FREDERICTON, N. B., September 3, 1884. J. E. Collins on English-Canadian Literature.

Mr. Joseph E. Collins, the rathe clever but eccentric editor of the now defunct Fredericton Star, who is now engaged in literary work at Toronto. contributes an article to the Week, on English Canadian Literature, in which fearless criticism and patronizing adultation, are curiously combined. Mr. Collins starts out with the proposition that there is no Canadian Literature, and then he hammers away in criticism and adultation combined as we have said, to the extent of two and a half columns, "There is no Australian Literature," says Mr. Collins, "no Heligoland Literature, no Rock-of-Gibraltar Literature : neither is there a Canadian Literature. A number of books have been written by English-speaking colonists here, but the majority of them have the tone of the kitchen of the empire the histories are the record of happen ings which are regarded only with respect to their relation to the Motherland : the fiction and belles-lettres, generally, have the limits of the municipality and the flavor of the log-hut. I suppose some will call this 'an attack on Cana dian Literature, but it is really nothing of the kind to say anything else would be inaccurate, to expect anything better. absurd. AT SAN PEDRO.

In M. mothingle I. B! He saw her for the first time in a Mis ston street car and his impressions were not preposessing. There was something too imperious in the quick wave of her hand as she signalled the car, and her step was tery positive and aggressive. The perfect health which blossomed in her cheek spiritled in her eye, and revealed took in the case carries of a realed itself in the easy carriage of a firmly molded figure, in his sight possessed an element of unlady-like audacity.

David Woodbury had been in San Franciseo only a fortnight, but he had already made up his mind, with the swift decision which cometimes characterizes Massachuwomen of California. They were an innocertain delicate, spiritual cast not uncommon among New England families. He selected now with an invalid's fretful persistency, that he could not recall one who had even remotely approached the buoyant health and general physique of when last they met, for, struggling against the inward tissues that had been ruptured, did their work of healing, and he rose from his couch, if not absolutely sound, with chances for a long life about as good as the average man's.

The season at San Pedro was usually prolonged this year. More than one

Yet he had, so far, attained only the in teresting stage of a sick man's existence tween him and the outside world, and the herves are easily jarred by contact with the unaccustomed or unexpected.

Lost in reflection, he failed to observ that a gray-haired woman, meanly clad and carrying a heavy bundle, had entered the car, and stood wearily against the door. The car was closely packed from front to rear. There seemed a singular lack of the customary gallanty which appears to be a second nature to most Californians.
