is made, and the special treatment of the former, must be such as will facilitate evaporation of moisture from within, yet not to a degree by which the absorption of moisture from without is unduly favoured. Leather stuffed or saturated with oil was not used. The material or leather of the shoe upper must not be hard; otherwise it will cause blisters, callouses and corns. The "brogans" formerly used in our service and the footwear of various foreign armies, have this defect. The sole should be sufficiently thick to prevent the foot from being injured by inequality in the ground. But if too thick, planter flexion of the foot is lost and dorsiflexion is much reduced.

That is to say there is only one standard military boot for the United States army. It has been suggested throughout our investigation that the United States have a summer issue and a winter issue, and that perhaps the boot produced before this committee is the boot which the United States army had in summer. This report of the quartermaster general shows that the boot shown to the committee was the only issue they have for an active service boot, and it is lighter than the Canadian military boot. Professor Munson goes on:

> That hereafter only vegetable tanned leather without oil stuffing be used in the manufacture of marching shoes, mineral tanned leather not being considered the equal of vegetable tannage for military purposes.

Our specifications provide for the same chrome tanned leather as recommended by the quartermaster general of the United States.

Then, as to the life of an ordinary military boot. There seems to be some misapprehension in this country as to how long an ordinary boot is expected to wear. After his exhaustive inquiries this is what Professor Munson says:

> During the ordinary campaign, under usual conditions of moisture and roughness of roads as found in this country, a pair of shoes may be expected to last about two months and be sufficient, with light repairs, for a journey of 500 to 600 miles over ordinary terrain. But local conditions may very materially modify and reduce this estimate. Rocks and sharp gravel rub away soles rapidly, particularly if wet; while continued wetting for a fortnight or so may cause the stitching to rot and the shoe to fall apart and become unserviceable.

I would ask the House to bear this in mind when they consider the conditions under which the Canadian boot has been worn in the present campaign. Take Salisbury Plain as an instance. If we are to judge of the use of the Canadian boot there by the fundamental principles laid down by Professor Munson as to the life of the ordinary boot, we must allow for the fact that according to testimony before the committee, they had fifty-five continued days of rain. Such conditions, of course, meant a very short life for any army boot.

Now we come down to the actual contract for the boots. War was declared on the 4th of August. On the 8th of August a request was sent out by Quartermaster General Macdonald, asking them to provide at once 65,000 pairs of ankle boots. Such an order was, of course, unprecedented in the history of Canadian militarism. The only thing the department could do was to recognize that a certain number of firms had been making boots in the past for the Government, that they had the Government lasts, and so would be able to turn out the boots more rapidly. So these firms were called upon to furnish the major portion of the first order. The department sent out invitations for tenders to a number of firms including these and asked how many pairs they could make, and stipulating that the boots must be delivered within six weeks. This invitation was sent to the following firms: Ames, Holden, McCready Company; Slater Shoe Company, both of Montreal; and Louis Gauthier & Company, Limited, of Quebec; Tetrault Shoe Manufacturing Company, Limited, George A. Slater Ltd., both of Montreal; the Amherst Boot & Shoe Company, Limited, Amherst, Nova Scotia; Hartt Boot & Shoe Company, Fredericton, New Brunswick; and McPherson & Company, Hamilton.

The first three mentioned firms had previously supplied the department with the Militia boot, and the contract for this requisition of 65,000 was distributed as follows: Ames, Holden & McCready, 20,000; Tetreault Shoe Company, 20,000; Louis Gauthier, 10,000; Slater Shoe Company, 1,000; Amherst Boot & Shoe Company, 2,000; John McPherson & Company, 6,000; and Hartt Boot & Shoe Company, 6,000. These were all at $3.85, except the Hartt Shoe Company, who had tendered at $3.66. These contracts were all dated the 10th or 11th of August, with one exception. Deliveries were to be made within six weeks. As a matter of fact, deliveries began within 11 days, and 55,000 pairs were delivered within the six weeks and the balance a very short time after.

[Mr. Middlebro.]

At that time it was based upon the assumption that we would send 22,000 men to Salisbury Plain. It was afterwards decided to send 33,000 men, and they were sent. And we know that, since that time, we have organized a second, third and fourth Contingents, until, as I see by the announcement of the Prime Minister last Saturday evening, we have in training here, in France, England and elsewhere, 101,500 men. Every one of these men has had to be supplied with boots. This was a herculean task, and one that had never been contemplated up to that time by the Militia Department. Then, I would point out the conditions under which these boots were worn in Canada. It so happened that they were delivered at a time of the year which necessitated their being worn in the worst part of the year. They were issued in the fall, where they had to undergo the rain and slush of that season, followed by the rigours of the Canadian winter and then the snow and slush of the spring. They could not be put to a more severe test as regards weather conditions. I venture to say that if the boots had been first issued in the present month and had been worn for the next six months, we should not have had any investigation such as we have had within the last few weeks in this House.

The evidence is to the effect that in the early history of the war there were no regimental cobblers. To begin with, only one pair each was issued to the men, and thus the wearers were not given a chance to dry them. They were marched out day after day, route marching through rain, slush and wet. The men were brought into camp, but had no opportunity to change their boots or to dry them; and the evidence is that there were no regimental cobblers in the fore part of the war and no dubbing or grease was provided to render the boots waterproof. These conditions all contributed to a more rapid deterioration of the boots than would otherwise have occurred.

Since the war broke out the department have made a very material alteration and improvement in the standard army boot. In the month of October they came to the conclusion that instead of a slip sole, as it is called, they would provide a through double sole and they stipulated in October that thereafter all boots manufactured for the department should have the through double sole. Under that provision some 40,000 boots have been manufactured with the through double sole. In addition to that they concluded that the soles should be further reinforced by nails and that has been done. That is technically called quilting the soles. By these two changes a very substantial and beneficial improvement has been made in the character of the Canadian boot.

The committee were anxious to get a bird's-eye view, as it were, of what had taken place in Canada with respect to these boots. You may get an individual complaint here or there, you may get a complaint from a certain board of inquiry in a regiment where they have been using the boots under exceptional conditions, which might lead you at first to suppose that the boots were wrong. In Halifax, for instance, we find that in the earlier part of the training they were using these boots digging trenches in wet clay for seven weeks, and because the stitching gave way they came to the conclusion that all the boots were bad. That is not a fair test. Digging trenches in wet clay for seven weeks, we would expect that a boot would give way, especially when there was no regimental cobbler and no opportunity to dry the boots and no dubbing to grease them and only one pair of boots for each soldier. These are not fair illustrations of the general service that boots have to give. The proper way is to take a bird's-eye view of all worn boots in Canada, bring them together and see how they compare with the total number issued in the whole Dominion of Canada. The committee have done that. We asked the departmental officers to tell us, first of all, the number of boots that had been used by men in Canada who had not gone to England; then the number of boots discarded and not in use throughout Canada; and then we tried to find out how many of these boots could be repaired and, of those that could not be repaired, to find out the reasons for their unrepairable condition. We selected two practical men for this purpose. Of these men I shall have something to say hereafter. But first let me point out the manner in which condemned boots are placed before the Government. There is one way in which a soldier can get a new pair of boots, that is by getting his old ones condemned. At the beginning of the war there was only one way of getting a new pair, and that was through the medium of what are called regimental boards. The regimental boards were not only for regiments but sometimes for companies of a regiment, and in this way some 70 regimental boards have sat throughout Canada since the war began and have condemned boots. But it must be understood that in condemning boots these boards are simply adopting a process for getting new boots when boots were worn out by reasonable wear and tear, defects, or abuse on the part of the soldier himself. Let me read you upon that point from the evidence. Lieut. Col. Macdonald, the director of clothing and equipment in the department, who has been there a great number of years, in the inquiry swore:

By the Chairman:

Q. I suppose the real object of those boards of inquiry is to enable the minister to come to a conclusion, because he cannot do it himself personally—to come to a conclusion as to the state of boots reported on?—A. Yes.

Q. And those gentlemen get together, and get information from witnesses who are not sworn. And when the report of the Board of Inquiry comes I suppose you scarcely ever accept it without sending out your inspectors to see whether it is so or not?—A. In practically everything.

Q. You do not accept the recommendation at all?—A. No.

Q. As a matter of fact you regard them with suspicion?—A. I am afraid we do.

Q. Perhaps I should not say you regard them with suspicion, but you do not accept them as conclusive at all?—A. No.

Q. And for that reason you immediately send out inspectors?—A. We send out inspectors.

Q. You send for the boots and put the inspectors at work on them?—A. Yes.

Q. To see whether their condition justifies these reports?—A. Yes. Many of these officers who sit on the boards are men like myself who are not able to tell whether the boots sent up to them are the boots called for.

Q. And the fact that you put the inspectors to work on these boots shows that the report is not conclusive and was not intended to be so, but simply a gathering of what information you can get?—A. Yes.

Q. Did you have these boards of inquiry regularly?—A. Frequently.

Q. And the object of the inquiry was to see whether the men were justified in getting further boots?—A. Yes, justified.

Q. Or whether the boots being worn out was due to their own fault?—A. Yes.

Q. They have been more often rejected than acted upon?—A. Yes.

Q. Before the war they were more often rejected than accepted?—A. I would say so.

Q. They were more often rejected than accepted even before the war?—A. Yes.

By Hon. Mr. Murphy:

Q. What has been done since the war?—A. Since the war we have kept them there and had them re-examined.

Q. Kept them where?—A. At the different depots.

Q. Where the inquiry took place?—A. Yes, they are at all these various points; and if the inspector of leather finds that the fault was that of the maker of the boots, and sometimes they do so find, those boots were returned to the makers and they were replaced, or repaired and returned to us.

By Sir James Aikins:

Q. Those would be worn boots?—A. Yes, but if the fault lay, as it often happens, with the wearer of the boots, that the sole is gone, that the inspector of leather who examines it very closely finds that the man has put it on a hot radiator and burnt it, the boot is returned, and the man has to pay for it.

I simply quote that to show that a condemned boot simply means a boot which the regimental board think they are justified in taking in and re-
12 noon. placing. I shall cite a few instances of these condemned boots at the various regimental district headquarters. At Toronto there had been issued until the 19th of March, 1914, 14,000 pairs of boots, of which 8,357 were issued before the new year and the balance after the new year. Of these only 413 pairs in all have been condemned, and of the 413 pairs 117 were repairable, leaving only 296 unrepairable out of 14,000, or about 2 per cent of the whole issue. No one can reasonably say that 14,000 boots were bad boots, if, out of that number, in the time they have been in use, from December until now, or until the 19th of March even, only 413 pairs have been condemned, and there are only 296 unrepairable altogether, or 2 per cent even of the whole issue.

At Kingston 2,400 pairs have been issued, and the whole of these are now in use, except 5 pairs which have been cut up for inspection purposes, and which, of course, could not be returned; so that 2,395 pairs are still in use out of the 2,400, although we got a report from Kingston that those boots were like moccasins and the soldiers could not wear them. Whether they were like moccasins or not I do not know, but the fact is that they are all in use, the whole 2,400, except 5 pairs; and the evidence is that they are giving good satisfaction to-day.

As regards Quebec, Colonel Landry said that of the 5,500 pairs issued to his men only 55 pairs had been condemned, and that all the 55 pairs had been repaired and reissued; so that the whole 5,500 pairs are in use to-day.

At St .Johns, Quebec, Lt.-Col. Sabourin said that there only 40 gave any dissatisfaction, and that 20 of these were due to misfits. I think he said that over 1,000 pairs had been issued, and that they had been used in all kinds of weather.

Let me give a resumé of all the boots that have come back. Excluding all the boots that have been sent to England and all those that are not yet issued, there are in Canada to-day 86,000 pairs of boots worn by the men in Canada. Of that 86,000 pairs, only 7,807 have been condemned; that is, out of the total 86,000 pairs the proportion of boots that have for any reason been put out of work during that time is 9 per cent. What has become of the 9 per cent? Nearly 4 per cent, or 3,248, have already been reissued, leaving only 4,559 that are not reissued; that is only 5 per cent of the 86,000 have not been reissued. But that is not the whole story. That does not mean that the 5 per cent, or the 4,559, which have not yet been reissued are not repairable or serviceable; because the evidence, as I will show, indicates that the greater part of them are repairable.

In order to get a bird's eye view, we said: Bring to this committee all the condemned boots that are at the various regimental headquarters in Canada, and we will put two independent experts upon them. They sent us 1,713 inspections, of which 384 were singles and the balance pairs. The committee unanimously appointed two independent inspectors to go over those boots; one was J. A. Hoar, a customs shoemaker and cobbler, of Halifax, who had made boots for the military of the British Army and for the Navy, and who had had 30 years' experience as a cobbler and contractor. No one will say that his evidence was given in a biased manner. The other inspector was Mr. Magloire Côté, of the firm of J. A. & M. Côté, of St. Hyacinthe, who had been a manufacturer of shoes for 40 years and had no contract with the Government and had worked in every position in a shoe factory from the bench up to the position he occupies to-day. He also gave evidence in a very fair and satisfactory manner. These two men went away by themselves and made an examination of those 1,713 inspections. They reported on every single one, and collaborated in their report, the result, which was this: there were 1,713 inspections, of which 384 were singles. Out of these they found that 112 were burnt by the soldier himself and rendered useless on that account, and that 1,484 were repairable and should have been repaired. That left only 153 out of the 1,713, and they found that the unrepairable condition of 70 of these 153 was due to their being cut by toe nails, knife or spur. That left only 83 unrepairable. They also found that 68 had not originally been up to sample chiefly by reason of being too light in the backs. To summarize these figures, the total number issued to the men now in Canada is 86,000, and of these there have been condemned 4,557, which are now not in use. That leaves still in use 81,441 doing duty after six months' use. I am not saying by any means that the whole of these have been used for the whole six months, because the department only started to issue to these men on the first of October, and they have been issuing from time to time since. But the whole of that 86,000 are now in use except 4,557; and of these 4,557, there are still repairable 3,351. If we accept the same basis of classification that was given to us by the two inspectors who were brought here to inspect the 1,713, which were part of the 7,807 condemned by the different boards, then the result as to the total number of condemned boots is that out of the 86,000 pairs there are only out of use to-day 1,208 which cannot be repaired, and which have been in use for varying periods from the 1st of October up to to-day. These 1,208 are accounted for as follows: 510 are not in use through being burned, and 319 by being mutilated by knife, spurs or nails, leaving only 379 out of the whole 86,000 that are not in use by reason of fair and reasonable wear and from other causes. Now there is no politics in figures like that. These two men were appointed unanimously, and I think the committee must acknowledge that they gave their evidence fairly. That is the result of the test given by these two practical men who were appointed to examine the boots that were condemned.

In the minority report I notice the following statement:

> That out of the said number of boots 265 pairs were not worth repairing.

While that is true, they forget to say that out of the 265, 112 were burnt and 70 were mutilated by knife, spur or nails that is, out of the 265, 182 were mutilated as I have said; that leaves only 83 which could be properly put in as the number of boots that were not worth repairing. So it was not fair to say that 265 pairs were not worth repairing without making this explanation. The minority report also says:

> If the proportion of boots in this particular lot, not equal to sample, is a fair percentage of the number of boots furnished that did not come up to samples, out of the one hundred and eighty thousand pairs supplied, the number of boots so furnished that were inferior to sample would be seven thousand, two hundred and ninety-eight boots;

Any one can see how unfair that is because there were 68 inferior boots in the 1,713 condemned boots, which are a part of the 7,807 condemned and therefore the worst part, and probably the only defective boots in the 86,000, and it is argued in the minority report that the same proportion existed in the original boots.

That is his argument. In other words, it is just the same as if he argued this: I sell to a man ten pairs of boots and after six months he comes back with two; of the two one is defective, one is fifty per cent of two and, therefore, fifty per cent of the whole ten are defective. I do not know which hon. member is responsible for it, but that is the argument and that is put in the minority report for the purpose of trying to show over 7,000 defective boots in the 86,000.

These figures show conclusively that the boot in Canada has stood the test well, especially under the trying circumstances of our winter, fall and spring. There is another consideration that must not be overlooked. The evidence proves conclusively that in the great majority of cases the number of boots supplied by the manufacturers of Canada to the Government was less than one per cent of their whole output. There was no case where the amount of a contract held by a manufacturer was more than five per cent of his output. Is it to be supposed, apart altogether from patriotic reasons, that any manufacturer would be so foolish as to supply the department with an inferior quality of boots when what he was selling the department represented such a small proportion of his annual output? I should think that, in his own interests, he would say: the boots I will supply to the department will be the greatest possible "ad" for me if they are good, and they will be the worst kind of a curse to my business if they are bad. The quantity supplied to the Government was such a small proportion of his annual output that it is only fair to conclude that in his own self interest he would give the department as good a boot as he could turn out. My hon. friends will not say, and do not say, that the boots manufactured were not up to sample, and they entirely exonerate the manufacturers. On the contrary, they will have to say upon the evidence that the boots manufactured were equal to the sample, and in many cases superior to it. That is the case with respect to the boots worn in Canada.

Now, a word or two as to the boots sent across the ocean. The conditions of Salisbury Plain were no fair test whatever for any army boot. All the witnesses who came before the committee, witnesses who had been on active service at Salisbury Plain, said that the conditions were most abnormal and exceptional. I propose to read from the statements of witnesses who appeared before the committee and who had served at Salisbury to give us an idea of the conditions of weather there which these boots encountered.

Private Ross said:

(a) Private Ross, of the Queen's Own Rifles, who appeared before us, swore that he enlisted at Toronto, August 25th last, going to Valcartier. He sailed from Quebec on September 25th; that after reaching Salisbury Plains it rained for 35 consecutive days, and the camp grounds were wet and muddy during the whole time he remained there, namely, up to the 18th of February, 1915.

Mr. Bennett said:

(b) W. M. Bennett, of Walkerville, who was at Salisbury Plains once or twice a week between the 1st of November and the 16th of December, swore that the sun did not shine once while he was there; that it was constantly raining, and that it was nothing but a quagmire of mud around the tents; that during the whole time he was there it was not possible for a soldier to step out on the ground around his tent without getting his feet covered with mud, and that the roads were in an even worse condition, there being from 1 to 14 or 15 inches of a thick batter mud all over them.

I find on reading that over that I have not done justice to the conditions as described by Private Bennett, and I would like to read from the evidence itself:

Q. What time were you at Salisbury Plain?—A. I was there once or twice a week, each week between about the 1st November and 16th December.

Q. What were the conditions when you were there?—A. As regards what?

Q. As regards the weather.—A. Well, it could not possibly be worse.

Q. In what respect?—A. I never saw the sun shine once, it was usually raining. The mud was deeper and thicker than any place I ever saw in my life.

. . . . . .

By Mr. Chairman:

Q. Give us an idea of the mud conditions, what were they like?—A. Well, I can probably tell you that by saying, I think it was the greatest crime that Canadian troops were allowed to stay there.

Q. That does not answer my question.—A. I will describe it exactly then. At Bustard camp, where were located the 1st and 2nd Battalions, and possibly one or two others, the streets between the tents, the ground all around the tents, was nothing but a quagmire of mud. A man would step out of his tent and go down to about the top of his shoes in mud. It was that way every time I saw it. The roads were in even worse condition. There was anything from an inch to fourteen or fifteen inches of thick batter mud all over the roads. That is the description.

By Mr. Nesbitt:

Q. At Salisbury?—A. Well, not at Salisbury city. The Plain is 70 miles square. That is wherever the camps were.

Q. I saw some pictures in the Illustrated London News, showing water up to the step of the motors. Did you see anything like that where you were?—A. I have seen the water higher than that, where the motor could not go through.

Then Wm. T. Nussey, sergeant of he Princess Pats, who was located at Salisbury Plains until the 13th of January, swore that he had talked with those living at Ainsbury, Fulford Market, Lavington, and Salisbury, and they informed him it was the worst weather they had ever experienced in sixty years. These are the conditions, and the evidence shows that the English boot would not stand such conditions.

Mr. LEMIEUX: My hon. friend speaks of Salisbury Plains; will he give the evidence of Gen. Alderson?

Mr. MIDDLEBRO: Gen. Alderson did not give evidence, but I will deal with his message in a few minutes.

Mr. LEMIEUX: I referred to his letter.

Mr. MIDDLEBRO: The conditions at Salisbury did not afford a test chance for any boots, but I am going to give you the test which the Canadian boot did stand under these exceptional and abnormal conditions:

Sergeant W. T. Nussey, above named, stated that he and his men were delivered 100 pairs at Valcartier and that up to the time he left Salisbury Plains in January, 1915, he had heard no complaints from his men respecting the boots; had worn his Canadian issue from Valcartier up to the time he appeared before the board, and was still wearing them, and left them with the Committee as an exhibit. They were in fair condition, the uppers intact, and he had worn them continually without repair until the 6th of March, when he had them half soled and the heels repaired; and when giving his evidence described them as,—as good a pair of boots as he ever had on his feet; had worn both the British and Canadian Army boot and preferred the Canadian boot, and that he had seen 12 years' service in the Imperial Army.

Private Ross, above named, swore: He had been issued his boots at Valcartier on the 30th of August, sailed for Salisbury on the 25th of September, was invalided home on the 18th of February, wore his boots during all this four months' time with the exception of two weeks during which time he wore a pair of British boots and had his own resoled, and the heels fixed with nails; that he discarded his British boots as he preferred the Canadian, and had been wearing his Canadian boots down to the 10th of March, seven months in all, that they were still in good shape with the exception of a few stitches in the back, and that he had never heard any of his companions complain about the Canadian boot, and that the English boot, which he wore for two weeks did not stand the water any better than the Canadian boot.

Corporal Edwards, mentioned above when he appeared before the board was wearing the Canadian military boot which had been issued to him; he testified that he got them on the 5th day of October, after which he had gone to Salisbury Plains; that he had worn them ever since with the exception of a week which would be nearly six months he had worn them in all, and about two months ago he had had them half-soled; that they were still in good condition and be thought would last another three months; that before he had used the boots he had given them a good dubbin and had taken care of them ever since; that he had been wearing Canadian military boots for the last five years, and that he had not heard any complaints from the men at Salisbury Plains with respect to the boots.

Two pairs of British Army boots were produced before the board by Major General Hughes, and which he testified had been sent to him by Colonel Currie, commanding the 48th Highlanders, together with a letter from Colonel Currie stating that the boots had been in use for two weeks only; and, from an examination of these boots, we find that they have not stood the test as well as the Canadian boots worn by Nussey, Ross and Edwards.

The letter from our friend Col. J. A. Currie, of the 48th Highlanders, was addressed to Major General Hughes, and it reads:

North Larkhill, Salisbury Plain,
February 10, 1915.

Maj. Genl. S. Hughes,
Minister of Militia,
Ottawa.

Dear Gen. Hughes:

I understand there has been a great deal of talk in the paper about the issue of Canadian boots being very bad.

I do not agree with this as the great majority of Canadian boots issued to my men were good boots and of course bad boots are likely to crop up in the best lots.

A great stress has been laid on the fact that the English boot is superior. I am sending you by parcel post two pairs of Imperial boots issued two weeks ago to the men of my regiment.

Had the Canadian boots been nailed with small round headed nails such as are used in northern Ontario the boots would have worn much longer. I think there are still about 500 pairs of boots issued to my men at Long Branch still being worn and they are very comfortable on the feet and in dry weather will be much better than the English boot. My orderly room clerk has just been in and tells me he is wearing a pair of the boots issued to him at Long Branch and that he wears them in preference to the English boot, so the row raised over the boots has certainly lost Canada a good deal of business in boots and shoes we could have got and I do not think the cry raised was at all justified.

Yours very truly,
(Sgd.) J. A. Currie, Lt.-Col.

And I am glad to say that the men from my county are now in the trenches in France serving under Lt.-Col. Currie.

I may say that I am not contending that amongst the 180,000 boots furnished every boot was absolutely good and up to sample. It would be ridiculous to make any such contention, for there never has been and never will be 180,000 boots made without something being wrong with some of them, a few stitches slipped, a few nails missed or short, or something of that kind. Nobody would contend that every boot was perfect, but the finding of the committee is that the boots were manufactured substantially up to sample and in many cases superior thereto.

The boots for Col. Currie's men must have been issued to them at Long Branch in the months of September or October, and this letter is written in February; so that these boots had then been subjected to five months' wear at Salisbury Plain, under those abnormal and exceptional conditions, and Colonel Currie says that 500 of them—I understand there are about 1,000 men in his regiment—were still in use, which is certainly a very good test.

Only yesterday I received a letter which was of course not submitted to the committee, but I give it for what it is worth and without comment:

I quote from a letter received from my brother Corporal Wm. M. Waters who it at present serving with the first expeditionary force in France, and in the trenches:

"I can't see why all the papers are talking about our boots. The pair I got in Valcartier lasted till we left for France, and I'd rather have them now than the ones I have. They were lighter than these, but were a lot better."

I quote further from the proceedings before the committee the statement by a young soldier writing from Salisbury Plain:

Ninety per cent of the men here cannot wear the English make, and I am now wearing the Canadian boots. I am going to leave the English make behind and wear the ones from home, as they are more comfortable, though they might not possibly stand as much wear and tear.

In view of such evidence as this, I ask hon. gentlemen opposite what becomes of the great flaring headlines we have seen in the newspapers with respect to the fraudulent manufacture of these Canadian boots. I doubt if there ever was a class of citizens who have been so maligned as the Canadian boot manufacturers have been during the last two or three months. The result of this inquiry has been, and I am glad it has been so thorough, that we got before this committee all the permanent officials of the department, the boot inspectors, the Quartermaster General, the chief inspector of boots, the inspector of contracts, the assistant inspector of contracts, and we had also before us to give evidence all the manufacturers against whom any accusation in respect to boots was made. In many cases we asked them to bring their invoices with them, and in other cases they brought their invoices voluntarily. They have produced the boots, they have shown whence the leather came, they have shown what leather they bought and what they paid for the leather, and those who have come before us have sworn that they manufactured the boots according to sample, and the committee is practically unanimous upon that point. The manufacturers who did not come before us did not come because they did not find there was any allegation made against them, and so the result of the whole inquiry is that the boots manufactured for the Canadian soldiers were up to sample.

What, then, becomes of the unjust allegations made from time to time by the press of Canada with respect to these boots? These allegations have been shown to be not only untrue, but they had the effect of injuring a great industry of the Dominion, and I understand they have prevented us from getting large contracts for boots from the allied nations of Europe. What becomes, for instance, of the headlines in the press respecting the man who told us that the bottom fell out of the soles of his boots after five days' wear? A man made that statement at one of these inquiry boards, and we brought him before the committee and we put him on the stand, and he told us at first that the bottom fell out of the soles of his boots, and as he was leaving the witness box he was asked how the barracks where he was billeted were heated, and his reply was that the barracks were heated by steam. He was then asked: "Did you leave the boots on the steam heater all night?" and his answer was, "No." Then when the question was put to him: "How many hours did you leave them on the steam heater during the night?" he replied: "Only four hours." Then, our boot expert examined the boot in question and testified that the man had burned his boots so badly that the soles fell out of them.

What becomes of the flaming headlines in the papers that the soles of some of these boots were filled with cork, cement, and glue? The man who made that statement came before the committee and said: I find I am wrong; I did not know that in the best Goodyear welt shoe made there is a substance called "fillo" which it is necessary to put into these boots, and I find that the specifications of the Department of Militia prepared by Charles E. Slater in 1905 for the late Government, required that this filling be placed in the very best Goodyear welt soles, and I did not know what I was talking about. And yet, notwithstanding that denial, the insinuation has gone throughout the length and breadth of Canada that the boot manufacturers of this country have been guilty of fraud in this respect.

What becomes of the allegations contained in flaring headlines in the newspapers of Canada that paper was used in the soles? I am not here to defend the manufacturers; I started out with the same prejudice against the manufacturers that the general public had before this investigation was held. There appeared in the Liberal press of this country, and in the Conservative press as well, flaring headlines placed before the people announcing that paper and other shoddy material had been found in the soles of these boots. Well, if paper had been found in the soles of these boots, hanging was not too good for the man who put the paper in. What I want to state here is that from the beginning of this investigation to the end, among all the boots that had been examined, among the 7,800 boots that had been condemned, and among all the boots that had been worn, no paper could be discovered in the soles. Among the many boots cut open by the Militia Board of Inquiry, and among the many boots cut open by the capable experts named by the committee, there has not been a single boot from beginning to end of this investigation as to which there was the slightest evidence that paper or any other fraudulent or shoddy material was put in the sole.

Then it was heralded throughout the country that a certain manufacturer had announced that when he looked at the boots provided for the Canadian soldiers he said he would not have it on his conscience to manufacture a boot like that and make money out of the lives of the soldiers. What became of him when he appeared before the committee? Let us see exactly what did happen when this gentleman did appear before us. It was shown clearly by the evidence that in 1913 Mr. Minister had tendered for boots for the department on the very same specifications, at $4.85 a pair; that in 1914, when he was given an opportunity to tender the same as the rest of the manufacturers, he said, "You have my price, and it is $4.85," and he was willing to tender again if he got that price, and to make the boots for our soldiers. Here is his evidence to prove it:

Q. When the telegram came to you in 1914 asking you to tender on the shoes, you put in a tender, didn't you?—A. If you call that puting in a tender.

Q. You put in a figure of $4.85. You said you could manufacture them for that?—A. I don't think I put in any new price. I told them they had our price.

Q. Of $4.85?—A. Whatever it was.

Q. And you have already told us that that price was based on the specification in your possession. How else could you tender?—A. That price was based on the specification I received.

Q. You were willing to make a boot along the lines of the specification you had in your possession at $4.85?—A. I think so.

Q. No doubt about that at all in April?—A. Yes.

Q. And you were willing to make the same boot in August at the same price?

Mr. Macdonald: Witness explains that the situation was different when the war was on. Let him speak.

You will notice that it was Mr. Macdonald who was explaining that, not the witness.

By the Chairman:

Q. When you sent down your tender after the war was on—

Mr. Macdonald: The witness ought to be allowed to answer.

By the Chairman:

The Chairman: I am putting a question to him.

Mr. Macdonald: He was in the course of explaining when you interrupted.

By the Chairman:

Q. You put in a tender after the war was on, didn't you?—A. I would not consider that a tender.

Q. You offered to make the same boots after the war was on?—A. I said we could make so many boots, and they had our price.

Q. And that price was what?—A. $4.85.

Q. In other words, you meant that you could and would make boots for the department at $4.85 after the war was on?—A. Yes, I would—

Q. And it was on the specifications you had in your possession then that you made that offer?—A. So far as the material was concerned and workmanship.

Q. So far as the specifications were concerned?—A. Only that part of the specifications.

Q. So far as material and workmanship were concerned?—A. Yes.

Q. What else is there?—A. There is the shape.

Q. It was only a question of shape, then?—A. Principally, so far as the boot we were going to make.

By Sir James Aikins:

Q. I understand you objected to the form of the last that was adopted in respect to the new boots. I understand your main objection was to the shape of the boot?—A. That was the principal objection, and some other little things in the workmanship.

Q. What were the other little things?—A. I did not think they were reinforced properly.

Q. What do you mean by reinforced properly, do you mean the soles were not reinforced?—A. Yes.

Q. Reinforced with additional nails?—A. Additional nails, and a different kind of nails.

Q. Anything else?—A. I do not know of anything else.

This is the man who was willing to manufacture the same boots with a few additional nails in the heels if he could have obtained $4.85 for what the department were paying $3.65. This is what his partner, Major Myles, said when we brought him before the committee:

By Sir James Aikins:

Q. Have you ever been on active service?—A. I have not; I was called on the occasion of 1885 in the Northwest Rebellion.

Look at Exhibit 12—

Exhibit 12 is admittedly the boot from which all the army boots were made, except those that were submitted by the manufacturers to and approved by the department.

Q. Look at Exhibit 12; for the ordinary purposes to which you have been accustomed in Canada, do you think that would be a suitable boot; that is assuming that the size would fit a soldier?—A. For ordinary wear I think it would be.

Q. It is a good boot?—A. So far as I can see, till it is tested; I do not want to give an expression of opinion.

Q. On your own military experience.—A. We never had any boots issued to us by the department in our camps. The soldier had to wear his own boots. So far as I am concerned, the boot question never came up in my experience.

Q. So far as military boots are concerned, of the use of that as a military boot for campaign purposes you know nothing?—A. Nothing.

By Mr. Chairman:

Q. Do you remember your partner saying that before the war broke out at all your firm had in their possession the departmental specifications for a boot?—A. I saw the specification that came to us.

Q. You had them in your possession?—A. We had them in our possession.

Q. You had them in possession before the war broke out, and you put in a tender to build a boot for $4.85?—A. Yes.

Q. And if you had got the contract you would have made a boot before the war broke out for $4.85 on that specification?—A. Our signature is there.

Q. And you stand by your signature?—A. I stand by our signature.

Q. And after the war broke out you got an invitation to tender, and you sent back saying, you have our price?—A. Yes, "you have our price."

Q. And that was for the boot on the specification you had?—A. Yes.

Q. And if they had written back and said "all right, we will give you a contract for 10,000 pairs of boots" would you have stood by your signature and made the boots. Is that right?—A. Yes.

This is the man who was too conscientious to make boots for the Government for $3.65, but would have made them for $4.85.

I think I can very well summarize the conclusions of this committee as follows, and in coming to these conclusions I am doing so on the evidence that has been adduced:

1. The standard military boot of the department when war was declared was the result of over fifteen years of careful consideration by that department, and after inspection of both the British and the United States military boot.

2. The present Canadian military boot is of the same class, but a much better boot than that issued to and worn by our men in the South African campaign, where it gave good satisfaction and was preferred to the British army boot, both of which were worn by our men there.

3. The boots supplied to the Militia Department since the war broke out were made according to the samples of said standard boot in the department, or according to samples submitted by the manufacturers to and approved by the department, and that they were in all cases equal and in many cases superior to said standard sample army boot of the department.

4. The United States Army Board after four years' deliberation adopted a standard army service boot which is similar in many respects to ours, but lighter.

5. The standard British army boot is not a suitable boot for adoption in Canada.

6. Out of 86,000 boots issued to and worn by the men now in Canada, all are now in use except 4,559, and of these about 3,351 are repairable and can be re-issued, leaving only 1,208 useless, and out of these again about 510 are useless owing to burning and 319 cut by knife, spurs or nails, leaving only 379 useless owing to ordinary wear and tear out of the 86,000; and this seems to prove that the boots have given good service in Canada through the worst part of the year, that is, the fall, winter and spring.

7. The exceptional and abnormal wet weather to which the boots were subjected at Salisbury Plain was not a fair test of the boots; no boots could resist the water under such conditions, and notwithstanding that the Canadian boots stood the test well, and the communications from General Alderson and Sir George Perley that the boots would not stand the rough wear and tear of Salisbury Plain must be read in the light of the abnormal and exceptional weather conditions that were encountered there, because no boot would stand such a test and remain impervious to water under such conditions.

8. Since the war broke out the department has very materially improved the standard boot by the requirement of a through double sole, and by re-inforcing or quilting the sole with nails.

9. A committee of experts and a special boot expert have been employed by the department with a view of ascertaining if any further improvement in the present standard army boot can be made, and that matter is still under consideration.

Mr. MARCIL: The hon. member for Rouville (Mr. Lemieux), before leaving the chamber, asked me to ask the hon. member for North Grey (Mr. Middlebro) not to overlook the question he put in regard to the statement made by General Alderson.

Mr. MIDDLEBRO: I did not overlook it, but I will say just a few words more. As I said, in the communications from General Alderson and Sir George Perley, the wording of their report, if I remember it rightly, is that the boots would not stand the rough wear and the wet weather to which they were subjected at Salisbury Plain, and that if they were unserviceable, it was on that account. What I say is, that in view of the evidence we have disclosed here, and in view of the evidence which we have gathered from outside quarters, such as that to which my hon. friend from North Oxford (Mr. Nesbitt) referred, that is, the illustrations of Salisbury Plain in the Illustrated London News and other papers, and taking the only evidence we have before this committee—and I suppose it is upon that evidence we are bound to form our conclusions—of men who have been at Salisbury Plain, I have no doubt that conditions were most exceptional and abnormal; that like conditions have probably never been encountered before in the last twenty or thirty years there; that all the communications from the other side must be read in the light of those exceptional circumstances; that no boot would stand the conditions which were encountered there, and that therefore the boots supplied would not completely stand the conditions encountered there, nor the British boot either.

Mr. MARCIL: I understand the hon. member had a letter. If he has no objection, would he read it?

Mr. MIDDLEBRO: It is printed in the proceedings.

At one o'clock, the House took recess.

The House resumed at three o'clock.

Hon. CHARLES MURPHY (Russell): Mr. Speaker. In appointing a special committee of this House to investigate all matters relating to the boots that were supplied to the Canadian soldiers who enlisted for the present war, the right hon. the Prime Minister (Sir Robert Borden) recognized the force of an aroused public opinion upon a subject which comes closely home to the Canadian people. His action at the time it was taken undoubtedly averted what was then a threatening storm; but, Sir, I venture to say that notwithstanding what was alleged by my hon. friend from North Grey (Mr. Middlebro) in his speech of this morning, when the facts adduced before the committee become generally known the storm will break, and the first to feel its effects will be the right hon. gentleman and his colleagues. By reason of the evidence submitted to us I am unable to concur in the report presented by my hon. friend from North Grey, and I propose to place before this House, as briefly as possible, the grounds upon which it should, in my judgment, decline to adopt that report.

Let me say a word as to the necessity of providing soldiers on active service with a suitable boot. That is an elementary principle to be observed in the equipping of any army. In this connection I cannot do better than give the House an extract from an article in the Liverpool Weekly Mercury of February 27, 1915:

> Good boots are of equal importance for the rank and file as brains are for the officers of an army. This is why such efforts have been made in various quarters to produce the best possible supply of army boots. The Duke of Wellington considered good boots as an item of the first importance in the soldiers outfit and when asked what he thought came next in importance replied: "A spare pair." "But what after that?" repeated his interviewer, "A spare pair of soles," said the Duke. Troops are useless if not mobile, it matters not how they can shoot if they are unable to reach the place where their shooting will take effect. It is therefore a sign of practical wisdom in those who instituted the marching and shooting competitions to combine them so as to make them inter-dependent. Marching power must be cultivated as well as marksmanship and the soldier may be inefficient from inferior boots just as easily as from an out of date rifle.

The opinions I have just quoted were confirmed by General Lessard and by every officer who appeared before the committee. In fact, Sir, the only persons who appear to have failed to grasp such an elementary principle are the members of this Government; and the consequences of their failure to do so were placed before the committee in a manner to which I intend to direct the attention of the House a little later on.

Before dealing with the contracts that were awarded after the war began, or with the boots that were supplied under those contracts, let me draw attention to certain facts which have an important bearing on the inquiry that the committee was directed to make. To do this it will be necessary to go back a few years; but for the moment I will not go further back than the year 1905. On the 9th of May, 1905, an ankle boot made by the Slater Shoe Company, of Montreal, was adopted by the Department of Militia and Defence as their sealed pattern to be used in future contracts. This sealed pattern was not designed as an active service boot, nor was it the boot that was used by the Canadian soldiers in South Africa, the hon. member for North Grey to the contrary notwithstanding. It was a boot suitable for soldiers in time of peace, and did not materially differ from the ordinary walking boot used by civilians in Canada. After 1905 some slight modifications were made in the boot, and the boot so modified was sealed by the officials of the Militia Department as their sealed pattern on January 15, 1911. The Slater Shoe Company of Montreal continued to supply boots according to this sealed pattern until after the change of Government in 1911. Then, in the year 1913, the L. Gauthier Company, of Quebec, became the principal contractors with the Department of Militia and Defence, and in that year they supplied 8,000 pairs of boots to the department. Some of these boots were in the ordnance stores when war broke out in August last, and when arrangements were made to purchase the first lot of 65,000 pairs of boots, no specifications were furnished the contractors, but several of these Gauthier boots were selected as being in every respect similar to the sealed pattern, and were sent to the contractors as samples of the boots they were to manufacture. During the inquiry it was shown that the Gauthier samples sent out to the manufacturers were inferior to the Slater sealed pattern, and the latter, I wish the House to observe, is the boot which was adopted during the regime of the late Government. On the point of the Gauthier samples that were sent out to the manufacturers in August last being inferior to the sealed pattern that was in the department, Mr. N. Tetreault was examined and gave evidence to this effect, that in the upper the leather in the Gauthier sample was lighter than the leather in the Slater sealed pattern, the stock being one and six-tenths in the sample and two and four-tenths in the sealed pattern, while in the vamps there was the same proportionate difference between the two as to weight and thickness. As to the slugs in the heels, in the sample, zinc slugs were used and in the sealed pattern steel slugs were used, and there was an additional half-row of these steel slugs in the pattern. Mr. Tetreault's evidence on this point will be found on pages 1101 and 1102 of the printed proceedings of the committee. That evidence clearly establishes the fact that, even if the contractors had made boots in all respects similar or equal to the samples furnished them, their boots would have been inferior to the sealed pattern, which, as I have said, was not intended for an active service boot. It was under these conditions that the first order for 65,000 pairs of boots was given in August last. Then, in September, the second order for 32,867 pairs was given. Of these boots some were made from the inferior samples sent out by the department, and others from samples furnished by the contractors themselves. In cases in which the contractors furnished the samples, we had evidence from several of them to the effect that the samples they furnished were equal to or better than the inferior Gauthier sample. On October 8, 9 and 10 further orders were given for 30,000 pairs under conditions similar to those that governed the September order. On October 24, the Department of Militia and Defence made a change in the sample boot by doing away with the slip sole, that is, the sole between the inner and the outer sole and extending from the toe to the ball of the foot.

In the place of this slip sole the department provided for a double sole running through to the back of the heel, and by reason of this change the price was increased from $3.85 to $4 a pair. Between October 29 and November 4, the department ordered 40,532 pairs of these double-soled boots, which were made in the same manner as the boots ordered in September, namely, some according to the departmental sample, and others according to samples furnished by the contractors themselves. In the month of November, under instructions from the acting Minister of Militia to purchase boots locally in Winnipeg the senior ordnance officer in that city bought 3,798 pairs of boots from middlemen. These middlemen had the boots manufactured in different factories in Ontario and Quebec, at prices ranging from $3.40 to $3.60 per pair, while they charged the Government an average price of $4 per pair. Afterwards, several other orders were placed in different parts of Canada, and in all the department purchased, as the hon. member for North Grey (Mr. Middlebro) has already told the House, 180,664 pairs of boots.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Does the $4 which the hon. member quotes as the price at Winnipeg include freight to that point?

Mr. MURPHY: I do not propose to go into those details; I am just giving the details as we got them before the committee.

Mr. MEIGHEN: It is very important.

Mr. MURPHY: I was about to say that having stated the manner in which purchases were made, it is important to see what arrangements were provided by the Government for the inspection of these boots. Up to the end of the year 1911, the inspector of boots in the Department of Militia and Defence was a practical boot and shoemaker. That gentleman was dismissed without cause in December, 1911, and in his place was appointed another gentleman who had had no experience as a boot maker or as a tanner, and whose business immediately prior to entering the department had, according to himself, been that of a broker. He had been in the department prior to the change of Government.

Major General HUGHES: What was the name of the man dismissed?

Mr. MURPHY: Edward Wallace.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: Who was appointed in his place?

Mr. MURPHY: Colonel Brown.

Major General HUGHES: Does the hon. gentleman say that when Wallace was dismissed Col. Brown was appointed? Col. Brown has been there for years and years and years.

Mr. MURPHY: If the hon. gentleman wants to make a speech—

Major General HUGHES: I am asking a question.

Mr. MURPHY: I am stating facts and I object to being interrupted. This is the House of Commons, and I appeal for your ruling, Mr. Speaker.

Major General HUGHES: If the hon. gentleman objects to a question—

Mr. MURPHY: I do not object to any proper question, but I object to having my speech broken up. I had stated that Col. Brown was in the department prior to the change of Government before my hon. friend asked his question.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: In what position?

Mr. MURPHY: Inspector of harness and saddlery.

Major General HUGHES: And boots.

Mr. MURPHY: No, not of boots. He never made a boot in his life, nor was he a tanner either.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: I do not suppose he ever made a saddle or harness either.

Mr. MURPHY: Still, he is there yet. In August last, when the first contracts were given, five other boot inspectors were employed, and of these only three had had experience as boot and shoe makers. It was admitted by all the witnesses who had had any practical experience that the only way in which boots could be properly inspected was to follow them through the various processes of manufacture in the factory. The inspection in the factories was carried out only in a limited number of cases, and most of the inspecting done was by making a superficial examination of the finished boot. It is important also to mention that all the inspectors used the same stamp, so that it was absolutely impossible to identify the inspector of any particular lot of boots. In the case of the first order given in August last, 13,926 pairs of boots were delivered at Valcartier without any inspection whatever, and I am convinced that there was no inspection of the boots purchased at Winnipeg or Vancouver. On the whole, therefore, the department was not equipped to do the inspection, and as a matter of fact that work was not properly done.

Let me now refer the House to some evidence that was given with reference to the sample boot, and the boots made from the sample and afterwards issued to the soldiers. First, as to the sample boot. Speaking generally, that boot was condemned as an active service boot by every witness who appeared before us. Prior to the appointment of this special committee of the House, the Department of Militia and Defence had appointed a departmental committee in the month of December last to investigate the complaints with regard to these boots, which even then had reached considerable proportions. That committee was composed of Lt.-Col. Hallick, E. A. Stephens, and Theo. Gallipeau. When speaking this morning, my hon. friend from North Grey (Mr. Middlebro) took exception to the competency of the members of that departmental board, and found fault with us for quoting in our minority report some of the opinions expressed by members of that board with reference to the matters in regard to which they conducted their inquiry. In this connection I have only to point out to my hon. friend that we quoted merely the opinions of those members, but we were careful to add that the witnesses who appeared before that committee appeared afterwards before the special Committee of this House, and confirmed under oath the opinions that had been expressed before the departmental board. On page 597 of the Votes and Proceedings of Friday last, the 9th of April, there is a summary of the opinions of the departmental board with regard to the character of the boot prescribed and supplied by the department. That summary is as follows:

> That the boot was of unsuitable shape and make and that the leather contained no water-resisting medium;
> That the heels and soles are unprotected and sole-filling is often poor quality;
> That the boot was unsuitable for the soldiers and for the particular work for which they were provided; because,—
> (a) The shape is such that the average foot has not room for the free movement of the toes and is thus not suitable for marching;
> (b) The leather is dry, containing no grease, and consequently quickly absorbs the water;
> (c) Soles and heels not being re-inforced with metal, soon wear down, especially when wet.

And the comment made in reference to that by my colleagues and myself who composed the minority on the committee was that we were of opinion that these findings of the departmental board, expressed by them it is true merely as opinions, had been amply proved by the evidence submitted to us.

Then, Sir, this sample boot was condemned as an active service boot by every manufacturer who appeared before us. Mr. Tetreault, for instance, said that it was ridiculous to put such a boot on a soldier; and Mr. Matthews, the gentleman who evolved the ingenious theory that the boots supplied to the soldiers were not supplied for the purpose of being used on active service, but merely to break in the feet of the soldiers so as to accustom them to a heavier boot when they got on active service, condemned this sample boot as unfit for active service. Similar evidence was given by Mr.

Adams, of the Murray Company, and by Mr. William Silver, one of the gentlemen recently appointed as a boot inspector in the department, who stated that everybody acknowledged that the boot was too light for the service to which it was put.

Now, a few words as to the judgment passed upon the boots, made from this sample boot and issued to the soldiers. The first condemnation of the boots to which I wish to draw the attention of the House is that contained in the cablegram from General Alderson, dated the 19th November, 1914, and sent to the Government at Ottawa. That cablegram will be found at page 245 of the printed proceedings and is in these terms:

The boots now being issued to the contingent are not suitable for rough wear in wet weather. Please cable instructions for purchase of boots here if we can obtain them.

Instead of answering the request made by General Alderson, some brilliant genius at Ottawa conceived the idea of sending over 48,000 pairs of overshoes, and this cablegram was sent to General Alderson:

Reference your cable re boots. Forty-eight thousand pairs overshoes already shipped. Will this meet your requirements?

To which General Alderson replied on the 25th November:

It has been found that overshoes do not compensate for faulty construction of boots. Some pairs are useless after ten days' wear. Special report is being made.

Mr. LEMIEUX: That is from the commander of the Canadian forces?

Mr. MURPHY: These cablegrams are from the general commanding the Canadian forces. These cablegrams are followed on November 24, 1914, by a cable from a colleague of my right hon. friend (Sir George Perley), who is at present acting as High Commissioner in London. On the 24th November, 1914, Sir George Perley cabled to the Prime Minister at Ottawa in these terms, and this cablegram will be found at page 247 of the printed proceedings:

"Confidential. Much difficulty obtaining orders Canadian boots. Authorities consider them too light altogether; say only heavy marching boots adapted to campaigning; find general complaint on this account regarding boots given our Canadian contingent; stated they will not stand mud and water and heavy work. Consider overshoes impracticable, as they are heavy to walk in and will only last short time on hard roads. In my opinion next contingent should be provided with boots made on regulation army pattern.

"(Sgd.) PERLEY."

There, Mr. Speaker, we have the proof of the condemnation of the boots supplied the first Canadian contingent by the general in command of that expeditionary force, and by Sir George Perley, acting High Commissioner in London. But that is only a very small fraction of the condemnation of these boots. There were more than seventy regimental boards of inquiry held in England and in Canada in regard to the quality of the boots issued to the soldiers. In every case these boards condemned the boots that were brought before them, and all of the reports of the boards were sent to headquarters in Ottawa. It is not my intention to cumber the record of the House with copious extracts from these reports; but I do intend to direct your attention and that of the House to the evidence that was given by individual soldiers who appeared before these regimental boards and who later on appeared before the special committee of the House and gave evidence under oath.

First of all, let me quote the evidence given by Private McGarvie which will be found at page 557 of the printed proceedings:

By Mr. Pringle:

Q. What regiment are you connected with?—A. 6th Field Ambulance.

Q. You examined some boots for a Board of Inquiry which sat in Montreal on 22nd December, 1914?—A. Yes, sir.

. . . . . .

Q. Where had you your experience in respect to leather?—A. Maybole, Ayrshire, Scotland.

Q. What was your experience?—A. I have had experience since I was a boy of fourteen years of age.

Q. What doing?—A In the shoemaking business.

Q. Were you apprenticed there?—A. I served eight years in the shoemaking business for a start; that is, clicking; I was a shoe clicker.

Q. I do not understand?—A. An upper cutter.

Q. How long were you at that business?—A. I had to serve eight years before I was a journeyman.

Q. What kind of leather were you accustomed to; what tannage?—A. Split, kip, box calf, greasy kid, anything at all.

Then, at page 558 the same witness gives this further evidence:

By Mr. Macdonald:

Q Did you ever work at the boot trade in Canada, McGarvie?—A. No, sir, I am only acting as regimental shoemaker for that Company now.

Q. How long have you been in this country?—A. For three years.

Q. You were mobilized with the corps last fall?—A. I have been five months with the corps now, sir.

Q. And your rank is that of private, is it?—A. Private, sir.

Q. When were you made regimental shoemaker?—A. About a month ago.

Q. You have been repairing bad boots since that?—A. Not exactly repairing them. I have been stripping them to see what really could be done with some of the boots lying down there, and I found in the heels alone, when trying to peel off the heel top, it ought to come off direct, but in place of that it came off in small pieces, it was just like a sponge in the center. It just tore off like you would tear a piece of pasteboard.

Q. What other defect did you find dealing with the boots there?—A. I would say the uppers are too light.

Q. Too light?—A. Yes, for military wear the uppers are too light.

By Hon. Mr. Murphy:

Q. Is that the whole boot you are referring to?—A. Yes, I say the whole boot is too light.

At page 560 the same witness is further examined:

By the Chairman:

Q. The uppers are right, are they not?—A. The uppers look all right, they may suit a civilian, but they are not suited to a military man, and the usage he puts them to. They are all right for Sunday.

Q. Did you serve in any military force before you came to Canada?—A Yes, I was seven years in the Royal Scots Fusiliers.

There you have the evidence of a man who speaks from his experience, both as an Imperial soldier and as a practical boot and shoe maker.

Next, let me refer you to the evidence given by Quartermaster Sergeant Wainwright, which will be found at page 410 of the printed proceedings.

By Mr. Pringle:

Q. What is your official position?—A Quartermaster Sergeant.

Q. I see that at a Board of Officers assembled at the headquarters of the 31st Battalion, Victoria Park, Calgary, on the 8th December, 1914, you made certain statements, You said:—

> "That he finds the boots generally as received by him into stores are unfit to stand the hardships of a campaign, owing to the uppers being made of split leather, differing from the British Army contracts, which call for 'kip' uppers. Of the boots received, those of McPherson, Hartt, and Murray, these three names being separate companies, appear to be the better makes of those received, but even these will not last the length of time they should under present climatic conditions. Those marked 'McCready' appear to be very light and flimsy."

What have you to say with regard to that?—A. Well, sir, the boots were not fit for soldiers.

Q. Was it on account of the climate that you consider the boots were too light?—A. No, I say the boot was too light and flimsy for the hardships they had to undergo.

Q. How many pairs of boots did you examine?—A. I think something like sixty-three pairs.

Q. Who was the manufacturer?—A. Well, the biggest percentage was made by Gauthier and McCready.

The same witness was further examined, and I quote from his evidence, page 412:

Q. Out of 1,093 boots you do not think there were a dozen as good as the sample, that is in your opinion?—A. That is my opinion. I would not think I had a dozen pairs of boots as good as that boot there.

Further evidence was given by this witness, in answer to questions put by Mr. Macdonald, at page 414:

By Mr. Macdonald:

Q. What is your military experience?—A. I served twelve years in the Imperial army, sir.

Q. Before coming to this country?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. Consequently you know what a proper military boot is?—A. I do, sir. I have served all over the world, practically speaking.

Q. Your emphatic condemnation of these boots is made on your experience as an English soldier?—A. Yes, sir.

There again you have these boots, supplied by the Government of Canada to the Canadian soldiers, condemned by a man who has seen service for many years in the Imperial army.

The next evidence from which I wish to quote is that of Major F. W. Doane, and at page 329 of his evidence this appears:

By Mr. Pringle:

Q. You are connected with the 63rd Regiment, I think?—A. Yes, sir, Major and Quartermaster.

Q. I notice that on 29th September, 1914, you had an examination of boots issued to the men of "A" Company?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. Can you tell us what condition those boots were in?—A. Speaking generally, the boots were badly worn.

Q. Was there any defect in the workmanship of the boot?—A. The stitching was bad.

Q. Was that bad stitching in the soles or in the uppers?—A. In the soles.

Mr. Pringle: I happen to have looked at some of those Halifax boots, and as you say, they are certainly very badly worn—the soles are practically worn off some of them.

Further on, at page 331, I quote from Major Doane's evidence again:

By Mr. Macdonald:

Q. This inquiry was held on the 29th September, and the boots were issued on the 10th August. Tell us what was the condition of the boots at that time?—A. After about a fortnight the boots were worn through so that the men's feet were on the ground. They had to tie shingles and bits of board and pieces of bag across the bottoms of their boots to keep their feet off the ground.

By Hon. Mr. Murphy:

Q. Do you mean to say they went around in that way, with pieces of shingle and board tied to their boots?—A. Yes, sir, they had to.

By Mr. Pringle:

Q. Had you not any cobblers attached to your regiment?—A. We had one, but we had not any material, and these boots could not be repaired.

Q. They had gone too far?—A. Yes.

Mr. RAINVILLE: Read the next page, please.

Mr. MURPHY: I will leave that for my hon. friend to read; I cannot burden the record with all the evidence.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: Nor with any evidence that is not favourable to you.

Mr. MURPHY: It is open to my hon. friends to read that evidence. In connection with these boards of inquiry that were held at Halifax there was called Captain C. A. Mumford, and at page 373 of the evidence the following appears in his testimony:

By Mr. Pringle:

Q. I see, Captain Mumford, that you were president of a board for the examination of boots, held on the 29th September, 1914, at McNab's Island?—A. Yes, sir.

Q. The other members of the board appear to be W. E. Doane, Lieutenant, and C. N. Bennett, Lieutenant?—A. Yes, sir.

At page 374 of Captain Mumford's evidence I quote:

Your finding was: (reads)

"The board having examined the boots are of opinion that they have become unfit for further use and that they should be replaced and the cost charged to the public."

The witness was further examined, and at page 377 the following questions and answers appear:

Q. Was the health of your men affected by reason of these boots?—A. Yes. In fact I had three tubercular men put into the hospital out of that lot. I think they all contracted heavy colds.

Q. Three of your men that were tubercular have been—A. Put out of the regiment.

Q. By reason of the colds they contracted?—A. Yes.

Q. They have since been put out of the regiment?—A. Put out of the regiment.

Q. Where are they now?—A. At their homes.

Q. Where?—A. At Halifax.

Q. What are their names?—A. One was Sutherland, another Hefferman, I just forget the other. I am not captain of our company now.

Another witness from Halifax who appeared before the committee was Captain F. C. Kaizer, and I quote from his evidence at page 367:

By Mr. Pringle:

Q. I see, Captain Kaizer, that you were president of a board of officers assembled at McNab's Island, Halifax, N.S., on the 29th September, 1914, by order of Lieut.-Colonel T. W. Viditi, for the purpose of examining boots issued to the men of "A" Company and reporting on the condition thereof. The other members of your board were Lieut. W. M. Rogers and Lieutenant R. C. Macdonald. Now, you took evidence, I see, from Major F. W. W. Doane?—A. Yes, sir.

Further on, Captain Kaizer deposed:

Q. In what condition were the boots in on the 29th September, when you held this inquiry?—A. They were practically all gone; the uppers were left.

At page 371 the following evidence from Captain Kaizer is reported:

[Mr. Murphy.]

Q. How far is McNab's Island from the city?—A. It takes about an hour to go down on the duty boat, but it goes in a roundabout way and makes a lot of calls. Maybe in a straight line it would be a little over two or two and a half miles.

Q. Was the health of the men affected by the state of their boots?—A. Yes. They all got colds.

Q. You say they all got colds?—A. Yes. We found it was very difficult to do anything with the men; we had to favour them all we could because of that.

Q. You heard the evidence that some of the men had to tie their boots with some material to protect their feet. What was that?—A. Canvas and bags principally. In my company there were three or four men who used that.

Q. They tied canvas bags to the soles of their boots?—A. Yes.

Q. To prevent their feet coming out on the ground?—A. Yes.

Q. How many men had to go around in that condition?—A. About three.

Q. For how long?—A. Two of them bought boots for themselves, and the other one used rubber boots for about perhaps a week or ten days, whenever it was wet. He used to use the rubber boots for night duty.

Q. How long would you say these three men went around with bags tied to the soles of their boots?—A. Oh, probably a week or ten days.

I quote from the bottom of page 372 and the top of page 373 from the evidence of Capt. Kaizer:

By Hon. Mr. Murphy:

Q. You said it was a common occurrence to see some of these men wearing bags on their feet. They went up and down and were seen on the duty boat?—A. Yes.

Q. Were these men going to Halifax?—A. I presume so, or maybe to some other port of call that the duty boat goes to.

Q. So that anybody that had eyes could see?—A. Could see.

Q. Could see what these men were wearing and the condition in which their feet were?—A. Exactly.

Q. And you know of no action being taken to remedy that by anybody in authority?—A. I do not know of any action having been taken. As I say, that is something that is outside of my sphere altogether.

Q. At any rate, you do not know of any action?—A. I do not know of any action.

These regimental boards of inquiry were held throughout Canada and in England and as late as the first of the present month of April, a board sat in the city of Ottawa, and I shall acquaint the House with the condition of certain military boots here in Ottawa on the first day of this very month.

Lieut. Anderson was called, and his evidence, which will be found at page 1189, is as follows:

By Mr. Pringle:

Q. I see you were a member of a Board of Officers which sat at Ottawa on the 1st day of April, 1915, by order of Lt.-Col. E. C. Arnoldi, 10th Artillery, for the purpose of inspecting the boots issued 25th Battery and Ammunition Column 7th Artillery. The board consisted of Captain W. Harty. He is absent, is he not?—A. He is on leave.

Q. The other members were Captain J. S. McParland and yourself?—A. Yes.

Q. You say you had to deal with nine pairs of boots. Of these, five pairs were worn through at the toe. In the case of one pair the heel was rotten and fell off in a week. Two pairs, the soles wore off. One pair warped so badly as to be unwearable in spite of being properly greased. Do you know when these boots were first issued to your battery?—A. We got orders to recruit on the 1st of March. The official order was given on the 5th or 6th, I think.

Q. Where did you mobilize?—A. In Ottawa here at the drill hall. We are still at the drill hall.

Q. You mean at the armouries?—A. At the armouries. The first week recruiting was fairly good, and after we had 100 or 150 men we started issuing clothing and boots.

Then, on page 1190:

By Mr. Pringle:

Q. How many pairs were issued altogether?—A. 279.

Q Out of the 279 pairs, you have only had complaints in regard to these nine pairs?—A. No, sir; I had a man this morning and his boot hurt him so—it was worn right through to his foot. The boot getting wet, had shrunk. I have had a great many complaints. The doctor told me this morning that that man could not walk that he could not wear the boots. They were at least one size too big for him.

Q. Out of 279 pairs, in regard to how many have you had complaints?—A. 25 or 30 pairs, probably more.

There you have proof that even down to the present month of April these boots have continued to be condemned by regimental boards, and no excuse as to weather conditions can be offered by even the most partisan supporter of hon. gentlemen opposite for the failure of these boots which were issued to this local battery and which wore out under the most favourable weather conditions in Ottawa in less than three weeks' time. I could cite a great many other cases of the same character, but it is not my intention to take up the time of the House in so doing. I submit that the cases I have already cited are amply sufficient to show the failure of the boots supplied by the Government under the various orders placed in August last and in the succeeding months.

In view of the conditions disclosed by the evidence before the committee, it will naturally be asked: What did the Government do to provide a remedy? So far as results are concerned, the Government has done absolutely nothing. From certain official files produced before the committee, we learned that in the month of December last there was some cabling to England and certain correspondence intimating an intention on the part of the Government to adopt the British boot as a pattern for the Canadian military boot, but nothing was done. In the month of January, when this matter continued increasingly to attract public attention, there was a rather important series of developments at Ottawa. At that time, if my information is correct, the hon. Minister of Militia and Defence was either absent from Ottawa, or, if not, some of the matters relating to his department were being looked after by a subcommittee of the Privy Council. In that month the boot manufacturers got together and decided they would send a committee to Ottawa to make representations as to a boot that should be substituted for the boot issued to the Canadian soldiers. Accordingly about the middle of January a committee of boot manufacturers, consisting of Mr. George A. Slater, of Montreal, Mr. N. Tétreault, of Montreal, and Mr. W. R. Louson, of Ames-Holden-McCready Company, Limited, came to Ottawa with a specially prepared boot; and, as I recall the evidence, a draft of a new specification. They first interviewed the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Sir. George Foster) on the subject, and were by him referred to the right hon. the Prime Minister, by whom they were again referred to a subcommittee of the Privy Council that was dealing with war contracts; and later on they secured an audience in the Privy Council Chamber with the subcommittee which they stated was presided over by my hon. friend the Minister of Marine and Fisheries (Mr. Hazen). They made representations to this subcommittee as to the inefficiency of the boots that had been supplied, and they produced a new boot which in their opinion should be substituted for the ones being worn by the Canadian soldiers. It appears that the subcommittee of the Privy Council was so impressed by the representations made that it appointed a special committee of boot men to go into the matter presented for its consideration, that special boot committee being composed of Mr. George A. Slater of Montreal, Mr. E. E. Donovan of the E. T. Wright Company of St. Thomas, Ontario, Mr. E. A. Stephens of Ottawa, and Lt.-Colonel Brown, Inspector in the Department of Militia and Defence. These gentlemen conferred together, and about the 20th of January they submitted their report to another meeting of this subcommittee of the Privy Council. In effect, they recommended the boot which had been prepared by the boot manufacturers, and they also presented a specification to govern the manufacture of that boot. As told to our committee, they were very courteously received by the subcommittee of the Privy Council which examined their boot, read over the specification and then asked them to retire while the subcommittee conferred about the matter. Later on they were brought back to the Privy Council Chamber and were informed by the hon. Minister of Marine and Fisheries, who at that time was Acting Minister of Militia and Defence, that the subcommittee had decided to adopt the boot submitted by this boot committee as well as the specification that they had prepared, and that 110,000 pairs of these new boots would be ordered. Up to that point it appeared as if business would be done; but the House will probably be surprised to learn that afterwards nothing was done.

The next step of which we had knowledge in the committee was that on February 18, 1915, two days after the special committee of this House began its work, an Order in Council was passed appointing Mr. S. R. Wickett, a tanner of Toronto, as chief adviser on boots. It is true that Mr. Wickett stated before the committee that he had received instructions from the hon. Minister of Militia and Defence to begin work in January, but he took no part in the proceedings before the subcommittee of the Privy Council, and there is no official record of his appointment until the Order in Council of February 18, 1915, which was based on a report to Council of the hon. Minister of Militia and Defence to the effect that Mr. Wickett had extensive experience in the manufacture of footwear, and that he was therefore the best available expert to advise the Government on the subject.

However, when Mr. Wickett was examined under oath he told us very frankly that he had never made a boot in his life; that he was a tanner. Now, Mr. Wickett, who is a most respectable gentleman, was one of the last witnesses examined before our committee, and he informed the committee on the last day he was there in the capacity of a witness, that he had not yet made a report as to the type of boot that he would recommend, and he was not quite certain when he would make such a report. That brings us down to the present month of April. What are the conditions at the present time? According to Colonel J. F. Macdonald, the director of clothing and Equipment, there are at headquarters in Ottawa requisitions for about 20,000 pairs of boots; and that gentleman swore that there were less than 1,000 pairs of boots in stock to meet these requisitions. So, it may fairly be stated that the Government's record for inaction at the present time stands thus: They cancelled no contracts that they had awarded; on the contrary, they allowed the contractors to go on and supply boots that were generally condemned as unfit for active service; and some of these boots were delivered as late as last month: they have continued to send troops to England since November 24 last, with the same boots as were condemned by General Alderson and Sir George Perley; they have made no attempt to outfit any of the troops with boots suitable for active service; and finally, according to the director of clothing and equipment, there are requisitions in for nearly 20,000 pairs of boots which they are not able to fill.

That being the state of affairs at the present time, what was the nature of the defence put up by the majority of the special committee in their report? First of all, in excuse for the failure of the boots, we are told that the boots were issued at a bad time of the year—that there was snow and slush. But these gentlemen failed to tell the House and the country that the first issue of boots had been condemned by the General Commanding the Overseas Expeditionary Forces and that they had been rejected and replaced by the British army boot. Then they failed to tell the House and the country, so far as the boots worn in Canada were concerned, that the soldiers in nearly all places, if not in all, where severe weather prevailed, were furnished with overshoes, and in some cases with rubbers. But they say, by way of excuse to the House for the haste in which some of the boots were produced: There was the retreat from Mons. Well, of all the fantastic reasons to excuse the failure of the Government, this is the most fantastic. I waited to hear the hon. member for North Grey (Mr. Middlebro) repeat in his speech that excuse which appears in the report of the majority; but I noticed that he did not repeat it, and I think that upon reflection he will not do so. It has been said that the comic is never very far from the tragic; and the dragging in of the retreat from Mons as an excuse for the bad boots furnished the Canadian soldiers illustrates the truth of that saying. My hon. friend says that the boot issued to the Canadian soldiers in this war is the same as was issued to the troops in the South African war. I have already made the statement that that was not the case, and I intend to prove that that was not the case. Let me refer you, Mr. Speaker, and the House, to the evidence given by Assistant-director of Stores McCann, which will be found at page 1033. After Mr. Pringle, the Government counsel, had put in a report dated 9th of May, 1905, showing that on that date a sample boot made by the Slater Shoe Company had been sealed as the pattern boot, the following evidence was given:

Q. We have got a pattern sealed on 9th May, 1905.—A. Yes.

Q. Is that the sealed pattern that has been carried down to the present date?—A. Practically.

Q. Practically the same?—A. There are some slight differences I expect; I do not like to give a definite answer.

Q. Probably Colonel Brown could speak as to the pattern. There have been some slight changes, but you say it is practically the same as the sealed sample?

By Mr. Macdonald:

Q. From 1905?—A. Yes.

Q. Then it does not date back to the South African war?—A. No.

Again, turning to page 1034, where the same witness gives this further evidence:

Q. Do you remember who were the contractors for the boots used in the South African war?—A. So far as my recollection goes, the Vankleek Hill Shoe Co. and A. W. Reddin.

Q. When did the Slater Shoe Co. begin to supply boots?—A. I think they began to supply a different pattern of boot probably about 1905. They were long boots, a winter boot, a knee boot for the cavalrymen, what is called Wellington boot, with a little low leg. I cannot recall the Slater Shoe Co. having made ankle boots until probably 1902-03.

Q. That would be the time that Canada assumed control of her own defence on land, and the quantity of boots required would be greater.—A. Possibly, sir.

Q. The 1905 sealed pattern was altogether a different pattern boot from the one used in the South African War?—A. So far as I can recollect, it was, except this, if I remember rightly. A number of the men who went to South Africa bought their own boots. Slater boots, with their own money. Of course, there were not a great many men who went to South Africa. The men of the Strathcona Horse wore those long boots.

Q. They were outfitted by Lord Strathcona?—A. Yes. I think they were. I think they got their boots from the Slater Shoe Co.

Then, Sir, let me direct attention to the further evidence given by the same witness, at page 1057:

By the Chairman:

Q. Are you able to answer our question as to when the first Slater shoes, ankle boots, were made for the Militia Department?—A. Some time in the latter part of 1900. I think it was September, 1900.

Q. That will be after the troops had gone to South Africa?—A. Yes, sir.

By Hon. Mr. Murphy:

Q. Was that when the boots were bought and paid for?—A. They were ordered in September, 1900.

By the Chairman:

Q. There is no doubt then that none of the Slater boots, ankle, were supplied to the soldiers who went to South Africa?—A. If they were they were not paid for. They were not, I am quite sure.

By Hon. Mr. Murphy:

Q. Then how did other officials come to tell us they were the Slater boots?—A. Probably a misunderstanding. A lot of these people bought Slater's boots and wore them in preference to ours.

Q. But even the men in South Africa referred to the sealed samples as a similar boot. They have told us that over and over again?—A. They must have been mistaken, sir.

Now, as against this positive evidence of the assistant-director of contracts who had better knowledge of the subject than any other man who appeared as a witness, because of his long service in the department and his familiarity with these matters, my hon. friend from North Grey cited General Otter.

Mr. MIDDLEBRO: Will the hon. gentleman excuse me. I know he wishes to be fair. I would refer him to page 1039, where the same witness says:

By the Chairman:

Q. Those who went to South Africa, and who did not buy their own boots, wore this class of boot?—A. It was this class that went to South Africa.

He also said that the present boot was better than that pattern.

Mr. MURPHY: I am quite well aware of that, but if my hon. friend will just cast his recollection back a few weeks he will remember that at the time Mr. McCann gave the evidence he has just cited, he was in some doubt as to the date upon which Slater first began supplying boots of this character to the department, and, his answers being unsatisfactory to the committee, he was directed to go back to the department and get official information so as to inform us accurately as to the facts.

Mr. MIDDLEBRO: But Mr. Slater himself subsequently swore that he supplied these boots for South Africa.

Mr. MURPHY: I am coming to that. Mr. McCann came back after getting the exact facts and gave evidence, which I have quoted, and which will be found at page 1057. Files were produced, and we had the documents there verifying it. My hon. friend said this morning that Charles E. Slater said he began supplying boots about the time of the South African war, but Mr. Slater did not give the exact date, nor was he pressed to give the exact date. Mr. McCann gave the date, and in answer to my hon. friend himself said:

There is no doubt that none of the Slater boots were supplied to the soldiers who went to the South African war.

For the reason that the two contingents had gone before Slater began supplying them in the latter part of 1900. There is absolutely no doubt about that.

Mr. MIDDLEBRO: We are not saying that the present boot was the same, but that it was a better boot; but we say it was the same class of boot, and other witnesses have sworn it was the same quality.

Major General HUGHES: Is it not plain that the boots supplied by the Government then were not the Slater boot, but that the soldiers, finding the Government boot inferior, bought the Slater boot?

Mr. MURPHY: No, nothing of the kind was plain; the very reverse is the fact.

Major General HUGHES: We will verify it.

Mr. MURPHY: The very reverse is the fact. As against this positive evidence given by Mr. McCann, my hon. friend from North Grey cited some casual observations made by General Otter, who, as my hon. friends will remember, strolled into the committee room one morning, stayed there a few minutes, and answered a few questions in a casual way. What did he say? Let me refer you, Sir, and the House, to his evidence as it appears at page 927:

By Mr. Pringle:

Q. In what capacity have you served with the permanent force?—A. I have commanded a regiment in Canada, I commanded a regiment in South Africa, and I have commanded a district in Canada.

Q. What boots were the permanent force supplied with?—A. Well, it was a boot issued by the Government, a regular boot, I don't know whose it was or who it was made by.

I will read that again:

I don't know whose it was or who it was made by.

Q. Covering the period of the last ten or twelve years?—A. Yes, for the last fifteen years.

Q. You cannot speak of the maker of the boot, you do not know who made it?—A. No.

And evidence from that witness is what my hon. friend quotes to offset the positive evidence of McCann!

Mr. MIDDLEBRO: A boot was shown to him in the committee and he was asked: "Is that the class of boot you wore in South Africa?" and he said "Yes."

Mr. MURPHY: What he did say I am just going to read. It is at page 928:

Q. How long were you in South Africa?—A. 14 months.

Q. In active service?—A. All the time.

Q. What boots did your regiment have during that time?—A. It was a boot issued by the department before we left.

Q. Similar to Exhibit 12, that boot I showed you?—A. That description of boot, yes.

That is what General Otter said, just as any man would who had previously declared that he did not know who made the boot or what kind of boot it was. The defence on that score, I submit even to my hon. friend from North Grey, falls completely to the ground.

Mr. MIDDLEBRO: My hon. friend has forgotten to quote the next question, which was that it was practically the same boot; that is what he says.

Mr. MURPHY: Yes, without ever looking at it.

Mr. MIDDLEBRO: I will read the whole thing.

Mr. MURPHY: I did not interrupt my hon. friend, and any of his friends can quote all this evidence.

Mr. MIDDLEBRO: Will the hon. member allow me to ask this question? Does he find this at page 928 of the evidence?

Q. Similar to Exhibit 12?—A. In that time, you know, the boot was changed more or less. I mean to say, every now and then they would change it; they would get improvements in it. It might be a little lower one time, and more heel in it another time, but it was practically the same boot.

Mr. MURPHY: If my hon. friend thinks that the citation improves his position I have only to refer him again to what the General said at page 927:

I don't know whose it was or who it was made by.

Q. You cannot speak of the maker of the boot, you do not know who made it?—A. No.

And I refer him again to page 928, to the General's answer:

Similar to Exhibit 12, that boot I showed you?—A. That description of boot, yes.

Mr. MIDDLEBRO: Practically the same boot, and that is the boot from which the boots were made in this case.

Mr. MURPHY: If my hon. friend is satisfied that the evidence which he has cited from Gen. Otter is more conclusive on the point as to what boot was worn in South Africa than that given by the assistant director of contracts, then, of course, I leave my hon. friend to enjoy whatever comfort he may get out of that contention.

I have already taken up too much of the time of the House. I have given the chief reasons why we cannot concur in the report whose adoption has been moved by the hon. member from North Grey. Other reasons will be advanced by the hon. member for Pictou (Mr. Macdonald) and the hon. member for North Oxford (Mr. Nesbitt) and possibly by other hon. gentlemen who may take part in this debate. I submit that the evidence has established mismanagement, indifference, neglect and incapacity on the part of the Government; and I, therefore move, seconded by Mr. Macdonald, that the report now read be not concurred in, but that the following be substituted in lieu thereof:

The Special Committee appointed under Order of the House on February 16, 1915, for the purpose of investigating and reporting thereon to the House the report of the Board of Inquiry consisting of Col. W. Hallick, E. A. Stephens and Theo. Galipeau, respecting boots supplied the Department of Militia and Defence as laid on the table of the House on the 15th of February, and all matters pertaining to the boots supplied to the said department, beg leave to present the following as their report

Your committee met for organization on the 19th of February when Mr. Middlebro was elected chairman. Numerous sessions have since been held and we beg to submit the printed record of the proceedings and or the evidence taken, and the exhibits received and other exhibits as the same were before us.

Your committee find that no part of a soldier's equipment is more essential to the proper performance of his duty and to his health and comfort than the boots which he wears on active service and that in preparing the Canadian soldiers for such service a special responsibility devolved and still devolves upon the Government to see that the soldiers were not and are not hampered in any way by defects in the kind of boot supplied and that especial care should have been and ought to be exercised so as to provide the very best boot obtainable, in order to insure the safety, comfort and efficiency of our soldiers while serving the Empire.

Your committee regret to report that this duty was not fulfilled by the Government in regard to the boots purchased and supplied to the Canadian soldiers who have been on active service both at home and abroad since August last, and that negligence and want of care are quite apparent. The following facts have been amply proved by the evidence submitted to us:

That the boot supplied to the Canadian permanent force previous to the war, being similar to the boot sealed by the officials of the Militia Department on January 15, 1911, was a boot suitable only for men in barracks and in times of peace, and not for men on active service;

That the boots given to the contractors in August last by the Department of Militia and Defence, as sample boots, in accordance with which they were to manufacture the boots under their contracts, were inferior to the sealed department boot in the following respects:

In the uppers the leather in the sample was lighter than the leather in sealed pattern, the difference being 1⁹⁄₁₀ in sample and 2⁴⁄₁₀ in pattern.

In vamps there was the same proportionate difference between the two as to weights and thickness.

Slugs : In the sample zinc slugs were used and in the pattern steel slugs were used and there was an additional half-row.

That no specifications were furnished to the various contractors in August last and no conditions as to details of manufacture were imposed on them other than that the boots supplied should be similar to the inferior samples above referred to and 65,000 pairs of boots were ordered in this way in August;

That the sample boots so given to contractors were taken out of a number which had been manufactured by L. Gauthier & Company, Quebec, and supplied to the Department of Militia through the intervention of Charles E. Slater, at the price of $3.72½ per pair; that the said Charles E. Slater's name was placed on the patronage list by the Minister of Militia and Defence and that the said Charles E. Slater received in commissions on boots supplied the Militia Department the sum of $15,275.

That the "last" used in the manufacture of said sample was not a proper last for the production of boots suitable for active service;

That the said sample boot was declared to be an unsuitable boot for soldiers on active service by practically every witness before us;

That the Minister of Militia and Defence personally approved of the awarding of contracts upon said sample on August 10, 1914;

That a proper and strict inspection of the boots supplied was not provided for before their delivery, and 13,926 pairs of boots were accepted at Valcartier without any inspection whatever;

That after the first orders for boots were given in August, further large quantities were ordered in September without any consideration being given to rendering the boot more suitable for active service, in some cases the sample boots submitted by manufacturers being accepted without proper care and examination and in other cases the inferior sample being again used and 32,867 pairs of boots were so ordered in September;

That on the 25th, 27th, 29th and 30th days of September a number of regimental boards sat in Halifax to consider the condition of the boots issued to men on active service in the month of August, all of which condemned the boots submitted to them that had been supplied by L. Gauthier & Company under their regular contract previous to the war, and which were of the type similar to the sample boots used as a model in the manufacture of the boots issued to the Canadian soldiers for active service. It was proven that these boots collapsed under active service conditions through ordinary wear and tear and after a short usage; that in some cases the soldiers were compelled to use slingles and bags on the soles of their boots; that three men had contracted illness on account of defective boots and were compelled in consequence to retire from the regiments. The decisions of these boards were that the boots examined by them should be condemned and the reports of these boards were duly forwarded to headquarters, at Ottawa;

That in the month of September last, Mr. Alfred Minister of Minister, Myles Shoe Company, Toronto, who had been asked to supply boots similar to the inferior sample, stated that he declined to do so because they would be unfit for men to wear on active service and he would not make the shoes, according to sample, knowing they were going to be served out to the men who were going to the war and he did not want to make any money out of a man's life;

That in the month of September the "last" specified by the department was condemned by a contractor who declared, "he was not going to risk making shoes with that last which would not fit anybody; (See Tetreault's evidence).

That one manufacturer declared when asked his opinion of the sample supplied by the department, "It is ridiculous to put that on a soldier"; (See Tetreault's evidence).

That another manufacturer stated, that shoes made from the inferior sample were never meant for foreign service and that in his opinion the Government fully realized that the boot would not stand any hard wear when they issued it. (See Matthew's evidence.)

That another manufacturer stated that the inferior sample was not suitable for the soldiers and did not consider the boots made from it were suitable for active service. (See Adams evidence.)

That Mr. William Silver, one of the inspectors employed by the department stated that the boot was not intended for active service, and that, "we all acknowledge the boots were too light for the use they were put to;"

That on October 8th, 9th and 10th, further orders were given under similar conditions to those given in September, and 30,000 pairs of boots were ordered on said dates;

That on October 24th the department directed a change to be made in the sample boot by doing away with the slip sole that had been in use and providing in its place a double sole running through to the back of the heel, but made no further changes in the specifications or in the direction of providing a proper boot for active service, and on various dates between October 29th and November 4th, proceeded to order 40,532 pairs of boots under similar conditions as to sample boots, as they had used in September, with the exception of providing for a double sole and increasing the price of the boot to $4 per pair, and that some of said double-soled boots have been since returned before your committee, in a badly worn condition after three weeks' use.

That in the months of November and December, 1914, and January, February, March and April, 1915, grave complaints arose from the men on active service throughout the country, as to the failure of the boots supplied to them, which caused illness among the men, prevented them from performing their proper training, and occasioned much discomfort and difficulty to them;

That as a consequence over seventy Regimental Boards were summoned in the months above named, under the regulations by the commanding officers of the various corps located at different places between Calgary and Lethbridge in the West and Halifax in the East, and these boards examined 11,054 pairs of boots, which were stated in many cases to be samples of larger numbers of other boots complained of by their men, thus indicating the extent of the difficulty created by inferior boots. Of these 11,054 pairs of boots, 7,807 pairs were condemned and discarded by the various boards. (The Minister of Militia and Defence stated that he was aware of these findings and reports of these boards.)

That in Toronto 225 pairs of boots were burned, as being of no further use, and a smaller number were burned in Kingston, for the same reason;

That we have had before us the commanding officers of different battalions composing the overseas expeditionary forces and other officers of these battalions and non-commissioned officers and men now on service in Canada, who have joined in condemnation of the boots supplied by the department and declared it was not suitable for active service;

That on November 19th, General Alderson cabled to the Militia Department at Ottawa, "that the boots now being issued to the contingents were not suitable for rough wear in wet weather," and asked for instructions to purchase boots there, and to this a reply was sent that 48,000 pairs of overshoes were shipped to him. On December 5th, General Alderson again cabled, "it has been found that overshoes do not compensate for faulty construction of boots; some pairs are useless after ten days wear. Special report is being made."

That Boards of Inquiry were held in England by officers of several Canadian corps on the 11th day of November, the 19th day of November, the 5th day of December and on the 21st day of December, respectively, and reports thereon as to the character of the boots supplied to the men of the overseas forces by the Canadian Government, were made by the various colonels in command, who state among other things, that the condition of the boots had caused great inconvenience to the men since enlisting at Valcartier; that they had been found to be decidedly unserviceable and that in many cases boots have become so dilapidated that they had to be discarded altogether;

That on November 24th, Sir George Perley, Acting High Commissioner for Canada, cabled to Sir Robert Borden "authorities consider Canadian boots too light altogether; say only heavy boots adapted to compaigning; find general complaint on this account regarding boots given our Canadian contingent; stated they will not stand mud and water and heavy work. Consider overshoes impracticable as they are heavy to walk in and will last only short time on hard roads. In my opinion next contingent should be provided with boots made on regulation army pattern."

In this connection it may be observed that the troops who have gone to England since November 24th, have gone with the same kind of boots complained of by General Alderson and Sir George Perley, and no attempt was made to outfit them with different boots, and that notwithstanding all the Regimental Boards held in Canada and England and the general complaint from all quarters as to the boots, the parties to whom contracts had been given in October were permitted to go on supplying boots of the character complained of, and in some cases the delivery of these boots were not completed until the month of March and long after the committee had entered upon its labours, and no contracts were cancelled.;

That in the month of November last the Militia Department directed the senior ordnance officer to purchase boots locally in Winnipeg and 3,798 pairs of boots were purchased there, not directly from manufacturers of boots but through middlemen;

That owing to the fact that the boots supplied for the first overseas contingent at Valcartier and in England, were not available for our examination, the evidence, with the exception of a few isolated witnesses submitted to us as to these boots, rests upon the reports of the Regimental Boards in England and of General Alderson and other officers there, and the statement of Sir George Perley;

That on December 7, 1914, a Court of Inquiry into boots, was constituted by the Department of Militia and Defence which, on January 7, 1915, made a report to the questions submitted for their consideration, which report has been referred to us by the Order of the House constituting your committee. The witnesses before the board were not sworn and were confined to department officials, all of whom with one exception have, however, been before your committee and given their evidence under oath. This Court of Inquiry in addition to hearing the witnesses, devoted themselves to an examination of the boots referred to in their report and their findings express merely the opinions of the different members of the court who afterwards gave evidence before your committee, confirmatory of their answers to the submitted questions. The opinion of the board may be summarized in so far as the character of the boot prescribed and supplied by the department, is concerned, as follows:

That the boot was of unsuitable shape and make and that the leather contained no water-resisting medium;

That the heels and soles are unprotected and sole-filling is often poor quality;

That the boot was unsuitable for the soldiers and for the particular work for which they were provided; because,—

(a) The shape is such that the average foot has not room for the free movement of the toes and is thus not suitable for marching;

(b) The leather is dry, containing no grease, and consequently quickly absorbs the water;

(c) Soles and heels not being re-inforced with metal, soon wear down, especially when wet.

We are of the opinion that these answers as quoted, have been amply proven to be correct by the evidence submitted to us.

This report was made on January 7, 1915.

That a committee of boot manufacturers from Montreal, composed of George A. Slater, N. Tetreault, and W. S. Louson, of the Ames, Holden, McCready Company, acting apparently on their own initiative, approached the Government early in January, realizing the necessity of a better boot for the Canadian soldiers, and made representations as to the necessity of action to a Committee of the Privy Council, over which Hon. Mr. Hazen presided. It appears that a committee was appointed, composed of Mr. George Slater, Mr. Donovan, Col. Brown and E. A. Stephens, who prepared a boot which they recommended as suitable for soldiers on active service and prepared and submitted on January 21, to the department, a draft specification for a suitable boot. On this committee's work and report no action appears to have been taken, although it was sworn that Hon. Mr. Hazen stated to the committee that the boot they had prepared was approved by the Privy Council Committee and that 110,000 pairs would be ordered by the Government.

That on February 18, 1915, by Order in Council, Mr. S. R. Wickett was appointed as Chief Advisor on Boots, to the Department of Militia and Defence, on the report of the minister dated February 11, 1915. Mr. Wickett states the minister actually assigned him his duties on January 13, but he took no part in the deliberations of Hon. Mr. Hazen's Committee;

That Mr. S. R. Wickett, the Chief Advisor on Boots, is of opinion that boots of the type hitherto supplied to Canadian soldiers since the war began, are too light for active service, and expects to recommend a suitable boot much heavier throughout and with many radical changes;

That at the present time requisitions for nearly 20,000 boots are waiting to be filled in the department and there are very few boots in stock, and that practically the whole of the 180,664 pairs of boots of the type complained of have been issued to Canadian soldiers since August last, notwithstanding all the defects, the complaints, the illness and discomforts of the soldiers, and the adverse reports which have existed and been made since they were first supplied;

That the evidence before us, especially that of Mr. Tetreault on page 780, et seq., shows that the Government could have without much trouble or delay provided a proper boot suitable for soldiers on active service. It was well understood that the boot supplied to the department before the war was not an active service boot and the failure to provide a proper boot for the Canadian soldiers going on active service, constitutes grave and serious negligence on their part. It has been sworn to that they could get all the new lasts they would have required, in a week's time, and it has been sworn that the matter of drafting specifications for a boot to replace what Mr. Wickett calls a "Summer Boot" could be accomplished in the same period, but no official act on the part of the Government to provide a proper service boot was undertaken until February 18, two days after your committee was appointed;

That if the haste in forwarding the First Overseas Expedition, interfered with the providing of a proper active service boot for the men at Valcartier, there was ample time to provide for and supply such a suitable boot for the men of the Second and Third Overseas Force who have since crossed the ocean or who are still in training in Canada.

That with reference to the character of the boots manufactured under the contracts by the various contractors, we are of opinion that none of the said boots were boots suitable for active service;

That representatives of the following contractors appeared before us:

Ames, Holden & McCready Co., Ltd., Montreal.
Amherst Shoe Company, Amherst, N.S.
McPherson Shoe Company, Hamilton, Ont.
The Murray Shoe Company, London, Ont.
The Relindo Shoe Company, Toronto, Ont.
The George A. Slater Company, Montreal, Que.
The L. Gauthier Company, Quebec, Que.
The Tetreault Shoe Company, Montreal, Que.
The Valentine & Martin Co., Waterloo, Ont.
The Western Shoe Co., Berlin, Ont.

The representatives of all these Companies stated that they had manufactured and delivered boots in accordance with the sample. The following companies were invited by telegram to offer representations to the committee, with regard to the quality of boots supplied by them, but no representative appeared on their behalf to give evidence before the committee:

The Aylmer Shoe Co., Aylmer, Ont.
The Cook-Fitzgerald Co., London, Ont.
The J. & T. Bell Co., Ltd., Montreal, Que.
J. M. Humphreys & Co., St. John, N.B.
The Regal Shoe Co., Toronto, Ont.
The E. T. Wright Co., St. Thomas, Ont.
The Hartt Boot and Shoe Co., Fredericton, N.B.
The Williams Shoe Co., Ltd., Brampton, Ont.
John Ritchie & Co., Quebec, Que.
W. B. Hamilton Shoe Co., Toronto, Ont.
The Perth Shoe Co., Perth, Ont.
The J. Leckie Co., Vancouver, B.C.

Thirteen hundred and sixty-five pairs of boots, and three hundred and forty-eight odd boots out of the number condemned by the various boards throughout the country were submitted to the inspection of Messrs. John A. Hoar, of Halifax, and Magloire Côté, of St. Hyacinthe, who made report thereon, as follows:

That out of said number of boots, two hundred and sixty-five pairs were not worth repairing; fourteen hundred and forty-eight boots were not originally equal to the sample. If the proportion of boots in this particular lot, not equal to the sample, is a fair percentage of the number of boots furnished that did not come up to the samples, out of the one hundred and eighty thousand pairs supplied, the number of boots so furnished that were inferior to sample would be seven thousand, two hundred and ninety-eight boots;

That the boot supplied to the soldiers who went to South Africa was a different boot from the sealed sample boot of 1914, and from the boots supplied to the Overseas Forces. It was in 1905 that boots of a similar pattern to the 1914 boot were first adopted by the department for use in times of peace by the permanent forces in Canada.

(See evidence of Assistant Director of Contracts McCann, No. 22, of evidence.)

All of which is respectfully submitted.

Mr. J. H. RAINVILLE (Chambly and Verchères): The special committee appointed to investigate the quality of boots supplied to the soldiers, the report of which has just been submitted to the consideration of the House, has stirred public attention to a high degree. That should not cause any surprise when we consider that on one hand it involves the question of the health and welfare of our fellow citizens who leave their country to go to the front, and, on the other hand, the reputations of large and flourishing Canadian industries which have been seriously injured by allegations made.

I am sure that a fair reader of the proceedings which were held, and of the evidence adduced before the special committee, will acknowledge that we did all that was humanly possible to get at the truth—at the whole truth. As far as circumstances permitted we succeeded in getting all the evidence which might throw light on the questions submitted to us. Officers, non-commissioned officers and soldiers who wore the boots manufactured for the Canadian Government, experts in leather and the manufacture of boots explained the technique and process of manufacturing, and expressed their opinion on the value of the materials used by the manufacturers before, and, more especially since, the outbreak of the war. We have gone so far as even to let an outside lawyer, working on an outside case, come before the committee and fish at will for evidence. That lawyer at times worked in such an unfair way as to incur quite a stiff rebuke from a member of the committee, the hon. member for North Oxford (Mr. Nesbitt). From the testimony of those who, on behalf of the Government, had watched at the factory the making of the boots, we have been able to understand the kind of inspection which was caused to be made. Lastly, a great number and a variety of boots coming from different regiments in different parts of the country have been put to a severe examination by two gentlemen of unquestionable experience and repute, and they have reported fully on the question.

From that mass of evidence we had to draw conclusions. This we did honestly and impartially, and I feel confident that our conclusions will be concurred in by this House and the country in general.

If we examine with care the various grievances formulated by the opposition on this question, they may be summed up under two heads: First, the kind of boots adopted by the Government was not fit for the purpose for which it was made; and secondly, the boot made according to sample and delivered to the soldiers of the Canadian contingent, as well as the sample itself, was defective as to quality. But between those two arguments they hesitate. When they have before them boots which are admittedly good as to workmanship and material, they attack the sample according to which they were made; and when it is the contrary, they allege that the boots supplied were not in accordance with the sample. Such double play shifting may be the characteristic of an able lawyer, but for a judge it is generally the sign of a lost cause. And it is established that on these two points the boots in question were satisfactory, if we are fair enough to take into account, as every reasonable man will do, the exceptional circumstances under which they were made, inspected, issued to soldiers and worn by them.

This inquiry is the result of the report made on the 6th and 7th January, 1915, by the commission which was presided over by Lt.-Colonel Hallick, and composed of Messrs. Stephens and Galipeau. We would not allow ourselves to be guided by, and we could not in justice rely upon, such a report, which, at all events, is highly deficient, for the evidence was not taken under oath. The previous inquiry was altogether a failure, for while it purports to show certain special defects in the boots, it concludes by stating that "the boots manufactured were, generally speaking, well made and of good quality."

The first and main grievance brought forward is the shape of the boots and the lightness that makes same unsuitable for the purpose for which they were made, let us say the word, for active service. Lt.-Colonel Hallick's report recommends the adoption of the English boot (the British Army boot) which is much heavier than the Canadian.

Mr. MURPHY: Or some similar boot.

Mr. RAINVILLE: Yes. We come here to one of the most difficult, the most debatable, and most debated upon, questions that governments of all nations have had to deal with in the past. Military authorities in every country have, after various and multiplied experiments, adopted a certain type of boot for their army, but the pattern varies according to the country. The English boot is different from the French and is still more at variance with the American. The American army boot is the lightest by a great deal. As far as weight is concerned, the English boot is the heaviest, then comes the French, the Canadian, and lastly the American. The latter was adopted by the United States army after four years of experiments, and after they had examined the patterns used by all the great nations of the world.

Consequently, is it possible, or is it fair to cast blame on the Canadian Government, before as well as after 1911, or on the officers of the militia staff, for having pronounced in favour of a boot somewhat lighter than the British boot and somewhat heavier than the American? No; I say it is not. It is a matter of opinion which will always be open to discussion. It may never be settled absolutely satisfactorily, but if the problem is ever solved it will probably be due to the fact that the means will have been found for giving three pairs of boots to each soldier, one pair of rubber boots for circumstances such as were found at Salisbury Plain, one pair of heavy boots for trench work in France, and one pair of light boots (like the Canadian) for marching to Berlin, the quickest possible.

Just now, here in Canada, opinions of experts are divided into three categories: One favours the heavy boot of the standard screw type with hob nails and steel plate, like the English one, another lauds the use of the light boot of the Canadian type (Goodyear welt), while others recommend a combination of the two. It is reasonable to think that the British army boot, because of its weight, shrould be more suitable for the new process of underground war and trenches than the light one, but for the same reason, that is because of its weight, it seems the more unfit for marching. This is a serious defect when one realizes that in war the facility and promptness with which an army can move and displace itself is one of the essentials of victory. Volumes could be written in favour of the light boot and also in favour of the heavy one as well. This shows that in such questions it is not possible to adopt absolute rules.

A full discussion of the advantages and disadvantages of the British boot would not be in my line, but I may be permitted to say this much that many experts in Canada are strongly in favor of the light boot. Mr. Matthews, Lieutenant Whitby, Pte. Ross, General Hughes, General MacDonald, Colonel Macdonald, Colonel Brown, Colonel Currie, Major Ranger and many others are in favour of the light boot.

It is true that the minority give great weight to the opinions of General Alderson and Sir George Perley. But this is, after all, indirect evidence which cannot destroy the evidence from soldiers having just come back from Salisbury and testifying, under oath, before the committee, opinions contrary to those given by these two gentlemen. Besides, just as much credit could be given to the opinions expressed by Lieut.-Col. Currie and Major Ranger, who have been at Valcartier, at Salisbury Plains, and are to-day on the firing line in France.

Paul Emile Ranger, of Montreal, an officer whom most of the members for Quebec know, gives, in a long and detailed diary recently published by La Presse of Montreal, a vivid account, day by day, from the 11th February to the 6th March, of the life of our soldiers in the trenches and their conduct in action, recording the gallant deeds which have inscribed on the roll of honor the names of such men as Hardy, Valin, Lacroix, Martin, Delongchamps, etc. And one would notice, while reading this account, the unassuming way in which the most heroic deeds are recited, showing the deep conviction, the true soldiery spirit of our men, now in war, and whose gallantry showed them to be the worthy comrades of the trained soldiers of France and England. While speaking of their life in the trenches Major Ranger has a word to say about the accoutrements. He mentions that his men have been supplied with English military boots and recalls, as his personal experience, that after one hour and a half walking in the trenches at night, he felt as if his shoes weighed fifty pounds. In his diary of the 4th of March he gives the opinion of his men on the same subject as follows:

Their greatest annoyance comes from their boots. They miss their Canadian boots for the English boots are no good. These last boots take credit for heavy and thick soles, but most of the time the sole is too thick for the uppers and after a few days' wearing gives way entirely.

Besides, they are not waterproof. As a general rule our men prefer the Canadian boots, more soft and better constructed, and I share their opinion.

I can give another testimony which should have as much weight as that of Sir George Perley or General Alderson, and it is the testimony of Private H. E. Parker, as contained in the following letter addressed to the Hon. Minister of Militia and Defence:

309 South Marks Street,
Fort William, Ont.,
April 1, 1915.

The Hon. the Minister of Militia and Defence,
Ottawa, Ont.

Sir,—Having reference to the inquiry regarding quality of boots supplied to the soldiers of the Canadian Expeditionary Force, I have the honour to inform you that I have at present in my possession and still wearing, the pair of regulation boots issued to me at Valcartier during the latter part of August, 1914. These boots have been in continual use since issue to date.

I had been issued with a pair of Imperial service boots, but such were stolen from me before I had an opportunity of using them.

The boots issued to me in Valcartier have been worn through all the mud and rain that obtained during the period of our training at Salisbury Plain, and are still in a fairly serviceable condition.

I further have the honour to inform you, that I heard very few complaints regarding the Canadian service boot. On the contrary, the men invariably preferred this boot to the heavy Imperial service one.

[Mr. Rainville.]

Should you require my boots as an exhibit, they are at your disposal.

I have the honour to be, sir,
Your obedient servant,
H. E. PARKER,
Late 8th Brg. C.E.F. Pte.

P.S.—I have just returned from service with the Canadian Expeditionary force in consequence of disability through paralysis of right arm and hand.—H. P.

All these things being considered, can we find ourselves at all justified in blaming the Canadian Government or the officers of the militia for having kept the Canadian boots as they were? Let us realize that the time for deliberating and making experiments in this respect had gone; it was too late. We had neither four years nor one, nor even one month, to restudy the matter.

The Canadian people, like all the other colonies, were rising, united, to promptly assist the Mother Country. No one in Canada, then, would fail to see an emergency. Can one imagine the indignation that would have been felt in this House and in this country, if, instead of putting himself immediately in a position to issue boots and other equipment to our soldiers, General Hughes had taken the attitude of making experiments of all kinds? Action was necessary, and the present Minister of Militia, it cannot be denied, answered with immediate action to the best knowledge and ability that could be had and shown in such an emergency, to rapidly equip the Canadian contingents. When war broke out, the Department of Militia had at their disposal a pattern of boot that had been in use since 1900, or at least since 1904, and as to which no serious complaints had been heard. I think we can safely say that this boot was the result of the experience of the South African war, and it was established that it has given satisfaction ever since. General Macdonald, on pages 211, 221, 213 and 216, said that some boots made according to the sealed sample had been worn by our soldiers in South Africa. Lieut.-Col. MacDonald, on page 236, and General Lessard, page 468, said that boot was thought to be advisable under the circumstances. By doing what they do, those who were responsible for efficiency acted prudently and listened to the voice of sound reason. That is the conclusion I have reached on that point. We have purely and simply applied the rule which in matters of liability is acknowledged as a principle of law all over the world, and according to which he who acts like a prudent, diligent paterfamilias, who administers and manages his business and property with the ordinary prudence of a reasonable man, must be held to have done what could be possibly expected of him. That is the principle of law laid down in the Civil Code of Quebec, and I presume it is a principle of law which is common to every civilized country in the world.

The boots issued to the soldiers were made according to samples approved by the Government officers, and were in use by the permanent force in Canada. Out of 180,000 pairs made by the manufacturers, 178,000 pairs have already been issued. Several of the manufacturers who obtained boot contracts, gave their evidence before the committee and all agreed that the material was excellent and the workmanship was good. The inspectors placed by the Government to watch over the making of the boots in the factories themselves assure us of their having done all in their power to rigourously inspect the boots in the then pressing circumstances under which the inspection was taking place, and it is established that, with the exception of a few instances of little importance, the boots were of good quality and in most cases superior to the sample. This is proven by the witnesses, as well as by the two experts, Mr. Hoar and Mr. Côté, who were unanimously chosen by the committee to make a report on the boots. The inspection no doubt did not cover the whole of the 180,000 pairs, because there were about 14,000 pairs which were sent direct to Valcartier and which, because of the pressing demand and lack of accommodation, had to be delivered to the soldiers without inspection. But there was no time to waste and the recruits at Valcartier could not be allowed to go without boots, which unanswerable reason made it necessary to issue a certain quantity without inspection. I quote from the evidence of Lieutenant Colonel Hallick, when questioned on this point, at page 59:

By Mr. Rainville:

Q. When you were pressing for the delivery of the boots, did you attend to the requesting of delivery yourself?—A. Yes.

Q. Did you wire any firms or to the Government to press delivery?—A. I only wired to my chief here at headquarters and told him I was short of boots.

Q. Where they shipped to Valcartier camp?—A. They were sent direct from the manufacturers to me on my demand.

This shows that if the boots were delivered at Valcartier without inspection it was for a very good reason, and there is nothing in it to merit blame for the Government or for the officers of the militia. We must not believe that this absence of inspection, which the manufacturers could not anticipate in order to make a cheap boot, had an influence on the making of the boots in question. The manufacturers could not expect that any of their boots would escape inspection, and surely they would not have run the risk of making bad boots and having them rejected, in the hope that there might be no inspection. It must be admitted that the absence of inspection did certainly involve the issue of certain boots, which, under normal conditions and under inspection, would have been detected as inferior, and rejected.

The report on the rejected boots is a most direct answer to the arguments of hon. gentlemen opposite. Out of the 86,000 boots issued to the different regiments all over the country only about 7,000 pairs were condemned. The committee wired to the different military centres to ship back to Ottawa the boots that were condemned, but some of them, such as Calgary, did not send these boots to the committee and the reason for that we do not know. However, a great many regiments sent their boots to Ottawa, and they were examined by the two experts appointed by the committee.

The hon. member for Russell (Mr. Murphy) has quoted many of the findings of the different boards of inquiry, and he is under the impression that he has proved that the reports of all these boards were genuine and should be taken as proof. I contend that the reports of these boards were not confirmed by the evidence given before the committee of this House. They were not confirmed in the case of Major McKenzie of St. John, N.B., who spoke about the leather being rubbish and who admitted that he had made a mistake, as will be found in the evidence at pages 392 and 393. These reports were not confirmed in the case of Quartermaster Taunton of Winnipeg, who at page 405 of the evidence admits his error about scrap and glue. They were not confirmed in the case of Major Andrews of Winnipeg, who admits his error as regards paper, and whose evidence will be found on page 424; nor in the case of Lieutenant A. E. Whitby of Toronto, who admits that the soldiers were drying their boots around the furnace, and who would not recommend the British army boot because, he said, it was too heavy.

My hon. friend said something about the Ottawa boots. Of these there were 309 pairs issued, nine pairs of which were brought before the committee. Three of these nine pairs were good boots and one was burned, so that four out of those nine pairs could not be complained of, and only five pairs had the soles worn out.

Certain hon. gentlemen opposite, with minds strongly bent on criticising, hold the Government liable as for a crime for the least omission of any kind. The present Administration and Militia Department will not pretend to possess supernatural infallibility. We maintain that from the evidence adduced, it is clear that the representatives of the Government, such as superior officers and inspectors, and the manufacturers and tanners, have shown the best of good faith, sincere honesty and great care for the welfare of our soldiers. It is possible that a few errors of judgment may have occurred on their part; but in all justice must we not give to the Administration, at the head of a country which for more than a hundred years has lived in peace and only in anticipation of a lasting peace, credit for the superhuman efforts made by it in a time of great emergency to face the immediate eventualities of a war which took by surprise all the European countries, except perhaps Germany, which caused it, and which I hope will get the worst of it?

In this inquiry the attention of the public is centred on the boot question, with no reference made and no regard paid to the innumerable difficulties with which the Administration has had to cope in undertaking to equip with boots, necessary clothes, arms, ammunition, food, and so on, an army of infantry, cavalry and artillery of over 100,000 men. We are within the facts as revealed by the evidence when we assert that the great majority of the boots which were returned to Ottawa as defective had been worn by the soldiers for from six to eight weeks, and we are told by the experts that such is about the limit of time within which a boot may be reasonably expected to wear under the exceptional circumstances which, the inquiry revealed, existed at the time at Valcartier and in other parts of the country. To prove that, I could quote Lieut.-Col. Hallick at page 59, Mr. Stephens at page 43, and Mr. Silver at pages 305 to 306. A great many of these boots were repairable, but they were not repaired, either through carelessness or through there being no cobblers with the regiments. That, however, is not a good ground on which to hold the Department of Militia or the Government liable for negligence or carelessness or any fault, because it must be observed that the boots which were reported as defective or bad were recently examined by two absolutely disinterested and qualified experts, and the result of their careful examination is more effective than any argument that can be adduced in answer to all that has been said or written against the Canadian military boot.

Hon. gentlemen opposite attach a great deal of importance to complaints lodged by the local boards of inquiry composed of the officers of various regiments throughout the country. It was objected that a great part of the evidence was not given under oath, and that it had to a great extent no legal value. I do not intend entering here into a discussion of that question, which has been dealt with fully by my colleagues; I rely only on the reports and on the evidence adduced upon their contents by the officers of these local boards of inquiry who appeared before us to give evidence on the worst cases mentioned in their reports. Without attacking the honour of our soldiers or officers, I wish to express my opinion that these reports do not conclusively establish that the boots so reported defective were all or in the majority of cases defective. I base that opinion on the fact that such inquiries were somewhat hurriedly held and quickly disposed of, and on the lack of experience of those who held them. I may be permitted to add, without offending my hon. friend from Pictou (Mr. Macdonald), who often objected in committee when we were trying to find out the reason for the condemnation of the boots, that boards of inquiry were held, in the majority of cases, not with a view to searching into the causes of deterioration of the boots complained of, but in order to obtain, through what appeared to be the only available machinery, a second issue of boots. The holding of such boards where boots are to be condemned, is the only means that the regiments have at their disposal to get from the department what they claim from their officers. Let me quote the evidence of Major McKenzie on page 391, as follows:

> Our idea was to get these boots condemned so that we could take over our men on parade with decent boots.

Colonel Jones' evidence on page 345 is as follows:

> Q. Is it not generally conceded in many regiments that the men want to get new boots as often as they can?—A. Oh, yes.

The reports of these boards are more often rejected than accepted by the department, according to Quartermaste-

General Macdonald, and I am under the impression that Major General Fiset said that he had not much confidence in these boards, and that in the Militia Department they were putting them aside because experience showed that they were of little value. A salient fact is that no mention can be found in these reports of any boots that were repairable that may have been burned or cut or destroyed by the wearer. The evidence, however, shows that a certain number of boots deteriorated in that way, and that the great majority of the others were repairable. Let me refer again to the summary of the report of the two experts who examined the condemned boots. Out of 1,713 inspections, only 265 boots were found not worth repairing, and out of these 265, were 112 injured by burning.

What is the reason for that omission? It is to be found in the fact that no deteriorated boot will be renewed which has become defective through fault or negligence of the wearer and he has to get, according to regulations, a new pair at his own expense. A new issue at the public expense will only take place when it is shown that the boots were worn through "fair wear and tear" or when they are defective or of bad quality.

Far be from me the idea of trying to blame the officers of the regiments for that zeal towards their soldiers. Nobody would think of blaming them. We are in this war not to try to economize on a few pairs of boots to be supplied to the soldiers, when the loyal soldiers are willing to give their very lives for the welfare and security of the country. We would equally refuse to blame the Department of Militia for accepting boots in the first rush contracts without inspection, when we find the goods furnished by the manufacturers were made according to a sample constructed under the specifications that had been approved since the South African war and discussed many times since.

As for the Gauthier Co., of Quebec, of which so much has been said in the newspapers and in the committee, to the great disappointment perhaps of the critics the experts have classified them the equal of any other company which made military boots in Canada. It is true that a certain Charles E. Slater secured a fat commission from that company, but the company alone were the sufferers as the Government paid the same price to them as to others and there is no fault to find with the quality of leather used by Gauthier, and the construction was shown to be equal to others.

The following is a summary of the report of an inspection made on two boxes of Gauthier boots:

Number of pairs of boots inspected.. .. 187
All the boots were substantially up to sample with the following exceptions:
Number of soles not up to No. 10 gauge, they being 9½ 9, 9, and 8 respectively.. 4
Number of flanky uppers.. 2
Number poorly lasted.. 2
Number of pairs not mated.. 3
Ten boots, or one boot in every twenty-five pairs were cut open and examined thoroughly, the remainder were examined superficially.

This report is signed by M. C. Wade, clerk of inspectors, who made the examination. As to the propriety of the transaction it is a matter between Mr. Slater and his conscience, when we know that he made that commission contract with a widow whose husband's death had left her without an adviser and who could easily be convinced, by a man who had had practically the furnishing of all boots under the late Administration, that she could trust Charley Slater in trying to get her contracts from the Government.

In conclusion: We have devoted two months' time to this inquiry; we had fifty-one sittings and heard eighty-seven witnesses, saw and examined some hundreds of pairs of boots. Some 86 exhibits of all kinds were produced. From the hearing of such a long evidence it will not appear improper for a member of that commission to draw the conclusion which seems to him to be the only one which can possibly be reached.

I would be prepared to say that the Canadian boot, bettered as much as can be through the experience obtained during this war, was very good. Since December the double sole was added, hobnails and horseshoe plates could be added as well to improve the wearing quality of the sole. As a whole the boots have given satisfaction and are the most suitable shoe for our voluntary soldiers. The soldiers themselves are the ones that we should please and satisfy in general.

Major Ranger and Colonel Currie, at the front, speaking for themselves and for their men, prefer the Canadian boot to the heavy English boot. Witnesses who came back from Salisbury Plain having worn the English boot are of the same opinion, and this is the only direct evidence we had on the question of a heavy boot or a medium boot such as the Canadian.

As far as our Canadian manufacturers are concerned, it is just that out of this inquiry there should come the true conclusion about it, and that the repute and trustworthiness of this Canadian trade when every one is at work in favour of "made in Canada," should still appear in its true light, not lessened but increased and acknowledged, and that for the benefit of our country it should be allowed to continue the pursuit of its destiny towards progress and more prosperity.

Mr. E. W. NESBITT (North Oxford): I do not pretend to analyse the evidence in this case. That has been done by those who have spoken before me. But I will endeavour to consider the matter from the standpoint of a business man and in the light of such business training and experience as I have had.

I confess that I think the chairman of the committee, the hon. member for North Grey (Mr. Middlebro), in his address was very reasonable. There is no doubt that the evidence the hon. gentleman quoted is there. But we think that the evidence to the contrary is there in greater proportion than the evidence that the hon. gentleman used to back up his report.

5 p.m.

Otherwise we would not have made up the report. I went on the committee, I think, absolutely without prejudice, naturally feeling a sympathy for the manufacturers on account of the fact that I am, to a certain extent, a representative of the manufacturers, not in the shoe business, of course. But my theory in life is to give everybody, as nearly as possible, an absolutely fair deal. That is why I could not understand from the start, nor could I understand at the finish, why the papers selected the remarks of the witnesses that were very harsh, to say the least. I appreciate that newspaper men are running their own papers and may do as they please. So far as I am personally concerned I have never attempted during my life to interfere with the way anybody ran their papers or did their business, so long as they keep within the law. But I could not appreciate just why the newspapers seemed to have a prejudice and did not wait for the evidence. The manufacturer, to a large extent, has been proved to have manufactured his boots according to the samples given him by the department before he started to manufacture. Now I think that if a manufacturer or a contractor of any kind fulfils his contract, that that is all that he is reasonably called upon to do. In accordance with the report of the experts, so-called, the gentlemen who were selected to examine the boots that have been returned from all over the country to the Chairman of the committee, and in accordance with our report, about 4 per cent of the boots that we gave them to examine were not equal to sample. You must bear in mind too that in accordance with our report the samples that were given to the manufacturers to manufacture from were not quite equal to the sealed pattern that had been in the department for a number of years. We specify in our report how they were not quite equal.

In the uppers the leather in the sample was lighter than the leather in sealed pattern, the difference being 1 6-10 in sample and 2 4-10 in pattern.

This was measured by means of one of those scientific instruments that Mr. Tetreault, a large manufacturer in Montreal, had at the committee and he did the measuring:

In vamps there was the same proportionate difference between the two as to weight and thickness.

Slugs: In the sample zinc sluge were used and in the pattern steel slugs were used and there was an additional half-row.

Now there is no question as to that being correct as to the various samples I think Nos. 12, 55, 57 and 67 that were given to the manufacturers to manufacture from. No specifications were given for the first 65,000 pairs of boots that were manufactured and most of the manufacturers swore that they had no specifications in their possession, that they were given the sample, to manufacture, practically speaking, by it. But out of the 1,713 inspections which consisted of 1,365 pairs of boots and 384 single boots, there were 68 that were not equal to the sample. We say in our report that if that same proportion held for the whole 180,000 pairs of boots that were manufactured, that would be 7,000 and some odd that were not equal to the sample. My hon. friend from North Grey takes exception to that, and says that it is a reasonable argument that we should apply that only to the boots that were brought before the various boards, which numbered 11,054. Naturally we do not agree with that, because, in the first place, none of the boots that went to Valcartier were complained about excepting through those boards from England that reported and through General Alderson.

Mr. MIDDLEBRO: The 86,000 does not include any of the boots that went to Valcartier or that went to England. The 86,000 are simply composed of the boots that have remained in Canada.

Mr. NESBITT: I appreciate that, but we take into consideration the boots that were supplied to go to Valcartier as well as those that remained in Canada, and we say if they were not up to sample in proportion there were 7,000 odd of the 180,000 boots supplied that were not up to sample. I am quite free to say that I do not consider that was a very large number. I can appreciate that, no matter who was making the boots or no matter how they were made, there would be a certain percentage of them that would not be up to standard. At the same time that does not do away with the fact that the first 65,000 pairs of boots that were manufactured and that went to Valcartier were not properly inspected, as we say in our report. That is, there were 13,000 odd, somewhere in the neighbourhood of 14,000, that were not inspected at all, and those that were inspected in the factories were inspected, some of them at least, by men who were just picked up in a haphazard way, who probably did not know anything about inspecting boots. The only real inspector we found who was certainly up to his work was a Mr. Silver, who had had great experience, and who inspected the boots, I think, at Tetreault's. These are the boots that went to Valcartier. But at the same time there was a lack of inspection, as we say in our report, and practically that is borne out entirely or almost entirely by the evidence. My hon. friend from North Grey says that of the boots that Mr. Hoar and Mr. Côté examined here, a certain number were not worth repairing, 265; and he subdivides them, saying that some were hurt by cutting and some by spurs and some by nails. I did not hear my hon. friend expain that the nails he here complains of were the unfortunate men's toe nails. They could not very well take their toe nails off when they put their boots on; and, therefore, I do not see how that could be considered the fault of the men, unless you grew some peculiar type of man that had no toe nails. A great many of the boots we saw had a hole there where the nail of the big toe was supposed to have worn its way through. I do not think that should happen, and that is one of the faults that we find, that the last was too thin at the toe; and it was not only too thin at the toe, but also too narrow; it did not give a reasonable amount of room for the toe to work in without cutting the leather. Surely, if anything could be a fault, that was. According to this report there were a certain number of boots burnt, and 1,448 of the 1,713 boots that were condemned can be repaired. But, because a boot has not got to the stage where it cannot be repaired, it does not follow that it is a good boot. There must be something wrong—I am not going to say what—with a boot that lasts only two or three weeks, and personally I do not believe that such a boot is a good boot. Perhaps it might have been up to the sample at that.

My hon. friend dwelt at considerable length on the boot that was used in South Africa. Mr. McCann swore that the boot used in South Africa was made by a man called Radden, and if I remember his evidence correctly, he said that a good many of the men who went to South Africa purchased their own boots. But personally, I do not see what the boot used in South Africa has to do with the present case. The South African campaign was entirely different. I was never in that country, but from what I have read I understand that it is very dry, and consequently the boot that would be good for South Africa would not necessarily be good for Canada or England or France or Belgium. I quite agree that General Otter said that it was similar to the boot that was shown to him. but I do not belive that he paid very much attention anyway to the boots in South Africa. He did say that they had to buy the English boot over there, or if he did not say it somebody else did. Major General Hughes said that he had in his possession a pair of boots that went through the South African campaign and were in first-class shape now. He offered to show them to the committee. I remember that he said that they were not supplied by the Government, but purchased out of his own good hard money.

Major General HUGHES: I did not say they were bought in England; they were bought in Capetown. Many of the Canadians bought boots from Slater in Canada before they started for South Africa to replace the other ones.

Mr. NESBITT: I was not going to say that the minister purchased his in England, but that he purchased them out of his own good hard money.

Major General HUGHES: They were made in England, but bought in Capetown.

Mr. NESBITT: That puts us both right. My hon. friend from North Grey (Mr. Middlebro) said that if the officials of the department had been changed, we should have complained about that too. So far as I am concerned I want everybody to understand that it would not have made any difference to me whether the officials had been appointed under the Conservative or under the Liberal regime. It was the duty of those in power at the time, no matter who appointed them, to see that the boots given to the soldiers were properly made and satisfactory. My hon. friend from North Grey says that no dubbing was supplied at the start off, and that the different regiments had no cobblers at the beginning of the war. I quite agree, but that was not the fault of the unfortunate soldier, nor the fault of the manufacturer. Whose fault was it? It certainly was not my fault, because I was not consulted. I should like to ask my hon. friend whose fault it was. It must come down to this. It was the fault of the Government, or the fault of the department. I quite admit that a great deal may be said by way of excuse for the first lot of boots that went to Valcartier, and for other things that were lacking. But from a businessman's standpoint I say that there was no possible excuse for giving a repeat order for the same kind of boots that the evidence goes to show there were complaints about after the first two weeks at Valcartier. Some of the manufacturers themselves, if I remember correctly, freely admitted that there were complaints after the first two weeks.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Where does that appear in the record?

Mr. NESBITT: I think in Mr. Matthews' evidence you will find a letter from the Ames-Holden people to the department stating that they had heard numerous complaints, and wanting to know whether the department had heard of them. There is a long letter in the evidence to that effect. There is no doubt at all that there were complaints.

Major General HUGHES: I shall be very glad if my hon. friend can show me where complaint was made concerning the boots at Valcartier. I was there nearly all the time myself and never heard a complaint either directly or indirectly.

Mr. NESBITT: There is in the evidence a long letter from the Ames-Holden people to the department drawing attention to the fact that they had heard about complaints, and wanting to know whether the department had heard about them or not. In any event there were plenty of complaints, if I mistake not, from the various regimental boards held throughout the country, and these complaints were made before the second orders were given.

Some of my hon. friends tried to prove before the committee that it would take a long time to change the model and the last. On the contrary, it was clearly proved by Tetreault and other large manufacturers who appeared before the committee that it would take only a very short time. All of us who have had any experience in getting out patterns know that it does not take a man more than a day to make a model of a last, and that it does not take him more than two days at the outside, perhaps not more than a day, to make the pattern. I am quite sure that some of the large manufacturers would have any number of lasts in their factories that would have been quite satisfactory for the department to use in making these boots.

If I am not mistaken the hon. member for North Grey, in quoting the report of Mr. Hallick as to the number of boots that had been examined before the regimental boards, gave 7,807 as the number that were examined.

Mr. MIDDLEBRO: I said that 7,000 odd had been condemned. There were some 11,000 that came before the board.

Mr. NESBITT: Oh, that is all right, then. In my judgment there are just two questions in regard to these boots. On the evidence we cannot complain that the manufacturers did not make their boots up to sample or within a reasonable limitation of it. My hon. friend from North Grey quoted the evidence of the men who came back from Salisbury Plain and in this connection the peculiar fact must be noted that the boots on both of these men were lined boots. There is another incident in regard to which the papers were not quite fair. They reported that the uppers of the boots manufactured by one of these concerns were glued together. As a matter of fact the lining was cemented and a very peculiar thing is that the two pairs of boots that came back from Salisbury Plain to be examined were found to be lined boots. Personally, I think that would have been an improvement, but that is only my own opinion.

There are only two questions that really affect us in this inquiry and one of them is this: Were these proper boots for active service? The other question is: If they were not, why were they not replaced long ago, or why were the orders for them continued? Let me examine the question whether they were fit for active service. I think my hon. friends who were on the committee with me will not differ from me when I say that the great mass of the evidence that was brought before the committee by all parties tended to prove that this was not a proper boot for active service. All the manufacturers without exception swore that they did not think that it was a proper boot for active service. All the departmental officials, practically speaking, except the Quartermaster General, swore that it was not a proper boot for active service. Even the Major General said that there were certain improvements that he would have advised over the boots that were issued but on the whole he thought it was a good boot. All the rest of the officials of the Militia Department who came before us, excepting the Quartermaster General stated that they did not think the boot was satisfactory for the service for which it was intended. All the manufacturers distinctly swore that they had told the department that it was not a proper boot and that they offered suggestions as to what would make a proper boot. I do not see why my hon. friends dwell on the English boot. We did not say anything about the English boot, we did not say that it was a proper boot, we did not recommend it at all; in fact, we were very careful not to recommend any boot. We simply made our findings on the boot that was before the committee as being the boot that was supplied. We did not feel it to be our duty to recommend a proper boot, but I must say personally that the boot that I think would be the most satisfactory was the boot that was designed by the Shoe Manufacturers' Association. That boot was exhibited before the committee by Mr. Tetreault, and it looked to me like the very best boot that could be used. That is only my personal opinion, and I may be a thousand miles astray. There is no question but that everybody who came before the committee swore that he did not think that the boot that was being supplied was a satisfactory boot. The hon. member for North Grey and the hon. member for Chambly-Vercheres (Mr. Rainville), who are two very fine gentlemen, and with whom I agreed very excellently on the committee, are not quite fair when they say that the regimental boards that were called simply condemned these boots in order to get new boots. It is not quite fair to play hot and cold. We heard eulogies of these men the other day in the House; they were men of the highest character, men that you could trust anywhere, and with anything, in the world, and yet my hon. friends, when their ox is being gored a little bit, say that you cannot trust these regimental boards, that they have made these reports for the purpose of getting new boots, and they also add that there is small blame to them for doing so. I know many of these men, and they are highly intelligent men. These officers came before us, and they certainly looked as if they knew what they were talking about. They told us what they thought without any hesitation. They distinctly declared that it was not true that they had allowed these boots to be condemned for the purpose of getting new boots. But they did say that these boots were not fit for their men to wear, and that was why they had condemned them.

I have taken more or less interest in this boot question, outside of the committee as well as inside of it, and I have followed this evidence very carefully. I have stopped innumerable soldiers since this inquiry commenced and asked them about their boots. I have never stopped one who did not condemn the boots. There must be something wrong somewhere. I have made up my mind that there must be something wrong. I remember meeting some soldiers at home. They had come back from Guelph. It was a little sloppy, the sun was shining, part of the sidewalk was bare and part of it was wet with sloppy snow. I met a number of these men belonging to the third contingent. I thought they belonged to the second contingent and had come from London but I found that they had come from Guelph. I stopped them and examined their boots. There was evidence given before the committee that the leather simply absorbed the water. That is what had occurred in this case and the leather in these men's boots looked more like buckskin than leather—some of the witnesses say more like blotting paper, but I think that is an exaggeration. Certainly the boots were soaking in the water and they would not keep the water out. They said that they had greased them. One pair was broken out at the toes and the soles were all nearly cracked across. The hon. gentlemen say there is evidence to prove that in many instances where the soles were cracked across it was due to over-heating. That may be true, but you cannot get over the fact that all the men I have questioned, and I have questioned many, have condemned the boots to a very large extent. They were not considering whether they were up to sample or not; they were condemning the boots because they thought they were not good boots. They did not consider whether they were up to sample or not; that was a part of our duty. If the manufacturer made them up to sample, that, in my judgment, would clear him. These men were complaining of the boots because they were not satisfactory. They might think that it was a fairly good boot but it was not a satisfactory boot for the purpose for which it was intended.

There has been more or less about the boots having been improved to a certain extent by the time the last 40,000 were ordered. There is a double sole running back to the heel in place of the slip sole which only goes back to the ball of the foot. Strange to say, just the other day, and immediately before we rose, one of those regimental boards came before us with nine pairs of boots. I certainly examined these nine pairs of boots and several of these were the double-soled boots the orders for which were given in the latter part of October or the first of November whereas the evidence before us went to show that a great many of them were not supplied until after the first of the year and some not until the first of March. The men to whom these boots had been issued formed a battery which had been gotten up within the last month and they only had their boots issued to them a short time ago. I noticed some of the boots that were exhibited were these same double-soled boots. If nothing else had convinced me that there was something wrong with the boots which were being given to the men that of itself would because it was absolutely ridiculous to me to know these boots, worn only two or three weeks around Ottawa here, should have been worn out. I know what the weather was, I know what the streets have been because I have been walking around every day myself.

The boots supplied to the soldiers are heavier than those I am now wearing, but although I have been around here in wet weather and in dry my boots are still good, and if the boot supplied to the soldiers were properly made and of good material they would be good too. However, we could see from the boots submitted to the committee that there was something wrong with them. The hon. gentleman from North Grey (Mr. Middlebro) says there were only 11,000 pairs of boots complained about, but the evidence of the officers who sat on these regimental boards throughout the country is that nearly all the boots issued were complained of. I gathered from the evidence of the witnesses that the 11,000 pairs gave out when only worn a short time, and that it is only as to these boots that the men complained.

The whole question comes down to what the Government or the department could have done when the first complaints came in, and the complaints came very soon after the boots were issued, because the first boots having been ordered on the 10th of August, delivery commenced on the 21st of August, and regimental boards were sitting in different parts of Canada to inquire into complaints on the 25th, the 27th and the 30th of September. My hon. friend (Mr. Middlebro) took strong exception to the evidence given by Mr. Minister, but the hon. gentleman should have said that while Mr. Minister did say he would have made the boots for $4.85, he also stuck to his story that he would not have made them on the last or of the pattern that was shown him. His evidence was that he would adopt his own idea of a boot at the price mentioned, and to show that, he exhibited a boot before the committee. The people of Canada will ask if the boots issued to our soldiers were satisfactory for the purposes for which they were intended, and the answer of the people will be that they were not. I do not believe there is a man in this country who if he were going to do the work the soldiers were expected to do would choose a pair of the boots issued by the Government. I do not believe that the work of a farmer, or the work of a lumberman, would be as hard on a boot as the work of the soldier who has to do heavy marching and to carry heavy weight. The soldier is supposed not only to go on soft ground like the farmer and the lumberman, but he has to trudge over roads whether rough or smooth. I firmly believe, therefore, that the soldier requires a better boot than the farmer or the lumberman, and I do not think any man in this House would have chosen the boots supplied to the soldiers, if he were going to engage in either occupation.

The question comes up: Could the Government have supplied better boots than those they did supply? The boot that was supplied followed a sample which had been in the department since 1905, and which had been used by the permanent forces which, as I understand it, had no very serious work to do. They were used in cities and in barracks, and as to this, the evidence of the witnesses was that they wanted a boot which would take a polish. Generally speaking, for the work of the soldier in peace, these boots were reasonably satisfactory, although Mr. McCann and Mr. Brown do say that there have been more or less complaints in the fall and the spring every year. But, even if there had been no complaints about the boots previously, everybody knew that our soldiers were going on active service, and that a different boot and a better boot would be required. Hon. gentlemen opposite say if the weather had been dry these boots would not require to have heavy soles, but I do not agree with them. My personal experience is that whether the weather is dry or wet, if one is going to walk a great deal he wants a strong pair of boots. The question arises as to how long it would have taken the Government to have secured a change of pattern so as to supply a better boot. The evidence of Mr. Tetreault shows that it could have been done in a week, and I think he is absolutely correct as to that. I believe myself that any large manufacturer in the country could have secured a new last and made a new pattern in a very short time, and indeed the manufacturers themselves told us that there were numerous lasts in their factories which were quite as good as the lasts which have recently been shown to the committee, and which are far more satisfactory than that used. That being the case, there was no possible excuse in my mind for the second issue of boots of the same kind as the first issue.

There is no doubt in my mind that the boot is not a satisfactory boot for active service, and that it could have been changed before the second orders were given had reasonable business attention been given to the matter. Any man in business in a large way would have given such a matter proper attention, and the Government, if it had acted in a businesslike manner would have changed the boot, and there would have been no difficulty in getting satisfactory boots after the first issue. I will not dwell longer on this question; the evidence is before the public if they want to read it, and they will come to their own conclusions.

I have just come across the report in regard to the nine boots examined which were taken from the 25th Battery of Ammunition Column, and it reads as follows:

Five pairs worn through at toe; one pair, heel rotten, fell off in a week; two pairs, soles worn off; one pair, warped so badly as to be unwearable, in spite of being properly greased.

None of those boots had been worn longer than three weeks. They were largely, as I have stated, boots that were made after the change in the specifications; that is, they were part of the 40,000 pairs of boots.

Mr. MURPHY: Double-soled boots.

Mr. NESBITT: Yes, double soles. I believe the double sole was approved, but some one said that afterwards there was a reinforcing put on the sole. I do not remember that there was any quilting or any reinforcing done in the order for the 40,000 pairs that had the sole extended back to the heel. There was certainly no quilting done, that is, nails put all over the sole, in the boots that were given to us the other morning from the Ottawa battery, nor was there any reinforcement in the heel. There was an order for the extension of the sole back to the heel, and there was an increase in the price on that account which was perfectly fair and right, and we have no complaint to make on that score. The manufacturers, as was stated, lived substantially up to their contracts. Some of the contractors did not come before us to give evidence; but others came, and swore that their boots were not only as good as the samples, but to a large extent better, and they produced the leather of which the boots were made. The tanners who tanned the leather were also called, and they swore that the leather was perfectly good; but at the same time, the boots on the feet of the soldiers whom I met from time to time did not look to me to be substantial boots. I do not know why, but there is the fact staring you in the face that all the soldiers, officers and men, who gave evidence, complained that the boots were not proper boots. What is the Government going to do in regard to the matter? The Government had a little more than a month from the time of the first issue of boots to the time when the second order was given, which was ample, in my judgment, for it to have rectified anything that might have been wrong in the boots.

Mr. F. B. McCURDY (Shelburne-Queens): The hon. member for North Oxford (Mr. Nesbitt) has referred the members of this House to the evidence produced before the committee which is on record. With even greater confidence I also refer the members of the House to the sworn evidence which is on record, because I believe it will convince any one with an unbiased mind that the majority report of the committee is founded on fact and cannot be controverted in any essential detail.

All who are interested in public affairs should be anxious in every way possible to discourage dishonest public dealings. In this, it appears to me, there are two attitudes to be avoided; first, that of condoning shady transactions; and, second, of almost equal importance, that of condemning honest transactions.

At the present time, and in the present circumstances, in considering the question of the supply of boots to the Canadian Militia Department, we should exercise an impartial, sane and deliberate judgment based entirely upon facts.

We must remember that criticism of army footwear is as old as war itself. Each campaign by a belligerent country is fought under conditions differing from those of its predecessors, so that after the termination of each campaign each belligerent country naturally reviews the experience of that campaign and ascertains in what ways its boots and other war equipment can be improved. The result is that there is constant change and difference of opinion.

The speakers who have preceded me this afternoon have pointed out that the question of army footwear has occupied the attention of the best minds in the United States, and that an experienced army board there required four years in which to make up its mind as to the best form of boot to be recommended. It is only within the last week that, in reading trade journals published in the United States, I find that there is an opinion in the trade there that these findings, although made as late as 1912, have already become obsolete, and that there should be now a change in their army boot.

The hon. member for North Oxford (Mr. Nesbitt) quoted the evidence of a Canadian manufacturer to the effect that the Canadian Militia Department could easily have made a change from the present specification and ordered different boots within a week. I think I need only point out to him—for he is a man well endowed with discretion—that if the expert American Army Board required four years in which to gather sufficient information to form the basis for an opinion, any suggestion of an interested manufacturer in Canada that a new sample could be supplied and a new specification adopted in a week, is not one that should carry weight with him.

Mr. NESBITT: If the hon. gentleman will change that and, instead of saying that they required that time, will say that they took it, I will agree with him.

Mr. McCURDY: My hon. friend has had a good deal of experience with and ample opportunity to observe our good neighbours to the south, and I think he will be the last to accuse them of any lack of celerity in their movements, or question their sound business judgment.

The interests involved in the present inquiry are two.

The first is the soldier's comfort, and in that is bound up the question of national protection. No interest which can be put forward is entitled to as much consideration as this.

But only secondary to that is the interest of an important Canadian industry, one which employs directly 23,000 operatives, and which has, in addition, a large number of shareholders. There are at least 23,000 operatives engaged directly in the Canadian boot manufacturing industry, tanning and leather trades. Using the usual basis of computation of five to a family, we find that over 100,000 of the Canadian population are dependent on this great industry. That is an interest which can be considered only secondary to that of the comfort of the soldiers themselves.

There has been, I regret to say, very noticeable in the discussion and consideration of the supply of boots to the Canadian army, a tendency to condemn without investigation. The press and pulpit have leaped at conclusions with insufficient evidence. I fully appreciate that, because my own views had, before I had any official knowledge or investigation, been influenced both by the press and by the pulpit; for I have read one and have listened to the other.

It seems to me that the obligation of members at the present time is to divest themselves entirely of all the original prejudice which may have been created by these or other influences. Evidence should be gathered from the whole field. It is not safe, it is not advisable, to select isolated bits of evidence, casual statements by witnesses who appeared before the committee. The evidence should be taken as a whole. If any one will take the trouble to read through these twenty-six volumes they will be able to form a pretty accurate judgment. I am afraid even though recommended to members of this House, that course will not be generally followed.

But, more than that, I think that any person who wishes to arrive at a judgment with regard to any matter such as this, is better equipped to do so if he were present and heard personally the evidence given by the different witnesses.

I know that it is superfluous to appeal to hon. members of the House for a careful consideration of the facts and of the evidence. I trust and I believe that every person who has the opportunity of serving his country by occupying a seat in this House will not fail to place the best interest of the country and its national prosperity above party and will render a decision on the facts as on record and not on any preconceived idea or any question that has to do with party advantage or interest.

At six o'clock, the House took recess.

The House resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. McCURDY (resuming): Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for North Oxford (Mr. Nesbitt) agrees with the report of the committee to the effect that the contracts have been substantially fulfilled by the manufacturers. These reports, I trust, will dispose of the statements which have been going around in the press and which have interfered not a little with the shoe manufacturing industry in Canada. It has been semi-officially stated that substantial contracts from belligerent countries have been cancelled owing to statements made in the press as to the failure of Canadian contractors to carry out their contracts with the department.

The investigation which has been conducted by your committee has been most thorough in all its details. A number of members of this House have occasionally attended that committee, and I am sure their observations will bear out this statement, that nothing in the way of evidence has been ruled out on a technicality, but that, on the contrary, all the rules of evidence, and the practice of previous committees, have been strained to allow anything that in any way could throw light on the matter of boot contracts to be admitted.

Naturally I regret the failure of the committee to arrive at a unanimous report. Unanimity was, I think, particularly desirable at the present time, affecting a question with which is involved that of national defence. The cordial and harmonious relations of members of the committee throughout the investigation seemed to promise, to the uninitiated at any rate, a unanimous report. But other counsels prevailed and we have not a unanimous report, but a report of the majority and a report of the minority, the latter, I feel, not warranted by a fair consideration of the evidence.

It is, however, gratifying that all agree on the essential part, and this gives the lie to the lurid press and pulpit utterances of paper soles and all other fraudulent suggestions—all agree that the boots supplied have been manufactured honestly and in accordance with the contracts.

Furthermore, it has been shown by the investigation that the profits of manufacturers have in all cases been very moderate. The largest manufacturers whom we have had before us and, therefore, presumably the manufacturers best qualified to manufacture at a low cost, testified (see 978 and 980) that the net factory cost, including factory overhead of the boots manufactured at the largest factory, that of the Ames-Holden Company, amounted to $3.39 per pair. They also stated that the overhead expenses of that factory amounted to 19.02 per cent of the selling price, which would be approximately 63 cents per pair. That overhead expense includes audit, advertising, allowances, cartage, donations, insurance, law costs, light, heat and power branches, office sundries, wages (branches), travelling expenses, rent of branches, taxes, stationery, discount, bank interest, repairs, and bad debts, but does not include interest on capital. This will bring the total cost over $3.85, so they appear to have been manufactured and supplied to the Government without any actual profit to the manufacturer. It is also fair to state that one manufacturer alone said before the committee that, even after paying what he called his selling expenses, a profit remained to the manufacturer of 25 cents per pair. But on the occasion when he next appeared before the committee he gave evidence to the effect that his profits were less than 13 cents a pair, and he furthermore, I am informed, made statements not in his evidence to the effect that there was an actual loss on the contract. I think it is a fair statement to make that in no case were any profits of any substantial size made on these contracts.

As to the evidence which has been offered to the committee, my hon. friend from North Oxford has told the House of his personal efforts to investigate. I think all members of the committee have taken pains to go outside the committee room, wherever occasion offered, to observe the condition of the boots on soldiers' feet in actual service, and informal conversations with soldiers and all other means available were employed by the different members of the committee in order to widen the information available.

Reference has been made by every speaker who has preceded me to the regimental boards of inquiry. When the evidence obtained by these regimental boards at the different headquarters first came to my attention, I was of the opinion that the evidence of these boards should be admitted; but it was otherwise decided by the committee. Five members of the committee were leading barristers, and we also had the benefit of counsel, and so six learned barristers decided, probably correctly, that they were not admissible as evidence, for the same reason as the findings of the departmental board of inquiry, sometimes known as the Hallick Board, was not admitted. The principal reason why this was not admitted was that the witnesses had not been sworn; and as the evidence had not been given under oath it was thought by a majority of the committee that the testimony taken before these regimental boards and the Hallick Board should not be received as evidence. Furthermore, with regard to the departmental board, there was always a temptation from being interested, which would be difficult for any departmental officer to fully avoid.

Regimental boards, are held at each of the different divisional headquarters and regimental headquarters of the troops. When new boots were required for any reason by the soldiers, as was explained in evidence, the only way in which these boots could be obtained was through a regimental board. If the regimental board appointed under the authority of the colonel of the regiment condemned the boots for any other reason than ordinary wear and tear, soldiers could not obtain new boots unless they paid for them themseives.

The function of the regimental boards, therefore, can perhaps be properly stated to be the condemnation of boots. I am sure that all can understand the temptation to which the officers were subjected to approve of the applications made by their soldiers for new footwear. If the board found the boots to be no longer useful on account of fair wear and tear, they recommended that the boots be replaced at the public expense. If the boots were rendered unwearable for other reasons they had to be replaced at the soldier's expense. It is only natural that an officer should try to meet the wishes of his men as far as possible, and if possible, confirm the applications that their soldiers had made.

We made inquiry of the regular departmental officers at Ottawa, and examined among others the director of clothing and equipment, who has particular charge of all the outfits for the men. We wished to ascertain whether he accepted the findings of these regimental boards as final. His evidence is to be found on page 232:

Q. You do not accept the recommendations at all?—A. No.

Q. As a matter of fact you regard them with suspicion?—A. I am afraid we do.

Q. They have been more often rejected than acted upon? A. Yes.

Q. In other words it is the natural desire of the men to get new boots as often as they can?—A. Just so.

Furthermore, it should be remembered that those who gave evidence before these boards, and the members of the boards themselves, were not experts in equipment and their examination of the boots was often casual. The hon. member for Russell (Mr. Murphy) made a good deal of the findings of these boards this afternoon. As I have already stated, their findings were not admitted in the evidence for the reason that those who appeared before the boards as witnesses were not sworn.

But there was also another reason.

When the majority of the members of the committee decided that we could not accept the evidence taken before these regimental boards we scanned the evidence very carefully and summoned before the committee twenty-six witnesses, I think it was, whose evidence in regard to the service given by the boots was the most unfavourable taken by all these regimental boards. These witnesses came before us and gave evidence under oath; but even here we were at a disadvantage for it was only natural that these men should, for the sake of being consistent, seek to uphold in their evidence before the committee the statements they had already made before the regimental board.

As a matter of fact, as subsequent events proved, these regimental boards discharged with a vengeance the functions for which they were created. I have already quoted the evidence of the director of clothing and equipment who said that he always regards the findings of these boards with suspicion, and more often rejects than accepts them. The result of our examination of the witnesses who had appeared before these regimental boards was exactly what was to be expected. It proved the statements made before the regimental boards to be palpably absurd.

The hon. member for North Oxford (Mr. Nesbitt) referred this afternoon to the case of nine pairs of boots which came before the committee from the 7th Artillery Brigade of Ottawa. This regimental board happened to be called towards the end of the Special Committee's sittings, and when its finding came to our attention we asked that the boots be sent to the committee, and that Lieutenant Patterson and Captain McParland appear to give evidence. It developed in the course of the evidence that of these nine pairs which had been condemned by that regimental board out of a total issue of 267 pairs, two pairs—and this is the evidence of my own senses, for I saw the boots myself; and I am confirmed by the opinion of the committee's experts—were actually wearable at the time they appeared before the committee, and our boot expert naturally asked the question: "Why are these boots condemned? That boot as it stands to-day is perfectly wearable." Three other pairs out of the nine were perfectly repairable, and only required the services of a regimental cobbler to be made right again.

Probably the one reason which more than any other contributed to the dissatisfaction with the boots of the troops at the different quarters was that they could only be served with one pair of boots to wear, rain or shine, day or night.

I am not going to quote at any great length from the evidence given by witnesses who appeared before the committee, but we had another officer, Lieutenant Underwood, who came from the Winnipeg division. This man gave evidence before a departmental board held at the agricultural college barracks in the city of Winnipeg on the 11th January, 1915, and this is his story there as we have it from a perusal of the report of their regimental board:

> I have taken at haphazard a number of pairs of boots of the first issue, which were returned to Q.M. stores, and on cutting them open found them composed of "paper, wood, cork and leather scrap, ground and mixed with glue." The uppers of inferior quality, and in my opinion, unfit for active service.

That officer was brought before the committee, and he admitted that it was news to him that in the manufacture of boots ground cork and cement are recognized as the best filling for Goodyear welt boots, and are required by the specifications of the department. Yet that is his evidence.

The hon. member for Russell this afternoon quoted the evidence of two soldiers only who preferred the British boot to the Canadian boot. We had before us five or six Canadians who enlisted and who saw service at Salisbury Plain. The only members of the Canadian force available to us were asked to appear before the committee and give evidence, and they were unanimous in declaring that they preferred the Canadian boot to the British boot. The opinion of these six men, to my mind, far overruled the opinion of the two privates, McGarvie and Ewing, who were quoted by the hon. member for Russell this afternoon. So far as opinions go with reference to the quality of the boots, the committee, I think very wisely, put their reliance on a committee of experts. After careful deliberation and a good deal of consideration extending over ten days, the committee unanimously decided to select Mr. John A. Hoar, of Halifax, a large custom boot maker, of 30 years experience who had made boots for Imperial officers and soldiers, for naval officers and for the general custom trade, and Mr. Magloire Côté of St. Hyacinthe, who also has large experience from his youth up in boot making, to assist them in an expert way. These two men, I understand, are one on either side of politics. They were unanimously appointed by the committee and, as I say, I think, the committee wisely decided to commit to them the investigation of the condition of the boots which had come to the committee for examination. Their figures have been given to the House a number of times this afternoon, but perhaps they will bear repeating. Immediately on the assembling of the committee, telegrams were sent to all the regimental headquarters throughout the country asking them to send all rejected boots to Ottawa so that the committee could pass upon them definitely. As a result of these directions 1,713 pairs of boots were sent to the committee as being boots condemned after fair wear and tear by regimental boards. I have previously referred to the findings of these boards as being such as perhaps should not be regarded as conclusive. This opinion has been very much fortified by the developments which have occurred and by the examination of these boots by our experts. They reported that 1,448 out of the 1,713 condemned boots were repairable. They reported further that 112 pairs of these boots had been burned. Every one knows that the burning of boots is not destruction by fair wear and tear. The regimental boards said not a word, any of them, about burning, but burnt they were. Therefore, you have conclusive evidence that the findings of these regimental boards are not such as should be depended upon. There were 22 cut by knife and spur and 48 cut by nails. Out of a total lot we will put those cut by nails in the class of boots unrepairable and destroyed by wear and tear and then we have left only 131 out of the 1,713 sent here for inspection, which shows that the regimental boards were wrong in their decisions in 92 cases out of every 100, and right in only 8 cases out of 100. Surely these results justify the decision of the committee not to accept the findings of the regimental boards as evidence and I am rather surprised that in this discussion my hon. friends opposite should have referred time and time again to the findings of these boards which have been already discarded.

The experience of quite a number of soldiers at Salisbury Plain was given in person to the committee, and I submit that the same rules of evidence should apply to the Salisbury boards as was applied to the regimental boards in Canada. In view of what we found in regard to the credibility of evidence given before the Canadian regimental boards, and the developments which have occurred since we examined the witnesses, considerable reserve should be maintained in regard to these Salisbury boards. Those who gave evidence before the Salisbury boards were almost all, without exception, not sworn. Furthermore, all the soldiers who had experience at Salisbury Plain, without any exception whatever, on coming before our committee testified in the most emphatic manner that they would not wear the English boots but that they preferred the Canadian boots. The hon. member for Rouville (Mr. Lemieux) this afternoon, was very insistent on having the letters received from General Alderson, who was in charge of the Canadian force at Salisbusy, read to the House. Whatever Gen. Alderson's opinion may be, it was necessarily based largely, as were the findings of the regimental boards in Canada, on evidence submitted to him and he would not necessarily express his own opinion nor could he state of his own personal knowledge; but he would give a report based on evidence which was sent up to him by those in authority under him.

We all know that every country has its own particular customs, and every good citizen of a country loves the customs of his country and is prepared to stand by them. We, as good Canadians, prefer Canadian things, and the people of Great Britain, as good Britishers, prefer British things, and it should be borne in mind in considering the expression of General Alderson as well as the evidence of Mr. McGarvie and Mr. Ewing, who preferred the British boot, that they have been accustomed to the British boots from their youth up, and that they would naturally favour them.

I shall now deal for a few minutes with the unfair features, as I regard them, of the minority report.

I have already stated that in my innocence, on going into this committee first, I really hoped for a unanimous finding. I went into the committee to consider this question at first under the impression, on account of the utterances in pulpit and press, that a great wrong had been done. I felt very strongly that all evidence possible that could throw light on the subject should be admitted, and I state now that after full consideration of the evidence I am prepared to stand by the report submitted by the committee as being a fair report, and a report warranted by the facts in their widest sense. If the minority report contains unfair features, and many unfair features, it is perhaps because of the fact that certain members have gone into that committee from the very start to if possible report something unfavourable to and tending to reflect on the Government. I went into that committee with no such intention; I went there with no other intention but to give my verdict exactly according to the evidence. As a sample of what I consider unfair findings, I shall read from page 599 of the Votes and Proceedings, paragraphs 43 and 44 of the minority report:

> Thirteen hundred and sixty-five pairs of boots, and three hundred and forty-eight odd boots out of the number condemned by the various boards throughout the country were submitted to the inspection of Messrs John A. Hoar, of Halifax, and Magloire Côté of St. Hyacinthe, who made report thereon, as follows:
> That out of said number of boots, two hundred and sixty-five pairs were not worth repairing; fourteen hundred and forty-eight were repairable, and that sixty-eight boots were not originally equal to the sample. If the proportion of boots in this particular lot, not equal to sample, is a fair percentage of the number of boots furnished that did not come up to sample, out of the one hundred and eighty thousand pairs supplied, the number of boots so furnished that were inferior to sample would be seven thousand two hundred and ninety-eight boots.

If that second paragraph of the minority report which I have read means anything, it means that Mr. John A. Hoar and Mr. Coté found:

> If the proportion of boots in this particular lot, not equal to sample, is a fair percentage of the number of boots furnished that did not come up to sample, out of the one hundred and eighty thousand pairs supplied, the number of boots so furnished that were inferior to sample would be seven thousand two hundred and ninety-eight boots.

As a matter of fact, Messrs. Hoar and Coté found nothing of the kind, and the wording of that paragraph must create a most erroneous impression upon the mind of any reader. To my mind, and I think to the mind of any impartial man who reads it, it is intended to convey an entirely wrong impression as to the finding of these two gentlemen who were appointed as experts by the committee. The first sentence alone of the paragraph, not the second or last, is that of Messrs. Hoar and Coté. And the representation is the more unfair because these boots are the "dregs" of the whole issues, and thus inevitably yield a larger proportion of bad boots than those not condemned.

Reference has been made to the evidence of Mr. Alfred Minister of Toronto, and is regarded as of so much importance by the minority of the committee that it occupies a whole paragraph in their report. It is stated in this minority report that Mr. Minister would not make shoes according to the sample, knowing that they were to be used by men going on active service, and the impression is conveyed that "he did not want to make any money out of a man's life." Citations from the evidence of Mr. Minister have been made by the hon. member for North Grey (Mr. Middlebro), and any person who reads that evidence in its entirety will recognize at once that it is most contradictory, and that it destroys the point which the minority report seeks to make out of it. In my opinion, too great weight ought not to be attached to the evidence of this man. His evidence, in the first place, was intended to make it appear that because of his high sense of public duty he was willing to forego profits which he might have made, because he did not want to take advantage of the situation. But he was obliged to admit before the committee, first that he would make the selfsame boots if he got his price of $4.65, and, second, that he took no further steps whatever to notify the Government or those responsible of the ideas he expresses at this date of defects; that he sent no word to the Minister of Militia or to his member of Parliament as to his views on the subject.

Another paragraph in the minority report which cannot fail to attract the attention of any one who has followed the evidence carefully, is paragraph 21, which is to be found at page 596 of the Votes and Proceedings and which says:

> That on October 24th the department directed a change to be made in the sample boot by doing away with the slip sole that had been in use and providing in its place a double sole running through to the back of the heel, but made no further changes in the specifications—

It is correct so far, but listen to this:

> —or in the direction of providing a proper boot for active service.

If anything has been shown by the investigation as regards boots, it is that the trouble is on account of the soles wearing out. A large number of boots have been displayed before the committee; and in almost all the cases, the difficulty where it did arise came on that account, and the minority report says that "the Government did nothing in the direction of providing a proper boot for active service, excepting the providing of a double sole." The evidence of Mr. Matthews, of Ames-Holden-McCready Company, at page 584, is as follows:

> Q. I see that this sole also has nails?—A. Yes, hob nails.
> Q. Would there be any difficulty in putting these steel slugs and these nails in the sole after manufacture?—A. After manufacture?
> Q. Yes?—A. There would be no difficulty in putting in hob nails. Since the investigation was started, the Canadian Government has sent to our factory in the neighbourhood of 8,000 shoes to be reinforced, or quilted as we call it, in the fore-part and in the heels with nails.

The Government has sent to one factory alone 8,000 pairs to be reinforced or quilted in the sole, which is the most vulnerable part of the boot. I need only draw the attention of the members of the committee to the matter, and they will recognize that there has been a cloud of witnesses who have produced boots that have been quilted in the soles, and that one firm alone has put those improvements in the soles of 8,000 pairs of boots.

Mr. NESBITT: Were not those boots sent back from the Montreal stores?

Mr. McCURDY: The evidence does not show where they came from. Why, in the face of this well-known fact should the minority report say that " nothing has been done by the Government in the way of providing a proper boot for active service "? Hon. members on the other side of the House may palliate the omission of the minority report to commend the vigilance of the department, but no hon. member can excuse the minority for such a palpable misstatement as the one to which I have referred.

The most amazing statement, however, and one which occurs no less than fifteen times in the minority report is that the boots which have been served out to the soldiers "are not active service boots." That is the burden of the song from beginning to end of the minority report. I was much disappointed at the failure of the committee to agree on a report, and it looks to me as though the hon. gentlemen who have submitted the minority report had early made up their minds to bring in an adverse report, which is not founded on the facts disclosed. The minority, after searching the whole record through, find that in their opinion the boot is not an active service boot, and they fasten on this point and reiterate from one end of the report to the other that the boot is not an active service boot.

It has been pointed out to the House already—and I will repeat it, as it is a matter of importance—that whatever the recognized departmental pattern boot may be, it was adopted in the days when the Minister of War of our hon. friends opposite presided over the Department of Militia and Defence. Whether the boot came into the department in 1899, 1900, 1905 or 1908, matters not; it was there, an accepted pattern by the department at the time when this Government came into power, and when hon. gentlemen opposite —and it is only they who join in this minority report—condemn the active service boot, they condemn their own administration of the Department of Militia.

I would have expected my hon. friends opposite to have been more kind to the gallant gentleman who lately presided over that department.

This country has voted large sums of money year after year for the upkeep of the Department of Militia. In 1897, $1,688,213 was spent; in 1898, $2,500,635; in 1899, $3,624,693; in 1900, $3,106,241; and so on down to the year 1907, $6,795,678; in 1908, $6,408,806; in 1909, $6,921,314, and in 1910, $6,909,211. This money was voted by the representatives of the people, assuming that it was to be spent for the purpose of keeping the permanent force in a state of readiness to defend this country, and engage in serious fighting if necessary.

Did it ever occur to the Canadian people that this money, instead of being spent in equipping the permanent force for active service, was to be spent in holding annual camps where honourary colonels might appear in full uniform once a year without any serious thoughts of fighting in their minds?

We all remember the experiences of our youthful navy, how one-half of it on returning from a junketing trip, ran on the rocks. Do I understand from this minority report that it was deliberately planned by hon. gentlemen opposite and by the late Minister of War that we were to have a toy army as well as a toy navy?

The argument of the hon. member for North Oxford is that this boot is an active service boot suitable for South Africa, but not suitable for France. If that suggestion is followed to its logical conclusion, then Canada should immediately equip itself with a variety of kinds of army boot. She should have one suitable for South Africa; she should have one suitable for France, the country where our men now are: one suitable for work in Belgium, for that is where they will be shortly; we should have one suitable for work in Germany, for that is where our forces will be soon; and so on ad infinitum; she should have boots suitable for use in every country on which she may at any time wage a war.

It is quite clear from the evidence that a boot very similar to exhibit 12 was worn by soldiers in South Africa. It seems clear that Slater boots were not provided by the department, but soldiers who wanted them had to buy their own boots.

But I should like to show to the House a sample of the real South African army boot, provided by the Administration under the superintendence of the late Minister of Militia and Defence. There [exhibiting a boot] is a fair specimen of the real boot our soldiers wore in South Africa provided by the department. It is a fair sample—exhibit no. 77.

An hon. MEMBER: What is that in the sole?

Mr. McCURDY: Cardboard—sometimes referred to as paper—in the sole from end to end—a fair sample of the boot that the Minister of War of my friends opposite provided for our soldiers for South Africa. If they did not like it, they could go to soldiers out with a booth of this kind? with their own money. I invite an examination and comparison of these two boots. If hon. gentlemen opposite condemn this Government for sending soldiers abroad with a boot of that kind, exhibit No. 12 [exhibiting another boot], what will they say about a minister of war sending his soldiers out with a boot of this kind [exhibiting the first boot].

Mr. MACDONALD: That is absolutely untrue, and the hon. member knows that. That boot was rejected.

Mr. McCURDY: The hon. gentleman says the statement is untrue. That comes as news to me.

Mr. MACDONALD: The hon. gentleman had better read the evidence.

Mr. McCURDY: I have read the evidence.

Mr. MACDONALD: You will find that that is a sample of the boot that was rejected by the inspector in 1899. It was made by Robert Taylor & Co., in Halifax. You will find the correspondence produced by Mr. McCann which will show that these boots were rejected and returned. And they were not intended for South Africa in the first place.

Mr. McCURDY: I refer to the evidence of Mr. McCann with regard to these boots. This boot is called exhibit 77. I am not at all surprised that my hon. friend from Pictou is very much annoyed when attention is called to this boot and its history in the department.

9 p.m.

Mr. MACDONALD: I am annoyed at my hon. friend misrepresenting the facts.

Mr. McCURDY: I quote from the evidence of Mr. McCann, page 1038:

We opened up that one boot and it was quite unnecessary to destroy any more boots. We had that as one sample. We just took it at random, opened it, and the moment it was opened we concluded that it was not just what our minister wanted to send away.

Then, at page 1,039:

Q. Then those that came in subsequently were from the same contractor and were the same kind of boots?—A. Practically the same kind.

Q. And they were for the permanent force in South Africa?—A. And for South Africa.

It is quite true, some of these boots were returned to the contractor. But this is a fair sample of the boot used at that time in the department; and I would advise my hon. friend, before he makes other positive statements with regard to that boot, to go to Halifax and personally investigate and inquire from his friends as to the subsequent history of the boot.

Mr. MACDONALD: Investigate among your friends, Robert Taylor & Co.

Mr. McCURDY: I trust that both Robert Taylor & Co. and Hon. A. W. Redden are friends of mine. I am a friend of theirs. It was the hon. gentleman himself who pointed out to the committee—however, I will refer to that later on. The point is that this is a fair sample of the boot sent to South Africa.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: It says it was this class of boot.

Mr. McCURDY: It was this class of boot, and no quibbling will dispose of that. Furthermore, the present Government are paying $3.85 a pair for boots for our soldiers, and we are told that the Government is not prepared to pay for a good boot; but all that the former Government were prepared to pay for boots for our soldiers going to South Africa was $2.13 a pair. As to the evidence of Mr. McCann, let me follow it a little further, quoting from page 1039:

By the Chairman:

Q. Then those that came in subsequently were from the same contractor, and were the same kind of boot?—A. Practically the same kind.

Q. And they were for the permanent force and for South Africa.—A. And for South Africa.

Q. And possibly some of them went to South Africa?—A. It is quite possible.

Q. It is quite probable, is it not?—A. I would not like to go that far.

Mr. Macdonald: The lot of boots of which this is a sample were all rejected and sent back to the contractor, and therefore this is not evidence.

Hon. Mr. Murphy: And he said that many of the men who went to South Africa bought their own boots.

By the Chairman:

Q. Those who did not wore this class of boot?—A. So far as I know, some of them might have gone to South Africa.

By Hon. Mr. Murphy:

Q. Do you know that as a fact?—A. I do not know as a fact; once they were accepted they were returned to the Ordnance Stores.

By the Chairman:

Q. Those who went to South Africa did not buy their own boots, nor this class of boots?—A. It was this kind that went to South Africa.

That settles the question. Where is my hon. friend's charge of misrepresentation now?

I deplore the fact that such an important question, one with which is involved Canadian national and Imperial defence, should be made a party question.

There are, as you know, in the prosecution of a fight, certain rules of civilized warfare; some things are permissible and some are not permissible. Among the acts not permitted in modern warfare is the poisoning of wells. I had sent to me a few days ago—I do not know whether on account of my official position as member of the committee; at any rate it came to me through the mails—a publication called "No. 24." I see that it is published by the Central Information Bureau of the Canadian Liberal Party, Ottawa, 1915. This publication, which bears the official impress of the Liberal party said:

The manufacturers made the shoes that were ordered. If the wrong sort were ordered, the fault lay with the Government, and that is where the fault did lie. They waited three weeks.

Now, Mr. Speaker, the evidence produced by that committee shows that war was declared on the 4th of August. The first business day following the 4th of August was the 5th of August. On the 8th of August, three days later, the Government sent out requisitions to a large number of manufacturers, and on the 10th of August, which was exactly five days after it was possible for them to act, contracts for the manufacture of boots were in the contractors' hands—and still we have from this official bureau that the Government "waited three weeks." I have already declared that we have heard from the pulpit and from the press wild statements with regard to the supply of boots and their quality. I think this little leaflet can properly excuse about one-half of the press of this country from any liability in this matter; this is the quarter from which official information springs for the Liberal party. No fountain can rise higher than its source, and if this is the official information—misinformation, distorted information, given out by the central bureau at Ottawa,—it seems to me that the fault lies there with the Liberal party, and not primarily with the press who are supporting it.

The minority report also devotes a paragraph to the middleman:

That in the month of November last the Militia Department directed the Senior Ordnance Officer to purchase boots locally in Winnipeg and 3,798 pairs of boots were purchased there, not directly from manufacturers of boots but through middlemen;

These boots were required for use at Winnipeg, they were purchased at Winnipeg from large wholesale dealers in Winnipeg because there are no manufacturers there, and it does not appear from the evidence produced before the committee that the public interest has suffered in any way whatever. The boots were delivered at Winnipeg at $4 per pair, express paid, delivered free of expense to the Government and the public interest has not suffered. Furthermore, these 3,798 pairs of boots are less than 2·10 per cent of the whole supply of boots ordered since the war broke out.

It is rather significant that the minority report calls attention to the fact that these purchases were made through middlemen—and stopped there. Do hon. gentlemen opposite condemn the existence of middlemen, this noxious weed of Liberal growth, or do they hesitate to attack this class whose activities flourished throughout the country in the days of hon. gentlemen opposite? Do they intend to uproot them? It is significant that they call attention to the fact that these middlemen exist and make no recommendation with regard to them.

Our casual research in the department brought us face to face with this institution, fostered—and I say it in all sincerity—by the late Administration. When our search in the department uncovered this institution, it was, in fact, the hon. member for Pictou (Mr. Macdonald) himself who first recognized it. The contract for army boots in 1889 was made with Mr. A. W. Redden, a leading citizen of Halifax, a member of the Legislative Council and a man of the highest standing. He is a stalwart Liberal, of course, else he would not have been called when he was to the "upper chamber" in Nova Scotia. But Mr. Redden is a retail dealer. The Winnipeg dealers who supplied the boots questioned by the minority are all wholesalers.

The significance of the Redden contract did not dawn on the majority of the committee, it remained for the hon. member for Pictou to point it out. The hon. member said (page 1200):

> Mr. Macdonald: I may state for the benefit of the committee that Mr. Robert Taylor was one of the people who made that boot with the paper sole that was produced here.

We were content to let the matter rest with Mr. Redden, but the hon. member for Pictou was the means of pointing out that there was a middleman in the transaction.

While it does not appear from our investigation that the public interest has suffered, there is one other circumstance in connection with the supply of army boots which, I think, should not be overlooked. It also is a legacy from bygone days. There was a gentleman well known around the department who formerly was president of the Slater Shoe Company, who dealt largely with the department in the olden days when Sir Frederick Borden presided over that department. In those days it was not fashionable to call for tenders. Mr. Slater was awarded the contract year after year without any call for tenders. The order was simply given out to Mr. Slater. This gentleman ceased his connection with the Slater Shoe Company on January 1, 1913. Within two months he had appealed to the Minister of Militia and Defence for consideration on the false representation that he had become a partner in Louis Gauthier & Co., a manufacturing concern in Quebec. The minister, with his customary good nature, allowed this gentleman an opportunity to tender.

Major General HUGHES: I might say right here that no man who is a manufacturer of boots who has ever had his name presented to the Militia Department since I have been there, be he Grit or Tory, reputable or otherwise, but has had his name put on the list and has had the director of contracts search him out to see whether he was fit for the job or not.

Mr. McCURDY: The minister's statement brings to my mind other information we found in the committee. We found that the minister had gone to a great deal of pains to ascertain whether this firm should be allowed to tender. Exhaustive reports were at his direction obtained from the mercantile agencies, who reported that this firm of Louis Gauthier & Co., in which Slater claimed to be a partner, was a reputable and reliable firm, well able to carry out a contract if given an opportunity to tender. At any rate, they were subsequently the lowest tenderers, at $3.72½, and as such were awarded the contract for the supply of boots.

Mr. NESBITT: My hon. friend has said that the Slater Company got the contract without tendering. What was the price?

Mr. McCURDY: I think it was $4.

Mr. NESBITT: I understand the highest price was $3.72.

Mr. McCURDY: Here is the evidence on page 903. Charles E. Slater was being examined as regards the Gauthier contract:

> Q. Then you ought to have no objection to tell us.—A. Instead of it causing the Government or the Department any more expense, I saved them money by my connection with Gauthier, and bringing Gauthier into the proposition. In 1913 and 1912 we were paying $4 a pair for the boots. That was the year, 1912, when Slater Shoe Co. supplied the boots.

So that on the first Gauthier contract the country was saved 27½ cents per pair. It has not been proven by the investigation that the public interest has suffered at all in the matter, but at the same time our investigations disclosed the fact that an abnormal and unfair commission arrangement existed; and although the public interest has not suffered in any way by reason of it, I think the Government, now that its attention had been brought to the matter, can very properly place its stamp of disapproval upon any such arrangement in connection with its business in the future.

It must be very gratifying to all citizens who are anxious for a full and free investigation into the public transactions that the evidence of the committee should be as it is.

It should also be gratifying to all interested in the fortunes of the soldiers who are so valiantly battling at the front in defence of our common cause, and gratifying as well as to every Canadian interested in the vindication of our great industrial structure, upon whose prosperity depends in turn the prosperity of a large army of employees and skilled mechanics.

In closing, I desire to express the hope that the agencies which have been instrumental in creating uneasiness in the minds of those who have sons or brothers or friends at the front—and that includes all Canadians—and which have been so ready to cast aspersions upon the fair name of one of Canada's great basic industries, may, now that the baseless nature of their charges has been demonstrated, be equally active in removing the false impression which they assisted in creating.

Mr. E. M. MACDONALD (Pictou): As a member of the committee to which was referred the question as to the character of the boots supplied by the Government to the overseas contingent, I feel it my duty to make a few remarks; and I should like to review very shortly the conditions which existed in regard to this whole matter of the supplying of boots by the Canadian Government not only to the volunteers for overseas service, but to the permanent force as well. We have had some very curious statements and reasoning by some of the hon. gentlemen who, in defence of the rather curious document that has been presented as the majority report, have gone very far afield indeed from the evidence which was presented before the committee. They have discussed almost everything else in the world except the question as to the character of the boots that were given to the soldiers. I might recall the fact that previous to 1899 the number of men permanently engaged in the Militia Force of Canada was comparatively small, amounting to not more than 700 or 800 at the most; and these were scattered at various places over the country at what were known as schools of instruction, where young men who wanted to qualify as Canadian officers proceeded for the purpose of taking a course and receiving their certificates. Previous to 1899, in no one year from Confederation down, was the Militia Department of Canada called on to supply more than 700 or 800 pairs of boots at one time. It will readily be seen, therefore, that the question of the character of boots supplied during that period was not a matter of very serious consequence. It did not engage the attention of the country to a very great degree, for a large number of these men were employed simply as sentries in the quietest kind of way, and had no real part in actual training. When the militia of the country were called out to the camps in summer time the Government of the country at no time, since Confederation down to the present, has ever provided them with boots. Each man provided himself with his own. I thought it well to make these remarks because I am quite sure that a great number of people who have not followed the procedure of the committee, or read the evidence, were under the impression that the Government had in the past been supplying the boots for the militia of this country.

With these premises, let us see where Canada was in 1899 when she decided to participate in the South African war. The result was that the organization of the department, so far as the supplying of boots for any purposes was concerned, was naturally of no consequential character, and from the evidence before us there can be no manner of doubt that the Canadian force that went to South Africa were equipped with boots in this way. In the first place Lord Strathcona sent the Strathcona Horse and equipped them with everything that attached to a soldier's accoutrements, the department supplying no part of their equipment whatever. It appears that the Vankleek Hill Boot and Shoe Company supplied the major portion of the boots that were purchased by the Militia Department in 1899 for the men who went to South Africa.

Major General HUGHES: Did I understand the hon. member to say that the Strathcona Horse were the first that were sent to South Africa?

Mr. MACDONALD: I did not say who was sent first. I said that the Strathcona Horse were equipped by Lord Strathcona himself. I am speaking of the evidence that is before us, and I do not want my hon. friend the General when his turn comes to speak to bring to the House any data that may be in his department but which was not submitted to the committee. If my hon. friend has any evidence in regard to this or anything else that was before the committee, he should have submitted it to the committee to whom was committed the task of dealing with this question.

Major General HUGHES: I am very much obliged for the lecture. But where was the suggestion that I was suppressing anything?

Mr. MACDONALD: My hon. friend has shown a disposition to be rather exceptional in his criticism of matters concerning the Strathcona Horse, so I ventured to give him that little suggestion, which I hope he will accept. He is too old a parliamentarian not to accept a suggestion of that kind. The Vankleek Hill Boot and Shoe Company was the one which supplied the boots which went to South Africa. But a great many men who volunteered at that time purchased their own boots. That was given in evidence by some gentlemen who appeared before us and has been confirmed from various other sources.

I was very much surprised to see the hon. member for Shelburne (Mr. McCurdy), who, all through this inquiry and down to the very last moment of the drafting of this majority report, was of the opinion that these boots were not suitable for active service, drag into this issue the question of a boot that was produced before the committee and alleged to be a sample of the kind of boot that was sent to South Africa. I asked Mr. McCann, who is assistant director general of contracts:

Q. Have you got a pattern of that 1,900 South African boot? You have not got a sample boot?—A. I do not think there is one in existence.

And he goes on to say in other parts of his evidence that he had searched in the department and could not find any boot of that kind. Then, as suggested by my hon. friend from North Oxford (Mr. Nesbitt), his examination proceeds in this way:

By Mr. McCurdy:

Q. Why were the boots rejected if not because they were not according to sample?—A. I could not tell if it was according to sample or not.

Q. I understand you to say the boots were rejected?—A. Some of them were rejected because they were found like that (pointing to boot). That was not considered a suitable boot to go either to the Permanent Force or to South Africa.

He identifies this particular boot which the hon. member for Shelburne has produced here. The correspondence produced by Mr. McCann will be found at page 1060. It will be found that Mr. A. W. Redden, of the city of Halifax, who was a boot and shoe dealer, and, as it was disclosed afterwards, connected with Robert Taylor & Co., who were boot and shoe manufacturers in the city of Halifax, tendered for the supply of boots for the Permanent Force in that year, and that this boot was one of the samples which had been sent forward in connection with the supply of boots to the Permanent Force, as explained by Mr. McCann at page 1030 of the evidence. The question was asked:

By Mr. Macdonald:

Q. Were there any specifications for that boot at that time?—A. No.

Q. There had been none in the department?—A. No, that was made to sample, and for anything I know to the contrary, the sample may have been made exactly like that.

Q. You say there were 3,000 pairs of boots. What became of those boots?—A. I could not tell you that. You would have to find that out from the ordnance people.

Q. They went to the Ordnance Department, did they?—A. Some of them did and some went to the contractors.

Q. Did you show that to Sir Frederick Borden, the then minister?—A. No, I did not. It was shown to him by the then Deputy Minister.

Q. And what was done in regard to it?—A. The boots were rejected and returned to the contractor, that lot.

Q. What about the 3,000 pairs?—A. I could not tell you off-hand.

Q. They were not returned?—A. Some of those were returned too.

Then this witness goes on and produces the correspondence which is found at page 1060 and in which you will find that Captain Benoit, director of contracts at that time; wrote to Mr. Redden:

Ottawa, 23rd December, 1899.

A. W. Redden,
Halifax, N.S.

Boots received from you just opened out for inspection. Leather in some, both soles and upper very bad; far inferior to standard and useless for service. Those for South Africa must be of best quality and workmanship. They will be subjected to rigid inspection. Wire explanation fully.

(Sgd.) A. Benoit, Captain.

He had previously written him on the 12th December, 1899, to the following effect:

I now beg leave to inform you that, as the boots will not be required for a second contingent to South Africa, we will have to issue them to our permanent force, who have been wearing a different kind made of brown leather.

On February 13, Captain Benoit, writing to Mr. Redden, says:

Ottawa, February 13, 1900.

Gentlemen,—I beg leave to enclose to you, herewith, a copy of our departmental inspector's report upon 456 pairs of ankle boots we received from you about 15th December last.

You will see from the nature of this report that it was quite impossible that we could accept these boots, 449 pairs, consequently were returned to you on the 2nd instant, via Canada Atlantic and Intercolonial R.R.

The amount of the charges paid for freight to Ottawa from Halifax on the 9 cases of boots —$9.40—will be deducted from any claim you may have against this department for boots accepted from you.

The remaining seven pairs have been kept here for the present for reference.

Among the seven pairs which were kept in the department for reference was found this boot which has been produced here. There was in the filling of this particular boot, according to Mr. McCann, what is known as leatherette. That is what Mr. McCann in his evidence states was in this boot and that was apostrophised by the gentleman who is acting as counsel in this matter as paper and hon. gentlemen have been talking about paper ever since.

Mr. McCURDY: The counter was composed of leatherette, but the soles, as the sample will show, were made of ordinary pasteboard from one end to the other.

Mr. MACDONALD: I speak of the filling. At page 1029 it will be found that Mr. McCann speaks of leatherette as being the quality of the material used. My hon. friend introduces this matter for the purpose of endeavouring to lead the House and the country to believe that particular boot was one out of a number of boots which had been shown to the committee and that the balance of them had formed part of the boots which had been sent to South Africa.

Mr. McCURDY: A similar boot.

Mr. MACDONALD: A similar boot? Let my hon. friend produce that similar boot. A similar boot has been the refuge of my hon. friend and his friends all through this inquiry. It was not a similar boot. When was this boot supplied?

Mr. McCURDY: This boot was supplied.

Mr. MACDONALD: If my hon. friend had not been so interested in other matters he would have known that Capt. Benoit stated that the boots were being ordered for the Permanent Force and that this was one of the seven pairs of boots that had been kept out of the 456 that had been received, that the balance were rejected and returned and that none of them got to South Africa. These are the boots (exhibiting a pair of boots) which my hon. friend's friends have supplied the soldiers who have gone to fight the Germans. It will take my hon. friend and his friends a long time to explain the shortcomings of this boot without going back into ancient history. If my hon. friend knows anything about Canadian history and about what was done in South Africa he will know that there never was any complaint about the boots which were sent to South Africa during the time when Sir Frederick Borden was Minister of Militia. My hon. friends went hunting in the recesses of the Militia Department and found a boot that was a rejected sample out of 456 boots that were absolutely rejected, which boot happened to remain in the department, and the finding of that boot is regarded by these hon. gentlemen as a good and sufficient answer for boots like those which have been supplied to the soldiers to-day. After all his arguments and after all his labouring about that boot, the very best that my hon. friend and his friends could do, when they put their hands to paper is the following to be found at page 585 of the Votes and Proceedings:

> The evidence does not justify the committee in coming to the conclusion that with some such improvements as have been suggested the sample boot would not be a good, all round, serviceable Canadian military boot.

[Mr. Macdonald.]

Is not that a beautiful commendation—that the evidence does not go so far that it would enable us to come to the conclusion that, with some improvements that have been suggested, the sample boot would not be made a good boot! That is the very best they can say about that boot. The improvements have not been made and the deliverance of the majority of the committee on this whole question is that with some improvements they might possibly make a good boot out of it. I commend to my hon. friend the task of wrestling with the question as to whether he could not do better even than that and not be forced to confess that he was driven to the position of taking up that old boot which was found in the recesses of the Militia Department and discussing it as if it had some relevancy to this question at all.

What happened after 1899? In 1901 the department took up the question of the defence of Canada and from that time on the Militia Department were concerned about the supplying of boots for outfitting the men who were looking after the defence of Canada herself. It became necessary to purchase, instead of 700 pairs of boots a year from 7,000 to 8,000. As a consequence, in 1901, a specification was drawn up. In 1905 the first time, as far as the evidence before us goes, Goodyear welt boots were bought by the Department of Militia and Defence.

Mark you, the boots which went to South Africa were standard screw boots and they were a nailed pattern, and for the first time in 1905 the Goodyear welt was introduced into the department. There is all the difference in the world between these boots, and the battle wages between the two schools of men in the boot world, as to whether the Goodyear welt or the standard screw boot is the better for soldiers. We had in three years 7,000 or 8,000 men in barracks in Canada—at Halifax, London, Esquimalt, and elsewhere. They were in small groups and their duties were not arduous; in Halifax they manned the citadel and the forts and they were engaged in schools of instruction, and the Militia Department knew very well that in providing two pairs of boots a year for each soldier they were not providing boots which were fit for active service conditions.

As I have said, there is a great deal of difference between the two kinds of boots. A number of soldiers came before the Committee, some from the permanent force and some from the expeditionary force, and they explained that they liked to have a nice dressy boot for ordinary occasions, and one chap who had lived in England said there was no use going up to London with a boot that was not dressy, because he never could get a girl, and that the Canadian boot was good for that, but it was not much good for campaigning. In these years, the Militia Department supplied this boot to the man living in barracks, when there was no thought of active service conditions. There is no question about that; every member of committee knows it.

Therefore the paramount question which the committee had to consider was. is the boot which was supplied to the men of the overseas force an adequate and a proper boot for active service conditions. These men were not enlisting to do sentry duty or to go on parade in barracks, but to engage in the most serious warfare the world has ever known. The moment the declaration of war was made, it must have become plain to the Department of Militia that above everything else the boys who were going to the front should be equipped in the best possible manner. A man engaged in this arduous duty might have a hole in his trousers, or the cloth of his coat might be thin, or there might be defects in his overcoat; and he could worry along, but the poor beggar who even in Canada had to train six hours a day, marching through the various evolutions, must have a boot which is comfortable and which will not cause him discomfort and pain. And when you transport him across the ocean and put him up against the task he has to perform in the trenches the absolute necessity for excellence in the character of his footwear becomes imperative. The question for the committee then to consider was, whether or not the boot was a fit boot for active service conditions, and that is the question which the Canadian people want to have answered. If any hon. gentleman opposite could bring evidence to show that it was an adequate and proper active service boot, then the whole discussion ended. If my hon. friend (Mr. McCurdy) was able to point to one piece of evidence that it was a proper boot for active service, we need not have this discussion to-night; but neither he nor any one else has been able to do so. This whole report of the majority of the committee is an absolute apology for the boot which somehow or other got under the feet of our soldiers. In legal parlance, hon. gentlemen on the other side have confessed the allegations and they are trying to avoid the consequence by all sorts of suggestions and learned discussions about the English boot and the American boot, which, of course have no relevancy whatever to the question as to whether or not we supplied our men with the right boot for the purpose it was to be used for. Up to this very moment, no one has come forward to say that this was a proper boot in all respects. When the Minister of Militia first appeared before the committee he impressed me that he would contend that it was a proper boot for active service, but when I read his evidence carefully, I found he told us very plainly that there was something wrong with the toe, and something wrong with the heel, and something wrong elsewhere—

Major General HUGHES: Does the hon. gentleman mean to insinuate that I did not state that to the committee?

Mr. MACDONALD: State what?

Major General HUGHES: State that in the opinion of some it should be better at the toe?

Mr. MACDONALD: I am just saying that you said so. I said that even the Major General did not come to the point of saying that this was an absolutely good boot for active service, and that he pointed out certain defects in it.

Major General HUGHES: Not defects.

Mr. MACDONALD: Inferiorities.

Major General HUGHES: That it might be improved.

Mr. MACDONALD: The Major General will not speak about this boot in the same sense that some people speak about painting the lily, because he said that this lily boot of his could be painted up, and that if it were fixed in the toe and in the heel and in the instep and in the uppers it would be a first-class boot, but that otherwise it was defective. Practically every man who has had to do with manufacturing these boots has condemned them.

We have heard a great deal about the excellence of Mr. Hoar, from Halifax, as an expert. Hon. gentlemen on the other side have lauded him and spoken of him as a man who knew what he was talking about. He comes from the constituency of the Prime Minister, and he was called by hon. gentlemen on the other side and put forward as a man on whose judgment they were going to rely. Let us see what he says about this boot. He was shown the sample boot, Exhibit 12, which was produced by the department, and he was asked:

Would you consider the sample boot, Exhibit 12, a fair boot for ordinary conditions, that is the sample by which the Ames-Holden Company were working.

Mark you, this was the sample boot from which Ames-Holden and Company made all their boots, and Mr. Hoar, before he answered the question, was rather cautious, and he said:

Under what conditions? For city wear or what?

Then he was asked:

Would you consider it so under ordinary conditions of military wear?

And his answer was:

Not for campaign work.

Then I quote further from the evidence:

Q. Would you think it was fit for ordinary military work outside of campaign work?—A. Yes, I would.

Q. But for campaign work, you think a different boot should be used?—A. Yes.

Q. What kind of a boot should be used?—A. A heavier boot.

Then Sir James Aikins asked him:

Q. Would you consider this boot fit for country wear?

Country wear, mark you, and the answer of this expert was:

No, sir.

He would not consider the boot which our boys were to wear in the trenches fit for country wear.

Mr. MURPHY: In Canada?

Mr. MACDONALD: Certainly, in Canada, and he was asked why, and he answered: The sole is not heavy enough." Then he was asked:

What experience have you had in boots for country wear?—A. Country wear?

And he goes on to tell what experience he has had.

Q. Then you would liken country wear to military use. There would be no distinction between country wear and military use?—A. Yes, they would be all right for city wear, but if the military go into the country they want a heavier boot than this.

It is Mr. Pringle who is asking all these questions.

Q. It is not heavy enough for military purposes?—A. Not for campaigning.

Major General HUGHES: Had the witness ever been on a campaign?

Mr. MACDONALD: I have not the military record of every one in this country.

Major General HUGHES: Surely the hon. member asked him.

[Mr. Macdonald.]

Mr. MACDONALD: This man stated that he had made military boots in Halifax for military officers and for the men in the garrison all his life.

Mr. NESBITT: For thirty years.

Mr. MACDONALD: Mr. Hoar was the special selection of the hon. member for Shelburne and Queens (Mr. McCurdy), and was brought up here on purpose to say that the sample boot was a good boot.

Mr. McCURDY: Not for that purpose. I heard that he was brought here to condemn boots.

Mr. MACDONALD: My hon. friend was arguing a little while ago in regard to percentages until he got the hon. members present to a point where they could not follow him on the evidence of Mr. Hoar. For my part I want to deal with the whole evidence properly as regards the kernel of the whole matter, which is whether the boot was fit for campaign use or not. Mr. Hoar's evidence is that it is not.

Mr. McCURDY: He said that it was a good boot.

Mr. MACDONALD: That is a great question my hon. friends are always asking witnesses. The witnesses come in and look at the sample boot. It is a pretty boot, just the same kind of boot as every hon. member here wears, but would any of us go far into the woods in the summer time or go marching around the country for five or six hours a day with the boots we wear in the city? Yet that is the sample boot shown. My hon. friends ask the witness: "Is it a good boot?" Answer—"Yes." "Does it look like the other boot?" Answer—"Yes, it looks like the other boot." That is the way in which the thing is done. But I want to go back to the kernel of the whole question, and I make the assertion that there was not a single manufacturer who was asked his opinion about the sample boot who did not condemn it, and that up to this moment no man, including the majority of the committee, has dared to put his signature to a certificate stating that this boot is a good active service boot.

Let us now take the evidence of Mr. J. A. Adams, of the Murray Shoe Company. I will not go into his evidence in detail, but I will call attention shortly to what he says on page 752.

Q. You have seen boots of the style of Exhibit 12, that has been so much talked of here?—A. Yes.

Q. You did not consider they were suitable for active service, and you submitted a boot that you thought would be suitable; is that it? —A. Yes, that is it.

This gentleman of the Murray Shoe Company did not think the departmental boot was a suitable one, and he said: "I have a boot that I think is better than this and I will make it, but I do not want to make the other one."

Take Mr. Matthews, of the Ames-Holden-McCready Company, of Montreal, who was interviewed by the Shoe and Leather Journal last autumn. In his interview he said that this boot, which was being made for the department and which was being given to the soldiers, was not a boot that was fit for active service at all, and that in his opinion this particular boot was a kind of a light boot that they were using in order to get the men accustomed to marching so that they could wear a heavier boot later on. He reiterated that this boot was not one which was suitable for active service.

Take, not Mr. Charles Slater, but Mr. George A. Slater, one of the bubbling, cheerful kind of chaps, who told the department he would not take $20 a pair to make boots like the sample for men who were going out to fight.

Take again Mr. C. A. Sutherland, manager of the Amherst Shoe Company, who supplied some of the boots. What did he do? He supplied these boots to the department in accordance with the sample; but when 125 boys from the county of Cumberland enlisted and were going to the front, he said: "I have a better boot for active service"—and he goes to his directors, and his directors with him make a present of 125 pairs of boots that they have themselves made different from the boots they supplied to the Militia Department, and they say: "'That is the boot that is going to equip the Cumberland county boys." When he comes before the committee and we ask him whether he thinks the exhibit is a boot suitable for active service or whether the boot that his firm has given the soldiers from Cumberland is the best, he says: "Our own boot is the best beyond all question."

Take the evidence of Mr. Alfred Minister, who came into prominence in connection with this matter. He is a member of the firm of Minister, Myles & Co., Toronto, which in 1913 was placed upon the list of firms which could supply boots to the department. My hon. friend the minister knows Mr. Minister.

Major General HUGHES: I never heard of the gentleman in my lifetime until I heard his name in connection with this boot inquiry.

Mr. MACDONALD: Do you know Mr. Myles?

Major General HUGHES: I know him well, but I never knew Bobby Myles was in the shoe business.

Mr. MACDONALD: I do not know Bobby Myles, but I know a Major Myles who came before the committee.

Major General HUGHES: The same man.

Mr. MACDONALD: He looked like a military gentleman.

Major General HUGHES: I knew him very well, but I never knew he was in the shoe business.

Mr. MACDONALD: It was not through Bobby that you put Mr. Minister on the patronage list?

Major General HUGHES: I never heard of him before.

Mr. MACDONALD: The firm was placed on the list by my hon. friend.

Major General HUGHES: I do not know that my hon. friend has any data for his statement.

Mr. MACDONALD: He stated it was so.

Major General HUGHES: Who stated it?

Mr. MACDONALD: It appears in the evidence that the firm was placed on the patronage list on my hon. friend's recommendation since he came into office.

Major General HUGHES: It is all the same; I do not deny it.

Mr. MACDONALD: Minister, Myles & Company were friends of the Minister of Militia's party, and they were given the right to supply boots in consequence. The result is that as far as hon. gentlemen opposite are concerned, it does not lie in their mouths to abuse Mr. Minister when he comes along and alleges that he has conscientious views in regard to the matter. On account of the fact that five or six gentlemen were endeavouring to examine Mr. Minister all at once, it was only natural that you would not have a connected story from him when he gave his statement first; but what appeared beyond all doubt was this, that having tendered in 1913 and not getting the contract, he was asked in August, 1914, to tender, and he referred the department to the old figure, and that finally after several telegrams had been exchanged, he came to Ottawa in September, and when he went to the Militia Department and saw the sample of boot which he was asked to follow, he took the position which he swore he then took that he would not make such boots at any price at all.

I have some further evidence in regard to this matter. Mr. Minister has written to the Toronto World in detail since then giving the substance of his conversation with Lieutenant Colonel Brown, inspector of saddlery and boots, and he says:

I asked Col. Brown whether he thought that a suitable boot could be made for the price, $3.85, I think it was. He replied he did not think it could. I then picked up a boot and said to Col. Brown that I would not make such boots as these at any price, as I would hate to think that any man had suffered, or maybe lost his life, through wearing a pair of boots made by me; that these men were risking their lives for us, and should have the best shoes that could be made. I was disgusted and angry clear through at the indifference shown as to whether the men were properly shod, as I consider this one of the most important things in a soldier's outfit.

That is what Mr. Minister says, who comes from my hon. friend's camp; because it is no Liberal that is in the business at all. This gentleman struck me having seen him only on the occasion on which he gave his evidence, as being a man who was impressed most seriously with the responsibility which would fall upon one who was engaged in supplying equipment for men going out to fight. Having had some experience in observing witnesses and estimating the value of evidence, I think there could not be the slightest fault found with him on account of his demeanour. Then we have the gentleman whom my hon. friend himself appoints as chief advisor to the department, on the subject of boots. My hon. friend from North Oxford reminds me—

Major General HUGHES: Did the hon. gentleman say that I appointed Colonel Brown to the department?

Mr. MACDONALD: The hon. minister must not be listening to his friends and then rising to interrupt me because of what they say. If he listens to me and wishes to ask a question, I will be glad to answer it. I was not speaking of the appointment of Colonel Brown, but was speaking of Mr. Wickett, whom the hon. gentleman did appoint. But my hon. friend from North Oxford reminds me of what Mr. Tetreault said. Mr. Tetreault is a contractor from Montreal, one of the men who had a big contract with the Government. He swore that he had told Colonel Brown at the time when these boots were being made that it was ridiculous to put boots like these on a soldier. And he is a political friend of the minister.

Major General HUGHES: Is he a judge?

Mr. MACDONALD: He is a maker of boots and is the man to whom my hon. friend committed the task of making 10,000 pairs of boots which our boys are now wearing. Then, take Mr. Wickett, my hon. friend made representations to Council by memorandum that he wanted somebody to look into this boot question, because it was worrying him. So Mr. Wickett was appointed chief advisor on boots. If there were any lingering doubt in anybody's mind as to whether this boot was good for active service or not, surely, Mr. Wickett's testimony on the point ought to be good enough. And I do not see—speaking with all deference to those associated with me in the committee; our relations were of the most pleasant character—I do not see how they can disregard the evidence of Mr. Wickett and permit themselves to make the equivocal finding they do make in regard to this boot. For they do not give a certificate to it; but they talk of the improvements possible. Mr. Wickett produces a boot which he had designed himself. He was asked this question:

Q. Be good enough to take that boot which is nearest your ideal, and take No. 12, and point out the difference between the two of them beginning at the upper first.—A. The upper in this No. 12—

That is the Government boot.

—is perhaps no more than 5-ounce stock and in this (Exhibit 86) it is 6-ounce stock. This No. 86 is stuffed with hard grease, it is more pliable stock, and hence more water-resisting, and while this calf (No. 12) is a very good piece of leather, if it had been stuffed with hard grease it would have been much more suitable for wear in winter or wet weather.

Q. What is the difference between them in the sole?—A. The gauge, I should not think the outer one is more than 9 gauge, that is 9 gauge, that is 9 gauge in Exhibit 12, and then I should think the other is about 7 and the insole is hardly as heavy as this or the Standard Screw. I would much prefer to have No. 86—

That is his own boot.

—which is 10 gauge with a 7 middle sole and an 8 insole.

Q. So that there is no short slip sole in your 86?—A. No, it goes straight through.

Q. And the 86 is the Standard Screw, the other is a Goodyear Welt?—A. It is not only a single, but a double Standard Screw.

By Mr. Chairman:

Q. And the 12 is what?—A. Goodyear Welt, with a few loose nails put in the shank, and of course the shank is narrow and it is not suitable for a man using a spade, to drive the spade in the ground.

That is the Government boot; that is the boot that hon. gentlemen argue about. And according to the chief advisor of the Government with regard to boots it is not fit for use by a soldier to drive a spade into the ground. Of what use would that boot be to our boys in the trenches?

10 p.m.

Q. You provide more room in the boot?—A. For the toes, and for the ball of the foot too, oh, yes, that is in No. 86.

Q. Do you regard 86 as the boot which approaches nearest to your ideal?—A. Yes.

Q. You regard it as the boot that will be fit for active service when you have finished your work on it?—A. Yes.

Q. Whereas you do not so regard No. 12?—A. Not for active service, not for winter weather such as they have had. Of course for ordinary wear that boot was all right, for our home service.

Q. For the permanent force?—A. Yes.

There you have a description of the boot as given by my hon. friend's own expert, upon whose authority he is basing his case in this matter. This boot which they gave to the soldiers is, as we say in our report, good enough for the permanent force but not for active service.

Major General HUGHES: Yes, but not in winter weather.

Mr. MACDONALD: Not fit for active service.

Major General HUGHES: In winter weather.

Mr. MACDONALD: I could take my hon. friend over other portions of Mr. Wickett's evidence in which he speaks of the department's boot as a "summer boot." That is the kind of boot the hon. minister gave our soldiers for active service a "summer boot."

Then, take the evidence of Mr. Silver, who is one of my hon. friend's own inspectors. He was a man of long experience, and about the only good inspector my hon. friend had. One particular thing in regard to this boot matter was the ridiculous nature of this inspection. Mr. Silver was the only man who knew anything about the business of inspecting. Pointing to the Canadian sample boot, he said:

Q. Yes. This is not a heavy marching boot. (Pointing to Canadian sample boot.)—A. No, that is only fit for barracks and general parade, and it has been useful for that purpose for a number of years.

Q. But what about a boot of that type (pointing to Canadian sealed pattern)?—A. It is not intended for active service.

Then, take the evidence of Mr. Vallentine, from Waterloo, who was in the same position as Mr. Adams. He came along and said: I do not want to manufacture the departmental boot; it is not a good boot for active service; I will submit a sample of my own. As regards the manufacturers what occurs? The manufacturers were all dissatisfied with those boots. They appointed a delegation to come here to Ottawa to represent to the Government that this was not a good service boot. And they did so, and they had an inquiry, as explained by my hon. friend from Russell (Mr. Murphy). I could go along this line and make full quotations; but let me briefly state that no manufacturer is on record as stating that this governmental boot was a good active service boot.

Further, what about these regimental board meetings all over the country? We mentioned in our report that there were seventy. Over seventy boards had met way back about the 1st of March. And they have been meeting all over the country since. One met in Ottawa on 1st of April. How were these Boards constituted? The colonel of a regiment designated three officers under his command to give their judgment upon the boots that were submitted to them and to make a report. That report was sent to the district officer commanding the division or district where the examination had been made, and was forwarded to Ottawa.

It has been suggested by some hon. gentlemen that these men, who at any moment might be transported from our Canadian soil into the fore front of the battle and who in a month from now might be losing their lives in France or Belgium, have been holding these regimental Boards for the purpose of getting new boots for their men, that they really did not mean anything and that the Boards had no significance. The hon. member for Chambly and Vercheres (Mr. Rainville) argued that and the hon. member for Shelburne and Queens (Mr. McCurdy), with some elaboration, attempted to leave the impression that these officers, who were working hard at the various regimental depots getting their men into shape, in holding these Boards were endeavouring to create a situation under which tney could get new boots whether their men were entitled to them or not. That is a discreditable statement to make against the officers of this expeditionary force.

That is the situation; you cannot wink that out of sight. Write all the reports you want on that question, juggle with words as you will, but from 75 to 100 Boards of officers in this country, between Calgary in the West and Halifax in the East, have been considering this boot question since the middle of September last and every one of them has condemned the boots.

Who else has condemned them? General Lessard said they were not good for active service. The minister's own brother said that twenty-five per cent of the boots served to them at Kingston were not much better than moccasins in wet weather. Colonel Allan, of Toronto, who seemed to me and to all the other hon. gentlemen in the committee to be a man with all the qualifications of an officer, said he would not care to lead any men into active service equipped with boots like that. And so on down the line. Here is Major McKenzie, from St. John, one of the leaders of the Bar in the province of Now Brunswick, to whom it was suggested, as I remember, by some hon. gentleman, when he was giving his evidence, that although he had held this Board under the direction of Colonel McAvity whose orders he had to obey, the Board was held for the sake of getting new boots for his men. Then we have the findings of the following officers: Major McKenzie, St. John; Colonel Seeley, Fredericton; Captain Taunton, Winnipeg; Captain Meredith, Ottawa; Colonel Hallick, Ottawa; Colonel Leonard, London; Major Inkstetter, Ottawa; Captain Howell, Montreal, and Major Andrews, Winnipeg. Out in Winnipeg they condemned 700 boots all at once; they said the whole outfit of boots they had were not fit to wear. I shall not trouble the House by reading in detail the report of the Board or the examination they made, but that was their declaration. I could go further through this list, but it is not necessary.

Then we come to what they did on the other side. Here is the unequivocal report of Colonel Howell of the first battalion at Salisbury; Colonel Labatt of the 41st battalion; Captain Warrington of the 14th, Major Fell of the first company of engineers and Major Lepsett of the second infantry brigade. All these men give their different statements in connection with the reports which they returned to headquarters and which were sent back here, to the effect that these boots are not a proper active service boot. When you add to that testimony the representations of General Alderson, unequivocal and positive, about which there can be no doubt, carrying out the findings made by the boards under him, together with the representations made by Sir George Perley to the Prime Minister, I think it is perfectly absurd for hon. gentlemen seriously to argue to this or any other body in this country that this boot issued by the Militia Department was a proper active service boot. That being so I think we can fairly conclude that the first statement contained in the report of the minority to this House is an absolutely correct one:

> That the boot supplied to the Canadian Permanent Force previous to the war, being similar to the boot sealed by the officials of the Militia Department on January 15, 1911, was a boot suitable only for men in barracks and in times of peace, and not for men on active service;

I submit that with the cloud of witnesses, professional and military, whom I have quoted to you, we have absolute proof of that statement in our report. Then we go on and make a specific statement to the effect that the sealed pattern boot in the department was too light for active service. What was done was this: When the contracts came to be called for what do you suppose they did in the Militia Department? Did they say to Ames, Holden & McCready, did they say to Gauthier, and these other people: "Here are specifications for a boot that you must follow exactly and closely, the circumstances demanding the utmost care"? Not at all. They gave no specifications to anybody, they simply went to the place in the department where Gauthier's boots were, which he delivered under the contract for the permanent force, they took out a boot and they put the seal of the department on it and said to Ames-Holden & Company, go out and make 10,000 pairs like that. When that boot came before the committee we asked Mr. Tetreault, who, as the member for North Oxford points out, had the instruments there for measuring, to tell us the weight of the leather and to make all other comparisons that could be made between the two boots, and Mr. Tetreault reported and swore to the committee the difference between these two boots, being as stated in the second paragraph of our report. He swore to that positively and unequivocally. He swore too that it was on a sample entirely inferior to the sealed pattern of 1911 that Ames-Holden & McCready made their boots. There is no question about that. No hon. gentleman could in any way shake the truth of that statement; it is a finding as absolutely uncontrovertible in any way as any finding of the fact by a judge could be made upon evidence where there was nothing to the contrary. Do you think that was good business? Do you think that that was proper care displayed in regard to providing footwear for soldiers? No specifications, a poorer boot than the one sealed by the department, poorer leather, lighter weight leather, lighter slugs and an inferior boot as shown in the report.

How were the boots turned into Valcartier? There was an inspector in the factories of Ames-Holden and Gauthier, but there was no inspection for 13,000 delivered at Valcartier; and some of the inspectors who were at the factories in Montreal did not stay there all the time. The inspection of boots returned to headquarters at Ottawa was of no value, because all they could see was what was on the outside. The place for inspection was in the factory, where they could see the leather that went into the boots, see how it was cut, see whether they put in the thin parts or only those parts of the hide that ought to go in. The inspection in that respect, as hon. gentlemen on this side of the House who have preceded me have pointed out, was deficient in every respect, deficient in regard to the extent of it, and deficient in regard to the competency of the inspector. Why, one of the inspectors was a young man who got a letter from a member of Parliament asking Mr. Burns in the Department to see whether he could give this young fellow any work. He had no special qualifications for an inspector, and was employed for a time sorting boots; and in a week or so he was transformed into an inspector, upon whose judgment rests the determination whether or not the boots are good enough to go to the front. I submit, Mr. Speaker, that that is not the proper way to deal with a matter of this kind.

Further, what were the boots out of which these sample boots were taken? These sample boots were taken from the boots supplied by Gauthier, under a contract they had made the previous spring through Slater. Gauthier was getting $3.72 a pair for these boots, but it was sworn to before the Committee that they were made at $3.02. The result was that the country was getting a boot which cost only $3.02 to make, instead of a boot that cost $3.50 or $3.60, allowing for a reasonable profit for the manufacturer; the balance went to Mr. Slater. It was out of these deficient boots, made under those conditions, that these samples, inferior to the sealed sample, were selected and handed out to the contractor on which to contract. Is it any wonder that there were complaints when the boots began to come in? Is it any wonder that there was trouble in all parts of the country in regard to them? Is it any wonder that at the end of September every corps that was employed in Halifax on active service had a regimental board examining into these Gauthier's boots which had been part of the permanent contract for the year? It was sworn to by reputable men that soldiers were walking around with shingles and bags on their feet because their boots had absolutely worn out and they could not get any more. The Minister had that evidence before him; if not before him personally, it was in his department. On the first of October, without making any change whatever in the specifications except providing for a double sole, he still allowed these boots to be made by some manufacturers, according to the inferior samples, according to a sample which they had purchased, and which had not been carefully examined by any one before being sent out as a sample. Then we had a period in which, as we all know from one end of Canada to the other every man who was on active service, whether as a private, non-commissioned officer, or officer, raised the issue in regard to these boots being inefficient. And what did my hon. friend do? He did nothing until he appointed Lt.-Col. Hallick's Board of Inquiry, a purely departmental proposition. Lt.-Col. Hallick came back and told him on the 7th of January: Your boot is absolutely unsuitable for active service. Everybody had said that the boot was unsatisfactory and unsuitable for active service. That was the situation on the 7th of January. In the meantime representations were made from Salisbury Plain as to the boots being unsatisfactory, and the absurd suggestion was made of sending overshoes for the men to wear over their boots. But General Alderson was not going to fool with the question. He at once went off and bought English boots. My hon. friend the General says that if he had been here he would have stopped him from doing it. But General Alderson solved the problem: he went off and bought English boots.

Major General HUGHES: Has the hon. gentleman any report as to the wearing of English boots by the soldiers?

Mr. MACDONALD: My hon. friend is an adept at the art of steering the discussion into other channels. I venture to predict that when he speaks he will tell us about the English boot, the French boot, the German boot, the Italian boot, the American boot, every boot in the world except this bad Canadian boot.

Major General HUGHES: Is the Canadian soldier wearing the English boot today? No, he is not.

Mr. MACDONALD: The only report I have in regard to the English boot is the statement of General Alderson that he had put English boots on the Canadian soldiers, in place of my hon. friend's bad boots.

Major General HUGHES: Did they keep them on?

Mr. MACDONALD: I do not know. As I have said to my hon. friend, I am speaking entirely from the evidence that is before us, and I am not going outside of it. I do not know what reports my hon. friend may have.

Mr. MEIGHEN: What about the quotation from the Toronto World?

Mr. MACDONALD: Does my hon. friend regard that as being a very serious departure?

Mr. MEIGHEN: Nothing that the hon. gentleman has said is very serious.

Mr. MACDONALD: That is very clever, my hon. friend is excelling himself. I am reminded by my hon. friend from Russell (Mr. Murphy) that I directed Col. Brown's attention to the statement that was in the Toronto papers, so my reference to it was entirely relevant, so far as keeping to the evidence is concerned. My hon. friend the Minister of Militia will discuss in the most delightful way, with all that eloquence and in that jaunty way which so thoroughly characterizes him, the merits and defects of every other boot in the world, but you will not get him down to the kind of boot he supplied the Canadian boys who went out to fight. He will not come up to the breastworks and discuss that question. For once in his life he will run away. The situation, then, was this: General Alderson was protesting, Sir George Perley was cabling, and the regimental boards were sending in their complaints; but my hon. friend the minister kept right along handing out to every battalion that was mobilized in Canada these boots that were manufactured according to the defective sample of the department. When we asked the minister in the committee why he was doing this, he said: We are not going to let this Canadian money that we have put into these boots be thrown away; let these fellows take the boots. I venture to suggest that the Canadian people would stand behind him in giving our soldiers the best possible boot at the earliest possible moment, without regard to the question of money. But the minister thought it better to use the bad boots.

Major General HUGHES: My hon. friend is wrong in stating that I thought it better to use the bad boots. I thought it was better that they should use these good boots.

Mr. MACDONALD: Good boots, with the exception of the heels and the toes and the vamps—three very important exceptions. My hon. friend was going to give these boots to the soldiers in spite of all the defects which he admits the existence of. He insisted upon putting these boots on the Canadian soldier with all their defects.

Major General HUGHES: These are not defects. Possibly there might be improvements.

Mr. MACDONALD: I do not know how my hon. friend reasons.

Major General HUGHES: Anything above the average standard I would consider an improvement, not a defect.

Mr. MACDONALD: My hon. friend thinks they are so good, but yet he wants to improve them. We had one very loquacious witness before the committee, who said that he called a certain kind of boot the Excelsior. I do not know whether the minister regards this boot as of the Excelsior type. I do not think he put it on that high pedestal. The fact remains that he still went on giving out these boots, although every one was complaining. The question is whether or not the minister should not have acted sooner. He had ample notice in September, but he never did anything until he appointed Lt.Col. Hallick's board. Why did he not send for Mr. Wickett?

Mr. Wickett swore that if he had been there last summer he could have prescribed a boot which could have been used long before this. My hon. friend did nothing until the 10th February, when he sent a memorandum to Council. The accumulated evidence is absolutely indisputable that the boot in the department that Mr. Wickett calls a summer boot, a boot for the use of the permanent force in Canada, was not a boot for active service, that it was totally unfit for active service and that being so, the Government were to blame in that they supplied a boot which was inferior even to the boot, according to the evidence of Mr. Tetreault, which they might have supplied. Since September last they have never made a move to get a proper boot. At this moment there are requisitions for 20,000 pairs of boots from all over Canada, and they have not a boot in store to give them. In addition to imposing a boot upon the men which is not a proper boot, they have fooled with this question until at this moment, if there was a sudden demand for our men to leave our shores on account of some contingency on the other side, my hon. friend has no boots to give them and has no definite specification or design or field pattern yet in the department upon which to have them constructed. Of these facts there can be no question whatever.

A great deal has been said in regard to the question of the responsibility of the manufacturers. My hon. friend from North Oxford (Mr. Nesbitt) takes a very generous view in regard to the manufacturers. The situation is that a certain number of manufacturers came before us and made out a prima facie case in support of the view that they had made the boots according to sample. But mark you, the investigation upon that point did not go to the length to which it ought to have gone if we were to determine the matter beyond any question or if we were to be enabled to arrive at a proper judgment upon it. We had no experts who had made any close examination with the exception of Messrs. Hoar and Coté, whose examination was confined purely to the boots that were rejected. It must be remembered that quite a number of manufacturers who were notified to come did not come at all. Consequently we have no evidence showing, in regard to the products of the different manufacturers what number of boots were defective as compared with the sample or their own samples. That is the situation in regard to the matter.

We know that these boots were unquestionably of no value whatever on active service, and that they were condemned by these regimental boards. The Government are responsible for these boots primarily irrespective of whether the manufacturers make good the defects in construction or not. My hon. friend the Major General assumes responsibility for these matters when he says that he looked into this question and it is well that we should note what he says upon that point. My hon. friend heard at St. John, at Quebec, at Kingston, and also while he was out West, that these boots were not satisfactory but in speaking about the question as to who was responsible for the issue of these boots he made the following statement at page 1022 of the evidence.

By Mr. Nesbitt:

Q. Do you think the men should have been served with a lighter boot, and with that boot rather than a heavier boot?—A. Those were boots that were in stock. There was a hurry; the British and French were retreating from Mons to the Marne. Those were the boots that had given satisfaction; our regular soldiers had reported favourably on them for years and years; it was on this basis that my predecessor, Sir Frederick Borden, had booted the soldiers. I had consulted officers, and after seeing the unanimity in regard to the boot, with the exception that I thought the boot should be wider at the toe, I suggested that we should use that, but the soldiers said they had no trouble with corns on their feet on account of their being narrow, the only thing was if they had a larger size and nice soft leather they should continue the boot on the recommendation of the officers of the department and no change was made, and so far as the wear of the boots is concerned, excepting the heavy marching around the frozen grounds of Canada, and putting their feet up on stoves to dry them, as soldiers do, and walking around knee deep in mud at Salisbury Plain, I never had any difficulty.

That is a summary of the minister's position, that is the evidence that I have submitted and it cannot be questioned. It shows that the position of the minister is absolutely indefensible. My hon. friend knows that it is not an active service boot. My hon. friend knows that it was not an active service boot. My hon. friend knows that these boots ought to have been changed long ago. From the 1st October last my hon. friend and the Government have been guilty of gross negligence in permitting this boot to be used by a single soldier whether in Canada or abroad.

I would like to note the situation in regard of my hon. friends in a very few words. It will be noticed that my hon. friends divide thei rreport into certain branches, according to the subject matter, dealing first with the Hallick board of inquiry. My hon. friends say that the board was of no consequence. It was constituted, I assume, under military regulations. It was ineffective in so far as any results were concerned and in so far as the failure to swear the witnesses that appeared before them was concerned. Personally the weight I attached to it was the opinion of Col. Hallick and his associates on the point as to whether this boot was a boot suitable for active service; so far and no farther, and I think that is the view of hon. gentlemen on this side of the House.

That is the only importance we attach to hat report; but these gentlemen having worn what their opinion was as to the fficiency of the boot, that sworn testimony ad to be taken into consideration. As egards the sample boot my hon. friends pposite do not discuss the difference beween the field pattern and the sample. hey do not mention the fact that the deartment failed to give a specification to he contractors when they awarded the ontract. My hon. friends discussed the alue of this boot as a military boot from nly one standpoint. They produced and uote evidence as to the conditions of alisbury Plain and they show that they ere very wet. They argue that because onditions at Salisbury Plain were very ad and that no boots culd stand them, herefore they say the reports in regard the Canadian boots are not so bad beause no boot could stand the conditions ere. Relying entirely on the Salisbury lain test they say that you could not y a word against the Canadian boot. hey absolutely fail to take into consideration the uniform character of the reorts in Canada in regard to these boots om all quarters and the evidence of Mr. oar and Mr. Wickett and of those manucturers whom I have already quoted.

Then my hon. friends take the position regard to the very crux of the whole uestion, not that this boot, which was a mple boot in the department, was a od boot for active service or for all purses, but that with some improvements e sample might be made a very good ot. That is the very best my hon. friends n say—that with some improvements the mple boot might be made a very good ot. That is not the kind of boot that e Canadian people want their soldiers wear, a boot that with some improvents which are going to be made in the m and misty future but which have never en undertaken up to this moment might a good boot. That, I say, is not the nd of boot that the Canadian people want give their boys to wear when they away to fight. They want to give them e best boot they can get and they want to provide for it.

My hon. friends say that the failure to spect these boots was due to the rush. hat was to prevent the Department of litia and Defence from going into every ntre of the country where boots were ng manufactured and employing attendce upon the factory in order to see that boots were properly made?

Mr. Macdonald.]

There was gross neglect in not supplying inspectors in every portion of the country, for had we had such inspection we could know where these manufacturers all are in regard to this matter.

We are told by honourable gentlemen opposite about the exceptional weather conditions on Salisbury Plain, and that in fairly dry weather the boots gave fair satisfaction. But last week we had before us two sturdy young Canadians, officers in the field battery which mobilized in Ottawa on the 1st of March, and these two fine young men told us with an earnestness that was most convincing that right here on Cartier Square in the city of Ottawa, in this beautiful springtime, nine of these boots they produced as sample, boots with a double sole, had gone to pieces in three weeks, under ordinary usage. There was a fair weather test of these boots which ought to settle that question if ever there was a question about it.

I submit, Sir, that every one of the allegations in the report made by the minority of the committee is supported by the evidence. Those of the committee who sit on this side of the House went through every line of that thousand pages of evidence with the greatest possible care, and I pledge my word as a professional man, with whatever legal knowledge I have, that hon. gentlemen opposite will search the evidence from one end to the other without being able to say that the findings we have placed there consecutively are not borne out by the evidence. And that being so, if the result of this inquiry shows conclusively that the men who compose the Overseas Expeditionary Force not only those who have gone abroad but those who are preparing to go have been fitted out with a boot which is not an active service boot in any respect whatever, and which fails to give that comfort and ease which every soldier has a right to look to, then the blame should be placed on the proper shoulders, and the proper shoulders for that blame to lie on are the shoulders of the men who are responsible for seeing that a proper boot was given to our Canadian soldiers. I assert, Mr. Speaker, that the report of the minority of that committee cannot be controverted; that it is absolutely supported by the evidence given, and that the longer the question is studied the more will it be endorsed by the people of Canada.

Sir JAMES AIKINS (Brandon): The hon. member for Russell (Mr. Murphy)

pening his address stated that he was pinion that one of the most important gs a soldier should have is a good , and that in that opinion the Duke Vellington had concurred. I shall not tion such authority.

. MURPHY: I am glad the hon. leman agrees in that view, but I did put the names quite in the order he mentioned.

JAMES AIKINS: The hon. member Pictou (Mr. Macdonald) made the same rvation, and it caused me to wonder long these hon. gentlemen, and those whom they are politically associated, entertained that opinion, because for y years we have been equipping our ia force with proper clothing, and er arms and equipment, but, on the ority of the hon. member for Pictou, question of service boots for the sol- was never considered when the Gov- ent which he supported was in power. ave had a permanent force varying in gth for many years, and notwithstand- hat these gentlemen opposite think the the most important part of the sol- ' equipment, never have they consid- the propriety of selecting a military They tell us that the specifications 00, 1905 and 1911 were never intended n active service boot; then what did iberal Government intend the boot for? it for a dancing pump, as suggested by on. member for Pictou, or a larrigan out hunting in, or a brogan in which mp the mountains? Were vaiting for an emergency, as usual? The ience of many countries has taught it takes not months but many years oduce a suitable military boot, and yet gentlemen opposite now claim that they were in power they never under- o deal with the question. Is that con- ble? They are responsible for the ication and sealed pattern boot upon which those supplied to the troops were made.

When the hon. member for Pictou (Mr. Macdonald) broke upon the committee one morning with fulminating impetuosity such as you have seen him display just now, he made the statement that the function of the committee was inquisitorial as well as judicial. He regards and properly regards, the duty of an Opposition is to watch and to criticise the action of the Administration; but the policy of an Opposition should not be solely a destructive policy. It should be constructive as well, and under present circumstances it is the duty of an Opposition to assist an Administration to arrive at the best conclusion as to what boots should be provided; if they think the one in use is faulty. That the Opposition in this House has not done. We who are supporting this Administration feel it as much our duty also to watch the Administration, to see that it is efficient, to see that no fraudulent schemes involve it, and to see that it stands before the people of Canada as deserving of their support.

This is no time for people to make money out of the miseries and wretchedness of war. Any man, who for the purposes of improper gain stands on one side of the public chest and, unwatched will put his hand in for some money to put into his pocket when there are tens of thousands of our good loyal citizens, rich and poor, young and old, constantly trying, out of their savings and their sacrifices to put something into that public treasury or to assist in carrying on the war, is a man who is not only an unworthy citizen, but absolutely disloyal and merits not only the condemnation but the swift punishment to which he is properly entitled. This is no time for palliation; the old principle should prevail:

> On those who fall, severity; but towards those, goodness, if they continue in that goodness; otherwise let them be cut off.

It was in that spirit that the members of the committee from this side of the House joined the members of the committee from the other side of the House in making a thorough investigation. Those inquisitorial functions have, I believe, been properly performed; but the hon. member for Pictou (Mr. Macdonald) also stated that the functions of the committee were judicial. Whether the members of this side of the House in preparing the majority report acted judicially or not will be determined by a reading of that report. Whether the members from the Opposition were judicial in their report must also be determined by the report itself. It is not judicial to be partisan or prejudiced, it is not judicial to make findings of facts inconsistent with the evidence. If prejudice and partisanship and improper findings are judicial, then the minority report is highly judicial.

This statement is made in the minority report, that it was in 1905 that boots of a similar pattern to the 1914 boot were first adopted by the department for use in time of peace by the permanent force of Canada. This is contradicted in the evidence of Mr. McCann, at page 1029, as follows:

Q. When was there a definite written specification? Was there one prior to 1900?—A. I think there was but it was a very crude affair.

Q. Could you find that specification for us?—A. It is down in the department, I think.

Q. I may be wrong, but I understood in looking over the files, that 1900 was the first time a specification was really prepared in the department?—A. really practical specification.

Then sample boot marked exhibit 77 was produced, and the question was asked:

This is the sample boot that gave difficulty in 1899?

Mark the date.

A. Well, it led to this specification.

That is an entirely different specification.

By Mr. Macdonald.

Q. Have you got a pattern of that 1900 South African boot? Have you not got a sample boot?—A. I do not think there is one in existence.

Q. In 1900 there was a specification laid down for the South African war, but you have not got the 1900 boot.—A. I don't think so.

Q. Was there not one in the department?—A. There was at the time.

So that in 1900 there was a sample boot produced entirely different from the boot made in 1899. The evidence of General Macdonald at page 211 is as follows:

Q. You had a sample boot in your department from which you had boots manufactured?—A. Yes. After I became Quartermaster General I found that sample boot in the department.

Q. Then in 1904 when you became Quartermaster General, you found in the department a sample boot?—A. Yes.

Q. Which had been used for how many years?—A. Well, perhaps for three years.

Q. Then your recollection is that from 1904 down to the present time the boot that was issued by department gave general satisfaction?—A. General satisfaction.

Q. You say it looks like the boot?—A. It looks like the boot, yes.

Q. What experience did the department have with this boot?—A. Well, the boot, of course, up to the commencement of the war was worn only by the permanent force. Or, do you mean what sort of wear?

Q. Yes. What satisfaction did the boot give to the permanent force?—A. Well, the permanent force have their training at Petawawa, perhaps for two or three months every summer, and their boots are subjected to the ordinary wear and team of drilling, marching out and so on. That is as far as I can speak.

Then Lt. Col. Macdonald, when he was being examined, said:

Q. You served in the South African war, did you?—A. Yes.

Q. And the boot that was used at that time was what they called a Slater boot?—A. Yes.—well we in the Strathcona Horse used a boot that gave good wear.

By Mr. Macdonald:

Q. They were purchased by Lord Strathcona?—A. Yes, but it was a Slater boot, and I believe that the departmental boot was also a Slater boot, as far as I can recall now.

Q. And they were similar to that model boot?—A. As far as I know.

Q. And they gave good service?—A. There were no complaints about them.

Q. How long have you been connected with the Militia Department?—A. Since 1903.

Q. And this is the boot that has been used ever since that time?—A. Yes.

Q. Have you made no change?—A. No.

You will see from this evidence that there was a specification for a military boot prior to 1905, and that the sample of it was in the department. So that the statement made in this minority report is inaccurate, that it was in 1905 that the boots of similar pattern to the pattern of 1914 were first adopted. My hon. friends took that position because they want to get away from the fact that that boot, Exhibit 5, their pattern boot, or a boot similar to it, was used in the South African war, and that it gave general satisfaction there as an active service boot, and thus justified the present Canadian army boot, Mr. H. W. Brown, director of contracts, says in respect of this, at page 110.

Q. I want to go back again now, for a moment, to clean up this specification question? As I understand it the pattern you have was adopted in 1903 and 1904 and it remained substantially the same until 1910 or 1911?—A. Yes.

Q. This is the sealed pattern. . . . which is marked Exhibit 5? Now this is the sealed sample that was adopted in 1911. Is that the sample of boot that has been followed from that time to the present time?—A. Yes, with this exception. This feature here (indicating) was cut out. That is the slashing or ratting on the sole, which was cut out almost immediately after.

Q. That is Exhibit 5?—A. Yes, Mr. Slater sent us that specification.

Q. Which of the Slaters?—A. Charles E. Slater of the Slater Shoe Co.

The man who made the big commission, it is said, out of the Gauthier boot.

They were the departmental contractors and sent us up a specification to supply this. His people made it. That specification provided for the supply of dressing.

To make their point and reflect on this Government it then became necessary to displace the fact that they are responsible for the sample boot on which the boots for the present war were manufactured. How do they seek to do this? It is very ingenious. I had better read exactly what they say in the minority report:

That the boots given to the contractors in August last by the Department of Militia and Defence, as sample boots, in accordance with which they were to manufacture the boots under their contracts, were inferior to the sealed department boot in the following respects.

If they can prove that they were inferior, then to that extent they relieve themselves of the responsibility for the class of boot made for our soldiers. Let us see in what way they say they were inferior. Remember, that the statement was made that all the samples given to the manufacturers, or used by the manufacturers and approved by the Government, in the making of the soldiers boots and therefore all the boots manufactured were inferior to that (Exhibit 5) sealed pattern adopted by the late Government. They say that a comparison was made by Mr. Tetreault between Exhibit 5, the sealed pattern, and Exhibit 12, the sample boot given to one manufacturer. I quote from Mr. Tetreault's evidence.

Q. Would you look at these two boots (Exhibit 12 and Exhibit 5) and tell us the difference between them? The one is the sealed sample and the other is the sealed pattern?—A. This one, Exhibit 5 is much firmer and heavier leather than the other, Exhibit 12; that is, the upper leather.

Q. What is the difference between the weight of the two?—A. No. 5 is two and four-tenths.

Q. That is the sealed pattern—A. Yes, in the upper; and the other Exhibit 12, is one point six.

This upper leather or quarter is the part of the boot that goes around the ankle. I would suggest that any hon. member who is wearing ankle boots should look at his boots and see whether this upper, or quarter or back, as it is called, is as heavy as the other portions of the leather in the boot, and also to consider if he would like to have heavy leather around the ankle which might prevent the free movement of the ankle. Does the fact that it is finer leather render it inferior to the other? Let us see what is stated by Colonel Brown at page 182. Lighter leather is approved:

Q. Did I understand rightly from the evidence that for the smaller size of boots light stock was used? that is, lighter leather?—A. Only in the quarters, that is according to the specification.

Q. In these smaller size boots, lighter leather was used?—A. Principally in the smaller sizes, I think especially in the smaller sizes.

Now, Exhibit 12, it happened, was about the smallest boot produced—it was a six and a half. If we look at the specification, dealing with "facing," we find that special provision is made that the quarter or upper may be thinner:

None except where stock is light in weight (usually in the small sizes) and necessitates a facing to hold eyelets properly.

In other words, you could get the quarter so light that it would not hold an eyelet, and a facing is put on to protect the boot and hold the eyelet. Therefore, the statement they make that the sample boot, Exhibit 12, was inferior to the sealed sample, Exhibit 5, by reason of the upper being a little lighter is contradicted by the specification. It is not inferior. Then, Mr. Tetreault speaks of the vamps:

Q. What about the vamps?—A. Just about the same proportion. It might be a little less difference than in the upper. This vamp I consider has less difference in the weight than there is in the upper.

That is the uncontradicted evidence, and the only evidence. Yet, what is the finding in the report of the minority concerning it, based on this evidence?

In vamps there was the same proportinate difference between the two as to weight and thickness.

A statement at variance with the evidence and false. And we are asked to endorse that untruth and to accept that finding.

The minority report says that "in the sample zinc slugs were used and in the pattern steel slugs were used." That is clearly contradicted by Mr. Stephens, one who sat on that Court of Inquiry presided over by Colonel Hallick:

Q. Would you look at this boot (Exhibit 5) which is apparently a sealed sample and tell me if that was one of the boots you saw?—A. It was a similar boot we saw; I cannot say if it was the actual boot.

Q. Is that boot constructed with steel slugs?—A. No, sir.

Q. What slugs are they?—A. Well, I am not an expert on slugs but they are not steel, I know.

The matter of slugs is comparatively immaterial. The sole is one of the most material parts of the boot. Mr. Tetreault had said referring to the sole:

Q. What about the sole?—A. This sole, Exhibit 12, is about 9½, I measured it a while ago. This sole (referring to Exhibit 5) is s full 10. This (referring to Exhibit 12) is not a full 10; it is near enough.

Mr. Hoar, the inspector (page 1221), who cut open the boot (Exhibit 12), proved conclusively that the outer sole of exhibit 12 was 11 gauge, and the slip was 7 gauge, whereas only 6 gauge was required by the specification.

Again, Tetreault says:

A. In Exhibit 12 it is a larger thread than in Exhibit 5. If each one had a larger thread it would be better.

So we find the sample Exhibit 12, given at least to one manufacturer, has a better sole han sample No. 5, better sewing, a vamp that is just as good as in No. 5, an upper that is according to specifications; and yet in their report which they have sent out to the world, they say that exhibit 12 was inferior to exhibit No. 5. Statements not supported by the evidence.

But there is something else to which I would call your attention which is equally amazing and that is, as I have pointed out, that they say that these inferior samples were the samples upon which the contractors manufactured boots supplied to the Government, because sample exhibit 12 was followed. Bear in mind this, that there were exhibits No. 55 and No. 57, samples given to manufacturers which were not compared at all with sample No. 5, and were not inferior to it. I quote from the evidence of Mr. C. S. Sutherland, of the Amherst Boot and Shoe Company:

Q. How did you manufacture, by sample?—A. By sample and specification.
Q. By both?—A. Yes.

And their statement was that none of these were manufactured according to specifications.

Q. Who prepared your sample?—A. It is a Gauthier boot, I have the sample here.
Q. Oh yes, you have the original sample (sample boot produced by witness) this is the same sample that was given your company to manufacture from?—A. Yes.
Mr. Pringle: We will mark this as Exhibit 55.

Which was never compared with exhibit 5. The Amherst Boot and Shoe Company manufactured according to sample 55, and yet a statement goes out in the minority report that this sample on which this manufacturer made his boot was inferior to sample No. 5.

The same as to Tetreault, one of the largest manufacturers, who did not manufacture according to sample 12, but according to exhibit 57.

Q. How were the boots to be made?—A. Made the same as the sealed pattern here.

[Sir James Aikins.]

Q. Is that the sealed pattern?—A. That one that was left with me; yes, I had tw them.
Now we have another sealed pattern w will be exhibit No. 57.

This was exhibit No. 57.

Q. Then your contract was to manufact a boot similar to Exhibit 57?—A. Yes.
Q. In that sample, as I understand it, vamps and uppers are of winter calf?—A. winter calf.
Q. And the sole is of what?—A. Oak.
Q. Were the boots manufactured by you accordance with the sample?—A. Exactly, Tetrault is another manufacturer w manufactured according to another sam and not according to exhibit No. 12. T minority report says that his boots w manufactured on an inferior samp which is not substantiated. None of manufacturers manufactured according sample 12 except one, the Ames Hold Company, and yet the statement of t minority goes out to the world that all t boots that were manufactured, some 18 000 pairs, according to what they allege an inferior sample, exhibit 12; where the fact is that the Ames-Holden compar who had exhibit 12, manufactured or something like 30,500, and according to specification made by that firm fully up the specification of the department. I a the hon. member for St. John (Mr. Pugsle and all others if they append their si nature to that minority report and decla to the people that it should be support and carried in this Parliament when su untrue, misleading statements are ma in connection with it.

The minority report seeks to hold t Government responsible in negligence, firs because the sample on which the boots we manufactured was inferior to the seal pattern adopted by the Administratio this was not true as shown, als because there was not a proper inspe tion. The inspectors were men who we well qualified. Prenter, who examined t boots of the Ames, Holden Company alon with Robert Wilson, was in the departmer for six years. He was especially instructe to inspect by Colonel Brown, who cut ope the boots and explained the whole manu facture and construction of the boots t him on several occasions. Robert Wilso had six or seven years experience as a boo manufacturer, and understood the makin of the boots. Mr. A. E. Baldwin had eigh years' experience working in leather fac tories, and he inspected at Tetreault's wit Silver, and he says all the boots were equa to the samples, and steel slugs were used i the Tetreault factory. Silver, about whose experience there is no dispute, was inspector with Baldwin. Jacques was a shoemaker with a large business, and he had been such for over 38 years. He examined at Gauthier's and said that the Gauthier boot was made with steel slugs and that Exhibit 12 was a good military boot.

It is complained that there was no inspection of boots at Valcartier. Well, why? Because the evidence says the exigencies were such that they could not possibly inspect them. No sooner did the boots arrive in the cars than they were put into the warehouse and from the other side of the warehouse delivered to men clamouring for boots, some of whom were said to be almost barefooted, others with practically no boots. Was there any failure by reason of that? I am not a special friend of the manufacturers. They are a strongly protected class and able to look out for themselves. Yet shall we say that because the manufacturers are a protected class, and have made money, that they are not as loyal, not as patriotic as other citizens of our country? Can we suppose for one moment that they would commit a fraud upon the country by depriving the soldiers of the opportunity of having a good boot? The evidence is exactly the contrary. Such were the firms as the John McPherson Company, of which Mr. Duffield is manager, the Ames, Holden Company, the Tetreault Company, and many others who showed that they made a better boot for the Government than the sealed sample. They could not afford to do other than what was right. Assuming that they thought some of their boots might escape inspection, could they imagine that those boots which were sent to Valcartier where the soldiers were would escape that inspection? Would they run the risk of that? The thing, on its face, is absurd. The evidence showed that the inspection was good, more thorough than the ordinary inspection, because the inspectors whom I have mentioned were placed in the factories to see the boot as it was being manufactured, that the leather was good, that the construction was good, and that the boot turned out was according to the sample.

But there is another thing which was very important, and that is the third charge of negligence that is made against the Government that the boot supplied to the Canadian Permanent Force previous to the war, and to the troops since, being a boot similar to the boot sealed by the officials in the Militia Department in January, 1911, was suitable only for men in barracks and in times of peace, and not for active service. Does the minority report or do the men who made that report say in what respect they were not suitable for active service? They base their statement that the boots were not suitable for active service upon the evidence said to have been given by certain witnesses, Mr. Tetreault among others, but only partially quoted. Let us see what Mr. Tetreault says (page 780):

A. I got 1,800 lasts of the celebrated 1.35. I never used them. I told Colonel Brown that I was not going to risk making shoes with that last which would not fit anybody. It was the "E" last.

You will notice that Mr. Tetreault says that it was the "E" last that was unsuitable. He goes on:

We got the model and made shoes, and found the "F" last more suitable, as the "E" last did not have the measurement.

Then, on page 781:

Q. You have mentioned something about "F" lasts. I notice that in the specifications which are printed on page 16 of Appendix 1, there is reference made to widths "E" and "F". Does that refer to the last?—A. That is the last "E" and "F". The "E" last we got made was never used.

Q. Then "F" would be all right?—A. Yes, it was a pointed toe last though, a little too pointed for active service.

So Mr. Tetreault found it unsuitable, because the "E" last wast too narrow; but the Government specifications provided for an "F" last. He said that the boot was unsuitable only because the toe was too narrow. I turn to the evidence given by Mr. Adams, to whom the last speaker has referred:

Exhibit 57—A seal sample boot—Gauthier make —Tan winter calf and oak sole.

Q. In the second order of boots that you made, did you make them after your own sample?—A. No, they were made after the same sample with the exception that instead of a single sole and slit they were made double sole.

Q. That is the department in October decided to have a double sole on all of them?—A. I believe so.

Q. And in consequence you were instructed to put a double sole on yours; in other respects, however, the boot was made in accordance with your own sample and not in accordance with the sample?—A. Exactly the same.

Q. I know that, but why did you submit them?—A. Because I considered the double sole was a necessity for the soldiers.

Q. That is you did not think the boot the department had was suitable for the soldiers —A. Exactly.

Q. You have seen boots of the style of Exhibit 12, that has been so much talked about here?—A. Yes.

Q. You did not consider they were suitable for active service, and you submitted the boot that you thought would be suitable; is that it? —A. That is it.

Q. In what respect?—A. Well No. 12 is a slipsole, and I do not think it is a good quality of boot.

This was changed by the department, and Mr. Adams manufactured a boot containing a double sole, and which he declared to be good for active service.

Then, the minority report makes a statement about Mr. Silver:

That Mr. William Silver, one of the inspectors employed by the department stated that the boot was not intended for active service, and that, "we all acknowledge the boots were too light for the use they were put to;"

But they did not state something else that Mr. Silver said, which is found on page 303:

Q. Do you mean the boots they are wearing on Salisbury Plain? A. No, at Valcartier. Had they put on those heavy British boots, or boots as heavy, as those, they would have been cripples instead of soldiers.

Q. Well, they do not seem to have had many of these cripples you speak of among the English soldiers? A. Well, they are used to that kind of boot. Those men have always been wearing those heavy boots. Englishmen have always had heavy boots; our Canadian men don't have them.

Q. Your theory is that if we have them heavy marching boots, such as the British service demands, they would find them.—A. Too hard. . . . These boots (pointing to the Canadian boots) have answered their purpose. We have got the men broken in. When they go over to the Old Country and get into active service they are ready for the heavier boot. But to have put that heavy boot on them when they went down to Valcartier camp, as I told you, there would have been more cripples than soldiers. . . These boots have been in service since 1904, I am told, and they have been very satisfactory for the purpose which they were used for.

Q. Would you consider the Canadian boot too heavy or too light for civilians?—A. I would consider that a very heavy boot for a civilian, yes.

It is not necessary to go any further in that line. You will find that the statements made in the minority report are picked out from detached pieces of the evidence, which, when you read them in connection with other parts, give a very different meaning. The minority also support their contention that it is not a suitable military boot, not only on the partly stated evidence of the witnesses I have mentioned but also on the report of the board presided over by Lieutenant-Colonel Hallick, which report was specially referred to the committee. I should like to point out what was said by the hon. member for Pictou in respect of that report by the Hallick board (page 36):

When I saw in the newspapers the evidence sworn to at the committee yesterday, that the witnesses examined at that investigation had never been sworn, one could only conclude that the whole thing was a farce. I do not know why we should be appointed a special committee of Parliament to investigate the report of an inquiry where the parties who were carrying it through did not think it serious enough to swear the witnesses they called. The mere ipse dixit and statements of people who appeared before this investigating board without pledging their oath, is, from a public standpoint, of no value whatever.

And further on he says:

We have to make our report to the House in regard to that report, because it was specially referred to us by the House. What Sir James Aikins says in regard to it is quite correct, the whole of the investigation and the report seemed to go on the assumption that boots were delivered in accordance with some specification, when it is quite clear that there were no specifications.....In so far as their report was a finding or a determination in regard to the question, my own personal opinion is that it was of no value.

I should like to know why he made the statement that their report was of no value.

Mr. MACDONALD: Does my hon. friend want me to answer that question?

Sir JAMES AIKINS: I can imagine the answer myself. Undoubtedly because he thought the very worst of that board's findings was more favourable to the Government than he imagined the best evidence given before the committee would be. Now that the evidence discloses a more favourable condition, he is greatly disappointed, and so in turn relies on the report. See what he says in respect to that report:

The opinion of the board may be summarized in so far as the character of the boot prescribed and supplied by the department, is concerned,—

Then he proceeds to give what he says is a summary, but he takes only part of it and omits the material balance, viz.:

The boots manufactured for the Canadian overseas division were generally speaking well made and of good quality—

Why does he omit that?

Surprisingly so, considering the very insufficient time given the contractors.

Why omit that in the summary? Because it does not suit his purpose. Yet he purports to send out to the Canadian people that misleading summary in his minority report. The Hallick report, from which he purports to give a summary, goes on to say that

Owing to the same extreme urgency, it appears that there was not enough time in which to consider how specifications for a boot differing with that which though suitable for a dry climate has been found to be unsuitable in the abnormal conditions in England. Consequently the board recommends the adoption of a heavier, stronger type of boot, similar to that used by the British Army.

What he gives as a summary is an unfair statement of the Hallick report. I have stated that the minority report did not mention in what respect the boot was unsuitable. I perhaps in that made a mistake. It does mention the point on which the boot was unsuitable by adopting the findings of the board, which says:

The boot was unsuitable for the soldiers and for the particular work for which they were provided because,—

(a) The shape is such that the average foot has not room for the free movement of the toes and is thus not suitable for marching.

The difficulty is in the shape, and yet when the inquiry was made of all these soldiers and persons who testified, only two persons, I think, said that there was any objection by reason of the particular shape of the boot. Yet the minority find that the boot is unsuitable because it is too narrow at the toe. Another point of unsuitability is stated:

Soles and heels not being reinforced with metal, soon wear down especially when wet.

Who disputes that fact? All that metal in the heels and soles does to the boot is to continue its wearing qualities. That does not add to the comfort of the boot, nor the flexibility of the sole nor the value of the leather that is put into it, only the length of its wearing. So they say that it is not suitable for active service because the toes are too narrow and they have not enough iron on the heels and soles. Therefore they condemn the Government because they have not issued a suitable boot, even though the boot was the same as the one adopted by the late Government. I say that they might well have joined in the report of the majority because the majority report points out these things as improvements. Let me read it to you from page 585 of the Votes and Proceedings:

Your committee conclude from the evidence given before it that for active service the sample boot would be improved by a second through sole instead of a slip-sole, (this change was made before the second orders for the Canadian boots were given and they were made accordingly); that it would be improved by putting more screws or nails in or quilting the outer sole so as to protect it from wear, and by making it wider at the toe (the large percentage of the boots supplied to the department since the beginning of the war were on a last wider at the toe); and by protecting the heel by nails or other iron material.

Is there any reason why the gentlemen who are asking us to adopt this minority report should not have joined in the majority report? Both concur in the desirability of a wider toe and more protection by nails or screws in the heel.

The minority report further says that the boot is unsuitable because:

The leather is dry, containing no grease, consequently quickly absorbs the water.

Let me point out what has been said in respect to that. Mr. H. W. Brown, director of contracts, page 112, gives the following evidence:

Q. Now, then, dealing with the question of the leather containing no water-resisting medium or other dressing, was there ever any pretence that that clause in the specification in regard to leather dressing or dubbing should be carried out by the contractors?—A. No.

Q. Special water-proof dubbing, water-proof? A. That was put in by Slater, I think he had some idea that by putting it in the specification he would be able to induce the department to buy it from his firm. We never bought it from him.

So that all that dubbing refers to is what may be done on the boot after it is constructed. Mr. S. M. Collis, at page 965, says:

Q. Were you the originator of winter calf? (That is the leather in the Government sample boots.)

—A. I was the first one who ever made it.

Q. You could show the difference between what is called winter calf and other calf?—A. Certainly.

Q. The winter calf and willow calf, as I understand, are exactly the same only one does not carry quite so much grease?—A. Willow calf is a skin that has been glazed or polished. That (pointing to exhibit) has not been polished; it has been finished up as winter calf. The willow calf is a skin that has been glazed and then boarded out. That has been boarded (pointing to exhibit). Of course you cannot give it so much grease because then you could not glaze it, it would not take the polish.

Then, Mr. Aubrey Davis, at page 611, says:

Q. Where do you carry on business?—A. In Newmarket, Ontario.

Q. What is the name of your firm?—A. The Davis Leather Co.

Q. Who is in that firm with you?—A. My father and two brothers.

Q. That is, the Hon. E. J. Davis?—A. Yes, and two brothers besides myself.

Q. What class of leather do you manufacture?—A. Calf leather entirely.

Q. Did you supply Messrs. Ames-Holden and Co. with calf leather?—A. We did.

Q. What quality of calf leather did you supply them?—A. With No. 1 tan storm for the army boots in the month of August.

Q. If they had no opportunity of drying you think there would be no leather that could stand that?—A. No, absolutely.

Q. In order to keep the leather it has got to have proper treatment?—A. It has got to have proper treatment.

Q. If it becomes wet it has to be dried and possibly treated with some oil or other substance of that class?—A. Certainly.

Then he goes on:

Q. Would you look at Exhibit 12 and say how that leather was treated?—A. This leather has been treated with an emulsion in the manufacture.

Q. And for general purposes, that is, for the usual wear, you would say the leather treated with emulsion is better than the other?—A. I certainly would.

Q. Would you even say that to the extent of the use of the boot for the army?—A. I would. I don't know whether I am transgressing or going too far afield—you can stop me if I do so—I realized the difficulty because I had a pair of army shoes that I was wearing myself and walking through the snow, I felt the dampness coming through the shoes.

Q. Whose make?—A. That pair of shoes was made by the E. T. Wright Co., of St. Thomas.

Q. Now, kindly proceed?—A. When I found this I immediately doctored the shoe with a treatment which we have used in our tannery for a good many years.... My experience with this pair of army boots made me think of the soldiers who were in the snow, and I suggested to my brothers that we should send a sample of this preparation to the officer in command of the expedition in Toronto.

Q. Then what developed?—A. Now, that is the same leather that the shoes were made from—the same leather as there, treated with the emulsion; consequently, that is the reason I brought it out, and I have no hesitation in saying that if the leather is properly treated with a proper kind of treatment, that leather can be kept perfectly waterproof in service, but of course a man must have a chance to let his shoes dry in order to get the preparation to take a proper effect on the shoes.

Q. Did you try this preparation yourself on the army shoes which you wore?—A. I did.

Q. And what did you find out?—A. It turned the snow water off entirely. I did not have a wet foot.

Why? Because he had used dubbing on his boots in the proper way, as any soldier might if given the dubbing or grease. Yet the minority report finds that the boot was unsuitable because it did not have enough grease to turn the water that can be obviated by the wearer. I have not time to mention what Mr. Matthews says on the very same subject, nor do I intend to delay the House. I have pointed out how unsupported is the statement that the samples furnished by the manufacturer were inferior to the sealed pattern. Then, when it comes to a question in what way the boot was unsuitable, the very best the hon. member for Pictou or the minority report can show is that it was too narrow in the toe, a little out in the shape, and had not qu iron enough on the heel and sole.

Mr. MACDONALD: Would the hon. g tleman wrestle with the question as what Mr. Hoar said about those boo namely, that they were not suitable fo campaign, or even to go out into the co try with?

Sir JAMES AIKINS: It is not support by the general evidence. The minority port begins by making a threatening no about the boots, about Government negle and winds up with only two points of u suitability. It reminds me of the story to of a man who had a pond on his place, a who asked a commission merchant if would buy from him a million frogs' leg He got an order for a hundred. He tramp around the edges of the pond and throu it, and found only three frogs, and reported to the commission merchan with the statement: "I thought from th noise the three made that there mu have been a million frogs in the swamp And so with these hon. gentlemen opposit one would think from the noise they mad that they had discovered something ver serious was wrong with the boots, but i the end they are limited to the complain that the toe was too narrow and that the was not enough steel on the sole and hee I submit that under these circumstance the amendment should not prevail.

Mr. F. S. SCOTT (South Waterloo): move that the debate be adjourned.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Why not finish to-night

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: Is no one els going to speak on your side?

Mr. PUGSLEY: I do not think so.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: Then I woul like to say a few words before the ques tion is put.

This matter was brought to the attentio of the House in the early days of the ses sion by the right hon. the leader of the Op position; and, shortly after he mentione it, I informed the House that we purpose bringing down the report of the inquir which had been made on the subject, an that three gentlemen might be named o the other side of the House as members o a committee, which would be constitute of seven members for the purpose of goin fully into the matters which had beer alluded to. The committee then appointe have made a very exhaustive inquiry an the results of that inquiry have been brough before the House in the form of two reports which have been discussed at great length, and into the details of which I do not intend to go at any great length at this late hour.

I want to point out in the first place that the gentlemen who have presented the minority report seem to have altogether overlooked, either intentionally or otherwise, the magnitude of the undertaking which was before this Government, when war broke out on the 4th of August last. The three hon. members who have seen fit to present the minority report to the House pose as critics, and they point out what might have been done, and what, in their judgment, ought to have been done; but it is well that the House and the country should remember what it meant in a country like this, with no great military organization, to undertake within a period of six weeks after the war broke out, the organization, equipment and despatch of a force of more than 32,000 men. When I remind hon. gentlemen that every one of these soldiers going to the front had to be equipped with sixty-six different articles for his own personal use, when I point out that the organization of a complete army division with all arms of the service, embraces an undertaking such as had never been dreamed of on a like scale in this country before; when one realizes in all its aspects the magnitude of the task which was undertaken by the Department of Militia and Defence, I venture to say that every one of us, looking back on these six weeks during which the first expeditionary force was prepared and sent forward, can only express the utmost surprise that the work was done as well as it turned out to have been done, and that so little cause of complaint has arisen.

Even in Great Britain, with a great military organization upon which the best thought of the nation has been directed ever since the South African war, they have had their difficulties in the equipment of their men since the opening of the war. I have under my hand reports from the Times and other great journals in the United Kingdom showing that even there, with all their marvellous organization, and with all the preparation that has been made for the past twenty years, difficulties have occurred on as great a scale, or perhaps a greater scale proportionately, than have occurred in Canada.

Even on this very question of the boots supplied to the troops, we have heard something in the United Kingdom. I have here a report of a debate in the House of Commons relating to the boots supplied to one battalion raised in England; and while it is perfectly true that the contract in this particular case was not a War Office contract, yet it was a contract of such a public nature that it was alluded to in Parliament. The debate took place on the 4th of March 1915, and Mr. Barlow, a responsible member of the British Parliament, made this statement:

> May I just quote one instance which came under my own personal observation? Boots were supplied to a battalion of which I have cognizance. They appeared to be excellent, they were passed by the local expert, and for them a high price was demanded.
> In appearance they were admirable boots. They were made of leather and looked charming. The only defect was that when they were put on the men's feet they would not hold together. The soles had a curious way of departing from the uppers—a practice which is not considered right in the best boot circles. After a good deal of struggle the contractor was forced to take the boots back. I cannot give the subsequent history, but a month or two later a further supply of boots was required for the battalion, and they were ordered according to sample. The new contractor said he could not supply the whole 2,000 pairs according to sample, but 1,500 were coming along just as good as the sample, and the regiment would, he was sure, be quite satisfied. The 1,500 pairs were supplied in due course, and they turned out to be a portion of the boots which had been rejected in the same warehouse for the same battalion. They were identical in every respect except that the price in the interval had risen by 1s. 9d.

Mr. PUGSLEY: You would not justify that.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: I would not justify it for one moment, and I am not justifying it; but I am pointing out that even in Great Britain they have had their difficulties; and, so far as I am aware, no such wholesale defects have occurred in Canada.

I deeply regret that hon. gentlemen opposite seem to sympathize with efforts which have been made to discredit those who are engaged in the manufacture of boots in Canada; and I have not the slightest doubt that statements which have been made in the press and elsewhere, before this matter could be thoroughly investigated, have led to the detriment of business conditions in Canada and have deprived this country of contracts which it otherwise would have obtained, and in that way have taken the bread out of the mouths of Canadian workmen and their families. That is a very unworthy attempt for any man in Canada to undertake, whether he is or is not a member of this House.

I desire to allude to a matter which has been dealt with pretty fully by hon. gentlemen on both sides of the House, but which I would like to put in a very few words. There is no doubt at all that a certain type of boot had been selected and approved by the late Government at the time of the South African war. That will not be denied, because the boots which our men took to the South African war and wore there we e boots selected and approved by the late Administration. Is there any man who will deny that? There is not one. Then I say further that after the South African war the late Administration undertook to prepare and did prepare a better type of boot, as they imagined, in 1905. Is there any man who will deny that?

Mr. MACDONALD: They prepared it for the permanent force in Canada, not for active service.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: I beg my hon. friend's pardon. There is not one line or tittle of evidence from first to last that supports the statement my hon. friend has just now made, and I will come to that in a moment. I know that he procured some men on the witness stand to say that the boots were not suitable for active service.

Mr. MACDONALD: Everyone said it.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: But see what that means. It means this, as was very well pointed out by my honorable friend the member for Brandon (Sir James Aikins). Here were millions of dollars being expended every year for military purposes in Canada. They were expended in the training and drilling of the men, in purchasing big guns, 18 pounders and 13 pounders, in providing rifles, bayonets and ammunition, in purchasing great coats and uniforms and clothing of other kinds as well as boots, caps, and equipment of every kind. These honourable gentlemen, the minority of the committee, have told us in the very first part of their report that one of the greatest essentials in the equipment of the soldier is the provision of a proper boot in order that his feet may be kept whole and that he can march with ease and comfort. Now they will have us believe that the boots deliberately selected and approved by the late Government, first in 1905 and afterwards considered and again approved in 1910, were not intended for use in war at all; that is to say, the honourable member for Pictou (Mr. Macdonald) desires us to believe—and it is understood that he had aspirations for the position now held by the Minister of Militia, and, I suppose he must be considered as speaking for the late Administration—that if war broke out, it was the intention of the late Administration not to put the men into the field at once to fight, but to call a board and ascertain what would be a suitable boot for war conditions and then spend six months or a year in providing them. The first act of mobilization by the late Administration would have been to call a board to provide that which they say is absolutely necessary for the soldier—a boot for active service conditions. That is the ridiculous position in which the honourable member for Pictou has undertaken to place the late Administration; and I think neither his leader nor the gentleman who held the position of Minister of Militia in the late Administration will be very much obliged to him. Could there be anything much more like comic opera? In the United States the best experts who could be procured in that great country took four years for the purpose of determining what would be the best type of army boot, and the first thing these honourable gentlemen opposite were to do when war broke out, if we are to believe the argument of the honourable member for Pictou, was to call a board which might take four years to determine the proper type of boot to be recommended. Their next active step in the war would be to let contracts for the purpose of having those boots supplied. According to the argument of the Opposition, the boots which the late Government adopted after much inquiry and consideration were peace boots; they were for soldiers, but they were purely peace boots. Were the soldiers' great-coats peace coats? Were their guns peace guns? Was their ammunition peace ammunition? Was every part of the equipment of the soldiers, according to the view of my honourable friend from Pictou, peace equipment? In that case, not only the boots, but the guns and the rifles and the ammunition and everything else would have to be discarded if war broke out, and an entirely new equipment procured for the soldiers.

Mr. MACDONALD: Oh, oh.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: I do not wonder that the hon. member for Pictou laughs at his own argument, because I do not think anything more ridiculous was ever put forward.

Mr. MACDONALD: I am laughing at your argument.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: My hon. friend is easily diverted. His own speech should provide him with an unending source of amusement. I believe he feels much concerned that he has put forward so absurd a proposition. His idea is absolutely and wholly ridiculous. I will follow my hon. friend's argument a little further. If the boots are not intended for active service, what is the soldier intended for? Was the soldier not intended for actice service? If the soldier was intended for active service, one would think that all his boots and other equipment were intended for active service; but, according to the argument of my hon. friend from Pictou, although the soldier was certainly intended for active service, yet an important part of his equipment, and what my hon. friend says is the most essential part of his equipment, was not intended for active service at all. I feel that such an argument deserves no more attention. My hon. friend from Pictou will be as much ashamed of it as any one else when he realizes where it really leads him into in regard to the position of the late Administration.

With regard to the type of boots selected by the late Government, I am not prepared at the moment to say that it was the best type of boot for active service that could possibly be selected; but it was the type which we found when we came into office; and after we came into office the expert officials of the Department of Militia and Defence, selected, not by us but by the late Administration, took the matter up again, and they said that it was a perfectly suitable type of boot, that they would adhere to it, and that they preferred it to the British type of boot. If my hon. friend desires to suggest that the officials of the Department of Militia and Defence, who have come to that conclusion and so reported to the minister, are not competent and able to discharge their duties, let him, or some other hon. gentleman opposite who is willing to take that responsibility, from his place in this House make that charge against those men. Up to the present time not one of them has seen fit to do so.

Mr. MACDONALD: The minister took the responsibility himself of this particular boot being furnished. I quoted his statement before the committee to that effect.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: I know what he said perfectly well, and I have read it. He said he thought this boot, on the whole, was better adapted for men in this country than would be the British boot which has been advocated by my hon. friends on the other side. And there is a good deal to be said in favour of that. What is the use of putting on the soldiers' feet boots which are strong and durable, it may be, but in which, after he has used them for four or five days, he cannot march. Every one knows that on this continent both civilians and soldiers wear a lighter type of boot than that used in the British Islands. And we know that the American Government, after four years of examination by the best experts they could procure, decided upon a type of boot just a little lighter than that adopted by the late Administration. After all, if you depend upon a man to march, in order to be effective, would it be better to place upon his feet boots in which he cannot march after three or four days' wear, or to place upon his feet boots in which he can march with the most perfect ease, and replace these boots when they are worn out? Does common sense teach us to take the one course or to take the other? The hon. member for Pictou and others who have concurred with him, apparently, are of opinion that if you place upon the soldier's feet a hard, unyielding boot, of a type such as he is not accustomed to, you will make him more effective even though he is absolutely unable to do his full duty in marching when so equipped.

I understand that the boots, with very trifling exceptions which have been supplied to the Canadian soldiers have been supplied according to the sample, and I am very glad indeed that the report which has been made in this House with regard to the quality of boots secured by the Government in the great stress and urgency of the early part of this war are such as reflect no discredit upon the Canadian manufacturers who supplied them.

My hon. friends on the other side of the House went to a great deal of trouble to show that the boots supplied, were not such as were used in South Africa. And they put the matter before the House and the country in a very insidious way. They say:

> That the boot supplied to the soldiers who went to South Africa was a different boot from the sealed sample boot of 1914, and from the boots supplied to the Overseas Forces. It was in 1905 that boots of a similar pattern to the 1914 boot were first adopted by the department for use in times of peace by the permanent forces in Canada.

"In times of peace" is absolutely interpolated. There is not a tittle of evidence to support their contention in that regard. I admit that the boot which was supplied in August last was a different boot from that hich was supplied to the men who went South Africa. It was a different boot ecause it was a better boot—unless the peech of the hon. member for Pictou this ternoon is to be considered as a direct id forcible charge against the Administra-on of which he was a supporter for many ars in this Parliament. If it is not a tter boot, then he is raising against that dministration which he supported so long this House a direct challenge either ainst its good faith or its capacity, one or e other.

Now, I must assume that the hon. gentle-en who composed the minority of this mmittee desired to present a report to this ouse which would contain a fair state-nt of the facts and would present an biased view of the whole situation be-e the Parliament and people of Canada. would like to ask under these circum-nces why it was they absolutely sup-ssed in their report any reference what-r, so far as I can remember, to the ather conditions to which these boots re subjected both at Valcartier camp l on Salisbury Plain. They desired en they proposed that report that it uld be adopted by the whole committee. y proposed it as a report which con-ned a fair statement of the situation to Parliament and people of Canada. I any reasonable man in this House or this country whether he could come to conclusion that they did desire to be in their report when they absolutely minated any mention whatever of the ther conditions under which these ts were issued. And yet, notwithstanding se weather conditions, we have the evid-e of witness after witness that the boots plied to them at Valcartier camp stood n in good stead for ten weeks in the st conditions that were ever known at season, and that after ten weeks of wear they were still perfectly good boots. This evidence stared them 2 m. in the face, and there is not one single reference to it in the r" report of hon. gentlemen opposite. reason for this is plain—their partisan-collided with their patriotism and the r was very quickly dissipated. There reference whatever in their report to testimony of the men who used these s on Salisbury Plain. That would not onsistent with their idea of endeavour-o make a little, petty party capital out great national question.

. MACDONALD: If the right hon. eman will permit me, I would like to point out that on page 597 of the Votes and Proceedings, he will find this:

> That owing to the fact that the boots supplied for the First Overseas Contingent at Valcartier and in England, were not available for our examination, the evidence, with the exception of a few isolated witnesses submitted to us as to these boots, rests upon the reports of the Regimental boards in England and of General Alderson and other Officers there, and the statement of Sir George Perley;

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: I am not prepared to accept that view of the situation. If my hon. friend will turn to page 588, he will find reference to the evidence of three credible witnesses, Mr. W. M. Bennett of Walkerville, ex-Sergeant Nussey, of the Princess Patricias, and Corporal Edwards; also the evidence of the Minister of Militia on the same page, and on the following page the evidence of Private Ross. All of these witnesses, except the Minister, speak of having used these boots under the awful conditions, the worst that have been known for forty years, on Salisbury Plain, and the boots, notwithstanding these conditions, had done good service. I would think that hon. gentlemen who desired to be fair, to place before the people of this country an unprejudiced and unbiased statement as to the boots in question, would naturally and necessarily have made some allusion to that.

A great deal has been said by several hon. gentlemen on the other side of the House with regard to delay in ordering new boots and with regard to a report of a Sub-Committee of the Council. So far as that is concerned the matter is capable of the most perfect explanation and it is this: After a Sub-Committee of Council had taken the matter into consideration, and after it had been proposed to issue orders for boots of a type and character then recommended by certain manufacturers, who, of course, were highly desirous that orders should go out as quickly as possible, we had further suggestions and further advice as to the type of boot that ought to be adopted. It had taken the Government of the United States four years, with the assistance of the best experts on this continent, to come to a conclusion. We had the decision of the late Administration, supported by all the technical officers of the Department with regard to the boot then in use, and we did not propose precipitately to make a change without the most careful consideration of the character and type of the new boot. The Minister of Militia, in consulting me, said he thought it would be better to wait until

Committee of this House had reported, ıuse suggestions might be made by the mittee whose report is now before the se, which would enable us better to e to a conclusion as to the type of boot ch should be ordered.

these three members of the com- ee, who were more concerned in r matters than the best type of which could be selected for the adian soldier, had devoted a little more ntion to that question and had endeav- d to assist the Government and the ple of this country in choosing a type of , which might be superior to that which late Government had selected in the instance, it would perhaps have been er for all concerned. But their minds entirely on other subjects, and chiefly, ot altogether, on the question of how e petty political capital might be made nst the Government of the country, not the question of what would be the best of boot to be supplied. The Minister of tia, in my judgment, took a perfectly ect course in waiting until he had the ntage of the advice of this committee, ıy advantage could be derived from it; in the report of the majority of the mittee who were concerned in this ques- and not with the pettier questions h absorbed entirely the minds of the ority. There are some suggestions which hall take into consideration and which otless will be helpful in the end.

respect of this matter, and indeed of y matter that is concerned with the aration of equipment for our troops, I desirous that there should be the st and most ample investigation; and ink our record through the session has onstrated not only our willingness but desire that every matter brought up in House, which might afford the slightest icion of improper dealings, should be ed to the bottom. We were not only ng, but we insisted that it should be ed to the bottom, and we shall continue o so until the end.

far as this matter is concerned, I am glad indeed to know that the action of Government has been sustained not by the majority of the committee, but, r than that, by the evidence given re the committee. We had to under- this tremendous task of equipping a t army at almost a moment's notice, inside of six weeks we sent out nearly 0 men, fully equipped, with all the plex organization that is necessary for an army at the front under modern conditions. Among other things a great number of boots had to be supplied. What we did was to take the type of boot which had been adopted by the late Government in 1905, and had been readopted by them in 1910, which had been approved by the technical men, then and now the advisers of the Minister of Militia; we went to the manufacturers of this country and asked them to supply those boots much more rapidly than they would be expected to do under ordinary conditions. With these boots we equipped the soldiers who have gone to the front. It would be a strange thing indeed, under those circumstances, and with the weather conditions which supervened both at Valcartier camp and at Salisbury Plain, if the boots did not give way now and then and if some complaints were not made. But I am glad to say that the result as a whole has demonstrated not only the fairness and the honesty of the manufacturers of Canada, but also the efficiency of the Department of Militia and Defence, and the ability of the people of this country to deal with so great an emergency in a prompt and efficient way.

Major General HUGHES (Minister of Militia): I was hoping that some worthy gentleman on the other side would have prolonged this debate so that we might have adjourned it until the morrow, as I wanted to speak at considerable length; but at this hour of the evening I shall endeavour to condense my remarks to a minimum.

The first I heard of anything wrong in connection with the boots issued to the soldiers of Canada was on my return from the old land towards the latter end of November. Soon after I took occasion to visit one of the centres whence adverse reports had come, St. Johns, Que. I found there about 30 pairs of boot that had been reported by Colonel Gaudette as being inferior. We examined some that were cut across the soles which to my mind had been burned. Two or three others were worn and one or two had the outer sole torn off, whether by accident or design I could not say. However, the report had been published in the newspapers that the boots were bad. Any one familiar with the spirit or temper of the Canadian people or any people who have not been accustomed to war under such conditions as have prevailed in Canada ever since the outbreak of war will readily realize the nervous tension affecting the people. For instance, a toy balloon crossing over the border near Brockville set the whole community agog, it was an American invasion. A kite flying over Ottawa stampeded the whole city on one or two occasions; and some persons having been heard speaking the German language near Toronto caused a great agitation in that city on an occasion not very long since. In many ways we have evidence that a certain number of people of the country are more or less readily stampeded, if I may use the term, by these irrelevant matters in connection with the war.

The temper of the people is sensitive at a time like this, and one can readily understand how they would feel at the first whisper that the boots supplied to the soldiers were poor. We had faith in the great majority of the manufacturers. We believed that they were absolutely honest and square in their dealings. I may say that a great number of them pledged their word that the quality of leather and the workmanship was not only fully up to the standard but above the standard, and that they were turning out a better boot than the contract called for. Almost every manufacturer gave us that pledge. When I heard of complaints, I immediately ordered the boards to report on these boots, and later on appointed a board from my own department to investigate and report. Their report is now before the House. At first it was believed—and the newspapers took up the agitation—that there was truth in these charges, but as I passed from regiment to regiment and personally investigated, I found that instead of the filling being of jam mixed with cork, as some of the stories had it, the filling was of the highest standard that could be put in boots. It was wax, mixed with cork, which is what the specifications call for. Furthermore, as I went through the country I found very few places where more than a dozen pairs were defective at all, and then it began to dawn on me that there must be something more behind all this, than the good of the soldier or the bad quality of his boots. Every facility the department could afford has been offered to the committee in their investigation; in fact, I had the honour of requesting the first minister to appoint the committee to inquire into the whole question.

I might point out, in connection with my views on the boot question, that some years ago I visited the city of Washington and investigated the American plans of boot making, and what they considered the proper boot for a soldier. It is generally known that the American boot is somewhat lighter than the so-called Canadian dancing pump. It also has a very broad toe, much too broad to my mind. I purchased a pair once that were supposed to be perfect, but I found that the toe played around inside too much and that the boot was much more uncomfortable than a boot that fitted more snugly. As I told the committee, one of our sample boots exhibited before them would have been better if it had been a trifle broader. I also pointed out that the toes and heels should be nailed, for wearing.

The Canadian boot has stood the wear and tear beyond all expectations. When the troops went to England they were met with adverse weather conditions at Salisbury Plains. The rain poured down day after day, and the men had to walk around in mud up to the ankles. No boots ever manufactured, whether in England or in Canada, could stand such weather as that. No boots have stood such weather. It is only natural that the Canadian boot, the only ones that were being worn there, should be the only ones to be criticised—at that time the English boot was not being worn by our soldiers. Finally, when the agitation from here reached England, the boys naturally thought: Oh, these boots must really be bad. At all events the boots were exchanged for English boots, but fortunately for themselves the boys still preserved their Valcartier boots. We have evidence after evidence to show that the British boot has gone clean to pieces. The heavy sole is not proving satisfactory to the English soldier, and to-night in the trenches in France and Belgium the Canadian soldiers are wearing their old Canadian boots, 90 per cent of them having discarded the English boot. The Evening Telegram of Toronto, a paper which cannot be charged with being too friendly to your humble servant, in its issue of February 19, 1915, contains an article from Gorden Dent, one of three brothers at the front. He says:

> I guess you have heard about the Canadian boots being no good. Well, they are all right, on my first pair the soles are only worn out and they can be made as good as new. What destroyed them was some of the fellows put them over the stove to dry, which rotted them. The first issue of English boots I happened to get (worse luck) they were fitted to a 2 x 4 plank and there is no support whatever to the arch of the foot, and the leather is rotten. A complaint was made and they stopped issuing them, and now they have got another kind which are some improvement, but let me half-sole my Canadian boots and hob-nail them and I will out-walk any person who has the English boots.

I have also an extract from a letter from Douglas Jennings to C. A. B. Jennings. It is dated Levington Manor, Wilts, March 9, 1915, and reads as follows:

> They have equipped us with those English boots, steel heels and those great large hob nails in the bottoms. I am afraid they are going to ruin my feet, for they are very heavy and hard to break in. On pay day I am going to buy myself a pair of boots that I can get some comfort out of, for if I have to do the marches in full marching order that we get I will be a cripple in a very short time.

Here is an extract from a letter written by a soldier on Salisbury Plain to his parents residing in Ottawa:

> February 1, 1915.
> I notice that the Canadian boots were condemned. Ninety per cent of the men here cannot wear the English make and want to wear the Canadian boots. I am going to leave the English make behind, and wear the ones from home, as they are more comfortable, although they might not be able to stand as much wear and tear.

A week ago, a soldier who had been invalided from the front, having been wounded by a shrapnel shell, passed through Ottawa on his way to Edmonton. On the way from Montreal to here he showed the folks the boots he had worn at Valcartier and at Salisbury Plain and in the trenches, and which I presume he is wearing in Edmonton to-night. I can also quote an extract from a very distinguished officer at the front. He says: "Our Canadian boots are better than the English. The latter have gone to pieces much worse than the Canadian boots." This bears out Major Currie's statement that the Canadian boots that stood the water at Valcartier, but which were discarded by arrangements with the British authorities, have had to be taken up again by the soldiers, 90 per cent of whom are wearing them in the trenches at the present moment.

I shall not take up any more of the time of the House except to point out this. Some of our wagons were discarded. One of the reasons given was that they could not turn in the narrow English roads. I knew that was nonsense, because the Canadian wagon can turn in 31 feet 9 inches, whereas the English wagon takes 35 feet. It was also said that our trucks were not satisfactory at the front, that we had three kinds of trucks. Instead of their having been discarded, however, it turns out now that we are supplying seven kinds of trucks. Our bicycles, which were discarded, have also turned out better than the English, and are now being adopted. Our boots were discarded, and they are now turning out better than the English boots.

In regard to the boots furnished to the Canadian contingent at the time of the South African war the facts are these. The inferior boot which was shown here to-night was the one supplied to the troops but the defects were found in them before they started and a number were returned. A large number of a slightly different make were subsequently purchased and handed out to the troops but the troops would not wear them. The troops, out of their own pockets, largely purchased the Slater shoe and wore them through the South African campaign. It is not correct to say that the Slater shoe was issued to soldiers in South Africa because as a matter of fact it was not. The Slater shoe was bought individually by the soldiers and worn by them through the war. Later on the Slater shoe was adopted by the department and Charles Slater, I think the gentleman's name is, was the gentleman who was intrumental in having that shoe adopted. It remained the standard shoe for the department but was remodelled in 1910. In that year I had the honour of being consulted about the shoe and I gave my views which are very much in favour of a light shoe.

I have always worn a light shoe and I have always felt that it was much better for marching purposes. I have never felt any difficulty in wearing a light shoe and I could outmarch men wearing heavy boots. The great trouble with the heavy boot is that unless it is kept well oiled and in a flexible condition it wrinkles and the result is that the soldier wearing it is incapacitated. I prefer a light upper made of flexible leather. If I had my way I would have mercurial tanned leather. As an instance of a light boot I might point to what is well known by any one who has studied Highland customs, that the Highland soldier in the olden days, when he was a distinct and superior individual to an even greater degree than he is to-day, wore what one might almost call slippers or shoes very much the same as our running shoes. In my own experience of mountain climbing I have found that the best results come from wearing a sporting or lacrosse shoe. I have no use for the heavy boot. The German and British soldiers wear the heavy boot. The German soldier wears a boot that is much larger than would ordinarily be necessary because he wraps his feet in flannel cloth while the British soldier wears a woollen sock. The French soldier wears a much lighter shoe than the British or German soldier, the Italian soldier wears a light shoe, the Canadian soldier wears a light shoe and the American soldier wears the lightest shoe of all, some lined and some unlined. The American shoe is lighter than the so-called dancing pump of the Canadian soldier.

I do not wish to detain the House other than to point out that I understood from the right hon. the leader of the Opposition (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) that the suspicion of fraud on the part of the manufacturers was the motive for appointing this committee of investigation. As time wore on we found that there was no attempt to show that there had been any fraud on the part of the manufacturers, and I presume that there was no opportunity of doing so, because there was no evidence of fraud.

The question naturally suggests itself to me: Are these hon. gentlemen doing this for the benefit of the soldiers? Not at all. The soldiers were perfectly content with these boots, and in the Dominion of Canada there are tens of thousands of soldiers wearing them. They were wearing them last fall, they have been wearing them all winter, and they are wearing them this spring, and there is no fault to find with the boots. The other day one dear lady came to me in the city of Ottawa, and she said: "It is an awful thing; I saw a poor soldier walking around with his foot actually out of his boot." I said: "That is absolutely impossible." She said: "I saw it myself. There is cloth on his feet." I said: "You must be mistaken; the soldiers are furnished with overshoes in the winter time," and she replied: "Oh, I did not know that." Any one in a snowy country wears overshoes in the winter. We had these overshoes for the men all winter, and they were offered to the men at Salisbury Plain, but they were discarded there because it was thought desirable to supplement the boots with which they were equipped.

This agitation certainly could not have been intended to promote Canadian industry. A gentleman told me that at the time this agitation commenced there were negotiations in progress for a $3,000,000 order for boots for the Russian Government, to be given to Canadian manufacturers, but as soon as this agitation began the order was cancelled and it was transferred to United States firms. This agitation, undertaken for political purposes, was utilized for commercial purposes by rival manufacturers in other countries.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Has the minister evidence in writing of the statement he has made, and, if so, will he be good enough to submit it to the House?

Major General HUGHES: Submit what to the House?

Mr. PUGSLEY: The Minister stated that as a result of this matter having been brought up—this matter of the quality of these boots which were furnished and for which he claims this side of the House is responsible—

Major General HUGHES: Yes.

Mr. PUGSLEY: —an order for $3,000,000, worth of boots and shoes, which otherwise would have gone to Canadian manufacturers, was transferred to the United States. That is a very important statement to make, and if the minister has any written evidence of it, would he submit it to the House? I would ask the minister if he would do so.

Major General HUGHES: Do what?

Mr. PUGSLEY: If he would submit the evidence to the House.

Major General HUGHES: I have submitted the evidence. The honorable gentleman has asked me for the evidence. I have given him my statement. Not a dollar's worth of Canadian boots have been sent to Russia, France—

Mr. MACDONALD: Oh, yes.

Major General HUGHES: Not to my knowledge.

Mr. MACDONALD: My honorable friend is mistaken there. We had evidence before the committee that a Montreal firm had a contract for supplying boots to those countries.

Major General HUGHES: Well, I was not aware of that. I have reason to believe that there would have been millions of dollars' worth sent to this country had this agitation not been carried on.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Let me ask the minister if it is the case that the remark which was attributed to him in the newspapers that the manufacturer who supplied these poor boots ought to be shot could have had some influence upon the Russian Government.

Major General HUGHES: The remark that was attributed to me was that shooting was too good for the manufacturer who made bad boots and furnished them to the soldiers, but that was after the honourable gentlemen opposite had been instrumental in developing this agitation.

Mr. MACDONALD: No, it was not.

Major General HUGHES: I made my statement in the middle of January.

Mr. MACDONALD: That was before the House met.

Major General HUGHES: But the agitation was going on before I came back from England.

Mr. PUGSLEY: It was broadcast among the soldiers, of course.

Major General HUGHES: Not at all; the soldiers were content. This agitation was not carried on for the benefit of the people.

Mr. MACDONALD: The soldiers started it themselves.

Major General HUGHES: The agitation was not started by the soldiers themselves. It was started in the press of the country and it was not carried on for the upbuilding of the Empire. I have studied the matter from every viewpoint, and no aspect presents itself that can be regarded as having any interest for the people of Canada. This agitation has only been carried on for the benefit of rival manufacturers in other lands and for the benefit of the political party that is now occupying the Opposition and will long continue to occupy that position in this Parliament.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Is the minister not aware that one newspaper that started the agitation in a most active way was that very leading Canadian newspaper in Montreal, the Montreal Star, which cannot be accused of favouring the Liberal party?

Major General HUGHES: No matter how it was started, it was very quickly taken up by our friends opposite. I was pointing out that the soldiers on the other side of the Atlantic, as well as this side, as soon as they saw that the agitation was merely political or commercial, settled down and refused to take any part in it. The soldiers on the other side to a man and the soldiers in the firing line in France, are wearing the soft leather boot in preference to the English hard leather boot. The English hard leather boot has not stood the wear for any two months on an average. In fact, they are issuing hard leather boots to the British soldier and they get an issue every two months or six weeks. The Canadian boots are better than the English boots; the latter have gone to pieces much worse than have the Canadian boots. Thousands of the Canadian boots supplied at Valcartier are to-day being worn by the soldiers at the front, which is a marvel for service and to my mind is more than creditable to our Canadian boot manufacturers. I shall not detain the House further at this late hour, as the matter can be discussed in case of need on other occasions.

Amendment (Mr. Murphy) lost on division.

Motion (Mr. Middlebro) agreed to on division.

On motion of Sir Robert Borden, the House adjourned at 12.35 a.m. Tuesday.

The House met at Eleven o'clock, the Speaker in the Chair.

KINGSTON PENITENTIARY.

RELEASE OF THOMAS RILEY.

On the Orders of the Day being called

Mr. EDWARDS: Mr. Speaker, I desire to ask the hon. Minister of Justice (Mr. Doherty) if his attention has been called to an item which appears in Saturday's Free Press, and which is also referred to in this morning's Ottawa Citizen, in regard to the release of one Thomas Riley from Kingston Penitentiary. It is reported in both articles that there were two Rileys in that institution and that the one who was sentenced about a year ago to fifteen years for manslaughter was by mistake released for the other Riley. If this is true it certainly reflects very strongly on the administration or management of that institution. I would ask the minister if his attention has been called to this fact.

Mr. DOHERTY: My attention was brought to the fact. What happened was this: an application was made on behalf of Thomas Riley, convicted of manslaughter in April, 1913, and sentenced to seven years. After consideration of the case a recommendation was made and was acted upon by His Royal Highness the Governor General approving an order for the release of this man, whose offence was, as I have stated, with all the circumstances on the face of it. Unfortunately there was in the same penitentiary another Thomas Riley who had been sentenced likewise for manslaughter in April, 1914, and who had been sentenced to fifteen years. I should say that the one difference between the two men, and this is where the very unfortunate error occurred, was that the man who had been sentenced to fifteen years had a middle initial in his name; his name was Thomas M. Riley. When the order went from the Secretary of State's Dearitment to the warden it contained no information in regard to the individual, but described him as Thomas M. Riley. Thomas M. Riley was, upon that order, discharged, although the recommendation approved by His Royal Highness was for the discharge of the other man. The "M" got slipped into the papers because of a report that was on the files on the question of the deportability of the fifteen-year man. The incident is, of course, most regrettable. What it makes most clear is that in the communication of these orders more care should be taken to give not only the man's name, but every circumstance surrounding him so as to make a mistake of identity impossible. I do not know that it is going to help things to direct public attention to it, but I may inform the House that steps are being taken to re-arrest and return to the penitentiary the man for whose discharge no order of His Royal Highness was issued and who, through this unfortunate combination of circumstances, in effect escaped from the penitentiary. We have initiated steps to remedy the mistake that occurred.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: Are you going to ask for extradition?

Mr. DOHERTY: I have given instructions that the matter be taken up from that point of view.

Mr. McKENZIE: I presume the minister is going to let out the right man?

Mr. DOHERTY: That is not at all an unnatural presumption. Most assuredly there is a proper order for the discharge of that man, and the proper action would be to discharge him. The mere fact that the message unfortunately did not convey the correct information should not prejudice the man whose discharge was ordered.

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR.

REPORT OF MR. FERGUSON.

On the Order of the Day being called:

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: There was a report laid on the table of the House two or three days ago of an investigation conducted by Mr. Ferguson, who, it appears, has been entrusted by the Government to make an investigation into certain matters under the jurisdiction of the Department of the Interior. The report is very voluminous. When I commenced to read it I found that there was no reference to the powers of Mr. Ferguson o rthe nature of the duties which were assigned to him. The Order in Council which appointed him has not been brought down. Will the Government have it brought down immediately?

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: When was the document laid on the table of the House?

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: A couple of days ago.

QUESTION OF PRIVILEGE.

On the Orders of the Day being called:

Mr. S. F. GLASS (Middlesex): Mr. Speaker, I desire to rise to a matter of privilege. I am sorry that the hon. member for West Lambton (Mr. Pardee) is not in his seat this morning, because I desire to direct the attention of the House to some remarks he is reported to have made on Saturday last in the constituency which I have the honour to represent. There is an article in the London Advertiser of yesterday headed, "Appeal for Blood-suckers," and containing the report of a speech delivered by the hon. member for West Lambton. Speaking at a Liberal convention held in the city of London last Saturday, to nominate a candidate for the Dominion House, he said:

> Then along comes the Finance Minister, White, a very practical farmer is Mr. White, having come direct from an office in Toronto, and he says to you farmers: "Pay a little more, have a little more patriotism and a little more production and pay more blood money in order that the suckers may be kept going."
> Then of this 5 per cent. The Tories have been shouting "Loyalty." They always have. They have the only simon pure brand of loyalty concealed about them. The Grits are disloyal. They want annexation. They are not British subjects.
>
> The Tories did not oppose reciprocity on economic grounds—they couldn't,—so they came to you farmers and said that while reciprocity would give you bigger markets and better prices you should not vote for it because if it carried it would weaken the bonds of the Empire and Canada would become annexed to the United States.
> They waved the flag. They called themselves the paragon of loyalty and called on Ontario to look at them. Ontario did look and it must have been through a magnifying glass for we were left with a shattered 13. However, I have no fault to find. It was foolish but every man's destiny is his own. Ontario was afraid of the bugbear of loyalty.

How loyal are the Tories of to-day?

What do the Conservatives say? Do they show consistency? Their arguments of loyalty don't go. The arguments that they are Tories from the ground up are accepted. They called on the British-born not to support the Liberal party because it was disloyal and would not support the British Empire. What will the British-born do now?

Last week I heard your present representative, S. F. Glass, endeavouring to justify the seven and a half per cent increase. He said: "If it wasn't for this row would we satisfy the manufacturers?" (Laughter.) In that one short sentence the whole trend of the policy of the Tories is shown. It is "fatten up the manufacturers and don't worry about the farmer. He will come."

If my hon. friend (Mr. Pardee) were in the House now, I should like to ask him if he has been correctly reported; and judging from the construction of the sentences, I rather believe he has not. But I do want to say that every word in that statement, from beginning to end, both in its sentiment and its construction, is absolutely false, and Hansard will show that I was not properly quoted. The object no doubt was to prejudice me before the farmers who were present. I take this opportunity, if the hon. gentleman is reported correctly, to say that the statements he made are absolutely false and without a tittle of foundation.

Mr. SPEAKER: With reference to the practice which seems to be somewhat prevalent of late, of reading newspaper articles in the House as a question of privilege, I wish to say that it is not a question of privilege, and cannot by any stretch of the imagination be properly regarded as privilege. All the same, it is the right of an hon. member to refer to such statements and to contradict them.

WAR SUPPLIES.

CORRESPONDENCE WITH MANUFACTURERS.

On the Orders of the Day being called:

Mr. PUGSLEY: In the absence of the hon. member for South Renfrew (Mr. Graham), and at his request, I wish to ask the Prime Minister if he has yet obtained the consent which he said was necessary before bringing down certain correspondence which took place between the manufacturers and this Government in regard to the mode in which orders for war supplies were given.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: I communicated with the gentleman who wrote me the letter, but I have not yet received a reply.

PURCHASES FOR THE BRITISH GOVERNMENT.

On the Orders of the Day being called:

Mr. PUGSLEY: I call the attention of the Minister of Militia to the following article which appeared in the Ottawa Free Press of last evening, and I shall base a question upon it.

British Government will send out its own Buyers.

Revelations of war purchases on boots, bandages, binoculars and bad horses apparently have crossed the Atlantic.

It looks as if the British Government had begun to sit up and take notice. Soon after the opening of the war the British Government entrusted the Canadian Government with the purchasing of some war supplies in Canada for the use of the British and allied forces. The British Government was to pay the bills.

It is understood that within the last few days the War Office or the British Government has cancelled the buying commissions which it gave to the Canadian Government.

This does not mean an end to the purchase of supplies in Canada by the British Government, as War Office buyers are on their way to Canada and the United States, and hereafter the British Government will deal direct with producers and manufacturers on this continent without the intervention of Ottawa.

I ask the Minister of Militia if the Government has received notice from the British War Office that they are sending their agents to the United States and Canada for the purpose of making purchases direct from the manufacturers, and are not to continue making them through my hon. friend the Minister of Militia and others who have been appointed by him?

Major General HUGHES: The hon. gentleman asks me a question concerning the Department of Militia, and I am in the happy position of being able to answer him. There is not a word of truth in that article, so far as the Department of Militia is concerned. So far as the Government is concerned, the Prime Minister is the proper gentleman to ask.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: The statements in the article are absolutely without foundation, so far as I am aware. On the contrary, I know that within the past four or five days the British Government have asked the Canadian Government to act in respect of the procuring of a large amount of supplies in Canada for the War Office.

INQUIRY FOR A RETURN.

On the Orders of the Day being called:

Mr. McKENZIE: I again call the attention of the Secretary of State to the order

I moved for some time ago, which principally concerns the Department of Railways. The Minister of Railways tells me he sent his return to the Secretary of State. I trust the return will be brought down, because we have evidently only a few days of the session left.

Mr. CODERRE: What is the return about?

Mr. McKENZIE: There is only one return of mine, and it is easily found if it is there at all. It is about certain correspondence between Mr. Douglas, provincial member for the county of Cape Breton and the departments of the Government.

Mr. COCHRANE: I may tell my hon. friend that I had no correspondence with the gentleman in question.

SOLDIERS' VOTING BILL.

The House again went into committee, Mr. Sevigny in the Chair, on Bill No. 111, to enable Canadians on active military service during the present war to exercise their electoral franchise.—Hon. C. J. Doherty (Minister of Justice).

Mr. DOHERTY: This Bill has been reprinted so as to have inserted certain amendments and alterations, some as the result of discussion in committee, and some as the result of further consideration on our part. Yesterday there was distributed a reprint in which there were a number of clerical errors, and in which there was inserted a section which I might describe as a tentative section looking to give effect to a suggestion which emanated from the right hon. leader of the Opposition. This section was inserted by mistake, because I did not intend to have it inserted in the Bill until after I had had an opportunity of submitting it to the right hon. gentleman. I do not want to suggest that I am not willing to carry out the suggestion of the right hon. gentleman if we can agree upon the best form in which to carry it out; but, by reason of the errors requiring to be corrected and the insertion of this section, I have caused a correct reprint to be made, and I will have copies of the Bill as reprinted handed around. It is substantially the same as the reprint issued yesterday, with the exception that the section to which I have referred is omitted, the other alterations being merely verbal corrections. I understand that we have dealt with the first two sections; but, if it is desired to take them up again, I have no objection.

[Mr. McKenzie.]

Mr. PUGSLEY: Is the first section the same as the first section in the original Bill?

Mr. DOHERTY: There is no alteration in the first section.

Mr. PUGSLEY: What about the second section?

Mr. DOHERTY: There is no alteration in the second section. The committee will notice that a heading has been inserted between the first section and the second section. This is the distinction between the portions of the Bill which deal with volunteers outside of Canada and the portions of the Bill which deal with volunteers in Canada. The dispositions with regard to the latter begin with section 4.

Mr. NESBITT: There are certain changes in the first section.

Mr. DOHERTY: To what effect?

Mr. NESBITT: Certain words have been dropped out.

Mr. DOHERTY: There is no change in the section as it passed the committee on Saturday, although there is a change in the section as originally drafted.

Mr. NESBITT: There is a change in the printing.

Mr. DOHERTY: The hon. gentleman has not indicated in what the change consists.

Mr. MURPHY: Do I understand my hon. friend to say that the first section in the reprint is the same as the first section in the original Bill?

Mr. DOHERTY: No, but there is no change in it as it passed the committee on Saturday last.

Mr. NESBITT: That may be true, but I am speaking about the Bill as first printed.

Mr. DOHERTY: The first section in the Bill as originally introduced was amended in the committee on Saturday last, and the first section as now printed is the section as it passed the committee in accordance with the amendments made.

On section 1—soldiers entitled to vote:

Mr. MARCIL: Has the minister made a distinction between the volunteers and the regulars?

Mr. DOHERTY: According to the first section the word "volunteer" covers any person serving in the military forces of Canada at the present moment.

Mr. VERVILLE: Is schedule A, which describes the manner in which the soldier is to vote, applicable to section 1 of the Bill? Schedule A corresponds with section 2, but section 1 does not say anything as to how volunteers in Canada are to vote.

Mr. DOHERTY: We are dealing now with volunteers outside of Canada, and we shall deal in due course with volunteers in Canada. The form A of ballot is exactly the form of ballot used in every election in Canada. To put it beyond doubt that the ballot as printed reproduces the actual ballot, I will, if the committee will consent, instead of the printing in the Bill, put upon the official copy one of the actual ballots. I want to make it quite clear that the soldiers of both classes are to use exactly the ballot that is used in Canada, save that a soldier voting outside of Canada, instead of having a ballot on which the names of the candidates are, will have a ballot the spaces of which will be filled in the manner provided in schedule A. There is no difference in the form itself; the difference between the ballot actually used under the Dominion Elections Act and this ballot consists in the fact—and the difference exists only with regard to overseas votes—that instead of names of candidates being printed in the white spaces, the words found upon the form are to be printed. In every other respect the ballot is absolutely the ballot used under the Dominion Elections Act.

Mr. PUGSLEY: I think the statement which my hon. friend the Minister of Justice has made, that his mind has been moving towards acting upon the suggestion made by my right hon. friend the leader of the Opposition with regard to adopting some provision which will make the Bill more satisfactory to all parties and perhaps throw around it safeguards which it is recognized ought to be thrown around the taking of the ballots of absent electors, is certainly calculated to make one believe that it will be possible for us all to agree upon a measure having that end in view. It is a little embarrassing, because my hon. friend has had the Bill reprinted with a clause looking to the appointment of scrutineers or commissioners, and another printed leaving that out. It is difficult to discuss the provisions of a new Bill—for this is practically a new Bill—across the floor of the House without having had time to study it. I would suggest, in view of these new provisions and of the suggestion the hon. gentleman has made, that it might be well to appoint a small committee, representing both sides, to go into this matter. I think that the idea of scrutineers and commissioners is a good one; it provides safeguards which are acceptable. I should think, however, that the powers of the commissioners should go somewhat further than the amendment provides, and that they should have in a large measure the control of the taking of the vote. If the Minister of Justice and the right hon. leader of the Opposition could get together, probably a Bill could be framed that would be acceptable.

Mr. DOHERTY: As to the clause to which the hon. member refers, I have already explained that it was a little premature to print it, for I understood that it was drawn as a tentative clause. I had a few words in consultation with the right hon. gentleman (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) about it, and it seemed to me it did not quite meet his views, and was not, perhaps, as practical as I would like to see it. I had not expected that it would appear in the reprinted Bill; and, inasmuch as there were other clerical errors, I had these corrected also and the Bill reprinted in that form. I am in hopes that, with discussion, we may be able to draft a clause that will be satisfactory and that will give effect to his suggestion as I understood it.

As to the suggestion that the Bill should be dealt with by a small committee, I think that might be a proper course. But I am in hopes also that there are a large number of the provisions in the Bill on which we can agree in Committee of the Whole. In that way we can greatly limit the scope of the reference made to the special committee. Perhaps, if the hon. gentleman (Mr. Pugsley) would accept this modification of his suggestion, we might act upon it. We might go through the Bill, allowing to stand for reference to a special committee such clauses as require more careful consideration.

Mr. OLIVER: If clause 1 is still open for discussion, I wish to reiterate my objection to the proviso. First, I would urge the same reason I gave before—that this makes a double qualification and, owing to the amendment the hon. gentleman has made this proviso is unnecessary to give a fair and reasonable opportunity to vote. Another reason against this is that the hon. gentleman has made a third qualification. I submit that that is mixing it up too much. I quite approve of the third qualification; but when he has the first qualification, that of the place of enlistment, and also the third, that of voting within the electoral district where the man belongs, there is no need, I submit, for this proviso. I do not wish to make a motion to strike it out, but simply to put myself on record.

Section 1 agreed to.

On section 2—distribution of ballot papers:

Mr. OLIVER: I observe that the ballots are to be sent to the commander of the forces in Bermuda, and later on it is provided that the commander of the forces in Bermuda is to control the handling of the ballots. I thought it was understood that the commander of the forces was not to have the handling of the ballots, but that under a later section it was provided that the balloting should be done under the paymaster. Is it not in order to make the same provision in regard to Bermuda as in regard to the other forces?

Mr. DOHERTY: Of course, the paymaster of the Canadian expeditionary forces is in England so that we could not very well bring the Bermuda forces under the general provisions under which the ballots would emanate from the chief paymaster. And, as regards Bermuda, after all, we have only to deal with one regiment of 982 men. It would be a very extraordinary system to send these ballots to the paymaster and all the more so because he does not pay these men, as I understand it. He is chief paymaster of the Canadian expeditionary forces, but I understand that the men in Bermuda do not form a part of these forces. They are doing garrison duty there, having been detached for that purpose. If it is thought that the commanding officer is a particularly objectionable man to do this duty, I suppose we could say that the paymaster of that one particular regiment should distribute the ballots. The hon. member will understand that the only thing the commanding officer has to do with these ballots is to distribute them to the officers commanding companies; that is the beginning and end of his work; the rest is done by the officers commanding companies and the volunteers to whom they distribute the ballots. The commanding officer is the mere instrument of handing out the ballots to the officers who are to take the votes.

Mr. GERMAN: I do not see that it makes any difference whether the ballots are sent to the commanding officer or to the paymaster. The objection that I have, and the objection that I believe the people will have, is that under this legislation there will be an indiscriminate circulation of ballot papers by the commanding officer or paymaster among the officers commanding squadrons, companies and batteries, and that the soldiers will vote higgledy-piggledy, if I may use the expression, without any guarantee that the votes shall be properly recorded. There will be no supervision; it will be done simply as the commanding officer may wish to have it done, if he has strong political convictions and desires to have the votes recorded in favour of the party in which he may have an active interest. Is a man commanding a company, because he is in uniform, going to conduct the casting of these ballots more properly than a man at home, who is not in uniform? There is no supervision over his conduct; he may do exactly what he likes. As I stated in the few remarks that I made on the second reading of this Bill, when the ballots are returned to a close constituency and it is found that the vote of the soldiers changes the result in that constituency, ill-feeling will be engendered. It is because of this probability that I am strongly opposed to this Bill. There is no safeguard; we simply say that because a man is wearing the King's uniform he will be more honest than he would be if he were at home. In elections at home all precautions are taken; we have scrutineers; we have agents; every safeguard surrounds the casting of the vote before a deputy returning officer, who is just as honest as if he were in uniform. I see no reason why similar safeguards should not surround the voting of the soldiers. It is proposed, however, to place the matter in the hands of men who are in a position to suit themselves as to their actions, without the restrictions of any safeguards whatever.

Mr. MARCIL: Has the minister taken into consideration the advisability of placing the ballot within the affidavit itself, so that there shall be only one document?

Mr. DOHERTY: We cannot very well have the ballot and the affidavit in one document, but as it is now proposed, the affidavit will be endorsed upon the envelope which contains the ballot.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: So far as the first clause of section 2 is concerned, I have no objection. The ballots are simply sent to the High Commissioner in London, and to the commander of the forces in Bermuda. I presume that the provisions of the law as it exists to-day will be observed, so far as they can be observed, under this Bill, and that there is a disposition to that effect.

Mr. DOHERTY: There is a provision that this Bill is to be read as one with the Dominion Elections Act.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: The difficulty which I see in connection with this Bill has just been expressed by the hon. member for Welland. We cannot disguise the fact that human nature is human nature, whether the person concerned be clad in khaki or in mufti. I wish to call attention to subsection 3 of this section, as follows:

> The Clerk of the Crown in Chancery shall also notify by telegraph cable the secretary of the High Commissioner for Canada, and the secretary shall thereupon send a sufficient number of ballot papers and envelopes to the chief paymaster of the Canadian Expeditionary Force, who shall forward the same to the several regimental paymasters, and such paymasters shall deliver the same to the officers commanding squadrons, companies and batteries, and such officers shall give each volunteer under their respective commands making the affidavit in form B before such officer, a ballot paper.

These ballots are sent from the Clerk of the Crown in Chancery to the Secretary of the High Commissioner in London; they are transmitted by him to the paymaster of the Canadian Expeditionary Force, who, in turn, sends them to the officers commanding squadrons, companies and batteries. Why should they be sent through so many hands? They should be sent to one person, the person who is to act as returning officer. The other day my hon. friend referred to the fifteen states of the union which had passed laws providing for voting of soldiers in the field. I have not been able to get all information on this subject, but I have found this much: that polling was carried on among the soldiers much the same as it was carried on elsewhere. A polling booth was kept, scrutineers were appointed and the casting of ballots was subject to very much the same regulations as applied to the voting elsewhere. It would be much more difficult to have the same thing apply to the operation of this proposed legislation, however, because in the United States all the men who were in the field were under the immediate control of the authorities; it is not so in this case. What I would suggest would be a commission to take the votes, so that they would be under constant supervision, and so that the same rules should apply in the taking of these votes as apply in the case of elections at home. The hon. member for St. John city has prepared an amendment, which I should like the minister to consider.

Mr. PUGSLEY: What I had in mind was that three commissioners should be appointed who would have entire charge of the taking of these votes. These commissioners would be appointed in this manner: one upon the nomination of the Prime Minister, and one upon the nomination of the leader of the Opposition; these two commissioners will appoint a third, and if they fail to agree on a third commissioner the Chief Justice of the Supreme Court of Canada shall appoint him. These commissioners will make all necessary regulations for the marking of the ballots, subject to the approval of the Governor in Council. Perhaps I might read this proposed amendment:

> The Governor in Council shall appoint two commissioners for the purpose of carrying out the provisions of this Act, one of whom shall be nominated by the Prime Minister and one by the leader of the Opposition, within—days after the passing hereof. And on failure of either the Prime Minister or the leader of the Opposition to make such nomination, the Governor in Council may make the appointment of the commissioner which either of such parties so failed to nominate. The said commissioners so appointed shall appoint a third commissioner within ten days of their being notified by the Governor in Council of their appointment, and should they fail to agree on such third commissioner, such third commissioner shall on the request of either or both of the said two commissioners be appointed by the Chief Justice of the Supreme Court of Canada. In case of the death, resignation or refusal to act at any time of either of such commissioners his place shall be filled in manner hereinbefore prescribed for the appointment of the said commissioner who so died, resigned or refused to act. The majority of the commissioners shall constitute a quorum and their acts shall be as legal and valid as the joint acts of the three commissioners.
> The said commissioners shall have power, and it shall be their duty from time to time, to make all necessary regulations for the taking of the votes, the marking of the ballots, the taking of the affidavits of the voters and the transmission thereof to the Clerk of the Crown in Chancery and all procedure in connection therewith, so as to insure as far as possible that all persons entitled to vote hereunder shall have a fair and reasonable opportunity of doing so. Such regulations shall be subject to the approval of the Governor in Council. And when they have been so approved they shall have the same force and effect as if they were enacted as a part of this Act.
> The commissioners shall have power to appoint such persons to act as scrutineers and otherwise to assist in carrying out the said regulations as the commissioners may deem necessary from time to time.

My idea is that the commissioners could make these regulations at their leisure, and of course they have to be subject to the approval of the Governor in Council. These commissioners would keep control of the ballots. It seems to me that this would be a very much better method than that provided in the Bill, which allows the ballots to be sent out broadcast to the different paymasters, to be delivered in turn to the commanders of squadrons, companies and batteries. The regulations should provide that the ballots must always be in the charge of the commissioners or their deputies, whom they might appoint from time to time. This seems to me a very much better provision. At all events, I throw out the suggestion for the consideration of my hon. friend.

12 noon.

Mr. DOHERTY: At first glance I should be very apprehensive that the constitution of a civilian body of this kind might be looked upon as an invasion of the field of the military authorities. The plan as outlined in the Bill has proceeded upon the assumption that we were keeping ourselves within our own scope, although I think some hon. gentlemen said that we were going too far in the invasion of the field that ought to be reserved exclusively to the military authorities. Generally speaking, this Bill is to provide for a clear recognition by law of the right of the soldiers to vote, and to provide a method by which that right may be exercised. In the carrying out of that plan we do not propose to send to the military forces any officers of our law such as has been suggested by the hon. gentleman, but to provide the men who are there already in their military capacity with the means by which they themselves can provide the machinery for voting. Now to constitute a commission which will name a large number of officers —and they might select them from the military men, I suppose; I do not know precisely how they would proceed about it—seems to me at the first glance to involve the introduction into the army there of some civilian body which is going to carry on operations. The members of that civilian body, being non-military men, will in no way be under the control, as military men, of the authorities there. I am just pointing this out as what occurred to me at first glance, but I am not saying that it is necessarily impossible to act upon the suggestion of my hon. friend. It might be possible to reduce the number of hands that these ballots will have to pass through. It occurs to me that if provision is made for the ballots being sent at the outset to the chief paymaster instead of to the secretary of the High Commissioner, we would at all vents avoid one transmission. If that were adopted, we would have just these two transmissions: the ballots would be in the possession of the chief paymaster, and would be passed by him to the regimental paymasters, and from them to the company officers. Of course the ballots should be kept carefully and not be distributed indiscriminately. It is not proposed to make any indiscriminate distribution; the ballot is to get to the man who is going to use it only after he has taken the necessary affidavit. The thing that is going to pass through these people's hands is a blank ballot. Now, any person can get printed any number of these blank ballots, so I do not quite see what is the serious danger in having some of these blank ballots in the hands of the officers. Why, I have here half a dozen blank ballots myself.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Before they went out would you not have them certified to and given an official character?

Mr. DOHERTY: As I take it, they will acquire their official character by the affidavits on the envelopes in which the ballots will be sent to the Clerk of the Crown in Chancery.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Are you not going to make some provision to prevent the indiscriminate printing of ballots? Will there not be something to identify the ballots as offiicial when sent to the secretary of the High Commissioner?

Mr. DOHERTY: In distributing these ballots we shall have all the provisions that are made with regard to the distribution of other ballots. I have half a dozen ballots here, and there is nothing to prevent me from going to a printing office and getting them absolutely reproduced. These ballots become official and acquire a value which makes it necessary to preserve them when once they have been used in connection with an election. I do not quite see that there is a tremendous danger in putting them in the hands of the paymasters, when somebody who is not a paymaster at all can go and get any number printed. Of course, he would have to have them printed on the paper prescribed by the statute.

Mr. PUGSLEY: They might be stamped by the Clerk of the Crown in Chancery before they left his office.

Mr. DOHERTY: That might be done, but it seems to me that the natural effect of that is to give them an official character, which makes it dangerous if anybody gets possession of them.

Mr. MURPHY: Hear, hear.

Mr. DOHERTY: That is all we get by giving them out with a stamp on them. We make it a dangerous thing, but if the ballot be a ballot pure and simple, its value begins only when it has attached to it that which makes a vote out of it. Its value begins therefore when it has been voted upon and when it is encased in the envelope with the necessary affidavits taken before the proper officer. I quite agree with hon. gentlemen who have spoken. But let us take the other suggestion. Commissioners, we will say, are going to have charge of these ballots. The commissioners will distribute them to I do not know how many scrutineers and deputies. I cannot help but think that there is a greater danger in such a system as that. It has been argued that a man with his uniform on is no better than a man with his uniform off. If it is better to have scrutineers than that the ballots should go through the hands of an officer it is not because they go through the hands of men who do not wear a uniform. I think we may assume that a uniformed man and a man without a uniform are on a footing of equality in that respect.

Mr. NESBITT: The scrutineers are a check on each other; it does not matter whether they are honest or dishonest.

Mr. DOHERTY: We are not discussing what is going to happen when they go to take the vote; we are discussing the comparative safety of ballots going through the hands of people. They have to go through somebody's hands. What is the advantage of these somebodies not being soldiers? There is the disadvantage of introducing a large civilian element in this matter. What did seem to me as the result of the suggestion of my right hon. friend and as the result of the brief conference I had with him, as being a reasonable and useful thing, was that we should appoint a commission whose business it would be to be representative of the respective parties and who will be placed in a position where they could, each as representative of a party, secure in connection with the giving of this vote to each of the parties respectively the protection that is secured under the system here to each of the candidates by the provision which entitles the candidates to have a representative in each of the polling booths. Instead of providing for six commissioners as suggested, and which on reflection I think is an entirely unwieldy and unworkable number, if we provide for the appointment of two commissioners, one on the nomination of the Prime Minister and one on the nomination of the leader of the Opposition, and give them all the powers that are given to scrutineers with the further power of appointing agents who would be entitled to exercise the powers of the commissioners themselves, then we will create a system whereby each of the parties is enabled to secure to itself in connection with the vote the very same protection that the law provides in connection with our voting here by allowing each of the candidates to have a representative who may be present at the different operations that are provided for here and perform the same functions that scrutineers would perform here. Something on this line would seem to me to be as far as we could go and after all it creates a situation where a military officer who is the returning officer will perform his operations in the presence of the representative of each of the parties. One cannot make imperative requirements any more than imperative requirements are made under the law here. Under the law here there is no absolute requirement that the scrutineer shall be present. On the contrary, there is an express provision that the absence of the scrutineer shall not affect the validity of anything. All the law does is to recognize the right of each candidate to provide some one to act as his representative, but the law does not insist upon the presence of that man as being essential to the validity of that which is done. Why need we go farther than the law here goes with the result of providing very cumbersome machinery and creating the possibility of very considerable delay in the taking of the votes?

Mr. TURRIFF: Would it be provided in the Bill that there shall be a fixed day or hour for taking the vote in any particular regiment, so that the scrutineers may be on hand at the proper time and so that there will be no possibility of the vote being taken before or after a certain time?

Mr. DOHERTY: No, the Bill does not make such provision, and I do not think it could do so without creating a situation which will make the taking of the vote impossible or make it imply some encroachment upon the performance of military duty. As I understand the provision of the Bill with reference to the taking of the votes, they will be taken as they can conveniently be taken. The officer commanding the company—and that officer will only have a comparatively small number of ballots, only as many ballots as there are men in the company—shall, under the Act, furnish a ballot to any volunteer who presents himself before him, asks for a ballot for the purpose of voting and makes the affidavit that is required. Thereupon the soldier may mark his ballot, but under the system I have been trying to outline I fancy that in all probability—I do not see how it could work otherwise—these agents that the commissioners would name would be men or officers in the different companies, and, being brother officers and soldiers, I can hardly believe that the officer who was going to take the votes would be endeavouring to run away from the scrutineers or that there would be any attempt on his part to prevent them from exercising the powers conferred upon them. After all, I think they would all get on in the perfectly amicable way in which scrutineers representing different candidates in a polling booth in this country get on together. I think we would be able to take each other's word about arranging one thing and another, and I think we would be justified in doing that in the case of military men. It seems to me that a scheme of that kind might be worked out. I would be glad to act on the suggestion of the hon. member to refer some of these matters to a small committee. However, there are other sections of the Bill which we might go on with in Committee of the Whole.

Mr. NESBITT: If the minister is going to have any portion of this Bill discussed by a small committee it would save a great deal of time if he would let the whole Bill go to that committee.

Mr. DOHERTY: Even after such a committee has performed its duties there are other clauses in the Bill which would have to be taken up by the Committee of the Whole, and we might as well discuss them now. We can reserve for a special committee such matters as this committee thinks call for further consideration.

Mr. MICHAEL CLARK: Is there anything in the Bill to deal with a situation such as this: suppose a shell comes along and destroys a number of these ballots after they have been marked, is there any machinery in the Bill to have the ballots marked again by those who had previously marked them? That is a perfect possibility. The soldiers enjoy their leisure in the trenches in reading their letters and writing their letters, with shells flying over their heads all the time, and I suppose the minister has imagination enough to conceive that the place where the soldiers are enjoying such leisure as men at war have, is a place where a poll might be taken. If you do not take the ballot in such a place, you would have to take the soldiers outside the firing line for the purpose of your election at the front. If a poll were taken there and a bunch of the ballots were marked and a shell destroyed the whole bunch, has the minister any arrangement for dealing with that situation?

Mr. DOHERTY: No. No more is there any arrangement provided by law under the Election Act, for what is to happen if the polling-booth should be struck by lightning and all of the marked ballots destroyed, which is a thing that may happen. I am striving to contend with the practical difficulties which surround the taking of this vote, but I really cannot undertake to overcome the forces of nature in order to prevent all of the things that might happen by reason of the conditions under which this vote is going to be taken. It is a soldiers' vote and it will be taken under war conditions, and just as the soldier himself has to take the risk of what may happen, I am afraid that the soldiers' ballots will have to take the risk of what may happen to them.

Mr. MICHAEL CLARK: Does the Minister of Justice not think that if he were to have a general election in Canada on a day when lightning were likely to be as frequent as shells are on the battle-field, that he would postpone the election from that particular day? I am almost certain he would, especially if he was going to be the returning officer.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: If the Government will not accept the suggestion made by my hon. friend (Mr. Pugsley) to have a commission, of course we can go on with the Bill, but if the Government leaves that point undecided, there is no use going on to consider the section, because the idea embodied in the amendment of the hon. member is that the commission should make regulations subject to the approval of the Governor in Council. The Minister of Justice sees no inconvenience in having ballots distributed promiscuously, but the law as it exists takes precaution against the promiscuous distribution of ballots, and for very good reasons. These restrictions as to the distribution of ballots were inserted in the law, because if an agent wanted to bribe an elector he would give him a ballot previously marked to deposit in the box and get the voter to bring back the original ballot, so as to ensure that the person bribed would deliver the goods. The suggestion of my hon. friend provides that regulations shall be made by this commission. Are we to have a counterfoil on these ballots? Are we to have a poll-book as in the ordinary elections? The Minister of Justice wants to make a commissioned officer the returning officer.

In all probability the officer, if he is an English officer, will be very much embarrassed as to what his duties are. He will have nc conception of them; the work will be something very new to him and he will be a very poor returning officer I am sure; but if we have scrutineers on either side, he then can be instructed as to his duties. If, however, my hon. friend were to agree to the suggestion made by my hon. friend from St. John that we should have a special committee appointed, it would certainly obviate a number of difficulties, and we would have more satisfactory legislation than we would otherwise have.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: The suggestion has often been made by hon. gentlemen opposite that it is proposed to distribute ballots promiscuously. I have not heard of any such intention, nor do I find it in the provisions of the Bill. In the ordinary course, the ballots go to the deputy returning officer who is bound to keep them in his possession until he hands them out one by one to the voters who desire to record their votes. In the present case it is proposed to use the military organization for the same purpose, and ballots are to be delivered to the commanding officer of each unit, the smallest unit being selected; that is to say, companies, squadrons and batteries. The commanding officer of any particular company, squadron or battery, does not distribute the ballots indiscriminately; what he does is to hand a ballot to any soldier who comes before him and makes an affidavit showing that under the provisions of this Bill he is qualified to vote. Apart from that the commanding officer has no authority whatever to deliver a ballot to any person at all, just as the deputy returning officer has no authority to deliver a ballot except to a voter whose name is upon the list and who comes into the polling booth and demands the right to exercise his franchise, so that there is no promiscuous distribution of the ballots under the provisions of this Bill. The purpose of this Bill is simply to use, as necessarily one must use, the military organization for the purpose of giving the soldiers at the front or in Great Britain the right to record their votes. In framing the Bill, the committee were inspired with the belief, which I think might very well be supported by hon. members on both sides of the House, that we could not anticipate that men serving their country at the front under conditions which have been described by the hon. member for Red Deer (Mr. Clark) could have their minds taken up with the desire to commit a fraud in the exercise of the franchise under the provisions of this Bill. It is perfectly obvious that if the men at the front are to have the right to exercise the franchise, one must give to the officers who are commanding them and to the men themselves some credit for reasonable honesty and for a desire to carry out the provisions of this Bill as they are intended to be carried out. If we start with the premise that every officer or man at the front is filled with and animated by a desire to commit a fraud in the exercise of his franchise, of course very wide precautions will be necessary; but after all, whatever precautions you take, either in this Bill or in any other Bill concerning the exercise of the franchise, the legitimate carrying out of its provisions depends in the last analysis upon the men selected to carry them out. You may legislate from to-day until the 31st day of December and in the end, whatever provisions you enact and whatever safeguards you provide, the result will depend upon the honesty and the integrity of the men carrying out the provisions of any legislative measure, and I defy this House or any other House to make legislative provisions with regard to the exercise of the franchise which cannot be defeated by dishonest men. Therefore, the whole question seems, in my judgment, to depend upon whether we may with reasonable confidence rely upon the commanders of the units to discharge the duties imposed upon them by this Bill in an honest way and without any desire to commit a fraud. If we are entitled to have that confidence in them, then it seems to me that the Bill contains reasonably sufficient safeguards; if we are not entitled to have that confidence in them, then I believe that no safeguards that we can insert will in the last analysis prevent fraud from being committed. I have not the slightest idea as to the political opinions of the officers of the various units and I do not know who they are. They were not selected by reason of their political opinions, and I have every confidence that whether they are of one political party or of the other, they will, under the conditions which have been described be disposed to discharge this duty in an honest and patriotic way.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: The fact that we insist upon taking such precautions as regards military life as are taken in civil life does not imply that there is any discrimination against the members of the army any more than there is discrimination against men in civil life. No one has answered the objection put forward by the hon. member for Welland (Mr. German) that a uniform does not make a man honest. Whether a man wears a uniform or not, it is human nature all the same, so that we are certainly doing nothing extraordinary in asking that the same precautions which are taken in civil life should be taken as regards military life. Does any one contend that in military life less precaution should be taken than in civil life? Military life is no better than civil life and civil life is no better than military life; human nature is the same in both cases. I am glad to hear from my right hon. friend that there is to be no promiscuous distribution of ballots, and that the volunteer can have the ballot only when he comes and asks for it.

Mr. DOHERTY: He asks for it when he makes the affidavit.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: I suppose my right hon. friend has in mind subsection 3 of section 2, part of which reads as follows:

> And such officers shall give each volunteer under their respective commands making the affidavit in form B before such officer, a ballot paper.

Mr. PUGSLEY: This is a change from the original Bill.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: This is a new provision and it satisfies me. It is a new precaution which has been inserted, showing that the suggestion we have made is not frivolous but serious. All that we can ask under this Bill is that the same precautions should be taken as if the soldiers were voting in Canada.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: We are perfectly willing to take any precautions except to the extent of making the Bill unworkable. The difference between the right hon. gentleman and myself is this: The basis upon which this Bill was reported by the committee is that under the exceptional conditions in which the soldiers are to exercise their franchise, we must have regard to military considerations, and that the best that we can do is to utilize the military organization for the purpose of giving these men the right to vote. If we superimpose upon that a proposal which will create an organization for the purpose of supervising the exercise by these men of their franchise, of such a character that it cannot be properly worked out under the military regulations which govern at the front, we might as well pass no legislation at all. Subject to that consideration, my hon. friend the Minister of Justice is disposed, as I am, to establish every possible safeguard. But I think that is a matter which might very well be considered in the informal committee that has been alluded to. In the meantime, the Minister of Justice thought, and I myself think, that we might make some progress with the provisions of the Bill.

Mr. MURPHY: It would be as impossible for my right hon. friend to prove that all men into whose hands these ballots would fall are honest as it would be unreasonable for any person on this side of the House to argue that all the men into whose hands they may fall are dishonest. That is not the purpose of this discussion. Under the Elections Act as it stands, the Minister of Justice knows perfectly well the principle is to limit the circulation of ballots to as few persons as possible. For that reason, when an election is held in Canada under this Act the ballots are first of all placed in the custody of the Clerk of the Crown in Chancery. This also is proposed to be done under the Bill now before the committee. When they leave the custody of the Clerk of the Crown in Chancery they go to certain designated officers, the returning officers for the several constituencies in Canada. All these officers are under the jurisdiction of the law of Canada and subject to well-understood penalties if they fail to carry out their duties. Here you begin to have a departure under this proposed Act. These men in Canada distribute the ballots to certain deputy returning officers.

Mr. DOHERTY: They have to go into the hands of printers in every constituency in the Dominion.

Mr. MURPHY: I am assuming this is to be done by those who are recognized under our Act as persons responsible for the custody and proper distribution of ballots when the election is held in Canada. Now, the difference between this and the method proposed in the Bill is very marked. The ballots go to other hands and ultimately fall into the custody of people who cannot be designated and are absolutely unknown. This discussion thus far has proceeded on the assumption that all the officers into whose hands these ballots will go are Canadians. I do not so understand the matter. From the discussion which took place the other day, and from the remarks of the hon. member for Red Deer (Mr. Michael Clark), possibly repeated by some other gentlemen, I understand that the Canadian troops are dispersed through many regiments and may be under the command of British officers—I mean officers from England, Ireland, Scotland or Wales. They may be under the command of Australian, New Zealand or other officers for aught I know. I venture to say that these officers, if they come from any other country than Canada would be very apt to decline to be bothered with carrying out the details of an election in the face of the tremendous task in which they are engaged. I think that if a request of this kind were made of these officers they would say they were there for carrying on the business of war for the Empire and not for the purpose of carrying on the business of elections for the people of Canada. These seem to me, at any rate, to be practical objections to what has been proposed. Dealing more particularly with the subsection to which the right hon. leader of the Opposition called attention, I would suggest that if that subsection is to be proceeded with, the distribution of the ballots should be entrusted to the several regimental paymasters, and that they should not be further distributed after coming to the hands of these officers.

Mr. DOHERTY: In this country, no doubt, we try to take care of the ballots. Before I go into that, I concede—it was conceded from the outset—that if the view be taken that the soldier cannot vote unless we can have identically and absolutely the precautions taken under the Dominion Elections Act, of course, we shall have to drop the Bill. But it seemed to us that something must be conceded in order to make it possible for the soldier to vote, and it is just because we cannot have him vote under all the provisions of the Dominion Elections Act that it is necessary to pass this Bill. Let us contrast how the ballots are handled in this country with the way they are going to be handled under this Bill. The ballots here are in the hands of the Clerk of the Crown in Chancery, and from him they go to the returning officers all over the country. Then they go into the hands of printers in every constituency in this Dominion. When they come back from the printers they go into the hands of deputy-returning officers, of whom there would be in each constituency, on the average, I suppose, fifty or sixty. Now, contrast this with what will happen under this Bill. From the Clerk of the Crown in Chancery these ballots will go to the chief paymaster and from him to the several regimental paymasters. That will not be more men than, I doubt that it will be as many as, there are returning officers in Canada. From these the ballots go to the company or battery commanders, each of whom, as I understand it, commands approximately 250 men. But we here have a returning officer for an average of between 200 and 300 votes. So that, proportionately to the number of voters, we are not exceeding the number of deputy-returning officers in the handling of these ballots. This means that these ballots will go through fewer hands than we are willing that they should go through in dealing with a similar number of voters in Canada. It is conceivable, of course, that some of these people may not be honest; it is conceivable—and I am afraid that we have had evidence of it—that all the men who handle ballots in Canada are not trustworthy under all circumstances. They are human, as has been said, and we have to take them as they are. The question comes back to this: Is it of sufficient importance that we should secure to the soldiers the right to vote to justify our modifying our law in some respects and foregoing to some extent the protection that we seek in the holding of an election in time of peace at home. It does seem to me that it is worth while to make some sacrifice. However we do want to reduce that sacrifice so long as the Act can be made workable. So far, I think, I have accepted every suggestion that has been made—certainly every one that seemed to me at all practicable—looking to greater security. The last one that has been made, it seems to me, cannot be given effect to and at the same time give effect to the soldier's right to vote.

I do not think that the Bill is in any sense open to the reproach that it provides for a more promiscuous scattering of ballots than takes place under the Dominion Elections Act. Indeed, I think that neither under the Dominion Elections Act nor under this Bill can it be said that there is or will be any promiscuous distribution of ballots. The soldier does not get a ballot until he takes the affidavit. While I am willing to give credit to other hon. gentlemen for a number of suggestions which they have made, I must say that that particular improvement is the result of my own consideration of how it might work if you handed the ballot out otherwise than to the man who is going to vote. When he gets the ballot, he does not go away with it; he then and there marks his ballot and returns it. The provision is that the officer must be in such a position that he can see that the voter marks the ballot which he receives, and returns it; so that I think we have done what is humanly possible to be done in that regard. As I say, I am quite willing to consider further whether we can so arrange that it may be possible to provide people who shall have authority to be present, wherever it is practicable for them to be present, to keep an eye on the carrying out of these provisions.

Mr. MURPHY: My hon. friend will know, from his experience as the able and courteous chairman of the committee which drafted this Bill, how much faster progress can be made when discussing matters informally in committee than can possibly be made in a committee such as this, even taking it for granted that there is a general desire to make headway. In connection with the observations which my hon. friend has just made, this distinction should be pointed out: for any irregularity which may be committed in Canada, a remedy is provided by law, but for any irregularity which may be committed elsewhere, there is no remedy. Irregularities, I believe, occur through ignorance or carelessness just as frequently, possibly, as they do through deliberate intent. Did I understand my hon. friend to say that all the ballots, before being sent away, should bear the stamp of the Clerk of the Crown in Chancery?

Mr. DOHERTY: Inasmuch as the Bill which we are now passing is to be read as one with the Dominion Elections Act, such provisions as now exist with regard to what shall be stamped on the ballots will apply to the operation of this proposed legislation. I take it, therefore, that the ballot mentioned in this Bill is the ballot described in the Dominion Elections Act. As to the suggestion that this could be better dealt with in a small committee, I have already said that I think subsection 4 ought to stand to be dealt with by the sub-committee. If that meets with the view of the committee, I suggest that subsection 4 be allowed to stand for that purpose, and that we proceed to the consideration of other clauses which will not, I think, not give rise to any questions necessitating such action.

Mr. H. H. McLEAN: I think that the suggestion that a small committee be appointed is a good one. I think the suggestion made by the Minister of Justice should be acted upon, namely, that the opinions of hon. gentlemen be taken down so that the committee will have the benefit of their views with regard to these different sections. I understood the Minister of Justice to say that section 4 only should be referred to a committee.

Mr. DOHERTY: That is as far as we have gone. If there are any suggestions with regard to matters contained in previous sections, I should be glad to hear them.

Mr. McLEAN: I think that in sections 2 and 3 there are some matters that may require consideration by such a committee. We have arrived at the position where both parties are practically united on the principle of this Bill; both parties are united in their support of giving the soldiers an opportunity to vote. We now come to consider the method by which that shall be done, and it seems to me that the machinery whereby the soldiers will be given an opportunity to vote should be made as direct and as simple as possible. Surely it ought not to be difficult to give these men an opportunity to register their votes before proper officers. We cannot apply to their voting the whole election machinery used in civil life, but we can rely on the assumption that officers commanding these regiments, companies and units will honestly carry out the duties imposed upon them. Officers who are in command of a certain number of men and who have other officers under them, realizing the necessity of their possessing the respect and confidence of the men over whom they have control, would surely do nothing which would cause the men to lose that confidence in them. It seems to me to be proper that the ballots should be given to the chief paymaster, because he has direct communication with every officer and with all men in the expeditionary force. I think it is advisable that a change be made in the section whereby it will be provided that the officer taking the ballots shall make a list of the men who have voted, such list to be returned in the envelope with the ballots. It would be very easy for the officer, as the soldier votes, to put down his name and the number opposite his name, and to put that number on the envelope containing the soldier's affidavit. The ballot, of course, will be in a separate envelope. I would point out also that this section says that the ballots shall be delivered by the paymaster to the officers commanding squadrons, companies, and batteries, who shall deliver them to the soldiers under their command. Sometimes, in the absence of the commanding officer, the next senior officer takes command, and I suggest that in order to cover this point, it might be provided that the ballot be delivered by the paymaster to the officer commanding, or, in his absence, to the senior officer in charge.

Mr. DOHERTY: I think it is section 3 that provides that, if for any reason the officer charged with such duty is unable to perform it, it shall be performed by the officer next below him in rank.

Mr. McLEAN: I had not noticed that. I see that it is provided that the paymasters shall deliver the ballot papers to the officers commanding squadrons, companies and batteries. Now, the medical officers are neither a battery, a company nor a squadron; and to cover them I think we ought to insert the words "and units" after "companies and batteries." If we provided that the ballots should be distributed also by the officers commanding medical units, we should cover the men in our hospitals, which are in charge of officers with the honorary rank of colonel. I think we ought to make the officers commanding absolutely responsible for having these ballots sent forward, marked and collected.

At one o'clock, the committee took recess.

The committee resumed at three o'clock.

Mr. H. H. McLEAN: There are one or two more suggestions that I would like to call to the attention of the hon. Minister of Justice. Looking over paragraph 3 of section 2 I find there is a very good provision made in regard to the channel that may be used in forwarding the ballots. It is provided that the paymasters' department shall distribute the ballots. It seems to me that the same channel should be used in collecting the ballots from the officers commanding the different units in different places so that there will be no delay in having these packages collected and returned. Another point is that there ought to be a limit to the time at which the polling is to take place. Before recess I pointed out that an officer commanding a company might have 220 men under him, that an officer commanding a battery might have 240 men under him, that these officers are therefore very busy men, especially when on active service and very important duties devolve upon them. It is quite right that the ballots should be sent to the commanding officer but he should have authority to authorize or employ other officers under him to carry out the duties prescribed in the Act. There are always one or two officers in the orderly room who might be available for doing this particular work and he might appoint the assistant adjutant, or some other officer under his command, to carry out these duties. It is going to take a long time to receive 220 affidavits and it is imposible for the commanding officer to do it himself. It should be provided that in the event of the officer commanding not being able to act himself the next senior should act. It would be better to authorize the commanding officer to appoint some other officer to carry out this duty if necessary. In the ordinary way, when an officer commanding is required to do so and so it does not mean that he himself, personally, does it. I have no doubt that in this discussion efforts are being made by hon. members to make the Bill perfect, and I think we should be able to provide machinery direct and simple in character to carry out the wishes of the House. In regard to the suggestion made by my hon. friend from St. John (Mr. Pugsley), that it might be advisable to have a commission of two, one representing the Government and one representing the Opposition, I would not go so far as my hon. friend because I would not like this commission to interfere with the disposition of the ballots through the channel which has been decided upon, that of the paymaster. I could see the advisability of having a commission whose duty it is to see that the work is carried out properly, that is to have general supervision over it. Explanations and information might be required by the officers charged with this duty, and it would be necessary for them to write to some one. Whom would they write to? If they were a little slow in taking in their instructions they would not know whom to apply to. A commissioner on the spot could give all the necessary directions.

Mr. DOHERTY: The suggestions made by my hon. friend are worthy of very careful consideration. I understand that the hon. member first points out that if we distribute these ballots to the officers commanding squadrons, companies and batteries, that might leave unprovided for some other bodies that would not come within the description. Of course we want to cover everybody as far as we possibly can do it. I have had some consultation with my hon. friend the Minister of Militia and Defence as to what might be added to meet that desire and he thinks we would reach everybody if we added to the words "squadrons, companies and batteries," the words, "or of any line of communication or administrative unit." I understand that would cover hospitals and men engaged otherwise. I also understand that the word "unit" might extend to a much larger body of men than a company or squadron. What we had in mind was to endeavour to reach the officer who would have a reasonable number of people under his command. If that addition would meet the view of my hon. friend I would be quite happy to amend the Bill to that extent. As to the officer keeping a list, no doubt it would make the matter more perfect, but I think we ought to bear in mind the conditions that will exist when this vote is being taken and we have to be a little on our guard not to impose so many detailed operations on the officer as to make it impossible for him to carry out the directions. The advantages of a list no doubt are considerable, but on the other hand when all the votes of the company are to be deposited in a bag or other receptacle and forwarded, bearing on the outside the affidavit of the man who gives the vote, it will be a very simple procedure. We have provided that these envelopes shall be returned to the Clerk of the Crown in Chancery and he has to keep a record of them. Whether there would be sufficient gained from that list to compensate for the additional duty imposed on the officer appears to me to be perhaps open to question.

As to the return of the ballots through the same channel as that through which they are sent, a good deal of consideration has been given to that idea. The consideration that led us to the conclusion that it would be better that they should be posted direct after the voting by the officer who took them was that it is objectionable that the ballots should pass through too many hands, and whatever force there might be in the objection when you are dealing with an unmarked ballot becomes greater when you are dealing with a ballot that has been actually marked. It seemed to us that it would be wiser that the ballots should pass as directly as possible from the officer who took the vote to the Clerk of the Crown in Chancery. Ultimately they will have to get into the post office, and it did seem to us that the earlier they got into the post office the better. In reference to what the hon. member has said as to the officers commanding these companies, squadrons and batteries, appointing others to do the work, you see there again that you are increasing the number of people who are going to handle these ballots. After all, at home we give to one deputy returning officer complete control of the voting of between 200 and 300 voters, and all the operations, as far as possible, have to take place between eight in the morning and five in the afternoon.

On the other hand, under the system provided, the votes may be taken at the time that is most convenient, and the Bill does not propose, nor do I think it desirable or possible, to fix that this shall be done on a particular day or at a particular time. It ought to be reasonably possible for the officers to take the vote of those who desire to vote. I have with my colleagues given the best consideration possible to the suggestion of the hon. member for St. John and my view is confirmed that an endeavour to create machinery such as he suggested would in all probability, result in making the plan unworkable. I feel impelled to say that I do not find it possible to accept that suggestion. If something in the nature of what I endeavoured to outline, namely, the making of it possible for scrutineers to be authorized to be present, I would be disposed to acquiesce in the wisdom of letting that be considered by a small committee, such as has been suggested.

Mr. GERMAN: Suppose a number of these ballots have been marked and received in due course by the returning officer, and it is evident that those who have made affidavits are not on the voters' list for a particular district, nor were they residents of that locality at the time they enlisted, will these votes be counted, and would the defeated candidate have to resort to a protest and recount in order to strike them out?

Mr. DOHERTY: I take it that such ballots would be in the same position as any other ballots that have been cast at an election, and I do not see that we can make a provision whereby the returning officer could adjudge whether the affidavits upon which these men had been allowed to vote were true or false. An analogous situation would arise if at the counting of the ballots in an ordinary election it were established that fifty men had voted who were not qualified. In an election held at home there would be no right in the returning officer to strike these names off, and I do not see that we could provide here for a system under which with regard to the absent soldier a trial could be had then and there and a determination reached as to whether he told the truth in the affidavit he made. After all, what would occur in this case is what would occur in an ordinary election held at home.

Mr. GERMAN: In the ordinary case, a man's name is on the list or he could not vote; but I venture to say that there will not be 20,000 men, out of the 100,000 men on active service, whose names will be on any voters' list. You can have the man in Canada arrested for perjury at once, but under the provisions of this Bill a man may make any affidavit he likes and he is immune of the law.

Mr. W. H. BENNETT: These men enlisted in September or October, and at that time the courts were proceeding to revise the lists for 1914. I can well recollect that at many places the objection was raised that the men were not there at the time, and the judge very properly said that the men were at home when the application was made and that the fact that they went to Valcartier only temporarily disarranged their residence, so that he allowed their names on the list. The hon. gentleman is very wide of the mark when he says that not 20,000 out of the 100,000 soldiers would be found on the lists of last year.

Mr. OLIVER: I want to protest against the statement of the minister that there was some suggestion on our side that the commanding officer at Bermuda was not a person to be trusted. That is not the question before us. The question is: Is he the proper person to be charged with this responsibility? In the following section, my hon. friend, in dealing with the votes in other parts of the world, says that he is not the proper person, and I see no reason why the commanding officer at Bermuda should have a responsibility laid upon him that is not to be laid upon commanding officers elsewhere. My hon. friend says that the chief paymaster cannot be as conveniently employed for Bermuda as he can for the European situation. It is not necessary that the chief paymaster shall be employed; there is a paymaster for the forces at Bermuda, I presume, and if my hon. friend will make the paymaster at Bermuda the recipient of the ballots, he will have the section in that particular on all fours with the other proviso.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: I do not see that it makes the slightest difference, if there is a regimental paymaster at Bermuda, whether the ballot goes to the commanding officer or to the paymaster. So far as we are concerned, the matter is not worth while discussing.

Mr. OLIVER: Let me disagree, then, with the right hon. the Prime Minister, because I think the matter is worth while discussing.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: I said, "So far as we are concerned." I was not speaking for the hon. member.

Mr. DOHERTY: If my hon. friend wants to be quite certain that at all times there will be a paymaster at Bermuda, I can, of course, delay the Bill in order to ascertain this point. The hon. gentleman seems to think that it is important whether the commanding officer or the paymaster receives the ballots. If that is the case, I will try to find out whether or not there is a paymaster at Bermuda; but there will always be a commanding officer—that is the one advantage that we have. I am not in a position to say with any certainty that there will always be a paymaster actually available. The commanding officer is a general term; no matter if the man who generally commands is absent, there will always be a man commanding, and we have a certainty that we shall have an official person who will always be available.

That is the only reason for the difference. In the other case, the reason why we fell upon the paymaster was that by taking the general paymaster for the entire force, we got a man who had a regular system of communication with the entire expeditionary force. It was not because he happened to be paymaster that he seemed to be desirable; it was simply because he was the man who had the entire organization ready to carry out the work. This argument would not apply to the paymaster at Bermuda who would be purely a regimental paymaster, just like any other officer of the regiment.

Mr. OLIVER: There were reasons put forward by the hon. member for Sunbury and Queens (Mr. H. H. McLean) why the commanding officer should not be used. These reasons apply just as much to the men in Bermuda as they do to any other place, and I am only suggesting that the section be amended to make the terms correspond in effect with the like provisions elsewhere in the Legislation. As to whether the matter is important or not, it has been suggested that there are less than 1,000 men in Bermuda, and if those 1,000 men are entitled to vote in the province of Nova Scotia, I do not think I need impress upon the House that those are enough votes, if properly directed, to change the electoral complexion of that province. I have seen tremendous issues decided by a less number of votes than that; I have seen elections carried by the vote of the deputy returning officer, and important issues resulting from that condition. It is not for this House to consider lightly the question whether votes shall be properly counted or not; for be it remembered that this is not a question of the right of the men to cast their votes—no one disputes their right—but whether those votes are going to be cast under proper conditions and with the guarantee that, having been cast under proper conditions, they shall be properly counted. It is desirable that the individual citizen shall have the right to vote whether he is a soldier or not, but it is essential to the welfare of the state that the result of the voting shall be the fair expression of the mind of the people according to the well-understood and well-defined rules laid down and worked upon before and during the election. The proposal of this Bill is that a certain separate condition shall be established that there shall be votes cast under different conditions from those under which the rest of the votes shall be cast. A new feature is projected into our elections, and the minister says: You must not accuse us of improper motives in connection with the projection of this new system of voting and of counting votes. We have to take things as we find them and if it is possible to switch the whole of the elections in Canada by the manipulation of the votes cast by the men overseas,—and I maintain it is—then I maintain further that this Government has no right nor claim to be released from the suspicion that it has within its ranks the men who will be willing to do that. For the sake of the credit of the Government let us have such provisions in this Bill as shall remove the Government from suspicion. If the minister cannot provide such provisions then he has no right to ask that this Parliament shall place in the hands of himself and his colleagues the power of counting their opponents in or out of office as they please to manipulate those votes.

Mr. DOHERTY: I have said all that I can usefully say with regard to the line of argument in which the hon. member sees proper to persist. Therefore I trust he will not think me discourteous if I do not say anything further.

Mr. MACDONALD: In regard to the taking of the votes at Bermuda, I hope the Government will see its way clear to have a committee appointed to look into the matter of carrying out the details of this Bill along the line of the suggestion made by my hon. friend from St. John (Mr. Pugsley). The sole question is as to the best machinery by which those votes can be polled, and it is a matter which can be very much better settled, in the light of all the discussion we have had, by a small number of members than by the Committee of the Whole. Bermuda is a West Indian island, a British possession, in fairly close proximity to Canada, and a great many people speak about the desirability of having it in Canada. Almost all the votes that will be polled by the Canadian regiment at Bermuda will be polled in the constituency of Halifax, which my right hon. friend the Prime Minister represents. I see no reason why, as Bermuda is within two days' sail of Canada and there are absolutely peace conditions there, there should not be a method of voting provided for Bermuda in all respects the same as the method used in Canada. This regiment in Bermuda, although it is for the time being doing imperial service, is the Royal Canadian Regiment, under Canadian control to a degree different from what it would be if it were in Great Britain or in the fighting line. Now, the casting of a vote in the method proposed under clause 2 is an abnormal method which is being improvised by the Government to meet difficulties that arise in the life of the soldiers on active service. These conditions do not apply in Bermuda. Many of these men have voted in Halifax in previous elections, and they are accustomed to vote; and it does seem to me there is no reason why the Government should not appoint a returning officer to go to Bermuda and poll the votes of these men after the manner provided for other soldiers in the later portions of the Bill. I can see reason for providing unusual and peculiar facilities for the men on the firing line; but the same conditions do not apply in Bermuda. It is true that Bermuda is under another jurisdiction, but there would be no objection to a Canadian returning officer and scrutineers going to Bermuda, an adjacent and friendly colony, and performing their duties in regard to the votes of men comprising a purely Canadian regiment.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: I think the hon. gentleman is mistaken as to the personnel of these men in Bermuda. This regiment is recruited in part from the permanent force in Halifax, but it is also recruited, in considerable part, if I am not mistaken, from Valcartier camp.

Mr. LANCASTER: Several there are from Ontario.

Mr. MACDONALD: That does not affect the principle.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: It would interfere to this extent: If you undertook to establish polls you would have to establish the polls for many different constituencies. I think about 400 of these men are from a force assembled at Valcartier and gathered from all over the Dominion. Therefore the conditions do not seem to be such as to make it practicable for the vote to be taken in the ordinary way.

Mr. MACDONALD: The answer of my right hon. friend does not furnish any reason why my suggestion should not be carried out under clause 5 of the Bill. If the men in Bermuda were in large degree recruited from Valcartier, the regiment would still be in the same position as one mobilized anywhere in Canada. There is no reason why the system applied to volunteers here in Canada should not be worked in the case of volunteers in Bermuda.

Mr. DOHERTY: It might possibly be worked out in Bermuda, but it does involve some anomalies arising out of our issuing a writ to an officer to go beyond the limits of Canada to perform the duties of a returning officer. We should have no more authority over his proceedings outside of Canada than we have over those of these other officers concerned. If it be true—I do not discuss it—that we cannot punish the people for offences committed in France, we cannot deal more effectually with those who have committed offences in Bermuda. When we came to the actual making of distnctions under this Bill, we found a natural line of difference running between that class of soldiers who are within Canada and that class of soldiers who are outside of Canada. That indicates one system for one class and a different system for the other. Those in Bermuda may be under different conditions from those in other places outside of Canada in relation to this Bill, but they are more like the soldiers outside of Canada than like the soldiers inside Canada. It is to be remembered that all our soldiers outside of Canada are not, and will not be at the time of an election should one be held, in the field of active hostilities. We have soldiers in England for long periods at a time, and it may happen that many will be in England at the time of an election, should one take place. If this system can be adopted for soldiers generally outside of Canada, I fail to see what advantage there would be in distinguishing between those who happen to be in Bermuda or in England and those who happen to be in countries nearer to or actually within the scene of war. We must draw the line somewhere, and it seems to me we have drawn it at the proper place. Further than that, the practical difficulties of carrying out Canadian law in Bermuda with regard to the prepartion of ballots and so on, it seems to me, would be considerable, and we might get ourselves into complications that would be hardly desirable and run risks otherwise unnecessary for the sake of making a separate arrangement with regard to one regiment of soldiers amongst all those outside of Canada.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: Another consideration I mentioned a moment ago. The regiment at Bermuda is anxious to go to the front, and may go to the front. It is not improbable that they may be sent before an election is held, if it should be held. Therefore, we might have a force in Bermuda made up of men gathered from all over Canada, in which case the observations of my hon friend from Pictou would not apply.

Mr. PUGSLEY: The Bill provides that the ballots shall be separate from the affidavits. I think it is worthy of considera tion whether the affidavit and the ballot should not form one document—one paper. Let the ballot paper be quite large, and the blank form of affidavit be printed on the back. In that way we should be sure that the ballot paper marked by the voter himself was the one accompanying the affidavit.

Mr. DOHERTY: Then, how are you going to preserve the secrecy of the ballot if we act on the hon. gentleman's suggestion, the man's name will appear in the affidavit on the back of the ballot?

Mr. PUSGLEY: My hon. friend knows that a distinct law, different entirely from the law that governs the taking of the vote in Canada is being provided. It is very important I think that there should be no switching of the ballot, no separation of the ballot from the affidavit of the man who has marked the ballot. The hon. gentleman has stated that we must trust those who have charge of the ballots. I am inclined to think that the commanding officers will not like to be bothered very much in connection with the taking of these votes, and that they will be very glad to avail themselves of the services of any Canadian commissioned officers who may be present to assist in the taking of this vote. If you have the ballot entirely apart from the affidavit, there is nothing in the world to prevent anybody who may be so minded from marking a ballot in a different way from that in which the soldier marked his, and substituting it for the one which the soldier actually marked. It does seem to me that we ought to provide a safeguard against that. If we are going to give the soldiers the right to vote in this peculiar way, we want to be assured, not merely that the soldier shall make an affidavit and mark his ballot, but that the ballot which he does mark will eventually find its way into the box of the returning officer. My hon. friend says that it is our duty to allow those who have gone to the front the right to exercise their franchise. But we owe a duty also to the people of this country, and it is that the expression of their will, as shown by the ballots which they cast, shall not be defeated by the use of ballots which were not marked by the soldiers. These fraudulent ballots, although not marked by the soldiers, will be counted when they reach the box of the returning officer. If you provide that the affidavit shall be on the back of the ballot, you add another safeguard against the switching of ballots and the substitution of fraudulent ballots for genuine ones. It does seem to me that that would be a proper provision to make. My hon. friend says that we ought not to be suspicious, because if men are honest they will not do the thing which we suspect may possibly be done. We do know, however, from our past experience in connection with elections in Canada, that men who in their ordinary business relations are regarded as men of honour and integrity, do things in connection with the carrying on of elections which they would not do in connection with their own business. There are many Canadian politicians at the front, and officers will be just as good politicians at the front as they were at home. I venture to say that there have been no more active partisans in Canada than very many of the officers who are now serving in the Canadian expeditionary force. They are none the worse for that, but we should remove as far as possible any opportunities for wrong-doing in connection with the marking of the ballots. By this section it is provided that the soldier makes the affidavit and puts his ballot in an envelope, on the back of which the affidavit is endorced. He hands that to the officer; the officer then takes charge of it, and the moment the soldier puts his ballot in the envelope and hands it to the officer, any control which he had over it is gone, and there is nothing to prevent the marking another ballot in a different way from that in which the soldier marked his, and the substitution of it for the ballot so bona fide marked by the soldier. I suggest to my hon. friend that the possibility of that condition arising ought not to be permitted. I regret very much that the minister has not seen fit to accept the suggestion for the appointment of an independent and non-partisan commission to take charge of the whole operation of the voting of the soldiers, and to make regulations which might be found necessary from time to time. These regulations would only become operative when approved by the Governor in Council. I feel quite sure that if that method were adopted it would prove satisfactory, and that the people would be assured that the ballots counted represented the true expression of the opinion of our boys at the front. The amendment which I suggested provided that one commissioner should be appointed upon the nomination of the Prime Minister, the other upon the nomination of the leader of the Opposition. The Governor in Council would act upon those nominations, and if either of these gentlemen should decline to nominate, the Governor in Council might make the appointments. In order to prevent any difficulty that might arise by reason of differences of opinion, my amendment suggested that the persons named should nominate a third commissioner, and that if they should not agree upon a third commissioner within the short period of ten days, that third commissioner should be appointed by the chief justice of the Supreme Court of Canada. I do not know whether or not I suggested it in my amendment, but I would have them sworn properly to discharge their duties, so that we would have an independent, sworn tribunal to make regulations, subject to the approval of the Governor in Council. They could appoint their deputies, scrutineers and assistants, and I believe that the scheme would be worked out in a satisfactory manner, and would result in all persons who desired to vote and who were entitled to do so being given a fair and reasonable opportunity to cast their ballots. The minister makes the suggestion that in some way this would seem like intruding officials into the military system of the Empire. Surely that would be no greater intrusion than the passing of an act which makes it the duty of the commanding officer to take charge of and distribute these ballots to the voters; to take the affidavits of the voters; to see that the ballots are marked and put into envelopes and that the envelopes are then sent in a package to the Clerk of the Crown in Chancery. If one is open to that objection, the other is open to the same objection. It seems to me, therefore, that the argument which my hon. friend makes against the commission on that ground is untenable. But there is another amendment which I think might very well be adopted in connection either with the mode of procedure suggested by my amendment, or with the method suggested by the Bill. and that is, that before taking proceedings under the Statute the consent of the Secretary for War should be obtained. I think that as a matter of courtesy and to ensure the harmonious working out of the details of the Bill that would be a most desirable provision to insert. I can see no possible objection to such a provision, and I think it would be much better to do that than for this Parliament to impose certain duties upon British or Canadian officers, whoever it may be—and now they are all members of the British Army, and under control of the British War Office. The Secretary for War would then know that in the opinion of this Parliament it was considered desirable to give the Canadians who are fighting at the front the opportunity of exercising their franchise, but that at the same time this Parliament recognized that these soldiers and officers were all now a part of the British Army and under the control of the British War Office, and that before taking proceedings which might by any possibility interfere with the morale or the discipline of the army the Bill should be submitted to him, and his approval obtained. So far as the Secretary for War is concerned, that would remove every possible objection against the procedure which is provided for in the Bill, or against that which is proposed in my amendment. I am sure that upon consideration the Minister of Justice will consider it desirable to make an amendment of that kind, whether he adopts the provision contained in my proposed amendment or not.

Just one word as to the certificates. I see that my hon. friend has left certificate C in the same form in which it was when the Bill was before us on a previous occasion. I suppose that is because he is providing that the affidavit shall be on the back of the envelope, by which the Clerk of the Crown in Chancery will be able to tell to what electoral district the voter is alleged to belong. But that eliminates altogether any inquiry by the person making the affidavit as to whether the man is really a resident and entitled to vote as he alleges. The only thing the officer has to certify to is the name of the man, and the rank and name of the corps in which he is serving. He is not compelled to make an inquiry—

Mr. DOHERTY: Has the hon. gentleman read the whole affidavit?

Mr. PUGSLEY: I am not sure that I have. By reason of the kaleidoscopic changes that have been made in the Bill from time to time, almost from 4 p.m. hour to hour, it is impossible for one to be absolutely sure that he has read every line of it. To what does my hon. friend refer?

Mr. DOHERTY: Certificate C provides that the officer shall certify that "according to the best information at my disposal I believe that the statements made in the affidavits are true;" and one of the statements in the affidavit is the statement as to the man's place of residence and his qualifications. The objection taken the other day was that the affidavit was not put on the back of the envelope, and I was quite willing to recognize the force of that. This certificate has not been changed in the kaleidoscopic changes that have taken place in this Bill, as the hon. member says. This is just as it was. It is simply completed by the fact that the affidavit is on the outside. As to the changes that have been made in the Bill, they have been made because, as I said at the outset, I wanted to avail myself of every suggestion that it was possible to meet; and it does not strike me as the most courteous way of recognizing one's efforts in that direction to have these more or less sneering references to the fact that this Bill has been changed, especially as it has been changed only by virtue of an earnest desire to meet every suggestion that could from any point of view be looked upon as reasonable.

Mr. PUGSLEY: I do not think I was sneering at the efforts of my hon. friend. I was simply stating facts. By the changes he has made my hon. friend admits that the Bill when first brought down was very objectionable indeed. My hon. friend yesterday afternoon had a Bill distributed which contained certain changes. I looked that over. Then this morning another printed Bill was distributed, eliminating the changes that had been made in the previous printed Bill.

Mr. DOHERTY: One change.

Mr. PUGSLEY: And a most important one. Therefore, I think I am fairly correct in describing as kaleidoscopic the many changes that have taken place in so short a time.

Mr. DOHERTY: I accept the explanation.

Mr. PUGSLEY: My hon. friend claims great credit for showing a sincere desire to meet our views. Is it not rather that he is showing a desire to get a perfect Bill? Certainly he should not be willing to have a bad Bill simply for fear he might meet our views. All that we are trying to do is to make suggestions for remedying the striking defects in the Bill as originally presented to the House. Some of us believe that the whole thing is wrong. But I believe that the majority of us on this side of the House, probably all of us, would like to see the Bill go through if it were possible to give the soldiers votes in any reasonable manner. Speaking for myself, I am anxious to have the Bill go through provided the proper safeguards can be thrown around the voting; but we should remember that it is proposed to give votes to men whose only qualification is that they shall have resided thirty days in this country. In the case of ordinary elections most of the provinces require the voter to have resided in this country for a period of at least twelve months. We should be careful to see that the expressed will of the people of Canada who are compelled to vote under the present law, and subject to all the safeguards which surround the voting, is not defeated by bogus ballots which may be put in, or by ballots marked by people at the front who have no right to vote. Unless proper safeguards are provided, the ballots which come back may not be the genuine ballots of the soldiers who marked them, and consequently would not express the real view of the soldiers at the front.

I think my hon. friend has met my objection as to the form of the certificate; although it does seem to me that to make that certificate of any value it ought to be expressly provided in the statute that it shall be the duty of the person taking the affidavit to make inquiry and satisfy himself that the statements contained in the affidavit are true. But the statute seems to be entirely silent as to that, and considering all that the officers at the front are required to do, one can very well understand that they might easily sign the certificate without realizing that they were expected to satisfy themselves as to the truth or otherwise of the statements made in the affidavit.

Mr. NESBITT: The minister stated that a soldier had to ask for the ballot. I find in line 7 of para. 2 of sec. 2 that the commanding officer —shall provide with a ballot paper and envelope each volunteer under respective commands entitled to vote and who makes the affidavit in form B before such officer.

There is nothing in that to say that the soldier shall have to ask for a ballot to entitle him to vote. I confess that after listening to this debate for a day or two I cannot see what objection the Government would have to the suggestion of my hon. friend from St. John (Mr. Pugsley). All we ask is that this vote be absolutely fair as between the two parties. I see no reason why the Government should refuse to make it fair. It struck me that if there were two commissioners appointed, who might have these officers as their subs, or whatever you might call them, and whose duty it would be to see that the vote was properly and systematically carried out, it would be possible to take a fair vote. One of these commissioners could be appointed by each party, and that would do away with the ill-feeling and protests that are bound to arise under this Bill. It is all right to talk about the officers being perfectly honest. It is all right to say that to-day, but if to-morrow it does not suit my hon. friends opposite they will say the opposite.

Mr. W. H. BENNETT: What do you say?

Mr. NESBITT: As far as I am concerned, the officers are reasonably honest, just the same as the rest of us, but no more so and no less so. When it comes to election time we know that there are a great many people who, while they will not do business in a dishonest way, will at least smile and pass along something that they call smart at election time. I believe that things should be done in elections just as they are in business—absolutely straight, no matter where it is or when it is. In this case the minister thinks we are a little suspicious on this side of the House I am not naturally suspicious, but I confess that I do not like to have voting done for me under the direct control of a strong partisan, even if he is an officer, on the opposite side of politics. I have no doubt that my hon. friends on the other side of the House will make the same objection exactly to a strong partisan who might be on my side of politics. It will work both ways. Why refuse to put the Bill in as good a shape as possible by providing for the appointment of two or three men whose business it will be, if you are going to worry the soldiers about voting, to see that this voting is properly done. That applies more especially, in my judgment to the Bermuda soldiers. The Bermuda soldiers are no more on active service than the soldiers in Ontario. They are simply garrison soldiers and there is no difficulty in sending a commissioner there to see that the voting is properly carried out. There is nothing I can possibly see to hinder that being done in reference to the Bermuda soldiers; nor is there any difficulty in reference to the soldiers at the front. If the War Office will allow you to have these men vote at all they will allow you to send commissioners there to see that the vote is properly taken. They may not allow it at all. I do not know anything about the rules of the War Office. It seems to me ridiculous for you to ask men, who are over there fighting for the Empire, to bother their heads about voting. That is the last thing I would dream of if I were in their places. But if you are bound to have it done why not have it properly systematized and looked after in order that it may be fair to all parties? The soldier would be the last man to suggest that he should be allowed to vote in such a way that when the votes come back to this country there will be nothing but protests and lawsuits over the voting and that is what this Bill means if it is allowed to go through in its present form. Why not accept the suggestion of the hon. member for St. John? It is a perfectly reasonable suggestion. There may be suspicions on the other side of the House as to my hon. friend's suggestion but I do not see in what way they are justified. We are asking for no party advantage whereas the Bill gives my hon. friends opposite a very great party advantage. Personally, I see no reason why the men in Canada should not be allowed to go back to their homes to vote if they are within a reasonable distance. The minister has arranged—and I think it is very much better than it was before—that the voting shall be carried out under proper supervision at the places where these men are at present drilling. In Ontario the distance is not so far and the expense of carriage is not so great that the men should not be permitted to go to their respective homes to vote. With reference to men from the West, the voting can be done as the minister proposes in the Bill. Why not adopt, for those in Bermuda and in Europe the suggestion of my hon. friend from St. John and also why not adopt what my hon. friend suggested this morning—that there should be a small committee of three from the other side of the House and two from our side to put this Bill into such a shape that we can all agree upon it and let us get it passed if we are going to pass it. The minister says that we should go over the Bill and pick out the clauses that we disagree about, and that a small committee can be appointed to consider them. That only wastes time, because the basis of the Bill is the whole thing, and the basis is as to how these men are going to be allowed to vote both in Europe and here. Once that is arrived at the other clauses would not cause much trouble to the House. If my hon. friend the Minister of Justice is in earnest in desiring to go on with the Bill why does he not accept the proposition of my hon. friend from St. John and offer to have a commission appointed that will arrange the details and see that the vote is carried out properly and, in the meantime, appoint a small committee of the House to get the thing worked down to the best form and all agree on it?

Mr. DOHERTY: In regard to the last observation of my hon. friend from North Oxford (Mr. Nesbitt), I have endeavoured to explain the reasons why I do not think the suggestion of the hon. member for St. John is acceptable or feasible. They may or may not carry conviction to the mind of the hon. gentleman, but, of course, they will be no stronger if I repeat them. In regard to his reference to a small committee, I have intimated my willingness, not to refer to a small committee that suggestion, but that the matter be referred to a small committee if something on the line of the plan which I endeavoured to outline this morning be acceptable. I understood from the response of the hon. member for St. John that it was not acceptable; so I do not quite see what is to be gained by going to a committee with a suggestion, which, from our point of view, is not acceptable, and when the principle which I would be disposed to carry out is not acceptable from the point of view of the hon. member for St. John.

Mr. MACDONALD: Is clause 4, which provides for the appointment of scrutineers, to be considered as part of the Bill we are now considering?

Mr. DOHERTY: That clause was drafted for the purpose of submitting it to the leader of the Opposition, with a view of seeing how far it carried out what I understood to be a suggestion made by him, and contrary to what I contemplated it was included in the reprinted Bill. As an alternative to that clause, the suggestion of the hon. member for St. John (Mr. Pugsley) was put forward, and for reasons that seemed to me and to my colleagues to be sufficient we did not feel that we could accept that suggestion. On the other hand the suggestion I outlined this morning which was in some respects in line with that clause, does not appear to be acceptable to my hon. friend (Mr. Pugsley) and to other hon. gentlemen opposite, and, therefore, it does not seem useful that we should appoint a small committee to consider two suggestions in regard to each of which part of the committee would go in, having arrived at a conclusion that it would not accept the suggestion of the other part.

Mr. MACDONALD: Is the minister open to consider a proposal by which a clause should be inserted in the Bill which would guarantee supervision of the voting in some way by representatives of both political parties?

Mr. DOHERTY: If there is any reason to suppose that would be satisfactory, I would be very glad to consider it. It might be possible that there should be appointed two commissioners, one representing each political party, who would have the power of scrutineers, with the further power of delegating this power to such persons as they might select, and that the persons so selected should be entitled to be present at any voting and to perform the duties that might be performed by the representative of a candidate if the vote were taken at home. Of course, there would have to be a provision that the absence of these scrutineers would not nullify the proceedings; it would be for the parties to use their own diligence to provide scrutineers.

Mr. MACDONALD: Provided sufficient notice were given?

Mr. DOHERTY: It would be the business of these commissioners to keep themselves informed. I do not think it would be possible to impose on the officers who might be called on to take the vote the obligation to notify the scrutineer every time.

Mr. MARCIL: A day might be fixed for the taking of the vote.

Mr. DOHERTY: I would consider that absolutely impracticable.

Mr. GERMAN: How could you have the scrutineer present?

Mr. DOHERTY: I am not asking to have the scrutineers, but I think there might be some advantage in providing scrutineers, and if that would meet the view of hon. gentlemen opposite in any degree, I would be glad to accept it. If it is considered not desirable to have anything at all because you cannot get as perfect a system of scrutineers as you could get in Canada at an election, then I cannot conceive of a system which would be as perfect as the system we have here.

Mr. NESBITT: Why not let the commissioneers take the vote?

Mr. DOHERTY: We may have 50,000 men—

Mr. NESBITT: You will not vote them all one day.

Mr. DOHERTY: I have given my reasons why I do not think it possible that the commissioners could take the vote, and I do not see the usefulness of my discussing that matter over and over again. When you get into the position when an officer commanding 250 men or thereabouts is in the position of a returning officer, and you afford to the representatives of the party an opportunity to select a scrutineer from among these 250 men, and you provide that these two men would be legally entitled to be present when voting is going on, I think you will have gone as far as you can. It will be for the diligence of these scrutineers and for the good faith and camaraderie which we must count upon to exist among officers and men in the same company, to so arrange matters that so far as convenient it would be possible for these men to be present when the votes are being taken. I am not here to press that upon hon. gentlemen opposite, but it has been suggested that there is lack of supervision under the provisions of this Bill, and if a proposition along these lines would be considered to be an improvement from the point of view of supervision, I would be glad to co-operate in putting it into shape.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Would the minister be willing to provide that it shall be the duties of the officers, in whose presence the ballots are to be marked, to notify as far as possible these commissioners or scrutineers, so that they should have an opportunity of being present? Otherwise it would be simply a farce to apply what was intended to be a safeguard, and then have the voting done and the ballots returned without the scrutineer knowing when the voting took place.

Mr. DOHERTY: My feeling with regard to the officers whom we are asking to do this work is that we are not imposing this work upon them. They need not do it if they do not want to do it, and I quite realize that we cannot force them to do it. Under the circumstances I am not disposed to ask them to do anything more than is necessary because we have to count upon their goodwill in this matter in a very large measure. The very things that make it difficult for the scrutineer to be present at each of the polls make it equally difficult for the officer to give notice. Is it not fairer that the scrutineer, who is the representative of a party, should do the running around in order to find out when it is necessary to be present, than that you should impose upon the officer the obligation of keeping track of the scrutineer to see that he is present? Do we in this country say: Mr. Deputy Returning Officer, if the scrutineer chooses to go out and be absent, you will send for him before you take a vote? In this country the right of a candidate is the simple right to have a representative, although of course he knows when the polls are going to be held, and the candidate, if he chooses, will send the scrutineer to the polling booth and take chances on his diligence and attention. If for instance my scrutineer is taken suddenly ill on the morning of the election, the law does not ask the deputy returning officer to stop until he gets my scrutineer to the polling booth.

Mr. PUGSLEY: The scrutineer knows the day and the hour of the election.

Mr. DOHERTY: Yes, he knows the day and the hour of the election. I do not know how often it is necessary for me to argue that conditions at the front are not going to be identical with conditions in Canada. It is a surprise to me that hon. gentlemen should find it necessary to point out so frequently things that are perfectly obvious, such as that things are going to be different at the front, when we all know that. What I am willing to do, so far as it depends upon me to do it, is to accept any proposal or suggestion for making it possible for the parties at their own diligence to supervise the voting, and it does not seem to me to be so difficult a thing as it seems to be considered by some hon. gentlemen. What strikes me is that after the scrutineer is appointed, hon. gentlemen do not think that he ought to make some diligence. He is there as the representative of a party; he is given full power to watch and go around and see when votes are to be taken and inquire; but hon. gentlemen seem to think that nothing is up to him; but that we must go to the officer, who is acting purely because this law asks him to enable people to vote, and impose on him, because we make scrutineers possible, the necessity of his running after the scrutineers. For my part, in pointing out the sort of suggestion that I am prepared to accept, I think I have gone as far in reason as I can go in the direction of endeavouring to secure fairness, and I do not think it is possible for me to go further without creating a situation where you are going so to embarrass this voting as to make it practically impossible to have the voting carried on.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: I am quite prepared to give my hon. friend credit that he is willing to go as far as he can, but he has given a very severe blow to the Bill. He realizes himself that we have no control and no power over the men who are entrusted with the carrying out of this legislation. In this country we cannot compel a man to become a returning officer or a deputy returning officer; but when a man accepts the position, we can compel him to do what the law says that he shall do. My hon. friend takes the suggestion of my hon. friend from St. John that we should have scrutineers, but he realizes himself that scrutineers will be of no avail and can do no good for the purposes we have in view, if they are not notified as to the day on which the polling is to take place. The minister says: I am powerless; I cannot prescribe any duty to the officer to whom I am entrusting the polling. That shows exactly the weak point in this Bill, and that is why the minister should have accepted the suggestion of my hon. friend from St. John to create a commission with power to take the vote. Here we are putting upon the statute book a Bill which, when it becomes law, simply gives a pious recommendation to the commanding officers that they should do right; but if they do not choose to act, we have no power over them.

Mr. MACDONALD: My hon. friend the minister is making a general proposition, in regard to the voting which is to take place outside of Canada, which is not based on an accurate knowledge of conditions in the places in which the voting is to take place. There is no reason in the world why the men who vote in Bermuda should not vote on a certain stated day under regular conditions, with scrutineers and parties notified, because they are under peace conditions; they are not doing anything in Bermuda except mounting guard, and their votes could be taken without the slightest difficulty.

Mr. NESBITT: The same as in Ontario.

Mr. MACDONALD: Yes, and the same as at Halifax. The same thing applies to the men at Shorncliffe and the other places in England. The men there are drilling; they go through the regular routine of preparation every day, and by proper arrangement all the men in England could vote on one particular date. When you come to the men on the continent, I quite agree with the hon. Minister of Justice that you get into an unknown land, because no one can tell what is going to happen, and our control over the officers who are to take the ballot becomes entirely chimerical. The Minister of Justice, however, having gone so far in stating his position, must recognize the absolute necessity and the fairness of the representations of both parties as to the actual casting of the ballots in Bermuda or in England; otherwise his proposition is of no value at all.

Mr. DOHERTY: I am not making a proposition; my proposition is the Bill as it stands.

Mr. MACDONALD: My hon. friend knows that it is quite apparent to the House that the general proposition which he has submitted to us to enable soldiers in Bermuda or in England to vote in this peculiar way is most anomalous, and that there is no reason why some solution of the problem should not be submitted. My hon. friend is willing to have a discussion on his Bill as a basis, but he does not want to discuss the proposition put forward by the hon. member for St. John (Mr. Pugsley) of having a commission to undertake the carrying out of the vote at the different places. Being desirous of having satisfactory legislation enacted as regards this matter, I would point out in all sincerity that my hon. friend is failing to recognize the conditions existing in Bermuda, which I pointed out when the right hon. the Prime Minister was here, because there is no doubt that in Bermuda you can take the vote just as it is provided in subsection 5 to take the vote of volunteers in Canada. The difficulty and uncertainty to which my hon. friend refers as arising as to the colonel or commanding officer taking the vote, need not arise in Bermuda. Why should not we have scrutineers and other persons to carry on the election properly? And the same in England. If he is candid —and I believe he is—and wishes to find some solution to this problem, why not take the suggestion he himself has made of providing reasonable scrutineering of the votes in these two countries? When you come to dealing with conditions at the front, we are left unguided by military authority. I think the Minister of Militia should have been in the House to discuss this Bill. He has seen active service, and can tell us how far this will be likely to work out properly. I do not know much about military matters, but I think there are many military informalities in this Bill, and that it will not work out. When you cross the Channel you come to an unknown land so far as the affairs under this Bill are concerned. What will or will not take place there, neither the Minister of Justice nor anybody in the Government, nor any one in this House, knows anything, nor can he predicate anything of the conditions there. But, before you cross the Channel, while you are still in England, there is no reason why the vote should not be taken under reasonable scrutineering. As to the hon. gentleman's remarks about this matter as a proper subject of discussion, I think he should be willing to extend the basis of discussion, and not seek to confine us within the narrow limits he has indicated. I am satisfied that he cannot make a reasonable answer to the distinction I draw between these soldiers who are not, and those who are, in the field of active hostilities.

Mr. MARCIL: There is nothing to prevent an election meeting being held in Bermuda and the electors informed—or misinformed—as to the issues involved in the election. They could hear any member of the Cabinet who wished to address them. They are nearer to Ottawa than are the electors of Vancouver. You go from here to New York overnight, and twenty-four hours after that you are in Bermuda. When you get there you find conditions absolutely identical with those under which it is proposed soldiers shall vote in Canada. But the unfortunate part of this whole matter is that the people of Canada have no assurance that the vote will be taken in France and Belgium. The Prime Minister has told us that the War Office is the centre of our whole operations, and of everything being done in consultation with the War Office. But if we had assurance that the vote would be taken in Belgium and France we would have more satisfaction in discussing the Bill. We are discussing a Bill that may never be acted upon, and that, I think, is lowering to the dignity of the Parliament of Canada. When we enact laws we should be in a position to know that they will not become a dead letter but will be respected and carried out. We order the officers in France and Belgium to take this vote. But they are officers of the British army and not under our control; if the rules of the army prevent it, the vote will not be taken. This will not redound to the credit of Parliament and of the people of Canada. This is one very weak point in the Bill. Another is that no assurance is given us that the vote that we receive here will be the vote cast by the soldier. I have no doubt that, taken on the whole, the Canadian boys in the army will cast an honest vote guided by the best information which the circumstances allow them to receive. But we have no assurance that the vote so cast will get here. With these grave objections to the Bill, I think this whole discussion is to be regretted. It is another cause of dissension between the two parties that hitherto have been united on all that is necessary to help the Empire in this crisis. We have voted all the money asked for, and have done everything in our power to strengthen the Government's hands. And now, in the dying hours of the session, when we are about to depart for our homes, we are called upon to enact a law here which may be a dead letter and which bears the suspicion of partisanship and may sow the seeds of partisan dissension in the ranks over there. For all these reasons, I hope the minister will reconsider his decision and will accept the proposal of the leader of the Opposition and the hon. member for St. John city, so that we may have the satisfaction of knowing on the night of the general election should it take place—for the Prime Minister told us a few moments ago that we may or may not have an election during the war—that the vote given by the boys at the front is the free expression of those entitled to vote. By accepting this suggestion, the hon. gentleman will close this chapter in our history with an agreement on both sides of the House, which, I earnestly believe, will be satisfactory to the Canadian people and to the boys who represent us at the front.

Mr. NESBITT: The Minister of Justice seemed to think that I was asking questions that had been answered this morning. I was present this morning, but in my place in the House I do not hear the hon. minister when he is talking in his ordinary tone of voice. I did not hear this matter explained this morning. I desire to make this statement in case he should think that I was trying to badger him.

Mr. McKENZIE: I may possibly be alone on this side, but I desire to express myself as being opposed to this Bill in its entirety. I am already on record in that way. I do not make excuses, but declare myself whole-heartedly opposed to this measure. My first reason for this opposition is that this Bill is for a purpose which cannot be carried out. The minister would have saved himself a great deal of trouble, and would have saved this House and this country a great deal of unnecessary confusion had he said to the zealous partisan, whoever he may be, who proposed this Bill, that the measure could not be allowed to pass. He should have told that partisan that the soldiers of this country have no right to demand or expect any greater rights or privileges than the soldiers of the King in the Mother Country, and that whatever provisions or conditions govern the soldiers of the King in the Mother Country and at the front, the like conditions and provisions should govern the soldiers of the Dominion who cast in their lot with them. Speaking for those who agree with me, I say that we are satisfied with the advancement of the Mother Country so far as civil privileges are concerned. Our most advanced legislation in this country is based on similar legislation in the old land, and when any person advocating this new theory comes to the minister and tells him that the intention is to go further than the old land has gone in such a matter as this, he should say: The officers and soldiers of His Majesty in the old country have no vote while the war is on and they are at the front, and therefore our men should not expect to have votes. One would almost have thought that these considerations would have resulted in the killing of this idea before it got into the shape of a Bill. I can only speak of conditions as they exist in the province from which I come. In Nova Scotia no man may cast a ballot unless his name is duly entered upon the list, after having gone through the regular processes outlined by statute of the local legislature. The franchise is established by the law of the province of Nova Scotia, and that franchise is accepted by the Federal Parliament. This Bill, however, provides an entirely new franchise. It extends the franchise in Nova Scotia beyond the limits which have circumscribed its operations in that province. We have no manhood suffrage in Nova Scotia; every man who gets his name on the list must have certain property or income qualifications. These considerations are, however, thrown to the four winds of heaven by this proposed legislation, and the name of any person who can make the declaration that he was 30 days in Nova Scotia before he enlisted is put on the list. Although we do not know who he is, where he came from or anything about his antecedents, he is given at once the same voice in the government of the province of Nova Scotia as the best citizen in the province. This is a striking departure from the practices to which we are accustomed in Nova Scotia, and it is a departure which should not be undertaken without asking the people of Nova Scotia something about it.

As I read this Bill, the votes are to be placed in one bag, without any special arrangement; the votes for the man in British Columbia are put in the same bag as the votes for the man in Nova Scotia, and no system is provided by which they shall be separated. There is no certainty that the votes will reach their proper destinations, and when they do come to be counted in any particular district, the names are not on any list and no objection can be taken to the ballots. There is no assurance of fair play or justice, so far as I can see. The minister places great confidence in the officers of the militia; out of the honesty of his own heart and mind, I suppose, he thinks that they will be incapable of doing anything dishonest in connection with the recording of these votes. Having had political experience with some of these officers, I think that I would not be doing the minister justice if I did not say something about those experiences. I had occasion less than three months ago to go to an officer, a well-to-do man, whose name it is not necessary that I should mention—a man who would impress the minister, if he saw him, as being a gentleman in whose hands he could safely place the disposition of the ballots. I had occasion to say to him: "Colonel, there is a man in your ranks whom I want as a witness in the Supreme Court in the province of Nova Scotia. I have served a subpoena upon him and paid him his conduct money; I want you to let him go to the court when the day arrives, in order that he may give his evidence." If this man had been desirous of doing the right thing, he would have said: "I see no reason why the man to whom you refer should not be allowed to go to the court-house and give his evidence." Without hesitation, however, he said: "No, I will not allow him to go and give evidence." I had to accept his decision, but I got an order from an officer higher up, at Halifax, directing that the man in question should be sent to the court under an escort. The Minister of Justice would naturally think that the colonel would instantly have complied with this order—but nothing of the kind. He put the soldier in the hands of a squad of partisans, stole him out of the country to Newfoundland, and kept him there for ten days. The sitting of the court lasted eleven days, and it so happened that the man, thinking that the court was over, came back on the tenth day. He put himself in hiding, but we sent the sheriff after him, brought him into the court-house and heard his testimony. That is my experience with officers in whom the Minister of Justice has such great confidence. This incident occurred during the progress of the war, when, if there is any honour on the part of these officers, it should be manifested. An officer who is capable of stealing a witness away and keeping him out of the country until he thinks that there is no further chance of his testimony being obtained would not hesitate for a moment to change a ballot or to do something which would prevent the ballot from getting to its proper destination. These are reasons which have influenced me to a great extent in opposing the proposal to put the fate of myself and my party friends in the hands of officers of that kind. The officials are at present on the other side of the water in connection with military matters. Since they left this country some of them have been disqualified in the Supreme Court of the province of Nova Scotia; they have been proved guilty of fraud and corruption. They are at the front to-day, and if the services of any men are required for the purposes of an election, these are the very men who will be picked up, because they have had experience in elections when they were at home. The minister, will, therefore, pardon men from Nova Scotia if they do not care to have their political destinies placed in the hands of such men, or that such vast and extensive powers should be vested in such men by Parliament.

Mr. GERMAN: This section deals with the affidavit which the voter has to make. The affidavit may be made out in one of two ways. The first form is:

> That, within the six months immediately preceding the date when I was enlisted... in the military forces of Canada the last place in which I was resident.

was so and so. And then he has to say that he is not qualified to vote in any other electoral district. I should like to call the minister's attention to the fact that a large number of these volunteers will not know whether they are qualified or not. Except in the western provinces, a man has to be on the voters' lists to be qualified, and I am sure that very few of these volunteers will know whether they are on the voters' list or not. The alternative form is

> That immediately before I was enlisted... in the military forces of Canada I was qualified to be a voter at such and such a place. Suppose that a voter chooses the second form and swears that he is qualified to vote at a certain place, and that when the affidavit comes back it is found that his name is not on the voters' list, would that vote count?

Mr. DOHERTY: I think I have already answered that question. It would appear to me that that is a man who has succeeded in polling his vote by swearing to a false oath. I take it that he would be in the same position as a voter in Alberta who falsely swears that he is a qualified man, and whose vote is taken. I do not see how we could do otherwise than accept such a vote as my hon. friend refers to subject, however, to the parties having the same remedies that they have in regard to a vote in this country which has been polled upon the strength of a false oath. They would not have any remedy, as I understand it, by way of prosecution for perjury.

Mr. H. H. McLEAN: I should like to call the minister's attention to an objection that I made this morning. The more I think of it the more impossible I think it will be for the commanding officer to carry out the duties that are imposed upon him by this Bill. A commanding officer has 220 men under him.

Mr. DOHERTY: Is there a commissioned officer who has a smaller unit under his command than a company or a battery or a squadron?

Mr. McLEAN: There is indeed. A company is now divided into platoons under lieutenants, and these platoons are divided into sections under the command of sergeants. Our present company consists of only 48 men, and is commanded by a captain, three lieutenants and four sergeants. The war service unit is much larger. The platoon now is quite as large as the ordinary company in Canada. Under this Bill the commanding officer has to take these affidavits, and certify that the document was written in his presence and that he believes the statements made in the affidavit are true. When all these preliminaries have been gone through the commanding officer gives the soldier a ballot, and, after it has been marked, puts it away in a box. I say that it would not be possible for a commanding officer to go through all these preliminaries and take 200 odd votes in a day. For instance, a commanding officer on active service may be under operation orders and be ordered to take his company and put out skirmishers or advance guards or to occupy a certain position. He may be away three or four days or perhaps a week with that particular section. On the other hand, he may have what is called a field officers' day, that is, he has regimental duties to perform in connection with his regiment. This takes him completely away from his company. So it seems to me that it would be impossible for these commanding officers to do this work and their military duties as well. Then there is a provision that if the commanding officer is unable to do the duties imposed by this Bill, the next senior officer shall do what is required. But the next senior officer may be away. It is quite possible that in the Princess Patricias and other regiments, even in the regular service, companies may be commanded by non-commissioned officers during a big engagement. I want the minister to understand that I am not making any criticism except what I consider fair and honest criticism. I should like this Bill to pass if I thought the machinery was effective and workable. I would just ask the minister to consult either with the Minister of Militia or with General Gwatkin, who is the first military member of the Militia Council, and has had a great deal of experence on active service, and take their advice as to whether this is practicable. I should like to see authority given to the commanding officer to appoint any officer he sees fit in case he himself is unable to perform the duties imposed by this Bill.

Mr. DOHERTY: I do not quite grasp that it would be an improvement. As I understand it, if the designated officer cannot act, the officer next in rank would act; and if the section does not make that perfectly clear we could modify it so that if the commanding officer is prevented from carrying out the work it may be done, not necessarily by the man next in rank, but by any man between the company commander and the junior lieutenant.

But I shall be glad to make that perfectly clear. The difficulty I apprehend is overcome when we provide that if the the officer commanding cannot do it the next in rank available shall do it.

[Mr. H. H. McLean.]

Mr. H. H. McLEAN: The words are not clear.

Mr. DOHERTY: I will be glad to make them clear. In order to avoid a difficulty which has been raised it is necessary that we shall cut down the number of men handling these ballots to the smallest number. The hon. gentleman heard the objection that was made this morning on the ground of the number of men that was going to handle these ballots. It is desirable to keep these numbers down as low as we can. While it might be true that if the whole 250 men came to vote on the same day it might be difficult for the captain, or major commanding the company, to take the oaths of all at the same time, we are not fixing the day and we are not limiting the hour. Provided that these ballots are taken in time to get back here for the polling day the officers and men voting can suit their own convenience as to the marking of the ballots and under these conditions I would have hoped that it would have been possible for the votes of a company to be taken by the commanding officer, or failing him, by some other officer who would take his place. I do not like the suggestion of his naming somebody. I think it desirable to have it so operated that it will never be a matter of personal choice in determining what officer shall act. It would seem to me to be the fairer way to let the performance of the function attach to the office held by the officer performing it and let it work out in that way so that there will not be a selected officer who might be a partisan of one party or the other. So long as we leave it to operate in such a manner that the officer takes over the duty simply by reason of his military rank it leaves the chances perfectly fair and equal to both parties as to what the partisanship may be, if there be any partisanship. I would rather see it designated as the officer commanding or the officer next in rank, without reference of the choice to the man who is not in a position to do the work himself. My hon. friend believes that a company is too large a unit for us to try to take the vote under one officer. I understand that a company is divided into—

Mr. H. H. McLEAN: Four platoons, each of them under a lieutenant.

Mr. DOHERTY: That there are two parts and that these two parts are subdivided.

Mr. McLEAN: That is the present system in Canada. There are eight companies in a regiment, but on active service we have only four companies. They are like double companies and each of these companies is divided into four platoons just like separate companies. They are almost as large as some of the ordinary regiments we have in camp. These platoons are again divided into sections under the command of a sergeant.

Mr. DOHERTY: Then if we depart from the commanding officer and go a step further we will have to multiply by four the number of officers that may be handling this matter and we will get it down to a situation where each officer who is handling it will only be concerned with 50 or 60 men. It would hardly be necessary to provide an officer for every 50 or 60 men to take these ballots. I would have hoped that it would have been possible to provide for a company through one officer and really I would think, in view of the fact that he does not have to do it all on the same day, that we might trust to his carrying it through. However, I will think about it and if it is necessary I will be willing to go back to the section.

Mr. H. H. McLEAN: There must be some practical method of carrying this thing out on active service and it would be well for the minister to consult with the Minister of Militia, or with men who have had experience and who would be able to suggest a practical solution of the objections that have been made.

Mr. DOHERTY: I shall do that before the Bill passes its final stage. In the meantime I beg to move that subsection 2 be amended by inserting in the sixth line, after the word "batteries," the words "or of any line of communication or administrative unit." That is to meet an observation made by the hon. member for Sunbury and Queens this morning.

Mr. H. H. McLEAN: That will cover it.

Mr. DOHERTY: It was pointed out by the hon. member for Sunbury and Queens this morning that "companies, batteries and squadrons" would not cover the army service corps and the medical corps and my hon. friend the Minister of Militia suggested these words.

Amendment agreed to.

Mr. DOHERTY: I beg also to move that subsection 3 of clause 2 be amended in the eighth line by inserting after the word, "batteries," the words, "or of any line of communication or administrative unit."

Amendment agreed to.

Mr. MACDONALD: Does the minister provide any form of affidavit to be subscribed to by the officer who takes the vote?

Mr DOHERTY: There is no provision in the Bill requiring an officer to be sworn. It occurred to us that we could not prosecute for perjury committed over there, and we have to rely on the moral security. If you swear the officer who takes the vote then somebody would have to administer the oath to him, and you would have to swear that official, too, and finally, unless we got all these men swearing each other we would have to get back to some official on whose certificate we could rely, that the man was sworn. I would be disposed to believe that we can rely on the officer discharging this duty faithfully without exacting from him the additional moral security, because that is all it would be, of his taking the oath. I am not disposed to resist the suggestion, if it is insisted upon, that we should provide a method to swear the officer; but then, of course, we will have to swear the man who swears the officer, and so on, until we get back to some one who is authorized to administer the oath under our own law.

Mr. MACDONALD: There is no reason why the officer in Bermuda or in England should not take an oath before some functionary, and we can provide in this Bill to that end. With every sincere desire to see a workable Act, I wish the minister would see his way clear to provide for the different conditions which exist in Bermuda and England from those which exist where the fight is going on. All a man has to do in Bermuda is to walk down the street on that beautiful island on a sunny day, drop into the office of a notary public, and subscribe to the affidavit.

Mr. DOHERTY: Would the idea the hon. gentleman has in mind be met if we inserted a provision requiring the officers to be sworn before any person authorized to take oaths in the country in which the officer is?

Mr. MACDONALD: It ought to be made imperative in Great Britain and Bermuda.

Mr. DOHERTY: I have no objection to an amendment, if the hon. member desires it, to provide that the officer shall be sworn before an official competent to take oaths in Bermuda or Great Britain.

Mr. MACDONALD: I think my suggestion is a reasonable one. I want to say a word now about another matter, and not in any critical sense. We have heard a great deal to-day about trusting the officers, but yesterday all day we listened to hon. gentlemen on the other side justify their report in regard to the shoes which were furnished to our soldiers, by basing all their speeches on the contention that the report of 75 or 100 regimental boards throughout this country were not worth the paper they were written on, because, forsooth, these men who were sworn to defend their King and country were going about and holding these boards for the mere purpose of getting new boots for the soldiers. It is rather a sudden change in doctrine for hon. gentlemen opposite to come down to-day and tell us that we should trust these officers. Certainly I am prepared to trust them the same as I would trust any other decent citizen of this country, with proper limitations; but we have to make laws here for all classes. I regard the military officers as honourable men, and I regret that hon. gentlemen opposite did not so regard them yesterday. If the minister will only go a little further and give us a sane amendment to this law, so as to provide for a sane system of voting in Great Britain and in Bermuda, he will be carrying out to a legitimate conclusion my proposition to which he has given assent.

Mr. PUGSLEY: It does seem to me that when we are discussing what duties shall be imposed upon military officers, we should have the Minister of Militia present to give us his opinion as to which is the most satisfactory way to have the voting conducted. We are proposing to exact from officers of the British army certain duties of a civil character which may materially interfere with the performance of their military duties, and surely there is no man who ought to know better than the Minister of Militia and his advisers the best mode to adopt in these circumstances. The committee would like to have the opinion of the Minister of Militia on what is a technical military matter, and in respect to which the Minister of Justice would not be supposed to know.

Mr. DOHERTY: I understood the technical question involved was, how many men had to be dealt with in a company and in a platoon, and I am satisfied to take the information which the hon. member for Queens (Mr. H. H. McLean) has given us on that point. I understand that in a company are included four platoons, and that therefore we should consider the desirability of going to the officer who commands a platoon thereby multiplying by four the number of officers. Between the major who commands a company and the officer who commands a platoon, there is no officer who commands any other section of a company. I had an impression that in a company there were officers under the commanding officer, each of whom commanded half of the company.

Mr. H. H. McLEAN: There is the major, then the captain, and then the four lieutenants each in command of a platoon, which is divided into two sections each under the command of a sergeant. The minister is quite right in regard to the formation of our regiments in Canada, which are divided into eight companies, but the new British system divides the regiment into double companies, and instead of a captain, there is a major in command.

Mr. DOHERTY: I have said to the hon. member for Queens and Sunbury that before this Bill goes through its final stages, I will consult with the military authorities, with General Gwatkin in particular, and I shall be very glad to come back to this House and impart the information I received, and if it leads to any action being thought desirable, I shall be glad to take it.

With regard to the amendment that the hon. member for Pictou desires, I have tried to put it into suitable words. It would apparently properly come at the end of subsection 4, and this is what I understand ought to be added:

> The officer receiving affidavits and taking votes under the above provisions shall in the United Kingdom and in Bermuda be sworn faithfully to perform his duties before an official authorized to administer oaths under the laws of the country where the said duties are performed.

Does that meet with the idea of the hon. member?

Mr. MACDONALD: There are notaries public in both England and Bermuda.

Mr. DOHERTY: If the notary public is an authorized officer he would come under this.

Mr. MACDONALD: It would be better to put:

> Before a notary public or some other official authorized to administer oaths.

Mr. DOHERTY: Even in England or in Bermuda we are creating a situation where, if by any accident it should happen that officers cannot find this qualified officer, all our machinery will fall to the ground. Will the hon. member consider giving in the alternative the right of the officer being sworn, because we are dealing with a company officer, before the commanding officer?

Mr. MACDONALD: If the duty is done by a subordinate, the commanding officer could administer the oath.

Mr. DOHERTY: We are dealing with company officers, so that there will always be above them a higher officer. I beg to move that subsection 4 be amended by adding thereto the words:

The officer receiving affidavits and taking votes under the above provisions shall in the United Kingdom and in Bermuda be sworn faithfully to perform his duties before the regimental commanding officer, a notary public or any official authorized to administer oaths under the laws of the country where the said duties are performed.

Mr. GERMAN: What right has the regimental officer to administer an oath?

Mr. DOHERTY: The right given by this Bill.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: But we have no such power. What power have we to confer upon soldiers who are in England or in France the right to administer oaths?

Mr. DOHERTY: As I have already pointed out, we shall get from this only the moral sanction of the oath. It may be more amusing to hear the statement more frequently, but that is the fact which I concede. As for myself, I have already expressed the view that I entertain upon that subject. I was willing to believe that without the oath we might have trusted the officer.

Mr. GERMAN: Might you not just as well do away with the oath altogether, because you are binding the conscience of no one by any oath that you are prescribing in this Bill?

Mr. DOHERTY: I do not understand how the hon. member appreciates conscience, but I think that the average man, if he takes an oath, binds his conscience just as much if he takes it before a non-qualified man, if he takes it in Bermuda or in England or in France, as he does when he takes it in Canada before the most solemnly constituted officer that can be conceived of. I would have been satisfied with my confidence in the officer's honour; but, to meet the objection, I am willing to go further and give the guarantee of the officer's conscience, and I should think that at least we may feel satisfied in resting on the officer's conscientious respect for the oath by which he binds himself upon all that is most sacred to all of us.

Mr. GERMAN: As far as I am concerned, I believe it is as binding on a man's conscience to tell the truth whether he takes an oath or makes a statement. But the hon. gentleman has brought into this Bill what he says is an oath, which is not an oath in the accepted meaning of the term. A man's statement should be just as binding though it were made under this so-called oath before this officer who is appointed to administer it.

Mr. MACDONALD: The proposition the minister is good enough to accept was made by myself in regard to the officers who take the votes in Great Britain and Bermuda. In so far as this amendment provides that the oath should be taken before a notary public or other authorized individual, there is no doubt that in such a case perjury could be assigned. But the minister has added a clause which gives the commanding officer the right to administer the oath. To that alone, I think my hon. friend could take exception, though I think that something might be said in regard to the right of the commanding officer of a regiment in England or in Bermuda to administer the oath with the duties assigned to him under the Bill.

Mr. LANCASTER: They administer oaths in other respects.

Amendment agreed to.

Mr. BUREAU: On a former occasion I called the attention of the minister to the words "I vote for the Government," "I vote for the Opposition," and "I vote for the independent candidate." Has the minister made up his mind to change these words from "Government" to "Conservative," and "Opposition" to "Liberal?" On a former occasion the hon. gentleman said that he used the terms given here because they were the terms recognized by law. But "independent candidate" is not recognized by law; yet that does not say that a man could not cast a good vote for the independent candidate.

Mr. DOHERTY: There is a general principle that words are to be read in law according to their ordinary significance. I think "independent" is well understood. I said that "Government" and "Opposition" are recognized by law and will not be misunderstood. But if you make it "Liberal" or "Conservative" I do not know how you are going to find either as a matter of fact or as a matter of law an exact definition. For this reason, which I pointed out on previous occasions, I think it better to keep the terms we have.

Mr. BUREAU: There is not a man who is going to cast his vote but knows what is meant by Conservative party and Liberal party. If he does not know it, he is not fit to vote. I do not see why "Government" and "Opposition" should be used in our ballot; it has never been done in our elections, and it is not a fair way to put it. Under this Bill, questions relating to the parties are referred to the discussion of the leaders of the party. I think we should use in this law words that are intelligible and will allow the soldier to give an intelligent vote. As to the independent candidate, I think that should be left blank. The candidate who does not belong to either of the great parties may be a Labour candidate, a Socialist candidate, or a Nationalist candidate, for all I know.

Mr. DOHERTY: But a fourth alternative is allowed under which the soldier may vote for the individual. The independent candidate I would understand to be the one who presents himself as independent as between the Government and the Opposition, whether he counts himself a socialist or gives himself some other title.

Mr. BUREAU: Suppose there were two Conservative candidates. I suppose the interpretation given to the word "Government" would be in favour of the candidate who was chosen by the convention. And the same with the Liberal candidate. But suppose that the Conservative candidate who has not been chosen by the convention has a majority of votes of those who heard him and saw him, but when these soldiers' votes come in, the votes of men who have not seen and heard, they give the majority to the other candidate. In that case, surely these votes should be eliminated and let the election go to the man who was the choice of the people.

Mr. CROTHERS: Subsection 7 deals with that.

Mr. BUREAU: That provides that the leaders shall elect. I say that is unfair.

Mr. PUGSLEY: I would call the attention of the minister to the case of the two constituencies in Halifax city and county, and St. John city and county. The voter in either of those constituencies would be entitled to two papers and entitled to vote for both a Government and Opposition candidate. I do not doubt that many hundred voted that way in the last election. In Halifax there must have been many who voted both for the Prime Minister and for my hon. friend the junior member for Halifax (Mr. A. K. Maclean). Has any provision been made for that point?

Mr. DOHERTY: I do not see how we can find a method, so long as the men have not sufficient information to justify their picking out any special candidate. While the soldiers may not have official information as to who the candidates are, it is probable that in respect of many constituencies the soldier will know, just as all of us know, who are going to be the candidates. The soldier who has that information will be able to avail himself of the opportunity afforded him to vote for a particular person. Under the provisions of the general act a man is entitled to vote for as many people as there are candidates to be elected, and if a gentleman voting in the constituency of Halifax should vote for two persons upon that ballot, if they prove to be candidates his votes would be counted. But the person who has absolutely no knowledge of who the candidates are, and is unable with absolute certainty to vote for them by name, has the right to vote for the Government or for the Opposition.

Mr. PUGSLEY: How about giving him two ballots, and permitting him to split his vote, if he wishes to do so?

Mr. DOHERTY: There is this difficulty; if you hand the man two ballots and he does take his chance on voting for a particular person, we may get two votes for the same man. I think that the persons who would wish to vote for one candidate on one side and one on the other are not very numerous.

Mr. MARCIL: If a voter votes for a particular person who does not happen to be a candidate, is the vote lost?

Mr. DOHERTY: The vote is lost. I do not think we can avoid that; it is the general provision of the law.

Mr. OLIVER: I want to have as thoroughly established as possible whether or not the Government has any authority over the officer, whoever he may be, who will handle the ballots in Europe, in England or in Bermuda.

Mr. DOHERTY: All these paymasters are our own officers. What we were discussing the other day was the question as to whether we can convict a man in this country for a criminal offence committed outside of this country. The right hon. leader of the Opposition expressed the opinion that we could not, and I am not prepared to dispute that opinion. Our officers, going into the Imperial army, are officers of the Imperial army for the time being, but when they return to this country, as we hope they will, they will return as officers of our miliary organization. I am not prepared to say what remedy may exist for any misconduct on their part during their absence. I am willing to assume that we shall have no recourse under the criminal law for infractions that they may commit under this particular Act. I do not want to say, however, that we have absolutely no authority that may be exercisable sooner or later by reason of the position which they will have occupied.

Mr. OLIVER: I want to find out exactly what the measure of our authority is. The exercise of that right on the part of the soldier, that we are taking some trouble here to give, depends on the conduct of the officer who is to act as returning officer. I think it has already been stated—I only want to have it absolutely defined—that that officer acts, or does not act, as he sees fit, and we have no remedy.

Mr. DOHERTY: I do not think that we can by any means within our power give ourselves a method of compelling a man in England to do something. We are empowering these officers to do these things. I do not want to go further than this: I am willing to concede that we cannot deal with these men under the criminal law in respect to things that they may do outside of this country. These men are, of course, in a peculiar position, and it is not very easy absolutely to define what our powers may or may not be in the direction of increasing their obligations. While they are, for the purposes of military operations, under the control of the Imperial authorities, they are still our officers, and are paid by us. I am not prepared to concede that, so long as we limit ourselves to things that have no concern in actual military operations, our law is not effective to create obligations with regard to them, nor am I prepared to-day to undertake positively to affirm that it is. While I am not asking the committee to pass this Bill upon the expectation of its being carried out by our creating legal obligation, I think we can safely rest assured that when the Parliament of Canada empowers these officers to do these things—and, so empowering them, in effect requests them—in the great bulk of cases the officers will be willing to carry out what they are empowered to do, to put themselves to such pains as may be involved in doing the things that are prescribed here in order to enable the soldiers to register their votes.

Mr. OLIVER: It is an absolute fact that it is entirely optional with the paymasters whether they act or not?

Mr. DOHERTY: I can make no further declaration than I have made.

Mr. OLIVER: From what the minister has said I am bound to conclude that that is the fact. We are passing this law ostensibly to give the soldiers the right to vote, but we are not providing the means which will ensure their having that right. I will admit that it is because we cannot.

Mr. PUGSLEY: We can by appointing a commission.

Mr. OLIVER: But as this Act stands we cannot do it. Therefore, let us be honest and say that we are holding out to the soldier a prospect which after all depends not upon our legislation, but upon the officers in charge.

Mr. DOHERTY: We can create an obligation just as strong, just as powerful, just as binding upon those gentlemen as any obligation we can create upon a commission appointed by statute. There is absolutely no possible distinction in that regard. I have said that I was not conceding that we have not the power to create legal obligations upon these officers over there. I have conceded, without doing any more than conceding it, that we cannot punish the men for a criminal offence committed outside of this country. I have further stated that it was not in reliance upon our imposing a legal obligation on the officers that we proposed this measure, but that we did believe that they, being empowered to do this, and Parliament putting before them the desire of the people of Canada, would carry it out. I have not affirmed that these are absolutely legal obligations, nor have I conceded that they are not. I do not think it is useful to discuss that now. But I am quite prepared to say that the obligation is just as incumbent upon them as would be the obligation that we, by a statute, would seek to impose upon a commission to perform duties outside of Canada.

Mr. PUGSLEY: I beg to differ from the minister, and differ entirely. In the present Bill the minister is proposing to invest certain functions in gentlemen over whom this Government and this Parliament have absolutely no control. These officers are a part of the British army and under the absolute control of the British War Office, and they have no right to do a single thing outside of the performance of their military duties except with the consent of the War Office or of the officers who are in command of the forces at the front; and no one knows that better than my hon. friend. But suppose that a commission such as was proposed in my amendment was appointed by the Governor in Council. Those commissioners accept the office, they accept the responsibility, and they accept the remuneration which goes with the performance of their duties. Surely that is a different case from imposing obligations upon gentlemen in England or France or Belgium or Bermuda over whom this Parliament has no authority whatever. The moment those commissioners accept the office they become the officials of this Government.

Mr. DOHERTY: But how will they carry out their duties except through these same people?

Mr. PUGSLEY: With the consent of these people.

Mr. DOHERTY: And so does our Act.

Mr PUGSLEY: No, this Act imposes the duty upon these people in England or France to perform the obligations. On the other hand the commissioners would go to England, France or Belgium as the appointees of this Government, and they could be sworn in in Canada to discharge their duties. They would perform their duties with the consent of the British authorities. That is an entirely different case. In the case of a commission you have a proper tribunal, a tribunal appointed by this Government, accepting office under this Government, and undertaking the duties of the position under this Government. In performing their duties on the other side they would be doing it with the consent of the British authorities and of the officers who are acting under the War Office. Under a commission you have a properly constituted body, but in the other case you are professing to impose duties on persons over whom you have not a shadow of jurisdiction.

At six o'clock, the committee took recess.

The committee resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Mr. Chairman, before recess I was speaking of the great advantage there would be in appointing a commission, as proposed in my amendment, over the proposition of imposing upon the officers of the British army duties and obligations which they might or might not be willing to discharge. I am satisfied that the proposition of a commission is a very desirable one, and if the minister will not accept it I beg to give notice that when this Bill comes to its third reading I will move this amendment, and also to strike out the sections which will be unnecessary if the amendment is adopted. The minister stated when the Bill first came before the House that one of the strong justifications for the Government in taking up the measure was that New Zealand had already provided similar legislation, but a careful examination of the New Zealand Bill shows that they did not presume to do any such thing as is sought to be done by this Bill. They did not presume to cast upon the officers of the British army the duty of seeing the ballots marked, taking affidavits and certifying to papers which were to be sent back to that country, but they provided that, in the case of soldiers who were on duty in New Zealand preparing to go to the war, they should be allowed to vote by marking their ballots before they left, and that if a general election came on, their ballots could be counted. They also provided that, in the case of soldiers who had left New Zealand as members of any expeditionary force before the passing of the Act, they should be allowed to vote in the manner prescribed, and they provided that electoral officers should be appointed out of New Zealand for the purpose of taking their votes. Section 8 of the New Zealand Act reads as follows:

> Electoral officers may be appointed out of New Zealand for the purpose of enabling any person to record his vote under this Act who is a member of any expeditionary force sent out of New Zealand before the passing of this Act.

This is exactly the same provision which is made by my amendment, with this exception, that this amendment contains a greater safeguard for non-partisanship because it provides that the electoral officers, which the commissioners would be, should be appointed upon the nomination of the Prime Minister and the leader of the Opposition respectively. Otherwise it is the same. It seems a strange thing, that modelling this legislation, as the Government pretend to do, upon the legislation of New Zealand, they should adopt the course of imposing obligations upon the officers of the British army which the Government and Parliament of New Zealand evidently thought was impracticable and unreasonable, and as to the undertaking of which obligations the Government has not the slightest information. The Minister of Justice has frankly informed us that he really does not know whether the officers of the British army will perform the obligations. It seems a very extraordinary thing to pass this legislation, which may be for that reason alone an absolutely dead letter. The Government could easily provide the machinery, by the appointment of a commission, the members of which would be non-partisan electoral officers, and who could, with the aid of the regulations which they might make, see that the provisions of the Act would be fairly and honestly carried out and that all the soldiers desirous of voting would have a reasonable opportunity of doing so, and who would also see, and that is a most important thing, that the ballots which would be marked by the soldiers entitled to vote would be returned to Canada and would actually be deposited. On the contrary, this Bill proposes to impose obligations on British officers which this Parliament has no right to impose. There is in the Bill a lamentable absence of those safeguards which one would suppose the Government would have had in mind in asking Parliament to assent to the Bill.

Mr. OLIVER: I wish to draw the minister's attention to the condition which results from the fact that, I think, we have agreed upon, that the officer who acts as a returning officer does so at his own option. He acts or he does not act, as he pleases. The purpose of the Bill is to give the soldier an opportunity of casting his ballot. That opportunity depends on the whim of the officer appointed; there is no obligation on him to take action and, as the minister put it, there is before him only an expression of the desire of the Parliament of Canada that he should act. Beyond that there is no authority or compulsion or obligation upon him. If I remember rightly, in considering the Bill at its earlier stage, the minister took occasion to say that a certain provision, which it was difficult to give effect to, was inserted so that there would not be a dislocation of the voting power of the country. We are making provision for the voting of the overseas contingents. We are assuming to make provision for the full number of the members of that contingent to exercise their franchise. Ostensibly we are doing that. On the face of the Act we are doing that. We are placing this matter absolutely in the hands, under the control and at the option of the men whom we may name for certain positions which they are under no obligation either legal or moral to fill. It is only reasonable to believe that under these circumstances some soldiers will have the opportunity of voting and some will not. We have no means of guidance as to what proportion of these will have an opportunity and what proportion will not. Surely, therefore, of necessity, under the conditions laid down in the Bill, there will be just as great a disarrangement of the voting power of the country as there would have been under the terms that my hon. friend objected to at the earlier stage of the proceedings. If we cannot do better than that, if we cannot be reasonably sure that every volunteer is going to have the opportunity of casting his vote, let us not claim that we are doing something that we actually are not doing. It may be that we are showing good-will, it may be that our intentions are all right, but unless we can do what we profess to be doing, let us not claim that we are doing it. Let us admit that we have undertaken to do something that in the nature of things it is not possible to do. I submit to the minister that when the operation of any law cannot reasonably or measurably be assured it is more than doubtful whether there should be such a law at all. By giving unequal opportunity to one portion of our volunteers to vote while in fact denying to others the same opportunity we are not increasing the share of control of the affairs of Canada by the volunteers as we profess, but we are endangering the reasonable result of a fair expression of opinion by the people who are not on active service. This cannot be the purpose of the minister, but it is the actual fact. I feel I would not be doing my duty if I did not set that view before the minister for his best consideration.

Mr. DOHERTY: The officers have been referred to, and no doubt correctly, as British officers, but in the great majority of cases, if not in all, the officers dealing with our soldiers will be Canadian officers. It may be possible that some of them may decline to act, but the effect of the argument of hon. gentlemen opposite is that because of the unwillingness of some of the officers to perform this duty this law might become ineffective in some instances, that therefore we should not pass the law at all. Does anybody conceive that more than a small minority (if there be any at all), of our officers having this power conferred upon them, will refuse to exercise it? There is already provision in the Bill that if any officer designated in this Act is prevented from discharging the duty it may be performed by the officer next in rank below him. I would understand that to mean that if the officer next in rank below him was prevented from doing it, then the next below him might act. When we come to that section I shall put in words which will make my interpretation of that absolutely clear. I think it is a very weak argument, that because in some instances this Act may fail of its operation for want of good-will on the part of some officer, we should abandon entirely the project of providing votes for our soldiers on active service. I do not think that our authority over the officers on active service would be in any way enhanced or increased by our naming a commission, which commission would themselves undertake to deal with that same class of officers; we cannot delegate greater powers to the commissioners than we ourselves have.

Mr. OLIVER: Would the minister transfer his mind to the case of an ordinary constituency and ask himself would he consider it fair that, there being set off certain polling divisions in that constituency, it was optional with those who might be selected as deputy returning officers whether a poll should be held or not.

Mr. DOHERTY: If that condition should exist, would the hon. gentleman suggest as a remedy that we should disfranchise the whole constituency and give no one an opportunity to vote?

Mr. OLIVER: I am not suggesting that. The minister must admit that such a condition would be unthinkable, looking toward a fair expression of the opinion of people in ordinary circumstances, and is it not absolutely just as unfair in securing a full expression of opinion by the soldiers? While the individual citizen has the right to have his vote recorded, the whole body of citizens has also a right in the election, and that right is that the election shall be so conducted that there shall be no disarrangement of the general body of the vote, and that there shall be a full, and fair, and as complete as possible an expression of opinion of all who are entitled to vote. If the minister, in granting the right to the individual, must take away from the right to which the whole body of citizens is entitled, he surely should reconsider his position.

His suggestion that my view was that if we could not vote all the men, we should not vote any, is hardly a fair statement to make. Under the proposal of the hon. member for St. John, whereby commissioners who would be under the authority of this Parliament would be in bodily presence on the other side of the water, these commissioners would have an opportunity of selecting officers who would be willing to act and whose consent they would have before appointing them, and therefore, although there would not be compulsion, there would be assurance that the action would be taken that was necessary to enable the soldier to poll his vote. That is the difference between the proposal made by the hon. member for St. John and the proposal of the minister, which is simply to issue an order to certain men that they shall take certain action, when there is not a shred nor tittle of authority to compel them to take that action or to lay obligation on them for the taking of that action. The minister has laid considerable stress on the idea that because this Parliament says that an officer should act as returning officer, therefore he is in some way not compelled, but made to feel that he ought to take the action that Parliament desires him to take. I do not look upon the matter in that light at all. The officer as well as the soldier is on the other side of the water for a certain definite, specific purpose, in the carrying out of which discipline is one of the first necessities. As regards action by the officer acting as a returning officer or acting as political agent, or a scrutineer,—because if you are going to have a returning officer you should have scrutineers as well—the large majority of officers will say: this is an undue and improper interference with the important business that we are here to attend to; we do not think the Government or the Parliament of Canada was well advised in imposing this duty upon us, and we decline to act. I think that will be the proper view to be taken by officers on the other side, and I believe it is the view that will be taken by a large majority of them, at any rate by those who have a full appreciation of the duties that they are there to fulfill.

Mr. PUGSLEY: I would not take up any further time on this subsection were it not for the extraordinary statement made by the Minister of Justice that the Government would have no more control over the commissioners, who might be appointed under the amendment which I proposed, when they reached the other side than it would have over the officers.

Mr. DOHERTY: I do not think that is the statement I made. I stated that we would have no greater control in any event over the men on the other side because it was exercised through commissioners than we would have by exercising it directly. We cannot give the commissioners a greater power than we ourselves have.

Mr. PUGSLEY: That is putting the case a little differently. When my hon. friend uses the word "men," does he mean the commissioners and their delegates?

Mr. DOHERTY: The people that the commissioners may work through over there. We can have no more control over them, because we have named the commissioners, than we can exercise directly.

Mr. PUGSLEY: My hon. friend is entirely wrong. Suppose, for instance, that the commissioners go to France or Belgium. Surely they go there under an agreement with this Government to act as electoral officers or commissioners. There is a contractual obligation into which they have entered with this Government to discharge certain duties, and that obligation they are bound in law to carry out. Suppose they want assistance, they appoint delegates to act for them; they make contracts with these people so to act and to discharge the duties which are required to be performed under the statute. Does not that create as against the people so appointed a contractual obligation? Surely it does; but as to those gentlemen who are officers in the British army, some of them are Canadian officers or were Canadian officers until they went under the control of the British War Office, and the moment they go under that control, this Government has no control over them whatever. On more than one occasion in the House that has been the statement made by the Prime Minister and by the Minister of Militia. I remember early in the session I asked the Minister of Militia if he had received any complaints from England as to the separation of the units of the troops which had gone from New Brunswick. He said that there had been some correspondence, but that this Government had no control over the men whatever; that when they landed upon the shores of England, they were absolutely under the control of the British War Office; and that they then formed part of the British army. The same statement was made again by the Prime Minister, when the case of Col. Struan Robertson came before us, that this Government must not interfere; that there must be no divided authority. Yet this Parliament is asked to impose an obligation upon these officers who are under the control of the War Office to perform civil duties for this Government in connection with the holding of the elections of this Parliament. Surely the position of these officers, as far as this legislation is concerned, would be entirely different from that of the commissioners, who had undertaken with this Government for a consideration to perform the duties of electoral officers under this legislation, and it would also be entirely different from that of the delegates whom the commissioners might appoint and who would enter into a contract with them. Take the case of the Acting High Commissioner in London, who is outside of the territorial jurisdiction of this country, but who is under the control of this Government, because when he accepted the office of Acting High Commissioner, he became bound under his contract to perform the duties which pertain to the office which he is filling. The same is true as regards the agent of Canada in Paris, who is out of the territorial jurisdiction of this country, but who is under a contractual obligation to perform his duties as agent in Paris. It seems to me that the case is not arguable at all. These commissioners would, as I have said, be like the electoral officers who were appointed under a contract with the New Zealand Government that for a certain consideration they would discharge their duties. But, as my hon. friend from Edmonton points out, this Government is asking the people to believe that it is making arrangements to enable the soldiers to cast their ballots. If they are not arranging to do that, then they are doing a great injustice to many of the boys at the front. Though this is what they profess, yet the minister himself admits frankly—he is compelled to admit—that there may be cases in which these officers will decline to act and by reason of that the votes of the soldiers under those officers may not be taken. Whether there will be a large number or a small number in that position the minister is unable to give us any idea. In answer to the hon. member for Edmonton, the minister says: Suppose some returning officer should decline to act, should decline to hold a poll, shall we therefore disfranchise the people? Surely, that is not a parallel case. The returning officer is not relied upon to act unless he has agreed to act; he gets a certain compensation for acting; there is a contractual obligation upon him. And I am inclined to think it would be the law—I think it is undoubtedly clear—that if for any reason a poll is not held—the judges would declare the election void and another election would have to be held. Talk as the minister may, he is imposing upon these officers duties which he knows they cannot be required to perform, obligations which he cannot assure the House they will carry out, yet he is making profession that this Bill will enable the soldiers to exercise their right of franchise. He believes that there may be cases. I believe there will be many, many cases affecting thousands of our soldiers—in which they will not be given opportunity to exercice their franchise, whereas, if he took the simple course of following the example of New Zealand, and appointing electoral officers, letting them go to England, France and Bermuda, letting them make arrangements for delegates and assistants to carry out the provisions of the Act, he would be able to give reasonable assurance to the Canadian soldiers that they would all have an opportunity to cast their votes.

Mr. VERVILLE: I do not rise for the purpose of discussing any of the articles of the present section. As the Minister of Justice knows, I spoke a few days ago about granting the right to vote to others than soldiers. Every member of the House knows that there is a certain class, a class of labour men especially, who are deprived by their occupation of the opportunity of cast their votes. I refer particularly to the railway men. A year ago, I believe, a letter was presented to the committee and an argument was made in favour of giving these men opportunity to use their franchise which was kindly received by the minister and by the members of the committee. This year a letter was sent and an argument presented which also was well received by the minister and the members of the committee. It seems to me that while we are spending so much time in finding a way to give votes to the soldiers we should add a section to this Bill which would cover the railway men. Of course, everybody will admit that if these men are sent to work early in the morning of election day, it is impossible for them to cast their votes. They are not like nearly all other classes whose occupation enables them to remain near their homes and within easy reach of the polling places. These men must be ready to take out their trains on schedule time, and it is absolutely necessary for the business of the country that they should fulfil that duty. They might be required to take away a train load of soldiers or a train load of munitions of war. They would thus be actually assisting in the carrying on of the war, and yet would be prevented from voting, while the soldiers would have opportunity to vote. The railway men tell me, and I accept it on their authority, that forty per cent of these men are prevented from polling their votes. I have a subsection to propose, which, I think, will overcome this difficulty. I think it should come in after subsection 4, and it might, if the minister wishes, be numbered 4a. I submit it in the form of an amendment and shall be glad if the minister will say whether he is in favour of it or not. He may say that it is a question of establishing the machinery to enable these men to vote. We have talked so much about machinery that it seems to me we ought to be in a position to organize machinery of any kind, especially for a purpose like this, which is to take the votes of people who remain within the country and not as in the case of the soldiers, to take the votes of those who are outside of the country. I do not know that I am absolutely in order in moving this amendment now, but I submit it in the hope that I am in order:

Railway conductors, railway engineers and brakemen, and all other railway employees, who are detailed for train service, shall have the option to cast their vote on polling day in the regular manner provided by law, or on the day before polling day in the following manner, to wit:

The railway employee, at any time between the hours of eight in the morning and six in the evening, shall present himself to the deputy-returning officer of the polling subdivision in which he is or may be, inscribed, who, in the presence of two witnesses, shall administer to him all the oaths required by law and shall then give him a ballot paper. The railway employee may thereupon mark the ballot paper in the usual manner provided by law and the deputy-returning officer shall then place the same in the envelope, upon the back of which shall be endorsed a certificate in form "c," mutatis mutandis, which certificate shall be signed by the deputy-returning officer and witnesses, and shall securely close the envelope. The envelope containing such ballot paper shall then be sent by the deputy-returning officer by post to the returning officer, who shall open the envelopes and count the ballots and include them in his returns in the manner provided by law.

This is submitted as embodying the best way to enable these men to cast their votes. Of course, there are many different ways by which it could be done, and this is not exactly the way proposed to the minister and the committee. While these are absentee votes, yet they are the votes of men who are in a position to know exactly who are the candidates in their several divisions. The letters sent to the committee a couple of years ago were signed by C. Lawrence, legislative representative of the Brotherhood of Locomotive Engineers, 200 Elgin street, Ottawa W. L. Best, legislative representative of the Brotherhood of Locomotive Firemen and Engineers, 576 McLeod street, Ottawa; and J. H. Hall, legislative representative of the O. of R. C., Carleton Hotel, Ottawa. My hon. friend will observe that the three men who signed that letter had a certain amount of responsibility on their shoulders. One represented the railway conductors, another the firemen and another the engineers. This demand must have reached a good many members of the House; I am sure that any railway man with whom they talked on the subject must have spoken of the manner in which railway men are handicapped on polling day.

The CHAIRMAN: I would remind the hon. gentleman that the title of this Bill is: "An Act to enable Canadians on active military service during the present war to exercise their electoral franchise."

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: The hon. member is speaking to his amendment.

Mr. VERVILLE: Am I out of order, Mr. Chairman, in moving this amendment?

The CHAIRMAN: The subsection actually under discussion is subsection 4. If the hon. gentleman is in order in offering an amendment, I do not think that this is the proper time to offer it, because subsection 4 deals with the manner in which the vote shall be registered by the soldiers.

Mr. VERVILLE: It seems to me that the proper place to introduce such an amendment as I suggest is immediately between subsections 4 and 5.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: The hon. member for Maisonneuve is moving to add a section, 4a, to the Bill.

Mr. DOHERTY: Personally I have no desire to insist on any point of order; I am quite willing to answer what the hon. gentleman has asked. We are dealing with subsection 4 of section 2, prescribing the details of how the soldiers shall register their votes under section 1 and the first subsection of section 2. The amendment which the hon. gentleman proposes is hardly an amendment to the method by which soldiers shall exercise the right of voting. If the hon. gentleman wants to introduce another section, it ought to come at the end of section 2. However, perhaps that is not material. The hon. gentleman has pointed out, very correctly, that the railway men have pressed for a method by which they may exercise their franchise. He has also very correctly said that I have every sympathy with their endeavour to have a means provided by which they may vote. I may point out in the first place, however, that the remedy which they ask for differs totally and entirely from the method suggested by my hon. friend. I have had many communications on the subject; the matter was dealt with in the committee, and I feel confident that I make no mistake in saying that they made no suggestion of this particular method of voting that is now asked for on their behalf by the hon. gentleman. If we should provide a method for them to vote, I certainly think that the method they asked for would be very much more effective than this. The committee went into this question in connection with the Dominion Elections Act generally, both last year and this year we gave it a good deal of consideration. The committee, as a whole, came to the conclusion that it was not a practicable method. I am not sure that if I had been alone on that committee I would not have felt it possible to have worked the matter out, but, as the hon. gentleman knows, when we came to deal with the Dominion Elections Act generally at this session, we did not, save as regards one or two separate and distinct things, endeavour to deal with that matter at all. If the hon. gentleman really wants to help the railway men and all other persons who are interested in a further recognition of the right of people who cannot present themselves at the polls during the polling hours to have their vote, it would seem to me that the wisest course to follow would be to aid us in putting forward this first measure for this particular class of men who are away from the country and who are prevented from voting, not because they are attending to their own work, but because they are attending directly to the work of the public. I am sure that railway men would be the first to recognize the difference between the two classes of voters. One is the class of men who, in the exercise of their employment, find themselves prevented from voting. That is a case with which I have the very greatest sympathy, but at the same time it is not an absolutely analagous case. The hon. member has witnessed in this House the strong feeling of antagonism that has been shown to the idea of trying to provide a method by which people can vote otherwise than with all the formalities in the way which are provided for the public generally. That feeling we have to overcome. We are having, as the hon. member witnessed, some little difficulty in overcoming it, even in this exceptional case of the soldiers. Does not the hon. gentleman think that he will do more to aid the cause of those who, for other reasons, seek to have another method of absentee voting adopted, if he will help this Bill to go through, and allow us to demonstrate, in the face of the apprehension and fears that have been expressed, that you can safely provide for absentee voting? I certainly would not favour the adoption of the method suggested by my hon. friend. It is a method that, so far as I know, the railway men have not asked for; it is one which makes it absolutely out of the question that candidates or their representatives should be notified or have any opportunity of being present. It is quite true that that may happen, out of absolute necessity, in the case with which we are dealing, but there is no absolute necessity for it in the case which the hon. member brings forward. The best way to help all persons interested in the recognition of the right of those who cannot present themselves at the polls to vote is to profit by this particular case, which presents a peculiar claim to the exercise of the right, and to allow the results of this proposed legislation to demonstrate the feasibility and practicability of providing for absentee voting. I am satisfied that the passing of this measure and its successful operation will be the most effective method of helping to meet the desire of the railway men.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: I understand that last year, when the committee was considering amendments to the Elections Act, the railway men applied to have their case considered; and this is a letter which I understand was addressed to my hon. friend as chairman of the Committee.

[Mr. Doherty.]

Ottawa, March 11, 1914.

Hon. C. J. Doherty, Esq.,
Chairman and Member of Committee on the operation of the Election Act,
House of Commons, Ottawa.

Dear Sir:

On account of the peculiar nature of their work which necessitates them being away from their home terminal on election day, a large percentage of railway men in train service are disfranchised and we would request that your committee who are considering amendments to the Election Act, take into consideration the adoption of some plan whereby a much larger percentage of railway employees could avail themselves of the privilege that rightly belong to all good citizens, namely, that of using their franchise.

Therefore we desire to submit the following proposition for your earnest consideration: That at all railway centres or divisional points the polling be extended to two days by placing the ballot box in charge of some responsible person who will be stationed at some convenient point the day prior to the day on which the election is to be held for the purpose of allowing those employees to vote who might be away from home on the regular election day. If there is more than one railway running into an electoral district with more than one terminal, have a separate ballot box for each terminal.

The only difference which exists between the amendment that has just been submitted to the House, and the suggestion contained in the letter addressed to my hon. friend last year, is that the latter suggested that the voting should take place at divisional points, whereas the amendment before the House suggests that the men should vote at their place of residence either on polling day or the day before. This point, however, is not material. If the Government is not disposed to consider the amendment, I would observe to my hon. friend that last year when he and the committee presented to the railway men the difficulties and objections which existed in connection with having a separate law for any class of the community, these reasons seemed satisfactory to the railway men, and they did not press their views further. But this year, when they found that the Government was making a separate law for one class of our fellow citizens, who, whatever may be the reason, will not be able to vote as the rest of the citizens will vote, the railway men naturally came to the conclusion that the same privileges should be allowed to them; and that is the reason for their demand. My hon. friend says: Oh, let us pass this law, and it will help the railway men in attaining their object. If it is reasonable to have special legislation for one class of the community what objection can there be to giving the same privileges to another class, which for one reason or another, is also prevented from polling in the regular way? The soldier is at the front doing his duty, but the railway man is doing his duty also, and it is just as important to the community. It is true that he is earning his living in the discharge of that duty, but every citizen in the community is working for a living, and every one is performing his duty to the state. It seems to me that my hon. friend is well justified in presenting his amendment; but if the Government will not accept it that is the end of it.

The CHAIRMAN: I must remind the committee that we are discussing clause 2 of the Bill. This amendment has been introduced as a new section to the Bill, to be known as 4a, and I therefore think it should be presented after we have studied section 4. If it is the desire of the House to discuss this amendment at this stage I have no objection, but I think it is out of order.

Mr. DOHERTY: I do not wish to question the ruling of the Chairman, neither do I wish to insist upon it, but I might just point out that it is perhaps not of material importance whether we discuss it on section 4 or on the present section, for we have already discussed it to some extent.

The CHAIRMAN: Suppose this amendment was adopted; where should I put it?

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: After section 4.

The CHAIRMAN: If it is the desire of the committee to discuss the amendment now, I have no objection.

Mr. OLIVER: I think the proper time to discuss the amendment is after we dispose of section 3.

Mr. VERVILLE: As we were discussing almost every clause of the Bill I thought it was perfectly in order to present my amendment; however, I am perfectly willing to withdraw it and present it at the proper time.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: If the minister will not accept it, that disposes of it.

Mr. DOHERTY: Perhaps it is not quite fair to say that I do not accept the amendment, but I hardly think it comes within the scope of the Bill. As the matter has been taken up I should just like to say this, with the permission of the Chairman: The committee that reached the conclusion that it did with regard to the difficulties in the way of providing this form of voting for the railway men dealt with this matter last year, and also considered it again this year, but not in connection with this measure. Hon. gentlemen will remember that the committee was originally constituted to consider the Dominion Elections Act and the Controverted Elections Act, and that later on this question of votes for soldiers was specially referred to it. Now I cannot quite accept the view of the right hon. gentleman, that because we are making this measure in regard to the soldiers it alters the situation with regard to the railway men. I have the advantage and pleasure of knowing a great many railway men, and perhaps the men who have shown the most active and intelligent interest in this movement to get votes, and I am satisfied that I shall have their endorsement when I say that they themselves will not pretend that their case, from the point of view of the cause that prevents their voting, is analagous to that of the soldier. We thought—and I say it notwithstanding my very high respect of the railway men of this country—that the soldier stood in a peculiar position as compared with every other class of 9 p.m. people who are staying at home; and we are trying to deal with that very special and peculiar position. For myself, I am as sincerely in favour of meeting the desire of the railway men in this regard as my hon. friend who has made this amendment, and I say that without any reflection on his sincerity. But after what we heard pro and con in the committee, and in view of the manner in which the matter was viewed by the committee, and particularly when I think of the difficulties which we met in this House when we did come with a minor proposition, but which looked to a certain extent to facilitating the voting of the railway men—I refer to the proposition to open the polls at an earlier hour in the day—in the face of all those facts I cannot think that one can do better service to the railway men and others who desire that we should arrive at a system whereby a man who cannot actually present himself at the polls may vote, than by giving the system support and a fair trial in this special case, when the opportunity for bringing it into force is furnished by the very special and peculiar position of those on whose behalf it is asked. Under the circumstances I cannot feel otherwise than that the suggestion of this amendment cannot be looked upon as something that can be expected to be acted upon in conne tion with this Bill. I do not think we should embarrass this measure, when we are having such very great difficulty in having it assented to by this House, by introducing into it at this stage, and without notice of any kind, a proposal in regard to which opinions might be held on lines other than those which would naturally be expected to bear on a Bill such as that before the House.

Mr. VERVILLE: I hope the minister will believe that I had no intention other than to give the right of voting to railway men. I do not see why this would prevent the present Bill from passing. It has nothing to do with the passage of the measure. It has been stated time and again that the Government are not willing to pass class legislation. Do they characterize legislation of this kind affecting the interests of the railway men as class legislation? We are passing class legislation to-day. Of course, it is for the soldiers but it is class legislation to a large extent. It may be class legislation in the proper sense of the word. If you are going to give soldiers now at Montreal or Valcartier votes you must pass class legislation for the purpose because there are soldiers at Valcartier who could go to Quebec and other cities and deposit their ballots in their own polling places. These railway men are not in a similar position. They may be away down at Rivière du Loup, and if they want to vote for any hon. gentleman opposite or for myself they cannot do so because they cannot return to their homes in time. If I had been in the House when the Bill to amend the Dominion Elections Act came up I would have moved this same amendment. I have heard time and again in this House this argument about class legislation. I am sorry to say that whenever we bring a labour measure before the House it is said that it is class legislation. What is there that is not class legislation? Every private Bill is class legislation. Only public Bills are not class legislation, but private members of the House have no chance to put through a Bill during the session because the rules of the House are made to prevent public Bills, introduced by private members, from being passed. The rules are such that you cannot reach a public Bill on the Order Paper. I repeat that private Bills are class legislation, and to facilitate their passage certain days and hours are set apart for them. It is only the Government that can introduce a public Bill and ensure its passing. I know that members on the other side of the House, as well as on this side of the House, are not satisfied with the present conditions because, while a public Bill may be introduced by a private member and placed on the Order Paper, it is wiped off at the end of the session. I claim that my amendment will not prevent the present Bill from passing; far from it. It is just my intention to add to this Bill a certain clause which will enable these railway men to record their votes. It may be said that there are other voters who cannot reach their polling places on election day. It is always possible for men, in the majority of cases, to remain for two or three hours in the city where they reside in order to cast their votes. Commercial travellers can do that. With the railway men it is impossible. Fishermen can go out a little later in the morning or come back a little earlier in the evening, but a train must go on schedule time. The lives of the people are at stake, and there are other considerations which make it necessary that running schedules must be maintained. Let me repeat that it is not my intention to prevent the passing of this measure. I am not afraid of the measure. My only intention is to give these men a chance of casting their votes.

Mr. DOHERTY: I do not claim to be any more sincere than the hon. gentleman; so it is evident I did not question his sincerity. I am sorry to hear this legislation spoken of as class legislation. Our soldiers are citizen soldiers, and all classes of people are represented amongst them. I have reason to know that the railway men in particular are represented among our soldiers. They have merged themselves into this great body of men that should not be described as a class in any sense at all. It is composed of people gathered from all ranks and all occupations, and I am sorry to hear this legislation spoken of as class legislation.

Mr. VERVILLE: I only spoke of those who are in Canada.

Mr. DOHERTY: Those in Canada represent all classes. We can hardly speak of them as belonging to any particular class. I do not want to stand on any technical matter at this stage, when a point of order is raised. I am willing to say quite frankly what I think. This Bill was introduced for a specific purpose, and it required to be preceded by a resolution, which resolution could only be presented to this House after it had been communicated to His Royal Highness the Governor General and had met with his approval. The resolution covered the providing of votes for soldiers. I do not think it would be competent for us to introduce into a Bill of that kind a further extension going beyond what the resolution covers.

Mr. PUGSLEY: It seems to me that the Minister of Justice did reflect upon the hon. member for Maisonneuve (Mr. Verville).

Mr. DOHERTY: If I seemed to do it I want amply and completely to withdraw any reflection. I did not intend to make any reflection.

Mr. PUGSLEY: What I understood the minister to say was that the amendment was introduced for a purpose.

Mr. DOHERTY: I immediately corrected that.

Mr. PUGSLEY: What I would understand the minister to mean was that my hon. friend was not sincere in speaking and that he was seeking to introduce this amendment for effect.

Mr. DOHERTY: Just because I had used these words, and because it occurred to me that such a suggestion might come from somebody, I hastened to add that I did not mean to say that there was any such purpose on the part of the hon. gentleman. I hastened to correct myself by saying that there might possibly be a purpose, but I certainly added what I have said, and if I did not I want to do it now. I want to put it as clearly as I can that I did not intend to suggest anything that would lead any one to conclude that I did not attribute perfect sincerity to the hon. gentleman who moved the amendment.

Mr. PUGSLEY: I am very glad indeed to hear the minister making that explanation, because I think every member of the community will recognize that the hon. member for Maisonneuve (Mr. Verville) is at all times earnest, sincere and watchful over the interests of the working people. And, as delegations from the railway men have been before this Government on different occasions urging that better opportunities should be given them for casting their votes, I can very well understand that my hon. friend felt it his duty to avail himself of this opportunity to move the amendment. The Minister of Justice has told the hon. member that it would be better to let this Bill pass as it might help to forward the object he has in view, but it should be borne in mind that the only object of pressing this Bill in the dying hours of this session, and in the face of the many amendments which the Minister of Justice has himself made in it, with a view of removing its defects, is that the Government believes that there may possibly arise before another session of Parliament a psychological moment when they would hope with advantage to throw the country into the turmoil of a general election. Surely it is poor consolation to the railway men to say that the Government may spring an election on them after this Bill is passed, but that next session or the session after, or five years hence, or some time before another general election, the claims of the railway men may be taken up. Call this Bill what you like, it is a Bill to amend the Dominion Elections Act, and it is quite proper that an amendment along the lines suggested by the hon. member should be added to it; the title makes no difference, the title can be changed. My hon. friend (Mr. Verville) only wants provision made so that the railway men may vote at convenient places in Canada under the terms of the present Dominion Elections Act and under the present franchise, and he asks for no important changes at all. On the other hand, this Bill is seeking to make provision for marking ballots in foreign countries under circumstances where it seems impossible to surround the marking of the ballots with the safeguards which the people of Canada have always insisted are to be provided in the case of an election. The Minister of Justice said he was sorry to hear the hon. member refer to some provisions in this Bill as class legislation. I do not understand there is any ignominy attached to the words "class legislation." All that means is, that you are enacting special legislation which will only apply to one particular class of our citizens, and does not this Bill do that? It provides among other things that so far as the soldiers on active service in Canada are concerned there shall be a special franchise for them; that the law requiring a residence of six months or twelve months as is the case in the different provinces shall not apply to the soldiers who are in Canada, but that a residence of thirty days gives them the right to vote. Surely that is legislation applying to a class of our people who have enlisted for active service. There is no insult in the use of the word "class;" all it means is that it applies to a particular portion of the community, and that is all my hon. friend (Mr. Verville) said. If this Bill is to go through this session, I believe there would be no difficulty at all in having the amendment suggested by the hon. member for Maisonneuve added to it.

We are getting along fairly well with the Bill, and if the Minister of Justice can only come a little way towards us and agree to these reasonable amendments, which would make this Bill workable, and which would surround it with safeguards which would assure an honest vote being taken, we could pass the Bill in a very short time. But if the Minister of Justice shows that he is magnificently stubborn, and that he cannot be made to budge once he makes up his mind, and will not try to improve the Bill unless we all agree to his suggestions, then, of course, it makes it more difficult to consider the measure. Although, of course, at the same time I do not suggest for a moment that the members on this side of the House will not help it along as well as we can.

Mr. CROTHERS: I desire to express my deep sympathy with any practical effort towards securing for railway men an opportunity to exercise the franchise. We have no more intelligent class of voters in Canada than are the railway men, and I would be very glad to do anything I could to bring about a means whereby all railway men would have an opportunity to vote. I have lived for many years in a railway city, and I have regretted at every election to find that large numbers of our very best citizens are deprived of the opportunity of exercising the franchise. In my city we have for thirty years been trying to think out some practical means for securing to the railway men an opportunity to vote, but we have never been able to hit upon a plan that did not seem to have so many objections to it that it was found to be impracticable. I quite admit that the suggestion made by my hon. friend from Maisonneuve would enable a larger percentage of the railway men to vote than is the case now when the election is confined to one day instead of two, but his proposition does not at all meet the situation.

The CHAIRMAN: In my judgment, this discussion is out of order. This amendment is not within the scope of the title of the Bill, and the committee has no power to deal with it nor have a discussion on it on the question under discussion at the present time. Therefore it is my duty, after having consulted my best advisers, to rule the amendment out of order at the present time.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Only at the present time?

Will the minister state why the envelopes are to be sent by registered post by the Clerk of the Crown in Chancery and not by registered post from abroad?

Mr. DOHERTY: The reason why we did not speak of registered post from abroad was that the arrangement with regard to registration on the other side was of such a nature as might expose the ballots to very considerable delay.

Subsection agreed to.

Mr. OLIVER: If I might be permitted, I want to say as regards subsection 4, that it is really a very loose way of handling the ballots that is suggested. The subsection says:

> The envelopes containing the ballot paper shall then and there in the presence of the voter be placed in a bag or other suitable receptacle, which shall be carefully kept by the said officer, and securely closed.

That is the time when the ballot should be placed in a sealed package, the package to be sealed in the presence of the voter and with a notation in some form as to who has voted, so that there will be a permanent record. There is just as great necessity for the ballot to be sealed from the hands of the original returning officer to the Clerk of the Crown in Chancery as there is from the Clerk of the Crown in Chancery to the returning officer in the constituency. I would very strongly urge that my suggestion be adopted.

Mr. DOHERTY: The reason why we use the words "securely closed" instead of the word "sealed," is that it was pointed out to us that in many circumstances it might be difficult or practically impossible for the officer to produce sealing wax to seal up the parcel; after all, sealing is only one method of carefully closing this bag or receptacle, and we are making the requirement that it should be securely closed. If other words can be suggested to be added there that will impress more the necessity of secure closing than the words used, I shall be very glad to add them, but I would like to avoid the word "sealed" simply for the reason I have given. If in addition to "securely closed" we should say "fastened or bound together so that it cannot be opened without that being perceived," or something of that kind, I shall be very glad to add it. I was under the impression that subsection 4 had been passed. I do not want, however, to object to the suggestion of the hon. member.

Mr. OLIVER: I am well aware of that, and I am quite willing to submit to the rule; but I am urging that this is the most important stage in the proceeding, and that there should be a more definite wording. Over and above the sealing of the package, which I still think should be done, the returning officer should make a list of the votes cast and put into the package, so that there will be a permanent record of the votes cast and of the number of the votes cast.

Mr. MACDONALD: I do not think the attention of the minister has been called to the fact that there is no provision in section 2 whereby any soldier who may not be able to read or write will be able to cast his vote. There must be some men in that position, and section 2 is the section that provides the manner of voting.

Mr. GERMAN: The Dominion Elections Act provides for that.

Mr. MACDONALD: Yes, but this is a Bill giving the instructions for the parties who are going to take the vote. Where you have a section like section 2 which deals with the whole voting under these exceptional circumstances, the expression of the method means the exclusion of the more general method contained in the Dominion Elections Act.

I would also like to point out that this section provides for the volunteer who desires to vote:

> In the presence of the said officer, but in such a manner as not to disclose to the officer how he is voting.

I would like to know how this is possible. The Dominion Elections Act provides that a person who wants to mark his ballot shall go into a separate apartment away from the officer and scrutineers and make his mark there, and there is absolute secrecy. There cannot be absolute secrecy here. Fancy the situation in which a vote of this kind will be taken. You have the commanding officer of the company or squadron, as the case may be, in a tent at the front, and you have his table in the centre of the tent. Where is the soldier going to go in that tent for the purpose of marking his ballot so that the officer cannot see what he is doing?

These two points seem to me to be entirely weak. If the wish is to preserve the secrecy of the ballot, you are trying to provide an impossibility, in view of the conditions under which the vote would be taken. In the second place, in my judgment, the provisions of the Dominion Elections Act would not apply to the illiterate voter, for all the directions are contained in the Bill, and this would not be covered without some express declaration.

Mr. DOHERTY: There is a clause in the Bill later on providing that this is to be read—

Mr. MACDONALD: I know that.

Mr. DOHERTY: I do not wish to discuss that, but if there be any doubt about the applicability, I am prepared to have the Bill amended so as to expressly declare that section 166 of the Dominion Elections Act shall apply, that being the section applying to those unable to write. Now, with regard to marking the ballot I believe that to require a separate compartment and so on for the marking of the ballot would be to require the impossible. But, for instance, I venture to say, that as the hon. gentleman sits there at his desk, it would be quite possible for him to mark a ballot in such a way that I, standing here, could see him mark it and yet I could not see for which candidate he marked it.

Mr. MACDONALD: This is a very big chamber.

Mr. DOHERTY: And fields are large. I understand that the battle front in Europe extends for miles and miles. If necessary, some of that space could be utilized. I think it is not difficult so to arrange matters so that one can be seen to mark a ballot without it being seen for whom he marks it. I am not now in a position to quote exact instances, but I may say that this is the method provided for in many systems of absentee voting. As to the suggestion of the hon. member for Sunbury and Queens (Mr. H. H. McLean) that a list should be inclosed, I am not going to deny that there would be advantages in having a list made. But we have to remember that if we surround this with too much formality, we shall defeat the very purpose of the measure. After all, the making of the list and inserting it in the package, so far as I can see, would have only this advantage, that if somebody had voted and was entered as one of a certain number on the list and the corresponding ballot did not turn up you would know that the ballot had disappeared. which would be an indication that the parcel had been tampered with. But this would hardly be conclusive, and you would hardly on that basis, reject all the ballots, for it might be that the failure to put the ballot in was the result of an oversight. When these ballots come to the Clerk of the Crown in Chancery he is ordered by the next section to make a record. While there would be usefulness in the list, yet I do not think, in view of the conditions under which this law must be carried out, that we ought to impose more formalities than are absolutely necessary.

Referring to the observations of the hon. member for Edmonton (Mr. Oliver), if we might be allowed to go back to subsection 4, I would like to have it amended in the sense he suggested. I move:

That subsection 4 be reconsidered, and that it be amended by adding, in line thirty-five, after the word "closed," the words "and fastened in such a manner as to make any tampering with the same evident.'

Mr. NESBITT: Is not the minister providing for a list?

Mr. DOHERTY: I pointed out that the advantage of having a list, in my opinion, would not counterbalance the disadvantage of the additional formality.

Mr. NESBITT: It would be a check on the officer himself. It would be no trouble for him to count the number of ballots.

Mr. DOHERTY: The hon. gentleman means to enter only the number, not the names?

Mr. NESBITT: Only the number of the names or envelopes.

Mr. DOHERTY: I have no objection to requiring him to enclose a statement of the number of ballots, in the parcel.

Mr. NESBITT: That would be a certain check.

Amendment agreed to.

Mr. DOHERTY: Now, to provide for the statement of the number of envelopes, I move:

That the section be amended by adding, at the end of line thirty-four, after the word "receptacle,' the words, "in which the officer shall enclose a slip giving the number of envelopes contained in it."

Amendment agreed to.

Mr. MACDONALD: If any special place is provided for the voting of the soldiers at the front, in all probability it will be a tent.

[Mr. Doherty.]

I am quite sure that you cannot work out the idea of secrecy in connection with the marking of the ballot if the soldier has to mark it in the presence of an officer. Why should he mark it in the presence of an officer, if he knows how to read and write? I suggest that words "in the presence of the said officer" be struck out from the fourth line of subsection 4.

Mr. DOHERTY: No man gets a ballot until he makes an affidavit. We thought to secure that the man himself shall mark the ballot. If we allow him to go away from the presence of the officer to mark his ballot, we do not know who will mark that ballot. It is suggested to me by my colleague (Mr. Crothers) that after the word "officer" in line 26 of subsection 4, there be inserted the words "or any other person." I beg to move that subsection 4 be so amended.

Amendment agreed to.

Mr. GERMAN: In every election there are independent candidates in many constituencies. The Government may have a candidate in a certain constituency, and the Opposition, feeling that they cannot carry the constituency, do not put up a candidate; accordingly, an independent candidate offers for election. On the other hand, in some constituency which is very strongly Liberal, the Government may not put up a candidate, and the result will be that there will be an Opposition candidate and an independent candidate. How will the votes be counted in such cases? If the soldiers vote for the Government, and there is no Government candidate, how will the votes be dealt with? One of the very many exceedingly objectionable features which I see in this Bill is that the voters at the front do not know who the candidates are.

Mr. CROTHERS: Does the hon. member offer any suggestion to obviate that difficulty?

Mr. GERMAN: The first suggestion I offer—and I think it is an exceedingly sensible suggestion—is that the Bill be dropped. The second suggestion that I offer is that you do away altogether with the mention of the independent candidate. I simply wish to point out that the soldiers may vote for a Government candidate or an Opposition candidate, and there may be no Government candidate or no Opposition candidate.

Mr. DOHERTY: As to the suggestion that we drop the Bill, of course I cannot agree with the hon. gentleman in that respect. If a man votes for the Government candidate in a particular constituency and there is nobody supporting the Government, that man is in the same position as anybody who votes at home for a person who is not a candidate—he loses his vote. The same thing applies, of course, if he votes for an Opposition candidate or an independent candidate, and there happens not to be any. Speaking personally, I have a strong feeling that the opportunity that is now afforded to the voter to say: I vote for John Smith—naming the candidate—will meet a great many cases. I believe that the knowledge will reach the other side in a great many instances as to who the candidates are or will be, and that this knowledge will enable the soldiers to take the chance in registering their votes, that a certain man is going to be a candidate. I think many ballots will come back containing ballots for particular candidates, and I think that in the bulk of cases it will turn out that the person named on the ballot is the real candidate. I am free to admit that there may be cases where a soldier says: I vote for the independent candidate, and there may turn out to be no independent candidate; also there may be cases where a man may vote for the Government or for the Opposition candidate and there may be no such candidate. These will be exceptional cases, however; I confess that I cannot devise means to avoid that.

Mr. GERMAN: They may be exceptional, but they may not be so exceptional in this case as not to affect the whole result of the election. Sometimes majorities are very narrow.

Mr. ERNEST LAPOINTE: These cases were not exceptional in the province of Quebec during the last election. At that election there were fifty candidates whose platform was opposed to the policies of both the leader of the Government and of the Opposition. They most emphatically disowned any relationship with the present Prime Minister, and one sentence that is well remembered in my province was, Borden is worse than Laurier.

Mr. DOHERTY: That was awfully abusive.

Mr. LAPOINTE: It was well known that most of these gentlemen were Conservatives, and it is well known now that their campaign fund was financed by the Conservative party. I have under my hand the programme of one of these gentlemen, Mr. L. P. Pelletier, now Judge Pelletier, who was the former Postmaster General in this Administration. This is what he said in his speech at Jeune Lorette in accepting the candidature. I am quoting from L'Evenement, the organ of the Conservative party, in its issue of August 30, 1911:

"En second lieu je suis candidat parce qu'à votre voix qui m'appelait s'est jointe la voix du chef nationaliste de ce district, M. Armand Lavergne."

"Je suis aussi candidat comme protestation contre la marine de guerre, et pour contribuer à rémédier à cette loi scélérate."

I will try to translate that: Certainly I am a candidate because to your voice—the voice of the people—which is calling me, is united the voice of the Nationalist leader of this district, Mr. Armand Lavergne. I am also a candidate as a protest against the Naval Law, and to help in having that nefarious law repealed.

Surely the Minister of Justice will not say that Mr. Pelletier was an Independent; for, thirty days after he uttered these words, he was a member of this Administration.

Mr. DOHERTY: He might meet the description of the hon. member for Welland (Mr. German). He was clearly against the Government.

Mr. LAPOINTE: He was not an Independent at all, for he became a member of this Administration thirty days after. I should like to know what the returning officer would do in such a case.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: Put him on the bench.

Mr. LAPOINTE: Would he count the votes in favour of the Government? Perhaps under one of the artful clauses of this Bill the right hon. Prime Minister would be the judge. Is that fair? I do not think so. The right hon. gentleman knows by experience what the independence of the so-called Nationalists amounts to. It would be deceiving the electors to call these men Independents. I am sure that at the last election it would have been very difficult to apply this system in my riding; it would have been very difficult to say to whom the vote should go. I do not know whether there will be any Nationalists next time, I do not think there are many of them left in the province of Quebec. I think provision should be made in the Bill to cover such a case as I have mentioned. Personally I do not see how this Bill can be worked out.

10 p.m.

Mr. DOHERTY: I appreciate the kindly anxiety of the hon. gentleman on behalf of the Nationalists, of whom he says there are no more. We are legislating for the present and the future, not for past conditions. In any event the only ballots that the leader of the Government or the leader of the Opposition can deal with are those that have been given either for the Government or for the Opposition. Their respective power is limited to saying who ought to get that vote, the Prime Minister dealing with votes marked for the Government, and the leader of the Opposition dealing with votes marked for the Opposition. The men who vote will make it quite clear that they want their vote to go to the greatest benefit for the Government or for the Opposition, and I think we have provided a perfectly fair method of determining who that vote for the Government shall be applied to, or who that vote for the Opposition shall be applied to. As for the Independent candidate, in no case will the leader of the Government or the leader of the Opposition be entitled to claim votes given for Independent candidates. Either there will be a person to answer to that description or there will not. If there is such a person he will get the votes. If there is not, the vote will be void.

Mr. MARCIL: Suppose there are two independent candidates.

Mr. DOHERTY: If there are, I do not know how you are going to arrive at a determination as between them. But all our past experience goes to show while such a case is possible, it is very exceptional.

Mr. MARCIL: I think the hon. member for South York (Mr. W. F. Maclean) always runs as an independent candidate.

Mr. DOHERTY: He will get the votes, then.

Mr. MARCIL: Suppose the votes are all marked either for the Government or for the Opposition. The hon. member for South York would not get any of the Government votes, as he would not be a Government candidate.

Mr. DOHERTY: The hon. member for South York is not here to define his exact situation, and I do not think I am called upon to do it.

Mr. VERVILLE: Suppose that a great number of ballots are marked Independent, and that there is no Independent candidate in that division. Those ballots would not be counted. Is that fair? We are so anxious to give the soldiers an opportunity to vote that we should certainly see that their votes are not lost. Again, a candidate may accept the fiscal policy of a certain party, but be against that party on other questions. Suppose that in his speeches he lets the people know where he stands, where would those ballots go? It is such a technical question that perhaps only a lawyer could decide it. Perhaps it would be better to divide the votes, seeing that the candidate favoured one part of the policy of his leader, but not another part. I suppose my hon. friend would say that those votes would be rejected. As we are so anxious to give votes to the soldiers, we should see that the votes are not thrown away. My hon. friend said that there will be Liberal candidates at the next election. I hope there will be quite a few of them. There may also be some Socialist candidates; I think there will. They might be elected but you could not be sure. It would be a good thing to have a few of them in this House. Will one mark "socialist" on his ballot if there is no socialist or candidate of an independent turn of mind? It has been the custom of many people in this country to mark "socialist" on their ballots and thus spoil their ballots because they want to acknowledge the fact that they are for socialism. The more we study this Bill the more we see its defects. I would be sorry to think that any soldiers should lose their votes on this account. Canadian soldiers have probably learned more of socialism than they ever knew before. They are now in contact with elements which probably were not so familiar to them on this side and it may be that a great many of these men will be willing to cast their votes for socialists. There are many socialists in Belgium, England, and France, they will be associating with those who hold these ideas at the front and they also may come in contact with German prisoners who are socialists. Therefore, there may be a very great change of opinion and I am afraid that a large number of votes will be spoiled in that way.

Mr. DOHERTY: I do not know that my position enables me to give any authoritative solution of the difficulty suggested. But I would take it that if you had in a constituency a Government candidate, an Opposition candidate and, say, a socialist candidate, and you had votes given for an independent candidate, I would understand that under these circumstances the man who classified himself as a socialist, or came under some other designation would thereby announce himself neither as supporting the Government nor the Opposition, and would meet the description of an independent candidate. But it will not do for me to deal with that. If that question arises the courts will have to determine it. We have provided for people as being for the Government, for the Opposition, or for neither one nor the other and I would be disposed to think that any man who adopted a designation such as the hon. gentleman suggests would be starting out on a line which would place him in the position of being neither for the Government nor the Opposition. That, to my mind, would meet the description of the hon. gentleman.

Mr. PROULX: In the case of a deferred election both might be for the Government.

Mr. DOHERTY: The gentlemen will vote either for the Government or the Opposition. If they vote for the Opposition, and both of the candidates are for the Government, they will be in the position of having voted for no candidate if it turns out that that is the situation.

Mr. TURGEON: I have always been opposed to electors being called upon to vote for anything but a personality. If they are asked to vote for the Government or the Opposition there is intimidation. When the officer confronts the voter and asks him if he votes for or against the Government it is certainly intimidation especially in the case of the soldier at the front. No one in this country values more highly the sacrifices which our soldiers are making than I do. I value so much the sacrifices of our soldiers and I would think they had so much to do in this terrible war, the results of which must certainly be disastrous to our children at the front, that I would not even attempt to bring in a bill to give franchise to the soldiers until the time when they had returned from the front bearing the laurels of victory. We all expect and hope that this terrible war will be ended favourably to the cause of the Allies before next September or October. It has been a very strenuous war but the most terrible part of it is to come because the Allies are bound to conquer, as they must conquer in the interest of humanity. I would like to ask any hon. members of this House why we should be rushing on an election during the most terrible part of this war. Lord Kitchener told us not six weeks ago that the war would commence in May. It is about commencing now, and the sacrifices that our armies have made during the last five or six months are nothing as compared with the sacrifices which they will be called upon to bear within the next six months. The only encouragement that the soldier has in the trenches is that derived from the comradeship of the man who is beside him. He does not inquire whether he is a Liberal or Conservative, whether he is for the Government or for the Opposition, he knows that he will help to sustain his life and courage in the great struggle that is being waged in the cause of humanity. That is the situation, and unless we can draw up a Bill which will give the franchise in such a form as we all desire, such as will enable the soldier to cast an independent vote, we should not be too eager to expedite this measure. During the discussion this afternoon and this evening the Minister of Justice by his avowals has admitted the impossibility of framing a Bill which will meet all the requirements of the men at the front. I am for votes for the soldiers, but why not wait until another session? We have supplied the Government with all the money they need to carry on the war. We look for British examples. Next December the British Parliament will expire. Is the British Parliament busy to-day passing a Bill providing votes for the soldiers at the front? It is contemplating the possibility of extending the life of Parliament in order that there may be no election during the war. We have eighteen months yet to go, and I am sure that in that eighteen months the war will be settled satisfactorily to the Allies, or it will never be settled. The discussion having demonstrated the impracticability of the Bill which we have before us, let us consider it for another year and if the war is not settled by that time the Bill can be taken up again and brought into operation at the expiration of this Parliament, which will take place in November, 1916. I submit these considerations to the Minister of Justice and I appeal to his judgment.

Mr. LEMIEUX: Has the Bill a provision to meet the case of a soldier who through the action of the enemy has lost the use of his arms, or is invalided in some way so that he cannot sign the ballot paper?

Mr. DOHERTY: That suggestion was made by the hon. member for Pictou and I answered that section 166 of the Dominion Elections Act, which deals with persons who are physically unable to mark the ballot paper, would be made to apply to this Act.

Mr. MARCIL: Will the words "I vote" on the ballot papers be in French and English?

Mr. DOHERTY: I will be very glad to put them both in French and in English.

Mr. PUGSLEY: I suppose some of the affidavits should be in French?

Mr. DOHERTY: We could have some printed in French and some in English.

Mr. MARCIL: Does the ballot bear the initials of the officer who takes the vote?

Mr. DOHERTY: There is no provision for that but if it is considered a precaution I have no objection to insert it. We were relying on the fact that the officer saw the man mark the actual ballot. In view of the circumstances under which this vote is to be taken I would like to avoid introducing any complication unless it is of manifest advantage.

What we did rely upon in that regard as to the identity of the ballot was the fact that the officer would see that the whole thing was done simultaneously, and that he was in a position to see the marking of the ballot. Then the ballot as it stands in the form provided in the Bill will have the counterfoil with the number on it which will remain on the stub as it is handed out, and it seems to me that that is sufficient identification that it is the same ballot, because the man does his voting without leaving the sight of the officer. I would like to avoid complicating the matter.

Mr. PUGSLEY: There is no evidence that the same ballot will get back to Canada.

Mr. DOHERTY: Would the initials of the returning officer be sufficient?

Mr. PUGSLEY: I do not think the initials would be of much use being put on abroad, because if any one wanted to switch the ballot, he could do it.

Mr. NESBITT: He could initial the envelope as being closed.

Mr. OLIVER: There is a general provision that if a ballot has a special mark,, it loses its value. Under the circumstances in which the ballots are to be marked, there is a very great possibility that there may be marking that will tend to disclose identity, or that will not be in accordance with the ordinary usage.

It would be very undesirable if the very strict rule that is generally applied to the marking of ballots in their being counted were applied to the making of these ballots. Will that strict rule be applied under the provisions of this Bill to these ballots?

Mr. DOHERTY: That is the rule that provides that if a ballot is marked so that it can be identified, it loses its value?

Mr. OLIVER: Yes.

Mr. DOHERTY: If I understand the matter aright, in the application of this section, it becomes a question to be determined by the circumstances of each particular marking, whether a mark in a certain way is a mark by which a man can be identified. While I have not had occasion very recently to look into the jurisprudence in connection with the subject, I do not think I am wrong in saying that the courts have adopted pretty generally the rule that you should lean in favour of the view that will give effect to the vote. I have no doubt that the courts in determining whether a mark, that may be claimed to be a marking that may serve to identify, should be so considered or not, will take into consideration the circumstances under which the ballot is marked. It would not be safe for us to wipe out the provision entirely; the safest course is to leave to the good judgment of the courts to bear in mind the circumstances in which the ballots are marked when determining whether the particular way in which the ballot is marked will lead to the identity of the voter.

Mr. OLIVER: These ballots will count as much as any other ballot, and sometimes an election turns on the marking of one or two ballots. Therefore you cannot give too great care to determining what shall and what shall not be counted.

Mr. PUGSLEY: I have an amendment which I would like to suggest to my hon. friend to come as subsection 11 of section 2 which we have been considering. Before reading the proposed amendment, I would like to call the attention of the minister to the fact—and to emphasise it as strongly as possible—that Parliament is proposing to ask officers of the Imperial Army to perform certain duties under this legislation. These officers are all under the control of the British War Office, and of course their military duty is the paramount duty which they are called upon to perform. Therefore

I would suggest to the minister that it would be an act of courtesy; that it would lead to greater harmony in the discharge of their duties by the different officers and to better understanding with the War Office, and that it would be altogether exceedingly desirable that before we give effect to the provisions of this Bill seeking to impose these duties upon Imperial officers over whom this Government has no control, the Secretary of State for War should be consulted and his approval of the Bill obtained. I throw out this suggestion which I think is worthy of favourable consideration, and it is altogether desirable that it should be added to the Bill. The amendment which I would suggest is:

That there be added as subsection 11 of section 2 the words:

No action shall be taken under the foregoing provisions of this section until the same have been submitted to and approved by the Secretary of State for War of the United Kingdom.

Mr. DOHERTY: This suggestion, perhaps not precisely in this form but in substance, has been made at different times throughout this debate. For myself, I think it so perfectly obvious that neither the Secretary of State for War on the other side nor any member of the Imperial Government, nor any authority whatsoever over there, would ever imagine that we meant to force the operation of this law to the detriment of military operations or so as to interfere with anything that the military authorities could consider necessary, that it would be absolutely out of place that we should put in this Bill something that would suggest that we thought that they might think us endeavouring to do that. I am quite confident that they would never think so. That being so with regard to this particular case, I think generally speaking, it is a highly objectionable proposition that this Parliament should legislate subject to the permission of the Secretary of State for War or of any other minister of His Majesty's Government of the United Kingdom. I would like to point out what I said in moving the second reading of this Bill, that to my mind this is purely a Bill recognizing the right to the franchise of a certain class of Canadian subjects of the King and providing a method whereby they may exercise that franchise. It is absolutely without question that where availing themselves of that right will interfere in any way with the paramount duty of those Canadian subjects of the King as soldiers of the King, they themselves will not allow it to interfere, and that if they were disposed to do so, the military authorities can be absolutely trusted not to allow it to interfere. That is a matter which the military authorities are absolutely in a position to control; but for my part, and with all the respect that I entertain for the military authorities of the United Kingdom and for His Majesty's Government of the United Kingdom, I, as one member of the Parliament of Canada and as one representative of the people of Canada, certainly do not think that it would be the proper thing that we should legislate as to who in Canada should have the franchise and who in Canada should be afforded the means of exercising that right, and say in express terms that we subject our judgment upon that question either to the Secretary of State for War or to His Majesty's Government as a whole of the United Kingdom. I do think we owe that much recognition to the autonomy of this country, that much respect to this Parliament itself. So completely is it recognized that the power relating to the election of representatives of the people in this country belongs exclusively to the Parliament of Canada and to the courts that the Parliament of Canada constitutes, that His Majesty's Judicial Committee of the Privy Council have consistently declined to entertain applications for leave to appeal in cases bearing upon elections to this House, laying down the doctrine that it was within Canada that matters pertaining to the election of members to the House of Commons of Canada should properly be decided. It therefore appears to me obviously unnecessary that we should go forward implying in any way to the Secretary of War that we have the faintest idea that our legislation can under any circumstances interfere with his military control of military operations. In the second place, I think it, in principle, undesirable in the strongest sense of that word, that we should in an Act dealing with the Canadian franchise, subject the action of this House to any approval or disapproval outside of this Parliament of Canada. Therefore, I must, for my part, decline to accept the suggested amendment. I may point out, if it is thought that in doing what we are doing here to-night we are overstepping the proper bounds within which the Parliament of Canada should keep itself, that there is in His Majesty a power of disallowance. But I do not think we can go forward with the implied admission that there is something in our legislation which could be objectionable. For my part, I see nothing to give rise to any well-founded objection on the part of the Secretary of State for War or the Government of the United Kingdom, and I am not ready to go forward with the suggestion, which would be involved in our submitting the legislation to the approbation of this minister, that there is something objectionable in this Bill. An hon. gentleman said to me to-day, "Qui s'excuse, s'accuse". If we go with such excuses we imply that there is lurking in our minds the belief that we have tried to do something which might interfere with the legitimate authority of the Secretary of State for War. I have no consciousness of having done anything of that kind, and the legislation we are dealing with to-night seems to me so obviously and in a very special manner a matter to be dealt with exclusively by this Parliament that I cannot consent that legislation being subjected to the approval of any Minister of the Crown in the United Kingdom.

Mr. PUGSLEY: The hon. minister has entirely misunderstood the amendment I have proposed. I was careful that it should have no reference whatever to section 1, which is the section which establishes the franchise and gives the vote to soldiers on active service, subject only to their having had a residence of thirty days in this country. As to that, I raise no question by my amendment. But section 2 provides the machinery by which the soldiers are to be permitted to exercise this right, and the minister proposes by the various subsections of this section to exact an obligation from, and impose a duty upon, officers of the Imperial Government, officers who are in the Imperial army. Without a "by your leave" or suggesting that we do him the courtesy to ask the consent of the Secretary for War, we will impose on these officers, who are abroad for military duty and in the interest of the Empire, and under the absolute control of the Imperial Government, the duty of carrying out the provisions of this Act. And the minister says that, because I proposed that before exacting this obligation from these officers the Secretary of State for War shall be consulted and shall approve of it, I am in some way humiliating this Parliament, and suggesting that by possibility the Secretary of State for War may not approve of it. Surely the minister must be wrong. All I say by my amendment and my argument is that we are asking these British officers to do what we have no right to ask them to do. We are by statute imposing upon them an obligation which we have no earthly right to impose on them. We are saying by our proposed statute that, instead of appointing our own electoral officers and sending them abroad to give to our soldiers the right to exercise their franchise, we will impose this obligation upon an Imperial officer. Is it humiliating to this Parliament—Does it detract from the authority of this Parliament if we say that, before so imposing this obligation upon these Imperial officers, the Secretary of State for War shall be consulted and shall give his consent?—not to the whole Bill, not to that part which extends the franchise, but only to that part which imposes these obligations upon the officers of the Imperial service. Is it detracting from the dignity of this Parliament if I say that before doing that the Secretary for War shall be consulted and shall approve of it? My mind may be different from that of the minister, but to me it seems cheeky and absolutely indefensible for this Parliament to declare by law that this task shall be cast upon the Imperial officers who are at the front to do Imperial duty, without asking the consent of the Secretary of State for War under whom they are serving. I cannot but express extreme surprise that my hon. friend regards this amendment unfavourably. I can do nothing further now, but I can say that when the Bill comes up for third reading, I shall have an opportunity of presenting my amendment again.

Mr. DOHERTY: The hon. gentleman's amendment is to the effect that this Bill shall not come into operation—

Mr. PUGSLEY: No, only section 2.

Mr. DOHERTY: Then, we are reduced to the operation of section 2. It is so perfectly obvious that these operations will not interfere with any matter which is properly within the authority of the Secretary of State for War that, for my part, I do not see why the suggestion should be made that they will do so. During something over an hour this evening I was condemned very forcefully, and with a great deal of eloquence and sincerity, by the hon. member for Edmonton and the hon. member for St. John city because I was neither imposing nor could impose any obligation on these officers of the British army. Now I am being condemned because I am imposing an obligation upon the officers of the British army without consulting the Secretary of State for War. I wonder what is the real opinion of the hon. member for St. John city with regard to what I am doing. I was wrong a while ago because I was not imposing and could not impose an obligation on these officers, and I ought to get a commission of people who, this Government not being able to do so, would go over there and impose obligations upon the officers of the British army. That was the head and front of my offending then. Now—I do not know whether this is the other end of my offending—my offending is that I am imposing obligations upon these officers without the consent of the Secretary of State for War. I do not know whether anything will be gained by my repeating it, but it is so perfectly clear that nothing in this Bill is an obligation that can in the slightest degree come into conflict with the authority of the Secretary of State for War that I entirely fail to see the utility of this proviso. I quite understand that, thinking that we are doing something which involves an infringement upon the rights and jurisdiction of the Secretary of State for War—something which they describe as "cheeky" —hon. gentlemen express the view that we ought to put this proviso in. I fail, however, to see the necessity for it. Even though we limit it only to the operation of section 2, it would be unfortunate to introduce into our legislation anything that would be susceptible of being interpreted as implying that we are legislating subject to the consent of a Minister of the Crown of the United Kingdom.

Mr. OLIVER: I wish to correct the minister so far as my attitude was concerned. I do not recall that I was condemning him.

Mr. DOHERTY: I mean to say, condemning my course.

Mr. OLIVER: If I may be permitted, I do not even agree to that. All I wanted was to establish a fact as it existed, and then to draw certain conclusions from that fact. I do not wish to be understood as condemning either the minister or his course; all I wanted was to know exactly what the course was, and what the consequences of it would be. At this moment I am not going to concern myself with the constitutional side of this question or the maintenance of the dignity of Parliament, but I am still concerned as to the probability of the volnteers overseas exercising the privilege or the right which it is proposed that they shall have an opportunity of exercising. It must be obvious that it is a matter of interest to us, if we are desirous of their exercising the right that we place within their reach, to know whether the authorities that are supreme on that side of the water are willing that they should exercise that right. It is obvious, too, that if the authorities there are not willing, the volunteers are certainly not going to be able to exercise it. On the other hand, if the authorities are willing, the exercise of the right by the soldiers then depends, as I have said, on the whim of the officers. I do not wish to criticise unduly, but I would have thought that it would have been wise for the Government to become informed as to what the view of the British military authorities is in regard to the application of this provision. They have not seen fit to do so, however; we are passing the legislation, and there is no time to find out now. It seems to me that it is a fair proposition that a saving clause should be inserted in the Bill such as has been suggested by the hon. member for the City of St. John.

Mr. MACDONALD: The proposal made by the hon .member for St. John city is so obviously proper and right that I cannot understand the position taken by the Minister of Justice in regard to it. What did we send these men across the ocean for? We sent them across the ocean to place them at the disposal of King George and his Imperial officers, headed by the Secretary of State for War, to fight the battles of the Empire. That is their first duty; that is their whole duty; that is that duty the fulfilment of which with credit to themselves will cause us to give them the glory of victory when they return. The moment they landed on the soil of Great Britain they ceased to be under the supervision of the Government of Canada, except in the matter of receiving their pay. As to their disposition; as to where they shall go and what they shall do; as to how they shall perform their duties—that is under the direction of Lord Kitchener, and no one else. The Secretary of State for War having control of their movements for the purpose of defending the Empire and of attacking the Germans, I agree with the hon. member for St. John that it is cheeky and impertinent for us to attempt to interfere with his direction and authority by saying that his commanding officers and captains shall do this, that or the other thing on a particular day or days when he, perchance, may wish them to be doing something else. I think also that the suggestion of the hon. member for St. John that the Minister of Militia should have been here during the discussion of this Bill is very apt. The Minister of Justice, erudite lawyer that he is, has no special acquaintance with military discipline, military law or military operations.

Mr. LEMIEUX: He was a soldier.

Mr. MACDONALD: He is an honorary colonel, like myself.

Mr. DOHERTY: I am a real captain, unlike yourself.

Mr. MACDONALD: The Minister of Justice will hardly claim that the situation just now with regard to military operations is such that any one on this side of the ocean is possessed of knowledge which would enable him to take any action interfering with the authority and direction of Lord Kitchener in the controlling of the movements of the men under his supervision. When in the committee I ventured to make a suggestion as to what should be done, my hon. friend took the ground at that time that you could not dictate to these men, that it was a matter entirely for the commanding officer to say whether he would do this or that. When some one suggested that the commanding officer should make out a list of the men who came before him to vote, my hon. friend took the ground that we ought not to impose on the officers in that way. All through the discussion my hon. friend recognized the fact that he had no control or authority over these men, and that he could not interfere with them. If that is so, who has the control of them? The Secretary of War, unquestionably. What is the use of us keeping this House sitting day after day in order to pass legistion which will be inoperative, absolutely a dead letter, if Lord Kitchener, in view of the issues that are at stake, should take it into his head to say: I am not going to let my commanding officers waste a week or ten days running around picking up votes from the men who ought to be getting ready to fight the Germans. I think the suggestion of my hon. friend from St. John (Mr. Pugsley), that we should say that this legislation is subject to the approval of the man who has control of the commanding officers, is but due recognition by the Canadian Parliament of the fact that our soldiers are under the control of Great Britain. There is no divided authority in this matter. A lot of confusion seems to exist in the public mind; some people think that the Canadian Government have got some kind of a string on our soldiers who have gone to the front. Why, every man that signed the muster roll agreed to serve the Empire for three years, and to give his services not to the Canadian Government but to King George, and to obey the Imperial authorities. This legislation practically amounts to saying to our soldiers: You shall not go out and fight; you and your commanding officers must give up your training in England for this war, and turn out for a week or ten days to see whether you cannot get in some votes. I say that any measure of this kind which did not contain in it the stipulation that the consent of Lord Kitchener should be obtained before it became operative would be not merely cheek and impertinence, but an insult to Lord Kitchener as well. That is the situation; and to talk of autonomy under these circumstances only shows that hon. gentlemen on the other side of the House have forgotten that there is a war going on; otherwise, they would never have proposed this legislation.

Mr. DOHERTY: The hon. gentleman has been impressing upon us things that are so absolutely obvious that it would be absurd for us to make a provision in regard to them, as though we did not know that they were perfectly obvious. This law cannot interfere with the military authority of Lord Kitchener.

Mr. MARCIL: Because Kitchener will not allow it to interfere.

Mr. DOHERTY: And it does not pretend to. We simply assume that Lord Kitchener gives us credit for common sense; and we further assume that Lord Kitchener, having at least as much knowledge with regard to military matters, well, perhaps not quite the degree of knowledge of my 11 p.m. distinguished friend and cohonorary colonel the hon. member for Pictou, will look upon this matter with common sense; and so we leave it in his hands with absolute confidence that he will see to it that if anything under this Act interferes with the performance of military duty it shall not be done.

Mr. MACDONALD: Why do you not say so?

Mr. DOHERTY: Because it is so entirely unnecessary to say so; because the Act as it stands, without those words, is neither intended to interfere nor can it interfere with the authority of Lord Kitchener; and because I think it would be an unfortunate thing for us to intimate that we were passing legislation that would so interfere with this great work as to make it necessary for us to first ask his leave. As I have said several times in the course of this discussion we are perfectly willing, if need be, that the Act should lie there a dead letter, rather than that there should be interference with the paramount duty of the soldier. Just let me point out the degree to which the hon. member for Pictou has found it necessary to read into this Bill things that are not in it. He tells this House that in this Bill there is said to the officers of Canada; "You shall not go out to fight; you shall take ten days for running around to pick up votes." When I propose a Bill of that kind I shall recognize that I am proposing something so utterly and entirely indefensible that I cannot conceive of any man being so cheeky and so impertinent as to do what the hon. gentleman suggests, namely, that we should present ourselves to Lord Kitchener and say: My dear Lord Kitchener, we are passing a law saying to your soldiers, you shall give up your fighting, you shall abandon your military duties and take a week or ten days off for the purpose of running around and picking up votes; and we have come, Lord Kitchener, to ask your leave to pass that law. Could anything be more offensive to Lord Kitchener than that anybody should suggest that he could possibly give leave for that kind of legislation? If I ever dreamed of proposing legislation of that kind I certainly should not like to be the gentleman delegated to ask Lord Kitchener's leave to give effect to it. This legislation proposes nothing of that kind. It is purely enabling legislation making it possible for the soldiers to vote, subject of course to the performance of their military duties; and I think it would be as offensive to our soldiers for us to suggest that they were willing to abandon their duties in order to pick up votes as it would be to suggest to Lord Kitchener that we thought it possible that he would give us leave to have legislation of that sort made operative. The moment the operation of this legislation runs counter to the performance of the military duties of the soldiers, automatically it ceases to have operation.

Mr. MACDONALD: My hon. friend is arguing in a kind of a circle. He says that this legislation will be inoperative unless Lord Kitchener consents, and yet he says that this legislation is only for the purpose of enabling the soldiers to vote. Why, those soldiers can vote only if Lord Kitchener lets them. When we suggest a provision that the Bill shall not become operative unless Lord Kitchener consents to it, my hon. friend argues that the autonomy of Canada is in peril. Now what sense is there in passing legislation for the purpose of enabling men who are on active service to vote, unless Lord Kitchener gives his consent to it? It is no use our fooling away time here passing legislation which is not to be operative.

Mr. DOHERTY: Why do you do it?

Mr. MACDONALD: The hon. gentleman knows that the session came to a conclusion naturally a few days ago. The hon. gentleman knows that he never could draft a Bill to provide in any practical way for the soldiers on active service casting their votes. For what reason, in process of time, have we had this measure evolved? My hon. friend does not meet this issue at all by saying what he does say in answer to the objection. It is held up to the country that they are proposing a method by which the soldiers can vote. Either the measure is a successful and practical one, and one under which the soldiers can vote, or it is not. My hon. friend says to-night that it is not a practical measure, that it is not one under which a man can vote, that it is an enabling measure only if Lord Kitchener chooses to call a halt to operations so that under section 2 some of these men can vote. I would like to know what my hon. friend does say if he does not say that.

Mr. DOHERTY: I said that if it does not interfere with the performance of any military duty nobody will interfere to prevent it taking effect. It does not interfere in any of its provisions with the performance of military duties.

Mr. MACDONALD: It does interfere. Every line of section 2 interferes with the performance of some duty by the commanding officers of the army whose business it is to fight the Germans. Otherwise all of this section 2 is nonsense. If this section does not mean that the commanding officers are going to take some time to do this work correctly, and if these officers are not to be diverted from their duty preparing for and taking this vote, I do not know what this measure means. It is an enabling measure, says my hon. friend; it is not compulsory. That means that if any one of these officers attached to the Canadian contingent chooses to say: I do not want to take the votes of my men and I am not going to do it, that you are not going to have the votes of that branch of the service taken at all. Then there is this further consideration. General orders are issued either in England, Bermuda or France, providing that various duties shall be undertaken by the commanding officer. Except in times of extraordinary emergency these general orders are always issued a couple of days before the actual performance of the duty assigned to the officer, and it may be that an officer's time is fully taken up in pursuance of one of these general orders. Under the circumstances must he disregard the general orders and pay attention to an Act of the Canadian Parliament? Are these officers going to pay attention to the orders of General Alderson or are they going to pay attention to an Act of this Parliament? My hon. friend says that they will pay attention to the orders of General Alderson. The result is that this measure is of no use unless his superior officer, his commander, and the Secretary of State for War, definitely intimate to Gen. Alderson that it is his duty to see that sufficient time is allowed on various days for the taking of this vote. Unless this legislation is to be subject to the direction of General Kitchener it is mere waste paper. We are wasting time talking about it. The position of the Minister of Justice indicates that. That being so, is it not ordinary politeness to say to Lord Kitchener, the man to whom the whole Emipre looks, and who has the responsibility of seing us through this war: Having control over our troops at the front, is it possible for you to arrange for them to vote under the proper method? That being the fact, we should say so and it should be put in the Act .

Mr. MARCIL: I have every respect for the hon. Minister of Justice (Mr. Doherty), but I am sorry to see that the position he takes to-night is not one in keeping with the general attitude of the Government. From the very outbreak of the war we were told in all the declarations of the Prime Minister and of his colleagues that the Government, in connection with every move that was being taken, were in close consultation with the home Government. It was stated that nothing was done unless the War Office was consulted. Yet the minister has declared to-night that the amendment proposed by my hon. friend from St. John (Mr. Pugsley) places us in a position of inferiority in such a way that it would make us subservient to the wishes of a minister in Great Britain in the exercise of what the hon. gentleman considers to be a free right of the Canadian Government—the granting of the franchise to whomsoever it pleases. It is a long time since Downing street rule has been battered out of Canada and there is no intention of reviving it, but at the present time every move in our war policy is subservient to the wishes of the Imperial Government. It could not be otherwise. The only way in which we can take an active part in this great war is by co-operating with the British authorities. Instead of passing a measure which would be accepted unanimously by the Canadian Parliament and the people, we find that we have only a measure which has been tattered and torn, which has been amended in every respect, and which is going out of this House in such a condition as to threaten it with falling into contempt because it cannot be enforced. A law which cannot be enforced, a law which is allowed to fall into contempt, is of no advantage to the public or to the people for whose benefit it was especially intended. I think the amendment proposed by my hon. friend from St. John is elementary and should be accepted by the Government. In order to make sure that the soldiers on the other side will really have a chance of casting their votes the Government should neglect no opportunity, they should do everything that is possible to be done to show their sincerity in the matter and to make it certain that this Act shall not become a dead letter. I regret that the minister has not accepted this amendment and I hope that before the Bill reaches the stage for its third reading better counsels will have prevailed, and that it will be accepted, if only in the interest of the soldiers themselves. The Government have assured us that they are very anxious that the Canadian soldiers shall have an opportunity of casting their votes but inasmuch as they have neglected to enter into communication with the War Office through the proper channels the right of our Canadian soldiers to exercise the franchise may be placed in jeopardy.

Mr. LEMIEUX: I wish to express my opinion of the amendment proposed by my hon. friend from St. John (Mr. Pugsley). I am glad to know that the Minister of Justice is a convert to Canadian autonomy.

Mr. DOHERTY: A convert?

Mr. LEMIEUX: Unfortunately his plea for Canadian autonomy does not work in with this proposed legislation. If the Canadian soldiers were acting under the Canadian Militia Act I would understand the plea of my hon. friend, but we have given all that away by allowing our volunteers to go beyond the boundaries of our country and serve in the Imperial army. I am in favour of giving votes to our soldiers if we can provide proper machinery for them to exercise the franchise. The moment our soldiers leave the shores of Canada, they are under British Army regulations. Their prime duty is to fight for the liberties of the British Empire, and the Canadian Government cannot impose any other duty on them without first obtaining the sanction of the British military authorities. Not only must we require the goodwill of Lord Kitchener to carry out the provisions of this Bill, but Lord Kitchener himself may have to consult the officers commanding the Canadian troops, and possibly also the French and Belgian generals with whose armies the Canadian soldiers may at the time be intermingled. It is quite possible that General Alderson or Sir John French may have to consult General Joffre and other French generals, operating in northern France or in Belgium, where the Canadian soldiers may be. The Minister of Justice shakes his head, but he has served with honour in the North-West rebellion and knows what military discipline is, for both officers and men. Will he tell me that when a regiment is in action any outside civil authority, no matter how high, can interfere with the direction of the commanding officer? The Minister of Justice will not deny that proposition.

Mr. DOHERTY: I certainly will not deny it.

Mr. LEMIEUX: Then, the hon. gentleman should not hazard passing this legislation without having first obtained the sanction and goodwill of the British War Office. Should this Bill become law, it is quite possible that some officers will agree that the soldiers may vote, while others may be opposed to it, and may answer that having received no orders from the War Office they shall not allow their men to play politics when the fate of the Empire is at stake. I submit that it is not beneath our dignity to insert a provision in this Bill that it shall only come into operation after the British military authorities have given their consent to it. I may be all wrong, but it occurs to me that the proposed amendment of the hon. member (Mr. Pugsley) is most deserving of the approval of the committee. I repeat that I shall be proud to see our soldiers enabled to exercise their franchise, but the machinery provided for in this Bill is obscure, and it lends itself to serious irregularities, I will not say corruption. Nevertheless, if the Government desires to pass it, they should at least take care, when this franchise is to be exercised in a foreign country, by our soldiers who are fighting under the direction of the British War Office, that the approval of the British military authorities should be obtained.

Mr. DOHERTY: I do not want to contradict the description of affairs with regard to the operation of this legislation which the hon. gentleman has just made. I think his description is a conclusive demonstration of the entire absence of any necessity for the suggested amendment. Our soldiers are soldiers absolutely and undoubtedly, and I do not quite understand what the hon. gentleman's suggestion could do to produce a different situation as regards the carrying on of any war-like operations under the control of the British War Office authorities. It has not entered into my mind to conceive that this legislation of ours could in its operation under any conceivable circumstances be allowed to interfere with the performance of their duties by our soldiers. If it does interfere, then if we go to Lord Kitchener to ask his leave to let it interfere, I have no doubt that it will be his duty to refuse that permission just as it will certainly be utterly cheeky and impertinent for us to ask for it to operate under conditions where it will interfere. On the other hand, under conditions where it will not interfere, which are the only conditions under which it can operate, I really cannot bring myself to see that Lord Kitchener is of such a disposition that we shall forfeit his good-will because simply we allow something to go on that in no way interferes with the performance of the military duties of our men. In other words, according to conditions, one thing will happen or the other. If the conditions are such that the carrying out of this voting will interfere with military duties, Lord Kitchener neither would nor should grant us permission, and we certainly should not go asking a permission which he neither would nor should grant. On the other hand, conditions may be such that all this will interfere in no way with military operations, and I for my part decline to assume that it will be considered necessary for us to go and ask leave, and objectionable if we do not ask leave, when we are simply allowing a law, having to do not with the performance of the soldier's duty but with the exercise of the citizen's right, to take its course and to operate with regard to our own citizens.

Mr. TURRIFF: I am sure the discussion that has taken place during the last two or three days on this subject must have satisfied the hon. Minister of Justice that it is very difficult to lay down conditions under which the vote of the Canadian soldiers can be taken at the front. The very fact that the Bill now before us is an altogether different Bill from the one introduced by my hon. friend the Minister of Justice some two or three days ago is proof of what I say, and the minister must surely see now that the longer it is discussed, the more difficulties arise in the way of carrying out this proposition. If that is the case, why not go back to the proper course? My hon. friend must be particularly anxious to have the soldiers vote when he is going to all this trouble and proposing a Bill that cannot be carried out in any reasonable manner. If my hon. friend and the Government are so anxious to have the votes of the soldiers, why not do the decent, fair and honest thing, and say that there will be no election at the present time? Why not wait until the war is over and let the soldiers come back, and then all those who are entitled to vote will be allowed to vote? Would not that be better than putting forward a half-baked Bill such as the one we are now discussing which proposes ways and means of having the votes taken and sent back here, when neither the minister nor any one else knows how his proposition can be carried out? Why go on with a proposition of this kind when the whole trouble can be obviated by doing the proper thing? There is more than a year and a half for this Parliament to run; and if the war is not over in a year from now, although in all probability it will be, if my hon. friend still wants to give the soldiers votes, we shall have a year to consider the matter. But now in the declining hours of the session to put forward a measure of this kind; to try to force it through to give votes to men who are in another country and who are out of our jurisdiction altogether, and then to try to do it without the authority of the one man who has charge of the whole matter and to object to ask the consent of that man, all this is something that I cannot understand. The minister a minute ago seemed to think it would be something unheard of for us to ask that Lord Kitchener should be consulted, or that we should make the Bill inoperative until he gave his consent. On the other hand he thinks it is all right for us to pass legislation instructing different men to carry on certain work when they cannot do anything at all without getting the consent of Lord Kitchener. The whole matter is too absurd for sane men to be arguing over it for two or three days, and to keep the House here in session on a matter of this kind, when the work is all practically done. There are two or three ways in which to get over the difficulty. I have asked my hon. friend once or twice already who has asked that the soldiers be given an opportunity of voting.

An hon. MEMBER: Every one.

Mr. TURRIFF: I venture to say that not a single organization in Canada nor any individual has asked that the soldiers be given an opportunity to vote. It is the hon. gentlemen on the treasury benches who are anxious to get the votes—perhaps not so anxious to get the votes as to manipulate them. My hon. friend now must see the difficulties in the way, and he still refuses to make the Bill inoperative until Lord Kitchener gives his consent. Imagine Lord Kitchener consenting to an election being taken on a certain day, and on that day word comes for a general advance against the enemy.

Mr. DOHERTY: Just imagine asking Lord Kitchener leave for a thing like that!

Mr. TURRIFF: That is exactly what my hon. friend will be asking under this Bill, that is, for authority to take a vote at the front when he does not know at what moment after that authority is given orders may come for a general advance, with the result that the vote may be taken at one part of the front and not at another part. It is quite likely, as some hon. gentlemen have pointed out, that the officers commanding in certain cases will say: I am not here to make politics; I am not here to peddle around begging votes from this man or from that man; I am here to fight the battles of the Empire, and I will take no part in this whatever. Therefore you will have some sections of the army voting and other sections not voting. Although I have been in this House for a good many years, I have never before seen such a crude piece of legislation introduced.

I would sincerely ask the Minister of Justice to withdraw this Bill. It is an impracticable proposition. If he wants to get the votes of the soldiers let him put off the elections until the war is over. If the war is not over next year we can easily get authority from the Imperial Parliament to extend this Parliament until the war is over.

Then, when the soldiers come back, every one who is entitled to vote will be able to cast that vote and cast it in the proper manner.

Mr. PUGSLEY: I desire to say just one word in answer to the Minister of Justice. Impressed as he must necessarily be by the force of the argument that this Parliament has no right to impose a duty on the officers of the Imperial army, he said that this measure imposed no duty, that it is merely an enabling law. Let us see the evidence. Subsection 3 of section 2 provides that the Clerk of the Crown in Chancery shall notify the secretary of the High Commissioner by cable of a general election, and the secretary shall thereupon send a sufficient number of ballot papers and envelopes to the chief paymaster of the Canadian expeditionary force, who shall forward the same to the several regimental paymasters who shall deliver the same to the officers commanding squadrons, companies and batteries. Now, let us see the "enabling" part of it; "and such officers shall give each volunteer under their respective command making the affidavit in form (b) before such officer a ballot paper, and shall fold it in a certain manner and place it in the envelope. It is then provided that the certificate in form (c) shall be signed by the officer who shall also securely close the envelope containing the ballot paper which shall then be sent by such officer by post to the Clerk of the Crown in Chancery.

If that is not imperative language, I fail to know how imperative language can be framed. That is not permissive; it is not an enabling clause but declaring what their duty shall be in connection with the taking of these votes. The Minister of Justice says that this has not the effect of imposing on these officers any duty which would interfere with their military duty. Who is to be the judge of that? This Parliament has said that these Canadian soldiers are to have a vote and that these Imperial officers shall give the opportunity to vote to every man who makes the affidavit before them. Does not that impose duties upon the officers that might interfere with the discharge of their military duties? If not, I fail to know how language could be employed to do so. We heard the suggestion that was made yesterday by the Minister of Justice (Mr. Doherty), the Solicitor General (Mr. Meighen) or some other hon. gentleman on that side. From this side it was suggested that the Secretary for War might not permit this. The hon. gentleman whom I am quoting said he could not imagine the Secretary of State for War taking such a stand, because it would create a deplorable and unfortunate situation. What did that mean? It meant that, this Parliament having declared that it should be the duty of these Imperial officers to allow a vote to be taken and make an affidavit and distribute the ballots, if Lord Kitchener should say that this should not be done it would create an unfortunate situation—that is it would create a conflict between the Secretary of State for War and this Parliament. That would indeed be unfortunate. But all that could be avoided if it were provided that these sections shall not be acted upon until submitted to the Secretary for War and approved by him. If the Secretary for War were consulted and thought that the voting could be carried out, it would create harmony, whereas in the present form it is likely to create friction and entire want of harmony. It seems to me that in taking the stand he has taken in regard to this amendment, the Minister of Justice is taking a position which cannot be justified and is likely to create friction and lead to great dissatisfaction.

Amendment (Mr. Pugsley) negatived.

Mr. PUGSLEY: I give notice that I will move this amendment on the third reading of the Bill.

Mr. OLIVER: Where mention is made of the envelope, is it provided that the electoral district in which the voter is entitled to vote shall be marked on the envelope? That does not seem to be provided, but I think it should be

Mr. DOHERTY: Provision is made that upon the affidavit endorsed on the back of the envelope, the elector, if he is qualified as having been a resident for thirty days shall set forth his place of residence in a certain precise manner. The first suggestion was that he should state the name of the electoral district. But it was pointed out that many of these men, while knowing where they live, might not, especially in view of the comparatively new redistribution, know the correct designation of their electoral districts. The Clerk of the Crown in Chancery will be able to determine in which electoral district the soldier would vote, and he will forward the envelopes to the several districts. Those who are qualified as electors in a particular electoral district will set that forth, each that he was qualified to vote at a certain place in a certain province. In that event, the Clerk of the Crown in Chancery will determine what the electoral district is and forward the ballot accordingly. The hon. member will notice that there are two alternate "Paragraphs 1" of the affidavit B provided to be made for these alternative methods of voting.

Mr. OLIVER: The first alternative makes the voter swear:

I am not qualified to vote in any other electoral district.

That would indicate that he swears that he was a voter in a certain electoral district.

Mr. DOHERTY: He swears to a certain fact—that he resided for thirty days at a certain place. Under this law, that ballot would be sent to the electoral district in which that place is situated, unless the voter was at the time of his enlistment a qualified voter in some other district, and so he is asked to negative that statement.

Mr. OLIVER: I do not see anything in the form requiring the mention of an electoral district.

Mr. DOHERTY: It says:

I was qualified to be a voter at in the province of .

It does not say that he shall mention the name of the electoral district, but shall give the place where he was entitled to vote, which will convey to the Clerk of the Crown in Chancery information as to the electoral district.

Mr. OLIVER: I think where a man is entitled to claim that he is a voter, it would be only right that he should name the electoral district as well as the place of residence. I can see the possibility of difficulty under the section. If a man is a voter, he ought to know in what district he is a voter.

Mr. DOHERTY: That generally is true. This subject is one that was a good deal discussed in the committee—this form of affidavit. The first instance given was with regard to the city of Montreal. It was stated that both as regards the men who reside for thirty days, and as regards men who have been voters perhaps for years, in view of our redistribution there would be great danger of men misapprehending the electoral district in which their places of residence had been situated, though quite aware that by virtue of their residence they are qualified voters. My own constituency is now very largely made up of people who heretofore never were in the electoral division of St. Anne; people whose knowledge on the subject, derived, perhaps, from years of being settled there, would be that they were in the county of Jacques Cartier. I have reference at the moment to the city of Verdun. A man in that situation might be expected to fall into error, but if the soldier swears that he was entitled to vote in the city of Verdun at the time he was enlisted, the Clerk of the Crown in Chancery will have no difficulty, with the Redistribution Act in front of him, in determining where the vote belongs. What applies to my own constituency applies, I think, to all constituencies as at present constituted in the city of Montreal. The same thing would be true of the city of Toronto and the city of Edmonton, which, I understand, has been divided into two electoral districts. Persons who are not informed as to where the line runs between East Edmonton and West Edmonton, might be very much puzzled to know in which electoral district they were when they enlisted, but they would know that they had qualifications in the city of Edmonton and that they resided at some particular place in the city of Edmonton. In view of that situation, instead of requiring the designation of the electoral district, we provided for a designation of the place at which the man had been accustomed to vote, from which the Clerk of the Crown in Chancery will have no difficulty in settling the question of the electoral district.

Section agreed to.

On section 3—officers who are candidates not to act:

Mr. DOHERTY: Carrying out a promise I made to the hon. member for Sudbury and Queens this afternoon, I beg to move that this section be amended by adding to it the words "and failing him for any of the causes aforesaid, the next below him in rank, and so on." Further, in view of some suggestions that were made as to the possibility of the commanding officer declining to perform the duties prescribed under the Act, I think we should make section 3 apply in the case of the officer designated or next in rank declining to perform the duty as well as in the case of the officer who is prevented from acting. To produce that result, I beg to move that the section be further amended by inserting in line 18, after the word "it" and before the words "the duty," the words "or declines to perform it."

Mr. MACDONALD: The first amendment proposed might produce a condition where the sergeant would be the responsible officer.

Mr. DOHERTY: The question is whether it is better to leave it possible that the sergeant may sometimes perform this duty than to leave it possible that it shall not be performed at all. If the Act operates as I hope it will operate, I do not think that a case of this kind will happen very often. If there should be ground for anticipating that the officers generally would refuse to do the duty assigned to them, then, of course, this position would come into general operation. If it is thought preferable, I would limit the operation of the section as amended so that the duty should not be performed by an officer who is subordinate to a commissioned officer. If we do that, however, we may create a condition where, merely for want of an officer, the men may lose their votes. It seemed to me that we might with perfect safety, in the few cases where this would arise, allow the non-commissioned officer to do the work rather than cause the soldiers to lose their votes because of there being no officer to perform this duty.

Mr. MACDONALD: One of the results of the provision might be that the officers would turn their work over to the sergeants.

Mr. DOHERTY: Even if it be a violation of obligation on the part of the officers not to fulfil this duty, we cannot make them do a thing if they do not want to do it. The case which I had in anticipation was that of an officer who might happen to be a candidate in an election or who might be prevented from acting. The latter case, I think, will be more frequent than the case where he may decline to act. If he declines to perform the duty, we leave it to the next officer in rank. We start with the company officer, who has under him, before you get to the non-commissioned officer, five officers. I think we may fairly assume that some one of these six officers will be able and willing to perform the duty.

Mr. OLIVER: As a civilian, speaking from what I have read, I suggest that the sergeants do all the work any way.

Mr. DOHERTY: I am not prepared to say anything about that. When I was in the army we used to find something to do.

Mr. MACDONALD: I think this is another argument in support of the suggestion that a superintendent of some kind should be appointed. Has the minister arrived at any solution of the difficulty that was suggested to-day in this respect?

Mr. DOHERTY: I pointed out that if it were considered that my suggestion would provide for what was desired, I was prepared to let it go to a small committee for consideration. That offer met no response, and at the present moment I do not think that we are prepared to re-open that consideration. The amendment suggested did not provide for persons who would have the receiving of the ballots.

It only looked to provide for representatives of the different parties to be present when the voting took place. It did not look to provide machinery for taking the vote.

Amendments agreed to, and section as amended agreed to.

On sec. 4—issue of writ:

Mr. DOHERTY: I might explain that by a printer's error the words
12 m. "an election" have been printed instead of "a general election."

Mr. OLIVER: What is the meaning of these references?

Mr. DOHERTY: They refer to the sections of the Dominion Act prescribing the duties of returning officers and poll clerks. We are trying to make the duties of the returning officers and poll clerks at the camps in Canada approach as nearly as possible to the duties that have to be discharged by the ordinary returning officers and poll clerks at an election in Canada.

Mr. OLIVER: The section does not make clear that this returning officer is not the returning officer of an electoral district. If, as I understand, he is a returning officer specially appointed, I would suggest that words be used to convey that idea.

Mr. DOHERTY: I am quite willing to make that clear. It follows the wording of the Dominion Elections Act. As regards the issuing of the writ, the Dominion Elections Act says:

> Every writ for an election shall be in form A and shall be dated and be returnable on such days as the Governor General determines, and shall be addressed and forwarded by the Clerk of the Crown in Chancery to the person appointed by the Governor General, as hereinafter provided, and shall be transmitted to such person by mail, unless otherwise ordered by the Governor General.

And then 76 provides that:

The person to whom a writ for an election is so addressed shall be the returning officer at such election.

I took it that these definitions provided for the issue of the writ and for the holding of the poll at each military camp.

Mr. OLIVER: I am perfectly satisfied with the explanation although on reading the section it was not quite clear. There are two regiments in barracks in the constituency of East Edmonton and there is a squadron of cavalry in the constituency of Strathcona within the limits of greater Edmonton, but in different constituencies and having no connection. The squadron of cavalry has no connection with the infantry regiment. Would each be considered a base which would be given to a returning officer or would one returning officer handle both establishments?

Mr. DOHERTY: My impression would be, if these forces have no connection one with the other, that we would have to provide a separate returning officer for each.

Mr. VERVILLE: What would be the result if a man is not on the list in the place that he chose to describe as his place of residence six months prior to the date of his enlistment? My hon. friend knows the position we are in in the cities of the province of Quebec. He knows that registration takes place in December. A man might not be on the list because he went before the list was made. Will a man who is in a position to swear that he lived within a certain polling subdivision for six months prior to the time of his enlistment have the right to vote?

Mr. DOHERTY: Under the cities' system if the lists were prepared at the time they were enrolled, or if they were on an electoral list that was still in force—it may not have been a new one—they would be entitled under this Act to vote in that electoral district wherein they would have been qualified to vote if the election had taken place the day that they enrolled. If I understand the city system aright in Montreal, there is always a list in force. Their lists are revised every two years and one list remains in force until the next one is revised. In the case suggested the fact that the voter was on the list of two years previous if that were still in force or on the newly made list would entitle him to claim as having been a person qualified to vote in the district on the day he enlisted. If, on the other hand, he was not on that existing voters' list he would not be in a position to say at the time he was enrolled he was a qualified voter in the district, but he might claim, if that was the place where he had lived for thirty days, within the six months before enlistment, that he was entitled to vote in that district because of his thirty days prior residence.

Mr. VERVILLE: What list will be in force in five or six weeks from now in Montreal?

Mr. DOHERTY: If I am not mistaken, the electoral lists that were prepared in December were revised in January and are actually in force now.

Mr. VERVILLE: They were supposed to be in force on April 1.

Mr. DOHERTY: I do not know the exact day, but I know there was a period of time which I think will now have elapsed. It will be in force for two years or until there is another revision.

On section 4, subsection 4—at expiration of ten days returning officer to prepare lists of volunteers:

Mr. OLIVER: The question arises as to what are the terms of the revision of this list.

Mr. DOHERTY: There is no provision for the revision of the list. What is arranged is that the returning officer shall make a list of the people who have given him notice. This is useful, because it informs him of who are the people who pretend to be voters in that district and it enables him to know the electoral districts he has to handle. The Act does not expressly provide for making it a final list in such a manner as to determine the right of the voter. A man who has arrived at camp after ten days have gone by, or who is precluded from sending his name should not be prevented from voting on polling day. I do not think it would be fair to make any list which the returning officer is able to provide an absolute settlement of a man's right to vote by reason of the existence of his name upon it, or the absence of his name from it. The provision requiring the prepartion of the list is really a measure of convenience, but there is no provision to make the presence of the man's name on the list essential to his right to exercise the franchise. The provision for the making of this list is for the purpose of facilitating and making more convenient the holding of a poll, but it is not provided that the list shall be treated as determining whether or not a person has the right to vote.

Mr. MACDONALD: Can the returning officer refuse a man his vote after he has made the affidavit?

Mr. DOHERTY: If nobody requires him to be sworn he will vote.

Mr. MACDONALD: Has the returning officer the right to strike his name off?

Mr. DOHERTY: There is no provision by which he is entitled to strike the name off. We have to have qualification by affidavit, but I think it is fair not to make that affidavit sent in in writing to the returning officer conclusive in the event of a question being raised. For example, in a camp like Valcartier there might be a large number of voters from a certain constituency and the candidates might find it desirable to send representatives, so that I do not think it would be fair that because a man has handed in an affidavit ten or fifteen days before, the representatives of the candidates should not be entitled to swear the voter to the essentials of his qualifications in the presence of a returning officer.

Mr. MACDONALD: There is no provision for that in the Act.

Mr. DOHERTY: Yes; the Act is subject to all the provisions of the Dominion Elections Act which are applicable.

Mr. MACDONALD: I find no provisions here, after the returning officer has made the list, for adding to or striking off any names that may be on the list.

Mr. DOHERTY: Because being on that list is not essential to the right to vote.

Mr. MACDONALD: Where do you provide for anything outside that list?

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: I think I understand the idea of the minister, although I do not approve of it. The idea is that the moment a person has taken the affidavit he becomes an elector, and his vote can be challenged, but there is no provision in the Act for challenging his vote.

Mr. DOHERTY: The provision that makes it possible to swear a man in the presence of the returning officer and the scrutineer is that in subsection 6 of section 4 which says that except as herein otherwise provided, the provisions of the Dominion Elections Act relating to the power and duties of the returning officer and other officers shall so far as applicable apply.

Section 153 says:

> Except in the province of Saskatchewan and Alberta and the Yukon Territory, an elector, if required by the deputy-returning officer, the poll clerk, one of the candidates, or an agent of a candidate, or by an elector present, shall before receiving his ballot paper, take such oath of qualification as by the law of the province he may in the like case at a provincial election be required to take, such changes having been made in the form of oath as are necessary to make it applicable to the election being held, and shall also, if required, take the oath in form Y.

I am free to admit that we are not dealing with an oath that is required for a provincial qualification. There are other provisions and I am pretty confident that I could lay my hands on them; but to make the matter absolutely clear, we will put it in so many words so that there can be no possible doubt about it. At the time I examined the Act I was satisfied that, by referring back to these provisions, we would make it possible for a man to be sworn at the time as to his qualifications, but as there may be some doubt about it, we will put it in.

Mr. MACDONALD: Is the general language used in subsection 6, where you are adopting the provisions of the Dominion Elections Act, sufficiently broad to cover the appointment and presence of scrutineers at the polls?

Mr. DOHERTY: It is a subdivision of the statute called "the polling." Section 137 says:

> In addition to the deputy-returning officer and the poll clerk, the candidates and their agents, not exceeding two in number for each candidate in each polling station, and, in the absence of agents, two electors to represent each candidate at the request of such electors, and no others, shall be permitted to remain in the room where the votes are given during the time the poll remains open.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: The trouble is this, that you may have thirty or forty candidates represented at one poll, and you may have 230.

Mr. DOHERTY: That is barely possible, but it is assumed that the returning officer in adjusting his poll will make as many polling places as are necessary. We assumed that if he had a knowledge of the different electoral districts with which he had to deal, in cases where there might be only a few voters in each electoral district, he would probably endeavour to subdivide his polls so as to include them in one poll. If he have a large number on one electoral district, he may have to provide several polls for that district. We leave it to the judgment of the returning officer so to dispose of these things as to make the matter workable. One cannot say in advance how many electors a returning officer may have to deal with. In one camp he may have only one or two, while in another camp he may have half a dozen. The provision is:

> The returning officer shall proceed to hold such number of polls upon the day fixed for the holding of the election in the several electoral districts, within such camp or base, and appoint such deputy-returning officers and officers as may be necessary therefor.

I think we can leave it to the returning officer to make the necessary arrangements. I hardly think that any returning officer will arrange to hold polls for twenty electoral districts all in the same polling booth unless he has secured very large accommodation. If there are half a dozen voters from one electoral district, I doubt if there is any reason to anticipate that there will be representatives of candidates there. If the voters are numerous, there will probably be representatives of candidates there, but it seems that it might properly be left to the returning officer for his own comfort if for no other reason to provide sufficient accommodation.

Mr. OLIVER: I would like to say in plain words whatever right the candidates have with regard to the scrutineers.

Mr. DOHERTY: If it is desired to have it copied in, I shall have it copied in, but I would ask my hon. friend from Pictou (Mr. Macdonald), for instance, if he has any doubt that when this Bill says that the provisions of the Dominion Elections Act relating to the polling shall apply, all of those sections which are in the Dominion Elections Act under the title polling apply.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: The difficulty is this: we have now over 230 constituencies, and it is not an extravagant supposition that there may be at a camp the electors of perhaps thirty or forty constituencies. In the camp at Montreal, or at Ottawa or at any other central place, there may be candidates from British Columbia, Nova Scotia, and other parts of Canada. Under the law as it is, at present electors can be scrutineers without any authority from the candidate. Any two electors in a constituency can go and be scrutineers; but it might be impossible to get authority from a candidate in British Columbia to have representatives at the poll at Montreal or at Ottawa, and I believe some provision should be inserted that any two electors in any constituency can be scrutineers for all on the one side or on the other side of politics.

Mr. DOHERTY: I have no objection to that.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: Two electors in the city of Montreal could go as scrutineers, and if they were to be scrutineers for one candidate, they could be scrutineers for all the candidates.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: The matter will really work out in that way, because the right hon. gentleman will remember that if no person is appointed as scrutineer for the candidate, any two electors can undertake to represent him.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: They can represent one candidate, but not all the candidates.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: I think they can.

Mr. MACDONALD: There are a great many deputy returning officers who will say that this legislation does not provide for candidates' representatives. It would be wise if the minister would draw up some section to meet the suggestion of my right hon. friend to provide for two agents of the same political party as the representatives for all the candidates who may be voted for at the same poll.

Mr. DOHERTY: I would be inclined to think, if it happened that in the same polling booth votes were being polled for more than one electoral district, that two electors coming in there would be entitled to represent candidates from different electoral districts. Now, as regards the possible ignorance of returning officers that the provisions of the Dominion Elections Act apply with regard to polls, I would like to point out that in addition to that we have a provision:

> This Act shall be construed as one with the Dominion Elections Act.

The duties of returning officers as well as others are to be governed by that. It would be his duty under the Dominion Elections Act, and under this Act, to furnish the deputies not only with this Act but with the Dominion Elections Act, and furthermore to furnish them with the instructions that are got out. Of course, if considered necessary, the Dominion Elections Act could be copied instead of telling the deputy returning officers and the returning officers that the provisions of the Act apply. But I should hope—as these returning officers are to instruct the deputies—that we should be able to find men of sufficient intelligence, that when told that all the provisions about the duties of returning officers and deputy returning officers, and about the polling and the taking of the vote, would apply, they would be able to understand that without it being necessary to print these sections; but I will get them printed if—

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: It is not necessary. It was only to understand the Bill and to put it as intelligibly as possible. I appreciate that we should have, perhaps, more legislation about scrutineers. But scrutineers are chiefly useful to prevent personation. There cannot be much personation here, because there is means of identification. Two electors can see that the formalities are followed.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: I think it will work out that way. Let that section stand.

Mr. OLIVER: Many people who will have to work out this Act will find great difficulty in referring to the Dominion Elections Act and reading one into the other. There are not nearly so many people learned in the law on the outskirts of civilization as in the city of Ottawa, and it is surprising how difficult it is for a man who is not used to such work to go through such an Act and read one section in the light of another. For that reason, I would ask that whatever is required in regard to scrutineers and the voter getting his name on the list up to whatever time is allowed him— that these provisions be made perfectly clear on the face of the Bill. Another thing: Are the returning officers and deputy returning officers to be civilians or military men?

Mr. DOHERTY: They will be appointed as other returning officers and deputy returning officers are appointed. The returning officer will appoint his deputy just as other returning officers and deputy-returning officers are appointed. There is nothing to require nor to prevent him selecting military men if he wants to.

Mr. OLIVER: But he does not need to choose military men?

Mr. DOHERTY: No, the Governor General will appoint the returning officer for the camp just as he appoints the deputy-returning officer for an electoral district.

Mr. VERVILLE: The minister says that the Dominion Election Act is to be followed. But in these places there is a certain military rule. Is the minister going to do anything under this clause to make sure that the military rule shall not override the Elections Act? I know that has been done in other cases and probably would be done in this.

Mr. DOHERTY: I do not think there is room for the slightest doubt that the Parliament of Canada controls soldiers in Canada. And where this Act, if it is passed, says that a certain thing shall be done, the soldier has to obey as much as any other man. Here we have an express direct clause, providing what is to be done in the camp, and there is no military rule that can override Parliament's expressed provision.

Section stands.

On subsection 7,—reporting vote to several electoral districts:

On section 4, subsection 8—poll at which to vote:

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: In all cases, except under this proposed legislation, the electoral list determines whether or not a man has a right to vote. If he is on the list, he has a right to vote; if not, he has not a right to vote. In this case, what constitutes the right to vote is the affidavit of the soldier.

Mr. DOHERTY: A man whose name has been put upon the list must vote at the place where he is allotted, and not elsewhere. I would not have it understood that this section implies that the man who is not allotted at all should not vote anywhere.

Mr. MACDONALD: There should go with that the correlative provision that the military authorities shall see that facilities are provided to enable the volunteer to vote at the poll to which he is assigned.

Mr. DOHERTY: I am willing to insert a provision to that end, although I had not thought it necessary.

Subsection agreed to.

Section 4, subsection 9—obtaining certificate that voter is on list where voting on previous qualification:

Mr. MACDONALD: Under this provision a soldier from a western constituency who is in an eastern camp would have to communicate with his friends in the far-distant constituency in order that the certificate of the returning officer might be obtained.

Mr. DOHERTY: There might be some difficulty about that. The provision makes it a duty for the returning officer in a certain electoral district who receives notice that somebody has claimed to be qualified in that district, to send the electoral list there. The returning officer who receives the list may ascertain whether the name of the man in question is upon it. Perhaps it would be well to put in some words providing that if the returning officer fails to find that name on the list, he should have power to reject the vote.

Subsection agreed to.

On section 4, subsection 10—procedure when volunteers leaving Canada before election day:

Mr. VERVILLE: I wish to ask again whether the amendment which I proposed at eight o'clock would be in order.

Mr. DOHERTY: Inasmuch as the Bill which we are dealing with provides for an expenditure out of the Consolidated Revenue Fund of Canada, it had to be preceded by a resolution assented to by His Royal Highness the Governor General. That resolution was looking to a provision being made for votes being given to the military forces, the expenses in connection therewith to be paid in the manner which I have indicated. I do not think that it is open to us to introduce into this Bill an amendment extending the scope of the proposed legislation, and introducing an entirely different subject matter, unless we have a new resolution assented to by the Governor, and re-introduce the Bill. For that reason, I do not think it is advisable to accept an amendment providing for something entirely different from that which was originally contemplated.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: I am not sure that that is a good reason.

Mr. DOHERTY: In my own experience I have found myself precluded from the possibility of providing—not in connection with a Bill exactly like this, but in connection with a Bill that required a resolution—for something not contemplated in the resolution, and which would involve the cost or charge of carrying out the thing not contemplated. If it is necessary that the Governor General should assent, surely he must assent to what he understands. He has assented to a charge being created for the purpose of providing funds for soldiers, and, under guise of that assent, to provide for votes for large numbers of other people, with a possible expenditure connected therewith, would be legislating in respect of something that the resolution did not contemplate.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: It seems to me that there can be no expenditure in connection with the amendment suggested by the hon. member for Maisonneuve. It is simply to provide that railway officials who are engaged in train service shall be enabled to vote either on the polling day or on the day preceding.

Mr. DOHERTY: It may not be a very heavy charge, but you are imposing new duties on the deputy returning officers; and either you are going to compel them to do two days' work for one day's pay, or you must provide them with remuneration for two days' work. However, without insisting over much on that, I have said what I desire to say in regard to the amendment.

The CHAIRMAN: In my judgment the Bill referred to the committee by the House is an Act to enable Canadians on active military service during the present war to exercise their electoral franchise. Bourinot says, at page 546:

> It is a clear and indisputable principle of parliamentary law that a committee is bound by, and is not at liberty to depart from, the order of reference.

I understand that the only thing referred to the committee from the House was the Bill under consideration, and accordingly I think it my duty to declare the amendment out of order.

Section agreed to.

On section 7—distribution of Act:

Mr. MARCIL: I thought the minister had agreed to strike out the word "enrolled?"

Mr. DOHERTY: We struck out the words "enrolment or "enlistment" in places where it might possibly create some confusion. I do not think it can do any harm here, but as I have no desire to insist on its staying there, I move that the word "enrolled" be struck out.

Section as amended agreed to.

On section 10—when voter cannot vote under this Act:

Mr. MARCIL: This is when he has to leave camp and go to the polling booth?

Mr. DOHERTY: Yes, if he is a voter qualified for that electoral district.

Mr. MARCIL: If this will interfere with his military duties, has he to obtain permission from the military authorities?

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: If his voting at the camp interfered with his military duties, he would have to get permission from the military authorities.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: Yes.

Section agreed to.

On section 11—termination of Act:

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: I see that the minister has passed over the clause he prepared as clause 4, providing for the appointment of scrutineers.

Mr. DOHERTY: I explained this morning what happened with regard to this clause, and I am sorry if I did not make myself understood. That clause, as I have explained two or three times, was drafted with a view to having some conference as to whether it should be carried out. It was inserted in that first reprint of the Bill by a misunderstanding, and that fact was one of the principal reasons that led me to make the second reprint. I said this morning with regard to the suggestion made by the hon. member for St. John that if something on the line of the suggestion that is contained in that section, modified as to the number of commissioners and providing for the appointment of scrutineers, would in any way be satisfactory I should be glad to consider it, and even have a special committee to deal with something on those lines. As I understood it, the response that was made to that suggestion was an insistence on the proposition of the hon. member for St. John, and I said in answer to some hon. member that I was not making a proposition on the subject, but endeavouring to meet the suggestions, and that if anything on that line would be acceptable I should be glad to try and work it out. This morning I put before the House this corrected reprint, with the explanation that the insertion of that clause as printed in the Bill distributed yesterday was the result simply of a misunderstanding, and I am sorry if I have created the impression that I proposed to go on with the first reprint which has been corrected by this corrected reprint, which does not contain that suggestion.

1 a.m.

Mr. PUGSLEY: The minister should state one further thing. He was asked whether these scrutineers would have any notice of when and where the votes would be taken, to which the minister replied in the negative. Therefore, it seems to me that was simply an empty proposition.

Mr. DOHERTY: I am not discussing the value of the proposition at all. I was explaining that I did not put forward that clause as a provision of my Bill, but was endeavouring to see if a suggestion carried out on those lines would be acceptable. The hon. member for St. John, for reasons he thought sufficient, did not consider it acceptable.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: We understood the whole thing very differently. The hon. member for St. John suggested that we should have scrutineers, and have some check upon the voting. He suggested a commission and my hon. friend agreed to that and he suggested that we should proceed with the Bill. We thought that, before we proceeded with the Bill as to the manner of voting, we should be able to provide some check preferably by way of a commission, and we offered some suggestions as to that. If the idea of a check upon the voting in the form of a commission should be adopted it would be necessary to modify the clauses accordingly. That is the reason why we did not press the matter.

Mr. DOHERTY: I do not want to take advantage of anything that may have been a misunderstanding. The hon. gentleman will bear me out when I say that hon. gentlemen opposite did not consider my suggestion satisfactory. At three o'clock, with this matter standing in that shape, I did state that we were not prepared to accept the suggestion of the hon. member for St. John, but that if something on the line of carrying out what was printed there, with the necessary modifications if we were to subtitute two commissioners, and if they were to have power to appoint scrutineers, would be acceptable, I would be glad to consider it and to refer it to a committee. There was some discussion as to how that was to work out, and I was asked whether I would consider whether there should be a provision that every officer, before he proceeded to take the votes, should call in the scrutineers. I said I did not think that would be workable, and I understood that was a proposition that was entirely unacceptable.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Only to myself; I did not speak for the leader of the Opposition.

Mr. DOHERTY: I put the proposition in the most general terms to the hon. member for St. John. However, I do not want tc draw any consequences from anything that may have been a misunderstanding. If that was understood in the other way, I shall be glad to consider some provision for the appointment of scrutineers.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: I think we might consider one or two matters that have been allowed to stand a little later in the forenoon, and I move that the committee rise, report progress and ask leave to sit again.

Progress reported.

On motion of Sir Robert Borden, the House adjourned at 1.12 a.m. Wednesday.

EMPLOYEES FROM L'ASSOMPTION COUNTY.

Mr. SEGUIN:

OVERSEAS FORCES—ROLL OF ENLISTMENT.

On the Orders of the day being called:

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: Early in the session we were given to understand that the roll of enlistment of the soldiers would be laid upon the table of the House. Is the minister ready to bring it down to-day or before we prorogue?

Major General HUGHES: Some of the rolls are now prepared, but it was deemed advisable by the officers of the department not to publish any of them until they are all ready. I have not asked about the matter for the last day or two, but I understand the rolls are nearly completed now. The intention is to publish them, and they will of course be laid on the table of the House at the very earliest moment.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: Under ordinary circumstances that answer might be satisfactory, but I call the attention of the Government to the fact that we are now considering a Bill to give votes to the soldiers, and it seems to me that the publication of the names of the men to whom we give this vote ought to be concurrent with the coming into force of the Act.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: I will find out how far the roll is advanced and let my hon. friend know later on in the day. The delay I am informed is in the Printing Bureau, and I will ask the Secretary of State to have the printing expedited as much as possible. Of course, there will be distribution among the members of Parliament when the lists are ready.

UNOPPOSED MOTION FOR PAPERS.

Mr. Proulx: For a return showing: 1. The amount paid by the Department of Justice since the first day of December, 1907, to the Senior Judge of the united counties of Prescott and Russell for travelling allowance and transporta-

Whether it is the custom of the Department of Justice to pay to Judges travelling allowance and transportation expenses for holding Chambers at the place where they reside.

QUEBEC AND SAGUENAY RAILWAY.

On the Orders of the Day being called:

Mr. LEMIEUX: May I ask the Prime Minister or the Minister of Railways and Canals if any Order in Council has been passed of late concerning either the payment of subsidies or giving a guarantee of bonds to the Quebec and Saguenay Railway? If so, has that Order in Council been laid upon the table of the House?

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: So far as I apprehend the hon. gentleman's question, there has been nothing passed of late on the subject.

Mr. LEMIEUX: Is the matter under consideration?

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: Everything that is not passed is under consideration.

CAMPAIGN LITERATURE.

Mr. VERVILLE: Is the Minister of Labour aware that campaign literature is being distributed from his department? If so, under what authority is it being done, and are the employees of his department working at it?

Mr. SCHAFFNER: This is an old story.

Mr. CROTHERS: I am not aware that such literature is being issued from my department, but if my hon. friend will give particulars concerning the matter I will look into it.

WESTERN UNION TELEGRAPH COMPANY.

On the Orders of the Day being called:

Mr. VERVILLE: I would like to ask the Minister of Labour if I can have an answer to question 11, which is as follows:

1. Is the Government aware that the Western Union Telegraph Company is said to control the Great North Western Telegraph Company, which, since the 1st January, 1915, is the name under which the amalgamation of the Great North Western and the Canadian Northern Telegraph Companies is carried out?

2. If not, can the Government indicate to what authorities application should be made for such information?

[Mr. Proulx.]

Mr. CROTHERS: I do not think it is a proper question, because my department is not supposed to keep in touch with private enterprises of this kind. We have had some correspondence making complaints against these companies, and I shall be glad to let my hon. friend know the substance of that correspondence; but we do not keep track of the information required by this question, and we do not indicate to members of this House where they can get information concerning private enterprises.

Mr. SPEAKER: My attention has been drawn to this question, and in my judgment it is not a proper question to put on the Order Paper and it is not in the proper form. The rule is laid down that members putting questions on the Order Paper become responsible for the allegations of facts in them, which is certainly not done here. A question should also refer to something in connection with the business of the House or of the country with which the Government is dealing, which does not seem to me to be the case in regard to this question.

CANADA GRAIN ACT AMENDMENT.

On motion of Sir George Foster (Minister of Trade and Commerce), the House proceeded to consider amendments made by the Senate to Bill No. 112, to amend the Canada Grain Act.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: The Bill, which was sent up from the House to the Senate and which has been returned with these amendments, was very carefully thought out and thoroughly discussed in the House, and it was sent to the Senate as it had been thought out and as the consensus of opinion in the committee and in the House after it was discussed seemed to dictate. The Senate, however, has fallen foul of one of the sections and has altered it by striking out the word "shippers." This amendment was moved in the House, but it did not seem to receive the assent of the House and was not even pressed to a vote. It, however, has been revived in the Senate and is now part of the Bill as the Senate has returned it to the Commons. It destroys the full efficiency of the Bill and will hamper the work of the department to the extent that this interest is left out of the powers that are to be given by this legislation to the Grain Commission. At this late time, however, I suppose it is better to take a mutilated Bill than to have nothing at all, and with the determination to work it out as well as we can under what has been sent back to us from the Senate, I propose to let the matter go. I move that the amendments be concurred in.

Amendments concurred in.

SOLDIERS' VOTING BILL.

The House again in Committee, Mr. Sevigny in the Chair, on Bill No. 111, to enable Canadians on active military service during the present war to exercise their electoral franchise.—Mr. Doherty.

On section 4, subsection 6—holding polls:

Mr. DOHERTY: When this subsection was allowed to stand, it was after certain suggestions had been made with regard to making some matters that might be considered to be covered by it perfectly clear, one of them being that the volunteer presenting himself at the poll to vote should be subject to being called upon to be sworn then and there. A second thing that was pointed out was that while subsection 6 does provide by reference to the Dominion Elections Act for agents, or what are called scrutineers, to be present at the polls, in view of the circumstances in which the votes will be taken and of the fact that they may be taken for more than one electoral district, it is desirable to provide that agents may be present at the polls as agents, not necessarily exclusively of any one candidate, but of all candidates of the party for which they are appointed scrutineers.

Finally, it was suggested that it would be wise that we should put in a provision to require the military authorities of the different camps to give all possible facilities for the holding of the polls. To meet these three suggestions, I have prepared amendments. I move that subsection 6 of section 4 be amended by adding thereto:

"6a. Any volunteer presenting himself to vote shall, if so required, even though his name be upon the list prepared by the camp returning officer, take the oath contained in form B of this Act and in form Y of the Dominion Elections Act, and if his claim to vote rests upon his having been a qualified elector in any electoral district at the time of his enlistment or appointment, any other oath which under the Dominion Elections Act may be required to be taken by voters generally claiming a like qualification.

"6b. In addition to agents who may be appointed in accordance with the Dominion Elections Act to represent candidates at the poll, agents may be appointed on behalf of either the Government or the Opposition and such agents shall have all the powers of agents of candidates under the said Act and be entitled to exercise the said powers on behalf of all candidates in all electoral districts for the party by which such agents have been named and any person or persons named as agent or agents of any candidate of a party shall be entitled to act as agent or agents of any other candidate of the same party in any electoral district or districts.

"6c. The military authorities at every camp or base where a poll is to be held as aforesaid shall afford to the camp returning officer all necessary facilities for the holding of the same."

The effect will be to make it quite clear that the volunteer may be sworn both according to form B and according to form Y, the latter being against disqualification or any corrupt act on his part or exercised upon him, and also any further oath under the Dominion Elections Act which may be required of those claiming like qualification.

Mr. OLIVER: Last night I understood the minister to say that he would propose an amendment that would make it absolutely clear that the voter had a right to vote although his name was not on the list prepared by the returning officer. Has that been done? Is it the intention to make that provision?

Mr. DOHERTY: I have no objection to it now, but it seemed to me that, inasmuch as there is absolutely nothing here to make the presence of the name on the lists that the returning officer provides an essential condition of voting, what the hon. gentleman desires would necessarily follow. I confess I overlooked the matter in preparing the amendments, but I have no objection to providing it. I move:

That subsection 4 of section 4 be amended by adding thereto the words:

"The failure of the volunteer to present his claim in time to be entered on such list, and the consequent absence of his name from such list, shall not deprive such volunteer of his right to vote, provided he presents himself to the returning officer and takes the oath above prescribed before the poll is closed."

Mr. OLIVER: Will the words, "oath above prescribed," preclude the possibility of his being required to take the qualification and bribery oath?

Mr. DOHERTY: I do not think so. This provides that the mere absence of his name from the list shall not preclude his voting, provided he takes the oath entitling him to get on the list. That being dealt with, I think he fairly comes under the provisions of subsection 6, which requires him to present himself to the returning officer and make before the returning officer an affidavit which will entitle him to get on the list. The words, "any volunteer presenting himself to vote," will apply to that man when he presents himself to vote just as it will apply to the man whose name was on the list.

Mr. OLIVER: So long as there is no confusion, I am perfectly satisfied.

Mr. MACDONALD: With regard to the amendment proposed by the minister respecting the furnishing of facilities by the camp commandant to the returning officer of the poll, the minister will remember that last night I suggested that a provision should be inserted requiring the camp commandant to give all volunteers in camp an opportunity to poll their votes. I pointed out the difficulty that might arise if a man were employed at some work which might prevent him from voting. Perhaps the minister could add some apt words which would make provision for this.

Mr. DOHERTY: I did not understand that the desire was that we should impose an obligation on them to allow the men to vote, because I take it that it is not desirable that we should require the military authorities to allow a man to absent himself from essential duties for the purpose of voting. However, I would have no objection to meeting the hon. gentleman's view.

Mr. MACDONALD: We are dealing only with Canadian camps in this case, and I see no reason, unless it be confinement for some offence, why every man in the camp should not be permitted to vote.

Mr. DOHERTY: I understand that the desire would be met if we added to subsection 6c the following words:

> And the officer commanding shall allow every volunteer, so far as it may be done consistently with the proper performance of his military duties, time and opportunity to vote.

Amendments agreed to.

Mr. DOHERTY: Having given consideration to what was pointed out last evening by the hon. member for Pictou, I beg to move that subsection 9 of section 4 be struck out.

Amendment agreed to, and section, as amended, agreed to.

On section 10—when voter cannot vote under this Act:

Mr. MACDONALD: Why is it provided that a volunteer, if within 25 miles of his polling place, shall not vote elsewhere than at said polling place? I do not see why he should not vote in camp?

Mr. DOHERTY: It seemed to us that a soldier who was at home, in his own electoral district, should not be entitled to vote in camp under the special provisions made for soldiers, instead of in the regular way at his proper voting place.

Mr. NESBITT: Why not use the words "in his own electoral district"?

Mr. DOHERTY: In order that the section should apply to him two conditions are necessary, being within his own electoral district and not being more than twenty-five miles away from his regular polling place. I may say that unless this section appears to members of the committee to be of more importance than it does to me, I am prepared to drop it altogether. It was inserted because it seemed to be a logical section to insert. I would move that section 10 be dropped.

Motion agreed to, and section 10 struck out.

On schedule A—ballot:

Mr. MARCIL: Has the minister decided to place any additional words on the ballot?

Mr. DOHERTY: I cannot at the moment lay my hand on the form of ballot to be used. We desire to have a ballot as much like the regular ballot as possible. I understood that the hon. member wished to have the words "I vote for, etc." printed in French as well as in English. That is being done.

Mr. MARCIL: They always are in Quebec.

Mr. DOHERTY: Not on the face of the ballot. Such printing as there is is on the back of the ballot.

Mr. MARCIL: I am not insisting on that. I thought the minister might put in some such words as "Dominion general elections."

Mr. DOHERTY: The existing law prescribes that the ballot, save for the white spaces where the names of the candidates are placed, shall be entirely black. There is no space on the ballot on which you could print "Dominion general elections."

Mr. MARCIL: If the minister is satisfied, all right.

Mr. PUGSLEY: The minister will observe that in the printed instructions on the margin of the ballot it is said that "the voter shall write the name of such person in the first space." Should it not be " such person or persons " so as to cover several constituencies like Halifax, St. John, Ottawa and others?

Mr. DOHERTY: I have no objection. My impression was that inasmuch as under the Dominion Elections Act a man is entitled to vote for as many candidates as there are persons to be elected you might say that a man might vote for " such person " and that that would cover any cases where there are more than one, because each one of these persons would be " such person." However, there is nothing like being perfectly clear, and I have no objection. But, we perhaps might create a situation where, for the purpose of being absolutely clear about one or two constituencies, we might mislead voters in the great bulk of constituencies by telling them they could vote for " such person." I think it would be safer to leave it as it is. Of course, instructions will go with the ballots.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Very well.

Mr. LEMIEUX: The ballots in the French-Canadian constituencies in the province of Quebec are usually printed in French. The returning officer knows the nationality of the majority of the electorate.

Mr. DOHERTY: When the ballots are issued there is nothing printed on them except the names of the candidates, which, if they are French are printed in French, and if English, are printed in English.

Mr. LEMIEUX: I mean the instructions.

Mr. DOHERTY: There are no instructions printed on the ballot paper. In conformity with the suggestion of the hon. member for Bonaventure (Mr. Marcil) I have put in an amendment that the instructions on the ballot shall be printed both in French and English, and also that all the words on the face of the ballot-form be printed in both languages.

Mr. LEMIEUX: All right.

On schedule B—affidavit:

Mr. NESBITT: There are numerous cases where these men come from outside an electoral district in which they enlisted, and perhaps in the electoral district only three or four days or a week before enlistment. That precludes their taking the oath that they have been thirty days there. How would that affect them?

Mr. DOHERTY: As the Bill now reads a man is entitled to vote in the electoral district in which he last resided for a period of thirty days within the six months previous to his enlistment.

Mr. NESBITT: No, it is the thirty days preceding.

Mr. DOHERTY: No, we have cleared away any question of its being immediately preceding.

Mr. GERMAN: The words in the affidavit are: "the last place in which I was resident for thirty days." Does not that point out to the voter that he must have resided thirty days in one place immediately prior to his enlistment?

Mr. NESBITT: That is the way I read it.

Mr. GERMAN: It seems to me that that is the way it has to be interpreted.

Mr. DOHERTY: No, if a man states the last place within which he has lived for thirty days during the last six months, he does not say anything about it being the thirty days immediately preceding his enlistment. It may be that within six months a certain place is the only place in which he had resided for thirty days, and he may have resided there four months ago. I do not quite see why it is inferred that because a man has to say where, during the last six months, he last lived for thirty days it means the last place in which he has lived for a shorter period.

Mr. GERMAN: He must give the particular place in which he lived for thirty days within the six months?

Mr. DOHERTY: Yes.

Mr. H. H. McLEAN: I want to call the minister's attention to the fact that there are a number of Canadian officers who have taken commissions in British regular regiments. Most of them are surplus officers who went over with the first contingent. From New Brunswick we have five such officers. I understand that there are 75 or 80 officers, or non-commissioned officers, who have taken commissions. It would be desirable to give these men a chance to vote and it might be done by inserting a provision in the Bill that Canadian officers with temporary commissions in the regular service may apply to the High Commissioner for affidavits and ballots, and, upon their being marked, may send the affidavits and ballots to the High Commissioner to be forwarded by him. It would give them an opportunity to vote.

Mr. DOHERTY: It is unfortunate that these individual gentlemen should lose their opportunity to vote, but on the other hand I think we are doing our full duty when we endeavour to provide for the members of the Canadian expeditionary force. To go outside and select a few people who have gone into the regular British army, and are not connected with the Canadian force, and try to provide a further method for their voting, is endeavouring to get a degree of perfection that will expose us to possible complications that the results would hardly justify. There are officers who are Canadians in some of the forces of the Allied armies, and it would be difficult for us to make the same provision for them. Upon the whole, I think that, having made a provision that seems adequately to cover the Canadian expeditionary force, it will probably be wiser for us not to endeavour to extend it further.

On the preamble:

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: Before the Bill is reported, I would ask the Minister of Justice if he persists in his intention that no notice shall be given of the time when and the place where the vote is to be taken by any officer.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: What does my hon. friend suggest?

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: Each officer, whether a commanding officer, a captain, or a sergeant, will have a certain number of men in his unit, who are to vote, and my suggestion is that notice should be given that on such a day and at such a place he will proceed to receive these votes. Otherwise, a man could come in and vote one day, another man to-morrow, another man the next day, and so on. What I had in mind was that notice should be given to those who are entitled to vote before such an officer, that on such a day and at such a place he would receive their votes.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: It would be very difficult to collect them all at the one place and on the same day.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: I do not deny that it is difficult, but it is only one of the difficulties surrounding this measure.

Mr. MARCIL: There would be no difficulty on that score in Canada, or in Bermuda, or in England. If the vote is to be allowed at all in France or in Belgium, I am sure the commanding officers could arrange to have some one representing the parties present. All that we on this side of the House want is that the vote coming from the firing line should be an honest vote.

Mr. DOHERTY: I desire to point out that when mention was made of my having refused yesterday to allow notice to be given, we were discussing a plan of official scrutineers, and what I was unwilling to undertake was that it should be an obligation of the officer taking the votes to see that the scrutineers were notified. It seems to me that if that system could be worked out, it would be more proper to require diligence on the part of the scrutineer to attend on the officer than to lay an obligation on the officer to run after the scrutineer. In order to meet a view in which I concurred, that is, that so far as possible we shall provide for observation of the operation of taking the votes, I desire to move:

That subsection 4 of section 2 be reconsidered for the purpose of adding thereto the following words:

"In cases where conditions make it possible, the officer empowered to receive affidavits and votes shall give notice of the time and place where he will receive such affidavits and votes, and shall permit any one officer, non commissioner officer or soldier who may desire to do so, to be present at said operations and act as agent of the respective parties, Government and Opposition, and any independent candidate, in the same manner as agents of candidates are empowered to act at a poll under the Dominion Elections Act. No volunteer who is entitled to vote and prevented by his military duties from voting at such time and place shall, however, be precluded from so doing at same other time and place."

I think, as we have allowed for the possibility of a voter voting for an independent candidate, it might be well to allow representation of such possible independent candidate.

Amendment agreed to.

Mr. OLIVER: According to the wording in the beginning of section 4, a returning officer is to be appointed at each military camp or base. At Edmonton there are two regiments of infantry occupying military buildings. In the case of the squadron, which is on the south side of the river, its base is at Medicine Hat; but it has the use of the armoury at Edmonton, and the men are billeted amongst the citizens. Would this be considered as a camp, and would this force have a returning officer under the interpretation of this section?

Mr. DOHERTY: I would feel that it ought to be treated as such. To remove all doubt I have no objection to putting in a section that shall interpret the word "camp."

Mr. OLIVER: If the word "base" were not used, the word "camp" would cover everything, but when the word base is used and when the men are not at their base and not at their camp there is confusion.

Mr. DOHERTY: There are conditions under which soldiers would not be in a camp. But we can interpret the word "camp." We struck out section 10. I move that the following be enacted as section 10 of the Bill:

"In this Act the word 'camp' shall include any barrack or barracks or other place where any unit or units are assembled for the purpose of military duties under a commanding officer."

Amendment agreed to.

Mr. MURPHY: May I ask if there has been any change in the title of the Bill? In this corrected reprint it is entitled, "An Act to enable Canadians on active military service during the present war to exercise their electoral franchise." But the Bill as it now stands enables others than Canadians to exercise their electoral franchise—for instance, persons in the British islands or other overseas Dominions who come within section 1.

Mr. DOHERTY: They must form part of the Canadian military forces.

Mr. MURPHY: But it says "to enable Canadians."

Mr. DOHERTY: They are persons enlisted in Canada.

Mr. MURPHY: Yes, but they are not Canadians. I think the title should be amended to meet the provisions of the Bill.

Mr. DOHERTY: Suppose we said "Canadian soldiers." I think that would describe them correctly. Whatever they may be as to nationality, when they join the Canadian permanent force or the Canadian expeditionary force, they are certainly correctly described as Canadian soldiers.

Mr. MURPHY: Would it not be more correct to say "to enable persons serving in the military service of Canada"?

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: A better wording, perhaps, would be, "to enable persons serving in the Canadian military forces." But I may remind my hon. friend that the title is dealt with on the third reading.

Bill as amended reported.

Mr. DOHERTY moved the third reading of the Bill.

Mr. PUGSLEY: I move in amendment:

That this Bill be not now read a third time, but that it be referred back to the Committee of the Whole House, with instructions that they have power to amend the same by striking out section 2 and inserting in lieu thereof the following:

"The Governor in Council shall appoint two commissioners for the purpose of carrying out the provisions of this Act, one of whom shall be nominated by the Prime Minister and one by the leader of the Opposition, within ten days after the passing hereof. And on failure of either the Prime Minister or the leader of the Opposition to make such nomination, the Governor in Council may make the appointment of the commissioner which either of such parties so failed to nominate. The said commissioners so appointed shall appoint a third commissioner within ten days of their being notified by the Governor in Council of their appointment, and should they fail to agree on such third commissioner, such third commissioner shall on the request of either or both of the said two commissioners be appointed by the Chief Justice of the Supreme Court of Canada. In case of the death, resignation or refusal to act at any time of either of such commissioners his place shall be filled in manner hereinbefore prescribed for the appointment of the said commissioner who so died, resigned or refused to act. The majority of the commissioners shall constitute a quorum and their acts shall be as legal and valid as the joint acts of the three commissioners.

"The said commissioners shall have power and it shall be their duty from time to time, to make all necessary regulations for the taking of the votes, the marking of the ballots, the taking of the affidavits of the voters and the transmission thereof to the Clerk of the Crown in Chancery and all procedure in connection therewith, so as to insure as far as possible that all persons entitled to vote hereunder shall have a fair and reasonable opportunity of doing so. Such regulation shall be subject to the approval of the Governor in Council. And when they have been so approved they shall have the same force and effect as if they were enacted as a part of this Act.

"The commissioners shall have power to appoint such persons to act as scrutineers and otherwise to assist in carrying out the said regulations as the commissioners may deem necessary from time to time."

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: The matter which the hon. gentleman has just brought to the attention of the House was debated very fully in committee, and reply was made by the hon. Minister of Justice to the arguments put forward in support of that suggestion. It is neither necessary nor desirable that these arguments should be repeated, and I hope that the hon. gentleman will not consider it discourteous if at this juncture we do not repeat them.

Mr. PUGSLEY: The matter was fully discussed in committee; I did not intend that we should go into it now.

Amendment (Mr. Pugsley) negatived on division.

Mr. PUGSLEY: I desire to move, seconded by Mr. Lemieux:

That this Bill be not now read a third time, but that it be referred back to the Committee of the Whole House with instructions that they have power to amend the same by adding as subsection 11 of section 2 the following:

"11. No action shall be taken under the foregoing provisions of this section until the same have been submitted to and approved by the Secretary for War of the United Kingdom."

This matter was discussed fully in committee, in the absence of the Prime Minister, and I do not propose now to add anything in support of this amendment.

Mr. SPEAKER: As the hon. gentleman has already moved one amendment, he has exhausted his right to speak on the third reading. The amendment which he now proposes is, therefore, out of order.

Mr. LEMIEUX: I beg to move this amendment.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: This matter also was fully discussed in committee, and it is not necessary nor desirable that we should add anything to the arguments which were made by my hon. friend the Minister of Justice in that respect. The only observation I desire to make is that the amendment as proposed, if carried into effect, would seem to constitute a very severe blow at the autonomy of Canada and the independence of this Parliament.

Mr. PUGSLEY: I do not take the view which my right hon. friend takes, for this reason: this Bill imposes certain duties upon officers of the British Army. It is made imperative upon these officers that they shall deliver ballots to Canadian soldiers who are entitled to use them; that they shall take their affidavits; that they shall place the different ballots and affidavits in envelopes; that they shall seal these envelopes and forward them in packages to the Clerk of the Crown in Chancery. That is imposing duties upon Imperial officers over whom this Government and this Parliament have no control whatever. It would seem to me, therefore, that before any action should be taken in the way of attempting to have these officers assume the functions which are specified in the Bill and take upon themselves the obligations which, by the Bill, they are required to take, it is only reasonable that the consent of the Secretary of State for War, who has jurisdiction and control over all these officers, should first be obtained. I cannot see how that would in any way derogate from the dignity, authority or autonomy of this Parliament.

Amendment (Mr. Lemieux) negatived on division.

Mr. MARCIL: I beg to move, seconded by the hon. member for Sunbury and Queens (Mr. H. H. McLean):

That this Bill be not read a third time, but that it be referred back to the Committee of the Whole House, with instructions that they have power to amend the same by striking out the words "twenty-one" in the first line of section one and by inserting the word "eighteen" in place thereof.

The House has already heard the arguments in support of this suggestion. I contend very respectfully that a man who has attained 18 years of age, who has undergone medical inspection, who is mentally and physically qualified to take up arms in the service of his country overseas, and who is willing to make the sacrifice of his life, if necessary, to defend the cause which he has at heart, should be on an equal footing with men of the age of 21. If the soldier who has attained the age of 21 years is to have the advantage of exercising the franchise, then it is an unjust and unfortunate discrimination that others who are serving their country should be deprived of that right. I think that this view will appeal to the whole of young Canada, which is taking a deep and patriotic interest in this matter.

Amendment (Mr. Marcil) negatived on division.

Mr. DOHERTY: I beg to move that the title of the Bill be as follows: An Act to enable Canadian Soldiers on Active Military Service During the Present War to Exercise their Electoral Franchise.

Motion agreed to.

Main motion (Mr. Doherty) agreed to, and Bill read the third time and passed

At one o'clock, the House took recess.

The House resumed at three o'clock.

PUBLIC ACCOUNTS COMMITTEE.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: Mr. Speaker, a report was made by the Public Accounts Committee yesterday and the House has not yet concurred in that report. It was intended to have made the usual motion for concurrence this morning, but I asked that it might be postponed, as I desired to make a statement in respect of it, having regard to the fact that the report or reports concerned contain some matter that demands the serious consideration of the Government. It would be possible to allow it to stand until to-morrow morning; but I would suggest, if the House has no objection, that the motion be taken at eight o'clock this evening for the purpose of having it disposed of and for the further purpose of giving me an opportunity to make the statement to which I have alluded. I would therefore move, if the House will consent, that motions shall be taken at eight o'clock this evening.

Motion agreed to.

WAR TAX STAMPS.

Mr. BUREAU: I wish to ask a question of the Postmaster General. I have here one of the new war-tax stamps for cheques, notes, etc., and I see it is exactly similar to the ordinary postage stamp, with the words "Canada postage" printed on it in the usual way, but with the words "war tax" on it. Is this special war tax stamp good for the payment of postage on a letter in the ordinary way? I was told in one of the banks this morning that a number of letters were returned to them yesterday—that the boys had, by inadvertence, placed the stamps marked war tax on them and that they were refused at the central post office. I understand that the ordinary postage stamp is good for payment of the special war tax. Is it also true that the war stamp is good for ordinary postage? If not, great confusion may result owing to the close resemblance between the two stamps.

Mr. CASGRAIN: I am not prepared to make a statement yet, but if the hon. gentleman will allow the question to stand until eight o'clock I shall reply fully. My impression is that the war-tax stamp is not available for the ordinary postage of letters.

DEPARTMENT OF THE INTERIOR.

REPORT OF MR. T. R. FERGUSON.

Hon. FRANK OLIVER (Edmonton) asked for leave to move the adjournment of the House for the purpose of discussing a matter of urgent public importance, namely, the report of Mr. T. R. Ferguson regarding the Department of the Interior.

And leave having been granted, he said:

Mr. Speaker, there have been laid upon the table of the House within the past few days certain reports made by one T. R. Ferguson, who was appointed a commissioner by Order in Council, which has also been placed on the table. In order that the House may be aware of the scope of the inquiry, it may perhaps be as well to read, in whole or in part, the orders under which Mr. Ferguson worked. There are two. The first of these is dated the 10th of May, 1913, passed under the Inquiries Act of 1906, and appoints Mr. Ferguson a commissioner.

> —to investigate and report upon all matters connected with the sale, lease, grant, exchange or disposition by any means whatsoever, since the 1st day of July, 1896, of (a) Dominion lands, (b) timber and mineral lands and mining rights and privileges, including coal, petroleum and gas lands and rights; (c) water-powers and rights, under the authority or purporting to be under authority of the Dominion Lands Act, Irrigation Act, or other statutes of the Parliament of Canada.

It will be observed that this gives Mr. Ferguson a fairly comprehensive range of activity, but it did not seem to be considered adequate for the purposes in view; and so, on the 27th of June, 1913, the order was amended to provide that Mr. Ferguson be appointed a commissioner under Part I of the Inquiries Act:

> To investigate and report upon all matters relating to or connected with the application for (although such application may not have been granted or may be still pending), the sale, lease, grant, exchange or disposition by any means whatsoever, since the 1st day of July, 1896 of (a) Dominion lands; (b) timber and mineral lands and mining rights and privileges, including coal, petroleum and gas lands and rights and irrigation tracts or lands; and the cutting of timber upon Government lands; (c) water-powers and rights; (d) Indian lands and Indian reserves.

In pursuance of this authority, Mr. Ferguson entered upon his duties, and that he was more or less diligent in the performance of those duties may fairly be gathered from the reports showing the results of his efforts, which have been laid upon the table of the House in the past few days and are now before the House for their inspection and consideration. I may say, for information, that I understand that Mr. Ferguson's services were enlisted at a cost of approximately $30,000 in the way of salary and $10,000 for expenses. This report thus represents an outlay of approximately $40,000. So there is no question that Mr. Ferguson had an ample range of authority, and there is no doubt that he had plenty of financial backing; nor is there any doubt that he has volumes of documents to show as the result of his activities. It would be ignoring the plain facts not to admit or take for granted that the purpose of Mr. Ferguson's appointment was to find actions that would be blameworthy on the part of myself as Minister of the Interior or on the part of my predecessor in that office. That, I take it, was the sole and only purpose of the appointment of Mr. Ferguson. No other reason, I think, can fairly be adduced.

As a result of this exhaustive examination that he has made, this unlimited investigation that he has been authorized to make, and that the country has paid for, certainly with unlimited liberality, I think I am safe in saying that both the Administration of my predecessor and that of myself have received at the hands of Mr. Ferguson what may be considered a very satisfactory certificate of character. There can be no doubt of the fact that Mr. Ferguson's investigations were prompted by political animus rather than by a sincere desire to secure the protection of the public interest. There have been many transactions of the Interior Department since 1896, but of all these thousands of transactions, we find by these reports that Mr. Ferguson has only dealt with the transactions that in some way are linked with the name of some person who is either a prominent Liberal in public life or a prominent official appointed by the Liberal Government. If Mr. Ferguson has not made any successful discoveries it certainly is not for want of authority, or for want of political animus. Besides that, it may be noted that while the second order that was issued to empower Mr. Ferguson to extend his inquiries was issued to enable him to take cognizance of unfinished transactions, and transactions entered upon by the Government of the day, there is no reference to any such transactions in any of these documents. Mr. Ferguson has confined himself almost entirely to transactions which already have been aired on the floor of Parliament, and to which, I am bound to say, his investigations have added very little in the way of information to the public.

While I do not wish to introduce a controversial attitude in the discussion of this report, I think it is only due to the country that it should be informed that this report, which obviously has been in large measure completed for a very long time, and I fancy has been entirely completed for a considerable time, was not presented to Parliament at a period of the session that would permit of a full and fair examination and discussion by Parliament or of such scrutiny as such an extensive and voluminous report would naturally be entitled to. It will be observed that while this report deals with matters concerning the operations of the Interior Department, no part of it was laid on the table of the House until the Estimates of the Department of the Interior and, may I say as well, the Estimates of the Department of Public Works had passed the House. Immediately those Estimates had passed, the volumes containing the report of the investigations began to be laid on the table. It is obvious that the animus on the part of the commissioner was behind the commissioner as well. It was not the intention of the Government that appointed that commission that the results of its work should be considered in Parliament fairly and impartially or that the questions arising under it should be discussed in Parliament as they should have been discussed and as they could only or best be discussed in Committee of the Whole House during the discussion of the Estimates of the department.

I have already said that there is no fault to find with the majority of the conclusions reached by Mr. Ferguson; but although there is not, these documents have been laid on the table of Parliament at a time when they do not admit of a reasonable measure of examination or discussion or consideration, but at a time when the public press has every opportunity to obtain knowledge of these documents and to place any construction it pleases upon any part of the matter contained. The Government laid itself out in the beginning to take all the advantage that lay in its hands, by reason of having control of the affairs of the country, and by reason of the Act providing for investigations in regard to public matters, and over, above and beyond that, they further took the strategical, practical, political, partisan and picayune advantage of bringing these documents before Parliament at a time when they cannot be properly considered or discussed, and at a time when all the political capital that can possibly be made out of them can be made out of them by the newspaper friends of our hon. friends on the other side of the House. I have no fault to find with the appointment of a commissioner to investigate the transactions of the Interior Department under my Administration or anybody else's administration. The transactions of the Interior Department are the business of the public, and the public have a right to be informed in regard to those transactions. They have a right, especially, if there is any suspicion, and I have no doubt there was suspicion in the minds of our hon. friends opposite as to the character of the transactions involved. Therefore, I say that the Government had a perfect right to appoint a commissioner to make all the investigation that is possible or that they think is necessary. But they have no right, having done that, having invoked the extreme power of the law in protection of the public interest, to turn that to a petty, partisan advantage as they have done in the case of this report.

Now, dealing with the different separate reports, I will first take the one with which my name is particularly connected. I have here the report upon the matter, and it is described as:

> Re the Bulletin Company, Limited, the Honourable Frank Oliver, and the Grand Trunk Pacific Railway Company.

Not to weary the House by going into any very great detail, I may say that the subject-matter of this report is the statement that the Grand Trunk Pacific Railway Company hold $15,000 of stock in the Bulletin Company, Limited, in which company I also hold a large amount of stock, or the controlling interest; that is, the controlling interest is in my name. The Grand Trunk Pacific Company, some time about 1905 or 1906, took shares in that company to the amount of $15,000. I do not know that it is of interest either to the House or to the country what the financial operations of the Bulletin Company, Limited, may be; but on that point I may mention that the Bulletin newspaper was founded by me, became a limited liability company later, and was conducted upon lines suitable to the circumstances of the city and surrounding country up to the point when the great development began as a result of the construction of the Grand Trunk Pacific railway and the extension of the Canadian Northern railway. About that time, I transferred my activities to Ottawa, in an endeavour to help along the interests of the country in the administration of the Interior Department, and naturally I left the Bulletin to take care of itself. If the newspaper was to continue its development in proportion to the changed circumstances of the country, it became necessary that it should have increased capital. A new company was formed, to which some of the leading citizens of Edmonton subscribed money, and to which it appears from the record that the Grand Trunk Pacific Company subscribed $15,000. I took shares for the interest I had in the company, and the business has gone on in that way ever since.

I do not know whether it would be of interest to the House and the country to know that the business has not been prosperous, and in all probability the Grand Trunk Pacific Company have lost their $15,000, as I have lost a good many thousand dollars also as a result of my connection with the Bulletin Company, Limited. I only allude to this because it is alluded to in this document.

I find further, on considering this document, that Mr. Ferguson apparently had in his mind the idea that the Grand Trunk Pacific Company had bought $15,000 worth of influence in the administration of the Interior Department, by taking this amount of stock in the Bulletin Company. I say that his purpose was to discover whether or not the Grand Trunk Pacific Company had bought $15,000 worth of influence in the Interior Department by taking this stock in the Bulletin Company, Limited; but after having made an exhaustive investigation, Mr. Ferguson does not find that. He did not find that the company had any influence in the administration of the Interior Department or he would have said so. He carefully does not say so, and what he says is:

> With regard to the propriety of the transaction as detailed herein, I do not know that it is necessary for me to comment upon the same at any length.

Now, after the evidence of animus that is shown throughout the transaction connected with the operations of Mr. Ferguson, after the investigation that he made as shown by his report, to find if the Grand Trunk Pacific had received advantage because of the ownership of stock in the Bulletin Company, after all his efforts he has not been able to find anything upon which he can hang even the suggestion of that influence, because if he had he would have said so. It was in order to enable him to say so that this country has paid between $36,000 and $40,000 for this report that is now lying before us. Mr. Ferguson says:

> Although I endeavoured to obtain some explanation from the Grand Trunk Pacific Railway Company as to why it should, and did, go into this transaction, I have been unable to do so.

And he continues:

> As the evidence reveals in purchasing the stock the company was doing something which was quite out of its usual line of business, and contrary to the custom of the company. That it was not regarded as of the nature of an investment would appear from the fact that the company, from the day of the purchase of the stock until the present time, has paid no attention to the affairs or management of the Bulletin Company, or attended any of its meetings, and no dividends have ever been received.

It was a mystery to Mr. Ferguson why the Grand Trunk Pacific Company desired to take stock in the Bulletin Company; I suppose it was just as much a mystery to him why a number of gentlemen in the city of Edmonton took stock in the Bulletin Company. But it was no mystery to anybody who knows the circumstances of the case. These men desired to see the newspaper expanded to correspond with the new conditions of the city, and I presume that the Grand Trunk Pacific Company, being interested in Edmonton, as a junction and terminal point, felt a like interest and were willing to take stock for that purpose. But it makes no difference what the purpose of the Grand Trunk Pacific Company was, the result which Mr. Ferguson wished to find has been achieved or not achieved, and that is the only thing in which, as I understand it, the House and the country is concerned. It is too bad that Mr. Ferguson was disappointed to the extent he was; it is too bad that our friends on the other side of the House have not been able to get what they expected for their expenditure of the money of the country, but there is the report, and that is the only conclusion that can be drawn from it.

There is, however, something else that may be brought to the attention of the House in connection with this report, and it is this—I wish all members of the House to realize just what has been done in this case. The Government of Canada, in partisan pursuit of a political opponent, took the authority that is vested in them for the purpose of furthering the public interest, in order to establish an inquisitorial inquiry into the private business of a political opponent, as to a matter with which the Government of Canada had no more business to deal than it has to deal with the private business of any other political opponent. I will admit that if Mr. Ferguson had found any evidence of improper collusion between myself as Minister of the Interior and the Grand Trunk Pacific, then he would have been warranted in inquiring as to what relationship existed between us; but that was not where he started apparently. He started to inquire into the private business of the Bulletin Company, Limited, as on the same principle he could start an inquiry into the private business of any private individual in this Dominion and expose that private business to the public gaze at the will, wish, suggestion or whim of the Government of the day. In my humble opinion, this is a most dangerous precedent and an action which will not find approval at the hands of the people of Canada. Power is vested in the hands of the Government for the purpose of protecting the public interest and not for the purpose of carrying on partisan warfare by methods which are generally relegated to porch-climbers or thugs. When the Government of Canada descends to that sort of political action, it disgraces Canada as well as itself. I do not fear any result that can be achieved by any Government of this country which chooses to make its fight supposedly in the public interest on any such principle, because, as is well-known by the members of this House, I have been the subject of blackmailing attacks for the past several years, and I do not think that those attacks have either done me any harm or done those who instigated them any good; and in so far as this attack, which is of the same character, goes, I think the result will be identical. When the Government of the day directs such an engine against a member of the Opposition, turning the authority of the Government into a means of political blackmail, it is establishing itself in a position of authority amongst even its own followers, and I think even its own followers will question the desirability of its existence. Supposing one of our hon. friends on the other side does not see eye to eye with the Government of the day on some important question, it is possible for the Government to appoint a commission of inquiry that will go into that man's private affairs, which may or may not be just as able to stand the light of day as the affairs of the Bulletin Company, Ltd., and to compel a loyalty of support on the part of its own followers that it is not entitled to receive and would not receive by reason of any other consideration. This principle of introducing blackmail into politics is a dangerous principle, and it is just as dangerous to supporters of the Government as it is to members of the Opposition.

I wish next to deal with the reference to my colleague, Mr. Cruise, the hon. member for Dauphin. Mr. Cruise moved for this report on the 15th of March; and although there is no doubt at all that the report was prepared at that time and had been prepared months before, it was not brought down until after Mr. Cruise, believing that the business of the House was practically finished, had gone home, so that he is not here to answer for himself in regard to this report; but, as it contains some reflections upon Mr. Cruise and indirectly upon myself, I propose to have a word or two to say in regard to it. Broadly speaking, I may say that the accusation is that Mr. Cruise acquired a homestead on misrepresentation and without having fulfilled the duties, and that this occurred through the improper and lax administration of the officials of the Department of the Interior for which, of course, I was responsible. This accusation has gone out through the press to all parts of the country, this being the intention of Mr. Ferguson when he made his report and the intention of the Government when they held it until Mr. Cruise was absent and when they laid it on the table of the House at the time they did lay it.

What happened was this: The Riding Mountain Forest reserve had been set apart some years before by Order in Council or by departmental order, I do not know which. Owing to the fact that the reservation had not been carefully examined before being made, some parts of the area included were suitable for settlement, and squatters went on these parts. When by the Act of 1906, these reservations were made by statute, and a more careful examination was made of the forest conditions existing within them, a new line was drawn which excluded some quarters and included others in the reserve. It became necessary for the Government to take action to rid the reserve of those squatters who were inside of the boundaries, and to dispose under equitable conditions of the lands which had hitherto been reserved, but which were now excluded, and upon which there were some squatters. A Mr. Davis, who had been a forest ranger, was appointed to attend to this work, which of necessity must be handled on the ground and by personal examination. It was a difficult piece of work to do; we had to get rid of the squatters who remained on the permanent reserve, and we got rid of them by compensating them—by giving them other land largely in the area that was permanently cut out of the reserve. In dealing, then, with the lands that were out of the reserve, we gave precedence to the men who were in occupation as squatters, and then disposed of the remaining lands to applicants as they came forward. For some considerable period before the Government took the action that I have stated, there had been a movement on to these reserves. Some men went on and established permanent improvements and went into residence; some established temporary improvements and did not go into residence. When we were disposing of the land that had been taken out of the reserve, we considered claims as to priority of right of selection, so that it was necessary that a man should have actually resided or squatted upon the land while it was still in the reserve. If there were tangible, substantial improvements, we recognized that the owner of them had a prior right over somebody who had not improved. That was the position of Mr. Cruise. He is an old homesteader in the Dauphin district. He was entitled to a second homestead. Having hopes, as others had, that this area would be cut out of the Riding Mountain reserve, in order to establish a priority right, I presume, he caused the beginning of a building to the erected in 1906, while the land was still on the reserve. Then, when the land was cut out of the reserve, he applied for homestead rights upon this land, and was accorded these rights on the ground that he had improvements on the land prior to that time. Mr. Ferguson suggests that Mr. Cruise acquired these rights by fraud or misrepresentation. There is absolutely no warrant whatever for that statement.

Now, as to Mr. Cruise securing patent. He entered under the provision of proving up by the ranging of cattle upon the land. His permanent residence was within nine miles of the locality, so he did not need to be in actual residence in order to prove up. All he needed was twenty head of cattle upon that land. He had—so this evidence goes to show—only thirteen head of cattle of his own at that time. He bought seven head from a neighbour and gave a promissory note in payment; and on the strength of the ownership of these twenty cattle, he acquired patent for this land—absolutely, unquestionably in accordance with the letter of the law as it stood at that time. Mr. Ferguson does not think so. He thinks that Mr. Cruise did not get his patent according to the law. I say that that is a misrepresentation on the part of Mr. Ferguson. And it is neither more nor less than an outrage on the part of this Government, that after having such a report in their hands, and it having been asked for by the member affected by it, they did not bring it forward when they had it there, and give him a chance on the floor of this House to state his actual position in regard to it. I may say that the use of cattle for the purpose of proving up the right of homestead was subject to abuse, and there were cases in which, while the letter of the law was fulfilled, the spirit was not fulfilled. And because of that, in 1908, an amendment was made in the law abolishing the right to prove up by ranging cattle on the homestead. This Government that appointed Mr. Ferguson and finds fault with Mr. Cruise for having proved up with cattle, absolutely within the terms of the law, has reinstated that provision so that anybody can prove up a homestead anywhere in the West exactly as Mr. Cruise proved up this homestead—can do it to-day. Mr. Ferguson concludes his report as follows:

> There does not appear to be a proper or adequate supervision of the grants for sale of public lands. If as suggested in other reports there had been a supervisor appointed who was reponsible for the legal and proper grant of each quarter-section granted, the frauds above mentioned could not have been perpetrated.

Mr. Davis was appointed as supervisor and had personal supervision and responsibility over and for these transactions. Mr. Ferguson uses the word "fraud" with a view to creating the impression that the country was in some way defrauded by the action of Mr. Davis. There was no fraud upon the country, in any way, shape or manner. The lands were there available for homestead, and the only question that is raised in the evidence offered by Mr. Ferguson is whether Mr. Davis gave due consideration to the rights of priority in the application made to these lands. It was a question between one applicant and another, and not between the applicants on one side and the country or the Government on the other. Mr. Ferguson has deliberately undertaken to create a false impression in regard to this case which has been taken advantage of by the newspapers supporting hon. gentlemen opposite. And I take the liberty of repeating that such a course is not politics, it is not partisanship, it is simply plain ordinary political brigandage.

Mr. SPEAKER: I am afraid the hon. member is a little extravagant. I would remind him that it is not in order to impute an improper motive in what is done by an individual member of Parliament or by a number of members of Parliament collectively. Being an old member of the House, I naturally expect the hon. member not to be guilty of an infraction of the rules.

Mr. OLIVER: I intended this to apply to the commissioner and not to the House. I do not wish to trespass upon the rules but I wish to make a statement that can be understood. I have quoted the concluding paragraph of Mr. Ferguson's report for the purpose of showing that on his own statement there was absolutely no fault to find with the principle of the administration of the department's affairs by myself at that time and in that case. He does find fault with the details, but he declares that the principle that was followed was the right principle.

Here is a "report on, the Southern Alberta Land Company, Limited, and the Grand Forks Cattle Company, J. D. McGregor, Arthur Hitchcock and others." I do not pretend that I have been able to go through this report and to find out all that it says and all that it leaves unsaid. Being personally familiar, as administrator of the department at that time, with some matters connected with the Southern Alberta Land Company, I wish to make a short statement in regard to it. An application was made to the department for a tract of land for irrigation purposes. This tract was known to be in what is now recognized as the area of light rainfall in southern Alberta; that is to say, it was an area that was considered to be capable of development by irrigation. There was the land that needed irrigation to ensure its productivity, and there was sufficient water in the river for the purposes of irrigation. The company asked for a grant of that land, at a nominal price, on condition that they should put water upon it. They were given the right to put the water upon the land; in the effort to do that they have spent a very large amount of money, and the works are very close to completion. I shall not argue the merits of the proposition, or the principle on which it was founded. There is no question as to the propriety of the principle, and there is no question as to the soundness of the proposition. It is, beyond question, for reasons that technical men will understand, the best irrigation proposition in southern Alberta, because it includes a lake of warm water which is available to be turned on the land after it is warmed, as compared with the cold water of the river flowing directly through the irrigation ditches on to the land. A cursory glance through this report leads me to believe that Mr. Ferguson desires to create the impression that these people should not have had the opportunity to spend their money upon this irrigation project. That is a matter with regard to which I at once take issue with him. I stand exactly by the principle that when these people came forward it was proper to allow them to spend their money in the development and irrigation of that land. As I understand it, they get title to the land only on consideration of their having developed it by irrigation. So convinced is this Government of the merit of and the desirability of completing this scheme, and of the bona fides of the company, that there is in the Estimates for the year ending March 31, 1916—item 490, under the heading "Dominion Lands and Parks"—the following item:

To provide for refund to the Southern Alberta Land Company, Limited, subject to security for repayment, with interest, upon terms arranged by authority of the Governor in Council, re-vote, $140,573.

I do not know what Mr. Ferguson has said about this project, but I am telling the House what the Government thinks of the desirability of completing it and what the Government thinks of the bona fides of the company.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Is it the same company?

Mr. OLIVER: Yes, the Southern Alberta Land Company. The amount was voted last year, and revoted again this year.

I think it would be only losing time to read all that Mr. Ferguson has written in the conclusion of his report, but the final conclusion that he reaches is this:

After discussion of the matter with several experts of the United States of America, where irrigation has been very extensively carried on, that the proper method is that irrigation should be carried on under government supervision and control.

That may be very true, but the Government had not adopted the principle of government supervision at that time. The policy of the Government was to use the value of the land as a means of securing its development by irrigation, and in pursuance of that policy this arrangement with the Southern Alberta Land Company was entered into. As I say, it is being carried out by the company to the satisfaction of this Government, to the extent that they are willing to pay $140,000 to the company in assistance of their enterprise. I presume, however, that in all these pages Mr. Ferguson is desirous of creating the impression that the company should not have got the land. I presume, further, that his effort was to prove that in my administration of the department I had done some wrong to the country in allowing the company to spend their money by the million in that effort.

4 p.m.

Here is another irrigation proposition: the Aylwin Company, E. A. Robert and J. D. McGregor. This report is even bulkier than the former one, and I have not been able to go through it in its entirety. I have only a very indistinct recollection of this transaction, but as near as I can follow Mr. Ferguson's idea, while he desires to create the impression that the late Government acted unwisely and unjustly in giving the land to the Southern Alberta Company, he finds fault with the late Government for not having given the land to the Aylwin Company, because a large part of it was opened to homestead entry. That is as much as I can make out of his report. Apparently a man named Aylwin applied for an irrigation tract, making certain representations to the department as to his ability to put water on the land. Later it was found that he could not put water on the land—either the water was not there, or he could not get it—and as a consequence his right lapsed and part of the tract was opened up to homestead entry, and was actually homesteaded. Part of it was under grazing lease, and, I fancy, in consideration of whatever steps the Aylwin Company had taken, they were confirmed in their rights in so far as the grazing lease was concerned. They afterwards entered into a transaction with the Southern Alberta Land Company, and the Southern Alberta Land Company acquired the whole tract. Upon it, as I say, they have spent large sums of money, and of that enterprise the Government has substantially approved.

Mr. Ferguson reaches the sage conclusion:

I conclude by saying that this seems to have been really a granting of this particular tract to individual promoters, who looked for enrichment. That they did not make very large sums out of it, is no fault of theirs. If these applicants had been informed that the Government policy was such that they bind themselves to irrigate, that they would not be allowed to sell or dispose of their interests, that they must irrigate and begin the work and carry it on themselves, it is altogether likely they would never have endeavoured to acquire this tract. In such an event—in this case at any rate—these purchasers would not have acquired it, as they would necessarily have taken the trouble to learn, and have learned, that the tract could not be irrigated.

I find here a report: "On the matter known as the Craven dam—Walter Scott, Lieut. Governor Brown and J. G. Turriff.' If I am not trespassing on the rules of the House, I would like to say that after such perusal as I have been able to give this report I can find no reason whatever for making it the subject of an investigation by a commission, or of a Parliamentary report, except the desire to couple the names of Lieut. Governor Brown and Premier Walter Scott with an undesirable publicity at the hands of this gentleman, Mr. Ferguson. Mr. Brown purchased some lands from the department about the year 1900 at one dollar an acre. These lands were partially flooded lands. Afterwards, it appears, there was an Exchequer Court suit in connection with the lands and some parts of them were sold at $25 an acre. Mr. Ferguson goes through all these pages in an attempt to prove that because at one time the land was sold at one dollar an acre and was afterwards sold at $25 an acre, there was improper action on the part of Premier Scott or of Lieut. Governor Brown. I need not carry the argument any further; it is simply the height of absurdity, and I need not dwell upon it. As to the appreciation of the value of land, everybody knows that land increased in value enormously from 1900 until 1911, and even until 1912. I find in the report of the Deputy Minister of the Interior for 1914 a statement of the total sales and the average prices realized on lands sold by large companies in the provinces of Manitoba, Saskatchewan and Alberta; and I find from this report that in the year 1900, which is about the time that Mr. Brown acquired these partially flooded and at the that time practically valueless lands, the average price was $3.27 an acre, while in 1914 the value per acre was $14.75 an acre. There has been that average appreciation in the selling value of lands in those prairie provinces. If you consider that the land bought by Governor Brown—remember, when he was a private citizen, when he was not Governor—as an adjunct to his ranch in 1900, because of its value for hay land, at a time when hay had no value and hay land was not considered valuable—if it is recognized that the most valuable land that could be sold by all companies, their selected lands, would bring only $3.27 per acre,—Mr. Brown was paying a fair price for land of the character that he bought. On the other hand, with the appreciation of the general value of land and particularly the appreciation of the value of hay land because of the closeness of settlement in the country, there is nothing whatever to warrant the suggestions put forward by Mr. Ferguson either that Mr. Brown got the land at less than its value in the first place or that he sold it at more than its value in the second place; and this was an absolutely gratuitous supposition on the part of Mr. Ferguson for the purpose of prejudicing a prominent political opponent. I am informed that part of this land, before Mr. Brown acquired it, had been homesteaded and had been abandoned by the homesteaders because it was not considered valuable. As a matter of fact, hundreds of thousands of acres of land, the property of the Qu'Appelle, Long Lake and Saskatchewan Railway and Colonization Company, in the immediate vicinity of this very land, was sold at $1.10 per acre in, I believe, 1902 or 1903—land that was not hay land or of low value, but land that was considered to be of good average value. But see what Mr. Ferguson says:

> These extracts from Mr. Brown's evidence, are a justification of the comments and statements I make as to the value of the lands when sold to him. The Crown should have received very considerably more than $1 per acre. I must take it that Mr. Brown did not mean the statements contained in his two letters as to the value of the lands. They were not made upon oath, and I accept the statements upon oath showing his idea of the time value of these lands. My conclusion therefore, is:
> First; that instead of producing very little hay, these lands produced on an average two tons per acre per annum.
>
> Second; that instead of being of very little value, these lands were worth as found on expropriation proceedings, at any rate $25 per acre.
> Further comment on Mr. Brown's evidence is unnecessary. It speaks for itself.

I will interpolate the idea that further comment on Mr. Ferguson's statement is not necessary: it speaks for itself.

Mr. PUGSLEY: When was the land expropriated ?

Mr. OLIVER: I think about 1910.

I find here a "report on a grazing ranch J. G. Turriff, A. J. Adamson and J. D. McGregor." This transaction was ventilated in the House of Commons a number of years ago. I do not think anything new is added in this report to what was said in the House at that time. I take it that Mr. Ferguson makes this report simply for the purpose of bringing into undesirable prominence the name of my friend and colleague, the member for Assiniboia (Mr. Turriff), and for no other reason that can be conceived. The transaction relates to a grazing lease, application for which was made by one Brown. The application was made at a time when closed grazing leases were allowed; that is, they were closed for 21 years. In some way Brown's application did not go through. After I became minister, I cancelled the regulations providing for closed leases for 21 years and provided that all 21-year closed leases should be cancellable on two years' notice. The applicants pressed for the granting of their lease. I decided that as we were trying to clear off the conditions that had existed up to that time in regard to closed leases, and as we were trying to establish new conditions, it was desirable that we should do so having regard to the rights already existing. I granted, as the evidence will show, a closed lease to the people who were the assigns of Brown. I do not know whether it was in the name of these gentlemen or not, but we will assume that it was. These men became the beneficial owners of Brown's application under the action I took, under the principles I laid down and the principles upon which I acted. We were making a very sudden and radical change in grazing regulations. We had to get the acceptance and approval of the people of the West to that change, and in order to get that acceptance it was desirable to clear off all existing or vested rights. I have no doubt that if we had taken the action that has been taken by our friends on the other side of the House in dealing with some of their political opponents, we would have said to every man whose lease had not been closed up: There is nothing doing; you are through. We did not do that, and I do not think it is good policy on the part of our friends opposite to do it; however, that is their business. We have granted this as a closed lease because application had been made for it, and the conditions in a certain measure had been fulfilled and the law was that closed leases could be had. Mr. Ferguson says that we did not charge the $2,400 rental that we should have charged these parties. That may be true, but on the other hand, the parties had not had the beneficial use of the lease during that time. There may have been an undue leniency in regard to the $2,400, and on the other hand there may not have been. I do not know that this Government is absolutely justified in taking $2,400 out of a private individual unless that private individual has had reasonable value for the money. Since it is a question that was in dispute, since it was awaiting adjudication, and since it needed further consideration, I am not prepared to admit that we should have charged that rental, although I am quite prepared to admit that we could have done so if we had seen fit. Mr. Ferguson's conclusion is:

> All of which goes to show the necessity for great care and attention in the carrying out not only departmental detail, but in guarding against errors and misunderstanding of those unfamiliar with the file, justifying my suggestions in other reports relative to the appointment of a supervisor of the different steps taken in different matters in the department.

That is his conclusion in regard to what has been heralded through the country by the press supporting our friends on the other side of the House as a most iniquitous transaction.

I find here a report on timber berths, with the names of W. H. Nolan, A. W. Fraser, K.C., and J. G. Turriff. I do not recall that this was under my administration, and I will leave this report for my hon. friend (Mr. Turriff) to deal with.

Here are two cases: The Kananaskis Coal Company, Limited, with the names of Howard Douglas, George E. Hunter and Walter Carret and others, and timber berths 550-558. As far as I have been able to gather from a glance through these reports, there is no suggestion that these people got anything that they did not pay for. The suggestion is, that being officers of the Government, they had no right, and they should not have been permitted to deal in Government property. With that contention I have no fault to find, and in so far as my administration was concerned, certainly I did not permit officers of the department to have transactions in the property of the Government. But it is only fair to these parties to point out that the business of the Department of the Interior increased in magnitude and value very rapidly from year to year during the period immediately before I became minister and while I was minister. Dealing with these questions from the point of view of the conditions as they prevailed in 1911, it is not fair to consider them from the point of view of the conditions that prevailed in 1900 or 1896. What was of little value in 1896 became three, four, five, six or ten times as valuable in 1911. From time to time it became necessary in the administration of the affairs of the Department of the Interior to make a change to meet the new conditions. What was quite permissible in years before ceased to be permissible as values and interests increased. When these men acquired these properties, in so far as I can say, they acquired them either by themselves or by assignment from other people who had acquired them in the ordinary way, and it has yet to be shown that the public interest suffered in any degree.

The first charge is that the men themselves should not have dealt with Government property. With that conclusion I have no fault to find, and as far as my knowledge went no member of the department did deal in Government property while I was minister. The connection of these men with the department had ceased, the connection of some of them having ceased before I was minister, and if there is any justice in the matter, justice has been done and there was no necessity in the wide world in the public interest of dragging these men's names, in an undesirable connection, before the Parliament and people of Canada, or of spending the money of the people in going over cases that were already settled and in regard to which the commissioner makes no suggestion as to any other action to be taken.

I find a report here: "re the Blood Indian Reserve and Frank Pedley." Frank Pedley was Deputy Superintendent-General of Indian Affairs, and as nearly as I can gather from what I see here, about 1903, before I became minister, a lease of the grazing rights on the Blood Indian Reserve was granted to one McEwan, of Brandon. McEwan afterwards took into his interest in the grazing lease Peter Ryan of Toronto, and Gordon, Ironsides, and Fares, of Winnipeg. There is no question about the propriety of the lease. These people agreed to pay $5,000 a year for the grazing rights; they paid the money, and it was a sound business transaction from start to finish so far as I understand it. Gordon, Ironsides and Fares, were great cattlemen; they needed the grazing lands; the Indians were not using them; and it was good business to lease the grazing rights in these reserves to somebody who would use the lands and give the Indians the financial benefits of that use. That was the transaction, and that was what was done.

There is no question about the responsibility of the parties concerned; there is no question as to the fact that they paid a fair price for what they got; but this whole report is an attempt to prove that Frank Pedley had some financial interest in the transaction. Frank Pedley is not in the department to-day; he has nothing whatever to do with the affairs of this country, and there was no sound reason in the world for Mr. Ferguson spending his time on this report, or no sound reason in the world for laying this report on the table of Parliament, except the partisan reason to make party politics pending a general election that the Government is ashamed to announce they are going to hold. Pedley's connection with this, so he informs me, was this: Peter Ryan, one of the lessees of this reserve owed Pedley money, or he owed the Bank of Commerce money upon Pedley's endorsation; that is, Pedley had endorsed Ryan's paper in the Bank of Commerce, and this occurred before there was any lease at all. Later on the Bank of Commerce pressed for payment and Ryan assigned a part of his interest in the lease to one Bedford Jones. Jones sold the interest to one Miller for $1,000, and the money was applied to reduce Ryan's indebtedness to the Bank of Commerce. And for that reason Mr. Pedley's name must be dragged through the columns of the Conservative press in this country, in terms that would certainly not be more than justified if Mr. Pedley were a horse-thief instead of a respectable citizen, who did good service to this country as Deputy Superintendent-General of Indian Affairs, and who has no reason not to look any man in the eye, let it be the Prime Minister of Canada or Mr. T. R. Ferguson.

Mr. J. D. REID: Does the report show that Mr. Pedley got nothing out of it?

Mr. OLIVER: I have been trying to tell my hon. friend that.

Mr. REID: Does it show that he only got a thousand dollars?

Mr. R. B. BENNETT: He admits that he got more.

Mr. OLIVER: I have stated what I have been able to gather from this report. This shows the unfairness of putting these reports upon the table at this time of the session, and I hope I shall not be declared out of order when I say that if my hon. friends opposite choose to take that course they must take the logical consequence of it, which is, that they have taken an undue and partisan advantage which is not to their credit nor to the benefit of good government in this country. It is not right that an attempt should be made to use the vast authority of the Government of Canada to pillory any honest citizen before the people of this country.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Do I understand the hon. member to say that the $1,000 was used to reduce Mr. Ryan's indebtedness to Mr. Pedley?

Mr. OLIVER: I said it was used to reduce his indebtedness to the Bank of Commerce.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Then my hon. friend has not read the report.

Mr. OLIVER: Perhaps I have not read it as carefully as the Solicitor General has, but if he had an opportunity to read it, would it not have been decent to place it on the table and let the rest of us have an opportunity to read it?

Mr. MEIGHEN: There will be no hurry; we can stay here a week if the hon. gentleman wishes.

Mr. OLIVER: I thank the Solicitor General for the suggestion, and it is a fair sample of the kind of politics that is being played by gentlemen on the other side of the House. We have closed up the business of the session, we have transacted all the business the Government has offered us, we have voted the Supplies, we have passed all the legislation, and now the Solicitor General throws upon the table a pile of documents which apparently he has carefully studied, and he says: If you want a fair discussion on this, all you have to do is to prolong the session, with no other business before Parliament than the discussion of this subject. The Solicitor General can campaign the country during the coming general election on that policy, and I do not think he will get very far with it.

Mr. W. H. BENNETT: Is the hon. member aware that Mr. Pedley was examined before Mr. Ferguson some time ago?

Mr. OLIVER: Yes.

Mr. BENNETT: And the hon. gentleman learned from Mr. Pedley the result of the inquiry?

Mr. OLIVER: Yes.

Mr. BENNETT: And so the hon. gentleman is not surprised to-day?

Mr. OLIVER: I am not surprised to-day; but I have not had time to read the report. I have merely been able to give Mr. Pedley's side of the story.

Mr. BENNETT: The hon. gentleman knows, then, what is alleged against Mr. Pedley as related by Mr. Pedley himself, and that took place some months ago. Do I understand from the hon. gentleman that Mr. Pedley did not acquaint him with the investigation?

Mr. OLIVER: No.

Mr. BENNETT: Then, if the hon. gentleman never heard from Mr. Pedley anything about it, he is taken by surprise to-day.

Mr. OLIVER: Mr. Ferguson's report with regard to Mr. Pedley came down here two or three days ago, and I happened to meet Mr. Pedley, and I asked him about it. I had not read the report; I had not seen it. He gave me what I have given to the House, and I am prepared to take his word in regard to that quite as much as that of Mr. Ferguson, or any other hired thug such as he is.

I find another report here on "Indian lands; re James A. Smart, Frank Pedley, and William J. White." Of course the major part of the transactions alluded to in this report took place before I was minister, and again I say I have not had an opportunity of considering them very carefully. As I gather, the allegation is that Smart, Pedley and White—Smart being Deputy Minister of the Interior, and Deputy Superintendent General of Indian Affairs, Pedley being Superintendent of Immigration, and White being a subordinate officer in the Immigration Department—formed a company of some kind to acquire Indian lands. Now, I have already said that on the question of the interference of officers of the Government in the property of the people I do not suggest for a moment justification for that action. I have pointed out that as conditions changed, what was permissible at one time became unpermitted at another time, and, whatever occurred, two of these gentlemen are out of the service of the Government to-day; one of them was out of it before I became minister at all, and he was the only one who had anything to do with the Indian Department and the third man is still in the service of the Government.

As far as I have been able to follow the report, there is no suggestion that these men in purchasing Indian lands got an acre of them for less than its full value; they paid dollar for dollar for everything that they got. That being the case, the Indian got what was coming to him; the country is discharged of its obligation to the Indian inasmuch as he got all that was coming to him, and the only question at issue is the propriety of Government officials meddling with public property. In regard to that matter, there is nothing in the report to indicate that it happened while I was minister. I certainly object to it, and I would not allow officers of the department, to my knowledge, to take such action. They must take their choice and speculate outside of the department, or refrain from speculating inside the department. That being the fact, however, there was no warrant for Mr. Ferguson spending the money of this country in securing evidence to this extent for the purpose of proving what every one will admit and bringing a report before Parliament in regard to one man who has not been in the Government service for, I think, over ten years, in regard to another man with whose services our friends on the other side have seen fit to dispense, and in regard to the third man who still is in the Government employ. Either Mr. Ferguson was anxious to put in his time in the preparation of this report—and I think he got $50 for every working day—or he was not able to find anything very serious in the way of delinquency in the Department of the Interior. If he could have found something more serious than the mere fact that these gentlemen bought Indian lands, by tender, taking their chances, getting them if their tender was the highest and not getting them if their tender was not. Mr. Ferguson was not using his time to good advantage when he spent so much of it in order to get this report, and I take it as a certificate of character to the administration of the department, to myself and to my predecessor that Mr. Ferguson, in all his search of two years at $50 a day, with all the authority of the Government behind him, with all the political animus that naturally went with himself and with those that put him into the position, was not able to do better than he did for his employers. Therefore we can take it for granted that under the Liberal Administration the people of Canada had an Administration of their Interior and Indian Affairs that was entirely and highly to their credit and to their benefit.

For a man who is paid $50 a day to find fault, over whom there is no control in any way, shape or form, who can say what he likes, and who by getting individuals into a solitary room and threatening them with process of law, is entitled to take down whatever he can compel them to say and to produce it before Parliament, it is possible to make a very much worse story than he has been able to make, so that if the results have been as they have been under the Liberal Administration, the country is still to be congratulated on the Administration it has received. It is an old saying that the proof of the pudding is in the eating, and we can judge best of Administration by results. As regards the values of land, when the Liberal Administration came into office, the railway companies and the Hudson Bay Company, that had the sale of lands in the Northwest, sold 108,000 acres at an average price of $3.34 per acre. This was all picked land, and they all wanted to sell and most of them employed special selling agents, but the best they could get for 108,000 acres of picked land was only $3.34 an acre. It took some time of Liberal Administration, of administration in the interests of the people of Canada, before the confidence of the people was inspired in the country so that the land advanced in price, because in 1900 the average price was only $3.27; in 1901, $3.36; in 1902, $3.56; in 1903, $3.46; but from 1903, with the inception of the railway policy of the Liberal Administration, the land of the West immediately began to increase in price, and it was $4.39 in 1904; $5.09 in 1905; $6.01 in 1906; $6.02 in 1907; $8.80 in 1908; $11.08 in 1909; $13.36 in 1910 and $13.59 in 1911. In that year the companies sold 1,406,651 acres at $13.59 an acre, the largest sale that had ever been made in any year or that has ever been made since. It is true that in 1914 the average price increased to $14.75, but the quantity of sales decreased to 501,575 acres; that is to say, the price of land increased by a little over a dollar an acre, but the sales decreased by over 900,000 acres. If the Administration of the Interior Department needed the advice that Mr. Ferguson has so kindly given it in all these reports, if it were so lax and slack and if so much fraud were perpetrated, it is not reasonable to suppose that the people would have had confidence in the country so that they would have rushed upon it and taken up homesteads in continually increasing numbers each year under the Liberal Administration, but this is what they did. In 1902, there were 14,673 entries; in 1903, 31,383; in 1904, 26,073; in 1905, 30,819; in 1906, 41,869; for the nine months of 1907 when there was the change in the fiscal year, 21,647; in 1908, 30,424; in 1909, 39,081; in 1910, 41,568, and in 1911, 44,479, or practically 44,500. But as soon as our friends got in and waved the magic wand of "leave well enough alone", entries began to drop, and in 1912 we had 39,000; in 1913, 33,000; 1914, 31,000. And they are still going down.

So I say that while the country must be grateful to Mr. Ferguson for the advice he has given as to the administration of the Interior Department, we think that this advice, if it is worth anything, if it is worth the money this country has paid for it, had better be tendered to our friends on the other side, and they had better take advantage of it, because the country absolutely needs some change in its administration from what it is getting at the present time, as compared with what it got under the late Administration.

As I said in the beginning, here is a report that has cost the country something in the neighbourhood of forty thousand dollars, which must be accepted as absolute evidence that under Liberal Administration our lands in all departments were administered as honestly as they were efficiently, and as the country's record shows they were efficiently administered.

Hon. W. J. ROCHE (Minister of the Interior): The hon. member for Edmonton (Mr. Oliver) has shown a good deal of heat because the Government has seen fit to appoint Mr. Ferguson as commissioner to inquire into the matters relating to the Interior Department over which the hon. gentleman formerly presided. I do not think he should find so much fault with the Government in investigating certain matters which had more or less a relation to his own administration of the department. I do not think he has very much reason to find fault because of the late time when, as he says, this report has been submitted. The report only came into my possession late in the month of March. It is true, I desired to peruse it before laying it upon the table. The session was in progress, and for the greater part of the time there have been three sittings a day. I had only time to hastily peruse the report and it was submitted to the House at the earliest possible moment under the circumstances. I think he is tolerably familiar with most of the matters discussed here to-day by reason of the fact that he was at the head of the department at the time they occurred, although I agree with him that after a lapse of time one's memory cannot be expected to retain all the details of these various transactions.

The hon. gentleman has stated that very little has been disclosed in return for the thirty-odd thousand dollars that have been paid to Mr. Ferguson. He points to the voluminous report and says that that is about all the country has in return for this large expenditure. It is easily seen that he has not carefully read this report. Because the attention of the country has been directed to the fact that the report has disclosed reasons to believe that the money was well spent. Had he read the report carefully, or even hurriedly, he would have found that it has been proven to the hilt that it has been a good expenditure for these disclosures.

Mr. OLIVER: Will the hon. gentleman be good enough to give us these instances? The matters relate to his own department. Let him come through with some of these instances.

Mr. ROCHE: I will try to give the instances. But, as I say, I have not got all the evidence and it is some time since I read it. The hon. gentleman has done the best he could in defence of himself, and I leave it to the members of this House whether the defence he has put up here in regard to these transactions is one in which the people will take much stock. I think he will find that there are many things that have been admitted on oath by his own former officials that will carry conviction to the people that his administration of the affairs of the Department of the Interior was not in the best interest of the country, and I will quote a few instances as I go along to prove my case. He states that this commission was appointed and this investigation held merely to enable the party press at this late stage of the session to make all the party capital they can against him and the Government of which he was a member. Well, what is the party press supporting himself and his party doing in connection with the investigations going on in the Public Accounts Committee, the Boots Committee and others, if not the very thing that he complains of in this investigation? Read those papers, from The Globe up, and you will find that there is scarcely a Liberal paper from one end of the country to the other that is not distorting the evidence, picking out particular portions from the statements of witnesses that they think will reflect upon this Government, and endeavouring to hold this Government responsible for every little lapse that has taken place in connection with the purchase of horses, boots or any other things the purchase of which has been investigated. Still, the hon. gentleman grumbles and thinks he has a grievance because the Conservative press has been publishing portions of this report which reflects upon himself. He knows what human nature is, and he knows that whatever party is in power the press of that party will try to make capital against their opponents and vice versa I think it a rather petty complaint for him to say that this report was brought down late for that purpose.

The hon. gentleman took up first the investigation into certain transactions connected with the Bulletin Company, Limited. He asks what right Mr. Ferguson had to investigate matters pertaining to his private business. There was a time when the hon. gentleman had a serious accusation made against him through the press of the country in connection with a certain deposit or cheque of $69,000. This was just before the late Government went out of power. The hon. gentleman then, both inside and outside this House, challenged the fullest investigation into that transaction, though it had no particular relation to the matters of the department over which he presided. And when he was so courageous to court inquiry into that affair, he should not take exception at Mr. Ferguson's desiring to probe this transaction, particularly in view of the fact that at least a prima facie case was made out for investigation, taking into consideration the fact that the Grand Trunk Pacific Railway Company invested $15,000 in the newspaper publishing company in which the hon. gentleman was interested, while at the same time that company was having direct and continuous relations with the department over which he presided. That is the reason assigned by Mr. Ferguson for this investigation. Let me quote his report on this point:

> With regard to the propriety of the transactions detailed herein, I do not know that it is necessary for me to comment upon the same at any length. The facts speak for themselves. When I learned, as commissioner, that the Grand Trunk Pacific Railway Company, having very extensive dealings in the year 1905, in fact, both before and after this stock transaction—was the purchaser of a considerable block of stock from the company practically owned and controlled by the minister presiding over the department with which it was dealing, I felt that it was my duty to examine into the matter, and report accordingly. If I had not felt that it was the duty of the minister to have avoided even the very appearance of all personal business transactions with persons or corporations with whom he was dealing as minister of the Crown, I should not have taken any evidence in this matter.

That is why the investigation was proceeded with. If the hon. member for Edmonton can see no reason why the Grand Trunk Pacific Railway Company should not have invested money in the paper of which he was proprietor when he presided over the department, then the hon. gentleman has not that sense of propriety that I think he should have. I am confident that if I as Minister of the Interior were unfortunate enough—or fortunate enough, as the case may be—to be the proprietor and publisher of a newspaper; and if, while acting as Minister of the Interior, I induced—because I presume that the hon. member did hold out inducements—the Grand Trunk Pacific Railway Company to take stock in that paper, the hon. gentleman would be the first person to condemn me for so doing.

The hon. gentleman states that nothing was proved as to the connection of the Grand Trunk Pacific Railway Company with the department. Mr. Ferguson did not go into details; he did not set out with the idea of proving any particular point or of delving into the particular transactions in connection with town sites or rights of way, but he did summon as a witness Mr. Lynch of the Railway Lands Branch. From that gentleman's evidence he established the fact that the Grand Trunk Pacific Railway Company had relations with the Department of the Interior. The evidence given by Mr. Lynch goes to show that at the time when Mr. Frank Scott purchased the stock in trust on behalf of the Grand Trunk Pacific Railway Company, paying $15,000 for the same, and when the hon. member for Edmonton was Minister of the Interior, the Grand Trunk Pacific Railway Company were carrying on extensive business transactions with the Department of the Interior, involving the transfer to the company of a large quantity of Government lands, including rights of way, town sites, terminals, etc.

Mr. Ferguson, therefore, established what he set out to establish: that the Grand Trunk Pacific Railway Company were having these relations with the Interior Department; that the Grand Trunk Pacific Railway Company took $15,000 worth of stock in the publishing company of which the then Minister of the Interior was the proprietor. Mr. Scott, who held this stock in trust, swore that he had not invested in it for himself; that the money had been given to him by the then vice-president of the company, and that he could not cite any other instance in which the Grand Trunk Pacific Railway Company had invested money in any other newspaper in the Dominion of Canada. It is rather significant that the Edmonton Bulletin, published by the then Minister of the Interior, should be selected above all other papers by the Grand Trunk Railway Company for the investment of this money. It could not have been because of the large dividends paid by the Edmonton Bulletin Company, because the ex-minister himself says that they have lost their money, and so has he. At any rate, no dividends have been paid. The Grand Trunk Pacific Railway Company paid this $15,000 to Mr. Scott, without any resolution of the company having been passed authorizing the same. It was done secretly; it was done in a manner of which Mr. Scott evidently knew absolutely nothing, except that he was asked to invest this $15,000 in his own name. That is all he could tell about it. He said that the Grand Trunk Pacific Railway Company had not invested money in any other papers that he knew of. He said that he has never attended an annual meeting of the directors of the Bulletin Company; that the Grand Trunk Pacific officials never took any particular interest in the affairs of the company. According to the hon. ex-Minister of the Interior, this amount of stock was a gift, because it was not expected that any dividends would be paid upon it. If by this defence which I consider to be a particularly lame one—of the investment of this $15,000 by the Grand Trunk Pacific Railway Company in his paper while he was Minister of the Interior, the hon. member for Edmonton means to assert that such a transaction was all right, and should not be questioned by any man either inside or outside of the House, I think that he is taking a stand which will not receive the endorsation of the people of this country.

So far as the company is concerned, Mr. Ferguson states:

> Although I endeavoured to obtain some explanation from the Grand Trunk Pacific Railway Company as to why it did go into this transaction, I have been unable to do so.

No member of the company was in a position to say why this money was invested. I leave it to members of this House to form the conclusion as to why that investment was made, and to judge for themselves as to whether the Grand Trunk Pacific would have invested this $15,000 if the hon. member for Edmonton had been only the private member for Edmonton, and had not been the publisher of the Edmonton Bulletin.

The next point taken up by the hon. gentleman was the matter of the timber lands that were removed from the Riding Mountain forest reserve. It is true that by Act of Parliament certain lands were withdrawn from the Riding Mountain reserve several years ago, and that all squatters who had located on those lands were to be allowed the privilege of taking up homesteads on the lands which had been removed from the reserve. I say frankly that that is not an unusual thing, and we are not complaining about that. What we are complaining about is that hundreds of Liberals who secured entries were not squatters at all, and that the public lands were parcelled out by Mr. Davis, then supervisor of the Riding Mountain forest reserve. This admission on the part of Mr. Davis was conveniently overlooked by the ex-Minister of the Interior in the remarks which he made this afternoon. Mr. Cruise made no pretense of being a squatter, in the legal sense of the term, or, indeed, in any sense of the term. The hon. gentleman says that those who had effected tangible and substantial improvements were allowed to remain on the land. What were the tangible and substantial improvements that Mr. Cruise had to show? He lived near the town of Dauphin, within the nine mile radius. He had a man cut logs for two or three days, and build up four bare log walls. I do not believe they were ever roofed; certainly up to the time the patent was issued this structure, which was to pass as a house, was never roofed. On these tangible and substantial improvements, Mr. Cruise put in his claim as a squatter. Mr. Cruise lived on other lands of his own. He could qualify by stock if he was a legitimate squatter, but we assert that Mr. Cruise was not a legitimate squatter. The supervisor, Mr. Davis, and the land agent, Mr. Herchmer, who received the entries at the town of Dauphin, both say so, and Mr. Ferguson finds that Mr. Cruise was not a squatter. Mr. Cruise had only thirteen head of stock of his own, and, as it was necessary to have twenty in order to prove up, he went to his neighbour—a man by the name of Ward—and, ostensibly, brought seven head of stock over to make up the twenty, giving his promissory note therefor. Mr. Ward kept the stock part of the time on his own property and part of the time during the summer months on Mr. Cruise's. That allowed Mr. Cruise, during the time that Mr. Ward held his note to swear that he was the owner of twenty head of stock; he therefore secured entry for the land. As soon as he got his patent he received back the promissory note and gave back the seven head of cattle to Mr. Ward. And we are asked to be gullible enough to believe that that was a bona fide transaction! This is the manner in which the hon. member for Dauphin (Mr. Cruise) qualified as a squatter on the Riding Mountain reserve. And Mr. Cruise was not by any means the only one. I will read some rather spicy evidence regarding this. For instance, of all the lands taken out of the Riding Mountain reserve, and there were several hundred quarter-sections given for homestead entry, Mr. Davis, who was the supervisor, swore before Mr. Ferguson that he believed that not more than 40 per cent were occupied by legitimate squatters; and he was the official appointed to do this business by the then Minister of the Interior and was kept in office until after this Government came into power, notwithstanding the protests of his own officials. Now, not only Mr. Davis swore that not more than 40 per cent of the so-called squatters were legitimate, but Mr. Herchmer, the Dominion Lands agent, swore as well that in his opinion not more than 20 per cent were legitimate; and these were the gentlemen who were supposed to have tangible and substantial improvements as squatters and were allowed entries to these lands. I have some evidence to back this up. We have the evidence of Albert McLeod and Sam. Cohen, who were employed by the Government, and who went around with blank orders which were handed to Mr. Davis for his signature, for them to take to the land office; and of course the land agent was compelled to honour them, because he got his instructions from the Minister of the Interior to allow any persons to have entries who bore an order from Mr. Davis.

5 p.m.

This is from the evidence of Mr. Davis:

Q. I believe you wrote a large number of orders out in the same way?

That is in blank.

A. Yes, I used to take them with me in blank. It saved a lot of writing.

Q. And after they had been filled in, some were genuine squatters and some were not?—A. Yes; I allowed myself to be used for the party there, to a certain extent, and I am willing to acknowledge it.

Q. Now this Exhibit 1-D, I want to ask you about that, Mr. Davis. In the first place, is that your signature?—A. Yes.

Q. But the rest of it was not written out by you?—A. No.

Q. Who wrote it out?—A. To the best of my knowledge and belief, Albert McLeod.

[Mr. Roche.]

So he was not the only one who wrote out these orders.

Q. And did he issue that, and fill it in himself?—A. Yes.

Q. So that he travelled around with these in blank also?—A. Yes, and he would send them to me with a letter stating that it was right, but I knew better. I will tell you the story.

Q. Yes, tell me the story?—A. I knew that Albert was picking quite a few of the residents in his own locality there, that he wanted to get good quarters for, and make himself strong in that locality; and so he was issuing orders to them on blanks and he would send them to me for signature and I would sign them for him.

Q. Mr. McLeod got out quite a number in that way, I suppose?—A. Yes, I think he did. He made himself quite smooth and nice.

Q. Mr. Herchmer has deposed before me that there must have been hundreds of these orders issued. Did you keep track of the number of orders which you were issuing, which were signed by you, either from your own instigation or that of Albert McLeod or Sam. Cohen?—A. No, sir, I did not.

Q. What was Cohen's idea, can you tell me, in asking you or procuring from you these orders and giving them to the people in this way?—A. Cohen was a rattling good man and a good worker, and he would not let any opportunity slide if he could benefit the party.

This is the way the public lands were parcelled out to the political friends of my hon. friend; and he gets up here to-day and contrasts the management of the land under the Interior Department by this Government with that when he was presiding officer over the department!

Q. I suppose Mr. Davis I could say that would apply to the whole three, all of you at that time?—A. Sure.

This is an illustration of how the lands that were taken out of the reserve were disposed of by the department.

But there is something more. There was dissatisfaction in the department at the head office here. They saw that something was wrong, and it was drawn to the attention of the minister. It was brought to his notice when he was visiting Dauphin, while it was going on, and Mr. Herchmer, the land agent, knew perfectly well what was going on. He wanted some protection for himself, and he brought it to the notice of the then Minister of the Interior. The result of this was that a letter was sent to Mr. Davis from the hon. the then Minister of the Interior, dated September 18, 1907, as follows:

W. A. Davis:

Sir,—I am informed that your work in securing removal of squatters in the Riding and Duck Mountain timber reserves has been completed; that is to say, that you have secured location of all those squatters that you were able to remove. You will understand that the privilige of locating on the lands formerly included within the Riding and Duck Mountain reserves, set aside by statute, only apply to squatters in the present reserves and that you have no authority to apply for the location of any other persons upon those lands.

Now, this was after the hon. member's attention had been brought to the fact that others than squatters were getting lands, and it having been brought by the land agent to his attention he could not ignore it, and so this letter continues:

The agent is being notified to advertise that those lands hitherto held under reservation will be open in due course to general settlement, first come first served.

That did not put an end to that condition of affairs. Mr. Dixon, in the department, drew the attention of the departmental officials to the unsatisfactory manner in which Davis was performing his work, with the result that this memorandum was submitted to Mr. Dixon by the minister's private secretary:

September 2, 1907.

The minister wants you to wire Mr. Leech to at once go to Riding Mountain and clear up the tangle which Davis finds himself in.

That shows that things were not going smoothly and nicely. He had evidence brought to his attention that things were not going right, and he sent out the celebrated R. E. A. Leech to investigate. Mr. Leech went up there and reported that everything was lovely—and what did he give as evidence? That Davis had told him that it was all right! That is all he reported to the department, that he had consulted Mr. Davis and that Mr. Davis had said that everything was all right. Still, the department were not satisfied, with the result that Mr. Leech was sent back a second time and told to further investigate these lands that were thrown open to squatters. Mr. Leech departed the second time. He came back with a report much the same as before; he could find nothing wrong. Mr. Davis was his authority, the very gentleman who himself swears that everything was wrong, that he was giving these lands to help his party friends, and so were McLeod and Cohen. So I do not think that there is anything that reflects very great credit upon the administration of the department in connection with those particular lands taken out of the Riding Mountain reserve.

The next matter the hon. member took up was the transaction of the Southern Alberta Land Company; and he thought he was making a point against this Government and was practically receiving endorsation for that transaction by reason of the fact that we had introduced in the last session of Parliament an estimate for a refund to the Southern Alberta Land Company of $380,000 which they had paid in advance for their land, a portion of which was expended during this past year, the balance being a revote this year. But that is no endorsation of the original arrangement entered into by the Government. Not at all. How did we find this arrangement. It was presented to us by the late Mr. Newton, who represented that company in Canada. This was the famous Robbins Irrigation Co. deal. J. D. McGregor and his friends sold them on the English market at an immense profit, they passed again into the possession of another company at another immense profit and eventually they fell into the hands of the Southern Alberta Land Company, a large quantity of stock being sold. This stock was widely distributed throughout the Old Country by the Grenfell Company which practically had the management of it. The Grenfell Company went into liquidation last year. Then the Southern Alberta Land Company was hard pressed. Their irrigation works were about completed to the extent that they could turn the water on the land and put the land in a position to sell for irrigation purposes. They came to the Government and said that if they did not receive some assistance in a financial way the scheme and the country would get a black eye and all the money that had been invested would be lost. What were we to do? Were we to allow the country to get a black eye? This scheme had received the endorsement of the late Government and if we refused to comply with their request so that they could utilize their works and turn the water on the land it would have been most damaging to the good name of the country and the investment would have been placed in jeopardy. The company merely asked us to loan the money that they had paid in for the land. They gave the Government a lien on their land and works as security. They had spent in the neighbourhood of $6,000,000 altogether. Surely we have security which is ample to protect us for refunding back to them the money which they had paid in for the land at the rate of $1 an acre, or in all $380,000. That is no endorsation of the scheme and we are not open to censure by reason of refunding this $380,000 to enable the company to put its works into operation and allow the land to be occupied under irrigation conditions. It is practically a loan because we took a lien on the land and works. We are charging them the same rate of interest—5 per cent—that we have been charging on irrigation schemes and other transactions of a similar nature.

There is another irrigation deal in connection with this report and it is the Aylwin deal. There was a gentleman by the name of Aylwin who had taken up with the late Minister of the Interior the idea of buying 350,000 acres of land. Negotiations had proceeded to a certain extent but in time he found that he could not have access to the minister, he said that he only saw him on one or two occasions and he came to the conclusion that he would have to have other influence. He had not sufficient backing to get access to the then minister and he went to Mr. Robert, of Montreal, the president of the Tramways Company, who, it was claimed, stood well in the favour of the Prime Minister and another member of the Government. Mr. Robert came up and had several interviews with the then Prime Minister in regard to this matter. The letters which are on file go to show that the then Prime Minister assured him that if anybody got this land he and his associates would, Mr. Robert had no financial interest in the land originally but he was using his influence because his brother was in the deal. Robert visited Ottawa on several occasions and saw several members of the Government about the matter, particularly the then Prime Minister, and received every encouragement to believe that he would get the land eventually. I should say that Mr. Robert got 18 cents an acre as his commission for using his influence, which amounted altogether to $12,000. He bought out the interest of Mr. Newton, of Winnipeg, who had an interest in the deal, and when the lands were sold Mr. Robert got over $18,000 as his share by reason of his acquisition of the Newton interest. Mr. Robert was very well paid for his influence in connection with this deal. But Mr. Robert did not have entirely plain sailing. There was a gentleman by the name of Denton in the city of Toronto and he and some of his friends also desired to get some of these lands. In order to put up a bluff that he had certain influence that could carry him through with the members of the Government, he went to Robert in Montreal and the bluff worked so well that Denton was handed over many thousands of dollars, although he had never invested a cent.

An hon. MEMBER: Who is Denton?

Mr. ROCHE: He is a Frank Denton, barrister, of Toronto. He came here representing himself and his friends and he bluffed Robert into an arrangement by which he got a good slice of this property. I should say in connection with Mr. Aylwin that he had to take 69,000 instead of the 350,000 acres for which he had applied. I draw the attention of the House to this most significant feature, that these 69,000 acres, which adjoined the lands of the Southern Alberta Land Company, were sold by the Government notwithstanding that they knew at the time that they were not irrigable. The officers of the department had reported that the lands were not irrigable and that there was no means of providing for their irrigation in view of the fact that other lands had been disposed of to the Southern Alberta Land Company. The Southern Alberta Land Company had practically monopolized all the ditches and water rights and this Aylwin company were absolutely debarred from irrigating their land and were absolutely dependent upon the Southern Alberta Land Company for irrigation. On this 69,000 acres, for which $3 an acre was paid, they have allowed a refund of $2 an acre. The works of the company had never been gone on with. They had eventually to enter into an arrangement with the Southern Alberta Land Company in order to get their land irrigated at all. What I condemn the department under the late Government for is that having disposed of land to the Southern Alberta Land Company they should have gone to their other friends and sold them 69,000 acres of land that were not irrigable at all.

The hon. gentleman has also brought up the question of the Craven dam. He says there is nothing in that, and claims that it was simply investigated for the purpose of bringing in the names of Mr. Scott and Mr. Brown. The hon. gentleman says that it is all right for the Government to sell land at $1 an acre and for the purchasers three years after patent issued to sell it to the Government for $25 an acre. A strange thing about it is that, when the Government were seeking to expropriate the land and when the judge allowed $25 an acre for it, Mr. Brown, now the Lieut. Governor of Saskatchewan, actually came forward and swore that the land was worth $100 an acre. What a wonderful transformation in the price of land in a few years!

Mr. OLIVER: Would the minister be good enough to verify the date? I think the period must be longer than three years.

Mr. ROCHE: It is in the neighbourhood of three years after patent issued.

Mr. OLIVER: I have no doubt that the minister has the papers and if he refers to them he will find that he is pretty far wrong.

Mr. ROCHE: I do not think I am wrong.

Mr. OLIVER: I am sure he is.

Mr. ROCHE: At any rate, it does not make a great deal of difference, when lands which were only $1 an acre suddenly jump to $25 an acre when the Government want to expropriate them, and when Mr. Brown swears that they are worth $100 an acre, whether it is three years or five years. I think Mr. Ferguson says in his report that when Mr. Brown was buying these lands he decried them and said they were practically worthless—that they were only swamp lands and could only be useful for hay; and the fact is that two or three years after the issue of the patent to Mr. Brown, he swore the lands were worth $100 an acre. It was decided to expropriate the lands, and $25 an acre was allowed for them. In these proceedings, forgetful of the fact that a few years previously he had said they were practically valueless and that he purchased them for a dollar an acre, Mr. Brown swore that the value of the land was $100 an acre and that they would produce on an average two tons of hay per acre per annum. You can figure that out for yourself. I do not know what the price of hay was, but I think it was probably $10 a ton, but take it even at $5 a ton and you have 1,000 acres producing 2,000 tons at $5 a ton or $10,000 per annum.

Mr. NESBITT: Would the minister value lands at $100 an acre that would only produce two tons of hay to the acre?

Mr. ROCHE: I am not putting any value on the lands. I am giving you the sworn statement of the owner of the lands as to what he valued them at.

Mr. NESBITT: He was trying to sell them then?

Mr. ROCHE: Yes, and when he was trying to buy them he said the lands were worth only a dollar an acre.

Mr. NESBITT: There are lots of fellows like him; the woods are full of them. Does the minister think that land that only grew two tons of hay to the acre was worth $100 an acre? If he does, he does not know anything about land values.

Mr. ROCHE: I am not saying that I do know anything about land values; I never saw the land, and I do not know what the value of the land was to my personal knowledge, but I am giving you the evidence of this gentleman that he purchased the lands at a dollar an acre, and two or three years after he got his patent he swore that they were worth $100 an acre.

Mr. PUGSLEY: The minister has mentioned the date that Brown got his patent; can he state when Brown made an agreement to purchase from the Government?

Mr. ROCHE: I think it was 1906.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Has the minister any estimate by the department as to the present value of these lands?

Mr. ROCHE: I am glad the hon. member mentioned that, and I wish to tell him that we are not sending out inspectors to value lands that have passed out of the possession of the Government; but I do charge against the minister of the day dereliction of duty in not sending inspectors around to value these lands before they were sold. When any lands are sold to-day, I can assure my hon. friend that we send out our inspectors to inspect them and to report as to their value. No such thing was done in connection with the sale of these lands; no inspection was made of them; no report as to their value was had, and the price put upon them by Mr. Brown was acceded to and recommended by the then commissioner, Mr. Turriff, who now sits in this House.

Mr. PUGSLEY: I think these lands were expropriated in 1910.

Mr. ROCHE: I am not sure, but the evidence is there, and my hon. friend can see.

Mr. PUGSLEY: I would like to know that; I think I was Minister of Public Works when they were expropriated. I do know that in 1900 lands representing thousands of acres in that vicinity were sold at a dollar an acre.

Mr. ROCHE: I think a good many acres were sold at the time for a dollar an acre, but I believe—

Mr. PUGSLEY: And sold by companies.

Mr. R. B. BENNETT: No.

Mr. ROCHE: I may say that these lands were sold to Mr. Brown on the recommendation of Mr. Walter Scott. Mr. Brown in effect said that he did not come alone and that he did not depend on his own influence to get these lands, but he admits he secured the services of Mr Walter Scott, and he secured these services because of Mr. Scott's political influence. It was at the request of Mr. Walter Scott that these lands were reserved for a year before they were sold.

Mr. OLIVER: I want to be perfectly clear as to what the minister states. I think he made the observation that the sale of these lands took place to Lieutenant-Governor Brown during my administration of the Interior Department. I want him to be satisfied on that point before he makes the statement, because I am quite clear that it is not so.

Mr. ROCHE: I have not the exact date before me, and it may have been that it was under the administration of the hon. gentleman's predecessor that the lands were originally sold, and if I am to diagnose by his interruption that the hon. gentleman condemns the whole thing, then I am glad of the interruption, and I will exonerate him from being the gentleman who sold these lands.

Mr. OLIVER: I want to point out that the period of time between the sale to Brown and the sale by Brown was the difference between the years 1900 and 1910, and that lands in the Northwest appreciated in value in that time, three, four, and six times.

Mr. ROCHE: Does the hon. gentleman say that these lands were worth $100 an acre?

Mr. OLIVER: I would not think so; they would not be worth that to me.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Would the minister be good enough to furnish the House with the date at which the agreement to purchase was made by Brown?

Mr. ROCHE: The hon. gentleman can read the evidence for himself.

Mr. PUGSLEY: That is important, and I will tell the hon. gentleman why it is important.

[Mr. Pugsley.]

Mr. ROCHE: I have not the report before me, but it is on the table of the House and the hon. gentleman can look that up for himself.

Mr. OLIVER: The Minister of the Interior has insisted on referring to me as having been a party to this transaction, and he fixes the date at a period that would justify the remarks he has made, when as a matter of fact the date was different and would not justify his remarks.

Mr. ROCHE: It is stated they were sold in 1910.

Mr. OLIVER: I do not know when the lands were sold, because I have not the papers before me. My impression is that they were sold approximately ten years between the purchase of Brown and the sale by Brown, and during that ten years the general price of land in the West appreciated five, six, seven, eight, ten times.

Mr. ROCHE: That might apply to lands adjacent to large cities like Edmonton or Calgary, but I know, as a matter of fact, that these lands did not appreciate in value to any such extent.

Mr. PUGSLEY: I know they did.

Mr. ROCHE: At all events, it was represented in the first place that they were only swamp lands covered with water, and Lieut. Governor Brown states they were not worth more than a dollar an acre, but strange to say these gentlemen opposite who are so anxious to make out that this report is an attempt to make political capital against the Lieutenant Governor of Saskatchewan, forget that it was he who swore that these lands were worth $100 an acre. I leave the evidence before the country and the House to be judged on its merits. I should say that of these lands there were about 1,000 acres, and 518 acres were purchased at one dollar an acre, and the balance represented half-breed scrip. It was, as I say, about three years after he got the patent that they were expropriated at a price of $25 per acre, so that this gentleman made very well out of his deal with the late Government, which professed so much solicitude with regard to the manner in which the public domain should be dealt with.

The hon. gentleman (Mr. Oliver) has also spoken about the grazing lease to Mr. H. B. Brown. This matter has been threshed out in the House before, and I am not going to enter exhaustively in to a discussion of it now. I may say that Mr. H. B. Brown was a mere stool-pigeon for Mr. J. D. McGregor. H. B. Brown lived in Montana and the application was made in his name. He knew nothing about it. Notice after notice, week after week, month after month, were sent to Mr. Brown and never replied to by him. Mr. McGregor and Mr. A. J. Adamson were the power behind the throne, and Mr. Adamson, ex-M.P., is the gentleman who eventually took over this grazing proposition, and H. B. Brown was merely utilized by these gentlemen. There is one point in connection with this deal that looks rather suspicious, and it is this: Although 28,000 acres of land was what was applied for, in some manner a recommendation was placed on file increasing the amount to 60,000 acres, and that was done by the present member for Assiniboia (Mr. Turriff) when he was commissioner.

When the hon. member was examined by Mr. Ferguson and asked for an explanation, he failed to give one, and said that he could not give one. No request came from Mr. Brown; he did not know anything about the matter; no request came from Mr. McGregor, so Mr. McGregor stated; and still in some mysterious manner the area was increased from 28,000 to 60,000 acres. This was done without any request except as conveyed by word of mouth and secretly, as there is nothing in the files to show that a request was made. In connection with the rental of this land, Mr. Brown owed arrears of some $2,400, and these were wiped off. Mr. Adamson should have paid them, but he did not do so; he was forgiven, and the lease was made a closed irrevocable one, although originally it was a 21-year lease and it could be cancelled by two years' notice being given.

The next point dwelt upon by the hon. gentleman is that of the Kananaskis Coal Company. My hon. friend agrees that employees of the Government should not act as purchasers or middlemen when dealing with the Government in connection with concessions for coal or land irrigation propositions, or anything of that kind, and in that I quite agree with him; but he has stated that the services of all these men in connection with this deal have been dispensed with. Who has dispensed with their services? Mr. Howard Douglas was superintendent of the Rocky Mountain park, and he engineered practically the whole deal. There was a certain timber berth within the Rocky Mountain forest reserve which it was desired to exchange; and in order to get it exchanged, Mr. Douglas associated with himself two of his own sons, an employee of the Government, another gentleman I think from Medicine Hat, and others. They sent in an application to have the timber area within the reserve exchanged for another area without the reserve. Mr. Douglas was the gentleman to whom they referred the matter for recommendation, and he recommended it, saying it would be an excellent proposition. Why would he not do so? His own two sons and his son-in-law were in the deal, and therefore he recommended it and the exchange was made. Not long afterwards, these gentlemen found out that a certain area of the timber limit was not very remunerative, having very little timber on it. Therefore they applied to have this portion exchanged for another area, but for a time the minister stood out firmly and replied: "The man in whose name the application is cannot come back again; he must not come back again; he has made one exchange, and he cannot make another." In the meantime, however, Mr. R. G. A. Leech, who by the way was interested in the same proposition, visited Ottawa and saw the officers of the department, and, strange to say, the minister's fortitude gave way, and while at first he said: "This gentleman must not come back again," he succumbed and allowed the exchange to be made, and these gentlemen got practically a new limit, one that the Government had valued a year or so before at $162,000.

Mr. HENDERSON: Nothing wrong.

Mr. ROCHE: I should also say that the old timber berth was worth about $12,000. It was Government officials who were seeking these concessions and who obtained the exchange, and still Mr. Howard Douglas was retained in his office until this Government came into power; he was dismissed by this Government; and then questions were placed on the Order Paper as to why this man was dismissed. The evidence goes to show that this gentleman got a Mr. Garrett, an official of the department, to send in an application in connection with this berth, and Mr. Garrett stated that he did not know what he was doing; that he signed what his superior officer asked him to, because he was a subordinate of Mr. Howard Douglas.

The hon. member has discussed the question of the Blood reserve very briefly, and so will I. The grazing privileges were given to a Mr. McEwan of Brandon, but who in reality was Mr. Peter Ryan of Toronto, and these grazing privileges were given without tender and after a great deal of dissatisfaction on the part of Mr. Millar of Toronto, who had applied for these grazing privileges and had been led to believe that his application was regular and in order and that he would receive the same; but in the absence of the Minister of the Interior, Mr. Sifton, Mr. Pedley, who was then Deputy Superintendent General of Indian Affairs, acted. Mr. Charles Millar was ignored, although he had been led to believe that be would get the concession, and the concession was handed over to the McEwan-Ryan outfit. Mr. Millar, when giving evidence before Mr. Commissioner Ferguson, swore that when Mr. Sifton was informed of this, he told him that he had been buncoed out of the grazing privileges. Now, who buncoed him out? The officers of the Department of Indian Affairs, evidently. Mr. Ryan, in his evidence, admits that he executed a deed of trust in favour of Mr. Bedford Jones, who held in trust for Mr. Pedley 6 per cent interest in this lease, and this 6 per cent interest was afterwards sold to Mr. Millar for $1,000, which Mr. Bedford Jones swore was handed over, less $100, to the Deputy Superintendent General of Indian Affairs. This, in short, is the history of the Blood reserve lease.

There were other Indian lands that were dealt with by certain officials of the Government, in regard to which blank tenders were given; or at least tenders were sent to the city of Toronto and were filled in there with the names of fictitious individuals. These leases were sent into the department, and the then Deputy Superintendent General, Mr. Smart, passed upon them. Although as Deputy Superintendent General of Indian Affairs, he was the guardian of Indian lands, and was selling for the Government, he became a purchaser himself in company with the other two gentlemen. The profit on the Moose mountain reserve was something over $45,000. It was bought on the 9th of November, 1901, and sold in April, 1902, for the sum of $112,500, through one of the immigration officers in the United States, a Mr. Charles Pilling, a former Brandon man. On the next reserve the profits were $8,000, and on the next over $18,000. Taking the three reserves, these gentlemen cleared something over $84,000. The whole thing was done in secret and under cover of three partners, as was brought out in the evidence. If the hon. gentleman thinks that is all right we have a different idea of the propriety of things, and I am quite willing to allow the people of this country to judge as to these transactions.

If this Government designed to prosecute the hon. ex-Minister of the Interior, if we desired to ask Mr. Ferguson to delve deeper into my hon. friend's affairs, or into his private transactions as a private individual, or as Minister of the Interior, we had plenty of evidence without going to Mr. Ferguson at all. All we had to do was to peruse some of the files in the Department of the Interior. The hon. gentleman knows that away back in 1890 he took up a homestead within a couple of miles of the city of Edmonton. At that time the person living within the two-mile limit did not require to reside upon the land; But he resided a portion of the time within the two-mile limit and then removed his residence beyond it. It is true, he performed his cultivation duties eventually. At first, he was not performing his duties and asked for an extension of time in order to protect his land. That extension, one of the officers replied to him, could be granted to him for, say, one year, or as an alternative he would be allowed the privilege of cancelling his entry and purchasing the land at the regulation price of $3 an acre. The time went on and the hon. gentleman did not avail himself of the alternative proposition. After a time he wrote a letter to the department stating that it was not convenient for him to perform the rest of his duties, and applying for the privilege of purchasing the land, in lieu of the residential duties and the erection of the house which he should have put upon the land, and I think a residence of about three months was required notwithstanding his being within the two-mile limit. He requested the right of purchase, and named his own price, $1 an acre. This was recommended by his particular friend in the department. The sale was recommended while the late Government was in power, and recommended by the then Commissioner of Lands, Mr. Turriff, who stated that he thought it very inconvenient for the ex-minister to perform his duties and that he should be allowed the privilege of buying the land at $1 an acre. The lands were sold to him. When he made his homestead entry there was printed on the homestead entry a statement that the mines and minerals were to be reserved in accordance with the Order in Council that was passed on the 31st October, 1887. I have the original application here, and this is stamped across the face. So the hon. gentleman could not be under any misapprehension that he was the owner of the minerals. In the patent there was again the clause reserving the mines and minerals. The hon. gentleman could hardly have forgotten it, because this declaration of reservation was in both these documents. Nevertheless, in the year 1906, on the 8th of October, he leased the mines and minerals to a gentleman by the name of Wills, who was to pay a royalty of 10 cents a ton on all the coal that was mined, which was the royalty exacted by the Government at that time. Mr. Wills worked the property and paid royalty, how much I am not sure, but a very substantial sum, to the ex-Minister of the Interior. And this was for the lease of mining rights which had been reserved and did not belong to the hon. gentleman at all. He simply could not have been under the impression that he owned these mines and minerals, and I will tell you why. I have stated that it was on the 8th of October, 1906, that he gave the lease. On the 26th of February, 1907, about five months thereafter, I find here on the file a letter from the Chief Clerk of the Patents Branch, Mr. N. O. Coté. Apparently, the minister of that time had been asking as to reservations of mines and minerals in the leases, and this is the answer:

With reference to your verbal request I beg to inform you that the under rights were not reserved in the patents which issued for the following lands:

N.E. ¼ 32-52-23 west 4th meridian, patented 21st July, 1886, to Alex McDougall.

N.W. ¼ 32-52-23, west 4th meridian, patented 6th April, 1888, to Francis Oliver.

S. ½ of S.E. ¼ 32-52-23 west 4th meridian, and legal subdivisions 12, 13 and 14 of 28, 52-23 west 4th meridian, patented 10th August, 1886, to Geo. Whitford.

I find, however, that the patents which isued in your name for lots 31 and 33,—

He purchased lot 33, consisting of 174 acres, at the rate of $2 an acre, lot 31 being a homestead.

—Edmonton settlement, reserved to the Crown the mines and minerals, as you did not appear to have had any claim to the said land prior to the 31st October, 1887, from which date all patents for lands west of the 3rd meridian reserved the mines and minerals to the Crown. It is also observed that in the application which you made before the agent of Dominion lands in 1890 for homestead entry for the part of said lot 31 such entry was granted subject to the provisions of the Order in Council of the 31st October, 1887, reserving all mines and minerals.

So that for the third time, and in answer to his own verbal request, he had the fact drawn to his attention that mines and minerals were reserved. This was five months after he had leased to Mr. Wills. Did he recall the lease? Did he cease accepting royalties? Did he pay back the royalties he had collected up to that time? Nothing of the kind. He continued the lease up to the time when this Government came into power, and he collected substantial sums by way of royalties from Mr. Wills up to that time on minerals that were owned by the Crown, and the Crown has never got a dollar out of it. I have some receipts here which the hon. gentleman gave Mr. Wills for the royalties. Within a month or thereabouts after this Government came into power evidently he had some compunction of conscience in regard to it; perhaps he supposed there was going to be an exposure, a new party being in power, and probably some commission would be issued. He applied to the department for a lease of the mines and minerals on the 2nd November, 1911. But he had made the lease with Mr. Wills on the 8th of October, 1906, for ten years. He got a lease for twenty-one years, renewable, the royalty being changed from 10 cents a ton to 5 cents a ton. He, to protect himself, having the right to issue a sub-lease, in November, 1911, issued a sub-lease to Mr. Wills to run for five years from December, 1911. During all that time he has been collecting royalties, and during that time he has been paying the rental of $1 an acre to the department. He has not paid any royalty as yet. I am not saying that is his fault; if there is a fault, it lies with the department. And, as a matter of fact, we frequently give extensions of time. I am not finding fault with that; as a matter of fact, an extension of time was granted. But one condition of his lease was that he was to make quarterly returns of all coal mined and to pay a royalty of five cents a ton. From the date of his lease, December, 1911, he has not made any returns—at least, I cannot find any statement on the files—showing any coal mined at all, while he admits that the claim is being worked. How, under these circumstances, he could give a lease to another party, accept royalties of thousands of dollars from that party and pay nothing to the Government, passes my comprehension. If the hon. gentleman had desired to be fair, after he got his lease from the Government he would at least have paid over the royalties collected from Mr. Wills during the time that he had no lease. Hon. gentlemen talk about restitution; about investigations in the Public Accounts Committee; about money having been refunded by a clerk in the city of Ottawa; and so on. They clamour for restitution on the part of those who received undue profits; what about restitution in this case?

Mr. OLIVER: If Mr. Wills says that he paid me $2,000, or $1,000, in the way of royalties before 1911; he states what is absolutely untrue.

Mr. ROCHE: He certainly states it.

Mr. OLIVER: Then he makes a statement that has no semblance of truth in it.

Mr. ROCHE: The hon. gentleman admits that he got royalties.

Mr. OLIVER: Yes, I admit that Mr. Wills paid some royalties.

Mr. ROCHE: It is simply a question of the amount.

Mr. OLIVER: Yes.

Mr. ROCHE: I cannot vouch for the accuracy of Mr. Wills' statement as to the amount, but I am glad that the hon. gentleman admits the accuracy of my statement that he accepted royalties when he had no authority to do so, in respect of mines and minerals that he did not own, and of which he had no lease. These royalties have not been paid over to the Government. This emphasizes the point that while a minister of the Crown, and supposed to be the guardian of the Treasury so far as the Department of the Interior was concerned, the hon. gentleman collected royalties in respect of which not one dollar has since been paid over to the Government.

At six o'clock, the House took recess.

The House resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. ROCHE (resuming): Mr. Speaker, prior to recess I had just about completed my reference to the matter immediately under discussion, namely, the particular homestead lands that the hon. member for Edmonton (Mr. Oliver) had secured and paid for and for which he did not have the mineral rights. Some criticism has been offered and some questions asked by some hon. members as to how the hon. member came to receive a lease of these mineral rights after the present Government came into power. Of course, under our regulations, any person who complies with the regulations is entitled to have a lease of mineral rights; but priority is always given to the party who is the owner of the surface rights. So the matter was dealt with departmentally, it did not come before the then Minister of the Interior at all, was passed upon by the officers of the department; as it was considered that there was no reason why that lease should be refused, the rental having been tendered for the first year at the rate of $1 an acre and the other regulations having been complied with. Of course, there was nothing on the file to show that the mines and minerals had been leased by the hon. member for Edmonton to Mr. Wills prior to the securing of his lease from the Crown. This is the explanation of how the lease came to be issued in November of 1911, after the present Government came into power. In the lease to Mr. Wills, that is the first lease in 1906, it was provided that he should pay a royalty of 10 cents a ton, which in the second lease was changed to 5 cents, and that he should mine at least 500 tons per annum. The mine was operated and certain royalties were paid. I have a few of the receipts given by the then Minister of the Interior in the form of letters. One is dated the 2nd of January, 1908:

Dear Sir,—Yours of the 23rd to hand regarding Buffalo park fence; also cheque, royalty on coal, for which thanks. Wishing you the compliments of the season,

Yours very truly,

Frank Oliver.

Mr. Robert Wills,
Edmonton, Alberta.

It does not say there what amount of royalty was received. There is another dated February 13. No doubt it was for one month, as the next letter is dated February 13, 1908, as follows:

I have your letter of the 4th instant containing cheque for $71.40, which is quite satisfactory, although the bigger it is the better.

Yours faithfully,

Frank Oliver.

Mr. Robert Wills.

I have another here of March 12, 1908, which says:

Yours of March 2 to hand, with cheque for $54.14 royalty on coal for January. I thank you very much and wish you all success. I have no objection to another shaft being put down in the uncultivated part and so long as fencing is provided so that the grain on the cultivated portion will not be interfered with. I have not thought of selling the farm and would not care to do so unless or until I visited Edmonton.

There is another on the 10th of April, 1908:

> Dear Sir,—I beg to acknowledge the receipt of your letter of the 31st ultimo enclosing $48.35 royalty on 483½ tons of coal for the month of February.
>
> Yours faithfully,
> Frank Oliver.

These receipts are all for the same year, showing that royalties had been collected for several months in that year; and other royalties were, of course, collected, the receipts for which I have not here at present. The lease to Wills provided that at least 500 tons should be mined each year. I notice here in one month that 483½ tons of coal was mined in February. So while the hon. gentleman may take issue with the statement made by Mr. Wills that he had paid a couple of thousand dollars, or in that neighbourhood, of royalties, still I have word from Mr. Wills to the effect that from November, 1907, up to December, 1912, some 18,360 tons were mined, and this does not include the royalty since December, 1912. Mr. Wills' recollection of the amount of coal which he mined and the royalty which he paid differs materially from that of the ex-Minister of the Interior if he says that he has not received as much as $1,000 in the way of royalty. But 10 cents a ton on 19,000 tons would be in the neighbourhood of $1,900, so it is pretty close to $2,000 which Mr. Wills claimed he had paid the ex-Minister of the Interior, and I have read you the receipts which the hon. member gave to Mr. Wills for a portion of the year 1908, showing that he had accepted royalties from mines and minerals which he had no authority whatever to lease to Mr. Wills. He practically admits that he takes no issue with that statement; and for my part I certainly would not make it if the records did not bear me out. The hon. gentleman, will, I think, upon reflection come to the conclusion, having this brought forcibly to his mind to-day in the course of this debate, that he has been so derelict in his duty in safeguarding the treasury of the Department of the Interior and the interests of the people of Canada in the administration of the lands under his management at that time, that he should, at the first possible opportunity, avail himself of the privilege of sending in a cheque to pay for those royalties that he received during the years from 1906 to 1912, collected from Mr. Wills when he had not leased the mines and minerals himself and when he was not the owner of the same. So much for the matter of that homestead and the mines and minerals on it.

There is another matter to which I would like to refer very shortly, which also is on the files of the department. That is in connection with the sale, when the hon. gentleman was minister, of certain Indian lands. Certain Indian lands were sold to a gentleman named Fahrni, who purchased in the neighbourhood of 23 sections. The purchase price was in the neighbourhood of $25,000. It was to be paid in five equal annual instalments. He met his first payment of, in round numbers, $5,000. Mr. Fahrni then fell upon evil days financially and was unable to keep up his subsequent payments. He asked from time to time for an extension of time and he was granted certain extensions. He called on his friend Mr. Crawford, who was at the time the member for the constituency of Portage la Prairie, to intercede in his behalf with the department in order that he might have an extension of time to pay his arrearages. Mr. Crawford did intercede with the department and replied to him favourably, that he was to receive an extension of time for payment. Subsequently, however, he was still more in arrears, and he was being pressed from the department for payment of substantial sums of these arrearages. In the year 1909-10 he was written to and threatened with cancellation if he did not make a substantial payment. He then wired to the department asking for 30 days' extension of time. He said that he hoped in the meantime to be able to effect a sale. The department granted him the extension of time on the understanding that he would make a substantial payment in the neighbourhood of $2,000 down. Unfortunately for himself, he was unable to make the payment even at the expiration of the 30 days. On April 27, 1910, when he thought he was going to lose what money he had put in—because the department had told him that if they cancelled the lease he would forfeit his payment of $5,000 which in accordance with the regulations would not be refunded to him—he replied suggesting a method of settling the differences between himself and the department. He was alarmed as he could not afford the loss of $5,000. He had passed through the financial stringency of the year 1908 and was unable to make the payment, and suggested, by way of relief to himself and in order that the department would not lose anything, that the department should retain the $5,000 which he had paid on the 23 sections and apply it as payment on two quarter-sections which he had sold out of the 23, so that patent might issue for the two quarter-sections.

He stated in his letter that "there are several precedents for it, and I can produce some of very recent date." The request was refused by the department; they would not allow that. They got very strict with him, and they wrote to him and told him that they would have to cancel his claim. On the 2nd of June, 1910, they wrote a letter to Mr. Fahrni telling him that his purchase of these lands had been cancelled. Prior to this, on May 10, I may say that the sale had been cancelled. I have a memorandum of the department signed by the then deputy superintendent general of Indian Affairs, Mr. Pedley, to the following effect:

Whereas the undermentioned lands in the Michel Indian reserve, standing in the name of Christopher Fahrni, were sold to him subject to the payment of equal annual instalments.

And whereas it has been represented and established to my satisfaction that the condition under which these lands were sold has been violated.

Now therefore by and in virtue of the powers and duties vested in the Superintendent General of Indian Affairs by the Indian Act, chapter 81, section 61, Revised Statutes of Canada, 1906, I hereby cancel the said sales and resume the said lands.

Frank Pedley.

They did that, and, of course, it meant that the $5,000 was forfeited. This was followed by a notification on the 2nd of June of the cancellation that had taken place on the 10th of May. On the 2nd of June Mr. Fahrni was communicated with as follows:

Ottawa, 2nd June, 1910.

Sir,—I beg to inform you that the sales of the lands purchased by you in the Michel Indian reserve, on the 5th December, 1906, have been cancelled, the moneys paid thereon forfeited, and the lands resumed by the department in order that they may be disposed of to other purchasers.

There was the notification that cancellation had taken place, that the money had been forfeited, and that the lands were to be placed at the disposal of another eligible applicant. It was on the 2nd of June that he was notified, and on the 3rd of June a letter was sent from Edmonton to the department as follows:

Edmonton, June 3, 1910,

Secretary, Department of the Interior,
Ottawa, Ont.

Dear Sir,—Could you oblige me by obtaining for me the addresses of Mr. F. W. Grant and Mr. Christopher Fahrni, who each hold considerable land purchased in the Michel Indian reserve some years ago and in this district.

Thanking you in anticipation.

Yours very truly,

J. J. Anderson.

I understand that Mr. Anderson is the manager of the Union bank in the city of Edmonton, and I understand also that he has the honour of being the son-in-law of the ex-Minister of the Interior (Mr. Oliver). That application was dated on the 3rd of June, Mr. Fahrni having been notified on the 2nd of June that cancellation had taken place and that the money had been forfeited. Four days after Mr. Anderson had sent his letter from Edmonton, strange to say, a change came over the spirit of the dreams of those in charge of this affair, and another letter was despatched to Mr. Fahrni, dated 7th of June, which read as follows:

Referring to letter addressed you on the 2nd instant, notifying of cancellation of sales of lands purchased by you in the Michel reserve, I beg to say, that upon further consideration it has been decided to allow this matter to stand for the present, and no further action will be taken towards carrying out cancellation.

Why this change of mind at this particular time? Mr. Fahrni had not asked for it. He thought it was all up with him. He had made the modest request that he should be allowed, in order not to forfeit his $5,000, that it should be applied on two quarter-sections out of the 23 sections, but that was not allowed. He was notified of the absolute cancellation which had taken place on May 10, and he had never written any letter to the department as far as I can discover, asking to be reinstated. Notwithstanding that, after the letter was sent to the department by Mr. Anderson, Mr. Fahrni was reinstated and the cancellation proceedings were not gone on with. Why was that done? For several months thereafter there is nothing to show that Mr. Fahrni was requested to make further payments. The department put Mr. Anderson in touch with Mr. Fahrni, and Mr. Anderson, in fact, got in touch with Mr. Fahrni, and he took over the lands from Mr. Fahrni, allowing him the amount of the first payment which he had made less a quarter-section, or $4,900. He took over the purchase that Fahrni had made, paying to Fahrni just his first payment in order to save the money that he had put in, and Mr. Anderson became the purchaser of these lands. These lands were purchased for in the neighbourhood of $25,000.

There is nothing in the regulations that goes to show that there can be any reinstatement of cancelled lands. I have the regulations here and they do not provide for reinstating any cancelled lands. I have taken the trouble to make some inquiry, and I find that where lands had once been cancelled by reason of the non-fulfilment of the conditions, such as the non-payment of instalments, no precedent can be found for the reinstatement of these lands even where the purchaser would profess to be able to pay immediately for the same. Mr. Fahrni did not ask for reinstatement; he did not profess to be able to pay; and still, without his request, and after Mr. Anderson had sent in his application to get in touch with Mr. Fahrni, they were reinstated. The provision with respect to forfeiture, section 5 of the Indian Land Regulations, is as follows:

> Any violation of the conditions of sale will render the land in respect to which the same has taken place, as well as all moneys paid on account thereof, forfeitable by order of the Superintendant General of Indians Affairs.

There is nothing in the regulations to provide for reinstatement; notwithstanding that, reinstatement did take place. In the meantime, Mr. Anderson becomes the purchaser of the land that Fahrni had purchased for $25,000. This sale ran along for some time, and it transpired that last year there was another transfer of this land from Mr. Anderson. I have a copy of the transfer, or of the abstract, which shows that these lands were transferred, and the date of the registry of the title was the 2nd of November, 1914. The grantor was John J. Anderson, manager of the Union Bank in Edmonton, and son-in-law of the ex-Minister of the Interior, and he transferred these lands to Mr. Frank Oliver. There is no consideration put in here whatever. Under the heading, "Quantity of land and consideration" are written the words, "transferring above land." It would appear by this form that these lands were transferred without any consideration whatever from Mr. Anderson to Mr. Frank Oliver. That was on the 2nd day of November, which is the date of the registry of the title. On the 4th day of November Mr. Frank Oliver registered a mortgage to the Saskatchewan Savings Society, Limited, to the amount of $25,000 on this land, which was the total amount that Mr. Fahrni had originally bought the land for. Therefore, according to this, the present owner, Mr. Frank Oliver, had mortgaged the land to the Saskatchewan Savings Society, Limited, and I am given to understand that the personnel of the Saskatchewan Savings Society consists of the Hon. Arthur Sifton, Mrs. Sifton and Miss Sifton. And so $25,000 was advanced, if I am correctly informed; at any rate, the abstract is absolutely correct, and the significant part of this is that I have here, while that transaction was taking place from Mr. Anderson to Mr. Oliver, a sworn declaration by Mr. Anderson, as to the value at that time, October, 1914, of these lands, and what do you suppose these lands were valued at? I have not read all the correspondence, because I do not wish to inflict too many of these documents on the House at this stage of the session, but here is the correspondence between Mr. Anderson and Mr. Fahrni, when Mr. Anderson was grappling with him for the purchase of the lands, in which Mr. Anderson was trying to persuade Fahrni that he had paid too much entirely for them, although in Mr. Fahrni's reply he stated that he considered he had got them dirt cheap. But if Mr. Anderson considered that Mr. Fahrni had paid too much for the lands, when he had paid $25,000 for them, I wonder what he thought, when he was making the transfer to the ex-Minister of the Interior (Mr. Oliver), and when he made the sworn declaration that the lands alone, without improvements were of the value of $71,460. Seventy-one thousand four hundred and sixty dollars, Mr. Speaker! No wonder Mr. Fahrni said he had got them dirt cheap, although Mr. Anderson all the time was telling the poor man, when he was attempting to buy them, that he had paid the top-notch price and that he could not at that time sell them for the price he had paid. Mr. Anderson, through his agent, Mr. Kenneth Macdonald, who is a barrister in the city of Edmonton, makes a declaration in identically the same words as Mr. Anderson himself did, stating that the present value of the lands without improvements was $71,460. These were the lands which were sold to Mr. Fahrni for $25,000, $5,000 of which was paid down, and we have that man squeezed out of his purchase in order that Mr. Anderson might purchase them, and Mr. Fahrni only saved his skin by getting the amount he paid down in on the first payment. Then we have Mr. Anderson holding the lands for a few years and transferring them to his honoured father-in-law for no consideration whatever so far as the transfer abstract shows, and the hon. gentleman who was the purchaser was able to raise $25,000 thereon through the Saskatchewan Savings Society.

Now, Mr. Fahrni, when all this information came to him, came to the conclusion that he had been,—to use a term I used this afternoon, quoting from Mr. Sifton when he said that Mr. Charles Millar had been buncoed out of the Blood Indian reserve—Mr. Fahrni came to the conclusion that he had been buncoed out of these lands, and he naturally took it very much to heart. He did not think he had had a square deal, and his son, on his behalf, directed a letter to the present member for Edmonton, on March 9, 1915, just about a month ago. Here is the letter:

Gladstone, Man., March 9, 1915.

The Honourable Frank Oliver,
House of Commons,
Ottawa.

Dear Sir,—I am writing this letter on behalf of my father, Christopher Fahrni, who was the purchaser of some three thousand acres of land in the Michel Indian Reserve, west of Edmonton in Alberta, in, I think, the year 1906. You are, I have no doubt, entirely conversant with all the facts in connection with the deal, so I will not need to go into same minutely.

I have been looking after my father's business, at least subsequent to and during the year 1910, and you will probably recollect that in June of that year, father not having kept up his payments on the Indian lands to the department, was threatened with cancellation.

At that time it was impossible for us to raise sufficient money to pay the department out for the land, and after receiving several notices from the department, father instructed me to make whatever deal I could with the land, as anything was better than nothing.

At this time we were suddenly approached by one J. J. Anderson of Edmonton, who after endeavouring to beat us down on the price as low as possible, succeeded in purchasing the land from us. We were under very great pressure of the threatened cancellation from the Government at that time, and felt that we seemed bound to sell at any price, or lose what we had paid. The whole proceedings of Mr. Anderson looked very bad to me in several different ways, but under the then existing circumstances I could not be a chooser.

Ex-Mayor W. J. McNamara of Edmonton has just come from Ottawa and has laid bare to us what appears to me to be a very infamous conspiracy, in which it appears that you, as Minister of the Interior, using the aforementioned J. J. Anderson who turns out to be your son-in-law, as a blind, made my father the victim.

I need not go into all the details as, as I have already stated you are without doubt familiar with same, but the letter which was written by your department notifying my father of cancellation for the sale of land had the desired effect on my father, and after receiving same he was prepared to do anything, in order to save whatever possible of the money which he had paid down.

[Mr. Roche.]

Just at this stage, your son-in-law's enquiries came to hand, and naturally we were ready to clutch at anything which would be of advantage to us, and we were prepared to sell at a sacrifice if necessary, provided we could give title. As soon as the question of our ability to give title arose, along came the notice from your department, dated June 7, 1910, in which you re-instate our contracts; thus making it possible for us to put a legitimate deal through and your son-in-law, through fraud and misrepresentation, with the connivance of the Department of the Interior, succeeded in obtaining the lands at about one quarter of their real value.

I was of the opinion that at the time of the sale to your son-in-law the land was worth at least $50,000 or $60,000, but your son-in-law insisted that the land was worth less than we had paid for it, and in the end, as I have said, he got it. I find now that the land at that time was as valuable, or more so, than it is now, and, further, upon obtaining a historical abstract of the land from the Land Registration Office at Edmonton, I find that the land has very recently been transferred from your son-in-law to yourself, and that you have raised a loan on same to the extent of $25,000, and that in the affidavits filed, requiring the value of the land to be set forth, same is sworn to be worth over $70,000.

It appears most conclusive to me that we have been defrauded out of some $50,000 which I have no doubt could be obtained by carrying the matter to a civil court, and it further seems to me that a perpetrator of a crime of this kind would also be criminally liable. What I ask, and which I must insist on having, is some restitution of this damage, and unless same is made immediately, all the documents shall be handed over to my solicitor for his attention.

I may say that a good deal of my information has been obtained from Mr. MacNamara, who has evidently spared no pains in unearthing same at Ottawa and elsewhere, and he has promised to give me his co-operation and all the help which he can give me, in order to bring this matter to a successful and just termination.

Kindly address all correspondence in this matter to me direct, as I am looking after this matter fully, and by the time this letter reaches you, my father will not be in Manitoba.

Yours truly,

(Sgd.) Stanley H. Fahrni.

Now, Mr. Speaker, that is a pretty strong letter, and if the statements can be borne out by the facts—and certainly a prima facie case has been made out by the record—I think it is none too strong. Certainly Mr. Fahrni apparently has a very great grievance against the department on the chain of evidence to which I have just alluded, which is set forth on the file, which is set forth in that letter which I have read, and which would strongly indicate that he had every justification for making these statements.

At any rate, what has happened? Five thousand dollars was paid in, and under the regulations $5,000 would have been forfeited if the Government had allowed the lands to have remained cancelled; and not only would the Government have had the first cash payment of $5,000, but they would have had the land which Mr. Anderson swears is worth $71,000. So that the Government only gets $25,000 out of the deal, and there is a direct loss to this country of about $50,000. And yet these gentlemen opposite claim that they have been looking after the interests of the Canadian people and their lands; and in view of this the ex-Minister of the Interior passed a eulogy this afternoon upon the administration of the lands department by the late Government, and he thought it well to hand out a bouquet to himself as ex-Minister of the Interior, a bouquet which I submit, in the light of these events, is rather of a petrified variety.

I am not going to say that no restitution is coming to this Government, but apparently Mr. Fahrni thinks there is some restitution coming to his father for the manner in which he has been dealt with. I put this matter before the House in all sincerity, because I think it is my duty to do so. It is no pleasure to me to refer to these matters, because I am not of a combative disposition; but when we listen in this House day after day and week after week to the fulminations of hon. gentlemen opposite against hon. gentlemen on this side, turning and twisting every bit of evidence that is coming out in the committees and scattering it broadcast in the Liberal press throughout the Dominion of Canada, trying to hold the Government responsible for every lapse that has taken place in connection with the vast expenditure of money in the preparations in such a short time for sending the boys to Salisbury Plain, and making ammunition for themselves to do duty on the hustings, the time comes when patience ceases to be a virtue. Therefore I came to the conclusion that as a physician the only treatment I could prescribe was to give my hon. friends opposite a dose of their own medicine.

I am not going to monopolize more of the time of the House, but I may say that I have merely scratched the surface, because we could unearth very many more things without referring to Mr. Ferguson at all. Mr. Ferguson's work lasted longer than I anticipated it would last; but he has disclosed sufficient to show that this country has been despoiled of thousands of acres of land, of thousands of acres of timber limits, and of concessions handed out to the political friends of the late Administration; and this is something to know in order that we may take steps to see that there shall not be a repetition of it in the future and also to place ourselves in a position to demand restitution.

In regard to some of the things to which I have referred there may be some explanation that I know nothing whatever about, and as to which there is nothing on the files to show the contrary of what I have just stated. If so, we expect to hear it; but at any rate I thought it my duty as Minister of the Interior, when these matters were brought to my attention, to refer to them, in the face of the accusations made by hon. gentlemen opposite against members of the Conservative party; and there is no member of the House of Commons who has sinned in this respect more than my hon. friend from Edmonton (Mr. Oliver) with those adjectives and that characteristic language of his, in accusing those of our party who have revealed any of these nefarious transactions as being black-mailers, porch-climbers, thieves and thugs.

Mr. OLIVER: Hear, hear.

Mr. ROCHE: My hon. friend says, "hear, hear." This is the language used in this House by the ex-Minister of the Interior. When Mr. Ferguson and others have unearthed some of these nefarious transactions of such a villainous character that neither he nor any one else on the other side of the House can defend them, he refers to these gentlemen as thieves, thugs, black-mailers and porch-climbers. This is the gentleman who held the position of Minister of the Interior under the late Administration.

Mr. OLIVER: I am very sorry that I was too flattering.

Mr. ROCHE: We certainly have some idea of the hon. gentleman's capacity for using adjectives of a most pronounced character. We are quite willing to award him the palm, because for any one on this side of the House to try to rival him would simply be vain.

In view of the taunts flung across the floor of the House from time to time, I have simply thought it my duty to bring these matters up, although Mr. Ferguson did not deal with them. Had he been given a little longer time, I have no doubt that some of the matters to which I have just referred would have been investigated by him, but I think I have made sufficient investigation as to what is in the files to warrant me in making every statement that I have made to-night. I do not wish to be strong in my language, no matter how great the temptation may be. I have not dealt with this question from a personal standpoint, because I have no personal feeling in regard to the matter. Were I to allow my personal feelings to weigh with me, I would say nothing whatever about these matters; but, being in charge of the department that has been under criticism by hon. members opposite during this session, especially by the ex-Minister of the Interior, I would be expected to do my duty, especially when he is simulating such righteous indignation against what has been exposed in the committees, in showing the character of the Administration which was carried on while he was Minister of the Interior and while the Liberal Government was in power. I think I have disclosed sufficient in the few minutes that I have spent in addressing the House this evening to show that the people of this country did not get rid of the late Government any too soon. The late Government has frittered away the public domain, scattering it out amongst its own political friends. In the light of such events, it ill-becomes hon. gentlemen opposite to attempt to criticise, as they have criticised in this House, the administration either of the Department of the Interior or of any other department of this Government.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: I have to say at once that I do not rise for the purpose of discussing the matters which have been brought to the attention of the House by my hon. friend from Edmonton (Mr. Oliver), followed by my hon. friend the present Minister of the Interior. I must confess my ignorance of the matters under discussion. On Monday morning, on looking over the Votes and Proceedings of the previous Saturday, I found that the Secretary of State had laid two returns on the table of the House. The record in the Votes and Proceedings reads as follows:

Mr. Coderre presented,—Return to an Order of the House, of the 22nd February, 1915, for a copy of the report of investigation held about June 1, 1914, by T. R. Ferguson, as special commissioner, into the allotment of homesteads on the area cut out of the Riding Mountain Forest Reserve in the year 1908 or about that time.

Mr. Coderre laid on the Table of the House, —Report of Thomas R. Ferguson, commissioner appointed to investigate matters pertaining to the Blood Indian Reserve and the acquisition of certain Indian lands by Messrs. James A. Smart, Frank Pedley and William J. White, together with the evidence taken in the said investigation.

[Mr. Roche.]

I sent at once to the clerk of the House for these reports, and he sent me, not the whole of the report which is now upon the table, but the report concerning the Blood Indian reserve. Looking at it, I found that the reference upon which Mr. Ferguson had acted was not to be found in the paper, and the following day I asked for it and it was laid on the table yesterday. I commenced to read the report; but I am sorry to say that I have not gone very far, for I have perused only some 20 or 25 pages. I had not the remotest suspicion at that moment that I would find my name mentioned in this report, nor had I any notice of it until I saw an article in the Ottawa Citizen of this date under the rather glaring headlines:

Western land deal with local end is laid bare—F. P. and H. A. Aylwin and J. A. Robert of Ottawa figure in irrigation case with big profits—negotiation through Sir Wilfrid Laurier.

I think it better, for the information of the House and the people and for all concerned, myself in particular, that I should read to the House the whole of this article, which is as follows:

A further report by T. R. Ferguson, K.C., brought down in the Commons this morning, deals with the Aylwin irrigation tract. The application, the report states, was made by F. P. Aylwin, of Ottawa, and the acreage was 69,000. The commissioner finds that E. A. Robert, of Montreal, was largely instrumental in obtaining the grant and that he benefited from it. J. Alfred Robert, of Ottawa, was another beneficiary. The report finds that Mr. E. A. Robert's services were enlisted for a consideration, and that he was paid $12,420 in that connection. The transaction took place in 1909. The land was located 75 miles west of Medicine Hat and in connection with the transaction the report finds that the Messrs. Robert and three others got $18,461 each. The commissioner states that it was not feasible to irrigate the tract.

Mr. Ferguson, dealing with the facts of the case, notes that it was necessary to procure the services of Mr. Robert. The application was made by Camille Piché, of Montreal, who was then a member of Parliament, and there were five partners: C. H. Newton, of Winnipeg, H. P. Simpson, of Vancouver, F. P. and H. A. Aylwin, of Ottawa, and J. A. Robert, of Ottawa. It was stated that the condition on which E. A. Robert became connected with the case was that his brother should have a fifth interest and he should be paid 18 cents an acre for every acre granted.

The commissioner states that according to the Order in Council $500,000 was mentioned as the cost of the scheme when it was proposed to grant 311,000 acres, and he adds that it was to cost the same amount when 69,000 acres were granted. If the tract could be irrigated he does not see why it was granted and goes on to state that some steps should be taken to prevent speculators acquiring irrigation tracts and making profits by turning them over. This case he refers to as one destined to benefit individual promoters looking for enrichment.

The total amount received by Mr. Robert and his associates was $270,100 which, after providing for expenses and certain amounts paid to associates, left a profit of $92,329.

The commissioner is unable to find that the grant of this land was in the public interest. No great benefit could result to the public from the irrigation of 17,000 acres which was called for in the contract.

A letter is quoted under date of June 19, 1908, wherein Mr. Robert wrote that he had seen the "chief" and had a long talk with him on the matter. Mr. Robert expressed fears that others might try to get in over his head and he says he got the assurance that if he and his friends did not get in, no others would.

On June 19, 1908, Mr. Robert wrote to H. A. Aylwin in respect to certain other parties who he feared might get the grant. He expressed the opinion that they would not get it, but that he and his associates would and, if so, they would be dealt with "on terms acceptable to ourselves."

On March 18, 1908, Mr. Robert again wrote Mr. Aylwin to the effect that he understood Mr. Oliver had thrown open the tract to homesteaders. He added that other than being evident that Oliver had not been straight in the matter he would not let it worry him as the matter was in such shape that the grant had to be made or one of a similar size given. "I am going up to see Sir Wilfrid in a day or so," he added, "and perhaps shall have some good news to send you on my return. Keep your friends quiet until you hear from me and I am as certain as ever that you will get your grant of land. The delay has been very annoying and disgusting, but they are in a worse position to refuse it to-day than they were some time ago."

The commissioner observes that Mr. Robert's deals were not with the minister of the department, but with Sir Wilfrid Laurier and Hon. R. Lemieux, and that twelve days after the 18th March, the minister took up for the second time consideration of Aylwin's application.

On August 14, 1908, Mr. Robert advised H. A. Aylwin that there was no further need to worry over it, that before many days there would be word that would be satisfactory.

Mr. Ferguson adds that the grant should not have been made until there was a complete investigation to see if the scheme was feasible. No engineers' reports were asked for and the conclusion he comes to is that the "insistent requests of Mr. Robert were the real reason for the grant."

The land was later transferred to the Alberta Land Company, organized by Mr. Robert.

That is the whole of the article. Now I come back to the headlines:

F. P. and H. A. Aylwin and J. A. Robert, of Ottawa, figure in irrigation case with big profits—Negotiations through Sir Wilfrid Laurier.

As to these Messrs. Aylwin, I do not think I know either one or the other. With Mr. J. A. Robert I may have a slight acquaintance. If I ever met him, it was not more than once in my life. Mr. E. A. Robert I know very well, have known him for many years, and have always counted him a friend. The gist of the charges in this paper is the following sentence:

Commissioner observes that Mr. Robert's deals were not with the minister of the department, but with Sir Wilfrid Laurier and Hon. R. Lemieux, and that twelve days after the 18th March, the minister took up for the second time consideration of Aylwin's application.

There is an inference there, as stated in the headlines, that the negotiations with regard to these lands were through Sir Wilfrid Laurier. I have simply this to say —that to this statement there is not a shadow of truth. Whether the lease was right or whether it was wrong, constitutionally I am responsible, and I do not intend to deny the responsibility which attaches to me, as I was then of the Government. But personally I know nothing of this matter, and if I dealt with it at all—of which I have no recollection at the present time—it was simply departmentally in the absence of the minister. Mr. Robert speaks in one of these letters as having come to me and seen me. Mr. Robert may have seen me; if he says so, he did see me. This article says:

A letter is quoted under date of June 19, 1908, wherein Mr Robert wrote that he had seen the "chief" and had a long talk with him on the matter. Mr. Robert expressed fears that others might try to get in over his head, and he says that he got the assurance that if he and his friends did not get it, no others would.

I have no exception to take to that; I may have said to Mr. Robert that if he did not get it nobody else would, as he was the first applicant. Of all this I have not at the moment the slightest recollection. Will it surprise the House, will it surprise the Government, most of all will it surprise the Prime Minister, if I say that it is impossible for me, after six or eight years, to remember a private conversation which may have taken place in my office when I was Prime Minister? Everybody will know that the Prime Minister sees in his office ten, twenty, forty, fifty persons every day, coming with their grievances, some of consequence and some of no consequence; some to whom he will give attention and some to whom he will give no attention. It is a matter of daily occurrence for some one to come to the Prime Minister complaining that he has not had satisfaction from one of his ministers; and it is also a matter of every-day occurrence, and a matter of common knowledge, that sometimes the Prime Minister deems it his bounden duty to interfere, but in most cases he does not interfere.

Now, in all fairness, if Mr. Ferguson had wanted to create the impression that I was in any way responsible—personally and not merely constitutionally responsible—that I had anything to do with the transaction right or wrong, I ask, in the name of fair play, in the name of common honesty, why did not he call me as a witness? I put myself in the judgment of hon. members on the other side as well as of those on this side. I have been for a great many years in public life, and up to this time I have escaped, I think, scandal. Have I not a right, then, if an accusation is to be bandied against me in the public prints, and on the floor of this House, upon the report of a commissioner, to say that at least this man should have given me the fair play of an opportunity of stating my version of the case? How can I be expected to give any information upon this subject? But I am satisfied of one thing—I have not had time to look at the evidence; my attention was called to this matter only two hours ago; but I should be very much surprised if Mr. Robert ever stated that I was an intermediary in connection with these negotiations. The evidence has been examined by hon. gentlemen on the other side of the House, and, if they can find in it anything to that effect, I invite them to bring it to my attention. I have tried to find in the report evidence to justify the assertion that I was an intermediary in this matter; I find no statement, but some insinuations. I think I ought to read the conclusion of Mr. Ferguson's report; it is as follows:

So far as Mr. F. P. Aylwin, the nominal applicant was concerned, he was not considered. Mr. Robert was the active man. Again I say; if this tract could not be irrigated, why was it granted? It seems unaccountable, unless one concedes that it was to satisfy the requests of Mr. E. A. Robert and his associates. The claims made from time to time by him in his letters to his associates, in which he insists frequently that he will secure the tract; his actions in buying out the interests of Charles H. Newton, and assuming a liability of $23,600 and agreeing to pay $5,000 as a bonus after the tract had been thrown open to homesteading, all goes to show that he, at least, was satisfied that departmental action was of no importance—that in the end he would get the tract. He was not, it is true, aware of all that was going on in the department. At the earlier stages of the application, at any rate, he believed that there would be granted something over 300,000 acres, and apparently he did not for months learn of the practical cancellation of the tract. After he had learned of it, he persisted, and the small tract was granted. Even then he did not know that the irrigation privileges and rights no longer accompanied the grant, although they were a most material portion of the grant. Nevertheless, undeniably it was the efforts of Mr. E. A. Robert which procured the grant of the tract.

After a consideration of the grant of this irrigation tract, and of the tract of the Southern Alberta Land Company, I am of the opinion that there should be a change in the department in connection with the granting of the irrigation tracts. As is mentioned in my report relative to the Southern Alberta Land Company, I consider that irrigation tracts should not be granted to private individuals or to corporations, but that such irrigation schemes should be undertaken by the Government for the benefit of the country at large. If such a course is not followed, then there should be some regulation governing the amount of acreage to be granted, and providing also that no tract should under any circumstances be granted until the fullest and completest details as to the feasibility of the scheme are placed before the department and the department is satisfied that the scheme can and will be fully carried on to completion. Some course should be followed to prevent speculators acquiring tracts and making large profits by turning them over. All such profits form a charge upon the lands which the settler must ultimately pay, and certainly cannot be in the interests of the public at large. In connection with the Southern Alberta tract, no proper government inspection and report was made, the reports of engineers of that company were used when the stock was marketed and when the shareholders' engineers took charge and began to examine the scheme, it was found to be utterly impracticable as an irrigation scheme. This has all been discussed elsewhere, in connection with my report in that matter.

I conclude by saying that this seems to have been really a granting of this particular tract to individual promoters, who looked for enrichment. That they did not make very large sums out of it is not fault of theirs. If these applicants had been informed that the Government policy was such that they must bind themselves to irrigate, that they would not be allowed to sell or dispose of their interests, but that they must irrigate and begin the work and carry it on themselves, it is altogether likely that they never would have endeavoured to acquire this tract. In such an event, in this case, at any rate, these purchasers would not have acquired it, as they would necessarily have taken the trouble to learn, and have learned, that the tract could not be irrigated.

It is satisfactory to learn from this report that the country did not suffer very much if it suffered at all, in connection with this matter. I deny absolutely the charge that I was an intermediary, that the negotiations passed through my hands. Although my memory is a blank as to the circumstances, I say without hesitation that that charge is false. I appeal to the sense of fair play of every man in this House as to whether it was not the duty of the commissioner, if any insinuations were to be made against me, to allow me to make an explanation in the matter. I would have produced my correspondence and allowed him to overhaul everything in order to find out the truth. Constitutionally, whether or not the transaction is wrong, I have to take the responsibility, and I do not intend to disclaim that responsibility. I am not here to ask favours from anybody; I am here simply to uphold my rights as a citizen of Canada, and to defend the good name which I have preserved through a pretty long life. As to what was done under the administration of the late Government, it is open to hon. gentlemen on the other side of the House to make what charges they can make, to find out what has been wrong, if anything, and to have restitution made to the Treasury if the Treasury has suffered by anything that we did. As I say, I am not here to ask any favours, but certainly, as a citizen of Canada and as a member of this House, I am entitled to justice and fair play at the hands of hon. gentlemen opposite.

Hon. RODOLPHE LEMIEUX (Rouville): I have not had an opportunity of reading the whole of this bulky report in connection with the Aylwin irrigation tract, which has been debated this afternoon and this evening in the House, but my attention has been called to a synopsis of the report which was published by the Ottawa Journal. I have read that synopsis, and it is because my name happens to be mentioned therein that I wish to offer a few remarks in connection with this matter. I suppose this synopsis was carefully prepared, and represents substantially the evidence adduced at the investigation held by Mr. Ferguson.

Let me first read the evidence on which Mr. Ferguson bases the conclusion wherein he connects the name of the right hon. gentleman (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) and my own name with this matter. I call the attention of my fellow members 9 p.m. to the evidence given by Mr. Robert in the presence of the commissioner, as follows:

Commissioner: Did you interview the Prime Minister (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) up to that time?

Mr. Robert: Oh, I may have. It is quite probable I did.

Commissioner: What other members?

Mr. Robert: At this moment I can't recollect, but I think I may have seen Mr. Lemieux, the member for the district.

Commissioner: That is the Hon. Rodolphe Lemieux?

Mr. Robert: Yes, it is quite probable I would go first to the minister of my district. I do not know in that interview that is referred to what minister I saw.

I quote the following from the same publication, dealing with the report made by Mr. Ferguson:

Twelve days after the date of that letter the minister took up for the second time the question of the consideration of Aylwin's application. Mr. Robert's dealings were not with the man who administered the department, but with two other ministers—Sir Wilfrid Laurier and the Hon. Rodolphe Lemieux. His certainty that he could procure the grant is evinced by the fact that within a few weeks after March 18th, 1908, and with knowledge of the action of the Minister of the Interior, he purchased the interests of Mr. C. H. Newton.

Of course, I could leave the case as it is summarized here and take my seat, because I see nothing in the evidence to connect my name with this matter. First of all, Mr. Robert does not swear that he had seen me. He says it is probable he may have seen me, but he does not recollect. He says he may have seen the minister of the district. As a matter of fact, you will remember that in 1909 I was not what in political parlance we call the minister of this district or of another district; I was not, at all events, the minister representing the district in which Mr. Robert lived, the district of Montreal. If I was the minister of any district, I was the minister belonging to the Quebec district. I may say further that I do not know Mr. Aylwin and I did not know of the case until I read of it this evening in the Evening Journal. It is not possible for a member of a Government to remember all the Orders in Council that are passed, knowing that thousands are passed, I will not say monthly, but annually, by the Council. I did not know of that Order in Council. Mr. Robert never spoke to me, because I had no business with him, not being the minister of his district; and I never spoke, I say it with emphasis, to my colleague, the Hon. Mr. Oliver, then Minister of the Interior, as regards this transaction, and I cannot see how Mr. Ferguson can base such a conclusion on the evidence of Mr. Robert. Let me repeat again, to show how unfair are the conclusions of the commissioner.

Q. Mr. Robert, what other members did you see?—A. At this moment I cannot recollect, but I think I may have seen the Hon. Mr. Lemieux, the minister for the district.

I was not minister for the district.

Q. That is, the Hon. Rodolphe Lemieux?—A. Yes. It is quite probable that I would go first to the minister of my district. I do not know in that interview that is referred to what minister I saw.

How in the name of common-sense, and in the name of fair-play could Mr. Ferguson conclude from that evidence that it was through dealings of the right hon. gentleman and myself that this case was promoted in the Department of the Interior? I say it again, I have had nothing whatever to do with it, and this is the first time I have known of this case—only this evening, by reading what has been published in the Ottawa press.

Mr. J. G. TURRIFF (Assiniboia): Mr. Speaker, in connection with this matter it is not my intention to take up the time of the House for more than a very few minutes. You have seen the bulky reports that have been brought down within the last couple of days, and I think every hon. member on the other side of the House who is actuated by the ordinary spirit of fair-play will recognize that it is rather a difficult matter for any one to go through these reports and understand them on so short a notice. I am not going here to make any particular complaint of the report that Mr. Ferguson has brought down in so far as my name has been connected with a couple of these transactions, for the simple reason that I do not understand them fully, I have not had time or opportunity to go through them. And I want to say further that these matters have all engaged the attention of this House many years ago. I refer to those with which my name has been connected while I was Commissioner of Dominion Lands. As I have not been Commissioner of Dominion Lands for at least eleven years, it is all ancient history. It was brought up and dealt with in the House and before the Public Accounts Committee many years ago, and there is nothing new, so far as I know, in these reports. Therefore, I do not intend to take up the time of the House in going into them. If my hon. friends opposite think that by handling these reports and bringing up these old matters again they can do me any particular injury in my constituency, or do the Liberal party any particular injury, why, they are welcome to do so. So far as I am personally concerned, in my own constituency, they are doubly welcome to attempt it. They tried it once, many years ago, and did not make very much of it, simply because there was nothing much to be made of it.

So far as the Craven lands are concerned, and so far as the Brown lease was concerned, the lease was not issued until a year or a year and a half after I left the department. I shall not shelter myself behind that in any shape or form. The application was made while I was there, and it was all done according to the usual routine of the regulations. The only criticism, as I understand, that has been made is that the rental was not charged from the time the application was made. I venture to observe, and the Minister of the Interior will, I think, bear me out, that in no case is rental charged until a lease is granted. In this case the rental was charged when the lease was granted, but not for the time that elapsed between the application for the lease and the time that it was granted.

Some remarks have been made about the selling of the Craven lands at a dollar an acre. Let me point out that the application was made in the year 1899. If my memory serves me aright, the sale was made in 1900 or 1901. At that time it was the practice of the department, where lands in that district were sold, to sell them at a dollar an acre. A dollar an acre was the full value of the land. If my memory is correct—and I am not certain, because this happened some 12 or 15 years ago—some of these lands had been homesteaded twice and abandoned by the homesteaders because they could not fulfil the homestead duties, and because the lands were not worth taking out a patent for, in the judgment of the homesteaders. The lands were subject to overflow from Long lake. Some years the water would recede and there would be a crop of hay on the lands, but in many years there was not a ton of hay. At that time Mr. Brown, who subsequently bought the land, was a farmer in that vicinity. He was also a rancher. He went in for mixed farming. He had a large bunch of cattle and made application to purchase some of these lands and, under the ordinary routine of the department, he was allowed to purchase some 500 acres at one dollar an acre and he put script on some further area of land, totalling about 1,000 acres. Let me point out that at that very time the Regina and Long Lake Railway Company had a grant of one million or one million and a half acres of especially selected land, dry land, not land subject to overflow; and they were offering those lands at $1.25 an acre and could not sell them. Let me further point out that all through that part of the country where to-day the land is of the greatest value, down along the Sault line in the vicinity of Weyburn, later than the time these lands were purchased by Brown, the Canadian Pacific Railway sold hundreds of thousands of acres for $2.50 an acre. Three or four years ago ordinary farm lands that had been bought for $2.50 an acre in that part of the country around Weyburn, Yellowgrass and up as far as Rouleau, were transferred at $60 and $70 an acre. Anybody could have gone and picked up the choicest quarter-sections in that part of the country at $3 an acre.

My hon. friend made the statement that this land that Mr. Brown had bought for $1 an acre was sold two or three years afterwards for $25 an acre. My hon. friend is mistaken as to the time that elapsed between the purchase and sale of these lands. They were purchased somewhere about 1901 and 1902 and sold nine or ten years later. There is nothing wonderful about that advance in value.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The sale, or the expropriation, is shown by the evidence to have taken place in 1906.

Mr. TURRIFF: The sale by whom?

Mr. MEIGHEN: By Mr. Brown.

Mr. TURRIFF: I have not the papers before me and the Solicitor General may have examined them, but I think he is mistaken when he says the lands were sold by Mr. Brown, or were expropriated in 1906.

Mr. PUGSLEY: The trial in the Exchequer Court took place in 1909.

Mr. TURRIFF: If the Solicitor General is right that the sale took place in 1906, then I am wrong as to the time that elapsed between the purchase of the lands and the time at which they were expropriated. But you must remember that the price of this land was fixed by the Exchequer Court. I was Commissioner of Dominion Lands at that time, and when the application came before me, as hundreds of others came before me, my decision was to allow Mr. Brown to purchase this land in 1901, or 1902, at the usual price at which lands were sold at that time, namely $1 an acre. I made those decisions in the absolute belief that I was doing exactly right and, after a lapse of ten or twelve years from the time that these transactions took place, I have nothing to take back and I am absolutely satisfied that I then was right. I have no reason whatever to think that I did wrong in my position at that time. It is a very simple matter for a commissioner to come ten or twelve years afterwards and make any sort of a report that he chooses. I am not complaining about the report. If he wants to make a report of that sort, well and good. We have the report and he has the money for making it. If the Government think it is worth while, well and good. As far as I am concerned, I have nothng to apologize for and nothing to take back in any shape, manner or form. I think I was in a better position to judge at that time than this commissioner is to judge at this time of what was a proper decision to come to on a matter of this kind ten or twelve years ago.

Hon. ARTHUR MEIGHEN (Solicitor General): Mr. Speaker, the report of Mr. Ferguson which has been placed on the Table of the House is a vastly important one. It comprises some eleven different subjects that have been under investigation by him for something over a year. It was laid on the table of the House as soon as we were able to lay it on and I can assure the ex-Minister of the Interior (Mr. Oliver) and all concerned, that there was not, and is not now, any intention to take any advantage whatever by reason of the time at which it was there laid. If it is their desire to have an opportunity later on for a fuller perusal than has been open to them, or for more ample discussion, I am sure that on this side of the House there will be no opposition whatever. Any suggestion that may come from them in that regard will be met in the frendliest spirit by us.

I have never been able to appreciate the force of the contention that because a subject is up before us for discussion at the latter end of a session necessarily it must be slurred over and improperly considered. The latter end of the session should be of as much importance to us, and its hours should be made as valuable to us and to the country, as are those of any other part. It is complained this afternoon that we have pretty much finished the other business, that the Estimates are voted, that even that long protracted consideration of the Act for soldiers' votes is over and that, inasmuch as we have no other business to transact, we cannot afford now to give time to the subject under discussion. I would have thought the argument would have proven the other way, that as we are now freed for the most part from the ordinary matters of public concern, we can devote our minds simply and solely to this subject and that there is no reason in the world to hurry until we are through with it, until all have had their say and have had time to say it.

I rise to address the House on the subject of this report, the debate having been introduced by the motion of the one hon. member of this House most concerned, the hon. member for Edmonton (Mr. Oliver). I arise in no spirit of personal antipathy to him, nor indeed to any hon. member concerned. Since I have had a seat in Parliament there is no associate in this House on either side with whom my personal relations have been more cordial than they have been with the hon. member for Edmonton. At the same time the subjects in the discussion of which his name appears are subjects of public concern and we would never do our duty if by reason of any personal relations we omitted to state the plain facts that appear in those subjects and make known to the country our opinions and the course of conduct we intend to take regarding them.

It is complained on the other hand by the hon. member for Assinaboia (Mr. Turriff) that he has not had time to review the report. The report, or a large part of it, has been on the table since Saturday morning last; the rest of it has been on the table since Monday morning last and it is now Wednesday night. His complaint also is that the subjects are too old and that in so far as his connection with them is concerned the discussion has very little interest for him at all because he is utterly unable to remember anything about these matters and that the records consequently are all we can rely on and if the records are against him he is satisfied and it has to go at that. We are not going to meet that objection of the hon. member for Assiniboia certainly by any further delay. The longer we continue the discussion the stronger the objection will become.

What are the subjects before us and why are they here? It was thought at one time that the session of Parliament upon which we are launched, and which is now nearing its conclusion, would be a non-controversial session.

If that had been carried out, if the Opposition had made it possible for the Government to have carried out that intention, then indeed, in my opinion, this report could not have been presented. But, has the course of conduct of the Opposition been such that it was open for us to choose? From the opening of this session to the close, their course of conduct has been such that never since the Government was returned to power has the spirit of partisanship been so aroused and excited as it has been by them. There is no trick of party controversy to which they have not resorted, and by means of their press chiefly, as well as by their speeches in Parliament, they have been endeavouring by distortion and by every other unworthy resort to cast aspersions on hon. gentlemen on this side of the House, and to make for themselves weapons for an election. And if there is one hon. gentleman more than another who has addressed himself with assiduity to that task, and has never waited for the verdict of committees, and has never waited for the evidence, to come to a conclusion, but who has been ready in advance to find everybody on this side guilty of everything charged by hon. gentlemen opposite, and to denounce us with adjectives and language that he only can command, it is the hon. member for Edmonton. The language which he adopts to-night, in reference to the commissioner who has made this report—a report so fully substantiated by the evidence produced that even the hon. member for Assiniboia says he has no fault to find with it—the language he has adopted to-night in castigation of that commissioner has been equalled only by the language he has hurled across the floor at ourselves ever since the opening of this session. He tells us to-night that the revelations here laid before the people of Canada by Mr. Ferguson are so trivial and reflect so little on him and on the Government of which he was a member, and reflect so little on the department over which he presided, that it amounts in fact to a certificate of character upon which he is ready to appeal to the people of Canada.

I want to examine this certificate of character, and I take it that if this is the certificate upon which hon. gentlemen opposite purpose to appeal, then what is revealed here is the character of administration which the people of Canada may expect if they send hon. gentlemen opposite back to office.

The disclosures that are first revealed in the report have to do with lands in western Canada; they have chiefly to do with lands in the very district from which I come. I have not been unfamiliar for many years gone by with the character of transactions revealed in this first report. I heard about them in the last election contest: I heard more about them, in the contest that preceded the last. Throughout those campaigns, it was reported to me over and over again that we might just as well cease our efforts to succeed in the Riding Mountain district and in the Dauphin country, because the homestead frauds perpetrated there were such that the Liberal party had a grip on the vote.

The right hon. the ex-Prime Minister tells us that the doings of his Government and of its departments are open to investigation, and that if we find anything wrong we have a right to reveal it and to demand restitution. Yes, the doings of his Government are open to investigation now; they became open to investigation on the 10th of October, 1911, when he threw down the seals of office and when the right hon. gentleman who now honours the post of Prime Minister took them up. But prior to that day, they were not open to investigation; prior to that day he and his followers behind him, over and over again, resisted motions, resisted resolutions, resisted every effort made by us as we sat in Opposition to have the very subjects which are here revealed investigated by committees of this House. Resolution after resolution, and motion after motion, calling for commissions to investigate these very subjects, were voted down at the right hon. gentleman's behest, and now because we have investigated them at the very first opportunity we had, the hon. member for Edmonton (Mr. Oliver) comes forward and says: there is nothing at all to investigate as regards several of them at least, because the men who committed the frauds are out of office.

What were these frauds in the Riding Mountain district? The hon. gentleman tells us that they are nothing in which the country is concerned at all. Why? Because he says that all these lands were open to homesteading anyway, and that if these fellows did not get them somebody else would, and the country would not have them, and, therefore, we have no concern. That is the attitude assumed to-day by the hon. member for Edmonton. There was a Riding Mountain forest reserve, that skirted the northern portion of my constituency, and the southern portion of the constituency of the member for Dauphin (Mr. Cruise). That forest reserve was defined by legislation of years gone by. It was found, according to the definition of that legislation, that there were large acreages that were not adapted to forestry at all, and that consequently should be thrown open for homesteads. The farmers of the district and all other districts observed—and doubtless some of them were advised in advance by hon. gentlemen opposite and by the minister of the day,—that it was altogether likely that certain portions would subsequently become open for homestead entry. Many became squatters upon lands in that district; some became squatters upon lands within the territory that afterwards became the restricted area of the forest reserve, and others again became squatters on lands which afterwards were thrown outside the new limitation of the forest reserve. With these men it became the duty of the ministry of the day to deal, and when it was determined to throw open for entry the lands outside the new restricted area of the reserve the squatters on those lands became entitled to priority of entry by virtue of the regulations then in force. There were squatters inside the new limits, there were squatters outside the new limits, and what was the policy pursued by the hon. member for Edmonton, then Minister of the Interior? He selects one of his henchmen, a man who was appointed to office for his services to the Liberal party, and one of the most pronounced partisans that ever infested western Canada, a man who to-day stands as admitting under oath that he used his office altogether to advance the interests of the Liberal party and for no other purpose at all; the then Minister of the Interior (Mr. Oliver) invests this man with uncontrolled authority by letter, and he notifies the agent of Dominion Lands to the effect that W. A. Davis, a forest ranger, appointed by his Government, could go on his own will hither and thither, and any man that he recommended for an entry in that new forest reserve or without that new reserve should get that entry without any further inquiry whatsoever. Yet the hon. member tells us that that is something with which the country is not concerned at all, because, as he says, if he did not give the lands to his friends somebody else would get them. What did Davis do? He goes to the printing press and he gets printed several hundred orders addressed to F. K. Herchmer, Esq., saying: "Please permit Mr. —— to enter for —— lands, and this is your authority; signed W. A. Davis, forest ranger."

He hands these to Mr. Samuel Cohen and to Mr. Albert McLeod, selected, as he admits, because they are the very best party workers he knows, and these men take these blanks, and they utilize them as an engine of the Liberal party to award the public lands of this country to henchmen of the party in Manitoba. If there is a weapon within the grip of a Government which illegitimately and illegally used will be certain to corrupt the electorate for election purposes, it is the weapon of these Dominion lands. Was there any restraint put upon Mr. Davis? There was not the least; he had the minister's own authority for what he did; the minister was at the Dominion Lands office at the time he did it, and the minister, sitting in the Dominion Lands office, wrote him a letter which ratified his authority to do it. He goes on with the work, and hundreds of men who had no right to entries whatever, are given entry for Dominion lands by the authority of the then Minister of the Interior of Canada. Amongst these men is one gentleman, now an hon. member of this House, a man who has done nothing wrong at all, says the ex-Minister of the Interior, but a man whom his own henchman, Mr. Davis, swore got an entry under that system to which he had no right whatever under the law. What does Mr. Cruise do? He goes up to the Riding Mountain reserve and picks up a good quarter-section, although the reserve is not thrown open for entry yet. Does he build a house on it and reside on it and become a squatter prior to the throwing open for entry? Not at all. He builds four walls without a roof; he does not live on the quarter-section for a day; and, after he gets the four walls up, he thinks that he has done enough, and he comes back to his farm in Dauphin; and up to the time he made his entry, yes, up to the time he got his patent, he had not lived on the quarter-section, and how could he be a squatter if he did not live on it? He gets the entry, but he is no worse than hundreds of others who get entries in the same manner; and the man responsible and the man guilty, is not half so much Mr. Cruise or the other men who availed themselves of the rewards of this system as the then Minister of the Interior, who permitted, authorized and ratified the system after he knew what was going on, and who accepted the results of the system in the election of 1908. Let me put this to the right hon. the leader of the Opposition: What does he think of the management of the Department of the Interior under his règime by the hon. gentleman Opposition: what does he think of the management is now shown to have been used by the then minister and by his henchmen for the purpose of electing the Liberal representative of Dauphin aud for no other purpose whatever? Does the leader of the Opposition think he is entitled to the votes of the Liberal member for Dauphin which have been given obediently at his command for the Liberal party in this House all through this Parliament, after he sees how those votes were got under the system which has been revealed? I suffered from this system also; men from my own county were promised by this man and by his henchmen homesteads in the Dauphin district if they would support the Liberal nominee. These promises were made over and over again, and I lost votes by them, and those votes were bribed and paid for under the authority of the hon. member for Edmonton. The letters are on record, and there are others here in the evidence which are not on record, but which are not essential to the proof. It is not a matter of dispute; the man who did this work swore that he did it and told why he did it. He allowed himself to be made a tool of his party; and when he was under oath, he was ready to admit it. He employed two men, Cohen and McLeod, because he said that they could not be beaten in the country for seeing to it that wherever the party would get an advantage, they would give it the advantage, and when he was asked: "were you not just the same?" the answer was: "Sure." He resigned shortly after the present Government was installed in office by the votes of the people of Canada, and I presume his resignation comes within the class of those complained of by hon. gentlemen opposite—those that were made under pressure and that amounted to dismissal, because, as hon. gentlemen opposite say, the men did not get a fair show at all. Yes, Mr. Davis resigned, and many others resigned under similar circumstances; but they were retained in office by the ex-Minister of the Interior after he knew, and after the records showed that he knew, the wrong which they perpetrated against the people in Canada and against the voters of that district, by his authority and under his supervision. Why did the hon. member for Edmonton retain Mr. W. A. Davis as forest ranger after he knew that Mr. Davis had disposed of lands of the people of Canada by the hundreds of acres, by the hundreds of quarter-sections, illegally, fraudulently and for political purposes? The hon. member for Edmonton is in the same position to-day as if he himself had acted the part of Mr. W. A. Davis, and had awarded homestead entries by the hundred in the Riding Mountain district in order to gain an illegitimate and illegal party advantage over his political opponents in those parts. If he had dismissed Mr. Davis, if he had called him to account, if he had visited upon him any punishment whatever after he knew the facts, then he might have absolved himself. Did he know the facts? He did not deny this afternoon that he knew the facts; he knew of the deeds when they were being perpetrated; they were brought to his attention at the time, and the letters are on the file. He kept Mr. Davis in office, however, and he thereby added his seal to the wrongs perpetrated by Mr. Davis in that district.

But the Davis case is not all; the Cruise case is not all; there are ten more and they seem to grow in importance, each one over the one before it. We come next to the Pedley case. Mr. Pedley is dismissed, it is true, or he has resigned—I do not know which, and I do not think it makes much difference. Mr. Pedley has resigned and because he has resigned, the hon. member for Edmonton says: you do not need any report on this matter at all; why do you send Mr. Ferguson after Mr. Pedley when Mr. Pedley is not an officer of the department? Nobody knows better than the hon. member for Edmonton that, when Mr. Ferguson started out after Mr. Pedley, and when he acquired a knowledge of these nefarious transactions, Mr. Pedley was still Deputy Superintendent General of Indian Affairs, and the reason why he does not hold that position any longer is this, that as soon as the facts were revealed by the Ferguson report, he threw down the seals and fled from his office as from a hissing snake; but he would not be out of his position to-day if it had not been for Mr. Ferguson and Mr. Ferguson's report, and according to the hon. member for Edmonton he should not be out of his position yet. Does he condemn the transactions of Mr. Pedley? Did he do so when he was on his feet this afternoon? No, Mr. Pedley had not one word of criticism at my hon. friend's hands. Speak about certificates of character! My hon. friend gave Mr. Pedley a certificate of character just as valuable as the one Mr. Ferguson gave him. Why, he said, Mr. Pedley is an honourable man; he can stand up and look the Prime Minister of Canada or anybody else in the face. He is a friend of Mr. Pedley's still. And, Sir, Mr. Pedley, the man found guilty on his own evidence, is to-day in the employ of the Liberal party, their organizer in Northern Ontario. Mr. Pedley is out of office to-day; there is no doubt about that. He got out of office very quickly, as soon as he was found out, and he will be out of office until a certain day and no longer—the day when the Liberal party is restored to power in this Dominion. Then he will get his reward the same as Wagner got his reward, the same as many others got their rewards, when the ex-Minister of the Interior was in office.

Mr. Pedley in the year 1902 received applications for grazing leases in the Blood reserve. He got one in December of that year from Mr. McLaughlin and Mr. Millar, of Toronto. These men were in correspondence with Mr. Pedley for this grazing lease. As a result of that correspondence and of an interview with Mr. Pedley of the 21st of April following they came to the conclusion that they were entitled to the lease and proceeded to arrange their affairs accordingly. They proceeded to secure a number of cattle to stock the land, and to employ a foreman and to prepare to take possession, believing that the lease was at hand and that they were the first and were entitled to it. What happened? The interview to which I have referred was on the 21st April. On the 22nd April an application comes in by Mr. Donald McEwan of the city of Brandon, asking for a grazing lease for the same land. On the 6th of the same month Mr. Pedley, at the request of a legal firm in Ottawa, acting supposedly for this same Donald McEwan, wrote Mr. McEwan a letter authorizing him to go upon the reserve and make any arrangement he could with the Indians inhabiting the reserve. It was apparently his intention, as far back as the 6th of that month, to grant this grazing lease to McEwan. On the 22nd, after he had written the letter, the application comes in. Now, this application of Donald McEwan is revealed by the evidence to be really the application of Peter Ryan, of Toronto, who used the name of McEwan and gave McEwan four shares of the stock of the company for the use of his name. Mr. Peter Ryan, of the city of Toronto, is shown to be a close friend of the Deputy Superintendent General of Indian Affairs. So close friends are they that when Mr. Ryan is hard up he draws and kites upon Mr. Pedley, and when Mr. Pedley is hard up he operates through Mr. Ryan. Such is the evidence given by Mr. Ryan himself. That has been going on for some years. So Mr. Ryan comes along with the application in the name of Donald McEwan; and from that hour until now

Messrs. McLaughlin & Millar, those who have rights by priority, are hurled to the winds, and Mr. Ryan is the only man considered. Why? There is a declaration of trust set out in the evidence verbatim, produced and made an exhibit, which shows that Mr. Peter Ryan held this 6 per cent of the stock of the company that was to get the lease for Mr. A. C. Bedford-Jones, a lawyer of the city of Toronto. And there is a declaration by Mr. Bedford-Jones, who takes the 6 per cent, naming himself as trustee, and stating that he holds that 6 per cent for Frank Pedley, of the city of Ottawa—a declaration of trust not made in writing, and exposable in writing, but made by Mr. Bedford-Jones, according to his evidence under oath, and latterly admitted by Mr. Frank Pedley himself.

An hon. MEMBER: Who is Mr. Pedley?

Mr. MEIGHEN: Mr. Pedley at that time was the Deputy Superintendent-General of Indian Affairs under the Government of that day; he was the man who had the granting of these leases; he is the man who turned McLaughlin and Millar down, and took Mr. Peter Ryan, under the name of Donald McEwan, as the proper party to get the lease. Six per cent of the stock Mr. Bedford-Jones holds as trustee. These facts are brought before Mr. Frank Pedley in evidence. He is confronted with the declaration by the commissioner that he was the real owner of that 6 per cent. What does he do? He denies it under oath—never heard of it; did not know anything about it; denies it over page after page of the evidence. I can read his denial. I turn to page 15 of his evidence:

Q. Were you ever offered by Peter Ryan or any person on his behalf, or on behalf of Donald McEwan or Donald McEwan and Company, any interest in that privilege of concession?—A. No, never.

Q. And you never acquired any interest in it?—A. No, I did not.

Q. Do you know of any officer or official either in the Indian Department—I am putting it correctly, when I say Indian Department, am I not?—A. Yes.

Q. Well, do you know of any officer or official in the Indian Department who acquired any interest in it directly or indirectly either from Donald McEwan, Peter Ryan, or any person else?—A. I do not.

Q. Now, referring to these documents. I see in one of the documents to which I have just referred, dated 10th October, 1904, of which Peter Ryan of Toronto is the party of the first part and Alban C. Bedford-Jones party of the second part, Jones is set out there to be trustee. You see that, do you not?——A. Yes, I see that.

Q. I wish to know from you if you know for whom Jones was trustee?—A. I do not.

[Mr. Meighen.]

Q. Jones is on the face of that document apparently trustee for some person?—A. Yes.

Q. Now I ask you if you can help me to ascertain who that person is for whom he was trustee.—A. No, I do not know anything about it. The first time these documents came to us would be as per the date of Millar's letter, the 17th December, 1912.

Q. I see by these documents to which I am referring and in which Alban C. Bedford-Jones is trustee that he acquired from Peter Ryan as trustee six per cent of the total profits resulting from the enterprise which Ryan assigns him?—A. Yes.

Q. The enterprise referred to, as appears by this document, is the ranching enterprise on the Blood Indian Reserve granted to Donald McEwan?—A. Yes.

And later on:

Q. I put it to you that when Jones received that cheque of $1,000 from Charles Millar, he gave you, if not the entire sum, a portion of it, did he?—A. No.

Q. You say you had no interest in it at all?—A. I beg your pardon?

Q. You say you had no interest in it at all?—A. No, no interest at all.

Q. And you never received any part of that thousand dollars?—A. No.

Pretty strong evidence, pretty strong swearing by this gentleman who could look anybody in the face, even the Prime Minister of Canada. I quote further from his evidence:

Q. Then Peter Ryan was not indebted to you in any money at the time of the assignment of this 6 per cent interest to A. C. Bedford Jones?—A. Oh, no.

Q. So that that could not have been given by Ryan to A. C. Bedford-Jones in payment of any moneys which he owed to you?—A. No, it could not.

Q. Is it possible that Peter Ryan assigned this interest to you in the Blood Indian reserve to pay any moneys he owed you?—A. No.

Q. I am referring to the agreement between Peter Ryan and A. C. Bedford-Jones of the 10th October, 1904, and I show you the papers. That is the paper to which we have been referring in your examination this morning, which purports to be a copy of the agreement of the 10th of October, 1904, between Peter Ryan of the first part and A. C. Bedford-Jones, trustee, of the second part. This is the agreement to which we were referring this morning?—A. Yes.

Q. I am now saying that that was not given by Peter Ryan and could not have been given by Peter Ryan for any moneys he owed you?—A. No.

Q. Or for any indebtedness of Peter Ryan to you?—A. No.

It is apparent that no matter how often the question was repeated, he was ready with a denial of the suggestion that he ever had the slightest interest in that lease; that he ever had the slightest interest in Mr. Bedford-Jones's trusteeship; that he ever received a dollar from him; that on account of any business relations between him and Peter Ryan there could have been an assignment of that interest for him, or a declaration of that interest as held in trust for him. I quote further:

Q. Was there any dealing between you and Peter Ryan or anybody on his behalf whereby you should receive or that anybody should receive on your behalf that 6 per cent interest? —A. No, there was not.

This is important evidence, in the light of the facts which are revealed a few pages further on.

Q. Had you any understanding about any per cent of interest?—A. No.
Q. With any person?—A. No.
Q. What does Jones mean when he says he remitted you out of the moneys which Charles Millar paid him, a certain portion of that money?—A. Well, it means I did not get it, if he remitted it.

Lost in the mails.

Q. Had you any knowledge that he was making a remittance to you of any money, or that he ever did make a remittance of any such moneys?—A. No.

What turns up a little later? Mr. Bedford-Jones is again examined; Mr. Bedford-Jones produces his cheques, and then the commissioner comes back to Mr. Pedley, who, as the hon. member says, using the words of Mark Antony, is an "honourable man." Page 28:

Q. Now, you got $1,000 in money; that is to say you got $900 in 1908?—A. Yes.
Q. And Mr. Jones kept $100 for his services, which he charged against you out of the $1,000? —A. Yes.
Q. So that you practically got $1,000 of the money?—A. Yes.

Later he endeavours to make an explanation. Oh, he says, I was endorsing certain notes for Mr. Ryan, and I took this $1,000 as security that he would pay the notes. It is a form of business transaction entirely new to me—perhaps the hon. member for Edmonton has heard of it before—where a man who endorses a note for another takes the other man's cash by way of security. There is page after page of explanation here by this "honourable man" to the effect that Mr. Peter Ryan, instead of paying his debts, chose to draw upon Mr. Frank Pedley for a few hundred dollars and then pay Mr. Frank Pedley money with which he might have paid his debts. High finance! frenzied finance! but a form of finance thought of by Mr. Frank Pedley when he was giving his evidence, and not before. I quote further from his evidence:

Q. Does Peter Ryan owe you any money to-day?—A. Well, in that sense he does. I am on his paper to-day.

Q. To what extent?—A. I think it is three or four hundred dollars.
Q. If Mr. Ryan took up that four hundred dollars to-day or to-morrow, then you would not have to pay any of it?—A. If he took that up, of course, my account would be relieved to that extent.
Q. Then would Mr. Ryan be entitled to receive back the sum of $1,000?—A. As far as I am concerned, he would.

Here is Mr. Frank Pedley, an honourable man, holding the $1,000 which he says is Peter Ryan's, and holding it for fear Peter Ryan will not pay a $400 note upon which Frank Pedley is endorser. Did it ever occur to Mr. Frank Pedley that possibly $400 of Peter Ryan's money might have been remitted to Peter Ryan and that Peter Ryan could then have taken up his note and have become entitled to the other $600? I wonder why that never occurred to these great business intel-
10 p.m. lects, Mr. Peter Ryan and Mr. Frank Pedley. I will tell you why it never occurred to them: because the $1,000 was Mr. Frank Pedley's money; he got it for giving the preference to his friend, Peter Ryan. Does the hon. member for Edmonton believe anything else? He knew of this transaction. He has read the evidence; he gave some of it this afternoon.

Mr. OLIVER: I beg the hon. gentleman's pardon. I did not know of the transaction, and I did not read the evidence.

Mr. MEIGHEN: The hon. gentleman ventured to tell the House what the evidence showed; he ventured to tell the House that this $1,000 went to Mr. Ryan.

Mr. OLIVER: I told the House what Mr. Pedley told me, and I told the House that it was what Mr. Pedley told me.

Mr. MEIGHEN: What does the hon. gentleman say now when he finds what Mr. Pedley said under oath? Did Mr. Pedley tell him this after he gave his evidence?

Mr. OLIVER: On Saturday, if I remember rightly.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Of this week?

Mr. OLIVER: Yes.

Mr. MEIGHEN: That is when he was down here attending committees of Parliament in order to get campaign literature.

Mr. OLIVER: I guess he got plenty.

Mr. MEIGHEN: If he had waited a little longer, he would have got some more.

Mr. OLIVER: I think the hon. member is quite right.

Mr. MEIGHEN: These are the doings of Mr. Frank Pedley. Because he was found out and because he chased himself out of the office as soon as he was found out, the hon. member tells the House that we should not have started the commissioner on his trail; that it was not worth the money to ascertain that a man holding a responsible position as head of the Indian Department of this country, under the Minister of the Interior, was a man of the calibre and character of Mr. Frank Pedley; to ascertain that the country was well rid of his services. Is $30,000 too much for that truth alone?

But Mr. Frank Pedley's depredations did not end there. He thought of another scheme. At the time he thought of this he was not Deputy Superintendent General of Indian Affairs, but he did hold an important office in the Department of the Interior. The other man associated with him was the Deputy Superintendent General of Indian Affairs, and had to do directly with the lands concerned in this transaction.

Did anybody ever conceive of such a scheme as this? Here is Mr. J. A. Smart, Deputy Superintendent General of Indian Affairs in the Government of Canada, afterwards promoted for his efficiency, no doubt, to the office of Deputy Minister of Militia.

Here is J. A. Smart, charged with the disposition of the Indian lands of this country under the law and under the minister. He forms a partnership with Mr. Pedley, in the department, and with Mr. White, who has to do with some other branch of the service —immigration, I believe. They are the men who open the tenders in connection with the sale of Indian lands. They are the men and the only men—the public have no access or insight—they were the men who have access and insight into all data as to the value of those lands and who know the tenders that are received. They form a company, they employ the same Mr. Bedford-Jones, trustee, of the city of Toronto. First of all they do not become incorporated, they are just a body of associates, a sort of family compact. They go down to Mr. Bedford-Jones and arrange with him that, at a figure that they shall name and on receipt of their instructions, he shall put in tenders for 45,000 acres of Indian lands in the Moose mountains. And on a certain date, just as the time is up to close all tenders for Indian lands, Mr. Bedford-Jones sends a telegram to Mr. Smart: "Package received,—everything arranged for all right." I think I have that pretty close. The exact words are:

> Package received, suitable party procured, instructions understood. Complete matter tomorrow.
> A. C. Bedford-Jones.

Language intended to be mysterious, but indeed very clear to any one who has read telegrams of this kind. Afterwards Mr. Jones admits that the package received was a lot of tenders filled in by these same gentlemen in the office of the Minister of the Interior, the price at which they were to buy filled in. And then they, having hied themselves back to the city of Ottawa, open their own tenders and award the lands to themselves! Oh, says the hon. member for Edmonton, they had to be the highest bidder or they could not get it, and if they did not get it they went down the same as anybody else. They went down? They put in, I think, three or four hundred tenders, and all their tenders were accepted but eight or ten. What excellent guessers they were of the price at which they might get Indian lands!

An hon. MEMBER: Who accepted them?

Mr. MEIGHEN: Who accepted them? They accepted them themselves, they were the buyers and the sellers, they were dealing with these lands as trustees, dealing with the property over which they were trustees. These are the honourable men whose conduct in this matter to the hon. member for Edmonton is ratified by him and he declares that, having done it, they can look any man in Canada in the face. This is the man taken up by the Liberal party and sent over Canada to organize for their victory and his own victory and re-instatement in office at and after the next election. They did not confine themselves to the Indian lands of Moose mountain, they went into other lands. But in Moose mountain alone they bought some 45,000 acres of land and they paid for that land in November, 1901, $54,850. As I remember they did not pay up for quite a while after that; I think they paid it out of the sale price, putting up a little in the meantime. They bought it in November, 1901, for $54,850 and sold it in April, 1902, for $112,500. They make a profit on these lands of $57,150 in three or four months, dealing with lands for which they are trustees under the Government of Canada, dealing with them unfairly, illegally, illegitimately as against other tenderers and as against the people of this country. They pocket the money, the result and the reward of their nefarious transaction, and they get the imprimatur of the hon. member for Edmonton for doing so. There may be fraud perpetrated under this Government, there may be parties in one extremity of Canada or the other who abuse the trust imposed in them; but there has been a Government in office since the 10th day of October, 1911, who, when they find out that these frauds are perpetrated and who the perpertrators are, do not stand at the door and block, do not render immune from punishment, do not reward for their offences, but who pursue them and punish them, and where legally possible, recover the money for the people of Canada.

Mr. PROULX: When has the Government done it?

Mr. MEIGHEN: When has the Government done it? There is one unfortunate thing, I do not know whether the hon. member for Prescott will be able to fully get his mind about this, but there is one unfortunate fact that the Government of to-day legally is the successor of the Government of yesterday; that when the Government of yesterday does a certain act and it is ratified by the then minister, the Government of to-day is bound by it. But there are men who do not come within the protection of that rule, and I do not think the hon. member for Prescott will be quite so anxious to spring the subject of restitution when he comes back to Parliament—if he ever does again.

Another transaction was referred to and admitted by the hon. member for Edmonton this evening. I do not wish to delay the House by going over all these matters; other members of the House have read them also. They have been exposed to view, open to perusal for days. But there is one matter to which I wish to refer because it has been covered in the speech of the hon. member for Edmonton. In the year 1905 the hon. member was and had been many years proprietor of the Edmonton Bulletin, a newspaper published in his own city, a newspaper which, since its inception, had been the personal asset, had been the personal organ of the hon. member for Edmonton. That has been known from end to end of Canada as his own personal organ, as the particular engine of publicity by which he has effected, from time to time, his recurring elections to this House. The Edmonton Bulletin becomes incorporated in 1905. The hon. member has an interest in it and the Grand Trunk Pacific Railway Company come along and subscribe $15,000 to the Edmonton Bulletin and become stockholders to that extent. Now, what are the circumstances? Why did they do so? Is there any ground of offence, any cause of offence in that transaction? Is it something upon which the people of the country should look with favour or with frown, and why? The Grand Trunk Pacific was incorporated in 1903, incorporated for specific and definite purposes by an Act of this Parliament. I have read its charter and I am not able to find in it that a part of its purpose or a portion of its power consisted in running newspapers. I have not been able to ascertain even that it had the power, that it had the legal capability, of investing any of its funds in newspaper enterprises. But in the year 1903, they make a contract with the people of Canada, the most important, one of the most momentous and by far the most disastrous into which the people of this country ever entered; a contract by virtue of which they have extracted with regularity millions and millions from the treasury of this country. They make their contract in 1903, they secure a modification of the contract hugely to their own advantage in 1904. This they secured at the hands of the Government, of which the present leader of the Opposition was the head. They come back in the year 1905, they amend the contract again, they come back in 1906, and still important concessions are made to the Grand Trunk Pacific. Objection was taken to that contract from the first on the part of the Opposition of that day, strong objection was taken to it on the part of the distinguished leader of the Opposition of that day, but at every point at which the Opposition of that time sought to amend the contract in the interests of the people they were met with the assertion on the part of the then leader of the Government that a contract was a contract and that it was too late to change it whether to the advantage of the people of Canada or not. But it was changed. It was cast iron as against the people of Canada but it was soft and plastic as against the Grand Trunk Pacific. They came back in 1904, 1905 and 1906 and they got $5,000,000 of cash that had lain in the Treasury as security transferred and reincarnated into $5,000,000 of bonds, and they got the power to declare their parent, the Grand Trunk Railway Company, to be the owners by virtue of an advance of $5,000,000 of the whole $25,000,000 of stock of the Grand Trunk Pacific. They come back in 1906 and got concessions still again and all the while, at the request of a member of the Government of the day, they are stockholders in the personal organ of the Minister of the Interior of that Government and they are contributors to the press campaign of the Liberal party to the extent of $15,000. What does the hon. member for Edmonton say? Here is an assertion in this report that a public service corporation, in whose transactions we are all interested, alienated $15,000 of its money, which it owned and possessed by virtue of the legislation we had given it, and transferred it into the treasury of the Edmonton Bulletin. But now, the hon. gentleman says, the people of Canada have no interest in that unless you are able to prove that, because they did that, because they made that contribution, the Interior Department, or the Government of Canada, made them some concessions. I want to ask the right hon. leader of the Opposition, who sat and listened to his lieutenant from Edmonton make that assertion and pronounce that doctrine, does he subscribe to it? Will he add the imprimatur of his great name to the pronouncement of his lieutenant from Edmonton? Does he believe that it is the right and proper exercise of legitimate politics, legitimate business, legitimate statesmanship or legitimate anything else that a public service corporation, at a time when it is having huge dealings with the Government of Canada, be asked for, and do contribute, $15,000 to the organ of a minister of the Crown? He makes no answer. He has stood on the floor of Parliament in this debate and he has failed to repudiate, and to put the ban of his disapproval on, the conduct of the hon. member for Edmonton. Did he know of it all the time? Had he known during all these years that the Grand Trunk Pacific Railway Company, who exist by virtue of the legislation of this House, who have drawn every year or almost every year of their existence millions from the treasury of Canada—has he known that while they were having these dealings with the Government of the day and were more or less dependent on the Government of the day for the successful prosecution of their enterprise, were the holders of $15,000 of stock in the personal organ of a minister of the Crown? We ought to show that they got that $5,000,000 cash transferred into $5,000,000 of American bonds or other bonds, because they put $15,000 into the Edmonton Bulletin? Does the leader of the Opposition say that that burden is upon us? Does he say so, or, in effect, does he tell us that because we find a man guilty of bribing a voter, or bribing a member of Parliament, we cannot prove any offence unless we go further and show that by virtue of that bribe the voter voted in a certain way or the member of Parliament gave the person who bribed him a concession? Does he subscribe to that doctrine? He will not, even nod approval of it. He knows he cannot; but he knows that he sits beside his own lieutenant who says that that may be done by a Government that may come into power, long years from now I hope. Fifteen thousand dollars of stock in the Edmonton Bulletin was held by a company, by a public service corporation, depending in a huge degree for its successful prosecution not only as a contractor but as a railway operator upon the bounty of the Crown, and at the same time a member of the Administration of the day under obligations to that company and a stockholder with that company in a political enterprise designed to keep the hon. gentleman's party Government in power! We are asked: What is the difference whether the Grand Trunk Pacific subscribed or the other fellow; the other Liberals around the city of Edmonton also subscribed? Perhaps many of us hold stock in newspapers—worthless stock a lot of it is no doubt—but it is a very different thing for a private citizen to hold stock in a newspaper and a public service corporation dealing with the Government of the day holding that stock and doubtless utilizing that fact, and the obligation which that fact entailed, to get favours from the Crown and the Government that represented the Crown.

The leader of the Opposition says nothing at all about the propriety of that conduct. I take it that he commends it. I take it that he knew of it. I take it that he knew of lots of others of perhaps the same quality and kind, because if this Grand Trunk Pacific had to contribute $15,000 to a paper of the size and proportions of the Edmonton Bulletin, how much was it compelled to contribute to all the newspapers from end to end of the country in order that the party and the Government which made with the company that disastrous bargain should be retained in power to the advantage of the company? Will he answer that? Will he trace the Grand Trunk Pacific out and find in what other papers that company also had stock? I think the House might have expected a pronouncement on this subject from the leader of the Liberal party. I think the House and the country are entitled to a pronouncement. The leader of the Opposition has listened to this debate. He cannot argue—he did not argue—that he is not in a position to give an opinion upon it because he does not know the facts. The facts are admitted. He heard his lieutenant from Edmonton make the admission that in 1905, the year which above all others was the year in which they had the biggest grip upon the Grand Trunk Pacific, the year in which that company relied most upon the bounty of the Crown, that company had to come forward and put $15,000 into the Edmonton Bulletin. The right hon. gentleman heard the admission upon the floor of Parliament of the hon. member for Edmonton (Mr. Oliver) who was the proprietor of that organ, that such was the case without doubt, but the right hon. gentleman stood up here and he refused to repudiate such conduct and to put upon it the ban of his disapproval. I am right in assuming, and the House is right in assuming, and the country will assume, until the right hon. gentleman stands in his place and repudiates his lieutenant from Edmonton, that he believes in that system, that he intends to persevere in that system, and that if he can he will press himself into power by virtue of that system. I have occupied as much of the time of the House as I feel I am justified in doing.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Go on.

Mr. MEIGHEN: There is no subject comprised and treated of within the four corners of the Ferguson report that is not of as much importance, and that does not reveal just as astounding details as does this. But more than that; more than has been revealed within the four corners of the report, is the astounding pronouncement read from the files of the Interior Department to Parliament and to the country by the Minister of the Interior in this House to-night. What shall we hear about that? What will be the pronouncement of the leader of the Opposition on that? Can it be said that the hon. member for Edmonton made a mistake? I may say that I thought so myself when I first heard it. I do not think any member of this House was more surprised than I. If there is one man within the four corners of Canada who should have known and did know the facts, it was the head of the department who had to do with such transactions. One would expect that a farmer who got a patent for a quarter-section and who would read in his patent that the mines and minerals were reserved, would know that they were reserved, and every farmer does know it. One would have expected that the minister of the department, who himself reserved them, would also know that they were reserved. But one would certainly be doubly sure that he who was both the patentee and the minister would know that the mines and minerals were reserved. And knowing that they were reserved, and knowing that in these minerals he had no interest whatever, and knowing that he had no part or portion of proprietorship in these minerals, it is astonishing to find that the minister, who is the patentee, should affect to deal with these minerals, and did deal with them, and that he in his personal capacity, instead of as a minister of the Crown, receives a royalty month after month and year after year, and never accounts for that royalty. It is an astonishing pronouncement. I do not think there was any porch-climbing to get it; it was revealed on the face of the file. I do not know in that case who the thug was, but there it stands. It might never have been known if the hon. member had not come forward, when his Government were hurled from office, and ask for a lease of the mineral rights, but he came forward and asked for a lease in November, 1911, and that lease is there, and since November, 1911, everything is open to the face of day, and that revealed what had gone on before in Oliver's time. The minister never disclosed to the Crown, of which he had the honour to be a minister, and never disclosed to the people, of whose wealth and whose assets he was the trustee, that he was collecting and pocketing money that was not his but theirs, and to which he had no right.

I opened my remarks by saying that there was no necessity, and no attempt on our part to hurry this matter at all. It is a matter of pressing importance, and it is my desire, and I speak the wishes of hon. members on this side I am sure, that every opportunity to defend or explain be given the hon. member for St. John (Mr. Pugsley), or any other hon. gentleman opposite —and I mention the hon. member for St. John merely because I see him at times coming close to the hon. member for Edmonton, and I know of no better wrecking-tug in the Opposition than is the hon. member for St. John. It is our desire that the utmost opportunity of defence be given, and there is no purpose to the contrary. This is before Parliament, and almost this alone is before Parliament, and we on our part are prepared to stay here and discuss it, and if necessary to revive from day to day this discussion, until the fullest justice is done to all concerned.

Hon. WILLIAM PUGSLEY (St. John): I cannot fail to respond to the invitation of the Solicitor General to make a few remarks on this motion which was made by my hon. friend from Edmonton. I was not quite able to hear the description the Solicitor General gave of me, but I thought he said I was a good wrecking something.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Wrecking-tug.

An hon. MEMBER: He did not say you were a thug.

Mr. PUGSLEY: I may be able to rescue a good many things, but I do not know that I could rescue gentlemen on the other side of the House from the hole into which they have fallen this session. Whatever else I would be willing to do, I would be very sorry to undertake that job. There is something peculiar about these attacks which the Solicitor General and the Minister of the Interior have made to-night. I was particularly struck with the remark of the Minister of the Interior when he said that he was a man of peace, and a man of moderate views, and he gave the House to understand that he would not have made this attack upon the ex-Minister of the Interior if it were not for certain statements which had been made by the Liberal members of this House during the last few weeks. I suppose the Minister of the Interior was referring to the disclosures which have been made in the committee about boots, and the disclosures in the committee on public accounts about binoculars, and bandages, and drugs, and horses—

Mr. J. D. REID: And jams.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Yes, and jams. I suppose that what the Minister of the Interior means is that in consequence of the very strong remarks which have been made by members on this side of the House and by newspapers in the country, he felt constrained to make an attack on the ex-Minister of the Interior, which he would not otherwise believe it to be his duty to make. That also explains the very warm attack which has been made upon the hon. member (Mr. Oliver) by the Solicitor General. In other words, they are trying to draw a red herring across the track; they are trying to divert the minds of the people of this country from the disclosures which have been made during the last few weeks by seeking to revive not only ancient history but ancient romance. The Solicitor General and the Minister of the Interior have referred to the report made by Mr. Ferguson, and they stated that it has been brought down just as soon as it was reasonably possible to do so.

Is this quite accurate? We have the fact that for about three years—scarcely long enough to earn $40,000—Mr. Ferguson has been engaged in these investigations, and we have a right to assume that many of these reports were ready a good many months ago and that many of them might have been laid upon the table of the House at the commencement of this session of Parliament; but it looks to me as if they had been reserved for some such occasion as this—as if hon. gentlemen opposite thought that there was scandal in the air in connection with these war expenditures and that disclosures would be made which would shock the people of this country, and as if they kept this report back until the last moment, hoping to bring it down at a time when there would be scanty opportunity of answering the arguments, when many of the members of the House had gone to their homes and when many more would have so completed their arrangements to go home that it would be at very great inconvenience that they could remain here.

Speaking particularly to the charge which has been made with respect to a homestead entry granted to Mr. Cruise, the hon. member for one of the constituencies in Manitoba, there is not any ground whatever for reflection upon the action of the department, because so far as the department and the late Minister of the Interior are concerned, all the requirements of the law were complied with. The allegation is that Mr. Cruise purchased upon credit some seven cattle in order to make the number up to 20, and that, alleging that he was possessed of 20 head of cattle, he was entitled under the law to a homestead entry. It is alleged that in respect of that Mr. Cruise deceived the department; but that shows no fault or irregularity upon the part of the department; it is a charge made against Mr. Cruise. That hon. gentleman, however, went home before this report was brought down, and to him it is very unfortunate and unfair that the report should have been held to this late date. Although my hon. friend the Solicitor General says, "we are prepared to stay here and give ample time for this discussion," he knows that upwards of a month ago the Government prepared for an early prorogation, giving notice of morning sittings, taking all private days for the discussion of Government measures, and also taking Saturdays. When this is done members begin to make preparations to go home, because they feel that prorogation will take place at an early date, and many members went to their homes before this report was brought down.

I am not going at length into these matters; but I want to speak of a charge made that there was an irregularity in connection with a sale of land to Mr. Brown in the valley of the Last Mountain lake. I want to speak of this, because when I have referred to all the facts which have been brought out by Mr. Ferguson, his including this in the list of these scandals which he says he has discovered during his long period of investigation, and it being one of the most important things which he was able to discover, when hon. gentlemen see the triviality of it and see how groundless is the charge which he makes, they will realize that there is very little in these allegations after all; because ordinarily in the case of an investigation of this character, particularly an ex-parte investigation as these were to a large extent, from one you can very well judge all. When you find that the commissioner has been straining at an effort to discover some one guilty in connection with this matter you can well believe that there is a distorted report in other matters. What are the facts in reference to this matter? To begin with, the quantity of land bought by Mr. Brown was not 1,000 acres, as I understood the Minister of the Interior to say, but only something like 500 acres.

Mr. ROCHE: I stated 530 odd acres at $1 an acre, and the balance making up 1,000 acres on which he placed half-breed scrip.

Mr. PUGSLEY: I think my hon. friend is wrong as to the difference between 530 acres and the 1,000; I think. Mr. Brown was the owner of that land a considerable time before he bought the 530 acres. It will appear in the report of Mr. Ferguson that Mr. Brown was a very large farmer and rancher, owing 170 head of cattle, a large number of horses, and cultivating a large area of land, being one of the largest farmers in that section of the country. He had bought a very considerable amount of land from The Canada Northwest Land Company that had purchased, as my hon. friend knows, from the Canadian Pacific Railway Company, the original grantee of the Crown; he had bought from people who had obtained patents and altogether he was the owner of about 2,000 acres of land, a part of which was in the valley known as the outlet of the Last Mountain lake. A considerable portion of the land was on a hillside, and a large area of some 400 acres upon the level land at the top of the valley. He was using all this land together as being a part of his farm. Among the other pieces of land which he had bought, he had acquired out of section 5 in the valley at the foot of the Last Mountain lake 122 acres or thereabouts, which was the only portion of the section which had been surveyed for settlement or sale. When the land was surveyed, it was found that upwards of 500 acres of section 5 was covered by the waters of Last Mountain lake, and so worthless did it appear to the surveyors that they did not survey it, and they reported it to the department as land covered by water. When the Canadian Pacific Railway Company took their grant within the 20-mile belt, they refused to take any part of section 5 except the 122 acres by reason of the fact that the remainder was covered with water. When the survey was made, the valley of Last Mountain lake was usually pretty well covered with water for a long period in the summer. I know the country very well because I was there in 1883, and at that time the foot of Last Mountain lake was somewhere about four or five miles further to the south and east than it afterwards came. The water of the Last Mountain lake dried up to a certain extent and receded, as was the case with many other lakes in our northwestern country. The result of that was that after a few years, a portion of the remainder of this section 5 became so dry that a quantity of hay could be cut over a considerable part of it in some years; but there was always the danger of recurring floods, and the land was regarded as being of comparatively little value. There was a rule in the West, as it is the rule generally in all of the provinces of Canada, that where a man owns land fronting upon a lake or river, the Government will not grant what is called the fore-shore of the lake or river to any one but the riparian owner. That land was left there; and when Mr. Brown as the riparian owner of these 122 acres applied for the land, it was recognized that he was the proper person to whom the title should be given, if he were willing to pay the ordinary price for land of that quality. After considerable inquiry the value of the land was fixed at $1 an acre, and at that price the land was sold to Mr. Brown. It will be found by the report that negotiations for the purchase were entered upon in 1900. This land formed a part of a very large farm, about two thousand acres, upon which Mr. Brown carried on large farming and ranching operations, on account of which it was desirable for him to get all the hay he could in the valley of the Last Mountain lake. As I have said, the Last Mountain lake had dried up to a considerable extent, and for a good many years all that section of country in the vicinity of the Last Mountain lake, especially the land to the West, was regarded as a dry section in which farming could not be carried on successfully. The railway, the Qu'Appelle, Long Lake and Saskatchewan, was built from Regina to Prince Albert, going into the valley of the Last Mountain lake, northwards to the west of the lake. And though that road was completed—and I was connected with that road—from 1890 down to 1900, there was no travel to speak of over the road, and it scarcely paid its running expenses. It did not pay interest on its debentures nor anything to shareholders, but barely paid expenses, though it was operated by the Canadian Pacific Railway, and operated as well as any good railway company could operate it. All that district lay stagnant. There were a few enterprising people like Mr. Brown, who engaged in general farming and ranching. They were excellent farmers and ranchmen, and they stayed on in the country in spite of the discouragements which drove many people away. It was not until 1900 that there began to be any development in that section of country. I venture to say that at the time when Mr. Brown bought that land, a considerable portion of which had been previously covered with water—dry in some seasons, but in others covered with water—one dollar an acre was the full value of the land. But what does Mr. Ferguson say with reference to the value? Does he say that this is too little to pay? Not at all; he makes no such charge, although from the argument of the Minister of the Interior (Mr. Roche), one would think, if he had not read the report, that the land for which Mr. Brown had paid $1 an acre had been found by the commissioner to be worth much more. At page 162 of this part of the report, he says:

> Whether or not these lands in question were valueless—

Not pretending to know from the evidence whether they were valuable or not.

> —I wish to say that in my opinion the disposal of public lands without full knowledge is an unbusinesslike proceeding which ought not to be permitted.

That is the gravamen of the charge—that, even though this land may not have been worth more than one dollar an acre, even though the price obtained by the department may have been a good one, an improper course was pursued because it was sold without inspection.

Mr. MEIGHEN: Where does the hon. gentleman find those words—that the price received by the department was a good one?

Mr. PUGSLEY: No; he says:

> Whether or not these lands in question were valueless, I wish to say that in my opinion the disposal of public lands without full knowledge of their value is an unbusinesslike proceeding and ought not to be permitted.

I say that is not a finding on the part of Mr. Ferguson that those lands were sold below their value, it is an admission that they may not have been worth more than a dollar an acre. But it says that they ought not to have been sold without a thorough examination so that the department would know their value. Was there not an examination? When the lands were surveyed, the surveyors would go upon every section, and they would make a report stating whether the land was stony or free from stone; the slope of the land, whether towards the north or in any other direction; the nature of the soil, whether clay, loam or gravelly, and also whether any part of the land was covered by water. And in the files of the department, available every day to the officials, there would be found the report of these surveyors who made a careful examination of this land stating that only 122 acres was such that the Canadian Pacific Railway could fairly be called upon to take it, the rest being covered with water. Surely that was a report upon which the officials of the department could act; and when they were offered $1 an acre they were getting, as they thought, a fair and reasonable price for the land. As the hon. member for Edmonton has stated, at that time the very best land in the province of Saskatchewan was being sold at from $1 to $2.50 an acre. The railway company to which I have referred sold their entire land grant, in respect of the first twenty miles of their railway, for $1 an acre and were glad to get it. Before 1902 the "American invasion" had begun. These experienced farmers had begun to come into that dry section of country. Having had the soil analysed and having knowledge of a process of farming in semi-dry countries which had then come into vogue, they were satisfied that the land in that country could be cultivated to advantage. As late as 1902, after so many thousands of Americans had come in and shown the capabilities of that country, the very best land, the pick of the land of that whole portion of central Saskatchewan, was under option to my knowledge for a period of three months at $1.50 an acre, and nobody could be got to take up that option or invest in the land. That is the very pick of the whole country which is now the garden of Saskatchewan. The fact that in the years from 1902 to 1910 land kept jumping up in value, rising at the rate of $2 an acre a year, does not prove that a way back before 1902 that land bought by Mr. Brown had any greater value than $1 an acre.

What happened later which caused the Government to expropriate? Both sides of the Last Mountain lake were rapidly settled by good settlers. One or more steamers having been placed upon the lake, it became necessary—because the water in the lake had fallen to a depth of five or six feet, making it too shallow for the steamers—to undertake a plan to place a dam across the creek which runs out of the lake, and so to hold back the waters and raise the level of the lake for the accommodation of the steamers and to permit the navigation of the lake. This is a lake of about 60 miles in length, and its navigation is desirable in the interests of the settlers. Besides, Last Mountain lake, being a large area of water, was calculated to become a great summer resort for the city of Regina —in fact, it has become such a resort. That is in a country where great lakes and rivers are comparatively scarce. Undertaking, as we did, the project of increasing and improving the navigation of Last Mountain lake, it became necessary to dam the creek, and in flooding back the waters of the lake we flooded the land owned by Mr. Brown and others at the foot of the Lake. So it became necessary either to pay damages and let Mr. Brown retain his land, or to expropriate the land and cause the Crown to become the owner. If I remember rightly—my hon. friend the Minister of the Interior will tell me if I am wrong—something like 1,200 acres of land owned by Mr. Brown were expropriated. Am I right in that?

Mr. ROCHE: That is approximately correct.

Mr. PUGSLEY: So that there would be 700 acres of land in addition to the 500 which had been bought some years before from the department at $1 per acre. I was Minister of Public Works at the time this expropriation took place, and I thought that it would be very much better to expropriate the land and secure an entire title to it than simply to pay damages and allow Mr. Brown to continue in ownership. In this way, the Crown could better go on with the improvements. We did expropriate the land, and it will be remembered that we took not only that land owned by Mr. Brown which at certain times, even before the dam was built, was flooded with water, but also the dry land, the best part of his farm; we took both good land and bad. The Exchequer Court valued the whole 1,200 acres at this price of $25 an acre, so that while he was getting an average price of $25 an acre a good deal of the land of which he had been the owner before he bought the land from the Crown was worth perhaps three times as much as the land which at certain seasons was covered with water. More than that, the expropriation of the land meant the breaking up of Mr. Brown's ranch and farming enterprise, because the taking away of 1,200 acres of his land would necessitate his farming elsewhere. Unless, therefore, one knows all these facts, one can hardly say either that the judge of the Exchequer Court allowed too much, or that Mr. Brown paid too little some years before for that portion of the expropriated land which had been covered with water. It has been stated —and no one ought to know this better than my hon. friend the Minister of the Interior —that land which in 1900 and in 1902 was not worth more than $1.50 or $2.50 an acre, even before 1907 had risen to $15, $20, $25 and, in some cases, even $40 an acre. A great advance in the price of land took place, because the people had begun to come in. No matter how good the land is, there will be no increase in value until there is an increase in population, because it is population that makes a demand for and increases the value of the land.

I should like to say just a word in reference to the Edmonton Bulletin. The con missioner, Mr. Ferguson, the Minister of the Interior, and the Solicitor General went far afield to make a charge against the Minister of the Interior when they dwelt at length upon the fact that in 1905 the Grand Trunk Pacific Railway Company took stock in the Edmonton Bulletin. One would think, to hear these gentlemen talk, that this is the first great railway company that ever took stock in a newspaper. I remember when the late Peter Mitchell, formerly a member of this House and one of the most honourable gentlemen in this country—a gentleman who, as my hon. friend the Minister of Marine and Fisheries knows, stood very high in the estimation of the people of New Brunswick and who occupied a very influential position in the government of the country—was editor of the Montreal Herald. The Montreal Herald was supposed to be owned by one of the railway companies of Canada, a company which has during all the years of its corporate existence, had to do with the different governments of the day. All railway companies, as hon. gentlemen know, have business to do with the different governments of the day. All railway companies, as hon. gentlemen know, have business with the Government and with Parliament. But no one ever suspected for one single moment that Mr. Mitchell was thereby influenced or induced to show any favouritism towards that railway. I happen to know that in New Brunswick not long ago a railway company took stock in a newspaper. The fact became public; no doubt the same thing has been done privately on many occasions. So far as I am concerned, I never supposed that that circumstance would influence the proprietor of the newspaper in the way of extending any favouritism to the railway. What was the condition at the time the Grand Trunk Pacific Railway Company took this stock? The contract had been entered into in 1903, and the amending contract in 1904. So far as those interested in the newspaper might assume, the contractual relations between the Grand Trunk Pacific Railway Company and the Government of Canada were fixed and settled. It might have been different if at the time that the company were before the Government in connection with entering into the contract, they went to the proprietor of any paper who was a member of Parliament or a member of the Government and made a suggestion as to what they would do if their project were supported. But in this case nothing of that kind occurred; everything was settled. One can very well understand that the Grand Trunk Pacific Railway Company would take stock in the Edmonton Bulletin without the slightest idea that that would cause them to be entitled to any favour from the member for Edmonton.

Mr. SAM. SHARPE: The contract was modified in 1906.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Yes, but the modification was of the very slightest character; it was one which was not in contemplation in 1905. Hon. gentlemen may ask, as the Minister of the Interior did ask, why the Grand Trunk Pacific Railway Company took stock in the Edmonton Bulletin. The Grand Trunk Pacific Railway Company was interested more than any other company in the development of the northern country, and in the development of the city of Edmonton. Is it not a well-known fact that real estate men establish newspapers at their own expense for the purpose of advertising the country in which they are interested? The more rapidly Edmonton was built up and the more widely its resources became known—and they could not be made known in a better way than through the medium of a strong, energetic newspaper published in the city—the better it would be for the Grand Trunk Pacific Railway Company. One can well understand that the enterprising manager of that company would be well disposed to encourage the existence and the successful carrying on of a newspaper in a city in which they were so deeply interested. If hon. gentlemen want to be suspicious, of course they can conjure up some sinister motive on the part of the Grand Trunk Pacific Railway Company, but I think it cannot be said either that the Grand Trunk Pacific Railway Company intended to influence the hon. member for Edmonton or that there is the slightest ground for suspicion that the hon. member for Edmonton ever was influenced by the fact of their having taken stock in the Edmonton Bulletin.

11 p.m.

The hon. Solicitor General says that as a matter of fact the Grand Trunk Pacific Railway Company did get favours from the late Government. I venture to say that there never was an instance in which the Government drove so hard a bargain with a railway company as it made with the Grand Trunk Pacific Railway Company at that time. How different it was from the contract made by the Conservative Government with the Canadian Pacific Railway!

Hon. gentlemen know what concessions were made, I will not go into them; but with the Grand Trunk Pacific there was not an acre of land given, not an acre of land which they could sell to settlers, not an acre of land which they could divide up into city, town or village lots, not one. In that respect they were treated in a manner wholly different from that in which the Canadian Pacific railway were treated. They were compelled to pay, by way of rental, interest on the entire cost of the road after the expiration of seven years from the time of construction. I say that was a hard bargain which the Government made with the Grand Trunk Pacific Company; and never afterwards did they show any disposition to treat that company in any very lenient manner, simply doing justice to them, holding them to their bargain. Again, my hon. friend says: Why they came later on and they got $5,000,000 which they had deposited with the Government, in exchange for bonds of an American railway company. Now that is a specious statement for the Solicitor General to make—if you are to allow your imagination to lead you into drawing conclusions from a statement which really contains nothing. The Solicitor General does not say that these securities were worthless; he does not say that they were not interest-bearing securities; he does not say that they were not worth par; he does not say that they were not just as good as gold, or as bank notes; and yet, without giving you or this House the slightest information as to the value of those securities, he would rather lead you to believe that some great favour was given to the company because an exchange was made. Take the insurance companies doing business in Canada, they are required to put up security but they are not compelled to put up gold; they are allowed to put up securities in the way of bonds, Canadian, American or British, so long as they have a market value equal to the amount of the security which they are required to give.

Now, with regard to the Alberta Land Company. I must confess that I am not able to follow the commissioner or the Minister of the Interior in the suggestion that the department was guilty of wrong-doing in connection with the Alberta Land Company. The fact is that that company, according to his own admission, have expended $6,000,000 upon the enterprise in which they are engaged; and that very soon they will have that undertaking completed and will have so completed an enterprise which both Governments recognize will be of an enormous importance to the country. Then what is there to complain of? My hon. friend in some portions of his speech says that concessions were given to a company that did not put up any money; but he complains of the concession to that company because they have put up the enormous sum of $6,000,000 and have carried out their undertaking almost to a succesful conclusion, and he says that because of the hard times, because of their not being able to go on with their own means and complete the undertaking this Government have returned to them the sum of $150,000 in order to encourage them to complete this most worthy, most meritorious enterprise. That is the effect of what my hon. friend says. I would like to know, under those circumstances, what there is to complain of so far as the action of the department is concerned.

It seems to me to be another evidence of the fact that this Mr. Ferguson felt he had to earn his $40,000 in some way or other and that, if he could not find any good ground on which to condemn the late Administration, he must report upon matters in regard to which there was very little to complain of, hoping, I suppose, that the Minister of the Interior and those associated with him would take the bulk of his report in lieu of the quality and by reason of the many thousands of pages which he could obtain they would be satisfied, would never take the trouble to read it through and would pay him accordingly. A reference has been made to a lease of grazing lands in connection with the Blood Indian reserve. This House should always bear in mind that there is no allegation that the association of individuals who got that grazing lease did not pay all that the land was worth. There is no suggestion of that kind, there is no suggestion that it was leased by the department to them for one dollar less than it was fairly worth. The whole allegation is that the department turned down a gentleman, whose name I have forgotten for the moment, and gave the lease to a Mr. McEwan. They say that Mr. McEwan represented a gentleman in Toronto, Mr. Peter Ryan, whom I have always heard spoken of as a very worthy gentleman indeed.

Mr. SAM. SHARPE: Pretty tricky.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Have he and the hon. gentleman ever hunted together?

Mr. SAM. SHARPE: He was an auctioneer.

Mr. PUGSLEY: I have known some very respectable auctioneers. He occupies the very responsible position of registrar of deeds in Toronto. I have always understood that he is a gentleman of high character and he has been registrar for something like 25 years occupying the position under both Governments and it remains yet for somebody to make a charge that he has ever failed to perform his duties in a manner entirely satisfactory to the public. It is said that Mr. Ryan gave a one-sixth interest in this grazing lease to a Mr. Jones, and that Mr. Jones held it in trust for Mr. Pedley. That may be so or it may not; but this must be borne in mind, that the commissioner, Mr. Ferguson, as I remember reading the report—I do not confess to have been able to read it very carefully as I did not see it until this afternoon—but as I remember from my cursory reading, the commissioner does not say that he has any evidence which would show that up to the time of granting the lease to Mr. McEwan there was anything irregular or that the matter was carried on except in a straightforward way—not the slightest evidence which would justify him finding that and he does not find it. This is a fact which will not be disputed that, according to Mr. Ryan's evidence, Mr. Pedley had of late years been assisting him a good deal financially. Mr. Pedley had been endorsing his notes, he had been accepting his drafts and, as I remember his evidence, he said that years ago when Mr. Pedley was poor and he was better off he used to assist Mr. Pedley, but in later years the obligations had been entirely the other way, Mr. Pedley had been assisting him. And I would judge from the evidence that Mr. Ryan, having got this grazing lease, thought that he would put one-sixth of it in the hands of Mr. Jones as security for the meeting of his obligations to Mr. Pedley. That does not appear to have been communicated to Mr. Pedley at the time. The commissioner does not intimate anything of the kind and it is not entirely unreasonable that Mr. Ryan had done it in that way. At all events, we must be fair to a gentleman who has been charged with wrong-doing and, in the absence of evidence, we have a right to assume that he was innocent of any wrong-doing.

That appears to be the transaction. Later on, when the property was sold, Mr. Jones, who had had transactions also with Mr. Pedley, sent him the sum of $900. Mr. Pedley thought apparently that that was a return of moneys which Mr. Jones was owing to him in connection with other transactions. Afterwards they got together and both agreed that this would be the proceeds of the sale of this one-sixth interest. Mr. Pedley swears that when these obligations of Mr. Ryan, in connection with these notes and drafts, are taken up this money will all belong to Mr. Ryan. This is not a very important matter, but it does not appear that Mr. Pedley had any knowledge whatever that Mr. Ryan was holding this one-sixth share until long after Mr. Pedley could be of any further assistance as far as the lessee was concerned.

There are some other matters referred to with which I do not intend to take up the time of the House. But before passing away from this subject I want to say that Mr. Pedley's conduct came to the knowledge of Mr. Sifton who was then Minister of the Interior. Are hon. gentlemen going to declare before this House that they are of the opinion that Mr. Sifton would allow dishonesty in his department? I have heard pretty nearly every hon. gentleman here praise up Mr. Sifton to the skies.

Mr. HAZEN: No, not always.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Not always, but of late years. I have seen the most eulogistic statements made in the newspapers of the Conservative party in regard to Mr. Sifton, and Mr. Sifton is a gentleman whom hon. gentlemen were apparently proud to follow in the fall of 1911. I know Mr. Sifton. I know him to be an honourable man, and when this was brought to his attention by a gentleman who had been a competitor for this lease, I do not believe that Mr. Sifton would so fail in his duty as to allow it to go uninvestigated at the time. I believe he did look into it and came to the conclusion that there was no wrong-doing on the part of Mr. Pedley. He continued Mr. Pedley in the responsible position which he was then occupying in the department.

I pass over this and come to a matter which perhaps might better be left to the hon. member for Edmonton (Mr. Oliver) himself to answer. I would leave it to him of course, with full confidence that he would be able to answer to the satisfaction of this House. But my hon. friend is suffering from a cold, and he might not want to go into these matters to-night. Hon. gentlemen know how much affected his throat is. I would feel it my duty just to make a reference to it in view of the statements which have been made by the Minister of the Interior and in view of the letter which he read to this House. What is the allegation there? It is that a Mr. Fahrni had purchased some 3,000 acres of land in the Michel Indian reserve in 1906, that after that gentleman had made his first payment of something like $5,000 for the land he had not been able to pay any more. Apparently he was not able to get people to put their capital into it because he was not able to raise any more money and he was in danger of losing the property. The suggestion of the minister is that the department at Ottawa, from some sinister motive, notified Mr. Fahrni that they would cancel the agreement for the sale of the property, forfeit the money which had been paid and resume ownership and possession of the property. Then it is stated that subsequently, by reason of Mr. Anderson, who was a son-in-law of Mr. Oliver, interesting himself in the matter and desiring to make the purchase, the fact that the department had cancelled the sale might be taken as evidence that they were bringing pressure for an illegal purpose upon Mr. Fahrni so as to enable Mr. Anderson to obtain the property at a very much less amount than its fair value. I think I have stated fairly what is the suggestion of the offence as made by the Minister of the Interior. If that were the design one would think the Department of the Interior would have continued in existence the cancellation of the agreement for sale until Mr. Anderson had consummated the deal and made the purchase. All the evidence is right to the contrary. The evidence is that the department rescinded the order of cancellation and rescinded it before Mr. Anderson had made the purchase. It appears from the letter which the hon. Minister of the Interior had read that when Mr. Fahrni sold to Mr. Anderson he had the notice from the department that the order of cancellation had been rescinded. Therefore, he was quite free to hold his land knowing that the department would wait on him for his next payment. Let me read the letter:

> I need not go into all the details as, as I have already stated, you are without doubt familiar with same, but the letter which was written by your department, notifying my father of cancellation for the sale of land had the desired effect on my father, and after receiving same he was prepared to do anything, in order to save whatever possible of the money which he had paid down.
> Just at this stage, your son-in-law's enquiries came to hand, and naturally we were ready to clutch at anything which would be of advantage to us, and we were prepared to sell at a sacrifice if necessary, provided we could give title. As soon as the question of our ability to give title arose, along came the notice from your department, dated June 7th 1910, in which you re-instate our contracts; thus making it possible for us to put a legitimate deal through and your son-in-law, through fraud and mis-representation with the connivance of the Department of Interior, succeeded in obtaining the lands at about one quarter of their real value.

What does that show? It shows that after Mr. Fahrni had got notice from the department that the agreement was cancelled by reason of his failure to pay, Mr. Anderson got into communication with him and he said that he could not deal with Mr. Anderson, but that fortunately there came notice from the department that the order of cancellation had been rescinded. He does not pretend that he had come to any agreement with Mr. Anderson before that. He certainly had made no sale to him before that, but the fact of his getting notice from the department left him free to make an agreement with Mr. Anderson, and it placed him in a position in which he could give title. Is not that an extraordinary thing if the department were desiring to force Mr. Fahrni to sell his property at a sacrifice? Is it not remarkable that if through the desire of the department, before any binding agreement had been made, or any agreement at all had been made, between Mr. Fahrni and Mr. Anderson, they should rescind the order of cancellation and so in effect notify Mr. Fahrni that there was no necessity for him to sacrifice the property, but that the department would wait upon him for the payment which was then due.

I do not know what the property was worth. One complaint of the Minister of the Interior seems to be that a great injustice has been done because the $5,000 that Mr. Fahrni had paid had not been forfeited and gone into the Treasury of this country. The Minister of the Interior talks about these different transactions in which he says great losses occurred, but let me tell him that if he puts all these together they would not in the whole amount to the value of that land at Prince Albert which was sold to Mr. Donaldson by the Department of the Interior after this Government came into office, for the magnificent sum of ten dollars. All put together would not amount to what was taken out of the Treasury of this country in that one land transaction, and yet the Minister of the Interior bemoans the fact that some $5,000 which

Mr. Fahrni had paid to the Government was not forfeited, but that Mr. Fahrni was allowed to get his $5,000 back.

There is another remarkable fact about this letter, and one which is worthy the attention of members of this House. This is a copy of a letter which was sent, not to the Minister of the Interior, but to Mr. Frank Oliver, M.P., and a copy of it evidently has been sent to the Minister of the Interior, in order that it might be used in this House on this motion. This precious letter is dated Gladstone, March 9, 1915, and I shall quote one statement from it:

> It appears most conclusive to me that we have been defrauded out of some $50,000, which I have no doubt can be obtained by carrying the matter to a civil court, and it further seems to me that a perpetrator of a crime of this kind would also be criminally liable. What I ask and what I must insist on having is some restitution of this damage, and unless the same is made immediately all the documents shall be handed over to my solicitor for his attention.

When I used to be practising law, the writer of a letter like that was called a blackmailer, and I have always understood that a gentleman who accepts a copy of a letter like that and endeavours to use it for the purpose of intimidating the person to whom it is addressed, becomes associated in that attempt at blackmail.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Oh!

Mr. PUGSLEY: I have always understood that to be the law. Let me read that portion of the letter again:

> It appears most conclusive to me that we have been defrauded out of some $50,000, which I have no doubt can be obtained by carrying the matter to a civil court, and it further seems to me that a perpetrator of a crime of this kind would also be criminally liable. What I ask and what I must insist on having is some restitution of this damage, and unless the same is made immediately all the documents shall be handed over to my solicitor for his attention.

And I suppose his solicitor has been handed a copy of this letter as well as all the documents, and the solicitor has handed them over to the Minister of the Interior. I do not know anything about what the writer of this letter states, but I am inclined to think that some degree of credit will have to be given to my hon. friend, that he has resisted this attempt at blackmail, and that he has in effect said to this man: If you have any claim against me, either civil or criminal, go ahead and take the matter into the courts whether you wish to resort to civil or criminal proceedings; you have no claim against me, no shadow of conspiracy can be substantiated against me, I will not be compelled by your threats to accede to your demands, go and do your worst. That is in effect what my hon. friend from Edmonton has said. And because evidence of wrong-doing has been made apparent to my hon. friend from Edmonton, as it has been made apparent to the people of this country, and because frauds have been committed in the purchase of war supplies, my hon. friend felt it his duty to denounce the wrong-doing, it has remained for the Minister of the Interior to lend himself to the efforts of this blackmailer who attempts to asperse the character of the hon. member for Edmonton.

Mr. R. B. BENNETT (Calgary): Mr. Speaker, at this very late hour I do not propose to trespass for any considerable time upon the patience of the House. It has been my privilege to be intimately acquainted with the hon. member for Edmonton (Mr. Oliver) ever since I went to western Canada, now some seventeen years ago, and I say in all sincerity that because of my relations with him, which were always friendly, I hesitate to discuss this report in the sense in which I otherwise would. It is not always pleasing to find that a public man in whom you have placed confidence is not worthy of the confidence you have reposed in him. It is not always pleasing to find that a public man whom you believed to be a man of integrity and probity is the opposite. It is not always pleasing to believe that those who have been charged with the administration of departments of the Government, have been unworthy of the confidence that has been placed in them and have been derelict to their duty. And, Sir, for those reasons, more in sorrow than in anger, I direct attention for a few moments to-night to the report which has been laid on the table of the House. I cannot but conceive this to be the end of the public career of the hon. member for Edmonton, as it should be the end of the public carrer of the hon. member for Assiniboia (Mr. Turriff).

I should like to say to this House as one coming from western Canada, that those who live in eastern Canada have very little understanding of what has taken place in that country during the past fifteen or sixteen years. There are very few public men in eastern Canada who have taken the trouble to study the conditions under which we have lived; the conditions under which we were permitted to exist by the Government led by the right hon. the leader of the Opposition. During the fifteen years that Government was in power, what did they do? They were not content with taking the fishes in the lakes and granting fishing monopolies to their friends, but they took the waters in the streams which give life to the parched and arid lands of the plains and they handed these waters out to their friends to monopolize and to prevent their use by the poor. Not only this, but the timber and the trees of the forest they handed out to favourites, and to-day honest men in the Senate, whom we heard referred to the other day, are timber licensees throughout western Canada. Does my hon. friend say that if you cannot find the name of Tom Davis among these licensees you will not find the name of some other equally reprehensible senator? If you cannot find the name of a senator who has a timber lease or a water-power, you will find the name of one who has a lease of coal lands, which by some method he wrung out of the reluctant Minister of the Interior of that day. And, not content with exhausting the fish and the waters, and the timber and the coal, they had a scheme for getting the other mineral resources under the surface of the earth. The coal lands were gone, and when they were gone they issued grazing leases to their friends, their brothers-in-law, their uncles-in-law, their sons-in-law, and every other relation they could possibly conceive of. When you cannot get a son-in-law, you get some one else who will answer just as well and when you cannot get a brother or a cousin or an aunt, you get some one related in some way or other, and you hand him or her part of the public domain. During the fifteen years from 1896 to 1911 everything that could be done to alienate the public resources of Canada by conspiracy on the part of the hon. gentlemen who then were administering the country and their friends, was done. There is not time to-night to go into all the details, because it would take hours to do it; but I live in the province of Alberta, and I saw men with nothing, grow suddenly rich at the expense of the public. I saw the land of this country being alienated—graft is the proper word to describe the situation—by men whose corrupt ideas degenerated and degraded the public life of the country; and when an election came around, we found them acting as the camp-followers of the then Minister of the Interior. They were the porch-climbers and the thugs to whom he referred; they were the men who in 1905 and 1913 robbed and opened the ballot boxes of Alberta; they were the men who interfered with the sanctity of the ballot, and who did not permit the people of the province to express their will at the polls. I presume my hon. friend referred to them this afternoon when he spoke of porch-climbers and thugs, for they were the porch-climbers and thugs, and I engaged the time of a detective agency for two years until I traced to its source the opening and robbing of the ballot boxes by these men. I suffered from their work, because I was chosen by the electorate of the city of Calgary, and the ballots of the constituency were opened and the ballots abstracted and I was counted out. But one would think that it would be sufficient that all these things should have happened, but it was not. Lo, the poor Indians they must suffer! The wards of the nation! The aborigines of Canada! The men whose rights they were sworn to protect were the victims of the conspiracy of a Turriff, a Pedley and a White. If anything has ever in the annals of Parliament been placed upon the table of this House calculated to bring the blush of shame to the face of any Canadian, it is the revelation contained in the evidence that is here to-night.

Mr. TURRIFF: I would like to correct my hon. friend; I was never connected in any shape, form or manner, directly or indirectly, with the Indian Department.

Mr. BENNETT: The hon. gentleman who has just spoken is quite correct as to not being associated with Mr. Smart and Mr. Pedley and Mr. White. He chose his brother-in-law, Mr. Adamson, as his associate.

As if that were not sufficient, my hon. friends opposite had to proceed to corrupt public opinion. One would think, Sir, that after having exhausted every known means by which to exploit the public domain to the limit, the fishes in the sea, the heavens above the earth, and the water under it, my hon. friends opposite would have been content. No, public opinion must be corrupted with a subsidized press. The hon. member for Edmonton, in his own person, stood here to-day, as the proprietor nominally and as the editor in fact, of a Grit journal that existed by the money of a great transportation and public service company for the purpose of corrupting public opinion. These are the indictments which this report makes against these gentlemen—conspiracy, fraud, dereliction of duty, breach of trust, and, above all, a deliberate attempt and intent to destroy and corrupt public opinion. What, Sir, happened in Alberta? At the very time that the hon. gentleman from Edmonton was negotiating a little deal with Mr. Frank Scott of the Grand Trunk Pacific, at the very moment that he was inducing him by honeyed words to put $15,000 into his great journal, that great fireside journal, his henchmen had charge of the campaign in which the ballot boxes were robbed. If any man is curious to-night to know in what manner public opinion was dealt with during those days, let him go to the Parliamentary Library and read the Edmonton Bulletin of those days. Ah, Sir, I am a personal sufferer; I have been the victim of the $15,000 filched from this public service company; I have been the subject of the attacks of these hired assassins; I know whereof I speak, and I speak feelingly. The people of the province in which I live suspected that these men had not suddenly grown so wealthy that they had thousands of dollars to cast about the streets in maintaining this gang of camp followers who went to the polls throughout the province; we did not believe that they had suddenly found the wealth in the soil and dug it out and spread it around in this way; but little did the confiding electorate of Alberta believe that the great stalwart, sturdy, determined, outspoken, grimly honest man, as he said, had sold for $15,000 the independence of the press. What will they say when they find that these attacks that have been made upon the public men in the province in which I live, who do not see eye to eye with some hon. gentlemen opposite, were being paid for by a great railway company? When the hon. gentleman the other day in such measured tones deprecated the passing of the legislation that we were about to pass dealing with the Grand Trunk Pacific, when he expressed the great fear that he did that vested interests would be interfered with, that the credit of the Grand Trunk Pacific might be affected, little did we think that $15,000 of the money of that very company was speaking.

Ah, Sir, it is indeed a sad spectacle. A long career of great usefulness to his friends and himself is about ended. I have stood as chairman of a great public gathering and introduced on a Dominion Day my hon. friend the member for Edmonton as a citizen of whom we might well be proud; I have pointed out those sterling qualities that have made for him a great place in the state; I have pointed out those qualities of heart and mind that he had from the day when he crossed from Winnipeg to Edmonton until he sat here as a minister of the Crown, little dreaming that such a report as this would indicate how little warranted was my confidence in him. I speak the thoughts of the many thousands of the province of Alberta who to-morrow morning will read my words; when they understand that this their one time idol has feet of clay, when they find that those feet of clay are firmly embedded around about the Bonaventure station in Montreal; and when they realize just exactly what his obligation and duty are to the Grand Trunk, they will say: "Our idol has fallen." It was only fitting that the right hon. gentleman who leads the Opposition should have entertained the same opinion, for to-night he deserted his one-time colleague and friend. Ah, well, my hon. friend from Edmonton after all was the heir to some of these things about which we have spoken to-day, and he did not create—nay, he only had to carry out. When one contemplates that, one might think that he would say with Wolsey:

> "Had I but served my God with half the zeal
> I served my King, he would not in mine age,
> Have left me naked to my enemies."

If he were not so disposed to think in the words of Shakespeare, he might have thought in the words of the Psalmist:

> "If it were an enemy that had done me this dishonour, I could have borne it; but it was thou, even thou, my own familiar friend. We took sweet counsel together."

Deserted in the house of his friends, flung to the dogs, forgotten, remembered no more. The right hon. gentleman who led the Government for fifteen years, and had him as his colleague for six, speaks no word of commendation, no word of defence, no word of recognition of the sterling qualities that endeared him so to the people of the West. Gone, forgotten, remembered no more! Peace be with him! And so he passes from the public life of Canada, forgotten, I take it, for his leader has forgotten him, remembered no more except for the wrong he has done and the legacy of evil he has left with us.

And now whom do we pass on to? We pass on to the hon. member for Assiniboia (Mr. Turriff). And who, contemplating that noble form in our public life, can fail to feel the force of the observations he made touching the public service of Canada? Who can fail to remember his observations touching the British preference and other matters? Think of the way in which he discharged his duties as land commissioner, and his noble thoughts for all those friends of his who are remembered now not as common men, but as huge colossi, I suppose, who look down upon us poor common mortals. Millionaires! some are knights, and some are about to pass out into dark night forever. Let us deal with him. Why, when first I came into this House and ventured to raise my voice here, the first words I heard snarled across the House, were "C.P.R." Think of the hardihood of the man capable of doing that. And he talked about "unholy hands" the other evening, and called upon high Heaven to be witness to his honesty, his integrity, his nobility of character, his splendid fervour for the public weal. And did he think then of the Brown lease? Sir, some man we know not who, some hand we know not whose, between the time a certain document passed into the hands of the hon. member for Assiniboia with "32" written upon it changed that to "60" and it never went out of the clutches of the hon. member for Assiniboia. I should like—indeed, I should like —to deal with many of these matters at length.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Go on.

Mr. BENNETT: But I am not going to, because the hour is late. I want to make a few observations only touching the Department of the Interior in connection with one or two of the matters which have been mentioned here to-day. The hon. member for St. John (Mr. Pugsley) has endeavoured to-night to support the position of his friend from Edmonton. With that sense of loyalty in which he is not lacking and which did not distinguish his sometime leader, he rallied his splendid talents to the support of his friend from Edmonton. But the woeful cry almost from the beginning indicated to us that it was not a congenial task; it was a work too great even for his master-mind.

There is one matter about which especially I desire to speak—the Brown grazing lease. What are the facts? A man named MacGregor, a beneficiary of the system came down to Ottawa and happened to run across a man named Brown. He said: "If I want a lease perhaps you will let me use your name. I have all the area I can hold in my own name." "Certainly," was the answer, "I do not mind a little thing like that; I live down in Montana." The application was put in. The hon. member for Assiniboia was Commissioner of Dominion Lands. MacGregor looked the thing over and did not think much of it. A man named Bell thought he would like to look into it. Later it transpired that a gentleman named Adamson thought it would be a good thing to get hold of. Mr. Adamson happens to be a close relative of the hon. member for Assiniboia. One good turn deserves another. Brown had sent in an application for 32,000 acres of land under a closed lease—and a closed lease in the terminology of the department, meant a lease that might be subject to cancellation after two years' notice,—and, under the control of the gentleman who now sits in this House and talks of "unholy hands," there came out an irrevocable lease for 60,000 acres.

Mr. TURRIFF: I do not know whether the hon. gentleman wishes to be fair or not, but he must know that that lease was issued a year and a half after I left the department.

Mr. BENNETT: Mr. Speaker, certainly that is so. The hon. gentleman realizes as he told us the other night, how poorly paid the civil servants were, and he too was in that case when he left the Civil Service; he was still poor on the occasion of his leaving the Civil Service. He left behind him this memorandum, that an application for a closed lease for 32,000 acres should become an irrevocable lease for 60,000 acres. And it was his handiwork and nobody else's. It is idle to try to get away from that. I have the evidence. He was summoned and gave evidence before the commissioner and explained exactly what happened. That evidence is too long to read.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Read it.

Mr. BENNETT: No, it would take too long to read that evidence to-night. Hon. members themselves can see the bulk of it. He was not, as some one has said, taken unawares; he was confronted with the facts and given an opportunity to explain them; and his evidence as to how it happened is upon that record. It will be printed; it will be read by the people of Canada; but there is only one explanation the people of Canada can gain from it, and that is that anxiety to assist a brother-in-law brought about the change from 32,000 acres to 60,000 acres. That is the fact and no glossing over, no sophistry, no endeavour to get away from the real facts, can disguise this—that there was alienated in the province in which I live a most valuable tract of land, one that should have settlers upon it. To satisfy the avarice and greed of a brother-in-law, 60,000 acres of the best land in that province was alienated on an application that went into the hands of the hon. member for Assiniboia as an application for 32,000 acres. And the lease is irrevocable, though the application was for a closed lease. I say that there is no explanation that can be given to the people of this country that can change the opinion in the province I come from that this was a deliberate act on the part of this machine to take from the people for the benefit of political favourites a part of the great resources that should be held in trust for the people and not for one or two political heelers and partisans. Why, Sir, there is only one person who benefited by the increase in that acreage, and that is Mr. A. J. Adamson, who was then after the lease. He concealed his connection with it from the department until July, 1905, when he sent to the department a quit-claim deed from this same man, Brown, to the Galway Horse and Cattle Company—which was Adamson, under another name, and enclosed a cheque for $650 for rental. Thousands of dollars of rental were left uncollected, for the rental was not paid between the date of the granting of the application and the issue of the lease in 1905. And the man whose handiwork this is, is the man who goes through the provinces of Saskatchewan and Alberta supporting the party of hon. gentlemen opposite and who dares to come into this Parliament and talk about "unholy hands." There may be travesties of justice, and there may be things that bring the blush of shame to Canadians, but what disgusts most men in Canada is the rank and arrant hypocrisy of some of our public men. The evidence is that this deed, which was brought to the department in 1905, was dated September, 1903; the name of the person to whom it was assigned was left blank, and this was afterwards filled in. Then what happened? The Galway Horse and Cattle Company was not in existence at the time of the assignment, nor was it in existence for some time afterwards. It was a company which was formed by Adamson for the purpose of holding this tract: that is embodied in the evidence that he himself gave. They allotted to the members of this little company their shares, and when Mr. Turriff—not as the hon. member for Assiniboia, but as the former Commissioner of Dominion Lands—testifying before the commissioner, was asked upon his oath to explain how the change respecting the increase in the area had been made, he could offer no explanation whatever. There is no doubt that he did it for Adamson, and Adamson, having decided not to go into the ranching business, turned the lease over for $22,500 to John Cowdry. All that it had cost Adamson for rental was $650; this he paid in July, 1905. The report showed that he should have paid $2,400 more for arrears of rental at that time, and that the department allowed the lease to be issued without demanding the money which should have been collected as rental—they practically made a present of $2,400 to Adamson and his company. I ask the hon. member for Edmonton, I ask the right hon. leader of the Opposition, whose supporters these gentlemen are: can any excuse be given to the people of the province of Alberta—Brown swears that he made no application and did not know that the lease had been changed until he gave his evidence before the commissioner—why that closed lease was changed to an irrevocable lease of 60,000 acres while the transaction was under the control of the now hon. member for Assiniboia? You may offer excuses; you may trifle with the truth; you may endeavour to palliate the effect, but there it stands, in all its grim reality. It was but one instance of the working of a system from which the people of western Canada suffered for fifteen years. I do not present that single instance as standing alone. The instances multiply; the illustrations increase. They are not isolated; they are not one here and another there; they are a continued, considered, persistent series of illustrations and instances showing a deliberate conspiracy on the part of a few men to enrich themselves at the expense of the people of that day and of the posterity that was to be. It was a deliberate attempt on the part of those men to filch from the settlers and from the settlers that were to come the public domain of the province of Alberta and to hold it until they could turn it over at a profit, as speculators and exploiters, to the loss of the people of Canada.

When you couple that single illustration, of which I have given the details, with the others that are dealt with in the report, and remember that in that province there is no voters' list—nothing but a system of enumerators worked by political partisans before the election—when you keep that fact in mind, together with the observations made by the hon. Solicitor General, I ask, what elections have we had in Alberta or in Saskatchewan during the last fifteen years? The party press rejoices, and in flaring headlines holds up to the public the story that the Liberals won in Alberta and Saskatchewan; but I say that there has not been an election in either of the two provinces, since they became provinces, that is worthy of the name of an election. There has not been conducted under the auspices of the Conservative party in these western provinces a single election since 1896—and the population of those provinces was then but a few thousands, a handful of people. All the new settlers who came from across the line and from foreign lands across the seas have been brought into Canada and taught the damnable doctrine that public men holding high offices are there to corrupt, not always with dollars, but oft times with the natural resources of the country: a coal lease here, a fishing permit there; an irrigation right here, a quarter-section there. Then, when that failed, if the poor, untutored Indian happened to have a few acres of land, he was not free from the avarice and the greed of these Shylocks of our land. Is it any wonder that public opinion is outraged? Is it any wonder that the public conscience is aroused? Is it any wonder that when men went through the country 12 p.m. and spoke to the people from the public platform, they said: "these people are right at heart"; yet when the votes were counted on election day, the results were quite different? The right hon. gentleman who leads the Government went through western Canada and found a sound sentiment and a splendid response to the principles that he enunciated, but when the votes were counted, his candidates were always in the minority. Why? Ask Cruise and Davis and Turriff and Adamson and Oliver and Marshall, and that gang of freebooting buccaneers who went round the country as campaign followers of the then Administration. These are strong words, but these are the words which the dictionary says describe the men that I mention, and I know of no other language which I can use to do justice to the occasion.

This Aylwin tract affair is one of the most despicable transactions that was ever endeavoured to be put through in this country. I want to be fair to the hon. member for Edmonton. He protested as long as a man could, but finally, as compromise is the price of all government, he yielded, and to-night he pays the price of his yielding to his friends in the Cabinet. The Aylwin tract lies east of Calgary. The Canadian Pacific Railway Company several years ago was carrying on large irrigation works in that locality.

Suddenly there appeared one McGregor. I would like to traverse his history this evening and tell this House of that long and devious trail that leads from Brandon to the Yukon and from the Yukon to Medicine Hat and along through the Southern Alberta Land Company and then back to Brandon again; but I have not time. Suffice it to say that having conceived the idea that where water would flow down hill there might be a chance of making some money by using it on the arid lands of the province, he organized a company. It is a sad story. If I had time to tell of the English investors who paid 40 shillings in the pound for their shares that have gone to six shillings! I know of widows in England who put money in the South Alberta Land Company's stock. I know of the absolutely untrue statements contained in the prospectus, and how that money was obtained. I know of the sanction given by the late Government to the operations of the company. My hon. friend from Edmonton was not then minister, let us be fair. But that reminds me that there was not only Mr. McGregor but several other gentlemen. One of them is now in the Senate, my friend Senator Ross, of Moosejaw; he was there and Hitchcock was there, another relation of somebody's else's relation, and these men foregathered and conceived the idea of the company. They obtained certain concessions. They purchased certain cattle. The Grand Forks Cattle Company turned in its property. It is too long to tell about tonight, but they got their company and when Aylwin and his friends saw the splendid exploitations made by this company in London, when they saw the way in which the English investor caught at the bait held out about this irrigable land and what fortunes there were to be gathered from it, they said: This is not right, we want some too. You know there is nothing equal to the avarice that a transaction like that sometimes creates in human nature, and so Mr. Aylwin looked about and said: There is 350,000 acres of land not far from this tract in southern Alberta, and if we can get some water from the river for irrigation there is a fortune in it. So they came down to my friend from Edmonton; and on the 1st of August, 1906, he wrote a letter in which he said:

This is a very important matter. . . The question is one of engineering, which must be very definitely settled, especially as the area involved is considerable. You may rest assured there will be no loss of time in arriving at a conclusion in regard to it.

That was a proper course to take, the course you and I would expect any reasonable minister to take. He said that as it was a serious matter it required to be carefully considered. But that was not sufficient for Mr. Aylwin for I find on the 21st of September, 1906—mark you that the first letter was on August 1, and on the 21st day of September of the same year, when my friend the Minister of the Interior returned from a little trip to England, there was placed before him a memorandum by the then and now Deputy Minister of the Interior which will, I trust, direct the attention of the right hon. gentleman to the ignoble part he played in connection with this undertaking:

Ottawa, September 21, 1906.

Hon. Frank Oliver,
Minister of the Interior.

Memorandum.—I beg to submit herewith the papers in connection with the application of Mr. Aylwin for a tract of land in connection with his irrigation scheme. As per the terms of your letter to Mr. Piché, Sir Wilfrid instructed me to have Mr. Stewart make the inspection therein mentioned; his report is attached.

Peradventure there may be another Sir Wilfrid rather than our own right hon. gentleman, but at least his name and fame are not known to the Canadian people.

The memorandum continues:

On the receipt of Mr. Stewart's report the matter was again submitted to Sir Wilfrid, and he desired me to state to you that in his opinion the application should be dealt with in the same manner as the Robins' application, and that he would have granted it and passed the necessary Order in Council but for the fact that you were then on the ocean on your way home. On that account he thought it better to let the matter stand until your return, for the necessary action.

So that these gentlemen, having retained the services of a then Liberal member of Parliament, Mr. Piché, to act as their solicitor, after the hon. the Minister of the Interior of that day had instructed the engineer to make a report, during his absence had taken the matter up with the right hon. gentleman who was then the Prime Minister and Acting Minister of the Interior and he was prepared to grant that application, according to the statement made by the Deputy Minister of the Interior. But that is not all. I observe that these gentlemen found, when the hon. member for Edmonton came home, that he was not quite the easy man to deal with they thought he would be, because he said: I do not quite see it that way. He conceived the idea that he would not tie up those 350,000 acres for these people and he did something else. He said: "I am going to throw some of this land open to homesteaders"—and he did it. Mark you the determination of the hon. member for Edmonton; mark you the noble patriot desiring to assert and protect the rights of the people; for a year he did it. A whole year had gone by and the thing had not been put through. Behold this illuminating epistle from Mr. Robert of Montreal regarding this action of the hon. member for Edmonton:

Montreal, March 18, 1908.

H. A. Aylwin, Esq.,
Winnipeg.

My dear Aylwin,—Your telegram to hand, and in answer would say that I understand that Oliver has thrown tract open to homesteaders, but other than being evidence that Oliver has not been straight in the matter, I would not let it worry you unduly, as the matter is in such shape that they cannot but grant it, and will have to give you a tract of similar size, and I am satisfied that from my last interview the matter will be granted this session.

I am going up to see Sir Wilfrid in a day or so, and trust to have some good news for you on my return.

Keep your friends quiet until you hear from me, and I am as certain as ever that you will get your grant of land. The delay has been very annoying and disgusting, but they are in a worse position to refuse it to-day than they were a year ago.

I trust Mr. Newton is keeping better; give him my kind regard.

I remain,
Yours truly,
E. A. ROBERT.

That was in March, 1908. The general election was approaching; always, with stealthy tread, nearer and nearer it came, and, peradventure, far be it from me to suggest it, Mr. Robert may have been a prospective campaign contributor. Far be it from me to suggest it, but what followed? The hon. member for Edmonton, with that sturdy independence which characterized him on an occasion which perhaps he has forgotten, was still determined that he would not even then hand the tract over to these men, and so for a year he stood out. Mr. Robert felt confident of what he could do; he had only to see Sir Wilfrid. And so we find this letter, on the 27th of July, 1908, a few months later—the election was approaching nearer:

Dear Sir,—Yours of the 24th to hand, and in reply would say that I have no objection to meeting Hudson, but rather think our best course would be to keep ourselves as free as possible until we get matters straightened with the Government.

I am supposed to have my interview with Sir Wilfrid next week to finish up matters, and will let you know the result as soon as possible.

With kind regards.

E. A. ROBERT.

This is the gentleman whom the right hon. gentleman hardly knows.

Mr. PUGSLEY: His brother.

Mr. BENNETT: Oh, yes. This goes a step further, nearer and nearer comes the hour when the appeal was to be made to the people, and let us see what we find:

Montreal, August 14, 1908.

My dear Aylwin,—I have just returned from my trip,—

This was the trip to Ottawa.

—and am pleased to tell you that we have no further need to worry over it, and before many days you will get word from me that will be very satisfactory to us all.

That is very pleasing. That indicates that he had made a little trip to Ottawa and that he had seen his friend Sir Wilfrid. Mark you, the hon. member for Edmonton had come back from across the sea and my right hon. friend was not then acting as minister of the Interior. The minister himself had said: "I am going to let the homesteader have some of this land." So Mr. Robert did not go to him as he had not acted straight with him.

An hon. MEMBER: What about the system?

Mr. BENNETT: The system had not been working well just then. Mr. Robert wrote the following letter:

September 21, 1908.

I am in receipt of yours of 8th, but owing to my absence I did not get it till my return from Ottawa, and I intended writing you at once, but had to leave town unexpectedly the next morning, and only just returned.

I was unaware that Mr. Newton was on the note concerning deposit with Government.

I do not want to put up the money at present moment for this deposit, especially as the money lies at our credit in hands of Government and your Bank has transfer for same.

Then he discusses what is to be done:

On my last trip to Ottawa, I had the whole matter approved and accepted, and the order is on the table, signed by minister, and has approval of Government, and will be signed by Government and Governor General before November 1st.

Notice, about November 1. This is September. Why delay? Far be it from me to say what the reason was. October 26 was the fateful day and of course this waits until the 1st November. Then he says:

We have made note due November 24th to enable the whole matter to be finished, so that we will, I hope, be able to make a part division before that date.

The spoils of war!

I have spent a considerable sum already on this, and have assured its successful completion within a few weeks, and do not, under the circumstances, think it out of my way to ask you to put this through, when I give your Bank another name on note as good, or possibly better than the one they have now, and trust you will arrange matter.

This suggested a change in the name of one of the endorsers and gave the name of Westgate, who was said to be worth a quarter of a million instead of the name of somebody else. Mr. Robert said that he wanted eighteen cents an acre for his influence. I do not know what that word "influence" means. There is evidence that this term indicates an ability on the part of some gentleman to get very close to the ministers of past days and induce them to do certain things regardless of the public interest and the public weal. Influence and prices seem to have a fixed relation to each other. If the price of land is good the price of influence is high, if the price of land is low influence is cheap. If the lands of the Qu'Appelle, Long Lake and Saskatchewan Valley Company are only worth $1.25 an acre the price of influence is away down, but if on the other hand, the price of land goes up then the price of influence goes up too. I do not know what influence was worth in the market at that time, but I know that in this case the influence of Mr. Robert was being sold at eighteen cents an acre and that they divided the spoils.

An hon. MEMBER: Cast lots?

Mr. BENNETT: No, they did not cast lots. They should have cast lots as to which should have gone out even as one in ancient times went out and made away with himself. What happened? As soon as these gentlemen got this land they incorporated a company called the Alberta Land Company, not the South Alberta Land Company. Robert and his associates then made an effort to hold up McGregor. It must have been a novel sensation for him. They went to him and said: We have this land. Oh, yes, says McGregor, but do you not know that I was ahead of you, that I saw the Minister of the Interior and I got all the water. You have the land and no water; what are you going to do about it? The minister had handed these people out a lemon in the shape of land with no water on it. What a sardonic smile he must have had on his face when he sold them this land without any water! What happened? Alexander Smith, of Ottawa, now appears on the scene. I know this House has never heard of that little transaction which he put through. McGregor found the money to buy up the Alberta Land company, the result of which was that the 69,000 acres passed into the hands of the South Alberta Land Company. They had the water and they got the land. The right hon. leader of the Government seems to have been very anxious to put this proposition through, but in the absence of the Minister of the Interior he thought he had better wait until he came back. When he came back he found him very reluctant, very obdurate. He was, to use the words of an hon. member of this House, a bucking broncho from the West who, when driven to make possible the sale of this land by his Prime Minister, handed out this lemon in the shape of the land without the water.

There was another transaction in my country in connection with the Kananakis coal deal, in which there figured not only the names of Howard Douglas, two sons and his son-in-law, but two or three government officials. One of them never heard of the fact that he had ever been a great landed proprietor till the investigation. He merely signed his name, he did not know that anybody else signed his name in his absence, but as a result there passed out of the hands of the Crown a very valuable coal property that has since been sold for $500,000. There is another case not far from my own country in connection with the Blood Indian reserve which has been touched upon. Then they talk about these conspiring and culpable officials being dismissed. If there is one thing more than another that should convince this House that the Government of this country cannot be carried on by a Conservative Government with men of this stamp occupying administrative positions it is the evidence that was given by Pedley, by White and by Smart. I do not want to traverse the ground gone over to-night by my hon. friend the Solicitor General, but if ever there was a self-convicted perjurer, it is Frank Pedley. If there ever was a man who admitted that he had perjured himself in the endeavour to steal a few dollars, if there ever was a man who was a self-confessed perjurer and a criminal unfit for the public service of Canada, it is Frank Pedley. It is time for us to revise our ideas about this matter. I say as a supporter of the Government that they have been entirely too lenient with civil servants who have prostituted their positions. I say that all the wrongs we have had in this country, all the offences that have occurred since the defeat of the Liberal party have been the result, not of the actions of this Government nor of the ministers who compose this Government, but of the men who were occupying positions in the public service when this Government came into power and who have given evidence of the training which they had in former days. How can you expect men to be loyal to the public service who have been recreant to their trust in days gone by? You have the cases of Pedley, Smart and White. Smart has now left the service, but White is kept there against my protest. How can you expect a man of that type to discharge the duties and functions of his office when he has been recreant to the trust reposed in him by the people and the Government of the day? These men have admitted that they have committed acts which stamp them as being unfit for the public service; if men such as they are going to have the sympathy and support of hon. gentlemen opposite, what must the people of Canada think of them? I have heard men stand up here and take hours talking about dismissals from the public service, but no wonder the public service is rotten if you have hon. members opposite standing up and vindicating the position taken by a Pedley, or a White or a Smart. This thing must stop, and this report will enable it to be stopped. I cannot continue longer, for the hour is late.

Some hon. MEMBERS: Go on.

Mr. BENNETT: I am not making a speech about this; I only rose to make a few superficial observations. This all may sound to some hon. gentlemen to be a very light thing, but it is not. It strikes at the very root and foundation of our institutions. I do say, Mr. Speaker, in all seriousness, that I have endeavoured during the time I have lived in western Canada to play my small part in the public life of that country, and I have been disappointed, as many men have been, by reason of the various results in elections. I have taken the trouble to ascertain the reason why. I have seen men of integrity—at least, I thought them so—and of worth, and of character, succumb to the powerful influences, to the tremendous pressure that can be exercised upon them by reason of the facts to which I have directed attention. I appeal to the right hon. gentleman opposite, with his forty-one years of parliamentary experience, to at least stand in his place, before this matter ends, and make a declaration that will make for the integrity and for the uplifting of the public life of Canada. I at least hope that as a result of these unfortunate revelations, and they cannot be less than matters of great sorrow and sadness to most men, good may come. Do you mean to say to me that a matter of this kind which strikes at the very existence of the body politic, is lightly to be passed over? You laugh when the member for Selkirk (Mr. Bradbury) endeavours to do something to protect the poor red man, and you laugh because the red man's heritage is taken from him on the Blood reserve or somewhere else, and we talk about the glories of our democracy and the freedom of our franchise, but if men occupying high public places are permitted, with the approval of their leader, to go back to the electorate and ask for their support after they have been shown to be guilty of acts so nefarious, so dishonourable, so destructive to the morale of the community and so degrading to the national life, then there is absolutely no hope for democracy or for the proper development of Canada. I appeal to men, to whom, after all, love of country is greater than love of party, to read those reports as they are published. They are not partisan reports, they are not violent attacks upon men, or individuals, but a plain laying open to the perusal of the people of Canada of chapters in its national life that are degrading to that life, and humiliating to every man who calls himself a Canadian. That is the reason I ventured to speak in general terms of all these things dealt with in the report, and to direct specific attention to only one, or two, or three of them. We know what the hon. gentleman from St. Antoine (Mr. Ames) pointed out with his camera in days gone by as to what took place with timber limits, and we know he was laughed to scorn. Why, Sir, look at the timber limits of western Canada and the men who own them. Go study the men; study these different coteries who got these limits by a system that could only be operated with the connivance of the officials, and that is so clear and so palpable that it does not require proof. Why, some of these men have the hardihood to appeal to the electorate, and some of them fold their arms smugly and say: What have you to say about it; we have the support of the people behind us. I do not often tell stories, but I will tell this one. Once in western Canada a man was charged with stealing a pig, and the evidence was clear, and a verdict of guilty seemed inevitable, but to the surprise of the judge and counsel, the jury filed into court and pronounced him not guilty. And when the prisoner was discharged his counsel said to him: "How do you account for this verdict?" and the late prisoner replied: "Say, that's easy, don't you know that each man of the jury had a piece of that pork?" And, Mr. Speaker, when the hon. member for Assiniboia (Mr. Turriff) comes back and talks of the magnificent majorities he has got in times past, I refer his electorate to the story of the Riding Mountain, the alienation of the public domain, which took place in his time, and then I think how the men who had a bite of the pork can be competent to judge between him and the best interests of this country. I would like to, and I shall do it later, review the evidence in these cases from my own provinces. I am content to place myself on record as regretting, perhaps more than I can say—although it may be of benefit and advantage to the party I support in this Parliament—my feeling of real sorrow and very great regret that these things should have happened in the province in which I live. I hopefully look to it, in fact I almost believe, that the right hon. the leader of the Opposition, notwithstanding his connection with some who are guilty, will before this Parliament prorogues, in his place, give to the people of Canada some encouragement or some word that will indicate that regretting as he does the past he looks forward to a brighter future, although he has no hope or expectation of ever being in a position to duplicate the past.

Mr. OLIVER: Mr. Speaker, I would claim the privilege of answering the personal references made by the Minister of the Interior, but I regret that my voice will not enable me to do so, and for that reason I shall not ask the privilege of the House. As the matter related to two departments, I brought in a recommendation to Council myself that a commission should be issued and a gentleman named for the purpose of inquiring fully into all the matters which had been alleged. The inquiry has now been completed, and I desire leave to lay upon the table of the House the evidence that was taken upon the inquiry and the report of the commissioner.

Motion for the adjournment of the House (Mr. Oliver) negatived.

PROROGATION OF PARLIAMENT.

Mr. SPEAKER read a communication from the Governor General's secretary, announcing that His Royal Highness would proceed to the Senate Chamber on Thursday, the 15th April, at 4 p.m., for the purpose of proroguing the present session of Parliament.

CONSTRUCTION OF DRILL HALLS.

REPORT OF COMMISSIONER.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: May I, with the consent of the House, lay on the table the report of Mr. R. A. Pringle, K.C., commissioner appointed to inquire into certain matters connected with the construction of drill halls at Orono, Meaford, Blackstock, Markdale, and other places in the province of Ontario. Information came to me some two or three months ago charging that certain irregularities and certain frauds had been committed in respect to these drill halls, some of which were under construction by the Department of Militia and some by the Department of Public Works.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN moved the adjournment of the House.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: As there has been no intermediate proceeding, this motion is out of order.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: The motion is quite in order. There has been a proceeding which will be recorded on the records of the House.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: That is not a proceeding.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: It is a proceeding in the judgment of John Bourinot, because I have heard it so ruled by the Speaker.

Motion agreed to, and the House adjourned at 12.35 Thursday.

Thursday, April 15, 1915.

The House met at Eleven o'clock, the Speaker in the Chair.

THE PURCHASE OF WAR SUPPLIES.

REPORT OF PUBLIC ACCOUNTS COMMITTEE.

Mr. H. B. MORPHY (North Perth), acting chairman of the Public Accounts Committee, presented the sixth report of the said committee, as follows:

[Mr. Oliver.]

Your committee have had under consideration the purchase of horses for the Militia Department in the province of Nova Scotia, and beg to report to the House the evidence and documents in connection therewith.

Your committee are of the opinion that the evidence respecting the purchase of horses in Nova Scotia discloses circumstances of such an unsatisfactory character that further investigation and action are necessary, and they recommend that the said evidence and all documents connected with the matters aforesaid be referred to the Department of Justice with instructions to make such investigation, and to institute such prosecutions and to take such proceedings as may be found necessary to protect the public interest.

And your committee further recommend that a further investigation should be made by the Government in regard to any irregularities which may have taken place in any other province of Canada, where such steps will be authorized and warranted by evidence or information of credible persons.

Mr. MORPHY also presented the seventh report of the said committee, as follows:

In view of the evidence adduced during the course of their inquiry into the matters referred by the House to them, your committee desire to draw the attention of the House to the requirement for the inauguration of a system of purchase, inspection and audit that will adequately protect the country from irregularities and frauds.

Mr. MORPHY moved:

That the third, fourth, sixth and seventh reports of the Select Standing Committee on Public Accounts be concurred in.

Right Hon. Sir ROBERT BORDEN (Prime Minister): The Select Standing Committee on Public Accounts during the past six or seven weeks has been engaged in the investigation of matters which have not yet been reported by the Auditor General to the House in the ordinary course of his duties, and which, therefore, have been under consideration by that committee a year in advance of the time when they ordinarily would come under its attention. The circumstances under which this was brought about are familiar to the House, and I need not dwell upon them. Certain correspondence with regard to the Accounts was moved for and brought down, and it was suggested that that correspondence ought to be referred to the Committee on Public Accounts. This was done, and the reference carried incidentally with it the right and the duty of the committee to investigate the matters referred to in the correspondence. There are two courses which a Government might take under the circumstances: one course would be to rely on technical considerations and rules, and declare to the House that such matters ought only to be investigated in the usual way at the time appointed by law and under ordinary conditions. The other, and that which we thought to be the correct course, would be to open the door wide to the fullest and freest investigation, and we took that course for the very good reason that we deemed it our right, and our duty as well, to investigate and to know of any frauds or irregularities that might have been practised upon the Government and the people of this country. One can understand the possible result of such a course, because if any fraud or irregularity or imposition is discovered, even of a comparatively trifling character the natural and usual result is that it will be greatly magnified and exaggerated and will create in the people throughout the country a condition of unrest which may not be fully justified by the facts. But considerations of that kind ought not to weigh with any Government, and they did not weigh with us. Therefore, my direction to those members of the Government who were members of the Committee on Public Accounts was to make the fullest and freest investigation, and to permit inquiry into any matters whatever that might be desired by gentlemen on the other side of the House, or that might be brought to the attention of hon. members on this side. That course, I believe, was pursued to the fullest possible extent, as I will show by some references to the proceedings of the committee.

I may say, in passing, that this was not the course pursued during the fifteen years immediately preceding the time we came into power, because, without dwelling upon particular instances, I may be permitted to point out that from the time of the refusal, in 1898, of an inquiry into matters of the greatest possible importance in the Yukon until the last refusal to investigate matters of even greater moment in connection with the National Transcontinental railway, there seems to have been a disposition on the part of hon. gentlemen opposite, when they held the reins of power, to restrict inquiry and investigation within the narrowest possible compass. I do not intend to go into those matters at any great length, but it is proper that I should call attention to a resolution which was moved by the hon. member for Peel (Mr. Blain) on the 13th day of February, 1908, and which is found in Hansard of that year at page 3070, the vote being recorded at page 3145. That motion is in the following terms:

The Committee on Public Accounts is constituted for the purpose of affording full and free examination and inquiry into the receipts and expenditures of public moneys and the circumstances in connection therewith.

That in the public interest the greatest possible freedom of investigation and inquiry should be enjoyed by the committee.

That any action of the majority of that committee in excluding evidence or restricting inquiry, should be subject to appeal to this House and upon request for that purpose the necessary report of proceedings ought immediately to be ordered.

That does not seem to lay down any startling or unusual standard of public duty; yet when that motion was put before the House by the hon. member for Peel it was voted down by the gentlemen on the other side of the House, then occupying the seats of office; and that motion of the hon. member for Peel to establish a most necessary and proper safeguard in the public interest, was denied by my hon. friends on the other side when they sat where we sit to day. Not only that, but in the committee itself inquiry was restricted in a very unusual manner, in a manner which it seems to me was not consistent with the public interest of this country. On the 9th day of May, 1906, a certain question arose in the Committee on Public Accounts. The Government of the day was represented on that committee by two ministers of the Crown; one of them, the Minister of Finance, the guardian of the public treasury, and the other the Minister of Justice, the man whose duty it would be, under the constitution, to take proceedings against any persons guilty of fraud against the Government of this country by raids upon the public treasury. Mr. George T. Merwin was under examination, and during his examination he was asked to state the price he had paid for an engine sold to the Government by him, and he refused to do so. Thereupon a member of the committee requested the chairman to rule whether the witness should or should not answer. The chairman of the committee, now an hon. member of the Senate, ruled that a business man was not obliged to divulge his private affairs. A member of the committee having asked the chairman to direct the witness to answer the question, and the chairman having declined to so direct him, the said member appealed from the ruling of the Chair; and the ruling of the Chair denying that right to a member of the committee, a representative of the people in Parliament, was sustained. Among others who voted on behalf of the Government of the day to deny that right to the representatives of the people in this Parliament were the Minister of Justice and the Minister of Finance of the day.

If there was any wrong-doing in connection with public expenditure, and particularly in connection with the expenditure for the purposes of this war, the members of this Government wanted to know it; especially I desired to know it, and the Minister of Militia and Defence also. I spoke to the Minister of Customs (Mr. Reid) who is a member of the Public Accounts Committee, with regard to the scope of the investigation. I spoke to him in the presence of the Minister of Militia and Defence (Major General Hughes) and I informed him—and my observations in that regard were emphatically seconded by the Minister of Militia—that we desired the widest possible scope given to that inquiry. If there had been any wrong-doing in connection with political expenditures, we desired it to be investigated to the full. We proposed that if wrong-doing should be discovered, restitution should be made and punishment should follow. And so the Minister of Customs in the Committee on Public Accounts adopted, as undoubtedly he would have adopted even if he had not been so informed by me, the course to which I will take the opportunity of referring the House. On the 24th day of March last Mr. Reid said in the committee:

I want to say that if there is any information the committee want, or any wrong-doing, then as far as the Government is concerned we want to ferret it right to the bottom; we do not want to shield any person.

And on the next day, the 25th of March, he said:

The Government is determined to protect fully the interests of the country in this and in all cases and to take such proceedings as may be necessary for that purpose.

And again on the same day he said:

I want to repeat here again that so far as the Government is concerned they want to prosecute their investigation to the very utmost limit.

And subsequently he said:

As representing the Government I have stated that we want to get to the bottom of these matters.

And on the 9th day of April he said:

I also want to say that so far as going into these or any other matters in connection with the Militia or any other department, the Government are not only willing but anxious to go into them from start to finish and get the true facts out in order that if there has been any wrong-doing, either restitution shall be made or prosecution be undertaken, to put matters right.

And later on, on the same day, the 9th of April, he said:

So far as these matters under investigation are concerned, or any others in connection with the Militia or any other department that have been brought up here, it is the intention of the Government to further the investigation and get to the bottom of every matter. We will follow this investigation from now on until we see exactly whether there are any other matters where there has been any wrong-doing.

On the 9th day of April some question arose about the investigation and the Minister of Customs again said:

I want to have it also understood that it is not the Government who are responsible for stopping any investigations.

Mr. Carvell : I thought we had put that very plainly.

Mr. Kyte : That is perfectly understood.

I now come to the matters that have been reported to the House by the committee. The one which appears first in my notes is that which is known as the Powell case.

Let me observe here for the information of the House and of the country that every one of the matters upon which the committee has thought it worth while to report to this House occurred during the first six weeks of the war, during a time when there was the greatest possible stress and urgency, and when it could not reasonably be expected that such attention could possibly be given to the safeguarding of the public interest as has been possible ever since that early stress and urgency passed away. The order for supplies in connection with what is known as the Powell case was given on August 24 last, and it is described as a rush order. Some evidence was given before the committee by a man named Shaver, who declared that he had been informed by Col. Jones, now General Jones, that the Government did not desire to purchase directly from manufacturers and producers, but that it desired to employ the services of middlemen. Evidence has been given by the Director of Contracts, Mr. H. W. Brown, by the Deputy Minister of Militia and Defence, General Fiset, by the Quartermaster General, General Macdonald, and, I think, by other officers of the Department of Militia, that no such principle or practice has ever been laid down or known in the Department of Militia and Defence since this party came into power. Further than that, one of these men—perhaps more than one—states that he does not believe that General Jones ever said anything of the kind, and I do not believe that he ever said anything of the kind. I say that if General Jones ever did make any such observation to Mr. Shaver or anybody else, his conduct must be called into question by this Government, and if he is not able satisfactorily to deny the assertion that he used such language, he is no longer fit to hold a position in the public service. But, in the meantime, I do General Jones the credit of assuming that he never said anything of the kind. I shall not condemn him upon the testimony of this man Shaver, confronted, as it is, by the testimony of other reputable men in the department who are appointees not of this Government, but of the Government of hon. gentlemen opposite. I know Gen. Jones very well; he is a native of my own city of Halifax, and an honourable man, so far as I know him. He is the son of a man who filled an important position in the public life of this country, the Hon. Alfred G Jones, a member of Mr. Mackenzie's Government, and afterwards Lieutenant Governor of the province of Nova Scotia. I, for one, absolutely refuse to believe for a moment that Guy Carleton Jones ever told Mr. Shaver or any one else the absolute untruth that any such principle or practice was ever laid down by the Department of Militia since we came into power.

The transaction itself presents features of a very unsatisfactory character, as one is bound to admit at once. So far as I am concerned, I propose not to attempt to shield any one, Liberal or Conservative, but to mete out what I think to be justice to every man concerned in any of the transactions which have been under review. A purchase was made through Mr. Powell, a very young man, who was in the employ of a company known as the Carleton Drug Company. He was receiving a salary of $75 a month. His duties were very exacting, according to the evidence; he began his work very early in the morning and continued it until very late at night. He was enabled, under circumstances to which I shall refer a little later, to make a contract by which in a few weeks he received a profit of about $9,000, equivalent to ten years salary at the rate he was receiving. It is perfectly true that a portion of that profit, some $2,600, was withheld, through the vigilance of Mr. H. W. Brown, director of contracts, and it is also true that during the progress of the investigation before the committee a further sum of $6,300 was restored, after a motion had been made by the Minister of Customs recommending that the whole matter should be committed to the Department of Justice for such further investigation and proceedings as might be found necessary to protect the public interest. I desire to say that any further investigation that may be required for the purpose of further restitution, if any is deemed possible, and any proceedings of whatever character that may be found necessary to vindicate the public honour and the public interest, will be undertaken by the Department of Justice.

Let me read the report—because I should like to make the record complete—which the committee has made to this House with regard to the Powell contract:

> Your committee ask leave to submit to the House, the evidence taken in respect to the contracts for such supplies purchased from Mr. E. Powell, and to express their opinion, that the contract for such supplies do not appear to have been so worded as to fully protect the public interests.
> Your committee therefore recommend, that the evidence adduced, and all papers connected therewith be referred by the House to the Department of Justice, for any further investigation, if necessary, for the recovery of any moneys overpaid, the holding back of any moneys not yet paid over, and the taking of such further action as may be warranted by the facts.

That is the resolution which was moved by the Minister of Customs in the Committee on Public Accounts, and which was followed by the repayment by Mr. Powell to the public treasury of the sum of $6,300.

The committee has also reported to this House certain evidence and a certain finding with regard to binocular glasses. Their report is as follows:

> Your committee have had under consideration the purchase of binocular glasses for the Canadian expeditionary forces and beg to report to the House the evidence and documents in connection therewith.
> From the evidence it appears a number of binocular glasses were of poor quality, low range and inferior efficiency, but passed inspection and were paid for at an excessive price; and this was due to misrepresentation and inadequate inspection. Your committee therefore recommend to the House that the said evidence and all documents connected therewith be referred to the Department of Justice, with instructions to enforce restitution and to take such further proceedings as the law will permit.

It is not necessary that I should go into the facts, nor will the time at the disposal of the House under present conditions permit me to do so. The crux of the whole matter is that 166 out of the 2,175 glasses were of inferior quality and were not worth the money which the Government of this country paid out of the treasury for them

It is only fair that I should read to the House a letter which I received yesterday from a gentleman whose name has been associated with the matter:

Ottawa, April 12, 1915.

Right Hon. Sir Robert Borden, G.C.M.G.,
Prime Minister of Canada,
Ottawa, Ont.

Dear Sir,—I note by the public press that a resolution has been adopted by the Public Accounts Committee, recommending that the purchase of binocular glasses by the Department ot Militia and Defence be referred to the Department of Justice, for its consideration.

As one of the contractors, I am very anxious that my dealings with the Ellis Company of Toronto should be thoroughly investigated by a judicial officer at the very earlist possible moment. I was not represented by counsel before the Public Accounts Committee, and I did not have an opportunity of presenting my side of the case in as complete a manner as I would have liked. If I have been guilty of any impropriety, either legally or morally, then I am extremely desirous than an impartial tribunal should so declare, and in such an event, it will give me great pleasure to make all the amends possible in connection with the matter.

I would therefore deem it a very great favour if you would kindly arrange to have the Department of Justice expedite this matter, and if the same is referred to a judicial officer, such as one of the judges of the Exchequer Court for investigation, I will facilitate and expedite the investigation, in so far as it is in my power. I would feel under very great obligation if such action could be taken immediately.

I beg to remain, Sir,
Your obedient servant,
T. M. Birkett, jr.

I pronounce no judgment on Mr. Birkett's relation to the case, but this seems a very fair and manly letter in which he desires an early and thorough investigation; and so far as the Government is concerned, it is disposed to give to him and to every other person connected with these matters the opportunity of that investigation and inquiry at the earliest possible moment. If unfounded suspicions have been cast on any person in this connection, it is only fair to them that the truth should be known. On the other hand if there has been any fraud or imposition practised on the Government and people of this country, not one moment's delay should be had in bringing the matter to the most thorough and careful investigation that can be provided for.

So far as the binoculars are concerned, I do not know precisely what the excess in price may amount to. But we propose to give, through the Department of Justice or by such other means as may be found necessary and adequate for the purpose, the fullest, freest and most searching inquiry into this matter that can be devised. If, on the one hand, any man's conduct has been impugned, if undeserved criticism has been passed upon him, let that be known; if on the other hand any moneys have wrongfully been extracted from the Public Treasury by excessive prices let us know that also. Further, let us take the most prompt and energetic means to provide that restitution shall be made and that persons guilty of wrong-doing shall be punished so far as the law will permit.

The next, and not the least important, subject touched upon by the Public Accounts Committee is the purchase of horses in the Maritime Provinces and particularly in the province of Nova Scotia. It seems that in August last it was necessary to purchase about 8,000 horses for despatch with the first contingent. Hon. gentlemen who remember what was transpiring at that time will not fail to recollect that there was urgent and emphatic demand from the country that the first contingent should be sent to the front at the earliest possible moment. That contingent was ready to go to the front fully organized and equipped within six weeks from the outbreak of war, although it did not go until a little later by reason of the necessity for adequate convoy. But any one who realizes what it means for a country with no greater military preparation than Canada had at that time, to arm and equip 33,000 men, in every branch of the service, with all the complex organization which forms part of a modern army—with guns, horses, rifles, munitions of war, all the sixty-six articles with which each soldier going to the front must be provided,—will realize that there was some haste and stress and urgency in the Department of Militia at that time. I should like it also to be remembered that we were entitled to trust, and we did trust, to the officers of the Department of Militia and Defence, the greater number of whom had been appointed by gentlemen on the other side of the House when they held the reins of office; and we had seen no reason to suspect that any irregularity would take place; nor so far as this part of it is concerned, do I know of any irregularity except a very great indiscretion on the part of one of the officers to which I will allude later on.

This reminds me, with regard to the binocular glasses, that the report of the committee complains of two things, viz., misrepresentation and inadequate inspection. So far as the misrepresentation is concerned, I have already informed the House that we propose to take immediate and effective proceedings through the Department of Justice to ascertain the actual facts. So far as the inadequate inspection is concerned, we depended upon an officer of the department who was appointed by hon. gentlemen on the other side of the House, when they were in office, as far back as 1906. My hon. friend the Minister of Militia has felt it his duty—and I absolutely agree with him—that, pending further investigation, he should suspend, and he has suspended, the officer who is responsible, if any one is responsible, for that inadequate inspection.

Let me come back to the subject of the horses. It was necessary to provide, in great haste, about 8,000 horses. I have taken up with my hon. friend the Minister of Militia and Defence the general system by which horses are purchased by the department. He informs me that when he came into power he found a system by which persons selected by the Department were sent out to purchase horses, and the price eventually paid by the Government to them was supposed to cover not only their travelling expenses but the remuneration which they should receive for their services.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Would the Prime Minister repeat that?

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: I understand from the Minister of Militia that when he came into office he found a system under which men were sent out to purchase horses, and the price paid to them for the horses was supposed to cover their travelling expenses and also remuneration for their services. I am informed that there was no distinct dividing line between the particular price the country was paying for the horse and the amount that was being paid to the agent for his commission and travelling expenses. The price paid by the department to the agent so sent out represented not only the amount that he had paid for the horse, but also his expenses and his commission.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: Agents sent out of the department?

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: Employed by the department. The Minister of Militia can make a fuller explanation; but just now I am submitting to the House the information he has given to me. He told me that the course which he decided to pursue was this: that the persons who were employed to purchase horses must be paid at a distinct rate for their services and their travelling expenses, and that for each horse purchased the Government must know the exact price. That was accomplished by giving a credit to some responsible person in whom the department had confidence, and that agent, together with a veterinary surgeon who accompanied him, and whose duty it was to examine and pass upon each horse, was authorized to sign cheques upon that credit so established or to give orders upon that credit. Under the rule which the Minister of Militia laid down, and which he understood was being followed, a cheque or order must be given for each individual horse, and the person selling the horse must endorse that cheque or order so that in respect of every horse purchased by the department, the Government would know the precise sum that it had paid. If that had been carried out, I think hon. gentlemen on both sides of the House will say that very effective safeguards would have surrounded the purchase of horses for the Department of Militia. There you had, in the first place, a purchasing agent in whom the department had confidence; and, in the second place, a veterinary surgeon who was to pass upon the soundness of the horse, his age, and condition, and everything of that kind; and, in the third place, you had a cheque or order drawn to represent the price paid by the people of this country in respect of each horse, which was also identified so that there could be no palming off of any other horse for the one actually purchased.

It seems that during the course of this war an hon. member of this House went to Col. Neill, the principal veterinary officer, and urged that horses should be purchased in the Maritime Provinces seeing that they were being purchased elsewhere in Canada. I shall refer a little later to the statement in connection with this subject which has been given to me by the hon. member for Kings, N.S. (Mr. A. De Witt Foster). At all events Mr. Foster was employed to purchase horses in the province of Nova Scotia, and he did undertake the duties of purchasing agent. For this purpose, a credit of a very considerable sum, about $73,000, was established and eventually paid out for horses purchased in that province. The hon. member for Kings, N.S., was not the only person employed in the province of Nova Scotia or in the Maritime Provinces. Major L. B. Anderson purchased horses to the number of 195 in New Brunswick and Prince Edward Island. The hon. member for Kings, N.S., purchased horses to the number of 428 in Nova Scotia. Mr. Walter Crowe and Mr. E. C. Thurston purchased horses to the number of twenty in Cape Breton; and Mr. H. B. McLeod and Mr. E. C. Thurston purchased horses to the number of 116, somewhere in the Maritime Provinces, I do not know precisely where.

Mr. Foster was appointed as purchasing agent without the knowledge, consent or approval of any member of the Government. I knew nothing of it or I should certainly have absolutely prevented his undertaking any such duties. The Minister of Militia knew nothing of it; and he informs me that if he had had any intimation of it he certainly would never have consented that Mr. Foster, a member of this House, should undertake the duties of purchasing agent for the Government. Mr. Foster was appointed by Col. Neill, the principal veterinary officer, as were also these other gentlemen to whom I have alluded. And lest there should be in the minds of the people of this country the idea that political considerations influenced the Government in these appointments, I may point out that all the other gentlemen who were appointed to purchase horses in the Maritime Provinces were, I am informed, members of the Liberal party. I do not know any of them personally except Mr. Crowe. Mr. Walter Crowe has been one of the strongest standard bearers of the Liberal party in the county of Cape Breton for the past twenty-five years, and I have not a word to say against him. He is a member of my own profession. I have known him for many years, and, so far as I am aware, he is a capable and honourable man; but certainly he was not selected by reason of his political opinions, because he has been one of the strongest opponents of the Conservative party in this country ever since I have known him.

Mr. MACDONALD: I am satisfied that he was appointed on account of his being an officer in command of the Field Battery at Sydney.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: I am informed that he had been an officer in days gone by, but that he had retired.

Mr. MACDONALD: It was in his military capacity solely that he had to do with horses.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: He had ceased to have any connection with military affairs. How valuable military knowledge may be in the purchase of horses, I do not know. In Great Britain strong criticism has been made of the selection of only military men for the purpose, it being alleged that they have not the knowledge and experience to discharge that duty as efficiently as it might be discharged by others.

In justice to Mr. Foster, I should give the prices paid by the respective purchasing agents. The horses purchased by Mr. L. B. Anderson in New Brunswick and Prince Edward Island cost this country on an average $225.70; the horses purchased by Mr. Crowe and Mr. E. C. Thurston averaged $187.50; the horses purchased by Mr. H. B. McLeod and Mr. E. C. Thurston averaged $186.64; and the horses purchased by Mr. Foster and those who were associated with him cost on an average $170.54. It is but fair to Mr. Foster that this fact should be made plain to Parliament and to the people. The Public Accounts Committee have made a special report upon the transaction which I now place before the House:

> Your committee have had under consideration the purchase of horses for the Militia Department in the province of Nova Scotia, and beg to report to the House the evidence and documents in connection therewith.
> Your committee are of the opinion that the evidence respecting the purchase of horses in Nova Scotia discloses circumstances of such an unsatisfactory character that further investigation and action are necessary, and they recommend that the said evidence and all documents connected with the matters aforesaid be referred to the Department of Justice with instructions to make such investigations, to institute such prosecutions and to take such proceedings as may be found necessary to protect the public interest.
> And your committee recommends that a further investigation should be made by the Government in regard to any irregularities which may have taken place in any other province of Canada, where such steps will be authorized and warranted by evidence or information of credible persons.

As far as Mr. Foster's appointment is concerned, apart altogether from any comment upon the manner in which he discharged his duties, Colonel Neill never should have appointed him and Mr. Foster never should have accepted the appoint- no hesitation in saying that, if Colonel Neill was not aware that Mr. Foster was a member of Parliament. I do not know about that. Colonel Neill is at the front and his evidence could not be obtained, but I have no hesitation in saying that, if Colonel Neill did know that Mr. Foster was a member of Parliament and appointed him to discharge the duties of a purchasing agent, he showed no such discretion as I would expect from an officer of his position and experience. It follows necessarily from this, that it was most unfortunate and regrettable that Mr. Foster should have accepted any such duties; it was a most regrettable occurrence. Upon that I shall make some observations later.

But having undertaken to discharge the duties of a purchasing agent for the Government and the people of this country, it devolved upon a member of Parliament above all other men, if you can imagine him undertaking such duties, to see that the most careful and most scrupulous account was kept of every dollar of the public money entrusted to him. I regret to say that the evidence—Mr. Foster's own evidence—convinces me that he did not have such proper regard to that imperative duty as his position demanded. We are confronted with the extraordinary situation that the Government, having placed $73,000 in the hands of Mr. Foster and a veterinary surgeon, have up to the present time had really no accounting for the money so entrusted to them. It may be perfectly true, as has been represented by gentlemen to me on Mr. Foster's behalf, that in the ordinary course of business where men are sent forth to buy horses, cattle, or other animals, the mere production of the animal is in itself a sufficient receipt; but I venture to believe that all the members of the House will agree with me that no such course of procedure as that can for one moment be tolerated in connection with the public affairs of this country. No vouchers are produced, and there seems to have been very little effort on the part of the persons concerned to have them produced. The matter, even after it had come before the Public Accounts Committee, seemed to have been treated in the most casual and extraordinary manner by the persons chiefly concerned.

Evidence has been given of some fraud or imposition practised upon the Government in connection with this matter by certain persons who sold horses to the Government. Some of the most disgraceful and cynical passages that were ever uttered in the presence of the Public Accounts Committee have been testified to on oath by certain men brought before that committee as witnesses in this matter—men who did not hesitate to declare upon their oath that they were defrauding the Government; that they knew they were defrauding the Government, and rejoiced in the opportunity to do so. So far as these men are concerned, I make this statement: first, if the laws of this country permit the courts of justice to enforce restitution against them, that restitution will be enforced; secondly, that if those laws permit the walls of the penitentiary to encircle them, they will go there.

What is the duty of the Government? The duty of the Government is to make the fullest and most determined investigation into the whole matter. The duty of the Government is to see that there is a proper accounting, by all persons concerned, for the sum of $73,000 of the public money of Canada; and the duty of the Government will not stop there. Horses purchased elsewhere in the province of Nova Scotia and in New Brunswick, and possibly in other parts of Canada, seem to have been purchased at a higher price than those with which we are concerned at this moment. We shall make inquiry into these matters, wherever it appears to us that there is any reasonable justification or cause for that inquiry.

I have spoken of what took place in connection with the furnishing of horses for the first contingent. Those horses were provided and purchased under great stress and in great urgency. I might fairly refer, I think, to the fact that after the stress and urgency had passed away, we appointed a man whose character, ability and position are above question, Sir Adam Beck, to purchase horses in all the provinces of Canada east of the Great Lakes. In the western provinces my hon. friend the Minister of Militia and Defence (Major General Hughes) appointed a man whom I do not know as I know Sir Adam Beck, but who, as I understand from the best information available, has thoroughly safeguarded the public interest in western Canada as Sir Adam Beck has certainly safeguarded the public interest in eastern Canada.

Let me call it to your attention that during the past eight months the Government have purchased nearly 20,000 horses in Canada, that about 8,000 of them were purchased during the early weeks of stress and urgency; so that, notwithstanding all that has been said and the clamour that has been raised, and without minimizing in the slightest degree our responsibility to probe the whole matter to the bottom, it does seem to me that very little has been brought forth during the six weeks' investigation by this committee.

A further resolution is before the House, moved in the committee by a Conservative member, the hon. member for Kingston (Mr. Nickle), in the following terms:

In view of the evidence adduced during the course of their inquiry into the matters referred by the House to them, your committee desire to draw the attention of the House to the requirement for the inauguration of a system of purchase, inspection and audit that will adequately protect the country from irregularities and frauds.

With any movement for a better system of purchase, inspection and audit as far as it can be devised, I am thoroughly in sympathy, and I will have something to say in regard to that before I conclude my remarks. With respect to the enactment of legislation for this purpose, may I say to my hon. friend from Kingston, to all the members of this House and to the people of this country, that there never has been any such legislation devised and there never can be any such legislation devised as will absolutely prevent fraud so long as there are dishonest people in the world.

The only thing that will accomplish this is raising the standard of public opinion and having conduct such as this made so absolutely abhorrent to the public sense of the country that it will eventually drive it out. But, in so far as legislation may aid I am perfectly prepared to bring down to Parliament any legislation that may be recommended. As soon as this resolution was passed, it was brought to my attention; and I sent immediately for my colleague, the Minister of Finance, and asked him to convene the deputy minister of his department, the Auditor General, and the deputy minister of Militia and Defence, as that department has chiefly been under consideration, and to ascertain from them, and especially from the Auditor General himself, whether any further legislation was required and should be adopted at this session. If any further legislation appeared necessary or even desirable, I for my part was willing to forward it and expedite it and endeavour to have it passed.

With regard to the whole question of purchases by the Government since the war broke out and the danger of fraud being practised upon the Government under conditions of urgency which have not absolutely disappeared as yet, I will in a moment make a statement of some importance; but in the meantime it is desirable, in view of the exaggeration which has prevailed respecting the matter, to point out this: the committee on Public Accounts has for six weeks or more been engaged in investigating an expenditure of $50,000,000 for war purposes. I have made it absolutely clear to the House and to the country that we have imposed no limit upon that investigation more than that my colleagues and all the Conservative members upon this committee, have themselves insisted upon investigation to the fullest possible extent. What I am about to say is not to be understood as minimizing the importance of the loss of a single dollar to the public treasury, because not one dollar ought to be lost; but I think it is worth while to point out that after a most searching inquiry and investigation for six weeks, conducted in a spirit which certainly did not desire to hide anything that could be brought out to the discredit of the Government and its administration, the total net result is that in respect of the Powell contract $6,300 are to be shown overpaid; that in respect of the binoculars, I would estimate the amount overpaid at $3,000 at the outside—I am taking 166 binoculars and allowing, roughly speaking, $20 overpaid in respect of each pair—and that in respect of the horses, so far as I can gather from the evidence, nothing has been shown up to the present time to indicate that more than a like amount, that is $3,000, has been lost to the country if even that amount has been lost. So that at the outside there is a total net result of $12,000 out of $50,000,000 or one-fortieth of one per cent. Of that amount the sum of $6,300 has already been recovered, leaving less than $6,000, or less than one eightieth of one per cent of an expenditure of $50,000,000, as the sum in respect of which all this clamour has been raised by hon. gentlemen opposite. My hon. friend from Red Deer (Mr. Michael Clark) the other day, at the conclusion of a very eloquent speech, asked us to turn away from the horrors of the Public Accounts Committee. Might I ask him to turn his gaze upon the inferno of the Ferguson report?

Mr. MICHAEL CLARK: Might I interrupt my right hon. friend to the extent of saying that I asked that the soldiers' gaze might be turned away from the horrors of the Public Accounts Committee; and I would like also, if his courtesy will extend that far, to keep the soldiers' gaze away, equally naturally and logically from the Ferguson report, on the broadest public grounds.

Sir ROBERT BORDEN: I can sympathize with my hon. friend in his latter aspiration, particularly if the soldiers should be permitted to exercise their franchise.

Early in the course of the war I discussed the subject of purchases, naturally in the first instance with the Minister of Militia;

I discussed it also with the Minister of Naval Affairs, with the Minister of Trade and Commerce, and with other members of the Government who might be brought in one way or other more or less closely in touch with the purchase of supplies or materials out of the appropriation of $50,000,000 which was made at the August session of Parliament. We laid down the doctrine which has been followed as I understand, by the Minister of Militia, except in very exceptional cases, and for good cause, which has also been followed by my hon. friend the Minister of Trade and Commerce and by other members of the Government who have had to do with these purchases. The principle which we laid down and maintained was this: that we should purchase from the manufacturer or producer direct, and should avoid the services of middlemen and the increased cost to the country that would result from their services. I am speaking in the presence of my colleagues, who know how often this subject has been discussed between us, and who thoroughly understand the principle which the Government as a whole, and the Minister of Militia and the Committee of Council, have adhered to from first to last in this matter. After acting for a few weeks as Minister of Militia during the absence of my hon. friend (General Hughes) in September and October last, I wrote to him immediately on his return from Great Britain, as follows:

Ottawa, November 18, 1914.

Dear General Hughes,—When acting as Minister of Militia during your absence at Valcartier I instructed Colonel Fiset, Deputy Minister, that the use of outside agents and middlemen should be avoided and that contracts should be made directly with manufacturers so that any unnecessary commissions or increased prices might be avoided. This is undoubtedly the wise policy and is entirely in accordance with the principles laid down by our party during the years past. If for any good reason you may think it desirable in the public interest that a different course should be pursued in any particular instance by reason of conditions arising out of the war I hope that you will first consult me as I consider the principle to be of prime importance.

Yours faithfully,
R. L. Borden.

Major General,
The Hon. Sam Hughes,
Minister of Militia,
Ottawa, Ont.

To this letter Major General Hughes replied:

Ottawa, November 21, 1914.

Personal.

Dear Sir Robert,—Re the avoidance of outside agents, and middlemen;

I heartily agree with your position and have pursued it everywhere it was possible. In fact, in no instance has it been departed from excepting in relation to the Ford motors, and I have been repeatedly informed by that company that no matter whether we ordered one motor, or one thousand motors, they would not make any difference in price. However, I notified them, some time since, that they must recognize us, not as individuals, but as a Government. They have now, offered to the department, free, one motor, fitted up as an ambulance, and I hope we will get them down to their proper position.

Regarding motor trucks, as you are aware, everything had to be done on the jump for the first contingent. For this contingent, we have appointed a committee to go into the whole matter.

I instructed them not only not to recognize any middleman but to refuse to recognize what they call their "Canadian Agency," that is an agency desirous of holding back ten or fifteen per cent in some cases for their Canadian agents. I have had them notified that these are not for use in Canada, therefore no Canadian, merely as a middleman, is entitled to any consideration.

I may say that while in new York I secured the services of Major Owen Thomas, an English expert mechanical engineer, and he has been largely instrumental in showing us how to bring down prices to rock bottom. I am having other inquiries made and hope, in a few days, to be able to give you a rock-bottom report.

And now just a word on the purchasing, contracting and general business dealing of all our departments. Since my advent here I have, in the early days, watched my director of contracts with very much concern, and also his assistants. At the end of a very few months I was absolutely convinced that not only was he strictly honest and honourable, but he was as fair and judicious, in the interests of the people of Canada, as it is possible for a man to be. I have, therefore placed implicit confidence in him, but have not relaxed in the slightest in my personal supervision.

Faithfully,
Sam Hughes.

Last autumn certain matters were brought to the attention of the Government which I deemed to be of grave concern. It was alleged that fraud or imposition had been practised upon the Government in the transactions mentioned; and it is only right that I should inform the House and the country as to the action we took in regard to them. The Minister of Customs (Mr. J. D. Reid) came to me in October, and told me that certain rumours were afloat as to one man in particular who had declared to his employers that he had been forced to pay $500 as a political contribution in order that he might obtain an order from the Department of Militia and Defence. I wrote two letters on the day on which that came to my attention, one to the Minister of Customs and the other to the Solicitor General (Mr. Meighen). I will read these letters:

Ottawa, October 19, 1914.

Dear Dr. Reid,—In view of your statement to me as to representations made by Messrs. J. D. King and Company, of Toronto, the following course should be taken. As I understand it Messrs J. D. King and Company allege that in their endeavour to secure orders from the Department of Militia for shoes their representative, Mr. Acton, was forced to pay five hundred dollars and that it was represented to him that this contribution was for political purposes. According to information placed before me there is clear evidence of an intent to defraud the Government.

My attention has also been called by you to like allegations made by two other companies who desired to supply shoes to that department. You should communicate immediately with the Hon. Arthur Meighen, Solicitor General, and with Colonel Sherwood, commissioner of Dominion police, and the whole matter must be thoroughly investigated. I am sending a copy of this letter to Mr. Meighen with the further instructions that any persons concerned in any such attempt are to be prosecuted to the utmost limit of the law.

Yours faithfully,
R. L. Borden.

On the same day I wrote to Mr. Meighen this letter:

Ottawa, October 19, 1914.

Dear Mr. Meighen,—The enclosed copy of a letter to the Hon. J. D. Reid explains itself. I desire that you make a thorough investigation of the apparent attempts to defraud the Government which have been disclosed to him. For this purpose you will obtain such assistance as may be necessary from Colonel Sherwood, commissioner of the Dominion police. The Minister of Justice should be consulted whenever you may think it necessary. You have my authority and direction to prosecute to the utmost limit of the law all persons who appear upon reasonable information to have been concerned in such attempt.

Yours faithfully,
R. L. Borden.

I was afterwards informed by Mr. Meighen that upon investigation—and if I am not stating these facts correctly, I hope the Solicitor General (Mr. Meighen) will correct me—the person who had represented this payment to have been made for political purposes had really put his employer's money into his own pockets. When we ascertained these facts a warrant was sworn out against him, and he fled the country and has not since been heard from. Subsequently other matters were brought to my attention, and I wrote to Mr. Meighen exactly the same kind of letter, telling him, in addition, that in his endeavour to get at the bottom of such attempts to defraud the Government, he was to use all the powers of the law, employing the Chief of the Dominion Police and all the staff under his command, and to spare no expense for that purpose.

So far as these matters, or any other such matters, are concerned, what we propose to do in every instance is this—to investigate every suspicious case, and to exact restitution and punishment so far as the laws of this country will permit.

And let me say now, for the benefit of Parliament, and particularly for the information of persons throughout this country who may be concerned in selling supplies or materials to the Government, that if any man in Canada, be he Conservative or Liberal, proposes to commit any fraud or imposition upon the Government and people of this country, or to be concerned in any attempt for that purpose, especially in connection with the war vote, he should remember that there are courts of justice in this country, and that the doors of the penitentiary are yawning for every man who commits such an offence.

Now, in connection with supplies generally we have had under consideration more than once during the past two years a proposal to establish a general purchasing commission for all departments of this Government. I myself have discussed it with my colleagues, and I know that my colleagues have discussed it with the officers of their departments. No doubt hon. gentlemen on the other side of the House who were ministers and heads of departments know how difficult it is to get officials to agree that any such proposal is practicable or possible. Objections of one kind and another have been made, and nothing in that regard has been accomplished up to the present time, chiefly, if not altogether, for this reason; also owing to the fact that since we came into power the sessions have been long and very arduous, and that during the past eight months the conditions of urgency have been such that it was absolutely impossible to take up that general question in any effective way. The Department of Militia and Defence was, of course, never organized for the enormous work that is cast upon it at the present time. I have seen the officers of that department, especially the director of contracts, in a state of mental and physical exhaustion that was really pitiful, because of the tremendous amount of work imposed upon them. I have brought the director of contracts into my own office and asked him whether it would not be possible now, even under the stress of this war, so to reorganize his department as to safeguard the health of the men who are working there sometimes eighteen hours a day, Sundays included; and also more adequately to protect the public interest. But the difficulty has been that these men are absolutely submerged by the stress of work which is imposed upon them, and have no opportunity to reorganize their department. So it has gone on, and they have had imposed upon them not only the additional work caused by the furnishing of the supplies necessary for the Canadian expeditionary forces, but also the necessity of dealing with enormous contracts which the British, French and Russian Governments desire to place in this country, the inspection and arranging and handling of which cannot be done very effectively except through the officers of the Department of Militia and Defence.

One can readily understand that persons may desire from time to time to practise fraud or to impose exorbitant prices upon the Government through the very conditions which have arisen. I do not speak of that in a general sense, because I think that there are few people in Canada who would be guilty of anything so dishonest and unpatriotic. But we know that there are men who, even in time of war, will seek to make undue profits out of their business relations with the Government, even when all the people of the country are straining every effort and are inspired with the most patriotic desire to assist, and to sacrifice their own interests for that purpose. Let me point out to the House and to the country that this is not true of Canada alone; it is true of all other countries as well. It is true wherever human nature is what it has been in the past and what it is likely to be in the future. I have before me an article which appeared in the London Times on March 23 last. It is given a very prominent place in that great journal; it occupies two columns, and I may be pardoned if I read a brief extract from it:

> Is it not true to say that there is a most urgent call at the present time for satisfactory assurance that the money which is voted and the money which is given cannot flow too freely into the pockets of unscrupulous profit-seekers? It is the most natural and inevitable consequence of a system of "pay whatever has to be paid" and "have it done at once no matter what the cost" that excessive profit will be taken by some. There is no need to cite cases to prove that the evil exists, for no one doubts it; the disclosures which followed our last war are foundation enough for the general impressions which prevail in the minds of the people, and for suspicion which, perhaps, goes beyond what the facts warrant. The direct economic disadvantage is a serious matter, but the indirect results are of far more vital importance at the present time. It is not too much to say that this evil and the widespread suspicion it creates constitute a malignant growth which checks the free flow of blood to the nerve centres of our national effort.

It is desirable that I should state to the House the proposals of the Government as to further necessary safeguards in the expenditure of the appropriation of $100,000,000 which has been made by Parliament. I recognize at once that it is the duty of the Government, in view of the character of that vote and of the wide discretion thus conferred upon the Government, to see that the utmost possible care is exercised and that every possible precaution is taken in order that not one dollar of this large amount shall be expended otherwise than wisely and economically.

But before I come to a statement of the measures which the Government propose to take for that purpose, I have another duty to perform which is of a painful character. It is one which, nevertheless, must be discharged, however disagreeable it may be. It is one of the penalties of occupying a prominent position in public life that a man may be called upon to perform duties which his every instinct, so far as his personal feelings are concerned, would shrink from. In connection with the two members of Parliament to whom I have already alluded in relation to their connection with these matters. I think it is my duty to say a few words. I sent for Mr. A. De Witt Foster and asked him as to his connection with this matter, and why it was that he permitted himself to act as purchasing agent for the Government of this country. It is only fair that I should give to the House his side of the story, although I am bound to say that it was not satisfactory to me. He said that the county of Kings, N.S., which he represents in this Parliament, largely depends upon the apple crop; that there was no market for apples last autumn and that the people thought there might be some distress; that a great many persons in that county and elsewhere in Nova Scotia had horses which they might sell and that his constituents considered it unfair that horses should be purchased in other parts of the country where conditions were more fortunate than in the Annapolis valley and elsewhere in Nova Scotia, and that they should not be purchased in that province He said that he went to Col. Neill, the principal veterinary officer, and told him of this, and that Col. Neill informed him that the horses were being provided elsewhere, that no horses could be purchased at that time in the maritime provinces; that the matter was very urgent; that horses had to be procured at once; that arrangements had to be made elsewhere and they had been made elsewhere; and that was an end of it. On the following day, Colonel Neill telephoned him that some 600 horses were not forthcoming under the arrangements previously made, and that he would be very glad to have them purchased in the Lower Provinces; and he asked whether Mr. Foster would see that they were purchased with the least possible delay, and that the matter was urgent and it had to be done at once. Mr. Foster says he embodied the substance of that conversation in a letter which he addressed to Colonel Neill and the next day he accepted the duties and proceeded to discharge them. So far as Mr. Foster's connection with the matter is concerned, it should be taken into consideration that he is a very young man, altogether inexperienced in business, and that he is not shown to have profited in any way by the transaction. But I am bound to say that his explanation to me of his undertaking the duty and his explanation—if it could be called an explanation—of his failure to supervise in the most careful manner the expenditure of that money and to bring back to the Government an exact account, with vouchers, of every dollar that had been expended, must be regarded as far from satisfactory.

As far as the member for Carleton (Mr. Garland) is concerned, I have already alluded to the purchases by Mr. Powell. Mr. Garland was formerly the owner of the business which is now carried on by the Carleton Drug Company, as I understand . The business was transferred to an incorporated company, and I think we may fairly assume, without doing any injustice to Mr. Garland, that he is the principal person interested and concerned in that company. He had in his employ this young man, who was devoting 12 or 14 hours a day to his duties and who received a salary of $75 a month. He not only permitted, but he encouraged and assisted that young man to make a contract with the Government under which, within a few weeks, he acquired a profit of $9,000. I cannot for one moment give my sanction or approval to a transaction of that character, because, to say the least, it is bound to arouse a very grave suspicion; and a member of Parliament, in respect of contracts with the Government, ought to keep himself absolutely above suspicion. Therefore, in respect of the hon. member for Carleton and in respect of the hon. member for Kings, N.S., I feel that I owe it as a duty to the Government of which I am the head, to the party of which, in federal affairs, I am the leader, and to this House and to this country, to express, as I do here express, my very grave disapproval of their conduct in respect of the matters which have been under investigation by the Public Accounts Committee.

I return to the question of what may be done by the Government to make it absolutely sure, that there shall be given to the people of this country every possible safeguard as to public expenditure. It is perfectly true that, so far as the investigation of the Public Accounts Committee is concerned, nothing has been disclosed—so far as I am aware and I speak subject to correction—in respect of transactions other than those which occurred during the first six or eight weeks of the war. But, nevertheless, I realize and I think all members of the Government realize, the Minister of Militia himself realizes, that that department was not organized to perform the enormous amount of work that is imposed upon it at present. What has been the course taken by the Mother Country under similar conditions? In respect of such matters, the course taken by the Government of the Mother Country has been to call to the aid of the Government the best business ability of the country. The business men of that country have responded and splendid results have been thus obtained. The Minister of Militia himself, it is only just to say, at least two or three months ago brought this question before Council and urged upon Council the advisability of having his department assisted in this regard by a committee of three business men. In respect of some other matters, the Minister of Militia has taken a course along that line which has brought about most excellent results.

If the House will pardon me—my remarks have been extended beyond what I had at first contemplated—I wish to place before Parliament the record of what has been accomplished by the committee appointed in this country to fill orders which the British Government desired to place here, if they could be placed in Canada, for the supply of munitions. A committee was formed by the Minister of Militia in the early stages of the war, consisting at that time of Col. A. Bertram, Chairman ; Thos. Cantley, Esq.; Geo. W. Watts, Esq.; E. Carnegie, Esq., representing the manufacturers; Col. T. Benson, Master General of Ordnance, Col. Greville Harston, Chief Inspector of Arms and Ammunition; and Lt.-Col. F. D. Lafferty, R.C.A., Superintendent of the Dominion Arsenal, representing the Department of Militia and Defence.

I have asked the chairman of that committee to prepare a report of their work for the purpose of showing what can be done by a business organization of this character, through the co-operation of business men in this country. A report has been prepared by Mr. E. Carnegie, who has had experience in work of this kind in the Mother Country. He was appointed Ordnance Adviser of this committee. Having met him, I desire to bear my testimony to his ability and efficiency, which I think are very great. Colonel Bertram and indeed all the members of the committee have brought great industry and zeal to the discharge of their duties. I would not care to read this memorandum, but if my right hon. friend would permit, I would like to have it included in Hansard as part of my speech. The report comprises a great deal more than can be made public. The tables and statistics which were attached to it I have necessarily omitted, because we would not even ask the War Office for permission to publish them. I have struck out a few words in one place and made a few eliminations of matters that I thought, in the public interest, ought not to be made public. But, subject to that, I would like to give the report to the House, and I think hon. members will find it is of interest. The report is as follows:

Report on the Formation and work of the Shell Committee by David Carnegie, M.I.C.E., Ordnance Adviser.

To Sir Robert Borden,
Prime Minister of Canada,
Ottawa, Ont.

Introduction.

Soon after the declaration of war, the hon. Minister of Militia, General Hughes, was asked by the British Government, if he would place contracts on their behalf, for arms and ammunition, with the United States.

After having arranged certain contracts there for small arms, etc., he received an inquiry for 200,000 schrapnel shells, empty, in equal numbers of eighteen and fifteen-pounders.

Knowing that it would take about eleven years to complete such a contract in the Dominion arsenal with their existing equipment, he conceived the idea of utilizing the engineering factories throughout the Dominion for shell manufacture and immediately set in motion forces to accomplish this object.

It was with some reluctance that the manufacturers, at the call of the minister, responded to his suggestion, even though at that time many of their factories were practically idle.

The remarkable ability shown by the various manufacturers in converting their machine tools rapidly, to produce shells of the highest quality, not only surprised the Minister of Militia and those instructed by him to direct the manufacture, but convinced him that this new industry could be extended to the manufacture of the complete filled and fixed ammunition, including the shells, brass cartridge cases, primers, clips, cordite, powder, pellets and fuses. As a matter of fact, within a phenomenally short period, all these different parts, excepting the fuses (which are about to be manufactured), are now being produced in Canada, giving labour to thousands of men in different parts of the Dominion who would have been otherwise out of employment.

Details of the committee's formation, constitution and operation are given in the following pages. Tabulated facts of the materials used in the contracts and their value are also recorded, together with note on the progress and nature of the work involved in the various contracts handled by the committee.

2.—Formation of the Committee.

Before actually forming the committee, the Minister of Militia asked Colonel Greville Harston and Lt.-Colonel F. D. Lafferty, to get in touch with all manufacturers in Canada, who they thought could make the component parts for shrapnel shells. He particularly emphasized his desire to have the steel manufactured in Canada.

As a result, the following manufacturers were called to Ottawa to meet General Hughes, on the 2nd of September, 1914:

Col. A. Bertram, of Messrs. J. Bertram Son & Co., Dundas, Ontario; Geo. W. Watts, Esq., of the Can. Gen. Elec. Co., Toronto, Ontario; The Ingersoll Rand Drill Co., of Sherbrooke, Que.; Goldie, McCulloch Co., of Galt, Ont; E. Carnegie, Esq., of the Electric Steel & Metals Company, Ltd., Welland, Ont.

At a meeting of the above, the whole question was fully discussed. Lt.-Col. Lafferty described in detail the manufacture of the shells and their component parts, and Col. Greville Harston dealt with the system of inspection. Drawings and specifications were shown and explained, after which the meeting assured the minister that the work could be done in Canada.

On the 8th of September, 1914, at a meeting held by the minister at the Dominion Arsenal, the following committee was appointed to organize the work throughout the Dominion:

Colonel A. Bertram, Chairman; Thos. Cantley, Esq., Geo. W. Watts, Esq., E. Carnegie, Esq., representing the manufacturers; Colonel T. Benson, Master General of Ordnance; Colonel Greville Harston, C. I. Arms and Ammunition; Lt.-Col. F. D. Lafferty, R.C.A., Superintendent of the Dominion Arsenal, representing the Department of Militia and Defence.

Lt.-Colonel Lafferty undertook the technical instruction of the manufacturers in shell construction, and it was decided that the examination and inspection would be carried out by the chief inspector of arms and ammunition.

About two weeks after the organization of the committee, Mr. David Carnegie, of London, Eng., was appointed by the minister as ordnance adviser to the shell committee.

When it is recalled that at the time in question, the Minister of Militia was engaged in the colossal task of raising, training and equipping a contingent of Canadians for the "front," it is remarkable that he should have found time to think of the many factories throughout the Dominion which were idle and to devise such an efficient means of helping them and the British War Office. It is somewhat flattering to find that the British Government has recently followed similar plans for utilizing the manufacturers throughout England for the manufacture of shells.

The minister in selecting manufacturers to work with officers of his own department, combined the commercial and technical ability requisite and the results of his choice have proved already eminently successful.

To Colonel Bertram belongs the praise for the harmonious and efficient work of the committee.

3.—Work of the Committee.

The work of the committee in the early stages, was that of formulating definite plans of procedure. They determined that, as far as possible, all the materials employed in the shells would be made in Canada; up to that time, for instance, no Canadian steel had been used for the production of ammunition.

To Colonel Cantley the committee is under obligation for having rapidly installed and equipped plant for producing the first steel made in Canada for shell manufacture.

With the exception of the copper bands all parts of the shells now produced are made in Canada, and it is hoped that, before long, these also will be included amongst the Canadian industries.

Another important decision made by the committee was to supply to the shell assembling manufacturers, all the component parts of shells, free of charge. By this means many of the smaller manufacturers have been relieved of the financial strain of carrying a heavy stock of raw materials.

It was also decided that uniform prices would be paid for the same articles, thus eliminating unhealthy competition with its risks of faulty workmanship.

Perhaps an equally important decision was the appointment of an inspection company to deal with all shell components; this has taken the entire responsibility of inspection from the shell assembling manufacturers and has also given the shell committee the opportunity of satisfying themselves beyond any doubt that the component parts of shells are correct before the finished shell passes into the hands of the Government inspector.

Many other minor details regarding insurance, shipping, financing, etc., were decided, which have proved to be of great help in carrying on the work of the committee.

4.—Executive Work.

The executive work of the committee has been very wisely entrusted to the chairman, Colonel Bertram, who reports weekly to the Minister of Militia and also to the committee when it meets (which is usually monthly) or more often, at the call of the minister .

The work consists of controlling what might be regarded as a huge combination of factories, in which various contracts are being executed to British War Office specifications, which entails constant attention and queries regarding the selection of suitable factories, the placing of contracts, instructing manufacturers in the art, inspecting the parts made, and the payment and auditing of accounts, etc.

Before contracts are placed, the ability of the firm to carry out the work is fully investigated. If there is any question as to their plant being unsuitable, a competent inspector is sent to report upon the state of the factory.

To safeguard the interests of the committee and to insure the work being carried out in accordance to promise, contracts are placed subject to cancellation, if not carried out promptly.

Each manufacturer is supplied with a set of inspection gauges as a guide in making the manufacturing gauges required. They are kept to check the working gauges and are the property of the committee.

The preparation of drawings of the gauges for the various component parts of the different shells manufactured and the preparation of gauges and their distribution and use involve a considerable amount of labour.

The inspection of the various component parts, including the analyses of material, various physical tests calling for the employment of over 146 inspectors, besides four chief inspectors, show in some measure the nature and extent of this part of the work. Most of the inspectors employed are experienced machinists and tool makers who can be trusted to carry out the work thoroughly.

The final inspection of the finished shell is carried out by an army of nearly 200 examiners and district inspectors, under the direction of the chief inspector of arms and ammunition.

On receipt of a certificate that the shells have passed examination and have been packed ready for shipment, payment is made to the manufacturer.

A chartered accountant recommended by the general manager of the Bank of Montreal, checks the accounts of the committee every month. These are then forwarded to Mr. J. W. Borden, chief accountant for the Militia Department. It might be said in passing that the committee's accountant has expressed himself in gratifying terms of the highly efficient way in which the accounts of the committee are kept.

5.—Shell Contracts.

When it became generally known that shells were being manufactured successfully, the demands for contracts from all classes of manufacturers were very numerous, and it became necessary to inspect the factories to decide which were suitable for undertaking the work. Visits were made to them and it was found that a large number of additional factories could be usefully employed.

The ordnance advisor reported this matter and indicated how many more shells could be undertaken. The Minister of Militia called a meeting of the committee at Ottawa and, after discussing the matter, cabled to Lord Kitchner, pointing out that much larger contracts could be undertaken by the manufacturers in Canada. He emphasized the fact that many works were standing idle in the Dominion, while contracts were being placed in the United States for shells by the British War Office. This resulted in additional contracts for 18-pr. fixed ammunition, complete without fuses and empty 18-pr. shrapnel shells.

It was proposed by several of the manufacturers that a deputation from the committee should be sent to the War Office, London, to put their claims before the Secretary of State for War. The Minister of Militia decided, on the recommendation of the committee, to send Mr. David Carnegie, as he was familiar with the whole situation. It was also decided that he should visit Woolwich Arsenal and obtain the latest information on the various details in the manufacture of complete ammunition.

The result of his visit has been fully reported to the Minister of Militia, but it might be briefly stated here that the War Office officials did not fully understand the nature and importance of the committee's work, and had no idea that the factories in Canada were capable of undertaking such contracts, until these facts were placed before them.

Mr. Carnegie presented to the Master General of the Ordnance, General Sir Von-Donop, K.C.B. one of the first shrapnel shells made entirely of Canadian materials, excepting the copper band. He also informed the various officials at the War Office that it was the intention of the Minister of Militia and his committee, to make ultimately the copper bands in Canada. As a result of this visit, several additional large contracts have been placed with the committee.

The only material not made in Canada is copper, which, however, is mined and smelted in the Dominion and subsequently sent to the United States for refining.

Miscellaneous.

In addition to the foregoing, the Minister of Militia, through his committee, has made several investigations for the War Office in connection with the supply of propellants and high explosives. An investigation was undertaken regarding the supply of Nitro-cellulose powder by a large firm in the United States. Other matters have been investigated, such as the supply of rifles and ammunition for the Russian Government.

The Manufacture of Tri-Nitro-Toluene.

In addition to the manufacture of several thousand tons of cordite and powder in connection with the present contracts for shells, the Minister of Militia has been instrumental in initiating a new industry in Canada, viz: the utilization of the by-products from the coke ovens of the Dominion Iron and Steel Company, at Sydney, N.S., for the manufacture of the high explosive, Tri-nitro-toluene. The revenue alone from the contract placed with this company will be nearly three million dollars; but the value of having such an industry in Canada far outweighs any money value which can be named.

In conclusion, it is gratifying to relate that the quality and finish of the shells, cases, etc., made in the Dominion, are equal to, if not better than the British shells.

(Sgd.) The Shell Committee,
Alex. Bertram,
Chairman.

It must certainly be conceded that the results thus obtained by the formation of this committee are most gratifying.

What do we propose to do? We propose, as soon as this Parliament prorogues, to take up the question of the purchase of supplies under the appropriation of $100,000,000, and we propose to have a commission appointed of either one man or three men—I have not yet decided whether it would be better to have one or three—to deal with the whole question. If we select one man, we shall endeavour to get the best available business man in Canada for the purpose. If we select three men, the same qualifications will be required of them. We will get the very best that are available. We will select those men without regard to any consideration at all except to employ men of the ripest experience, the highest ability and most perfect integrity. Having selected that one man or those three men, we shall confide to them the whole direction and control of all supplies which are to be purchased under the appropriation of $100,000,000.

We believe that in that way we shall be able to safeguard most thoroughly and effectively the public interests of this country. We realize that the country is doing and has done its duty in the splendid response which is being made to the call for men, and in the magnificent patriotic fund which has been collected from all parts of the country for the purpose of providing for their dependents. We realize that the response to the call to arms is all the more impressive and important because it has been given freely and voluntarily. Parliament has also done its duty in giving to the Government a vote of $100,000,000 for carrying on the war. It remains for the Government of the country to do its duty; that is, to take such means and to employ such safeguards as will result in the wise and economical and efficient expenditure of that sum of $100,000,000, to the end that not one single dollar of it shall be lost or wasted, so that we may be enabled at another session of Parliament to give an account of our stewardship which shall commend itself not only to the members of this Parliament, but to the people of this country from the Atlantic to the Pacific.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: The House is called upon to approve three reports of the Committee on Public Accounts—the fourth, the sixth and the seventh. The fourth deals with binoculars and the sixth with horses; and these can be passed over without any more remarks at the present time. But I attach, and the House will attach, great importance to the seventh report, which is in these words:

In view of the evidence adduced during the course of their inquiry into the matters referred by the House to them, your committee desire to draw the attention of the House to the requirement for the inauguration of a system of purchase, inspection and audit that will adequately protect the country from irregularities and frauds.

I do not in any way begrudge the time that has been taken by the Prime Minister in dealing with these matters, for they are of great importance; but I am sorry to say that in view of the short time we are away from prorogation I must very materially curtail the remarks I had to make.

Perhaps I may be permitted to express my regret that in a matter of this kind my right hon. friend thought fit to resort again to the old tu quoque argument, and tried to create the impression, in fact be made the assertion, that the late Administration did not favour public investigations, but rather curtailed or prevented them wherever they could. In that part of his speech my right hon. friend cited two instances: one was a general proposition of my hon. friend from Peel (Mr. Blain), which was vague in terms and to no particular purpose, and which simply laid down a rule of conduct; the other was an exception taken in the Committee of Public Accounts in the year 1906 by the then Minister of Justice and the then Minister of Finance to a question which was put to a witness. That witness was asked to divulge certain matters of his own private business. To that question he took exception and the chairman then ordered him to answer; and on the exception being pressed the Minister of Justice and the Finance Minister of that day both thought that the witness should not be bound to divulge his own business secrets. It is impossible at this moment to review the whole case in connection with that, but, so far as I remember, the attitude which was taken by the then Minister of Justice and the then Minister of Finance was not at the time challenged in this House. In view of that fact, and in view of the character of the gentlemen who made the objection, I think my right hon. friend would have done better not to mention the matter at all. I have not the matter very fresh in my mind, but I think the Minister of Justice of that day must have been either Mr. Fitzpatrick, now Sir Charles Fitzpatrick, Chief Justice, or Mr. Aylesworth, now Sir Allen Aylesworth; I believe it was Mr. Aylesworth. Now, I appeal to the hon. members of this House who have known Mr. Aylesworth of the past, and Sir Allen Aylesworth of to-day, and who know of his character and ability as a jurist, whether an opinion of his should be lightly questioned. In the long list of those who have been incumbents of the position of Minister of Justice, from Sir John A. Macdonald's time down to the present day, I think I can fairly say that Sir Allen Aylesworth occupies a most eminent position. His ability as a jurist was never challenged, nor was his honour as a man ever questioned; and when he and Mr. Fielding, a man also of the strictest integrity, give their views on such a point, I repeat that it was not well advised on the part of my right hon. friend to bring their judgment into question six, or seven, or eight years after the event. This, however, is of little consequence. But if I were prepared to follow the matter a step further, I would remind the House that the late Administration did not hesitate to appoint, on mere newspaper rumours, a special committee, and to have the fullest possible investigation of all matters connected with the Transcontinental railway. But, Sir, it serves no good purpose to recriminate in order to justify oneself. Let us look rather to the business with which we have to deal.

Through a motion made by a gentleman on this side of the House, the junior member for Halifax (Mr. Maclean), the Public Accounts Committee was seized of questions which were not merely attracting but engrossing the public attention, and which it would have been criminal not to investigate at once, in order to satisfy the public mind. Impelled by the uneasiness in the public mind, and by that sense of duty which characterizes him, the junior member for Halifax asked the House to have these matters referred to the Public Accounts Committee, and since that time that committee has been investigating different matters. My right hon. friend says that very few losses to the country have been found: some $3,000 upon binoculars, and some thousands of dollars upon horses. But let me say, Mr. Speaker, that the Public Accounts Committee have been simply scratching the surface, and though they have been able to make only a very incomplete report, it is nevertheless of the most disturbing character.

My right hon. friend has referred at some length to the committee's report upon drugs. The only thing I have to say upon that matter is that it is evident, and it should have been evident to the department from the first, that the man who was dealing with the Government in drugs was not Mr. Powell, but his employer, who was to profit by the transaction. No man of common sense will believe that a junior clerk earning $75 a month could have entered into a contract of such magnitude as this. The matter is no longer in issue between us. The member of the House who tried to shield himself behind Mr. Powell did not profit much by that, but the fact is there. If any blame is to be attached to anybody, the Department of Militia and Defence was certainly remiss in not exercising its judgment and seeing that it was not the clerk, Powell, they were dealing with, but another man.

In that connection my right hon. friend has paid a high tribute to the officers of the Department of Militia and Defence. I have not a word to say against them; on the contrary, I endorse absolutely every word he says as to the high character of the staff of that Department. In respect of one of the officers, General Jones, I endorse every word that was said by my right hon. friend. The evidence of Mr. Shaver is of no account in this matter. Whether Mr. Shaver aspersed the character of General Jones or did not is of no consequence at all in connection with the question we have to investigate to-day; because, whether Mr. Shaver did or did not tell the truth, the fact remains that the department entered into a transaction with Powell which, on the face of it, was fraudulent. As to General Jones, I understand that his fellow-officers do not believe the aspersions upon his character, and I agree with them. General Jones is a gentleman of the highest character; he is a son of one of my oldest friends, and, being the son of his father, he could not be anything else than an honest and honourable man. But the simple fact remains that the Department of Militia exercised no judgment and no discretion in contracting with Powell. It must have known from the first that Powell was not the contractor, but that the real contractor was the man behind him.

At one o'clock, the House took recess.

The House resumed at three o'clock.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: Speaking of the purchase of horses, my right hon. friend the Prime Minister this morning stated that when the Government came into office they followed the system which they had found established by their predecessors. The system itself was right, but it so happened that the principal agent chosen for this important duty was not fit for the task entrusted to him. My right hon. friend stated that the Government were not responsible for the selection of Mr. A. De Witt Foster, the hon. member for the electoral district of Kings, N.S.; but they cannot escape their responsibility constitutionally; they are responsible before the public. They say they did not know of the selection of Mr. Foster, and I of course admit at once, since the Prime Minister has given us his word for it, that the Government did not at the time know of the appointment of Mr. Foster; but it is difficult to understand how Mr. Foster could go on purchasing and expending something like $73,000 without the Government knowing that he was spending this money. Seventy-three thousand dollars to buy horses is not spent in a day; such an expenditure must cover a period of some weeks if not months. The Government must have been in receipt daily, certainly weekly, of reports from Mr. Foster and his agents, which would show to them that this man, whom they had not selected, who they now believe was not fit for the task entrusted to him, and who, by all rules of propriety, should not have been entrusted with the task, was spending the money of the country from day to day, and yet no action seems to have been taken to put a stop to his usefulness or want of usefulness. The Prime Minister stated that Mr. Foster had not been as fortunate as he might have been in his selection of assistants. It so happened that Mr. Foster fell in with those members of the community who are to be found everywhere, the horse breeder and the horse trader. The horse trader in this case—and there were more than one—proceeded in the manner of David Harum, the model horse-trader: he did to Mr. Foster what David Harum did to all those with whom he came into contact; that is, he acted on the principle, "Do unto the other fellow as the other fellow would do unto you, but do it first." My right hon. friend was very indignant, and he told us in tones of thunder that if there was any law and justice in the land, the men who had so abused the confidence of Mr. Foster would find it hot for them and would be put into the penitentiary. If any one is to go to the penitentiary for these transactions, I do not think it probable that it will be the horse-trader who sold to Mr. Foster spavined horses and old mares that had been rejected as being too old at the time of the South African war. There is an old Latin saying: Caveat emptor—let the buyer beware. If the purchaser bought these spavined and old horses, then the fault is not so much upon the man who did the selling as upon the man who accepted the animals.

Mr. J. D. REID: It was not sworn to that there was a horse purchased that had been refused at the time of the South African war as being too old.

Mr. McKENZIE: It was sworn to.

Mr. GAUVREAU: It is too late now to make denials.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: It is not worth while discussing whether the statement is true or not true; I believe it is beyond doubt; or at all events, we have been so informed. But when the Prime Minister this morning estimated the amount that the country has lost on account of horse purchases at $3,000, he was very short in his calculation, because if we take into account all the spavined horses and exhausted animals which were shot at Valcartier, I believe the loss of the country must run into thousands of dollars. Be this as it may, I do not think I should be very severe upon my right hon. friend on this account, because it is always hard for a man to have to speak as he did this morning. When he came to speak of Mr. Foster, he said that he was sorry that he had to speak harshly of that gentleman. It seems to me, therefore, that the condition with regard to the whole transaction is this: the seller will be sent to the penitentiary if he is to be sent anywhere at all, and the buyer will be sent to the desert like the scapegoat of old, laden with all the sins of Israel and of the party. It is manifest that there was a carnival of corruption and graft in the Department of Militia and Defence in regard to the purchase of horses, boots, drugs, bandages, motor-trucks, to speak of nothing else—that on all these things the country was defrauded. I do not pretend that this is absolutely a country of angels; I am prepared to say that there has been a great deal of graft and corruption in this country, but if graft and corruption are criminal at all times they are doubly criminal in war time. The men who defrauded the Government put all our troops in danger and our successful participation in the war also in danger, and for this there can be no excuse and no possible pardon.

Mr. J. D. REID: Might I interrupt the right hon. gentleman? Why did he not prosecute grafters at the time of the South African war, when there was far more graft?

[Sir Wilfrid Laurier.]

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: I was prepared for this coming back, because the tu quoque argument is the only argument with my hon. friends opposite. The people expected, when they put my hon. friends in office, that they had done away with fraud; that my hon. friends would live up to their professions, and that in these matters they would not do what they charged us with doing.

Mr. REID: We left your appointees in office.

Mr. GAUVREAU: Sit down; you will have your turn.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: In regard to investigations by commissions of inquiry, they ought to be carried on in the light of day and not behind closed doors as some have been under this Government. I call the attention of the House to two commissions in particular; the Transcontinental Railway Commission and the commission of Mr. Ferguson, of which we heard yesterday, those investigations have been conducted behind closed doors. No opportunity was given to the men attacked in Mr. Ferguson's report to defend themselves. I complained of this yesterday, and to show my hon. friend the condition of things, I want to quote to the House a telegram received this morning from Mr. Cruise by the hon. member for Edmonton:

Winnipeg, Man., April 14, 1915.

Hon. Frank Oliver,
House of Commons,
Ottawa, Ont.

Ferguson's report concerning me absolutely false in its two essentials. First, I was a bona fide homesteader and not a squatter; secondly, I had twenty-six horses besides my cattle, as my application for patent shows and as Ferguson knew when he made his report. Will go to Ottawa if necessary. Wire me Royal Alexandra.

R. Cruise.

I appeal again to the fairness of the men who sit on the other side of the House. Mr. Cruise is a respected member of this House. He has a good reputation in his own constituency and in that whole section of country in which he is well-known. He was attacked here yesterday in his absence, which is bad enough, but he was not called by the Commissioner to answer to the charges made against him. Is that fair play?

Mr. MEIGHEN: I know the right hon. gentleman does not wish to be unfair. Mr. Cruise was called, and was also represented by counsel at the inquiry.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: Was he examined on this point?

Mr. MEIGHEN: Mr. Cruise was examined. He claimed that this transaction was bona fide, and Mr. Ferguson reports that he so claimed, but finds against him.

Mr. ROCHE: Mr. Cruise swore that he had fifteen head of his own cattle and bought seven, giving his promissory note, to make up the twenty that were necessary. He said nothing about any more.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: Did he not say that he had twenty-six horses?

Mr. ROCHE: No, there was not one of these horses on the land he was homesteading.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: That is what he says at all events. If he was examined, then I withdraw what I said. But I said it in support of my contention that these investigations should be held in public and everybody should have an opportunity of being heard. Does the Solicitor General deny the proposition that these investigations should be held in public? Is he prepared to say that men can have the justice to which they are entitled if such investigations are held in secret, as this was? Everybody who has an innate sense of justice must agree with me that an investigation that is not made in the open light of day is not a proper investigation nor one upon which we can place reliance. It is an axiom of British justice that no person shall be condemned unless he has had an opportunity of being heard. If Mr. Cruise was heard in this investigation there are others who were not heard, who had no opportunity of being heard, and who were equally condemned. If we are to have investigations which will purify public life, as I hope we shall, then I insist as a condition absolutely essential that these investigations shall take place with open doors, and that every man whose name is brought before the commission shall have an opportunity to give his own version. When this is done we shall have something like justice.

We have been told also that the Government is going to prosecute the offenders, and the resolution we are now considering states that restitution must be demanded from parties who are found in the wrong, and the Department of Justice is entrusted with this duty. I have this to say to the Solicitor General, who represents the Department of Justice on this occasion, that if in these prosecutions the Department of Justice shows no more diligence, no more justice and no more fair-play, than it has shown in the case of the land owners at Valcartier, who for the last six months have been claiming their money and have not got it, then the offenders will have a good chance to go scot free. Twice before, and now for the third time, I have called the attention of the Government to the claims of these land owners who in the months of August and September last were deprived of their property, being called upon to give way to the necessities of the occasion, but who up to this day have not received the money to which they are entitled. I first called attention to this matter in the latter part of February. I was then told by the Minister of Militia in the presence of the Prime Minister and the Minister of Justice that most of these cases had been settled and that those that had not been would be settled very soon. I received a letter on the 25th of March from Mr. Cannon of the firm of Taschereau, Roy, Cannon, Parent & Fitzpatrick, who represents a number of these settlers, including Frank McLaughlin, Hugh Bowles, Madame Veuve Conway, Thomas Thompson, Michael Woodlock and Joseph Griffith, and I received a letter the following day from a widow, Mrs. Richard Smith, and up to that date these people had not received their money. I quoted letters going back to the month of November showing that they had refused to take what was offered them and had asked that the Government should at once proceed in the Exchequer Court; and yet no relief has been granted.

Major General HUGHES: I understand that there is an understanding that this debate is to end with the speech of the leader of the Opposition. One would think that common decency—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Major General HUGHES—would demand that no controversial matters be introduced into his speech. The Prime Minister understood that no new matter was to be introduced.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: I do not know about common decency; I leave that to my hon. friend; but I do know something of common sense, and if we are not to talk of controversial matters, what is this debate for?

Major General HUGHES: There is an understanding that the debate closes with the speech of the right hon. gentleman, so that there is no chance to reply to him.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: Certainly, the debate ends with my speech.

Mr. SPEAKER: It seems to me that this is going a little outside the record. We are dealing with a report of the Public Accounts Committee.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: I am just pointing out that the report recommends that the prosecution of offenders should be referred to the Department of Justice, and I am stating in your presence, Mr. Speaker, and before this House of Commons, that if the Department shows no more diligence in prosecuting offenders than it has shown in paying the creditors of the Government, the offenders will have a chance of going scot free.

Mr. SPEAKER: In that I think the right hon. gentleman is within his rights, but to take up these cases which are not before the House, and which were not before the committee—

Some hon. MEMBERS: They were before the committee.

Mr. SPEAKER: I did not so understand it.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: On the 26th of March I had the promise of the Prime Minister that court proceedings in these matters would be taken. I called the attention of the Prime Minister and of the House to the fact that these men could not go to court; if they could they would have done so long ago, but it is wholly in the hands of the Government to bring these matters to court. I had a telegram from Mr. Cannon yesterday saying that to his knowledge these men have not been paid nor have proceedings been taken. Is that so, or is it not so? I have no opportunity to speak except on this occasion, for the House is to close in a few minutes. I ask, not as a matter of courtesy but as a matter of justice to these men and women, that, if the Government will not pay their claims they should be at once submitted to the court. That was promised on the 26th of March, and it is now the 15th of April, and still no understanding with these people has been reached.

Mr. MEIGHEN: This is a matter that comes not under my department, but under the department of a minister who is out of the House at present. From what information I have, however, I believe that the summonses have been issued, but considering the time that it has been before the Department of Justice, the matter could not be in court yet.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: I have received the following telegram from Mr. Cannon:

> Telegram received. Kept in house through sickness since eight days. As far as I know, Valcartier clients have received neither money nor information.

As I have said, I must hurry, because time is precious. I wish to refer to the last report of the Committee on Public Accounts, which recommends that a system of purchasing should be established. My right hon. friend, speaking on this subject this morning, turned towards the hon. member for Kingston (Mr. Nickle), who, I understand, is the author of that suggestion, and said that men could not be made honest by legislation. That is very true, but legislation, if it cannot make men honest, certainly can minimize the effects of dishonesty, and that is all we can hope for. One of the last things we discussed during the last session of Parliament was the patronage list. I am free to say that all Governments since Confederation have had a patronage list; it is an evil to which my Government has to plead guilty, in common with all Governments before my time. The Government of Sir John Macdonald and that of Mr. Mackenzie had patronage lists. If there ever was a time when the patronage list should be dispensed with, it is the present; if ever a Government should dispense with a patronage list, the Government of the day should dispense with it. This Government should have said to all those who wanted to do business with it that there should be no political partisanship thought of and that orders would be given to the lowest tenderer. That has not been done.

Major General HUGHES: Does the right hon. gentleman know that it has not been done? I challenge him to name a Liberal in the Dominion of Canada who was ever refused an opportunity to tender, if he was qualified to do so.

Mr. MACDONALD: He was never asked.

Major General HUGHES: I beg the hon. gentleman's pardon. Caldwell of Lanark and fifty other Liberals are contractors today.

Mr. W. H. BENNETT: Let me tell the hon. gentleman—

Some hon. MEMBERS: Order.

Mr. MACDONALD: In my county, if a Grit doctor certifies to the physical condition of a man going to the war he is driven from the job, and a Tory is put in his place.

Major General HUGHES: The hon. gentleman refers to men who are only country practitioners?

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: I accept the correction of my hon. friend the Minister of Militia, who says that there is no patronage list in his department at the present time.

Major General HUGHES: Not since the war began.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: Whether or not there has been no patronage list in his department since the war began, everything has been worse since the war began. This is the report made by the Public Accounts Committee the other day, which was unanimously agreed to:

> In view of the evidence adduced during the course of their inquiry into the matters referred by the House to them, your committee desire to draw the attention of the House to the requirement for the inauguration of a system of purchase, inspection and audit that will adequately protect the country from irregularities and frauds.

It is the opinion, therefore, of the Public Accounts Committee that the system which has prevailed in the Militia Department since the war began does not protect the country against irregularities and frauds. That is enough to serve the purpose of my argument. We should have a new system; whether it should be established by legislation or not I do not know. At all events, the opinion of the committee was that something should be done. The Prime Minister stated this morning that in order to meet these views he was going to have a purchasing agent; he did not say whether the commission would consist of one person or of three persons. Whether it consists of one or of three may not be material, though I prefer three. We have the right to insist that henceforth in the Department of Militia all purchases of supplies shall be made by calling for tenders, and that no favours shall be extended to anybody. If we are to gain anything from this discussion or from the report of the committee, that is what we ought to insist upon. I promised my right hon. friend that in view of the work which we have to do I would abridge my remarks, and I intend to do so. Of course, it will be necessary for me to omit many material things which I would have dealt with.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: Let me tell my right hon. friend that there is considerable time; he need not abridge his remarks too much.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: Very good. If there is considerable time, there is one thing which I should like to discuss for a few minutes. There has been considerble talk of an election. I persist in the position that I have taken all along in regard to this matter. I have no opinion or suggestion to offer to the Government with regard to whether or not they should hold an election; that is their own business. We on this side of the House have endeavoured during the present session to forget as much as possible that we are party men.

Some hon MEMBERS: Oh, oh.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: Do hon. gentlemen believe that if we had not tried to avoid party controversy during this session we should be within half an hour of prorogation at this moment? There are many subjects which should have been debated, but we did not debate them. There are many matters which we should like to discuss on this very occasion, but we refrain from doing so because, though we are party men, we believe and have believed all along that the one thing which should engross our attention at this time is the war in which we are now engaged. I repeat that I offer no suggestion to the Government in regard to an election; that is their own concern. My hon friend the Minister of Public Works the other day gave as a reason for going to the country the fact that the Senate chose, not to reject, but simply to amend or vary, a resolution, of this House. Nothing could be more flimsy than such a pretense as that. The Minister of Public Works said that the people were demanding dissolution in a voice of thunder because the Senate had dared to amend a resolution adopted unanimously by this House. But my hon. friend did not tell us that the resolution which we were then considering had been amended not only by the Opposition in the Senate, but by the Government as well. I was not aware of that at the time, but on looking over the proceedings of the Senate of March 31, I find that Hon. Mr. Lougheed moved, seconded by Hon. Sir Mackenzie Bowell:

That the said message be further amended by adding to the first section of the suggested enactment the following subsection:

Nothing herein contained shall affect the powers of Parliament under the British North America Act, 1886.

Here were two amendments: one suggested by the Opposition and one by the leader of the Government in the Senate. One of these amendments is considered to be treason, but as to the other no adverse criticism is offered. This shows that the Senate took a nobler and broader view of their duty than gentlemen on the other side of this House are disposed to do. The Senate discarded my opinion, as they discarded the opinion of hon. gentlemen on the other side of the House, and the senators have shown an example of independence rather than of partisanship. But what does it matter? What do our little difficulties matter in the face of the great issues with which we are now confronted in the present war? We are party men, but under the present circumstances what we on this side of the House insist upon is that the troops who are going to the front to defend as noble a cause as ever engaged the attention of man, as noble a cause as any for which men have ever shed their blood, shall be as fully equipped as Canadian money and Canadian science can equip them, so that they shall discharge their duty in a manner worthy of their ancestors, take their full share in the struggle, and bring back peace and glory in the triumphant folds of their flag.

Major General HUGHES: Nothing would delight my heart more than to have a short time in which to assist in the digestion of the utterances of the right hon. the leader of the Opposition; but, as there is an arrangement between the two sides of the House and prorogation is at hand, I am compelled to reserve my utterances for the public platform. But let the right hon. leader of the Opposition rest assured that I shall have no hesitation in stepping into his own province on any platform he may choose, to discuss these questions on any and every occasion that he may select. I will select them if he does not.

Mr. PUGSLEY: Will Colonel Allison be along?

Major General HUGHES: And Flint will possibly have my hon. friend retained. I will not take up the time of the House, as there is an understanding to secure prorogation, and if I got started it is very hard to tell when I would stop. I shall content myself with telling the right hon. leader of the Opposition that I will take every opportunity of discussing these matters on the public platform throughout the length and breadth of the country.

Mr. BUREAU: I hope to see you in Three Rivers.

Motion agreed to.

QUESTIONS.

[Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk.]

DISTILLATON OF GRAIN.

Mr. LOGGIE:

1. Has the Government received a letter or a circular from the Womens Christian Temperance Union, protesting against the great waste of valuable grain, which is being converted into intoxicating liquors?

2. If so, is it the intention of the Government to take such means as will prevent the grain that is said to be now worse than wasted, being used for food instead?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER:

1. Some members of the Government have received a letter or circular from the Women's Christian Temperance Union protesting against the great waste of valuable grain by its conversion into intoxicating liquors.

2. The Government has not come to any conclusion on the matter, and has not, as a matter of fact, yet given it consideration.

WAR TAX STAMPS.

Hon. T. CHASE CASGRAIN (Postmaster General): I wish to answer a question put to me by the hon. member for Three Rivers (Mr. Bureau) in relation to the postage stamps that bear across their face the words "war tax." I may tell the hon. gentleman and the House that, after due deliberation, the department have come to the conclusion that the postage stamps which bear upon their face the words "war tax" may be used as postage.

Mr. PUGSLEY: The stamps which are furnished to banks, although they are for cheques and notes, etc., are postage stamps with the words "war tax" upon them. It does seem to me to be an anomaly to use a postage stamp as a stamp upon a receipt or note. Is that intended?

Mr. CASGRAIN: They are being used in the meantime until the Inland Revenue Department has had time to print their own stamps.

Mr. PUGSLEY: I have seen a postage stamp on a bottle of soda water marked "war tax."

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: Is my hon. friend sure that it was soda water?

Mr. PUGSLEY: Yes, and I looked around for the Minister of Trade and Commerce to partake of it with me.

QUEBEC AND SAGUENAY RAILWAY COMPANY.

Mr. LEMIEUX: Yesterday I put a question to the right hon. gentleman who leads the House as to whether an Order in Council had been passed concerning the payment of a subsidy or guarantee of bonds to the Quebec and Saguenay Railway. I think that the right hon. gentleman perhaps did not catch the name of the railway, and I wish to refresh his memory and to know whether or not this Order in Council has been passed. I am informed it has been. Perhaps the Minister of Finance would tell me.

Mr. WHITE: I understood the Prime Minister, in reply to my hon. friend, to say that no Order in Council had been passed.

THE HIGH COST OF LIVING COMMISSION.

Mr. PUGSLEY: I should like to ask the Minister of Labour, whom I am glad to observe in his seat, a question upon a subject of very great importance and of very great interest to the people of this country. A long time ago, recognizing the great rapidity at which the cost of living was increasing, this Government, upon the recommendation, I understand, of the Minister of Labour, appointed a commission to inquire into the matter. I should like to ask the minister to inform the House what information has been gathered, what the commission has done, whether it is still at work, and when we may expect the report?

Mr. CROTHERS: I do not think there is sufficient time at my disposal to tell the House all that has been done by the commission appointed to inquire into the high cost of living. However, I may state in a general way that the commission took evidence at various places throughout the country. One of its members was assigned to the work of gathering certain information, and he has been at work on that for seven or eight months, but about a month ago he had to quit work, as he was run down both physically and mentally. In his enthusiasm he had overworked himself, and his physician compelled him to take a rest.

Mr. PUGSLEY: What is his name?

Mr. CROTHERS: Mr. Coats, one of the best men in the service of this Government, an enthusiast, and highly skilled in the gathering of statistics; in fact, I do not think he has an equal in Canada. He has been working at the report, with the assistance of another gentleman in the Labour Department, for seven or eight months. He was compelled about a month ago to take a rest, but, in order to try and get the report out while this House was in session, he again took up the work much sooner than he should have done. I have gone over various portions of the report, and I can promise the House that it will be the best piece of work of its kind ever published; it will be a classic, which will be read by economists throughout the civilized world, and which the people of Canada will be proud of. I think the report will be published about the middle of next month; that is the very best Mr. Coats can do. However, it will be worth waiting for, and I can assure the members of this House that when it is published we shall have the best report on the question that has ever been given to the public in this or in any other country.

SOLDIERS' VOTING BILL.

The House proceeded to consider amendments made by the Senate to Bill No. 111, to enable Canadians on active military service during the present war to exercise their electoral franchise.—Hon. C. J. Doherty, Minister of Justice.

Mr. DOHERTY: The Senate has returned this Bill with two amendments. By one of them it is provided that there shall be appointed by the Governor in Council six scrutineers, three on the nomination of the leader of the Opposition and three on the nomination of the Prime Minister. In substance these scrutineers are to be entitled to be present at all the operations connected with taking of the vote and to have all the powers that the representatives of candidates have at any poll held in this country. They are to have the additional power of appointing deputies who shall have all the same powers that they themselves have with the exception of the power of appointment. That is almost in the exact words, at all events it is clearly on the lines, of a clause that was put forward tentatively by myself in this House with a view of endeavouring to meet what I had understood to be suggested by the leader of the Opposition. The amendment, however, goes farther than that and proposes to amend a provision that is made in the Bill as passed by this House respecting the notice to be given by the officers before taking the vote. That provision reads as follows:

> At least eight days' notice in writing of the date and place where the vote of such volunteers will be taken shall be given to the said scrutineers by the regimental officer who will collect the votes as aforesaid, such notice to be addressed to such scrutineers in the care of the Secretary of the High Commissioner for Canada in London if the regimental officers are in Great Britain, to the care of the Canadian Commissioner in Paris if the said regimental officers are in France, Belgium or Germany.

In my judgment this last provision makes the amendment as a whole unacceptable. I think a brief reflection will make it clear that in so far at all events as the troops who may be on the continent of Europe are concerned, the operation of sending notice, that the ballots have reached the officer who is going to take the votes, back from that place to the office of the Canadian Commissioner in Paris in order that from that office there may be sent back to the place where the votes are going to be taken notice of the appointment of a scrutineer, creates a situation in which the delay may be so long that it may be impossible to have the voting put through. By reason of the disposition in regard to this notice, it would be impossible to accept the amendment as suggested. This delay would be obviated by providing that the notice shall be given in a manner analogous to the method already provided in the Act as it passed this House, that is that there should be a notice to the company, and once you have provided for the appointment of the scrutineers it would seem to be quite proper that in addition special notice should be given to the scrutineer who would be on the spot. That will go much more rapidly and much more promptly. I shall have to move that this amendment, as it comes to us from the Senate be not concurred in but that the Bill be amended in effect so as to secure what is the real object of the appointment of these scrutineers and to make simpler and more direct the method of giving notice to them of the holding of the poll.

The second clause of the amendment proposes that there shall be inserted in the Bill a provision that no proceedings shall be taken or had under sections 2 to 4 inclusive of this Act until a declaration has been obtained from the Secretary of State for War of Great Britain that a full and fair vote of such volunteers may be taken without prejudice to military discipline and without interference with the efficiency of military operations, and that the same be duly proclaimed in the Canada Gazette. For reasons that have already been given in this House upon the proposal of an amendment practically identical with this, it does not seem to me, or to the Government, that this proposed amendment would be acceptable. Indeed, it does not seem to us that there is any reason why any action outside of the action of this Parliament in the ordinary course should be required to give effect to these particular sections. But we attach great importance to the passing into law of these sections of the Act and in order to avoid if possible their being defeated by an absolute refusal to concur in this amendment in full, and while we decline to accept this amendment, we are prepared to offer an alternative, the alternative being that in so far as these particular clauses are concerned, they shall not come into operation until assent to them has been given by His Majesty in Council and that assent proclaimed in the Canada Gazette. It seems to us that if any outside authority should be required to bring this Bill, or any part of it, into operation, other than the usual authority which sanctions the Acts of this Parliament, the only authority to whose assent it should be submitted is His Majesty himself. Therefor I beg to move:

> That a message be sent to the Senate informing their Honours that this House doth not concur in the amendments made by Their Honours to Bill No. 111, to enable Canadians on active military service during the present war to exercise their electoral franchise, and that this House doth propose in lieu thereof that this Bill be amended by adding to subsection 2 of section 2 the following:
> There shall be appointed by the Governor in Council six scrutineers, three to be so appointed upon the nomination of the Prime Minister and three upon the nomination of the leader of the Opposition; such appointments to be made within ten days of such nominations respectively. One of each nomination may be present at the distribution of ballot papers and envelopes, the marking of affidavits, the marking of ballots, the closing of envelopes and the posting of the same, and may exercise all the rights which may under the Dominion Elections Act be exercised by candidates or their representatives at any poll. The actual travelling and living expenses of such scrutineers, at a rate to be fixed by the Governor in Council, may be paid out of the Consolidated Revenue Fund, and they shall be afforded facilities for the performance of their duties. The said scrutineers may name such number of deputies as they may deem necessary, and said deputies shall have and be entitled to exercise the powers herein above conferred on said scrutineers;

And that in subsection 2 of section 2, the following words be inserted after the word "votes" in line 10 of the second page:

And shall give, in addition to the general notice, a special notice to any person whose ap pointment as a deputy scrutineer under the provisions hereinafter made has been notified to him, and shall permit any scrutineer or deputy scrutineer so named to be present at said proceedings, in the absence of any such scrutineer or deputy scrutineer on behalf of either party.

And further that the Bill be amended by adding immediately after section 3 the following:

3A. sections 2 and 3 of this Act shall not come into force until a proclamation by His Majesty in Council declaring them to be in force shall be published in the Canada Gazette.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: With regard to the first amendment, I would think there would be no objection either one way or the other; and if it is satisfactory to the Government, I have no objection to it; but with regard to the second amendment, there is a principle involved. Do I understand that this Bill is to be sanctioned partly by the Governor General and partly by the King?

Mr DOHERTY: As I understand it, this Bill as a whole will be sanctioned by the Governor General, but one of the provisions of it is that certain sections shall not come into operation until the assent of His Majesty in Council is expressed to it. This particular Bill itself provides a special condition for two sections of it being operative. The suggestion that came from the Senate was that the operation of these sections should be held up awaiting the expression of approval of one particular minister of His Majesty's Government. For reasons to which I need not again refer, we did not think it a right or proper thing to do, and for my part I do not think there is any necessity whatever for this provision for the assent of His Majesty; but because we want to go as far as we possibly can, perhaps even farther than we should, to avoid this legislation being defeated, we are willing to suggest to Their Honours of the Senate that in lieu of the provisions they suggest making the operation of the Bill subject to the assent of one of His Majesty's ministers, we should have a provision making it subject to the assent of His Majesty himself

Mr. W. F. MACLEAN: Does not that mean that the British Cabinet would have to assume the responsibility for the operation of this legislation?

Mr DOHERTY: It is made subject to the assent of His Majesty in Council, and the Parliament of Canada by this declares that it is willing, with regard to these two particular clauses, that they should not go into operation until His Majesty in Council, which as the hon. gentleman says, is the British Cabinet, expressess approval in the manner provided in the Bill. As I said, it is not that it seems to us necessary or even proper to make such provision, but we do attach such great importance to avoiding the substantial withdrawal of this measure that we are willing to go to this, which I may describe as the extreme length, to meet the views of the Senate, and to submit to this condition imposed on us to the effect that this Act should not go into operation solely because the Parliament of Canada so wills.

Motion agreed to.

On the return of the Bill from the Senate,

Mr. SPEAKER: I have the honour to inform the House that the Senate doth not insist on the amendments made to Bill No. 111, intituled An Act to enable Canadians on active military service during the present war to exercise their electoral franchise, but doth concur in the amendments made by the House of Commons to the said Bill without any amendment.

DOMINIONS TO PARTICIPATE IN PEACE TERMS.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: May I ask whether the Government have any information to give to the House in regard to the despatch which has appeared in the press that the Dominions will be called upon to participate in the peace proposals?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: The communication that appeared in the press is genuine.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: Is it too late to lay the official communication on the table of the House? Perhaps it might be given to the press.

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: It already has been published.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER: Substantially as received?

Sir GEORGE FOSTER: Yes.

After which His Royal Highness the Governor General was pleased to close the Fifth Session of the Twelfth Parliament of the Dominion of Canada with the following Speech:

Honourable Gentlemen of the Senate:

Gentlemen of the House of Commons:

In relieving you for the present from your arduous duties I desire to thank you for the diligence and zeal with which you have discharged them, and especially for the timely and effective measures which you have taken for necessary co-operation with the United Kingdom and the other Dominions of His Majesty in the tremendous war which has been forced upon our Empire. It is my earnest prayer and my firm hope that the aid thus promptly and generously given will contribute, in no small measure, to that complete and unmistakeable success of the allied arms which alone can bring an honourable and lasting peace.

As this great struggle proceeds there is no abatement in the intense earnestness and determination of the Canadian people to unite their efforts with those of all the British dominions for the maintenance of our Empire's integrity and for the preservation of its institutions and liberties. From Atlantic to Pacific the splendid response to the call for men has fully equalled all anticipations.

In common with all the people of this Dominion, I have been proud to learn that the Canadian soldiers have shown conspicuous bravery and efficiency in the field of battle, and that they have borne themselves worthily when fighting side by side with the best troops of the Empire.

Gentlemen of the House of Commons:

In His Majesty's name, I thank you for the liberal provision you have made for carrying on the affairs of the country and for meeting the necessities of the war under the trying conditions which it has brought about.

Honourable Gentlemen of the Senate:

Gentlemen of the House of Commons:

I bid you now farewell, in the earnest hope that the terrible conflict in which the Empire is engaged may be brought to a speedy and favourable conclusion, and in the firm belief that our country under the blessing of Divine Providence, will then resume unchecked that career of marked progress and abundant prosperity which it is destined to enjoy.

The Speaker of the Senate then said:

It is His Royal Highness the Governor General's will and pleasure that this Parliament be prorogued until Tuesday, the 25th day of May next, to be here holden, and this Parliament is accordingly prorogued until Tuesday, the 25th day of May next.
