House of Commons Debates

FIRST SESSION—TWELFTH PARLIAMENT.

. HOUSE OF COMMONS

WEDNESDAY, November 15, 1911.

To-day being the first day of the meeting of the first session of the Twelfth Parliament for the despatch of business, Thomas Barnard Flint, Esq., M.A., LL.B., D.C.L., Clerk of the House of Commons, Lieutenant-Colonel Henry Robert Smith, sergeant-at-arms, Jean Baptiste Rene Laplante, Esq., assistant clerk, and Arthur Henry O'Brien, M.A., law clerk, commissioners appointed by Dedimus Potestatem for administering the oath to members of the House of Commons, all attending according to their duty, James G. Foley, Esq., Clerk of the Crown in Chancery, delivered to the said Thomas Barnard Flint a roll containing a list of the names of such members as had been returned to serve in this parliament.

The aforesaid commissioners did administer the oath to the members who were present, which being done, and the members having subscribed to the roll containing the oath, they repaired to their seats.

The Clerk of the House said: I have the honour to inform the House that I have received the following communication from the secretary of His Royal Highness, the Governor General:

Office of the Governor General's Secretary, Canada.

Ottawa, Nov. 16, 1911.

Sir,—I am commanded by His Royal Highness the Governor General to inform you that the Chief Justice of Canada, in his capacity as Deputy Governor General, will proceed to the Senate Chamber to open the session of the Dominion parliament, on Wednesday the 15th inst., at three o'clock.

I have the honour to be, sir,
Your obedient servant,
H. C. LOWTHER, Lieut.-Colonel,
Governor General's Secretary.

The Clerk of the House of Commons.

A message was delivered by J. de St. Denis LeMoine, Esq., Acting Gentleman Usher of the Black Rod:

Gentlemen of the House of Commons:

It is the desire of His Honour the Deputy of His Royal Highness the Governor General that you attend him forthwith in the Senate Chamber.

Accordingly the House went up to the Senate, when the Speaker of the Senate said:

Honourable Gentlemen of the Senate:
Gentlemen of the House of Commons:

I have it in command to let you know that His Royal Highness the Governor General does not see fit to declare the cause of his summoning the present parliament of Canada until the Speaker of the House of Commons shall have been chosen according to law; but, to-morrow, at the hour of three o'clock in the afternoon, His Royal Highness will declare the causes of calling this parliament.

And the House being returned:

ELECTION OF SPEAKER.

Hon. R. L. BORDEN (Prime Minister). Dr. Flint, as the representative of the Crown has just reminded us, with the commencement of a new parliament, it becomes necessary for this House to elect a Speaker. It is not necessary to remind the House that the Speaker occupies a position of very great dignity and importance. In the earlier days of constitutional development he was not only the spokesman of the House of Commons, but he was the champion of their rights against aggression or invasion by the Crown when the rights of the representatives of the people in parliament had not been so firmly established, and were not so clearly understood as they are at present. But in these later days the chief function of the Speaker is to preside over the deliberations and debates of this House, and that the position calls for qualities of intellect, and of temperament, and for experience in the rules and procedure of the House is undoubted. The Speaker must represent fairly both sides of the House, and he must be impartial, firm, courteous, and, above all, patient. I submit to you the name of Thomas Simpson Sproule, member for East Grey, as one who possesses all these qualities in an eminent degree. Dr. Sproule has been a member of this House in every parliament since 1878. He has sat with almost every minister of the Crown who has been a member of any government since confederation. His devotion to his public duties has been pre-eminent, and those of us who have been his colleagues in the past know that he has made an especial study of the procedure and rules of the House, and has on all occasions manifested a very complete acquaintance with them. It is, therefore, with the greatest pleasure, and in the confident hope that the selection will command your approval that I move, seconded by Mr. Foster:

That Thomas Simpson Sproule, Esquire, member representing the electoral district of the East Riding of the county of Grey, do take the Chair of this House as Speaker.

Rt. Hon. Sir WILFRID LAURIER. Dr. Flint, it is the privilege of every administration, after a general election, especially when the administration has such a large majority at its back as the present administration has, to select from the members elected one who, in their opinion, is a fit and proper person to discharge the important duties of Speaker of this House. My hon. friend (Mr. Borden) has just moved that our old friend and colleague, Dr. Sproule, be elected Speaker as the candidate selected by the government. I have no exception to take to anything that has been said by my hon. friend opposite (Mr. Borden) in his appreciation of the merits of Dr. Sproule. On the other hand, I cannot but say, and I must say it with frankness, that I am surprised at the selection which has been made by the government, not from any want of qualification on the part of the hon. member, not that I mean to say anything derogatory to him—far from it—but from the circumstances out of which the present administration has come into office. In England, in the mother and model of all parliaments, it is an established rule, unwritten, but with the force of written law, that whenever a man has been selected and elected as Speaker, he is Speaker for ever—elected after a new election, re-elected again until removed by death or disabled by disease. That system has certainly a good deal to be said in favour of it, and ought to commend itself to the judgment of the House in preference to our own. The system which has been followed in England has this advantage, that it trains the occupant of the Chair for the great position he has to maintain, and that he learns from the experience of every year, and of every parliament. We know ourselves from what has taken place in this House that however well qualified to act as Speaker a man may be by training, and by education, he has much to learn from actual experience in the Chair.

These things occurred to me when I had the honour to occupy the seat now occupied by my hon. friend (Mr. Borden) and after the general election of 1908 I communicated with the Hon. Mr. Sutherland, who had been Speaker in the parliament of 1904, and asked him to again become the Speaker of this House. For reasons personal to himself, and for political reasons as well he would not accept, and I communicated my application, and the reasons for its refusal by Mr. Sutherland at the first opportunity. Then on my own motion, my hon. friend from Bonaventure (Mr. Marcil) was elected and filled the Chair with ever increasing dignity, impartiality and ability. After the election which has just taken place, and in which the principle fought for by the victorious party was the maintenance of British institutions, which were very much threatened, it appears, by the possible acceptance by the Canadian people of a harmless and innocent trade agreement, it would have seemed to me that the first thing to be done by my hon. friend was to put himself in accord as much as possible with British institutions, and that according to British precedent he would have moved into the Chair my hon. friend the member for Bonaventure (Mr. Marcil). British institutions, now that the victory has been won, are relegated to the backyard, there to be buried in dust and ignominy, to be resurrected and polished and re-furbished whenever a new election occurs. We have been familiar with such things in the past. Loyalty has always served a good purpose for the Conservative party in election times—and has then been forgotten.

Since, however, the principle of British institutions is to be departed from on this occasion, perhaps it is quite in the fitness of things that the hon. member for East Grey (Mr. Sproule) should be selected to be the Speaker of this House. I repeat that I have no exception to take to what has been said by my hon. friend (Mr. Borden) as to the ability of the hon. member for East Grey. He and I are among the oldest members of the House; we have been sitting opposite one another for many years—if my memory serves me aright, for more than 30 years. I can bear testimony that he is able, painstaking, hardworking, conscientious according to his light, although his light is not my light. But, Sir, my hon. friend is of the human race, and therefore is not perfect. He would not, I think, find fault with me if I should say that in my estimation he has some weaknesses, but after an acquaintance with him of 30 years I must say in all kindness to him, that the only fault I find with him, the only weakness I find in him is that he is a Tory, a Tory of the Tories, the very quintessence of Toryism. I do not say that in anger, I say it in sorrow, and deep sorrow, but I know it is not his fault, it is his misfortune, he could not be anything else, even if he tried. But I am sure, at all events I hope, that when he takes the Chair in this House he will leave on the floor of it his Toryism, that his Toryism will not ascend the Chair, and that in the Chair he will be the impartial servant of the House.

But, if I am surprised that my hon. friend the leader of the government has selected my hon. friend from East Grey to be the Speaker of this House, still more surprised am I, still more surprised must everybody be, that the selection has received the endorsation of my hon. friend the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Monk) and my hon. friend the Postmaster General (Mr. Pelletier), Nationalist representatives in the government. If my hon. friend from East Grey (Mr. Sproule) were to read as assiduously as I read the Nationalist press he would know what a bad man he is, he would know that according to the Nationalist press, and according to Nationalist orators also, he is so bad that it is a crime for a member of the Liberal party, or any party, especially the Nationalist party to vote with him on any division. He would have learned that in 1905 there was a conspiracy between him and me, when autonomy was being granted to Alberta and Saskatchewan, to deprive the Catholic population of their schools, and the French settlers of their language. All this, and much more was written and spoken during the last campaign, and yet on this day, this very day, the first of the session, my hon. friend is the chosen candidate for the presidency of this House of the Nationalist party. In this they give us the measure of what we are to believe of their denunciations, and they show how easily they can swallow their principles if what they speak and write can be dignified with the name of principles.

Mr. BORDEN. Dr. Flint, my right hon. friend (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) has not received the proposals of the government with the best possible humour, but I suppose that under the circumstances we should not have expected that he would have been in much better humour than he has shown himself to-day. After all he has indulged in a more or less rambling speech with regard to the proposal made, and in the end he has admitted that the gentleman proposed by the government is a gentleman entirely worthy of the very high honour which it is proposed to confer upon him. I would like to say to the right hon. gentleman (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) that he has already begun to give evidence of the fact that he is ready to preach in opposition that which he did not practise in power. His speech was full of surprises, surprises that certain dissensions which he had hoped to see in the ranks of hon. gentlemen on this side of the House had not made themselves manifest. His appeal in that regard was unworthy of the right hon. gentleman, but the exhibition which he has given to-day is no new incident in his political record. I would like to tell him that so far as hon. gentlemen on this side of the House are concerned, they are, without exception, so far as I am aware, willing to support the nomination of the gentleman whom I have named, and if the right hon. gentleman desires to test that, the opportunity is open to him now. I can only add that nominations of this kind have in the past been received in a somewhat different spirit from that which the right hon. gentleman has exhibited to-day; but I would like to say finally that under all the circumstances every allowance should be made to the right hon. gentleman for the ill temper which he has shown on this occasion.

The motion being put to the House,

The Clerk of the House declared the motion carried in the affirmative, nemine contradicente, and Thomas Simpson Sproule, Esquire, member for the electoral district of East Grey, duly elected to the Chair of the House.

Mr. Sproule was conducted from his seat in the House to the Speaker's Chair by Hon. R. L. Borden and Hon. George E. Foster.

Hon. THOMAS S. SPROULE (Speaker-elect). I beg to tender to this House my sincere and hearty thanks for the high honour it has conferred upon me by electing me as its Speaker. It will be my pleasure, as well as my duty, to endeavour to deserve that high honour by dealing with all questions which come before me in my official character with firmness and with impartiality. I am fully sensible of my unfitness for the position, but I rely confidently upon the co-operation of hon. members on both sides of this House to assist me in maintaining our rights and privileges and in preserving our rights and privileges, and in preserving the freedom and dignity of debate, according to ancient usage.

The sergeant-at-arms then placed the Mace on the Table of the House.

On motion of Mr. Borden, House adjourned at 3.40 p.m.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

THURSDAY, November 16, 1911.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

Mr. SPEAKER. I have the honour to inform the House that I have received a communication from the secretary of His Royal Highness the Governor General as follows:

Ottawa, 15th November, 1911.

Sir,—I have the honour to inform you that His Royal Highness the Governor General will proceed to the Senate Chamber formally to open the session of the Dominion Parliament on Thursday, the 16th inst., at three o'clock.

I have the honour to be, sir,
Your obedient servant,
H. C. LOWTHER, Lt.-Col.,
Governor General's Secretary.

The Honourable the Speaker of the House of Commons.

A message was delivered by J. de St. Denis LsMoine, Esquire, Acting Gentleman Usher of the Black Rod, as follows:

Mr. Speaker, His Royal Highness the Governor General desires the immediate attendance of your honourable House in the Chamber of the honourable the Senate.

Accordingly the House went up to the Senate Chamber.

Then the Hon. Thomas Simpson Sproule, Speaker elect, said:

May it please Your Royal Highness:

The House of Commons have elected me their Speaker though I am but little able to fulfil the important duties thus assigned to me. If, in the performance of those duties, I should at any time fall into error, I pray that the fault may be imputed to me, and not to the Commons, whose servant I am, and who, through me, the better to enable them to discharge their duty to their King and country, humbly claim all their undoubted rights and privileges, especially that they may have freedom of speech in their debates, access to your Royal Highness's person at all seasonable times, and that their proceedings may receive from your Royal Highness the most favourable consideration.

The Hon. the Speaker of the Senate then said:

Mr. Speaker, I am commanded by His Royal Highness the Governor General to declare to you that he freely confides in the duty and attachment of the House of Commons to His Majesty's Person and government, and not doubting that their proceedings will be conducted with wisdom, temper and prudence, he grants, and upon all occasions will recognize and allow their constitutional privileges.

I am commanded also to assure you, that the Commons shall have ready access to His Royal Highness upon all seasonable occasions, and that their proceedings, as well as your words and actions, will constantly receive from him his most favourable consideration.

Then His Royal Highness the Governor General was pleased to open parliament by a speech from the Throne.

And the House being returned to the Commons Chamber.

Mr. SPEAKER. I have the honour to state that the House, having attended on His Royal Highness the Governor General in the Senate Chamber, I informed His Royal Highness that the choice of Speaker had fallen on me, and, in your names, and on your behalf, I made the usual claim for your privileges which His Royal Highness was pleased to confirm to you.

THE SPEECH FROM THE THRONE.

Mr. SPEAKER. I have the honour to inform the House that when the House did attend His Royal Highness the Governor General this day in the Senate Chamber, His Royal Highness was pleased to make a speech to both Houses of Parliament. To prevent mistakes I have obtained a copy, which is as follows:

Honourable Gentlemen of the Senate:
Gentlemen of the House of Commons:

It is with much satisfaction that I meet, for the first time, the parliament of Canada, and avail myself of your advice and assistance in the fulfilment of the important charge which has been entrusted to me by His Majesty the King. I can assure you that I esteem it a privilege to be called upon to administer the affairs of this prosperous and growing Dominion, and to associate myself with you in the important duties which you are about to approach.

It affords me great pleasure to congratulate you upon the continued and increasing prosperity of the country. Our trade, both with British and with foreign countries, is rapidly expanding, and there is every prospect that its volume in the present year will be largely in excess of that attained at any time in the past.

Although there has been some damage to the crops in certain districts, the harvest has on the whole been abundant, and it is believed that the returns to the husbandman will exceed those secured in any previous year.

The results of the census taken during the present year will be laid before you, so far as they have been tabulated. While the increase in population has not fulfilled all the sanguine expectations that had been formed, yet it has been substantial and encouraging.

You will be pleased to learn that the revenues for the current fiscal year have, up to the present, largely exceeded those during any similar period in the past, with every prospect that this increase will be maintained.

The advantages that would result from a wider exchange of products between the various countries of the empire are undoubted, in view of the wonderful variety and extent of those productions, and negotiations have been opened for improved trade arrangements with the British West Indies and British Guiana, which should prove advantageous to those colonies as well as to this Dominion.

The importance of providing our country with better highways is manifest. A Bill will be introduced for the purpose of enabling the Dominion to co-operate with the provinces in the accomplishment of this desirable object.

It is essential to recognize that, in a country possessing so great an area of fertile land as that with which this Dominion is happily endowed, the great basic industry is agriculture. My advisers are convinced that the time has come when greater aid and encouragement should be given to those who are engaged in the cultivation of the land. To this end, a measure will be introduced under which it is hoped that there may be co-operation between the Dominion and the various provinces, for the purpose of assisting and encouraging our farmers to secure the best results in production, and at the same time preserve the fertility of the soil.

A measure will be introduced revising and consolidating the Acts relating to the inspection of grain and providing the means by which the government can secure, through a commission, the control and operation of the terminal elevators upon the Great Lakes.

A Bill will be introduced to establish a permanent tariff commission, whose duty it shall be to ascertain, by investigation and inquiry, such information as will furnish a more stable and satisfactory basis for tariff legislation than has heretofore been available.

Bills will also be laid before you with respect to the Department of External Affairs, the Archives and other subjects.

The selection of the best route for the Hudson Bay railway is engaging the attention of my advisers, and an announcement will be made to you of the result of their inquiry.

Gentlemen of the House of Commons:

The accounts of the last year will be laid before you.

The balance of the estimates for the current fiscal year, as well as the estimates for the coming year, will be submitted for your approval at an early date.

Honourable Gentlemen of the Senate:
Gentlemen of the House of Commons:

I commend the subjects, which I have mentioned, to your best consideration, and I trust that your deliberations, under the blessing of Divine Providence, may tend to the welfare and good government of this Dominion.

MEMBER INTRODUCED.

Duncan Orestes Alguire, Esquire, for the electoral division of Stormont, introduced by Hon. Mr. Foster and Hon. Mr. Reid.

DEBATE ON THE ADDRESS.

Mr. BORDEN moved:

That the speech of His Royal Highness the Governor General to both Houses of Parliament of the Dominion of Canada, be taken into consideration on Monday next.

He said: It was our intention to have proceeded to-morrow, but I understand from hon. gentlemen on both sides of the House that it would be regarded as somewhat more convenient if the debate were proceeded with on Monday.

Motion agreed to.

Mr. BORDEN moved:

That the order for the consideration of the motion for an address to His Royal Highness the Governor General in reply to his speech at the opening of the session have precedence over all other business except the introduction of Bills until disposed of.

Motion agreed to.

SELECT STANDING COMMITTEES.

Mr. BORDEN moved:

That a special committee be appointed to prepare and report with all convenient speed lists of members to compose the select standing committees of this House under Rule 10, such select committee to be composed of the following members: Hon. Mr. Borden, Sir Wilfrid Laurier, Messrs. Reid (Grenville), Monk, Pugsley, Stanfield and Pardee, and that the portion of Rule 10 limiting the number of members of said committee be suspended in relation thereto.

He said: I would like to say in connection with this motion that I think hon. members on both sides of the House have realized in the past that several committees as constituted hitherto have been too large. The Railway Committee, for example, in the last parliament, consisted, if I remember the figures accurately, of 205 members out of a total membership in this House of 221. So, it was much easier to name a committee by saying that it should consist of all the members of the House except the sixteen gentlemen who happened not to be appointed as members of it. I would like to have the views of hon. gentlemen on both sides as to whether or not this can be corrected. It would seem to me that if we name about fifty or sixty members on the Railway Committee the other standing committees such as Privileges and Elections, and Banking, and Commerce could be restricted to from twenty-five to forty members, with the result that probably more responsibility would be felt by the members of the committees, the relative attendance would be larger, and on the whole better work would be accomplished. I take the opportunity of mentioning this now so that my right hon. friend may consider it, and if he wishes give us his views upon it. We can also have the ideas of hon. gentlemen on both sides of the House as to whether this reform, as I think it is, cannot best be accomplished at the present time. Under the arrangement which I would feel inclined to propose, every member of the House would be on two committees and on no more, whereas hitherto it has been the practice to appoint certain members of the House upon three or four, or even five committees. I make the suggestion now in order that we may elicit the opinion of hon. members generally with regard to it.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. The remarks of my hon. friend in presenting the motion are quite apposite under existing circumstances. The older members of the House have recognized that the committees would be more useful, and more practical were the membership restricted. If all the committees were of equal importance, the reform would be more easy to accomplish, but we know that some committees are recognized as being more desirable than others for membership on them. However, I presume there will be a general expression of opinion from all the members on the matter.

Motion agreed to.

INTERNAL ECONOMY COMMISSION.

Mr. BORDEN presented to the House a message from His Royal Highness the Governor General.

Mr. SPEAKER read the message as follows:

His Royal Highness the Governor General transmits to the House of Commons an approved Minute of Council appointing the Honourable Frederick Debartzch Monk, Minister of Public Works; the Honourable George Halsey Perley; the Honourable John Dowsley Reid, Minister of Customs, and the Honourable William James Roche, Secretary of State, to act with the Speaker of the House of Commons, as commissioners for the purposes and under the provisions of the eleventh chapter of the Revised Statutes of Canada, 1906, intituled: 'An Act respecting the House of Commons.'

On motion of Mr. Borden, House adjourned at 3.55 p.m. until Monday.

CONTROVERTED ELECTIONS.

Mr. SPEAKER. I am informed by the Clerk of the House that on the 18th September last he received from the Hon. Messrs Justice Malouin and McCorkill, two of the judges selected for the trial of election petitions pursuant to the Dominion Controverted Elections Act, a report relating to the election for the electoral district of Chicoutimi and Saguenay declaring the said election null and void.

Bill (No. 2) to amend the Juvenile Delinquents Act, 1908.—Mr. Bickerdike.

MARRIAGE ACT AMENDMENT.

Mr. LANCASTER moved for leave to introduce Bill (No. 3) to amend the Marriage Act. He said: Mr. Speaker, the Bill which I have placed in your hands speaks for itself, and the best explanation I can give of it is to read it. It reads as follows:

The Marriage Act, chapter 105, of the Revised Statutes of Canada, 1906, is amended by adding thereto the following section:—

Every ceremony or form of marriage heretofore or hereafter performed by any person authorized to perform any ceremony of marriage by the laws of the place where it is performed, and duly performed according to such laws, shall everywhere within Canada be deemed to be a valid marriage, notwithstanding any differences in the religious faith of the persons so married and without regard to the religion of the person performing the ceremony.

2. The rights and duties of the respective persons married as aforesaid as married people, and of the children of such marriage, shall be absolute and complete, and no law or canonical decree or custom of or in any province in Canada shall have any force or effect to invalidate or qualify any such marriage or any of the rights of the said parties or their children in any manner whatsoever.

I would draw attention to the fact that a duty has been thrown upon parliament in this matter by a decision of one of the courts in one of the provinces of Canada. I do not think that this House, or the country cares a rap whether that judgment is well founded or not on provincial law, what the national interests require is that no such doubt shall be raised in any part of the civilized world in regard to the validity of any marriage ceremony regularly performed in Canada. The people of Canada have recently dealt with very important matters, but such a question as reciprocity pales into insignificance compared with the great national question involved in this decision, and I have no doubt that when the House has considered the matter it will pass either this Bill, or some similar measure embodying the same principle.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the first time.

DOMINION ELECTIONS ACT AMENDMENT.

Mr. LANCASTER moved for Bill (No. 4) to amend the Dominion Elections Act. He said: This Bill is required because of the very unfair result of legislation passed by the late government shortly after they took office in 1896, the result of which has been that in one or two of the provinces voters have a right to vote in more than one constituency, while in all the other provinces they are limited to one vote for one member of parliament only, a most unfair and unjust discrimination in favour of one or two provinces against the rest of the provinces. Like many other Acts of the late administration that Act requires to be rectified in the interests of the people of Canada in order that we may have proper legislation and proper means of electing our legislators without any unfair advantage to one province or one part of the country in its representation in this federal tribunal.

The Bill therefore reads as follows:

1. Section 10 of the Dominion Elections Act, Revised Statutes of Canada, 1906, chapter 6, is amended by inserting at the beginning of the said section the words 'Subject to subsection 2 of this section,' and by adding to the said section the following subsection:—

Section 2 of the section of the Bill I am now introducing, reads :

2. No person shall vote in more than one electoral district for the same year, and if by the laws of any province he is entitled to vote in more than one electoral district he shall for a Dominion election be entitled to vote only in the electoral district in which he is domiciled at the time of the election.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read for the first time.

RAILWAY ACT AMENDMENT.

Mr. LANCASTER moved for leave to introduce Bill (No. 5) to amend the Railway Act.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Explain.

Mr. LANCASTER. Briefly, this is the same legislation which was introduced by me two years ago and which was discussed in the House and upon which a party vote was taken. I have no doubt that the present government will adopt the Bill because at that time every man of the Conservative party in the House voted for this legislation which was defeated by a party vote at the instance of the government of the day, which thanks to Providence is now in opposition. Those who were not in the House when this legislation was formerly discussed are entitled to a little explanation. The object of the Bill is to remove a very unfair taxation upon municipalities in regard to the protection of level crossings. As the law is to-day the municipality has to pay a portion of the cost of protection, the railway company a portion, and the Dominion of Canada a portion, so that the municipality pays twice : once as taxpayer to the Dominion and also as a municipality. This Bill provides that unless a municipality, in order to get some extraordinary and special protection makes a special agreement, the Railway Commission shall not put upon the municipalities any cost of the protection when the railway persists in running on the King's Highway, or, what is commonly known as a level crossing. I am in hopes that the Bill will be passed by a vote of the majority of this House as at present constituted.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the first time.

ADDRESS IN ANSWER TO THE SPEECH OF HIS ROYAL HIGHNESS.

The House proceeded to the consideration of the speech of His Royal Highness the Governor General at the opening of the session.

Mr. R. B. BENNETT (Calgary) moved :

That a humble address be presented to His Royal Highness the Governor General in reply to the speech from the Throne.

He said, Mr. Speaker, the constituency which I am privileged to represent in this House—a constituency which comprises within its boundaries the third largest city west of the Great Lakes—is deeply sensible of the high honour conferred upon it by the selection of its representative to move that an address be presented to His Royal Highness the Governor General, thanking him for the gracious speech with which he has been pleased to open the first session of the twelfth Parliament of Canada. The very title 'His Royal Highness' by which the Governor General is designated, gives cause for satisfaction and congratulation to Canadians. For the first time in the history of our world-wide empire the parliament of an overseas Dominion has been opened by a Governor General who is a member of the reigning family—a Prince of the Blood Royal. We can assure His Royal Highness that if he esteems it a privilege to be called upon to administer the affairs of this prosperous and growing Dominion and to associate himself with us in the important duties which we are about to approach, we appreciate the honour that has been conferred upon our country by his appointment which implies a recognition of the growing importance of this Dominion as a part of the British Empire, and of the loyal devotion of the Canadian people to the Throne and person of His Majesty the King. But we welcome His Royal Highness not only because of His Royal birth and high station, not only because he is the brother of our late beloved Sovereign whose solicitude for the welfare of his subjects and devotion to the cause of peace have given him in history the name of Edward the Peacemaker; not only as the sole surviving son of that great Queen and mother whose name and fame are the common heritage, not of the ciitzens of our own empire only, but of the people of all countries and all nations; not ony because he is the representative of our King and Emporer, but because of those matchless qualities of heart and mind that have ever endeared him to those with whom during a long and successful official life he has been associated. We are reminded that the beginning of his military career found him offering his services to His Sovereign for the protection of our own country from threatened invasion and that whether actively participating in great battles on the burning sands of Egypt, holding high military command in India, Ireland and Malta, or as an administrator or the special representative of his Sovereign on high diplomatic missions, he has ever brought to the discharge of those multitudinous and onerous duties, great abiltity and great tact and the manifestation of a spirit of patriotic devotion and self sacrifice that has commanded alike the affectionate regard, the respect and admiration of his fellow countrymen; while his illustrious consort has been the exemplification of all those virtues that are inseparably connected in our minds with the words 'home and mother.'

To many of us, it seems but fitting that a member of the Royal Family should open a new Parliament, with a new government with a clear mandate from the people on a great issue, indicating in no uncertain terms a settled conviction that the Canadian people would consider no trade proposals that menaced, even remotely, their fiscal and national independence, or threatened to lessen the strength of the ties that bind them to the British Empire, or rendered for a moment more difficult the realization of the hope that lives in all of us for the commercial and organic union of that empire.

Mr. Speaker, the risk was real and the danger imminent. I doubt not that when the proposals to which I have referred were first introduced, they were regarded merely as trade proposals; but when it was ascertained that in their ultimate results they involved the whole future of Canada, then it was that the national spirit of our people was aroused. I venture to think that the right hon. gentleman who so successfully leads the opposition in this House would not have introduced those proposals if he could have foreseen that there would have arisen around them an agitation, the results of which were so vital to the imperial and natioal future of the country. While I mention the name of the right hon. gentleman, may I be permitted to tender to him my sincere congratulations upon his having attained another anniversary of his natal day, with the expression of the hope that he may be long spared faithfully and illustriously to serve the state in the position which he at present occupies.

Mr. Speaker, in that portion of this great Dominion in which I am privileged to reside, a very substantial portion of our population has come from the great republic to the south, and one of the strongest reasons I had for opposing the reciprocity agreement was that it threw into the melting pot for solution a question that involved a problem in patriotism. When we remember that so large a portion of our population came from that great republic, where they inherited traditions that were at least not favourable to monarchial institutions; when they learned through the medium of the American press, that, however, much their former political parties differed with each other, they showed unanimity in favour of these proposals, and when they found American public men preaching a doctrine that indicated that the consequences of this agreement would be the absorption of western Canada at least by the great republic, and at all events rendering impossible for all time the commercial and organic union of those overseas dominions and the motherland which comprise the British Empire, it was little wonder that these people allied themselves with those who were in favour of the reciprocity pact. But it is a pleasure for me to say on behalf of these new settlers that as soon as they discovered that the Canadian people were not in favour of the agreement, they responded to the prevailing sentiment, and made it apparent that they proposed to devote their time and energies to the upbuilding of this great country just as they had done in the land from which they came; and, as they are settlers who are accustomed to pioneer conditions, they are enabled, now that this question is settled for ever, to assist us in laying the foundations of a great state, and in building up in western Canada a country which will at no distant day be the greatest part of this great confederation. That is, I think, a cause for congratulation and for rejoicing.

The speech itself indicates an earnest desire on the part of the government to at once realize the responsibilties to western Canada. We in the west have produced abundant crops. Our contribution to the wealth of the state this year will not be less than $200,000,000 by a population of a little more than a million, and it is but natural that we should look for some lavish public expenditures that will advance the interests of the agriculturists. With a buoyant and increasing revenue, and with expanding trade, we in the west do not require expenditures for lighthouses or breakwaters, or wharfs, unless perhaps some like those built in recent years by hon. gentlemen opposite where there was no water; but we rejoice to find the new government implementing the promises they made while in opposition, by being prepared to assist and co-operate with the provincial authorities in giving us a system of highways which will enable the husbandman to convey the products of his farm to the elevators and railways. The very fertility of our soil makes it difficult for us to have good roads. I believe any member of this House who has travelled in western Canada will realize how many difficulties have to be overcome in the construction of highways in that country; but by the co-operation of the federal government with the provincial authorities we may hope to have constructed great trunk lines of communication whereby the farmers will be enabled readily to reach their markets, and also whereby the mails will be more readily conveyed to the remote sections of the country. This is a matter which I am sure will commend itself to the people of the west.

Closely allied with that is the encouragement which the new administration proposes to give to agriculture. It would of course be a mere commonplace to say that in a country like this, with a population of something over seven millions, and where over one-half of our people is engaged in agricultural pursuits, it is absolutely essential to give consideration to every measure that can be devised to advance those interests. It is encouraging to find this new administration, in its early life, making a deliberate attempt to grapple with the problem of how to secure the best results from the cultivation of the soil. It is also necessary in this country that we should appreciate the lessons of conservation. The very prodigality of nature in bestowing her bounties upon us not only in the west, but in all parts of Canada, is one of the reasons why we have been prodigal in their use. We are finding, despite our splendid natural resources, and despite the opportunities which exist on every hand for reaping rich rewards from industry, that we can soon exhaust those resources, and it is the duty of statesmen not ony to conserve the natural resources of the country, but the public health and public energy by measures which will best advance the interests of the people as a whole. I hope this administration will find some place in its programme for providing a department of public health. In the report of the conservation commission appointed by a former president of the United States it was stated that great as was the value of the material resources of those states, there was a still greater monetary value attached to the vital energy and living force of its people. We are a new country, and we have the opportunity to create such conditions as will conserve not only our material resources, but the health, energy and vitality of our people. It has been found that the largest number of industrial accidents happen toward the close of the day's work when the vital forces are low, and too many of our railway accidents have been directly attributable to the employees remaining too long on duty. Too often it has been found that child labour and the work which has been undertaken, especially by married women, in the older countries has involved a loss of vital force in the succeeding generation, and we Canadians—we in this young country—must, it seems to me, if we are true to our best traditions, realize that at best we hold this great land with its brilliant opportunities and its splendid resources as trustees for that posterity which will one day weigh us up in judgment for the manner in which we have discharged the trust reposed in us; and I hope and believe that this attempt and endeavour that is to be made by this new administration to conserve our resources and the heritage of our people will meet with a ready response from the people of the east and the west and will everywhere bring about those results which we are so very desirous to accomplish.

Then there is closely allied to the question of the development of our agricultural industry, the consolidation of the Grain Acts and the taking over under proper control by a commission of the terminals at the head of the Great Lakes. It has been a fruitful source of dissatisfaction and complaint on the part of the western agriculturists that proper provision has not been made at the head of the Great Lakes for the storage of our grain products. This complaint this new administration now proposes to remedy, but there are many questions which are worthy of the consideration of this House before we commit ourselves to a scheme that would involve the nationalizing of all of the grain terminals at the head of the Great Lakes. By 1915 the Panama canal will be completed, the Hudson Bay railway will have been completed, the National Transcontinental railway will practically have been completed, and new methods of transportation will be furnished to the people. It is, therefore, of vital importance in the minds and thoughts of those who produce grain in the west that no mistake be made so far as the terminals at Hudson bay are concerned, and we rejoice that the speedy completion of the railway will be one of the matters which will receive the most earnest consideration of this administration. It is a matter in which the people in the west are vitally interested, that terminals shall be constructed there under the control of a commission, and that no private corporation will have an opportunity to unnecessarily control or dominate those terminals. That will obviate the necessity, of course, of our having to expropriate them, as we may some of the terminals at the head of the lakes. It is of equally great importance, it seems to me, Mr. Speaker, and I am expressing the opinion of men who have given the matter every consideration, that provision without further delay should be made for the construction of terminals at Vancouver and Prince Rupert. I do not know whether the hon. members of this House have given any consideration to the problem of transportation as it may be raised by the construction and completion of the Panama canal, but it has already been demonstrated by shippers who have sent grain from as far east, I believe, as Moosejaw, that it is possible to ship that grain west to Vancouver, and then by water carriage around the Horn and convey it to England in a little longer time, but at substantially the same freight rate at which it can be conveyed to the head of the lakes, and by water carriage shipped to Liverpool. And that during the winter months it is quite possible now to ship grain to Vancouver, and by water carriage from there, so as to reach all corners of the world quite as cheaply, if not at little better freight terms, than it is possible to have that same grain conveyed to the eastern seaboard by railway carriage, and from thence to the markets across the ocean. Now, if that be so it is quite apparent, it seems to me, Mr. Speaker, that the construction of that canal will have a revolutionary effect upon the transportation problem of the west, and it is of the highest possible importance that this House should make provision for the early construction of terminals at Vancouver and Prince Rupert to meet the demands that will be absolutely made upon this country when the Panama canal is completed.

The construction of the Hudson Bay railway, as I have said, will bring the interior portions of Canada many days closer than at present to the markets of England and the continent, and it is of importance for the same reason that we should provide every facility by which the demands of the west can be met without delay. The Hudson Bay railway itself must follow the best possible route. I am pleased, and I am sure every western man will be equally so, that no question has been raised by the incoming government as to the necessity for the construction of that railway. It will provide an additional transportation route by means of which millions of bushels of grain that will be produced on the fertile prairies of the west will find access to the markets of the world, and even although that route be open only for a very short time in the year, it will afford that measure of relief which the absolute necessity of the case demands. It is of the highest possible importance, not only that the best route with the best grades be chosen, but that the terminals also shall be the best that can be provided. I am convinced that the determination of these questions by the government, after proper consideration, will commend itself to the people of every portion of this great dominion.

I doubt not that our friends opposite will congratulate us upon the splendid heritage in the way of buoyant and expanding revenues, and increasing trade that they have left to us. But in that connection I have also to remind them, Mr. Speaker, that they left us a legacy of great responsibilities and great obligations. No student of affairs in western Canada can for a single moment contemplate the construction of one of the means of transportation that I have just referred to—namely, the National Transcontinental railway—without being seized of the fact that there is a railway that has cost in its construction from 50 to 75 per cent more than the estimates of its engineers anticipated, and that that involves an added burden upon the men of the west in the shipping of their products to the sea in the form of increased freight rates. But, Sir, that is not all. The manufacturers of the east have quite as much interest in the question as the producers of the west, because if the cost of transporting the goods manufactured in the east bears an improper relation to the actual cost of those goods, as is very often the case, then it follows that there will be difficulties because the enhanced price will at once stimulate the differences between the east and the west. The east has an equal interest with the west in the question of the cost of the road to which I have referred; and, speaking for myself, I can only say that I hope the incoming administration will without delay see that a proper commission is appointed to investigate why it is that this road has cost from 50 to 75 per cent more than the engineers expected. This is very vital to the people of the west in so far as the question of transportation is concerned because the fixed charges of a railway, as we all know, are the principal factors which determine what the freight rates shall be; and if those fixed charges have become excessive by reason of the reckless expenditures of public moneys, it follows that in order to meet them the rates must be correspondingly increased. I had intended dealing with this subject at greater length, but I shall pass on merely hoping, as I have said, that at the earliest possible moment proper steps will be taken to ascertain just why it is so great a sum of money has been expended over and above the sum estimated to accomplish the purpose aimed at.

Reference has been made to the fact that the returns of the census were somewhat disappointing. I am in receipt of a communication from the union of Alberta municipalities directing attention to the fact that these returns are incomplete and incorrect, that the statistical information in many instances is inaccurate and asking that a new census be taken, at least in the provinces of Alberta and Saskatchewan. I do not know, Mr. Speaker, whether that be possible, but this I do know that the city which I have the honour to represent has a population of at least 6,000 or 7,000 more than that shown by the census returns. But I am not altogether prepared to believe that is the cause of the inaccurate census returns. Indeed so extraordinary has been the growth of that great city and so rapid has been the increase of its population that during the last three or four months 6,000 or 7,000 may well have been added to the population as shown by the census.

But I think that we may congratulate ourselves as Canadians upon the fact that the census returns show a substantial increase in population. While the immigration returns show that vast numbers of people have come into Canada, people must have been leaving Canada as well in large numbers. But we have only to remember that fifty years ago the population of the United States was only half what it is at the present time to realize what the great possibilities of this Canada of ours may be. So, while, as I say, the census returns may be somewhat disappointing, still, I think we have every cause for rejoicing that they show such a substantial increase in population within the last ten years. And it is to be borne in mind that we have passed the difficult point. In the next ten years, we can ardently hope and confidently expect, the returns will not be disappointing. And we can very well be encouraged, because it was during the corresponding ten years in the history of the republic to the south that the greatest improvement was made in the census returns there.

Now, intimately associated in the minds of those who live west of the Great Lakes—and, I doubt not, also of those who live in the east—with the problems of transportation and prices and markets are the problems incident to and connected with the tariff. And it is a matter of great satisfaction, and, it seems to me, of congratulation, that we at last have an administration with the courage of its convictions, the courage to lift the tariff, if you will, out of politics by creating a tariff commission that will gather the information to enable us to deal with this most important matter on a scientific basis. I do not think there has been a time in the history of the Canadian people when it was more apparent that we should have a band of trained experts capable of gathering at first hand full and accurate information for the benefit of the Canadian farmer, manufacturer and workman than in the election that has just passed. How complete was the information of the people of the United States as compared with ours. That indicated the necessity of employing such a band of trained experts; and another advantage is that we may find employment for the great number of young men who are coming from our universities highly trained in the theory of political economy who would thus find employment and be able to apply their knowledge practically for the benefit of the people. We shall be able to have a band of trained experts whose labours will enable parliament to frame a tariff that will not be framed in the interests of a few gentlemen, to enable them to create great fortunes, nor yet for the purpose of vindictively attacking a political foe, but a tariff that will commend itself to the judgment alike of the agriculturist and manufacturer. I feel sure that I speak for the people whom I have the honour to represent, and for the people of the west generally, when I say that they are not the kind of men who do not believe in a tariff. The men of the west equally with those of the east, believe in a tariff. In these days of peace treaties, in these days when we are talking of the arbitration of differences that arise amongst the nations of the world, when we say that fleets and armies no longer have work to do, what is the great weapon with which nations must fight the battles of commerce?—and these battles are just as fierce, and, even though there be no bloodshed, just as deadly in some respects, as the battles of the past. The only weapon we have is the weapon we call the tariff. There is no sense in talking about the theories of free trade, the splendid doctrines of the past. It was a great constitutional writer in England who said, 'There is no human pain that is equal to the pain of a new idea.' And it seems to me that in these days the new idea that has seized the people everywhere is, that we must protect our country. People no longer talk of free trade, but of fair trade. We must protect our artisans, our manufacturers, and our farmers by affording them markets at home for the products of land and sea.

This is the duty, it seems to me devolving upon us, and I think it is a matter of congratulation for the House and the country that the government has the courage to create a tariff commission, one that will be able, as I have said, to obtain such information as will form the basis for the scientific tariff that will secure stability in business. For, after all, the greatest thing you can have in a country is stability in business; and the thing that we call business has the right to know what treatment it has to expect from governments and from people. I can conceive of no method that can be devised that will enable this parliament to deal more justly and more fairly with the complex problems associated with the tariff and all that goes with it than a tariff commission. I venture to say that no Act of the late administration has met with greater support than the creation of the Railway Commission, a commission that is the buffer between the rights of the people and the aggressions of the railway. And in the same way it will be possible to create a tariff commission, not one with legislative functions but one whose duty it will be to gather the information that will enable us as legislators to devise a tariff on scientific principles, a tariff that will do violence to no industry, while protecting every legitimate interest that may exist within our broad Dominion.

One might ask what is meant by such a platitude as 'scientific tariff.' That is an old question, one that I have seen frequently asked and as frequently differently answered. I suppose it is only fair for each man to give his own interpretation of a scientific tariff. For my own part, I believe that is a scientific tariff which will insure to the Canadian people the ordered use regulated employment of our great resources of river and lake, sea and land that will insure the manufacture within Canada of all those articles that can be economically produced in Canada, giving employment to Canadian workmen at wages at least equal to those paid to workmen in competing countries, to the end that Canadian farmers may produce those things that will feed may produce the food products necessary to feed the Canadian workmen. That is my explanation of a scientific tariff at this time. And I say that there are no people in this great Dominion who have a more earnest desire to see a scientific business tariff for this country than the agriculturists of the west. For they are prepared to bear their part of the burden and responsibility of government ; and they realize that so long as we are in need of great public works for national development, so long as such demands are made upon us as are now made, we shall require large and buoyant resources, and that this can only be done in the manner now followed. If that be true, and I think that even hon. members opposite will agree that it is true, we reach the further conclusion that we should give to the motherland and to the overseas dominions a preference in our markets with respect to those articles that cannot be economically manufactured or produced in Canada. That constitutes my idea of a scientific Canadian tariff. The effect will be to remove prejudices too often created by public men between the east and the west. I remember when a senator belonging to the party of hon. gentlemen opposite told the people of the west of the vast fortunes being accumulated by manufacturers at their expense and pointed out in glowing terms that the one desire of those manufacturers was that they might use the dollars they had so acquired as a means of securing their entry into the effete aristocracy of Europe. The prejudices thus cultivated in the minds of the people of the west can only be removed, it seems to me, by removing the tariff, as far as possible, out of the realm of politics. And, as I have said, the way to do this is to furnish parliament with such accurate, such absolutely correct information will enable it to pass a tariff law based upon a proper conception of the obligations and requirements of every section of the country.

For, after all, Mr. Speaker, we in the west and those who live in the east are all imbued with a common patriotism,we are all striving for the common prosperity of our country; and I feel quite sure that as the years go by it will be found that those who create prejudices on fiscal questions and on tariffs in the minds of the agriculturists of the west at the expense of the manufacturers of the east, or seek to create antagonism between those who live in the west and those who live in the east, will receive a reprimand at the polls on the very first opportunity at which the people can express themselves.

Now, Sir, closely associated and allied with the question of a tariff commission is another question which I think must engage at no distant date the attention of this House and of this parliament. I refer to the control of corporations. I think it was Lord Acton who said that the great struggle of all the ages had been the conflict between custom and reason. In my judgment, in this complex civilization of ours, the great struggle of the future will be between human rights and property interests; and it is the duty and the function of government to provide that there shall be no undue regard for the latter that limits or lessens the other. I believe that so far as business, great or small, is concerned, it is elementary to say that if men meet together and conclude to enter into partnership, the limit of their responsibility is the limit of their joint and several fortunes. But when they constitute themselves into a joint stock company, or a corporation, the limit of their liability is the amount of their subscriptions. Every corporation is the creature of a statute, and the statute expresses in some way the will of the people through their legislatures. If that be so, and if there be certain immunities and rights and privileges which flow to men who constitute themselves into corporations, it follows that the parliament or legislature that created them, that gave them birth and existence, has the power to impose upon them limitations commensurate with the demands and necessities of the people. I remember a minister of the Crown a few months ago, in western Canada, declaiming against the undue capitalization of certain companies organized during the past few years. But it must be remembered that they were organized under a law that had the sanction and approval of this parliament, and under the sanction of the government of which he was a member. It was the fault of the legislature, and not of these corporations, because we cannot take away from men the inherent right to merge, to unite their business interests; that is the inalienable and inherent right of all men, as we have learned during the past. But we have also learned that it is of the utmost importance, that it is absolutely essential for the development of the commercial life of this country, that men should know in advance just what they may do within the law and what they may do without the law. It is only a few years ago that the United Statse was passing through an era of development the like of which we are fast approaching, an era of trusts and combinations, and that situation gave rise to what is known as the Sherman Act. It was a punitive measure, it was not a piece of constructive statesmanship, it was not successful legislation, it did not indicate to the large business corporations what they might do or might not do with impunity. I submit that in this country we should at the earliest possible moment give our best attention to the consideration of some measure that will provide a tribunal that will limit the issue of securities by corporations, and will protect the public by enacting some measure by which they can know the real value of those securities.

Mr. MACLEAN (East York). Hear, hear. We are getting there.

Mr. BENNETT (Calgary). I am glad to hear my hon. friend (Mr. Maclean) say 'hear, hear,' and I trust that this subject will engage his attention in the years to come. There is no subject to which a public man may more usefully turn his attention than this very subject. But if my hon. friend's 'hear, hear,' means only a sneer at what has already been done—

Mr. MACLEAN (East York). No, no.

Mr. BENNETT (Calgary). Then we will accept the hon. gentleman's disclaimer.

Some hon. MEMBERS. C. P. R.

Mr. BENNETT (Calgary). It is perhaps rather early in the day to raise a question of this kind, but I am glad to see that some hon. gentlemen have the temerity to raise it. Their interrogation offers me an opportunity to say, now at the outset of my career in this House, that for many years I was associate solicitor and counsel for that great corporation, the Canadian Pacific railway, and I gave to it the best services in my power. But as soon as I was elected to this House I severed my connection with that corporation, and with all other railway companies or corporations; and I propose to devote my abilities, and whatever experience I have gained to advancing what I believe to be the best interests of the people of this Dominion. I will just say, Mr. Speaker, that it is of the utmost importance that this matter should engage the early serious attention of this House. I have seen railway securities issued, for instance, by new companies in western Canada whereby a large paid up capitalization was secured, by giving all the bonds and all the stock to some construction company formed for the construction of the railway often at a less cost than the amount realized from the sale of such bonds and that means that all the watered stock was scattered through the country, and that dividends on that stock will ultimately have to be paid by the people of the west. It is of transcendent importance that this House and this parliament should be seized of the fact that the people demand that some tribunal shall be created that will have control over the extent of the issue of securities by railway companies and by public utility companies, and that the capitalization of industrial concerns should bear some just proportion to the outlay, and to the physical value of the enterprise which it represents. My excuse for venturing to mention this subject is the fact that it has always been closely allied with the question of tariffs.

Now, Sir, there is one other matter in the speech from the Throne with which His Royal Highness the Governor General was pleased to open this House, that certainly should engage the consideration of every man, that referring to the promotion of trade within the British Empire. During the recent campaign I advocated that we should first endeavour to promote trade within the British Empire before we turned to promoting trade with other lands; and I believe that in seeking the extension of our trade in the British West Indies and in British Guiana we are fulfilling the pledges that we made in days gone by. It is important if we are to bring about that commercial and organic union of the British Empire, of which I think we all have a strong and abiding hope, it must be done through commercial means. The genius of Pitt, the genius of Chamberlain, the genius of other great English statesmen has foreseen the extraordinary possibilities of uniting the overseas dominions with the mother country to commercial ties and commercial bonds. It is essential that we in Canada, as the greatest partner, should extend our trade so far as possible among the British dominions and with the motherland. I hail consequently that reference in the speech from the Throne with regard to increased efforts to promote our trade with the West Indies and British Guiana, as an indication of a desire on the part of the administration to expand our trade in those directions.

Now I have trespassed already too long on the attention of this House, and my apologies are due therefor. I will venture to say one thing more in conclusion. A new administration has come into power, with enormous responsibilities and matchless opportunities. The people of this great land, east and west, north and south, are looking for some results that will be commensurate with those responsibilities and opportunities. I feel certain that by acting in no narrow party spirit will that progress we all desire to see be attained. Let us unite our efforts to assist in the development of this great Dominion, let us all do our little best to bring about that organic and commercial union between the mother country and the overseas dominions which, I think, is inevitable and the accomplishment of which will mark this parliament as one of the greatest parliaments that ever sat in any of the King's dominions.

I thank you, Mr. Speaker, and the hon. members of this House for the attention with which my remarks have been received.

Mr. ALBERT SEVIGNY (Dorchester.) (Translation.) Mr. Speaker, I beg to second the Address in answer to the speech from the Throne. The honour done me surely is great, but what of the task it implies? Many are those in this House who would have been worthier than I of such an undertaking, but I understand that the hon. the prime minister (Mr. Borden) has not forgotten that the county of Dorchester stood by the party in 1896 and 1908, and has once more come back to the fold on the 21st of September last, when the Conservative party was gloriously returned to power.

The honour which is conferred upon me redounds on my constituents, and they will not forget it. In their name and in my own, I beg to thank the hon. the prime minister.

Mr. Speaker, a moment ago, on seeing that beautiful wreath of roses deposited on the desk of the right hon. leader of the opposition (Sir Wilfrid Laurier), I recollected that to-day is his seventieth birthday. He will allow me, no doubt, to tender my congratulations and my respects. With such a distinguished leader at the head of hon. gentlemen opposite, whatever victories we win in the future will be glorious victories, because the battle will have been a hard one to fight.

Large numbers of our opponents are still wondering what has brought about the change in the country's political complexion which culminated in the sweeping victory of a few weeks ago. Have they forgotten that in this country of ours every citizen is guided and inspired by the one same ideal of national life and common citizenship?

The last campaign, in all parts of the Dominion, witnessed the awakening of the Canadian soul in the homes of the farmer, the settler, the workingman, the manufacturer, the trader, the business and professional man, the awakening of a feeling of common citizenship, each one being desirous to ensure the future happiness and progress of Canada.

The people who for the last fifteen years kept aloof from our party, have almost unanimously come back to us, realizing that when matters had come to a point when two ministers could proceed to London and here arrange secretly for the building of a navy, and two ministers proceed to Washington and there secretly give away our natural resources, they were practically being deprived of the right they conquered, and with which they are not willing to part, of governing themselves; they realized that they were being deprived of their birthright in connection with the natural resources of Canada as well as of the bright prospects which they are endeavouring day by day to improve.

Canada, which was 'at the parting of the ways,' as the president of the United States expressed it, has just shown that it had been slandered and that it had never thought of deviating from the path so wisely staked by the Conservative party through confederation and the national policy.

Let us hope that the mother country will be proud of the result and that she will grant us within in her own bounds that reciprocal treatment which we have refused to accept from other hands.

Sir, we were unwilling that our rich Canadian market should fall in the hands of the United States. Oftentimes Liberals have stated that their reciprocity proposals concerned natural products only; even so it was disastrous for our farming community. But how long would the farmer have submitted to such restrictions, how long would the American dealer have submitted to them? Is it likely that the tariff wall would have stopped the importation of manufactured products from the United States? No, Mr. Speaker, the government would have been obliged to cut down the duties or do away with them, and then it would all have been over with our Canadian industries through which our cities have developed; the east would have ceased supplying the west, and the west would have ceased feeding our railways, our canals and our seaports. Our people would have flocked to the United States and increased its army of factory hands. Our forest wealth would have been depleted, we would have been the hewers of wood for the benefit of the United States pulp mills. Canadian wheat would have been monopolized by the United States milling industry which in return would have exacted heavy tolls on the flour sold back to us.

And what about those large numbers of foreigners who are settling down in the west? If they were to have their free trade connections with the people of the United States, is it at all likely we would succeed in impressing on their minds our aspirations, our ideals, our love for this country of memories and which has a great future before it? How would they have come to understand that sharing as they do in our national heritage, they would show their gratefulness for it by sharing in our aspirations. They would have acquired the Yankee turn of mind which distinguishes our 90 millions of neighbours, and such a result would have suited the United States, as paving the way to annexation. But a people owning such a fine, rich and great country as ours, enjoying such a measure of freedom, hopeful of being counted some day among the nations of the world, are surely entitled to ask of all Canadians, whether by birth or adoption, to give to Canada their hearts, their talents, their riches, have certainly the right to say to all: Canada for the Canadians.

Sir, that is what we said, and the voice of the sovereign people has approved of our views and stated that it was high time to overthrow the idols. Vox populi, vox Dei. Let us return thanks to God, Mr. Speaker. He has endowed the Canadian people with a proud soul, and He is watching over us in our youth, as He watched over us in our infancy.

For us that statement made by Sir Adolphe Chapleau thirty years ago, should remain as true as ever: That Canadian people in whom qualities of devotedness, of loyalty and of pride are intermingled, is worthy of being loved, educated, trained to vigor and greatness; nothing should be done to deceive them, or spoil them or defile them.

Sir, on entering this new life, I make it a point to thank and congratulate the hon. gentleman who has set for us such a fine example of courage and patriotism while in the midst of that strenuous battle against reciprocity. The circumstances are still fresh in the memory of all. To those who boomed reciprocity in the west he made this answer: I am absolutely opposed to it, and if you, gentlemen of the west, were prepared to make me prime minister to-morrow, if I would support it, I would refuse to do so.'

For many years, Sir, for fifteen years to say the least, our country has not heard such manly declarations from hon. gentlemen, who have preceded us in power. Utterances such as these was what was needed in the difficult position we occupied, and they won over to him the hearts of the people. Honour to him.

Sir, we are starting with a new governor and a new government. Our governor is a brother of the great king, Edward the Seventh, surnamed the Peacemaker, and we believe that he will bring along with him to Canada the qualities which endeared our late sovereign to his people.

The new government have at the outset offered and granted fair treatment to all. That is a precious token for the future, which causes the people to rejoice at having voted as they have done on the 21st of September, and causes pangs of remorse to those who have voted against us.

We are starting work under very favourable auspices. While under our eyes nations of the old world are waging war against each other or getting ready for deeds of violence and bloodshed in the near future, thrones are being overthrown, others are threatened by revolutionists; year by year thousands of people are leaving their country to seek elsewhere, on this side of the ocean, more favourable conditions, in the meantime Canada is expanding in peace, harmony and plenty, owing to the efforts of a strong and patriotic population, a God-fearing people, respectful of the crown and of our institutions.

Peace and harmony Canada wishes to ensure to all its children, and that policy will win the day, in spite of the appeals of certain organs whose inspirers on the day following their overthrow, and ever since, have striven to arouse ill-feeling and spite between the various races.

Abundance, we have it and we will have more of it in our immense prairies with their golden harvests, in our mines inexhaustibly rich in gold, in silver, in copper, in coal, in iron and asbestos; in our forests worked with care and preserved with prudence; in our industry protected with benefit both for the employer and the employee; in the development of our land and by waterways, and principally in the Canadian people who love their country and work every day for its progress.

In this vast field of our operations we are all, I think, guided by the same desire of doing good. The field of our operation is beautiful; but we need good pilots such as those that we have, for the responsibilities are heavy and the reefs are treacherous.

We see in the speech from the Throne that the first thought of the new Government has been for the farmer. What do the left, who have cried everywhere that our party was opposed to the agricultural class, say about that?

Let us aid agriculture, Mr. Speaker, it is the most solid basis of our country, it is the domain from which the nation draws its best forces and its most durable wealth. It is the farmer who has just saved Canada from the reciprocity trap. In fact, take the verdict of Ontario and you will see how deep are the roots which bind the farmer to the Canadian land; take the verdict of Quebec, and out of the twenty-seven counties which were carried by the Conservative party in spite of the desperate appeal of our opponents, you find twenty-four rural constituencies, among which the most beautiful is certainly Dorchester, whatever my honourable colleagues may say.

It is the duty of governments to give a paternal attention to these sturdy workers who grow the harvests which nourish mankind.

It is by agriculutral products that our country has gained a world-wide reputation. The new government has recognized this in getting to work; we must congratulate them very cordially for it.

In these late years, steps of the greatest importance are made by men whom I think are very sincere, in order to draw us in the new policy called military imperialism. This policy has provoked discussion in Canada, principally since the old administration has voted the Navy Bill, and many of its most ardent champions have gone so far as taxing of disloyalty those who differed from them on this question. Notwithstanding the calumnies in a certain press it is not my intention to recriminate, after the words of peace and union which I have uttered a few minutes ago. Some have too hastily passed judgment upon my compatriots of Quebec. I say my Quebec compatriots because I know them better than the Canadians of the other provinces who were in unity with them upon this question. The flag that we love is unfurled to all the breezes of the world, and each Britsh colony, like each British subject, has received the mission and undertaken the duty of defending it. History shows that French Canadians have always faithfully fulfilled their duty.

In this country, both people, English and French, have one ideal and one common destiny. I am convinced that on this policy as upon all others, it is possible to come to an understanding if we have for each other mutual respect.

I think that the strifes of France, the old mother country of French Canadians, and those of England, the mother country of every one of us, were acute enough to justify us to repeat, as said Musset:

La mer y passerait sans laver la souillure,
Car l'abime est immense et la tache est au fond.

However, what a comforting spectacle they gave us a few weeks ago when we saw them uniting their flag, their pride and their honour and telling Germany to abandon its audacity.

This example of 'entente cordiale' comes from high enough, it seems to me, that it should be followed in our politics by those English and French living in Canada, who call themselves Canadians and who have the same flag.

Mr. Speaker, French Canadians, like the Canadians of other provinces, are opposed to this unfortunate law voted by the Liberal government, providing for the construction of a war navy which will be ruinous for Canada and useless to our country and to the empire.

If French Canadians are opposed to this law it is not through lack of loyalty. I affirm that French Canadians are just as loyal as any other Canadian. Those who doubt the loyalty of the French Canadians should know them better. They should come in our churches and hear the people singing every Sunday this prayer 'Domine salvum fac regem.' They should be in Quebec, the most French city of Canada, in circumstances such as marked the coronation of our sovereign a few months ago, and they would see for themselves all our people abandoning their work and filling the churches to sing the hymn of Thanksgiving, the Te Deum.

Mr. Speaker, let every one of us join in mutual respect for all, and let us remember that the presence of the two races on this continent was not brought about by human will, but by God's providence. In being united and working together we can make great things with this young giant whose name is Canada.

Mr. Speaker, the European governments did not realize until a few years ago the importance and the future of British North America. It was Sir John Young, who became Lord Lisgar, who said in Quebec, about the year 1865 that Canada was free to remain united to the metropolis or to part from her, that Great Britain was giving full liberty. It was, in other words, the famous 'arpents de neige' of Voltaire celebrating their centenary. Lord Lisgar was judging too hastily as Voltaire had judged from too far away. They were forgetting Providence, who governs all empires and who had decided that Canada was to be the most important colony of the British empire.

European governments are no more indifferent about Canada. France regrets that she has lost it, as it has been said very often and, as Mr. Louis de Tinseau repeated it a few days ago, and England gratifies us with every honour, the most recent and the greatest being the sending us of H. R. H. the Duke of Connaught as Governor. We have now more than a representative of the Crown, we have, I dare to say, a part of the crowns of the great Queen Victoria, of our regretted sovereign Edward VII., and our beloved King George V. Canada has greeted with joy and many good wishes the arrival of His Royal Highness. We have not in this country the sumptuous palaces of the Imperial court, but we have seven millions of British subjects who say with the same sincerity and the same joy: God save the King! These seven millions have faith in the future and expect from their government principals, acts, work, revenues, wealth and honesty. The heirs of the Conservative party know that 'noblesse oblige.' They will work with our noble governor and with the people who acted so nobly on the 21st of September when the time came to remember the country.

Rt. Hon. Sir WILFRID LAURIER (East Quebec). Mr. Speaker, the House has listened with more than ordinary interest to the two addresses in support of the motion now in your hands. We can congratulate ourselves upon the fact that we welcome to our ranks two members, young in years and of eminent ability, ability which might accomplish a great deal for this country if the hope could be entertained that these young men would direct their ability in the proper direction—a hope, however, which judging not from the manner but from the matter of their speeches, I fear I must not be too sanguine of. The hon. member for Calgary (Mr. Bennett) was preceded to this House by a high reputation for fluent oratory, and the speech with which he has favoured us has not only sustained but enhanced that reputation. I think I can with perfect appositeness compare his speech on the present occasion—judging from its easy and copious flow of sentences—with the crystal waters of the Bow river rushing down from the summit of the Rocky mountains towards that young and enterprising city which he has the honour to represent in this House.

Nor is my hon. friend the member for Dorchester (Mr. Sevigny) new to political life. I am unaware that he has ever served in any legislative body as has the member for Calgary, but my hon. friend (Mr. Sevigny) is well known to us in the province of Quebec as amongst the most brilliant and ardent orators of the Nationalist party. Indeed, echoes have reached us of his fiery denunciation of the Naval Service Law, and not only of the Naval Service Law itself but of all naval expenditure in any kind or shape, whether Imperial or Canadian, by the Canadian people. But, Sir, it is a pleasure for me to congratulate my young and hon. friend (Mr. Sevigny) upon his speech of to-day. I particularly congratulate him upon the contrast that speech affords to the speeches with which he carried on his campaign, and I am sure that if his electors of Dorchester had been present to-day they would have inquired of themselves: Is that the candidate we elected on the 21st of September. My hon. friend (Mr. Sevigny), as did the hon. member for Calgary, was kind enough to offer me his congratulations upon the fact that this is my seventieth birthday. I tender to both gentlemen my sincere thanks, and I thank hon. members on both sides, and especially hon. gentlemen on the opposite side of the House, for the kind manner in which they received these compliments. The hon. member for Calgary was profuse in his good wishes towards me, and he concluded by hoping that for a long time I shall occupy the position which I now do, meaning of course that for a long time to come I should remain leader of the Opposition discharging the difficult task of watching and criticising the acts of the government. I must say in all candour to my hon. friends, that judging from the manner in which the present government has commenced its career I feel that task will be too great for my advancing years.

My hon. friend (Mr. Bennett) and my hon. friend (Mr. Sevigny) reached their happiest vein in their references to our new Governor-General, His Royal Highness the Duke of Connaught. Sir, it is a trite saying now that Canada has been exceedingly fortunate from the earliest days of Confederation to the present, in the character of those who have been entrusted with the duty and the honour of representing the royal authority in this dominion. Every new appointment has suggested the same observation, but the last appointment more than all the others. Already it is evident that His Royal Highness will bring to the discharge of his duties the same zeal, the same enthusiasm, the same care, that was ever displayed by his predecessors. In addition, he brings to the dignity of the office the glamour of his high rank in the British Empire. And, as to His Gracious consort, though scarcely a month in this Dominion she has already won all Canadian hearts by the simplicity of her manner, the dignity of her bearing, the kindliness of her disposition. From her we have learned that dignity and simplicity of manner and kindliness of disposition, appreciable in every walk of life, have a double charm when found in the most exalted station.

As to the speech with which His Royal Highnesss has opened parliament there is not much to be said. The measures suggested in it are not of the character to invite any criticism at the present time. It promises we shall have measures for the improvement of highways, for the aid of agriculture, and for the establishment of a Tariff Commission, all of which may mean very much or very little, and until we have their details it is impossible to make any comment on them. But, there are words placed in the mouth of His Royal Highness by his present advisers which we on this side of the House have every reason to be proud of. It is stated in the speech:

> It affords me great pleasure to congratulate you upon the continued and increasing prosperity of the country. Our trade, both with British and with foreign countries, is rapidly expanding, and there is every prospect that its volume in the present year will be largely in excess of that attained at any time in the past.

Sir, when we took office fifteen years ago, such compliments could not be paid to the outgoing government as are now paid to us. Fifteen years ago the country was not in the condition in which we have left it to our successors; fifteen years ago agriculture was in a languishing condition, industry was perishing, the people were on the verge of despair. To-day, the treasury is not only full but it is overflowing; agriculture is in a flourishing condition, industry never was more active, the Canadian people are prosperous and happy. Fifteen years ago, Canada was nothing but an obscure colony; to-day, those hon. gentlemen who preceded me in this debate admit that our country has reached the dignity of a nation, and that upon her is fixed the admiring gaze of the world. If we scan the pages of history, I do not think there ever was an administration which went out of office under such circumstances as ours. As a rule, governments are beaten because the people are not satisfied with the prosperity of the country, but we have gone out of office because, having done so much for the country, our opponents told the people that it was better not to go further, and that they should take the administration from the hands which had guided the country with such success and place it in hands less enterprising. I believe, Sir, that a better epitaph could not be written for the late administration than these words put in the mouth of His Royal Highness by his present advisers, and these gentlemen will be happy indeed, if when the day comes that they must relinquish their trust, as much can be said for them as has been said for us.

There is another reference in the speech on which we have reason to congratulate ourselves. It is stated that the government have already opened negotiations with a view to having improved trade relations with the British West Indies and British Guiana. My hon. friend the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Foster) will remember that in former days he tried his hand, but with little success, to improve our trade with British Guiana and the West Indies. He knows also, and I regret it is a fact, that there is not much to be had in the way of trade with these countries, even under the most favourable conditions. I do not say that to discourage his efforts; on the contrary, we on this side of the House approve of any attempt which may be made by this administration to find markets for our products, whether it be in British or in foreign countries, because what we want is improvement of our trade. But, Sir, the present administration have rejected that agreement, in which there was a good deal to be had for the people, on the ground of sentiment, and I am afraid that in the present trade negotiations there is more sentiment than business reality.

This brings me to refer to the remarks of my hon. friend from Calgary upon the question of reciprocity, upon which we went to the country and were defeated. Sir, under our British system of government, the loss of power by one party and the accession to power of another party is a matter of little consequence in itself but what is of consequence is that we should know exactly what are the present conditions and what are the duties devolving on the present government? I want to speak of this without any recrimination in regard to the decision of the country. Of course in my judgment, the country made a mistake, but we on this side of the House are prepared to accept its decision loyally and to act accordingly. At the same time, we want to point out the obligation which rests on the present administration in consequence of the change which has taken place. What is the situation so far as this question is concerned? It simply amounts to this, that the late administration negotiated a commercial convention with our neighbours, the great American Republic, to remove all legal obstacles to the flow of trade between the two countries so far as natural products were concerned. Such conventions are not new in the history of the world. They are as old as tariffs. From the day nations adopted tariffs and collected their revenues by imposing duties on foreign imports, from that day conventions of such a character have been a part of the commercial history of every nation. Need I remind the House once more that when Sir John Macdonald advised the Canadian people to adopt towards the United States a policy of high tariff, it was with a view to have a commercial convention such as was negotiated last year with the American Republic? The conditions which impelled us to negotiate were as old as Confederation itself; but those conditions received a new impetus from the rapid development of the western provinces; where a new community, buoyant with the enthusiasm of every new community, was seeking to expand its energies beyond the limits of our country. We are above all things an agricultural people. It is now established that at least 66 per cent of the population of Canada gets its living by agriculture, and the area devoted to agriculture is increasing every year. The consequence is that the country produces more than it can consume, and it is necessary to find markets abroad. This was the goal of the policy pursued by the late government from the day it first took office. We had that in mind when we adopted the British preference. We calculated that England, importing products from several countries, would naturally give the preference in buying from the country which accepted her manufactured goods in payment for what she bought rather than the country from which we would have to meet her exchange with gold, and the result of our policy, in increasing our trade with England, has shown that. Then we made the treaty with Japan and the treaty with France, and if you remember the dispositions of those treaties, you will know that our object was to obtain markets in those countries for our agricultural products. It was the same thought which impelled us to negotiate with the United States. In this we were impelled chiefly by the attitude of the new settlers in the western provinces; but the demand for the American market, which came chiefly from those provinces, did not meet with any favour from the party now in office. They did not object to the reciprocity agreement on any economic ground, but for such political reasons as have been exposed to us again to-day by my hon. friend from Calgary. The nearest approach to anything like economic ground which I saw placed before the Canadian people in the last election was in a speech by Mr. Sifton which caught my eye during the campaign. Mr. Sifton spoke as follows:

> We regard the United States as a great nation confronted by serious problems of unemployment, of exhausted resources, and monopolistic control of commerce. We wish our great neighbours well in the solution of these difficult questions, but do not desire to mingle their problems with ours. We object to this treaty because it binds the provinces of Canada in firm bonds of social and commercial union with the United States.

In this utterance of Mr. Sifton there is a true statement and a very false conclusion, which I was surprised to find in the mouth of one of so lucid and clear mind as Mr. Sifton is. He states strongly, but with no exaggeration a condition of things which all the friends of the Republic know to exist in the United States, and which all the best minds in the Republic are striving to get rid of. But what is the chief cause of these problems in the United States problems of unemployment, of exhausted resources, and monopolistic control of commerce? There are many causes; but can it be denied that the chief cause is a high and fast tariff, which, by unduly inducing industrial development, has caused the farm to be deserted and population to be concentrated in towns and cities, beyond the demand for employment, which by generating a desire to get rich quickly, has induced speculators to grab the natural resources of the country and exhaust them by premature exploitation, which, by preventing competition from abroad, has left the Republic defenseless to be preyed upon and controlled by monopolies.

Sir, if you refer to public opinion in the United States you will get confirmation of this. You will learn that all the best minds to-day in the republic from the professors in the universities to the man in the street, all are agreed that it is a problem which is meeting them and the difficulty is how to get rid of it. We know by experience that wherever such problems are caused by high tariffs, whatever there may be of desire to deal with them there is always a difficulty of creating new communications by touching the tariff. Now, Sir, if we compare our own condition to the condition of the United States do we see very much difference? True it is our resources have not been very much impaired, but are we free from the problems of monopolistic control of trade and commerce? He would be a bold man who would dare to say so. Is it not a fact that at the present time combines, trusts and mergers are flourishing on the soil of the Dominion almost as luxuriantly as on the soil of the republic. Mr. Sifton when he said that if we adopted this policy of a free interchange of commodities we would have involved ourselves in the problems of the United States made in my judgment, a singular mistake, a singular miscalculation. It seems to me quite clear that by opening the avenues of trade we would make it possible to deal with mergers, combines and trusts in the United States as well as in Canada. And indeed the rejection of the policy which we proposed is already bearing fruit. I believe it is a fact that at the present time the meat packers are making arrangements whereby, freed from competition, they can calculate how much can be abated from the price to be paid to the producer, and how much can be added to the price which the consumer should pay. And this, Sir, although only two short months have elapsed since the 21st of September. Within this short space of time the Canadian people are already commencing to suffer for having listened on that day to the voice of passion and not to the voice of reason. Notwithstanding what has been said by my hon. friend from Calgary (Mr. Bennett), I maintain to this day, and I believe it will become more and more apparent as time goes on, that upon the 21st of September it was not the voice of reason that prevailed, but the voice of passion and prejudice.

My hon. friend stated that had this agreement for the interchange of natural commodities between the two countries been adopted, British connection itself would have been in danger. Sir, this assertion was borrowed from and I believe largely inspired by that class of imperialists who hope to build up the British Empire and solidify it, not by removing the shackles of trade, but by intervening and creating in all the constituent parts of the British Empire, between one nation and the other within the empire, new shackles. The defeat of reciprocity has been hailed with glee in Great Britain by this class of imperialists and their shouts of triumph have been reverberated week after week and at meeting after meeting Now they express their hope, their certainty, that before long British manufactured goods would by the action of the present Canadian ministry be admitted to compete freely in Canada with Canadian manufacturers. These men are about to be undeceived, they are undeceived this very day, and they will learn by the mouth of my hon. friend (Mr. Bennett) what is in store for them because he stated in so many words—I was careful to take down his words—that he hoped to see reciprocity within the empire for natural products, but never would he see the day when British manufactured products would be admitted to compete on a footing of equality with Canadian manufactured products. Sir, as I have already said the imperialists of Great Britain are already undeceived, and they will know to-morrow, if they do not know to-day, what false calculations they have been making. They will know that with the men who are now in office there is no more hope for British competition than there was for American competition. Moreover those who, as they thought, voted for British connection will learn by and by that if they are to reach the goal of their ambition they will have to come back to the Liberal party who first introduced the British preference. And here I make bold to say that the last elections were carried under false pretenses. Sir, I know there are men on the other side of the House who imagined that in rejecting the agreement which we made with the United States they did a great service to England and to the empire. I respect their views, I will not quarrel with them, but let me say that in my humble judgment far from rendering a great service to England they have done an injury to England and to the British Empire. To-day, Sir, the world is in a state of transition, the old civilization is passing away, and a new civilization s coming. The period of conquests, of domination, and of land aggrandisement by force is passing away, but it has not so far passed away that at the present time we see Germany, France, Italy and Spain endeavouring to snatch slices of territory in North Africa. Yet we are so far advanced in the new civilization that after all there is no fear of a general conflict resulting from this painful state of things. But were we living in an earlier day and not in 1911 it is probable that there would have been in Europe a general conflagration on account of what is now taking place in North Africa. In this new condition of the future, a condition not of war but of peace, the friendship of the United States would have been the best asset that England could possess. My hon. friend the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Foster) has been at pains to explain that in the attitude of the present Canadian government there was no hostility to the United States and so did the Prime Minister. Sir, I do not believe that any Canadian in his views was influenced by any hostility to the American people; but, Sir, I may perhaps say that I regret the tone of certain newspapers, the tone of certain public men, which was such as to create enmity between the two peoples. Let me say this: Whilst the United States can find no complaint in the attitude taken by the Canadian people—in my judgment the Canadian people were wrong, but whether right or wrong I place my country above everything. While the United States could find no fault with us for the attitude we took—wrong in my judgment as it was—I still say that we have lost a great opportunity of improving and increasing the friendship between the United States and England.

I said a moment ago that my hon. friend had been at pains to explain his attitude on this subject to the American people. Let me quote for his information a statement from a very moderate paper, the New York Times. I quote from the issue of that paper of 23rd Sept.:—

Speaking about the various degrees of deadness, President Taft's plan of arbitration with England seems deader to-day than the Wool Bill he recently vetoed. Canada did it.

This pithy sentence shows to us all that there may be in the rejection of this agreement far worse consequences than had been dreamed of by my hon. friend.

Mr. FOSTER. May I ask my right hon. friend (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) if he endorses that statement ?

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. My hon. friend (Mr. Foster) knows that I stated in the manifesto which I issued to the Canadian people that reciprocity would help the passage of the arbitration treaty. My opinion is here confirmed. And I stated a moment ago that the Canadian people, while, in my judgment, they took a wrong course, yet had done nothing at which the American people should take umbrage. But human nature is human nature, and while the relations of the two countries are satisfactory, my contention is that they would have been made more satisfactory and that a better sentiment would have been created had this agreement been passed.

I know very well that there are people, not only in this House, but in the country, who feared that reciprocity would provide but the incipience of annexation. I know also that there are in the United States people who hope that some day annexation will take place. I have simply to say to the people in Canada who fear annexation and to the people in the United States who hope for it that they alike fail to take into account the manhood of a proud people who would equally disdain to be cajoled or to be coerced into a course inconsistent with their dignity. And, whatever attitude hon. members on the other side of the House may assume, we on this side have sufficient confidence in our own honour to do the best we can for our country and not fear the consequences. Our patriotism is of such robustness that it is equally impervious to the allurements of favour or to the debasing suggestions of fear.

It is true that in the recent elections we lost ground. We lost ground in every part of Canada except in the prairie provinces. There the feeling was so strong that it could not be influenced by appeals to passion and prejudice, and we have come back from that section of country as strong as when the House was dissolved. In this there is a strange situation which cannot be overlooked by the men in office, the men upon whom rests the responsibility of governing this country. The men in the prairie provinces are growers of wheat and herders of cattle. The producers in this territory between the Great Lakes and the mountains have, on the other side of the international boundary, and almost at their very doors, a market which is to-day something like 10 cents a bushel higher than their own.

Mr. STAPLES. Might I ask the right hon. gentleman a question ?

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order. Sit down.

Mr. STAPLES. What was the difference in price 4 days or 4 weeks prior to the 21st September ?

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. My hon. friend (Mr. Staples) knows, probably better than I do, that, taking it day in and day out during the 12 months of the year, the difference is from eight cents to twelve cents in favour of the American market. The Canadian cattle grower has now no other market than the British market. This market is open to him, but it is hampered by an embargo against which we have protested again and again, but protested in vain. These men were looking for the American market. They are denied it by the action of the present government. What is going to be done for them ? It would not be human nature for these men to rest idle and be satisfied. They are labouring—and it is but natural that it should be so—under a sense of wrong and injury. If you peruse the newspapers of the west you cannot but be impressed with the existence of this sense of wrong and injury. But there is more than that ; you find indications in those papers of an impression growing in the minds of the people there that in the attitude taken by this government, western interests were sacrificed to eastern interests. There is in this a danger far greater, far more to be apprehended than the vain, illusory idea of annexation. There is nothing more detrimental to our national life than that there should be cultivated between the east and the west the feeling to which I have invited the attention of my hon. friend. I do not ask to-day for an answer; it would not be reasonable to ask the government at this time to be prepared to offer a new policy. But at no distant day the government should be prepared to deal with that situation and give the western people some compensation for the benefit which they expected from the trade agreement, of which benefit they are deprived.

But there is another question which is in the air, a question which was spoken of even to-day by the seconder of this address : there is the naval question. And upon the naval question we have not heard a word in the speech from the Throne. On the 31st of March, 1909, this House by resolution unanimously passed and affirmed the following proposition :—

> The House fully recognizes the duty of the people of Canada, as they increase in numbers and wealth, to assume in larger measure the responsibilities of national defence.
> The House will cordially approve of any necessary expenditure designed to promote the speedy organization of a Canadian naval service.

In conformity with the terms of this resolution we introduced, the following session, after consulting with the Admiralty, a measure, which measure was not satisfactory to the opposition of the day. This was not because our policy was wrong but because it did not go far enough. And I cannot do better than quote the resolution moved upon the Bill by my hon. friend (Mr. Borden) then leader of the opposition. He moved the following amendment :—

The proposals of the government do not follow the suggestions and recommendations of the admiralty and, in so far as they empower the government to withhold the naval forces of Canada from those of the empire in time of war, are ill-advised and dangerous.

That no such proposals can safely be accepted unless they thoroughly ensure unity of organization and of action without which there can be no effective co-operation in any common scheme of empire defence.

That the said proposals while necessitating heavy outlay for construction and maintenance will give no immediate or effective aid to the empire and no adequate or satisfactory results to Canada.

That no permanent policy should be entered upon involving large future expenditures of this character until it has been submitted to the people and has received their approval.

That in the meantime the immediate duty of Canada and the impending necessities of the empire can best be discharged and met by placing without delay at the disposal of the imperial authorities as a free and loyal contribution from the people of Canada, such an amount as may be sufficient to purchase or construct two battleships or armoured cruisers of the latest Dreadnought type, giving to the admiralty full discretion to expend the said sum at such time and for such purposes of naval defence as in their judgment may best serve to increase the united strength of the empire and thus assure its peace and security.

In this amendment was laid down the policy of the present administration. They found fault with our proposal because there was in the Bill introduced by the government of that day too much autonomy and too little imperialism. Upon the present occasion one would have expected, seeing that the government are now meeting parliament for the first time and exposing their policy, to hear an announcement of the course they intended to follow upon such an important question as that. Yet the administration is silent, not a word have we heard about it. What is the reason? Before we proceed further, perhaps it would not be out of place, on the contrary it would be conducive to a better understanding of the present situation, if we asked ourselves what is the character of the administration we see before us. If I am to judge of the character of the present administration by that resolution I have just quoted, and by the speeches which were made during the election, by solemn declarations by party leaders, I would judge that the present administration is a True Blue Tory administration, tinctured and saturated with sound imperialism, as they understand imperialism. I could quote sentence after sentence, speech after speech to this effect, delivered during the contest by my hon. friends opposite. It will be sufficient for the present to recall the words my hon. friend the Prime Minister spoke at Toronto, when he said that the voice of Toronto should be the voice of Canada. Well, we know what the voice of Toronto is with regard to the navy. The voice of Toronto has always been that the navy Bill we introduced was not sufficiently imperialistic, and was too autonomous. That is the only criticism that was ever made. But, Sir, on the present occasion I have to say that the voice of Toronto has been endorsed; and no one will dispute that the victory gained by my hon. friends on the treasury benches on the 21st of September last was a triumph of imperialism. All over the country the triumph of the conservative party was greeted with pæans of triumph, with shouts of victory for the cause of imperialism. Indeed, on the very next day, the 22nd of September, Mr. Joseph Chamberlain, himself the apostle of imperialism, cabled his congratulations and his blessings to my hon. friend, stating that he saw in the victory the dawn of the day he had long been looking for, and that he hoped soon to see the realization of his imperialistic dreams.

So, under the circumstances, therefore, there is perhaps no occasion to ask what is the character of this administration. Is there any doubt? If I were to listen to my own reasoning, my own judgment, if I were to attach importance to the deliverances of my hon. friends opposite, I would conclude that this is a true imperialistic administration. That is what my reason would tell me, but my eyes tell me a different story. When I look about me I cannot see what is in the hearts of hon. gentlemen; that they have refused to tell us; but I see before me a very composite galaxy. I see men sitting on the treasury benches opposite, one, two, three, perhaps four, upon whom the blessing of Mr. Joseph Chamberlain would produce the same contortions as the sprinkling of holy water upon the head of Satan. They cannot have come together without something extraordinary having taken place. This government, like another Joseph, wears a coat of many colours. The other Joseph was betrayed by his friends and sold into bondage. I have no hesitation in saying, with a full sense of the responsibility attaching to my words, that the hon. gentlemen now on the treasury benches cannot have come together without some of their brethren having been betrayed, without some of the electors, either in Ontario or Quebec, having been sold, and badly sold.

But who is it that has gone back upon his record? Who has abandoned his principles? Is it my hon. friend the Prime Minister? Well, my hon. friend will permit me to tell him, and I do not think he will differ from me, that he has been many things in succession, and nothing long at a time. I believe, however, that he is still a true Tory and imperialist. Is it my hon. friend the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr Foster)? I believe that the fear of the electors of Toronto will keep him to his guns, if nothing else will do it. Is it my hon. friend the new Minister of Finance (Mr. White)? I once knew him in better company, but he has fallen from grace, and it is much to be feared that he has fallen down, down, down, to the lowest depths of the bottomless pit. Is it my hon. friend the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Monk)? Once upon a time my hon. friend the Minister of Public Works, then the private member for Jacques Cartier, was the pride and hope of the Conservative party. He was promoted high in the ranks until he became the first lieutenant of the leader of his party. He sat by his side, cheek by jowl, every day. But unfortunately that accord did not last long For some reason better known to my hon. friend the Minister of Public Works, for some reason which he never explained, he left this seat and took a back seat, though still remaining in the ranks of the party. But last year my hon. friend seceded altogether from the ranks of his party, broke openly with his party, and refused any longer to take part in its deliberations. He shook the dust off his feet at the door of the caucus room, would not enter the caucus room. He joined the ranks of the Nationalists, who held Laurier in abomination and Borden in execration.

Those of us who were here last session saw him aloof from his former colleagues, isolated, sullen, tragic, the avenging angel of an outraged people whose sons were soon to be removed from the bosoms of their families and thrown upon the decks of men-of-war to be disembowelled on distant seas fighting for England. This was the language of his new associates, the Nationalists, who, upon the hustings, and in his presence upon more than one platform, denounced the Naval Service law, qualified it as a criminal law 'une loi criminelle' a wicked law, 'une loi maudite'. No wonder, therefore, that my hon. friend, holding such views, dissociated himself from the Conservative party whose only quarrel with the law was that it did not go far enough. My hon. friend was utterly opposed to the policy of the government, totally opposed to the policy of the opposition—until the 21st of September. For my hon friend opposite, the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Foster), to cross over from this side to that side was natural enough, but for my hon. friend from Jacques Cartier (Mr. Monk) to have jumped over from this side to that side of the table was an acrobatic performance which does honour to his limbs if to nothing else, and which showed that, after all, the weight of principle which my hon. friend carries will never interfere with his movements.

But now my hon. friend (Mr. Monk) is in the administration of my hon. friend opposite (Mr. Borden). How did they come together? Sir, the government that we have before us was not the natural government to be expected when an opposition becomes the government of the day—it is a coalition government. Am I speaking too strongly when I say that? I repeat it is a coalition government, and I shall give the proof. Only last year, just two days less than a year ago, on November 22 last, my hon. friend, speaking of the numerous meetings of Mr. Bourassa, of Mr. Lavergne, or the seconder of the address (Mr. Sevigny) and many others which he attended himself and at which certain resolutions were passed condemnatory of the policy of the government, of that of the opposition also, made use of the following words ('Hansard,' page 127):

> Certainly the policy of Mr. Borden was condemned at these meetings. A resolution was passed at these meetings wherever they were held condemning the attitude of the government and condemning the attitude of the leader of the opposition. I stand by that resolution, I adhere to it.

I have the resolution; it is a long resolution from which I shall quote the concluding portion as follows:

> We blame the federal government and the parliamentary majority, who have imposed on Canada this new naval law, who have launched the country into the vortex of militarism previously denounced with such energy by Sir Wilfrid Laurier, who have endangered the peace of Canada, and deflected towards the construction of murderous engines, and the preparation of bloody wars, the millions destined to the development of our agriculture and of our ways of transportation.

This is the part that related to me personally, let me now quote the part referring to my hon. friend opposite (Mr. Borden):

> We likewise censure the attitude of Mr. Borden and of the opposition behind him, for the adoption of a policy in no way less nefarious.

Now what has taken place to bring my hon. friend from Jacques Cartier (Mr. Monk) into the ranks of the government?

Has anything been said by the leader of the government (Mr. Borden) to make him change his views? Has anything occurred except the verdict of the people on the 21st of September, that my hon. friend now approves of the Act which was so nefarious when the leader of the government was in opposition? How did they come together? What arrangement has been made between them? It is impossible for these two gentlemen to sit together if they still hold the opinions which they held until the 21st of September, and if they now hold different opinions it is their first duty to inform parliament of the new policy they intend to follow. What has taken place? Which is the master mind? Who has brought the other down? Who is it that has given way? Is it the imperial lion who has swallowed the National lamb, or is it the National lamb who has swallowed the imperial lion? Whatever took place between my two hon. friends has remained hermetically sealed in their bosoms. My hon. friend the Prime Minister (Mr. Borden) has spoken on two or three occasions in different subjects, but he has never mentioned the word 'navy'. My hon. friend from Jacques Cartier (Mr. Monk) has also spoken since the elections. Before the elections he talked of hardly anything but the navy, but he has not opened his mouth on that subject since the elections. He spoke the other day to the people of Hull, and gave most salutary advice to the young people, telling them not to seek a living in the civil service, that they might do better elsewhere, mixing with the people. But, Sir, it is not fair to these young people for him not to tell them also to eschew the naval service where they might be exposed to be disembowelled on the decks of ships on distant seas, fighting for England. Opportunity has been given to these gentlemen to explain their policy, and certainly if they did not choose to do it before, here was the opportunity, when they placed in His Royal Highness's hands a statement of the measures which they were to bring forward for the happiness of the people of Canada. His Royal Highness told us that we should have a Tariff Commission—not a word about the navy. We were told that we should improve the highways—not a word about the navy. We were told that we should improve agriculture—not a word about the navy. But, Sir, there is one who is not quite so discreet, and who lifted a very little corner of the veil, that was my hon. and old friend the Postmaster General (Mr. Pelletier). On the occasion of his election by acclamation, my hon. friend the Postmaster General made use of the following language:

When I was called to Mr. Borden's cabinet, I was not asked to withdraw a single line of the programme that I have submitted to my electors, and my efforts will tend to the complete carrying out of this programme. We shall have the referendum that we ask, and we shall stand by the decision of the majority of the Canadian people on that question. Moreover, we may be offered more than a referendum, and we shall be still more glad to accept it.

We would have been interested to know what is more than the referendum which may be offered to the Canadian people. Mr. Armand Lavergne was present on that occasion, and Mr. Lavergne stated that he was not bound by any secret and that he could assure them they would have a referendum. Mr. Armand Lavergne gave us a little more of the secrets of the party, for he told us he had had an interview with the Prime Minister when he was forming his government. He did not say whether he had come by invitation or unsolicited to offer his advice, but at all events he was consulted whether on his motion or on the motion of the Prime Minister does not much matter and he said to the Prime Minister: I am bringing you the regenerated province of Quebec; will you accept it? Well, Sir, when I look at the regenerators of the province of Quebec now sitting on the treasury benches I very much fear that many people will believe that the regenerated province of Quebec is in a worse position than when it was unregenerated. At all events, Mr. Lavergne pretended to speak of the secrets of the government. We are living under constitutional government, an elementary principle of which is that the men who form the administration must have a common policy. Are we to suppose that men who so differed as these gentlemen on the treasury benches did during the elections have now come together on a new policy? If that be so, then the leader of the government will not dispute that it is his bounden duty to acquaint parliament of the policy they have agreed upon and which they intend to pursue. On the other hand, are we to suppose that these men holding views so dissimiliar, have formed a cabinet, ignoring altogether such an important public question and still intending to sit there together; the Prime Minister and his friends from the other provinces, holding that the naval policy must be improved, and the member for Jacques Cartier (Mr. Monk) and his colleagues from Quebec, holding that it must be wiped out altogether. Constitutional government demands that we should have an explanation of the policy which has been adopted, and as we have not received any explanation we are bound to conclude that the men who now sit together in the administration have no policy upon this question. I believe there is a measure of truth in the statement of Mr. Armand Lavergne and of the Postmaster General (Mr. Pelletier) that there shall be a referendum upon which the government, abdicating their responsibility and functions, will leave it to the Prime Minister to advocate an improvement of the naval policy from his point of view and larger expenditure for naval purposes, and will leave it to the hon. member for Jacques Cartier at the same time to advocate a different policy. This would mean that the Prime Minister would say to the hon. member for Jacques Cartier (Mr. Monk) and that the hon. member (Mr. Monk) could say to the Prime Minister I will wash my hands of this business and you can wash yours, and let the people vote as they please, and we will have no policy and no guidance to offer the people; this is a thing which we thought essential to the empire two years ago, but the requirements of office now tell us to cast it aside as an old garment. Sir, that is not responsible government in any way. I leave it to all those who are students of English Parliamentary History if such a spectacle as we have here to-day would for one instant commend itself on the floor of the British parliament. I leave it to the House to say whether we are to have a government without any policy at all, or whether we shall exact from them compliance with the constitutional rule. Standing there, as they are at this present moment, I think I am not criticising the course of the government in too strong language when I say that it is a scandalous and immoral violation of the fundamental rules of British parliamentary government. I beg to move, seconded by Mr. Pugsley:

That the following words be added to the address:

We beg to represent to your Royal Highness that by resolution of this House, adopted the 31st of March, 1909, it was affirmed that:

This House fully recognizes the duty of the people of Canada, as they increase in numbers and wealth, to assume in larger measure the responsibilites of national defence.

And further:

This House will cordially approve of any necessary expenditure designed to promote the speedy organization of a Canadian naval service.

That in pursuance of that resolution the late administration proceeded to adopt a well-defined policy of naval organization.

That with regard to that policy, as well as to the whole question of naval defence, there is in the present cabinet a flagrant conflict of opinion, and that some of its members have repeatedly, both before and during the last elections, denounced naval defence in any form whatsoever.

We respectfully submit to your Royal Highness that it is a fundamental principle of constitutional government that the advisers of the Crown shall be heartily in accord on all important questions of public policy, and that the inclusion, by the Prime Minister, in the present cabinet, of members holding diametrically opposite views on a question of the highest importance to the Dominion and to the empire, is contrary to the well understood principles of responsible government and should not receive the approval of the House.

Hon. R. L. BORDEN (Prime Minister). Mr. Speaker, I join with the mover and seconder of the address in extending to the right hon. gentleman (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) my hearty congratulations on his having attained his seventieth birthday, and to wish to him in the years to come during which he shall be spared—and I hope they will be many—every possible happiness.

I join with my right hon. friend in extending congratulations to the mover and to the seconder of the address. Their speeches have been characterized not only by eloquence, but by breadth of view and by an understanding and comprehension of the conditions of this country and of the problems confronting us for the future, which I am certain assure us that there presence in our deliberations will be a very great and welcome addition to the debating strength of this House.

I also desire, before dealing with other parts of the speech of my right hon. friend, to associate myself with what he has said so eloquently and so well respecting their Royal Highnesses the Governor-General and the Duchess of Connaught. My right hon. friend has expressed this so well, and it has also been expressed so well by the mover of the address, that little remains for me to say. But I would like to add just this, that it seems to me that the great distinguishing characteristic of the life of His Royal Highness the Governor-General and of the Duchess of Connaught is a high and earnest sense of duty and responsibility, and I am thoroughly confident that they have assumed their duties in this country with an earnestness and an enthusiasm which will assure to the people of Canada the deepest possible interest by them in everything that concerns the welfare of this country.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I come at once to some of the observations of my right hon. friend. So far as the opening portion of his speech is concerned, I have no fault to find with his observations. In fact, I am entirely inclined to agree with his frank statement in the first instance that he deemed it beyond his power to enter into any effective criticism of this government. I am sure that every hon. gentleman to-day listening to him was more firmly convinced of that after he concluded his speech than at the outset. He very properly remarked that it is not now time to comment on the measures which the government propose to introduce; but he found a great solace and comfort in the fact that an allusion, a very proper allusion, was made in the speech from the Throne to the prosperity of this country, as well as an expression of belief that that prosperity would continue at all times in the future. My right hon. friend, possessed with an hallucination which has overcome him on many occasions in the past, considered this a compliment to himself. He takes the credit of this prosperity. Mr. Speaker, I would have thought that after the 21st day of September last he would have awakened from that dream, and would have realized that the prosperity of Canada is not due to him or to any measure, whether administrative or legislative, that he has given to this country, but is due to the wonderful resources of this Dominion and to the splendid capacity of the people of Canada in developing those resources. It is only an illustration on his part of that singular self-appreciation which has characterized him on many occasions. We have in opposition over and over again recognized that this country was prosperous; we recognized it in the debate on this very question during the last session of parliament; we recognize it now; but we believe that that prosperity is due to the great resources of this country and to the industry and capacity of its people, and not to him or his government or to any measure that they ever passed.

The right hon. gentleman said that he would desire no better epitaph than that contained in this speech. May I be permitted to note in passing that the right hon. gentleman recognizes the verdict of the people on the 21st of September last as an epitaph. Let us deal for a moment with this question which the right hon. gentleman desires to thresh out again, after it has been pronounced on by the people—the question of the agreement which he proposed to parliament during the last session with respect to trade relations with the United States of America. So far as that agreement is concerned, my right hon. friend took a somewhat curious position in the concluding portion of his observations with regard to it. He did not feel inclined to say that it was not within the rights of the Canadian people to pronounce upon that question when it was submitted to them; but, by a certain curious insinuation which was to be found in his speech, he more than suggested that they could not properly have done so. I take issue with the right hon. gentleman in that regard. I say we had on the statute-book of this country for eighteen years, until the right hon. gentleman himself removed it, a standing offer of reciprocity to the United States of America. My right hon. friend removed that, and I say that no man in Canada, during the period in which that offer was on the statute-book of this country, ever denied the absolute and perfect right of the people of the United States to decline to entertain it; and it would be a curious condition of affairs in this country if, after parliament had been dissolved for the purpose of submitting that question to the electorate of Canada, that electorate ought to have been influenced by any consideration that they could not deal with that question in what they deemed to be the best interests of this Dominion as a portion of the British Empire.

My right hon. friend dissolved parliament in a great hurry, and dissolved parliament without taking the ordinary and constitutional step of asking parliament to vote the necessary supplies. I want to tell him, in connection with the motion he has proposed, that under all the constitutional authorities that can be cited, no graver violation of the duties of a government was ever witnessed in any country. If you examine the authorities, you will find that when a dissolution of parliament is in preparation or under consideration, the very first duty of a government is to make provision for the supplies in order that the public business may be carried on, and it is the duty of the opposition under such circumstances to grant those supplies for such reasonable period as may elapse before a new parliament can vote them. That plain duty of a government under constitutional usage was violated by the right hon. gentleman, the result of which brought the public service of this country for a time into very great difficulty and very great confusion.

Well, my right hon. friend went to the country with his boast. He told us in parliament—told us amidst the cheers of his supporters—and published in the press that he was going to the country and going to sweep it from the Atlantic to the Pacific. He made many boasts of the same character after parliament was dissolved. He told the people of this country to follow his white plume and he advised all his friends far and near to bet their money on the old cock. I would like to say to you, Mr. Speaker, in passing, that there are many men in Canada, if I am not mistaken, who followed that advice and who are sadder and wiser men to-day.

Now, let us come for a moment to the observations of the right hon. gentleman with regard to this question. He has told us that we opposed reciprocity on national and not on economic grounds. I take absolute issue with the right hon. gentleman. His statement in that regard indicates either one thing or the other—that his memory is not as good as it ought to be, or that he did not read very much of what was said by hon. gentlemen on this side in discussing this question in parliament, and on the hustings after the dissolution of parliament. I have under my hand here—if it is desired to raise economic considerations on a question which was thrashed out in very great detail—an address which I issued to the people of Canada during the course of that campaign, and in paragraph after paragraph of which—as the right hon. gentleman would know if he had ever done me the honour to read it, as I believe he could not have done—I dealt with the economic considerations connected with the adoption of this agreement. I said:

> It is a direct and serious menace to our internal lines of water communication and to our ocean shipping, as well as to our Canadian Atlantic ports that have been constructed and equipped at such enormous cost to the country.
> It opens to the United States our home market, which consumes 80 per cent of our animal and agricultural products. It also has the effect of opening that same market to twelve foreign countries and to all the British possessions for which we obtain no reciprocal or compensating advantage.
> It makes an absurd pretence of bringing relief to the farmer by exposing him to the competition of the world in everything that he sells and by continuing the existing burden of taxation on everything that he buys.

I can read to the right hon. gentleman many more extracts from this address which touch the economic feature of this question and the economic feature alone.

Now my right hon. friend says that the result of the elections of the 21st September was obtained by an appeal to prejudice. I take issue with him upon that and I say, Mr. Speaker, that he cast a distinct reflection upon the capacity and the judgment of the Canadian people when he ventured to say that their action on that occasion was the result of prejudice. I say that their verdict was the result of well reasoned consideration of the arguments placed before them on the one hand by himself and his colleagues, and on the other hand the arguments both from the economic and from the national standpoint which were placed before them by hon. gentlemen on this side of the House.

The right hon. gentleman declares that trusts are flourishing in Canada, and he draws an alarming picture in that regard. Might I venture to ask him what he and his administration have been doing during the past two or three years? Does he mean to suggest that these trusts have sprung up since the 21st of September last? I venture to remark that when the right hon. gentleman made that suggestion he cast no reflection on hon. gentlemen on this side of the House who have not been responsible for legislation during the past fifteen years, but he cast very serious reflection upon his own administration, and his own policy in respect to the matters which are alluded to. But, Sir, how did he propose to remedy the state of affairs of which he complained? By submitting to the parliament of Canada a measure not to control and regulate Canadian trusts, but by opening up the Dominion of Canada, the markets and the resources of this country to the depredations of the enormous trusts of the United States. Well, if that be the method which commends itself to the right hon. gentleman I for one am not surprised that sometimes his reason and his eyes do not see alike.

At six o'clock, House took recess.

After Recess.

House resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. BORDEN. Mr. Speaker, when the House rose at six o'clock, I was dealing with the observations of my right hon. friend with respect to what is known as the reciprocity pact which he submitted to parliament in the last session and which was passed upon by the country. I had been dealing with his assertion that the economic question had not entered into the discussion so far as we were concerned. I challenged that statement, and I still challenge it. The fact that it is absolutely unfounded can be demonstrated to the satisfaction of any hon. gentleman who desires to go over again the discussion which took place in the late campaign. But I will point out to the right hon. gentleman one thing—one thing which he has overlooked or forgotten—that on one side in that controversy there was not only one economic argument, there were two wholly inconsistent economic arguments; and that side was the one that he represented. For every one who recalls what took place will remember that, up to about two weeks before the 21st of September last, the argument of these gentlemen was that this proposal should be accepted by the country because it would bring higher prices to the farmer; but, about two weeks before polling day, they absolutely changed their position and placed before the people, not only in the east but in the towns of the west, the argument that the proposal ought to be accepted because it would give lower prices to the farmer and therefore lower prices to the consumer. So. if my right hon. friend is disposed still to contend that we did not stand upon any economic argument, I can pay him the compliment of saying that he and his friends stood during the campaign upon two absolutely inconsistent economic arguments.

My right hon. friend says that the people are suffering to-day from the results of the rejection of this pact. The conditions of Canada at the present time do not appeal to me in that way. But I was not very sure whether he considers that the rejection of this agreement had resulted in higher prices or in lower prices. He did not make that very plain to me, and I do not know whether he desires to make it plain now. He asserted also that the rejection of this proposal had resulted in a divergence of sentiment between the east and the west, and that the people in the west felt themselves aggrieved and oppressed because this compact had not commended itself to the people of Canada as a whole. I would like to say to the right hon. gentleman this, that if any such sentiment does exist in western Canada to-day—and I am not satisfied that it does exist—it is due to the teaching of his own friends and supporters.

So far as his argument with respect to the relations between Canada and the United States is concerned, I say that I for one in this country have always endeavoured to adopt a course which would maintain and improve, if they could be improved, the friendly relations which now happily exist between the British Empire and the great republic to the south. I hope that those friendly relations always will be maintained; and I hope that the approaching celebration of the completion of a hundred years of peace between the two countries will be carried out in Canada as well as in the United States in a manner worthy of so great an occasion. But I venture to think, Mr. Speaker, that Canada will lose neither the friendship nor the respect of the United States by a policy which will firmly maintain the control of Canadian affairs by our own parliament and which will find its highest ideal and expression in the growth and development of this Dominion as an autonomous nation within the British Empire.

The right hon. gentleman went on to speak of the project of preferential trade within the empire. He thought that he found inconsistencies in the views of the members of the cabinet in this and in other respects. It seemed to me that the right hon. gentleman, so far as I could understand the purport of his remarks, expressed, within five minutes of each other, views that were absolutely inconsistent. For, in the first place he sneered at the British imperialists, speaking of their aspirations and ideals in a very slighting way; and then, a few sentences afterwards, he described himself as their only hope and said they would have to come to him in the end. I can only say that I think they will be in a very distressful and a pitiable condition when they come to that last resort. For the right hon. gentleman knows his own record in this matter. Every hon. member of this House knows that record. In 1896 the right hon. gentleman adopted the policy of Sir Charles Tupper in regard to inter-imperial preference. He said that if he were given power he could and would do every thing to bring about a system of mutual trade preferences within the empire that Sir Charles Tupper would do. And he went to the mother country in 1897 and told the people there that Canada did not desire a preference in the British markets. And for what reason? Because Canada did not wish to see the mother country cursed with that system of protection which he said had been the bane of this country for many years. And I need only point out, as bearing on the question of inconsistency—if that is to be dealt with—that the right hon. gentleman for the next fifteen years maintained in Canada the very system which he had so strongly denounced before the people of Great Britain. In this respect my right hon. friend seems to be almost an unconscious humourist. For, after all, when he is dealing with the question of reciprocity within the empire on the one hand, and the question of reciprocity with the great republic to the south on the other hand, does it not appeal to him that, even putting aside all national considerations and taking the question purely from the economic standpoint, it would be infinitely more to the advantage of the people of Canada to seek reciprocal trade relations within the empire, with those who are our customers, rather than with the producers of the great nation to the south who are our competitors in the markets of the world. I think that within the range of this empire, having regard to the great variety of its products, there is infinitely better scope for the bringing about of reciprocal trade arrangements than were to be found in the scheme which the right hon. gentleman presented to parliament.

The right hon. gentleman dealt with the constitution of the cabinet and expressed very grave disatisfaction with it. Indeed, in the closing part of his resolution he adopted a most extraordinary course—one which I have never known to be followed in the House before—of submitting to His Royal Highness the Governor General that the constitution of the cabinet ought not to receive the approval of this House. I have never heard that it was the duty of the King or the representative of the King to concern himself with what should or should not receive the approval of parliament in that regard. My right hon. friend has launched a constitutional idea that is new to this generation in asking His Royal Highness the Governor General to express any opinion as to what ministers should or should not be approved by parliament. I have always understood that under the modern system of constitutional government, liberty of opinion had been secured to the representatives of the people in parliament in this respect. My right hon. friend in the course of his discussion showed himself to be what in days gone by he described as a scrap-book orator of the first water. But it is certainly refreshing to find that he has not only gone back fifteen or twenty years for the purpose of bringing matters to the attention of this House which are more or less irrelevant, but he has gone back about two hundred and fifty years for his ideas of constitutional government.

I would like to explain to my right hon. friend, in the first instance, lest there should be any misunderstanding on the subject, that this cabinet was not constituted with the idea of satisfying him. We knew that this would be an impossible task, and that no matter how this cabinet might have been constituted, my right hon. friend would have been found making much the same argument and much the same complaint that he has made today. He has commented upon my hon. friend the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Monk). There is nothing that more quickly arouses my right hon. friend to a high tide of eloquence than the sight of my hon. friend the Minister of Public Works, than to see him sitting upon the treasury benches while my right hon. friend is sitting in opposition. He compares the blessing of Mr. Chamberlain upon my hon. friend the Minister of Public Works to the pouring of holy water upon his Satanic majesty. I do not know whether my right honourable friend compares the blessing of Mr. Chamberlain to the holy water, or whether he desires to compare the Minister of Public Works to his Satanic majesty. If the latter was his intention, I can only say that my right hon. friend might have found a much more suitable illustration a little nearer home.

Then he clutched eagerly at the idea of dissension in this cabinet, and there is nothing that would fill his heart with greater joy than to believe that such dissension exists. But after all, it does seem to me that the speech of my right hon. friend and his illustrations have been prompted by something of a more personal nature. Every honourable gentleman in this House remembers, I am sure, that on one occasion, about twelve or thirteen years ago, one of his most distinguished colleagues declared that my right hon. friend and his colleagues were wont to fight like blazes. Well, I can assure him that there is no such unhappy condition in this cabinet. Then he thinks that the Minister of Public Works ought still to be sitting upon the opposition benches. Well, that may be a matter of opinion, Mr. Speaker, and my right hon. friend is entitled to hold his opinion. But if I may venture to speak for my hon. friend the Minster of Public Works, I would hazard the statement that he prefers the company on this side of the House to that on the other side, and therefore he is over here. Then my right hon. friend points out the weaknesses of various other gentlemen on this side of the House. I think he might well remember that weaknesses are not confined to hon. gentlemen on this side of the House. I have not heard that my hon. friend the Minister of Public Works ever held up to the people of this country as the goal of his aspirations the complete severance of the ties which bind this Dominion to the rest of the empire. If, at the opening of this parliament, we are to indulge in reminiscences of that kind, it is only right perhaps that they should not be confined to one side of the House.

Now, my right hon. friend is very much concerned about the naval question, and he is deeply anxious to know what is to be the policy of the present administration with respect thereto. Now, let me point out to him one or two considerations. He imagines, if one may draw a reasonable conclusion from his utterances, that this government should have come down with a full fledged naval policy at the commencement of this session. That is, as I understand it, the gravamen of his complaint. In 1896, my right hon. friend came into power on the 11th day of July, and he met parliament on the 19th day of August in the same year. The present administration was formed on the 10th day of October 1911, and we met parliament on the 15th of November in the same year. We come before parliament sooner than did the right hon. gentleman on the former occasion. He came before parliament on that occasion without proposing a single measure, although he had before him the Ottawa platform of 1893, with no less than thirteen or fourteen articles suggesting reforms which, as he and his friends declared, were absolutely essential to the welfare of this country. Now, we have not followed his example in that respect. We have met parliament at an earlier date than he did, and we have presented a very substantial bill of fare indeed, one that will occupy the attention of this parliament for some time, even under the best conditions. Therefore I submit that the course which has been taken by this government, and the progress we have made in carrying out the policy which we placed before the people, can well be contrasted with the attitude and the position of my right hon. friend and his government when they met parliament in 1896.

Now he desires to know what we propose to do with regard to the naval policy. Well, I will tell him. In the first place, let me read what we placed before the people of Canada when we were asking them to return us to power during the recent election campaign :

Since the last general election the government has entered upon a new line of policy in regard to naval affairs, which is of far-reaching importance. The policy adopted was not debated before the people during the election, and it bears all the earmarks of a hasty and ill-considered scheme. In my judgment our duty to the empire cannot be properly or effectively fulfilled by such a measure. I hold that the plan of the government contemplates the creation of a naval force that will be absolutely useless in time of war, and therefore of no practical benefit to Canada or to the empire. It will cost immense sums of money to build, equip and maintain. It will probably result in time of war in the useless sacrifice of many valuable lives, and it will not add one iota to the fighting strength of the empire. The more it is considered, the more does it become evident that the whole naval plan of the government is an unfortunate blunder.

I have no doubt that the ideas embodied in that paragraph of the address which I issued to the people of Canada have entered the inner consciousness of my right hon. friend; and if that be so, I do not understand the great curiosity which he exhibits with regard to this matter, because I think he is pretty effectively answered by the words I have quoted.

The proposals of the late government involved an expenditure of nearly $55,000,000 in the next ten years. It was argued in parliament, and there was never any satisfactory or reasonable answer to our contention, that, as a fighting force, it would be absolutely useless when completed. Further than that, it established the principle of disunited navies, and I think it can be demonstrated to the satisfaction of the right hon. gentleman himself, and will be demonstrated before the end of this session, that before such a navy would be completed it would be entirely obsolete. Does my hon. friend consider that under those circumstances an expenditure of that kind should be carried on? I say there is only one thing to be done, and that is to stop such a system of wasteful expenditure— and we propose to do it. Further, Mr. Speaker, the whole policy must be reconsidered, and we shall reconsider it. In so grave and important a determination affecting for all time to come the relations of this Dominion to the rest of the empire, it is infinitely better to be right than to be in a hurry. The question of permanent co-operation between this Dominion, and the rest of the empire ought to be threshed out and debated before the people, and they should be given an opportunity of pronouncing upon it. I say further that we shall take pains to ascertain in the meantime what are the conditions that confront the empire, and hon. gentlemen on this side of the House, without exception, will be prepared to do their duty as representatives of the people of this Dominion, and as citizens of this great empire. I stand by the declaration which I made in this House on the 24th day of November last.

My right hon. friend has spoken of the resolutions that were passed, and has called attention to one which I myself moved declaring:

That no such proposals can safely be accepted unless they thoroughly ensure unity of organization and of action without which there can be no effective co-operation in any common scheme of empire defence.

That the said proposals while necessitating heavy outlay for construction and maintenance will give no immediate or effective aid to the empire and no adequate or satisfactory results to Canada.

That no permanent policy should be entered upon, involving large future expenditures of this character, until it has been submitted to the people and has received their approval.

I have no fault to find with the right hon. gentleman for calling attention to the fact that my hon. friend the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Monk) when this matter was under debate two sessions ago did not see eye to eye with me on the question of emergent conditions which at that time I thought confronted the empire. Those conditions appealed to me in that way at that time by reason of very grave declarations that had been made by the Prime Minister, the Foreign Secretary and the First Lord of the Admiralty of Great Britain. I am ready to admit, in fact we were afterwards taunted in this House by hon. gentlemen opposite with the fact, that these declarations were, to a very considerable extent, modified by subsequent statements made in the British House of Commons by the advisers of the Crown, by the Prime Minister himself, I think, and also by the First Lord of the Admiralty. It is true that the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Monk), and I did not see eye to eye, but the point that divided us at that time was not a question of policy, but a question of fact, because the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Monk) had said over and over again that when any emergency confronted this empire he and those who think with him would be prepared to do their duty. The Minister of Public Works (Mr. Monk) and I stood together on this common platform that it would be the height of unwisdom, and not in the interest of a united empire that any great scheme of permanent co-operation should be forced on the people of this country without affording them an opportunity to pronounce upon it.

My right hon. friend could not come to a conclusion without having a fling at the utterances of gentlemen in the province of Quebec who have been opposed to his naval policy, and who, it is perfectly true, were as much opposed to some of my views in the matter as they were to the views of the right hon. gentleman. A very severe arraignment was made of these gentlemen at the commencement of the last session. My right hon. friend was foremost to denounce them, and an hon. gentleman who is now out of public life (a reference to whom I make now only because it is necessary for the purpose of my argument), who occupied the position of Minister of Marine (Mr. Brodeur) denounced them also in unmeasured terms. They referred to their utterances, they quoted them, and the gravamen of the whole charge was summed up at the end in a certain cartoon which as it was alleged had been used in a journal in the province of Quebec that was the recognized organ of the Nationalists. The House was astounded two days afterwards to discover that this very cartoon had been copied by this wicked Nationalist paper from the organ of the right hon. gentleman himself, and if any hon. gentleman in this House desires to verify what I state he may refer to the columns of 'Le Canada,' of the 26th day of September, 1904, when a certain issue had been raised in some parts of this country in regard to the action of the government respecting Lord Dundonald. Under these circumstances I do not think it lies very well in the mouth of the right hon. gentleman to make this the subject of controversial debate. I would suggest to him the old proverb: 'Physician heal thyself,' before he undertakes to cast any aspersion upon any other hon. gentleman.

I think I have touched almost every point that the right hon. gentleman has taken up in the course of his speech. Let me only say in conclusion, that I am very glad indeed that he has screwed his courage up to the sticking point of proposing this motion. It is conceived much in the same spirit as the right hon. gentleman displayed on the first day of this session, and I shall only invite the House to treat it in the same summary manner as the country treated the proposals of the right hon. gentleman with respect to the reciprocal trade arrangement proposed in this parliament during the last session, to dismiss it from notice as inspired not by any desire to conserve or advance the public interest of this country, but as a motion put forward solely with a view to excite supposed dissensions which do not exist, and in that way to conduce to the advantage of the political fortunes of my right hon friend which unfortunately for him and his party have been reduced to a very low ebb indeed by the event which took place on the 21st day of September last.

Mr. HUGH GUTHRIE (South Wellington). Mr. Speaker, whatever opinion one may entertain of the remarks of the hon. gentleman who now has the honour of leading this House, one must surmise in the first place that his temper is not as genial as we might expect from a man who suddenly has been elevated to a very high place of power and prominence in this great country. It was noticeable on the day this House opened that something was wrong.

Some HON. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

Mr. GUTHRIE. After an experience of twelve sessions with my hon. friend (Mr. Borden) in this House, I do not believe that I ever saw him so irritated, notwithstanding that he should have been genial, smiling and bland. It is all very well for him to-day to protest that there is no friction in his Cabinet and that all is peace and harmony, but his own discomposure inclines one to conclude that even at this early date everything is not so happy as he would have us think. There can be no doubt, as the Prime Minister has said, that the personnel of the Cabinet may not satisfy the leader of the opposition, but a more serious question is : does it satisfy all the supporters of the right hon. gentleman himself. I need only refer to prominent Conservative papers and to the speeches of Conservative public men to prove that all is not satisfaction, and that the Prime Minister has fallen very far short of satisfying even his own followers. It may be said it is none of my business, but I hold that every elector of this Dominion has a perfect right to express himself freely upon the personnel of the Cabinet or upon any individual member of it. I shall not be going beyond the limits of proper criticism, if I state a few reasons why I think there is not entire harmony around the Council Board. There is no doubt considerable disappointment on this side of the House, but there is a good deal on the other side too, and that which impresses the onlooker most profoundly is the glaring evidence that the Prime Minister has not been a free agent in the selection of his Ministers, and that he has been shackled in some way, the particulars of which may never come to light, but the evidence of which is very apparent. There is no doubt in the world that the personnel of the Cabinet surrounding the Prime Minister is not the result of his own choice. They have come to the council of the nation not by any process of natural selection ; they are the work of the political highwaymen who say: stand and deliver. And the Prime Minister instead of resisting as we might hope he would have, has held up his hands and delivered. Will any hon. gentleman on the opposite side ; will the Prime Minister himself say that the occupant of the high position of the Minister of Finance was the result of natural selection on the part of the Prime Minister or on the part of the Conservative party. I read the speech of the Minister of Finance at his nomination a few days ago, and he told the people he had entered the Cabinet through the open door. I have no doubt he did, but how did he get the door opened? The door was locked, barred and fastened, but it was opened because certain influences with a battering-ram on their shoulders, came to the door and smashed the bars. Does anybody think he entered the Cabinet with the consent of the Minister of Trade and Commerce? Does anybody believe he entered with the consent of the Borden Club or the Albany Club or the First Ward, or Fourth Ward or Fifth Ward Conservatives of Toronto? Was he the free choice of the Prime Minister? I say no, and I know I am correct. He was the choice of whom? He was the choice of the trusts, of the mergers, of the corporations, and he sits in his place today with the record of never having given more than one Conservative vote in his life, and of having been until last spring a pronounced Liberal. He sits there, the representative of the trusts, the mergers and the corporations.

Mr. SPEAKER. The hon. member (Mr. Guthrie) will please withdraw that expression. I think it scarcely parliamentary.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Go on.

Mr. SPEAKER. Order.

Mr. GUTHRIE. I will bow to your ruling, Mr. Speaker, but I hardly think my statement is unparliamentary.

Mr. HENDERSON. That is not bowing to the ruling.

Mr. FOSTER. Bow a little deeper.

Mr. GUTHRIE. If my hon. friend (Mr. Foster) thinks I should withdraw the statement I will do so in deference to him because I feel more sorry for him than for any man in that Cabinet. For the past seven or eight years I have seen the Minister of Trade and Commerce the dominant Conservative figure in this House. I have seen him the real if not the titular leader of the Conservative party. On all great occasions he was the leader of debate, he formulated the Conservative policy, he dictated terms, and now I do not like to see him relegated to a more or less insignificant position in the councils of his party. And, when I speak now, I speak more in sorrow than in anger, because during the past summer I had the honour of knowing my hon. friend (Mr. Foster) more intimately than at any previous time and I found him a most genial and agreeable travelling companion. I found him above all things a thorough Imperialist. There is nothing anti-British in the make-up of the Minister of Trade and Commerce. He is an Imperialist from beginning to end and it is with sorrow that I see him denied his rightful post, and another taken in his stead, contrary to the desire of the great majority of the Conservatives throughout the Dominion.

Perhaps there was a reason for it. I have no doubt there was a reason for it, and I believe the real reason is now the dominating influence in that cabinet of the hon. Minister of Public Works (Mr. Monk).

I am going to direct my remarks to the proposed amendment to the Address, and to what it suggests. I think that amendment is most opportune. I remember particularly that just a year ago, on the debate on the address in reply to the speech from the Throne, the hon. Minister of Public Works moved in this House an amendment upon the navy question. In the speech from the Throne on that occasion the navy was mentioned, with the progress that had been made in regard to it. But that did not satisfy the hon. Minister of Public Works, and he undertook to move an amendment. I think he said that his object in doing so was to allay the tormenting condition which existed in Canada over that naval proposal. His amendment was in the language following:

> The House regrets that the speech from the Throne gives no indication whatever of the intention of the government to consult the people on its naval policy and the general question of the contribution of Canada to imperial armaments.

My hon. friend the Prime Minister was evidently not satisfied with that amendment of his quondam colleague. He moved a second amendment and the only difference to a casual observer between the amendment of the Minister of Public Works, and the amendment of the Prime Minister, was that the Prime Minister, for I think purposes of his own, premised his amendment with a bold statement of the unalterable loyalty and devotion of the people of Canada to the British Crown and empire. I believe that the intention of the Prime Minister, when he moved that amendment, was to drive from him openly the support of the so called Nationalist party in this House. He did not want them particularly to vote for his amendment, and he knew of no better method of preventing them doing so than by prefacing it with a declaration of the unalterable loyalty and devotion of the people of Canada to the British Crown and empire. The result of the division proved my case in that respect. How did hon. members vote on that occasion? The amendment of the Prime Minister was put first. The Nationalists of the House now in the House voted against it. My hon. friend the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Foster) voted for it. My hon. friend the member for Centre Toronto (Mr. Bristol) voted for it. I mention that because, when the amendment of the present Minister of Public Works was put immediately afterwards, up stepped the Minister of Trade and Commerce from his seat and sneaked out of the door behind the Speaker's Chair, and out stepped the hon. member for Centre Toronto and hurried out the rear door. A moment after, when the amendment of the Minister of Public Works was put, two names are omitted from the voting list, either pro or con—one the present Minister of Trade and Commerce and the other the present member for Centre Toronto. There was one man, however, in this House on the Conservative side who had the courage of his convictions; I refer to the Minister of Militia and Defence (Mr. Hughes). He refused, and he was the only one who openly refused to vote for the Nationalist amendment; he voted against it. The balance of the Conservative party voted for it, except two who as, I have already said flew the coop. That was the condition when the speech from the Throne was read last year.

Now, another question has intervened in the meantime, a question which has engaged very largely the attention of the electors in all the provinces of Canada to the exclusion, I think, of most other questions. In the province of Ontario I do not think the navy question was discussed at all during the recent election; at all events, I did not hear it. The discussion was purely and simply on the trade proposals. The verdict on polling day was certainly a decisive one and was against the then government's proposal. But I believe in the province of Quebec there was not a fair, unprejudiced, unbiased discussion of the trade issues at all. The predominant discussion in that province was the discussion which the so-called Nationalist party thrust upon the people, and was nothing more or less than an absolute condemnation of the then Prime Minister of Canada, charging him with being too British, too imperial, and a condemnation of the navy policy of the government, in which promises of all kinds were made, that if the Liberal party were defeated we would have heard the last of naval defence throughout the Dominion of Canada.

Under conditions so marked in the province of Quebec, and with no other great issue before the people, the people having disposed at the election of the question of trade relations with the United States, was it not to be expected that in the speech from the Throne there would have been some pronouncment by the government as to its naval policy? The absence of any suggestion in that respect emphasized the situation. People all over the country thought, why does not the Prime Minister state what he and his government intend to do? But not a word, not a reference in the speech from the Throne to the great question of naval defence in the Dominion of Canada, and for the support of the British Empire.

Now, there is a history to this question, and I am going to be very brief as I discuss it. This question was brought before this House for the first time in a most admirable manner by the present Minister of Trade and Commerce. It had not then become a political football; it was a question on which all parties agreed. They agreed to establish a Canadian navy first of all, with schools for the training of cadets and officers, and to build a fleet in our own country, under the supervision of course of the British Admiralty. That resolution stands to-day as the unanimous decision of the House of Commons in March, 1909, and it was approved time and again by the present leader of the government—in his speech at the Dominion day banquet in London in the same year, and in his speech at the banquet in Halifax after his return. We were all one on that question until when? The date of the bye-election of Drummond and Arthabaska.

All went well until that day and then my hon. friend the leader of the government and his colleagues seemed to have fallen from the high plane which they took in regard to naval defence in this country. Fell for what purpose, for what object? To grasp at any thing? Yes to grasp at the Nationalist vote in the province of Quebec. Not openly. No, they would not take part openly, their supporters in the province of Ontario would not permit it; but by fair means or by foul they meant to get control of that vote. I am sorry to say in looking over the result of the last elections in the province of Quebec, though the Nationalists may be but small in numbers they are well scattered throughout the country, and that element rallying to the support of Conservative candidates in riding after riding were strong enough in many of the ridings to change the complexion of that province to some extent. But we are thankful that the great bulk of that province still remains loyal and true. To what? To the naval defence of this country for the protection of Canada and the protection of the empire. My hon. friend the First Minister need not imagine that he can simply say in regard to the naval question: 'Give us time,' we have only had a month or two months. Give us time and we will decide upon what we are going to do.' He has to do more than that. This country is committed at the present moment to a naval policy. The navy has been started. Some hon. members are inclined to laugh but we must make a start somewhere, and my statement was that the navy has been started. Training schools have been established, training ships have been procured, advertisements calling for the construction of cruisers and destroyers issued, and tenders from the leading naval constructors of Great Britain have been received. There is no turning back on this question, we must go forward with it; and the people of Canada, particularly in this House—expect this government—this ultra loyal government at election times to come forward with its policy, with its naval programme. The policy which has already been adopted they can change if they like but the principle must remain there; and I am absolutely certain in my own mind that my hon. friend the First Minister, while he may disregard my advice altogether—although I am certain I am giving him good advice—can cut the Gordian knot which confronts him very simply if he so desires. Why in a few words, by a short declaration now or in the near future he can take the House into his confidence, he can free himself from Nationalist support if he wants to and get on this side of the House backing for a proper naval scheme even though he should lose his whole Nationalist following. I want to know from my hon. friend the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Foster)—he is usually a candid man—I want to know from my hon. friend whether he is prepared to stand by the statement which he made in this House last year in connection with the navy? Will he stand by that? If he will I am satisfied. I want to ask my hon. friend the Minister of Militia and Defence whether he will stand by the statements he made in this House less than a year ago? If he will I am satisfied and the people of the country will be satisfied. And, Sir, if any one goes away from this House in the hope that this question is going to be settled by a plebiscite or by a referendum, I for one entertain the opinion that it will never be settled in such a way. I think my hon. friend the First Minister knows as well as any body that constitutional practice, parliamentary practice, demands of him that he as the head of the government shall take a position on this great question. If his position is challenged in his own party or throughout the country he will have an absolute right to go to His Royal Highness the Governor General and ask for a dissolution and submit that question to the country. He can do so in the usual way but he cannot crawl under the gate or out through the bars of the fence by any referendum or any plebiscite to the people on this question. We on this side of the House can make up our minds on that question, just as hon. members opposite made up their minds not to allow the reciprocity agreement to pass. And if we have to stay here and force that question to dissolution we will do it in order to make the government——

Some hon. MEMBERS. Oh, oh.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

Mr. GUTHRIE. In order that the government may take a stand, a constitutional stand, on what is at this moment the greatest question with which that government has to deal, although they have omitted all mention of it in the speech from the Throne, I do not believe there is any reason for delay in the matter. I believe that my hon. friend the First Minister has in his possession at this moment all the information he requires. I believe he has, I know he has, the results of the Imperial Conference which took place in 1902, the subsequent conference in 1907, the conference of 1909, and the scheme mapped out by the admiralty during the present year. He knows what the British Admiralty wants. Why this delay? Why not say, within a reasonable time at all events, what he is going to do? He is the man who is responsible and the man who must take a stand on the question; and he will avoid a great deal of trouble I think in his own party and a great deal of annoyance throughout the country if he will take that stand at the very earliest date possible and let the country know where he and his party are upon the question which is very prominently before the people. Why? Because he has permitted to enter his cabinet three hon. members of whom it is said that they are in their inclinations, in their bearing, in their political life Nationalist as apart from Liberal or Conservative; and one of these hon. gentlemen, the hon. the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Monk) if he is reported correctly in the newspapers has said that not only was he invited to enter the cabinet but he was permitted to select all the ministers from the province of Quebec. In that selection he has included himself and two other hon. members of whose views and leanings in regard to Nationalism there can be but one opinion. All of them were not up to the election time followers of my hon. friend the Prime Minister at all.

An hon. MEMBER. They denounced him.

Mr. GUTHRIE. They are to-day led by Bourassa and Lavergne. Although my hon. friend the Minister of Public Works may smile at the remark, my statement is actually correct and we read in the papers that my old deskmate—my old deskmate in this House—Mr. Armand Lavergne has been hiring a special train to come to Ottawa at a late hour of the night to consult the First Minister as to the personnel of the cabinet. Does not that add some truth to my statement that the actual leaders of the Nationalist party are not in this House? But I was surprised to see within the last few days in the papers that when the hon. Minister of Militia and Defence (Mr. Hughes) had called his field officers, his staff officers and his commanders of battalions together, that there was present even on that occasion one captain, Armand Lavergne, the only junior officer evidently who was permitted to attend. There is no getting away from the fact; there it is. Now it might be, may be asked why should we object to the Nationalists taking part in an administration in this country? Well, we can be candid on that question. I object. I, as a loyal British subject, as a believer in the British Empire. I object because I do not think the Nationalist propaganda is a loyal propaganda; and I believe that the sooner we join hands, if it became necessary to join hands, Liberal and Conservative and stamp it out root and branch the better it would be for Canada and the better it would be for the British Empire.

I denounce the propaganda of the Nationalist leaders as sectional, as tending towards the segregration of the province of Quebec from her sister provinces in this confederation. I denounce it as a menace to confederation itself, as anti-imperial in every sense. And the Prime Minister and his colleagues know that what I say on this point is correct. Why not, then, terminate the alliance? It will only bring trouble, sooner or later—, and probably sooner than my hon. friend thinks. Everybody, I think, is disposed to give the Prime Minister a fair opportunity to show Canada what he and his ministers can do. They are returned by a very substantial majority. I believe they have within their ranks sufficient to resist any Nationalist appeal or any calamity which might be threatened as following such an appeal. I believe that we have on this side of the House what will make up for any support on any question raised by the Nationalists which may cost the present government the votes of some of those now sitting behind them. I for one would do so, and I think I could undertake to get a good many from the province of Ontario who would do likewise. The Prime Minister has only to consult his own friends of the Borden Club of Toronto, of the Albany Club of Toronto; he has only to recall what was said by his friend the member for West Toronto (Mr. Osler) who came down to Ottawa when the cabinet difficulty was on. Read his description of what took place. 'Uneasy lies the head that wears the Crown,' says the poet. And I am afraid that during two or three weeks after the 21st of September, my hon. friend the leader of the government did not have many nights of quiet rest. His friend and staunch supporter the member for West Toronto came here, and, returning declared that he was disgusted with the action of his colleagues—two hundred of them down in Ottawa crying for portfolios, two hundred of them, and only sixteen positions to give. And a great many men of cabinet ability, men who have done good service and displayed great ability during past years in this House had to be excluded, but some of them might have been included had not the bludgeon been held over the head of the Prime Minister, had he been allowed to be a free agent, and had the process of natural selection been allowed to proceed. I believe he would have surrounded himself with a band of gentlemen who would have given more satisfaction and peace of mind to himself and greater advantage to the people of Canada.

The Prime Minister said—I do not know that I should refer to it, but I will do so in closing—that the last campaign, so far as he and his party were concerned, was an economic discussion not a national discussion.

Mr. BORDEN. I did not say that.

Mr. GUTHRIE. I beg the hon. gentleman's pardon; I so understood him.

Mr. BORDEN. I said that the discussion was carried on on both grounds, and not on one only.

Mr. GUTHRIE. And the hon. gentleman read something from what he called a 'manifesto.' I do not know to which manifesto he referred; he issued so many of them. At all events, that particular manifesto has not come to my notice. But I think that probably I attended as many meetings in the province of Ontario—and with good results—as any other member who sits in this House, and I can say that in those meetings I did not hear a discussion of the trade question by the representatives of the other side from the economic standpoint. I have heard very able lieutenants of the hon. gentleman (Mr. Borden) refuse to discuss the question upon economic grounds at all, saying to the people that even if they did lose a few dollars it would be to their advantage to refuse this proposal, for it would lead eventually to annexation, it would mean that we should be swallowed up by the United States. And why should it lead to annexation? Can anybody tell me that? This reciprocity proposal is dead, but can anybody tell me now why it should have led to annexation? The answer is—it is the only answer that can be given—because President Taft, or Champ Clark, or Senator Beveridge, or some of the cheap yellow journals of the United States said it would lead to annexation. And these bold gentlemen opposite, these loyal gentlemen, taking that as a threat, were ready to tell the people of Canada to lie down under it, that if President Taft said it was so it must be so —forgetting that what seven or eight millions of free Canadians had to say on that subject was the important thing, and not what President Taft had to say.

However, that issue is out of the way at present, and I think the motion of my right hon. friend (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) the leader of the opposition to amend the Address is a most pertinent one on this occasion, particularly in view of the personnel of the present cabinet. We do not believe there is harmony; the country does not believe there is unanimity. If cabinet responsibility is still a good British doctrine let us have it in Canada as well as in Great Britain. Let the Prime Minister free himself from his troubles as I suggested. Why, Sir, as I have said, the Navy Bill is not a thing of the future, but a thing of the present. The objection raised to it by hon. gentlemen opposite was that it did not go far enough; it did not meet the views of the present Prime Minister because it did not give 'unity of command,' that is it did not give the command of our Canadian fleet to the British Admiralty. That clause of the Canadian Naval Service Act can be amended.

It was stated there was too much autonomy in it, and not enough imperialism. That all rests in one clause, which provides that the Canadian navy may go to the defence of the empire upon the order of the Governor in Council. If that does not suit the majority in this House, that clause of the Canadian Navy Bill may be amended also. But why not go on? If you want the Canadian navy to patrol foreign waters, state so in the Civil Service Act by a short amendment. If you want to know whether there is an emergency or not, and you should give a cash contribution, a cable will serve your purpose.

But I believe that there is something behind what we see in the newspapers, that the policy which the government will follow in regard to the Canadian navy service will be a policy of delay, delay, seeking to put the matter over until the Nationalist movement in the province of Quebec shall have quieted down; and I honestly thought to-night when my hon. friend the First Minister commenced his speech at twenty minutes to six, that he himself was actually playing against time until the adjournment so that he might consult with the Minister of Public Works. The case, however, is in the hands of hon. members opposite. I think we can rely on the gallant Minister of Militia and Defence (Mr. Hughes) for his support on this question. He was out when I made my statement regarding him a few moments ago, and as it was, I think, complimentary, I see no reason why I should not re-state it in his presence. He is a man in whom we on this side of the House have a great deal of confidence as a gallant officer, as a man who is not afraid to pay tribute to his predecessor, as a man who was not afraid, when occasion required, to vote against what is known as the Monk amendment last year, and the only Conservative who did so, as a man who is not afraid to express his opinion and to stand by his opinion. Now, all I ask of the Minister of Militia and Defence is that he will stand by the opinion which he uttered in this House at page 293 of last year's 'Hansard' on the question of submitting to the people a question so important as that of the naval defence of Canada. We on this side rely on the good sense, the good judgment and the manliness of the hon. Minister of Militia and Defence, and we ask him to stand with us on that question and force the government to take a stand on the Canadian Naval Bill. If that stand is not satisfactory to the people of this country, then we shall have no hesitation in asking for a dissolution and seeking a new mandate from the people, but not by referendum, and not by a plebiscite.

Mr. GUTHRIE.

Hon. GEO. E. FOSTER (Minister of Trade and Commerce). I have been intensely interested and not a little amused by my hon. friend (Mr. Guthrie) who has just taken his seat. He has developed in a good many ways. In one way it struck me, just towards the conclusion of his speech, that the party opposite had missed a great opportunity in not having chosen him some years ago as leader of the party and of the government. He has such a delightfully short and sharp way of bringing great issues to fulfilment. He would send a cable, and settle the whole matter of the naval difficulty. Now, there are short cuts which help and there are short cuts which hinder, and I am afraid that the short cut system which has been adumbrated by my hon. friend would not be the most successful in carrying out great policies in great countries. We have had an admirable melange of gossip. Gossip always takes. What circle will not come close together and put ear to ear and head to head to hear something gossipy, which probably has no foundation in fact, but it is none the less eagerly listened to. Now, a great part of what my hon. friend has stated is gossip pure and simple, a sort of an outside introspective view of the formation of cabinets, and how it is done. But the mild and gentle temperament of my hon. friend seemed to change into one of a sanguinary character. He built up an extraordinary picture of men carrying vast timbers on their shoulders, marching up to a door which was locked, barred and bolted and with these heavy battering rams of old he described them as bursting open the door of the citadel, and camping on top of my hon. friend the leader of the present government. He did not say that blood was shed, but certainly that wounds were made. Now I thank my hon. friend for all the balm he has poured upon my wounds, but won't he give me once in a while the opportunity to tend them for myself, and I assure him that I will tend them all, and come out sound and sane at the end?

My hon. friend's sympathy is of later date than I would have been glad to have it. Perhaps, as we travelled together, and ate together, and were entertained together, although we did not sleep together, during the coronation, he has somewhat revised his views of me, and has come to look upon me as a human being, and seeing me so maltreated in the house of my friends, he offers me his sympathy. Thanks. But there have been disappointments of other kinds. I remember attending a meeting in the course of the campaign in one of the Greys, and at what I thought was quite a successful meeting in that county, I noticed a young chap handing out to all and sundry a large poster. I took one in my pocket and carried it to my room. I took it out and read it, and it made the announcement that three nights from that night I was to be cut into small pieces, metaphorically speaking, by the Hon. Hugh Guthrie, soon to be Minister of Justice in the Laurier cabinet. The title was there, the prospective office was there; and if I were to deal a little in gossip I wonder if I could not draw all your ears towards me as I told you, in racy tones and in flowing language, of the many months passed in a perturbed condition whilst the hon. gentleman who has just taken his seat was casting the horoscope, and wondering in what length of time he should take the seat vacated by the Hon. Mr. Aylesworth, and become Minister of Justice in the government that has been.

However, this is all persiflage. It tends to pass an hour more or less pleasantly, but it is not statesmanship on the part of men delegated by the people to come here and look after the interests of their country, not of interests that lie back in the past, that can never be recalled and much less amended, but the interests of a great and growing country that will, in the present year and in the future, require their best services as trustees. Let my hon. friend bend his acknowledged talents and his great powers to the future issues of this country, to questions that lie about us to be solved, and in which we are all to co-operate in solving. He may not make it quite so pleasant for us, but I think he will allow me to say that he will advance the interests of the country in a better way than he has been doing to-night. However, I know that all he has said was uttered in a good spirit, and I take it as such.

Now what is the ground, if there has been any ground in all this talk we have heard to-night from the other side? May I say one thing, that my courage has considerably gone up since my right hon. friend made his speech. I do not know how strong we may be on this side, 47, 49, 50 is a very good majority. We were fairly comfortable under that majority, but to think now that with a majority of 50 behind us, if we ever get into a tight place the gallant leader and the gallant crew behind him will come to our help. The Prime Minister can go on now with the development of his policies, with the assurance that in time of stress the government can appeal to our hon. friends on the opposite side for a small contingent of assistance.

Why should not Armand Lavergne belong to the King's militia in the Dominion of Canada? He denounced Mr. Armand Lavergne because he was not imperial enough to fight for Great Britain, and shortly afterwards he poked fun at him, and criticised him because he ventured to appear amongst the militia under the kindly care of my hon. friend the Minister of Militia (Mr. Sam. Hughes). I should think he might have hailed with delight the appearance, out of that hot bed of degenerate Nationalism which he described to-night of one bright and shining example, who comes up to the support of his country and wears the colours of the King's militia.

But are they all at peace with each other on the other side of the House? I listened to the speech of my right hon. friend (Sir Wilfrid Laurier)—I always do listen to his speeches, mainly because it keeps me going, to find out what there is in them, and so I have to follow them with great care; but if I drew anything at all from the long and able speech of my right hon. friend I drew this from him as leader of the party, that the question of reciprocity with the United States of America was neither dead nor put aside. Why all the speech, why all the deploring of the action of the country on the 21st of September, why all the declaration that it was the result of passion and prejudice? Why the insinuation if not more that in the other sister countries of the empire, and the heart of the empire itself, we could not reap as great benefits in the way of interchange of trade as we could from trade with the United States of America as set out in the reciprocity agreement? Why his sympathy for the Northwest, because of the ill done to them on September 21st, unless beneath it all there was the conviction in the right hon. gentleman's mind that the saving thing still for this country was to have reciprocity with the United States? And yet here comes my hon. friend from Guelph (Mr. Guthrie) and declares that the question is a dead question, and that the issue is out of the way. Are these two brave men who fought for their country, sitting down under one defeat, and allowing their country to go to ruin rather than repair the consequences of their failure to secure what they believed would be of greater value to Canada?

There was another bright and shining light which illuminated my countenance when I sat on the other side of the House and looked over to this side, that of my hon. friend, the late Minister of Labour. I believe that the late Minister of Labour lies as close to the heart of my right hon. friend and has done so for a period of years as ever did Mr. Bourassa and Mr. Armand Lavergne in the good old times. They took counsel together, and my friend Mr. Mackenzie King, no longer a member of this House but the leader of the Reform party in Ontario, has declared that the reciprocity question is not dead, and has made his propaganda upon that as a basis. Whom are we to believe? What is the purpose of all this? Are my hon. friend and his party going to save this country yet on the line of reciprocal trade arrangements and to save it by the only path which they declare lies open, or after all this talk are they going to let it die and do nothing? There is a question to be settled by my right hon. friend himself, with some of the members of his party.

My right hon. friend (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) is the greatest coiner of catch phrases whom I ever met in public life. They are often very happy, but many of them are only catch phrases. My right hon. friend in the opening of his speech said that this country fifteen years ago was very different from what it is at the present time, pluming himself on the great advance that had been made in fifteen years. Yes, Mr. Speaker, fifteen years ago this country was very different from what it is in 1911. Does my right hon. friend take credit to himself and his policy and his governmental methods for the difference between the Canada of fifteen years ago and the Canada of to-day? The Canada of 1896 was very different from the Canada of fifteen years before 1896, and I would again call the attention of the right hon. gentleman to the fact that the growth and development that took place in the period of fifteen years from 1896 to 1911 was absolutely based upon and was the outcome of the patient preparatory work that had been done in the preceding period. Your critic who is not very observing or very much gifted with sound common sense, leans on the fence rail and watches the woodsman cutting down the trees. He watches him for a season and says: You have not got along very far, there is not much doing yet. Another year he leans over the fence rail. The man has cropped between the stumps after having burned the land off, but his crop is poor and skimp; the critic says: Not much doing here, the man is not much good. Four years afterwards he comes back and finds every stump out, but the land not yet cropped and he says: The man is no good, there is nothing doing around this farm. Then all at once, by pressure or persuasion or purchase, this man is succeeded by another man. Everything is ready for the plough, the man puts his plough into the soil ready for the planting, sows his seed and a few months afterwards reaps a bounteous harvest, and your critic then comes along and says, equally unreasoningly and equally unjustly: A great farmer this, see the crop he has got; the other man was no good, this man is good forever. There you have it exactly, the preparatory years in that great Northwest when all Canada, as the motive power and nourishing power of this great land was making experiments, was opening up its transport lines, was preparing its soil, was showing to the world the advantages of the country, that preparatory work of transport and exploration and development was the absolute essential to the fifteen years of harvest time that have been enjoyed from 1896 until to-day. Do not let us be carried away by these simple catch phrases.

In another respect the Canada of 1911 is a little different from the Canada of fifteen years before—it has been burdened by some mighty heavy unnecessary burdens, all the result of the system and the policy of my hon. friends opposite. The country has been denuded of some of its best property, which has been given to the individual by the policy and system of my right hon. friend (Sir Wilfrid Laurier). In every branch of their administration evils became so glaring that the people thought it necessary at last to step in to prevent these evils. They were met by a government united in fastening down the lid and preventing all inquisition. Publicity was absolutely denied.

My right hon. friend has also declared that sentiment was the largest element in the defeat of reciprocity, and he feared that sentiment was the greatest impelling force in the endeavour to have reciprocal trade relations within the parts of the empire. Well, Sir, I believe it to be perfectly true that when sentiment is weak and selfishness is strong then is the opportunity for bad measures and bad government, and I am thankful that in every nation's history, the time comes ever and anon when sentiment thrusts out selfishness, and bad men and bad measures have to disappear. From 1896 to the present day, the appeal of my right hon. friend to the country has largely been an appeal to the selfishness of the individual. Reciprocity with the United States was an appeal to the selfishness and cupidity of the elector. I am glad, Sir, that the people having listened to that appeal, felt, that underneath this proposed measure there lay the seeds of harm to this young country in its national ideas and national development. I am glad that the electors did forego the extra few cents a bushel on their grain, that they did forego the appeal to their selfishness, and that they looked to the better and stronger and higher interests of the country and gave their verdict in accordance with their judgment in that respect. And Sir, to my mind, nothing has ever sent through this country a more purifying flame than the canvass that resulted in the elections of the 21st of September, 1911. I hope that ever and anon in the history of this young nation there will come times when on large issues sentiment may be appealed to, a sentiment which is proper and honourable and just, and which may purge us from selfish and unworthy ideas.

Mr. DEVLIN. What about your own trips to Washington?

Mr. FOSTER. My hon. friend (Mr. Devlin) shows that he has not lost one of those small interrogation points that always stuck out on him when he was supporting ing the government in this House. My right hon. friend (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) also said, and to this I call the attention of the House and country that the conditions in Canada with respect to reciprocity with the United States were the same now as they were at confederation. No more misleading statement was ever made in this House, but I believe now that my right hon. friend himself did believe it and of course it led to his complete undoing. You have all read the remarkable personal allusion made by Mr. Balfour in taking leave of his leadership of the Unionist party, where he describes a peculiar disease insidious and powerful which creeps upon a man although he does not know it, and though he seems to be in the plenitude of his powers yet has really become impervious to new ideas. That more than anything else, Mr. Balfour said, led him to the captious course of laying down the leadership before he braved the risk of entering such a period. Well, such a period seems to have taken hold of my right hon. friend and his two principal colleagues. They believed in their hearts—my right hon. friend has said so to-night—that the conditions in 1911 were exactly the same as the conditions before confederation. In that belief he proposed reciprocity, and though from every side came hints of the changes that these years had made, of the springing hopes of the new and aroused and growing national life of Canada and of the higher ideals of her people, none of these seemed to find access to the minds of my right hon. friend and his two colleagues; they wrapped themselves around with the conditions of 1867 and rushed to their fate and ruin. One of the right hon. gentleman's arguments was that reciprocity was necessary because Canada produces more than she needs for her own consumption and therefore requires markets. That is just the point. Canada needs markets but what she needs especially is home markets. That is the cardinal difference between the two parties on the issue which has just been decided. My right hon. friend looked at the published figures of foreign markets, and he forgot that home markets and the interchanges which make home markets are infinitely of more importance to us than our interchange with foreign countries. We believe that it is better to have an interchange of products raised in Ontario with an interchange of products raised in the prairies, both requiring in their production Canadian labour and both building up homes in Canada. Our whole policy was to make production greater in our own provinces and then to interchange these products the one province with the other and so build up a trade within the country. We said to the Liberal party: it is because we see that your policy threatens these provincial productions, threatens these provincial interchanges, threatens our means of interprovincial communication, which will be built up by these interchanges and thus sap the life of the country, that we prefer to stand by the policy which we have announced and which we believe is best for the country.

My right hon. friend, in referring to the monopolies, and the speculations, and the unemployment in the United States of America, asked, what caused them? He was ready with the cause, and his one and only cause was a hard and fast tariff. Then in the United States of America it is a hard and fast tariff which causes monopolies and unemployment; in Canada it is a half-and-half hard and fast tariff which causes monopolies and unemployment, if they exist here; in Great Britain it is no tariff at all which causes monopolies and unemployment, for there are both of them in Great Britain to-day. My right hon. friend is evidently not a philosopher, he catches at the straw of a hard and fast tariff in the United States as being the cause of monopolies and unemployment. Graded down, what about the tariff which he maintained in this country for 15 years—was that productive of non-employment and monopolies? If there were mergers and monopolies in this country, why did not he and his administrative co-partners use their regulating and destructive power upon these mergers and monopolies? But it is not simply a hard and fast tariff that causes mergers and monopolies and unemployment. The United States tariff is altogether too high; and to compare that with the tariff of Canada is not a fair comparison—ours with 25 per cent on the average, theirs with 43 per cent on the average; or, taking sections, ours on wools and woollens with about 30 per cent, theirs with from 90 to 92 per cent. The exaggerations of tariff exaggerate the difficulties in the United States; but we in Canada stood a poor chance of having less monopoly and less effects of monopolies by opening our resources to the monopolists of the United States than we do by holding to our moderate tariff with our regulating and controlling powers upon it.

The voice of the 21st of September, my right hon. friend says, was the voice of passion and prejudice. Do not let my right hon. friend run away with that idea. There was no discussion of the economic question, said my right hon. friend. Very little or none of it, said my hon. friend who has just taken his seat. Are they sincere in that declaration? I can only say from my own experience that I travelled this country fairly extensively, and spoke very assiduously, as often as I could and as long as I could stand it, and I am here to state that I never made a speech in the campaign in which there was not from three-fourths to seven-eighths of it, my best attempt at economic argument. I cannot say that I made a first-class economic argument, though I tried my best to do it; but I made it, and made it because I thought it was one of the strongest points we had, and I believe that to this day. I did touch the National question and the question of our Imperial relations. I would have considered that I had not done the duty I owed to my hearers if I had not touched those two points, because they were inextricably tied up with the proposal with the United States of America.

But, said my right hon. friend, you have done a bad thing because you have spoiled the prospect of peace arbitration. Why does it limp to-day in the United States as between the United States and Great Britain and as between the United States and France? Not because of Canada's action, as my right hon. friend knows. It halts because a portion of the Senate of the United States refuses to give life and vitality and power to Mr. Taft's arbitration treaties. I have greater respect for the sensible people of the United States than to think that because an independent country to the north of them exercised its manly right to say what it thought about a trade proposal, therefore the United States is any the less inclined to friendly relations with the people of Canada. Not less friendly, but more friendly will be our relations unless such advocates as my right hon. friend impress upon the people of the United States that we did an unfriendly Act when in reality we were acting according to our lights for our best trade and national advantages.

Now, I want to see my right hon. friend live up to his professions. In the campaign that has just ended, and in many campaigns preceding, my right hon. friend has made this one claim for his long political life, that he has always acted as a peacemaker, that he saw in this country factions, races, creeds, sectional diversities, and that if he has done any thing in his thirty-five years of public service it has been to cement together all sections of the country and to do away with these acerbities and prejudices. It is a noble ambition for a statesman to work up to; it is a noble claim for a statesman, when his life of statesmanship is drawing toward its close. What I want to ask my right hon. friend to-night is not to mar that claim of his by persisting in doing what he has started out to do on two occasions already in this House—lighting the flames of dissension between different parts of this country, between the east and the west and between different sections of the country in the province of Quebec and the province of Ontario. What good statesmanlike end is served by the attempt of my right hon. friend to sow the feeling in the minds of the people of the west that their interests are utterly at odds with those of the people of the east? What good end is served by trying to pick out from the debris of that feeling little differences between Nationalists at one period of their life and another or by making it appear that there are differences between members of the cabinet? I have so much respect for the claim of my right hon. friend and the work of many years of his many years of statesmanship that I would like to see him drop that course and deal with greater questions.

Now the naval question has been referred to to-night and I do not intend to deal with it at any length. Let me tell my right hon. friend a thing which follows as a corollorary from a statement made by the Premier. In 1896 when my right hon. friend came into power there was one great question—great to him and all his followers for 18 years. What was it? It was the reform of the tariff. You remember it. Everybody remembers it. For 18 years he and other gentlemen with him had declared that protection was a curse and a bane, and that their aim and life object politically was to take every vestige of it out of the tariff and out of the statute book of this country. They knew for 18 years just what an iniquity it was, and they knew for 18 years just what was necessary to get rid of it, viz., to revise the schedules. That is all there was to it. They preached that for 18 years, they were ready to take office on that issue at any time during that period. They came into office in 1896. They passed one whole session of parliament, they passed into a second session of parliament, and yet they didn't declare their policy on the tariff question until 1897. And yet to-day they want us in a moment of time, after a month or thereabouts, they want us to formulate a policy with reference to the naval defence of the empire. My right hon. friend knows that will not go down with the country because it is not a just request. Here are 16 or 17 men gathered as indiscreetly and indiscriminately as my hon. friend may choose to term it, and yet men who I believe have honest purpose in their hearts and an honest will to work. They come to the responsibilities of departments entirely new to them, to the administration of affairs of great complexity and of great difficulties, as some hon. gentlemen on that side of the House know, they envisage policies which are of the greatest importance and none more so than as to the relations and the manner of defence that shall exist between us and the other parts of the empire. And yet they request us after having been in office one month with all the disturbing influences which prevent thought and study almost entirely, to modulate and formulate our policies. We will modulate it and we will formulate it and we will present it to this country and we will defend it before this country, but we do not intend as my leader said, to hurry ourselves—

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. Hear, hear.

Mr. FOSTER—and run the risk of spoiling what might otherwise be strong and permanent. And, Sir, that position, laugh as my right hon. friend will, is a position which is perfectly fair and which the country will cordially endorse. That is my opinion. If my right hon. friend and his friends think otherwise let time which has solved many things and given wonderfully unexpected answers to a great many well-devised imaginings, let time solve this as it has solved so many other questions, and let this government, as other governments, be judged upon the record of its works and not upon idle gossip or vain imaginings.

Mr. CARVELL. I move the adjournment of the debate. I had no idea that my hon. friend the Minister of Trade and Commerce would have concluded his remarks at this hour.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Go on.

Mr. BORDEN. It is rather early in the evening if this is to be a prolonged debate to consider adjournment. If my hon. friend is not prepared to go on—

Mr. CARVELL. I am not in a position to go on.

Mr. FOSTER. The ex-Minister of Public Works is always prepared to speak.

Mr. BORDEN. If my hon. friend is not prepared of course we must make allowance, but I should think he would perhaps be as well prepared as any of the hon. gentlemen who have preceded him. However under the circumstances, Mr. Speaker, I will not raise any further objection.

Motion agreed to, and debate adjourned.

On motion of Mr. Borden, House adjourned at 10.03 o'clock p.m.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

TUESDAY, November 21, 1911.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

ADDRESS IN ANSWER TO THE SPEECH OF HIS ROYAL HIGHNESS.

House resumed the adjourned Debate on the motion of Mr. Bennett (Calgary): For an Address to His Royal Highness, the Governor General, in reply to his Speech at the Opening of the Session, and the proposed Amendment of Sir Wilfrid Laurier thereto.

Mr. F. B. CARVELL (Carleton, N.B.). Mr. Speaker, we had the pleasure last evening of listening to a very racy, if not very lucid, address by the hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Foster). That address dealt practically altogether with the trade question and, therefore, I shall briefly deal with that subject. Coming back fresh from the country with a majority which he estimates at from 45 to 50, it is all very well for my hon. friend the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Foster) to claim that the question of reciprocity has been threshed out and settled by the Canadian people once and for all, and to repeat the statement which he has so often made in this House that the prosperity enjoyed by this country during the last 15 years has not been due to any wise legislation or administration by the right hon. gentleman who now leads the opposition (Sir. Wilfrid Laurier) and his colleagues, but has been due entirely to the policy or foundation laid by my hon. friends when they were in power prior to 1896. We have heard that from the Minister of Trade and Commerce during nearly every budget debate in which he has participated since 1896 when he had the honour of a seat in this House and I have no doubt that to some extent he believes in the truth of it. I shall not quarrel with him or any hon. member opposite as to the cause of the enormous development which has taken place in Canada in the last 18 years, but it is certain the development has been enormous, and if my hon. friends opposite during their term of office, whether it be lengthy or otherwise, can continue the ratio of progress which existed from 1896 down to the present time, they certainly will not have lived and governed in vain.

My hon. friend says that the whole discussion during the late elections was upon the economical side of the trade question submitted to the people by the government.

Mr. FOSTER. Not quite as broad as that.

Mr. CARVELL. I want to be correct, and I will say it was nearly all along those lines.

Mr. FOSTER. As far as I was concerned.

Mr. CARVELL. I have no doubt that the Minister of Trade and Commerce is too astute a politician to go through the country occupying the high position that he does, and talking nothing but the economical phase of the reciprocity proposition. But, Sir, my hon. friend the Minister of Trade and Commerce does not represent the whole Conservative party in all the back townships. My hon. friend the Minister of Trade and Commerce may not have been present in some of the back townships and have listened to the impassioned appeals which his supporters and friends made on every question almost in the world except the question of reciprocity with the United States in natural products. I know I am voicing the experience of all the members on this side of the House who represent English-speaking constituencies when I say that practically the last thing that was used to influence votes in our constituencies was reciprocity or what the result of reciprocity would be. I state here that practically the only thing which was used for the purpose of affecting votes was the race and religion of the hon. gentleman who led the government of this country down to September 21. I realize that there are hon. gentlemen on the other side of the House who will deny that; I realize that newspapers will take up the statement I make and deny it, but nevertheless I repeat it and declare that in the English-speaking portions of the maritime provinces and in the province of Ontario, practically the only thing which we had to fight was the money which reciprocity furnished—

Some hon. MEMBERS. Oh, oh.

Mr. CARVELL. —the money which reciprocity furnished and the contemptible cry of race, creed and religion which was waged against the right hon. gentleman who now leads the opposition. So far as New Brunswick is concerned, I have personal knowledge of this because I met it on the platform, I met it in public and I met it one hundred times in private to every once I met it in public, and I say that so far as the English-speaking portions of New Brunswick were concerned, practically the whole campaign was waged on this contemptible cry. We see from the newspaper reports, we hear from our friends in Ontario, we hear from almost every source—not only that we have the proud boast of 'The Orange Sentinel' three days after the election that it was their work which won the election for the Conservative party and placed them in power. I have here a clipping just placed in my hands by a friend containing a statement made by a Methodist clergyman at a meeting held in Leeds, during the campaign of the present Minister of Finance (Mr. White). On November 6, a Methodist clergyman, the Rev. Frank Cochrane, minister at Phillipsville stated:

> He recognized the truth of Dr. Dunn's charge against the Conservative campaigners in Leeds, 'I yield to no man in my Protestantism,' he declared, 'but I blush for the appeals made in this riding on grounds of religious prejudice against a great Canadian who has spent his life in public service, seeking to unite in true and patriotic Canadianism all creeds and classes.'

This is only one evidence of the cry and the campaign urged all over this country by my friends opposite. Now they say: we have won because the people do not want reciprocity with the United States. I am not in a position to speak for any other portion of the Dominion of Canada excepting the maritime provinces, but I am here to state that reciprocity and subjects closely allied to it are not dead so far as the maritime provinces are concerned. I do not care whether you say reciprocity with the United States in natural products or not, but my opinion, and I know I am voicing the sentiment of every gentleman here from the maritime provinces, on either side of the House, is that the admission of the natural products of the maritime provinces into the United States would have been the greatest boon which has been offered to our people in a lifetime or which can be offered to them within the next generation. The Minister of Trade and Commerce says that what Canada needs is home markets, trade with ourselves; we do not want foreign markets.

Mr. FOSTER. I never said that.

Mr. CARVELL. Does he not go that far? Then I stand corrected, and I will say that we want foreign markets when we can get them, in the British West India Islands, in British Guiana, and in a few other countries where Nature supplies bananas and dates for the food of the people, but we do not want to sell our products to the great country of ninety million people which is growing faster than any other country in the world and which is able to pay a good price for them. We do not want trade with them, but we do want trade with a few coloured people in the West India Islands. Well, the hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce is welcome to his opinions, and there is no member of this House in a better position to judge of the opinions and wishes of the Conservative party. But, Sir, he is not judging truly the aims and desires of the people of the maritime provinces. I regret to say that the people of the maritime provinces are not prospering in a commercial sense as much as they should. I do not know why it is. The census returns on this point must I think be unpleasant reading even to my hon. friend the Minister of Trade and Commerce. They are unpleasant reading to any man who wishes well of any portion of Canada or of Canada as a whole. The Minister of Trade and Commerce says we should sell to the home markets. We can sell from the maritime provinces to the home markets nothing that I know of which our people can produce except a few potatoes which we are able to sell to Montreal and Toronto. We cannot sell a thousand feet of our lumber outside of the maritime provinces unless we go to foreign markets. We cannot sell our horses, our sheep, our cheese, our butter, our fish, or anything else that we produce unless we go to some foreign market.

Mr. CURRIE. What has the hon. gentleman been doing with St. John harbour ?

Mr. CARVELL. I want to tell my hon. friend that we have been developing the St. John harbour in a manner which his friends never dreamed of doing, and I only hope, now that his friends are in power, that they will have the true patriotism to carry out the schemes that our friends started for the development of that harbour, and make it the great national seaport which it ought to be.

Mr. CURRIE. What for ?

Mr. CARVELL. I commend St. John harbour to my hon. friend. I hope he will go to his friends on the treasury benches and urge them to do justice to St. John harbour. I cannot tell why it is, but it is a cold fact that at least three-fourths of all the exports of the maritime provinces during the last few years have gone to the American market, even in the face of enormous duties. It may be possible for our hon. friends opposite to devise some scheme for finding other markets for these exports ; but no man can tell me that under these conditions the people of the maritime provinces do not want freer access to the American markets. I think I can go so far as to say that we have another intimation from the Minister of Trade and Commerce when he says that we must trade at home. That means, of course, higher protection. Perhaps I am drawing an improper inference from the statement he made, but if I am, my hon. friend can deny it. I think that is the only logical conclusion to be drawn from his statement—that it means greater protection. Let me tell you that from the standpoint of the maritime provinces we shall hear of this later on.

Mr. FOSTER. If my hon. friend intends to pin his argument on that, perhaps I should make a little denial. It is not necessary in my mind to place a larger protection on imports to make home markets grow, when you are contrasting that with a policy which proposed to throw down protection, as in the reciprocity agreement.

Mr. CARVEL. I am glad my hon. friend has given us this intimation that we will not have greater protection in Canada than we have had in the past.

Mr. FOSTER. Neither did I say that. I think I had better not make any explanation to my hon. friend.

Mr. CARVELL. I think my hon. friend is wise in not being drawn out too far on that line. We shall know better when we see the personnel of the Tariff Commission which my hon. friend proposes to create, whether we are to have higher protection or the same or less protection than we have at the present time.

Something has been said by other speakers as to the personnel of the present government. I have no quarrel with my hon. friend the Prime Minister in regard to the personnel of his government. That is his affair, and not ours. No doubt my hon. friend has had his own troubles, and is getting the punishments and rewards that must come to every government. If there are heart-burnings in his ranks, that affects him, not us. But I do have a quarrel with my hon. friend as to the position of his government in so far as it affects the well-being and the advantage of Canada. I am going to discuss for a short time the proposed amendment of the right hon. leader of the Opposition. I submit that the inclusion in the government of the three gentlemen who represent the Nationalist party in Quebec will be a distinct disadvantage to the well-being of Canada as a whole. This leads me to a résumé of the naval affairs of this country during the last two or three years. I have taken a great deal of pleasure during the last two or three days in reading the speeches made by my hon. friend the Minister of Trade and Commerce and my hon. friend the Prime Minister on the 29th of March, 1909, when the famous resolution was introduced into this House and carried, in favour of Canada starting on some sort of naval policy. I commend particularly the speech of the Minister of Trade and Commerce to the careful perusal of every member in the House, no matter whether he be a Liberal, a Conservative, or a Nationalist, and I wish it were placed before every elector of Canada and that they might read it in their calmer moments. If they did so, I think they would come to the conclusion that no finer sentiments and no more logical conclusions have ever been uttered or reached than those of the hon. member on that memorable occasion. It is wonderful, however, to consider the results of what have followed from the statements he made and the pictures he painted at that time.

My hon. friend the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Foster) discussed in the first place the proposition I am making of a monetary contribution in support of a navy and in his own inimitable, logical manner pointed out first the advantages, and I think he marshalled every fact which could come to the support of that proposal, or the proposal to send a money contribution to the mother country. Having done so, he then took the other side of the picture, and he pointed out in the most masterly manner possible the disadvantages which he thought would flow from it, and concluded that the proper thing for Canada to do in the first place was that we must have some method or means of naval defence, and in the next place concluded that it must be by constructing our own navy, by becoming our own contractors and defenders, and in that way contribute not only to our own self support, but also to the support of the empire when necessity should demand. At the risk of being a little tedious I want to recall to my hon. friend the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Monk) and the members of this House the noble sentiments, and the logical sentiments, to my mind, put forth by him as contained in 'Hansard' at page 3496 on the 29th March, 1909. After discussing our isolated condition, after discussing the unpatriotic course of relying upon the Monroe doctrine for our defence after showing what we could do, he sums up in these words:

Whatever may be necessary has to be collected and assembled and developed with such expedition and in such abundance as circumstances will allow. Under that system our first vessels would be British built, British equipped, British manned, British officered from stoker to captain. There is no other way in which we could proceed——

And I may say here, Sir, that under the policy carried out by the Liberal government we went to England and purchased two vessels, brought them here with certain British officers and certain British sailors. We formed a nucleus of a navy by means of training ships by which we could eventually become master of the situation ourselves.

We are absolutely bare of the skill, the experience, the training and the machinery necessary to put one single war vessel on a proper footing; but—and it is but the beginning of a circle—the first Canadian owned vessel, built and equipped in Britain, and sent out to defend our coasts would become the nucleus and the training ground of Canadian stokers, Canadian sailors, and Canadian officers, and by and by perhaps, of a Canadian Admiral on the Canadian coast. How much time would be taken in completing that circle none of us can say, but if we begin the tracing of it and follow it fairly and faithfully, the time must come when we get a complete service and have an imperial adjunct to the British navy for the defence of Canada and the defence of the empire in which Canada gives some of her body, her bones, her blood, and her mental power, her national pride.

And then my hon. friend went on further, and pictured the development of first of all repair plants, next shipbuilding plants, and finaly of plants by which we could have commercial ships built as well as naval vessels. This is exactly the course which the late government followed. They did bring British vessels here, they started in to educate our own sons, to develop a Canadian navy, eventually to develop shipbuilding and repairing plants, and I submit that it is the only way of going to work, not only the only way, but it is the way which will eventually inspire all Canadians with the responsibility of their position, and make Canada an integral part of this empire. It will do that better than any other course that could be pursued. That was considered good politics by the members of that House, and the resolution moved by my hon. friend, as slightly amended, was unanimously passed by this House. My hon. friend the premier went to England and, as has been stated in this debate, he advocated and defended that principle at a public banquet in England. He came back to Halifax, and he advocated and defended the principle again, but in his absence certain of his jingo friends in Toronto had got in power, and finally he and his friend the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Foster) were compelled to go back on the manly policy which they had advocated, to go back on the logical policy which they advocated, and to do something else—anything at all as long as it was opposed to the principles and the policy of the then government. Then came the memorable resolution of my hon. friend the premier in which he advocated a contribution of $25,000,000, and this went on very well, and the Conservative party seemed to be pretty well agreed upon that, until the Drummond and Arthabaska election took place in the autumn of 1910. And since the Drummond and Arthabaska election was carried by the Nationalists we commence to see the fusion—I might almost say the agreement, and, as has been stated by the right hon. the leader of the opposition the unholy alliance—which was entered into, which evidently must have been entered into before then, between the then leader of the opposition and present premier, and the leader of the Nationalist party in the province of Quebec. Perhaps my hon. friends will deny now, as they did a year ago, that such an alliance existed,

We say on this side of the House that at that time that alliance did exist between the Nationalist party and the then leader of the opposition. My hon. friend the premier denounced this statement in almost angry terms and we had it denounced from every platform in the country as well as in parliament. We were compelled to take the word of my hon. friend (Mr. Borden), we were compelled to treat it as though no coalition existed. But, Sir, from the day that the Drummond and Arthabaska election was carried by the Nationalists down to the present time, I ask the hon. members of this House, and I ask the people of this country, can they point to a solitary circumstance that has not shown in the plainest manner possible that that alliance did exist, that it existed down to the very day of the elections on the 21st September, and that it was consummated by admitting into the government the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Monk), and the two gentlemen whom he says he chose as his colleagues acting under the authority of the Prime Minister. Now we have here three gentlemen who represent the party which is avowedly opposed—I do not know that I can put my hands on the actual words of the Minister of Public Works in which he will say that he is opposed, absolutely opposed, to contributing anything to the naval defence of the empire; but, Sir, take the statements which have been made by that hon. gentleman all through the province of Quebec during the last year and a half. Take his admission made here in this House about a year ago when he confessed that he had preached in every meeting in the province of Quebec which he and his friends had held during the preceding summer that the logical conclusion of a naval policy such as we had, meant conscription and, therefore, they opposed it.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. Hear, hear.

Mr. CARVELL. My hon. friend (Mr. Monk) admitted that it meant conscription. He said that it could not be anything else, and he and his friends preached that doctrine everywhere. And then take the impassioned appeal made to the people of the province of Quebec by his leader, and by the actual master of the present administration, Mr. Henri Bourassa, and his lieutenant Mr. Armand Lavergne, and the rest of the Nationalists in that province. Take the impassioned appeals which they made to the mothers of the province of Quebec, not to have their sons taken away to be disembowelled by German shells. Then take the impassioned appeals and the impassioned remarks—my hon. friend from Champlain (Mr. Blondin) denies that he is the author of them—but take the impassioned appeals of one Nationalist who said that it was necessary to shoot holes in the British flag in order to breathe the air of freedom. These were the arguments used by hon. gentlemen on the other side, these were the arguments used in the Drummond and Arthabaska election, these were the arguments used last summer, these were the arguments used on every platform in the province of Quebec during the late campaign, and it was on these arguments that hon. gentlemen on the other side were elected. And now my hon. friend the leader of the government, and his friends around him are sitting on the treasury benches by virtue of the assistance which they received from the men who obtained their election in the manner in which I have described. So, Sir, I say that we have the right to come here and protest against the inclusion of these men in the cabinet. Not that they are not gentlemen unfit to sit in any cabinet, I have nothing to say against them in their personal capacity, I am only criticising them on account of what they represent, and the views which have brought them into the government, views by which this country will be governed I am afraid as long as this government remains in power. My hon. friend the leader of the government says: 'We will frame our naval policy in good time, and as we have a mind to.'

And the question comes to us now: What is that policy to-day? The hon. gentleman and his friends said in 1909: We believe in the manly policy of self-defence by Canada, the creation of a Canadian navy, the training of our own men, and the placing of ourselves in a position to protect our own shores and our own commerce, and, in time of war to give assistance to the mother country. But they abandoned that policy, they did not want to pursue the manly course, but they said: We ought to contribute $25,000,000 because there was an emergency. But last night the leader of the government was compelled to state before this House and country that at that time he was wrong, that no emergency existed, that he did not know what he was talking about but was only trying to get away from the position he had taken eight or nine months before, and, therefore, we must not blame the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Monk) for differing with him, that the Minister of Public Works was nearer right than he. Such is the position to which the leader of the government of Canada is reduced. I suppose that, a year from now, he will say he was wrong in issuing his manifesto in September, 1911. In that manifesto he said:

> I hold that the plan of the government contemplates the creation of a naval force that will be absolutely useless in time of war, and therefore of no practical benefit to Canada or to the empire. It will cost immense sums of money to build, equip and maintain. It will probably result in time of war in the useless sacrifice of many valuable lives, and it will not add one iota to the fighting strength of the empire. The more it is considered, the more does it become evident that the whole naval plan of the government is an unfortunate blunder.

I hope that my hon. friend, within the next year will come forward and say he was wrong then. It may be asking too much, but it is just possible that he may come to his senses and recall all these statements, and do what I have already said to be the manly thing, that is, to start in to build our navy for ourselves. But can he do this with the present Minister of Public Works in his government? Can he do this so long as he is under the control of the Nationalist party of Quebec? I submit that it is impossible for him to do it. His own common sense must have shown him by this time that it was not reasonable to ask for a contribution towards the imperial navy, because he admits that there was no emergency. He tells us that he has nailed his colours to the mast, that he cannot take the Liberal policy and build a navy because it would be a useless waste of money, and might lead to the useless sacrifice of lives. What then is he going to do? If he listens to the Nationalists of Quebec he will do just what we have always told him he would do—nothing. That is what he is driven to. And that is why I object to the inclusion of these gentlemen in his government; that is why the Liberal party object, and why, I believe, the loyal people of Canada will object, to the inclusion of these men in the Prime Minister's government—because the end will be that nothing will be done.

I had the pleasure of discussing this matter with people of all shades of politics in the old country last summer. While I admit that I was not able to discuss it with every politician, yet I met many of them both Unionist and Liberal; and I must say I did not meet a single Unionist who did not tell me that the policy that Canada ought to adopt was the very policy that we had decided upon. It is true, many of them said we should have gone further. That is my own opinion. Had I had my own way in its entirety, our policy would have gone further, and would have included a Dreadnought or a complete fleet unit. But the difference is only a matter of degree. My idea was, as the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Foster) said that we should start by obtaining training ships, and so place ourselves in a position to train our young men. This would enable us to develop our own officers. Then we could build our own vessels. We might as the Minister of Trade and Commerce said build only torpedo boats at first, but later we could build cruisers and finally Dreadnoughts. I repeat that I would like to have seen the full programme carried out. But the difference, as I have said, was only one of degree. We were on the right track, according to the consensus of opinion not only in this country, but in the motherland.

But what will be the position of Canada in the eyes of the world if we follow out the decision that the Minister of Public Works will force this government to make, which the Prime Minister's alliance with the Nationalists of Quebec will force him to follow, and do nothing? Canada has been recognized for years as the premier self-governing dominion of the British Empire. One has only to travel in Great Britain, meet the politicians there on either side of politics and other people as well, to know that everywhere in the old land Canada is looked up to as the greatest of the overseas dominions of the empire. But in what position will Canada be in the eyes of the world, when, at the behest of the Nationalist party of Quebec Canada says: We will not contribute money, we will not build vessels, we will not take any part, but will place ourselves in the degrading position, which the Minister of Trade and Commerce described in the magnificent speech to which I have referred, of relying upon the bounty of the hard worked and over burdened taxpayer of Great Britain to defend us in the troubles that may arise in the future. It is a gloomy picture, but who can say that it is not a true one in view of the state of affairs in Canada to-day? Therefore, I say, I am disappointed in the lines upon which the government has been formed. And in that I think I express the sentiment of the great majority of the people of Canada.

The hon. gentleman (Hon. R. L. Borden) intimates that we will have a plebiscite. But think of handing over a great matter of policy such as this to a plebiscite which may mean nothing, and which certainly will not bring out one-half, even if it brings out one-quarter of the vote of Canada. My hon. friend knows that the scheme is unworkable. He knows he will not satisfy the people of this country in this way. He knows that he will place Canada in a position of humiliation in which she never need be placed. It is a scheme which, I believe he will regard, on full consideration, as ill advised, and, therefore, not to be carried out.

For my part, I am a firm believer in the policy adopted by the right hon. gentleman (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) who leads the opposition, and by the Liberal party, the policy of building our own navy. I believe we have reached the time in our history when it is our duty to adopt whatever means may be necessary to protect ourselves and to render to the mother country in time of danger whatever assistance it may be possible for us to render. We know that it is possible to do something in the way of training soldiers on short notice, for we have had experience of that in the past. But we know also that such a course is impossible in the case of naval defence. We know that naval defence involves the employment of trained, technical officers and seamen. A horde of untrained men on board a man-of-war would be worse than useless. Therefore, if we are going to do anything, we must commence somewhere, and I do not think we can commence a day too soon.

There is another side to the question—the moral effect which the building of a navy by ourselves will have upon the rest of the world. This is worth more to us than all the millions of dollars we should contribute even if we were to adopt the policy of contributing $25,000,000 now and $25,000,000 two or three years hence. The sending out of a few thousand men to South Africa to take part in the war there brought about results that will outlast the life of any man in this building. By that course we placed Canada in a position which no money contribution could have secured for us. We not only increased our national spirit, but we compelled the admiration of the people of the empire generally. Even considering it on the low basis of money value alone, we have got back in the last ten years a hundredfold what it cost us.

By pursuing that course with respect to the navy, we will place ourselves in a much better position than we occupy at the present time. In my opinion, the amendment of the leader of the opposition is well advised, and I hope the leader of the government and his friends will take this matter to heart, and will accept the amendment, and that we may then go on our way in the development of the policy inaugurated by the late government, taking the manly course of making a start, building a navy, so that if the need ever arises, we may be in a position to do our share in the defence of Canada and the defence of the empire.

Mr. J. A. M. AIKINS (Brandon). Mr. Speaker, it was to me a matter of great surprise to hear the right hon. gentleman the leader of the opposition (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) speaking on the motion made by the leader of the government for the appointment of a Speaker. Clouds and darkness were around about him sufficient to obscure what I had expected to see, namely, the sunny ways of conciliation. Instead of adopting the policy of conciliation, the right hon. gentleman, and those supporting him seem to have adopted a very different policy, a policy of sowing seeds of discord, a policy of perpetuating strife, a policy of preventing the cementing of the bonds of unity and friendship between all classes of our population, without which no nation can ever attain peace or permanence or prosperity. It was also a matter of surprise to me that the right hon. gentleman should have referred in the way he did to the prairie provinces, expressing sorrow for the way in which they had been treated by the electorate recently and sympathy with them in their present misery. No doubt he included the province of Manitoba in his reference to the prairie provinces. Now the province of Manitoba was brought into the confederation in the year 1870 by a Conservative government, the people of that province well understand the principles of the Conservative party, and the principles of the Liberal party; and, because they well understand the distinction between the two parties, they saw fit to send a very large majority of members to support the present government. When the right hon. gentleman offers his sympathy to the people of Manitoba, I trust he will not forget the way in which that province was unjustly treated by the late government, refused fair consideration in respect to her boundaries, denied her prayer to be placed on an equality with the other provinces which are the creation of the right hon. gentleman and his administration. So when he sympathizes with Manitoba and expresses his sorrow for their present condition, I scarcely think the people of that province will consider him sincere, or even thank him for his sympathy. The people of that province expressed their resentment for the way they have been treated by their votes on the 21st of September last. Speaking of the prairie provinces, the right hon. gentleman said that they were growers of wheat, and herders of cattle. It is true that the people in many parts of the prairie provinces are growers of wheat and herders of cattle. But they also aspire, along with the people of eastern Canada, to have their own industries, and their own home markets for the sale of the products of their farms. In the province of Manitoba there are many farmers, farmers who have prospered without the suggested benefits of reciprocity. And let me say to the right hon. gentleman that those three prairie provinces are so prosperous that they are attracting not only thousands but tens of thousands of agriculturists from the United States, who desire to have a share in the prosperity of Canadians.

It has been said that the election was not carried by economic reasons against reciprocity. Now let me say that the people of Manitoba thoroughly understood the situation regarding reciprocity. The right hon. gentleman said that the people were looking to the American market, because there was probably a difference of 8 to 12 cents a bushel in the price of wheat in favour of the United States market. But the people of Manitoba kept in mind the message of the President of the United States, when transmitting to the Senate in response to resolutions the report of the Tariff Board relative to prices of the various commodities named in the proposed reciprocity treaty. That report was carefully prepared by experts, and showed the conditions of farm production in the United States and Canada, the market prices in the two countries, and as to wheat, shows that of the Minneapolis prices one-half were more and one-half were less than six cents above the Winnipeg prices. Let me say further that in the report that was issued by the Minneapolis Board of Trade the statement was made after investigation that the difference in the price of wheat between Minneapolis and Winnipeg was about 5 cents, and that the prices in Winnipeg and Chicago were practically the same. The President of the United States is a gentleman whom we all respect, and greatly admire, because he is interested as President in doing all he possibly can for his country. When members of the present administration were invited to go to Washington and talk the matter over with the President, he then had a far better understanding of the situation than they had. One reason stated by the President why the price in Minneapolis was a little higher than the price in Winnipeg, was the local conditions, because the Mineapolis mills had a capacity to grind about thirty-three per cent more grain than they could get from the country immediately surrounding them. The farmers of Manitoba knew perfectly well that just as soon as that deficiency was supplied in the Minneapolis market down would go the price of grain in the Minneapolis market, and it would remain the same in the city of Winnipeg and in Fort William.

They understood, further, another thing in respect to an expression that was used by the right hon. gentleman opposite.

> The men in the prairie provinces are growers of wheat and herders of cattle. . . Men were looking for the American market. . . The Canadian cattle grower has now no other market than the British market.

That the Canadian cattle grower in the eastern provinces has a splendid home market, which means increased prices for the farmer's commodities and an increased price for his land. There are farmers, at all events in Ontario, concerning whom I know something, who are exceedingly prosperous, and we hope and prefer to think that there will be home markets established in the western part of Canada which will make conditions in western Canada the same as in eastern Canada. The farmers in western Canada hope to have that home market in which they can sell their produce without having to send it to the United States. The President of the United States also made a statement which appeared in an address that was made by him in Chicago, Ill., in June last:

> The world price of these four cereals is fixed abroad, where the surplus from the producing countries is disposed of, and is little affected by the place from which the supply is derived.

He also states that:

> A very material benefit to all the farmers of the country, especially stock and cattle raisers and the dairy farmers, will be the by-products of bran and shorts from the flour mills likely to follow the free export of wheat from Canada to those mills.

He also states in the same speech that the United States exports to Canada fifteen times as much meat as Canada exports to the United States.

The farmers in western Canada, particularly in Manitoba, desire that the by-products of the wheat, the bran and shorts, should remain in Manitoba so that they can be used by the farmers, that the mills where they grind the wheat should be in western Canada so that the benefits to be derived therefrom may be enjoyed by the people of that country. They also desire that their cattle should be fed at home in order that the statement made by the President of the United States might not continue to be correct that the United States sends fifteen times as much meat into Canada as Canada sends into the United States.

In respect to animals and the market for animals, in the report which I have just mentioned, a statement of the number of horses and other animals in the United States and in Canada is given. For instance,—and the farmers of western Canada knew that the United States killed the position because it was a statement that was made by experts for the President of the United States,—there were in the United States 21,000,000 horses and in Canada only 2,133,000, and that the price in Minnesota for these horses was $111 and in North Dakota $114. From the same report they learned that the price of horses in Saskatchewan was $156 and I believe it to be a fact that you can scarcely buy a fair horse in Manitoba for less than $170. The horse dealers and horse raisers of the United States knew perfectly well from that report that they would find in Canada a splendid market for their horses. Manitoba and the other provinces in western Canada send a large number of horses to British Columbia and get good prices for them. Providing the fence between the United States and Canada were taken down, let me ask you where would the people of British Columbia buy these horses—in Manitoba or in Saskatchewan? By no means; they would go to the United States and they could get them at a much less cost. It is the same with respect to dairy cows. The price of dairy cows that reports show in Minnesota and North Dakota was $33 per head, and in Manitoba and Saskatchewan were $40 and $41 per head. The prices of other cattle in Minnesota and North Dakota, immediately adjoining Manitoba and Saskatchewan, were $14 and $20 per head and in Manitoba and Saskatchewan $23 and $31 per head. The price of sheep per head in those immediately adjoining states was $4 and in Manitoba and Saskatchewan $7, and of swine in those states which I have mentioned $11.50 per head and in Manitoba and Saskatchewan $13 per head. The farmers of Manitoba, having that evidence and report before them, knew perfectly well that if reciprocity were to be put into operation, instead of the United States being a market for their general farm products, Canada would be the market for the farm products of the millions of people in the United States. So, having considered all these questions, they said: 'The market at home is good enough for us.' They heard and they knew the sentiment expressed in rather poetical expression found in the 'Globe,' a paper perhaps that hon. gentlemen opposite know something about, in 1905. I did not hear them repeat it on the stump this year:

Land of the sweeping eagle, land of commercial swing,
Ye know that we (Canada) toiled through the snow and the night because we believed in the spring,
And when we needed ye most ye spoke of a vast wilderness
Of stunted trees and frozen lakes and people in distress.

But the sun of our West has arisen
And now by its light we see
A country fit for great empire,
A land of one mind and free,
And do ye think that we who have Toiled through the snow and the night
Have prepared that repast for thee?

Mr. MARTIN. Is it not a fact that in the hon. gentleman's own constituency, among the rural voters, there was a majority against him on the question of reciprocity?

Some hon. MEMBERS. No, no.

Mr. AIKINS. Well, the hon. gentleman has asked a question and I think he should have an answer to that question. In the city of Brandon I think the majority was about 700, and in the rural part of the constituency, including some of the villages and towns in which there were I believe polls for persons from the rural constituency, the balance of the majority of 866 was made up.

Mr. MARTIN (Regina). May I ask the hon. gentleman another question?

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order, order.

Mr. SPEAKER. The hon. member for Brandon has the floor.

Mr. MARTIN (Regina). Is it not a fact that outside of Souris——

Mr. SPEAKER. Order, the hon. member for Brandon has the floor, and without his permission it is contrary to the rules of debate to interrupt him.

Mr. AIKINS. I have no objection to the hon. gentleman asking me a question.

Mr. MARTIN (Regina). Is it not a fact that outside of Brandon, Souris and Virden——

Some hon. MEMBERS. Oh, oh.

Mr. MARTIN (Regina). Is it not a fact that in the farmers' vote in the constituency of Brandon there was a majority against my hon. friend?

Mr. AIKINS. Let me, in reply to my hon. friend, say that in the town of Souris and in the town of Virden there were I believe polls in which rural constituents voted the same as those from the town, and I would like if my hon. friend would go to the trouble of analysing the vote, he can only do it and discover how the ballots were cast. I do not know.

There is one further reason why the people of Manitoba did not wish to have reciprocity carried, because they understood from the message of the President of the United States to Congress that one of the leading motives of the United States was that the timber and other natural resources of that country were being exhausted, and as he put it on one occasion:

> The report of the chief of the Bureau of Corporations shows that the control of lumber in the United States is in comparatively few hands, and that they are so friendly to each other that the possibility of a monopoly is neither remote nor improbable, unless we bring to the markets of the United States the relatively inexhaustible supply to be found in Canada.

The people of western Canada realized, that if opportunity were given to those in the United States who had practically taken possession of all the timber resources in the United States and created monopolies, it would not be very long before they would have the control and the monopoly of our great timber and other natural resources. Discussion has taken place as to how far the late administration has dissipated our resources of timber and other natural products, but the people of the west believe and wish that whatever remains of the natural resources, whether in timber or coal or other mineral, should be preserved by the government for the benefit not only of those now residing in western Canada but of those who will eventually occupy happy and prosperous homes there. They realized that if they had to come into competition with the people of the United States in the purchase of their own natural resources they would have to pay higher prices for lumber and other materials and therefore concluded that it was better to reject reciprocity altogether. Conditions in Alberta and Saskatchewan are somewhat different. The result of the election was somewhat different. I daresay hon. gentlemen opposite are quiet because they know the reason why. It must not be forgotten that the provinces of Alberta and Saskatchewan are the children of the late administration. They were created by the late administration. Their premiers were practically appointed by that administration. They know perfectly well that in 1901 for instance the population of Alberta was only 73,022, while in 1911 the population is 373,854, an increase in population in Alberta of 300,832. The population in Saskatchewan in 1901 was 91,279; in 1911 the population, if the census has been correctly taken, is 476,369, a new population entering that province in 10 years of 365,000. We cannot forget then that the premiers of the local governments of those two provinces were practically nominees of the late Liberal administration and, therefore, they could do nothing less in gratitude for what was done for them than do their utmost to return the late government to power. It must not be forgotten that these 600,000 people who went within ten years into those two prairie provinces were to a very large extent received and piloted by numerous immigration agents appointed by the late government and advised in respect of their location. It must not be forgotten that there were also numerous land agents who gave homestead entries to many thousands of these people; these would naturally take a kindly interest in those who had piloted them to their future homes or granted the homesteads, because they have prospered in Alberta and Saskatchewan—not by virtue of what the late government did for the west but by virtue of what God Almighty and Nature have done. Since these people came into such pleasant conditions piloted by immigration agents, located by land agents, is it to be wondered at that very many of them should be influenced by these immigration agents and land agents and take their advice in respect to the government which was in power when they came into this country? But I venture to say that if a vote were to be taken to-day the result in those provinces would be found very different from that of the 21st of September last. If you want an illustration of that go to the province of my hon. friend from Calgary (Mr. Bennett) where in the recent by-election there was an indication of what would happen, because all these elections went in favour of the Conservative party.

Another condition prevailing in these two provinces which does not prevail in the older provinces of Manitoba and British Columbia must not be forgotton, that is that there were not only thousands but tens of thousands of splendid settlers from the United States who entered Canada during the last ten years. I say splendid settlers, and the more we can get of them the better, because I believe if they are properly treated, as they will be under the Conservative government, they will in a very short time become the most loyal Canadians that we have; but in the meantime they have just come from the United States, a country which teaches all its children to love their country, and in that respect we in Canada might well imitate them, in order to create a national, patriotic sentiment among our children and among our people. One of the first things that is put into the hand of the little American child as soon as it is able to distinguish any colour is a miniature of the stars and stripes —they call it Old Glory—and the child grows up recognizing that it should be loyal to that flag and to the Constitution which it represents. That is a matter concerning which we ought to laud the United States. These American citizens come into our country loving their own, and very properly so, we have no objection whatever to that; but when they do come from their own country, although they may love it, although they may sing:

The star spangled banner, long may it wave,
O'er the land of the free and the home of the brave——

—they should understand that there is north of the 49th parallel a land just as free and homes of men just as brave who take off their hat and acknowledge allegiance to and have hope and confidence in and gratitude to an older flag, of serener glory.

The flag that braved a thousand years,
The battle and the breeze.

I am not at all surprised and I do not complain that the people recently coming from the United States should have an inclination and affection toward their old homes, even a passionate attachment to their native land; but it must not be forgotten that in the election which recently took place the Liberal party had the benefit of that sentiment which was not a Canadian but an American sentiment. As I have said, I do not believe it will be very long before the people coming from the United States, and we wish more of them, when they understand the way in which property and person are protected here, the way in which our law, civil and criminal, is administered, will prefer living under the Canadian constitution to living under the constitution of the great republic. Therefore, I have no fear in respect of them, no fear that they will induce us to become annexed to or to become citizens of the United States. The right hon. gentleman has said in his address.

You find indications of an impression growing in the minds of the people there that in the attitude taken by this government, western interests were sacrificed to eastern interests. There is in this a danger far greater, far more to be apprehended than the vain, illusory idea of annexation.

I entirely agree with the right hon. gentleman that there is a manifest danger—I do not say a probable one—of a severance of sentiment between the east and the west of Canada; and from the way in which the west of Canada was treated by the late Liberal government, I am not at all surprised that he refers to a divergence of sentiment, for what did the late government ever do for western Canada? Perhaps it was the construction of the St. Andrew's Locks, a work which was commenced some 15 years ago, and after having to wait longer than a celebrated old Israelite had to wait for two wives, we have eventually got those locks open. What else did they do? I shall not speak of the Transcontinental railway; that will come up at another time. But it seems to me when it is considered, it will be found that the cost of the construction of that railway has been such that instead of the Railway Commission being able to reduce freight rates, they will probably have to maintain them, I will not say increase them, in order that such railway may earn sufficient revenue to pay the fixed charges on the cost of construction. And what else have they done for western Canada? Yet the right hon. gentleman fears that there may be a severance of sentiment between the east and the west. One of the best ways for him to create that severance of sentiment in the minds of the people of the west is to tell them that they have not been properly treated by the people of the east. I am very sorry that suggestion was made by the right hon. gentleman. The fact is that the people of the west are looking to the Conservative party to adopt, in respect to the west, that National Policy that has made the east prosperous—a policy which was born in the Liberal-Conservative party, and which in 1896, for various inducements, was handed over, shall I say, to a wet nurse, the Liberal party. Somehow or other, the Liberal party, prior to the last election did not think enough of the child, and wanted to introduce something else, reciprocity in natural products, which is more or less in conflict with the principle of that National Policy. When that was understood, the people said, let the National Policy be the policy of Canada, and let the child be transferred to those who are able to look after it. I ask, what would be the difference between the practical results of the other policy and the practical results of the National Policy? What does the National Policy mean? It means the building up of national industries in Canada and the creation of home markets. Those industries and home markets have made eastern Canada one of the most prosperous parts of the world, and the same policy applied to western Canada will make it equally prosperous. I will not say it is not equally prosperous now. The farmers are progressive; but we must not forget that there have been expended in the west large sums of money on public works, and that the incoming settlers have also spent large sums of money. But the construction of public works will not always go on and immigration will not always continue in the same ratio, and then or even now comes the question, where will the farmers find their home market? In eastern Canada? They would have to carry their products for long distances at expensive rates. May we not hope that under the fostering care of the present administration national industries will be built up in western Canada, providing the western farmer with markets where he can sell his products readily and at the best prices? That will tend to consolidate the east and the west of Canada. What would have been the result of the other policy, assuming that we had reciprocity in natural products? The result would have been that our farmers would —as the right hon. gentleman suggests— have had to find a market in the United States; that millions of bushels of wheat grown by our western farmers would have been carried southwards on American railways to American mills and manufactured there into American flour. What ultimate good would that do to our western farmers? As was stated by President Taft, there would be more meat coming from the United States to Canada than from Canada to the United States, a diversion of traffic to the south. What would then become of all the traffic now carried over our railways? Instead of moving east and west, it would go south to enhance the wealth of the people of the United States. Is that the proper policy for Canada? The National Policy, as administered by the Conservative party, tends to the consolidation of Canada; reciprocity, as proposed by the late administration, would tend to separation, a consummation not devoutly to be wished.

The right hon. gentleman also said this:

> At no distant day the government should be prepared to deal with that situation and give the western people some compensation for the benefit which they expected from the trade agreement, of which benefit they are deprived.

Mr. Speaker, the people of western Canada never had that suggested benefit, so that they cannot be deprived of it. The people of western Canada prospered under the old policy, and the policy which made them prosperous will continue to make them prosperous. What compensation is the present administration going to give to western Canada? One thing promised in the speech from the Throne is the Hudson Bay railway, which for years was promised by the late administration and is not yet constructed. It is perhaps in process of being born in the minds of some of the late government, but the present administration promise to build it. It is the shortest route that can be found between Great Britain and central Canada and between western Canada and the markets of the old country. The route is soon to be ascertained. Its benefit is soon to be given. What else is to be given? Some aid, as I understand it, towards the creation of a chilled meat system which the farmers greatly desire. What else? One thing I would suggest to the members of the administration and the people of Canada and that is that there should be a freer interchange of news between eastern Canada and western Canada.

(Mr. Aikins' hand in motion, happened to touch a passing member.)

Some hon. MEMBERS. Oh. Oh.

Mr. AIKINS. I beg your pardon. Well, you laugh but the hon. member did not get it in the neck as some hon. members opposite may. There is one thing that I would suggest, the people of western Canada, the great majority of the people of western Canada, have come from places outside of Canada. I do not suppose that in the present population of 1,700,000 in western Canada there are perhaps more than 250,000 of eastern born Canadians. Those from across the seas have passed through Quebec, Montreal, Toronto and other cities, and hurried to their destination; and they know no more about the cities I have named than they do perhaps of some places in the United States, in Belgium or in France. They may know no more about these towns than they do about Berlin, Washington, or Vienna. What do they know of eastern Canada? They know more practically of the United States because the western papers print more news from that country than they do of news from eastern Canada. That is because the rate for news messages from the south to the north is less than for similar messages from the east to the west. And so, although, as I said only yesterday, the people of the country pray to the newspapers which are mighty—they are mighty and properly so for they create very largely the sentiment of the people—pray to the newspapers: Give us this day our daily bread. And instead of getting their wholesome good loaf of Candian news they get an American bun on their daily breakfast table to assimilate. Gentlemen, that thing it seems to me should not continue if the people of eastern Canada are wise. If the present wires are not able to carry at lower rates news from east to west, and west to east, then the government should do something to facilitate the carrying of news more cheaply. They might subsidize a line or construct perhaps a separate wire maintained and controlled by the government. We should have one common sentiment. The right hon. gentleman who leads the opposition, as I understand it, has said that the election was carried not by reason, but by passion and prejudice. The right hon. gentleman may mean by passion and prejudice, strong feeling or sentiment. Passion is a matter of feeling, prejudice is a matter of feeling, sentiment is a matter of feeling. If it is said that prejudice and passion with that meaning had something to do with carrying the election, then, Mr. Speaker, I entirely agree with the right hon. gentleman. I believe that there was a truth expressed by the hon. member for the St. Lawrence division of Montreal when he said that one man who had a great deal to do with the events that happened on the 21st September was the man that wrote 'Rule Britannia.'

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

Mr. AIKINS There was a demonstration given to the people of Canada that there was prevailing in this country, and growing, a British-Canadian national sentiment which, in addition to the good reasons that were assigned, was a strength to carry the Liberal-Conservative party properly into power. You talk about sentiment as a thing to be put aside and not considered. Mr. Speaker, I consider that sentiment with a proper object, sentiment with kindliness in it and with wisdom, is one of the most potent forces for good that exists in the world.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

Mr. AIKINS. It may be as diffusive as the sunlight but it is as strong as steel and powerful as a thunderbolt; and I would be very glad to see that sentiment grow and expand in Canada until it becomes that force which bound the people of other countries patriotically together. You ask for illustrations of that. You do not require very many illustrations. What was it that caused the people of France led by Joan of Arc to rise up and expel from their borders the invader? What was it that made the French people resist the invasion of their country and the attacks in other wars what inspired them. They sang the Marseillaise: 'March on, march on, all hearts resolved on victory or death.' National sentiment. What was it, when there was a contest on the sea between the British navy and the navy of another country, when that signal was thrown up: 'England expects every man to do his duty,' that made the men respond and win the battle of Trafalgar? Simply national sentiment. What was it in the old city of Quebec when General Schuyler and the ill-fated Montgomery besieged that place, caused the people in those early days to fight for the maintenance of British authority in Quebec as against the United States? What was it, when Benjamin Franklin, Charles Carroll and Samuel Chase came over with their newspaper to Montreal, then in possession of the Americans, arrested their persuasiveness and made their success no greater than that of Schuyler and Montgomery? Simply sentiment. What was it that caused the United Empire Loyalists to leave the United States and their homes and come into Canada, that they might have the benefits and security of the British laws? Nothing but national sentiment.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

Mr. AIKINS. What was it in the stress of the 21st September last caused the people of Canada to avoid the rocks and shoals of reciprocity and brought them into safer water and a better harbour? A Canadian national sentiment and good sense. What can the government do by way of compensation to western Canada? Let the government, in so far as lies in their power, join with the other governments in teaching the new population that has come into our country something about Canada and Canadian history. Let them teach about Jacques Cartier and Champlain, about La Salle and La Verandrye, let them teach about Wolfe and Montcalm, let them teach about the United Empire Loyalists, about Laura Secord and about General Brock, about Lord Selkirk, about Vancouver and Simpson and Douglas in order that the children may have before them great ideals which they may imitate.

And in addition to that I would like to see the government of our country provide as far as possible for the military education of our children in all our schools. The best kind of a soldiery for Canada is a citizen soldiery, and the best time to train them and give the idea of protecting their own country and their own homes is to start when they are in the public schools and when they are young. And I think that the hon. Minister of Militia agrees with me in this respect. Create a national sentiment, and then, gentlemen, when we have created a national sentiment—when we are creating a national sentiment—let it not be said or suggested, as it is suggested in the proposed amendment and as has been suggested in certain addresses given in this debate, that there should instead of concord, be discord. While Canada is in a formative state let us do everything we can to bind the people together. I notice the attacks that have been made upon the hon. the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Monk), and I am amazed at them. I meet him and look him in the face and say to him: You may be born of French blood, I of the blood of the British isles; you may speak a language different from mine and in your religion may be different in some respects from my religion; but at heart we are one because we have faith in Him, who, in His last utterances, expressed a desire for concord and for unity. I look at my hon. friend (Mr. Monk) and ask him if he is a Canadian as I am a Canadian and he will answer, yes; I ask him if he would devote the best hours of his life to Canada as I am prepared to do and receive a similar reply. So that at the bottom of our hearts we are one—one, at least, in this great thing, that we are Canadians who admire and love and are prepared to live for our own country. Then I can say to him as was said by one celebrated of old:

If thy heart is to my heart as my heart is to thy heart, then give me thy hand.

Locked together in the bonds of love for our own land, locked as should be locked the hands of all people in Canada whether they come from the east or from the west or from the south, to whatever race they belong, whatever language speaking, whatever religion professing, let us all be one as Canadians, one people welded together and guiding our nation. Our country's too broad for the schisms that shake petty lands. Let us join all our forces to make sure and firm federation, shoulder to shoulder, phalanxed heart to heart, and hand to hand.

Mr. E. M. MACDONALD (Pictou). Mr. Speaker, I trust that my hon. friend from Brandon (Mr. Aikins) will not feel that I am discourteous to him if I fail to follow him along the lines of the address which he has just given to this House. The hon. gentleman came to this House with a reputation both at the bar and in general life which led yourself, I am sure, Mr. Speaker, and every hon. gentleman here to look forward to the hon. gentleman's first address as one worthy of his record and his career. One would naturally have expected him to address himself to the consideration of the very important constitutional question which has been raised seriously in this House by the leader of the opposition (Sir Wilfrid Laurier). But the hon. gentleman did not choose to prove true to his reputation. Instead of the address which we might have expected, he has given us the campaign speech with which he regaled the electors of Brandon in the late campaign, with sundry additions of pious ejaculation about the unity between the races in this country. Had he been here in previous parliaments and consorted with some of the hon. gentlemen who were at that time at the left of the Speaker's chair, he would have found far greater necessity for his eloquence than any which he can suggest today. My hon. friend, I say, has failed in his duty by failing to discuss the very important question which is more particularly and pertinently before us for consideration at this time. Instead of his poetic effusion and eloquent references to splendid generalities, if the hon. gentleman had attempted to show this parliament and this country why it was that his leader proceeded to form what was either a coalition government or a government the like of which has had few precedents in British history, he would have been true to his reputation, and would have better exhibited the ability which he is supposed to possess.

The right hon. leader of the opposition has proposed a resolution which brings to the attention of the country the one imminent situation which every hon. gentleman who sits at your right, Mr. Speaker, knows to exist. That resolution says:

That it is a fundamental principle of constitutional government that the advisers of the Crown shall be heartily in accord on all important questions of public policy, and that the inclusion, by the Prime Minister, in the present cabinet, of members holding diametrically opposite views on a question of the highest importance to the Dominion and to the empire, is contrary to the well understood principles of responsible government and should not receive the approval of the House.

That the cabinet which the Prime Minister has announced, and which now has its place on your right has been made up of varied and conflicting forces of the community is a fact that is well recognized. In that cabinet many hon. gentlemen who sit to the right of the Speaker in that portion of the House which we may describe as 'below the gangway' are not included. Concerning these hon. gentlemen it was the confident belief of every member of the House, whether on the right or on the left of the Speaker that they would be included in the government should the present leader of the House (Hon. Mr. Borden) be returned to power. If assiduous attention to their duties—whether or not really in the public interest, at least along lines that they believed in the public interest—and conspicuous ability, were to be reasons entitling men to recognition on the coming into power of their party, then the hon. gentleman who leads the government has completely disregarded these essential elements in the composition of the cabinet. I need not name the individual gentlemen whose rights in this regard have been so completely overlooked; they are within the knowledge of every one in this House and the country. Perhaps it will be said that this is a family affair. It may be so; it probably is so; I leave that to my hon. friends who have been overlooked, and so grossly disregarded, who have been supplanted in some cases by outsiders, men who did not give adherence to the Conservative party until the last moment, and who declared that they should be considered because they came in at the front door, when gentlemen who had stood in the dark shades of opposition for fifteen years were ignored. The Prime Minister of the day has taken from all classes and parties of people to form a cabinet. There is no precedent for such a course since the famous 'broadbottom cabinet' organized by Lord Pelham in 1742, and which was so called because in it were included men of all parties. The cabinet of to-day is either a 'broadbottom' cabinet, as Pelham's was, or it is a coalition cabinet. It certainly is not a Conservative cabinet. The men who were in the last House know that it is not a Conservative cabinet. And those who now appear in the House for the first time like my hon. friend from Brandon (Mr. Aikins) who had been indulging in all this flag-flapping and flambuoyant patriotism, little know of the worth and the capacity and ability of the men who sat on the left of the Speaker in the last parliament, and who have been disregarded by their leader in the formation of his administration.

Mr. LALOR. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Macdonald) speaks with feeling on that point.

Mr. MACDONALD. I am sure that I did not refer to my hon. friend (Mr. Lalor) in what I said. But there are hon. gentlemen who sit not far away from him to whom I might have referred.

Now, no less a statesman than Lord Derby, speaking in 1866 defined a coalition government to be:

> A government of men of different parties in which each, to a greater or lesser extent, sacrifices his individual opinions for the purpose of obtaining political strength.

Have we such a proposition here? Is the government made up of men of different parties who have, to a greater or lesser extent made sacrifice of their individual opinion for the purpose of obtaining political strength? I say that definition absolutely and completely covers the combination that sits at your right, Mr. Speaker. But, in case there may be any doubt, let us look at the situation for a moment or two. Let us consider first what the situation was in the last parliament. Let us consider where the Conservative party stood when they went to the country on the 21st of September, and where they stood in regard to the recognition of the rank and file of that organization when they came to parliament last week. A coalition, according to all constitutional authorities, is only to be formed in times of stress, and for the purpose of attaining conditions under which conflicting views may be adjusted in order to avoid a position which might result if any one of the elements concerned attempted to go on alone.

My hon. friend, the leader of the government, who I regret is not in his place, to the knowledge of every one in this country, and to the knowledge of the men who sit around him, knew that it was a matter of doubt for quite a while whether he would be able to form a cabinet without Nationalist support. The people of this country were quite aware that it was a matter of speculation and debate whether he would have pluck enough, strength enough, and confidence enough in his own party, to go on and form a government that he could ask the people of Canada to support, exclusively from the ranks of the Conservative party. And everybody knows that the leader of the government capitulated, and made a coalition with the Nationalist party in the province of Quebec, and that here we have a coalition government, in which my hon. friend the Postmaster General (Hon Mr Pelletier) comes in, following his leader, the Minister of Public Works (Hon. Mr. Monk), and either they or the Prime Minister made some sacrifices of principle, gave up some of their opinions upon public questions, in order that they might work together and form a government under a common leadership. Which party was it that gave up its principles? Was it my hon. friend the Minister of Public Works, who I am sorry to see is not here? He and I used to have discussions, in the last parliament, and I wish he were here now in order that I might ask him a few questions. These two gentlemen now sit side by side, cheek by jowl, seeing eye to eye, whereas they did not sit cheek by jowl, they did not work in harmony during the last parliament. There were three parties in this country during the past two years, and down until the 21st of September, until the moment that the Prime Minister capitulated and agreed to take the Minister of Public Works and his following into the government. We want to know, this country has a right to know, this House has a right to know, what were the terms of that capitulation, what was the agreement arrived at between those two combinations which resulted in this coalition. It is all very well to tell us they are going to sit down and think this matter over as to what they will do about the navy in the dim and distant future. Sir, according to every constitutional principle, according to every authority in the long line of British precedents in the mother country or in Canada, where a combination has been formed such as now exists in this government, it is the duty of the Prime Minister to divulge the terms upon which the coalition was arranged. But my hon. friend the Prime Minister says rather disingenuously, I think that he has no fault to find with the right hon gentleman for calling attention to the fact, which is perfectly true, and said:

> My hon. friend the Minister of Public Works, when this matter was under debate a few sessions ago, did not see eye to eye with me on the question of the emergent conditions which at that time I thought confronted the empire.

He has no fault to find. And the hon. gentleman who was lecturing us about raising race issues in this country, should note his leader tells us on this side of the House that he has no fault to find with us in raising the question. But he would like his followers who were not here in the last parliament to think that the difference between him and his Minister of Public Works was only a little difference upon a question of fact that occurred two years ago. Well, Sir, every man who sat in this House in the last parliament knows that, unless these gentlemen were playing a game, unless they were dissimulating and deceiving the people of this country, the most active hostility existed between them, not on mere questions of fact, but on substantial questions of policy, down to the very last hours of the last parliament. There were, as I say, three parties in this House previous to the 21st of September. There was the great Liberal party, under the leadership of the distinguished gentleman whom we are all proud to follow, and whom, let me say, the people of Canada will once more call to rule the destinies of this nation as soon as they have discovered the grounds on which this coalition has been formed. Then there was the Conservative party, led by the present Prime Minister, and the Nationalist party led by the present Minister of Public Works. The Conservative party and the Nationalist party have formed a coalition, and the Prime Minister will not tell us up to date what were the terms of the agreement upon which they coalesced. I hope the Minister of Public Works will tell us himself. Let me say now in his presence, what I said before he came in, that according to every constitutional principle, where conflicting political elements combine to form a coalition such as now exists in this government, it is the bounden duty of the parties to the coalition to announce to the House and the country the basis upon which the agreement was arrived at. Now let us examine the question as to whether there was only a difference of opinion as regards a mere question of fact. The whole difference first arose as to the duty and responsibility of this young nation of the empire in relation to the rest of the empire. It arose acutely in regard to the question of the naval policy which should be followed by this nation in the empire, in conjunction with our sister nations. It also existed upon other lines. The Minister of Public Works, and those who were associated with him in the province of Quebec declared that we should not interfere with military assistance in the wars of Great Britain. The position taken by the Minister of Public Works was a direct sequence, a direct result, of the position taken by his coadjutor in the leadership of the Nationalist party, Mr. Bourassa, when he declared in 1900 that the right hon. gentleman who then led the government had no right to send soldiers to the aid of Great Britain in the South African war.

Mr. MONK. My hon. friend (Mr. Macdonald) does not know what he is talking about.

Mr. MACDONALD. Let me say, Mr. Speaker, that because the Minister of Public Works has gone over to the other side of the House, he need not think that he can address hon. gentlemen on this side in that curt manner. He might as well make up his mind now at the very inception of this parliament that he has got to be polite with hon. gentlemen on this side of the House.

Mr. MONK. I have a right to say what I think.

Mr. MACDONALD. Of course, and perhaps he will tell us why he agrees with Mr. Bourassa that Canada should not send soldiers to South Africa.

Mr. MONK. I will tell all about it when the time comes.

Mr MACDONALD. Now we are getting it. I am delighted to see my hon. friend rising to the fly. He is going to tell us shortly all about this arrangement he made with the Prime Minister; he is going to tell us why he and his confreres in the province of Quebec took the course they did, a course which the people of Ontario watched with alarm, and which the people of my own province, good Conservatives, also watched with alarm. He is going to tell us of the strange things that occurred in order to enable this once great Conservative party to patch up an alliance with the Nationalist organization in order that they might work together We will all be delighted to hear what the terms were. Let my hon. friend be frank about it. Don't let us have any side-stepping, don't keep back anything.

Now that he has given us the assurance that he will say something about it, let us hear why it was that he went back on all the splendid position, from the standpoint of those behind him, which he took on this question of our relations with the mother country, and calmly eats out of the hand of the men whom he joined in passing resolutions to denounce only a year ago, in the province of Quebec.

My hon. friend the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Foster) initiated the discussion of this question in the year 1909 upon a proposition that Canada should share in the responsibilities of the empire by contributing to the naval defence of the country. The matter formed the subject of consideration by hon. gentlemen on both sides and, unanimously, hon. gentlemen on both sides of this House joined in a resolution which we passed, the terms of which are familiar to every hon. member who was in the last parliament, or will be to hon. gentlemen who take the trouble to look it up, in which we pledged ourselves to a definite and positive position in regard to our relations with the mother country. My hon. friend the Minister of Public Works, I think, was not here. He afterwards said that he was not here at the time that was done, because I find that a little altercation took place between him and the Minister of Trade and Commerce the following year after this, when the late government, following up and implementing the unanimous resolution of this House, brought down to parliament their proposals in regard to a naval service. I find that my hon. friend, speaking on that occasion, says:

I think I was given to understand that the motion would not be pressed. If I were certain of that I would assert it here. But it remained in abeyance until nearly——

Then my hon. friend stopped, or was interrupted by the Minister of Trade and Commerce who went on to say:

To make the question clear to my hon. friend, so far as I am concerned, no such promise was made by me.

There was the first sign of a little hostility given to the House, and given to the country between the Minister of Public Works and the father of this resolution which produced this whole naval question, when the Minister of Trade and Commerce very curtly told his then colleague sitting behind him that if he thought he had ever given any undertaking that he was not going to go on with this proposition, he was greatly mistaken.

Then, my hon. friend proceeded to discuss the question when we had the second reading of the Bill. My hon. friend moved a resolution in February, 1910 in which, after protesting his loyalty to the British Crown, he declared that this was a change in the relations of Canada with the empire, and ought in consequence to be submitted to the people by plebiscite. Then, further, the difference of opinion between my hon. friend and his then leader, and his now leader, was accentuated, because the Minister of Public Works, speaking at page 2992 of 'Hansard', said:

My hon. friend has spoken of differences of opinion in the ranks of the party on this side of the House. They may exist, but they are acknowledged.

So that he was very frank in February, 1910, in stating to the House and the country that differences did exist between him and his present leader. Not two years ago, upon a question as to whether or not there was a contribution to be made to the mother country, the minister said that there was a difference of opinion between him and his leader. He did not minimize it in any degree, did not pretend to say, as we were jauntily told last night, that there was a little difference of opinion as to a question of fact.

Well, what further? My hon. friend moved a resolution at that time, and he followed it with a speech in which he went on to discuss the responsibility that was being placed upon Canada by the imperialists of this country. I think that if there is any hon. gentleman who is entitled to be called an imperialist it is the Minister of Trade and Commerce or the Minister of Marine and Fisheries (Mr. Hazen), who sits behind him, and who is an imperialist almost of the Colonel Denison type. I am using that language advisedly because the Minister of Public Works in his speech in February, 1910, spoke of men of the Colonel Denison type who had brought such terrible things on Canada. This is what he said:

And who are the originators of that charge? Who, I ask this House, have been so earnest in promoting this gradual advance until at last we are face to face with this scheme, which is totally different from the two others and from the third more ancient, which began in 1862? To my mind it is largely the work, in the first place, of the Imperial Federation Society,——

Are there any members of the Imperial Federation Society in this government, or at the council board of my hon. friend? If there are he had better keep an eye on them unless they have buried the hatchet, unless they have settled all their points of difference; and if they have he ought to let the House, and the country know how they have settled them.

—which failed because it had no representative character and had proposed boldly in the beginning a scheme for which we were totally unprepared, political union, which is virtually comprised in this present project, and when that society failed and the new one, the British Empire League——

Is there any member of the British Empire League on the right of the House, or in the government?

—was organized, they took it up and the members of that anti-Canadian society——

Note the words:

—I will call it such, have been ever since moving heaven and earth to bring about this very policy to which many of us at present object. Look at the active members of the league. You will find they are not representative men; they are very respectable men.

but if you read their speeches you will find that they have gone to England and stated that this scheme is popular and accepted with joy throughout the country. What authority have they for that statement? Col. Denison or Mr. Small, at one of their meetings, after congratulating the meeting that it was not open to the press, stated that it was known that war decimates sailors, the British have great difficulty in finding complements of men for their navy, and they could easily recoup themselves here, there were 75,000 men at their disposal as a naval reserve, and the people were anxious to place them at the disposal of the British Empire.

That is the way that my hon. friend spoke in the debate. I know that my hon. friend is a plucky man, and I know that he can offer a defence for his position if he will do so. He cannot have any objection, whatever, to those of us who, at this moment fail to discern what his position is, reminding the House and the country of where he stood a little over a year ago. This is what he also said in that debate, and I want hon. gentlemen, and particularly the hon. Minister of Marine and Fisheries, who were not in this House to listen to it. I am sure that the hon. Minister of Marine and Fisheries, busy as he was with the government of New Brunswick could not possibly have known what the Minister of Public Works said, because if he did I am quite sure that the Minister of Marine and Fisheries would have hesitated before he would have accepted a seat in this government or until he had had an explanation upon the subject.

It has been claimed——

—says the hon. Minister of Public Works—

—that what is asked from us to-day, this to my judgment unjustifiable sacrifice of our liberty, we owe to the mother country. I heard it said to-day that if British supremacy upon the sea was to fail we would disappear at once.

The hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce had presented to our minds the terrible picture of the Armageddon that was going to come, telling us that England's navy was going to be destroyed, and holding up before us the fate that was in store for Canada. The Minister of Public Works proceeded to say that this was all nonsense. This is what he said:

Is our indebtedness so very great? Do we owe all this to the mother country, and have we done nothing for ourselves in respect to external affairs or in respect to our own political development? Have we been sponges or jelly fish occupying a merely passive role in that regard, and has everything that could be done been done by the mother country?

Then my hon. friend proceeded to discuss the whole history of British diplomacy from 1876 down to the Alaska boundary dispute, the Ashburton treaty, the Washington treaty, the whole course of British diplomacy. He declared that England was willing to hand us over to the United States in 1782 and, therefore, we owed nothing to the mother country. Then he said:

There are many other facts which might be cited to prove the claim that any man who says that we owe a debt of gratitude to the mother country in respect to these many transactions under which our territory has been greatly fragmentized is speaking of what he knows nothing about.

Where is my hon. friend from Brandon? Did he ever indulge in any eloquent words to strengthen the tie which binds us to the mother land or in proof of the devotion which we ought to exhibit to the mother country? If he has, and I am sure he has, I invite him to come down and wrestle with my hon. friend the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Monk) who says that any man who ever said that we owed a debt of gratitude to the motherland did not know what he was talking about. Then my hon. friend went on:

What of this pretension that if British supremacy is not maintained upon the sea we cease to exist? I think that is carrying assertion a little too far. Whatever we have in this country is our own work. We built it up ourselves. And my friend will admit that in the early days we had to wrest concessions from the mother country.

That is where my hon. friend stood in February, and I want to trace his history right down because the Prime Minister told us that there was never any difference of opinion between them except a slight one two years ago. Where was my hon. friend in November, 1910? If my hon. friend speaks to-morrow he will be just celebrating the anniversary of sundry little differences that were going on in this House between him and his present leader. My hon. friend, on November 22, 1910, a year ago to-morrow, referred to a statement made by the hon. member for Bellechasse in the House at that time, that Mr. Armand Lavergne had said at a meeting at which Mr. Monk was present that Mr. Borden was no more and no less than the vicar of Sir Wilfrid Laurier. His leader to-day (Mr. Borden) was characterized by his bosom friend and companion, Armand Lavergne, as being the vicar of our distinguished leader, Sir Wilfrid Laurier. What did the hon. Minister of Public Works say when challenged with that statement? Did he deny it? Did he question the fact that Mr. Borden was the vicar of Mr. Laurier? Not at all—this is what he said:

I was not called upon to rise and call him to order. Certainly the policy of Mr. Borden was condemned at these meetings. A resolution was passed at these meetings wherever they were held condemning the attitude of the government and condemning the attitude of the opposition.

This third party leader was condemning the attitude of the second party leader.

I stand by that resolution; I adhere to it.

What did my hon. friend do then? He went on to relate the fable of the wolf and the dog who met in the forest and had a fantastical conversation in which the great stand taken by the wolf was that he was proud that he did not wear a collar like the dog. My hon. friend the Minister of Public Works told this story to indicate to the House and the country that he did not wear the collar of the leader of the opposition at that time. Yet to-day the leader of the government (Mr. Borden) tells us there was a little difference about a question of fact two years ago! Just a year ago to-morrow then, my hon. friend spoke in this House and made some quotations in the course of the debate showing Mr. Bourassa's attitude at St. Eustache. At that town on July 17, Mr. Bourassa had appealed to his compatriots and had pictured the case of a little lad who, instead of staying at home and being a good Canadian and a good Catholic, would be disembowelled by a Chinese or Japanese cannon ball when he would be taken off to fight the battles of England. He said:

When we will have gone in that disastrous policy of which Laurier and Borden are the prophets and one day conscription will be enforced.

What did the Minister of Public Works say:

Mr. Monk was asked if he approved of Mr. Bourassa's statement, and replied:

Certainly, Mr. Speaker, I think we did at every meeting state that conscription must necessarily follow. I remember the passage referred to by my hon. friend. It was a very eloquent portrait of what would be the result of conscription.

Is this man who stood at St. Eustache in July, 1910, and listened to Mr. Bourassa picturing the sad fate of the poor little habitant boy who, when he grew up and would have to fight the battles of England, was going to be disembowelled as the result of a policy for which Mr. Borden was going to be responsible? Was such a spectacle ever afforded in any British country?—men occupying positions so diverse and contrary as those of the present leader of the government (Mr. Borden) and the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Monk) until the very election day forming a combination under such terms as those under which these people have got together? I would like to know whether the good Conservatives in my province, where those of us who belong to the Protestant faith have been proud in every election to stand in defence of the policy of the Liberal party and have declared that we would follow, so long as he was alive, the great man, a Frenchman, who led it—I would like to know what the feelings of the Conservatives in my own county would be if each one of them who was affected by the appeals to prejudice against that great statesman knew that in the cabinet of their leader there was a Minister of Public Works who shared in that wild and absolutely unwarranted appeal to the passions and feelings of the French-Canadians of this country, one year ago.

One year ago to-morrow, my hon. friend the Minister of Public Works moved an amendment to the address. He did not, as on previous occasions, begin with an assertion of loyalty to the British Crown, he excluded that altogether, and made simply a bald declaration in regard to this question. Having passed the summer campaigning in the province of Quebec, indulging in harangues and appeals to prejudice, he cuts out the assertion of loyalty and says this Naval Service Bill changes the relations of Canada and the empire and ought in consequence to be submitted to the people by a plebiscite. That is where my hon. friend stood last year on this question in this House. He sat there all last summer and the men who sat behind him went up and down Quebec declaring themselves against Laurier and Borden equally, saying that they were Nationalists and would follow their leaders, Messrs. Monk and Bourassa. And Mr. Speaker, my hon. friend, after all that record, calmly comes in after September 21 and nestles away into a Conservative cabinet and his leader does not deign to tell us on what basis they got together.

There is my hon. friend the Minister of Inland Revenue (Mr. Nantel)—he was certainly one of the unexpected things. When the stork brought the basket, and left it at his front door, I think he was almost surprised himself. I do not think any hon. gentleman who sat in the last parliament ever expected that the hon. member for Terrebonne (Mr. Nantel) was going to fledge out into a minister when we got back, even though the Conservatives were in power, and even though my hon. friend was a good old-fashioned stodgy Tory. Nothing of the kind. He was a Tory in the old days, but he was a Nationalist now, a doughty member of this third party. That was less than two years ago. The Prime Minister has not explained the deal he has made with the Minister of Inland Revenue; he will have to tell us about that before we get through. My hon. friend the Minister of Inland Revenue spoke on November 23rd, just a year ago the day after to-morrow, and it would be a good thing if he would celebrate the anniversary of that day by getting up and telling us the day after to-morrow just what understanding he had. Did the Minister of Public Works make the deal for the whole three, or only for himself? I rely upon my hon. friend the Minister of Inland Revenue to frankly tell us just what has been done, because when speaking last year he told the House that he was a very frank man. I have his statement here, from page 184 of 'Hansard.' He said:

I shall be frank and shall say that, in the last contest, the proposition which had been made by the leader of the opposition was condemned as well as the government's policy.

So we have a second member of the Nationalist party frankly telling the House and the country just a year ago that he was not a follower of the leader of the Conservative party. Now, here are the two cabinet representatives of the Nationalist party who were in the last parliament both asserting their absolute independence of their leader, the present premier, and running a party of their own on this question of the naval service, and the relations between Canada and the mother country. We shall probably have some honeyed words; we shall probably be told that there were some things that the Minister of Public Works was ready to do. But this Nationalist party has a bible. It is written by Mr. Asselin, one of their candidates in Montreal in the last campaign. He has written a book called: 'A Quebec View of Canadian Nationalism,' in which we find the gospel of the party set forth, and a statement of what Canada should do as a colony, either by men or money or co-operation, in the way of contributing to the defence of the empire. For instance, he says:

You want Canada to contribute to just wars only? But who will judge of the justness of the war? There is hardly more sense in the cash contribution proposal, unless the contribution is based on the principle of obligation and the quota determined accordingly. And here again, once the principle is admitted, you must go at it manfully, and take up the burden in no niggardly spirit. The Quebec Nationalist, for fear of the consequences, will not admit the principle.

I wonder if that is a doctrine in the faith of my hon. friend the Minister of Public Works. I hope he will tell us, when he comes to enlighten us in regard to this deal with the premier, whether he agrees with Mr. Asselin or not. That gentleman goes on to tell us:

So, whichever way you look at it, you are confronted with this conclusion, that as long as a colony is a colony, she is entitled to the armed protection of the mother country; that the colony which would build a navy to assist the mother country whenever the latter's 'honour' or the 'integrity of her territory' is at stake—and these are the terms of the resolution of March 29 last—would be three times worse off than the mother country herself; and that Canada, considering the risks implied in her connection with Great Britain, would still be doing more than the ordinary duties of nationhood by simply providing for the defence of her own territory.

So that the Nationalist theory, as expounded by Mr. Asselin, and as enunciated by the Minister of Public Works, was that Canada should not do anything for the empire, but should confine herself to the defence of her own territory on the northern half of the American continent. Surely my hon. friend the premier will not seriously contend that that position, taken by the Nationalist party down to September the 21st, was not diametrically opposite to the policy he professed and tried to initiate. There was no question of the fact of the wide divergence between him and the Minister of Public Works, and between the Minister of Public Works and several other gentlemen, now ministers of the Crown, who sat behind him in the last parliament. Take the premier's own position with regard to the naval service. He could not say, like the Minister of Public Works, that he was not here when the resolution of the 29th of March, 1909, was passed. He was here, and joined in the wording of that resolution. He was absolutely and completely responsible for every line of it. Not only that, but he asked, with regard to the clause providing for the creation of a Canadian navy, that the word 'speedy' be put in, so anxious was he for the speedy creation of a Canadian navy. Then my hon. friend went on and loyally supported the compact. In England he sounded its praises; in his own province, in Halifax, he told of the glorious Canadian navy that was to be. As a result of this question having been settled on broad lines, having been lifted above the sphere of mere party politics, every one in Canada thought my hon. friend would have stuck to that broad position, one which would always have done him credit. But my hon. friend changed his tactics. In the following year his position was somewhat different, though on the first reading of the Bill on January 12, 1910, that is, a year later than this little difference that occurred between him and the Minister of Public Works on the question of fact, my hon. friend was still loyal to the proposition for a Canadian navy. This is what he said:

I say to my right hon. friend the Prime Minister, so far as my words have any weight with him: go on with your naval service; proceed cautiously and surely.

That is where my hon. friend the premier was on January 12, 1910. Then my hon.

friend the Minister of Public Works apparently began to complain that the resolution of the previous year had been passed without his having been consulted about it. The result was that the premier moved an amendment on the second reading of the Naval Service Bill, in which he declared that we were not going far enough, that the Bill did not adequately provide for all that was needed for the defence of the mother country, that we should provide for a naval unit. My hon. friend went on and proposed that we should have, not a plebiscite, but a general election, on this question, and further proposed that we should at once send to the mother country enough money to buy two Dreadnoughts, the cost of which would be in the vicinity of $25,000,000.

Now that was in January 1910, that is a little later than the two years of which he speaks and he knows, we all know, that the honourable gentleman who sits on his left (Mr.Monk) did not agree with him in regard to this question of the contribution of $25,000,000 of dollars for Dreadnoughts, and would not support it, that there was a straight line of cleavage between them which continued—I do not know whether the Minister of Public Works mesmerized the Prime Minister or the Prime Minister mesmerized the Minister of Public Works —but the line of cleavage which appeared in January 1910, continued without question. Then we came along to last autumn. Now I hope that before this debate is concluded my hon. friend the Premier will be good enough to tell us frankly and freely what kind of arrangement he did make with the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Monk) and the Minister of Inland Revenue (Mr. Nantel) in order to allay their fears and put them to sleep. I have attempted to show Mr. Speaker, to the House, that constitutionally it is the bounden duty of my hon. friend (Mr. Borden) to do so. My hon. friend has always been a stickler for constitutional practice and I trust he will not fail us on this occasion. Because it was on a question of fact that the difference arose and I have his utterances on the subject made on November 24, 1910. This is what he said and the man about whom he was talking at the time has just now gone out:—

> I have had the good or bad fortune to be denounced beyond measure by Nationalist speakers on every platform where they have spoken in the province of Quebec.

Denounced by those people with whom he had a little difference of opinion on a question of fact. But he went on to say this:—

> I shared the honour of being denounced with about 80 Conservative members of parliament.

So that my hon. friend was proud of those gentlemen denouncing him, proud of the Minister of Public Works passing resolutions that he was no good, proud of the Minister of Public Works standing on platforms where Nationalist speakers called him a vicar of Laurier. That is where he stood a year ago. My hon. friend from Carleton ventured to doubt the truth of the denial which was made by my hon. friend the Premier, but I am not going to be so unkind to my hon. friend as that. I am going to accept his own statement in regard to the matter. I am bound to believe it and I think according to the rules of this House, Mr. Speaker, we should do so. My hon friend (Mr. Borden) went on to say:—

> We are not in alliance with the Nationalists and we have been denounced by them even more strongly than we have been denounced by hon. gentlemen on the other side of the House.

Of course when a man wins and success is fluttering around he can be very jaunty. My hon. friend the Premier was very jaunty yesterday afternoon. He was proud of being denounced by the Nationalists a year ago; he was not in alliance with them and would not have anything to do with them at the time. Why, he says, my French Minister of Public Works and I two years ago —he did not say anything about last year—had a little difference about a question of fact. But that will not do, Mr. Speaker. I can fancy if you were on the other side of the House and the conditions were reversed how you would insist upon explanations being given that were satisfactory to the country; and I am quite sure that behind the hon. gentleman (Mr. Borden) there are representatives of the people who for the moment perhaps may be satisfied with the conditions which success creates despite a strange combination of that kind, but who will find in their hearts a feeling that will demand an explanation and back home in their constituencies and along the concession line they will want to know how it is that these men who, one year ago, were at dagger points and were not in alliance, according to the words of their Premier, have got together since September 21, and what kind of arrangement they made in regard to this matter. Now while my hon. friend the Minister of Public Works a year ago was moving a bald resolution, without any protestations of loyalty in it, that there should be a plebiscite, my hon. friend the present Premier was moving resolutions and propounding policies which involved large plans of co-operation within the empire in regard to Imperial defence. The two positions were absolutely contradictory, impossible to reconcile in any way whatever, impossible to justify before the House or the country. Yet we have these two men getting together in the face of the people of Canada and declaring that, while they stood before the whole country absolutely opposed to each other on this vital question: we are going to get together and for the sake of the sweets of office some time in the dim and distant future we will state what we ought to do. Of course my friend the Minister of Trade and Commerce will have his fears, and his doubts, and his worries in case Armageddon should come before that policy of theirs is incubated. Let us look at this eloquent statement of the Conservative position made by hon. Mr. Foster, Minister of Trade and Commerce, a position which my hon. friend the Minister of Public Works absolutely denies and says is not right and is not in the interests of the Canadian people:—

For five centuries the patient, toiling British taxpayer has paid the bill and paid it with a cheerful countenance, and so far without grumbling. Can you find in the history of the world any more sublime figure and instrumentality of great and powerful good worked in so unselfish a way and borne so cheerfully and unstintingly by the few millions of people that live in the islands in the North sea. . . . To some, and I confess to myself, it is time, for very shame's sake, that we did something and did something adequate. Oh, but say some objectors, Great Britain is bound to protect the empire, her prestige demands it, her interests demand it. Well, all I have to say of that argument at the present time is that it is not the argument of the brave.

That is the opinion of the Minister of Trade and Commerce.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. Hear hear.

Mr. MACDONALD. But there are some others here. There are some gentlemen in the cabinet who had something more to say in regard to where they stood in respect to the Minister of Public Works. It was not only the Premier and the Minister of Trade and Commerce who had the quarrel with that hon. gentleman, My hon. friend the Secretary of State (Mr. Roche) speaking on February 15, 1910 said:—

I am not here to defend the hon. member for Jacques Cartier. I frankly say I do not agree with him.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

Mr. MACDONALD. Perhaps the hon. Secretary of State will tell us where he and the Minister of Public Works got together. And then the doughty Minister of Militia, who I heard had a hard time getting his place in the cabinet, but the boys on this side after all are very pleased that he should get it; there are lots of fellows who thought he should not have that position. But the Minister of Militia and Defence did not hesitate to condemn the views of his colleague the Minister of Public Works. On February 17, 1910 the Minister of Militia said:—

The policy of the opposition is an imperial navy under the one flag united and strong under which Canada will have ample protection.

What has the Minister of Public Works got to say to this statement of a minister of the Conservative party? Did he ever stand for that? Has he ever by word or voice in this country, in this House or anywhere else, declared that Colonel Hughes' statement of the position of the Conservative party was the right one? Then there is my hon. friend the Minister of Labour—and I can run over almost any one of them except my hon. friend the Minister of Customs who I do not think butted in on this occasion—who said on November 30, 1910:—

Mr. Speaker, the difference in a few words between the two parties is this, that the Liberal party wants a few ships, as they say, to protect our own coast, while the Conservative party declares for: one King, one flag, one navy.

There is another gentleman that has to reckon with the Minister of Public Works, or that hon. gentleman has to reckon with him: Take my friend the Minister of Agriculture, that strange selection which supplanted a man whom we in the Liberal party all thought was the farmer representative of the Conservative party par excellence, Mr. Andrew Broder.

Any hon. gentleman who will read the patriotic effusion of my hon. friend the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Burrell) will find that, instead of there being a little difference on the question of fact, such as the Premier said existed between him and the Minister of Public Works, their divergence was wide as the poles. The hon. gentleman quoted Tennyson's poem about "One flag, one fleet, one throne." That is not the ideal of the Minister of Public Works—or if it is, he has a new birth, he has been absolutely converted since September 21. Now, this is where these gentlemen stand—this curious combination that now governs this country, this "broadbottom" government or coalition. There was my hon. friend the Minister of Finance (Mr. White) declaring to every audience that he spoke to in Ontario and throughout Canada that he was a loyal follower of our great leader (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) down to the time of reciprocity. No fault with the navy had the hon. gentleman; he was for the navy established by the Liberal party, he was not for the navy of the Nationalist party nor was he for the navy proposed by the present Prime Minister. But the members of this strange conglomeration that has been got together, these men of divergent views, decline to tell us on what basis they came to an agreement. The hon. gentleman was a supporter of the Liberal party except on reciprocity. On every other point he was in favour of the policy favoured by all the supporters of the late government. I wonder what kind of an arrangement, the Minister of Public Works has with his desk mate (Mr. White). The Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Foster) used to talk about men who, being on the toboggan slide, found the descent very easy. The Minister of Finance (Mr. White) when he cut clear of reciprocity made a complete and sudden descent He now accepts the Nationalist party with all the other features of a policy which formerly he found objectionable. I wonder whether the Conservative tiger has swallowed the Nationalist lamb, or whether the Nationalist tiger has swallowed the Conservative lamb. That is a conundrum that the small boys on the back concession line in Ontario will be asking.

But seriously speaking, Mr. Speaker—

Some hon. MEMBERS. Oh, oh.

Mr. MACDONALD. If hon. members on the other side can take anything but a serious view of the anomalous position that the two men who practically sit alone at this moment on the government benches occupy before the people, I can only say, I wonder at their levity. One of these gentlemen, the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Monk) went up and down the province of Quebec addressing meetings at which resolutions were passed with his consent denouncing the Prime Minister (Mr. Borden) beside whom he sits to-day. A proud position the gentlemen are in who support that combination without knowing how it came about and who only laugh at the situation. Is this a party to be trusted with the responsibility of the destinies of Canada? The Prime Minister and the Minister of Public Works were wide as the poles apart in their opinions upon the vital question of the relations of this nation to the empire, yet they sit now cheek by jowl and do not even deign to give parliament the slightest explanation of how they got together. What can this be but a coalition government?—one in which differing elements have come together to try to carry on the affairs of the country notwithstanding their differences on the question of the relations of this country to the whole empire. Up to this moment, so far as the country knows, they have disagreed. I contend, as declared in this amending resolution, that every constitutional precedent, every rule to be found in books dealing with the long line of parliamentary history either here or in Great Britain, declares that it is the bounden duty of the head of an administration in such a position as the present Prime Minister to give to the House and the country immediately a complete statement as to how this coalition was brought about. It is true, he attempted to do something of the kind last night. His reference to the disagreement between himself and his colleague was to the effect that two years ago they had a dispute about a question of fact. When I heard that statement last night, I hesitated to believe that I had correctly understood the hon. gentleman, believing that the Premier would not deal with such a question in that way. I waited to see if 'Hansard' would verify my understanding of what he said. I find that 'Hansard' does verify it. The hon. gentleman knew when he was making that statement that he was giving us only half the truth. He knew that this difference in policy existed until the time when he and the Minister of Public Works met and agreed upon the terms on which the Minister of Public Works and his followers would come in. He knew that there was a third party, the Nationalist party with whom he was dealing. This was shown by the additional fact that when he came to make these arrangements he did not go and ask the Minister of Inland Revenue (Mr. Nantel) and the Postmaster General (Mr. Pelletier) to come in singly, but, contrary to the wishes of the large body of straight Conservatives in Quebec, who did not want either of these gentlemen in the government, he committed to the leader of the Nationalist party (Mr. Monk), who was to come into the coalition, the task of selecting the colleagues whom he would bring with him. That statement has been made publicly, and is unquestionably true. It is not an ordinary thing for a Prime Minister to negotiate with a leader of another party. Does he expect this country to be satisfied with the story that two years ago this hon. gentleman whom he has taken into his cabinet, the Minister of Public Works, and he 'had a little difference of opinion about a question of fact' not a question of policy? I trust my hon. friend the Prime Minister will be serious at least on the assumption of the important duties which he has been called upon to perform. He surely does not think that the Canadian people will submit to the peculiar performance which he is attempting to impose upon them. Down in his own constituency of Halifax there are men who are wondering how it was that the Monk-Bourassa element were supporting this government. Does the hon. gentleman count on the slavish adherence to himself and his party of men who are looking for office, preferment and position? Surely, he will hesitate to inaugurate his career as Prime Minister of this country by taking such a position as that. Rather should he follow the lines of the great men who have ruled in this country and in Great Britain, and make a statement to the public of the basis on which this coalition has been made. How can he refrain from doing so? Are we to be satisfied with what has been said, and to accept this as the last word to be spoken about the matter? Except as my hon. friend the Minister of Public Works may have discussed this question here and there, is no one ever to know whether the Prime Minister gave up his high ideals for the working out of a plan of co-operation between this country and the rest of the empire in regard to naval service or whether the Minister of Public Works has given up his position on this question?—that position with which he and his coadjutors attempted to so alarm the whole province of Quebec by extreme language denunciatory not only of our leader but of his own.

Which one of them, Mr. Speaker, has gone back on his position? Sir, I say that the motion made by my great leader here is one which demands an answer from these gentlemen, is one that this House and this country demands an answer to. Either the Minister of Public Works will tell us whether he has gone back on his position, or the Prime Minister will tell us whether he has gone back on his. This House and this country await an announcement on this question.

At six o'clock, House took recess.

After Recess.

House resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. W. H. BENNETT (E. Simcoe). Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for Pictou (Mr. Macdonald) who resumed his seat before recess, has certainly dispelled the gloom that was cast over the chamber yesterday and to-day. We heard the right hon. the leader of the Opposition (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) and, with him on that side of the House, we heard the hon. member for South Wellington (Mr. Guthrie), and the wails and woes that came up from these hon. gentlemen reminded one of a chapter of Lamentations. Apparently the word was sent forth to-day that something must be done to endeavour to cheer up the back benchers and so the hon. member for Pictou has done it to his heart's desire. One thing above all others that he tried to do was to endeavour to point out that upon this side of the House on the naval question there was a division of opinion. I think it would be well first to look at their own household and particularly on the question of reciprocity. Yesterday afternoon we had from the hon. member for South Wellington the statement that reciprocity was as dead as a door-nail, never again to be resurrected, never again to be brought forth from that bourne to which it had been followed by a large majority of the electors of this Dominion. But, this afternoon, the hon. member for Carleton, N. B. (Mr. Carvell) came forth with the statement that reciprocity still was a live issue in this Dominion. Well, we have to leave it to these hon. gentlemen to settle their differences among themselves. I tell them once again that they had better take heed to the differences that exist amongst themselves.

I am sorry that the hon. member for Pictou (Mr. Macdonald) is not in his seat because I wished to congratulate him and at the same time to sympathize with him. The hon. gentleman has made complaint that for a long time sundry and divers gentlemen on this side of the House were knocking at the doors of the cabinet. What can be said of the hon. member for Pictou who, in season and out of season, was at the same portal and who is now doomed to the most bitter disappointment of all, because I think the man hardly lives who can see a time in the future when the Liberal party will again be ushered into being as the dominant party in Canada. The hon. gentleman spoke of the outsiders in the cabinet. If there have been some gentlemen introduced in the cabinet to-day who formerly had not the honour of seats in this House, what can be said of the preceding government when it came into power? They had drawn from the east and the west, from the north and the south, and it was a well-known caustic remark of the late Mr. M. C. Cameron, who represented the constituency of West Huron in this House, that when he made his appearance at the initial bow of the Laurier government he asked the Premier to introduce the gentlemen who were sitting on the front seats, and Mr. Cameron himself had been a member of this House for many years. A party may have some additions to it. We always welcome additions. Do not hon. gentlemen opposite welcome additions? I see the serene countenance of the hon. member for St. John, N. B. (Mr. Pugsley). In the times of the Liberal-Conservative party, when differences of opinion did result it happened that among the followers of Sir Charles Tupper, a gentleman named Wm. Pugsley was in quarantine in Montreal for a whole week seeing whether or not he could be admitted to the government of that day. And, it is well-known in New Brunswick that the hon. gentleman, on more than one occasion, was a candidate on behalf of the Liberal-Conservative party, and I have no doubt at all that had the opportunity been tendered to that hon. gentleman he would have sat pat, as a stand-patter of the stand-patters, in his own seat as Minister of Public Works. Talk of principles ! Principles at least are not to be found with the hon. gentleman opposite.

The fact of the matter is that there has been a general election. We all seem to concede that this is a fact. There is a cause and there have been results and I see before me the smiling face of the hon. ex-Postmaster-General (Mr. Lemieux) who explained how the result was brought about. There is no complaint from him that the Naval Bill defeated the party, no complaint that reciprocity killed him, but he bears a grudge against a reverend gentleman, Father Vaughan, that a speech made by that gentleman last year brought about the downfall of the party. He will have to settle that with Rev. Father Vaughan himself. Whether it is so or not I do not know. Then, we come to other gentlemen. We come to the hon. the leader of the Opposition. Last night he assigned the cause to prejudice and passion. Well, if there is any man in this country who should be a judge of prejudice and passion I should think it is the right hon. leader of the Opposition. Has there ever been a time in his existence when that has not been his stock-in-trade ? Has there ever been a time when he has not fanned the country with it ? We heard of the time when he was threatening that if he had had that puny musket of his he would have shouldered it on the banks of the Saskatchewan. We also remember that, prior to the elections of 1896, with pious ejaculations, at Chicoutimi in the province of Quebec, he thanked God that there was not an Orangeman in the ranks of the Liberal party, while as a matter of fact he must have known that there was—I was going to say —the ex-Minister of Public Works, who was a prominent leader in his party in New Brunswick, although I will not charge that at the time he was a follower of the Liberal party, because his course in that regard was always very erratic. But, the right hon. gentleman well knew then that a gentleman from Addington in this House, Mr. Dawson, was a most prominent member of the Liberal party and he well knew too that Mr. John A. Barron, who represented North Victoria in this House, was a shining light in the Liberal party. Yet, despite that fact, when the then leader of the Opposition was in the province of Quebec where he wished to fan the wave of sectarian anger, prejudice and passion, he thanked God that there was not an Orangeman in the party. If the hon. gentleman wishes to read the whole debate which took place in 1896 he can do so and in which, when pilloried and held down to his words, the leader of the Opposition did not dare to deny the impeachment that that was an utterance of his in the province of Québec. Why? Because upon the seat of the hon. member for Chicoutimi there was a huge mass of affidavits and declarations from men who had heard him make that statement. I do not assume the hon. gentleman would deny in the House to-day that that was the speech that he made in Chicoutimi. That is the way that he was trying to pacify the people and to do away with all those appeals to race and religion in Quebec and in every part of the Dominion.

Now, we have come down to what probably was the real cause of the defeat of the party and we will go to the eminent authority of the pious and reverend editor of the ' Toronto Globe.' What does that reverend and pious editor say ? Every hon. gentleman knows full well that unless it was true the editor of the 'Globe' never would have said it. So, going to the city of Chicago a few weeks ago, he assigned as the reason for the defeat of the government the wholesale corruption of the people of Canada.

Some corroboration of his statement is to be found in the speech of the member for Carleton, N. B. (Mr. Carvell), who says it was the cash that brought about the defeat of the Liberal party in New Brunswick. This is a sad reflection on the ex-Minister of Public Works (Mr. Pugsley) that he did not beat the other fellows out in cash.

Another gentleman has come to the rescue in the province of Quebec to explain how elections are carried in that province. A fair inference to be drawn from the statement of the editor of the ' Globe ' is that the cause of the defeat was too much cash on the part of the Conservative party, and too little cash on the part of the Liberal party. We have always heard that the Liberal party are the party of purity. I shall not say that they are not, I shall allow the election courts into which they have been taken to prove that. There is now pending in the province of Quebec an election, and a note of warning has been thrown out by a Liberal newspaper in that province which intimates that there is no prospect of Premier Gouin having a corruption fund of anything like the proportions of that which the late government had in the province of Quebec, and he foretells that dire disaster awaits the party unless the cash is forthcoming. I quote from the Montreal ' Gazette ' of the 20th instant:

> Sir Lomer Gouin has only a meagre influence as far as an electoral fund is concerned, and a great number of Liberal candidates will be obliged to make their elections with prayers.

I wonder what they made them with in the last election in Quebec. I hold in my hand a clipping from a newspaper published at the time of one case that was unearthed in the province of Quebec, that was the case of Lotbiniére. I shall briefly read from the evidence:

The first witness examined was François Blouin, of Ste. Croix, who admitted having received $25 from the respondent. Philias Normand, of St. Antoine, admitted having received money which he used to treat; Joseph Lefebvre, of St. Antoine, received $40 of this, he kept $22 for his own share and the balance he spent; Alfred Lefebvre, of St. Apollinaire, received $80, which he spent.

I have reason to believe that one of the causes that has led to the return of a solid following of the party opposite in many elections in the province of Quebec was, as the editor of this newspaper, Mr. Langlois, says, that it is the funds that tell and the funds alone in the province of Quebec. The trouble is, I think, that all over the country the people have rather got sick of hon. gentlemen opposite. It was not so much a question of reciprocity or of naval policy, but a widespread feeling that the time had arrived in Canada for ordinary common honesty. What a spectacle was presented before the electors in the last parliament, a minister of the Crown charged with having a corruption fund, and the curtain being rung down before it could be inquired into. I shall not say whether that charge was true or untrue, the allegation was made, and was not inquired into. But if a corruption fund or a large amount of money had been handed to him personally he had high warrant for accepting it, because other ministers of the Crown had done the same thing. We have all read in the Toronto newspapers of the celebrated Fielding fund. We have all read in the Toronto 'Mail' of the large fund that was collected, and handed to the ex-premier of this Dominion, and if these things are true—and in the case of the Fielding fund, it was discussed openly in the House—the public as a whole had got sick and sore at heart of the corruption of hon. gentlemen opposite, and wished to put an end to it. As to the province of Quebec the people no longer had that implicit faith in the Prime Minister, by degrees he had been found out. Where had he been found out? In this, that in one part of the Dominion he had preached one doctrine, and in another part of the Dominion he would preach another doctrine; in fact he was all things to all men wherever he happened to meet them so that with these lapses of memory, if we are charitable enough to attribute it to that, the right hon. gentleman hardly knew what he did say as he travelled from one part of the country to another when he assigned to his opponents all manner of crimes and misdemeanours and indulged in false prophecies. That seems to be an inherent quality of the hon. gentleman. I recently read a reference to his early youth, and when I say this is from the pen of that versatile and talented ex-member Nicholas Flood Davin, it will be listened to with attention. Prior to the election of 1878 the leader of the opposition journeyed to the province of Ontario and among other places he spoke in the town of Strathroy. Mr. Davin says:

At Strathroy, after a little speech from Mr. Oliver, Mr. Cartwright plunged in medias res with characteristic vigour, dealing trenchant blows upon Sir John and his unprincipled crew, hurling figures around and above him at intervals, until the air fairly glowed with the coruscation of fireworks sent forth, with all the satirical shock and shiver peculiar to his rhetorical sky-rockets. The presence of Mr. Laurier was somewhat refreshing, because it seemed like a renewal of the old league between the progressive parties in Ontario and Quebec. To confederation we owe the rapprochement which rancour, excited by the representative question, had, of late rendered impracticable. Were the party what it once was, placed firmly on a basis of sound principle, instead of being a mere combination to retain office, one might recall the days when Robert Baldwin found a seat in Rimouski and Louis Lafontaine was returned for one of the ridings of York. Mr. Laurier is a young man of promise, a minister to whose utterances people are ready to listen, and whether friends or opponents, to weigh with generous indulgence; but it is much to be feared that party training is beginning to efface the frank ingenuousness of his nature. Mistakes in political history, such as those Sir Francis Hincks detected in Mr. Laurier's Quebec lecture, are pardonable; to misrepresent opponents and even passing events and recent transactions, so early in his career, are sadly ominous indications of deterioration. It is to be hoped that the hon. gentleman is not to furnish another proof that 'evil communications corrupt good manners,' and that one cannot take a dip in the slough of partyism without permanent defilement.

That was away back in 1878, and I think the country has found since that time that the foreboding of Mr. Davin was only too true, and that the hon. gentleman has been very inconsistent in many attitudes and positions he has taken in the public life of Canada both before and since he became Prime Minister. The trouble with the hon. gentleman was that he had been fed with adulation by his followers to such an extent that he had got into that position that he believed that he had really created Canada. I well recollect the statement of an hon. gentleman, once a member of this House but now a senator, that the right hon. gentleman was the greatest man who ever lived. The adulation that this gentleman showered upon the ex-premier was taken with the best possible grace.

He was afterwards rewarded I do not know whether for that reason or not, with a seat in the Senate.

Now, there is before the House to-day a speech of considerable interest to the people of Canada, because in it there are many matters of deep import, especially to the western part of this country, the most important and vital part of this great Dominion. One clause of that speech to which I intend to refer for a little time is the clause with reference to the selection of the best route for the Hudson Bay railway. I understand that the last government gave a pledge to the people of the west that that railway would be constructed. The same pledge is being made by the present administration. Transportation is not only to the people of the west, but to the people of the whole Dominion, a most important question but to my mind it is most important to-day that the country should move slowly on this question with a view to adopting the best system that can be obtained. Before the public to-day there are four or five schemes involving the expenditure of millions of dollars. There is the Georgian Bay canal, which will entail an expenditure of probably upwards of $200,000,000. There is the deepening of the Welland canal, a fair estimate of the cost of which is some $50,000,000. Then we have upon us the heavy burden of the Transcontinental railway. The construction of the Hudson Bay railway will cost in all probability some $40,000,000. I am not going to quarrel with the government on the subject of the Hudson Bay railway, but I think the time has arrived when they should appoint a commission of the best men that can be selected to deal with this whole transportation question on its merits. There was a time in the state of New York when an expenditure of some $100,000,000 was contemplated by that state for the deepening of the Erie canal, and I well remember the statement made on that occasion by the New York Central Railway Company that if the interest on that amount were paid to that company it would be prepared to ship from Buffalo to New York every bushel of grain that would be carried there. I am going to ask the House to consider these various routes. As there is a notice with regard to the Welland canal enlargement, I shall not speak of that at any length. But there is already in Canada to-day a system of transportation that to all appearances is going to prevail as essentially the leading route, that is, the system that obtains between upper lake ports and the Georgian bay ports. It may not be within the knowledge of hon. gentlemen that the Canadian Pacific Railway Company has within the last year or two spent, at a prospective town on the Georgian bay called Port McNicoll, some $7,000,000 or $8,000,000, and that the government of Canada has spent a large sum of money in improving and deepening the harbour at that port; and I believe the time has arrived when, with larger vessels on the Great Lakes, and with an improved system of railway, and an improved style of cars, grain can be shipped from the head of the lakes to Montreal at three or three and a half cents per bushel. When it is remembered that the prevailing rate by vessel from Fort William to Montreal has been six cents a bushel, this House and the country must realize that before any large schemes are undertaken by the government, the whole question should be inquired into by a competent commission in order that the country may get the very best. With regard to the Hudson Bay railway I have only this to say, that the Canadian Pacific Railway Company is a huge concern, with practically unlimited money, and if it had been proved that that was a feasible route, and would turn out to be a profitable one, I believe that long ago the Canadian Pacific Railway Company would have established that line of communication. Be that as it may, the government are apparently committed to the project, and I presume it will be dealt with in due course by this parliament. With regard to the Georgian bay and lake route, let me tell the House that heretofore the system of transportation carried on by the Canadian Pacific railway has been this: They carry to the head of the Great Lakes all the grain that is collected along their various lines of railway. At Fort William it is transferred to vessels which may go either to ports on the Georgian bay, or to Buffalo. But to-day, with the new means of transportation which the company has established at Port McNichol, and from there to Peterborough, they will be able not only to control the trade of the northwest, but to go to Chicago and Duluth and take the bulk of the trade of 250,000,000 bushels of grain that is going to Buffalo to-day, and bring it through on the Canadian Pacific railway. Now, is there a necessity to-day for all these various systems of transportation that are being mooted? Our own northwest produces 120,000,000 bushels of grain. Of this only 25,000,000 are transported from Canada, the bulk of it finding a market in our own country. In view of that, would it not be wise on the part of this country, before undertaking expenditures running into hundreds of millions of dollars, to postpone the whole question until it has been dealt with on its merits by a competent commission? Nobody would expect men like Sir Thomas Shaughnessy, and the board of directors of the Canadian Pacific Railway Company, to go into an expenditure such as they have done at Port McNicoll and to undertake the construction of a road from there to Peterboro, without being fully aware of the vantage ground which their company would secure thereby. A vessel from the upper lakes—and I take any point, either Fort William, Port Arthur, Duluth or Chicago—can make two trips to Port McNicoll as against one to Buffalo; and when it is considered that we have on the Great Lakes vessels with a carrying capacity of 400,000 bushels of grain, and some with even greater capacity, and that there is an advantage of $4,000 to the vessel on her two trips as against one to Buffalo, one can see how much money that means in a season to the large Canadian shipper and the Canadian Pacific Railway Company, which will be practically the owners of the ships carrying the grain on that system. Heretofore all the grain carried on the Canadian Pacific railway has been landed at Owen Sound, carried from Owen Sound to Toronto, and from Toronto carried past Peterboro and on to Montreal, and in the winter season it is carried to St. John and taken charge of by the Canadian Pacific steamers.

The Canadian Pacific Railway Company are in a position to do this. They have their ships on the Atlantic, they have their vessels on the Great Lakes, and they will control more vessels on the Great Lakes, and they will be able to take the grain right from the elevator on the prairie and lay it down at Liverpool, and in consequence of the strategic position they hold in that regard they will be able to give a rate that will beat the rate to Buffalo. Now, a glance at the map will show hon. gentlemen this fact, that Montreal is closer to the north eastern states of the United States, considerably closer, than is Buffalo; and that is the reason why the Canadian Pacific railway people pin their faith on the hope that not only will they control the trade of the Canadian Northwest, so far as it is gathered by their own lines, but they will also take a great portion of the trade from the United States ports on the Georgian Bay. The government and the late administration—and I as representative from the riding affected am willing to and I do thank the ex Minister of Public Works for having regard to that fact—have been liberal, in meeting the wishes of the Canadian Pacific Railway Company by establishing, and by helping to improve, this port at Port McNicoll. But Sir, if the position occupied by the Canadian Pacific Railway Company in regard to the grain route is a strategic one, the position of the Grand Trunk Railway Company on the Georgian Bay is even better for this reason: At the town of Midland the Grand Trunk Railway Company to-day have three enormous elevators which are by reason of their construction capable of storing probably from 10,000,000 to 20,000,000 bushels of grain which means that in the fall of the year grain can be brought from the Northwest placed in the elevators at Midland and at Port McNicoll, there transferred to the cars and carried to the port of St. John whence the Canadian Pacific railway operates lines of steamers, and to Portland, where the Grand Trunk operates.

Mr. PUGSLEY. The Grand Trunk Pacific steamships will leave St. John and Halifax.

Mr. BENNETT (Simcoe). The hon. gentleman reminds me of the fact that the Grand Trunk Pacific steamers will leave the port of St. John as well. It means an enormous advantage to the farmer of the Northwest not only on the outgoing crop, but on the manufactured goods which he wishes to introduce from the other provinces. When these vessels are on the Great Lakes and while they are at the respective ports, of course ports McNicoll and Midland—and before I forget it let me remind the House of this fact also, that the Canadian Northern railway is within about fourteen miles of Port McNicoll, and whether or not it is an accomplished fact it is a well defined rumour in that part of the country that to-day the Canadian Northern anticipate having a port close to those I have already referred to, and there will thus be at those points congregated and assembled the grain trade not only of the Canadian Northwest, but also of a great part of the northwestern states.

Mr. PUGSLEY. Hear, hear.

Mr. BENNETT (Simcoe). Now, there is also this further advantage of the Northwest. Ontario is simply girdled with the systems of the Canadian Pacific and of the Grand Trunk railways. The Grand Trunk to-day have a line of railway to their Midland port from Toronto of about ninety miles. It is a link line that has lately been constructed, a sort of cut-off line. At Toronto you assemble the manufactured goods to the extent of millions of dollars that go to our Canadian Northwest. Toronto is the assembling point from which the systems of the Grand Trunk, and the other different lines of railway radiate, and enter, and whether it be from any town in western Ontario, or whether it be from the city of Toronto itself, there will be a cheap rate obtained by the Grand Trunk for their vessels not only coming down, but also going back. The whole question in transportation in this western country has been the carriage of the grain in one direction, and going back in the other direction empty, and the latter problem will be met, and met to a large extent, by the conveyance back to the west of the manufactured goods of the different provinces by way of the Great Lakes.

Mr. PUGSLEY. They will get the trade of the American west as well.

Mr. BENNETT (Simcoe). Yes, as the hon. member suggests the American west as well.

Now, there are other matters that come into consideration in this respect, and that is the question of the employment of labour on the railways. I have heard estimated the number of men employed by the Canadian Pacific Railway Company. I am not going to mention those figures, they seem so large; but every man knows that in every town in Canada of any importance at all railway men are large factors in the progress and in the business of that town, by reason of the fact that they are in the main adults and large earners of money.

What then to my mind is presented to the government of the day, and what is foreshadowed in the speech from the Throne, is the establishment of a system of government elevators in this country, or taking control of the railway elevators so that satisfaction will be granted to the farmer of the Northwest in respect of the complaints that he has to make. Let us assemble grain at the base of the Great Lakes, in the fall of every year at the time when it is moving, and place it there at points where it can be moved forward in the winter months in quantities of 20,000,000 or 40,000,000 bushels. Let us even place there if possible 100,000,000 bushels of grain. But I believe before the government of this country plunges into such huge expenditure as the deepening of the Welland canal, or the construction of the Georgian Bay canal, or even perhaps the construction of the Hudson Bay railway, it would be well for them to take this question up by way of a commission composed of capable and competent men, men upon whom the railway companies or other ulterior influences cannot possibly prevail, and bring down to this House and to the country a well defined plan of transportation so that the country may have the benefit of it, and the farmer of the Northwest may have that which he to-day desires and which he is looking forward to—the cheapest possible freight that can be given to him. Now, I am told that the freight from say Portage La Prairie or Brandon to the head of the lakes is about six cents a bushel. That is a very considerable item. If you can reduce the rate from the head of the lakes to the ocean port of Montreal to three cents a bushel you are going to give the farmer of the west a rate which I think would satisfy him or satisfy him to a very great extent.

I have touched upon these two questions —the question of government elevators, and the question of the Hudson Bay railway—because they come within the purview of the address, and I hope that during the course of the session those matters will be debated and discussed to such an extent that the government will before the close of the session appoint such a commission of high class men so that the whole subject may be discussed on its merits. I have not said to-night one word, and I do not propose at this stage to say anything, as against the Welland canal deepening. That will come up, and no doubt there will also be introduced the question of the Georgian Bay canal. But I do say this, and I say it is a matter for contemplation by hon. gentlemen, that the first thing this government should do is this: Follow up the line of policy foreshadowed here whether it is by the establishment of elevators or their control at the Great Lakes, or whether it may not be as I think it should be, by co-operation with the great city of Montreal which has established at that port—and the city of St. John also—elevator accommodation of most capable dimensions so that the trade will be centralized there to the greatest possible extent, and the farmers of the west, the manufacturers of the different provinces, and the great railway interest—for it is a great interest—will get the benefit.

So far as the naval question is concerned, upon which a good deal has been said on the other side of the House, I have little to say, and for this reason,—that today there is a naval policy before the people of this country. Hon. gentlemen on this side found it when they came in, and they will have to deal with the question. I am quite satisfied, as a supporter of the government, to take the assurance of the Prime Minister that the government are going to meet the matter squarely and deal with it on its merits. The proposition has its adherents and it also has its opponents. I do not believe that this government ought to have its hand forced on the present occasion, or that it should be compelled to take a stand on this issue. I think that the fair opinion of the country and the House will be that on this question the government should be given a free hand. The people of the country, I think, are satisfied. They declared their satisfaction in no equivocal way in the elections that have just been held.

And if there was one source of strength more important than another in the ministerial party it was in the fact that they had at their head a gentleman who is known to the people as one who met public questions squarely and dealt with every issue without hesitation or equivocation. And every man, irrespective of politics, must admire the splendid position taken by the Prime Minister when he went through Manitoba and Saskatchewan and stated openly that, even at the price of power he was not prepared to recede from the stand he had taken on the reciprocity pact.

Every member of this House, whether on this side or the other, must congratulate the country on the present state of prosperity, and all will join in the hope that that prosperity may be continued for many years to come. And if prosperity is with us—and we all know it is—we are thankful that Providence has been kind, that the sun has shone and the rains have fallen, giving us abundant crops. Our people have been industrious and in their prosperity are content. They know that their prosperity is due in no small measure to the policy of protection brought forward in this country many years ago, a policy not broken into rudely or harshly by hon. gentlemen opposite even when they held the reins of power. As an admirer and humble supporter of this government, I do hope and trust that in their tenure of office they will stand by this policy which has given Canada prosperity since 1878 and by strict adherence to which we may look for continued prosperity for the future.

Hon. WM. PUGSLEY (St. John City). Mr. Speaker, as I listened to the very admirable address of my hon. friend from East Simcoe (Mr. Bennett) on the transportation question I was impressed with his very great ability, and could not but think what a pity it is that one possessed of such ability should descend to such small ideas as some of those he expressed, and should indulge in personalities on an occasion when we are engaged in the consideration of questions of vital importance to the country. I do not propose to follow my hon friend in these personalities. So far as my right hon. friend the leader of the opposition (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) is concerned, nothing that the hon. gentleman (Mr. Bennett) can say will detract from the unique position which that gentleman occupies in the eyes of the people of this country and in the eyes of the English speaking world. He stands to-day before the whole world not only as one of the greatest of Canada's statesmen, but as one of the greatest of imperial statesmen. The hon. member for East Simcoe (Mr. Bennett) has thought fit, even on a motion calling attention to the extraordinary position occupied to-day by two wings of the government towards each other, to refer to my having changed my politics some fifteen years ago. My hon. friend the Minister of Marine and Fisheries (Mr. Hazen) knows the circumstances under which I changed. He knows that at the time I had the sympathy of a large number of the people of St. John. He knows that a large portion of the people were then taking a stand upon what they thought—whether rightly or wrongly—was a great act of injustice on the part of the government of that day towards the port of St. John and the province of New Brunswick. Whether I was right or wrong is a matter of little consequence at the present time. The stand I took, I took conscientiously. And, Sir, if I had to act again under the same circumstances, I would do again exactly what I did fifteen years ago.

Now I wish, before proceeding with my remarks upon the address to add my congratulations to those already offered to the mover and seconder of the address for the very eloquent speeches they made. More especially do I desire to congratulate my old friend from Calgary (Mr. Bennett) upon the able manner in which he presented his views to the House. The hon. gentleman comes from the province from which I come, a province that has given many able men to other provinces of Canada, and to other portions of the world. New Brunswick has the honour to have sent my hon. friend into one of the newest provinces of Canada, where he rapidly took the highest position in his profession, until he has now arrived at the position of a member of parliament. New Brunswick gave to the same province its governor. It has given to imperial politics the leader of the Unionist party; and it has given to North Toronto a very able gentleman in the person of the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Foster). But when my hon. friend from Calgary goes back to New Brunswick, as he goes every year, or nearly every year, to visit his old home, and contrasts the progress and great prosperity which he sees in other portions of Canada, and especially in its western portion with the want of progress and development which appears in the district in which he was born, he must regret that, instead of sending her sons and daughters abroad New Brunswick could not send more of the products of farm and forest, mine and sea. My hon. friend was born and brought up in one of the loveliest sections of this country, on the banks of the Petitcodiac river, where the soil is capable of producing as abundantly as that of any other part of Canada. Still, I doubt if the population of that district is any greater to-day than it was on the day my hon. friend was born. Now, there must be a cause for this.

Those of us who have watched the trend of events in the maritime provinces ever since confederation, have been of the opinion that the upper provinces do not give, and will not give, and cannot give the people of the maritime provinces a market for their natural products, which it is very desirable for them to have if they wish to attain that measure of prosperity which the people in any part of Canada are reasonably entitled to look forward to. Our natural markets are in the great cities of the republic beside us. The natural markets of the maritime provinces are in the cities of Portland, Boston, Baltimore, Philadelphia and New York. Looking out from the city of St. John, we imagine we can see across the few hundred miles of water, where there is a great consuming population of upwards of eight millions, who would be glad to buy the products of the people of the maritime provinces, who would be glad to buy our fish, to buy our farm produce. Ever since the abrogation of the reciprocity treaty which was put an end to in 1866, the natural markets of our people have been denied to the maritime provinces, and instead of the progress, prosperity and development which our great natural resources would reasonably entitle our people to expect, we have found practically no growth, practically no increase in population, practically no development of business. We have found many of our farms abandoned, we have seen little increase in population; and as my hon. friend from Carleton (Mr. Carvell) said to-day, the last census returns tell the tale in a most emphatic manner.

Well, Sir, I wish that during the late election I could have had my hon. friend from Simcoe (Mr. Bennett) in the city of St. John to aid me in our campaign on behalf of better trade relations with the United States, for the very arguments he has presented to the House to-night would have been potent arguments with the people of St. John, and would have gone far to counteract the arguments advanced by my hon. friend the Minister of Marine and Fisheries (Mr. Hazen), by my opponent, Mr. Powell, and by Mr. Sifton, who came there to speak against reciprocity, and also, by the Prime Minister. What was the argument they used? They said: If we have reciprocity with the United States, if the products of the Canadian west are allowed to be admitted free into the United States, the result will be that the vast majority of the products of Canada will go south, or will reach the markets of the old world through the ports of the United States. I argued then, feebly it is true in comparison with the arguments my hon. friend has presented to-night, but I argued that, with the unrivalled trade routes which Canada possesses in the St. Lawrence, in the great lakes, and by the Georgian Bay, we would grasp in the future, if we had reciprocity, not only the trade of our own great west, but we would be also able to grasp a great share of the trade of the fertile states of the American west. That was the argument which I made, and any man who looks at the map, any man who studies the situation in the western states and in the Canadian west, will realize the truth of what I say, and the truth of what the hon. member for Simcoe has so well said to-night. Further, my hon. friend would have said just as I said, that in order properly to develop the trade, to develop it in the west, we must have return freights, whether the freight is being carried by railway or by steamer. My hon. friend said that the railways of our country will draw the products of the west down to the seaboard over Canadian routes to ship them to the markets of the world through Canadian ports, and take back the manufactures of Canada as return freight. I interposed the remark: To the United States as well? And he said, yes, to the western states as well. Is it not reasonable to suppose that if, under reciprocity, it would be true that the Canadian railways would draw eastward to Canadian ports a large portion of the products of the American west, they would want return freights? They would not want to send freight cars back empty. They would carry the manufactures of Canada into those western states where they would be disposed of at remunerative prices, and so greatly aid the manufacturing industries of eastern Canada. Take the case of farm implements. If we had reciprocity so that our manufacturers could send farm implements into the western states, the Canadian railways would be glad to carry those farm implements at a reasonably low rate in order to have the benefit of return freights for their cars which would be bringing out the products of the western states. Now that was one of the arguments which I made. And we had to meet as well as we could the argument which was made by our opponents to the people of St. John that if we had reciprocity the result would be that our whole trade which now flows to the east through Canadian ports would flow through the south and through the ports of the United States. For my part I had no doubt that the opposite would be the case, and I am glad that the people of St. John gave heed to the arguments which we sought to present; and although they did not send two supporters of reciprocity to this House, yet they divided evenly, and I had the honour of being returned from the city of St. John by a reasonably good majority. I am glad also that the province of New Brunswick at large sent a majority of members, eight members out of thirteen, to this House who were in favour of reciprocity.

Now it may be that there is no great pleasure in holding inquests upon dead issues. But hon. gentlemen have to-night discussed reciprocity to a certain extent, and therefore, even at the risk of wearying the House, perhaps you will allow me to present the matter briefly from the New Brunswick standpoint, and to state briefly what we contended for. What I think appealed very strongly to the people of New Brunswick was that this was a reasonable business arrangement between two countries which would result in the benefit of both, and which must inevitably result to the benefit of Canada, and more especially to the benefit of the maritime provinces, and particularly to the province of New Brunswick. What are the facts? In addition to farm produce, an important industry in New Brunswick is lumbering. To-day our lumber manufacturers have no market for their shingles, which are a very important by-product of the mills, no market for their laths, no market for their boards, except the United States, none whatever, and we are obliged to sell these products to the United States in the face of a very heavy duty. Of the class of lumber of which I speak there was a considerable import from the United States to Canada last year, but it paid no duty. The public men of this country, representing both sides of politics, had thought it to be in the interest of our people that lumber of this class should be admitted into Canada free of duty.

We thought that in the interest of the people living upon the prairies it was of great importance that they should get lumber as cheaply as possible and that no duty should be imposed upon this class of lumber. What were the Americans doing with regard to this great industry which is of such vast importance to the people of New Brunswick? Last year, upon this class of lumber, Canada collected upon imports from the United States the magnificent sum of $50, and the United States collected upon imports from Canada the very large sum of $1,200,000. By this arrangement the United States government, by a stroke of the pen, agreed to throw off the $1,200,000 which they had collected as against the $50 which this government was collecting on their products of a similar kind. That was something that appealed to the people of New Brunswick.

But further, we were able to point to the fisheries, which are of great value. We were able to say that there was exacted upon Canadian fish last year that went over the American border very nearly $500,000, and that notwithstanding this duty we sent over four million dollars' worth to the United States. The value of the fish sent from the United States to Canada was comparatively small. The United States government agreed to throw off this burden upon our fishermen which would give a very great impetus to the fishing industry of the maritime provinces. In regard to farm products we recognize the conditions because we live near the American border and we know what is taking place. We know that the market for potatoes, hay, butter, cream, lamb, poultry and eggs, and other products of the farm, is a most excellent one for the people of the maritime provinces. We have a very great valley watered by the St. John river with the city of St. John at its mouth, and we are able to ship by water to New York, Philadelphia, Baltimore and Boston from the very valley of the St. John and we know that 500 miles of water freight is not greater than fifty miles of freight by rail. We have these great markets at our very doors and our people or a majority of them at all events. thought that nothing would do more to enhance the prosperity of New Brunswick than free entry for natural products to the markets of the United States.

Well, Sir, we had another argument to present and it is one to which I invite the attention of this government. It is one that is all-important to the people of St. John. We have had for sixty years a law known as the Pike law, passed by the Congress of the United States under which American lumbermen could cut trees from the forest in northern Maine, float the logs down the river St. John to the city of St. John, have them manufactured there in mills owned by American citizens and the products of the mills sent forward to the United States free of duty. As a result of that very amicable arrangement made by the United States quite an American colony has grown up in St. John, as the Minister of Marine and Fisheries (Mr. Hazen) well knows. Hundreds of men are employed in that industry. On the 5th day of August last the repeal of the Pike law went into effect. To-day upon this lumber a duty is imposed of $1.25 a thousand on the products of their mills. Had reciprocity been obtained they would have sent their manufactured lumber into the United States free of duty just as they had been doing for the past sixty years. To one big firm in St. John employing many hundreds of men the re-imposition of this duty means a burden on their lumber industry of at least $50,000 per year. As I say, they employ hundreds of men and they are a great factor in the prosperity of our city. If we do not get some relief for them the result will be that their mills will be closed and their industry will be transferred to northern Maine where the manufacture of these American logs can be carried on and from where their product will get into the hands of the consumers in the New England states free of duty. I do not know whether my hon. friends opposite feel like making any representations to the government of the United States and asking them whether, in view of this industry having been built up and continued there for sixty years under this friendly legislation of the neighbouring republic, they might not be induced to continue it for a number of years at all events. Perhaps my hon. friends may think that it might be taking a step towards the dismemberment of the British Empire to ask for a concession in this respect. However, I merely throw out the suggestion for the consideration of my hon. friends. The matter is one of very great importance. I tell my hon. friends that by the defeat of this movement for better trade relations with the United States a blow of the most severe character has been struck at the province of New Brunswick. There is no question in reference to that. With reciprocity our province would again become prosperous as it was during the years 1856 to 1866.

However, the people of Canada had the determination of that question. The people of New Brunswick stand with the people of Quebec, the people of Nova Scotia, the people of Saskatchewan and the people of Alberta. In all of these five provinces, the majority of the provinces of Canada, the majority of the people have voted in favour of better trade relations with the United States. Their voice has been drowned by the voice of the people of Ontario. Outside of Ontario there is a popular vote of 22,000 of the people of Canada in favour of reciprocity. I think that the people of the great province of Ontario ought to consider well as to whether, in voting down this businesslike arrangement, this fair and reasonable arrangement, they acted fairly to those sections of Canada to which the carrying into effect of this agreement would mean so much and do so much for the prosperity of the people. Ontario is the great manufacturing centre of Canada. She is sending out her manufactured goods by the millions into Saskatchewan and Alberta, whose people have spoken so strongly in favour of reciprocity. She is sending down her manufactures to the lower provinces and she has driven out many manufacturers which we had there some years ago. She has derived a profit and a benefit from the people of New Brunswick. It seems to me that it is well worth the consideration of the people of Ontario as to whether, when the opportunity does come for them to pronounce upon this question again, they may not feel that in the interest of their poorer brethren in these different provinces of Canada they should reverse the verdict which they gave on the 21st September.

Now, Mr. Speaker, my hon. friend the Prime Minister rather sought to convey the impression that the people had decided this question upon economic grounds. I say no, so far, at all events, as New Brunswick is concerned. The Minister of Marine and Fisheries knows that he appealed to the people upon other grounds than economic grounds. He knows that he appealed to them to protect the empire from losing this fair Dominion of Canada. He knows that before the campaign was over thousands of people in New Brunswick thought that it was a question for or against annexation. There are some places in New Brunswick where the ladies and children almost went crazy, begged of their husbands and fathers that they should vote down this movement in favour of annexation as they did not want the stars and stripes to float over the people of New Brunswick.

The other day my hon. friend the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Foster) went to the city of New York and addressing the Canadian Club said that he wanted it distinctly understood that the government of this country and the people whom they represent, which would be the majority of the people of Canada, had the most friendly feeling towards the people of the United States and wanted to enlarge the commercial relations between the two countries. If he had told the members of the Canadian Club of the appeals which in his name and in the name of his colleagues were made to the people of Canada I do not think he would have felt that he was in good company in being present with a number of excellent American citizens. Is it evidence of a friendly feeling towards the people of a country that when you are discussing a business-like arrangement which the one government has made with the other you will tell the people whom you are addressing that the government was not sincere, that while it was pretending to offer you simply a trade agreement yet it had something back of it all and intended to make this agreement a means of drawing you away from your allegiance to the British Empire and forcing you to become a state of the American republic? If I can convince you that that was the course which was pursued in the province of New Brunswick, I think you will agree with me that no public man who encouraged appeals of that character ought, for some years to come, to be seen at any public meeting or gathering in the United States of America.

In the city of St. John at the great gathering which met to give a greeting to my hon. friend the Prime Minister (Mr. Borden) shortly before the election a large number of transparent mottoes and campaign slogans were displayed; among them was one which greatly impressed the crowd and which was cheered. What was it? It was: 'No truck with the Yankees,' and my hon. friend the leader of the government made an appeal to the people of St. John on the ground of their being the descendants of the Loyalists, the men who had left their homes in the United States after the war of the revolution in which they had taken part, in order to save the colonies for the British Crown. He appealed to them, and he knew he was appealing to the tenderest and warmest feelings of the people of St. John when he sought to touch them upon their loyalty because they are proud to be the descendants of loyalists. He is reported in the 'Standard, the Conservative paper published in St. John and which I believe is regarded as the mouthpiece of the Minister of Marine and Fisheries (Mr. Hazen); I think I am correct in saying that popular opinion is correct in that respect because I doubt if any editorial would ever appear in the St. John 'Standard' unless the editor were sure it had received or would receive the approval of the minister. This is what the Prime Minister, then the leader of the opposition, said to the people upon that occasion:

Even if the economic advantages of the agreement were threefold I would still be opposed to the pact. You must have some regard for what was done by your fathers when their loyalty led them to leave their homes in the United States and come into a wilderness to commence anew. The pact would affect our nationality. A nation is a partnership of the dead, the living and those yet to be born, and I ask the sons of the loyalists to be on their guard because the great work which their fathers have done will be threatened. The loyalists acted on principle, and if they had not so acted this great country to-day would not be under the British flag.

What stronger appeal could be made to the inhabitants of a city a majority of whom are descendants of the Loyalists who had sacrificed all in order to remain under the British flag? Did the Prime Minister fix opposition to reciprocity on economic grounds? No. He knew he was in a city where it would be infinitely to the advantage of the people if this agreement were approved of and he knew that if the people were to deal with the matter on economic grounds alone, I and my colleagues would have swept the constituency by 1,000 votes. Therefore he threw the economic reasons to the winds and said: I appeal to you, the Loyalists of St. John, you the descendants of the men who sacrificed their homes and all the comforts of life and came and hewed out homes in the wilderness in order to live under the British Crown, I call on you to be true to the flag of your fathers, I call on you to stand by the old flag which they loved so well and for which they made such great sacrifices.

The next day the same newspaper says:

After such a meeting as that of Tuesday night, there can be no doubt that the people of this city as a whole are opposed to the Laurier surrender of our commercial rights to the United States. There are still freeborn British subjects who do not believe in handing over trade relations of this country to foreigners. They are determined to rule themselves and are not to be the serfs of an alien nation which has always sought the destruction of Canada, and in 1812 invaded its territory to accomplish this purpose.

Driven out of Canada at that time, largely by the militia of the country, they have since sought its ruin by adverse tariffs in the hope of creating a discontent that would lead to annexation. Failing to accomplish their purpose by this means, they now come forward with a left handed trade agreement by which they hope to get control of the country commercially and afterwards politically.

When these hon. gentlemen talk about being friendly with the people and government of the United States, I ask if they can be sincere in that after telling the people from the various platforms and through their newspaper organs that the government of the United States was not sincere in offering this arrangement, that while on its face it appeared all right, yet back of it was the deliberately formed intention and sinister design upon the part of the government of the United States to in some way get control of the commerce of Canada in order thus to force us into annexation, and so draw Canada away from the British Crown. I can imagine no greater insult being cast upon the government of any country than these gentlemen and newspapers have cast upon the government of the United States.

Mr. MIDDLEBRO. What about Champ Clark?

Mr. PUGSLEY. I do not excuse Champ Clark, but because a man in one country makes a fool of himself is no reason for hundreds of others seeking to get votes by appealing to the passions and prejudices of the people.

'No truck with the United States,' they said in St. John. Well, Sir, what are the facts so far as our trade with the United States is concerned? Our trade with the whole world last year amounted to $759,000,000. What was it with the United States? $404,000,000. And yet their slogan is: No truck with the United States. What was the total trade of Canada when the government of which the Minister of Trade and Commerce was a member, went out of power? In 1897, $249,244,274 was the total foreign trade of Canada with the whole world, the United States included. Therefore, Mr. Speaker, you will see that the trade of Canada with the United States for the year ending the 31st of March, 1911, was 50 per cent greater than the trade of Canada with the whole world when the Conservative government went out of office. And yet we are told, no truck with the Yankees. Why, Sir, this agreement only had the effect of placing a comparatively small quantity of goods upon the free list. One would think, to hear these gentlemen talk, that the addition to the free list of a few million dollars worth of goods would have some terrible disrupting effect upon the empire. If I remember rightly, it would affect only $9,000,000 worth of goods, and what was the value of the free goods that Canada imported from the United States last year without any reciprocal arrangement: $131,867,507, or some thirteen times as much as it was proposed to add to the free list by this arrangement.

Then, I want to make an appeal to my hon. friend the Minister of Trade and Commerce by an argument which he has often made to this House that it is most desirable, if possible, to have the balance of trade in favour of Canada. My hon. friend has made many a speech to show how injurious it is for Canada to have a balance of trade against her, and I take it that what applies to the whole Canadian trade will apply to its trade with any particular country. What were our imports from the United States for the year ending the 31st of March last? $284,934,-739. And what were our exports to the United States? 119,203,201. In other words the excess of our imports from the United States over our exports to the United States last year amounted to the enormous total of $165,731,536. Can hon. gentlemen wonder that when the members of the late government saw an opportunity to get better trade relations with the United States, so that we might be able to send there more of our lumber, more of our fish, more of our farm products, and so level up the trade between the two countries, we felt that we would not be doing our duty to the people of Canada if we had refused the opportunity? Had you any doubts, Mr. Speaker, from what you knew of the temper of the Conservative party some years ago, that if it had become known that the late government had an offer of reciprocity in natural products with the United States, and had rejected the offer, that the strongest condemnation would have come from the leaders of the Conservative party? And I would ask you, Mr. Speaker, now that you are removed from the storm and tempest of political life for a few years, and are able to consider the matter calmly, if you are not struck with amazement when you think that a plain and simple business agreement so advantageous to Canada should have been the means of arousing those appeals to national prejudice and to the loyalty of the people, with the result that to many thousands of people it was simply a question of voting for annexation or continuing to be a part of the British Empire?

Mr. FOSTER. Do you pause for an answer?

Mr. PUGSLEY. I shall be glad to hear my hon. friend. Now, Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for Simcoe has misquoted the hon. member for South Wellington (Mr. Guthrie). My hon. friend from South Wellington did not say that reciprocity was a dead issue. What he is reported in 'Hansard' as saying is that the electors have for a time disposed of that question, having given their verdict upon it. I would be sorry if a member on this side of the House should say that reciprocity was a dead issue. So far as we from the province of New Brunswick are concerned, it is by no means a dead issue. We intend, as the opportunity arises from time to time—and I think I can speak for all my colleagues from New Brunswick—to plead for justice from our fellow subjects in the province of Ontario. We cannot help thinking that when they come to think the matter over, when they forget many of the things which had their influence upon them, when they come to know that the right hon. leader of the opposition was not responsible for the ne temere degree, they will have a different view—because I have heard it said that it had been stated in many places that Sir Wilfrid Laurier introduced a Bill into parliament under which this decree became possible, and when they realize the complexion of this government, when they realize that the Nationalist party is practically in control, so far as dictating the policy of this government is concerned, we believe that they will change their minds. As to the Nationalist party being in control, have you a doubt, Sir, that if the Nationalists were not in this government, there would be an important clause in the speech refering to the naval policy? Why, that is the question that is in the minds of all the people of this country, and how absurd it was to frame a speech which makes no reference to the great question which is of vital interest to the people for whom they are supposed to speak. It is true they have referred to a few minor matters in the speech from the Throne, but upon this great question they are absolutely silent.

Now, I do not want to attempt to add anything to the magnificent speeches which have been made by my right hon. friend the leader of the opposition, and the hon. gentlemen who have followed him on this side. I feel that they will have a tremendous effect upon the people of this country. Many Conservatives, when they understand from those speeches the situation, when they understand how they have been humbugged and deceived, when they understand that they are now living under a government far different from the one they anticipated they would have when they cast their votes on the 21st of September, will, I think, be intensely indignant.

I remember that in the city of St. John, after it became apparent from statements which Mr. Bourassa was making in 'Le Devoir' that there was an alliance between my hon. friend the member for Jacques Cartier, Mr. Bourassa, and the other Nationalist leaders, on the one hand and my hon. friend the present leader of the government on the other, I ventured at a public meeting, a very largely attended meeting, to say that I believed there was this alliance and that it was capable of proof. I remember that a very prominent and very able young Conservative rose in the audience and said: Mr. Pugsley, will you allow me to make a few remarks on this question? I replied: Certainly. Then this young man said: I want it clearly understood—and remember he was one who occupies quite a high position in the organization of the Conservative party, he was a gentleman who spoke from many different platforms—I want it distinctly understood that there is no alliance between Mr. Borden and Mr. Monk, that there is no alliance between the Nationalists and the Conservative party. And added: The Conservatives of St. John would not stand for it. Sir, I venture the assertion that if it had been known there was the alliance which the subsequent events have shown to have existed and which was concealed from the people of Canada—the result as far as the province of New Brunswick is concerned would have been very different from what it was, and instead of our only carrying eight seats out of the thirteen, which was not too bad a record in view of the forces arrayed against us, we would have secured at least twelve seats in that province. Sir, I cannot tell you how deeply I, as representing the maritime provinces, regret that there is not an evident determination on the part of the government to proceed vigorously with the naval policy. I am one of those who listened with profound admiration to the speech of my hon. friend from North Toronto, now the Minister of Trade and Commerce, on the navy question. It seemed to me that he showed so clearly what was the duty of Canada that it would be impossible for the members of this House to do anything otherwise than they did do namely, to agree upon a resolution along the lines suggested by my hon. friend, and then to pass it unanimously, so that it might go forth to the country that all the representatives of the people of Canada in this parliament were united in favour of the policy of building a Canadian navy, to be manned by Canadian seamen, and to be controlled by the government of Canada, and, what is of vital importance, to be placed at the disposal of the British Empire in case of war, and to be used for the service and defence of the empire. But, to-day, Sir, we find that in the government there is a strong and a potent force which says in the first place: We shall have no Canadian navy. It is a waste of money, the money would be better employed in developing the resources of Canada, and who say in the next place: If we do have a Canadian navy it shall be used solely for the defence of Canada and that no government shall be allowed by parliament to have the power to place that navy at the disposal of the empire in case of war. And the gentleman who either really leads the Nationalist party in the province of Quebec, or who is very close to the leader, Mr. Bourassa, has the coolness to state in 'Le Devoir' what are the questions that shall be submitted to the people of Canada when the plebiscite is presented. And think of it, Sir, one of the questions which he declares shall be submitted is as to whether the Canadian ships shall be available for the defence of the empire in case of war. Think of it being suggested to any self-respecting government that they should, without having a policy of their own upon the matter, that they should leave as an open question to the people of Canada a matter upon which some of them would speak, if they spoke at all, one way, and others of them, if they spoke, would speak the other way, as to whether the ships of this great and growing young nation, one of the most important parts of the empire, should, in case the safety of the empire was imperilled, be available for its defence and preservation. Mr. Bourassa actually suggested that that should be submitted as one of the questions which should be determined by a plebiscite.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I am going to dwell for a moment or two upon some other questions which are suggested by the speech, not all of such importance as the naval question, but which are worthy of some attention. It is stated that the government propose to aid the construction of highways throughout the Dominion, and, Sir James Whitney in his manifesto to the people of Ontario claims credit for the suggestion of this idea, because he says he was the first one to mention it to Mr. Borden, the leader of the government. My hon. friend (Mr. Bennett, Calgary) who moved the address referred to the question of highways, but he gave no intimation—because I presume he was not instructed as to what information he might give—as to what the government proposed to do in this direction. Have they a policy on this, Sir, do you suppose? Do they intend to build a great national highway as a federal work from the Atlantic to the Pacific, or do they intend to take charge of the building of byroads throughout this great Dominion, and so take the work out of the hands of the provinces, and of the municipalities? What is their policy? What do they propose to do? I believe they will tell us they have not settled upon the policy yet. All they know is that they have made a promise to Sir James Whitney, and that there is an election on in the province of Ontario. And they know very well that if they put it in the speech from the Throne it would enable Sir James Whitney to keep his promise to the electors.

Mr. MACDONALD. Hear, hear.

Mr. PUGSLEY. Because Sir, the premier of Ontario said that in a few days he hoped to be able to make a definite announcement that aid would be given to highways in that province.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. Hear, hear.

Mr. PUGSLEY. Sir James Whitney is also reported to have referred to the fact—a fact which nobody can deny—that under the very excellent fiscal policy of the late government Canada has progressed so highly on the whole, its revenues have increased so well by reason of its vast foreign trade, that we have a surplus to hand over this year to our successors of about $35,000,000, and Sir James Whitney suggested to the people of Ontario, if he is correctly reported, that this surplus should all be used for provincial purposes in the building of highways, the improvement of agriculture, the building of colonization roads, and generally for the development of the newer sections of the Dominion, but having more particular reference to northern Ontario. In addition to that he announced that an agreement had been made to reimburse the Ontario government for the cost of building the government railway, the Ontario and Temiskaming railway, at all events to the extent of $6,400, per mile. Now, Sir, I do not hesitate to say that this proposition to hand over certain moneys to the provincial governments or to the municipalities to assist in the building of highways throughout the country is going to lead in the very near future to the very greatest possible dissatisfaction.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. Hear, hear.

Mr. PUGSLEY. If the Dominion government once enters upon the building of ordinary highways, ordinary by-roads, throughout the country where is to be the limit of the expenditure? By what means are you to satisfy the different provinces of Canada, that they are being treated fairly? Upon what is the grant to be based?

The government has not felt able to say a word upon the naval question because they have not matured their naval policy. Am I right in supposing that the Minister of Marine and Fisheries (Mr. Hazen) cannot tell me anything about the government's policy with regard to the highways because that policy has not been matured? Having left out all reference to the navy and having put in what they have put in with regard to the roads we might have assumed that they have a policy with regard to the roads that they have given careful attention to it and worked out the details. I would ask the Minister of Marine and Fisheries, who, I understand, is to follow me, to inform me and to inform the House as to the mode in which the government propose to distribute the federal moneys for the purpose of building highways in the various provinces of the Dominion. I could understand, if it were proposed that the government should itself take charge as a federal work of the building of national roads, such as a highway from coast to coast, that that might be justifiable and might be of great advantage to the people—I say nothing as to that until I give the matter further consideration. But, with regard to the other mode in which the moneys might be distributed—handed over to the provinces to pay part of the expense—I will say that would be entirely unjustifiable. It would work great detriment to the revenues of Canada and would prove a source of very great dissatisfaction to the people of the different provinces. Besides, how would it be done? Would it be based upon population? Or upon the length of the roads in the different provinces? The British North America Act provides a basis upon which subsidies shall be given to the different provinces, and I venture to say that it would be contrary to the letter of the British North America Act for the parliament of Canada to apportion subsidies to the different provinces for any such purpose and hand these subsidies over to the provincial governments unless and until an amendment of the Act had been secured, which amendment could be made only by the parliament of Great Britain. I think it is due to this House that my hon. friend (Hon. Mr. Hazen) should give some explanation of what the government propose to do in this connection.

With regard to terminal elevators, I think that upon this subject also the House is entitled to some explanation as to what the government propose to do. Why limit it, as the speech says it is to be limited, to elevators on the Great Lakes. What elevators are proposed to be taken over? Is it intended to take over the expensive elevators built by the Canadian Pacific railway, the Canadian Northern railway and the Grand Trunk Pacific at Port Arthur and Fort William, in addition to the elevators owned by what may be called private companies? If so, why limit it to the western shores of the Great Lakes? May not grain be mixed on its way eastward after it has passed through these elevators? Why not take over also the elevators at Tiffin and Midland? Why not take over the elevators of the railways at Montreal? What was the Minister of Marine thinking of as the representative of St. John, when he allowed the speech to be silent as to the taking over or building elevators at the port of St. John to be under the control of the government? Surely it is of as great importance to have the elevators in the port of St. John through which pass every winter many, many millions of bushels of grain, and through which, we hope, in the not distant future will pass many more millions—surely it is as important for the government to control these elevators in order to make sure that the grain is not mixed, that no injustice is done, and that the reputation of the port is maintained at the highest notch, as that elevators on the western shores of the Great Lakes should be taken over. I merely throw out these suggestions for the consideration of the minister as I believe they are worthy of consideration. When I read the speech I thought it unjustifiably silent with respect to elevators at other points than those on the Great Lakes.

But the speech was disappointing to me and I am sure it will be disappointing to the people of Canada on another ground, that while reference is made to the Hudson Bay railway and to the opening of a new port in our northern country, no reference is made to the existing ports of Canada through which our trade is now being carried on. Is this because the government has no policy in that respect?

Mr. MONK. Had you any?

Mr. PUGSLEY. Yes.

Mr. MONK. You never announced it.

Mr. PUGSLEY. We did not talk; we worked. We went on, we had been going on year after year carrying out one of the grandest transportation policies that any country could have. My hon. friend from East Simcoe (Mr. Bennett) has borne testimony to what we have been doing. Let me, in answer to the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Monk) add just a word to what the hon. member for East Simcoe has said. We recognized a few years ago the enormous advantages which would be afforded if the ports of Victoria —now known as Port McNicoll,—and Midland could be developed for use in connection with the traffic not only from our own west but from the western states through Canadian channels. We found that from the head of Lake Superior to the eastern side of Georgian Bay is 260 miles shorter than to Buffalo. And that from Port McNicoll to Montreal is 70 miles shorter than from Buffalo to New York. So that the distance from the head of the lakes to Montreal by way of Port McNicoll is 330 miles shorter than from the head of the lakes to New York by way of Buffalo.

Mr. MONK. If my hon. friend (Mr. Pugsley)' will allow me: he had the report of the government's own commission in 1904 on the best policy with regard to Montreal and the other ports he had mentioned. Why did they not carry out the recommendations of that commission?

Mr. PUGSLEY. One thing my hon. friend ought to realize,—that to make a port free simply means taking the burden off shipping leaving it to rest on the people as a whole. We thought it better to dredge out the harbours, build the wharves, and encourage the railways and steamship companies. And we have found, I am happy to say, that the trade of the port of Montreal has been increasing so rapidly that, by simply charging reasonable duties, the harbour commissioners have been able to pay their interest year after year and it has not been found much of a burden upon the port. And, as suggested by an hon. member near me, Montreal has become the successful rival of the port of New York.

Mr. MONK. But my hon. friend did not carry out the representations of his own commission; he did not make Montreal a national free port as they advised him to do.

Mr. PUGSLEY. We have been going on spending a great deal of money for the purpose of bringing trade through Canadian channels down to Montreal, Que. and the ports of the maritime provinces. But has my hon. friend the Minister of Marine and Fisheries, or has the government, any policy on this question? If so we naturally would expect so important a subject to be referred to in the speech. My hon. friend cannot say that they ought not to have a policy.

Mr. MONK. My hon. friend (Mr. Pugsley) must remember, that in fifteen years, he never once made that announcement himself.

Mr. PUGSLEY. During the election in the city of St. John, I find that a despatch was sent by my hon. friend the leader of the government. It was headed 'Mr. Borden's special message to the people of St. John.' It was published by the St. John 'Standard' on the 20th of September, the very day before the election, just in time to reach the people of St. John through the 'Standard,' which was, according to my information, very generously distributed free at the door of every elector in the city of St. John, irrespective of his political affiliations. That message was as follows:

Mr. Borden's special message to the people of St. John.

Halifax, N.S., September 19, 1911.

Special.—On the 5th April, 1904, I moved a resolution in parliament declaring that the public interest demanded a thorough and efficient equipment of our national ports and terminals on the Atlantic and Pacific. That has ever since been the policy of the Liberal-Conservative party and has been so declared on repeated occasions. The thorough and efficient equipment of St. John harbour is part of our policy. I desire to emphasize what I declared at St. John on the 5th September, namely, that the defeat of the Laurier government——

And will my hon. friend the Minister of Marine and Fisheries pay close attention to this language? I appeal to him now as a representative of St. John, whose people are looking to him to see that there is no delay in granting justice to that city, and in proceeding to carry out the promises which the Prime Minister made to the people of St. John—made for what purpose? To get votes?

An hon. MEMBER. Oh no.

Mr. PUGSLEY. Well, I will not say what it was for. At all events, it was sent specially from Halifax on the 19th, in order to be published on the 20th.

—that the defeat of the Laurier government will not retard, hinder or prevent in any way the construction of terminal facilities at St. John, or the equipment and development of that port as one of the Atlantic national ports of Canada.

Mr. HAZEN. Hear, hear.

Mr. PUGSLEY. I am glad to hear my hon friend say hear, hear. But might I not suggest that they should be up and doing, instead of saying hear, hear?

Mr. MONK. We will go as quickly as you did.

Mr. PUGSLEY. I am told my hon. friend does not go quickly. I am told that my hon. friend, in carrying out his official duties, found it easier to stop all the public works in Canada than allow them to go on. I have always found it involved very much less trouble to do nothing than to do something, and I have no doubt my hon. friend found it easier to do nothing, simply to give a general order, irrespective of the merits of any particular work, that they should be stopped. Now, Sir, have I not reason to complain, and have not the people of St. John reason to complain, that this great question which was thought by the Prime Minister of sufficient importance to require from him a special message to the people of St. John, through the 'Standard,' telling them what would be the policy of the Conservative party—have I not reason to complain that, upon this great question, the Speech from the Throne is absolutely silent? Remember that what the Prime Minister assured the people of St. John, and pledged to them, was that the defeat of the Laurier government would not in any way retard, hinder or prevent the construction of terminal facilities at St. John. But I have a further complaint to make, and that is against the Minister of Public Works. Pursuant to votes of parliament, I called for tenders for the construction of terminal facilities at the port of St. John. These were under consideration for a long time, as my hon. friend the Minister of Marine and Fisheries knows, before undertaking to go on with that great national work—because it is a great national work, and that is my justification for taking up the time of the House in referring to it—we had to have soundings taken, borings made, all over Courtenay Bay. That took a long time. We did not know what was underneath the surface of the sand and the mud there. The result of the borings showed us that there is a great basin which evidently had formerly been full of water, even at low tide, and which, with dredging, could be made into one of the finest harbours on the Atlantic coast. It is the only available place at the Port of St. John for the Grand Trunk Pacific to have their terminal facilities, it is the Atlantic port, open all the year round, which is nearest to the city of Montreal. It is, I venture to say, the one Canadian port in the winter season which can successfully compete with Portland and Boston for the vast traffic which the Grand Trunk Pacific is soon to bring to the Atlantic sea-board. Well, after a long time for consideration, after many conferences with the engineers of the Grand Trunk Pacific, after they had fully made up their mind that this was the ideal port, for freight business particularly, tenders were called for, and they were received on the 10th day of August last They called for the construction of a breakwater, for dredging out the channel leading into Courtenay Bay, for dredging out a basin, and for building wharves for the Grand Trunk Pacific. The Grand Trunk Pacific had agreed with the city of St. John, and myself as Minister of Public Works, that these wharves when built were to be leased to the Grand Trunk Pacific upon the same terms as the Transcontinental is to be leased by that corporation, and therefore, were to form a part of the Transcontinental system. Those tenders, as I have said, were received upon the 10th day of August and opened two days afterwards. But in consequence of there being no meeting of the government until after the election, they could not be considered until after our defeat, and therefore, owing to the magnitude of the work, and the very considerable amount of money which was involved, we thought it right that the lowest tender should be left to the incoming government to deal with.

Mr MONK. My hon. friend has really done nothing whatever in that direction. I have not been thirty days in the department, and I have already made a definite arrangement for large improvements on the west side. I have done more than my hon. friend.

Mr. PUGSLEY. I am glad to hear my hon. friend say that. Let me say to him that if our government had been returned, we would have gone on, not only with the work upon the west side, but with the work of Courtnay Bay as well, the contract would have been entered into, and this work would have been under way. Will my hon. friend tell me the nature of the work he is doing on the west side?

Mr. MONK. I will explain it at the proper time.

Mr. PUGSLEY. But my hon. friend made the voluntary statement that he was doing something on the west side. Would he say what he is doing?

Mr. MONK. I will explain it at the proper time.

Mr. PUGSLEY. Does my hon. friend think that is fair?

Mr. MONK. Yes.

Mr. PUGSLEY. He has accepted tenders for the west side, would he say for what work?

Mr. MONK. It is for a wharf.

Mr. PUGSLEY. I am very glad indeed my hon. friend has done that.

Mr. MONK. I merely mention it to show that I have done something. My hon. friend was at the head of the department for a long time and did nothing.

Mr. PUGSLEY. My hon. friend then is oblivious of the charges which have been made against me in regard to expenditure at St. John. I have been charged with spending a very large sum of money at St. John.

If the hon. gentleman will do me the favour to go down to St. John and make some inquiry, or if he will ask the Minister of Marine and Fisheries, I think he will assure him that a great deal of important work has been done at St. John on the west side. Let me tell my hon. friend that the building of the wharf, for which he has accepted the tender which we called for and which came in in the month of September last, has only been made possible by reason of the dredging work which we have carried on there for the last two years.

Mr. MONK. I know the hon. gentleman has done a great deal there.

Mr. PUGSLEY. Does not my hon. friend know that it is very important work in connection with harbour improvements? Did not my hon. friend stop that dredging?

Mr. MONK. No.

Mr. PUGSLEY. Sure? Did not my hon. friend stop that and start it again in a few days after there was some change in the personnel of the dredging company?

Mr. MONK. No.

Mr. PUGSLEY. Then rumor does not treat my hon. friend justly. It is rumoured in St. John that my hon. friend did stop the work and after some very hot telegrams and after there had been a little new life put into the company, he started the work again.

Mr. MONK. My hon. friend is quite mistaken about it.

Mr. PUGSLEY. A little new blood was infused into the company, some hot telegrams came to my hon. friend and he wired down to go on with the work. Still I will say to my hon. friend that I am extremely glad that he has ordered the work to be continued. It is a most important work and if it is any advantage to my hon. friend's party that the dredging shall be done by and under the control of good Conservative friends of the Minister of Marine and Fisheries, that makes no difference to me. I applaud the action of my hon. friend just the same in having this work go on and I am very glad that the making of the change in the personnel of the company took such a short time as that the work was not delayed many days.

There is another respect in which the speech from the Throne will be disappointing to the people of the maritime provinces. As you know, for a very long time the question of improving the accommodation of the people of the maritime provinces generally in connection with the I. C. Railway by the acquisition of various branch lines had been under the consideration of the late government and under the consideration of this House. Immediately before the adjournment last summer the then Minister of Railways and Canals had introduced a resolution authorizing the government to take over various branch lines connecting with the I. C. R. This is a matter of very great interest; it is a matter, I think, that is of as great importance as the granting of aid to highways. Of course, there is no election going on in New Brunswick or Nova Scotia and perhaps the question of highways is of more importance to Ontario at the present time than the consideration of the question of taking over the branch lines of the I. C. R. But nevertheless I do think that my hon. friend might very fairly have called the attention of the Prime Minister to the fact that this was a burning question in New Brunswick and Nova Scotia, and I think the government should have announced its policy in regard to the taking over of the branch lines of railway. As to this, surely my hon. friend will not say that the government have had no time to consider whether they should take over the branch railways or not because I find that the Prime Minister gave consideration to this question before the election also. On the 8th September, when my hon. friend the Prime Minister was at Summerside, he thought it of sufficient importance to send a telegram to Mr. Geo. W. Fowler, Conservative candidate for the counties of Kings and Albert, and now a member of this House, in which he stated to Mr. Fowler what would be the policy of the Conservative party in regard to the taking over of the branch lines of railway. I may say to the Minister of Marine and Fisheries that this telegram was not sent so close to the election as his telegram relating to the harbour improvements in the port of St. John ; still it was sufficiently close to the election to show that my hon. friend at that time thought that the question was of large importance and that it was one upon which he should enlighten the electors as to what was the policy of the Conservative party. He says in this telegram :

Summerside, P.E.I., Sept. 8, 1911.

Mr. Geo. W. Fowler,—

Am convinced that interests of Intercolonial railway demand acquisition of branch lines as feeders and we propose to acquire them on reasonable terms if returned to power.

(Sgd.) R. L. BORDEN.

So we find that notwithstanding the fact that the then leader of the Opposition, now the Prime Minister of Canada, as long ago as the month of September last, had given sufficient thought to these questions, one the development of the harbour of St. John, the other the acquisition of the branch lines of railway, as that he felt safe in declaring what would be the policy of the Conservative party if returned to power, and yet I regret to find that in the speech from the Throne no mention is made of these important questions and we are left entirely in the dark as to what is to be the policy of the government in regard to them.

These are questions of grave importance to the people of a very considerable section of Canada, and I do think that the hon. gentleman, speaking as he did for the Conservative party, having, as he assures the people by these telegrams that he had, made up his mind as to the course that he should pursue, should have taken His Royal Highness the Governor General into his confidence and advised him as to the course which should be adopted and that His Royal Highness ought to have acquainted parliament with the fact that it was intended to deal with these two important subjects in the way in which the Prime Minister indicated that they would be dealt with by these telegrams, one sent to the people of St. John, and the other to the present hon. member for Kings and Albert.

I am very sorry that I have taken up so much of the time of the House. I did not intend to do so when I began my remarks. I had the honour of being asked to second the amendment to the address moved by my right hon. friend the leader of the opposition.

Let me say, Sir, that it seems to me that this is an amendment that ought to commend itself to the good judgment of this House. The leader of the government is entirely wrong, when he in effect, says that neither His Royal Highness nor the opposition have anything in the world to say as to the composition of the government. I entirely disavow such a proposition as that. Every one of these gentlemen is an adviser of His Royal Highness. His Royal Highness has the right to have called to his attention by the representatives in this House what has been the attitude of certain members of his cabinet with respect to questions of great national interest in the not distant past. He has a right to be informed as to what were the views which were presented by these gentlemen upon these great questions and this amendment, I think, is eminently proper as expressing what one would hope, if it were possible for hon. gentlemen opposite to release themselves from the trammels of party, would be adopted by the majority of the members of this House. Whether it commends itself to the judgment of hon. gentlemen opposite or not, it appears to us on this side of the House that, with a knowledge of the alliance—the unholy alliance—which had been cosummated between them and the Nationalists who have been taken into the government, we would not be discharging out duty to the people if we did not take the earliest opportunity of submitting our views to the House and embodying these views in the amendment which has been proposed by my right hon. friend the leader of the opposition.

Hon. J. D. HAZEN (Minister of Marine and Fisheries). Mr. Speaker, before making a few remarks in reference to the amendment moved by the right hon. the leader of the opposition (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) I wish to extend to my hon. friend from the constituency of Calgary (Mr. Bennett) my sincere congratulations on the fact that he was selected to move the address in reply to the speech with which it pleased His Royal Highness to open this session of this parliament and also on the admirable manner in which he discharged that duty. I feel that this is a pleasant duty for me to perform in view of the fact that the hon. gentleman comes from the province from which I come and his career since he has gone to the west has been followed in New Brunswick with the satisfaction with which we always follow our sons when they go forth from our province to larger fields of usefulness.

I would also take the opportunity, in no perfunctory spirit, of tendering my sincere congratulations to the right hon. gentleman opposite (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) on having completed seventy years of life and to express the great pleasure it is to me on returning to this House to find that the right hon. gentleman, although he has reached three score years and ten has done so with his intellectual and physical vigour unimpaired and to express the sincerest hope that for many years to come he may continue to adorn the public life of this country.

I do not desire to say anything personally or otherwise offensive to my hon. friend from St. John (Mr. Pugsley) and therefore I regret that he appealed to me with regard to a reference to his somewhat tortuous political career made by the hon. gentleman who preceded me, (Mr. Bennett) The hon. gentleman said I knew the circumstances under which he changed his politics in 1896. To allow that statement to go by without a reference to it would be to admit that the hon. gentleman's reply was a complete answer to the statement of the hon. gentleman for Simcoe (Mr. Bennett). Briefly I may say that in the year 1896 my hon. friend who sits opposite to me and who has sat opposite to me for many years in the legislature of New Brunswick and with whom I have had intimate intercourse at the bar of that province, was the candidate of the Liberal-Conservative party in the county of Kings. The hon. gentleman was nominated by a convention of Liberal-Conservatives held at Hampton. I was present at the convention. The hon. gentleman accepted the nomination and in a very vigorous speech told how loyal he was to the Conservative party in Canada and after being nominated by the Conservative party he entered upon his campaign. I remember going into the country of Kings and speaking in his support from the same platform as the hon. gentleman himself. But difficulties arose in the county of Kings; a temperance section of the Conservative party were unfavourable to the candidature of my hon. friend and as the election drew near, and as it began to be apparent that it was a difficult matter to solidify the different forces of the party in support of my hon. friend, the hon. gentleman withdrew from the contest doing so in a perfectly correct way by sending a letter to Mr. Sinnett, president of the Conservative Association, saying that in consequence of divisions in the party it was not desirable that he should continue in the field saying: I hand back unsullied into your hands the banner which the Liberal-Conservative party did me the honour of placing in my hands. He added further: I do not withdraw from the contest because of any difference of opinion with the Liberal-Conservative party of Canada whose trade policy I believe is essential to the prosperity and good of this country, but in order that they may unite on another candidate whose chance of election may be greater than mine. Then the hon. gentleman, returning to St. John, when the elections approached allowed himself to be nominated as the candidate of an independent party in the city. My hon. friend has not been quite candid in telling the House the reasons for his nomination and the platform on which he stood. In the year before, 1895, largely through the efforts of the gentlemen who with me were representatives of the constituency of St. John, a subsidy had been granted for the first time in the history of the community, the result of which was that we had a direct line of steamers connecting with the Canadian Pacific railway from the port of St. John to Liverpool. The hon. gentleman came back to St. John and the issue in that election was the Manitoba School Act and the action of the Conservative party in attempting to pass a remedial Bill for the purpose of doing what I at that time candidly believed and believe yet was simply a measure of justice to the minority in the province of Manitoba. That was the one question in the campaign. My hon. friend has said that he ran as a protest against the way St. John had been treated in connection with steamboat subsidies and the way in which the port had been neglected, but he failed to tell the House of the effective part of the platform on which he ran and that which got him the few votes he obtained—because he lost his deposit——

Mr. PUGSLEY. What happened to my hon. friend?

Mr. HAZEN. I was defeated. But although in the city of St. John there were three candidates, it has always been a pleasure to me that I came out at the head of the poll, being defeated only by a few-votes in the county. That is neither here nor there, I have never thought it any matter of disgrace for a public man to go down to defeat so long as he does it standing on a platform to which he adheres, and of which he honestly approves. The hon. gentleman appealed for support on that platform of hostility to the Remedial Bill, and standing side by side with me at the joint meeting on the hustings he told a large audience that while he had little confidence in the Conservative policy on that question he had no confidence whatever in the hon. gentleman whom he now calls his leader and therefore he could not support him in the contest. Therefore, I regret that the hon. gentleman appealed to me in this connection as I do not wish to say anything offensive, but I think I am right in saying that when the hon. gentleman gave the reasons why he left the Conservative party in 1896 he did not give the whole reason and he was not quite candid in the explanation he gave this House.

But I might add that within three weeks after the 23rd of June when the elections were held my hon. friend, who on nomination day had no confidence in the party led by the hon. leader of the opposition, was the most staunch and noble Liberal of them all. Now, Sir, I was surprised to-night to hear my hon. friend indulge in a jeremiad with regard to the condition of affairs in the province of New Brunswick. One would almost have thought from his utterances, so different from his usual utterances, that the people of New Brunswick were in a down trodden and depressed condition, that business was bad, that they were a poverty-stricken people, without hope and with no share in the prosperity of the country. I might have expected that from some other hon. gentleman, but it is hard to understand it coming from my hon. friend. Year in and year out in the legislature, when I was leading the opposition, for a time a very small one, to the government of which my hon. friend was a distinguished and prominent member, we were delighted when we heard read from the Throne by the Lieutenant Governor sentences telling how prosperous the province was, and how well off the people were, all due to the good government that my hon. friend was giving to the people at Fredericton, and to the good government my hon. friend the leader of the opposition was giving to the people here at Ottawa. I am surprised too because, during the last two years ending on the 21st of September last, my hon. friend, whenever he came to the city of St. John, never made a public speech without pointing out how immensely prosperous the province was, due to the legislation and the policy of the Liberal party at Ottawa; and day after day the St. John 'Daily Telegraph,' which advocates the cause of my hon. friend, kept pointing out, right up to the 21st of September, how prosperous the people were, and that was one reason why they should keep the government in power. Therefore, I am surprised at the position taken by my hon. friend to-night. I suppose it is due to the fact that when sitting in opposition we look through different glasses from those we look through when sitting on the treasury benches; but I would have thought that the optimism and the sanguine temperament of my hon. friend would not have led him in so short a time after he had left the treasury benches to make such utterances about his province. I dispute those utterances, because, while we are not making much increase in population, while the attractions of the west are taking away too many of our sons, I do not believe that man for man there can be found in any other province of Canada a greater degree of happiness than is to be found in the province from which my hon. friend and I come, in which we were born, and in which we shall probably spend the rest of our days.

Passing from that, the hon. gentleman has gone into a long discussion of the result of the election in the province of New Brunswick. I have been somewhat surprised at the position taken by my hon. friend. A gentleman of sanguine temperament, he has always possessed the gift of extracting sunbeams from cucumbers, and he has done that to-night on that subject. The hon. gentleman went into that election with everything in his favour, having at his back eleven members out of thirteen, and a government apparently strongly intrenched in power, a government that many people thought could not be defeated. The hon. gentleman had a strong and powerful support in New Brunswick, and two weeks before the election he stated that his own majority in St. John would probably be from 1,500 to 2,000 and that the Liberals would probably carry every seat in the province. The hon. gentleman now comes with his majority reduced from 1,500 or 2,000 to 61, and says that he had a reasonably large majority, and he exults in the fact that of thirteen constituencies eight elected Liberal members to this House.

But the hon. gentleman forgot to tell the House that two of the gentlemen who were elected as Liberals were elected by majorities of ten or eleven votes, and that the aggregate majority of four of the Liberals returned was less than 150 votes. Considering the fact that the hon. gentleman had every advantage, that he was a member of a powerful government, that he considered that the reciprocity pact would be a powerful factor in his favour, the hon. gentleman has little to boast about in the result of the elections in the province of New Brunswick on the 21st of September last.

Now my hon. friend tries to minimize the effect of what took place in the province by saying that the economic question was not discussed.

It seems to me that one of the principle reasons for the hon. gentleman opposite moving this amendment to the address in reply to the speech, and for the remarks made by hon. gentlemen opposite, has been to try to make it appear to this House that the people of this country, in the verdict they gave on the 21st of September last, were not actuated by high and lofty motives, not by motives for the preservation of their country and the expansion of its trade, but by narrow and bigoted sectarian feelings; and the whole purpose and object of the amendment, and of the debate upon it from the other side of the House has been to set race against race and creed against creed. One hon. member tells us that the election was the result of passion and prejudice, and a reflection is cast on the three gentlemen of French Canadian birth from the province of Quebec, because, forsooth they entered a cabinet in which my hon. friend the present premier and my hon. friend the Minister of Trade and Commerce, and my hon. friend the Minister of Militia, and others are members. They are told in effect that they are not loyal to their race for doing this. That is intended for consumption in the province of Quebec.

Mr. MACDONALD. Who was it made that remark?

Mr. HAZEN. That is the effect of every speech made on the other side of the House.

Mr. MACDONALD. Nobody made that remark, and you made it up yourself.

Mr. HAZEN. Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for Pictou has been in this House longer that I have, but I trust that I shall be in the House a long while before I offend the amenities of debate by such a remark as that just made. On the other hand, members from the province of Ontario are told in effect that they should not be members of a government containing three gentlemen from Quebec who are held up as being Nationalists. That is intended for campaign purposes in the province of Ontario. But it is a dangerous weapon to play with. I am surprised at those hon. gentlemen taking exception to men sitting in the same cabinet who on certain questions in the past may not have seen eye to eye with each other. I look back to the campaign of 1896, when in some provinces hon. gentlemen who belonged to the other side of the House were stating that they were opposed to the Remedial Bill because it did not go far enough to do justice to the minority in Manitoba, while in other provinces men were opposing it because they thought no remedy at all should be given to the minority; yet when the elections were over gentlemen who held these divergent views became members of the same cabinet, sitting side by side at the same council board, and discharging their duties to their country as members of the government.

Mr. HAZEN.

The hon. member for Carleton (Mr. Carvel) has stated that in the province of New Brunswick there was not a proper discussion of the economic features of the reciprocity pact.

The hon. gentleman has stated that he would speak for the maritime provinces in that respect. I challenge the hon gentleman's right to speak for the maritime provinces. The hon. gentleman, in that campaign, was outside his own constituency very little; he was kept very busy there. I challenge the correctness of that statement. During the campaign I spoke in almost every county, if not every county in our province; in every county I think in Prince Edward Island; and in one or two counties in the adjoining province of Nova Scotia. I have been taking part in political campaigns in my own province ever since the year 1882, and I say without fear of successful contradiction that during that time I never knew of a campaign where the discussion was kept down to one issue as it was in the campaign which closed on the 21st day of September last. I never knew of a campaign where so few side issues were introduced as in the campaign which has recently closed. Further than that I say to this House with all sincerity that I have never known a campaign where there was so little attempt to introduce questions of sectarian or of racial character as during the campaign in the province of New Brunswick in the month of September last. Wherever public meetings were held there was one subject and one subject only which electors wanted to hear discussed, and that was the reciprocity pact. I never in my experience saw such large meetings as there were in our province, and I never addressed meetings to which so many Liberal electors came as to the meetings that were held during last September. On all sides there was a desire to hear a free and full discussion regarding the reciprocity pact negotiated at Washington by the representatives of the Canadian government; and the longer that discussion went on—and it was discussed from every possible standpoint, from the trade and economic standpoint as well as from the sentimental, national and moral standpoint—the longer that campaign went on the more strongly I believe the idea was borne in upon the minds of the different business interests of our country, upon our lumbermen, our fishermen, and our farmers—that they did not want that compact with the United States, not only for sentimental and loyal reasons, but because they believed it would have the effect of unsettling a condition of affairs which was satisfactory, under which they were getting large prices for their products, and under which they were more prosperous than they had ever been at any time in the whole history of Canada. But my hon. friend from the city of St. John (Mr. Pugsley) seemed to be horribly shocked because there was some appeal to the loyalty of the people, because there were those who honestly—either mistakenly or not it may be—who honestly believed that the result of that pact would be to give the commercial control of Canada to the people of the United States, to give them the control of our fiscal system, and in time to bring our political system under their control also. My hon. friend sitting opposite was shocked because in the city of St. John that issue was raised by some gentleman who sat on a public platform. I am the more surprised at this, Mr. Speaker, because I read a short time ago an extract from the report of a speech which my hon. friend made in the city of St. John at a banquet given to the Hon. John Costigan when he was a member of the Conservative government of Canada. And in that speech my hon. friend from the city of St. John took the opportunity of saying that it would be more manly for my hon. friend the leader of the opposition to declare for annexation at once than to declare for unrestricted reciprocity with the United States. Now, Sir, if unrestricted reciprocity in the mind of my hon. friend then—I will get the extract and send it over to him if he would like to see it—if in the mind of my hon. friend at that time unrestricted reciprocity would lead to annexation with the United States, does he see anything wrong, does he regard it as a very criminal act, that with respect to the reciprocity compact that view should be put forward for the consideration of the intelligent electors of the country?

Mr. PUGSLEY. Will my hon. friend allow me to ask him one question?

Mr. HAZEN. With pleasure.

Mr. PUGSLEY. At the time that I am reported to have made those remarks with respect to reciprocity, did not my hon. friend in this very House advocate reciprocity in natural products just as was proposed by the late government?

Mr. HAZEN. If the hon. gentleman will look at the speech which I made in this House in the year 1891, when I had the honour of moving the address in reply to the speech from the Throne, my hon. friend will find some remarks in that speech which I think will justify him in asking the question which he has put to me. But surely my hon. friend realizes there is a difference between the condition of Canada in 1911 and the condition of Canada in 1891.

Mr. PUGSLEY. We had a flag, and we had an empire in 1891.

Mr. HAZEN. Yes, we have a flag and an empire, and we propose to keep that flag.

Mr. PUGSLEY. So we had in 1891.

Mr. HAZEN. My hon. friend thought it desirable to-night to mention to this House a story that somewhere or other someone had said that my hon. friend opposite (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) was responsible for passing the ne temere decree, that he had introduced a Bill to the House for that purpose. My hon. friend must have a very low idea of the intelligence of the Canadian electorate if he imagines that a story of that sort, if indeed it was ever told, would affect a single vote in Canada. It would be almost as justifiable for me to tell the story here that was said to have been told—it may not be any more true than the one about the Ne Temere decree—a story that was told in a county in my province,in a district where the inhabitants are Acadians. It was said that a speaker went down there, and from the public platform made this statement: That if my hon. friend here (Mr. Borden) was called upon to become premier of Canada the result would be that the next occupant of the Vatican would be a Protestant. The one story is just as true, or just as false as the other. One would have just as much effect as the other. It is an insult to the intelligence of the Canadian people to imagine that any such story would have ever so slight an effect upon their votes, or the formation of their judgment.

Now, Sir, my hon. friend was not very candid, I think, in the attempt he made to have this House, and the country believe that the attitude of my hon. friend the leader of the House with regard to the improvement of the highways in this country was brought forward for the purpose of influencing the local elections in the province of Ontario. Why, the hon. gentleman ought to know—surely he does know—that that amendment was one of the planks in the platform, or the manifesto, which my hon. friend the Prime Minister submitted to the people of Canada for the elections held in September last. The hon. gentleman knows that at that time there was no thought of dissolution, I presume there was no thought then, or no idea then that there would be local elections at the present time, in the province of Ontario. And yet my hon. friend would try and have this country believe that my hon. friend the leader of this House took the course he did with regard to the improvement of the highways of the country for the purpose of influencing elections that were never thought of at that time, elections that no man knew or had any reason to suppose would be brought on at an early date. I regret very much that this plank in the government's platform is not receiving the enthusiastic support of my hon. friend who comes from the city of St. John. Not only was this plank in the platform of the leader of the government, but it was referred to in the speech delivered by His Royal Highness from the Throne on the day parliament was opened. At the very first opportunity that was afforded to the Prime Minister he gave evidence of his bona fides by informing the House that a Bill would be introduced for that purpose at this session of parliament. That Bill will be introduced, and I am afraid my hon. friend, who to-night is giving evidence of possessing such an inquiring mind will have to possess his soul in patience for a little while until the measure is brought down. Then he will be informed of its details, and I hope the Bill will have his enthusiastic support.

But my hon. friend seems to sneer at the idea, no he does not sneer; that is not his way, but he does not seem to regard with favour this proposition. I am surprised that my hon. friend, who was so long in local politics should take that course. I remember that the present lieutenant governor of the province, speaking in the assembly, when he was Premier said that it was a matter of regret to him that gentlemen who had been members of provincial administrations, when they went to Ottawa seemed to forget that they had ever belonged to provincial administrations and to forget the interests of the provinces from which they came. Surely my hon. friend is not going to allow himself to be placed in the category in which so many were placed by the lieutenant governor of New Brunswick. The hon. gentleman knows that if a policy of this sort could be worked out wisely, nothing would conduce more to the prosperity of the country. He knows how difficult it is to maintain good highways throughout the country; how with the climatic conditions we have to fight, with long stretches of country in which the highways have to pass through woods in which no people were living, it is very difficult for the provinces with their limited resources to maintain good roads. If a policy of co-operation can be worked out that will have the effect of improving the highways of the country, I am sure that no policy will be more popular.

Then the hon. gentleman found fault with the speech because, he said, no reference was made in it to what was to be done with regard to the ports of the country. What, he asked, is to be the policy of the government with regard to the ports of St. John and other ports? And the hon. gentleman himself showed that he had a complete answer to his question, because he took from his desk and read the telegram sent by the Prime Minister in September 19, and published in the 'Standard' of St. John —and I am delighted that my hon. friend reads the editorials in the 'Standard' so closely as he does; I trust he will profit by doing so. That telegram laid down the policy of the Prime Minister, because he reaffirmed the position he took in parliament on the 5th April, 1904, when he declared by resolution that the public interest demanded a thorough and efficient equipment of all ports on the Atlantic and Pacific. That, said telegram of my hon. friend the leader of the government, has ever since been the policy of the Liberal-Conservative party and has been so declared on repeated occasions. The thorough and efficient equipment of St. John harbour is part of our policy. I desire to emphasize what I declared at St. John on September 5, namely, that the defeat of the Laurier Government will not retard, hinder or prevent in any way the construction of terminal facilities at St. John, or the equipment and development of that port as one of the Atlantic national ports of Canada. That is the policy of my hon. friend (Mr. Borden) and that is the policy he will live up to. It is a policy that, I am satisfied, will prove most acceptable and satisfactory, not to the people of St. John alone,—because the work in the harbour of St. John should not be regarded as a local work any more than the work in the harbour of Montreal should be so regarded—but to the people of Canada generally. It is a work undertaken that the traffic of this country, conveyed to the ocean ports by our systems of transportation, may pass out through these ports having the best of facilities for handling it expeditiously, economically and well, to Europe and other parts of the world. I feel satisfied that the members of this House will view with the greatest possible pleasure a generous expenditure for putting the ports of this country into such a condition that they can do the business that may be brought to them in a way not surpassed by the ports of any other country in the world.

The hon. gentleman (Mr. Pugsley) spoke as if there was something improper in my hon. friend (Mr. Borden) sending this telegram on that occasion, so soon before the election. He knows the reason why it was sent. The press supporting the hon. gentleman in St. John, and the speakers supporting him on the platform, day in and day out had been declaring that if the government were defeated the result would be that no work would go on in the harbour of St. John. Could my hon. friend (Mr. Borden) have allowed that statement to go unanswered? He took the course that anyone would have taken and sent that telegram. I am surprised at my hon. friend objecting to the sending of a telegram at election time. If there is any hon. gentleman who has used the telegram as the means of securing political support it is my hon. friend (Mr. Pugsley). For years there was hardly an occasion when my hon. friend addressed a political meeting that he did not at a very opportune moment receive a telegram which he read to the audience. I think I did hear once in the House of Assembly that one of these telegrams dated in New York or Boston and purporting to be sent by a Mr. Leary who was going to build a dock in St. John was actually prepared in St. John, by my hon. friend himself and Mr. Leary had not even seen it. So I am surprised that my hon. friend should think that the sending of a telegram was not fair political warfare.

The hon. gentleman also referred to the acquisition of branch lines for the Intercolonial railway. Well, why should not my hon. friend the leader of the government send a telegram to Mr. Fowler, then candidate in Kings and Albert, telling what his policy would be on that subject, in view of the fact that the question of buying branch railways has done service for my hon. friend and the party to which he belongs during the last two or three elections in the province of New Brunswick, and in view of the fact also that the people were told that no branch railway would ever be sold unless they returned the late government to power and elected my hon. friend to the House of Commons.

Mr. PUGSLEY. Will the hon. minister pardon me?

Mr. HAZEN. With the greatest pleasure.

Mr. PUGSLEY. I think that the hon. gentleman misunderstood me. My complaint was not so much that the Prime Minister had sent the telegram but rather that no reference to the matter appeared in the speech. My idea was that if the policy had been determined upon as shown by the telegram, it was due to parliament to make hon. members acquainted with the policy of the government in reference to a matter of such importance.

Mr. HAZEN. Perhaps the leader of the government will take the hint, and if, in future, he sends a telegram upon such a subject, he will have that telegram set out in full in the speech from the Throne.

I do not propose to follow the hon. member (Mr. Pugsley) in his discussion of the reciprocity pact. That question was fought out and the people gave an emphatic answer. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Pugsley) has regaled the House by repeating at considerable length the arguments he advanced in favour of reciprocity during the campaign in the province of New Brunswick. Rightly or wrongly, the people who were the judges of the issue, pronounced against the pact. While he has stated that the hon. member for South Wellington (Mr. Guthrie) did not say last night that reciprocity is dead, I would like to read him the report of that hon. gentleman's speech as I find it in the copy of 'Hansard' lying upon my desk:

> And why should it lead to annexation? Can anybody tell me that? This reciprocity proposal is dead, but can anybody tell me now why it should have led to annexation?

Hon. gentlemen opposite do not seem to have quite got together on this reciprocity pact. The idea of the hon. member for South Wellington seems to be that this issue will not be raised again in Canada. But I judge from the speech of my hon. friend (Mr. Pugsley) and also from that of the hon. member for Carleton (Mr. Carvell) that these hon. gentlemen propose to try to galvanize it into new life. I can only say that I hope they will be successful in making it an issue in another election in Canada.

Now, I pass from matters of that sort to say a few words with regard to criticism levelled against this government because it has not declared in the speech from the Throne what its policy on the naval question will be.

I think hon. gentlemen opposite might fairly give the government time to bestow proper consideration on a great question of this sort. It is a question, it seems to me, that requires the most careful consideration at the hands of the government and at the hands of the members of the House of Commons. It is a question which is going to involve a tremendous expenditure to the people of this country, and I think it is the desire of all Canadians that when a naval policy is embarked upon, it shall be one that will conduce to the welfare of Canada and the strength and maintenance of the British Empire.

Now, Sir, my hon. and respected friend the leader of the opposition said that the old government had a well defined policy on that subject. The policy may have been well defined, but I submit to this House that it was not well considered, because the policy which they embarked upon and laid before this House was one which, if it had been carried to a conclusion, would have resulted in the expenditure of an enormous amount of money with little or no advantage to Canada or to the empire. Let me say that there is evidence that the hon. gentlemen themselves must have come to a conclusion of that kind. We find that in the month of February last tenders were asked for the construction of four cruisers of the 'Bristol' type and six torpedo destroyers. Those tenders were received on the 1st day of May, 1911, five months before the government went out of office; yet during the whole of that time, apparently, the government did nothing with regard to those tenders. Now, Sir, why was it, if the government were convinced of the wisdom of their naval policy, that they did not, on receipt of those tenders, award the contract for the construction of those cruisers and destroyers? Why did they wait for five months, until they went out of power, without having taken a single step in that direction? There were nine tenders. There was the tender of Cammel, Laird & Company, which was the lowest, for $11,280,000. There was the tender of Swan, Hunter & Wisham Richardson for $12,174,000. There were other tenders, ranging from the lowest already mentioned up to $13,055,804. Those tenders did not include the armour plating, the armament, and certain supplies that go with warships of this sort, and which would have considerably augmented the cost.

Now why did the late government, after embarking on that policy, after receiving those tenders on the 1st day of May, allow them to remain in abeyance without taking a single step towards making a contract for the building of those ships? Was it because the hon gentlemen discovered afterwards that if they had done so they would have simply been throwing away about $15,000,000 of the people's money? Because the fact is, and I have evidence that cannot be contradicted, and which I am prepared to give this House at any time if my statement is challenged, that those vessels, under that contract, and under the conditions therein contained would not have been completed for six years from the time the contract was awarded, and by the end of the six years those vessels would have been obsolete, entirely unfit for the purposes for which they were designed. I cannot help concluding, therefore, that the late government, after issuing a call for those tenders, discovered the actual facts which I have just stated. Therefore, they did not award the contract for the construction of those ships, but they allowed the matter to stand. When the present government came into power, and when I, as Minister of the Naval Service, began to look into that question and found the facts I have just narrated to this House, I would have been entirely failing in my duty as a Minister of the Crown if I had advised my colleagues in the Council and the Governor General to sign a contract for the construction of those ships which, by the time they were completed, would have been obsolete and valueless for the purpose for which they were intended. Under these circumstances, Mr. Speaker, I think the people of this country will approve of the action of this government in hesitating before rushing hastily into a policy which must involve an expenditure of so many million dollars every year. I think they will appreciate the course of this government in doing what was stated by the Prime Minister in his admirable speech in reply to the right hon. leader of the opposition, when he said it was the intention of the government to consider with the English Admiralty this whole naval question from first to last. When we have done that, I think we will be able to come before this House and this country with a policy that will appeal to all Canadians as a policy that will be the best for the people of Canada and the best in the interest of the empire in which we live. Mr. Speaker, I will not trespass further upon the attention of this House. Many years have passed since I had the honour of holding a seat in this House, and I want to thank the hon. members, and you, Sir, for the kindly attention which has been accorded me on my return to it.

Mr. MACKENZIE moved the adjournment of the debate.

Motion agreed to.

On motion of Mr. Borden, the House adjourned at 11.05 p.m.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

WEDNESDAY, November 22, 1911.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Two o'clock.

RAILWAY ACT AMENDMENT.

Mr. TURRIFF moved for leave to introduce Bill (No. 6) to amend the Railway Act. He said: The object of this Bill is to compel the different railway companies to submit any special tariff as well as any regular or standard tariff to the Railway Commission before it becomes operative. At present the general or standard tariffs have to be submitted, and to receive the approval of the Railway Commission before they can be put in force, but any special tariff can be put in force or they can raise the rates of a special tariff without consulting the Railway Commission further than to give them thirty days' notice after which the amended tariff goes into force, and then no action is taken by the Railway Commission until somebody who suffers brings a case before them. The object I have in introducing this Bill is that the special tariffs as well as the standard of general tariffs should receive the authority of the Railway Commission before becoming effective.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the first time.

LABOUR CONDITIONS IN BRITISH COLUMBIA.

On the orders of the day being called.

Mr. G. H. BARNARD (Victoria, B. C.). I wish to call the attention of the Minister of Labour (Mr. Crothers), and of this House to an article which appeared in the Toronto 'Saturday Night' of November 18, 1911, referring to a class of the community in the province which I represent, a class largely represented in the city from which I come. The article refers to labour conditions in the province of British Columbia, and the contention of the people of British Columbia that the country should be reserved as a white British Columbia. The words to which I wish to direct the attention of the Minister of Labour, are as follows:

> The capitalist who is carrying on great enterprises out there claims that it is impossible to go forward without Oriental labour. According to his statement of the case, the white man of the coast is a loafer. He makes the excuse that he will not work alongside a Chinaman or a Hindu; but, says the employer of labour, the truth of the matter is that he objects to work altogether. On the coast the problem of union labour is a much more serious one than in the east. Labour organizations out there are chiefly in the hands of crooks and blacklegs whose favourite weapon is dynamite. The arrogance of these worthies knows no bounds, and in the elements which go to make a useful member of the community, they are distinctly inferior to the average Chinaman.

Mr. Speaker, I feel that that is a statement which cannot be allowed to go uncontradicted and I feel that the contradiction should, if possible, have as much publicity as the article in which the statement was made. It makes one wonder that a decent journal would condescend to publish such utter trash, which is absolutely without any foundation in fact.

Mr. SPEAKER. I would remind the hon. member that it is not in order for him to make a speech at this stage; he is only at liberty to ask a question or to bring the matter to the minister's attention.

Mr. BARNARD. I propose, with your permission, to ask a question of the Minister of Labour. I was proceeding to say that the people who compose the labour unions in British Columbia have as full a sense of their responsibility of citizenship and are as self-respecting and as respected as any other class in British Columbia or in any other part of Canada. I wish to ask the Minister of Labour if he knows of anything on the files of his department which would justify the statement that the weapon of the labour unions of British Columbia is dynamite or that the membership of those unions is composed of blacklegs and crooks, and I wish the minister, if he can conscientiously do so, to give his absolutely unequivocal and official denial of that statement.

Mr. CROTHERS. I can only say that I am not aware of any information in my department which would warrant the statements objected to by my hon. friend.

COAL SUPPLY OF THE WEST.

Mr. McCRANEY. I have here a copy of the extra of the 'Canada Gazette' published yesterday which contains the following order in council:

> AT THE GOVERNMENT HOUSE AT OTTAWA.
> Monday, the 20th day of November, 1911.
>
> PRESENT:
>
> HIS ROYAL HIGHNESS THE GOVERNOR GENERAL IN COUNCIL.
>
> His Royal Highness the Governor General in Council is pleased to order that the order in council of the 31st July, 1911, with reference to the remission and refund of duty on coal for use in eastern British Columbia, Alberta, Saskatchewan and Manitoba, shall be and the same is hereby revoked in so far as concerns the refund of customs duty on imported bituminous coal entered for duty on and after the 6th day of December, 1911.
>
> RODOLPHE BOUDREAU,
> Clerk of the Privy Council.

I wish to ask the government what, if any, information, they may have as to there being sufficient coal in store in the west now or by December 6 next, to meet the requirements of the coming winter?

Mr. MONK. My colleague the Minister of Customs (Mr. Reid) is unavoidably absent. I shall see that he gets my hon. friend's question and gives it immediate attention.

ADDRESS IN REPLY TO THE SPEECH OF HIS ROYAL HIGHNESS.

House resumed the adjourned debate on the motion of Mr. Bennett (Calgary): For an address to His Royal Highness, the Governor General, in reply to his speech at the opening of the session, and the proposed amendment of Sir Wilfrid Laurier thereto.

Mr. D. D. McKENZIE (North Cape Breton and Victoria). Mr. Speaker, permit me to join hon. gentlemen who have preceded me, in extending my congratulations to the mover and seconder of the address for the very excellent manner in which they discharged that somewhat difficult and exacting duty.

The speech of the hon. gentleman who moved the address was very extensive and very comprehensive. It covered a good deal of ground and dealt with a good many subjects. I do not at all, Mr. Speaker, find fault with anything that is contained in that speech. I think it is a very excellent one indeed, and one that will sustain the reputation of the hon. gentleman who delivered it. At about the commencement of his speech, making reference to the trade question upon which the late government went to the country, he made the statement that there was a danger to the empire in that question, that reciprocity in itself contained the germ of danger to the British Empire. That of course is a very strong and striking statement to make. That is, if a fact, a matter that requires consideration, and one that would require careful consideration from any party before they would go to the country and submit to the people any question containing anything that was dangerous to the empire or to the connection of this land with the mother country. If it be true that there is no danger to this country, a danger to the sacred ties that bind us to the mother country in reciprocity, my hon. friend must begin far back and begin in his own political family and make a great many corrections, for the most illustrious members of the party to which he belongs were strenuous supporters of reciprocity, and I am sure that if such men, as I shall mention in a few minutes, favoured reciprocity and received the support of this country while strenuously supporting it, the hon. gentleman was not well advised when he stated that there was danger to the empire in placing before the people such a trade policy as that submitted by the late government. I will read in support of my assertion a statement uttered in this House on his responsibility as a minister of the Crown by the Minister of Trade and Commerce, then as now a member of the cabinet. He of all men in this House is an Imperialist, extremely loyal to the institutions not only of this country but of the motherland, and I am sure that if the young member from the west who so ably moved this address is looking for an example and a guide in loyalty and true devotion to the empire, he cannot follow a safer guide than the hon. minister to whom I refer. What did Hon. Mr. Foster say ? Speaking in this House on the question of reciprocity, and rather defending himself and the government of which he was then a member from aspirations in regard to that policy, he said :—

The government is ready and willing to come to the aid of the country now and implement to the best of its ability this desire which is growing and stretching out from the true and solid basis of trade prosperity at home, in a foreign trade with other countries, so that we may compete with foreign countries in the different wares that we make and the different products that we raise. This country and this government has always been desirous of extending its trade to foreign countries. In all honesty and candour that can be maintained and it cannot be denied. No matter what government has been on the treasury benches, no matter what party has been in power, there has been a continuous and persistent attempt to cultivate better trade relations between this country and the United States of America in a reciprocity that should be fair and equally beneficial to both countries. The negotiations of 1866, of 1869, of 1871, and of 1888 all bear testimony to that.

That, Sir, is the evidence of a witness whose authority will not at least be questioned by hon. gentlemen supporting the government. About the same time and under similar circumstances we find Sir Charles Tupper speaking upon the same question in this House. What did he say :

But no matter how they may endeavour to confuse the public mind, the people understand that the Liberal-Conservative party, as a whole, are still ready to make a fair trade arrangement with the United States, whenever the United States are prepared to enter into such an arrangement. We have said, time and time again, to the government at Washington, we have said it in all the official correspondence, as these gentlemen admit, our plenipotentiaries have said it; and true to that policy we are not taking an attitude unworthy of Canadians; we are not taking a cringing attitude. I believe we will yet succeed in making a fair arrangement with the Republican government lately installed at Washington, and we will do it as men and as Canadians. Just as independent in Canada in reference to our future and our present as the Americans, to their credit, are independent in the United States.

That, Sir, is the position taken by Sir Charles Tupper about the year 1888. Hon. gentlemen opposite will say : Oh, that is long ago. That is evidence that we cannot recognize as applying to the conditions of to-day. Well, Sir, if that be so I will quote the evidence of the Minister of Trade and Commerce not later than December, 1910, long before a general election had been determined on, before party strife had come to the heat which it attained during the recent contest, and when the hon. gentleman in question was calmly dealing with the question in an article in the University magazine. What does he say ? He is writing as if he were addressing himself to the American people or to an American citizen of the republic.

We owe you much. We admire your enterprise and your wonderful growth, and sympathize with the efforts you are making to grow rightly and develop the best forces of a great democracy. We covet your virtues and try to avoid your faults, individual, municipal and national. If we can make easier channels for trade between the two countries, consistently with the above conditions, we will be glad to co-operate. Meanwhile, as a neighbourly beginning, could you not give our products tariff entrance to your markets at the same rates which we accord to yours in our markets? You are bigger, older, richer, more skilled and more populous. What competition should you fear on a basis of equivalent tariffs? If you were to do this it would be an earnest of good feeling and might dispose us to further converse.

That, Sir, is evidence of a very recent date from a gentleman who is supposed to understand the trade conditions of this country so well. If he had thought that there was any danger in the matter of reciprocity, as asserted by the hon. gentleman who moved the address, we do not suppose he would have given utterance to such language. Then not long ago we had the evidence of a man who for many years successfully led the forces of the Conservative party in this country, no less a man than the late illustrious Sir John Macdonald himself. What did that distinguished statesman say in his famous manifesto in 1891, when he was looking for reciprocity himself and when, in addition to that policy, other questions of a very vital character were before the people? The question of the loyalty of the people, the question of annexation was then put forward just as strongly as it is now. Knowing that that was in the air and was before the people, Sir John Macdonald in his manifesto said :

We said to the Americans, we are perfectly willing to deal with you upon equal terms. We are desirous of having a fair reciprocity treaty, but we will not consent to open our markets to you whilst yours remain closed to us.

Sir John Macdonald was not afraid that there was danger to the empire in reciprocity; he did not fear that the people of Canada under reciprocity would cross the line or that the institutions beyond the line would cross to us. The only obstacle to reciprocity that he anticipated was that the Americans would not give us access on fair terms to their country.

Now, I wish to give the testimony of so distinguished a Conservative as the late lamented Sir John Thompson, once a distinguished Minister of Justice and Prime Minister of this country. Sir John Thompson said:

I think I have said enough to show you that the government is favourable to a renewal of the reciprocity treaty or any enlarged trade relations with the United States, and that we have done all that it is reasonable to secure it.

On the question of the effect of reciprocity upon the loyalty of Canadians, we have the opinion, very tersely and very briefly expressed, of the Prime Minister of the day, Mr. Borden himself. Addressing a meeting in Montreal, in March, 1904—a meeting, I believe, under the auspices of the Manufacturers' Association, he puts to himself the question:

Is there any idea that reciprocity with the United States would in any way interfere with self-government in Canada?

And he answers himself.

No, there is not.

This was the hon. gentleman's expression of opinion at an important gathering, at a time when he was leader of the opposition in this House and knew that what he might say would be carefully watched and that he would be held responsible for his expression of opinion. Now, I am pleased to know that the Conservative party is wealthy in great men and wealthy in opinions in favour of the point I am making. I have here the opinion of the present Minister of Marine and Fisheries (Mr. Hazen). I am not in a position to state the exact date when that opinion was expressed, but it was when he was a member of the House before, and must have been about 1891:

The relations and interests of the people of the two countries which compose the northern part of this continent, are, in a commercial way, in a social way, and in a friendly way, closely interwoven in many respects, and I believe, that if a fair reciprocity treaty can be effected along the lines of the old treaty of 1854, it will be of considerable benefit to both countries, and that it will meet with favour from all parties in the Dominion of Canada.

This is the opinion expressed by the hon. gentleman (Mr. Hazen) coming from that great city on the Bay of Fundy, of whose extreme loyalty we heard yesterday. Nobody will suggest that the Minister of Marine and Fisheries would be a party to the expression of opinion in favour of a policy, however beneficial from the commercial standpoint, that would interfere with the loyalty of the people of Canada. The expression of opinion which I have just read as that of the hon. gentleman is a sane and consistent one, and is no doubt as sane and consistent to-day, and just as applicable to the conditions that exist now as it was to the conditions that existed then. Now, I have the opinion of another man. I cannot say that he was then, or that he is to-day, a shining light of the Conservative party. But I must say that he was one of their leading generals in the last election; and, whether they approved him generally or not, they were quite willing to take advantage of his prowess in winning for them the laurels of the last fight. I refer to no less a personage than the hon. Mr. Sifton. Speaking at a banquet in Fargo and in the presence of the famous Mr. Hill, who had spoken before him on the question of reciprocity, Hon. Mr. Sifton said:

I endorse all that Mr. Hill has said in favour of reciprocity. I am in favour of any treaty that would give the citizens of both countries equal advantages. Canada is ready to meet the United States on any fair proposition. First of all there must be a campaign of education in the states south of the border states. At present the administration at Washington feels that the sentiment of the country at large is against it.

The only difficulty that stood in the way of reciprocity in the opinion of Mr. Sifton in those days was that the sentiment of the people of the United States was against it.

Now, I think these statements prove, if proof were necessary, that the Liberal party was not alone in favouring reciprocity, but that the Conservative party also at all times had been in favour of it. And I venture to think that the Conservatives would be in favour of it to-day had they not found a way by which it could be twisted to their advantage from a political standpoint.

So far as the province of Nova Scotia is concerned, I must say, the question of reciprocity is still a live one. I must say to the House and to the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Foster), that in the maritime provinces we need something to revive and better trade conditions. It is a sad commentary that, while some twenty or thirty years ago Nova Scotia was entitled to twenty-one members in this House, under the working of our constitution, I am informed, after the next redistribution, we shall have only sixteen. I am sorry to say also that the province of Prince Edward Island and the province of New Brunswick are suffering in like manner. What is the reason? The reason is that our population is falling away, that our best blood is drawn away to the large centres because we have no inducement to offer these people to stay. But, what are our resources, what are our industries in the maritime provinces?

In the little province from which I come our great industries are fishing, lumbering and mining. We want encouragement for those industries. Certainly, we want the coal industry of Nova Scotia encouraged in every way that it can be done. We want the Minister of Marine and Fisheries to pay attention to the conditions in the River St. Lawrence, we want him as rapidly as possible to improve those conditions, and to make the navigation of that river as safe as possible, so that the transportation of coal from Nova Scotia to the different points along that river may be made as quickly, and as cheaply, and as safely as possible. We want the Minister of Public Works to open canals, we want him to enlarge the Welland canal, we want him to build the Hudson Bay railway, and we want him to build the Georgian Bay canal so that the vast mineral wealth we have in Nova Scotia may find its way to the west. In Nova Scotia we have an abundant and inexhaustible supply of magnificent coal for every fireside in Canada, and we want the River St. Lawrence to be improved; the canals to be opened, and the Georgian Bay canal to be built, so that our coal may find its way to the door of every man in the west, where coal in the west itself cannot be conveniently obtained. For these reasons, if we are to be shut off from dealing with our neighbours across the Bay of Fundy, with whom we could, I think, conduct a profitable trade in all we have to export from the provinces of Nova Scotia, New Brunswick and Prince Edward Island, if we are to be shut off from those markets, I impress upon the government the necessity of carrying out the projects of the outgoing government, which were intended to give us greater freedom of interprovincial trade.

I spoke a moment ago about the fisheries of the maritime provinces. I was glad to see from the observations made by the Premier himself at the banquet in Halifax, that he proposes to give some attention to helping along the province of Nova Scotia. What have we got in the shape of fisheries in Nova Scotia, and in the maritime provinces generally? It is not realized in the central parts of Canada, and even in Montreal and Quebec, how extensive are the fisheries of the province of Nova Scotia. We have a sea coast extending from Grand Manan in New Brunswick down to the shores of Quebec, of some 5,000 miles, extending three miles out into the sea, where we have the exclusive right. There is no other place in the world that possesses so large a territory of such wealth in fisheries. What are we getting from this wealth, Mr. Speaker? Practically nothing, because we are not equipped to handle that fish. We cannot send it to Quebec, to Montreal, to Ottawa, or Toronto, because we have not the facilities to do so. We are shut off by a tariff, which the present administration helps to maintain, we are shut off from our natural market across the Bay of Fundy. Now if this government does congratulate themselves upon the fact that they have succeeded in shutting out the fishermen in Nova Scotia and the maritime provinces from the markets of the United States, and that they are leaving that trade entirely to the New England states to make money out of it, I say that they are congratulating themselves at the expense of the interest of the fishermen of the lower provinces. We say that the government should take every means possible of improving the trade routes through which our products may reach the central parts of Canada, and that no money, no reasonable expenditure should stand in the way of making a complete success of the system outlined by the late government, by which our products were to reach the great markets of Canada at least as far west as Toronto, and possibly Winnipeg.

Now I want to point our that we lost a great opportunity when we shut out our fishermen from the markets of the United States. What are the conditions to-day? An American vessel and a Nova Scotia vessel are standing off three miles, we will say, from the shores of Cape Breton. They fish together, they load up their vessels together under exactly the same conditions, they go to the city of Boston, and what happens? If they have mackerel, which is found in great abundance along the coast, particularly at this time, and earlier, the American, with the same fish caught in Nova Scotia waters, goes into that market free. The Nova Scotian who has borne the same expense of fishing, in curing, and everything else, in order to put his fish in the best possible condition on the market, is compelled to pay a tax of $2 on every barrel that he has to sell. Sir, we want that embargo removed. We said to our people in Nova Scotia that it was the purpose of the late government to remove that embargo, and to make them give us free entrance to that valuable market. It is unfortunate that that policy was not endorsed. It did not go through, because it did not receive favour from those parts of Canada where the conditions were not fully understood. I venture to think that if any fisherman of Nova Scotia were to go to the people of Ontario and say to them: You have wheat, you have an abundance of wealth, you have good transportation facilities, and you can deal with your business in your own way. I have fish, but I have no market in Canada for that fish, but when I look across into the United States I see a market that will take any quantity of my fish. I ask you people of Ontario to permit me without any hindrance or encumbrance, to take my fish across to the other side. Now, Sir, I am sure that every reasonable elector in the province of Ontario would say to that man: Certainly, take your fish across, and sell it to the best advantage you can. That is what we wanted to do, but unfortunately we did not succeed. Therefore I ask this government to take such steps as will help us out as much as possible, and relieve us from the disadvantage under which we have been placed.

Now, I am pleased to find from the words addressed at the last sitting of the House by the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Monk) that it is the policy of the government to carry forward the projects entered upon by the outgoing government. I was glad to hear from the Premier that it is his intention to carry out the programme of the outgoing government in connection with public works in the city of St. John. I hope that there will be no partiality or sectionalism in connection with this matter. We have been endeavouring for the last five or six years to build breakwaters, to open harbours, and to help along the fishing industry of Nova Scotia, particularly in that part of it which I represent myself.

The same thing has been done in other places, but I am more familiar with what has been done in the county I represent. I hope, therefore, that when the Minister of Finance and the Minister of Public Works come to look over the estimates that were before the House last year they will see that amounts are appropriated for the building of breakwaters, wharves and harbours in the county of Victoria, Inverness and other parts of the Island of Cape Breton where the fishery is the chief industry and where these breakwaters and wharfs are necessary to enable the men in that particular part of the country to prosecute the somewhat hazardous calling in which they are engaged. When they come to think that they have deprived them of the opportunity of selling their fish in the best market, I hope they will come to the conclusion that there is at least one way in which they can make it more convenient and safer for our fishermen to catch the fish; that now that they have shut them off from selling their fish they will make it easier for them to go in and out, that they will build breakwaters to secure their boats from the storms and will improve the harbours where necessary to make them still more secure.

I am not familiar with the details of government procedure but I have no doubt that much of this business will come under the eye of the Minister of Finance. I hope when he comes to look over and possibly revise the estimates of last year he will not forget my observations in connection with the harbours and breakwaters that we were hoping to open for the fishermen of the county of Cape Breton, and in like manner that he will give consideration to all the appropriations that were proposed for works of this kind all along the coast.

There is also another matter along the line of the continuance of the policy of the outgoing government which was broached slightly yesterday, and that is in regard to railways. If the people of Nova Scotia, New Brunswick and Prince Edward Island are to have the advantages in connection with the fisheries that they ought to, they should and must have railway communication all along the coast touching at these fishing villages. Since I came first into this House seven or eight years ago I have been pressing upon the government, and with some success, that in the villages lying along the sea coast of Nova Scotia, where we catch our fish and where we wish to sell them at any time and under the best circumstances, we should have the advantage of railway communication. We have only communication by water for a comparatively short period. After the drift ice sets in or the ice forms upon the coast we cannot send our fish away at all. The result is that the price is kept down after navigation closes and advantage is taken of our fishermen and they are paid poor prices. I submit to the Minister of Railways and to the Minister of Finance that they cannot do anything that would be more gratefully received than to extend these railways which it was the intention of the outgoing government to do. I want to point out to the Minister of Railways and Canals that a branch line is being provided for the Intercolonial railway in my own county from a point on the Intercolonial railway called St. Esprit, going down to the county town of Baddeck, giving that county, after a hundred and fifty years of long and weary waiting, railway connection. A survey was made, $200,000 was put in the last estimates, seven-twelfths of that was passed by this House and tenders were called and were ready to be opened on the 12th day of last month. I hope the Minister of Railways and the government will see their way clear to go on with that work and not only complete it to Baddeck but to extend it further to the fishing villages throughout that part of the country. I trust that these observations will reach the ears and attention of the hon. gentlemen to whom they are addressed. I may possibly have an opportunity later on of calling their attention to these matters, but before they make up their minds as to what they are going to put into the estimates, as I hope that they have not yet fully made up their minds they will come to the conclusion that this item at least is one which should have a place in the list.

The hon. gentleman who moved the address (Mr. Bennett, Calgary) made reference to the benefits that the farmers were to receive from the present administration. I am glad to learn that the farmers are to be remembered. The only hope we have in Nova Scotia or the maritime provinces in overcoming this difficulty of the cost of living is to make farming more attractive than it is now, to bring men back from other callings to cultivate the soil and to be able to restore and to maintain the connection between the farm and the young life of the country. I am pleased indeed that the Minister of Agriculture is taking this matter in hand. But, I am sorry to find that the first public act in connection with farming matters in this country under the present administration is not encouraging. Down in the county of Guysboro a fertilizer of a certain kind is being manufactured in connection with the reduction of dog-fish. A very excellent kind of fertilizer is made there and it has been in much demand by the farmers of the counties of Guysboro, Pictou and Antigonish. I find that the present Minister of Marine and Fisheries has thought it proper to raise the price of that commodity from $20 to $28 a ton. That is not starting out very well to encourage the farmer. For years and years, during the time that this material was produced at the reduction plant, the farmers were getting the benefit. Now, we have the declaration from this government that they are going to help the farmer. Help him, how?—help him in getting his fertilizer by adding $8 per ton to the price. What is the reason that is given by the government for adding this $8 per ton? They say: We can get that for it in Boston. This government, when they have anything to sell themselves, are quite willing to trade with the United States, they are quite willing to take their commodity to Boston and sell it there, and they will make the poor farmer and the poor fishermen, who are not permitted to go there with their products by reason of the policy of this government, pay the Boston price for such commodities as the government have to sell. That is not fair treatment of the farmers who were in a position to take advantage of that fertilizer. I bring the matter to the notice of the Minister of Marine and Fisheries, as this thing may have been done without him knowing anything about it. If he does not know anything about it, if it is a matter of departmental detail put into effect without the knowledge of the members of the government, I direct his attention to it and I hope he will make a correction as soon as possible. I would also say to the Minister of Agriculture that I hope he will enter into some arrangement with the Department of Trade and Commerce by which these dog-fish reduction plants will be increased, because by such arrangement he will be able to kill two birds with the one stone; that is he will catch and kill the dog-fish, thus helping the fishermen in doing away with that pest, and, having caught the dog-fish, he will reduce them into fertilizer for the benefit of the farmer.

Fertilizer is perhaps a by-product, but at all events I believe that such a scheme as I suggest could be carried out with advantage to the fishermen, and the farmer, and I trust the Minister of Agriculture will be able to make some arrangement with the Minister of Marine and Fisheries by which this double barrelled machinery can be adopted. We are also promised in the speech from the Throne a scientific tariff. Well, the people of Canada are not so very particular whether the tariff is scientific or not so long as it suits their conditions. The present Prime Minister tried his hand at what I suppose he considered a scientific tariff in 1906 when he moved a resolution in this House calling for a tariff giving adequate protection. However, he was soon glad to abandon that kind of a tariff, because he found that what was adequate protection for A was not adequate for B, and what was adequate for B was not adequate for C, and that no two people could agree as to what adequate protection meant. But now, when the hon. gentleman is in power and responsible to the people for the tariff he wants to shirk his responsibility by shifting it on to a commission. We should consider very carefully before we remove from the government and the parliament of Canada any question touching taxation such as this is. The tariff is the taxation of the people, and all taxation should be crystallized into legislation by the members of this House, on the initiative of the government, taking full responsibility for their acts. The government, and the Minister of Finance especially, should hesitate before throwing from their own shoulders the responsibility in this respect which constitutionally rests on them; a responsibility which the Hon. Mr. Fielding for fifteen years took on with credit to himself, and with glory and advantage to the country which he so faithfully served.

Speaking generally of commissions I may say that the experience of the labouring men of this country under the eighteen years of Conservative rule and government by commission, was not of the happiest kind. The government of Sir John Macdonald appointed a Labour Commission about 1886, and its report was held out like a revolving lighthouse so that you could catch a glimpse of it when the elections were on, and the labour organizations were asked to see how beautiful it was, but the moment the elections were over the Labour Commission passed out of sight, and its beneficial results to the labouring men of Canada were absolutely nil. I hope the government of to-day, and the people of Canada will take warning that government by commission has in the past been a failure in this country. Last night I heard the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Monk) saying to the ex-Minister of Public Works (Mr. Pugsley): You did not follow out the dictates of your own commission, which I suppose would mean that if a Tariff Commission makes any proposition it is to be regarded as a policy of the government, and must be carried out. That makes me think that we have to be very careful as to what powers may be given to this commission, and as to the class of men who may be selected as members of it. I cannot understand how any Tariff Commission could be better equipped to deal with the tariff of this country than are the Minister of Finance and the Minister of Trade and Commerce, who have competent and trained officials to assist them. When, a few years ago, a proposition was submitted to reduce the number of members on the Railway Committee of this House, it was pointed out that if that committee would be made smaller its members would be more subject to influence brought to bear on them by the log-rollers who haunt the corridors of this parliament. It would be difficult for those who might endeavour to influence the framing of a tariff in this country to reach all the members of the House, as well as the members of the cabinet, but it would not be so difficult for them to get around two or three men on the commission who though they may believe themselves honest, may be fooled into making tariff regulations which would be inimical to the best interests of the country. For that reason, as well, we should be careful before launching on this new theory of a Tariff Commission.

Now, Sir, as to the amendment proposed by the right hon. the leader of the opposition, I have a few words to say. It is a surprise to hon. members on this side, and I venture to think it is a surprise to the more enlightened people of Canada, that no reference is made in the address to the naval policy of the government. Those of us who were in the House on the 29th of March, 1909, when the naval policy was launched by the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Foster) are quite familar with the policy of the opposition on that question. The Prime Minister of to-day has again and again declared what his policy was, and although he departed to some extent from what he regarded as the implementing of that policy, I am not aware that he ever departed from the policy he announced in seconding that resolution of the 29th of March, 1909.

That being the case and his policy having been well known to the people of Canada when he went to the country at the last election, I submit that that policy has been accepted by the people, that his naval policy has been accepted and that the people of Canada are willing that he should carry on that policy in his own way. They expect him to carry out the resolution that was passed on the day and date I have mentioned. There are many new members in this House and many people in the country who possibly do not know what the naval policy of the leader of the opposition at that day was, a policy which he has not forsaken so far as I am aware. The resolution was introduced by the present leader of the opposition (Sir Wilfrid Laurier), and was accepted with some slight changes by the present Prime Minister who voted for it and supported it. There has been no change in it, it was the policy of both parties then, and as far as I know it is the policy of both parties to-day. It reads:

This House fully recognizes the duty of the people of Canada, as they increase in numbers and wealth, to assume in larger measure the responsibilities of national defence.

The House is of opinion that under the present constitutional relations between the mother country and the self-governing Dominions, the payment of regular and periodical contributions to the imperial treasury for naval and military purposes would not, so far as Canada is concerned, be the most satisfactory solution of the question of defence.

The House will cordially approve of any necessary expenditure designed to promote the speedy organization of a Canadian naval service in co-operation with and in close relation to the imperial navy, along the lines suggested by the admiralty at the last Imperial Conference, and in full sympathy with the view that the naval supremacy of Britain is essential to the security of commerce, the safety of the empire and the peace of the world.

The House expresses its firm conviction that whenever the need arises the Canadian people will be found ready and willing to make any sacrifice that is required to give to the imperial authorities the most loyal and hearty co-operation in every movement for the maintenance of the integrity and honour of the empire.

That resolution, as far as I know, stands as the policy of the Premier and of the government to-day so far as the basis of operation is concerned. We would expect the First Minister (Mr. Borden) upon whose shoulders rests the responsibility of carrying forward this policy, to gather around him men who would be in sympathy with it. When that policy was announced the Minister of Inland Revenue (Mr. Nantel), speaking in this House, declared to the world that he was not in sympathy with that policy as laid down by his leader of that day. On the 21st of March, 1910, speaking on a Bill introduced to implement that policy he said:

I shall vote against the Bill because it involves the recognition of military imperialism, because it aims at having that principle recorded in our statute-books. I shall vote against the amendment because I do not admit that there is any emergency under the present circumstances. I do not wish to justify the motion of the leader of the opposition. I have just said that I am against it. But I believe, in all sincerity, that it does not involve such serious consequences as the government measure. It involves an expenditure not of $25,000,000, as stated by hon. gentlemen opposite, but of only 18 to 20 millions.

Then he goes on further:

The sub-amendment, which calls for a referendum to the people on a question of such importance, is the only proposal which meets with my full and entire approval.

Personally, I believe that the policy to be followed by Canada is, and will be for a long time to come, the policy which has been followed ever since 1863, admitted by British and Canadian statesmen such as Gladstone, Disraeli, Salisbury, Sandfield Macdonald, Cartier, J. A. Macdonald, Blake, Mackenzie, until the days of Chamberlain, and which is limited to the defence of our land, to the defence of the empire on Canadian territory.

The balance of the speech of the Minister of Inland Revenue (Mr. Nantel) is strong and shows clearly that he is opposed to any naval operations at all. He is asked at the close of his speech:

Mr. WILSON. Does the hon. member for Terrebonne intend to support the leader of the opposition (Mr. Borden) at the next election?

Mr. NANTEL. I may say in answer to the hon. member for Laval that on this side of the House we are free to differ from our leaders. We have opinions of our own. We stick to principles, in preference to mere expediency.

thus implying, of course, that whatever position his leader of that day, if he had a leader, took, was a matter of mere expediency, and that there was no principle involved, but he for his part was prepared to stick for principle, and had no use for expediency. The hon. the Prime Minister (Mr. Borden) took this hon. gentleman into his cabinet knowing well that he was a determined foe of any naval operations in this country or any support at all to the mother country, produced or paid for by the taxes of the people of Canada.

On January 12, 1910, the hon. the Prime Minister (Mr. Borden) made a speech on this question, a speech which does him credit. It shows that he was then firm upon the policy of aid to the British Empire and that he was determined, whatever others might do, that there was only one course open to him consistent with his manhood, his citizenship and his principles, to go right forward with the naval policy of this country. I would ask the attention of the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Monk) the Minister of Inland Revenue (Mr. Nantel) and the Minister of Justice (Mr. Doherty) to the opinion which the Premier then expressed, of men who would for a moment hesitate in coming to the aid of the empire, of men who would be prepared to accept the protection of the British navy, the British army and the machinery of government of the mother country, and contribute nothing towards its support. And they will learn that he regarded them as most contemptible kind of people and unworthy of any high office or position in this country. I make these remarks so that when they read the observations of their hon. leader they will know whom he has in mind and to whom he is making reference. The Minister of Inland Revenue in that speech states that he would not regard himself as bound to do anything to assist England in a foreign war. Yet the present Premier said on the 12th of January, 1910, which is a camparatively recent date:

How would it be possible for any man in this country to imagine that Canada could be at peace with any great naval power in the world if that naval power at that very moment was at war with Great Britain? The thing is absolutely inconceivable. The nations of the British Empire are separated by great stretches of ocean, the empire covers every continent in the world and these great nations are divided by vast distances, but upon the sea, any British navy, any imperial navy, must be one. The jurisdiction and power of our government and of this parliament over expenditure and over control in time of peace must be maintained. I frankly admit that we must maintain that principle in view of our autonomy, but in time of war the naval force of Canada, or the Canadian unit of the British navy, must be part of the British navy when engaged in the preservation and defence of this great empire.

The Prime Minister quoted also the words of the Secretary of State for Foreign Affairs, Sir Edward Grey, who in June, 1909, gave his views as to the necessity of the navy for the maintenance of the permanency of the empire, and said:

The navy is the common security of the whole empire. If it ever fails to be that it will be of no use for us to discuss any other subjects, and the maintenance of the navy in that position must therefore be the care not only of us at home but of the self-governing Dominions beyond the seas.

The Prime Minister went on to say in his speech of January 12, 1910:

Thus the control of the militia in war emergency is vested in His Majesty. So it is absolutely essential under the resolution of March last that the supreme control of the Canadian naval force shall be vested in one supreme authority in time of war, acting in the interests of the whole empire.

The Premier goes on to say:

An army takes twenty years to create and a navy half a century.

The speediest organization would not make our Canadian naval service effective in less than ten years.

Probably 15 or 20 years would be required; and the crisis, if a crisis is to be apprehended, will come and probably within three years.

I wish to pause here, Mr. Speaker, and point out that the Hon. Premier predicted at that time when the crisis would come. He said that it would possibly be within three years from the date at which he was speaking. If he spoke truly there is now only a year and a few months until the crisis shall arise, and I would ask the Minister of Marine and Fisheries and the First Lord of the Admiralty to become busy and put into operation as rapidly as possible a naval policy. The Premier continues:

If the Germans prove themselves the greater race, if they have greater resourcefulness, higher skill, superior organizing ability and more sincere and self-sacrificing patriotism, they are entitled to be supreme on the sea, as they are now on the land. We have no right to resent the challenge, but unless the ancestral blood flows less red in our veins we shall meet it with a heart no less firm than that with which our forefathers encountered the shock of the 'Invincible Armada.'

The Premier shows that a plebiscite is out of the question and certainly was not in his mind at that time. He further quotes Sir Edward Grey:

We must be prepared to defend our national existence under the conditions which are imposed upon us in our own generation. I am glad that it is not to us alone that this feeling is confined. I am glad that the colonies, such as New Zealand recognized that their national existence is one with us in this matter.

The Premier adds to this statement:

I am very sure, Sir, that there are a great many people in Canada, the vast majority of the people of Canada to-day, who devoutly wish that Sir Edward Grey, in making that statement, could have coupled the name of Canada with that of New Zealand and of the other overseas dominions.

He goes on to observe:

The mere circumstances that there are in Canada those who conscientiously object to co-operation in defence gives room for grave disquietude.

The Premier was very much disquieted at that time because such men as the Minister of Inland Revenue were giving voice in this House to different ideas and to what the Premier regarded as dangerous ideas. He says that it was a grave consideration that there were even a few gentlemen in this country who differed from his own policy on that question. Then he continued:

The mere circumstance that there are in Canada those who conscientiously object to co-operation in defence gives room for grave disquietude. I can understand the man who advocates independenec. In that case with ten thousand miles of coast line and a great seaborne commerce, we must of necessity become a naval power at enormously increased expense or else remain the plaything and laughing stock of the world. I can understand the man, if there be any such in Canada, who conscientiously advocates the union of this country with the great neighbouring republic, but let him remember that such a union would be followed by naval and military charges of from twenty to twenty-five millions per annum. I cannot, however, understand how any man receiving and accepting the protection of the British flag, the advantages of British citizenship, the safeguarding of our coasts, the security of our shores, the benefits and advantages of the diplomatic and consular service throughout the world, the talismanic protection of our flag, can reconcile it with our self respect to have every dollar of the cost paid by the over-burdened taxpayers of the British islands. We have the power to adopt that position if we choose, because our liberties which we hold as a right and of grace are in this regard absolute, but, with all respect for the conscientious opinions of others, I cannot conceive it to be a worthy or honourable course. It is not so much a question of our duties or obligations to the mother country as of our own honour and self-respect. I am the descendant of those who have never lived under any other than the British flag since it first streamed to the free winds of heaven. I am as profoundly and unalterably attached to British institutions and connection, and as ready to work, and if necessary to fight for them as any man in Canada. But if my country, one of the richest in the world in proportion to its population, should accept the humiliating, the degrading, the pauperizing position of receiving future protection and safety at the hands and cost of the British taxpayer without contributing one dollar in aid or assistance, I would say that the sooner the empire was rid of her the better for all. When the battle of Armageddon comes, when the empire is fighting for its existence, when our kinsmen of the other great dominions are in the forefront of the battle, shall we sit silent and inactive while we contemplate with smug satisfaction our increasing crops and products, or shall we pauper-like seek fancied but delusive security in an appeal to the charity of some indefinite and high sounding political doctrine of a great neighbouring nation? No, a thousand times no. There will be no such outcome. It may be that the Canadian people absorbed in the development of their marvellous natural resources have paid little heed to the wide world activities of the empire, and have realized but imperfectly the responsibilities and duties of their country as one of its greatest Dominions. But they do not lack the intelligence, the vision, the courage, the patriotism necessary to realize those duties and accept those responsibilities. So, if Canada be true to herself she will not fail in the day of trial, in the very forefront of the sister nations. But she must not stand unprepared. I say to my right hon. friend the Prime Minister, so far as my words have any weight with him: Go on with your naval service. Proceed slowly, cautiously and surely. Lay your proposals before the people and give them if necessary opportunity to be heard, but do not forget that we are confronted with an emergency which may rend this empire asunder before the proposed service is worthy of the name. In the face of such a situation immediate, vigorous, earnest action is necessary. We have no Dreadnought ready; we have no fleet unit at hand; but we have the resources and I trust the patriotism to provide a fleet unit or at least a Dreadnought without one moment's unnecessary delay. Or, and in my opinion this would be the better course, we can place the equivalent in cash at the disposal of the admiralty to be used for naval defence under such conditions as we may prescribe. In taking this course we shall fulfil not only in the letter, but in the spirit as well, the resolution of March last, and what is infinitely more important we shall discharge a great patriotic duty to our country and to the whole empire.

There is the position taken at such a recent date by the Prime Minister. But the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Monk) did not at all agree with that position. Immediately on the Prime Minister, then leader of the opposition, taking his seat, the hon. gentleman (Mr. Monk) arose in considerable heat, and said:

Everything, Sir, connected with the discussion of this all-important matter seems to be a surprise. For my own part, I little anticipated the turn which the discussion has taken this afternoon, and reasonably so, I think. It seems to me that, having taken the opportunity of expressing my view about this matter upon another occasion, I was entitled, in the ordinary courtesy which exists within the working of a party, to some indication that, upon this occasion, at the first reading of this measure, the party itself, as I understand it, would express its policy. I say that has been a surprise to me which, I think, I have not deserved. But, Sir, even under these circumstances, I would have been prepared to await the moment usually chosen for the discussion of the principle of a Bill to defend before the House, as I have defended outside of it—and intend defending in the future—my opinion in this matter. Unfortunately, expressions have been used which make it necessary for me to at once challenge certain statements that have been made.

He refers to the statements of his leader.

And let me say this further, Mr. Speaker: Although I have the misfortune to differ from many on this side of the House—and apparently from all on the other side—on this question, I consider that advantage gained in this country, where we enjoy those free institutions which we have been so earnestly invited to maintain and defend, in speaking of people who do not hold our own views as people without sense of honour, without self-respect. If that course is carried too far, those who have initiated such a mode of attack will be the first to suffer from it.

There is a clear threat that, unless the leader took care of himself he would be made to suffer by the Minister of Public Works; we do not know in what way, but let us put a generous construction on it and assume that it was simply in the way of politics—that is that the Minister of Public Works would give no assistance to the hon. gentleman (Mr. Borden) in politics.

Another question enters into this naval policy of hon. gentlemen opposite since the resolution was passed, and that is that nothing could be done by this country in support of the naval operations of the mother country until we are represented in Great Britain in some way or have a voice in the declaration of war. I need not be technical in this matter and say that the declaration of war is entirely for the King. Though we know that to be true, we also know that in practice, the King must consult his councillors before he declares war. It is not for me to know in what way these hon. gentlemen expected that Canada should be represented in the councils of the mother country; it is enough to know that that idea was declared in this House on the initiative of the Minister of Justice (Mr. Doherty). We heard nothing of this barrier to action, I think, until the hon. gentleman addressed the House on the Naval Bill. I have no quotation from his speech, but I recollect it well. It was then put forward in this House for the first time that we were to refrain from discharging our manly duty to ourselves and to our country—to use the expression of the present Prime Minister—until we are given representation in the councils of the empire. That may not come for some time, it may never come; but we have the declaration by the hon. gentleman who now occupies the position of Minister of Justice that nothing could be done by this country. No matter what might happen, even if the empire were going to pieces tomorrow by reason of the attacks from foreign nations—which God forbid—we must stand here and look on in an ignoble safety declaring in effect: We have wealth in abundance, we have men, we have capacity, we have opportunity, to help the mother country, but according to the Minister of Justice, we are forbidden to do anything until we have representation in the British parliament or otherwise according to a scheme to be developed. I submit that that is not sound principle, it is not sound policy. I submit that every part of this empire belongs to all of us. We belong to all, as all belongs to us. If Paul was right in talking about the faithful as 'brethren of the faith,' we equally are brethren of one great empire. A blow cannot be struck at one part of the empire, and leave the rest secure. An attack upon any part affects the empire from end to end, and if we fail to recognize this fact and act upon it, it is conceivable that such a calamity might happen as the wiping of the empire and its dependencies off the map. Still we have the Minister of Customs (Mr. Reid), the Minister of Inland Revenue (Mr. Nantel), the Postmaster General (Mr. Pelletier) and the Minister of Justice (Mr. Doherty) declaring that until machinery is perfected by which we are to have a say in the declaration of war and the announcement of peace, this country with all its wealth shall not take part in the empire's defence. Such a declaration is not worthy of this country or of this House. It is not in accord with the sentiments of the people of Canada. If the people understood the question, if the question were put to them fairly, they would certainly not endorse the course proposed. At the time of the South African war, our brave soldiers did not wait to inquire whether they had or had not a voice in the councils of the empire. They only knew that there was danger, that prowess, ability and high spirit were necessary for the empire's defence. On that they acted.

Canada is not less loyal to-day than it was then. The idea is that we are growing step by step, and getting more loyal as we grow in strength.

Now, Sir, I hold the Premier responsible for having introduced into his cabinet four men, three of whom are absolutely committed to the policy of rendering no help at all to the empire. The Minister of Justice says that he would not agree that anything should be done until a certain condition was met, which means in the present circumstances of this country, that nothing will be done at all. That is the condition we have in the present cabinet. Sir, the policy, principles and ideas of the Minister of Public Works were well known to the Premier when he delegated to him the authority to select the ministers from the great province of Quebec. He knew what his views were on the naval question, and what they were in the group of men that he has around him. The Minister of Public Works picked out a Minister of Justice whom he knew was of the same opinion as himself; he picked out a Minister of Inland Revenue who was on record here as speaking of Imperialism in the most hostile manner. Imperialism, he says, in this country is a danger, is a doctrine that distils like drops of poison among the people, and the most dangerous of all Imperialists are the disguised Imperialists, because they do not show their hand. That is the language found in a speech of the Minister of Inland Revenue in this House, somewhere about the 21st of March, 1910. Anybody who wants to read it will find it there, and will find I am not putting words in the mouth of my hon. friend, whom I very much respect. Now, Sir, how could the Minister of Public Works better carry out the task confided to him of serving the Nationalists, than to choose such men as that? There are not any speeches delivered in this House by the Postmaster General (Mr. Pelletier), but we find his speeches in the newspapers where he follows exactly the same line of thought as did the Minister of Public Works himself, as did the Minister of Justice (Mr. Doherty), and the Minister of Inland Revenue

(Mr. Nantel). So the whole Quebec outfit that is gathered into this cabinet are men holding exactly the same opinion as the Minister of Public Works himself. Now how could the Prime Minister expect to serve the loyal people of this country by taking such men into his cabinet? The people of this country are strongly in favour of the empire, they are in favour of doing everything that ought to be done in putting us in a position, from a naval standpoint, of defending ourselves, of defending the homes of those who are dear to us. The people of this country are unwilling to occupy the position of beggars and poltroons, such as were described by the Prime Minister himself in the speech I have just read. Is that the position he wants us to adopt when he gathers around him a cabinet composed of men who have clearly and distinctly declared themselves as opposed to contributing to the naval strength of the empire? Is the Prime Minister going to ask the people of Canada, by a plebiscite, to say whether or not they wish to bring themselves into the category of the men whom he described in this speech? He says that if this country is composed of men of that kind, the sooner the empire is clear of Canada the better, the sooner the cord is cut and the sooner she cuts adrift from the empire, the better will it be for her own reputation. Is the Prime Minister going to ask the people of this country, by a plebiscite, to say whether they are willing to put themselves into that category? So it would seem, if he is going to ask the people of Canada to say whether they are in favour of doing their duty or not. It would be just as reasonable for me to ask you if you are a murderer, or if you have been guilty of any other of the criminalities on the statute books of this country, knowing well what kind of an answer I should receive from you. It would be just as respectful for me to ask such a question as that, as it would be for the government of this country to ask the Canadian people if they are willing to sit down in idleness, in abjectness, if they are willing to continue to receive the protection of the British navy while refusing to contribute one dollar to its support. If that is a fit question to put to the people of this country, and if the people are so hide bound by partisanship as to answer it, then I am very much mistaken in the temper of the Canadian people.

Now, Sir, we had some explanation last evening from the Minister of Marine and Fisheries (Mr. Hazen) as to why he would not proceed with the navy scheme commenced by the late government. He said that if he went on with it now, the ships would become obsolete in six years.

Well, the Minister of Marine and Fisheries may be gifted with doublesight, he may be a prophet with powers beyond the ken of an humble individual like myself; but I do not see how otherwise he can say that the programme of the late government would turn out to be so utterly useless. The programme of the late government let him remember, was laid down by the British Admiralty. The plans and specifications were prepared only a few months ago by the best experts at the command of the British Admiralty. They knew the conditions in Canada, they knew we intended to build these ships in Canada, that was the policy on both sides of this House; and surely it is not to be supposed that they would have presented us with plans and specifications which which would be useless, for the construction of ships which would become obsolete in so short a time. They knew that Canada had no shipyards, and that the men taking the contract would have to get ready the necessary machinery and plant to build these ships, and does the Minister of Marine and Fisheries understand that the Admiralty placed in the hands of the late government plans that could not possibly be carried out with any advantage to the country? What evidence has he that these ships would not be useful and serve a good purpose when completed? Is it not necessary that we should make a start? According to the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Foster) we should make a start, going along gradually, and carrying out this undertaking like every other great undertaking that the Canadian people have assumed. The Minister of Marine and Fisheries had no right to say that we should not go on with this undertaking, if we are ready in other respects, unless he meant to put forward a subterfuge, unless he desired to throw dust in the eyes of the people, to put the thing off. If that be so, perhaps the answer of the Minister of Marine and Fisheries is as good a one as he could give. But there is this satisfaction to be got out of it, that the Minister of Public Works and his associates in the cabinet must understand from the speech of the Minister of Marine and Fisheries that they are not going to have it all their own way, there is going to be a navy, there is going to be a naval programme acceptable to the people of Canada, a policy that will be worthy of this great country. But there was a statement made by the minister to the effect that the outgoing government should have done something that they did not do, that they should have let the contracts. Now, let me point out to him that there was no opportunity for the late government to deal with this question. According to the Minister of Marine and Fisheries this is a question that requires thought, it is a question that must be dealt with with great care, it is a question in regard to which they must not jump to conclusions. If that be so they can better understand the position that the outgoing government was in. These tenders were received on the first day of May last, the Prime Minister and the Minister of Marine and Fisheries left for England on May 12, they left England on their return trip on the 3rd July and they arrived at Ottawa on the 11th. Parliament resumed on the 18th July and dissolved on the 29th. That is the answer that I have to give to my hon. friend the Minister of Marine and Fisheries to show that there was no time for this government or for the then Minister of Marine and Fisheries to consider those tenders. It is no answer that is satisfactory to the country, for the Minister of Marine and Fisheries to shift the burden of responsibility on the outgoing government. Even if they were mistaken in the course that they took then, even if they were not as active as they might have been, when he reads over the speech that his leader delivered on the 12th day of January, and finds that he says that the crisis may be three years, but it is going to come quite probably in three years, he will see that that only leaves him a short time, and that it behooves him to get busy and do his work regardless of what course may have been taken by his predecessors in office.

I submit, therefore, that the answers that were given us by the Minister of Marine and Fisheries are not such as should have been given to this House and the country on so important a question as to whether or not we are going to proceed definitely and shortly upon this question of establishing a navy in Canada. Are we going to take that manly position in the empire which we must take in order to be worthy of ourselves and worthy of our sires? I submit that there is the greatest justification for the motion moved by my right hon. friend the leader of the opposition and that there is every reason why we should put the facts before the people and give them to understand why it is that proper steps are not taken to place this country in its proper light as an important portion of the empire to which we belong. I, therefore, upon these grounds, and for these reasons, shall be pleased to support the amendment introduced by my hon. friend the leader of the opposition.

Mr. ARTHUR DE WITT FOSTER (Kings). Mr. Speaker, before proceeding to answer some of the rambling remarks that we have listened to for the last hour and a half, I would like to express my congratulations and the congratulations of the constituency which I have the honour to represent to the hon. the mover (Mr. Bennett, Calgary) and the hon. the seconder (Mr. Sevigny) of the address in reply to the speech from the Throne. I am sure that congratulations are due not only to the sister province of New Brunswick for having produced such a speaker as we listened to, but also the province of Quebec for having produced another speaker, a speaker who addressed us in a sister language. I think this House is to be congratulated upon having in it such able gentlemen and, lastly that the country is to be congratulated upon having such able men, with such a future before them to look after its interests when some of the older statesmen shall have passed on.

The hon. member from Cape Breton (Mr. McKenzie) who has just taken his seat opened his remarks by reading from a speech delivered by the hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Foster) a speech delivered by the hon. the Prime Minister (Mr. Borden), as well as from one delivered by the right hon. Sir Charles Tupper in reference to reciprocity some years ago, and the inference we might plainly draw from his remarks, or the inference that he wishes us to draw, is that these gentlemen had swallowed their principles. It seems to me that it would not be amiss for the hon. member for Cape Breton to look at his own position, in reference to his record particularly on the important question which was recently before the people of the Dominion of Canada. In the year 1909 he advocated a higher rate of protection on coal than that which we already had in Nova Scotia and the Dominion of Canada. He was then for higher protection, a greater chance for the home market, greater development for our own people under higher protection. But not six months later, what do we find? We find this gentleman swallowing his own principles and adopting the policy of 8 cents lower duty per ton on coal—lower protection three months ago, higher protection one year ago. I do not think we need any better example of how men, not only on the government side of the House, if such may be found, but on the opposition side of the House, will swallow their principles at convenient stages in the political history of the country.

During the last election in his own constituency he was interrupted by some of the miners by the question: How is this 8 cents a ton lower duty on coal going to affect us? What was the answer he gave these men?—work hard and put your trust in God. I submit that this is most excellent advice, but let us see for a moment if the hon. gentleman followed that same advice himself. If we look up the record of 'Hansard' we will find that he had appointed in that constituency some 109 fishery wardens for a certain particular time and that when the election came around we rather believe that he placed his faith and trust in them to a very much greater extent than he did in God.

I am somewhat surprised that he should deliver before this House a very lengthy dissertation upon reciprocity. One would think that he had some doubt in his mind as to whether the people of his constituency really believed that he was elected upon that platform or upon some other platform. I am bound to tell him that I believe that there is some doubt existing in the minds of his constituents and therefore he desires to place himself upon record in this House in order that his constituents and the country at large may have absolutely no doubt but that it was reciprocity that elected him. Grave doubts were entertained some few years previous to that, after the result of an election had been anounced in that self-same riding, as to whether or not it was a certain policy of the government that had elected him, or some other means. I refer to the time when a recount was refused to determine who was elected when in all probability if there had been a recount the result of the election would have been different.

In reading speeches in the 'Hansard' for the last few years, we have found our friends on the opposite side of the House quoting Sir John Macdonald.

They have been quoting the language of great Conservative statesmen to substantiate their case, but under no consideration would these gentlemen follow the advice and guidance of these Conservative statesmen when they ruled the destinies of this country. But now, they seek solace from the words of these men, words uttered when the conditions in Canada were entirely different from what they are to-day, and words which although appropriate at the time they were uttered, are not appropriate years and years afterwards. The hon. gentleman also went on to quote the Hon. Mr. Sifton as being in favour of a fair agreement between Canada and the United States, but the great difficulty was that Mr. Sifton and other enlightened Liberals did not feel that the reciprocity pact was a fair deal for Canada and, therefore, they felt it their bounden duty to oppose it. We were told during the campaign that the maritime provinces and particularly the province of Nova Scotia had been suffering for many years. Well, we have had a Liberal government in that province for close on thirty years, and I notice that every time the provincial elections come around these gentlemen proclaim from platform to platform that Nova Scotia is the most prosperous province of the whole Dominion, all of which they claim of course for their own excellent government. But, when they want something to say against the Conservative government at Ottawa they change their tune and proclaim that everything is going to blue ruin. In the month of June last when the local elections were being held every Liberal in Nova Scotia proclaimed the prosperity of the province, but two months later when there was an election for the Dominion House these very same men proclaimed that the province was going to dry rot, that it was stagnant, and that reciprocity with the United States was the panacea. But, Sir, I am pleased to say that we have very strong signs that there will soon be a change in the complexion of the provincial government of Nova Scotia. Gentlemen on the opposite side of the House have been telling us what a bad thing it is to see a coalition government, as they claim it is, formed at Ottawa, and they tell us that evil results are likely to flow from it, but their answer is to be found in the two recent by-elections in the province of Nova Scotia when the people unhesitatingly pronounced in favour of the Hon. R. L. Borden and his government, and against the moribund government of Hon. Mr. Murray. I commend this to hon. gentlemen who are so worked up over what they term the alliance between the various elements of the present administration here. The hon. member for Cape Breton (Mr. McKenzie) told us that we had no market for our fish, that we could not ship them to Montreal or to western Canada, and that reciprocity with the States was, therefore, most desirable for us. Has the hon. member (Mr. McKenzie) forgotten that the counties of Digby, Lunenburg, Queens-Shelburne, Annapolis and King's returned members opposed to this reciprocity pact? The hon. member from Cape Breton (Mr. McKenzie) would have this House believe that he and he alone has the right to speak for the fishing industry of Nova Scotia, and, that in the very face of the results of the elections in that province his dictum was to be paramount. I submit, Sir, that one of the supreme reasons why these counties rejected this agreement is that the people realized that the home market of the Dominion is the best market, and they looked to the future development of this industry under the able and efficient administration of that distinguished son of Nova Scotia who now leads the government. I would commend for the perusal of the hon. gentleman (Mr. McKenzie) the very able treatise on the fishery question written by the hon. member for Digby (Mr. Jameson) and in that treatise he will find food for thought and enlightenment as to the fishery industry of the province. Then, the hon. member (Mr. McKenzie) the very first time he gets on his feet as a member of the opposition, asks this government to build railways in eastern Nova Scotia in his own constituency. I have not a word to say against the building of railways in Nova Scotia; on the contrary I believe that if there is one part of the Dominion more than another that needs and is entitled to railway development it is that province of Nova Scotia. But Sir, for the last fifteen years we have needed railways, and during part of that time we have had a solid phalanx of eighteen Liberals from that province supporting the government, but what railways have they been able to get their government to build? The Eastern railway from Halifax to the Eastern part of the province has been made to do service at every election, and yet, to-day, the hon. member from Cape Breton has to rise in his place and plead with this government for railways when, for fifteen years, the government which he supported denied to the province the railway development to which it was justly entitled. Sir, the people of the maritime provinces have borne their share in the upbuilding of the northwest and we are proud of the great Canadian heritage we have there; we are proud that we produced men to send to the great Northwest to till its fertile fields and to help to consolidate into one great whole a Canadian nation under the folds of the Union Jack. We glory in the privilege of being able to do that in the province of Nova Scotia. I submit that that province has a right to make a demand on the men of the west and the centre of this Dominion and that these men will recognize that right and will come back and help us as we have helped them—reciprocity within the empire.

We have heard something about a scientific tariff. Some fun was poked at the scientific tariff mentioned by the hon. mover of the address in reply (Mr. Bennett, Calgary). I think on reflection it will be seen that the people of Canada said very clearly on September 21 that they did not like the scientific tariffs that were being dealt out by the late administration. The speech of my hon. friend (Mr. Macdonald) yesterday, was similar to one delivered in this House some eight or nine months ago. He repeated himself at least seven or eight times in his endeavour to make a case from very little material. He declared that the country was not satisfied that this alliance should take place between these two differing parts of the cabinet, the country wanted to know why and upon what terms an agreement was reached, what one had sacrificed and what the other had sacrificed. I would ask the hon. member for Pictou (Mr. E. M. Macdonald) if, when he was running his election in Pictou, he laid down a plank in his platform, and placed it before the Conservative electors, that in the event of Mr. Borden being called on to form a cabinet no man from the province of Quebec should be included in it? Did he ask the electors to vote upon such a question? Assuredly not. If he did not submit that to the will of the people, I ask what right he has to say that his constituents or the people of Canada want to know what was done here or there in the formation of the cabinet. I believe that what the country wanted to know was something of far greater importance than the remarks of my hon. friend, which were made for the sole purpose of stirring up hatred and placing one faction against the other. Is that the great ideal which my hon. friend from Pictou has been enunciating? I think the people of Pictou will be far more interested to know what the hon. the First Minister (Mr. Borden) has placed in the speech from the Throne, whether or not he has inserted in it those things which he promised to the people when he was in opposition. They will not ask us to plunge hastily into various problems that need some consideration, we have had too much of that sort of thing in the last fifteen years. They want to know if the Prime Minister is going to do what he has promised and whether he has announced that he will do so on the first opportunity that presented itself. The whole tendency of the remarks of my hon. friend from Pictou is to place one section of the community against the other. That is not the ideal for which we have been striving in Canada, that is not the ideal of the right hon. the leader of the opposition whether such statements are borne out by fact or not his constant effort was to coalesce all the various elements of the Dominion of Canada to the end that they may be united in one happy and contented people. In that, I think, the hon. member from Pictou may well copy the attitude of his leader, the right hon. the leader of the opposition.

But, if we look at the campaign in his own constituency, we find the hon. gentleman himself appealing to the sectional ideals and elements. He had printed a pamphlet setting forth the various things that would appeal to different parts of his constituency. One of his appeals was: See what I have been able to obtain for this county from the Liberal government. How much do you suppose he was able to obtain from the Minister of Public Works in the late administration for the county of Pictou? One million and fifty-eight thousand dollars' worth of public works. If you look at the next county, or the county beyond that, represented by a member of the opposition in the late parliament, do you find an expenditure of $1,058,000? I venture to say you do not. Then it comes back to this, that either there must have been urgent necessity in the county represented by my hon. friend, or else he must have been taking a certain sum of money which ought to have been distributed to the various counties in order that each might have its legitimate share. I submit that in either case he appealed to the selfishness of the people in asking them to return him to power, not upon reciprocity, but upon the cry: See what I can get for you. I can imagine that the hon. member for Pictou (Mr. E. M. Macdonald) would be somewhat sore in this new House, particularly when we find in that same pamphlet a little paragraph which reads that the hon. member for Pictou has been selected by his leader the Prime Minister to accompany him in his tour throughout the west, that he has been honoured. That would give you the impression that the Prime Minister thought he was head and shoulders above every other member on that side of the House, and he above all others was selected to go upon that tour. Not only that, but there was a subtle suggestion that if he was returned to power further honour would be placed upon him, and it was freely discussed and quite commonly understood in the county which I have the honour to represent that in case my opponent should go to England, the hon. member (Mr. E. M. Macdonald) would have been made Minister of Militia and so you see he himself was appealing from sectional standpoints to the cupidity of his constituents. I have read with some pleasure speeches which the hon. member has made but this one exceeds in repetition anything I have ever read in 'Hansard.'

We were told by the hon. member for St. John (Mr. Pugsley) that had this reciprocity pact gone through, the trade of the United States would come down through Canada. That seems to me to be a particularly new doctrine, because on our side of the province the argument was advanced by the Prime Minister, I think, that if this proposition went through trade would flow north and south like water through a mill-race. If that argument was sound, we must conclude that trade would flow towards the south. All trade and products must tend to find the shortest outlet to water communication and since the shorter route is via American ports therefore we are bound to believe that the Canadian trade would pass down through the American ports. What then would become of the ports of St. John and Halifax? What becomes of the great scheme which was laid down when introduced by the late government to build a national transcontinental railway from west to east.

What for? Not to carry the trade of Canada down through the United States, but to transport it east and west through the Dominion, and build up the great seaports of Montreal, St. John and Halifax. The railway has been started, and it is being built at tremendous cost, but the port of Halifax remains practically the same. Transportation was a great cry a few years ago, and the main topic upon which the late administration went to the people. They presented to the electors recently a proposition which tends to reverse the whole situation, and because the people of Canada would not stand for that particular scheme we are told they acted upon passion and prejudice rather than upon reason and sound common-sense. We were also told by the hon. member for Carleton, New Brunswick (Mr. Carvell), if I understood him correctly, that in New Brunswick there was nothing shipped but potatoes. Well, we have in the province of Nova Scotia more things to ship than potatoes. We were told that there was no market for lumber. Yet in New Brunswick and in Nova Scotia we have a market for our lumber, and the very lumber dealers of those provinces, or a great many of them, pronounced against this pact. Yet we are told we had no market and the country was suffering by reason of that fact. Sir, we have an excellent market in the West Indies for all the potatoes we can raise in the province of Nova Scotia, and I am speaking particularly of that province. I do not know what the conditions may be in Carleton county, but I venture to say they have a fairly good market for the things they can produce. This year in the province of Nova Scotia we had 1,250,000 barrels, if not 1,500,000 barrels of apples, and the county of Kings—one of the richest and best counties in the whole Dominion—has sent a very large proportion of that fruit from its farms. Where are we going to sell this fruit? We were told before the 21st of September that we should sell it on the other side, and would receive so much per barrel; but when a man was sent to the United States to ascertain the state of the market, and to let us know exactly what the conditions were over there in regard to the fruit industry, and when he came back and reported to Kings county the information received first hand, what did that county do? The fact that I am speaking to this House at the present moment is an evidence of the sound commonsense of the people of Kings. Not so much, Sir, in electing me to this position—because I do not claim to be a brilliant representative, but I mention it as a tribute to the sound common-sense, and the business capacity, of the people and to their ability to understand how this particular opposition was going to affect them in that part of the country.

Let me here refer to a point that seems to me to have been lost sight of from the east to the west in discussing the issues of the late campaign. Too little stress was laid upon that subtle paragraph in the reciprocity agreement regarding the pulp-wood industry. There you had an agreement which would have prevented provinces with pulpwood resources, the Dominion having accepted this reciprocity pact, from putting a stop in the future to the excessive outflow of that pulpwood. Now what are the conditions in the province of Nova Scotia in respect to pulpwood? Why simply this: We cut every year about 400,000,000 feet of lumber which is 100,000,000 feet faster than it grows. Now, the 1,250,000 or 1,500,000 barrels used in the apple trade have to be made out of this very lumber that is to be sent to the United States or to other parts of the world as pulpwood, and this requires 25,000,000 to 50,000,000 additional feet each year. How long do you suppose our timber supply would continue at this rate of cutting before our forests would be entirely denuded. And yet if the reciprocity pact had gone through our province would have been unable to pass any legislation to prohibit the exportation of that very article that we require so much at home. What do you suppose was the remedy proposed by one of the gentlemen on the opposite side of politics who spoke during the campaign? When asked where we would get our barrels he flippantly remarked: 'Buy them at T. Eatons.'

In the province of Nova Scotia we are raising fruit that will be found of advantage, and is received with favour in the Canadian Northwest. The Canadian Northwest is raising the particular thing that we require in the east. We have natural resources yet untouched in the province of Nova Scotia. Let us apply ourselves to the development of these resources and build up between the maritime provinces and the western provinces a great interprovincial trade. That is the great proposition that we in the east are seeking, that is the thing that we want to see fulfilled, and I believe we will see that wish carried out within the next five or ten years. There is no province in this whole Dominion that is richer than Nova Scotia, and none that has contributed more in material wealth, and more towards the upbuilding of this Dominion than the province from which I come. It has sent to Ottawa three premiers to adorn the government of Canada and to win mention in history as three of the greatest men that Canada has produced. As I have already said we have in Nova Scotia unlimited resources, and we ask for and we will obtain the co-operation of the people of the Dominion in making Nova Scotia one of the banner provinces of this Dominion.

Mr. MICHAEL CLARK (Red Deer). Mr. Speaker, Ruskin has said somewhere that the ways of youth ought to be very quiet ones, free from much help or praise. Remembering that dictum, Sir, I shall not run the risk of helping my hon. friend who has sat down by criticism or by praise. I will, however permit myself to say that the country has nothing to fear which can produce a member at once so young and so gallant as not only to tackle, but to defeat him who was, from his professional position, presumably the embodiment of the gallantry of the nation. I will also allow myself one single word of encouragement to my young and hon. friend. If he will only practise his excellent dialectical skill to a greater extend in pummelling any one, be he Liberal or Tory, who proposes to raise the tariff in this country then I will be glad to stand at his back or by his side and wish more power to his elbow. Mr. Speaker, I should like to congratulate my hon. friend the Prime Minister even in his absence—if he were present I am sure he would give me credit for sincerity—on his accession to the high position of premier of this great land. In the midst of much criticism of the public life and the characteristics of the public men of Canada, I think we do well on both sides to remember that at any rate this country can boast of a tradition by which no one is admitted to the position of the premier citizen of Canada without having the character of high personal integrity.

I am glad to concede that in the present Prime Minister we have, in this respect, a worthy successor to his great predecessors. With apologies to my hon. friend from Calgary (Mr. R. B. Bennett), I venture to offer a further word of congratulation to the government as a whole upon the condition in which the country is handed over to their care—a condition very different, let me say, from that in which it was received by the preceding administration. It is the fashion, I know, among hon. gentlemen opposite, from the Prime Minister downwards, to talk of the prosperity of Canada as if it had endured for the last thirty years. Now, I have tried to find evidence of any prosperity in Canada before the year 1896, and I am bound to say that all the study I could make has not revealed one jot of such evidence to my researches. What is the test of a nation's prosperity? My hon. friend the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Foster), is not present; I wish he were, I enjoy breaking a lance with him. And I am bound to say that I attach to one particular test very much more importance than he seemed to do in the remarks which he made to the House the other day. I contend that the surest test of the prosperity of a nation is in the expansion of its foreign trade. Is there not evidence of that in one of the first paragraphs of the speech from the Throne? How does His Royal Highness the Governor General, in the words put into his mouth by the Ministry, proceed to prove that Canada is prosperous at the present moment? Why, by the fact that trade is expanding with the utmost rapidity not only with the mother country but with other countries of the world. Apply the test to the claim, this first fallacy I shall call attention to, which is being continually peddled before the country in the speeches of my hon. friends opposite, and how does their case come out? In 1895, when they had been in power for seventeen years, the volume of commerce of Canada with the whole world was represented by the insignificant figure of $230,000,000. Or rather I should say it was represented by $224,000,000 in that year, the same being $6,000,000 less than the $230,000,000 which represented the foreign commerce of Canada in 1883, twelve years before. So far as this test is a guide on the point I am discussing, Canada, during the last twelve years of the previous Conservative government, had progressed indeed, but progressed as the crab is said to progress,—it had gone backwards. Take any other test you like to apply and compare the condition of Canada then with the condition of Canada now, and you are bound to concede that Canada did not know progress until the year 1896. Take the tests of the deposits of your people in the banks, of the homesteader taking up homesteads, of the immigrants coming into your land. Under any test you like you will find that Canada's condition was one of stagnation and retrogression in 1896. Nobody doubts for a moment that Canada's progress to-day is one of the wonders of the world.

Now, on this head, while repeating my congratulations to the government, I wish to refer to another policy which is constantly being formulated or insinuated by our hon. friends on the other side of the House, and that is that the progress and prosperity which Canada is enjoying at the present moment are in any sense due to the system of protection. As to what progress did take place after 1896, let me follow up the figures in regard to foreign commerce that I have already mentioned. The foreign commerce of $224,000,000 in 1895, was increased under the Laurier administration which took office in 1896, so that three years later, in 1899, our foreign commerce had grown to $321,000,000. That is, in three years of the late administration there had been an increase of nearly fifty per cent. Now, what had the Laurier government done to increase foreign commerce in that most remarkable, most phenomenal way? We are told that they never lowered the tariff. They lowered tariffs by the introduction of the British preference, and by that preference, they at once opened the markets of Great Britain to the agricultural products of this country. Is it any more than the simplest and most obvious common-sense that, if you have a dam across a stream and remove a part of that dam, some water will flow over? A tariff is an obstacle to foreign commerce; tariffs were lowered by the Laurier government; and it is surely good reasoning to say that the extension of commerce finds in that fact one of its explanations,

What did the Laurier government do else to account for the remarkable change which took place? They introduced an immigration policy. By that immigration policy, we are told, it is estimated that $100,000,000 is being brought in as the assets of the immigrants coming into this country every year. Think of that, Mr. Speaker,—one hundred millions of dollars of dry cash coming into the country yearly. Yet, according to the opposition, the country owes all its prosperity to protection. You have fourteen dollars per head of the population coming in, and these hon. gentlemen seek in some artificial tariff arrangement the explanation of the extraordinary prosperity of the country. Sir, this single fact is a strange comment upon the whole protective doctrine. Protection, if it has any object and any purpose, is meant to keep imports out of the country. But there is one hundred millions of dollars of imports yearly,—surely a better explanation of the prosperity of Canada than any artificial manner of restricting trade or raising revenue.

Now, I am glad to have been able to offer congratulations to my hon. friend the Prime Minister and the government generally upon the condition in which the affairs of the country were handed over to them. And here my words of congratulation, I fear, come to an end. I cannot congratulate my hon. friend (Mr. Borden), on the auspices under which he came into power. I wish I could. I am sincerely hopeful of the future of this country and as jealous of its public life as if I had been born in it, and I say again, I wish I could. But I cannot congratulate the Prime Minister upon the fact that in the province of Quebec during the recent election he may be said to have partaken of the light wine of old France purveyed by such a connoisseur as my hon. friend (Mr. Monk), while in the province of Ontario he drank a beverage flavoured with more than a dash of orange bitters.

In western Canada we conducted a simple, economic argument on this question, and in my particular province we had no reason to be dissatisfied with the results. But when I reflect upon the condition of affairs in the east, I do not think it redounds so greatly to the credit of the public life of this country. When I reflect upon my hon. friend the Prime Minister walking into power, flanked on one side by that well-known unselfish patriot, Mr. Clifford Sifton, and on the other by that well known imperialist, Mr. Bourassa, with Mr. Armand Lavergne following in the rear, waving, I am told, or some of his friends did, the flag of old France, and the party asking elsewhere at the same time, 'Under which flag,' then I cannot help acknowledging the truth of the saying that politics, like poverty, makes strange bedfellows.

Now, we have heard a great many explanations of what happened on the 21st of September. Well, I myself think the best explanation probably is that 35,000 more people voted on one side than on the other. But there are other explanations that are perhaps worthy of examination for a moment. I have not come across anything more amusing than the explanation that was given by the Lord Bishop of London. The Lord Bishop of London has been informing the people of Great Britain that Canadian elections went the way they did on the 21st of September because Canadians preferred to remain poor and British, rather than become rich and American. The worthy Bishop, I have no doubt, had in mind a band of men, lean, ascetic, without any campaign fund, going forth to battle for principles as sacred as those of the Sermon on the Mount, and I suppose now the good people of the old land who take their politics from the bench of bishops, are congratulationg themselves that Canada has been delivered from the hands of such well-known bloated plutocrats as my right hon. friend and Mr. Fielding, and has passed into the frugal care of a cabinet poor but patriotic. I cannot think this explanation of the elections will commend itself to the Manufacturers' Association, nor yet to my good friend the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Burrell), whom I am glad to see in the cabinet, and who, before he went into the cabinet, warned the fruit growers of British Columbia, not that they were going to be made rich by trading with the Americans, but that they were going to be made poor if the pact went through. It may not be inconsistent with the duty of a bishop to join in the cry of prejudice against the Americans, whether they are rich or poor; but for my part I would a thousand times rather suffer defeat in trying to assuage international animosities than to achieve the greatest victory by inflaming them. Though, as I have said, the Manufacturers' Association and the Minister of Agriculture would not support the view of the bishop, he is not without support in this country. If he had heard my hon. friend the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Foster) speak the other night he would have found that with the boldness we all admire he was supporting the Lord Bishop's view, for he told us that the result of the elections was a triumph of sentiment over selfishness. Just imagine the sentiment of the Manufacturers' Association. I would just as soon imagine sentiment on the part of the licensed victuallers of Great Britain who, with great honesty, are in the habit of putting up in their places of business during an election campaign the poster, 'Our trade is our politics.' And I am not so sure but that the manufacturers' association would endorse that view. Yet the Minister of Trade and Commerce says that the election was a triumph of sentiment over selfishness. Why, Sir, look at the appeals that were made to sectionalism. When it suited them they made an appeal to the east against the west. I did not read the speeches of all the candidates in eastern Canada, but I did read a dispatch from the east, at a certain period of the contest, which told us that this argument was being used, and I am going to claim credit for at least one western member, that I at once went on the platform and denounced it as a crime against the country. Who has launched this doctrine of the east against the west?

Mr. CURRIE. You have.

Mr. CLARK (Red Deer). My hon. friend is suffering for the moment from a little irritation, natural to one in his circumstances. But there are some instances in which the Prime Minister did not make any mistake, anyhow. I detect in my hon. friend's interruption a very suspicious evidence that he was one of the guilty parties himself. In fact, if my memory does not play me false, I think his name was in the very dispatch that I have been mentioning. But I am going to call fairer minded gentlemen with whom I had the honour of a seat in this House during the previous parliament, I am going to call to their remembrance that in this House the member for Edmonton (Mr. Oliver) used this language: We in the west to-day believe in western development, because western development is Canadian development; and why I regret the defeat of the pact more than anything is this, that it would have benefited every man, woman and child in Canada, in my humble opinion.

Now would it have done it? We heard T. Eaton's mentioned just now. When I sell a bunch of steers my wife sends an order frequently to T. Eaton's. Would not the orders have been more frequent if I had more for my steers? Western development is Canadian development—I have argued in this House. All that makes work for the one makes it for the other. Was it that sentiment triumphed over selfishness? Not in the appeal to us in the west. When they needed a new and different argument they expanded their views a little, and they were ready to argue the position of Canada against the old country. With perfect honesty, a quality which did a great deal to put him where he is, the Prime Minister, when he came to the west, came out flat-footed not only against reciprocity but, as I understood him, against any increase in the British preference. Where was the sentiment in that attitude? A little extended, but still a sectional view, still a selfish view. When all else failed it was east versus west, Canada versus the old country, and the empire against the world. Mr. Speaker, are these hon. gentlemen contented with any such narrow view as that? The highest thought of the world to-day is not national, it is not even imperial; it is international. Ever since civilization dawned upon mankind, since we have known anything about trade, have not the greatest and grandest things all been international? If a man of my own profession, a medical man, invents something new, does he confine it to the country in which he happens to live? No, it is his greatest privilege, his highest ambition to benefit mankind. An inventor makes an invention and he may obtain every material good that is in it, but he is glad to be able to go forth to the world and give it for the good of mankind. Science, art and literature are all international, and not national. There is where unselfishness lies. But, whoever thought of an international system of protection? The thing is a contradiction in thought and in terms. It is impossible because it is in its very nature anti-social, sectional and selfish. It is the embodiment, the quintessence of selfishness

No, Mr. Speaker, what did happen was that a large number of the people believed they were voting for sentiment, but the trusts, mergers, corporations and big moneyed men were under no delusion in this matter. They used the sentiment of others to cloak their own selfishness. The hon. member for Calgary (Mr. Bennett) offered us an explanation, or one of his explanations, of the change of parties on the 21st September, in the words that the organic union of the empire was threatened. I quite admit that the people thought so, but if the House will allow me, it would not be uninteresting for me to explain why I did not think so. I can assure hon. gentlemen opposite that I wish they had sent all the copies of the pamphlet to the British-born, to myself. The harm done by it would have been extremely little. I was born and lived for forty years in Great Britain. I want to put this in, in case there may be hon. gentlemen in the House who believe what they said on this question. When I lived in Great Britain I shared with the other inhabitants of the country the right which they freely exercised of buying wheat, for example, from twelve different countries in the world, and selling wherever they could do it at a profit —a harmless line of conduct for any one of us within our private capacity. Are the people of Great Britain disloyal to the flag? I do not suppose that even the most patriotic, the most loyal man opposite would suggest such a thing as that; at least not all of them. But, if I was loyal to the flag when buying and selling with the world, in Great Britain, the thing that puzzled me was to know how I was to become disloyal to the flag by selling and buying with one more country after I had become a Canadian. I cannot understand it. I hope that my hon. and esteemed friend who follows me will enlighten me upon this point for doubtless that was the particular form that his electioneering finally took, although I do not think that loyalty troubled him very much.

This talk about the flag having anything to do with how you buy and sell is absurd. It is not even good Nationalism, for, mark me, Sir, it deprives me now, because I live in Canada, where I am proud to live and where I am proud to be a citizen, and it deprives me as a western homesteader, of a privilege which I exercised as an Englishman without law or anything else interfering with me; so that my privileges are reduced by becoming a Canadian citizen. The loyality argument was absurd to my mind. When I ship a car load of steers to Chicago I do not put a caboose at the end with so much loyalty in it. If I did, according to the theory of trade, I should have to take goods back from Chicago, or some other part of the United States to pay for the steers, and the United States, presumably, would put on a caboose with some of their loyalty, and it would be made up again. It was not only absurd but it was insulting to Canadians, for, what was the suggestion? And not only the suggestion, but what was the plain statement? That because, forsooth, you have an opportunity of extending your trade you are going to endanger the integrity of your country. The reduction of taxes is a common-sense thing to do and under direct taxation people never think of doing anything else. It is only when you tax people indirectly that they think taxes are good things. When one takes the opportunity of extending one's trade and reduces taxes at the same time the statement is that it is going to lead to annexation with the United States. It was insulting to Canadians and for this reason that, according to my poor methods of thinking, the only way that annexation could be brought about was either by conquest on the one hand or by meek surrender on the other. America, one hundred years ago, shed the last blood of Canadian citizens and she could not conquer Canada then.

There is no Canadian who thinks that issue could occur here to-day. So that, the thing that frightened my hon. friends of the Tory party—and no Tory party is ever happy long without a scare—the thing that frightened them was that they,—not we, for no such thought ever entered our bosoms—would be led to give up Canada by a process of meek surrender. I leave them the thought as a compliment to their citizenship as Canadians. My hon. friend from Calgary (Mr. Bennett) went on to indicate what he seemed to conceive would be one of the results of the election going the way it did, and he used the phrase "not only organic but commercial union." He must have spent some midnight oil in coining it, because I heard him repeat it at least three times, and I have not had time to read his speech to see how many times he used the phrase. Now, my only wish about that phrase is that he had come down from vague generalities and gone a little into detail as to what he meant by the 'organic and commercial union' that is likely to result from the rejection of this pact. I presume he means to indicate that he is a supporter of the policy which was first brought before the empire and the world by that brilliant statesman, Joseph Chamberlain. Well, how is organic union with Great Britain going to be strengthened by Mr. Chamberlain's scheme? That scheme proposed to tax the wheat of the world and to allow Canadian wheat to go into British markets more cheaply, the result of which process must be to increase the price of flour to the British workingman. The result of that scheme would have been that my hon. friend from Calgary (Mr. Bennett) would have hold of the British workingman, metaphorically speaking, by the stomach, and in that way there would be indeed a kind of organic union, and of course the length of time that union would last would altogether depend upon the ability of the man with the stomach to get out of the grip. I wish again that some one on the other side would descend from vague generalities and give us some details about what they are going to do for this commercial union. Presumably my hon. friend the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Foster), as I proved last session, has been working for this thing for twenty years and now that he is in power he will surely get to business and do something. There is the excellent article of woollens that we need very much of in this country. Woollens are an essential article of clothing in a country where you have five months of winter, sometimes zero most of the time as I have seen occur once. A plentiful and cheap supply of woollens would seem to be a very great thing for people inhabiting such a country, so that I presume one of the first steps of this government in bringing about organic and commercial union—which, to use a verb familiar to my hon. friend (Mr. Foster) he has adumbrated for so many years—one of the first things this government will do will be to go to Britain and indicate woollens as one of the things upon which they are willing to reduce their duties so that we homesteaders in the west will get the chance of buying the products of the Yorkshire mills which are the best woollens in the world. We need the chance to buy more cheaply all the more because we have been refused the right to sell where we like. Unless this whole talk of organic and commercial union and inter-imperial preference is a gold-brick to the British-born, I shall be interested indeed to see the present government make offers to Britain along the line of woollens with the smiling approval of my hon. and esteemed friend the chief whip of the party (Mr. Stanfield) and of my other hon. friend from Lanark (Mr. Thoburn). It is only when you go into details and look at schemes like this that you see the difficulty.

An hon. MEMBER. Unshrinkable woollens.

Mr. CLARK (Red Deer). The woollens might be unshrinkable as my hon. friend suggests, but the policy is unthinkable. My hon. friend from Calgary (Mr. Bennett) is great on new ideas, and in connection with the mention of fair trade (not free trade) he used the phrase that it was a new idea. Why, Sir, I remember in the early days of my political work in the old country that Mr. Chamberlain, when in the height of his power, and president of the Board of Trade in Mr. Gladstone's second administration, used to trounce the protectionists of those days who at that particular time called themselves fair traders. Fair trade is not a new idea; there is nothing new about the idea of protection any more than there is about selfishness which is at the root of it; it is as old as human nature. But, commercial union seems to be a new idea to the hon. gentleman (Mr. Bennett). I wonder how he, who has done much reading--as he will soon give this House ample evidence of—I wonder how he has forgotten his history. There was a time when we had commercial union between Canada and the old land. Has my hon. friend forgotten the navigation laws? The navigation laws were repealed by the wise Liberal government of Lord Russell in 1849 and these laws were designed to force Canada into exclusive trade with the old land. The date 1849 is significant, because five years later as a result of the repeal of those laws Lord Elgin negotiated his first reciprocity treaty with the United States. Now, Sir, the point I want to bring to the notice of my hon. friend (Mr. Bennett) —who doubtless in his blind and stumbling way loves the empire as much as I do— the point I want to bring to his attention is this; that before that repeal, and before that introduction of reciprocity there was disloyalty in Canada. The people were dissatisfied, but the gift of commercial freedom, (not commercial restriction) that is to say the freedom to make their own commerce restored that loyalty, that patriotism and that imperialism which are as strong to-day in Canada as in any portion of the British Empire.

And now Mr. Speaker, I want to say a word or two upon the amendment of my right hon. friend (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) which after all is the specific thing we are debating at the present moment. I was very much interested in listening to the first speech of my hon. friend the Minister of Marine and I hope I may already call him my hon. friend. It was an able speech; a speech which fully justifies—if I can say so without offence—his inclusion in the cabinet. But it was not free from fault, and I think that one of its faults was as a piece of parliamentary debating, and as my hon. friend from Pictou very well pointed out in an interruption, that he in general terms charged the whole of this side of the House with inflaming race and party prejudice without producing one jot or tittle of a quotation to prove his case.

That is not a method of debating which will carry my hon. friend very far in producing conviction as to any cause which he is arguing. We are charged by my hon. friend the Minister of Marine and Fisheries (Mr. Hazen) with inflaming race and creed prejudices in this country. Why, when my hon. friend makes a charge of that kind in this House he presumes upon the credulity of his own followers. Did we issue 'The Appeal to the British-born' in the last election? I never used an argument upon any platform which I did not address to my audience as an audience of Canadians. I should be ashamed upon this or any other topic to speak to any audience of men, from the Atlantic to the Pacific, except as the members of one great country—and I have learned that lesson partially from my right hon. friend (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) who, above all men, so far as I have been able to observe his career, has for his magnum opus, his chief object, the cementing of all classes and creeds. If he has one pride it is Canada. I am glad to pay that tribute to him when he is leading the opposition, because I am as proud of being behind him to-day as ever I was when he was in power. I never wanted anything from him or from anybody else, I do not now, but I am proud to have followed him on this and a hundred other grounds; I am proud because in him, as all Canadians realize, we have had an incomparable party leader, a great asset of a whole people, a splendid example of a world citizen and, with all that, a simple and loving friend of every man, woman and child in the country. I am sorry that a slight aside on my part has had the effect of driving from his place the Minister of Marine (Mr. Hazen); however, in the absence of the minister I must continue to say just a few words about the amendment, and may I point out, Sir, that the amendment is justified to the hilt by the speech of my hon. friend the Minister of Marine. The amendment has done some good already. It complains that no policy has been declared on the part of the government in regard to naval defence, but the Minister of Marine declared at last the fourth policy of the Conservative party upon this subject. It is exceedingly interesting to reflect upon the kaleidoscopic views of the party opposite in regard to naval defence. But I shall not do more than touch on them:

First act in the drama—German scare at full height. The hon. member for North Toronto, as he then was (Mr. Foster), comes down to the House with his full war paint on and with tears in his voice tells us about the weary Titan. Just before the curtain went down they decided upon the speedy construction of a Canadian naval service, and the gentleman in the biggest hurry was the Prime Minister because at his instigation that word 'speedy' was put in the resolution.

Second act in the drama—German scare still on, so badly on that we must send dry cash, $20,000,000 or $25,000,000. Down went the curtain on the second act.

Third act in the drama—Capture of the omnibus by my hon. friend from Jacques Cartier (Mr. Monk) whom I am more than pleased on personal grounds now to see a minister of the government—capture of the omnibus and a plebiscite on the part of this great loyal and imperialist party to find out from the country whether they should really do anything or not.

Last act in the drama—revealed by one of the recruits of the party and of the minister last evening, when he lifted the curtain just a little he justified the amendment to which I am speaking, and he says he is now going not to the Canadian people, but to the British Admiralty. I hope that if he does so he will take my hon. friend the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Monk), who still runs the omnibus—at least he possesses the works—and Mr. Bourassa over with him.

What are the circumstaances which have led the Minister of Marine and Fisheries (Mr. Hazen) to announce this fourth policy within two years? Why he actually finds that if you are going in for a Canadian service, you will have to build some ships. That has been a perfect revelation to him—I am surprised at that seeing that he lives on the sea coast. He says he has a proposition to build nine ships. What did they expect to build when they were going into a naval service, airships or houses? Of course if you go in for a naval service, you must build ships; it has never been done in any other way. If my hon. friend the Minister of Marine had been in this House a year or two ago, he would have heard me give more startling figures than he produced last evening. He talks of nine ships, cruisers and destroyers, and he is so frightened at that that he gives up his first resolution, his second resolution and the plebiscite and he is going, I understood, as a deputation, to the British Admiralty to see if it would not be better to go a little more slowly. That plea for time does not for one moment touch the principle of this amendment—not for one moment. The figures which I quoted to the House were that our representatives to the imperial press conference in Britain, two or three years ago, saw 144 ships of the line in the Solent and only one of these ships was 12 years old. That is the brand of imperialism they go in for in Britain. They believe in the flag there. I doubt about my friends opposite of they are frightened out of their wits at the idea of building nine ships. I think that is a fair criticism of a party that has just come out of an election in which they have nearly shaken their arms off waving the flag. I have great respect for the loyalty which will die in the last ditch for the flag, but I am very suspicious of loyalty which wants the other fellow to die in the last ditch to provide him with bigger dividends on the one hand and is frightened at the idea of building nine little ships of war on the other.

As I said, the plea for time is no answer to the amendment before the House.

Now that amendment I shall support with the utmost heartiness, because it raises a question of the highest importance to this country. And let me say, and I hope to prove what I say, that in the first place the amendment involves nothing less than the personal honour of the ministry. That is very strong language, but according to the canons and traditions of the best political life with which I am acquainted—the political life of the government and parliament of the old country—that is what is involved in this amendment.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

Mr. CLARK (Red Deer). For what are the facts? Up to the time of the formation of the cabinet there was a distinct cleavage in opinion on this question of naval defence as between the two sections of the cabinet. I want to explain to my hon. friend the Minister of Marine (Mr. Hazen) at this point that I, of all men in this House, had the least possible objection to the inclusion in any cabinet of my hon. friend the Minister of Public Works. What I am concerned for is that he should go into that cabinet in accordance with the best traditions of British government, I mean government of the British Empire. There was a distinct cleavage; there is no denying that, it cannot be denied. Nor can it be denied further that it is a very constitutional practice that the members sitting in one cabinet, and as has been pointed out in the words of the amendment itself should be in agreement upon the principles upon which they are going to govern in regard to the vital questions before the country. May I give an illustration, to any one who knows anything of recent British history or how highly British statesmen regard their honour in this respect? All of us, many of us, remember when Mr. Gladstone was forming his first home rule administration, Sir Henry James, afterwards Lord James, was an old and honoured member of the Liberal party. He had been Mr. Gladstone's attorney general in the previous administration, he was in agreement with Mr. Gladstone upon everything but home rule, if he had gone into Mr. Gladstone's government he would have been the Lord Chancellor of Great Britain. When he heard Mr. Gladstone's explanation of what he proposed he laid down cheerfully the Lord Chancellorship of Great Britain and didn't go into the government, because he could not agree with Mr. Gladstone's policy upon the home rule question. The Duke of Devonshire was in exactly the same boat. Now, I do not know what ministers have given way upon this subject, but I think I have given evidence that according to the best parliamentary traditions that have ever been known in this world the question of the honour of ministers is involved. Nay more, the rights of parliament are involved.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. Hear, hear.

Mr. CLARK (Red Deer). Parliament passed a resolution on this subject, unanimously, parliament has a right to know whether the resolution is going to be honoured by this ministry and loyally honoured by every section of it. There was a cleavage until the two sections sat together in a cabinet. One of two things has happened. Either there is no change in opinion on the part of either section in the cabinet or there is a change. If there is no change then one side of the formation of the cabinet is guilty of breaking this constitutional rule, and has fallen short of the high standard of statesmanship shown by Devonshire and James, and I for one am a good enough Canadian to want as high a standard in these matters to prevail in Canada as ever prevailed in Great Britain. If there is a change the country has a right to know who has changed, and then all will go well.

It is a poor thing if Canadian traditions are to be given away in such a matter because some one is afraid to divulge that he has made a change in case it should hurt the chances of his political party. We have heard recently of a simile of a dog that had or did not have a collar on, but it appears to me in this case that some dog has got a muzzle on. I do not know that if I were to speak until bedtime I could make a point in regard to this amendment any clearer. I leave it with the cabinet in that shape. But I will vote for the amendment cheerfully on the grounds that I have given. Imperialism was the word we heard recently throughout the length and breadth of the land. My hon. friend the member for East Lambton wrote a letter to his constituents after the election was over and, if I mistake not, it ended with the words: 'Continentalism is dead, imperialism is alive.' Well, are they following up their imperial traditions in causing the Canadian standard to descend in this way? Mr. Speaker, during the recess, a year or two ago, while our naval debates were on there came into my little house on my western farm a poor Norwegian who had only been two or three years in Canada and in broken English he said to me: I wish you could do something for the old country, if there is any danger, Sir. I think more of that man's loyalty, and that man's imperialism than the three cent brand that I have tried to say some few words about this afternoon, that seems to animate the whole government benches.

Hon. F. D. MONK (Minister of Public Works). Mr. Speaker, I have listened with much interest to my hon. friend from Red Deer. I confess very frankly to my hon. friend, we have sat together in this House for many years, that I have always found him entertaining. He is a cultured Englishman who has settled in this country, and I will be frank enough to say to my hon. friend that when I hear him I always think that we cannot have too many of his kind in this country. But, Mr. Speaker, there is this peculiarity about my hon. friend: He hates Toryism.

Some hon. MEMBERS. He is right.

Mr. MONK. He is a Radical, and he is a hidebound free trader, and he seems to exult in the fact that he has during the fifteen years supported a protectionist government. Not only that, but I have heard often before to-day what my hon. friend has stated as to the prosperity of the country and he does not seem to connect that prosperity in any way with the prevalence of a fiscal regime which his party adopted when it came into power and has firmly conserved to the present moment. But where my hon. friend has surprised me slightly is in his unqualified support of this amendment. And perhaps the House will allow me for a moment because I can assure you Mr. Speaker I have no desire whatever, to unduly prolong this debate, to ask him what he thinks of the purport of this amendment? Is it not a representation to the Crown of a supposed division existing in the cabinet?

Can my hon. friend point out in British constitutional history any example of such a representation made to the Crown by the House of Commons within the last three hundred years? My hon. friend, who hates Tories, who is a Radical, who has kept track of the progress of British liberty,—how is it possible for him to support the representation contained in this amendment to the Crown of the supposed position in the cabinet? It only shows how very hidebound a party man my hon. friend is. For I submit to him that this amendment is one of the most extraordinary that has ever been proposed in any modern British parliament. The state of the cabinet is not a matter for the Crown. In olden times, cabinets were divided, ministers might not be on speaking terms; and in that remote period representations could be made and were made to the Crown. But, nowadays, the constitution, the humour, the control of the cabinet is entirely under the hand of the House of Commons. It is a committee of parliament. It is a retrograde step to make representation to His Royal Highness the Governor General on a matter which the House of Commons alone can and should take cognizance of.

But my object in rising is more especially to say something to my right hon. friend the leader of the opposition (Sir Wilfrid Laurier). He and I, in the many years we have sat together in the House, though we have not been on the same side, have always been good friends. But I would ask him, why has he exhibited since the 21st of September, and more particularly since we met for the present session, so much bad humour? My right hon. friend has been peevish—

Some hon. MEMBERS. Oh, oh.

Mr. MONK—he has been morose; he has been in bad humour. And—will he allow me to say to him, though he is not present at this moment?—that he does not seem to have realized in any degree the effect or nature of what took place, to his extreme discomfiture, on the 21st September. I heard my right hon. friend's statement to the House—and heard it with great surprise—that the people, in that memorable election had been carried away by sentiment and by prejudice. Surely, he is judging lightly and insufficiently the demeanour of the people in that great election. Surely he is developing—and I make him no grave reproach about it—that very natural sentiment of vanity, which, when a man passes a certain age, leads him to believe that he alone is right and that those who do not follow his opinion are necessarily in error. The House, the country at large, view very differently from that the judgment of 21st September last. There was sentiment, there was feeling. There was a natural determination of the Canadian people to do by themselves and not to become the slaves of the great republic to the south. But there was also I submit to you, Mr. Speaker, a careful weighing, a prudent appreciation of all the conditions of that bargain which was extended to us by our neighbours after their refusal during twenty years or more to meet us on any terms of arrangement. It was not only sentiment, but it was also a careful and judicious appreciation of all the conditions of the pact which led the people of Canada on that day to affirm their determination to remain Canadian, to remain in the empire and to continue their development, as they have done since confederation, independent of all foreign influence.

Not only did my right hon. friend find in that verdict by which the people have affirmed their intention to remain what they are a proof of the influence of pure sentiment, but he added that the remarkable event which swept him and his party from power and put us here was a result of prejudice. I say that that statement is dictated by peevishness, moroseness, dissatisfaction. And will my right hon. friend allow me to say to him, this: If there has been prejudice, if that element has had any effect in that election, it is due particularly to my right hon. friend himself and his friends. If he has seen that feeling in his own province, if he has seen a diminution of his influence in that particular part of the country, he owes it to himself and his friends, and to the prejudice that they built up there.

Mr. WILSON (Laval). To the Nationalists.

Mr. MONK. We will come to them in good time. My right hon. friend started in the province of Quebec, long ago, a campaign with the view to establishing that he alone was in a position to protect his compatriots of that province—against whom? Against the encroachments of the Conservative party. That was the starting point of my right hon. friend; that was the object of the campaign he made in 1896. and he succeeded, he and his friends in persuading the people of the province of Quebec, or a large number of them, that there was in the Conservative party an unfriendly, a hostile, an inimical disposition towards the people of that province. And if to-day he meets the result that has occurred he owes it to the falsity of that charge and to the refuge he took in it for so many years.

What was the condition in 1896? Allusion was made to it yesterday by my hon. friend the Minister of Marine and Fisheries (Mr. Hazen). At that time it was contended by my right hon. friend (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) in the province of Quebec that the untold sacrifice and effort of the Conservative party at that time in order to give satisfaction to the minority in Manitoba was nothing but simulation on the part of the Conservative leaders.

How many times have I heard my right hon. friend in the province of Quebec contend that the Remedial Bill, which was the cause of the defeat of the Conservative party in that year, did not contain a sufficient measure of justice for the minority of Manitoba. My right hon. friend promised that if he were given power he would give a greater measure of justice to the minority, and it is upon that representation in the province of Quebec, and upon his success in building up for himself and his friends a totally undeserved reputation for being the only just, the only fair men to the people of his own province, that he obtained that ascendency which he did obtain, and with the loss of which he is now threatened. Now, Mr. Speaker, what is the fact? I point this out in order to show the House the gradation in the loss of popularity by my hon. friend, in the loss of that confidence which he never can regain in our province. The elections of 1896 gave my right hon. friend the power to carry out that promise. He did not do so. My right hon. friend knows what he did. These people to whom he had made that promise he threw overboard. Is that a fact or is it not? We know what the situation is to-day, and that whatever advantages or rights they enjoy they owe purely and simply to the indulgence of the government of that province. Then came the second test—because the people of our province do not readily abandon confidence in a man when once they have given it. In 1905 my right hon. friend had a fresh opportunity. He knows what happened when he constituted these two new provinces. He came down to the House with a measure which he said was grounded upon the rock of the constitution. It gave, according to him, a just measure of protection to the minority in the territories that were going to be constituted into two provinces. Somebody raised their hand. My right hon. friend withdrew from that position immediately, once more he deceived the confidence that had been placed in him, and he abandoned the position he had taken up with regard to people whom he was bound to protect. My right hon. friend remembers that upon that occasion when we were discussing the constitution of the new provinces some of us moved an amendment by which we sought to obtain for the minority the important right of the use of their own language. My right hon. friend remembers that.

Mr. DEVLIN. Who abolished it?

Mr. MONK. You did.

Mr. DEVLIN. Will my hon. friend allow me one question? Who passed the law in 1890, abolishing that right in the Northwest Territories, was it the Liberal or the Conservative party?

Mr. MONK. At that time there was absolute unanimity in the House that the right of that minority to their language stood absolutely upon the same basis as the right to their schools, there can be no doubt whatever about that. In answer to my hon. friend's question, I say that at that moment, once more deceiving the people whose confidence he had obtained, my right hon. friend abandoned them, and when I rose in the House and claimed for the descendants of the discoverers of that country, the pioneers of that country, the right in the legislatures of the two new provinces at least to address the House in their own language, my right hon. friend was the first to deny it. So, Mr. Speaker, there was a gradation in the loss of confidence which the right hon. gentleman has sustained in our province.

Mr. DEVLIN. One more question. Who passed the law in 1892 abolishing the French language in the Northwest Territories? Was it the Conservative or the Liberal party?

Mr. MONK. I do not think that question is important. What we are discussing now is the situation that is before us.

Mr. DEVLIN. Will the hon. gentleman answer?

Mr. MONK.

Mr. SPEAKER. Order.

Mr. MONK. Now there is another point upon which my right hon. friend took, during many years, a very strong position in our province, I refer to the naval question. In 1902, and from even an earlier period, my right hon. friend took the position that we were not bound to contribute to the assistance of the British navy. Rightly or wrongly, that was the stand he took until 1909. After the conference of 1902 he returned to Canada and was praised for the attitude he had taken there, he received encomiums from all parts of our province. In 1907 he took an even stronger position at the Imperial Conference of that year, and absolutely refused to take any part whatever, in co-operation with the other dependencies, in imperial defence. The chief point upon which my right hon. friend lost the confidence of his own people was when we called upon him not to inaugurate his naval policy without giving the people a chance to be consulted and to decide upon it.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. The position that I took in the Conference of 1902 was that we were prepared to take up the naval part of our defence as well as the military part.

Mr. MONK. Not to my knowledge. Those who read the proceedings of the conference of 1902 will find that my right hon. friend took the stand that we were doing all we could do in that direction.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. I took the stand that we were prepared to undertake our naval defence as well as our military defence.

Mr. MONK. What I submit is that the position taken by the right hon. gentleman at both those conferences does not admit of any doubt whatever.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. None whatever.

Mr. MONK. It absolutely repudiated any idea of participation and at the Conference of 1907 the right hon. gentleman accentuated that position by stating positively when the motion of Dr. Smartt was submitted to the Conference, which called for some kind of assistance, that under no circumstance and under no conditions would he consider that proposition.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. Not at all.

Mr. MONK. Mr. Speaker, I would ask you to call it six o'clock.

House adjourned at six o'clock.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

THURSDAY, November 23, 1911.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

CANADA SHIPPING ACT AMENDMENT.

Mr. EDWARDS moved for leave to introduce a Bill to amend the Canada Shipping Act. He said: The amendment proposed by this Bill has in times past been the subject of negotiations between the Dominion government and the government of the province of Ontario. It has also been the subject of urgent representations on the part of the Dominion Marine Association, which controls practically all the vessels on the inland waters of Canada. The Bill has particular reference to the amendment of section 477 of the Canada Shipping Act. By that section as it stands at present there is a very unjust discrimination against Ontario vessels in the payment of pilotage dues in the harbour of Montreal. The object of the Bill is to remove that unjust discrimination and to place the province of Ontario on a parity with the other provinces. I need not say that large interests are affected by this Bill, and that practically every county in the province of Ontario is more or less interested in this amendment. When I state that a vessel sailing from Halifax, Newfoundland or New York to Montreal is exempt from the payment of pilotage dues, while a vessel sailing from Owen Sound, Toronto, Kingston, or any port on the Great Lakes is now subject to the payment of those dues, members will at once recognize that an anomaly exists. I believe that that anomaly is unjustifiable. The Bill is very simple. I merely am asking that vessel owners in the province of Ontario be placed on the same footing as vessel owners in the other provinces of this Dominion.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the first time.

Mr. SPEAKER. On consideration I am inclined to think that this Bill is a Bill which should be introduced by resolution, as one affecting trade. It is true that it is to amend the Shipping Act, but it seems to me that when you amend the Shipping Act you affect trade, and I would ask the hon. member to withdraw the Bill until that point has been considered.

With the permission of the House, the Bill was withdrawn.

CANADIAN MISSIONARIES IN CHINA.

Mr. A. H. CLARKE (South Essex). Mr. Speaker, before the Orders of the Day are called I desire to ask whether the attention of the government has been called to the recent disturbances in China and the serious condition of Canadian citizens whose lives are in very grave jeopardy in that country? I have communications from two families in my constituency of which members are besieged in the city of Chung Tu where not only the missionaries but all the Europeans are confined to the Mission hospital. Already two missionaries have been stabbed to death in that place, a Canadian and an American, and there is great danger of starvation if not worse unless immediate relief can be obtained. I have been asked to bring this matter to the attention of the government in order that, in some way, if it be possible, the attention of the authorities may be brought to the matter with the hope that some speedy relief may be given.

Hon. R. L. BORDEN. I am obliged to the hon. gentleman (Mr. A. H. Clarke) for having brought this matter to the attention of the government. The matter has not come under the consideration of the government, in fact we were not aware, until my hon. friend brought it to my attention that the conditions were so serious as they seem to be. The attention of the government will be given to the matter at once, and we shall endeavour to make such representations as may be in order for the purpose of bringing about any action that is possible under the circumstances to secure the relief of the people who are in danger and destitution. I shall take steps this afternoon to carry out the request of my hon. friend.

COAL SUPPLY IN THE WEST.

Mr. McCRANEY. I would repeat my question of yesterday as to what information the Minister of Customs has that the supply of bituminous coal in the west on the 6th of December, when the order in council replacing the duty on bituminous coal becomes effective, will be sufficient to meet the wants of the people of the prairie provinces.

Hon. ROBERT ROGERS (Minister of the Interior). The government understand from the coal dealers at Winnipeg and other large centres, that, in view of the alarming conditions existing in the prairie provinces and western Canada prior to the settlement of the recent coal strike, they have laid in an extraordinary stock of coal and in view of this and of the fact that the strike has been settled and the mines are now running, the government have reason to hope that there will be a sufficient quantity of coal available for the supply of settlers in all parts of western Canada.

ADDRESS IN REPLY TO THE SPEECH OF HIS ROYAL HIGHNESS.

House resumed the adjourned debate on the motion of Mr. Bennett (Calgary) for an address to His Royal Highness, the Governor General, in reply to his Speech at the opening of the session, and the proposed amendment of Sir Wilfrid Laurier thereto.

Hon. F. D. MONK (Minister of Public Works). Mr. Speaker, when you left the chair last night, I was putting forth a modest endeavour to soothe the unduly irritated feelings of my right hon. friend the leader of the opposition (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) and I was placing before the consideration of my right hon. friend the fact that if his friends, particularly in the province of Quebec, had held him up to our detriment, as the saviour of the rights of his race and the only one qualified to protect and save those rights, events which I mentioned had rather tended to dispel that illusion and that many who had before favoured my right hon. friend under the conditions of that legend, carefully built up, had subsequently withdrawn their confidence from him. But, Sir, we can go further and I submit to you and to this House that my right hon. friend does not give due consideration to the circumstances under which he was removed from power when he ascribes the events of September 21 to pure emotionalism, sentiment and prejudice. There were many other causes, and even taking the question of reciprocity, I believe that in the history of this country there will be no page more interesting, not only from the point of view of sentiment but from the point of view of the calm judgment, the courage and the determination of the Canadian people, than that page which my hon. friend calls an emotional page.

My hon. friend and his friends cannot fail to consider the effect upon public opinion of the numerous scandals which marked particularly the latter years of their regime. Does he think that with the Canadian people and the electors of this country the Quebec bridge scandal did not have a very serious effect? Never in my experience of public life have we had an example of such a glaring dereliction of duty as that which the government exhibited upon that occasion and which not only caused us to lose millions of money but also ended in throwing into mourning nearly a hundred of our labouring families. And what does my right hon. friend think was the effect upon the public mind of the North Atlantic Trading scandal? We had here the very singular spectacle of two of our officials concerned in the expenditure of over half a million dollars, as I recollect it, in connection with immigration positively refusing, under the protection of the government of the day, to inform us as to what persons had received these very large amounts. Let me advert briefly to what took place during the last three or four years in the Public Accounts Committee. I, for one, abandoned the investigation which more courageous members of the opposition of that time pursued before that committee. For my hon. friend from Pictou (Mr. Macdonald), my hon. friend from Carleton (Mr. Carvell), and others were there at every moment to check the investigation into the expenditures of public money. To such an extent was this carried that it was utterly impossible for the representatives of the people to obtain accurate information as to the vast sums spent yearly by the government. In our province at least—and I am sure the same was true everywhere—the immense and unexpected expenditure in connection with the National Transcontinental railway was another cause of loss of confidence in the government. My right hon. friend and his ministers had stated that some thirteen or fifteen millions of expenditure would pull us through this immense enterprise, that we should build it, so to speak, with our yearly surpluses. But we all know that in the last session of parliament we had the admission of hon. Mr. Graham, then Minister of Railways, that this transcontinental line would cost us at least $188,000,000. And I believe that we shall have incurred an expense of $250,000,000 before that line is ready with all its equipment from ocean to ocean. The House remembers under what circumstances our investigation into the giving away —that is the only proper expression—of vast tracts of land in the Northwest took place and how the investigation was checked into the expenditure of money by one of the ministers concerned in the passing of orders in council by which the country parted, without consideration, with a tract of almost six thousand acres. Is it surprising, I say, and can we ascribe merely to emotionalism, or to the reign of prejudice the verdict which the people gave in September last? I believe that the sooner we adopt in this country the rule which has prevailed for years in England, of not keeping a government in power for more than ten or twelve years the sooner we shall obtain that degree of good government which they have already obtained in that country. And although everything leads me to believe that our own lease of power will greatly exceed that number of years, I must confess—and I am sure my hon. friend from Red Deer (Mr. Clark) will agree with me—it is not wise for the people to keep a government in power longer. The fact is, I was closing a transaction yesterday with an important member of the Liberal party, and, invited to state the term of our probable stay in office, I told him that I was not in favour of keeping one government long in power and said: You cannot have me for twenty-five years, and I favour rather fifteen years. At the same time, everything leads me to believe that, if the same conditions prevail as when we came into office, the term of our power will be extended beyond that period.

But what particularly disquiets hon. gentlemen on the other side, is the existence—according to them—already of dissensions in the cabinet. My right hon. friend (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) thought he had made a point, if I mistake not, when he qualified this cabinet as a cabinet of coalition. Well, I do not know that a cabinet of coalition is, per se, a very bad one. When the right hon. gentleman formed his cabinet in 1896 he took in elements which up to that time had been somewhat strange to him. He took in my late friend the hon. Mr. Dobell, of Quebec, who was supposed to represent the discontented Conservatives at that time if I mistake not. He took in another element from discontented Conservatives in the person of the late hon. Mr. Tarte; and I believe that was the occasion of a great deal of bitterness to my right hon. friend, bitterness which lasted up to the time when Mr. Tarte left the cabinet. There is nothing absolutely wrong in the taking in of what my right hon. friend called 'strange elements.' But, in the peevish mood, the scolding mood, in which hon. gentlemen opposite are, they think that they see dissension. My hon. friend from South Wellington (Mr. Guthrie)—as I am informed, an aspirant Minister of Justice—during a certain time—stands on the watch-tower. He scans the desert before him, and thinks he sees dissension, 'Sister Ann, Sister Ann,' they say to him, 'do you see anything in the distance?' There is nothing to see, Mr. Speaker. We have not yet even reached the stage when they 'fight like blazes' as we were told they did by a member of the late government. I went down to take part in the magnificent demonstration given to the leader of the government some days ago at Halifax; and as one who has sat in this House with my hon. friend the Prime Minister (Mr. Borden) during the whole of fifteen years since we entered parliament together, I was proud to declare there that, amongst the many excellent qualifications he possessed to lead the party, there was none which I thought so outstanding during these long years as his extreme delicacy in all relations. I cannot conceive how it is possible for any man to have any serious differences with the hon. gentleman (Mr. Borden) who sits at my right. The declarations made in this House by my hon. friend the leader of the government on all occasions since he has assumed the reins of power have given absolute satisfaction not only to myself but also I am sure to all those on this side of the House.

But what gave rise to this idea of difficulties? My right hon. friend, the leader of the opposition, if I remember his words correctly, stated a day or two ago, in this very debate, that there had been at most a difference of opinion between himself and myself—and I am referring to myself, because I have been in this discussion, I think, somewhat in the position of a 'caper emissarius à tête de Turc,' as we say in French. That is, I believe, absolutely true, there never was any difference or dissension between us. Let me briefly recall some of the leading facts. I was, Mr. Speaker, when a boy a great admirer of the circus, where I went to see famous acrobats who could leap over high elephants; but I never witnessed anything so remarkable as the leap which my right hon. friend made in 1909 when, jumping over all platforms, as is his habit, and clearing the platform he had adopted at the conference of 1902 and 1907, he brought down to this House the resolution to which reference has so often been made, in the month of March, 1909. My right hon. friend then took up a position which he had never taken up before, and which was at variance particularly with the attitude he had always professed to hold in the province of Quebec. I voted upon that occasion, Sir, for that resolution, and I never regretted it, and I would do it again under similar circumstances.

What were the circumstances? Many members of this House were here then, and can remember them. A day or two before—and I am speaking from memory, but in this respect I think my memory is pretty correct—a very important debate had taken place in the British House of Commons sitting in committee on the naval estimates, and a very violent attack had been made upon the government of the day, in which it had been asserted that not only war was imminent, but that the British navy, so long easily considered the first navy of the world, had been unexpectedly found in an absolutely defective condition. A panic ensued, a panic which I am informed by competent authorities, lasted for at least two weeks in England; it was a war scare. It was under those circumstances that the motion of the 29th of March was brought up in this House. Let me say this, Mr. Speaker, because I have at times in this House, very unfairly I believe, and friends of mine with me, been taxed with disloyalty. The moment of danger for the British Empire will never be the moment which I and my friends with me, will choose to discuss our relations with the mother country. That was a moment of emergency, that was a question of fact. It was a moment of danger, and I gladly gave my adherence to that resolution, as I would, and as every true Canadian should, under similar circumstances. But, Mr. Speaker, that panic did not last long. Shortly afterwards the leaders on both sides in the House of Commons reassured the public, and all fears were dispelled, and it became a well ascertained fact that never at any moment had the British navy been in a condition of inferiority, as had been asserted. It was still the two power standard, it was still easily in a position to maintain the supremacy of the sea. A few months afterwards Lord Brassey, in a lecture which has become celebrated, which he delivered at Cape Town, I think, on the 22nd of December of that year, gave a full explanation of the condition of the British navy, which can be found in the British Navy Annual, from which it is made to appear without any doubt whatever, that that navy was and is in a very high state of efficiency. I mention this because sometimes I have been asked why I voted for that motion I say again that at that moment, when a new question of policy was under consideration, when the desire was throughout the great dependencies of the British Empire to show that every one of those dependencies stood side by side with the mother country, no loyal man could have refused to support that resolution.

Mr. ETHIER. May I ask the hon. gentleman a question?

Mr. MONK. Certainly.

Mr. ETHIER. Is it not a fact that during the last campaign in the province of Quebec, when the hon. gentleman and his Nationalist friends were accused of having voted for that resolution, he defended himself by stating that the motion was passed in his absence, that he never voted for it?

Mr. MONK. I did not think that I would have to defend myself against the Nationalists. I thought from what has been said in this House during this debate, that I was one of them myself. I may say furthermore, in answer to my hon. friend, that I never heard of what he has just stated. I never was accused of having voted for the resolution. I have often been asked why I voted for it, and I am giving one of the reasons here now. Let me further tell my hon. friend and the House that I am not aware that I was guilty of inconsistency in supporting that resolution. I do not know whether many of us have read carefully the reports of those great conferences, I have read them several times over. And let me call attention—because it is necessary for the purposes of the present discussion—let me call the attention of the House to what was contained in that resolution of the month of March, 1909.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. Did my hon. friend say that he voted for this resolution?

Mr. MONK. I adhered to it, certainly.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. You voted for it?

Mr. MONK. Certainly. But let me say in further answer to the right hon. gentleman, that I was not present in the House when it was declared carried. But we all remember the circumstances.

Mr. DEVLIN. That was your defence in the country.

Mr. MONK. Let me say to the hon. gentleman of the butting in habit, that there were very few members in the House when that resolution was declared carried. It had been the subject of a conference between my right hon. friend and the leader of the opposition; I am sure my right hon. friend, though he is momentarily ill disposed towards me, will bear me out in that. My hon. friend who at present leads the government, and the right hon. gentleman, in that conference, agreed upon the terms of the resolution, and it was declared carried. But by that time I had gone home and was in bed. At the same time, I was quite satisfied with its terms. Curiously enough those who rose in the House and spoke against that resolution and the next day afterwards apparently adhered to it, because it was carried unanimously, never came back to this House. I did not speak myself, but I approved of it under the circumstances I have indicated.

But, I have wandered slightly from the subject. What I wish to call your attention to, Sir, is that the resolution declared that it was the desire to carry out the suggestions made by the British Admiralty at the Imperial Conference of 1907—speaking from memory, and I am sure I am right in that. What were the suggestions made by the British Admiralty at the conference of 1907? Lord Tweedmouth, at the conference of 1907—and he did not get the approval of the right hon. leader of the opposition as we all know—submitted to the Colonial delegates there gathered together the old plan of the British government, the plan which had been matured by the British government beginning about the year 1885 and which had been evolved by a committee of the British Privy Council assisted and inspired by the best experts. In two words—for I do not want to take up too much of the time of the House—that plan was that the British Admiralty took charge for itself of the supremacy of the seas. It was their business—I am interpreting the report as I understand it—to take charge of the supremacy of the seas and the guardianship of the trade routes. Where did we come in? We came in in this respect, that we were asked to provide against any sudden attack or raid upon our coasts and, furthermore, we were required to provide ports of refuge and repair, naval ports, and coaling stations for the vessels of the British fleet. I wish to draw the attention of the House to that point. There were other details but that was, en résumé, the plan that the British government themselves evolved and the plan which was referred to at length by the Duke of Devonshire when, in 1890 or 1892, he presided at the meeting of the Imperial Federation League and explained this plan to them. It is referred to at greater length in the proceedings of the House of Lords in 1892, I think, when the Duke of Devonshire gave an answer to a question put by Lord Minto, and subsequently further explanations were given by the noble lord who had preceded the Duke of Devonshire in the office he then occupied. I am giving these references because what I am saying can easily be verified. I mention that for the purpose of showing that the plan, whatever its merits were, was different from the one which was finally adopted by the government.

No matter what you say, no matter what you call me, I was born and bred a Liberal-Conservative, and I never varied in my allegiance to that party. I intend dying in that faith because I believe it is the party that has built up this country, but what I desire to accentuate is merely this and it confirms what my old friend the leader of the government stated here. We never took up any other ground in Quebec, in the campaign, in the doctrine, call it what you like, that we preached, than this one: We are loyal subjects of the Crown; we do not approve of this plan and of this navy; we use our right to criticise it; it was adopted without any mandate from or consultation with the people; we pledge ourselves to accept unreservedly the verdict of the people consulted on this question.

The hon. member for Pictou (Mr. Macdonald), whom I might qualify as an aspirant Minister of Militia at one time and the hon. member for Carleton, N. B. (Mr. Carvell), who was an aspirant Minister of Public Works, who aspired to the position that I have the honour to occupy myself to-day, seemed to take pleasure in calling us disloyal. Disloyalty is a crime. I would ask these gentlemen, if I did not understand a word of the English language, read no French, knew nothing of the people amongst whom these gentlemen live, knew nothing of their history, of their traditions, of their aspirations, and not understanding their language or anything about them, I ventured to denounce them as disloyal, what would they think of me? Can they find that there was anything unconstitutional or unpatriotic in the ground that we took during that campaign? They were loyal speeches and these hon. gentlemen cannot prove that they were anything else. Do not these hon. gentlemen know the noble history of the race that inhabits our province? Why, they have in this House, time and again, thrown that reproach at me and at those who have defended the grounds which I have just exposed to the House. Is it not the undeniable privilege of every British subject to criticise? Can he not say that, good subject as I am and loyal subject of the Crown, I do not approve of this plan? The people have not been consulted. I claim you should get your mandate from them, and I bind myself beforehand to accept the verdict of the people upon this question. Does the hon. member for Red Deer (Mr. Clark), who preceded me in this debate and, who, apart from being an out and out free trader, is a democrat who has left his country to live in the free west and who knows something of the freedom of British institutions, believe that that is a fair ground for any man to take under the British flag? Why therefore tax us with disloyalty? We took that ground in our province and with the varying doctrines that were put forth by this man or that man, by this party or that party, having determined to preach that principle, we condemned the leaders on both sides. That was our ground. The right hon. leader of the opposition took that ground and everybody else in this House has maintained it. Before me in this House the right hon. gentleman said that any permanent policy must be carefully thought out and must be submitted to the people. Am I right in that or am I wrong? I was not the first to raise that point, a most important point, an impregnable point in this House. It was raised by others before me. The right hon. leader of the opposition took that ground because that is the ground that he gave, the hon. member for Digby, before me, mentioned that point and the question is grave and serious enough, it is important enough for each and every one of us and for the whole country that no man can be blamed for taking that point and should not be reproached with disloyalty. I hope we have ended the time when the reproach of disloyalty shall be bandied from one side of the House to the other. I am confident that the leader of the government has taken the view of this question which should be taken. Notwithstanding its gravity, its importance, its seriousness he will know how to solve it for no man is better qualified to do it than he is himself.

Probably the illusions under which my right hon. friend suffers at the present moment, and the feelings of disappointment and acrimony which he experiences are of such a nature that he does not discern public opinion, but surely he must know that that navy of his does not meet with public approval. It is a useless navy for this country. Nobody would dream of defending a country with cruisers of that type. It is a navy of enormous cost, and in my judgment it fails in every way to fulfil one of its objects, which was to take part in the defence of the empire. Who ever heard of cruisers to defend a country? Ships of that type are for scouting the seas, harassing the enemy's commerce, conveying troops, and they could not stand for a single moment before ships armed with heavy guns. They are absolutely useless for the purpose of defence. My right hon. friend's navy was an ill-conceived plan.

Mr. SINCLAIR. Will my hon. friend permit me to ask him a question. I would like to ask him what type of a naval ship he favours.

Mr. MONK. That is the question which my hon. leader has under consideration, and I am sure he will solve it properly. My regretted friend, Mr. Brodeur, that eminent mariner, discerned tempests and typhoons long before his friends foresaw what the people would think of the navy, and he got to safe anchorage just in time. Sir, we have very grave and important questions before us.

Mr. SINCLAIR. Will my hon. friend excuse me.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order.

Mr. SINCLAIR. The hon. gentleman should answer my question.

Mr. SPEAKER. Without the permission of the hon. member having the floor, the hon. member (Mr. Sinclair) is not entitled to interrupt.

Mr. SINCLAIR. I really am sincere in this matter.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Oh.

Mr. SINCLAIR. Yes I am. With the consent of the minister I was permitted to ask what I considered a very pertinent question, and the minister has not yet given me any answer. May I insist on an answer.

Mr. MONK. I thought I had already given a satisfactory answer to my hon. friend, but I am not an expert in seamanship as the hon. member is, although surely he must know, because any tyro in naval matters knows that cruisers are of no use whatever as battleships. Every one knows that cruisers cannot be used for battle because they cannot stand before the heavily armed ships. It is the heavy guns. I am sorry my hon. friend the Minister of Militia is not here for I am perfectly sure he would confirm me in that opinion. I do not wish to take up too much time on that matter.

Mr. MONK.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Oh, oh.

Mr. MONK. What is the cause of the merriment opposite. I am delighted, Sir, that after having heard the very lonesome and mournful speeches of some of these gentlemen opposite I have been able, through an honest endeavour, to bring some cheerfulness to them. I am not going to give a lecture on naval architecture but I may mention that being ill some time ago I went down to Fortress Munroe where I saw many ships and many guns and there I learned what I did not know before and what possibly my hon. friend (Mr. Sinclair) does not know that it is an axiom that cruisers being light and swift ships they cannot bear the discharge of a twelve-inch gun, and that for fighting purposes and for attacking purposes and for the purpose of guarding a country you can only use these heavy ships which can discharge twelve-inch guns and at the present time thirteen-inch guns.

Mr. FOSTER. Like the 'Niobe'.

Mr. MONK. The 'Niobe' could not use such guns. If we procured the 'Niobe' for training purposes—well, I do not want to go into that matter now and to take up time unduly, but in the Railway Committee room perhaps some evening I may be able to give an account of my trip to Fortress Munroe, and what I learned about naval architecture. At all events I learned enough to say that this naval scheme of my right hon. friend is not worth much.

Now Sir, we have urgent and serious questions before us. I listened with great interest to what my two young friends from Dorchester (Mr. Sevigny) and Calgary (Mr. Bennett) said most eloquently—more eloquently that I have ever before heard said in moving and seconding the address—as to the great and immediate duties we have before us. I also bear testimony to the very able address given upon a subject which I have at present under particular study, by my old friend from Simcoe (Mr. Bennett) when he spoke to us as to the solution of the question of transportation. More than once in this House in previous parliaments I have listened with attention to what my hon. friend from Simcoe (Mr. Bennett) has told us about transportation upon the Great Lakes. My right hon. friend and his colleagues of the late government had before them since 1903 or 1904 the report of a commission which proposed a satisfactory solution of the problem of transportation and I think there is much in the suggestion made by my hon friend (Mr. Bennett) as to the necessity of perhaps taking up again the work of that commission. It is remarkable that these gentlemen opposite who want the new government within a day or two of its existence, to declare its policy on most abstruse and difficult subjects never carried into effect the suggestions of that commission which recommended national free ports and canals. The late government seems never to have had the energy to deal with any of these questions. So true is it that a governement that has remained a long time in power seems to have lost its energy and strength, and moreover, thinks it may arrogate to itself the right of doing things without taking the opinion of parliament or of the people.

My hon. friend the late Minister of Public Works asked me too if we would do anything with regard to the port of St. John, New Brunswick, which he had under consideration just before the vote of the people relieved him of the exercise of that function. But my hon. friend is not quite right. If the report of the commission on that matter is well founded—and the government seem to have pigeon-holed it the moment it received it—you cannot consider only one port. You must consider the claims of St. John; you cannot overlook the claims of such a great port as Quebec. You must take all the ports and consider them in a general plan; and I venture to say, in connection with this one of the great problems before us pressing for urgent solution, that if at that time the government had taken it up seriously, and had expended $20,000,000 or $25,000,000 judiciously and carefully in carrying out the suggestions of the government, the government would have been twenty-five years ahead of what it is to-day. This is one of the problems we have to solve. Mr. Speaker, there is absolute satisfaction and harmony amongst us in spite of the hopes which some hon. gentlemen opposite try vainly to kindle. What I express the hope of, Mr. Speaker, to you, whom I am so proud to see in the Chair, is that the government will be able, even with the assistance of our disappointed friends opposite, to carry out the programme which is before us.

Hon. RODOLPHE LEMIEUX (Rouville). Mr. Speaker, first of all, let me join with my hon. friends on both sides of the House in the compliments which have been extended to the mover and seconder of the address. Everybody will admit that both of these gentlemen, the member for Calgary (Mr. R. B. Bennett) and the member for Dorchester (Mr. Albert Sevigny), are two notable additions to the debating power of the House of Commons. Sir, speaking as a Liberal from the province of Quebec belonging to the loyal opposition, I wish also to extend my sincere congratulations to the hon. gentleman who leads the government over his recent success. He will not doubt my sincerity. I have always had for him great admiration, and my sincere hope is that he will give this country a strong and progressive government. May I add that, coming after such nation-builders as Sir John A. Macdonald, Sir John Thomson and Sir Charles Tupper his is no light burden indeed.

Sir, a change has taken place in the administration of the affairs of this country; but, Mr. Speaker, those who sit to your left can look with some pride at their record of achievements while they were in office. Need I say that the hon. gentleman who leads the opposition, and who has the respect and admiration not only of his party, but of the whole country, and I should say of the whole British Empire, has given this country fifteen years of unbroken prosperity and progressive legislation. Every one bears witness to his statesmanship, to his eloquence, imposing, lofty, persuasive and sage, to his deep knowledge, not only of Canadian affairs, but of imperial affairs as well. His broad patriotism has been acknowledged by the highest in the land, and in the empire. We are proud of him. We have been taunted by my hon. friend the Minister of Public Works with having, so to speak, idolized the ex-premier of Canada. Sir, whilst it may be said that ministers of the Crown and especially prime ministers are idolized on account of 'the boast of heraldry and the pomp of power,' my hon. friend will readily admit that if the same chivalrous admiration follows a man when he crosses the House from the right to the left, that man must indeed possess noble qualities and great qualifications. There are no blandishments of office on your left, Mr. Speaker, and to-day the right hon. gentleman who leads His Majesty's loyal opposition enjoys perhaps more respect than he ever did when he sat on your right.

I must say, however, that my hon. friend the leader of the government has not been very generous in his compliments as regards the administration of the right hon. the leader of the opposition when he sat in his place. He said the other evening that from a legislative or from an administrative point of view nothing was due to the policy of the right hon. gentleman as regards the prosperity of this Dominion. I say that the hon. gentleman has not been very generous. He should at least have followed the example of the great leader of the Conservative party in England, a good Canadian, and a sound imperialist, Mr. Bonar Law, who, speaking at Leeds on the 16th inst., used the following language:

> I never said a word in criticism of Sir Wilfrid Laurier's government. It would have been the height of folly to do so, for we must never forget that it was the government of Sir Wilfrid Laurier which gave to the work of our people a preference in the Canadian market. We are grateful to him for that, but we are grateful to him again that that example set by him has now been followed by every one of the self-governing dominions.

Sir, there is more than this. Not only has the right hon. gentleman during his administration given the British Preference, thereby reducing the taxation but no man has done more to promote the union of the various races in this Canada of ours. He has increased the revenue of the country to a wonderful degree, and under his guidance the powers of the Railway Commission have been enlarged in such a way as to deserve the encomium of the president of the American republic.

He has reduced the postal rates, in this, leading in the van of sound Imperialism throughout the overseas dominions. He has developed the resources of this land, increased the provincial subsidies, deepened the channels, making of Montreal, the commercial metropolis of this Dominion, the successful rival of the great city of New York. He has built the National Transcontinental railway. The right hon. gentleman retires from office leaving the country in a highly satisfactory position financially. I listened with great attention the other evening to my hon. friend the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Foster), against whom I would not use any persiflage although if I remember well when I was a young member of this House in 1896 he did use some persiflage, addressing himself to the then Minister of Trade and Commerce (Sir Richard Cartwright) and taunting him because, forsooth, he had not been taken into the Laurier government as Minister of Finance, but had been shelved in the department of Trade and Commerce. I am glad to see that, after the storms and stress of political life, my hon. friend (Mr. Foster) is still a prominent figure in the Liberal-Conservative party, or I should say in the coalition government, and that he fills an important office with ability and with distinction not only to his party but to his country. I listened with reverential emotion and stillness to that born master of moving cadences and high sustained modulation. I was rather astonished when he said that he was not in a position to modulate or to formulate a policy. When I think of the many surpluses accumulated by the late government during 15 years of wise and prudent administration, when I think that my hon. friend (Mr. Foster) has accepted the seals of office with a buoyant surplus of over $30,000,000 I hope that for the future, judging from his past experience, although he has nothing to modulate and nothing to formulate he will at least have something to emulate.

Under the guidance of the right hon. gentleman (Sir Wilfrid Laurier), who has done nothing according to the leader of the government (Mr. Borden) to develop this country of ours, new provinces have been created, there has been a wonderful trade expansion; in fact we stand at the head of modern nations as regards trade, and finally, by our immigration policy, we have settled the great lone land, the Canadian west.

The hon. member for St. John (Mr. Pugsley) was interrupted on Monday by the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Monk). He said that the Laurier government had done nothing with regard to the transportation problem, and the minister has repeated this in so many words this afternoon. Will my hon. friend bear in mind that the late administration has spent for the solution of the transportation problem in this country over $121,000,000? The St. Lawrence Canal system was rushed to completion when we took office, and by 1910 a clear channel of 14 feet was available from the Great Lakes to ocean ports by Canadian waters. The late administration gave special and urgent attention to improving the condition in the harbours of Lake Superior, where the western grain has to be transhipped from the railways and in the eastern harbours on the Great Lakes where it is again transhipped to the railways for carriage to Montreal. We gave deep attention to the harbour of Montreal which is our national harbour par excellence, so much so that to-day the largest boats of the Canadian lines can navigate the St. Lawrence river with security, and that in the race of grain carrying transportation, Montreal is admittedly ahead of New York.

Whilst the late administration accomplished all that, they thought that something should be done towards relieving the taxpayers of this country and this brings me to say a few words on that vexed question of reciprocity in natural products. The measure of reciprocity in natural products proposed by the late administration was a step forward not only from a commercial but also from an Imperial point of view; but the manufacturers and the great interests of our country became nervous, they were afraid. We have an old French proverb: "La peur est mauvaise conseillère," Fear is a poor adviser. The manufacturers of this country were afraid in 1897 when Mr. Fielding introduced his tariff, they were afraid when he gave the British preference, they were afraid at each subsequent increase of that preference, yet, Sir, never were our industries so prosperous or our trade so buoyant as under these conditions. I admit that it is wise to be cautious in tariff matters but the world moves on and commercial changes become imperative at times. Our commercial relations with the United States are admittedly not what they should be. My hon. friend (Mr. Foster) went to New York the other day and delivered there a very mild, very courteous, very diplomatic speech. He did not hurl in the face of the American guests of the Canadian Club of New York the fervid rhetoric which we heard in some provinces in the last campaign. No, he said to his American cousins that the trade relations between Canada and the United States were not what they should be and that some day, not too far distant, a solution would be found to the trade impediments. Sir, that was understood by President Taft, when he made an offer of reciprocity in order to remove the barrier as regards a series of natural products between the two countries.

The pilgrimage was from Washington to Ottawa. That is the greatest compliment that can be paid to the late administration. The pilgrimage did not go from Ottawa to Washington. I do not wish to dwell unduly on this question of reciprocity. But, Sir, if this is not the occasion on which I should explain what reciprocity is—if we have heard enough of that phase of the subject—still I think it is my duty as a Liberal, as a member of the late administration, as a public man, to state at least what reciprocity was not, but what it was represented to be. It was not a treaty like the Elgin-Marcy Treaty of 1854-66. It was merely a customs convention. It did not affect in the least degree any of our leading manufacturing industries. That point was made very clear during the campaign, and during last session. I did not detract from the preference which we gave to England, although it was stated in public that the preferential treatment given by Canada to England in 1897, and increased in subsequent years would be affected by this convention. So much so, that in England, no less a man than the Colonial Secretary had to explain that the Canadian government had never meant to remove the advantages which accrued from the preferential duties of 1897. The other day, Right Hon. Mr. Harcourt delivered a speech at Haslingden in which he used the following language:

> Canada had no intention of varying the preference which, to our mutual advantage, she afforded to British trade. The negotiations with America were in no way connected. With the fact that the mother country felt herself unable, in the interest of our own population, to give these reciprocal advantages which could not be afforded by taxes upon raw materials and food, and the abandonment of reciprocity with the United States did not mean or entail any enlargement of Canadian preference or any revival of a request for fiscal changes in this country, which its people had deliberately and repeatedly decided that they were unable to afford.

The significance of the late election is interpreted in various ways. In England, from the reports in the papers, we are led to believe that the triumph of hon. gentlemen opposite is said to mean the giving of a mutual preference between Canada and Great Britain. It must have been quite a damper on imperialists indeed on jingo enthusiasm, when Lord Grey, our late Governor General, an impartial witness delivered the following speech at the Colonial Institute a few days ago:

> I can also say with equal confidence that, notwithstanding some desire to the contrary, there is no expectation in Canada that the recent Canadian elections should be used as an argument for introducing any change into the tariff of the United Kingdom.

I say Lord Grey is an impartial witness. He heard the promises made throughout the country made especially in the province of Ontario that if that cursed government was wiped out of existence the new administration would give to Mr. Chamberlain's party the much coveted mutual preference.

Mr. FOSTER. How could that be?

Mr. LEMIEUX. Be what?

Mr. FOSTER. How could a Canadian party give to the people of the United Kingdom a mutual' preference?

Mr. LEMIEUX. A Canadian party could not do it alone; it takes two to make a bargain. But this was represented as the beginning of the bargain as the overture to the arrangement that would be made in the future.

Mr. FOSTER. The hon. gentleman modifies his statement?

Mr. LEMIEUX. No, I leave it as it is.

Mr. FOSTER. Does he stand by his statement, made five minutes ago, that the reciprocity pact did not in any way interfere with the British preference?

Mr. LEMIEUX. It only interfered with the British preference, if at all, in a very slight degree. I have not the figures at hand; they were given last session. But only to an infinitesimal degree did it interfere.

Mr. FOSTER. Then I have that more moderate statement from my hon. friend (Mr. Lemieux). I have been instrumental in getting two of his statements moderated.

Mr. LEMIEUX. Sir, I say this reciprocity convention did not affect our fiscal autonomy, or our future in any way. The industries affected by it were those of the farmer, and the fisherman. Our Customs Act put on the free list over 200 articles; and by schedule (A) of this agreement the important articles added to the free list were farm products, live animals, grain, fruit, fish—with certain exceptions—and a few other articles. Surely, this addition could not have changed our allegiance. It is not true that our hearts go with our trade. If that were true American trade with Canada would not be an experience with us, but only an experiment. In 1879, when the National Policy was introduced, a permanent offer of reciprocity was made to the United States. And in 1888, after nine years' operation of the National Policy, if it be true that our hearts go with our trade then our hearts were with the United States rather than with Great Britain, because our trade with the United States was $12,000,000 more than that with Great Britain. In 1896 our trade with the United States was three and a half millions more than with Great Britain and to-day our trade with the United States is equal to our trade with all the rest of the world put together. All classes in this country trade extensively with the United States except farmers and fishermen. If it be true that our hearts follow our trade, the miners, the lumbermen, the manufacturers were long ago annexed to the United States. The miners sell eighty-seven per cent of their surplus products to the United States; the lumbermen sixty-seven per cent; the manufacturers nearly fifty per cent. But the fishermen sell only twenty-five per cent of their catch to the United States, and as to the farmers, out of $144,000,000 worth of products sold, only $19,000,000 worth are sold to the United States.

What, then, can be the meaning of the verdict of the 21st September last, as regards reciprocity? Sir, I am a loyal Canadian. I accept the rule of the majority, I bow to the decision of the majority. But I have no apology to offer for the stand taken by the Liberal party on that question of reciprocity. I respect the verdict of the people, I accept it; but I say most distinctly that it was the verdict of fear over self-reliance, it was the verdict of passion over reason. Reciprocity was not judged on its merits. Other issues overshadowed the real issue. Flag waving, appeals to the British born by Mr. Hawkes, the new immigration agent, and the old annexation bogey, did it. Look at the result of the polls. With all the flag waving, with all our alleged annexation proclivities, with all that campaign of fear over self-reliance, if you examine the pluralities of votes given during the last election you find that in five provinces out of nine there was a decisive majority in favour of the pact. Sir, speaking of annexation, let me say that the Liberal party standing in this House around its chief, and its colours, repudiate any other feeling but that of loyalty to the mother country. Sir, treason is a crime. The immortal Edmund Burke has said:

> It looks to be narrow and pedantic to apply the ordinary ideas of criminal justice to a great public contest. I do not know the method of drawing up an indictment against a whole people.

If the words of Burke are true as regards a whole people, they are equally true as regards a good half of the people, because one-half the Canadian people voted in favour of reciprocity on the 21st of September last. I know it has been denied that such mischievous appeals were made in certain sections of this country. But again we have the testimony of an impartial witness, Lord Grey, in his utterance at the Colonial Institute dinner. Here is what he said:

> In order that I may convince you that Canada is absolutely and passionately loyal to the imperial connection, let me point out to you that Sir Wilfrid Laurier, whom some of you have been taught to regard with suspicion, was fully persuaded that his policy would, if adopted, strengthen both Canada and the Crown. To secure the free entry of the products of the farm, the fisheries, and the forest into a protected market of nearly a hundred millions by the purchase of reciprocal admission of similar products from the United States, appeared to him to be an economic advantage which it was his bounden duty to secure for his country when the unexpected opportunity placed it within his reach. His policy may have been a good or a bad policy —it is not for me to say—but it was certainly in no sense the policy of disloyalty to closer connection with the motherland.

Why did our late governor use this language on his return to England? It was because his ears were full of the resonant note which he had heard during the last campaign, branding the right hon. gentleman as an annexationist, and branding the Liberal party as a disloyal party. I have said that it was not reciprocity alone that carried my hon. friends opposite into the seats they now occupy; there were other issues, and whilst reciprocity was the dominant issue in the English-speaking provinces, let me assure my hon. friends who sit side by side in this coalition government with the representatives of the province of Quebec, that in my province the dominant issue, in fact the only issue, was the naval question.

Mr. PELLETIER. No, no.

Mr. LEMIEUX. Mr Speaker, so much was that the case that hon. gentlemen who are in this House trusted representatives of the Nationalist party presented themselves as candidates in favour of reciprocity, in order to avoid the discussion of that question in the counties of Quebec. Why? Because the question of reciprocity was intensely popular in our province. I will go further. The leader of the movement, the head of the Nationalist movement in Canada, Mr. Bourassa, has published over his own signature a pamphlet on the question of reciprocity, in which he accepts the proposal of reciprocity with the United States, because in his judgment it is the safest weapon for Canada against imperialism. I repeat, Sir, that in the province of Quebec the naval issue was practically the only issue discussed before the electors in the various constituencies. There is no mention of this question in the speech from the Throne; but in Quebec, I say again, it was the only question. If we lost some Liberal constituencies we owe it to the fact that the naval issue stood so prominent in the debates.

I see my hon. friend from Yamaska (Mr. Mondou), a bosom friend of mine, smiling. He is my best witness. He was elected as an opponent of the navy, and he was also elected as a supporter of the reciprocity pact. Sir, there were three schools of thought during the campaign on that naval question. First, there were those belonging to the Liberal party who favoured a Canadian navy, who favoured the Navy Bill presented to this House two sessions ago by my right hon. friend, in the absence of Mr. Brodeur, who was then ill. Secondly, there were those who favoured a cash contribution to the British exchequer, or a contribution in Dreadnoughts; and finally there were champions, if one may be a champion of such a cause, of a do-nothing policy.

This coalition government is composed of those who favour a cash contribution, of those who favour a contribution in Dreadnoughts, and those who advocated publicly and privately a do-nothing policy. That is why, Mr. Speaker, I agree entirely with the terms of the amendment submitted to you by the right hon. leader of the opposition.

Now let us refer for a moment to the history of this naval question. In spite of the three different schools of thought which I have just mentioned, everybody will admit, who is of good faith, that the parliament of Canada was committed, unanimously committed, in favour of the policy enunciated in the resolution introduced on the 29th of March, 1909.

On this subject I wish to refer to the remarks made a moment ago by my hon. friend the Minister of Public Works. He stated that he had voted in favour of that resolution. Pressed a little more by an interjection from the right hon. leader of the opposition, he said: at least I adhered to it. He thus intended to give a little comfort to his followers in the coalition behind him. Yet, Sir, he delivered a speech in the House of Commons on January 10, 1910, and, with your permission, Mr. Speaker, I will refer to it. You, Mr. Speaker, and other Conservatives of the old Macdonald-Cartier school supported that motion, but a year after it had been unanimously adopted—presumably unanimously adopted—by the House, the hon. gentleman, who was then the member for Jacques Cartier, feeling that perhaps he could get some political advantage out of that naval situation in the province of Quebec came back to his seat and what did he say? He was bound, as you were bound, as we were all bound, by the policy enunciated on the 29th March, 1909, but he sneaked back—I will not use the term if it is unparliamentary—I withdraw it, Mr. Speaker—he came back to his seat a year afterwards and what did he say? He complained bitterly that such a resolution had been adopted in his absence in the House of Commons. Yet he has just said that he voted for it and that he adhered to it. Listen to his language, Mr. Speaker:

> Everything, Sir, connected with the discussion of this all-important matter seems to be a surprise. For my part, I little anticipated the turn which the discussion has taken this afternoon, and reasonably so, I think. It seems to me that, having taken the opportunity of expressing my view about this matter upon another occasion, I was entitled, in the ordinary courtesy which exists within the working of a party, to some indication that, upon this occasion, at the first reading of this measure, the party itself, as I understand it, would express its policy. I say that has been a surprise to me which, I think, I have not deserved.

And then he goes on, speaking of the famous motion of the 29th March, that to which he adhered, that for which he voted, and this is what he says:

> The moment I saw that motion upon the orders of the day I said, particularly to those who sit on this side of the House and to many of my friends on the other side, that I would not approve of that motion.

He did not approve of the motion, in 1910, but this afternoon he informs us that he went quietly to bed on the 20th March, and that is where he probably learned to approve of the motion.

Mr. CODERRE. Was not the motion moved by Mr. Foster on the 29th March, 1909, the first motion put on the Order Paper?

Mr. LEMIEUX. That was the motion of the 29th March, 1909, amended by the late government and adopted unanimously.

Mr. CODERRE. Was not the motion put on the Order Paper by the hon. the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Foster) the first motion; had not that motion long since disappeared; had it not been replaced by the motion of 1910, and was not that the motion to which the hon. Minister of Public Works (Mr. Monk) was alluding on that day?

Mr. LEMIEUX. If the hon. gentleman (Mr. Coderre) will read what took place during the debate of January 12, 1910, he will satisfy himself that we have divergent statements from the hon. gentleman who now occupies the position of Minister of Public Works. In this House in 1910 he declared that he was against that motion to which he declares to-day that he adhered and indeed voted for. It is a most important, indeed and invaluable admission after all we have heard during the last campaign. Sir, I wish to impress upon the House, that in the province of Quebec, when we were accused of sacrificing the autonomy of our country, of being too British, too imperialistic, we referred our opponents to the motion unanimously adopted on the 29th March, 1909, and immediately came a flat denial from our opponents that indeed Mr. Monk was not present and had never approved of it.

Sir, this motion was unanimously carried. The hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Foster) moved that: Canada should no longer delay in assuming her proper share of the responsibility and financial burden incident to the suitable protection of her exposed coast line and great seaports. The day after that Sir Wilfrid Laurier moved in amendment:

That while the House fully recognizes the duty of the Canadian people in the matter, it is of opinion that under the present constitutional relations between the mother country and the self-governing colonies the payment of regular periodical contributions to the imperial treasury for naval and military purposes would not as far as Canada is concerned be the most satisfactory solution of the question of defence.

He proposed, therefore, to build a Canadian navy, to which everybody agreed in this House.

But, what was the attitude of the Conservative party on this question during the elections? I charge the Conservatives, I charge the coalition government, with having varied their attitude on this question according to circumstances, according to provinces. There was one policy for the great province of Ontario, and for the maritime provinces and there was a distinct policy for the province of Quebec. The hon. gentleman who leads the government supported that motion by a very able speech. My hon. friend the Minister of Trade and Commerce also delivered one of the most eloquent speeches which he has ever delivered on the floor of this House. But, there is more than this. The hon. gentlemen cannot say that they acted only in obedience to the sentiment of the time, or were influenced by the emergency, or the panic, or the scare which existed. No, Mr. Speaker, the hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce and my hon friend the leader of the government had time to reflect, to pause and to think over the resolution which had been unanimously adopted. The hon. leader of the government went to England shortly afterwards in the summer and, speaking at the Constitutional Club, used the following language:

Some people seem to be aggrieved in the British islands owing to the fact that Canada did not by resolution or by speech from the Prime Minister vouchsafe to offer one, two or three Dreadnoughts.

He thought the resolution, in the form in which it was passed, while its terms may not upon their surface seem as significant at the moment as the offer of one or two Dreadnoughts would have done, laid down a permanent policy for the Dominion of Canada, upon which both parties united, and which would serve a more practical purpose than any such offer of Dreadnoughts. It was the outcome of conferences between himself and Sir Wilfrid Laurier entered into before the remarkable utterances of British statesmen of all parts as to the position of affairs at the moment in Europe, and was designed to show to the world Canada's unanimity of desire to take her full share if necessary in securing the safety and integrity of the empire.

Later on when he returned to Halifax he said:—

One governing principle at least should control, namely, that out of our own materials, by our own labour, and by the instructed skill of our own people, any necessary provision for our naval defence should be entered upon so far as may be reasonably possible.

So, Mr. Speaker, the leader of the government having supported the motion in this House, endorsed its policy before the Constitutional Club in England and on his return to Halifax a few months afterwards. The same may be said of the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Foster).

The hon. gentleman (Mr. Borden), however soon changed his bearings. What had happened in the meantime? There had been an election in the county of Drummond-Athabaska and that was the motive power which forced the hon. gentleman (Mr. Borden) to change his bearings. I am pleased to say that the county of Drummond-Athabaska being better informed during the last elections returned to this House a supporter of the Liberal party. The leader of the government knew that with the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Monk) he could profit by the intense Nationalist agitation in the province of Quebec, and he began by advocating a referendum to the people and at the same time a contribution in cash or in Dreadnoughts.

Mr. SEVIGNY. Will the hon. member allow me a question?

Mr. LEMIEUX. Yes.

Mr. SEVIGNY. Did not the hon. member (Mr. Lemieux) in 1903, send to Mr. Henri Bourassa a letter in which he stated that it would be a bad principle for Canada to help England in its wars. If that is so, then the hon. member (Mr. Lemieux) is a Nationalist.

Mr. LEMIEUX. This is the first occasion I have had to refute calmly and dispassionately the accusation now sent across the floor of the House. I never made such a statement. I hope that during this debate the letter which I wrote to Mr. Bourassa in 1903 will be read, not in parts but in full.

An hon. MEMBER. Read it now.

Mr. LEMIEUX. I have not the letter before me. This is what occurred: In 1903 the Congress of the Chambers of Commerce of the Empire was held in Montreal, presided over by Lord Brassey, and a resolution was presented by Mr. Drummond of Montreal, and I think seconded by Mr. Rolland, then president of the French Chamber of Commerce, and that resolution stated that it was the duty of Canada to share in the defence of the British Empire. I was invited to attend the meeting which was held in Montreal to protest against that resolution, and in the letter I stated that it was not a wise policy for Canada to embark in a scheme of such magnitude. That is from memory what I wrote at the time, and to-day I stand by the same policy and I am ready to defend it.

But, Sir, I can foresee the day—judging from the declarations, vague as they may be that were made the other evening by the Minister of Marine and Fisheries—when the stern and unbending Nationalist members of the coalition government will gladly support the very policy I deprecated in 1903.

I was proceeding to say, Sir, that the leader of the government advocated both a referendum to the people and a cash contribution or a contribution in Dreadnoughts. We all remember his speech of the 12th of January, 1910, when he said: proceed cautiously but surely, appeal to the people but meanwhile send a contribution in cash or in Dreadnoughts to the mother country. May I use the expression once used by Lord Randolph Churchill, to call that a double-barrelled policy. The referendum was there to soothe the timorous Nationalists and the contribution to placate the stout imperialists. In Ontario, under that policy, Laurier could be branded as a separatist, and in Quebec he could be denounced as a traitor to the cause of autonomy; in Ontario, the Canadian navy could be ridiculed as a tin-pot navy, and a toy navy, whilst in Quebec it could be denounced as an infernal machine. And, what has happened, Sir? We French Canadians count for something in this Dominion. No Prime Minister since confederation ever evaded the electorate of the province of Quebec during a general election. Sir John Macdonald, Sir John Thompson, Sir Charles Tupper, even in the midst of strong agitation all came to Quebec to address the French Canadian electors on the public issues of the day. But, Mr. R. L. Borden, the leader of the Conservative party hardly appeared in our province. He speaks good French, and I congratulate him for having learned French since he came to this House, but he might have spoken even in English, and he might have done us the honour of appearing somewhere at least and explaining to the people his attitude on the Canadian navy. True, he spoke in Montreal (St. Lawrence) in favour of Mr. Johnston, the Conservative candidate, but he did not meet the Minister of Public Works. These two gentlemen did not appear on the same platform, and after having made this one slight appearance in Montreal one evening, we find Mr. Borden devoting himself to the eastern townships, the English speaking portion of the province.

He never went to Quebec; he never spoke to the French-Canadian electors of Montreal; he never made a public appearance with my hon. friend the Minister of Public Works. Sir, there were obvious reasons for that. Part of the game was to denounce the hon. leader of the government as a traitor to Canada; part of the game was to denounce any naval assistance to Great Britain; and part of the game was to denounce also the conspiracy which existed between Lord Grey, the Governor of Canada, the Prime Minister and the leader of the opposition.

Sir, I say that the Nationalist party denounced the hon. leader of the government. My hon. friend the Minister of Public Works was present, if I mistake not, at a large gathering held at the old historic village of St. Eustache. There a resolution was adopted. One of the few exceptions who did not vote for that resolution was my hon. friend the member for Wright (Mr. Devlin). But my hon. friend the Minister of Public Works was there side by side with Mr. Bourassa. The resolution there presented was adopted, and in that resolution against the navy there was a severe indictment against the hon. leader of the opposition.

An hon. MEMBER. Read it.

Mr. LEMIEUX. It can be found in the papers of the day; but it is reported in Mr. Castell Hopkins' book, the 'Annual Register of 1910, thus:

Mr. Borden was condemned as having urged a no less nefarious policy than the hon. gentleman who leads the government.

I will read the resolution. I am sure that there was a good deal more than a little difference of opinion between the leader of the government and the Minister of Public Works. My hon. friend yesterday illustrated the whole situation when he said that he could find precedents in the old English constitutional history of cabinet ministers who were not on speaking terms with each other. From what I will quote, one would surmise that there are in our day and generation cabinet ministers who are not on speaking terms:

We blame the federal government and the parliamentary majority who have imposed on Canada this new naval law, who have launched this country into the vortex of militarism previously denounced with the same energy by Sir Wilfrid Laurier, who have endangered the peace of Canada and diverted to the construction of murderous engines and the preparation of bloody wars millions which were intended for the development of our agriculture and our systems of transportation. We also censure the attitude of Mr. Borden and the opposition behind him for the adoption of a policy in no way less nefarious.

Was my hon. friend the Minister of Public Works present at that meeting? I know he was present—I need not torture him by asking him that question. What policy was he denouncing then? The policy for which he had himself voted, although a year afterwards he stated in this House that he had not adhered to it.

Mr. MONK. In 1896 my hon. friend said: 'We are here and you are there.' I give the same answer now.

Mr. LEMIEUX. We have here the philosophy of the election. By advocating a double-barrelled policy, an imperialist policy in Ontario and a narrow Nationalist policy in Quebec, an unholy alliance has been formed, but who has made the sacrifice of his convictions? The prime minister or the Minister of Public Works? My hon. friend the member for Dorchester (Mr. Sevigny) who interrupted me a moment ago, will, I hope, for the sake of his reputation, deny having made the statements that are reported here in the 'Annual Register' of 1910. I will read for the benefit of the House what Mr. Albert Sevigny, a Quebec advocate, said at Tingwick on October 31, 1910:

The Laurier cabinet is a cabinet of imperialists, who want to sacrifice Canada's interests and to plunge us into wars with which we have nothing to do. The Navy Bill is an attempt by Ontario and the provinces of the west to coerce Quebec and enslave our people for ever. What has England ever done for you? She has no need of your help. She is strong enough to defend herself. Laurier's idea is to make you the vassals of the majority in the west. You must protest by your votes against this slave traffic. You must protest against helping England in her wars; unless you do, conscription will come next.

The same Mr. Sevigny, who nearly sang 'God Save the King' in his speech the other day in the House, who spoke with tears in his eyes of the 'Te Deum' and the 'Domine salvum fac regem' he has heard in the old cathedral of Quebec will, I am sure, deny this other statement. Mr. Sevigny said in Arthabaska—on All Saints' Day—imagine, Mr. Speaker:

The navy belongs to His Majesty. Is that a Canadian navy? Who is His Majesty? Have we any Majesty here? As to this naval taxation, it was wanted by the Lords of England——

I wish Lord Northcliffe were here:

—who will not pay taxation there and are striving to get it out of the colonies.

That was, Sir, the tenor of Nationalist oratory in the province of Quebec. That is probably why the coalition is there and why we are here.

Sir, what were the arguments generally used in the province of Quebec, by the Nationalist allies of the Prime Minister.

The hon. gentlemen who are in the coalition government and their Nationalist supporters stated that we owed nothing to Great Britain, that Canada was protected by the Monroe Doctrine, and that we did not care for England. They urged that if this Canadian navy were adopted, it would mean conscription, that the sons of our peasantry would be taken away from their homes, embarked in the dead of night on board Dreadnoughts and cruisers and carried away to distant seas, and there disembowelled by Japanese shells, Chinese bullets—they even spoke of Austrian balls.

Sir, do I exaggerate? Not in the least. I have here a list of the various pronouncements made on this subject by the leader of the Nationalist movement. At Grand-Mère, speaking with my friend the hon. gentleman who is to become your deputy, Mr. Bourassa, on September 26, 1910, said:

You can tell Mr. Laurier, that he has no right to impose such a law as this which will take away from us and from their homes the young men of this country. He has no right to tell the old mother: I want your son, the law of 1910 gives him to me.

At Farnham, speaking to the young men, he said:

England wants men and your children will be disembowelled on the distant African coast. Laurier has no sons and Mr. Borden has no sons.

We know that the hon. gentlemen have used that argument in every constituency in the province of Quebec—and it is a most despicable argument. I have here a speech delivered by Mr. Bourassa on the 20th of January, 1910, in which he denounces Mr. Borden, Sir Wilfrid Laurier and Earl Grey and states that the man towering over all the parliament of this country is his friend Mr. Monk:

The danger is to see men like Mr. Borden go back on thirty years of the best traditions of the Conservative party, go back on Sir John A. Macdonald and Sir Charles Tupper. When in 1878 reproach was made to Sir John A. Macdonald of the menace to the interests of the mother country involved in the adoption of a protective tariff. 'So much the worse for British connection,' was his answer.

And further:

The lesson which one must learn from the situation is that since ten years a conspiracy has existed between the two political parties. Each time that the great interests of the country are at stake, there is a conspiracy of cowardice and cupidity for office, the ones wanting to maintain themselves in office and the others to get into office.

And further:

In all that debate one man alone overtowers the House of Commons by his sincerity, by his patriotism and I have no hesitation in naming him, it is the member for Jacques Cartier (Mr. Monk).

Sir, the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Monk) stated that he had had only a little difference some time ago with the Prime Minister. I have here an extract from 'Le Devoir,' the Nationalist organ, telling us of a meeting at Drummondville, on October 27, 1910. Mr. Monk was speaking and he said:

We are against the navy because we have something better to do with our money than to spend it in buying ships to serve the conflicts and entanglements of Great Britain.

And a voice in the audience interjected:

What about Borden?

My friend the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Monk), with his cavernous though eloquent voice, answered:

Yes, my friend, I will speak of Borden. I have separated myself from Mr. Borden on that important question and I will continue to fight the battle with my friends the Nationalists as long as the battle shall not be won. We are not going to abdicate our rights and our principles for the sake of Mr. Borden.

And my hon. friend says that there was only a little difference of opinion in the coalition government!

Listen, now, to my good friend the genial Minister of Inland Revenue (Mr. Nantel). Speaking on the 21st of August, 1911, just a few weeks before he joined ranks with my distinguished friend the Minister of Finance (Mr. White), who knows that the voice of Toronto spoke during the last election, and who will tell me if this language is the expression of Toronto's opinion. The hon. Minster of Inland Revenue, as reported in 'Le Devoir,' the book of books, said:

For my part I thought I should separate myself from Mr. Borden on that vital question and if, as I hope, I become your member once more, I intend to maintain that independent attitude that I took then.

That was, Sir, the tenor of Nationalist oratory in the province of Quebec, and my hon. friends the members of the Nationalist party were encouraged primarily and chiefly by the head of the coalition, the Minister of Public Works. One has only to refer to the ambiguous and tortuous speeches which he made in 1910, one year after having given his support to that now famous motion, to see what he had in his mind. He wanted to arouse the feelings of the habitants of Quebec against Great Britain on the naval question. I remember listening to him one day when he used, in whispering tones, a quotation from Byron, and as I am a great reader of Byron, I noted the quotation. It was on the 12th of January, 1910, when he was explaining to the House that he had not voted for the motion alluded to a moment ago:

Can we not more properly be likened to those who, from Gaul and Germania and Dacia, were brought down to Rome to enter the Roman armies and the Roman arena and who had no representation in the councils of the Roman republic. This is the condition which, I submit, this plan——

Which he had approved,

—is imposing on us and it reminds me of the man in the gladiatorial arena dying.

And then he quotes Byron:

He heard it, but he heeded not—his eyes
Were with his heart, and that was far away;
He recked not of the life he lost nor prize,
But where his rude hut by the Danube lay,
There were his young barbarians all at play.

'Our sons.'

There was their Dacian mother—he, their sire,
Butchered to make a Roman holiday——

The 'Japanese bullets' and the 'Chinese shells.'

All this rushed with his blood—shall he expire
And unavenged? Arise, ye Goths, and glut your ire.

Byronic oratory. But give me the Nationalist oratory of the province of Quebec. Addressing myself to you, Mr. Speaker, an honest and convinced imperialist, I have no hesitation in saying that in Quebec if the coalition won any seats, they won them through duplicity, demagogy and sectionalism. Though there were losses on our side, yet Quebec was not all stampeded. There were a few redeeming features—Rouville, for instance.

In contrast with all this, what was the attitude of the Liberal party in our province on this naval question First, we opposed the referendum. On what grounds? We said this was not the British method of solving a difficulty. We accepted the language of the Lord Chancellor of Great Britain:

The word and the thing are utterly unfamiliar in this country. We live under representative government. The electors control both policy and legislation by choosing members to represent them in the House of Commons, to whom is left the duty, not only of settling the scheme and clauses of a Bill, but also of keeping in or driving out the ministers of the Crown. The referendum, in any of its numerous varieties, means that a direct question is to be put to the electorate over the head of its representatives. It supersedes representative government so far as it is adopted. How far, will depend upon the variety you choose.

Sir, we stood by the British constitutional doctrine. Then, we stood united in favour of a Canadian navy as set forth in the resolution unanimously adopted by the House of Commons in 1909. We have suffered a few losses; but we still adhere to the principle of a Canadian navy to serve in co-operation with the British navy in case the supremacy of Great Britain is endangered. In our judgment, this Canadian navy means the creation ot a new national institution, responsive to the demands of the future: it means the placing on our own shoulders of the burden of national defence; it means the development of our national life on these lines and of self-government within the empire which has brought us liberty and peace; it means the expenditure of money in our own way; it means the employment of our own sailors and of our own mechanics; it means the opening of new channels for the activity the ambitions, the enthusiasm of our young men.

This was, in concrete form the policy voted upon and adhered to by the House, and maintained by the Liberal party during the elections. It was also the policy to which adhesion was given by hon. gentlemen opposite, but not adhered to by them during the electoral campaign. What has happened since? My hon. frriend from Pictou (Mr. Macdonald) is not what we call in French un naïf. But I must tell him he is very indiscreet. He asked my hon. friend the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Monk) what were the terms of the coalition. Sir, we had that hon. gentleman's answer this afternoon: You are there, and we are here. Let me remind my hon. friend of an episode. There are coalitions and alliances, which like marriage, are based on love, friendship and affection. But there are coalitions and alliances also that are based on common hatred and common ambition. Has my hon. friend read—I am sure he has read—of the incident of the meeting of Napoleon I. with the Czar Alexander on the Niemen. Does he recollect that every historian has expressed surprise that Napoleon, the son of the revolution, should have attempted to make an alliance with that autocrat and descendant of autocrats, the Czar of Russia? But it is all explained when one reads the accounts of that meeting. It is said that as they met Alexander rushed up to Napoleon, and embracing him shouted, 'Sir, I hate England as much as you do.' And Napoleon's rejoinder was, 'Then, peace exists between us.' Sir, one can surmise that, after the election, when the hon. Minister of Public Works representing the revolutionary Nationalists of Quebec met at Ottawa the new leader of the government who represented the old traditions of sound imperialism and sturdy Toryism, the leader of the government must have told the Minister of Public Works, 'Yes, I hate Laurier as much as you do—and I love power as much as you do.' And one can imagine what was the rejoinder of the Minister of Public Works, 'Then peace exists between us.'

Sir, they speak of mergers. This is the acme of mergering. They have merged common hatreds, they have merged common ambition, aye and principles too.

My hon. friend the Minister of Marine and Fisheries (Mr. Hazen) stated the other day—referring, I suppose to the last Order in Council which I signed in my very short career as Minister of Marine and Fisheries—that this plan of a Canadian navy would be obsolete and expensive, and that he was going to consult the Admiralty and would bring back a policy which would commend itself not only to Canada, but to the British Empire. I feel quite sure that the Nationalist leaders will accept any policy which will be propounded by that most loyal of loyalists, the Minister of Marine and Fisheries when he comes back from England. But they must realize if they are true to themselves, that the Canadian navy as submitted to the electors of Canada has also been submitted to the British Admiralty, that the autonomous principle of that navy had been accepted by the British authorities, and that we had made a step forward in our nationhood. And if what I surmise happens, if we are called upon to contribute in cash or Dreadnoughts some people will regret their debasing alliance.

Sir, if, instead of a Canadian navy, we are called upon to contribute cash or Dreadnoughts, it will not be a step forward but will be a step backward in the history of our country.

My hon. friend has passed judgment on the Canadian naval plan. He has had no time, I am sure, to study it during the few weeks he has been in office. Let me remind him that experienced naval architects like Sir William White have passed judgment on such schemes as ours. I will not weary the House in reading the opinion of Sir William White, but I will send it over to my hon. friend, and he will see that the chief naval architect of the British Admiralty favours the plan which the late government had adopted. So my hon. friend was rather hasty when he said the other evening that our proposed navy would be expensive to construct and obsolete when completed. Moreover, let me refer my hon. friend to the last conference held in London in the month of June, 1911. At this conference the Canadian naval scheme of the late government was accepted by the British Admiralty and by the British government. Sir, it is our pride to know that we, who have been accused and denounced for being anti-British, anti-imperialists, are at one with the Prime Minister of Great Britain. In his speech the other day at the Guildhall dinner, Mr. Asquith stated that before the coronation he had had an opportunity of consulting the Prime Ministers and various other ministers of the empire, and that they had adopted a common policy in matters of defence, a policy of co-operation, not of concentration. His statement was only a paraphrase of the words spoken by the right hon. gentleman, the leader of the opposition, at a previous conference, I think in 1907, when he stated that true imperial unity was based altogether on local autonomy. This is the policy which guides the Liberal party in Canada, this is the ideal of the Liberal party, not only in Canada but in Great Britain, and in every self-governing colony.

My hon. friend the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Monk) stated in beginning his remarks that the right hon. gentleman who leads the opposition was morose, and in very bad humour. Well, if I compare the speeches, and the attitudes of the two gentlemen who delivered them I should say that my hon. friend who was so fervid, so definite and so unfaltering in his defence of Nationalist principles during the elections, gave a very poor exhibition of himself this afternoon in the House. Let me say that when he accuses the leader of the Liberal party of having always incited passions and prejudices in the minds of his fellow countrymen, he did not speak the truth, Mr. Speaker,—I do not mean in any unparliamentary sense, I mean to say that he knows better. If you examine the career of the right hon. gentleman you will find that ever since boyhood, ever since he entered the political arena, he has been an advocate of tolerance, between the various races of this Dominion. Who has not read the speech delivered by the right hon. gentleman on political Liberalism, in 1877, when he addressed his fellow countrymen? He told them that in trying to form a party based on racial and religious lines they became the worst enemies of themselves and of their country. He said:

> You wish to organize a Catholic party. But have you not considered that if you have the misfortune to succeed, you will draw down upon your country calamities of which it is impossible to foresee the consequences.
> You wish to organize all the Catholics into one party, without other bond, without other basis, than a common religion; but have you not reflected that, by the very fact, you will organize the Protestant population as a single party and that then, instead of the peace and harmony now prevailing between the different elements of the Canadian population, you throw open the door to war, a religious war, the most terrible of all wars?

Mr. Speaker, you are probably not aware of what occurred during the last election in the province of Quebec, you were too busy in your own constituency. But we were told that this Nationalist party was to form in the House of Commons a Catholic centre, with a Herr Windthorst for leader, and that the leader of that Catholic party would be my hon. friend the Minister of Public Works, assisted by the Postmaster General (Mr. Pelletier), and the Minister of Inland Revenue (Mr. Nantel). They were going to hold the balance of power between the two parties. Sir, there are good, honest and pious souls in the province of Quebec this day who expect that to-morrow, after this address has presumably been adopted, the hon. gentlemen who are now installed in our seats, will repeal the Autonomy Bill of 1905. Yes, they will repeal clause 16, and give to the Northwest a system of separate schools as we have in Quebec. Sir, in the province of Quebec, there are good, honest and pious souls, who earnestly believe that the Manitoba school question will be revised by our genial friend the Minister of the Interior; there are good and pious souls who believe that we, who have taken away from the French Canadians of the Northwest their mother tongue, are at last supplanted by men who to-morrow, or the day after to-morrow, will reinstate in the constitutional instrument of 1905 a clause by which the French Canadian minority will be given the official use of the French language. Time and again during the last campaign they made those promises, and I commend their appeals to my hon. friend the Minister of the Interior. Sir, this is how we suffered some reverses, some losses. But we are not discouraged, we still stand by our policy, and above all we adhere to our ideals and our aspirations. Opposition with its duties, is a nobler occupation than the exercises of power with its interests.

The aims of Liberalism are far higher and far nobler than those that power and patronage can proffer or give them.

Mr. Speaker, we stand by our policy and I can predict that the day is not far distant when my hon. friend the Minister of Trade and Commerce will rise from his seat in the House and, inspired by that stout imperialism that is his, will denounce the very men who to-day have formed a coalition with him. He will find that, having sown the seed of trouble, there will be germinated in this country a war of races, a war of aggression and defence.

An hon. MEMBER. No sir.

Mr. LEMIEUX. Yes, Mr. Speaker, I know whereof I speak. I have quoted the speeches delivered by the alliance—the unholy alliance—in the province of Quebec, and I can foresee the day when that very alliance will have, I will not say imperilled, the country which we inhabit, in which we live, but will surely have shattered to pieces the present combination.

Mr. A. A. MONDOU (Yamaska). Mr. Speaker, I would claim the indulgence which is usually granted by the House to an hon. member addressing it for the first time. I beg hon. members to excuse me if I make use of any unparliamentary language during the course of my speech, but I can assure you that I will always be ready to withdraw anything that I should not say. The hon. member for Rouville (Mr. Lemieux), has just explained to the House some of the defeats that this party has suffered during the last fifteen years and he says that he is happier than we are because his party never lost one election. But, it did lose one on the 21st of September, and I can sympathize with hon. gentlemen opposite because I suffered four defeats in the interest of a cause that I am going to explain to you in the few minutes that I propose to address this House. In 1896 I delivered addresses on the hustings all through the province of Quebec. In 1891 I took part in the election campaign of that year. In 1897 I was elected in the local House at Quebec, suffered defeat on Nov. 22, 1897, on Dec. 16 of the same year I ran for the Federal House in 1900 and I suffered defeat. The principle which the Liberal party is putting forth to-day is one to which the Liberal-Conservative party of the Cartier-Macdonald school would never give adherence because it is well known to us all that those great leaders ever stood for equality and liberty in this country. The first racial cry that was ever raised in the province of Quebec was on this same Manitoba school question that the hon. member for Rouville has just made allusion to. If I do speak perhaps without sufficient preparation it is to thank the thirty-three members who, in 1896, upheld the principles of Cartier and Macdonald, by voting for the Remedial Bill and who suffered defeat in Ontario and other provinces of Canada for the stand which they took. They had to fight the double-faced policy of their opponents. When we look at the foundation of that policy we see where it originated. If I am well informed there was a caucus at the Russell House in 1896 of the leaders of the Opposition at that time over the Remedial Bill which was then before the House. They were discussing the question of introducing a motion in amendment to the Bill. A very shrewd man from our province, and who at one time occupied the position of Minister of Public Works in this country, went into the caucus and said: What are you doing here? They said: We are preparing an amendment to be moved to the Remedial Bill and we propose to move the six months hoist. He said: Why, the six months hoist? They said: That is very easy; we will go to the province of Quebec and say the Bill does not give enough to the French Canadians and we will go to Ontario and say that it gives too much. Well, we were in the game and we were forced to stay there for fifteen years. I wish I could explain to this House the opposition that was offered to the Conservative party by reason of these appeals in the province of Quebec, because if I could, I have no doubt but that hon. gentlemen would stand side by side with the young people from the province of Quebec who have suffered defeat so often for the sake of the principles for which we have contended, and who are now looking for that honest administration that we hope the business men sitting in the ministers' seats will give to this country for many years to come.

There is one point that I want to put before this House, and I am going right in to follow the hon. member for Rouville. I see that I have something interesting to say to this House because I am pleased to observe that my hon. friends are in their places in the House. We will go over every matter that has been discussed by the hon. member for Rouville, and first of all I will state one fact. If you ever saw the hon. member who is addressing the House now on a political platform side by side with Henri Bourassa, or if Henri Bourassa ever came into his constituency, well, I am a dead man. If you can prove that I ever addressed a public meeting at which Henri Bourassa was present, except as an opponent, I will acknowledge that I am in the wrong. When Mr. Bourassa was assisting the Liberal party in 1893, in the by-election in the county of Soulanges in which Mr. Bain was elected, he was present in the interest of the Liberal party, and I was there for the Conservative party. That is the only time that we were ever on the same platform together. Now, I give you this explanation purposely because I can judge Mr. Bourassa frankly, and openly and give the House the real opinion I shall pass upon him without being accused of partiality. You are looking at the source of the prosperity that this country has had the opportunity to enjoy for the last fifteen years.

I have put this question to my opponents on the hustings in the province of Quebec, and I never yet have received a business answer. I do not go in for oratory in my speeches; my business is banking, insurance and commerce; I have no time to spare for fine phrases and rhetoric; I have left that branch of literature alone since I was in the seminary. The hon. member for Rouville (Mr. Lemieux) commenced his speech by talking of the price of this and the price of that commodity, and he claimed that the Laurier government was responsible for the enhanced prices, but there was a little purchase, the last made by the Laurier administration which had not been explained yet, and that is the purchase of Mr. Leduc in the Quebec East election campaign. I suppose we will get an explanation of that some day. Let me ask hon. gentlemen to look at the condition this country was in 1878, as compared with its prosperous condition in 1911. In 1878 business was bad and the country was passing through a financial crisis. Who saved the country then and started it on the career of prosperity? It was the government of Sir John Macdonald, and the prosperity of to-day is due to the protectionist policy introduced by him. True, the ministers of the Conservative government sought to make commercial arrangements at Washington which would be beneficial to Canada, but they never yet pretended that they would take down the wall of protection that existed between the two countries. When the Liberals came to power they found the policy of protection inaugurated by Sir John Macdonald in force, and thanks to the fact that they continued that policy the prosperity of the country continued. I am ready to praise the right hon. leader of the opposition when he deserves praise ; I have always taken personal gratification in recognizing his integrity and his honour, but I must say that before he can be placed amongst the roll of Canadian statesmen he has got to show that he did something in power which he advocated when in opposition. I am afraid the right hon. gentleman will have to admit that during his fifteen years as leader of the government of this country, his consistent course was to carry out the measures of his Conservative predecessors which he denounced before he attained power. I cannot believe, Sir, that such a man is a statesman in the proper sense of the word. And, as to prosperity, there is no doubt that the butter and cheese industry in the province of Quebec is in a prosperous condition, a fact which has been taken hold of by the Liberal orators to tell the people that the increased price of these commodities was due to the Laurier government. Well, the process of making butter and cheese is just the same process as it was fifteen years ago and the increased price is because of educational methods adopted by the government of the province of Quebec when the government of that province was led by Conservative ministers. These hon. gentlemen opposite when in power did not want the people to be consulted on the question of reciprocity just as they did not want to consult the people on the naval question. They told us that there was no necessity for consulting the people on the reciprocity measure that the people were in favour of it, but when they were forced to appeal to the people they got a big surprise. I believe they will get a similar surprise when the people come to pronounce on the naval question. And, Sir, I would tell my hon. friend from Rouville that the ideas of the Nationalist party in Quebec on the navy question are not peculiar to them. I will tell my hon. friend that the members from the province of Quebec supporting the government are not afraid of our fellow members from the other provinces sitting side by side with us, and as to the opinion held on the navy by other than the Quebec Nationalists, I might quote from an English paper, the Winnipeg 'Saturday Post,' in its issue of October 14th.

At 6 o'clock, the House took recess.

After Recess.

House resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. MONDOU. Mr. Speaker, I have the honour to move that the debate be adjourned.

Motion agreed to.

Mr. MONK. Mr. Speaker, I believe that, in view of the condition of the electric light, *it would be preferable for the House to adjourn, and I would move accordingly.

Motion agreed to, and House adjourned at 8.05 p.m.

* Owing to an accident in the electric power during the recess, all the lights in the building went out, so that at the hour for resuming the sitting the Chamber was in complete darkness.—Debates Reporter.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

FRIDAY, November 24, 1911.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

CANADA SHIPPING ACT AMENDMENT.

Mr. SPEAKER. Yesterday, at my request, the hon. member for Frontenac (Mr. Edwards) withdrew his Bill to amend the Canada Shipping Act in order that I should consider a little more fully the question as to whether the same should not be introduced upon a resolution in Committee of the Whole.

Rule 50 is well understood:

No Bill relating to trade or the alteration of the laws concerning trade is to be brought into the House until the same shall have been considered in Committee of the Whole.

Bourinot, 3rd edition p. 635, states as follows:

Bills regulating harbours, pilotage and shipping. . . have always been based on resolutions passed in committee.

References are made to the journals of 1873, 1874 and 1878 in confirmation of this principle. All the cases in these notes fully bear out the practice I have indicated as being the correct one. I wish, therefore, to be understood as ruling accordingly.

RAILWAY ACT AMENDMENT.

Mr. MEIGHEN moved for leave to introduce Bill (No. 7) to amend the Railway Act. He said: This is the Bill which I introduced in the last session of the late parliament, but which, owing to amendments to the Railway Act brought forward by the late government to affect a similar result, did not reach its second reading. The purpose of the Bill is to remedy a grievance of many years' standing particularly in western Canada in regard to the killing and injuring of animals at large. The present state of the law leaves the burden of relief, in the event of animals being killed or injured, on the railway companies, but it leaves that burden in so light a form that the companies in practically every instance are able to escape liability. The burden of proof now resting on the railway companies is simply to show that an animal killed or injured on their right of way got at large in the first instance through the negligence or wilful act of the owner. That provision, I believe, has proved very satisfactory in the east where the running at large of animals is strictly circumscribed, but in the further west it has proved utterly inadequate, because in practically all cases animals that meet with death or injury in this way are in the first instance allowed at large by wilful act of the owners, and necessarily so. The Act which I now introduce leaves the burden on the company still, but it places the burden in a different form, and compels the railway company in order to escape liability, to show not that the animal got at large through the wilful act of the owner, but that it got upon their right of way without any neglect or omission on the part of the railway company. It leaves the burden where it is, but alters the character of the burden.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the first time.

CANADIAN MISSIONARIES IN CHINA.

Hon. R. L. BORDEN (Prime Minister). In respect to the matter brought to my attention by the hon. member for South Essex (Mr. Clarke) yesterday in reference to the safety of missionaries, in the disturbed district in China, I find on inquiry that on the 18th instant a telegram was sent by the Governor General's secretary, at the request of the Secretary of State for External Affairs, in consequence of representations received from a gentleman in Toronto, asking the foreign office to obtain all information possible respecting the murder of a Canadian missionary. I find further that late yesterday afternoon a telegram was received by His Royal Highness the Governor General, from the Secretary of State for the Colonies, to the effect that His Majesty's minister at Pekin had not been able to obtain any confirmation of the report of the murder of any Canadian missionary.

FRENCH EDITION OF 'HANSARD.'

Mr. ETHIER. I wish to bring before the government a matter deserving the most urgent consideration with regard to the publication of the French edition of 'Hansard.'

Last year the Debates Committee adopted regulations and made arrangements with the Printing Bureau to have the French translation of the debates reach the members not later than forty-eight hours after the delivery of the speeches. This morning the French 'Hansard' distributed was dated only November 20, four days late. I am informed by the chief translator that the translation has been made day by day, and the report of the Printing Bureau reached the chief translator this morning for Wednesday although it has not been distributed here. There may be something wrong at the distribution office at the Printing Bureau. I do not complain of the French translators, who are now translating yesterday's debate, and have kept the translation up from day to day, but I hope the government will see that the arrangements made last year are carried out so that we shall receive the French version not more than forty-eight hours after the delivery of the speeches.

Mr. BORDEN. I have no knowledge of this matter. The debates are entirely under the charge of the House, and I suppose this matter is one for the consideration of the Debates Committee. That committee has not been constituted, as the committees are not usually struck until after the conclusion of the debate on the address. However, I shall make inquiry of the officers of the House as to the cause of the difficulty and ask if it is possible to provide some remedy. This is not the first time the same difficulty has been brought to the attention of the House; I recollect that the matter was raised in much the same way during several previous sessions. If the hon. gentleman has any suggestions to make as to how the difficulty may be obviated, I would be very glad if he would make them to me privately.

LONGSHOREMEN'S STRIKE IN MONTREAL.

Mr. LEMIEUX. I do not see the Minister of Labour (Mr. Crothers) in his place, but I suppose in his absence the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Monk) might answer my question in regard to the longshoremen's strike in Montreal. I notice by the newspapers that the strike has been settled, and I would like to know whether the longshoremen have accepted only a temporary settlement, and if they have applied to the Department of Labour for an investigation.

Mr. MONK. I am not in a position to answer my hon. friend's question. I will communicate with the Minister of Labour.

ADDRESS IN REPLY TO THE SPEECH OF HIS ROYAL HIGHNESS.

House resumed the adjourned debate on the motion of Mr. Bennett (Calgary): For an address to His Royal Highness the Governor General, in reply to his Speech at the opening of the session, and the proposed amendment of Sir Wilfrid Laurier thereto.

Mr. A. A. MONDOU (Yamaska). When my remarks yesterday were interrupted by the six o'clock recess, I was about to quote an article from the Winnipeg 'Saturday Post' showing that the Nationalists of Quebec were not the only people in this country who entertained some doubt about the Laurier naval policy. I will read this article from the Winnipeg 'Saturday Post' of the 14th of October last:

> It had been predicted that the new premier would be quite incapable of dealing with the Nationalist following of Mr. Bourassa, and at the same time retain the loyal support of certain ultra-British sections of the country. The cabinet as sworn in by Earl Grey as his last official act in this country indicates that this prediction was wrong. One or two men—very able men by the way—who were more or less closely associated with the Nationalists during the campaign have been taken into the government. This is a clear indication that they have become reconciled with Mr. Borden's policy—for it would be absurd to believe that he had taken a step in their direction, in view of the fact that he has a very substantial majority even without the Nationalist support. So far as the naval question is concerned, up to a certain point there is practically no difference between the policy of the Nationalists and the policy of Mr. Borden. The Nationalists do not believe in a navy at all, but they have recognized the fact all along that if the people of Canada vote for a navy that navy will have to be built. Mr. Borden, as leader of the opposition, argued that the building of a Canadian navy was a mistake—he favoured assistance in the upbuilding of the British navy—but he, like the Nationalists, made his chief fight against the Laurier government's naval policy on the ground that no such radical undertaking should be proceeded with until the voice of the people had been heard concerning it. Now that Mr. Borden is at the head of the government in Canada he has the opportunity to refer the whole question to the people—when Conservatives, Liberals, and Nationalists alike will have the opportunity to express their opinion on this one subject without other questions being introduced to its confusion. If the Canadian people should support the naval policy, then all legitimate reason for Nationalist agitation will logically vanish. This makes it evident that the Nationalist problem is no such terrible question as some would have us believe.

This article proves conclusively that this naval question is not so enormously important as our hon. friends sitting on your left would have us believe. Let me say here that I intend to speak briefly, and the House will realize the difficulty under which I am labouring in addressing this House for the first time in the language of the majority. During the last campaign in the province of Quebec, I attended many meetings where Mr. Bourassa and his friends addressed the people, and notably I was present at the famous meeting at St. Hyacinthe, also at important meetings in Fraserville and Three Rivers, and I assert on my responsibility as a member of this House, that on no occasion were the speeches of Mr. Bourassa and his friends such as could not be repeated in any part of this country, whether in Toronto, Vancouver, Montreal, Halifax, or any other place. We must deal with all these questions without prejudice, openly and aboveboard; and I say there is not a member of this House who can state from the records of this parliament during the last session that the Prime Minister of this country and the Minister of Public Works ever differed on the naval question. They differed on the question of urgency, and they did differ when they were then speaking from the opposition benches. They did not differ at all on the wisdom of consulting the people of this country before embarking on such an important matter as the building of a navy. Let me call your attention to what was said by the hon. member for Rouville (Mr. Lemieux) in 1903. He wrote a letter to Mr. Bourassa in which he stated that the very important question of our future relations with the British Empire must be carefully dealt with, and after due consideration, because it was one of the most important problems this country would ever have to solve for many years to come.

But the great question before the electors in the last campaign was reciprocity. The House had sat here for nine months, and the Liberal organs throughout the country were complaining that the opposition was wasting the people's money without cause. But what was the result? Some say that in the last election in Quebec the navy question was the most important one, others say that the question of reciprocity and protection was the main issue, and still others say that in the other provinces of this country reciprocity was the main issue. However, the people in those provinces condemned the late government. The members sitting to the right of the Chair are those who have always advocated and applied the principles of the Liberal Conservative party in this country, and they will give very careful consideration to these matters. We come from the people. We have not been fifteen years in power and believe that this country is ours. We still believe in the great voice of the people. They spoke eloquently on September 21 last, and they can speak again to-morrow on the policy that the Liberal Conservative party will adopt on the naval question if it is necessary. Hon. gentlemen opposite try to create disunion among the members sitting at the right of the Speaker by introducing questions in regard to Nationalists, Bourassa and the like, but I can assure them that they are wasting their own time and that of this House by such tactics. This navy question, this question of the Nationalists and of Bourassa, is not the all-important question they believe it is, because, as I have already stated, there is not a French Canadian in this country who will not be ready to accept the verdict of the majority of the people whether it be for or against the proposal which may be placed before them regarding the naval question. I do not say this because Mr. Bourassa came into my constituency to help me, and am, therefore, most kindly disposed towards him, but the fact is that in many cases his statements have been grossly misrepresented. I hope and trust that opportunities will be afforded Mr. Bourassa of addressing the people of Canada from Vancouver to Halifax if necessary on this important question because his statements in many instances have been falsified and wrongly interpreted.

This Nationalist movement, let me tell the House was first started in the province of Quebec in 1896. My hon. friends opposite will remember the great noise and trouble they raised in that province over the purchase of a million dollars worth of rifles to equip the Canadian militia. I suppose they will all remember the inflamed appeals that they made to the French Canadians there, stating that the purchase of these rifles was to enable the government of that day to give rifles to every one of the children of the French Canadian people that they might go and fight for England over the seas. For proof of that I will refer you to the French Liberal organs of the province of Quebec. I do not want to deal at any great length with these matters, but I might recall the fact that when the late Minister of Marine and Fisheries (Mr. Brodeur) undertook to quote an article from a Nationalist paper, it was discovered that the paper from which he proposed to quote was 'Le Canada. We absolutely understand in the province of Quebec that every citizen of this country is entitled to express his opinion on a matter of this kind affecting our future relations with the motherland, and we realize that we must submit to the vote of the people properly expressed upon this subject. That is what every man in the province of Quebec, belonging to the Liberal-Conservative party, or to the Nationalist party, if such exists, is prepared to do. They talk about the Nationalist party, but it must be remembered that Mr. Bourassa never claimed to be a party man, either Liberal-Conservative or Nationalist. He has a right to his opinion and the opinion of Mr. Bour-assa calls for serious consideration. He is a high-minded man, he is well educated, he has had the honour to occupy a seat in this House and, therefore, I say his opinion is worthy of consideration. It has been my good fortune to travel through the provinces of Quebec, Ontario, Manitoba, Alberta and Saskatchewan, since last session, and to have become acquainted with public opinion upon the navy question, and I have no hesitation in saying that the opinion as I heard it expressed in those provinces absolutely conforms to the principles that were laid down by the Prime Minister when he was sitting on the opposition benches. There was a motion made in this House asking for a plebiscite on this question, emanating from the opposition benches, and I feel sure that the Liberal-Conservative party will settle this matter in a satisfactory manner after an opportunity has been given to the people to express their views upon it.

What was the trouble that caused Mr. Bourassa to leave the Liberal party? He was a Liberal and he is still a Liberal. In 1896 the right hon. leader of the opposition had stated to the people of Quebec that if returned to power he would give full and complete justice to Catholics and French Canadians of Manitoba. When the right hon. gentleman was returned to power, the right hon. Sir Charles Tupper came back as leader of the opposition and said to the then Prime Minister: Bring back the Remedial Bill before this House and I am willing to take the same stand that I took with regard to it when I was Prime Minister. It was then that Mr. Bourassa began to lose confidence in his leader. Later on, when the question of the schools in the Northwest and the use of the French language in the legislatures of the new provinces came up in connection with a law that was recognized as right by Sir Charles Fitzpatrick, what happened? There was another volte face by the leader of the opposition and Mr. Bourassa's confidence in his leader was further shaken.

Mr. Bourassa has confidence that the party of Cartier, of Macdonald, and of the present Prime Minister will solve the important problems before our nation; he believes that the principles of these great Canadians must prevail in this Dominion of ours. The present government has the confidence of the Nationalist party; it has the confidence of all the Conservatives of Canada; it has the confidence of all Canadians who desire peace and harmony to prevail and who want to kill for ever the evils of disunion, discord, race cries and appeals to religious prejudices. The people of Canada voted against the late administration for, among other reasons, the scandals of mal-administration they were guilty of during the last seven or eight years. Look at the Quebec bridge affair, look at the little paint business of Mr. Lanctot the late member for Richelieu, look at the McGillicuddy-Oliver affair. The people of the province of Quebec wanted to know something about that matter, although it occurred in the far west, and they were deprived of knowing the particulars of it by the dissolution of parliament. Sir, the late government had been too long in power; they had arrived at that stage when the people of Canada thought it time to put them in opposition where I hope they will remain for a long time and where, judging by their appeals to religious prejudices and their efforts to sow disunion between the two great races of the country, they will remain for a long time. The hon. member for Rouville (Mr. Lemieux) stated yesterday that I was sitting to the right of the Speaker on false pretenses so far as reciprocity is concerned. Well, I am the manager of the Quebec and Western Canada Land Syndicate, Limited, which owns and farms some lands at Wainwright, Alberta, in the constituency of the hon. member for Strathcona. We grow wheat there and I had to look closely into the question as to whether the Fielding-Patterson pact would benefit us. I have no doubt and I never had any doubt that the policy which should prevail in Canada is the policy adopted in 1878 by the Conservative party. I told my electors of Yamaska that I would study carefully this important question, and in my study of it I saw that one day the late Minister of Marine (Mr. Lemieux) told the people of Farnham that under reciprocity the farmers would sell their products at a higher price, while on the same day the ex-Secretary of State (Hon. Chas. Murphy) was telling the workingmen of his constituency that under reciprocity the workingmen would get the farm products they consumed at cheaper prices. This caused me to pause. Yamaska is a hay-growing country and there is a duty of $4 a ton on hay entering the United States, and I told the farmers that their interests were identical with mine because on flaxseed grown in Western Canada, there was a duty of ten cents a bushel when sold in Duluth or Minneapolis and hay sold at $12 or $14 a ton and flaxseed at $2 or $2.25 a bushel. I told my electors that if as manager of the Quebec and Western Canada Land Syndicate I was obliged to take a position antagonistic to what I considered the general welfare of Canada I would step out of the management of that Company. Well, what happened. The railway companies thinking that the reciprocity pact would go through raised the freight rates on hay from Canada to the United States by $1 per ton, and I was startled to see that the benefit which the farmers might get was to be absorbed by the railway companies. I have no hesitation in saying now that in my opinion the question of reciprocity with the United States will never succeed in this country from a national point of view. Twice in 40 years, in 1878 and again in 1911 the people of Canada pronounced against it, and if the Liberal party still sticks to it they will get some more kicks when they again come before the electors. In my opinion, Sir, on all great national issues of the day, the Liberal-Conservatives of this country have the full confidence of the manufacturers; they have as well the full confidence of the farming community, and the endorsation of the whole Dominion. It is not correct to say that the present government is sustained by the mergers, the trusts, and the corporations. Sir, the present government has the support and sympathy of the farming constituencies of this country just as it has the support of the cities. Racial and religious appeals have never succeeded in this country, and never will succeed no matter how much gentlemen to the left of the Speaker may try to make them prevail. The Liberal-Conservative party based on the principles of Cartier and Macdonald, principles which are dear to the present Prime Minister, stands for equity, stands for justice, and stands for equal rights to the people of all Canada, whether they live in the east or in the west.

To emphasize that fact, I may say that although living sixty-five miles east of Montreal I have not been afraid to go to western Canada and start a farm there; and I am pleased to say that in the syndicate for that purpose with me are the hon. member for Rouville (Mr. Lemieux), the hon. member for Kamouraska (Mr. Lapointe) and the hon. member for Temiscouata (Mr. Gauvreau), and we are farming together in the large and prosperous province of Alberta. Mr. Speaker, I hope that before long all we poor farmers will come to the same idea, that we had better develop our home market without bringing competition from elsewhere, and make this country great and prosperous. I have heard with great pleasure the speeches which have been delivered here by the hon. member for Brandon (Mr. Aikins) and the hon. member for Calgary (Mr. Bennett). They have the western optimism. If the people of eastern Canada would go oftener to the west, better relations between the east and the west would naturally prevail. I would like to see more French Canadians from my province go and see those great prairie provinces, and become citizens of them and help their development. I would like to see in every part of this Dominion people who, while speaking their different languages and practising their different religions, would unite together to make this great Dominion as prosperous as the great Republic to the south. What has made it the great Republic it is, if it is not protection? The Americans wanted our natural resources, they wanted our fertile soil, they wanted our prairie provinces, as their soil has lost its fertility. They have a large population, and they wanted this great and fertile Canada. For my part, as long as I live, I shall always, whether in this House or elsewhere, stand for Canada and Canadians. In closing my speech, I beg the indulgence of the House for the imperfect way in which I have addressed it in the English language; but I do not want to close without saying that the motto of every Canadian whether he is English, French or nay other nationality should be, 'a Canadina I was born and a Canadian I will die.'

(Translation.) Mr. Speaker, I did not wish to end this speech which I have just made in the English language, without addressing a few words to the House in the language which is dear to me, in the language which I speak every day.

I had not time to prepare my speech upon a subject so important as is the address in answer to the speech from the Throne. Nevertheless, I desired to explain before this House and before the country the stand which I have taken during the last campaign. I think I have defined my position, in a clear and satisfactory manner.

The remarks from the hon. member for Rouville (Mr. Lemieux) about me, when he insinuated that I had sympathies for, and that even I had declared myself in favour of, the reciprocity pact, rendered it necessary that I should define my position as regards that policy. I do not wish to be called a politician sailing under false colours, nor being the victom of false representations.

I know that the speech I just delivered in the English language will be translated into French, and it will be easy for everyone to see that I have explained my position clearly and to the best of my ability.

I will have during this parliament some other occasion to speak before this House upon the questions which may be brought by the hon. members opposite, and I will do it in such a way that no doubt can be left as to my position in this House.

Mr. ALPHONSE VERVILLE (Maisonneuve). Mr. Speaker, I wish to occupy the time of this House in this debate, for a short time only. I was rather surprised that the speech from the Throne contained not a single word with regard to labour. The reason for this omission I am not able to state; but it seems to me that there should have been in that speech some reference to that subject. Mr. Speaker, I am not going in detail into many matters. It is not my intention to try the Nationalist party, neither is it my intention to defend them; that is not my mission. I want to discuss two of the points which have been raised in this debate. At the outset let me say that I do not believe that the present government has a right to boast of its success any more than the present opposition has a right to mourn over its defeat. I believe, and I think I am correct in saying, that the change means the success of the trusts over the masses of the people of the country. Members on the other side of the House, and even members on this side, may not agree with me in that; but I will explain briefly some of the work of the trusts in the last campaign. I have heard a good deal here about waving the flag and about Canada for Canadians. I do not believe that people who talk so much about their loyalty are really sincere. It seems to me that there is something else to do besides protesting constantly one's love for the flag and one's loyalty to His Majesty. During the last campaign there was a good deal of misrepresentation. The trusts may be well satisfied with their work, and they are probably well represented in the present government. While they are in power they can take the advantage which it is their disposition to take, because I do not believe that they will have the same power in the near future. The masses of the people in this country are commencing to understand that great conglomerations of capital against the interests of the masses of the people have to come to an end; and if they do come to an end, it will only be through the strong pressure of the masses.

During the late campaign a great point was made by hon. gentlemen opposite, when they ridiculed the statement that if we had reciprocity our farmers would get more for their goods than they do at present, and at the same time our consumers would pay less. But those hon. gentlemen carefully left out of sight the fact that there is a third party in the case, apart from the farmers and the consumers, and that party is the trusts. The trusts stood between the farmers and the consumers, and reaped an immense profit by forcing the farmer to take what prices they chose to give, and forcing the latter to pay what prices they chose to exact. For instance during the last campaign our farmers had to sell their pork at $6 per hundred pounds, and yet at the same time our consumers had to pay for that same pork from 14 to 15 cents per pound. Somebody must have made the difference, and as there are some members of the pork trust in this House, no doubt they could let the public into the secret. But I do not think it requires much penetration to find out where this immense profit went, since we know that the pork trust was not at all scrupulous about declaring a dividend of 125 per cent. It is into the pockets of that trust that the difference went between the price of six cents per pound paid the farmers, and of 14 and 15 cents per pound charged the consumers.

Mr. BEST. When were the farmers getting $6 per hundred pounds and the consumers paying 14 cents per pound?

Mr. VERVILLE. Not more than three weeks ago. If my hon. friend has any later information, let him give it to the House. We also have a sugar trust in this country. That trust took a very active part in the last election. During that campaign, we found the price of sugar increased one and a half cents per pound. How much did that increase take out of the pockets of the consumers? Well, in the city of Montreal alone, there is a consumption of 300,000 pounds of sugar per week. At one and a half cents per pound, that increased price amounted to $45,000 per week. And I do not think I am at all exaggerating when I say that the sugar trust has taken out of the pockets of the consumer $45,000 per week in the city of Montreal alone, and no doubt put that money into the campaign fund to fight reciprocity. What I claim is that our people did not realize what reciprocity meant. They did not understand it. They did not realize what advantages they would gain from it, but I have no doubt that in time they will become educated; and to those who cry out that reciprocity is dead, I say it is only just born.

We have had protection advocated in opposition to reciprocity, and the United States have been held up to us time and again as an example of the benefits of protection. True there is probably no country in the world which has a higher protective tariff than the United States, but at the same time there is no country in the world which has made millionaires so fast. Since the formation in 1877 of the sugar trust in that country, the American consumers have paid $600,000,000 more for their sugar than they would have, had they been able to buy in the open market. I have read a good deal about these trusts, and all I have read has convinced me that they are a canker eating out the heart of the nation. Some years ago, when the famous steel trust of the United States issued a manifesto asking the great financiers of that country to invest their capital in it, they pointed out that they were employing 67,000 hands, and were paying out $113,000,000 per year, but the most important point of all was their statement that they were making a clear profit of $120,000,000 per year. This was the first time in history when so large an amount of profit was made in comparison with the amount of wages paid. I might go further into details regarding the operations of these trusts, but I do not wish to take up too much time. Besides the hon. Minister of Public Works (Mr. Monk) last session gave this House statistics showing what some of these trusts were doing in our own city of Montreal; and I am sure that while he is in the cabinet, he will not allow these combines to continue crushing the people as they have done in the past. But that, of course, is their own concern. If you will study the question, you will find that the gospel of these trusts, which have made so active a fight against reciprocity, is high protection, monopolies, and the creation of millionaires. The present government, I believe, are under the jurisdiction and control of these trusts. In that belief, I hope that I am mistaken, but the future will tell. But when I found that no mention was made in the address regarding these trusts, I could not help thinking that there was good foundation for the charge that they controlled the policy of this government. There can be no doubt that the present cabinet is highly protective. In the newspapers we find the statement that there are seven millionaires in it.

Something has been said in this debate about the North Atlantic Trading Company. I do not propose to hark back to that matter because hon. members know the attitude I took on it in the past; but still, for the benefit of those who were not then in the House, I might point out the contrast between the attitude taken by the opposition then and that taken by them since they have attained power. At that time they made a concerted attack on an hon. gentleman whose name I may mention, Mr. Sifton. He was then their great bugbear; but if Mr. Sifton was so very bad then, in their opinion how comes it that he is such a saint in their eyes to-day?

When that gentleman was probably as poor as I am, he was in favour of reciprocity, but when he got to be probably fifteen times a millionaire he was against it. He now cries 'Canada for the Canadians.' During the last campaign we heard men like Sir William Van Horne who were opposing reciprocity, shouting 'Canada for Canadians.' Sir Wm. Van Horne is not satisfied with that, he made up his mind at one time to place some capital in the United States, but he found that was not far enough away, and he went to Mexico and placed his capital there. Even that was not far enough away and he went to Cuba and placed capital there. Why do capitalists cry Canada for Canadians? Has capital any nation, any country? No, the capitalist will place his money wherever he can get the biggest dividend. Capital has no heart. It has no conscience and I am sorry to say that the managers of the large mergers are becoming as bad as the capitalists, they have no conscience.

We may boast about the prosperity of our country, but at the same time we must realize that about every 12 years there is a period of depression. We in Canada have suffered very little from depression of late years. The last depression did not affect Canada very much but I am afraid that the next one will. These periods of depression usually come from a surplus of production. We have now a surplus of production, and I believed when reciprocity was proposed that it was the best possible means to prevent the occurrence of the depression that might come over this country in the near future, that it would certainly be preferable to protection. I hear the trusts asking for protection on everything they manufacture, but I would like to see the member of a trust or the member of a large institution who is willing to have protection on labour. His cry is: Free labour at all cost, but give me all the protection you can on the goods I have to sell. That is what has been asked in the past and I am very much afraid that the cry will become stronger and stronger.

There is a certain amount of discontent among the masses of the country. In what I am about to say I am speaking on my own responsibility and do not wish to hold the present opposition responsible for my utterance. There is a certain amount of discontent among the masses of the people of this country to-day and, if the trusts and mergers keep up their work as they have done in the past, the Crown in Canada will be in danger inside of ten years. It may seem strange to members of this House that I should utter such words as these, but there are signs of discontent among the people in all parts of Canada. We see similar discontent all over the world. Look at Germany for example. After the next election in Germany we will undoubtedly see a great change in that country, and what will cause the change there is the constant oppression of the people by the large institutions called mergers. What has happened in other countries is likely to happen here. The population of Canada is composed of all classes of society, and I claim that in the public interest the trusts should not get any higher protection than the masses of the people. Hon. gentlemen opposite will realize to their sorrow in two or three years the strength of the current of feeling among the people in favour of such movements as reciprocity which tend to give the masses of the people a chance to buy goods in a better market at a cheaper rate perhaps to the detriment of the trust. That movement is growing rapidly and hon. gentlemen opposite will probably see in the near future a strong element crying out against the present administration if they do not place some restriction on the work of the different trusts in Canada. I claim to-day that the question of reciprocity was not explained before the people in its economic aspects in the last campaign. My opponent certainly did not do so. In one part of the riding my opponent said that his policy was the policy of Mr. Monk and Mr. Bourassa, but in the English part of the riding he declared himself in favour of Mr. Borden's policy. In this perhaps he did not make a mistake, as according to these hon. gentlemen it is but the one policy. Yesterday was the first time I heard that it was a question of power, when the hon. the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Monk) said: You are there and we are here. It seemed to me that there was something beyond that question of : You are there and I am here, instead of saying that there is a great question and a certain policy at stake. Although the policy of reciprocity has been defeated I for one shall not cease in the effort to educate my fellowmen to the belief that it was the best policy ever presented by any Democratic government in any country of the world. I know that there is at present a vigorous movement to prevent labour men from entering this House—this I can prove whenever it is necessary. I will state here publicly, to the members of the government that if anyone should in the future be guilty of trying by all possible means to prevent me or other labour men entering this House, they are making the greatest mistake of their lives. I will even invite some hon. members opposite to endeavour to prevent labour men from entering the House and then probably we will see in the near future more men in this House who will be ready to present radical legislation. The hon. member for Calgary (Mr. Bennett) spoke well in reference to the investigation of mergers. I am sorry to say I cannot say as much for the St. Jean Baptiste speech made by the hon. member for Dorchester (Mr. Sevigny) At the same time I hope my hon. friend from Calgary will pursue that line of policy. He may rest assured that whenever he brings before the House any measure looking towards that end, he will receive my hearty support.

Mr. H. H. STEVENS (Vancouver). I had not intended to take any part in this debate until I noticed, as it proceeded, that the great province from which I come, had scarcely received mention from any member who has participated in the debate. I represent a constituency which comprises some 150,000, good loyal Canadian citizens, and I think consequently I may be allowed to take part in this debate. The subject of the cabinet appointees, or the colleagues which the Prime Minister has chosen to act with him, seems to have taken precedence over every other subject. I think that is a matter for regret, because I understand that we are sent here for the purpose of discussing the larger questions relating to the affairs and administration of this Dominion, and not for the purpose of making personal attacks upon individuals. I want to congratulate the hon. member who has just spoken (Mr. Verville) upon one or two points which he mentioned, and which I think prove conclusively the wisdom of the position taken by the Liberal-Conservative party of Canada on reciprocity. He spent considerable time criticising the trusts, and he argued in favour of reciprocity as a means of preventing the inroads that the trusts are making upon the consumers of this country. In my opinion, to open the markets of Canada freely to the ingress of the trusts of the United States would certainly not benefit the consumers of this country, according to his own argument. He also made reference to the protection of labour, and in this I am heartily in accord with him. But I was surprised to hear the criticisms he made, being, as he is, a supporter of the right hon. gentleman who leads the opposition, and who so lately led the government of this country for fifteen years I am reminded that there is on the statute books of Canada an Alien Labour Act, which was especially designed for the labouring men of this country. Now, what did we find a short time ago on the Pacific coast of Canada? We found that the authorities of the Dominion, under the leadership of the right hon. gentleman, were deliberately violating the Alien Labour Act, acting in direct contravention to its provisions. They have been for over a year conniving with certain individuals for the importation of foreign labour into Canada in direct contravention of that Act. The government officials at Victoria and at Seattle, where foreigners take the boat for British Columbia ports, were instructed that they could admit foreigners into Canada in direct contravention of that Act. Now, Sir, how the hon. gentleman who claims to be the special representative of the labouring people of Canada, can be a supporter of a government, of an administration, which has perpetrated a crime of that kind, is beyond my comprehension. The hon. gentleman said that he felt convinced that the reciprocity agreement had not been well explained to the people of Canada. Well, all I can say is that he could not have attended any Conservative meetings during the last campaign, because so far as I could learn from the press, and according to my own personal observations, in every constituency the Liberal-Conservative party sought to give a full and complete explanation of this important measure. In the amendment proposed by the leader of the opposition we find this clause:

> We respectfully submit to your Royal Highness that it is a fundamental principle of constitutional government that the advisers of the Crown shall be heartily in accord on all important questions of public policy.

Now, hon. gentlemen opposite are making strong objection because they imagine that there is a difference of opinion between members of the present government on what should be Canada's naval policy. Now can we not offer a similar criticism on the personnel of the members of the opposition? Can you imagine a more direct contradiction of opinion, for instance, than that which exists between the hon. member for Red Deer (Mr. Clark), and the right hon. gentleman who leads the opposition? The hon. member for Red Deer is a hearty hale, bluff John Bull, an ultra-imperialist, according to his own statement, a man who is an avowed free-trader; and yet he sits side by side on the same political bench with the refined and cultured leader of the opposition, who is an avowed protectionist, whose administration has ever pursued a protectionist policy, a gentleman who introduced that famous resolution into the late Imperial Conference which cast a wet blanket, as was stated by the press, over the whole proceedings of that conference. I say, can you imagine a more direct opposition than exists between these two gentlemen? And yet they appear to be working in perfect harmony. Well, why should they not differ in opinion if they like, and why should not hon. gentlemen on this side of the House have the same privilege of holding a manly difference of opinion in details, so long as they are agreed on the essentials of a national policy? Because my opinion may differ from that of a gentleman sitting beside me on matters of detail, is no reason why we should divide on matters of national policy, and fight over it like Kilkenny cats. I think it is only requisite that we should agree on the essential principles of the administration, while being allowed to express frankly and openly our minds on any minor question that may arise. When I entered this House I came with certain opinions of my own, but I am willing to hear and consider the opinions of my fellow members who may differ from my own, and leave it to a vote of the House to determine which set of opinions shall prevail. I cannot imagine how we can decide a public question in any other way.

Now, Sir, I wish to deal briefly with some of the measures referred to in the speech from the Throne. Several hon. members opposite have presumed to say there was very little in the speech from the Throne, but even that little has been ignored by them for the purpose of making an attack on the ministerial benches. There has been practically no discussion of those important matters which are referred to in the speech. I submit that there are measures referred to in that document of sufficient importance to keep this House in session for several months. If they would apply their reason and their intelligence to a discussion of these measures, I believe it would result in some good to the country. In the first place, we have an allusion to the subject of good roads. This has been a subject of some ridicule on the part of our hon. friends opposite. The hon. member for St. John city and county (Mr. Pugsley), the late Minister of Public Works, says that this is a matter that will present insuperable difficulties.

He could not understand how they were going to make a division of these funds which would be satisfactory to everbyody. Sir, from his standpoint, and from the standpoint of the late administration, I can readily understand how it would be difficult to make a division of the spoils, but, under the administration that we have at the present time and with the application of the intelligence of the members of the whole House, I believe that this question can be solved amicably and justly to all concerned. I consider it a question of the most supreme importance. There is no greater colonizing influence than good roads. I believe that a highway through the country is of more value to the settling up of the community than a railway or a tram line. I believe that the Dominion and provincial governments should co-operate in the extension of the highways throughout the country. I am here to say this, that according to the records of our own province, the provincial government of British Columbia are spending this year $3,000,000 on the extension of the highways and this has been hailed by the people as a highly commendable piece of administration. We welcomed the assistance of the Dominion government in extending the highways through our province. There is an illustration of the value of this policy that I might give the House. For instance, there is the Alberta-British Columbia highway. This is a highway that we hope to join up. At present I understand that you can take an automobile or a carriage and drive practically all the way from Winnipeg right through to the Rocky mountains. We wish to extend our highways eastward and join them up so as to make a highway clean across the continent. Some hon. gentleman the other day rather ridiculed this idea, but to my mind, and I repeat it here, it is a highly commendable piece of administration to extend the highways of the country.

There is another point upon which I wish to dwell for a moment and that is as to the question of immigration. The hon. member for Red Deer (Mr. Clark), in his eloquent and witty address, which I enjoyed very much, made reference to this subject. By the way, I might just say that the hon. member for Red Deer visited British Columbia and preached his free trade policy and we returned seven solid, Conservative members. He is still persistent in believing that he is on the right track. However, I have no quarrel with the hon. gentleman, he is a gentleman for whom I have a great deal of respect, and I listened with great interest to his exposition of the theory of free trade notwithstanding the fact of its impracticability. He made some reference to immigration and that is a subject in which British Columbia, and the west as a whole are deeply interested. I want to refer, Mr. Speaker, to an investigation which was held in the city of Vancouver into the Chinese immigration frauds. Here are the Sessional Papers which have never been printed under the direct instruction of the late government, and why? Simply because there were facts contained in those Sessional Papers that the public would like to know and which would have been very prejudicial to the late administration. I have been through these Sessional Papers, I am thoroughly acquainted with the situation in British Columbia connected with these Chinese frauds, and I have supplemented my investigations there with a perusal of these papers. What is the situation? The Chinese are admitted into the Dominion of Canada, according to statute under a $500 head tax. There are certain exceptions. Merchants, Chinese who have returned to China and come back within one year, and the wives and children of merchants in the country are admitted free. We found that there was a syndicate or company organized, with the connivance and knowledge of officials of the late administration, who were working together and bringing in, by a system of frauds, hundreds of Chinese without paying the head tax. This was accomplished by this method. A number of Chinamen would come in on a boat and the interpreter who would question them, being a member of the syndicate, would give answers to the English officials which were positively false in every detail. The result was that these men would be passed free. This is the administration which an hon. gentleman spoke of a moment ago as being in favour of the policy of the labour element in this country. I want to draw your attention to a few references in connection with the investigation which was made by Mr. Justice Murphy just to substantiate my statement. He said:

Ample opportunity has existed at Vancouver for illegal entry of Chinese into Canada.

Then he goes on:

A system of direct fraud to secure illegal entry of Chinese into Canada as merchants and exempts has flourished at Vancouver.

Then he goes on further and recommends that:

A digest be forwarded to the Minister of Justice for advice re prosecution of Yip On and Yip Sue, interpreters.

How could these things flourish unless they were connived at by the administration? They were known in Vancouver by those who were the official employees of the government. The interpreters were working hand in hand with those who were benefiting by those frauds. Just to illustrate that, I want to tell you what happened a few weeks ago. Two Chinamen came into my office and offered me $500 if I would secure them the appointment of interpreter telling me that it was an exceedingly valuable office. That indicates the way in which these interpreters secured their positions formerly and the methods that were being pursued by this department in Vancouver. The immigration policy of the Dominion government during the past fifteen years has bequeathed to this present government a racial problem in comparison with which the negro problem in the south fades into insignificance. The Pacific coast is flooded with Asiatics who have entered the country by fraud.

I want to come now to the Japanese situation. I again refer to the fact that hon. members opposite have claimed that we have an immigration policy which has been satisfactory and for which we should congratulate ourselves, according to the hon. member for Red Deer (Mr. Clark). Ten years ago there were a thousand Japanese on the Pacific coast; to-day, I have not been able to secure the exact figures, but I venture to say that there are upwards of 25,000 Japanese on the Pacific coast. Ten years ago I do not think there was a single Japanese engaged in the fishing business, or there were very few; to-day there are 10,500 Japanese engaged in the fishing business. Ten years ago that business was in the hands of white men; to-day it is entirely in the hands of Japanese or almost so. These are facts which, I think, speak for themselves. How has this come about? The provincial government of British Columbia repeatedly passed Acts seeking to stop this immigration of Asiatics into Canada. They were continuously passed, and as often as they were passed they were disallowed by the Dominion government. They were disallowed, probably legally and properly, but the policy that was followed was against the advice of the imperial authorities. I refer you to the Sessional Papers of 1898 and 1900, should any hon. member desire to verify my statements. There he can find reference after reference, telegram after telegram, letter after letter, from Mr. Joseph Chamberlain, speaking for the imperial authorities, advising the Dominion parliament to pass an Act along the lines of the Natal Act. This was refused by the Dominion government, the Acts of the province were disallowed and the result is that to-day you have a race problem on the Pacific coast in comparison with which I repeat, the negro problem of the south fades into insignificance, because you not only have the presence of the Asiatics on the coast and in your country, but you also are face to face with the fact that they are protected by their own countries which are highly civilized and powerful nations. This is a problem that must be taken up and dealt with by the Dominion House.

Under this new administration I am looking forward to some measure which will assist us to keep British Columbia as a white man's country, and not as a field to be exploited by Asiatics. Reference is made in the speech from the Throne to a proposed reform in the terminal elevator system, and to the development of agriculture, and our friends opposite rather ridiculed these proposals.

Mr. PUGSLEY. My hon. friend is mistaken as to that. I was not in the House when any member on this side ridiculed the idea of the government controlling terminal elevators. I spoke of the elevators myself, but I did not criticise the policy of the government.

Mr. STEVENS. The hon. member may not have been in the House, but I am distinctly under the impression——

Mr. PUGSLEY. Mention any member who criticised that policy.

Mr. STEVENS. I am distinctly under the impression, and reference to 'Hansard' will I think prove my statement, that the general tone of all the members on the other side was to ridicule the proposals in the speech from the Throne.

Mr. PUGSLEY. Not at all.

Mr. STEVENS. The proposal of this government with regard to terminal elevators is most progressive and advanced legislation, and any man who has the welfare of this Dominion at heart must say that such legislation is in the interests of the masses of the people of Canada. We were told by the right hon. gentleman (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) the other evening that 66 per cent of our people lived by agriculture, and yet, so far as I have been able to find out, $750,000 only was the amount that the Liberal government could afford to spend last year for the promotion of agriculture. Our agricultural industry comprises 49 per cent of the total trade of the Dominion, and if you include transportation, which lives by agriculture, and the agricultural implement industry, which is also dependent on it, then, you can easily say that 75 per cent of the total industry of Canada is agricultural. Sixty-six per cent of our people live directly by agricultural pursuits, and although our revenue last year was about $115,000,000, we spent less than 1 per cent of it on the fostering of this great industry. Such a condition as that is absurd, and I submit that the time has arrived when the Federal government should spend a much larger sum for the development of agriculture.

Let me give you a few facts. France, which is a very small country compared with Canada, spends annually $9,000,000 in the interests of agriculture; Austria spends annually nine millions, Hungary nine and a half millions; the little empire of Japan, which you could bury in one of our inland gulfs on the Pacific coast, spends three and a half millions; and the United States spends annually ten millions on agriculture; and yet, notwithstanding that Canada is essentially a new agricultural country requiring great assistance for its development, the late government could only afford a sum of less than one million dollars last year on agriculture. The proposal of the new government, as I understand it, is to provide facilities for the establishment of agricultural colleges and experimental farms so that immigrants coming to this country, not experienced in agriculture, may obtain that experience here which will enable them to settle on the land and become prosperous and successful farmers. The immigration policy of the late administration tended to bring to our shores, hordes from southern France, to encourage the Japanese and the Chinese to flood this country, and to, as far as possible, provide $5 per head for the coffers of the North Atlantic Trading Company and other such institutions. Hardly a city in this Dominion but has to face the problem of what to do with these southern Europeans. Ontario has had to pass an Act to prevent these people carrying concealed weapons and using them to the danger of life, in the slums of our cities where they congregate. Instead of bringing immigrants to this country who would settle on the farms, the policy of the late government was to bring to our cities hordes of these undesirables. What we want now is a policy which will enable immigrants when they arrive in Canada to become acquainted with our customs so that they may be useful citizens of Canada and successful settlers of our vacant farm lands. The hon. gentleman from Maisonneuve (Mr. Verville) spoke about trusts, and as I understand it the condition which prevails in the Northwest in the matter of our terminal elevators is that there is danger of certain companies corralling the elevator business there, and so the government proposes to regulate these elevators in such a manner as to give the farmers—whom we may classify as the backbone of the citizenship of the country—facilities to store their grain under favourable and equitable conditions, and to market it to advantage, so that they may secure a fair profit as the result of their toil and industry. That is legislation which ought to receive the endorsement of every member in this House. True, there are problems in connection with the scheme, but never has there been a departure from the ordinary routine that did not present problems. The details must be worked out, and if hon. gentlemen on the other side are interested in the development of the country, then, instead of casting ridicule upon the project they can, by offering judicious criticism, assist the government in carrying it to a successful issue. Another thing touched upon in the speech from the Throne was the appointment of a tariff commission, and I submit that this proposal offers an eminently intelligent solution for many of our present difficulties. I repudiate the assertion of hon. gentlemen on the other side that the party now in power represents the trusts. The truth is that we represent the whole people of Canada and not any particular class, and so, the tariff commission will be able to hear from all classes of the community and to decide what is best to be done for the general welfare of the Dominion. When the two gentlemen went from Ottawa to Washington last year—and I say this in spite of the statement that Washington came to Ottawa—in connection with the reciprocity agreement, they met the tariff experts of the United States who had at their fingers' ends facts and statistics to sustain their side of the case. I submit, Sir, that a minister of the Crown, with the multiplicity of duties he has to perform and the tremendous pressure of business on him, could not be expected to be an expert on such a question.

You cannot expect any human being who has such a diversity of duties to be an expert on any one of them. So that when these gentlemen went to Washington they met the expert tariff commission of the United States, by whom, I am credibly informed, $300,000 was spent in gathering facts for the purposes of this agreement. How, I ask how, in the name of commonsense could any man who is not an expert, I care not how intelligent he may be, meet men of this calibre, who are intimately informed on this subject, and expect to make an agreement that was entirely equitable? The thing was impossible. What we expect from the announcement in the speech from the Throne is that the present administration will organize here a tariff commission similar to what they have in the United States, non-political in its complexion. So far as I am concerned, I would oppose any scheme of this kind with a political stripe. The commission must be a scientific, non-political organization, and with such an organization I can see that we shall have an equitable tariff schedule in the future.

Now, I wish to deal for a moment with the fisheries question. I have intimated already that the fisheries on the Pacific coast are almost exclusively in the hands of Japanese. This is a matter of very great significance to this House. It is difficult for hon. gentlemen living in the eastern part of the Dominion, with many local problems pressing upon them for solution every day, to become interested in what is happening at the other extremity of the country. But this is more than a local problem for British Columbia; it is a problem which affects the whole Dominion of Canada, and I will briefly show how. These Japanese fishermen on the Pacific coast are not merely ordinary fishermen, but to a large extent they are reservists of the Japanese navy. They are experts in navigation. They have draughted complete charts of every hole and corner of the Pacific coast, and have photographs of the whole coastline. I venture to say there are in the archives at Tokio complete charts of our navigable waters. To illustrate that, I may state that a few weeks ago one of our coasting boats going on its usual run wanted to call at a certain inlet. Some of these inlets run up into the land for 30 or 40 or 50 miles. The captain had no chart, in fact there was no chart of that particular inlet; and having looked up the chart he had he said, 'I cannot take the risk.' When he was faced with this difficulty, a Japanese fisherman produced from his pocket a complete and perfect chart of that inlet, and the captain was able to sail up many miles by that chart. The problem on the Pacific coast in this regard is a serious one, and merits the attention of this House. Moreover, the method followed up to the present time of granting fishing licenses on the Pacific coast is something nefarious. Licenses have been granted to individuals whose only recommendation was that they were political heelers, and these licenses have been farmed out to Japanese and others. Fishing licenses which have been secured for $50 have been sold to Japanese for from $1,000 to $1,500.

While speaking on this subject I want to make a practical suggestion which I hope will be taken into consideration by the administration. On the Labrador coast there are a large number of fishermen who would make excellent settlers and citizens on the Pacific coast. At present these fishermen are disfranchised, because there is no representative in this House from the Labrador coast, and I am informed that Dr. Grenfel, who has done a great deal for the people of that part of the country, is interested in the transfer of some of these fishermen to the Pacific coast. I believe it is up to the Dominion administration to arrange its immigration laws in such a way as to conserve and protect the resources of this country so that they will not pass into the hands of aliens, and I believe that the transfer of some of these Labrador fishermen to the Pacific coast would be a splendid solution of the difficulty, because it would give us expert fishermen and relieve us from the necessity of employing Japanese.

Mr. LEMIEUX. Has the number of Japanese fishermen materially increased during the last two or three years?

Mr. STEVENS. Yes, most materially. The hon. member is referring, I have no doubt, to his little jaunt to Japan a few years ago; but, while I presume the hon. member did his best and his intentions were all right, that arrangement does not meet the case in any sense. What we in British Columbia contend is that there should be passed by the Dominion authorities, as was suggested by Joseph Chamberlain himself, an Act similar to the Natal Act; but the Dominion government of that time absolutely refused to pass such an Act. I go farther. When the treaty with Japan was under negotiation, the late administration were asked by the Imperial authorities if they wanted to come in as a party without reservation, or if they wanted to reserve their rights with regard to immigration, and they told the Imperial authorities that they would come in without any reservation whatever. The result is that if we attempt to interfere with Japanese immigration in any way, we are met with the difficulty of an objection from the Emperor of Japan. It is not an easy question to solve, but the late administration neglected the question entirely, instead of attempting to deal with it. It is a question that requires large men to deal with, but if it is not grappled with, you are going to be faced with a race problem that you will have to reckon with in the near future.

Now, I want to proceed to the navy question. It has been stated by some hon. members that in the recent campaign prominence was not given to the navy question, while other hon. members stated that it was the sole question discussed. As far as British Columbia is concerned, this naval question is of vital importance. If you will permit me, I will read again the clause referring to that in the proposed amendment of the right hon. leader of the opposition:

> That with regard to that policy, as well as to the whole question of naval defence, there is in the present cabinet a flagrant conflict of opinion.

On the Pacific coast there is no conflict of opinion, but there is an opinion that is directly antagonistic to the policy of the late administration. What have we got to-day? The Atlantic squadron the other day went on a political junketing tour in express opposition to the orders of the naval authorities, and the result was that the 'Niobe' was piled up on a rock. The Pacific squadron went to Comox harbour and dropped anchor, and had not men enough to raise the anchor. That is the kind of Canadian navy you have to-day. Now, was it the intention of the late administration to man their navy with Japanese? because that is what it apparently was leading to. The whole fishing industry on the Pacific coast, on which you must depend for men to man your merchant marine and navy, was in the hands of Japanese, and no one who has looked into the question carefully could fail to see what result would follow from the naval policy of the late administration. That policy was simply suicidal in every sense of the term, not only so far as the poor 'Niobe' was concerned, but from beginning to end. I have formed a judgment on the navy question and have no hesitation in stating it. We have been told that there is a conflict of opinion among members of the cabinet on this question, but we ought to be sufficiently broad-minded to give members of the cabinet the right to their own opinions with regard to any public policy, but if there be any difference it has simply been concerning the direful effects bound to follow the policy of the late government.

This question is one which should be approached as a business proposition and not with a view of utilizing it so as to throw out sops of patronage to particular parts of the country. What is the condition at present? We have a certain trade on the high seas, and it is just as essential that we should have protection to our trade on the high seas as police protection in the cities. The question is not one of simply bolstering up imperial ideas. It is a commercial one more than anything else. We are proud to boast that the British Empire controls over half the carrying trade of the whole world. We are proud to boast of our supremacy of the high seas. Well, in my opinion what is required is an imperial board of defence on which the overseas dominions should be given representation. I am convinced that a board of that kind would remove the last vestige of objection in this country to a direct contribution to a navy under the control of the imperial authorities. But I may be asked how we are going to decide the proportion which each of the overseas dominions should contribute. Well as I have said, the proposition is a business one. There is a certain amount of traffic throughout the empire. Let us, for the sake of argument, say that the gross amount of traffic throughout the empire amounts to one billion dollars and that the portion contributed by the Dominion amounts to $100,000,000. In my view the proportion which the Dominion should contribute to the support of the navy would be pro rata to the proportion which her traffic bears to that of the whole. Suppose, for instance, that one billion dollars represents the whole traffic of the empire, and $100,000,000 that of the Dominion, the proportion of our contribution would be one-tenth. If such a course as I have indicated were pursued I believe it would result in removing the objections which at present obtain against our contributing to the maintenance of an imperial navy. A good many people are opposed to any such contribution unless we have representation in the councils of the nation. I myself am a firm believer in the autonomy of this Dominion, and while I believe in a direct contribution I am equally convinced that we should have our say regarding how that contribution should be spent. If then, we be given imperial representation, I see no objection to our contributing to an imperial navy. For 100 years Canada has enjoyed the protection of the imperial navy and has not given a cent towards the cost of that protection. That, I consider, is a disgrace to Canada. I consider it a disgrace to this country that we should allow the taxpayers of Britain to be burdened with the whole responsibility of the heavy tax required to protect our overseas trade. The time has come when we should bear our just proportion to protect our own trade. On the basis I have pointed out and on being given direct representation in the councils of the empire, I believe the last vestige of objection to a naval policy would be removed.

I have not much more to add, but I wish to refer to a remark made by the hon. member for Kings, Nova Scotia (Mr. Foster), the baby member of this House. Let me congratulate him on the excellent speech he made on the address, but when he alluded to the unlimited resources of Nova Scotia, while I have no fault to find with my hon. friend's enthusiasm regarding his own native province, I find I am at a loss how to describe the resources of the province I have the honour to represent. We have in that province a coast line of 7,000 miles and an area of some 238,000,000 acres. When the late Sir John Macdonald and his noble colleague proposed to span this continent with two bands of steel, their policy was ridiculed by the Liberal party of that day. In fact, Sir Richard Cartwright described British Columbia as a sea of mountains and declared that the railway would not pay for its axle-grease. Well, we have great mountain peaks, of which we are justly proud. Those peaks are so high that I do not believe the mentality of those engaged in this debate could surmount them, and certainly they tower high above the mentality of those who criticise the statesmen-like policy of Sir John Macdonald and his colleagues which has made this country what it is to-day. But between those great mountain peaks we have fertile valleys in which you could place Nova Scotia, New Brunswick, and I believe the province of Ontario as well. Let me now draw attention to a few of our resources. Our output of coal last year was 2,000,000 tons and our output of other minerals amounted to some $24,500,000, almost one-half the total production of minerals in Canada. Our salmon fisheries canned over 1,000,000 cases of salmon. I am not drawing attention to these facts in a boastful manner, but simply to show that British Columbia is a great province and belongs to the Dominion of Canada as a whole and not to the people of British Columbia alone, and for the purpose of pointing out to the people of the east the great territory we have on the Pacific coast. When legislation is passed by this House, it should be based on the broad idea of developing the whole country from the Atlantic to the Pacific and not of benefiting any one particular section. I might point out further that in Vancouver alone during the last ten years we have contributed to the Dominion treasury some $35,000,000 in customs and postal returns and this year the amount is likely to reach $8,000,000. But what I wish particularly to emphasize is the fact that we ought to turn our attention to the development of this Dominion regardless of race, religious and creed differences. What do I care about anybody's views on transubstantiation or any other religious doctrine? Though born in the old country, I am a Canadian in sentiment, my first love is Canada, and I believe the time has come when we should bury these petty differences and work in common for the development of our common country. The other day I had a conversation with one of my colleagues from the province of Quebec who told me he had property in the west and had travelled considerably throughout that country and had thus obtained an idea of the vast heritage belonging to this Dominion and he came to this House prepared to deal with every public question from the standpoint of the country as a whole and not from any sectional point of view. I agree with my hon. friend. I believe that we should for ever banish these petty differences of creed and race and unite with one object, namely, the development of this great Dominion of ours in the interests of all classes and all sections.

Mr. J. A. C. ETHIER (Two Mountains). (Translation.) I have followed attentively the debate which has been going on for a few days, and especially the academical and patriotic utterances of the member for Dorchester (Mr. Sévigny), the bilingual utterances of the member for Yamaska (Mr. Mondou), and the fretful and timid speech of the Minister of Public works (Mr. Monk). After listening to such an out and out repudiation of principles which these gentlemen had advocated previous to the 21st of September last, I considered it was part of my duty to give expression in this House to my humble views regarding the present state of things and the men to whose care the future of the country is now entrusted.

It would have been to me pleasant to think, Mr. Speaker, that you were in a position to follow the remarks which I am about to make to the House. However, I am satisfied that by taking some pains and drawing on your well-known resources, you will by the end of this parliament have mastered our beautiful French language and be able to appreciate its wealth of expression. Just here, I may be allowed a short digression: while listening at the opening of the session to the reading of the speech from the Throne, which was given in French by His Royal Highness the Governor General, I was unable to repress a feeling of pride at hearing my mother tongue spoken with such fine accent by a member of the British Royal family. And I said to myself. What a lesson for those ultra-loyalists, for those Ontario Tories who clamour for the abolition of the French language and the closing of our bilingual schools to the detriment of the younger generation. May such a lesson profit to those whom it concerns.

Mr. Speaker, following on the bitter warfare waged against the Laurier government in the course of the last electoral campaign, wherein prejudice fought hand in hand with falsehoods and misrepresentations, wherein nationalism and Toryism joined forces towards securing a common end, the overthrow of Laurier, we expected there would be formed a strong and united government having a definite, frank and overt policy. But what have we been witnessing ever since the overthrow of the late government? In the first place an army of hungry office seekers, besieging the Prime Minister, in the hope of satisfying an appetite maddened by fifteen years' waiting in the cold shades of opposition. And if the report of some newspapers is to be credited, I might use the very words of the hon. member for West Toronto (Mr. Osler), who, it appears, stated he was ashamed of his colleagues, and of some defeated Conservative candidates as well, seeing them so eager to press their claims and to secure a minister's portfolio.

What has been going on under our eyes in connection with the making up of the cabinet? And what are we to think of those who are to run the business of the country for the next four or five years? I am not a confident of the Prime Minister, but if any stock is to be taken in current gossip and rumor, he had a rather hard time of it before he succeeded in recruiting his full quota of ministers.

In the first place, he had to find a Minister of Finance to whom he could confide that surplus of thirty millions left over from the late administration. An honest, worthy, reliable man, a man above reproach, was required for such a position. Did he cast his eyes on his former colleagues in this House from 1896 to 1911? Did he find a single one of them worthy of such a trust, whether in this or in any other province of Canada? No. He had to confide that fund to a new Conservative, to a Liberal of yesterday, who even never had voted for the Conservative party, and he appointed the Hon. Mr. White as Minister of Finance.

In filling that position he might have recalled the hon. member for North Toronto, but I imagine he was scared by the remembrance of what occurred in connection with the Independent Order of Foresters. Before calling on him to fill that office, no doubt the Prime Minister was made uneasy by the thought of what happened to his predecessor, through the wire-pulling of the man who holds the portfolio of Trade and Commerce, and of what Sir Mackenzie Bowell termed the 'nest of traitors,' and he made up his mind to relegate him to the Department of Trade and Commerce.

Casting an eye over those who surround the Prime Minister, and endeavouring to find out what reasons dictated his selection of the Quebec representatives in the cabinet, we, as representatives of that province in this House, can well wonder at seeing the hon. members for Jacques-Cartier (Mr. Monk), Quebec county (Mr. Pelletier), and Terrebonne (Mr. Nantel), sitting at the council board, although, previous to September 21st, they repudiated and reviled the Hon. Prime Minister. If the memory of what happened to Sir Mackenzie Bowell must have recurred to him when he selected his present Minister of Trade and Commerce, the shades of Mercier and of the year 1892 must have appeared to him when he appointed his present Postmaster General.

What special qualifications exhibited by the member for Terrebonne (Mr. Nantel) can have induced the Prime Minister to appoint him Minister of Inland Revenue. I am personally acquainted with him, and I congratulate him on the promotion he has secured preferably to a number of his fellow-members. One thing I am sure of, and it is that he has not secured his appointment with the consent of the hon. member for Charlevoix and Montmorency (Mr. Forget). As to that, I would be willing to wager. But no, Mr. Speaker, I withdraw what I have just said, knowing that the hon. minister will have nothing to do with betting, especially when he is the loser, witness his $1,000 wager with Mr. Prévost and 'l'Avenir du Nord,' of St. Jerome, which has been pending for several years back.

We have reason to be surprised at the appointment of the hon. member for Victoria and Haliburton (Mr. Hughes) as Minister of Militia and the Nationalist element in the province of Quebec have still greater cause for surprise. While occupying seats alongside their colleague, surely these hon. gentleman do not entertain in regard to him the view held by Mr. Henri Bourassa, the political adviser of the present Prime Minister, and who, if newspaper reports are to be relied on, was retained here for two days, in order to express an opinion, as to the policy to be propounded before the country.

Have they had and have they still before them the sizing up of the new Minister of Militia, which appeared in 'Le Devoir' in the month of August last, when Mr. Bourassa wrote as follows:

> Yes, Sam Hughes, the imperialist, the 'orangeman,' the 'tory,' the 'hater of religion,' the arch enemy of the French language, whose name has so often been hurled as an insult by government henchmen. Well, he has been selected by Messrs. Laurier, Borden and Lemieux to lay down the terms under which Canada will participate in the wars of the empire.

Has the hon. Minister of Public Works before his eyes that picture, the work of his leader, Mr. Bourassa?

And after viewing that picture, have we not good reason to be surprised at this incoherent assemblage making up that government already termed a coalition government, but which I would term 'heterogeneous', comprising as it does men whose views on the most important questions of Canadian poltics are radically at variance.

The hon. Minister of Public Works, in closing his speech, yesterday, stated that he was proud to see the Speaker of the House occupying that post of honour. No doubt the facts the right hon. leader of the opposition had recalled to his memory in such scathing terms at the time of the Speaker's election had already been dismissed from his mind.

In making that selection, the hon. Prime Minister no doubt recalled his defeat in Halifax in 1904, and by appointing you, Sir, to fill that important position, he was anxious to show his gratitude towards the electors of Carleton who returned him in 1904. But enough on that chapter; the Laurier governement was defeated on September 21st. Great as he was in victory, Laurier is still greater and more to be feared in defeat.

A government supporter would have said that the leader of the opposition had met his Waterloo on September 21st.

Mr. PAQUET. (Translation.) He said so himself.

Mr. ETHIER. (Translation.) I am not aware of that, but at any rate, that statement was made quite recently. And in connection with that defeat, never was there uttered nobler and loftier thoughts by the leader of a defeated party and for the information of the hon. member for L'Islet, I shall quote the very words:

> I prefer defeat, when suffered for the sake of justice, to power obtained through the betrayal of principles advocated for many years. I feel healthier and stronger than ever, and if the Liberal party continue to abide by me, I shall remain their leader until my strength fails me, or God takes my life.

I may say to the hon. member for L'Islet that with Laurier as leader of the opposition, victory is assured to that party, and that he and this government will meet their Waterloo earlier than they expect.

The speech from the Throne as well as the addresses of hon. gentlemen who have preceded me contains references to the country's prosperity. It outlines a policy of aid to agriculture, of assistance towards the good roads movement and announces the establishment of a tariff commission.

All are agreed in saying, Liberal and Conservative alike, and even the Nationalists could not gainsay that the prosperity of this, country has kept on increasing since 1896. The old administration should be given credit for it. On what ground can the hon. gentleman opposite claim credit for that prosperity, when compared with the state of things that existed before 1896? This whole paragraph is a slap in the face of the hon. gentlemen opposite, because the credit for that prosperity belongs to the old administration. The Laurier government has gone down to defeat, it is true, but it has fallen in a noble cause, without any stigma of infamy for having dilapidated the public exchequer attaching to its record. Thanks be to God, during their adminstration of fifteen years here has been no dilapidation of public funds and in the ranks of the Liberal party men are not to be found like those who brought disrgace upon the Conservative party. To quote the very words of Sir Wilfrid Laurier, it was by standing up for principles that we endeavoured to make of Canada a great and prosperous country. With such experience as we have gained and under the ægis of Laurier, the Liberal party is already threatening the position of that heterogeneous administration which is afraid of putting its programme before the House on the important issues which are of interest to the public in general

The old administration, as I said, has left in the public exchequer, in addition to the gigantic work it has achieved, a surplus of thirty million dollars. What did our opponents say during the last elections? 'Let well enough alone. Why should we seek to better our condition?' To this the Laurier government replied: 'We want to make the country still more prosperous; we wish to better the position of the farming community. Let the farmer have his turn.' That is the reason why the Laurier government had made a new departure in its fiscal policy by offering us freer trade in natural products with the neighbouring republic.

Besides exploiting the race and religious prejudices in Ontario, our opponents have also raised the annexation cry, taking as a pretext the Taft-Fielding convention, in the province of Quebec. And in the matter of annexation, it is true that a few isolated words—which I could call imprudent—uttered at around some festive boards in the United States had fallen from the lips of Mr. Champ Clarke and President Taft. At once the Tories, in search of any pretext whatever which might be grasped as a weapon for battering in the Liberal policy, seized upon these statements and used them as a war cry to disturb the public mind and befool the electors into believing in annexation as a probable consequence of the proposed pact of commercial reciprocity. Sir, the meaning of the proposed agreement has been strained and I could give the House no better illustration of the awkward predicament in which the Conservative party have placed themselves than by quoting the opinion of an impartial and honest witness, a man who is well acquainted with our country, having spent here several years of his life, I refer to that distinguished publicist, Mr. Kleczkowski, formerly French consul at Montreal and plenipotentiary minister. The article I am going to read appeared in the review, 'France-Canada' of November, under the following heading, 'Sir Wilfrid Laurier and Reciprocity':

As our readers have been aware for some time, the general elections held in the Dominion of Canada, on the 21st of last month, turned against the Liberal party, that is to say against Sir Wilfrid Laurier's government. The Conservatives did carry the country in a decisive manner, having obtained a majority of 47 votes in a House which numbers 221 members.

It was on the question of reciprocity with the United States that the battle was fought. Through the initiative of the American government, negotiations have been entered into, last year, at Washington. They resulted, in January last, into a project of commercial reciprocity. The opposition, in the Canadian parliament, proved radically opposed to the pact, indulged in obstruction and challenged the Prime Minister to appeal to the people on the issue. Sir Wilfrid Laurier took up the challenge. Parliament was dissolved. It had been three years in existence, and under the provisions of the British North America Act, it was not bound to be dissolved before the lapse of two years more. The Liberal party, which had carried the country and come off with flying colours from the electoral contests of 1896, 1900, 1904 and 1908 have suffered defeat this time. The reciprocity issue was the stumbling block against which, for a time, the fortunes of the party were dashed to pieces.

Then, what is reciprocity? In order to answer this question, it is necessary to make a distinction here. Reciprocity, such as proposed by Sir Wilfrid Laurier to the Canadian electorate was not the integral and theoretical reciprocity which has met with such a flat refusal from the country.

The proposed pact negotiated by the Minister of Finance, Mr. Fielding, and the Minister of Customs, Mr. Paterson, and which was later on covered by Sir Wilfrid Laurier's high authority involved fiscal modifications affecting natural products only. Manufactured articles were excluded, with one single exception: reductions lowering the duty from 20 to 15, or from 17½ to 15 per cent, according to the case, were agreed upon as to agricultural implements.

Under this arrangement, the Dominion of Canada obtained free entry into the United States, and granted the same privilege to her neighbors on her own territory, for all agricultural products: living animals, wheat, Indian corn, straw, hay, vegetables and fruits of all kind; butter, milk, cream, poultry, &c.; for the products of fisheries, fish, lobsters, oyster, fish oil, cod liver oil, &c., and for another series of products such as timber of all kinds, wood pulp included, for products of the mines, mica, asbestos, coke, &c.

All the reductions of duties stipulated in the agreement and agreed to by Canada were to be extended to all countries enjoying within the Dominion, the most favoured nation treatment.

According to the figures given by the Minister of Finance, if one takes as a basis the trade between the two countries in 1910 for the various products mentioned in the agreement that is to say, supposing such an increase of commercial activity as hoped for were not to result, from the new regime, Canadian exports to the United States would have benefited by reductions of duties equivalent to a sum of $2,260,000, or about 11,700,000 francs.

The proposed agreement, curiously enough, contained no clause as to duration and as a consequence, no clause reserving to the two contracting parties the right of denunciation. The two governments merely undertook to amend their respective customs tariffs so as to make them harmonize with the stipulations upon which the agreement had been reached. The agreement resulted from letters exchanged between the Canadian negotiators at Washington (Messrs. Fielding and Paterson) and the American Secretary of State, Mr. P. C. Knox.

Those who have opposed the arrangement, some because they looked upon it as too dangerous an experiment, others because they aimed at striking a blow, through the pact, at the administration in office, have singularly stretched the purport of the arrangement. The agreement was a partial one, a limited one. All the details have been lost sight of; the word 'reciprocity' alone, has remained. In the eyes of the anxious elector, it has appeared as a threat and a peril; the elector has pronounced himself against a tendency to a far greater extent than he has voted on a reality.

Following up his argument, Mr. Kleczkowski refers to the intervention on the reciprocity campaign of Sir William Van Horne, president of the Canadian Pacific Railway and he remarks that when a man of that character sounds the alarm throughout the country, no wonder that the alarm should have such an echo among the electors and he goes on :

Under the inspiration of such a cry, the electors lost even sight of the government project, the narrow limits and the restricted purport of which were mentioned at the beginning of this article. They saw but one thing, namely, that willing or unwilling, the country was being entangled by this pact into a new departure, the issue of which was altogether unknown and which might lead to unforeseen consequences. Canada is on the crest of a wave of prosperity. Wherefore a change of policy? 'Let well enough alone.' Such remarks were freely made and heard here and there in Canada, when I visited the country; in August. And yet nobody then, even among the out and out opponents of reciprocity, could foresee that the elections would take such a turn, so great was the prestige attaching to Sir Wilfrid Laurier's personality. For fifteen years at the head of affairs, he had kept on growing in office, as a statesman and the country had grown with him. He had represented Canada with such an unusual distinction at the jubilee of Queen Victoria in 1897, at the crowning of King Edward in 1902 and at the crowning of King George in June last. On three different occasions he had participated in the colonial conferences that had been held in London in 1902, 1907 and 1911. His clear and correct views of political questions, his high intellects, ever soaring above small things, had won for him a real ascendency over the ministers representing the other British colonies who were sitting with him. Those of our fellow countrymen who saw Sir Wilfrid Laurier and who heard him on his two short visits to Paris, have never forgotten him. They admired his distinguished countenance, his courteous and gentlemanly bearing and still more, the loftiness of the sentiments, and ideas expressed by him, ever served by a fascinating and broad eloquence.

The whole Dominion was proud of Laurier. Under his administration and without the strength of the ties which bind Canada to the British crown being in the least impaired, Canada has more and more assumed the form and countenance of a real state, thoroughly organized, while preserving its primeval economy and charming originality. With Laurier at her head Canada, while remaining a colony, has gradually evolved into a 'nation' in the loftiest acceptation of the word, a nation which plays and will play a part more and more considerable in the great family of peoples, having the greatest vitality and with the most promising future before them.

Those are real services, the effect of which extends far beyond the moment when he who has rendered them goes out of office, after defeat at the polls. Laurier's name has already its place in Canadian history; it will have its place in the world history. Why not add here that Laurier's name owing to its French consonance and the origin of which it is the sign, is most particularly sweet to our ears? It will quite naturally be inscribed on the marble on which are engraved illustrious names which remind us—who can forget it—that France has behind her in America a glorious record. The good seed she has sown in that virgin soil is still springing up, and the race which she has transplanted there is not on the point of dying out.

Now, we may ask ourselves, from a philosophical viewpoint so to say, whether, when he proposed the mitigated reciprocity agreement which has just been condemned by the popular vote, Sir Wilfrid Laurier, accomplished statesman as he is, could have made such a blunder as he is credited with, in all sincerity by those who have so hotly battled with him? The Canadian confederation has the United States as a neighbor alongside a frontier of over 3,000 kilometres. Geography has its laws, its logic and its exigencies. Apart from any reciprocity agreement, in spite of very high tariff walls on each side of the customs frontier, the trade carried on between the two countries represents, within a trifle, for the Dominion one half of its trade with the whole world (313 millions of dollars out of 693).

The trade of Canada with the United Kingdom amounted to $245,000,000, of which $149,000,000 were exports, whereas her exports to the United States represent $233,000,000 worth of goods. These figures afford food for reflection. Would it be too rash to infer therefrom that the last word has not yet been said about reciprocity? The bogey of a possible annexation of Canada to the United States was dangled before the electors; it hovered like a grim spectre over the last elections. Annexation! nobody in Canada has it in mind; nobody cares for it. Very few people in the United States think of it, and its advocates are without any authority. Perhaps one of the useful results of the elections of the 21st September will be to have settled the matter once for all. Under the British Crown, as we said before, Canada is evolving more and more into a 'nation.' Let reciprocity, defeated yesterday, reappear to-morrow and insinuate itself more or less deeply into the economic relations of the two countries, Canada as a 'nation' would not be affected thereby. Her historical individuality is already too well established, and determined by tried political institutions as also by the continuous progress implied in those institutions to allow anything to alter it and still less destroy it. It is a complete organism, possessing autonomous life, perfectly able to work out its own destiny; an organism that means to live and which will live.

Such, Sir, is the impartial judgment of a great economist who has spent many years in our midst and who knows our fiscal policy as also the trend of our affairs. It is the most eloquent compliment that could be paid, coming as it does from across the sea, to the great Canadian who, as I said a little while ago, is still greater in defeat than in victory. The other day, the hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Foster) said that he was astonished to hear it stated that this reciprocity policy was not a new departure. On all the hustings throughout the province of Quebec and even in Ontario, to my own personal knowledge, they kept on repeating: 'It is a new policy offering great danger to Canada and which may lead us to annexation and absorption by the neighbouring republic.'

A new policy! And it is the hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce who dares say so! Let me quote his opinion on that point and that of one of his leaders, Sir Leonard Tilley who in 1882 spoke as follows :

The House has not forgotten that when the hon. leader of the opposition, last session, brought down resolutions aiming at reducing taxation, I set forth on behalf of the administration the reason on account of which we were not then ready to ask parliament for such reduction of taxation. I added that petitions had been sent from Massachusetts, Maine and New York to the Congress at Washington, asking the latter to create a commission with a view to consulting with another commission appointed by the Imperial government on the matter of reciprocity.

Further on, he adds:

But, as I said before, should the United States come and tell us to-day or later on, that they desire to come back to the reciprocity treaty of 1854, under which the natural products of both countries were freely exchanged, we should be quite willing to agree to it.

But what is more, in 1891 the hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Foster) when he was Minister of Finance in the Conservative government, spoke in his budget speech, on the same reciprocity issue, as follows :

The people of Canada knew that when, in 1866, the old reciprocity treaty was abrogated, that abrogation took place, not at the desire of Canada, but at the express instance of the United States, and they knew that, from that time up to the present, time and again, Canada has made advances, in a fair and honourable spirit, for the resumption of the old or the inauguration of new relations upon some fair and equitable basis.

Suffice it for me to say at the present moment that on an invitation given by Mr. Secretary Blaine, the delegates from Canada went to Washington for the purpose of having an informal conversation with Mr. Blaine, and talking over the possibilities of trade relations between their country and ours. They went there, and at the expressed desire of the United States, and, for their convenience and not for ours, the President of the United States asked us to postpone that informal conference which was appointed at that time, and to meet on his own invitation in a formal conference to be held in Washington in the month of October next. But I may say this, that the government holds itself ready, as the Liberal-Conservative governments have always done, to meet the United States on a fair and equitable basis and with the sincere and earnest desire to remove all differences that exist and to give the greatest freedom of trade compatible with the best interests of this country in its relations with the United States of America. I do not despair that, when our conference takes place in October, if disturbing conditions are not injected which might bring about a defeat, it may be found possible for relations to be formed which will place our intercourse with the United States on a more satisfactory footing than it is to-day.

Well, Mr. Speaker, it was the same gentleman who sought to fool the people into believing that it was a new departure and spelling danger to the country.

If ever the Conservative party did have a plank in its platform, it was surely reciprocity, but now they even refrain from referring to that issue in the speech from the Throne.

While the annexation bogey was being dangled over the heads of the electors in Ontario, the most dangerous appeals were made to race and religious prejudices against the distinguished leader of the government of the day.

I wish to place before the House and before the country a few extracts from newspapers, so that the public may know that I am not indulging in mere suppositions, but that I am referring to facts which really took place in Ontario. I wish to put on record here what the 'Sentinel,' the organ of the Orange lodges, said in a vitriolic editorial published on the 27th July last last under the following heading: 'The punishment of Laurier is due,' and which was spread broadcast among the English Protestants and Tories of Ontario, in order to draw a herring across the track and divert public attention from Laurier's sound and progressive policy. That paper said:—

The people of Canada have, during the past few months, had their eyes opened to see the hand of Rome manipulating the governement of the Dominion. Mr. Bourassa has written a lengthly article in 'Le Devoir' giving the facts of Sir Wilfrid Laurier's surrender to Mgr. Sbaretti on the school clauses in the Autonomy Bills of 1905. Bourassa says he was the intermediary between Laurier and Sbaretti. Consequently he knows all about it.

Mgr. Sbaretti's name reminds me of an incident which transpired a few years ago in this country, and I suppose the hon. Minister of the Interior and his colleague, the hon. Minister of Public Works, also remember that incident which will be handed down to history as the 'Rogers-

Campbell-Sbaretti incident.' No doubt the hon, the Minister of the Interior owes his portfolio to that incident, and that may explain why the hon. the Minister of Public Works appears to be so proud of it. The article continues:

This exposure reveals Sir Wilfrid Laurier in the position of an obedient son of the church chaining the two western provinces to a system of separate schools at the dictation of the Pope's delegate. What a descent from 1896! When he was appealing to Ontario to elect him and prevent the coercion of Manitoba he was a fine figure in the political life of the country. Ontario helped him to defeat the ultramontane wing of his church. But no sooner was he settled securely in power than he began trading the principles he had professed, and for which his party had stood for years, for the votes controlled by the Roman hierarchy. He has descended to the lowest depths of servitude to the Papal authority. What further concessions are contemplated no man knows. The clerical party play the game with almost absolute secrecy.

But can Laurier be trusted with the affairs of this Dominion any longer?

There are many people who hold that it is impossible for a man to be a loyal citizen of the British empire and a devout Romanist. They say that the Pope demands their civil obedience as well as their submission in spiritual matters. Those who hold this view are supported by the syllabus of 1870, and by Papal doctrines. Can a man serve two masters?

Leaving that aspect of the question aside, and judging Sir Wilfrid Laurier by his acts, how can Protestant electors continue to support him? He has become the tool of the ultramontanes. He fastened separate schools on the west at their dictation. He allowed the officers of the state to prostrate the civil authority before the prelates at the Eucharistic Congress. He uttered no protest when the military paraded as a guard of honor to the visiting cardinals. In fact he has played the Papal game from beginning to end.

And to cap it all he rendered futile the efforts of those who tried to advance the Imperial idea at the conference of colonial premiers in London. He did so in order to catch the votes of French Nationalists, who form a part of the Papal machine. Laurierism and Papalism go hand in hand in the government of this country. As we view the growing arrogance of the Roman church, as exhibited in the Ne Temere decree; as we see the priests breaking up happy homes; while they are breeding such fierce sectarian strife that it leads to murder (as at Lancaster); are not the Protestant voters of Canada warranted in saying that they will no longer continue in the office a premier who has given so many proofs of his readiness to put the government of the Dominion under the thumb of the Papal delegate?

I leave it to the House to properly appreciate such a fanatical denunciation which ought to be well pondered by public men whose duty it is, under the circumstances, to preserve and foster those feelings of peace and harmony which Laurier has succeeded in implanting among the various ethnical elements or our community and which some are trying to eradicate from their hearts, in the province of Quebec and elsewhere.

Mr. PAQUET. (Translation.) Would the hon. gentleman allow me as ask him a question? Before he proceeds further, I should like to ask him if he is aware that in the three elections which I had to go through in the county of L'Islet, my opponents never failed to tell my constituents to vote against Doctor Paquet, because the leader of the Conservative party was an English Protestant?

Mr. ETHIER. (Translation.) I do not know the nature of the objections raised against the candidature of the hon. member for L'Islet during the three last elections; but I know that the gentlemen alongside of whom he is now sitting on the other side are the authors of that infamous article. Is he going to repudiate it or accept it?

Mr. PAQUET. (Translation.) Does the hon. gentleman approve of the stand of my opponents?

Mr. ETHIER. (Translation.) As to that question, I leave it to my hon. friend to deal with. After all, he cannot be dissatisfied as he has succeeded in obtaining a seat here and he is now sitting on the government side.

But, what is more, during the last campaign, a remarkable poem in the form of printed sheet, was circulated throughout the province of Ontario, and I recommend that poetical effusion to the pious consideration of the hon. the Minister of Public Works. That lyrical effusion consists in two sections, the former of which is entitled 'Special orders from His Holiness the Pope,' and the other 'Canada's Reply to the Pope of Rome.'

Here are a few verses translated into French prose which the hon. the Minister of Public Works might hand over to his colleagues for their own edification.

Mr. MONK. (Translation.) Shame! shame! how dreadful!

Mr. ETHIER. (Translation.) Yes, how dreadful, indeed! The hon. the Minister of Public Works is quite right in crying out: 'For shame!' Shame on the fanatics of Ontario, the colleagues of the hon. minister:

Down on your knees, Ontario! and make obeisance low,
To me, your sovereign Lord and King, as Canada shall know.
Too long your recreant Protestants have scorned my holy plans,
But now your haughty populace must bow to my commands.
Down on your knees, Ontario! grovel and lick the dust,

Your sons and daughters fair are mine, by all that's good and just.
I own your bodies, souls and minds, as well as all your cash,
And to the lowest depths of hell, your proud ones I will dash.
Close up your schools, Ontario! and I will teach your young,
You English cannot be compared with the old latin tongue
You educate them far too well; you make them sharp and wise
And what you call the sins of Rome you keep before their eyes.

There are five stanzas in the same vein Here is the last.

Down on your knees proud Canada! my word must be obeyed
I hold the keys, I rule the state and though I have delayed
To exercise my royal will—my day has come at last,
And Canada is mine—for sure I will hold her fast.

The second, as will readily understand, is in response to this fictitious order of the Pope. Here is the first portion :

Ye Protestants of Canada arise in all your might.
Your liberties are threatened, grave dangers are in sight.
The sky is dark, the clouds are black, and soon the thunder's roar
Will echo loud when lightnings flash from distant shore to shore.
The storm blows straight from Rome.

The third stanza is quite remarkable:

Will he succeed? Shall we submit to be the slaves of Rome?
Shall we allow her priests and nuns to regulate the home?
To part asunder man and wife and let the children go?
Ten thousand voices cry aloud emphatically: No.
We will not bow to Rome!

Such are all these stanzas, such the vile and infamous literature circulated in Ontaro to defeat the Laurier government. Then there was an alliance with the Nationalists of the province of Quebec on the ground that the end justifies the means.

Six o'clock.

AFTER RECESS.

Eight o'clock.

Mr. ETHIER. (Translation.) While the campaign that I have described and explained was being carried on in Ontario, what was going on in the old French province of Quebec? Denounced as an annexationist and a papist in Ontario, Laurier was accused of being an imperialist and a traitor to his race and religion in Quebec. We find everywhere the doublefaced policy by which the Conservative party was able to climb to the treasury benches and grasp power. To achieve that end, the Conservative party did not fear to enter into an alliance with a party, the offspring of hatred, vengeance, pride, spite, ambition and jealousy. I have named the Nationalist party. And that hybrid alliance unfortunately resulted in the destruction of the work of fifteen years devoted to cementing the union of races, to the re-establishment of union and concord in the country threatened with civil war in 1896. God only knows how threatening and terrible for the future will be the consequences of that infamous policy preached by the Nationalist party in the province of Quebec particularly but also throughout the country.

I think that it is proper to show how this Nationalist policy really appears to thinking men who followed the electoral campaign in the province of Quebec. I read the other day an article which appears to me to describe accurately the Nationalist party as it actually stands, as well as its aims and the consequences of its action. Allow me to quote a few extracts. Their insertion in the Debate may afford food for reflection to those who, in good faith or otherwise, have adhered to that collection of antagonistic ideas to a party which they have denounced and ridiculed but which they now support against all comers. Here are a few extracts from the article :

Every public policy and all that is done for the government of society should de devised in view of the common and general good. The plans and efforts of true statesmen are distinguished by lucidity, utility and justice.

The weakness and incapacity of politicians are revealed by the obscurity, the inopportunity and the danger of their conceptions.

It is thus found that the former have intelligence, foresight and judgment whereas the latter lack the necessary guiding light; the first secure our confidence, the second do not. In the first case, we have men who know where they are going, in the second men groping in the dark.

Is it not thus that men and their works are naturally and wisely judged every day?

Let us now submit Nationalism to this test and see the result.

Where will their flag lead us?

That is the first question to be solved, as their flag is the emblem of a new and most serious state work to be undertaken.

The Nationalists are therefore men who devote themselves to the interests of their country, nation and race. So far, well.

But what must they do to prove their interest? That is the question.

They must overthrow two governments in their country, the federal and the provincial; they must trample under foot the men who form part of them, be they guilty or not. They must join in, if necessary, with their dangerous opponents, with men of false principles, in order to succeed.

This being done, what will happen for the common good of the nation? Will it even be possible to accomplish and complete this great work of upheaval?

They cannot tell; but at least in so doing they and they alone will be Nationalists!

As for those who do not think and act as they do, they are convicted beforehand of not loving their country; much more, they are cowards, traitors and even reptiles.

Such is Nationalism; such the monster.

We put it to reasonable and thinking men, is that a sensible political programme? Were those who conceived it, inasmuch as they were swayed by intelligence and not merely by sentiment, of that quality of well balanced mind and judgment which marks the leaders? Is there any national advantage to be discovered in such a project? Is it not rather an aberration, an enterprise calculated to accumulate ruins and nothing else?

Which is the true friend of his country? Is it he who screams and foams out his patriotism, who slanders his civic superiors, who foments popular and demagogic commotions? Is it not rather he who accomplishes faithfully and quietly the duties of his station, who does not cease his regular labours except when regularly called upon by his superiors, and who, in all matters, works efficiently for the good of his countrymen?

According to the Nationalists, all the citizens devoted to their duties, respectful towards their superiors, enemies of dangerous agitations, are not the friends of their country or true patriots!

It is thus that the true idea of patriotism, a sacred sentiment which should be respected and carefully fostered, is distorted and destroyed; it is made the plaything of cabal; the deepest feelings and the most fundamental principles of the people are being shamefully deceived.

This is something very bad and exceedingly dangerous. Every man wants to show his love of country, but it is leading men into grave error to represent to them as patriotic service that which may lead to their ruin.

Let us leave its true significance to the sacred expression of duty. Let us not raise a false standard under pretense of defending the country.

In the second place, is it serving the country to proclaim, under the flag, a race war in Canada, an entirely political war if you like? We say that it is not and we believe that it is very imprudent to attempt any such thing.

We have already explained that Nationalism is politically imprudent and very dangerous to the French nationality in arraying the representatives of the different races against one another, in contesting civil rights in the federal parliament, when we are the weaker party in confederation.

What should we not say if it were true that Nationalism tended to push the races in the direction of a social conflict, in organized and disciplined bodies? It is evident that we would then be on the eve of civil war.

It may be said: there can be no question of any such thing; no one desires to go so far.

We reply without hesitation: at the rate things have been going this year, we are not far from it.

What is necessary to bring on civil war? Two things only: To excite the minds and the blood of the people and to discredit the leaders. History tells us that it is thus that all such calamities have begun.

Nothing is easier than to excite men by playing upon their national and religious feelings, particularly when races are antagonistic in their origin, as is the case in Canada. The English are firm, the Scotch steadfast, the Irish violent, and the French-Canadians hot blooded. Could better elements be found for a dangerous war?

Unfortunately, when people are excited they will not hear reason and nobody can tell how far they will be carried away by passions.

No, Nationalism is not a wise method of defence under the circumstances; we declare that it is the worst of all methods.

Is that a true description of what the Nationalist press has been during the year preceding the 21st September last? But you will say: Things have changed since then. Those gentlemen have changed their programme, it is true. It is not to be wondered at, for that party, like the chameleon, changes its colour with the seasons. In opposition they proclaim their adherence to a certain programme, which they give up having attained power. The representatives of that party now sit beside the hon. the Prime Minister whom they had renounced and denounced before the country.

Mr. Speaker, Nationalism being clearly defined, I return to the policy which these gentlemen upheld in the province of Quebec. Before recess, we examined together the work done by the Conservative party in Ontario, from the point of view of reciprocity and of race and religious war.

Let us now turn to Quebec and see what was done to further the programme of the Conservative and Nationalist party. In the province of Quebec, reciprocity was one of the principal battle cries.

Hon. Mr. PELLETIER. (Translation.) Hear, hear!

Mr. ETHIER. (Translation.) The Postmaster General cries, hear, hear. Why?

Hon. Mr. PELLETIER. (Translation.) Because the hon. member for Rouville (Mr. Lemieux) declared the contrary yesterday.

Mr. ETHIER. (Translation.) If the hon. Postmaster General will hear what I have to say, he will find that there is no difference of opinion between the hon. member for Rouville and myself. Conservatives in the province of Quebec were divided as to reciprocity. Their common leader, Mr. Henri Bourassa, declared himself favourable to it before the opening of the campaign. How is it that they are burning to-day what they adored yesterday? Why do they now renounce reciprocity?

I have before me a pamphlet of which the hon. member for Rouville (Mr. Lemieux) spoke yesterday when he said that Mr. Henri Bourassa had favoured reciprocity. I will quote from an article which first appeared in 'Le Devoir' of the 7th

Februray last, and which concludes on page 4 of the same pamphlet. It will show whether Mr. Bourassa was for or against reciprocity, and the question may then be asked why he has altered his views since the 21st September last. This is what Mr. Bourassa said on page 4:

It would be unfair, to my mind, to charge Mr. Fielding and Mr. Paterson with having sacrificed the general interest to local or personal interests in thus reducing the duties on imports of agricultural products.

And elsewhere he wrote as follows:

And now, to conclude, should the proposals be rejected or agreed to?

I give herewith in a nutshell the main objections urged against the proposals, and proceed by way of rejection.

Does the mere principle of reciprocity endanger the economic system and national unity of Canada? No.

Do the proposals imply any danger as regards Canadian industries? No.

Do they imply any danger as regards our Canadian transportation system? No, especially if the Georgian Bay canal is built.

Do they imply any danger as regards imperial interests? No.—'Le Devoir', February 7, 1911.

And in conclusion he added:

But what cannot be gainsaid, to my mind, is this: the proposals embody a very large measure of reciprocity, which, all things considered, will tend to develop agricultural production, and consequently be beneficial to the great majority of the Canadian people.

In answer to the Hon. Mr. Lemieux, Mr. Bourassa expressed himself as follows:

Mr. Lemieux who has so closely kept in touch with all my whereabouts in 1904, should be aware that in 1911 I am still in favour of reciprocity, and so much so that I have on several occasions refused to publish in my paper manifestos of the anti-reciprocity league, whose money he charges me with accepting. I have stated and re-stated many a time, I am in favour of the opening up of the United States market for the disposal of our surplus natural products.

Thus, did Mr. Bourassa write and speak in the early part of 1911 and in the course of the last campaign; while some of his friends avoided the issue to suit the conditions of the various localities.

I was surprised to hear the member for Yamaska state this afternoon under his responsibility as member of this House, that he had not agreed to support reciprocity. He muttered some explanations to the effect that he was president or manager of a farmers' syndicate in the west, and that before taking a stand on such an important question, it was necessary to make a study of it. Is it likely he found time to do so since the 21st of September last, when the government themselves have not managed as yet to take a definite stand on the question, or had the courage to put such a plank in their platform.

I shall say something now in respect to the hon. member for Yamaska. When the time came for selecting a candidate in opposition to Mr. Gladu, the former member for the county, the Conservative party thought of former Judge Ouimet, a state pensioner. That gentleman was outspoken in his opposition to reciprocity, but the Conservative electors of Yamaska were of a different frame of mind, and they refused to accept him. Then it was that the candidature was offered to Mr. Mondou, who had been defeated on four previous occasions, as he stated to us yesterday, and who, in order to secure the farmers' votes came out against the navy, but in favour of reciprocity. That was how he succeeded in juggling away his election.

Hon. Mr. PELLETIER. There are other ways of juggling away an election.

Mr ETHIER. (Translation.) Has the hon. gentleman any experience in this connection? As for me, I have none.

Mr. PAQUET. (Translation.) In this matter of reciprocity, did not Mr. Bourassa like the rest of us, favour an appeal to the people, the great principle for the recognition of which we fought throughout the last election?

Mr. ETHIER. (Translation.) On no occasion did I hear Mr. Bourassa lay down such a principle on the hustings in the course of the last campaign. I had the pleasure of meeting him at St. Scholastique—and he knows it—and never did he propound such a view. The circumstance would have been an exceptional one, since there were four thousand people gathered there, and I challenge my hon. friend to quote a single statement made by Mr. Bourassa during the last campaign in the sense which he indicates.

Mr. PAQUET. (Translation.) He so stated in the editorials which he published in reference to reciprocity.

Mr. ETHIER. (Translation.) Such is the double-faced policy advocated in the province of Quebec; but then that policy has two cutting edges, as the hon. gentlemen on the other side may find out to their discomfiture one of these days.

There is another question out of which capital has been made in our province. I would not have referred to it, had not the hon. Minister of Public Works done so himself on a previous occasion. I mean the Manitoba school question. What have we seen and heard in connection with this matter, especially in the county of L'Assomption? Have we not seen a former Conservative Prime Minister of the province of Quebec, to-day postmaster in Montreal, going from door to door, as a common canvasser, in the back country, to inform the farmers that the school question was not settled, but that it would be if the Conservatives were returned to power. No doubt it was as a reward for his zeal that he was given the place which he now occupies. May I now inquire from the Prime Minister, whom I now see at his seat, whether he intends to take up once more that question and to implement the pledges given by a former colleague of his fellow ministers? For the last fifteen years the fellow citizens. If he does not think the question into the political fray, with a view to working on the religious feelings of my fellow-citizens. If he does not think he can settle the question himself, let him in any case bring his influence to bear on his colleagues from the other provinces to secure its settlement. Let him impress on the Ontario prime minister, Mr. Whitney, the desirability of putting an end to the persecution of which the French Canadians are the victims on his part in Ontario, and of maintaining the bilingual schools in that province. He will thus bring credit to those who have defended him in the province of Quebec.

I now pass on to another subject, that of the navy. In Quebec the Liberal candidates have all come out openly and frankly, every one of them, in support of the Navy Bill voted by the House and based on the resolutions of March 29, 1910. Not one of them wobbled, not a single one of them went counter to the principle embodied in that resolution. We had before us on the one hand the Laurier Act, on the other, two proposals from various members of the opposition. One of these emanated from the then leader of the opposition (Mr. Borden), providing for the building of Dreadnoughts and the payment of a contribution of $25,000,000. The other emanated from the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Monk), and refused to make any contribution at all or to build any Dreadnoughts towards the defence of the empire, in other words advocated the statu quo. What happened? We witnessed the coming to St. Eustache, at the opening of the Nationalist campaign in 1910, of Mr. Bourassa, followed by Mr. Monk, to denounce the Navy Bill, and that, right in front of the old historic church of that village. Mr. Bourassa cried out: 'You members of parliament who have supported that infamous, damnable Navy Bill, you will be accursed by your children in the next generation and the Hon. Mr. Monk applauded with both hands that statement of Mr. Bourassa.

Mr. RAINVILLE (Chambly-Vercheres). (Translation.) Did not the Liberals in 1896 particularly hold out similar opinions regarding the purchase of rifles by the Hon. Mr. Desjardins?

Hon. Mr. MONK. (Translation.) Hear, hear.

Mr. ETHIER. (Translation.) I think the hon. member for Chambly must have forgotten the discussion which took place in 1896 in regard to the purchase of rifles. The opposition did not take exception to such purchase, but deprecated the purchase of useless rifles of a type which had been discarded by the British authorities as valueless.

Mr. RAINVILLE. (Translation.) I may point out to the hon. member that the rifles purchase in 1896 were Lee-Enfields, a type of rifle which is in use in the British army and elsewhere.

Mr. ETHIER. (Translation.) I am not going to discuss the question of the purchase of those rifles; it has been settled long ago.

Mr. PAQUET. (Translation.) Did not the Hon. Mr. Brodeur, in 1896, under the circumstances referred to by the hon. member for Two Mountains, take a stand against any proposal to have Canada assist Great Britain in her wars?

Mr. ETHIER. (Translation.) Since the conference of 1902, that principle has always been defended by the former Prime Minister, while insisting at the same time that Canada's autonomy should be maintained, a matter about which the party supported by the hon. member for L'Islet do not concern themselves very much.

I referred to some resolutions voted at the St. Eustache meeting, and to which the hon. Minister of Public Works adhered with all his might. Well, a year later, at a meeting which was held at the Ontario street skating rink, in Montreal, the same resolutions were proposed, if not in the very same words at least in pretty much the same language. The hon. Minister of Public Works, was present at that meeting. He was even escorted there by young men armed with brooms and who were to acclaim him, as well as Messrs. Bourassa and Lavergne, who were opposed to Mr. Borden's proposal for a direct contribution and the building of Dreadnoughts. If all these gentlemen were of one mind, how is it that in the course of the last campaign, on the occasion of the official visit of the Conservative leader in Montreal, in the course of the meeting held at His Majesty's theatre, the hon. Minister of Public Works did not dare appear in company with his present leader? Where were then Messrs. Bourassa, Monk and Lavergne? Where were then the hon. member for Terrebonne, and the hon. member for Quebec county? However, there were present some old Conservatives, no dissemblers, no hypocrites those, and I shall mention only one, Mr. Maréchal, who, for one, was not ashamed to appear publicly at Mr. Borden's side, and to assert in public his adherence to his programme, that is to say, the direct payment of a contribution and the building of Dreadnoughts.

What proposal is now before us? Are we to understand that the hon. ministers representing the province of Quebec are now in favour of a direct contribution and of the building of warships? Were they sincere in giving their approval to the resolution of March 29, and particularly that clause included at the suggestion of the present Prime Minister 'the speedy organization of the navy?'

Well, how comes it that to-day they dare not repeat what they stated at the time? How is it that they shrink from the idea of forcing their leader the Prime Minister and his colleagues to make known to the electorate the policy they propose to follow in connection with the navy and which they claim to be useless and inefficient?

We are then left with the policy of the Prime Minister propounded when he was still in opposition, as it is not likely that he has since modified that policy which consisted, as I have just said, in granting a direct subsidy and in building Dreadnoughts. Otherwise we would be entitled to know what pledges have been given to the opponents of the navy scheme. What is the nature of the compromise which made possible their acceptance of portfolios?

But we are told a plebiscite is to take place. It appears to me, Mr. Speaker, that before setting down the plebiscite issue, the government are in duty bound to state what will be the question asked. Moreover, why should we have recourse to a plebiscite under the circumstances? The government as constituted has a majority of 47, why should they shrink from assuming responsibility for their action? I have always understood that responsibility to the people was of the very essence of constitutional government. The people elect representatives who are to decide on a policy to follow, the soundness of which they have to answer for before their constituents. The hon. Minister of Public Works cut, to my mind, a very poor figure and showed revolting cynicism when in an endeavour to vindicate his false position and explain his change of face, he replied to the member for Rouville: 'We are here and you are there.' Of course, you are there, but you may remain there only a very short time, before long we will occupy your places.

Mr. RAINVILLE. (Translation.) That is not yet an accomplished fact.

Mr. ETHIER. (Translation.) It will be presently, although I must admit, not while recourse is had to such a policy of side stepping and dodging of issues.

The hon. Minister of Public Works tried to explain away his vote on the motion of March 29, 1910. When we stated on the hustings of the province of Quebec that he had voted in support of that motion, our opponents offered to bet, as was done at St. Thérèse de Blainville, on September 18 last, in the presence of the member for Terrebonne, that Mr. Monk had not supported the resolution. But is it not a fact, we answered, that he accepted the resolution and the principle it embodies? Here is the explanation the now Minister of Public Works gave at Lachine in this connection:

> In 1909, a war panic broke out in England, war seemed to be on the point of being declared with Germany, and it was important to show to the world that the colonies are in close union with old England. A resolution was voted by the House stating in the face of the whole world that the overseas Dominions are unfailing in their loyalty to the mother country.
> Mr. Monk explains that he has been taken to task for having supported that motion. He has done so, he answers, for the sole object of showing to foreign nations that the overseas dominions are in sympathy with England.

Such is the explanation given by a minister of the Crown to justify himself for supporting the basic principle of an enactment providing for the establishment of a navy and which the same minister disapproved of later on.

In some previous speeches, reference was made to the bye election in Drummond and Arthabaska. That constituency has vindicated its good name in the meantime, the electors having found out that they had been hoodwinked in the previous contest. What the Nationalist leaders had stated at the time, they dared not repeat in 1911. The House will, no doubt, be interested by a recital of some of the circumstances under which that election in Drummond and Arthabaska was secured in 1910. It is an easy matter to explain how we suffered defeat, and to show up the shameful methods which were resorted to in that election. What were the statements made by Messrs. Bourassa, Blondin , Tancrède Marcil and Bourassa, Blondin, Tancrède Marcil and 'Hansard.' Here are excerpts from some of their speeches:

> Mr. Bourassa: In harvest time, the agent of that paternal government will knock at the door and notify the still robust father and all his sons to quit their home, as England, or else a group of speculators, require the sacrifice of their flesh and blood to extend their dominions or to promote some undertaking.
>
> Mr. Blondin: Those who butchered your forefathers on the plains of Abraham ask today that you sacrifice your lives for their sake. We have had enough of England and the British.

The Same: Our liberties, we have wrested them from England, and we owe her nothing.

Mr. Tancrède Marcil: We must avenge the death of the patriots slain by the British at St. Eustache.

The same: At St. Eustache the British made use of the sacred vase to water their horses, and it is for their sake that we are asked to build a navy.

Mr. Armand Lavergne: Do not expect French Canadians to go and get their backs broken for the British.

Mr. RAINVILLE. (Translation.) What paper are you reading there?

Mr. ETHIER. (Translation.) It is an extract from a paper of which I have not the name.

Mr. RAINVILLE. (Translation.) I am sorry.

Mr. ETHIER. (Translation.) Those are the words used by your leader and by the man who is to-day Deputy Speaker of the House, and in that capacity represents here His Majesty the King.

Mr. PAQUET. (Translation.) Has not the hon. member for Champlain denied in this House having used such words?

Mr. ETHIER. (Translation.) If he has so denied them, I shall charge him anew with having made use of them.

Mr. PAQUET. (Translation.) You did not have the courage to go to Drummond.

Mr. ETHIER. (Translation.) My hon. friend from L'Islet has been kept too busy at home to be able to assist his friend, Mr. Gilbert, and he was defeated at the last election.

Mr. RAINVILLE. (Translation.) What paper have you been reading?

Mr. ETHIER. (Translation.) Those extracts are taken from a paper dated October 10, 1910.

Mr. RAINVILLE. (Translation.) I ask that question simply because on a previous occasion extracts were read in this House which purported to be from 'Le Devoir,' while they were taken from 'Le Canada.' That may be the case again to-day.

Mr. ETHEIR. (Translation.) Let us speak of Mr. Armand Lavergne, Mr. Bourassa's lieutenant, that opponent of militarism who, during the military conference held lately in Ottawa, paraded in these very corridors in his brilliant military attire, at the request of Mr. Sam. Hughes, Minister of Militia. What did he say previous to September 21, concerning these same Britons whom he adores to-day: The French Canadians are not going to have their backs broken for the sake of these Englishmen.

That is, Mr. Speaker, a specimen of that class of politician making up the Nationalist party, and whom we find in company with the Minister of Public Works. The House is now in a position to judge what can be expected from such a hotch-potch.

Sir, I believe, I have set before your eyes a true picture of the manner in which the electoral campaign was carried on in Ontario and Quebec; and in the presence of that picture as well as of the cabinet whose policy remains a mystery for us, I must say with the fabulist Lafontaine: 'Ce bloc enfariné ne me dit rien qui vaille.' For the reason above given I shall support the amendment moved by the hon. leader of the opposition.

Mr. J. H. BURNHAM (West Peterborough). Mr. Speaker, I do not know what we can do to bring any consolation to our friends of the opposition. We have been debating this address for a whole week and the position taken by the government has been fully explained, and explained in such a way as to give satisfaction to every sensible man. However, this does not seem to satisfy our friends of the opposition. It is, as was said by the most eloquent member for Two Mountains (Mr. Ethier), a case of the government having been put in power and their having been put on your left. We have listened with little less than rapture to the eloquent words of the member who has just sat down. He is an ornament to his race, a race equal to the most illustrious in the history of the world, a race which has distinguished itself by a sense of justice, and a love of liberty that has drawn the admiration of all the peoples of the earth. I would gladly, as the hon. member suggested, follow him in French, but beyond giving us to understand that he has a yearning, a noble yearning which attracts our sympathy, for the government benches, I cannot say that there is anything in what he said that requires attention.

The gentlemen of the opposition have, with a rare eloquence and irritation, been looking and searching for the reasons of their defeat. They did not understand the policies, if I may be allowed to say so, that they laid before the country, but the people did. Not understanding these various policies, they are unable to account for their defeat. I may, perhaps, be able to suggest some few things to them which, at least in our part of the country, occasioned their downfall. One of these is a little measure to which I refer as a typical measure. Let there be no misunderstanding or misconception, unintentional or otherwise, with respect to my reference to Ne Temere; I am considering that measure as typical of all attacks upon the laws of this country, whether made by Protestant or Catholic, Jew or Gentile, bond or free. The question involved is: Are we married or are we not, when the law of the country says we are? If we are married, then how does anybody dare say that we are not, and if people do say we are not, then we are entitled to the protection of the laws of this country and more than that those people who endeavour to bring about defiance of the law or the setting of the law at naught, are punishable in other cases, and why should they not be punishable in this? You will understand that it was the government's position with regard to this plain and simple question that occasioned in the minds of a great many people the idea that they were unworthy to stay in office because they were afraid to give a straight answer to a straight question. Questions were put to them in the House at various times. They were asked by Mr. Taylor (Leeds):

Has the Dominion government power to legalize or validate any or every marriage solemnized anywhere in Canada?

To this the government replied:

The government does not consider that it possesses any such power.

The consequence is that although, by the British North America Act, they are given power with respect to marriage and divorce, although in them lies all the power except the right to solemnize the marriage, the mere process of entering into that contract, yet they answer the question by saying they do not know whether they possess the power or not. Is it any wonder that the people of this country lost faith in a government that had such a wretched conception of their duty to the people of this country?

Mr. E. M. MACDONALD. Would the hon. member state what power, in his opinion, the government have to deal with that question?

Mr. BURNHAM. They have the power at any rate of answering questions with respect to it.

Mr. MACDONALD. That is begging the question.

Mr. BURNHAM. I will explain. If the government are asked a question whether they have power to enforce the laws of this country, then they should say yes, if they think they have; if they think they have not, they should cause an inquiry to be made as to why they have not.

Mr. A. K. MACLEAN (Halifax). Give us your explanation of the whole thing.

Mr. BURNHAM. The hon. member desires to draw me into a side issue.

Mr. PUGSLEY. Do I understand my hon. friend to say that in his part of Ontario the Ne Temere decree was used against the late government?

Mr. BURNHAM. It most distinctly was.

Mr. OLIVER. It was.

Mr. BURNHAM. And I shall show you to a certain extent why. In a pamphlet just issued by no less a gentleman than Sir Richard Scott, Senator, by way of confutation of the statement that the Ne Temere decree had nothing to do with the laws of this country, occurs this sentence taken from 'The Tablet,' the organ of the Catholic Church in England:

The Catholic church, though she does not acknowledge that the state has any right to determine what marriage shall be null or void, has no power to change the civil law of marriage.

It does not want to have anything to do with the civil law of marriage but it denies to it the right to say what law is null or valid. If that is not bringing in the question of the validity or otherwise of a marriage, I would like to know what does. To show that this question has not been sprung upon us but has been brought forward deliberately I shall quote from the last issue of the 'Catholic Register.'

In spite of the Church's constant warfare on these (mixed) marriages, the number is much larger than we would wish to see it.

You have there the causa causans of the whole trouble, but it does not matter whether it is the Catholic Church or any other church, the people of this country ought to be free and under the protection of the laws of this country, and when any doubt is raised as there has been raised in this case, a general doubt—and you must acknowledge there is general doubt, because the various conferences, presbyteries, synods, &c., have expressed in very strong resolutions their opinion—it is the duty of a government that is a strong and willing government, not to evade the question by refusing to answer questions and declining to say whether it has power or not, but to say that they are able and willing to enforce the laws of the country.

Mr. MACLEAN (Halifax). Was it a very important part of the campaign in Ontario?

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order.

Mr. CURRIE. The hon. member is interrupting. He is entitled to ask a question, but not to carry on a conversation when the rest of the House cannot hear him.

Mr. OLIVER. The hon. member asked the hon. gentleman who had the floor a question and he is entitled to an answer?

Mr. MONK. He has no right to ask a question.

Mr. SPEAKER. It is the right of the hon. member who has the floor to give way and have a question asked if he desires.

If he refuses to give way he has a right to keep the floor.

Mr. MACLEAN (Halifax). If the hon. gentlemen will permit me to ask a question, would he say whether, in his judgment, this Ne Temere decree played a very important part in the province of Ontario, and if so what proportion did it play in the issues of that campaign?

Mr. BURNHAM. It certainly played an important part.

Mr. OLIVER. Hear, hear.

Mr. BURNHAM. The cowardice of the government in respect of the matters to which I referred has played a very important part.

Mr. OLIVER. Hear, hear.

Mr. BURNHAM. Because the measure was taken as a typical measure, and how were we to know that perhaps in a short time another body, perhaps the 'Orange Sentinel,' would not come forward with an equal right to trespass on the laws of this country. The laws of this country must be vindicated and the people must be protected.

We have heard a great deal of the naval policy of the late government, and when we study the naval policy, or the naval apology as you might call it, we can quite understand how it is that it was so generally attacked. If to be opposed to the naval policy of the late government, if to despise it, if to wish to reject it as nothing but a burden on this country without rhyme or reason, is to be a Nationalist, then I am a Nationalist.

We find, Mr. Speaker, in the resolution of the 9th of May, 1907, in the report of the proceedings of the Colonial Conference in England, this item under the head 'Naval Defence,' which that learned and august body was then considering:

Dr. Smartt——

I believe he hails from South Africa.

Would I be in order in moving this naval resolution after the discussion yesterday? I do not think it will take any time because it is a resolution which requires no remarks to make it acceptable to the conference?

Then follows the resolution:

That this conference recognizing the vast importance of the services rendered by the navy to the defence of the empire and the protection of its trade, and the paramount importance of continuing to maintain the navy in the highest possible state of efficiency, considers it to be the duty of the dominions beyond the seas to make such contributions towards the up-keep of the navy as may be determined by their local legislatures—the contribution to take the form of a grant of money, the establishment of local naval defence, or such other services in such manner as may be decided upon after consultation with the admiralty, and as would best accord with the varying circumstances.

You would think that that was broad enough for anybody to endorse. But what did Sir Wilfrid Laurier say, the right hon. leader of the opposition, one of the most distinguished men in the world?

I am sorry to say that, so far as Canada is concerned, we cannot agree to the resolution. We took the ground many years ago that we had enough to do in that respect in that country before committing ourselves to a general claim. The government of Canada has done a great deal in that respect. Our action was not understood, but I was glad to see that the First Lord of the Admiralty admitted we had done much more than he was aware of. It is impossible, in my humble opinion, to have a uniform policy on this matter; the disproportion is too great between the mother country and the colonies. We have too much to do otherwise; in the mother country, you must remember, they have no expenses to incur with regard to public works; whereas, in most of the colonies, certainly in Canada, we have to tax ourselves to the utmost of our resources in the development of our country, and we could not contribute, or undertake to do more than we are doing in that way. For my part, if the motion were pressed to a conclusion, I should have to vote against it.

It is that sort of thing that brought about, in Ontario, the defeat of the government. Surely there was a straight, square and definite resolution, proposing different ways in which the local legislatures might help the mother country, and might affirm their solidarity, and show a certain unity. But no, it was necessary in the eyes of the leader of the present opposition, after a whole volume of reports and proceedings, to decline to have anything to do with such a broad and really splendid resolution as that. But in order to satisfy a certain section of people in this country it was necessary for him to have a substitute naval policy, and out of that substitute naval policy was born this infernal policy they call a Canadian navy, which has no right or title in reason to that name.

Now, I will touch upon one more point. Hon. gentlemen of the opposition have rung the changes on the surpluses rolled up by the late government, as they pretend, year after year. But let me ask you, Sir, who paid those surpluses? The people of Canada. The people of this country took the money out of one pocket and put it into the other, and we are told that by that magical process the late government had conferred enormous benefits upon the people. If there had been some satisfaction in the process I could have understood it. If the taxes had been paid upon goods manufactured in this country we could have understood it. But the goods were manufactured in other countries upon which those taxes were paid, and we had to hand out our money for the development of industries in other countries, in paying taxes upon goods manufactured in other countries. While we were paying out these taxes we had been deluded into believing that we were doing it as a result of the magnificent administration of the late government. When we understood that, we said, away with the economic policy of such a government, and what, with one thing and another, the old government fell down, and they have a fitting if too splendid monument in the wreck of the Quebec bridge.

Mr. J. H. SINCLAIR (Guysborough). I must compliment my hon. friend from West Peterborough (Mr. Burnham) on the vigorous speech he has just made. My hon. friend complains of the naval policy of the late government as not being sufficiently definite and clear for his approval. I trust that my hon. friend is satisfied with the policy of his leader, or rather with the variety of conflicting policies that he has heretofore brought before the country with regard to the navy. Now, Mr. Speaker, before I proceed to make any further remarks, I wish to be permitted to congratulate the Prime Minister on his elevation to the most important post in the gift of the Canadian people. I have had the pleasure of his acquaintance for a good many years, and whilst we have not always been able to see eye to eye on public questions, that is his fault rather than mine. We were at one time on the same side, but he strayed away from the fold, and I remained in it. At the same time, if we are to have a Conservative administration in this country, there is no man in the ranks of my hon. friends opposite whom I would prefer to see holding the chief seat than my hon. friend the present Prime Minister. I would also like to be permitted to compliment the hon. the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Foster). He fought very vigorously for his party during the past fifteen years, and I suppose there was no man in the party who had more claims on the rewards of victory than my hon. friend. Many of us on this side of the House expected that when his party again attained power he would be promoted to his old post as Finance Minister. But that did not take place. I do not know whether he is aggrieved at what has happened or not, but he has no more reason to be aggrieved than all the other Conservatives throughout the country. It would appear that the Prime Minister was not able to find a man in the Conservative party from Cape Breton to Vancouver to entrust with the people's money, and he had to come to our side to find one.

I am also glad to see my good friend the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Monk), sitting in the front row. My personal relations with him during the years I have had the honour of a seat in this House, were very pleasant indeed. I have watched his course for some years, and on many questions I was able to agree with him. My chief regret was to see him drifting towards Nationalism during recent years. I was sorry to see that. For my own part, I do not think there is any place for a so-called Nationalist party in the public life of this country. I read a long speech delivered by one of the leaders of the Nationalist party delivered in one of the cities of Ontario recently, explaining what the Nationalist party stood for, and I felt that if those belonging to the other races throughout this country were to adopt a policy of that kind, with the object of securing the advantage of any particular race, we would require a great many of them, and it would not redound to the advantage of the public life of this country. I have the honour myself to belong to that gallant and warlike race that was bred among the hills and glens of old Scotland. What would you say, Mr. Speaker, if we were to organize a national Scotch party for the purpose of seeing that the Scotchman got a fair share of what was going, and that, whenever a new cabinet was formed, there was a fair sprinkling of Presbyterians in it? Some hon. gentlemen are laughing at that. But it is just as reasonable as the organization of this so-called Nationalist party in the province of Quebec.

There is no desire on this side unnecessarily to prolong this debate. But there is a desire among hon. members on this side of the House to expose the methods by which the victorious party won the election on the 21st of September I will venture to say that there never was an election contest in this country in which so many crooked and indirect methods were resorted to as in the recent election. We provide in the Criminal Code for the prosecution of a man who obtains money or goods by false pretences, but we have not any effective statute to punish the man who obtains the votes of the people by similar methods. But there they are with the stolen goods in their possession, and the only thing that we can do is to expose them in so far as we can to the gaze of the public, and of the people whom they have deceived.

In the recent election the Conservative party claimed that they were the only loyal party in this country. That seemed to be the claim that was set up by that party on every platform where I happened to be during the course of this election. They waved the old flag everywhere and strained their windpipes singing 'Rule Britannia.' You would, from their own presentation of the case, think that they were really the party that was keeping the old flag flying in this country. I do not say that the Conservative party are a disloyal party, but I say that they protest too much about their loyalty. When a woman gets on the housetop and begins to shout to the public that she is a virtuous woman we are very apt to think that there is something the matter.

Suppose we examined the record of the Conservative party on this question of loyalty. I will not go back to the days when they burned the parliament buildings in the city of Montreal and stoned the King's representative. That was a generation ago, but from the experience that I have had in attending public meetings in the city of Montreal not many months ago as a looker-on, I would say that the Tory of Montreal to-day is a lineal descendant of the men who did that. Let us look at one or two incidents of a more recent date. There was one that was referred to during the course of the present debate. At the time that the late Sir John Macdonald, who was the greatest leader that was ever produced by the Conservative party, was framing his National Policy, it was drawn to his attention that the high tariff against British goods might interfere with or imperil British connection and his answer was: 'So much the worse for British connection.' So, he placed the tariff against British goods just as high as against American goods or goods from any other country. That is incident No. 1. Take another. In 1885 Sir John Macdonald was at the height of his power. He had a strong majority at his back and I suppose that if there ever was any period in his history in which he and his party were able to control the affairs of this country it was about that period. It was during that year that the heroic Gordon was besieged in Khartoum and the news when it reached the British dominions throughout the world, created a thrill everywhere. At that time General Laurie was the member in this House for the county of Shelburne, Nova Scotia. General Laurie pressed upon Sir John Macdonald that he should send a Canadian contingent to the relief of General Gordon in the Soudan. Sir John refused to do anything of the kind. Mr. Blake, who was at that time in the House, asked a question and this is Sir John's reply:

No offer has been made by the government to equip and send a military contingent to the Soudan at the cost of Canada or of individual Canadians.

The British government noticed the attitude of the Canadian government and a few days after that, on the 10th February, 1885, Lord Derby, who was then Colonial Secretary, cabled to Lord Lansdowne, the Governor General, as follows:

General Laurie and Col. Williams propose enroll and command regiment Canadian volunteers. Before further considering these offers Her Majesty's government wish to know whether they are sanctioned or recommended by Dominion government.

The answer came back:

Permitting Laurie to recruit volunteers.

But ending with the following significant words:

Entire cost would fall on the imperial exchequer.

So there you have it; General Laurie may get Canadian soldiers to go to the Soudan if he can but we wash our hands of the whole business, and not a cent or a dollar shall we pay. This was the attitude of this flag-flapping party on the only occasion during their eighteen years of power when they were asked by the imperial government to do anything for the defence of the flag at home or abroad. Let us take a couple of incidents of a similar kind in the history of the Liberal party, and contrast them with those I have just mentioned. When the present right hon. leader of the opposition was enacting his tariff in 1897 the same question arose. It was asked: What will you do in regard to Great Britain?—and the present leader of the opposition acknowledged frankly that Great Britain had special claims upon the Dominion of Canada, with the result that when the tariff was brought down there was incorporated in it a provision which gave British goods a preference of 25 per cent over the goods of any other country. If I remember rightly, Sir, the present Prime Minister (Mr. Borden), and the hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Foster) were at that time members of this House and both of them spoke and voted against that resolution. Take another instance. Everybody remembers the prompt action of the late government in the case of the South African war. Why, Sir, the declaration of war was not more than three or four weeks old when a transport was making its way down the St. Lawrence with Canadian soldiers to fight for the British flag in that distant part of the empire. These men were not recruited by General Laurie in his private capacity or by any other citizen of Canada, but by the Minister of Militia under the authority of the late government, and that government provided a large sum of money to pay the expenses. That is the difference between the attitude of the Liberal party and the Conservative party on this question of standing by the old flag. I submit that it does not entitle hon. gentlemen on the other side of the House to claim that they are the only loyal party in this country. I have said that the election was won to a large extent by false pretences. My hon. friend who has just taken his seat (Mr. Burnham) has admitted that in the province of Ontario the great question was the Ne Temere decree, some decree that was passed by the Roman Catholic church, with which the government of Canada has nothing whatever to do, and in regard to which it can have no responsibility. But, it appears that there is nothing that these people will not bring up at the time of an election if they think that they can deceive foolish people and obtain their votes. In the province of Nova Scotia the great question was the danger of annexation. That was the question on which they tried to frighten the people of Nova Scotia.

The statement was that if we allowed our people to trade in natural products with the United States it would bring on annexation. Now, Sir, we have at present an enormous trade with the United States, and that trade has been growing year after year, until it has become the largest trade of this country, and at the present moment it amounts to one million dollars a day. Our trade with the United States has been going on for one hundred years, and if it has any tendency towards annexation, how is it that that trade has not produced a single annexationist in Canada during a whole century. And, if it is wrong for us to trade with the United States, who are the chief offenders. We bought from the United States fifty million dollars worth of coal last year, and eight million dollars worth of raw cotton, and who bought the coal and who bought the raw cotton if not the manufacturers and railway magnates of this country who are the friends of the government in power? It was from these people that gentlemen opposite got their campaign funds. The very men who are putting up their money to prevent the farmer and the fisherman from trading with the United States are the very men who are themselves trading with that country on an enormous scale. If the Prime Minister was sincere, that it was a dangerous thing to carry on this trade with the United States, then his first duty on taking office was to take measures to stop it, a thing which so far he has not done. The leader of the government might appeal to his Finance Minister, and he might ask him to influence his friends, the corporations, to buy Canadian coal in place of Yankee coal, and that would have the double effect on the one hand of keeping the friends of the Minister of Finance loyal, and on the other hand of developing the Canadian coal mines. But we on this side of the House did not believe in that theory; we think we can carry on any amount of trade with the United States without affecting our loyalty in the slightest degree. Our doctrine is that our loyalty is not so cheap as to be thrown in the scale with a barrel of fish or a bundle of shingles. Then we were told by the Conservative campaigners that if we introduced reciprocity the American trusts would come across the border and swallow up everything in Canada. Well, everybody who knows anything at all about political economy knows that trusts flourish under protection and wither under free trade. Every one who deals with the question honestly will admit that if you broke down the tariff wall between the United States and Canada it would be almost impossible for the trusts to exist on this continent. There is, however, one thing certain, and it is that the present administration will not carry on a very severe war against the trusts; they are too friendly with them. The trusts have had much to do with putting these gentlemen where they are, and I have no doubt they will stand loyally by their friends. It was also attempted in Nova Scotia by Conservative speakers, and the Conservative press to frighten the fishermen with the story that if reciprocity were brought about it would mean the end of the Canadian fishing bounty, and added to this absurdity was the equally absurd statement that the Yankee fishermen would be permitted to fish within the three-mile limit. Of course there was not the slightest foundation for either of these statements, but they were diligently published throughout the country during the whole campaign, and I have no doubt they had an effect on the votes of some people along our coast. Then, as most of you know, there was an attempt made to buy out all the newspapers of this country.

An hon. MEMBER. The 'Globe.'

Mr. SINCLAIR. There was that kind of patriotism that we have in the city of Montreal where they sell it by the yard, An association in that city made offers to the newspapers that for every line they would print opposed to reciprocity they would be paid for at a liberal rate. Some of the Liberal newspapers, and the Conservative newspapers which were in favour of reciprocity, indignantly refused, and while others printed these articles and marked them 'advertisement,' some of them put them in as editorial matter, and took the silver and betrayed the country. What, Mr. Speaker, do you think of men who gained their seats by such means as that? Looking over the speech from the Throne there is very little I have to find fault with. I thoroughly approve of the proposals to develop the great agricultural industry and to spend public money in improving the roads of this country. My criticism of the speech is that it is flat and commonplace. There is nothing in it to touch the imagination or awaken the enthusiasm of the Canadian people. The proposal for a tariff commission I regard as unsound and I am opposed to it. I am surprised that a government which is so very cautious in matters regarding the United States should go to Washington for a model in that respect. It is an un-British idea. The men who ought to deal with the tariff are the representatives of the people. You can turn over to a commission the construction of a railway and the fixing of railway rates and matters of that kind, but when it comes to a question of the taxation of the people that should be dealt with directly by the representatives of the people, and should not be farmed out to anybody. This is the position I take with regard to that matter and I think my position is sound. And if this tariff commission becomes part of the machinery of the law of this country, mark my word that it will be a commission for keeping up taxes; it will be a commission which will be used in the interests of the manufacturers and the millionaires to fleece the common people. That is what I believe it is intended for, and that is how it will work. I was disappointed that in the speech no mention was made of the fishing industry on the coasts of this country. It will not be denied that the verdict of the 21st of September was a serious blow to the fishing industry, because everybody will admit that if reciprocity had passed it would have opened up a large and new market for our fish. Our home market is all right as far as it goes, but our home market is not large enough to consume the fish we are now catching, and if confined to that market it would be impossible for us to expand our business. Why, if we depended on our home market for the sale of our live lobsters, nine-tenths of our fishermen in the maritime provinces would have to pull up their traps and go out of business. Nearly all that product goes to the United States and the United States is the only market we have for it. The same may be said in reference to our salt mackerel and other varieties.

This proposal to open up the American market for fish was the first ray of hope that our fishermen had for many years, and the Prime Minister has not made any proposal to compensate them for what they lost in that respect on the 21st of September. But while the speech was altogether silent on that point, I have been able to find that my hon. friend did not ignore it altogether. It is referred to in a manifesto which he issued during the election campaign in the county of Halifax, and this is what he said:

> The fishing industry, so important to our province, is carried on largely by boat fishermen. The conditions governing boat fishing have changed greatly of late years. Fishing is now frequently carried on many miles outside our territorial waters and during the entire year. The boats employed are more expensive, better equipped and more costly to operate than those in general use some years ago. Thus, boat fishing has become largely a permanent employment, and those engaged in it are in reality seamen. This change is advantageous to the industry, because it ensures a regular supply throughout the year, which is essential in order to retain our hold on the markets. The Liberal-Conservative party has adopted and will carry out the policy of extending to the boat fishermen the same free medical aid and attendance afforded to those employed on Canadian vessels in the deep sea fisheries.

My hon. friend does not seem to realize at all the requirements of the fishing industry of this country. There are a great many things that the fishermen in Canada are asking for. They are asking for better transportation facilities; they are asking for branch railways to fishing points like Canso, Country Harbour, Cheticamp and other ports in the maritime provinces; they are asking for the abolition of the steam trawler, outside Canadian waters, which threatens the existence of the fisheries along the coasts of the maritime provinces; they are asking for lower express rates so that they may be able to reach the home market. It is very difficult at present to sell our fish in the province of Ontario. The late government has been trying to do something in that direction; it has being paying part of the express rates for sending fish to Ontario in the effort to coax the Ontario people to consume some of our fish. But there is no large market, I am sorry to say, in the province of Ontario for our fish. It is increasing somewhat, but not much. The late government spent the large sum of $35,000 last year in paying part of the express rates to aid in sending our fish to different points in the western part of Canada, but the effort has not been very successful. Our fishermen are asking for better transportation facilities, lower express rates and better markets, and all that the Prime Minister proposes in his manifesto to give them is free medicine. They are not promised any branch railways or better transportation facilities or the abolition of steam trawlers or better express rates. The only thing the Prime Minister offers them is pills. I want to say to the Prime Minister that he is very much mistaken if he thinks he can satisfy the fishermen of this country with the promise of pills or castor oil. I would like to know from the Minister of Marine and Fisheries when we may expect to have the regulations made for furnishing free medicine to the boat fishermen on the coasts of this country.

Mr. HAZEN. Will the hon. gentleman be good enough to tell me when and where the Prime Minister made that statement?

Mr. SINCLAIR. I have just read from the manifesto which he issued to the electors of the county of Halifax, dated the 31st day of August, 1911.

Mr. HAZEN. I may say to my hon. friend that I am satisfied that any promise the Prime Minister has made will be carried out in the best of good faith.

Mr. SINCLAIR. It is estimated that we have about 40,000 fishermen on the coasts of this country, and with their families I suppose they would number 200,000 people; and if my hon. friend intends to provide free medicine and free medical attendance for these 200,000 people, I for my part would support the proposal as a small compensation to the fishermen for what they lost on the 21st of September as the result of the defeat of reciprocity.

Mr. STANFIELD. They are not worrying over it.

Mr. SINCLAIR. I presume the Minister of Marine and Fisheries was not aware until I mentioned it here that there was such a promise made by the Prime Minister. One of the other questions that I missed any mention of in the bill of fare is the question of branch line railways in connection with the Intercolonial railway. I would like the Prime Minister to inform the House in his reply what policy he intends to adopt in that regard. This is one of the most important questions in the maritime provinces. The Prime Minister, in his address to the electors of Halifax, refers to that important matter in the following terms:

Railway extension through the eastern part of the county has for many years been urgent. For fifteen years the federal government with abounding revenues has remained indifferent and inactive. During the past session, while both federal and provincial governments were trifling with the question, I took the ground in parliament that the road should be built as a part of the Intercolonial railway and without delay. As a result of this the federal government has apaprently been awakened to a momentary sense of its duty, and an item of $1,000,000 has been inserted in this year's estimates for the commencement of the work.

I submit that the hon. the First Minister claimed in that manifesto credit which he is not entitled to. Every hon. gentleman who has sat in the House, as I have, during the last eight years knows that during all that time he took no leading part in the agitation for branch lines on the Intercolonial. Every hon. member, who was in the House during these years knows that resolutions were moved at different times by members supporting the late government urging on it the necessity of doing something, and that my hon. friend took no leading part in the discussions on these resolutions. The pioneer in this important question was my hon. friend from Westmoreland (Mr. Emmerson). He took the matter up and made forcible speeches upon it, and persuaded some of us that we ought to move in the matter and it was pressed on the government year after year. The resolution which brought the matter to a focus so that the government dealt with it was moved by my hon. friend from North Cape Breton and seconded by your humble servant; and after a number of members on the government side had spoken on the question, the then leader of the opposition, who is now Prime Minister, said a few words in criticism of the course of the government and, in order to press the Minister of Railways to make some declaration, he said that at that time he approved of what we were proposing. But surely that does not entitle him to make the statement which he has made in this manifesto, in which he says:

I took the ground in parliament—without referring to anybody else—that the road should be built as a part of the Intercolonial railway without delay, and accordingly the government agreed to build it and voted $1,000,000 for that purpose.

But if it was so easy for my hon. friend to get this done why did he hold his easy seat for fifteen years before asking for it? Why did he not ask for it a little earlier? He seems to have got it simply for the asking—seventy miles of railway through his county and an appropriation of one million dollars to commence the work. That is his own statement, and I give it to show that the Prime Minister claimed a good deal more than he is entitled to when he made that statement over his own signature in his manifesto to the electors of Halifax.

Referring for a moment to the amendment moved by the right hon. the leader of the opposition (Sir Wilfrid Laurier), I was very much struck with the reply of the Prime Minister a few days ago. He failed altogether to make clear what his own naval policy is, and that is what the people of this country want to know. They want information as to what the policy of this government is to be in regard to that important matter. In answer to the challenge thrown out to him by the leader of the opposition, the Prime Minister read a paragraph from a manifesto that was issued by him in the province of Quebec about the time of the elections. Here is the paragraph:

Sinc the last general election the government has entered upon a new line of policy in regard to naval affairs, which is of far-reaching importance. The policy adopted was not debated before the people during the election, and it bears all the earmarks of a hasty and ill-considered scheme. In my judgment our duty to the empire cannot be properly or effectively fulfilled by such a measure. I hold that the plan of the government contemplates the creation of a naval force that will be absolutely useless in time of war, and therefore of no practical benefit to Canada or to the empire. It will cost immense sums of money to build, equip and maintain. It will probably result in time of war in the useless sacrifice of many valuable lives, and it will not add one iota to the fighting strength of the empire. The more it is considered, the more does it become evident that the whole naval plan of the government is an unfortunate blunder.

In that paragraph the Prime Minister condemns the policy of the present administration, but he fails to make plain his own policy. Evidently, however, that manifesto, with that paragraph in it, was not issued for that purpose. To my mind it was issued for a very different purpose —for the purpose of inflaming the people of Quebec against any naval policy whatever. Proof of that statement I find in the very paragraph itself. Why does my hon. friend refer in that paragraph to the loss of many valuable lives in the event of our adopting the policy recommended by the Admiralty in England? Does he think we can carry on a naval warfare and not hurt anybody? Does he think that when this Armageddon comes, about which he told us two years ago, no valuable lives will be lost? Just look for a moment at the circumstances under which this manifesto was issued. The whole province of Quebec was in a turmoil at that time over this naval question. Mr. Bourassa was making speeches on many platforms, wherever he could get a hearing; and my hon. friend the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Monk) and the Minister of Inland Revenue (Mr. Nantel), and other gentlemen were assisting him. The people of the province of Quebec were told that Sir Wilfrid Laurier had given himself over to the imperialists of England, that he had betrayed his own province, and that if this proposal were carried out their sons would be torn from their homes and made food for powder. With that agitation going on in the province of Quebec, the Prime Minister comes out with this manifesto which was circulated largely in that province, in which he tells the people that if the naval policy of the late government be adopted, it will probably result in the loss of many valuable lives. I submit, therefore, that the evidence of my charge that this manifesto was issued for the purpose of inflaming the people of Quebec against any naval policy whatever is contained in the manifesto itself. It is said that the late government should not have embarked on this naval policy at all—that nobody ever asked it, that it was an improper thing for them to embark in. Any man who says that is not familiar with the history of this affair, because from year to year, for many years, this matter was brought urgently to the attention of the Canadian government by the imperial authorities. Time and again they did not hesitate to put this matter before the colonial authorities, and were urging an answer. As far back as 1897, reading from the report of the Imperial Conference of that year, I find that the Home Secretary of that day, addressing the delegates from the overseas dominions at that conference, made the following statement. Referring to the British navy, he said:

This gigantic navy, and the military forces of the United Kingdom, are maintained, as you know, at heavy cost. I think the charge upon the exchequer is at the present time something like 35 millions sterling per annum, and it constitutes more than one-third of the total income of the country. Now, these fleets, and this military armament, are not maintained exclusively, or even mainly, for the benefit of the United Kingdom or for the defence of home interests. They are still more maintained as a necessity of empire, for the maintenance and protection of imperial trade and of imperial interests all over the world, and if you will for a moment consider the history of this country during, say, the present century, or, I would say, during the present reign, you will find that every war, great or small, in which we have been engaged has had at the bottom a colonial interest, the interest, that is to say, either of a colony, or of a great dependency like India. That is absolutely true and is likely to be true to the end of the chapter. If we had no empire there is no doubt whatever that our military and our naval resources would not require to be maintained at anything like their present level.

Now, I venture to say that that must necessarily be the case in the future. Look at the condition of the colonies. Assume,—although I am almost ashamed to assume it, even for the purpose of argument,—assume that these colonies were separated from the mother country; what would be the position of the great Dominion of Canada? The Dominion of Canada is bordered for 3,000 miles by a most powerful neighbour, whose potentialities are infinitely greater than her actual resources. She comes into conflict in regard to the most important interests with the rising power of Japan, and even in regard to some of her interests with the great empire of Russia. Now, let it not be supposed for a moment that I suggest as probable—I hardly like to think that it is even possible—that there should be a war between Canada, or on behalf of Canada, either with the United States of America or with any of the other powers with which she may come into contact but what I do say is this, that if Canada had not behind her today, and does not continue to have behind her this great military and naval power of Great Britain, she would have to make concessions to her neighbours and to accept views which might be extremely distasteful to her in order to remain permanently on good terms with them. She would not be able to, it would be impossible that she should, herself control all the details of her own destiny; she would be, to a greater or less extent, in spite of the bravery of her population and the patriotism of her people, she would be still, to a great extent, a dependent country. . . .

What, then, I want to urge upon you is, and in doing so, I think I am speaking to those who are already converted, that we have a common interest in this matter, and certainly it has been a great pleasure to us, a great pride to us, that Australia, in the first instance, offered voluntarily a contribution in aid of the British navy besides taking her full share of her own military defences. Now we have to recognize that the Cape Colony has followed in that patriotic course. I do not know upon what conditions these gifts may be offered or continued, but, at all events, the spirit in which they have been made is most heartily reciprocated in this country. The amount, of course, is at the present time, absolutely trifling, but that is not the point. We are looking to the colonies as still children, but rapidly approaching manhood. In the lifetime, perhaps, of some of us, we shall see the population doubled, and certainly in the lifetime of our descendants there will be great nations where now there are comparatively sparse populations; and to establish in the early days this principle of mutual support and of a truly imperial patriotism, is a great thing of which our colonial statesmen may well be proud.

That is a straight appeal from the highest authority in Great Britain to the government of Canada that the time has come when they ought to do something. When the country was new, and the population sparse and revenue small, nothing was said. The British government for 100 years protected the commerce of this country and the British taxpayers paid the bill, but when we have a population of seven millions and a revenue of one hundred millions, it is said that the time has come when we ought to take some action ourselves, and this is an appeal that a proud people like the people of Canada cannot very well ignore; so it cannot be said that any mistake was made when the government of Canada undertook to do something in regard to naval defence. I should have been disappointed myself if my leader (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) had not taken some action in that way, and I would say to the Prime Minister (Mr. Borden) that there are thousands of men in this country who voted for him and his party who will be ashamed that they did so if he capitulates to the views of the Nationalists in regard to this important question.

A few weeks ago I came across a speech made by the leader of the Nationalist party at North Bay in this province. I would like to be permitted to read a short extract from it. Mr. Bourassa says:

Mr. SINCLAIR.

I often hear that this is a British country, and that the majority should rule. When you tell me that this is a British country let me tell you that if this is true, that if the British flag floats to-day from sea to sea on the northern half of this continent it is because of the action of the French Canadians of this country one time when it was their will and power to join hands with the Anglo-Saxons to the south against your King,——

Mark, Mr. Speaker, 'your King'.

—against your flag, against your constitution. Had they done this, there would not have been one inch of the province of Quebec under the British flag to-day.

The part of that paragraph that I wish to emphasize is the reference to 'your King, and your flag, and your constitution.' This high authority in the Tory party, this man who has put himself in the position of godfather to the Prime Minister, this man who makes and unmakes cabinets in this country, does not acknowledge King George V. as his King, he does not acknowledge that flag that floats day by day over this building as his flag, does not acknowledge the constitution under which we live. In talking to a public audience in Ontario, he says 'your King, and your flag, and your constitution'. What does the Minister of Militia (Mr. Hughes) think of that? I would like to know. What do you think of it yourself, Mr. Speaker? I have had the honour of sitting with you in this House for the last eight years, and I have always regarded you as a staunch supporter of British connection, and of the British flag, and I would like to know what you think of Mr. Bourassa? I would like to know what the loyal Orange lodges of Ontario think. What do the Daughters of the Empire, those fine ladies who met day after day and drank tea, and wore ribbons, and talked for the Tory party, think? What does the Rev. George Frederick Scott, of the city of Quebec, that man who burst out into poetry, and called on the Lord of Hosts to save us from the consequences of selling our hay and shingles to the Yankees—what does he think? What do the 'British-born' think of that language from a man so prominent in the Conservative party? Is it any wonder that the hon. gentlemen on this side of the House have demanded an explanation from the Prime Minister as to how far he has committed the affairs of this country to the care of men who are acknowledged followers of this man who openly infers at a public meeting that he refuses to acknowledge our King, and our flag, and our constitution?

On motion of Mr. Rainville, the debate was adjourned.

On motion of Mr. Rogers, the House adjourned at 10 o'clock p. m.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

MONDAY, NOVEMBER 27, 1911.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

DOMINION ELECTIONS ACT AMENDMENT.

Mr. BURNHAM moved for leave to introduce Bill (No. 8) to amend the Dominion Elections Act. He said : The object of this Bill is to abolish the requirement of a deposit by the candidate in a Dominion election.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the first time.

ADDRESS IN REPLY TO THE SPEECH OF HIS ROYAL HIGHNESS.

House resumed the adjourned debate on the motion of Mr. Bennett (Calgary): For an address to His Royal Highness the Governor General, in reply to his speech at the opening of the session, and the proposed amendment of Sir Wilfrid Laurier thereto.

Mr. J. H. RAINVILLE (Chambly-Verchères). (Translation.) Mr. Speaker, during the last few days, the debate upon the speech from the Throne seems to have taken a very extraordinary turn. I had thought that in the discussion of the speech from the Throne, it was customary to consider the matters mentioned in that speech, and that we attached ourselves principally to the amendment submitted to the House, when there was one.

Well, I notice since the beginning of this debate, that instead of being limited to these different questions, we have spoken of all sorts of things of the past, and that the aim has been to laud one party and villify the other. This evidently has nothing whatever to do with the speech from the Throne and the amendment before the House, because the policy of the government is not discussed at all, and I confess that I have been somewhat surprised.

In taking part in this debate, I will endeavour not to go astray from the questions upon which our attention is called, as some of my colleagues have done, that is to say to confine myself to what is contained in the speech from the Throne, and principally to the amendment before the House.

Much has been said about the prosperity which Canada enjoys. It is true that that prosperity is great, but there is one thing which our friends opposite have taken great care not to forget, no more here than durin the last campaign, it is to assert that the author of that prosperity is the right hon. leader of the opposition (Sir Wilfrid Laurier). If we would believe them, he is the sole maker of that prosperity.

From their speeches one would believe that he is even the creator of the prosperity in England, in France, in Germany and in the United States. However extraordinary this assertion might seem, to my mind, it is not any more extraordinary than to assert that he is the sole author of Canadian prosperity. The contention is just as ridiculous in one case as it is in the other. There is no more truth in this than to say, for example, that the ex-Posmaster General (Mr. Lemieux), is to be credited with the military successes of Japan against Russia. No, Canada is only having her share of the general and universal prosperity.

The question we have to decide is this: Have we simply used, or rather have we abused of that prosperity with which Canada has been gratified by Providence. Is it in the name of that prosperity that the Transcontinental which, as was contended by the ex-government would cost only $13,000,000, being the interest during seven years upon $50,000,000, has cost, up to the present, 188 millions, the road not being even completed?

Is it in the name of this same prosperity that was established the system of assisted immigration, a system which has been in existence during too long a time, and which has developed into the North Atlantic Trading Company, a company without a president, with no directors, no shareholders, no secretaries, a company belonging to the order of myths, a company which has made enormous profits, and instead of having brought our population to 8,000,000, as it was expected, leaves Canada with a little over 7,000,000, a great difference, proving that assisted immigration at $5 per head has served to nothing else than to bring into this country undesirable immigrants who, after all, crossed to the United States or went to other places?

Is it in the name of this same prosperity that we have been given in the western prairies large grants of lands at ridiculous prices to some speculators and favoured friends of the government, and also to private companies such as the Canadian Northern, transactions in which a minister of the ex-government has been mixed, in an affair of $69,000, which was to be investigated during the last session, and which has contributed to the defeat of the ex-member for the county of Chambly-Vercheres, a county which during the last fifty years had always been faithful to the Liberal party?

Is it also in the name of this prosperity that the ex-government in the disastrous affair of the Quebec bridge has reimbursed to its favoured friends, the shareholders of the company, the sum of one hundred thousand dollars with interest and a bonus of ten per cent, leaving the widows and orphans, victims of this sad accident, to the mercy of an insolvent company and without any recourse whatever?

My conclusion in this question of prosperity, Mr. Speaker, is that the ex-government has deeply and often abused it.

The speech from the Throne contains a very important paragraph intended to develop the agricultural interest of the country in giving good roads. This is a very effective way of aiding agriculture and rural traffic, in saving to our agriculturists and merchants much time and fatigue, in permitting to the tourists to travel easily across our country and becoming better acquainted with it. This, I hope, will be the means to increase the population of the country, which, unfortunately, has been deserting into the cities, which is a great evil, because the more our agricultural lands are deserted the worse it is for the country. In fact, national prosperity depends in great part upon the prosperity of the farmer who supports the whole nation.

We must aid the farmer in other ways. We must give him wise laws and teach him practical and modern methods, and I think it is the intention of the government to do so. These laws must be of such a nature that they will not create, but instead would prevent such conflicts between the producer and the consumer as the reciprocity bill would have unfortunately brought, in opposing the interest of the labourers and manufacturers to those of the farmers, as was attempted in saying that it was the farmer's turn. I would like, after being fifteen years in power, that the government would be in a position, speaking of what was done for agriculture, to say more than they had put at the head of the Department of Agriculture a practical farmer; I would like that they would leave to the farmers permanent laws, practical and modern methods which would make sure their prosperity and facilitate the exchange of their products.

In this affair of the 'farmer's turn,' skilfully invented for the circumstance, after fifteen years of power, the principal object of this cry was to hide some acts of the ex-government, such as those which I mentioned, the North Atlantic Trading Company, the Quebec bridge, the Transcontinental, and also bring the people to forget that the expenses of the Militia Department which, in 1896, were of a million and a half, a figure which was already a scandal, from the Liberal party's contention, and which, in 1910 increased to the figure of seven millions of dollars, when there was not in any way amelioration in the service, as says in his report General French, who has not minced his opinion upon the efficacity of our militia. It is also undoubtedly to hide the paint affair of Sorel, and the government materials given away to private parties.

It is no doubt also for the purpose of having those good farmers, especially in the province of Quebec, forget that under so-called Liberal government, our country's constitution has been shamefully torn to pieces to the detriment of what is dearest to them, at the time of the establishment of the two new provinces of Alberta and Saskatchewan. Again, no doubt, the object is to relegate into oblivion the war navy, the establishment of which, according to the statement made by the hon. leader of the opposition (Sir Wilfrid Laurier), in 1902, was paramount to a crime and to national suicide.

For all these reasons and many others, that enticing by-word 'the farmer's turn,' was put in circulation, and to give effect to it, reciprocity was offered. Now, what does reciprocity consist in? Reciprocity with the United States, condemned, if I am not mistaken, by the hon. leader of the opposition in 1908, rejected as well by all our manufacturers, amounted practically to the opening of our market to the products and the awful competition of a people of 90 millions, the results of which could only be disastrous to us. The people realized that reciprocity could not be of any advantage to them. Neither the manufacturers nor the farmers were long in finding that out, for in my constituency, at the very opening of the campaign, I openly took a stand against reciprocity, and the farmers gave me generous support. I may state here that it was not so much the votes of townspeoples which ensured my return, but those of electors in the old county of Vercheres, which has sided with the Liberal party for fifty years back, and is made up entirely of farmers; that is where I took a majority of over 150 votes.

Mr. Speaker, instead of that reciprocity regime, the government proposes to establish a tariff commission, and I approve with all my heart such a policy as will ensure to our country that fiscal stability which many a time has been imperilled in the past under the pressure of purely partisan and selfish interests. I hope, Mr. Speaker, that the business men who are to make up the commission will strive to restore to the industrial world that confidence which is so necessary to the general welfare. For it should not be forgotten that several important industries have suffered very much of late years, and that a large number of workingmen having lost their jobs, emigrated to the United States, there to secure the wages which they could no longer obtain in Canada. Take, for instance, Mr. Speaker, the woollen industry. Out of a total of eighty factories in existence about twelve years ago, scarcely ten remain to-day, and that at the price of great sacrifices and disinterestedness on the part of the owners. Among these I am glad to point out the important Willett mills, of Chambly Canton, which for the last fifty years have supported a considerable number of people in the constituency I have the honour to represent.

Such is, in a nutshell, the substance of the speech from the Throne, and without further delay I shall take up the amendment of the right hon. leader of the opposition, which may be summed up in two words: You have forgotten our war navy. As a matter of fact that navy of the hon. leader of the opposition has not been mentioned in the speech from the Throne, and if we are to go by the statements made in this House by certain ministers of the Crown, that question seems consigned, to say the least, to utter oblivion.

This amendment does not imply hostility towards the present government; it is a mere pointer to the representative of His Majesty. Now, I trust that the representative of His Majesty is too deeply imbued with the constitutional spirit to accept such a representation, which, besides is one of the most illiberal ever proposed in the House of Commons, and which, were it adopted, would carry us back three hundred years. Then, it seems to me that we may very well discuss that war navy proposal, without being accused of disloyalty towards His Majesty. We are aware that the British Admiralty not very long ago, left the Canadian government entirely at liberty to choose between three distinct ways of contributing to the defence of the empire. That contribution might in the first place consist in a direct cash payment, in the second place, take the form of a local navy; or lastly, be in the shape of public works to be carried out in the country of a nature to help in the defence of the empire. Those were the three alternatives submitted by the admiralty, and surely, it seems to me, we should be allowed to discuss them, and to select one of these plans in preference to the others. We have had here advocates of the direct contribution proposal; others preferred the local navy idea. Why should those who, in the country's interst, looking to the development of its resources and of its territory through the spending of money and the carrying out of work in the country itself, prefer that plan to all others, knowing that it will at the same time help Great Britain and Canada, why should not those, I say, be treated with the same consideration as the advocates of the two other plans?

I am a former Liberal. For a period of ten years I fought the battles of the party. My political education I obtained in the pamphlets of that same party, as well as in the speeches of its recognized leaders, and I may well be allowed to-day to inquire as they do, and in the same way as they have done, whether Canada has contributed its share of the war expenditure of the empire. I, for one, answer yes, and I choose the third form of contribution to the defence of the empire.

I defended the principles of the old Liberal party, which that party sems to have cast aside within the last five or six years: No taxation without representation. From the purely military point of view, Canada has contributed more than any other colony to the defence of the general interests of the empire, through the immense improvements it has carried out, and on this point it will be sufficient for me to quote the words of Sir Charles Tupper. Here is an extract from a speech delivered by that Conservative statesman on September 22, 1893:

> I deny that we are a burden to the empire. I say that if to-morrow Canada was dissevered from the Crown of England, if to-morrow Canada became a portion of that great republic which liees to the south of us, England could not reduce her army by a man or her navy by a ship. She would want more soldiers and sailors and ironclads than she has to-day in order to maintain her prestige. I say, if this great continent was closed, as closed it would be to the ships of England, under the circumstances I have named, if they had no harbour into which to run or a place where they can obtain a ton of coal or a spar, instead of England being strengthened she would be enormously weakened. Her power in the Pacific, her possessions in India and China would be imperilled, and her prestige as a nation entirely changed. Instead of relieving her from any change for diplomatic services, or her army or her navy, it would impose greater burdens upon the tax-payer of Great Britain than at present. I deny that we are a burden. There is not a pound of British money spent in the Dominion of Canada, from end to end, for any Canadian purpose.
> I have a word or two more to say with reference to the defence of the empire. They say: Why should Canada with her enormous mercantile marine, her sails whitening every sea, not contribute from her resources to the defence of the empire? I say she does. I say Canada is discharging that duty nobly and well. No person holds more strongly than I do the unquestionable duty of every British subject, wherever he may be found, to contribute to the support of the defence of this great empire. If you are going to strengthen a fortification, what would you strengthen? The strongest or the weakest part? Of course, the weakest. Where is the weakest part? Is it in England, in the United Kingdom, or Canada, or Australia? No person can question that if England was engaged in war with any great power in the world, they would strike, not in its strongest but weakest part, and therefore, if you wish to strengthen the defence of the empire, to increase the power to resist invasion, the best way to accomplish this, I have no hesitation in saying, is by looking after Canada. Those who say that Canada is contributing nothing to the defence of the empire must be very ignorant of fact, at all events, and I would recommend them to peruse a little of that very interesting literature contained in blue-books.

Yes, Mr. Speaker, the building of the Canadian Pacific railway and other railways which have opened up our territory, the building of our canal system and the improvement of our harbours and seaports, the increased expenditure on our military organization, which has risen from one million and a half to seven millions, the taking charge of the garrisons and forts at Halifax and Esquimalt, all these items of expenidture the Canadian people have taken over, relieving by as much the tax roll of the mother country. All political men here have acknowledged that we had fully done our share in the manner I have indicated, and quite recently the right hon. leader of the opposition, together with the then Minister of Marine and Fisheries (Mr. Brodeur), insisted in London to have the Admiralty acknowledge and have it consigned in their records, that Canada had done more than its share through those great works for the defence of the empire.

We are a British colony and propose to remain so, but as loyal subjects of His Majesty we surely have the right to vindicate the position taken by us on the question of the navy and imperialism, and to appeal to that great principle of the British constitution: No taxation without representation. Our stand is in every respect a reasonable one, and in accordance with the policy followed by the right hon. leader of the opposition for a period of at least ten years up to 1908. And if we were to assume part of the expenditure required to maintain the British military establishment, not only in our country but in England as well, I think I would be entitled to say with all our Canadian statesmen, without distinction of party, and particularly Sir John Macdonald, Edward Blake, Sir Charles Tupper, the present leader of the opposition, and before them, Sir Allan McNab, Sir Etienne-Pascal Taché, who all of them wanted an autonomous military establishment for Canada, that we would be sacrificing the principle which I have just mentioned and which has always been the safeguard of British liberties. Instead of providing a useless navy, would it not be wiser to develop our resources and have a land military organization worth mentioning and founded on common sense, in place of a system of militia which consists in having children masquerade as soldiers for a fortnight every year.

We should realize that our geographical situation is not similar to that of Australia, for example, which is surrounded by water. Our only likely foe is the United States, from which we are separated by a boundary three thousand miles long, and which can be traversed by land at every point.

I repeat, it would be wiser to do what, in fact, the present Minister of Militia seems intent on doing, that it reorganize thoroughly our militia, make it strong and stable, capable of coping with any future development, for should we have war with the United States, our only likely foe, as I have stated, our navy would be of no use, and the most difficult problem, that of protecting our lines of communication from west to east, would in no way be solved by means of a navy.

The hon. member for Rouville seemed very much horrified and even poured out sarcasm at some hon. gentleman who saw in the Monroe doctrine a safeguard for Canada. No undue advantage has been taken of the Monroe doctrine, but if the hon. member for Rouville had reproof to administer in that connection, it should have been addressed to his former colleague, Sir Frederick Borden, who declared recently that 'the Monroe doctrine against outsiders was our best guarantee.' The same reproach might have been made to Lord Charles Beresford and to Sir Edward Grey. The latter on the 24th of May last, at a great banquet, accepted the principle of the Monroe doctrine as applicable to America's external relations.

Much has been said, Mr. Speaker, about this being a coalition government, and some hon. members on your left seem to find fault with Mr. Monk for having agreed to join the cabinet just formed, inquiring what business he has in this new organization. They criticise the hon. Minister of Public Works on account of a difference of opinion as to a particular question, between himself and the hon. Prime Minister. Now, supposing that to be the case, what about it? Have we not witnessed members of the present opposition party sitting side by side at the same council board, though entertaining contradictory views on certain essential questions. Need I refer to the acceptance by Mr. Tarte of a portfolio in the Laurier administration, in spite of his well-known protectionist principles, while two of his colleagues, Messrs. Fielding and Paterson were downright free-traders. Mr. Tarte even always refused to state that he was a Liberal. I have merely to glance over a few pages of the political history of my country to ascertain that differences of opinion were never an obstacle to the formation of a cabinet, and that coalitions were at all times in order. Was it not a coalition that was effected between Joseph Howe and George Brown? Was it not a coalition which was effected in 1873 between Cartwright and Mackenzie. And previous to that, the Lafontaine-Baldwin, the Morin-McNab, the Morin-Taché governments were all coalition governments.

When Mr. Dobell was elected in Quebec as an independent Conservative, he refused to take part in the Liberal celebration at Quebec, notwithstanding which, a few days later, he joined the Laurier administration, that is, what I term coalition. Nevertheless, things have gone on smoothly for the Liberal party, no one was scandalized, and I can assure the hon. gentleman on the other side that in the ranks of the government supporters no more harm will come from it. And that navy question hon. gentlemen would fain throw in as a stumbling block, will be settled to the satisfaction of all true Canadian interests. For it seems perfectly well understood, and I have the statement as to that from the mouths of two authorized ministers of the Crown, if we are to change the basic principles relative to the organization of the land and sea forces, and if some new pro-proposal is to be set forth, the people will beforehand be consulted.

That is what we asked, that is what the Minister of Public Works asked, and that is what the people will be called upon to decide; and by their verdict we shall abide.

Mr. C. A. WILSON (Laval). (Translation.) Will the hon. gentleman allow me to ask a question? Has he any objection to stating the names of the minsters from whom he holds the statement?

Mr. RAINVILLE. (Translation.) The statements from the two ministers were made on the floor of the House.

Mr. WILSON. (Translation.) I beg the hon. gentleman's pardon, I understood that those statements had been made to himself.

Mr. RAINVILLE. (Translation.) No, I stated that those statements had been made in the House to the entire satisfaction of hon. gentlemen on this side; and I think that all the members of this House should be satisfied with them.

Are we deviating from the path which has been blazed by the fathers of confederation and by the leading statesmen of Canada on that navy question? I do not believe it, and I now wish to lay before the House the platform of the Liberal party in 1896 and from 1896 to 1908. The hon. member for Two Mountains (Mr. Ethier) contended in his speech the other day that in 1896 there was no question of principle at stake regarding the purchase of Lee-Enfield rifles, but that if the purchase of those rifles had been criticised, it was solely in connection with their efficiency which was being questioned. I wish to contradict that statement and to show by 'Hansard' that it was on the very principle of the purchase that the discussion took place, and not in respect to their worth. I quote from 'Hansard,' of 1896, p. 6172, an extract from the speech of a then noted leader of the Liberal party, and that should convince him once for all:

> There is one feature in connection with this vote which puzzles me. We have over and again been told that in the event of war taking place of Canada being invaded we could rely on Great Britain's protection; and that the only ground for not severing the colonial tie was that should international difficulties arise, we might rely on England's strong arm. Now, Sir, I am sorry to hear under the circumstances that the government, for the purpose of arming the Canadian militia, have made their purchases, not from private contractors, but from the War Office in Great Britain, and that we are asked now to foot the bills. Is that the protection we have been promised by Great Britain? Is that the position in which we stand as a colony? I think we are entitled to an altogether different treatment.

Needless to say that the author of this speech was Speaker of the House of Commons, Minister of Marine and Fisheries, and is to-day a judge of the Supreme Court.

I think this authority is sufficient to show to the hon. member from Two Mountains that, in 1896, that question was considered as one of principle, and not as a mere difference of appreciation as to the efficiency of those rifles.

I shall go farther and quote extracts from newspapers, but I shall not follow the example of the member for Two Mountains who was unable to point out the name of the paper from which he quoted, or the date of its publication. The paper from which I am quoting is 'Le Soir,' of June 18, 1896, a paper founded especially to promote the interests of the Liberal party on the eve of the federal elections then to take place.

> Extract from 'Le Soir', June 18, 1896.
>
> One of the hobbies of old man Tupper is imperial federation. Imperial federation means a closer union between England and her colonies in general and Canada in particular.
>
> In accordance with the terms of that union, Canada, in time of war, would be called upon to pay its share of the cost in money and in men.
>
> And as England is nearly always at war with some one, we would constantly be under the obligation of taxing ourselves to find the required funds and of recruiting men to fill up the regiments.
>
> In turn, England would make those rascals baronets, knights of so and so and commanders of so and so.
>
> But the people would continue to supply convenient targets in time of war.
> Hardly was Sir Charles Tupper back from England that he began paving the way towards the fulfilment of his awful plan.

England has been expecting some trouble with the United States concerning a few arpents of mining lands of which she claimed the ownership in Venezuela, thousands of miles away from our country, in Central America. In a hurry Sir Charles Tupper to show his zeal, orders the purchase in England of rifles and guns to the amount of $1,800,000, while the House was sitting, without consulting parliament.

That was not enough.

He required three millions!

Mr. Foster on April 21, 1896, (page 6902 of Hansard) moved a resolution authorizing a loan of three millions dollars to settle all purchases past and future.

Orders had been sent out at the time for the issue of 40,000 Lee-Enfield and 23,000 cavalry rifles of the same make. There had also been ordered four batteries of six guns, of twelve inch diameter, together with the necessary ammunition.

The rifles cost $18 each.

The cavalry rifles cost altogether $40,000.

The bayonets, the scabbards, cost four dollars.

Then, the following purchases are to be made:

Fifty Maxim guns.

Two hundred sets of harness for heavy draft.

Forty sets of cavalry saddles.

Why all these armaments if we are not to have war?

And why should we fight for England?

Electors should remember that these great and portly leaders, who are always anxious to show themselves better patriots than others, more loyal than others, and ready to engage us in war for the benefit of others, will not bear the burden of it.

Those rifles, those guns, will be put in action by the people themselves. You are considered the right stuff to be fired at. The Tuppers, the Angers, the Taillons will be in their offices, whence they will dispatch you to a certain death, their hearts filled with joy and their glasses with champagne. Once more, why all those rifles, those guns, those bayonets if the whole Tupper concern is not meditating some damnable onslaught?

Your children will be sent to Africa, to Asia, whence never to return.

If you vote for the Conservative candidates you approve of all these war preparations. Does the government come to your assistance when you are overburdened by taxes of all kinds, when you suffer damages through floods or fires? And three million dollars have been spent on rifles.

Vote for Laurier and his candidates, if you wish your country to enjoy the same tranquillity, and to not run the risk of being some day sent out to foreign countries, while your wives and children and all that is dear to you remain behind.

So I am surprised to hear members of the opposition complain that politicians in the province of Quebec have worked up race prejudices, knowing as I do that since 1896 the Liberal party, under whose patronage, unfortunately, I fought my first political battles, has not ceased working on the prejudices of the race in the name of one man. If any proof be needed, just run your eye through the Liberal pamphlets, and it will be found that for fifty years, in the province of Quebec, political questions have not been considered on their merits, but that continually and solely the personality of one man has been dangled before the people as a means of holding sway over the minds of French Canadians, his greatest merit in their estimation being his nationality and his Catholic faith. And it is such a system of deceit, worked on the greatest possible scale, that we had to cope with in our fight for principles and opinions. Thank God, those principles and opinions have triumphed this year. That playing on the prejudices of the people has been defeated by the good sense of the people themselves, and I trust that for the good of Canada it will never be reinstated.

Mr. E. B. DEVLIN (Wright). Mr. Speaker, if I crave the indulgence of the House for a few moments, it is simply to consider what has been said since the beginning of this debate, rather than to criticise anything which may have appeared in the speech from the Throne delivered by His Royal Highness the Duke of Connaught. It is a matter of surprise to a great many of us that the Prime Minister (Mr. Borden) did not see his way clear to have a clause inserted in the speech which could assure us and the country at large of the immediate construction of the Georgian Bay canal. We remember that the hon. Minister of Public Works (Mr. Monk) thought it was inopportune to build a Canadian navy, as he said we should immediately begin the construction of the Georgian Bay canal, but this hon. gentleman, whom, if it be not unparliamentary, I would call the Sir John Falstaff of the province of Quebec, does not now show any great sympathy with the construction of the Georgian Bay canal. Has he forgotten his promise? I hope that it is because it is early in the session and that he has not yet made an announcement on the subject, I trust that he will refuse to remain in the government of the Prime Minister if the Prime Minister and his colleagues do not agree to begin at once the construction of that important work.

There was a matter referred to the other day by the hon. member for Maisonneuve (Mr. Verville)—labour. Nothing was said in the speech from the Throne about labour. I have had some little to do with labour for the last seven or eight years, in fact since I have had the honour of a seat in this House. I sympathize most sincerely with certain hon. gentlemen seated on the other side of the House in many respects, and especially in respect to the question of patronage. The question of labour is one which necessarily must occupy the attention of every hon. gentleman who has a seat on the other side of the House, and it certainly occupies the attention of every hon. gentleman on this side of the House. I would like to tell hon. gentlemen on the other side of the House, who must be bothered about patronage, that there is an easy way out of all those difficulties. I am sure that they will believe that I am sincere and that they will give me credit for having had some little experience of my own. Do not give all your attention and thought, as you are doing, to the manufacturers, the trusts, the combines and the mergers of this country, but give some thought to the question of labour. As our shanties are being further removed from our great industrial centres it necessarily follows that there will be a greater demand for labour from the labouring classes during the winter months. I am extremely sorry to see that hon. gentlemen have taken it upon themselves to forget the elementary principles of Christian charity and, untrue to all the principles which they advocated when they sat upon this side of the House, when they told us that patronage should be removed from politics, that it should be placed under a commission, that a man's politics should not in any way be a disqualification for a position in the government, I find that the hon. gentlemen, the day after they found themselves in the majority, forgot the season of the year, forgot the poor fathers of families, and threw them out on the street without giving them a chance of finding any work for the long winter months. I commend labour to the consideration of the government, and I give them my assurance that for any measure which they bring in in the interest of labour I will forget the party with which I am allied and will give them my earnest support.

There is another question which has been bandied about in this country in the last few days that I would like to take up in as delicate a manner as I possibly can. That is the question of race and the question of religion. It has been said that during the last campaign racial and religious appeals were made in this country. It does seem to me that there is in this country too much provincialism and not a sufficient amount of Canadian sentiment. Certain hon gentlemen forget the purpose for which confederation was entered into, and to hon. gentlemen opposite, more especially to my good Nationalist friends, if there are any left on the other side of the House, I would commend the reading of the history of Sir John A. Macdonald and of Sir George Etienne Cartier. Appeals to race and religion are very dangerous. I was somewhat of a victim to them myself during the last campaign, and I propose to speak openly upon this subject to-day. Why should we make such appeals? What good is there in it? I speak the English language, it is my language, and I am glad to say that I understand the French tongue. Let hon. gentlemen opposite study the French character a little more. If they would inquire a little more into conditions in the province of Quebec, if they would go amongst the French Canadians, if they would study the Acts which guarantee the French Canadians their rights, notably the Act of 1774, the treaty of Paris of 1763, aye, and the British North America Act, they would find that our French Canadian friends ask for no more, and certainly no less, than what has been guaranteed to them by these Acts. There may be differences of opinion, because it is only human nature to have differences of opinion. Why then not understand that a French Canadian citizen is as loyal to his country and as loyal to the British Empire as we are? Why these appeals during the last election against my right hon. friend the leader of the opposition (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) on account of his race and religion? You, Mr. Speaker, after your long career in parliament, are setting the good example of the study of the French language. I cannot commend too strongly to every hon. gentlemen in this House, who does not know it, the necessity of studying the French language. The French are here to remain, they are here under the security of constitutional Acts, and they will have all the rights which are guaranteed to them by the British North America Act, and which we on the Liberal side of the House are conserving to them.

Why then should gentlemen make appeals against them on account of their race and religion, and why in every school of this Dominion should not the French language be taught to their children? Let me say a word to my very good friend the Minister of Public Works. I am not a believer in the Darwinian theory of evolution, but I never saw a case of evolution so clearly proved to the people of this country as the Minister of Public Works evolving from an extreme Nationalist to an ultra-imperialist for the sake of a portfolio. I do not want to be hard on the Minister of Public Works; I know that the road he will have to travel from this out in the province of Quebec will be sufficiently difficult. I want to treat him as gently as I naturally would treat any hon. gentleman opposite, even the Minister of Trade and Commerce. The Minister of Public Works went through the province of Quebec last election educating the youth of our universities and colleges everywhere he met them against the iniquities of the naval policy. The cry everywhere in the province of Quebec used by the Minister of Public Works and his friends was: 'a bas la marine; we want no navy.' The Minister of Public Works said there were other expenditures more necessary, and to-day we have the member for Chambly-Verchères (Mr. Rainville) who is apparently not satisfied with the present stand of his leaders upon the navy question. I want to point out the very noble stand taken by the Minister of Public Works upon this question. He says, as reported in this year's 'Hansard' page 245:

I am confident that the leader of the government has taken the view of this question which should be taken. Notwithstanding its gravity, its importance, its seriousness he will know how to solve it, for no man is better qualified to do it than he is himself.

Couple that with his words in the city of Hull when he said that the Prime Minister was of a sympathetic nature and would no doubt handle the naval question all right. Couple that with his answer to the hon. member for Rouville (Mr. Lemieux): we played the game and we are here and you are there. I regret the absence of the Minister of Public Works from his seat this afternoon, but I would like to ask him were he present if that is the attitude the people of Quebec were led to believe he and his Nationalist friends would take when they were returned to this House? No; these gentlemen gave to the province of Quebec the solemn assurance that they would hardly be a day in this House before they would introduce legislation against the naval policy of Sir Wilfrid Laurier. But to-day the Minister of Public Works tells us he is in favour of the navy, and that his only objection is that under the naval policy of the late government the ships were not big enough and the guns were not heavy enough. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Monk) also told us that he and his friends would not choose a time of danger as a time when they should consider the relations existing between the mother country and this country. Let me refer for a moment to what was said by one of the Nationalists printed in a paper published in the county I have the honour to represent and published purposely for the last election, and which was paid for I have no doubt by the money that came from the trusts and mergers of this country, and we have some few of them in the county of Wright. One of the candidates of the Minister of Public Works laid down their policy on the naval question in these words:

I am in favour of helping England by every reasonable means in case England is in danger.

That was the attitude taken the other day by the Minister of Public Works; In case England is in danger he will consider our relations to her but not sooner. This gentleman continued to say:

I declare myself opposed to the naval policy as established by the Laurier government.

Hon. Mr. PELLETIER. Hear, hear.

Mr. DEVLIN. Is the Postmaster-General also opposed to the naval policy?

Mr. PELLETIER. Of the late government?

Mr. DEVLIN. The only naval policy we have at the present day.

Mr. PELLETIER. That is the policy of the late government.

Mr. DEVLIN. The only naval policy we have at the present day.

Mr. PELLETIER. I am dead against it.

Mr. DEVLIN. Have you any other substitute?

Mr. PELLETIER. Yes, wait until you see.

Mr. DEVLIN. Wait until that rum comes from British Guiana that the Minister of Trade and Commerce is going to bring in. This paper continues, and I translate from the French:

A vote for Laurier is a vote for the decadence of the French language in the west. A vote against Laurier does not mean a vote for a contribution and for an Imperial navy. Mr. Borden himself in spite of his offer of contribution recognizes the right of the people to be consulted.

That is some of the policy of the Nationalist party, but there is a little more:

Why vote against Laurier? Because he has betrayed the constitution and the traditions of all parties. Because, when giving constitutional life to the west he should have protected the rights guaranteed by the constitution. With his prestige and his majority when you gave him the power to do so, he did not stand by his duty. Because, he, in choosing between right and fanaticism put his power at the service of sectarian hatred against right and justice; because he should have defended Canada against Imperialism and he betrayed Canada to Imperialism. For Laurier we have forgotten the humiliation of our brothers in the west; for Laurier we have submitted to the entry of Sifton into the cabinet; for Laurier we have forgotten the participation of Canada in the murdering of the Boers.

These are some of the remarks that were made by the Nationalists during the last election campaign. Then, what do you think when I tell you, Mr. Speaker, that there was spread throughout my county on the eve of the election a circular offering $1,000 reward to any man who could prove that I did not vote against every proposal for the establishment of the French as an official language in the new provinces, and the Catholic religion upon the same footing as other religions That will show you, Sir, some of the efforts which were made by our friends opposite to attain that delightful position they occupy now, and which we on this side of the House do not envy them at all.

My hon. friend the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Monk) said the other day that we on this side were the cause of French-Canadians in the Northwest Territories not having the right to recognition by the state of their language and religion. Will you, Mr. Speaker, permit me to review this question, as it is one in which you must be greatly interested, and as it is well we should all know just how it came about that the French Canadians in the Northwest Territories lost the use of their language in the legislature there. I must apologize to the House for referring to this matter, but I think I have ample justification in the fact that it was the chief argument used in the county of Wright to defeat me, and I think, therefore, it is well that the electors in the province of Quebec should be reminded of the attitude taken by the hon. Minister of Public Works (Mr. Monk) upon this question of the use of the French language. In 1877, under the McKenzie government, a Bill was introduced establishing the use of the French language in the territories. In 1890, when a Conservative government was in power, a Bill was introduced by the late Mr. Dalton McCarthy providing for the abolition of the French language. Then an amendment to Mr. McCarthy's measure was introduced which read as follows:

> That this Bill be not now read the second time, but that it be resolved that it is expedient the legislative assembly of the Northwest Territories should be authorized to deal with the subject of the Bill by legislative enactment after the next general election in the territories.

Mr. Beausoleil, then a member of this House on the Liberal side, moved on Feb. 12, an amendment for the continuance of the dual language. His amendment was voted down and the question was referred to the Northwest Territories for their decision. The Conservatives were then in power in the Dominion. In 1892 the Conservative party was also in power in the Northwest Territories, under the leadership of Mr. Haultain, and that party then and there abolished the dual language. Yet we had the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Monk) coming into the province of Quebec and telling the French electors that we on this side voted for the abolition of the French language in the Northwest Territories and appealing to them to see that we were not again elected to this House. Let me tell the hon. minister that in making such a statement and such an appeal he went entirely outside the fact. Let me go one step further, let me point out that when the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Monk) who poses in the House as the apostle of the French language and the Catholic religion, had the opportunity to stand up for the very language of which he professes to be so ardent a champion, he utterly failed to take advantage of it. In 1896 there was in the estimates a small item of $2,000 for the printing of statistics in the French language. My hon. friend the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Monk), not then expecting that in the course of evolution he would become a full-fledged cabinet minister, stood up in his seat and said that the printing of statistics in French was a piece of extravagance because every hon. member from the province of Quebec understood the English language. That statement regarding representatives from the province of Quebec was perfectly true, but that was no reason why the use of the French language should be discontinued in our blue-books, or why it should not be continued, even to the printing of a comma, in our statistics.

I should like to pay the Minister of Public Works a compliment, as I know he would to me under similar circumstances. I would say that he is the most consistent man I know of. If any one in this House thinks the Minister of Public Works is inconsistent, let me dispel that opinion. But if he is consistent, it is in the sense used by the poet when he said:

> Consistency thou art a mule.

My hon. friend swallowed every principle which he advocated in the last campaign. I hope, for his own sake, that he did not do it in order to obtain a seat in the cabinet. He does not need a seat in the cabinet. I hope he was actuated by higher motives, and I hope that some hon. gentlemen opposite, who fought the fight for the Conservative party, will not believe that he did it for the sake of a seat in the cabinet. But in paying this little compliment to the Minister of Public Works, I would like to say to him that when he uses the name of Sir George Etienne Cartier as one of the authorities from whom he has taken his political principles, he has gone to the wrong book, because Sir George Etienne Cartier was not a man who ever shirked any responsibility, no matter how grave. Sir George Etienne Cartier always had the courage of his convictions. If the Minister of Public Works and other hon. gentlemen who have seats in the cabinet and who advocated every Nationalist principle in the last campaign—if these men have made an honourable entry into this cabinet, why do they not stand up as men and tell us what was the arrangement made between the hon. the First Minister (Mr. Borden) and themselves under which they entered this cabinet? The Minister of Public Works and these other Nationalist advocates condemned every other member of the present cabinet from the Prime Minister down. They denounced the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Foster), who is perhaps one of the ablest men in the cabinet to-day. Let the hon. Minister of Public Works tell us why they condemned the Minister of Trade and Commerce, the Minister of Militia, and practically every minister in the cabinet except the one who was taken from the Liberal ranks. They could not very well condemn him. No one can condemn the Minister of Finance (Mr. White) just at present. Sir, I think it is one of the greatest compliments that could be paid the Liberal party in Canada that the First Minister was forced to go into the ranks of that party to find a gentleman competent to control the purse strings of the Dominion treasury.

Mr. Speaker, I will conclude with a word about reciprocity. How that poor word has been bandied about the country. The hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce spoke very strongly against reciprocity, and apparently got very angry with me the other day, because I had suggested to him that he had made sundry little trips to Washington to obtain reciprocity. It was not disloyal then. It was not disloyal for the Conservative party at different periods, or before the Conservative party. It was not disloyal to have reciprocity with the United States in 1854. It was not disloyal for Sir John Macdonald in 1878 to adopt the National Policy in order to force the Americans to give us reciprocity. It was not disloyal in 1869 for Sir John Rose to go to Washington to get reciprocity. It was not disloyal in 1888 for Sir Charles Tupper to go to Washington for reciprocity. It was not disloyal in 1891 for the present hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce, and the late Sir John Thompson and Sir Mackenzie Bowell to go to Washington to get reciprocity. It was not disloyal for the hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce to include reciprocity in his tariff of 1894, and if it had not been that the Liberals had succeeded in getting the promise of reciprocity in natural products from the United States, the hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce to-day, if he had anything to do with the tariff of this country, would be one of the first to include reciprocity in that tariff. But we are going to have reciprocity; we are going to have reciprocity with British Guiana. Of course, it is a little early in the day to ask hon. gentlemen opposite what we shall get from British Guiana. Being of a somewhat inquisitive mind I looked the other day to find what are the natural products of British Guiana, and I found that timber is one. Surely the Minister of Trade and Commerce is not going to British Guiana for timber. Dye-wood is another. Surely he is not going to British Guiana for dye-wood. The other two natural products of British Guiana are rum and sugar. There was a suspicion in this country that the Minister of Trade and Commerce would be quite satisfied with the rum traffic of this country without going for rum to British Guiana. I know he is a temperance advocate. I do not think anybody would accuse him of being addicted to rum, and I do not think anybody in this country wants more rum that we have, and I have no doubt the Minister of Trade and Commerce will tell us why he found it necessary to put in the mouth of His Royal Highness the Duke of Connaught, not rum, but a statement of the means by which we could get more rum. We on this side of the House look with great pleasure at this immense plank in the government's platform dealing with reciprocity with British Guiana, and I have no doubt that when the people of this country realize that they have set aside the late right hon. the Prime Minister for the policy we have before us now, they will be greatly surprised that they voted against us on the 21st of September.

But, Mr. Speaker, I would say this in conclusion, and I say it earnestly and sincerely: Hon. gentlemen need not place too much faith upon the appeals by which they won the last election. Any man who tells me that anti-reciprocity carried the day tells me something that I have not yet been able to grasp. I would like to hope that it was reciprocity that defeated the late government on the 21st of September. I had thought that in the province of Quebec the naval question had a good deal to do with the defeat of the government, until I heard the hon. Minister of Public Works say no, that they are in favour of building ships, and that it was only after his visit to Fortress Monroe that he discovered that our ships were not big enough and had not big enough guns, that he decided to come back and oppose the naval policy of the government, and advocate the building of bigger ships and bigger guns. Hon. gentlemen opposite will have to place bigger planks in their platform than those in the speech from the Throne if they want to hold the confidence of the people of this country; and let me tell you, Mr. Speaker, I am not so much attached to any political faith that I will not give to hon. gentlemen opposite, what they did not give to us when we sat on that side of the House, a fair fighting chance. I for one will give them my most earnest support whenever they bring in any measure which I believe to be for the general advantage of Canada.

Mr. SCHAFFNER. It will be an awful change.

Mr. DEVLIN. Well, you know, this is the age of changes. We will support His Majesty's government in carrying out a policy which will inure to the benefit of Canada. The hon. member for Dorchester (Mr. Sevigny) the other day referring to the hon. member for Rouville (Mr. Lemieux) said that he was a Nationalist, Why, it seems to me that in this House we are or we ought to be all Nationalists in the true sense of the word. If the word means patriotism, then surely we are Nationalists. If the word means anything, it means patriotism, and I do not think there is a man in this House, and there certainly is not a man in the province of Quebec, who is not imbued with the truest sentiments of patriotism towards Canada and Canada as a part of the British Empire. The cry of disloyalty is misplaced in this country, and if hon. gentlemen who call themselves Nationalists study the programme of the Liberal party of Canada, they will find that we are all true Nationalists in this country, imbued with the one idea of building up a Canada of which we shall feel proud, and which will always lend strength to the British Empire. There is no other sentiment in this country, and when hon. gentlemen opposite abandon petty little appeals against the right hon. leader of the Liberal party, I am sure that he will be the first to give them his assistance in carrying out all measures which will tend to the advancement of the people of this country.

Mr. W. B. NORTHRUP (East Hastings). Mr. Speaker, I trust that I shall be forgiven if I decline to wander through the wilds of fancy, fiction and irrelevancy, through which this House has been dragged during the last seven or eight days, and come down to the more prosaic, but I hope not less useful task of considering the question before the House. Let me remind the House that we are called together by an official notice for the despatch of business, and would any one who has looked down on the proceedings of this House for the last week believe that 221 selected representatives of the people, supposed to be the ablest men the people could call to this Chamber to discharge their duties by considering those matters and legislating in those directions which are for the true interests of the people of this country, had spent eight days here without doing one single cent's worth of good.

Let me remind the House of the position we are actually in. A motion was made a week ago to-day for an address in reply to the speech from the Throne. I fully recognize the constitutional right of any and every member at such a time to bring before the House any grievance, to call the attention of the government to any matter of moment to which he may consider it proper to call attention. But we must not forget, despite these rights, that we are called here for the despatch of business, and so far, nothing has been said by the opposition to show that any fault exists in anything that is in the speech from the Throne. Therefore, I think we are entitled to assume that the speech from the Throne, so far as it goes, meets the views of the opposition. But the opposition have not said anything to show that they find any fault with the speech from the Throne with regard to anything that is omitted, because this amendment, to which I will come in a moment, does not find fault with the speech from the Throne on account of anything contained therein, or omitted therefrom, but brings up an entirely new and different matter. And so, Sir, after a week's debate, we find that this House is satisfied with the bill of fare presented by the government in the speech from the Throne.

Under such circumstances, when the right hon. gentleman (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) who leads the opposition to-day after so many years' occupancy of the place of leader of the government, comes before the House with an amendment, one would surely be justified in supposing that he would have taken the trouble to consider the subject he is bringing before the House and would have brought before us a motion that hon. members could consider without derogation of their own dignity or waste of the time of the House. I am sorry, very sorry, that the right hon. gentleman is unable to be in his place to-day. But that shall not prevent me from calling attention to two stubborn facts. In the amendment which he has moved there is first a statement of fact and then a proposition of law. Now, the statement of fact is false or it is true, the statement of law is sound or it is childish. I do not need to go very far to find that the statement of fact is not accurate and the statement of law is not sound.

What is the statement of fact upon which the right hon. gentleman has based the amendment which has been the occasion for this whole week's waste of time? He quotes a resolution passed by this House on the 29th March, 1909, a resolution passed under circumstances to which I adverted last session and which I shall not take time to advert to again to-day. But a copy of the principal clause, the one on which the naval policy of the government was based, is given as follows:

> The House will cordially approve of any necessary expenditure designed to promote the organization of a Canadian naval service.

And yet, Sir, there is no such clause in the resolution of the 29th March, 1909. Would it be believed?—the right hon. gentleman has put in his amendment a statement of a clause of a resolution passed in this House on a certain day, when, as a matter of fact such a clause is not contained in any resolution passed by this House on that or any other day. Let me read what really was passed by this House on the date referred to, the 29th March, 1909:

The House will cordially approve of any necessary expenditure designed to promote a speedy organization of a Canadian naval service——

So far, correctly quoted. But there is no stop there, not even a comma, and the resolution goes on:

—in co-operation with and in close relation to the Imperial navy, along the lines suggested by the Admiralty at the last Imperial Conference, and in full sympathy with the view that the naval supremacy of Great Britain is essential to the security of commerce, the safety of the empire and the peace of the world.

A wonderfully different sentence, a sentence which, if introduced into this amendment would have made absolutely nugatory every word stated in that amendment. Yet it is a sentence part of which it is deemed necessary to cite in order to give even the pretext of a shadow of excuse for bringing this amendment before the House. Let me call attention to this clause which the right hon. gentleman has so mangled and misquoted in the amendment before us. This clause declares that the Canadian naval service is to be in co-operation with and close relation to the Imperial navy along the lines suggested by the Admiralty at the last Imperial Conference. In order to understand that, we need to know what the Admiralty did suggest at the last Imperial Conference. I can inform the House as to that from the original blue-book giving the reports of that Conference. On that occasion, Lord Tweedmouth, the head of the Admiralty, said:

I know that you gave to the government and to the Admiralty, with a free and unstinting hand, the help that you thought you could manage to give. Gentlemen, I have only one reservation to make, and in making it I ask that, as we have proved ourselves successful in the past, you should put your trust in us now. The only reservation that the Admiralty desires to make is, that they claim to have the charge of the strategical questions which are necessarily involved in naval defence, to hold the command of the naval forces of the country and to arrange the distribution of ships in the best possible manner to resist attacks and to defend the empire at large, whether it be our own islands or the dominions beyond the seas. We thoroughly recognize that we are responsible for that defence. We want you to help us in that defence. We want you to give us all the assistance you can, but we do not come to you as beggars; we gladly take all that you can give us, but at the same time if you are not inclined to give us the help that we hope to have from you, we acknowledge our absolute obligation to defend the King's dominions across the seas to the best of our ability.

That is what the Admiralty wanted—contributions from the various parts of the empire, in money or in ships, but a navy over which the Admiralty was to have supreme control. Is that the naval policy referred to by the right hon. gentleman, adopted by this House in 1909 and carried out by the late government? Why, Sir, it is a sheer abuse of language, a travesty of justice, to claim that there is any connection between the proposal of the Admiralty asking for a navy along the lines indicated and the navy that would have been foisted on the country by hon. gentlemen opposite had they remained longer in power. But the Admiralty spoke further. Let us see what Canada's position was. Lord Tweedmouth at this conference further said:

I have here a statement of the subsidies which in the past have been given by the various colonies. Australia gives £200,000; New Zealand, £40,000; Cape Colony, £50,000; Natal, £35,000; Newfoundland, £3,000; in all £328,000. . . . We are quite ready to enter into any arrangements with the colonies that may seem most suitable to them and which may seem to bring advantages to the navy, and advantages to the colonies themselves.

You will notice, Mr. Speaker, that in the list of contributories the name of Canada does not appear. Again at page 470: Lord Tweedmouth lays down in plain language where Canada was and what Canada was undertaking to do, and it was along these lines that this precious navy was to be founded and carried out:

There is at present no proposition from Canada to make any change at all, but I think it is proposed that matters shall go on very much as they have gone on, except that the Canadian representatives announce that they are anxious to do all that they can to expand the interests in the navy throughout the Dominion, and in that way think that they will really be giving a great help to the empire as a whole.

Here is where Canada shines: 'The Canadian representatives announce that they are anxious to do all that they can to expand the interest in the navy throughout the Dominion.'

But, you see, the navy that we were to develop was never along the lines as laid down by the Admiralty at the conference in 1907. That which was accepted by the Admiralty, as voiced by the head of the Admiralty, Lord Tweedmouth, was that Canada would do her best 'to expand the interest in the navy throughout the Dominion.' That was the sum total of the contribution that this great overseas Dominion was willing to make.

As if put to the matter beyond peradventure, at the close of the conference Dr. Smartt moved a resolution that it seems to me any man with one spark of loyalty or one drop of patriotic blood, or even with a spark of self-respect might support. Dr. Smartt moved:

That this Conference recognizing the vast importance of the services rendered by the navy to the defence of the empire and the protection of its trade, and the paramount importance of continuing to maintain the navy in the highest possible state of efficiency, considers it to be the duty of the dominions beyond the seas to make——

And now what were we to do?

—such contributions towards the up-keep of the navy as may be determined by their local legislatures— the contribution to take the form of a grant of money, the establishment of local naval defence, or such other services in such manner as may be decided upon after consultation with the Admiralty, and as would best accord with the varying circumstances.

Can you imagine any resolution proposed at any conference of imperial statesmen that would seem less open to criticism than the resolution I have just read, a resolution which commended itself to every statesman present save the representative of Canada, the right hon. gentleman who moved this amendment and who said as soon as Dr. Smartt took his seat:

I am sorry to say that so far as Canada is concerned, we cannot agree to the resolution.

The chairman said:

I think it is a pity to pass the resolution if it is not unanimous.

Dr. SMARTT—I should like very much to hear the opinions of the representatives of the other portions of the empire.

Mr. DEAKIN—I have no hesitation in entering into the discussion if desired; but if we are not going to pass the resolution, is it worth while?

Dr. SMARTT—I think it is a great pity we do not pass something. We have done so much in the way of pious affirmation, that I am anxious we should do something of a practical character.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER—It can be passed if there is a majority. For my part I must vote against it.

Sir JOSEPH WARD—To do any good we would require to be unanimous about it.

Dr. SMARTT—Yes, I suppose so.

Mr. WINSTON CHURCHILL—It is not much good to have a resolution at all if we cannot be unanimous.

CHAIRMAN—I think we had better not proceed any further just now.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER—We, of the different dominions beyond the seas, have tried to be unanimous up to the present time. I am sorry to say this is a question upon which we could not be unanimous. Therefore, Dr. Smartt can move it if he chooses or withdraw it. But if he presses it I should have to vote against it.

Dr. SMARTT withdrew the resolution.

There is the right hon. gentleman then finding fault with this resolution and now stating the most absurd doctrine of constitutional law in support of his amendment to the address, and who in 1909 moved the very resolution whose terms I have read committing this House to a fanciful scheme which could no more be carried out than the vessels built under it could be made to sail north by south. I think I have shown then that the alleged statement of fact in this amendment moved by the right hon. the leader of the opposition is absolutely contrary to the facts as laid down in the resolution of March 29, 1909. Based on this so-called statement of fact the right hon. gentleman goes on to say in his amendment:

We respectfully submit to your Royal Highness that it is a fundamental principle of constitutional government that the advisers of the Crown shall be heartily in accord on all important questions of public policy, and that the inclusion, by the Prime Minister, in the present cabinet, of members holding diametrically opposite views on a question of the highest importance to the Dominion and to the empire is contrary to the well understood principles of responsible government and should not receive the approval of the House.

That is to say, the proposition is laid down, for the first time in the history of any parliament in the British Empire, that the advisers of the Crown shall be heartily in accord on all important questions of public policy. What enemy of the right hon. gentleman, behind his back, ever drew up such an amendment as this and induced the right hon. gentleman, without having read it—because I am sure if he had read it he would not have committed his reputation to it—to bring it before this House. Imagine such an impossible doctrine as that the advisers of the Crown must be heartily in accord on all important questions! I wonder if the hon. gentleman ever heard of a coalition government—I am not saying that this is one. We know that the Crimean war was fought out under a coalition government. Does the right hon. gentleman say that the members of that government agreed on all important questions of public policy? Does he remember the history of this country when, in order to form a union of the four provinces, it was necessary to bring in men from all parties to form the first government as a coalition government. Does any one suppose that Sir John A. Macdonald and the Hon. George Brown, were, to quote his words, 'Heartily in accord on all important questions of public policy?' Is not the very statement of historical fact enough to show the utter absurdity of the proposition laid down by the right hon. gentleman? Does the right hon. gentleman not know, apart from coalition governments, that in every government there are a number of questions that are allowed to be open questions? Some members may be astonished when I read a list of the questions that have been held to be open questions by governments in the motherland. I quote from Todd at page 404:

Since unanimity in the cabinet has become an acknowledged rule, such great questions as parliamentary reform, the ballot, the abolition of the slave trade, Roman Catholic emancipation, free trade, hours of labour in factories, marriage with a deceased wife's sister, women's disabilities, household franchise in counties, and the Public Worship Regulation Bill, with other minor matters, have severally been considered as 'open questions' by some administrations, though not by others.

There we have a great number of questions of the utmost importance which were held to be open questions and upon which, according to this amendment, all advisers of the Governor General should be in accord.

Mr. PUGSLEY. The author speaks of them as minor questions.

Mr. NORTHRUP. Let us not have any misunderstanding. The list is:

Parliamentary reform, the ballot, the abolition of the slave trade, Roman Catholic emancipation, free trade, hours of labour in factories, marriage with a deceased's wife's sister, women's disabilities, household franchise in counties and the Public Worship Regulation Bill, with other minor matters have severally been considered as 'open questions' by some administrations, though not by others.

Mr. PUGSLEY. And other minor matters.

Mr. NORTHRUP. Minor in comparison with the matters on which the government must be unanimous, but these are the style of questions that are allowed to be open questions.

It is laid down in Anson just how far a government has to be in accord, and I am not for a moment pretending to say that the advisers of the Crown on all occasions can go each his own way, apart from the others; the advisers of the Crown can have as many opinions as members of the opposition and they have a perfect right to these opinions, but when the advisers of the Crown come to advise the Crown or to lay a Bill before this House, then there must be unanimity; but until they do either of these things they may have as diverse views as they see fit.

If hon. gentlemen will take the trouble to read the speech from the Throne they will not find one single reference therein to any naval policy that the government is committed to. Therefore, the members of this House have a perfect right in the meantime to differ as much as they like with regard to the naval policy, and such a position is no contravention of any constitutional law or usage. It is contrary to the custom and practice of England that they should be held up before His Royal Highness the Governor General, as being unworthy of the positions which they occupy, because they differ, if they do differ, on matters as to which they have not so far given any advice to the Crown, and as to which they have not brought any question before this House.

I do not intend to go into the various questions which have been discussed by different members here in view of the stand which I have taken that the time of this House is being wasted by a discussion which is certainly out of place. I am content with having called attention to the fact that we have spent a week discussing an amendment to a motion, which is in order, which provides for an address in reply to the speech from the Throne, as to which no fault can be found as to its contents or omissions, and that the amendment lays down an untrue statement of fact and a proposition of law for which no countenance will be found in any work on constitutional law, or the practice of any legislative assembly.

Mr. W. M. GERMAN (Welland). Mr. Speaker, I agree with the hon. member for Hastings (Mr. Northrup), who has just taken his seat, that it is perhaps unwise to occupy the time of this House at very much greater length in discussing the resolution which is before the House at the present time. But I do feel, Sir, that I should have something to say on this resolution, and on matters which are of interest to the members of this House as well as to the people generally in view of the verdict of the people, which has lately been rendered, and the position which I took on the question which was the matter in dispute between the different parties in that election. I occupy a rather unique position, perhaps, from the fact that I differed from my party associates on the question of reciprocity, living as I did in a border constituency having the great city of Buffalo practically as an open market for the people of the county of Welland, if reciprocity had been adopted. From that fact, I think, I should have something to say at this present moment. My Conservative friends were good enough not to oppose me in that election, and I think very wisely so from their own point of view, because I apprehend they felt they would probably be defeated anyway. But, that was not the question. Reciprocity was the sole issue in the election, and as I was diametrically opposed to that proposition the Conservative party thought fit not to put up a Conservative candidate against me, and I certainly must thank them for their friendly attitude towards me in that particular. Some of my own friends of the Liberal party were anxious to have a candidate in the field against me and they had their convention at which the principles of reciprocity were discussed at very considerable length, and a considerable agitation was got up to bring out a candidate. I can say very frankly that there was a very strong effort on the part of my political associates and friends to induce me to change my attitude on that question, and to adopt the policy of the Liberal party. Many of my strong supporters and friends approached me on that question and urged me to change my attitude, but I felt that I could not do so. I told them that, no matter what they might think of me, if I had to change my attitude on that question upon which I had felt so strongly, I would despise myself. I maintained the position which I held and the result was that I was elected by acclamation. It was believed by many, I apprehend, that I had completely gone over to the Conservative party. I know that my good and esteemed friend, the 'Globe' newspaper, suggested that I would be on the government benches no matter who succeeded in the election, but I am proud to know that I have always been a Liberal and that I always intend to remain a Liberal. I felt that I perhaps had about as many bad habits as I should have without adding to the number by joining the Conservative party. I know that some of my fellow prodigals who left the Liberal party in that campaign have remained in the Conservative party—ostensibly the hon. Minister of Finance (Mr. White). Well, I am quite satisfied with the action he has taken, but I am not absolutely certain that it was altogether a free action on his part. I think that there were some other matters appertaining to his change of political attitude which have not been brought fully to the attention of the people. The present Minister of Finance was always a strong Liberal. He stated before his constituents that he had no expectation of being Finance Minister, much less a member of the government, and in that I quite agree with him. He was manager of a trust company in the city of Toronto which was controlled by Mr. Flavelle, Sir Wm. Mackenzie, Sir Edmund Walker and by Mr. Z. A. Lash, of the noble eighteen who signed the manifesto. I do not know that it is a fact, but I believe it to be a fact—I have no doubt of it in my own mind—that these gentlemen produced the currency with which to carry the elections, and they dictated to the hon. the Prime Minister (Mr. Borden), who his Finance Minister should be. I think that these gentlemen said to Mr. Borden when he was in Toronto: We will produce the money necessary to carry this election, but we must name the Finance Minister. We will not stand for that old gentleman, Mr. Geo. E. Foster. That, I think is absolutely what happened, and I think that the present Minister of Finance was forced into the position without his knowledge, because he had to obey the suggestions of the managers of his trust company.

I was not opposed to the reciprocity agreement on the ground of sentiment. I never believed, as I stated in this House, that the carrying of the reciprocity agreement, and placing it upon the statutes of Canada would bring about any feeling of disloyalty in the hearts of the Canadian people. I did not believe it would bring about any idea of annexation in the hearts of the Canadian people. I have too much confidence in the loyalty of the citizens of Canada to believe that any trade agreement between Canada and the United States would cause them to swerve from that loyalty which they have always and will always maintain. It was on economic grounds entirely that I opposed the reciprocity agreement. I felt that as the Democratic party in the United States had obtained the majority in Congress on the distinct policy that they were to reduce the tariff on agricultural products and food stuffs, that the Democrats would take the duty off Canadian agricultural products or so reduce it as to be sufficient for the people of Canada without our making any disturbance in our fiscal arrangements. That was the principal reason why I opposed the reciprocity agreement. But, Sir, that is a question which it is not necessary for us to enter into now, because reciprocity was defeated at the polls by a large majority. Whether or not it will ever be brought up again is a problem. It is possible that it may. For fifteen years the Liberals governed Canada and controlled its affairs so successfully that at the end of that period the Conservatives said that because everything was so prosperous we should not make a change. The chief argument of the Conservative party at the last election was: Leave well enough alone; Canada is so prosperous, and we are doing so well that we cannot now afford to make a change. And the people of Canada believed that and said: Under Liberal rule we have made such rapid progress in the development of this great country and its resources and in the accumulation of revenue that we should not and will not make a change. Well, what a difference. The Conservatives say that the policy of the last Liberal government was the policy inaugurated by Sir John A. Macdonald in 1878, and I am free to admit that it was practically the same policy. That policy had been in force under Conservative rule for eighteen years; it had been the play on the political stage for eighteen years with Mr. George E. Foster as the chief actor, and at the end of that eighteen years every person in Canada, Conservatives as well as Liberals, was crying for reciprocity. And so, Sir, I say that it is possible that there may again be a cry for reciprocity if our friends on the treasury benches remain long enough in power to get things into such utter confusion as they were during the eighteen years they were previously in power. That is the only possible reason that reciprocity will ever be brought up again, but that is not at all a probability because I doubt exceedingly that our friends opposite will remain in power for a sufficient length of time to so disturb the financial affairs of this country that the people will desire reciprocity.

Now, there are some matters spoken of in the speech from the Throne with which I am in full and perfect accord. It states that the importance of providing our country with better highways is manifest, and if any scheme can be devised by this government whereby a system of better highways throughout Canada can be established, I, for my part, would be very glad indeed. One of the greatest needs of our country for the farmers as well as for the business men is an improved system of good roads, but it appears to me that this is a matter more for the provincial governments and legislatures and the municipalities than it is for the federal government. So far as this government can do it, I am in accord with that policy. It is also stated in the speech from the Throne that an effort will be made towards bringing the terminal elevators under government control, and I wish the Minister of Railways and Canals were in his seat while I am speaking on this question. I think the government can very properly and under proper advisement take this question altogether out of the political arena. The government elevator already in operation at Port Colborne is an example of successful operation to which we can point with pride. The government elevator at Port Colborne has been in operation for two years; the first year little was done at it because it was finished late in the season, but during the past year something over seven million bushels of grain will have passed through that elevator, and the government will have made a profit over and above all expenses of between eighteen thousand and twenty thousand dollars. I direct the Minister of Railways and Canals to the fact that it is his duty to complete that elevator to its full capacity of two million bushels at the earliest possible date. We have, in the speech from the Throne a reference to the best route to the Hudson Bay and that may or may not be a good proposition.

But what I more particularly complain of is what is left out of the speech from the Throne. I think that the government should have put in it a proposition for the immediate enlargement of the Welland canal. My hon. friend the Minister of Finance (Mr. White), who comes from Toronto, knows full well that every citizen of that city desires the immediate enlargement of the Welland canal. The Minister of Customs (Mr. Reid) is also strongly in favour of that scheme, and I think that this government ought to take steps at the first possible moment to enlarge that canal to a depth of 25 feet. All the shipping interests demand it, and the longer that work is delayed the longer will the interests of Canada suffer. I regret, therefore, exceedingly that the government did not think fit to put in the speech from the Throne any reference to this great improvement, and have not immediately set about enlarging the Welland canal to a depth capable of accommodating the large upper lake steamers.

But there is another question of great importance left out of the speech from the Throne—one which has been discussed at some considerable length in this debate already, I refer to the naval policy of the present government. Have they a naval policy, or have they not? Sir, no matter how I might have felt towards the Conservative party on their policy in some particulars, I would have felt bound to oppose them on their present attitude regarding the navy. A more weak, uncertain, indefinite position, I never knew men, claiming to be statesmen, to take. The query has been asked in this House: Who was the man that gave way? Was it the First Minister or the Minister of Public Works? What is the position? In 1909 we had a resolution in this House which my hon. friend from East Hastings (Mr. Northrup) has cited and which has been referred to by other hon. gentlemen in this debate, but which, I think, will bear mentioning again. It will be remembered that in 1909 the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Foster) moved a resolution looking to the formation of a navy, or at any rate the furnishing of aid to the British government in its naval operations. The right hon. the leader of the opposition, who was then First Minister (Sir Wilfrid Laurier), moved an amendment which was not satisfactory to the opposition. A suggestion was made by the then leader of the Opposition (Mr. Borden) to the effect that certain words should be added to the resolution. Then a conference was held, and as a result of that conference the resolution finally adopted was as follows:

> This House is of opinion that in the present constitutional relations between the mother country and the self-governing Dominions the payment of regular and periodical contributions to the Imperial treasury for naval or military purposes, would not, so far as Canada is concerned, be the most satisfactory solution of the question of defence.

That appears to a fairly clear cut proposition, namely, that a contribution by Canada to the British government would not be a satisfactory solution of the problem of naval defence, and that was agreed to by both sides in this House. The resolution then went on:

> This House will cordially approve of any necessary expenditure designed to promote the speedy organization of a Canadian naval service in co-operation with and in close relation to the Imperial navy along the lines suggested by the British Admiralty.

Certainly there is no reference to a plebiscite there, nor is there any reference to the building of 'Dreadnoughts'. That resolution was designed to promote the speedy organization of a Canadian naval service in co-operation with and in close relation to the Imperial navy along the lines suggested by the British Admiralty. With that proposition every hon. member of this House was in accord. Every hon. gentleman from the province of Quebec, who is sitting in this House now, and who then, or has since claimed to be a so-called Nationalist, was in favour of it. Every man from the province of Quebec who sits in this House now, and who has been shouting so-called Nationalism from every platform in that province, and from some in the province of Ontario, was in favour of that proposition. The present Minister of Public Works (Mr. Monk) was in favour of it, and told us the other day he voted for it though he was not in the House. He is a sort of Dr. Jekyll and Mr. Hyde. The Dr. Jekyll personality of him was in the House voting for the proposition, but the Mr. Hyde part of him was in bed endeavouring to devise some scheme whereby he could inflame the minds of the people of the province of Quebec against the proposition which he said he was in favour of. Is that a position which any statesman, which any public man in Canada, should take? I for one would be ashamed to stand up in this House and say that I favoured that resolution, unanimously adopted by this parliament in 1909, and then be responsible for the statements which the Minister of Public Works made in the province of Quebec, and which have been read in this House. Let me quote one of these statements:

> We are against a navy because we have something better to do with our money than buy ships to serve in the conflicts and entanglements of Great Britain.

A voice from the audience cried out: 'What about Borden?' and the hon. minister replied:

> Yes, my friend, I will speak about Borden. I have separated myself from Mr. Borden on that important question.

When did he separate himself from that hon. gentleman. He agreed to the resolution to which in 1909 the then First Minister (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) and the now First Minister (Mr. Borden) gave their support. A few days ago my hon. friend (Mr. Monk) said in this House that he was still in favour of that proposition. But on the occasion to which I refer he said:

> I have separated myself from Mr. Borden on that important question, and will continue to fight the struggle with my friends the Nationalists as long as the battle shall not be won. We are not going to abdicate our rights and principles to support Mr. Borden.

Well, did he abdicate his rights and principles for the sake of a position in the present cabinet?

Is he the man who advocated that, or is Mr. Borden the man? One of the two certainly has done so. Mr. Borden, definitely and emphatically, in speeches in 1909, expressed his approval of the resolution that was passed. The present Minister of Public Works at that time expressed his approval, and now he says he was in favour of it. Is there not a justification for the resolution of the right hon. leader of the opposition, when we have two gentlemen occupying the first positions in this government standing before the people of Canada in diametrically opposite positions? Is it not proper that the right hon. leader of the opposition should bring to the atteention of His Royal Highness the Governor General that there is this divergence of opinion between the members of this cabinet on one of the most important issues before the people of Canada to-day?

But, Sir, they say they will have a plebiscite. The Prime Minister takes into his cabinet three men from the province of Quebec who are distinct Nationalists, who, throughout the whole campaign, were preaching the so-called doctrine of Nationalism, which is a doctrine of un-nationalism, a doctrine, to my mind, if I may be allowed to express the sentiment, strong though it may be, of treason and disloyalty. Men who will stand up before the electors of the province of Quebec, or before the electors of the province of Ontario, and say that the air of liberty cannot be breathed in Canada except through holes shot in British flags, are not loyal Canadian citizens. Men who will stand on the public platforms in the province of Quebec and inflame the minds of the people to the extent that they were inflamed by these gentlemen, whom the Prime Minister has taken into his cabinet, are not men who should sit, not only in the government of Canada, but in the parliament of Canada. We want none of that in Canada. We are willing that people should differ in their opinions, in their political opinions or their religious opinions; but, Sir, we do not want men to stand on the public platform and deliberately misrepresent the condition of affairs, as these gentlemen, I maintain, have done.

Mr. SPEAKER. Order.

Mr. GERMAN. I say gentlemen speaking in the province of Quebec. The Prime Minister has taken into his cabinet three men who were diametrically opposed to him and to the Minister of Trade and Commerce on this question of naval defence. But they intimate, though they do not say, that they are to have a plebiscite, that they will refer it to the people of Canada to determine what shall be done. Sir, is that a policy? That is a makeshift; that is an excuse. I doubt, Sir, if in the history of England or of Canada, or of the United States, or of any self-respecting and self-governing country you will find a condition of affairs such as that. On a great question on which all parties in this House, Conservative and Liberal alike, were agreed in 1909 the government will now come to this parliament and suggest that the question be referred to the people of Canada in a plebiscite. I doubt if the people will have confidence in the men who make such a suggestion, and I believe that when they again go before the people they will receive an awakening which will be astonishing.

But, Sir, the hon. leader of the government has even done worse than that. He is proposing to make as deputy speaker of this House one of the men who made these statements throughout the province of Quebec. He is proposing to place in succession to you, Mr .Speaker, a gentleman who has not denied that he made the statements, or at any rate many of the statements, which were recorded of him in 1910.

(Reading.) You are intimidating the people in waving the English flag, and adding that we must contribute always and everywhere to the defence of that tormentor of our constitutional liberties; but we will not be made to forget that in 1837 it was necessary to bore holes in it in order to breathe the atmosphere of liberty.

Mr. BLONDIN. Will the hon. gentleman allow me to say that the quotations which he is making were denied, when I was allowed by the House, in answer to the quotations made by the Hon. Mr. Brodeur, to read the article in 'Le Devoir,' which began with these words: 'Mr. Brodeur a public liar.'

Mr. GERMAN. The hon. gentleman said, as reported in 'Hansard' in 1910, that he denied most of these statements. He said:

I did not till to-day have any knowledge of that report, and I can explain it.

And he goes on later to make an explanation in which he repudiates some of the statements, but not all of them. I have never yet heard him say that he did not make the statement that in 1837 it was necessary to bore holes in the British flag in order to breathe the air of liberty. He can deny that at this present moment if he chooses. And, Sir, the hon. leader of the Government is proposing to make that gentleman the Deputy Speaker of this House. Send that to the eighteen ultra-loyal gentlemen in Toronto who signed the reciprocity manifesto, send that to the Orange lodges of the province of Ontario, who are also ultra-loyalists, put that on the desk of the Finance Minister that he may read it every day when he sits down, because he is ultra-loyal—that in succession to the ex-Grand Master of the loyal Orange lodges of Canada is to be made, first his deputy and afterwards his successor, a man who has made these statements on a public platform of Canada.

Mr. SPEAKER. I understood the hon. gentleman (Mr. Blondin) distinctly to deny the statement; and it is the rule of the House that an hon. member must accept such a denial on the part of an other hon. member. I think the hon. member for Welland (Mr. German) is going too far in repeating a statement that has been denied.

Mr. GERMAN. I bow most respectfully to the rule of the chair. But I deliberately asked the hon. gentleman to deny that he made that statement and so he could do it now if he wished to. I have not yet heard him say he did not make the statement.

Mr. SPEAKER. Order.

Mr. GERMAN. Now, I will tell the Prime Minister (Mr. Borden) this, notwithstanding that I admire many of his personal qualities, that he has tied himself up to a bad crowd. If he is to allow that element in the province of Quebec to dominate his government, he will have a rude awakening when the next general election comes on. The hon. gentleman holds his majority in this House by grace of the electors of the province of Ontario. He has a majority of 62, I think, from that province. The electors of the province of Ontario are intelligent electors—I believe that as to the last election because, very largely, they agreed with me. And they have always been fair to the province of Quebec; we sometimes think that they have been more than generous to the people of Quebec, to their religion, their customs, their laws and their language. But, Sir, I doubt me very much if the electors of the province of Ontario will stand for the Prime Minister taking into and keeping in his government the Nationalistic element which he has been seen to associate himself with. And I believe that if he continues to travel with them in the same conveyance, when the next general election comes on, his political cart will get a jolt that will send him and his Bourassas, his Blondins, and his Monks into political extinction.

Mr. JOHN WEBSTER (Brockville). Mr. Speaker, I almost feel that I owe you an apology in rising to speak. Should I be so unfortunate as to make use of any unparliamentary expressions, like my hon. friend from Yamaska (Mr. Mondou) I am quite willing to withdraw them. But I desire to refer to a few of the statements I have heard here to which I have listened with a great deal of interest indeed. My experience in parliament is brief; but I must say I am amazed to find so many intelligent men talking so much trash to the people as hon. gentlemen have been talking in this House in the course of this debate. This is my first attempt to address an audience of public men. But I have never seen a lot of public men display so little wisdom as I have seen displayed on the floor of this House so far this session.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order.

Mr. SPEAKER. I think the hon. gentleman is going a little too far and is reflecting upon the House.

Mr. WEBSTER. I withdraw the statement, but the thing is true as I see it from my point of view. Before proceeding farther I wish to congratulate the Prime Minister of Canada (Mr. Borden) on being called to his high position. He has been before the public of Canada for some twelve years; and, I have listened with great pleasure to the testimonials offered him by hon. members on both sides. During the debate of the past week I have not found an hon. member pointing the finger of accusation at the leader of the government because of any political crookedness or graft to be charged against him at any time during his public life. When a man possesses such high and sterling qualities as those which our leader has displayed, we cannot wonder that the people of this country demanded when, on the 21st September last, they had an opportunity to declare themselves by their ballots, that he should be the Prime Minister of Canada. To that hon. gentleman I pay my tribute of respect.

And to the hon. leader of the opposition (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) I would say that his native province of Quebec regards his career with justifiable pride. He has been a tower of strength to his party; he has been an ornament to society whilst in public life; and in years to come, I am sure, historians will record in glowing terms his deeds as a public man, and people, of generations to come, will read that record with pleasure and will feel that the right hon. gentleman was a credit to our sister province of Quebec. But I confess that I am a little surprised on coming to this House as a humble follower of my leader to find the right hon. gentleman here as the leader of the opposition. If I remember rightly I read a report of his speech at St. Jerome, Quebec, in which the right hon. gentleman was represented as stating that if he were not elected to lead the government he would retire; that he would not come here to lead the opposition in this House. Certainly that is the way the papers in Ontario reported it. I am very much surprised indeed to find the right hon. gentleman going back on his promise and still remaining with us.

In passing I must pay you a tribute of respect, Mr. Speaker. You have been in public life for a long time, and in view of your reputation and of all that has been said in your praise by previous speakers, I think you have been worthily honoured by your leader in being called to the Chair. And although the right hon. leader of the opposition said that his light was not your light, I hope that yours will long be a beacon light to guide the men of Canada.

Judging from what I have been able to gather in this debate it seems to me that hon. gentlemen opposite are pursuing a fishing policy. They are trying to find out what the policy of the present administration is. But they should not for one moment doubt the ability of the Prime Minister and his colleagues to manage the affairs of this country. It seems to me that we have seen much time wasted in discussing the Naval Bill and other things which have been under debate here. Let us join hands together. We are all brothers, we are all Canadians; let us join to develop the resources of this Dominion.

The motto unfurled by the Conservative party to the people of Canada during the last campaign was: Canada for the Canadians—the grandest battle cry ever raised before the people of this country. Why should we give away the resources of this country to a nation that has always been hostile to us? My hon. friend from Yamaska (Mr. Mondou) expressed himself in noble words the other day when he said we should forget these dissensions, these cries of religion and race, and join our hands in making this country the home of one of the grandest nations in the world. We have, beyond doubt, more resources than any other nation. The eyes of the world are upon us to-day, and by her action in rejecting reciprocity on September 21st last, Canada has won the admiration of the whole British Empire. Let us drop all our petty differences and join hands in developing this great country for the people who are to come after us.

The hon. member for Rouville (Mr. Lemieux) wanted to know the other day why the opposition were there and the government here. It was just because of the fact that the people of this country had lost confidence in the late government, and by their ballot on September 21 last they said to that government: You have been weighed in the balances and found wanting, and we are going to place you in opposition. I believe that to be the best thing for this country that has ever taken place. There were other reasons for the change in public opinion, one of them being the lack of management of the affairs of this country. The principal want of Canada to-day is a business government composed of business men who will manage the affairs of this country in a business way. My right hon. friend the leader of the opposition (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) has said upon the floor of this House on several occasions that he is not a business man. I am quite willing to agree with him for had he been a business man his record would have been very different from what it is to-day. Let us review some of those unfortunate things that have arisen to prove to the people of this country that he is not a business man. First of all I shall refer to that monument that has been erected in the pillars that mark the proposed site of the Quebec bridge. What has that bridge cost the people of Canada? Nearly half as many dollars as the Liberal party said they would construct the whole National Transcontinental railway for, and what have they got left for that great expenditure of money? They have a monument to mark their own incapability of managing the affairs of this country.

At six o'clock, House took recess.

After Recess.

House resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. WEBSTER. Mr. Speaker, when this House rose at six'clock I was commenting upon the inability of the late administration to manage the business affairs of this country in a business way. I had just referred to the great loss which was occasioned by the waste of the money placed in that monumental block down on the south side of the majestic river St. Lawrence known as the remnant of the Quebec bridge. Nothing for that great expenditure of money remains but some cement piers with a great many tons of iron and steel far below the surface of the water. I have referred to that, Sir, as a monument to the inability of the late administration. But, there are other monuments on the little hillside to mark the graves of those poor men who went down on that occasion. I would ask you: What has the late administration done for the poor widows and orphans who lost their bread winners when the bridge collapsed? We were told that the treasury was full, that the government had a large surplus on hand, and we know that when the earthquake occurred in the city of San Francisco there was money in the treasury to be voted for the relief of the sufferers; and right it was, Sir. We also know that at the time of the flood in Paris, France, there was money voted in Canada for the relief of the sufferers. We know that the year of the Chinese famine money went forth from Canada to relieve the suffering of those people, but apparently there was no money in the treasury to relieve those widows and orphans who lost their bread winners on that occasion.

Another feature that I would like to refer to, Sir, which marks their career as a non-business administration is the celebrated Newmarket canal. We have heard a lot about building the Georgian Bay canal by the present administration, but if this administration ever attempt to build a canal I will pass my word of honour that the canal which they build will contain much more water than is contained in the Newmarket canal, or the canal which is known as a dry bottom canal. That is one more monument that they have erected to their inability to do business.

With your permission, Mr. Speaker, I will refer to the case of the Grand Trunk Pacific railway. My opponent in the last election in Brockville, printed in the 'Recorder' a table purporting to show that the Grand Trunk Pacific railway would be built at a cost of $13,000,000. The man who made that statement knew just as much about the building of a railway through that great western country as I would about the construction of a railway that would take me to heaven. Another deal that has caused the hearts of the people to change was that put through by the former Minister of Public Works (Mr. Pugsley) who purchased at a large price some very softly filled wharfs known as sawdust wharfs. That is one more incident I must refer to which marks the inability of that hon. gentleman to do business with the public funds of this country. He also referred to the horse industry down in New Brunswick. I will prove to this House that he knows just as much about the horse business in Canada as he does about the proper filling for wharfs. I shall refer to that later. The unfortunate thing about the late administration was that they thought they were the bosses of the people of this country instead of the servants. When a public man goes out into this world he is no longer his own boss; he is the servant of the people who give him their confidence and place him in the high position of representing them in this House of parliament, and that is one of the reasons why they are there and we are here to-day. These are only a few reasons which I am giving you, but there are lots of others. During the late campaign we heard something about a white plume, and the old cock. That is a very sporty insinuation, and I think that all sports should certainly be good losers, as well as good winners. If our friends opposite have been so unfortunate as to be misguided into thinking that they were the bosses of the people, and the people, not being children, declared in such an emphatic manner against them on the 21st of September, let them now prove themselves to be dead-game sports, bow to the inevitable and join hands with us who are engaged in endeavouring to build up this country in order that it may occupy the high and proud position which nature intended it would achieve. To-day this Dominion of ours is the star and gem of the empire, and it behooves us as loyal young Canadians to rise in our might and take care of the interests which we must take care of for the people who are going to possess this country when we have passed over to the great beyond.

I would say to you with all the confidence of a man who has been engaged for the last thirty-five years in commercial interests that this country is simply mad with opportunities. If the firmament of heaven were a blackboard and the Rocky mountains were the chalk a man would not have space enough to enumerate all the advantages which we in this young nation possess. Why, Sir, it is beyond the estimate of any man to say what the future possibilities of this country must be. To-day, Sir, in the eyes of the world we hold the highest possible position in the money markets of the world, and those markets, I am proud to say, are in Great Britain and not in the republic to the south of us. We have been told that Canada is writing history. I am quite sure of the fact myself, but if there ever was a large amount of history written in a small space of time it was on that memorable morning of the 7th of February, when this young nation's contingent of soldiers who had gone to the Transvaal to fight for the mother country, by their bold and efficient service, caused Kronje, the lion of the Transvaal, to lay down his arms and do homage to the old Union Jack. That was one of the occasions upon which Canada has written history that will be referred to with pride by the generations which are to come hereafter. I tell you, Sir, that we are the men of the north, and the men of the north have never yet failed in their ability to do justice to any occasion which demanded their attention. It was the same in 1812 when our friends to the south of us thought that Canada could not take care of her own interests. The memorable day that General Brock lost his life is another occasion that every good loyal young Canadian can point to with the finger of pride.

Now, Sir, I am going to take up something that may possibly prove a little pleasanter to you. Let us refer for a few moments to the speech which was made by the Hon. Clifford Sifton upon the floor of this House. The Hon. Clifford Sifton is a gentleman to whom hon. gentlemen opposite were proud to point as being one of the staunchest Liberals in this country. But, like many more of those honest, broad-minded Liberals, men who had travelled, who had experience, who knew what the wants of the country were, he was able to cut the party tie, and to say to his friends that the policy which the late administration had adopted was not the policy for this country. He joined forces with the Conservative party in using his endeavours to conserve the interests of the country in order that the people in the republic to the south of us might not come in here and despoil the heritage that we should preserve for the generations which are to come.

In the past, men have laid down their lives to preserve the empire and to leave this heritage to their children, and following their grand example we of the present day should not be unmindful of our descendants who will come after us. The broad-minded Liberals who in the late campaign left their party to join the forces of the Conservative party and to keep the country in the lines laid down by Macdonald and Cartier at confederation, are men of whose patriotism Canada ought to be proud. In Northern Ontario we have a country so wealthy in minerals that it has produced a sufficient value of silver to pave the streets of every city in that province. That fact alone should encourage us to develop our mineral resources and to cultivate the yet barren soil of our lands so as to supply the men who are engaged in developing these industries and other resources. The establishment of the Hydro-Electric schemes by Sir James Whitney's government has proved of untold benefit to our province. Last year alone ten million dollars less money was paid out in the province of Ontario for coal, which was mostly American product, and saved by the people of this country by the power from the Hydro-Electric scheme having displaced the previous consumption of coal to that extent. The water-power of Niagara Falls has been so developed that the people of the western part of the province are now supplied with cheap power, and that scheme is capable of yet further development. Then, President Taft and the newspaper owners of the United States were most anxious for reciprocity so that they might get their pulp wood and paper from Canada and consequently preserve for some years to come their own supplies in the United States. Well, Sir, the defeat of the reciprocity pact has conserved one of our great natural resources, and we are proud of the fact that we have more timber and more lumber in Canada to-day than are to be found in any other country of equal population. Then, we have marvellous freshwater and saltwater fisheries, which are sufficient to feed the teeming millions of the empire for years to come, and these we should preserve for our own people. For some days past in this House we have been holding a post-mortem on the dead corpse of reciprocity, and so I may relate how the Liberal orators in Ontario during the election passed through the province telling the farming community that reciprocity would enhance the value of their farm lands from twenty-five to fifty per cent. Let me, by citations from the columns of 'The Country Gentleman,' the oldest agricultural journal printed in America, show the value of farms in the United States where they have that market of ninety millions of people. Compare these prices with the prices that can be obtained for land in this country and you will at once see how much better off the Canadian farmer is than his American neighbour. I read from the issue of the 4th of May:

For Sale—Hudson Valley Fruit Farm, 19 m. below Albany on river road. 100 acres fertile clay loam, machine worked, no stone, well watered, stream and springs, plenty of wood; grows splendid crops of hay, wheat, corn, oats, potatoes and fruit. 400 young, thrifty apple and pear trees just coming to bearing. Large house, fair condition, open fire places, beautiful lawns and shade, magnificent mountain views. Three min. walk to river and school, two minutes to railway station, small barn in good condition, other out buildings fair. Shipping facilities the best. Price $4,000, part cash.

What is there in reciprocity for the Canadian farmer when in the United States you can buy farm lands at that price? Another advertisement reads:

200 ACRES, $3,000,
Stock and Tools Included.

Ten cows, 2 horses, wagons, all machinery and small tools will be included if taken now. 125 acres machine worked fields, grows all crops, spring watered pasture for 50 cows, quantity of timber, large barn, large bearing orchard, also small fruit. Two story 11-room house 65 x 75 barn, other out buildings, pleasantly situated, shaded by 75 sugar maples. Short drive to railroad station. Price only $3,000, $1,000 cash, balance on easy terms. For details of this and other New York farm bargains, see page 14 Strout's Farm Catalogue 34, just out, copy free.

There, in that great market of ninety millions people you can get two hundred acres of land for three thousand dollars. Another advertisement reads:

217 ACRES, FIFTY CATTLE, FOUR HORSES AND MACHINERY INCLUDED.

One of the best dairy farms in New York State's great dairy county, fully equipped for profitable business. Smooth fields, spring and brook-watered pasture for 50 cows, 1,600 cords of wood, lots of timber, 300 barrels of fruit in season. 12-room house with running water, barn, 30 x 70, other barns, 10-room tenant house. Income $3,000 yearly. If taken immediately, 50 head of Holstein cattle, 4 horses, ploughs, harrows, ensilage cutter, cultivator, wagons, harness, dairying utensils, small tools and all crops included. Price for everything only $9,000, half cash. Further details and travelling directions to see this and other big, equipped farms, page 12, Strout's Farm Catalogue 34, the biggest and best farm catalogue ever issued; gives reliable information regarding railroad, schools, climate, soils, crops, markets, &c., in all the leading farming sections of the east. Free.

I have forty or fifty just such advertisements as that, and hon. gentlemen can inspect them if they wish. Then, as to the condition of the milling industry under reciprocity, the Canadian millers told us that they could not compete with the United States millers, because in the pact it was arranged that wheat would enter the United States free, but if you wanted to bring a barrel of flour back into this country to feed your family you had to pay a duty of fifty cents on it.

Then the dairying industry in this country is greater than any other one industry in Canada to-day, and I know from experience that Canadian cheese is the finest cheese imported into the British market. So fine is the quality of our cheese that some unscrupulous dealers have tried to sell it as British manufactured cheese, and only a few years ago the Canadian farmers to protect their own product, had to establish what is know as the 'Bate Brand' in order that Canadian cheese might retain its identiy and to prevent the substitution of an inferior article.

I tell you, Sir, that was simply for the purpose of preventing the American producer of cheese selling his product as Canadians do. It is reported that there were some dealers, in Montreal who, it was reported, bought American cheese and brought it across the St. Lawrence in bond, and then exported it to England as the Canadian product. For that reason the dairymen of Ontario established what is known as the Bate brand. With this result that any man posted in the trade can know to-day that when he is buying Canadian cheese he is getting what he is paying for. But if that reciprocity pact had gone through in the shape in which our hon. friends opposite endeavoured to have it adopted, it would have ruined the butter and cheese industry of this country, in which we have spent forty of the best years of our lives to place it at its present high standard.

For a moment let me draw attention to the horse industry of this country. Let me point out to hon. gentlemen opposite that in the state of Iowa alone there are more horses than we have in Canada from the east of the Great Lakes to the Atlantic ocean. Let me also point out that they are a superior class of horses, because the people in that state have been breeding from pure stock during the past twenty years. To-day in the states of Iowa and Illinois they turn out the finest draught horses that can be found in any market of the great American republic. I can state in all sincerity that to-day in the state of Illinois you can buy horses 25 per cent cheaper than you can in any of the Northwest provinces of Canada. As evidence of this, let me point out that every American settler who has the privilege of bringing horses into Canada duty free, brings in his full complement, namely, three to every head of a family. What better proof could you have that they can purchase horses at lower rates in the American market than in our Northwest provinces?

I am pleased indeed to see that our leader, the hon. the First Minister (Mr. Borden) in the manifesto he issued, promised to encourage the Canadian farmer who is engaged in the chilled meat industry and our Northwest ranch owner will never come into his rights until that industry is properly protected; and I hope to see the present administration mapping out something along that line this session. We have to-day from the port of Montreal carloads of butter and cheese shipped in refrigerator cars to the far west and these cars in many cases have to come back to the eastern provinces empty. Had we the chilled meat industry put on a proper basis, those cars would come back loaded as they ought to be. I must congratulate our leader on his promise to do something for the rangeman of the west who to-day is compelled to send his cattle to the American market, owing to the lack of proper facilities to handle that trade in our market. What did we see take place in regard to the shipping of American sheep into this country? Last August I had the pleasure of being in the Toronto market and I found there 2,200 lambs brought in from the state of Michigan. With what result? With the result that the Canadian lambs declined in price in the Toronto market fifty cents per 100 pounds. Well, if they can bring in American lambs under a tariff of 25 per cent, and undersell us, what would be the effect on the Canadian sheep industry if they were admitted free of duty as they would be under the reciprocity agreement? That is a question I have never yet heard properly answered. I call wool as it is shorn from the sheep's back a natural product, and under the reciprocity schedule, what duty was Canadian wool to pay going into the United States under this pact? It was to pay 12 cents per pound, in order to protect the wool growers of Idaho and Montana. My experience in that country is that those people spend all their energies in endeavouring to have legislation enacted that may be profitable to the American farmers and not profitable to the Conadians.

Let me now come a little nearer home and speak for a few minutes on the province of Ontario. My hon. friend from Vancouver (Mr. Stevens) the other day said that in British Columbia there were immense valleys in which you could possibly hide Ontario and two or three other provinces. Well, my hon. friend has not quite realized the vastness of our great province. I would point out to him that Ontario is 750 miles wide and 1,000 miles long, and contains 220,000 square miles and 140,000,000 acres of land and let me tell my hon. friend that only one half of that province has ever been touched by the ploughshare. We have what is known as the great clay belt in the north that will be opened up very shortly, and it is beyond the expectations of the most sanguine man to realize what the results will be when that new section will be brought under cultivation. In Ontario to-day we produce more dollars worth of agricultural products than was raised in the three great grain-growing provinces of Manitoba, Alberta and Saskatchewan. These are all considerations worthy of your most careful attention. If we should bend our energy to the development and building up of this great country there is no reason why she should not go forward with rapid strides to the attainment of that high position to which she is entitled.

Now as to agriculture we are told that all wealth comes from the ground, and that agriculture consitutes the corner stone of every prosperous nation, whilst manufacturing constitutes the keystone. Now, with those two stones so well and truly laid as they are in this Dominion, she is bound to go on in the future as in the past. Under the policy of the late Sir John Macdonald, known from one end of the country to the other as the National Policy, we have made most rapid strides, and I would here congratulate the opposition on the fact that they have never had the courage of their convictions and seen their way clear to abandon that policy. To-day in Canada we have a home market for say 80 to 83 per ceent of the total products of our soil, and that market we claim is the best market in the world, while England takes 11 per cent of our total agricultural product, which would mean 94 per cent already accounted and contracted for. Why then should we take so many chances to get a market for the remaining six per cent? The 90,000,000 people to the south of us have 13 farmers for every one we have in Canada and are exporting the same products we are sending to the British Empire to-day. I have heard some comments on the balance of trade recently in this House. The balance of trade proved one of the most interesting subjects of the discussion during the late campaign, and if you will allow me to go into this question of balance of trade for a few moments I have here some figures which I wish to submit for the consideration of gentlemen opposite, showing the result of the trade between Canada and the United States for five years from June, 1905, to June, 1910:

	U.S. sold in Canada.	Canada sold in U. S.	Difference.
Horses..	$14,172,415	$2,549,211	$11,623,204
Cattle	1,578,179	1,293,796	384,403
Meat and dairy products.. ..	17,011,017	904,191	16,106,826
Breadstuffs.. ..	31,596,556	6,679,884	24,916,672

The total value of goods sold by the United States to Canada during those five years was $886,417,276, while the total value of goods in these lines sold by Canada to the United States was $393,913,673, a total balance of trade in favour of the United States for the five years of $492,503,603 in those articles alone. The members of the House who compose the opposition to-day do not tell us how they propose to raise the revenue of this country to take the place of the large amount of revenue which the farmers of the United States are contributing to this country to-day. That is another question that I never heard referred to by any speaker during the whole campaign. I asked my audiences, which were composed principally of farmers, what was going to become of the great farming industry of Canada when we put down these bars and let the Americans ship these goods in without paying that duty of 25 per cent, and no man has answered that question to my satisfaction for me yet.

Now, I listened with a great deal of delight to-day to the hon. member for Wright (Mr. Devlin). He said that for anything in which labour in Canada, and in which he was interested, he would immediately hold up his hand; but I will go him one better, and will say that for wherever labour is interested I will hold up both my hands. I stand for labour every day, and I would ask the hon. gentleman, what did the late administration do for labour at the time of the great Grand Trunk strike? I will tell you it was most pitiable on that occasion to see strike-breakers imported from the United States to take the places of honest, hard-working men, and the alien labour laws and the immigration laws of this country winked at. I saw with my own eyes incompetent men running a beautifully-equipped train, known as the fast express on the Grand Trunk railway, who did not know enough about railroading to go through the cars and take up the tickets. It was a disgrace to this country on that occasion to see the soldiers brought out to protect the railroad interests when the labouring men were asking for nothing but their rights, namely, standard wages. This country has dealt most generously with the Grand Trunk railway, and all that these labouring men asked was the standard wage, and it is a discredit to this country that they were treated in such an ungentlemanly manner. I am told that there are still on trains in this country men who were imported at that time, while good, honest, loyal Canadians are walking around with their hands in their pockets. That was the first time we ever had reciprocity in labour in Canada that I can remember.

I listened with great pleasure to my hon. friend from East Simcoe (Mr. Bennett), when he spoke so eloquently on the transportation problems of Canada. If Canada continues to be inhabited by a progressive and prosperous people, the transportation problem will be one of the most serious problems we shall have to deal with. Only 6 per cent of the soil of the great grain-growing provinces of the west has yet been tickled with the ploughshare. What will the transportation problem be when the other 94 per cent is brought to yield in the same ratio as the present 6 per cent? I tell you we enjoy privileges in this country that we cannot possibly appreciate. A few years ago we had no transcontinental railway, while to-day we have one fully completed and two others partially completed, and it is going to tax the energies of these railways to handle the traffic before the transportation problem is settled satisfactorily. We have the finest system of freshwaterways and canals owned by any nation in the world to-day. I tell you, as a man who has had a great deal of business experience in the republic to the south, that the people over there envy us the advantages we have in our great waterways. The people of the city of Buffalo wept tears of sadness on the night of the 21st of September when they read the message sent to them by the people of Canada. What other nation in the world enjoys the facilities for cold-storage shipments that we have in Canada? When you realize that you can go to the Niagara peninsula and pick two or three carloads of peaches and ship them in cold-storage, and land them in England, Ireland or Scotland in a better condition than they were in on the day they were picked, it is something we should be proud of; and I hope the new Minister of Agriculture will pay a little more attention to our great fruit industry as well as to other branches of agriculture in Canada. That is one thing that I think the late government was very slack in. They had money to spend on other projects, but very little to encourage the agriculturists of this country, and for that reason the electors on the 21st of September said, 'we will give another party a chance to display their business ability.'

As I have said, no man can form any conception of the greatness of this country twenty-five or fifty years hence. If I have one regret keener than another it is that I was born fifty years too soon. With the great discoveries that are being made all around us, with the progressiveness of this nation, and under the leadership of men of such strength and talents, the country is bound to occupy a foremost place among the colonies of the great empire to which we are so proud to belong.

I was showing, Mr. Speaker, that the reason why hon. members opposite are where they are and we are where we are is that they have lost the confidence of the electors of this country. One of the reasons why the people voted against them was that they had tried to force through this reciprocity pact for which they had no mandate from the people. As I have said, they forgot that they were not the bosses, but the servants of the people. This campaign, I think, was one of the best things that ever happened for Canada. It was a great campaign of education. We heard more during that campaign about the resources of this country and the outlook for its future than we had heard in any campaign since 1878, when the great National Policy was adopted by the people. Another reason why our friends opposite sit where they do to-day is that they had two policies, one for the farmers in the rural districts and another for the artisans and mechanics in the towns. We all know that Christopher Columbus was a great discoverer, but his reputation would fade into insignificance in comparison with that of the man who could discover how it would be possible for the farmer to get more money for his product and the artisan, the mechanic and the business man of the city pay less. The ex-Minister of Railways (Mr. Graham) during the campaign told the story of the Indian who was asked if he were lost, and said: 'No, wigwam lost; Indian here.' They have lost their wigwam, and we are occupying it.

Now, we have heard a lot about loyalty. I do not claim for a moment that there are any more loyal men in the Conservative ranks than in the Liberal ranks. I tell you the salvation of this country is found in just such men as we saw come out and take their stand for the preservation of this country for the people who dwell here. Our Liberal friends cut the party tie and told the late Prime Minister that they could not support his policy and they threw in their lot with the great Conservative party with the result of placing that party in power here to-day. The difference in the policies of the two parties was simply this: The policy of the Liberal party stood for a greater United States, while the policy of the Conservative party stood for a greater Canada, and a greater and united empire, with one King, one Flag, one Throne.

Another reason for loss of confidence in the late administration was explained by a deputation that came here last Thursday—one of the saddest sights I have ever been called upon to witness. I refer to the delegation that came here to seek help to extricate them from the difficulties caused by the error of the late government in granting a certificate to the now defunct Farmers' Bank to do business—an institution that was conceived in sin, born in iniquity, and died in bankruptcy. We hear of a purse of $120,000 having been contributed to the ex-Minister of Finance (Mr. Fielding) by his friends. If I had been the cause of one-half of the suffering that he caused by granting that certificate, I would gladly give up every dollar I possessed to relieve the sufferers. In that room we saw a man of seventy-three years, tottering with age, hardly able to walk, whose future lay before him in some poorhouse or charitable institution, having sunk his all, $11,300, in that defunct institution. Hon. W. S. Fielding, the late Minister of Finance, made one of the most serious mistakes ever made by a Finance Minister of Canada when he granted that charter to that rotten institution. Many complaints have been made about the new Minister of Finance (Mr. White) by the opposition, but I am confident that that hon. gentleman will not make such errors as the Hon. W. S. Fielding made in this case. This Farmers' Bank experience was certainly one of the causes why the people in my constituency lost confidence in the late government.

And there was another. We have heard a good deal about a gentleman who occupied the high position of Minister of the Interior. There was a fund of $69,000 that has never yet been explained away satisfactorily to the members of this House, and I do not believe that that amount of money will ever be satisfactorily explained to those members.

Mr. OLIVER. I quite agree with the hon. member.

Mr. WEBSTER. On the other hand we have seen many bouquets handed to the present Minister of the Interior (Mr. Rogers). Let me tell you, as one somewhat interested in one of the western provinces, that the one act of that hon. gentleman in settling the coal mining difficulty has done something to mark him as one of the coming men of Robert L. Borden's cabinet.

Now, let me refer for a moment to what the National Policy has done for this country. In 1878, that great statesman, right hon. Sir John A. Macdonald, went up and down this land and told the people that if they gave him their confidence he would take this country out of the throes of depression, in which it was then suffering, and would place it on a sound basis. I leave it to hon. members of the House to judge whether that was accomplished, for they are in a position to judge. Hon. members opposite came into power at a time when the country was just beginning to feel the effects of the great National Policy; And that accounts for the prosperity of Canada to-day. We all know that the Liberal party at that time told the electors that they would make great changes. But, thanks to our Heavenly Father—and I say it with all reverence—they never had the courage to act on their convictions. The result is that to-day Canada is prosperous and going ahead by leaps and bounds, both agriculture and manufactures are prosperous, and the people enjoying to-day one of the best home markets enjoyed by any nation in the world.

Let us for a few moments consider why we should continue the same line of policy. Our Liberal friends point with a great deal of pride to the high and exalted position held by the great republic to the south. I too would point to that nation and ask what nation has protected her industries as highly as the United States. That accounts for her great march forward in manufacturing and the upbuilding of her great home market for the products of her soil. I extend to my American cousins the right hand of welcome and I say to them: Come over here, bring your capital, erect your factories, use our raw material, employ Canadian labour and give this country the benefit she should enjoy from furnishing these raw materials, and build up a bigger market for the farmers of this country. I believe as firmly as I believe that I am speaking in the halls of parliament that within five years you will see more manufacturers cross the line than in the last twenty years. It is one of the saddest sights when you approach a city to see tall chimneys lying dead. I looked with pride and pleasure at the smoking chimneys of Ottawa as I came into this beautiful city this morning, and I was rejoicing to think that in five years there would be three chimneys in this manufacturing town where there is one to-day. I believe we stand on the verge of a period of the greatest prosperity enjoyed by any nation in the world.

During the campaign we heard a great deal about the memory of the late lamented Sir John A. Macdonald. The policy of Sir John Macdonald served its purpose in putting the Conservative party in power in this country whilst he was living and the reference made by hon. gentlemen opposite to his memory served to put the Conservative party here again to-day. Hon. gentlemen opposite told us that Sir John Macdonald was anxious for reciprocity at a certain time. If any hon. gentleman will read the address of Sir John A. Macdonald during the campaign of 1878 when he used those words: 'A British subject I was born, a British subject I will die,' and when he called unrestricted reciprocity nothing but veiled treason for the Canadian people that hon. gentleman should be convinced that the man who said from the platform that Sir John A. Macdonald wanted reciprocity was uttering something that was not true. There were some public men who wanted reciprocity. I heard the late Minister of Public Works (Mr. Pugsley) say the other day that Champ Clark was a fool. I would ask my respected friend if he considers that all those public men in the United States who considered reciprocity the first step towards annexation were fools?

Mr. PUGSLEY. I would not hesitate to say yes to that.

Mr. WEBSTER. President Taft said he wanted reciprocity, and he said Canada was at the parting of the ways. The people of this country sent a message to President Taft, that rolled down to Washington on the night of September 21, which I am sure must have come to him like a mighty peal of thunder; in that message were these words: Canada is still loyal and still stands by the British Empire. That peal of thunder bore a message to the incoming government that Canada was still to go on along those lines which she had so successfully trodden for the last thirty years and by following those lines would be left free to carve out her own destiny among the nations of the world and that destiny I hope will always be found within the British Empire and under the folds of the old Union Jack.

Mr. O. TURGEON (Gloucester). Mr. Speaker, I had not intended to take part in this debate until a few days ago when I was prompted to do so by some remarks of hon. gentlemen opposite in reference to the conditions existing in New Brunswick in the recent campaign. In speaking to the motion for an address to be presented to His Royal Highness the Governor General in reply to the speech from the Throne I wish to express my participation in the noble sentiments expressed by both the mover and the seconder of the address. Those sentiments, I am sure, are shared by every man of every race in this country, but never more generously and devoutly than by the race which I have the honour to represent in this House, the Acadian people of the maritime provinces who, 200,000 strong, dwell to-day in that part of the country happy to live under the protection of the British flag under which they enjoy political and religious freedom to a greater extent than could be enjoyed under any other flag, a flag they love and are ready and willing to defend if occasion requires.

The mover of the address, being a native of the province from which I come, I was especially interested to listen to his speech. Pleasant zephyrs have already carried down to his home and his neighbours the sound of his fame in the far west which he had chosen as the field of his activity, and may I be permitted to say that the first experience we have had of his ability has certainly convinced everyone that the zephyrs in their travels had not exaggerated his eloquence and merit. I have only to congratulate him and to wish that he may be able to render service in this House for many years.

I have also listened with attention to the seconder of the address, a native of the province of Quebec, which has furnished so many eloquent men in this House; everyone of us hung upon his words during the whole hour for which he has entertained this House. He has also expressed very noble and generous sentiments and I wish to the hon. member for Dorchester that he may remain many long years in public life to be able further to develop and display the magnetism of his magnificent eloquence to the admiration of the Canadian people in consistency as well as in brilliancy.

Mr. Speaker, I did not frequently address the Chair when I was on the other side of the House and this is the first time I have had the honour to address you from this side of the House. I do not wish to be offensive to anybody in the remarks which I have to make, especially to the hon. Minister of Marine and Fisheries (Mr. Hazen), whose presence I should like to have had in the House for a few moments. I am sorry that he is not in his seat now. The new Prime Minister (Mr. Borden) was in his seat a few minutes ago, and I would have liked merely to have expressed to him my personal consideration, because, as he knows, I have the highest respect for him. Our country is fortunate in having been led for the last fifteen years by a man whose sterling honesty and integrity have been the admiration not only of the Canadian people and of the British Empire, but of our neighbours to the south of us, and if we have to have change after times of war we are fortunate in having placed at the head of the government of the nation a man whose personal integrity and honour stand under no stain and under no suspicion. I would have liked to have seen my friend, from New Brunswick originally, the hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Foster) and to have congratulated him upon occupying a place in the cabinet. I would have expressed my sorrow to see that he has not been given the position that he possessed for so many years previously under the old Conservative government and to which every one of us expected to see him return. I have not the honour to be acquainted with the more fortunate gentleman who has been appointed to the position of Minister of Finance (Mr. White). I have no doubt that his selection is due to his ability, as developed in the presence of those who may have been near to him. May I be permitted to say, though, that this country has been favoured during the last fifteen years with the intellectual activity of a Minister of Finance who has certainly earned the admiration of the Canadian people, and of the British Empire, and if his successor, who also comes from the ranks of the Liberal party, can, in the next few years, during which he may be at the head of that department, reach the position and achieve the success which characterized the administration of his predecessor, the House and the country will realize how fortunate they have been that the Liberal party have been able to produce another guide and guardian of the treasury of this great and advancing nation?

But the remarks that I wanted to make had more particular reference to the canvass during the last election in the maritime provinces, and especially in New Brunswick. The hon. Minister of Marine and Fisheries (Mr. Hazen), in reply to the hon. member for the city of St. John (Mr Pugsley), admitted that he did favour reciprocity in the year 1891, when he had the honour of occupying a seat in this House for the city of St. John. The Minister of Marine and Fisheries is a most eloquent speaker and he is always courteous to those who know him. He has no doubt commanded the admiration of every one who has heard him speak in this House—those who had heard him previously and those who heard him for the first time when he spoke in this debate. We know that he is gifted with great fluency and eloquence, we know that a strong patriotism impels his intellectual activity, and I have no doubt that if many more years are given to his party in power he will be able to render service not only to the province from whence he comes, and from which I come, but also to this great country at large

Meanwhile, I must say that I was pleased to hear him give expression to the fact that he was favourable to the pact of reciprocity as applying to agriculture products in the as applying to agricultural products in the taken by the Conservative party at large since, he has added that conditions have changed. We have had for many years at the head of the Liberal party perhaps the greatest man that this country has ever produced. We perhaps never had any one to compare with the ex-Prime Minister, who has been at the head of the Liberal government for the last fifteen years and whom we are pleased to have now at the head of His Majesty's loyal opposition. Sir John Macdonald said that a British subject he was born and a British subject he would die. But while uttering this truth he told us that he was also trying to get a reciprocal arrangement with the country to the south of us. Thus we found him trying to harmonize and realize the dual aspirations of life, to firmly maintain his British citizenship and at the same time to improve our relations with our neighbours. We remember that the leader of the Liberal party at one time made the prophecy that the time would come when the United States would knock at the door of Canada and that prophecy was realized two years ago when the United States knocked at the door of the Liberal government of this Dominion. It was loyal for Sir John A. Macdonald to be a British subject and at the same time an advocate of reciprocal arrangements with the United States in order to better the trade conditions of this country. How then can it have become disloyal in 1911 to ask for the same privileges that the Minister of Marine and Fisheries said the Liberal-Conservative party were asking for in 1891 and 1894? The conditions have changed, yes, and it is for that very reason that the conditions have changed that I so heartily supported the reciprocity pact for the exchange of natural products between Canada and the United States. Had the conditions not changed I might have been more reluctant to give the enthusiastic support which I gave to this measure during the past summer.

What were the conditions in this country in 1891? At that time we had less than 25 per cent of the revenue that we have to-day. Our total trade was not one-third of the trade that we have now. Prices and wages were low. Our lumbermen in New Brunswick were obliged to work in the lumber camps for $12, $14 and $16 a month. Geographical conditions, climatic conditions have not changed, but commercial conditions have changed, and in 1911 we have a trade of over $750,000,000, nearly half of which is with the United States, with which nation we want to increase our trade.

Is it because we wanted to further extend the market with the United States, which already is increasing by millions of dollars a year, that we should be accused of losing our loyalty. In past years our transportation facilities were not developed as they are to-day, the population of the west was not one-third of what it is at present, our canals were not enlarged and deepened, and our trade was restricted, but, very soon, when the Georgian Bay canal is built and the Welland canal improved, and with the increased railway facilities which are now being provided, our transportation system will have reached almost perfection. We will have the shortest, and the cheapest and the best route between east and west. We need then fear no competition from the American republic, and with reciprocity we could control not only the trade with western Canada, but with the western States as well. Now that the Minister of Marine and Fisheries is in his seat I wish to commune with him for a few minutes on the issues of the last campaign, knowing that with his amability he will permit the humble member for Gloucester presenting him with his views. We have in our province of New Brunswick the resources of the land and the sea: Fisheries, lumber, and agriculture. The New Brunswick fisheries yielded last year about $4,800,000; the industry in the county of Gloucester alone yielding $1,250,000, which surpassed the yield of the whole of Prince Edward Island. The hon. minister (Mr. Hazen) knows that the best market for our fish is the American market, and that notwithstanding the duties we will have to pay owing to the recent verdict of the people, we must still send most of our fish to that market. The smelt and salmon fishing industry would have to be closed were it not for the American markets. The smelt fishing industry is a very valuable pursuit for three or four months of the winter on the north shore, and without the American market it would not be worth while taking those fish from our waters. No one is more ambitious than I to favour the local market, but when we remember that a market must be found not only for the fisheries of the maritime provinces, but for the fisheries of the St. Lawrence, of the Great Lakes, of the great inland lakes on the prairies, and of the Pacific coast it is easy to realize that the home market cannot take the entire product. We must remember also that our fisheries in the maritime provinces, and possibly our other fisheries as well, can be made to produce double their present yield if remunerative markets are to be found. The cod industry is the most valuable in my country and it is pursued by hardy fishermen who deserve every consideration from the government. I am quite sure the Minister of Marine will extend his consideration to them. It must be remembered that under the reciprocity arrangement our fishermen would have obtained not only the benefit of the American market but also the benefit of the Porto Rico market which is one of the best markets for the cod industry known as the 'Gaspé cure.'

We have also mackerel, for which there is scarcely any other market than the American, and in other parts of the province we have the lobster industry which certainly owes its prosperity to the proximity of that market. Therefore, one need not be surprised that the people of the maritime provinces interested in the fishery, both the fishermen and the farmers, should have been favourable to this pact.

There is also the lumber industry, the conditions in which have changed since 1890, as the hon. Minister for Marine and Fisheries (Mr. Hazen) has said. In 1891 Great Britain purchased 35 per cent of all her lumber from Canada. But in 1911 the British market took only 20 per cent of her lumber from Canada. It took the greater portion of its spruce lumber, the same quality as the spruce we produce, from the Baltic. Would any one tax the people of Great Britain with disloyalty to Canada because they bought their lumber from districts where they could get it at cheaper prices than in Canada? As a result we have been obliged to look more and more to the American market which, during the last 15 years, has been absorbing our lumber to a greater extent each year, until the quantity we export to that market has reached an enormous figure. I might point out that as in the case of our fisheries the American market in the matter of lumber is the only one on which we can depend for the greatest portion of our production, especially the by-products such as shingles, laths, boards, scantlings. These products we can find no market for in Great Britain at all. And as our large timber is yearly decreasing in quantity, and the American market is the one to which we must look for the smaller grades and inferior grades, that market is becoming more and more necessary to our lumbering interests, and consequently the reciprocity pact would have proved a great boon to the maritime provinces.

While we can boast of our transportation facilities, there is still a great deal to be done in order to make them perfect. It is certainly absolutely necessary, in the development of those facilities, that we should build the Georgian Bay canal and improve the Welland canal. The production of our great western country is increasing every day. This year we had a crop of 200,000,000 bushels, and in a few years we will be producing more than a billion bushels of wheat. When Sir Charles Tupper was advocating the construction of the Canadian Pacific railway some thirty years ago, and when he was depicting the great possibilities of that country, he realized that it would not only become the granary of the old world, but would furnish the market of 100,000,000 people to the south of us. No doubt, however, the time will soon come when our American neighbours will be compelled to purchase their grain supplies in our market. But at the same time we in the maritime provinces, while we have never been unwilling to contribute to the development of the great west, while, inspired by a patriotism as lofty as our religion, we have ever shrank from doing our duty by that country in furnishing it with men and money, we have always been looking forward to the time when our magnificent harbours would be developed as they ought to be when every encouragement should be given for the utilization of our great water-powers, and for the settlement of our rich agricultural areas along our rivers and lakes, and when our census enumerators would be able to report an increase in our population which would give us adequate representation in this House. Had the policy of the Liberal party been allowed to be put into force on the 21st of September last our people in the maritime provinces would have been placed in such a position that every child born under our blest heavens would no longer have any inducement to leave their own soil. They would settle along the colonization roads of New Brunswick, along its rivers, lakes, and water-powers which are now waiting development which would have come to them had the policy of the late government been adopted. The majority of the people of Canada decide otherwise. But I am happy to say that the maritime provinces, notwithstanding all the difficulties and circumstances, side issues brought into the campaign, gave a majority in favour of the government's policy, in favour of the reciprocity pact. This policy will, however continue to be the aspiration of the people, and ambition of the people of the maritime provinces as long as there are fish in the Gulf and the Atlantic coast waters and as long there are trees to fell, and lumber to export from the maritime provinces.

It has been said that notwithstanding all the great economic advantages which this pact would give to Canada, our loyalty was endangered, and therefore we are obliged to leave aside that economic advantage, conditions, and prosperity of our people in order to keep our people loyal.

Where is the man in Canada to-day whose loyalty could be suspected? May I be allowed to ask my generous friend the Minister of Marine and Fisheries, where can disloyalty be suspected in New Brunswick? What is the population of New Brunswick? It is composed chiefly of the descendants of United Empire Loyalists, the ancestors of the Minister of Marine and Fisheries, I believe, amongst them, and also of the Acadian people, who to-day form one-third of the population of that province. I am sure that my hon. friend the Minister of Marine and Fisheries has no doubt of the loyalty of the descendants of the United Empire Loyalists in whatever corner of the province they may be, and I can vouch that the Acadian people would not exchange the British flag for any other flag in the world. Therefore, I regret to say that during the recent campaign an education was carried on which showed the other nations of the world that there were among the Canadian people a certain class who doubted the loyalty of certain other people in Canada; we where supporting the reciprocity agreement at a time when it was to the interest of the British Empire that Canada should be socially and commercially on friendly terms with the United States, when not only the Liberal party which is now dominant in the British House of Commons, but the whole public opinion of the British Empire, was in favour of bringing about a treaty of peace between the two nations by which their difficulties in the future should be settled by arbitration. Therefore, the acceptance of this reciprocity agreement by Canada would have given Great Britain a new-born force and prestige which would have made her not only invincible, but the arbiter of the world.

Mr. Speaker, very recently another sister nation of Great Britain, in which I am sure disloyalty would never be suspected, Australia, has sent delegates to the United States to endeavour to make a similar reciprocity pact between the two countries for the exchange of goods suited to the requirements of each other; and certainly no Canadian would assert that the loyalty of Australia can be doubted. But, Mr. Speaker, reciprocity is set aside for the time, its opponents are in office, and to them we must now look for compensation for the advantages lost to Canada by the rejection of the reciprocity pact. I would ask my generous friend the Minister of Marine and Fisheries what he would suggest by way of compensation to our fishermen, who have been deprived of the American market? From this out they will have to continue to pay a duty on their fish going to the United States. That is the penalty for their loyalty. Our lumbermen will have to continue to pay a duty on their lumber going to the United States. The man in the camp will have to be satisfied with lower wages; instead of getting from $33 to $35 a month, he will have to be content with $20 or $25; that is the penalty for their loyalty. What will the government propose as a compensation to our fishermen and our lumbermen? Will they increase the British preference? I hope they will. That was my hope before the election, as is well known in my county. It would be an expression of loyalty to the people of Great Britain, an expression of our will to deal with them to a larger extent. At the same time, it would be a compensation to our fishermen, our lumbermen and our farmers by enabling them to get more cheaply the goods they have to buy. Will the government reduce the duties on farming implements for the farmers of the west? I hope they will. I remember that my hon. friend, the bright young member for Portage la Prairie (Mr. Meighen) last session brought in a resolution in favour of taking off altogether the duty on farming implements. Is compensation of this kind to be offered to the farmers of the west for the restriction placed on their markets by the rejection of the reciprocity pact? I hope that my hon. friend the member for Portage la Prairie is endowed to-day with the same patriotism on behalf of the farmers of the west that he was last year, and will again move for the removal of the duties on agricultural implements, in order to encourage the farmers to remain on their farms to inspire their sons to remain on the homesteads, so that we may not see our cities over-populated at the expense of our rural districts, which would be a great misfortune for Canada, which would cease thereby to be an exporting country.

Again, we are told that at least we should have reciprocity within the empire. Again, I answer that it requires at least two to make a bargain, and in this case it may require more than two. I believe that there is at least one party in Great Britain that will not be very favourable to this imperial commercial union. The artisans of Great Britain will resist, I am sure, the taxation of their bread in the future as they have in the past; and it is to be remembered that this arrangement can only be brought about by taxation of the products now put upon the British markets by others than the sister nations. I hope the government will look into these things. I appeal more particularly to my hon. friend the Minister of Marine and Fisheries (Mr. Hazen), who represents the province from which I come and whose patriotism and great intellectual powers assure to him the maintenance in the federal field of the reputation he has already won in that province. I hope he will not forget our position, but will see what can be done for the fishermen, the farmers and the lumbermen who have been deprived of this great market in order to stand by his loyalty.

But there was another great question which interested a portion of Canada during the last campaign—the navy question. May I be permitted to say—and I believe the Minister of Marine and Fisheries will bear me out—that in my constituency at least, no other question than that of reciprocity was made an issue in the election. This was in part because my views on the naval question were well known. It had been my lot to express my opinion in this House at the time when this question was before parliament. My constituents generally had read the remarks I made on that occasion, and every one of them, Liberal or Conservative, knew my position on the matter. There can be no equivocation as to the expression of the people of the county of Gloucester and their willingness to share in the defence of the empire by the construction of a Canadian navy in co-operation with the imperial navy in time of need. And, in spite of the greatest combinations that could be made against a candidate in the maritime provinces, the people of Gloucester have sent me to this House for the fourth time, with a majority of a thousand. I heard with pleasure the speech of the Minister of Marine and Fisheries (Mr. Hazen). But, while some of his remarks give me hope for the future, there are others which do not altogether satisfy, not my curiosity, for that is not worthy of his attention, but my ambition to gain accurate information from his statements. It may be due to my lack of penetration that I do not reach the depth of his ideas. But I know he takes this important position of Minister of Marine and Fisheries with intention of promoting the welfare of the maritime provinces and of the province of New Brunswick. Before he took his present portfolio, the policy of the Liberal party had been set forth in the statutes of Canada by the action of parliament in 1910, and contracts in fulfilment of that policy had been prepared and tenders received. Expenditures had been made on ships for training purposes. And this House had voted five-twelfths of the sum required for the construction of ships to be built in Canada. I no more doubted that the country was committed to the naval policy of the Liberal party and that the contracts asked for would be carried out as soon as my hon. friend (Mr. Hazen) would be sworn in as Minister of Marine and Fisheries. I was more particularly of a hopeful mind because of the statement made by Dr. Daniel, who had been elected for the city and county of St. John and who so generously gave up his seat in order that the Prime Minister might give the province of New Brunswick the advantage of being represented in the cabinet by the hon. gentleman (Mr. Hazen). I say I believed that the hon. gentleman would take the position of carrying out this policy because of the declaration made by Dr. Daniel who eliminated himself on behalf of the hon. gentleman for such patriotic purposes. In a letter to his electors, Dr. Daniel was careful to say that the portfolio of Marine and Fisheries was a very important one, and particularly if the policy of the Liberal government were carried into execution it would be the most important in the Canadian cabinet. For this additional reason I thought there was no doubt about the realization of that policy. But as I have said, my hon. friend (Mr. Hazen), has not given me the satisfaction I had hoped for and expected at his hands. He threw blame upon the late government for having kept the tenders so long. But he forgot to tell us that it had been decided by his predecessors in office, and by the late government as a whole, that these tenders should be submitted for the consideration of the Admiralty.

And the late Minister of Marine (Mr. Lemieux) had scarcely came back from Europe where he had been in consultation with the Admiralty in reference to some tenders when dissolution took place. After the election there was a change of ministry and I would have been most pleased if the present Minister of Marine (Mr. Hazen) had adjudicated those contracts made that remark to us. The Minister of Marine said in reference to these tenders:

> There were nine tenders. There was the tender of Cammel, Laird & Company, which was the lowest, for $11,280,000. There was the tender of Swan, Hunter & Wisham Richardson for $12,174,000. There were other tenders, ranging from the lowest already mentioned up to $13,055,804. Those tenders did not include the armour plating, the armament, and certain supplies that go with warships of this sort, and which would have considerably augmented the cost.

No doubt it was a large amount and the minister shows that it would have required $15,000,000 to build a Canadian navy such as was proposed by the Canadian government on the suggestion of the Admiralty. It would have cost perhaps $15,000,000 but no Canadian expects to be able to get a Canadian navy of any utility to Canada and the empire without spending some money. So I consider that $15,000,000 was not an extravagant figure for any Canadian who looks into the future conditions of this great country of ours. With that expenditure of $15,000,000 Canada would have been given the advantage of the construction of shipyards for the building of these ships. These shipyards would have remained an asset of the people of Canada and would have secured in the future the construction of commercial as well as war vessels, so the people of Canada would have greatly benefited by the immediate commencement of the construction of these ships. The Minister of Marine and Fisheries (Mr. Hazen) tells us that from the information he has at his command these vessels under that contract could not have been completed within six years by which time they would have become obsolete. I do not question the accuracy of my friend's information but it is hard for me to believe that the British Admiralty would furnish to the government of Canada plans for a type of vessel that would become obsolete before their completion. It may be that in the near future the Dreadnoughts themselves will be the most obsolete vessels. We know that many authorities have blamed the British parliament for having commenced to build Dreadnoughts of such dimensions, causing other nations to do the same thing and therefore it might have been better if we had never had the Dreadnoughts. On the other hand cruisers and torpedo boats have always been and always will be required in naval warfare. But there is one consolation for me in the words of my hon. friend the Minister of Marine and Fisheries. It is well known that I am in favour of co-operation within the British Empire and assistance to the empire in the time of need, that I belong to that party who wish to co-operate with England when necessary. We in Gloucester county do not belong to that group of do-nothings; we wish to protect ourselves and we wish also to help to protect the great flag under which we live. I was most pleased to hear my hon. friend the Minister of Marine when he said:

> It is a question which is going to involve a tremendous expenditure to the people of this country, and I think it is the desire of all Canadians that when a naval policy is embarked upon it shall be one that will conduce to the welfare of Canada and the strength and maintenance of the British Empire.

I join with him in those words, but they do not offer me all the consolation I had expected from his remarks. He does not say to us whether it will be a Canadian navy built in Canada with Canadian material in Canadian shipyards and as rapidly as possible manned by Canadians. I hope it will and he knows that these are my views. If there is one policy in addition to the policy of reciprocity that would have been of advantage to the people of the maritime provinces it is the naval policy proposed by the late government. No doubt some of the vessels for the Canadian navy would have been built in the great harbours of the maritime provinces, St. John, Halifax, Digby or Bathurst, and therefore all our young men, with so many divers aspirations and such great intelligence, who have proved themselves such great mechanics when they have gone to the United States during the last forty years, because there was not sufficient scope in the maritime provinces for the employment of their skill, would have had their ambitions fulfilled in the building of steel and iron ships and we would have seen our population rapidly increase. The natural increase of population would remain with us and our prosperity would attract many newcomers to our shores.

There is a movement on foot in the maritime provinces for an amendment to the British constitution so that our people may be able to get a larger representation in this House. I respect that movement although I have not been in favour of it. It is not so much representation in this House that we want as the means to secure and retain population. With this great policy of reciprocity and with those great industries which might be created along the Atlantic and Pacific coasts and would be complementary to the shipping interests, we would not only keep the population which we have but we would rapidly increase our population, and we would have in future a right to an increased representation in this House. We would not then be considered as securing our representation in this House through the charity of the west. I hope, therefore, that my hon. friend will take this into consideration. I know him to be gifted with great patriotism as I said before, and, exercising the influence which I know he will with regard to the policy of the government on the question of the Canadian navy, I hope that he will not agree to anything but a Canadian navy, built on Canadian soil, in Canadian harbours, by Canadian men and, when built, manned by Canadians. It is all very well for those who favour a money contribution to Great Britain to say that our children, if they desire to serve in the Canadian navy, may go to Great Britain, enlist there and serve on the ships representing Canada, but, that would not take the place of a Canadian navy, and it would not afford the opportunity for those of our sons who desire a naval career, because very few would take advantage of that opportunity. The moment you commence the construction of Canadian ships along the coast of Canada, the people of the maritime provinces will be ready in large numbers to loyally do their share to make the Canadian fleet as efficient as possible. I hope that when my hon. friend the Minister of Marine and Fisheries comes back from England with the matured plan which is supposed to take the place of the navy now outlined on our statute-books, it will be found to provide for a Canadian navy, and if that is so I for one will render him all possible assistance to make it acceptable to the people of New Brunswick.

I do not wish to refer to other points in the speech from the Throne. I rose more particularly for the purpose of expressing my views to the Minister of Marine and Fisheries upon these two great questions, and I hope that before long that hon. gentleman will give the people of Canada a scheme which will be Canadian and British, but Canadian before all. He has not told us that it will be necessary for him to have a plebiscite on the plan which he may propound. I hope it will not be, because I believe that a plebiscite on such a question would be altogether useless and unpatriotic. I hope you will not place the people of Canada in the position of registering the vote of one Canadian who would not be willing to co-operate with Great Britain in her new aspiration for Canada and other sister nations. Therefore, if the minister takes the responsibility of accepting or rejecting a plan for the navy and if he brings us a plan for a Canadian navy, built in Canada as far as practicable, whether they be large or small ships, I will for one give him all the support I possibly can in the province of New Brunswick.

Mr. W. G. WEICHEL (North Waterloo). Mr. Speaker, we have been debating this address for a whole week and it seems that we cannot offer much consolation to hon. members of the opposition. To a newcomer the situation is indeed highly amusing. I feel that the time and attention of the House could be profitably devoted to the consideration of more weighty matters rather than to ruminating around the events of the recent contest on September 21. Let me add my congratulations to those which have already been expressed to the mover and seconder of the address in reply to the speech from the Throne. I assure you that it was with the greatest pleasure that I listened to the eloquent remarks of these two hon. gentlemen. I am sure that the hon. leader of the House (Mr. Borden) may also be complimented upon the accession to his ranks of the talent which we have before us upon the ministerial benches. Certain remarks have been made by hon. gentlemen on the opposite side of the House with reference to the election which was held on September 21. I come from the county of North Waterloo, and happen to have the honour of having defeated that great essayist, the hon. Wm. Lyon Mackenzie King. We have heard a great deal in this House about passion and prejudice. The accusation has been made that in the elections passions, prejudice and sentiment were the predominating features. Let me tell hon. gentlemen opposite that I have with me the facts which will dispel that illusion from their minds. I will take the opportunity tonight of reading to the House an extract from the 'Globe' and I am positive that hon. gentlemen on your left, Mr. Speaker, will not dispute anything that we can find in the 'Globe'.

At the convention held in Waterloo on August 22nd the Hon. Wm. Lyon Mackenzie made this statement:—

> Are the people of this country going to place at the head of affairs a man who will be precipitated into such a position as this, who will take from the treasury of this country and who would have taken money enough to build two Dreadnoughts and send that money to England so that they could spend it as they pleased? And against what country? He was ready to send money to build warships to fight Germany.

In view of this language is it not time for gentlemen of the opposition to call a halt, when they see a minister of the Liberal cabinet actually using such words as I have read from the report in their own party organ. Not only that, but Mr. King asked how the Germans of that county were going to stand behind me when I was supporting a man like Mr. Borden who was taking that stand in regard to the defence of the empire.

Mr. PELLETIER. That's loyalty.

Mr. WEICHEL. Mr. Speaker, I can tell the Liberal members present in this House to-night that the people of North Waterloo do not require anything of that stamp to make them loyal. North Waterloo is one of the greatest manufacturing counties in Canada, and it is inhabited by what you might call a German speaking people, although they speak English as well. I can tell you Mr. Speaker, that every man, woman, and child in that constituency resented the implication contained in the statement of Mr. MacKenzie King, and the result of the elections of September 21st in that constituency showed what they thought of such utterances from a minister of the Crown. I would like to ask Wm. Lyon Mackenzie King whether he thinks we are subjects of King George or subjects of the Emperor of Germany. I can assure the members of this House that there are no more loyal subjects in this Dominion than the German people of North Waterloo. When Sir Wilfrid Laurier brought forth his reciprocity policy the people of my constituency could not see eye to eye with him upon it, and although they had been honoured with cabinet representation in the last parliament they decided that it was in the bests interests of the country as a whole that Mr. King should be defeated at the polls, and I can assure you they did the job properly. I was in the House the other day when a member of the opposition interrupting one of the Conservative speakers said: You may have gained in the cities but what about your vote in the rural sections? Let me point out in answer to this question what the result was in the county I have the honour to represent. The township of Waterloo voted practically as in the previous election. In the township of Woolwich there was a difference of only a few votes, but in the township of Wellesley, which is an agricultural district, I reduced Mr. King's majority from 187 to 73. That is a direct contradiction to the claim of the Liberals that in the rural constituencies the vote was for reciprocity. We, in the towns of Berlin and Waterloo believe in the National Policy; that policy which the Liberals had the good sense to preserve when they got into power in 1896. These gentlemen now in opposition may say that during fifteen years they gave the country prosperity, but the country was bound to be prosperous any way and none of the prosperity which prevails is due to any policy initiated by the Liberals. We have heard a great deal about sentiment, and about passion, and prejudice and in my opinion it is high time that such language should stop, and that we get down to the solid work of the business of the country. Sentiment is a good thing in its place, and I am glad to say sentiment did play a good part in the election, for I believe that no nation can prosper that is devoid of sentiment. On the 21st of September last, the people of Canada did exhibit sentiment combined with good, sound sense and they marked their ballots according to their own free will, and when these ballots were counted the Conservatives were in power. When I hear the Liberals in this House talking about what occurred in the province of Quebec I wish to tell them that the people in the section of the country where I come from do not allow passion or prejudice to influence their votes in any way, manner or form, when it comes to vote. I can tell my hon. friends that although the people of German origin in my constituency may be at heart Germans, they are at the same time above and beyond all, Canadians and loyal British subjects. We admire the people of the province of Quebec; we give them credit for their noble institutions, and for the part they have played in Canada's history, and we Canadians of German origin bear no ill will to them. Sir, the people of North Waterloo do not allow for one minute anything in the shape of religion or race to come between them and their right to mark their ballots as was demonstrated on the 21st September. I can assure you, Mr. Speaker, that the language used by Mr. Mackenzie King was not the only language of the kind used in my constituency during the election, but the words of that gentleman which I have read ought to be enough to teach the opposition to let that matter rest. When Mr. King made that statement he no doubt had the idea that he could sway the German people of the constituency, but in that he was mistaken. I believe, Sir, that neither will that sort of language swerve the people of the province of Quebec from their duty to Canada and the empire. Indeed, the result of the 21st of September in that province demonstrated to a certain degree that the people of Quebec have a mind of their own, and that they will vote entirely as they please.

Mr. W. A. BUCHANAN (Medicine Hat). In the early part of this debate the hon. member for Brandon (Mr. Aikins), gave expression to the opinion that there was danger in the future of a severance of sentiment between the east and the west. As a representative from western Canada, as one who believes we cannot build up this country unless we are all agreed to develop a united Canada, I must express my absolute dissent from that opinion; and I wish to say, on behalf of the constituency of Medicine Hat, that the people there are just as anxious for a united Canada, and opposed to any severance between the east and the west as the most intense Canadian can possibly desire. We are as anxious for the development of eastern Canada as the people of the east can possibly be for the development of western Canada. I happen to be engaged in the newspaper business, and it has been my pleasure on many occasions, as it has been that of every other newspaper man in western Canada to develop that sentiment of sympathy towards the people of the east. The hon. member for Brandon (Mr. Aikins) took occasion to refer to the lack of Canadians and British news in Canadian newspapers, and to the quantity of American news in our western papers. As one familiar with the newspapers of the west, I would like to say that for a number of years our newspapers had a long struggle to secure reduced telegraphic rates, and had made persistent efforts to obtain such reduction from the Canadian Pacific Railway Telegraph Company; but to-day and in the last couple of years they have been enabled to come to an agreement by which all the newspapers of Canada, in the east as well as the west, are at present furnished with the same report so that the papers in the west and the papers in the east are supplying the public with the same news. We in the west are making every effort to give the people of Canada and those who are coming into this country, Canadian news, and British news, thus stimulating their interest in Canada and the empire.

I have taken occasion to refer to the remarks of my hon. friend from Brandon because they might create the impression in eastern Canada that there is a sentiment growing up in western Canada that is not in the interests of the whole Dominion. I do not agree with that. I say we are developing a strong British and Canadian sentiment through the schools, through the press, and through all the institutions that are intended for the moulding of public opinion. In our schools the British flag is displayed and the pupils attending them no matter to what race they belong, and no matter from what country they come, are impressed with the idea that that flag stands for Canada. They are given lessons in British history, and they are taught to believe that British institutions are the best in the world. In view of all this the people of eastern Canada need not worry about the future of the Dominion so far as we in the west are concerned. We may differ in our opinions on the trade question. I confess I would not be in this House to-day if it were not for the strong sentiment in western Canada in favour of a low tariff? And I feel that so long as I stand for a low tariff and larger markets that I will be returned by that constituency. I say also that western Canada, while it is anxious for larger markets and anxious for the nearby American market, is not populated with a selfish people. The people of the west do not believe that their interests alone should be considered, and there is no desire on their part for any tariff which would wreck any legitimate industry in this country. But, Sir, we think we are entitled to consideration and we believe that reciprocity with the United States is in the best interests of western Canada, and in the best interests of eastern Canada as well. I had the opportunity of addressing a great many meetings during the last campaign, and I know that every speaker on the Liberal side announced that we did not want to injure the interests of the people of eastern Canada, nor did we feel that reciprocity would injure those industries. We hold that view to-day and we are not going to advocate that we should wipe out the tariff completely, and wreck any deserving industry in the country. I can tell hon. gentlemen that the sentiment in favour of a low tariff exists in western Canada and will continue to grow, because the people of that country are anxious to have access not only to the markets of the United States, but to all the markets they can procure. In that western country our productions are increasing year by year, and it has become necessary that we should look for these larger markets.

We are quite willing to sell as much as possible within the British Empire market and to the people of Canada, but we must look for other markets than these, and it is for that reason we supported reciprocity so strongly on the 21st of September. I may say that after listening to this debate, I am satisfied that in no other part of Canada, as in the west, was reciprocity considered on its merits. The people of the west voted for reciprocity because they thought it would be a good trade arrangement that would be helpful to the whole of the Dominion; and if the people of the rest of the Dominion had considered reciprocity in the same way and had excluded extraneous matters in connection with racial and religious cries, I am satisfied they also would have endorsed reciprocity and that to-day we would be enjoying its benefits. I would not like to say that any of the members of this House had questioned the loyalty of the American people who have come to this country, but since the election some of the Conservative press have talked about 'a solid American vote,' giving the impression that these settlers have voted for reciprocity in the hope that it might bring Canada into closer political relations with the United States. I want to say of the American people who have settled in western Canada that on taking up their citizenship here they immediately began to take an interest in our affairs, that they appreciate our institutions, that they appreciate the enforcement of law in Canada, and that they appreciate our good system of government. I believe that these former American citizens are just as good citizens as any that have ever come to Canada. It is worth mentioning that when the deputation from western Canada, and eastern Canada as well, presented their claims before the late government they not only asked for reciprocity with the United States but they also asked for the extension of the British preference. That was an evidence of the loyalty of the Canadian farmers. In the west we are prepared to buy the goods that are made in Great Britain and we are prepared also to buy the goods that are made in Canada, but we believe it would be to the advantage of the western Canadian consumers if we had the opportunity of buying in a competitive market of the British and the Canadian manufacturers. I believe that as to the establishment of a Canadian navy, that if the government decide to put it to a referendum, they will find the people of the west in favour of a Canadian navy on the lines laid down by the late government. I believe Sir, that the people of the west will give evidence of their loyalty in that matter because they feel that we should take part in the defence of Canada and the empire. Before taking my seat I would like to say a word as to the criticisms which have been offered as to the treatment accorded by the late Liberal government to western Canada. Let me say that western Canada has only become a country worth talking about since the Liberal government came into power in 1896. That country appreciates what the late Liberal government has done for it in the past; it appreciates the immigration and transportation policy of that government. I can say to the new government that if they consider the interests of western Canada as loyally as the late government did then western Canada will have no complaint to make.

Before taking my seat, I would like to make a suggestion with regard to labour legislation. In the constituency which I represent there are many men engaged in the mines, and in connection with the late strike there was much criticism of the conditions under which the miners have to work and live. The people there feel that the Department of Labour should institute an investigation to ascertain whether the charges made by the miners in this respect are correct. I hope the Department of Labour will take that matter up. These men claim that the conditions under which they have to live are almost impossible, and very injurious to health. I believe the matter is one that comes within the control of this government, and I would be glad if they would give it their consideration.

Mr. A. E. FRIPP moved the adjournment of the debate.

Motion agreed to, and debate adjourned.

On motion of Mr. Borden, House adjourned at 10.40 o'clock p.m.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

TUESDAY, November 28, 1911.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

CONTROVERTED ELECTION.

Mr. SPEAKER. I have the honour to inform the House that I have received from the Hon. Chief Justice, F. X. Lemieux, and the Hon. Mr. Justice C. E. Dorion, two of the judges selected for the trial of election petitions, pursuant to 'The Dominion Controverted Elections Act,' a certificate and report relating to the election for the electoral district of Quebec West, by which the said election petition was dismissed and the sitting member duly elected

REPORT PRESENTED.

Report of Conservation Commission on the Water Powers of Canada.—Hon. Mr. Burrell.

BANKING ACT AMENDMENT.

Mr. SPEAKER. Referring to the Bill intituled 'An Act to amend the Banking Act,' of which the hon. member for St. John and Iberville (Mr. Demers) has given notice, I am of the opinion, after an examination of the measure, that it should be introduced upon resolution.

Previous to 1874 the practice in this regard had been somewhat unsettled, but in that year Mr. Speaker Anglin decided (see Bouré inot, 3rd edit. p. 634) that general banking Bills are to be based on resolutions. It is added that this position was in accordance with the practice of the English parliament. The case in which this question arose was of a Bill similar to that now under consideration. (See Can. Com. J., 1874, pp. 142-3). In 1890 the government Bill to extend the charters of the several banks in Canada, and to amend the Banking Act, was introduced upon resolution (See Can. Com. J., 1890, p. 209). I, therefore, decide that similar action should be taken with the Bill proposed by the hon member.

CRIMINAL CODE AMENDMENT.

Mr. STEVENS moved for leave to introduce Bill (No. 9,) to amend the Criminal Code.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Explain.

Mr STEVENS. This has reference to a slight technical omission in the law relating to the piracy of logs. It is a question that has been agitating lumbermen on the Pacific coast for some time. The Act at present provides for the punishment of those who steal floating timber in rivers, lakes, and so on, but it does not include or specify salt waters on the coast line and under this omission the pirates, as we call them on the Pacific coast, have been evading the law. We simply wish to have the law amended so that it will cover the coast waters of the Pacific. We also desire that the Act shall apply to logs that are marked under the provincial marking Act of British Columbia. This is a mere technical amendment which will enable us to punish those who are perpetrating these crimes.

Motion agreed to, and the Bill read the first time.

CRUISER 'ABOUKIR.'

On the orders of the day being called.

Mr. MACLEAN (Halifax). Mr. Speaker, I desire to call the attention of the government to Canadian press cable despatches appearing in the press this afternoon to the effect that the crew of the cruiser 'Aboukir,' purchased by Canada, is being paid off to-day That would mean yesterday. The despatches further say that this cruiser will be thoroughly overhauled and transferred to Canada next spring. I wish to inquire if there is any foundation for these despatches.

Hon. J. D. HAZEN (Minister of Marine and Fisheries). I have no information whatever upon this subject. I will make inquiry and if I can ascertain anything about it I will let my hon. friend know later on in the afternoon. Perhaps he would send me the extract he refers to.

FISHERY TREATY WITH THE UNITED STATES.

Mr. MACLEAN (Halifax). I desire to ask the hon. Minister of Marine and Fisheries (Mr. Hazen) if there is any foundation for the statement which appeared in the 'Evening Journal' newspaper of Ottawa on Friday last, to the effect that the Minister of Marine and Fisheries was investigating one of the earlier fishery treaties entered into between Canada and the United States with the view of Canada's withdrawal from the treaty altogether. I desire to ask the Minister if there is any foundation for that report, and if so, what treaty is referred to?

Mr. SPEAKER. I beg to remind the hon. member, Mr. Maclean (Halifax) that these are questions that probably ought to be put on the Order Paper because they are not matters of great urgency. It is not, therefore, permissible to ask these questions without notice, and if notice were given it would afford the Minister a better opportunity of answering.

Mr. MACLEAN (Halifax). Of course, Mr. Speaker, I appreciate the fact that I can only ask this question with your permission and by the courtesy of the Minister. I think it is rather an important matter. Perhaps it may be very easily answered.

Mr. HAZEN. I may say for the information of my hon. friend that I would not have any objection to his asking me a question of that sort without the usual two day's notice, and I would be very happy to answer him, if I had any information to give to my hon. friend. I may say, however, that my attention has not been called to the paragraph to which my hon. friend refers, and without having seen that paragraph and having read it carefully I would not care, with regard to an important matter such as a question relating to a treaty, to make any off-hand statement to the House. I think my hon. friend will appreciate how careful one must be in making a statement with regard to a matter of that sort.

Mr. MACLEAN (Halifax). If there is any foundation for the report the Minister might be able to make a statement about it to-morrow, or at any convenient time.

ADDRESS IN REPLY TO THE SPEECH OF HIS ROYAL HIGHNESS.

House resumed the adjourned debate on the motion of Mr. Bennett: For an address to His Royal Highness the Governor General, in reply to his speech at the opening of the session, and the proposed amendment of Sir Wilfrid Laurier thereto.

Mr. A. E. FRIPP (Ottawa). Mr. Speaker, I had not any idea that I would have the privilege of addressing this House at such an early date, but I am thankful that I have been given the opportunity. I came into this House with certain expectations and I regret to say that so far they have been rather rudely shattered. There are some seventy-five new members of this House who are taking part in its proceedings for the first time in their lives and none of these new members could, I think, have come into this building, have walked through its corridors, have viewed the portraits of the fathers of confederation, and have remembered that here sat those men who gave the best part of their lives to their country, without being impressed, without having some feeling of awe and reverence for this building and for this chamber.

No student of political history in this Dominion can have read the early debates in this House of Commons without coming to the same conclusion. When we remember that Sir John Macdonald, Sir George E. Cartier, Sir Alexander Campbell, Sir Charles Tupper, and other fathers of confederation were at the helm, we can realize in what competent hands was the difficult task of bringing the scattered portions of this great Dominion into one confederation. When we note the high tone that characterizes every line of the speeches of these great men, I am prone to confess that it appears to me that the debate in this House so far this session has fallen to a much lower level, and that we have departed from the high and dignified and broad-minded way in which the early statesmen of this country debated and considered and gave the best that was in them to the development of this Dominion. Might I refer to what struck me at the time as being the rather unkindly remarks that were made by the right hon. leader of the opposition in reference to the selection of you, Sir, as the first Commoner of Canada? I am one of those who always have had a high opinion of the right hon. gentleman. His commanding figure and his personality in the city of Ottawa during the last fifteen years have made him beloved by all classes of the people no matter what their political leanings, and I am rather surprised that he should take occasion, in a rather sarcastic way, to belittle the selection of you, Sir, for the high office you dignify. That speech was followed by others which I have had the honour to listen to or to read. I specially noted the speech delivered by the hon. member for Rouville (Mr. Lemieux), a gentleman who has held a very high position in the councils of this country, and who has been fortunate above other ministers in visiting foreign lands and representing Canada. On these occasions and especially recently in South Africa, he struck a high note of Imperialism which made each one of us who is an Imperialist feel glad that we had such a strong man in our ranks. But, Sir, his recent speech in this House astonished me. Three-fourths of it was taken up by reading extracts from newspapers published in the province of Quebec and extracts from speeches delivered by the Minister of Public Works. Well, I venture to think that the people of this country from the Atlantic to the Pacific do not care one iota whether the Minister of Public Works is a Nationalist or whether he is not.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

Mr. FRIPP. My hon. friends to the left of Mr. Speaker may laugh, but I venture to think that my statement is perfectly correct. What does the man in the street care now as to what position these gentlemen took in the province of Quebec? We had to meet that cry in the province of Ontario; we heard the Liberals denounce the unholy alliance as they called it between Bourassa and Borden, but the people of Ontario paid no attention to that. Sir, the people of Ontario, and I believe the people of Quebec as well, are sick and tired of this sectionalism and provincial-

ism. I have had the honour to mix among the French Canadian people in the city of Ottawa; I have the honour now to represent thirty or forty thousand of them in this House and I know the French Canadian people do not approve of such tactics. They are as anxious as we are to upbuild Canada as one united country, and I believe Sir, it is a vicious principle for the hon. gentleman for Rouville and others of his political friends, to attempt to erect a sort of Chinese wall around the province of Quebec, to attempt to isolate and separate that province from the rest of Canada, and to attempt to promulgate within that province small sectional ideas. That, Sir, is conduct which does not redound to their credit and which, I believe, does not meet with the approval of the large bulk of the people of Quebec, or of Ontario either. If these hon. gentlemen imitate the fathers of confederation they will not be found attempting to isolate one province from the others, they will not be found advocating and defending the rights and privileges of one particular province, but they will be found advocating what is best for all provinces and all races in this Dominion. I believe that the citizen of Quebec has as much interest in the affairs of British Columbia as he has in the affairs of his own province, and I believe he will demonstrate that interest if he is not kept in a state of turbulent feeling all the time by pretended champions of the rights and privileges of a particular section of the people of Canada. Sir, if the plane of statesmanship is not elevated higher than that; if the member who represents Ontario is to speak only for Ontario and the Quebec member only for Quebec, Canada will never attain that high rank which she deserves to attain in this British Empire.

I do not pretend, Sir, to discuss the question that has occupied so much of our time in this debate; I cannot understand why, but I would like to be enlightened as a new member, as to why it should be necessary to rehearse all the talk of the last election about reciprocity. Do hon. gentlemen of the opposition think that the people of Canada are now concerned in what has passed; do they not know that the people of this country are principally concerned with the fact that Mr. Borden is at the head of the State, and that he has surrounded himself with ministers from the different provinces who are ready and willing to discharge their duties in the best interests of the whole Dominion? In view of what happened on the 21st September, I should have thought that the right hon. leader of the opposition would have taken the first opportunity to rise in his place and say: Thank God the people of this country had sense enough to keep any foreign country from interfering in our affairs. In view of the verdict of the people I should have thought he would rise and say: What a blessing it is that when we were in power last year we did not force upon the people of this country this reciprocity pact without giving them an opportunity of saying yes or no to it. But, Sir, what has happened is that many of the speeches delivered in this House are simply campaign speeches delivered with some object which, so far, I have been unable to discover.

So far as the people of this country are concerned, reciprocity is a dead issue and likely to remain so. We have been told by one hon. gentleman on the opposition benches that the speech from the Throne was, as he called it, a flat bill of fare and contained no matter of importance. Well, that does not seem to me a very high parliamentary term to use in describing the address from the Throne. It may be an unpalatable bill of fare for the hon. gentleman, but it has within it sufficient meat for the careful consideration of the best brains in this House within the next month or two.

I would have expected that hon. gentlemen on both sides of the House would congratulate the Dominion of Canada for having as its Governor General His Royal Highness the Duke of Connaught. The appointment of His Royal Highness singles us out as the chief colony of this great British Empire. It is a mark of special favour to the Dominion of Canada that we should have as our Governor General the beloved uncle of our beloved Sovereign, his adviser and friend, a man of large experience and great wisdom. I say, Sir, that the sending of the Duke of Connaught to preside over our government is an acknowledgment by our Sovereign that after Great Britain herself, Canada is nearest to his heart. And it seems to me most fitting and proper that this event should have occurred when the people of Canada demonstrated, with no uncertain sound, on the 21st of September last, that they desired this country to remain connected with the British Empire and build up that empire with Canada as an important integral part. These, Sir, are some of the thoughts which have come to me during this debate. Let me say, before I conclude, if one new member may congratulate another, that I was delighted to hear the speech of the hon. member for Medicine Hat (Mr. Buchanan), and to know through him that the people of the Northwest recognize that their interests are bound up with those of the people of Eastern Canada and are willing to work with them for the upbuilding of this young nation. We heard during the last campaign that there was some work to be done to keep the east and the west in harmony, but I trust, Sir, that the statement of the hon. member (Mr. Buchanan), will always be true as it is to-day, and that the east and west will go hand in hand towards building up the prosperity of Canada. I have had the honour during the past three and-a-half years to sit in two parliaments, if one may term the legislature of Ontario a parliament, and I can tell the hon. members of this House that if they want to see a business-like administration and public affairs conducted in a businesslike way and with despatch, they should keep their eyes on the legislature of Ontario and the government of Sir James Whitney. And I would add that the leader of the opposition in that House, during the time I had the honour to be there, vied with Sir James Whitney in giving the closest attention to public matters, with the result, I venture to say, that more good legislation has been introduced, thoroughly considered and passed by the Ontario legislature during the past 12 years than has passed through this House during the past 10 or 15 years. We have no 'Hansard' in the Ontario legislature, and as at present advised, I would be inclined to do away with 'Hansard' in this House as a preventive of long speeches. There are no long speeches in the Ontario legislature. In fact, outside of the statements of the leaders, there are few speeches by members of the House. The members of the House give their close attention to the different measures submitted in the committees, so that when these measures come to the legislature they require very little extra discussion. I do hope, for my own sake as well as the sake of other members of the House who come from far distances, that the length of the sessions of this parliament will be so arranged that they will not as in the past, occupy six or seven months. I am satisfied that by the application of businesslike methods all our legislation can be dealt with in three or four months.

I desire to add my hope that in the debates and in the work we have to do in this country, we shall have heard for the last time the cry of provincialism and that we shall use our endeavours to legislate for the people as a whole. We have many subjects to discuss, we have many important questions to deal with, and I do hope and trust that in all our legislative work we shall bear in mind that we are legislating for the whole Dominion and not for any particular section of it, and that the rights and privileges of all sections and communities will be safeguarded in any measure we may decide to adopt.

Hon. H. R. EMMERSON (Westmoreland). The hon. gentleman who has just taken his seat (Mr. Fripp), has apparently come to this House with a mission, and judging from the tenor of his remarks I can only conclude that my hon. friend has become a sort of fanatic in a religious way, because during the greater portion of his speech he seemed to be entirely worshipping himself. When we find him, as a new member, attempting to tell the other members of this House what their duty is, it seems to me that he would have done better to have sat in his seat a little while longer before attempting to lecture the House in the way he did. I observe a disposition on the part of many hon. gentlemen opposite to deprecate any further discussion with respect to the issues which have been raised before this House and which have been occupying our attention for the past week or more. If my hon. friend from Ottawa (Mr. Fripp), had been in this House during the last parliament, there might have been some occasion for the lecture he has seen fit to give us, because he would have found much food for thought had he given his attention to the long dissertations and discussion which took place during the last session of the last parliament. The desire to cut short this debate, which is so apparent on the part of hon. members opposite, is no doubt well founded. No doubt they are anxious that the means by which the change was brought about in the personnel of the government should not be exposed to the people.

I have no doubt that the hon. members who so desire to cut short the debate are anxious that there should be hidden from the people of Canada the means and the methods whereby a change of government has been brought about in Canada. Mr. Speaker, changes of government are not very serious matters, but there are questions the determination of which are of greater gravity, and if hon. members on the opposite side are desirous of closing the debate and of preventing the country from receiving knowledge as to the course which has been pursued by hon. members during the recent campaign, I for one feel that it is my duty, as the representative of the county which I have the honour to represent, to place before this House somewhat as to the course which was pursued during the campaign. We have heard from hon. members, notably the hon. member for West Peterborough (Mr. Burnham) as to the course that was pursued in the great province of Ontario. In every campaign there are necessarily issues raised that are not pertinent nor relevant, but I am sure that the people of this country are interested in knowing whether those issues are raised for a purpose, or whether they are merely incidental. I am sure that the people of this country are interested in knowing whether there has been deceit and misrepresentation knowingly and premeditated. I think the people of this country, while willing to condone and even forgive any small or minor issues which may be raised in any campaign, are certainly not disposed to forgive, but are disposed to resent, any attempt to mislead the electorate on matters which are not issues and which men would be ashamed to speak of in the open.

In the county which I have the honour to represent, and I am bound to say that it is inhabited by an intelligent people, presumably the great issue was that of reciprocity. I assumed from the very outset of the campaign that that was the issue. I assumed, moreover, and I stated from every platform, that it was merely a plebiscite on the question of freer trade relations with the United States, and to all appearances that was the issue that was being fought. But I found, as a result of inquiry at the close of the campaign, that there were underground organizations; and, indeed, I have it on the authority of the gentleman who opposed me in the election, the candidate of the Conservative party, in a statement which he made in a public address in the city of Moncton, that not only did this underground organization exist, but that he was so desirous of keeping it in existence that he urged his supporters to see that it should be kept alive in order that it might do future service in the interest of the Conservative party. If that election had been determined on the question of reciprocity, I certainly would have been content. I was not concerned at the loss of power. I would not have been concerned even if I had gone down to defeat on the question of reciprocity. But, Sir, I do think, in regard to the issues which were raised, that it is in the interest of the people of Canada that they should be exposed and be known from ocean to ocean. Reciprocity was a great issue, a transcendent issue, an issue on which any government might go down to defeat with honour. But that the former government went down on that question, so far as eastern Canada is concerned, I deny, and I think I shall be in a position to prove that denial conclusively. In the county of Westmoreland, there were two underground issues raised: one was the Eucharistic Congress and the other was the Ne Temere decree. I did not meet these questions on the public platform; but as I travelled through the county I learned that the emissaries of the Conservative party had been ahead of me. In some sections of the county there was hardly a man who could not tell me about every incident connected with that Eucharistic Congress held in Montreal over a year ago. The people were told that that congress was convened because of a French Catholic Prime Minister and in the interest of the Romish Church. It was also alleged that the Ne Temere decree arose out of legislation that had been initiated by the right hon. Sir Wilfrid Laurier as leader of the government. I had been told in many instances of every detail. It was alleged that your predecessor in office, Mr. Speaker, attended that congress in the city of Montreal in his robes of office, and that the Prime Minister, Sir Wilfrid Laurier, was in the procession. Every detail was talked of—the utterances of those who were present, the statement that one delegate at that congress had stated that Montreal should be made the Rome of Canada, and so forth. I am a fairly constant reader of the newspapers, but I never learned in any of my readings or from any other source, the details of that congress. But, Sir, it was not alone with respect to that phase that I had a right to complain. I learned that there were in that county a band of Nationalists, that they had converted a French Acadian newspaper, 'Le Moniteur,' into a Nationalist paper, and that it quoted in each issue from 'Le Devoir' in a way to excite the French Acadian electors of the county of Westmoreland against Sir Wilfrid Laurier. I am bound to say, however, that this attempt did not make very great progress among the French Acadians. I am bound to say they were true to themselves and true to their faith, and were not carried away by any such appeals as were brought to their attention in every issue of that paper.

The issue of reciprocity, as it was joined in this discussion, and as it was set forth in the resolution before the House in the last session of the last parliament, involved, in my judgment, two very pertinent questions, and it is my purpose to devote most of my time in the remarks I shall make to these questions. I hold that the resolutions which were tabled by the hon. Mr. Fielding in the last session of the last parliament raised these two questions, and the campaign throughout the country until the 21st September confirmed them. The first question was the effect of freer trade relations between the young nation occupying the northern half of this continent, and the great republic lying immediately to the south. The second was the results which might possibly accrue to the great empire of which we are an autonomous unit by reason of such trade convention. And, there has been developed since the election in September, and especially during the debates in this House, a third question, that is the duties and responsibility of a party forming a government to the people whose affairs that government is called upon to administer. For the sake of convenience I will comment first upon the third question reversing the order in which I have stated them.

I have already mentioned the means whereby the election was carried in many of the constituencies in the province of New Brunswick. I have mentioned the means used in the attempt to wrest the county of Westmoreland from its old associations and place it in the Conservative fold. But these are matters that relate to the individual as such and not to individuals collectively and in the aggregate. There were, it is true, involved in the campaign two very great questions to which I have not at the moment referred. One was the appeal to the cowardice ot the French Canadians with respect to the naval policy. And hon. gentlemen opposite, in appealing to cowardice of the French race were insulting the French Canadians, for they are not a cowardly race, certainly so far as I have come in contact with them. But there was as well an appeal to the cowardice of the English provinces with respect to annexation and the severance of British ties. That appeal was made unblushingly. It was stated that if we should enter into an economic pact with the people of the United States, our connection with Great Britain perforce would be severed, and we should irresistibly be drawn into the whirlpool of annexation; that we should have no control over the conditions prevailing in this country but should be helpless—and should be so much Americanized, possibly some may have thought, that we should be compelled to speak with a nasal twang. These appeals did not, and do not do credit to the Conservative party. And I think that the exposure that is being made with respect to these appeals may well be left to the consideration of the people who will apply the remedy in their own good time. To say that it was a cowardly appeal to the people of Canada is not an extravagant statement. They planted in the minds of the timid ones the idea that reciprocity and freer trade relations with the people of the United States meant annexation, meant the furling of the British flag and the hoisting in its place of the Stars and Stripes. There were many timid ones, I venture to say, throughout the length and breadth of Canada who had that idea planted in their minds. This in conjunction with these appeals to passion and prejudices wrought havoc, they took the people from the seat of judgment and constrained them to act upon impulse and without regard to reason. I think that those who made that appeal to a fear of the danger alleged to be incident to trade with the people of the United States paid, but a very poor compliment to the people of Canada. They forgot, Sir, the history of Canada within the last hundred years. They forgot the conditions which prevailed during the war of 1812. They forgot the sturdy charcter of the people of the north, their stamina and their force of character. Bliss Carmen, a New Brunswick poet, has aptly described the conditions which prevail and have prevailed in Canada, and I cannot do better than read to the House that pretty little poem of his, 'The Song of the Four Worlds.' In that poem he says:

> Is it northward, little friend?
> And she whispered, 'What is there?'
> There are people who are loyal to the glory of the past,
> Who held by heart's traditions, and will hold it to the last:
> Who would not sell in shame
> The honour of their name,
> Though the world were in the balance and a sword thereon were cast.

I think that aptly and beautifully expresses the sentiments of the loyalists who first settled in our province of New Brunswick. Aye, and it expresses the sentiments of the sturdy Scotch, Irish and French who came to join these loyalists in the pioneer work of the building up and peopling our province. And what is true of New Brunswick, I am sure, is true of the other provinces regardless of situation or name. I hold that the appeals which were made in the direction of implanting fear in the hearts of the people were an insult offered to the people of Canada.

But Mr. Speaker, we are concerned particularly at this moment, not with the individual appeals which were made during the election campaign, but with the aggregation in the form of a government which has resulted from those appeals. Now, I will speak in no personal sense, nor in any sense disrespectful to any of the hon. members who sit in that cabinet, all very worthy men and men whom I hold so far as I know them in the highest respect. But the people of this country are concerned with them not as individuals but as a combination entrusted for the time being with the destiny of Canada. I had some idea, because of my reading, of the difficulties which beset the Prime Minister when he was entrusted with the duty and responsibility of selecting a cabinet. I appreciate to the full all the annoyances and irritations that he must have experienced in finding gentlemen to occupy positions in his cabinet; I appreciate to the full also the measure of success which has attended the efforts of my hon. friend, the leader of the government, in making the selection which he did. I have no personal quarrel with any member of that government. I am glad that my hon. friend was able, in the first instance, to get together an aggregation of millionaires, the like of which cannot be found anywhere in Canada. I suppose that the result was due to the fact that the campaign just closed was one between the classes and the masses, and if the classes have succeeded, it is in the natural order of events that the representatives of those classes should sit on the treasury benches in this House. Let me deal just now with a question of fact and not with a question of law. My hon. friend the Minister of Public Works raised a legal point with respect to the amendment moved by the right hon. the leader of the opposition. I certainly must congratulate the leader of the government in the selection of the Finance Minister. I think I voice the sentiments of every one when I say that the leader of the government, because of his experience as a Liberal in former days, knew where to turn when he wanted a reliable, able, clever finance minister who could be depended upon. He did not seek one from those who came to him in such large numbers from among his own friends in the province of Ontario; he did not look even to his own native province of Nova Scotia, nor to the adjoining province of New Brunswick. My hon. friend the leader of the government having knowledge did not even select the gentleman who had had experience already as Finance Minister of Canada and who sits at his right in this House. He looked to none of these provinces, nor to his friends in any of these provinces, but he went to the province of Ontario, where the trusts do abound, and he selected a good Liberal, I believe, up to within a few months ago, and I have great pleasure in congratulating the leader of the government in making such an excellent selection.

I was much interested, Mr. Speaker, in the explanations offered to this House by the Minister of Public Works the other evening as to why it was that he appeared as the first lieutenant of the leader of the government. It appears that my hon. friend the Minister of Public Works and the hon. the leader of the government were former lovers, that something came between them, the wooing that had been going on year after year was, for some reason, suddenly brought to an end. It seems that that separation, that coldness, continued down to the 21st of September, and after that date the wooing was renewed. We were not told who initiated the wooing, whether it was my hon. friend the leader of the government or the Minister of Public Works. But the fact remains that those old lovers came together again, the romance was ended, and they joined hands and heart on the treasury benches of Canada. It is creditable to them that they could come together after all these years of coldness and separation. One would almost imagine that their case was like what sometimes happens in real life, where lovers had been parted. 'I have forgotten her face, and she has forgotten my name.' That apparently was not the case, and my hon. friends, remembering each other's names and faces, came together again, and there they sit in the same government, having apparently forgiven and forgotten all.

Now Sir, it must seem strange, I should think, to the hon. members of this House who sat in the last parliament to see such a combination; it must seem strange to the people of Canada that this has occurred after the appeals that were made in the different provinces, after the endeavour to array the people against each other, made by the hon. gentlemen opposite; it must seem strange indeed to the people of Canada that there should now be that unanimity of heart and spirit which hon. gentlemen would have us believe exists to-day. The point has been raised, Mr. Speaker, that the amendment offered by my right hon. friend was not constitutional. I have been at some pains to study the authorities with reference to that point, and I find it is laid down very clearly, beyond all peradventure, first in Morley's Walpole; it is to be found in Anson's Law and Customs of the Constitution, and in Michael McConnell's work on parliament.

In fact, in every constitutional work relating to parliamentary government it is laid down, in the first place, that there are four features to our system of government to-day. The first is the doctrine of collective responsibility, the second, mark you, is that the government is answerable immediately to the majority of the House of Commons and ultimately to the electors whose will creates that majority. The third is that the cabinet is, except under uncommon, peculiar and transitory circumstances, selected exclusively from one party. Of course, there are the exceptions in cases of coalitions. Coalitions are usually only the preliminary of fusion. A coalition is where men of different parties and owing allegiance to different political organizations come together for the common good, to work out, in the interest of the people, some proposition and means for the good of the whole people. We have had instances of that kind in Canada, notably where, at the dawn of confederation, those who represented the Conservative or Tory party, those who represented the Reform or Liberal party, joined hand in hand for the purpose of accomplishing the confederation of the British North American provinces. Whether this government is a coalition government or simply a banding together of different individuals who have not seen eye to eye with respect to great and important questions, I cannot say. We have not been favoured with an explanation in respect to that matter. But, there is one, the fourth feature of our system of parliamentary government, which I wish to emphasize to the House and to the country. The fourth is that the Prime Minister is the keystone of the cabinet arch. But, there is an important qualification of the Prime Minister's power and that exists with respect to the Crown. Here it is well understood that the Sovereign has the right to demand the opinion of the cabinet and is a court of appeal against the Prime Minister or any other minister. That was evidenced in the foreign crisis which occurred in Great Britain in 1859-61. I admit, Mr. Speaker, that the Prime Minister entrusted with the duty and responsibility of selecting a cabinet, has large powers of discretion. I admit that, having made that selection, he is bound to submit to the Sovereign or the representative of the Sovereign, the names of those whom he has just selected, but, Sir, I hold as well that he is bound to tell the Sovereign or the representative of the Sovereign if there is any divergence of views upon any of the vital questions which affect the government of the country. It seems to me that where, as was stated by Disraeli in his day, party is organized opinion, it is due to the sovereign power, or the representative of the Sovereign, that there shall be an explanation made to him and repeated to the House of Commons, because the people have rights in this matter as well as the Crown, as to whether there are differences of opinion and as to how and in what manner those differences of opinion may be fused or coalesced so that the country and the Crown will know just the position in which the government stands upon matters vital to the public welfare, vital, indeed, to the future of the country.

It seems to me that we stand here to-day without that knowledge. When it is proposed in an amendment submitted to this House to inform the representative of the Sovereign that there are men in the cabinet who are divided in opinion with respect to questions affecting the public interest and the public welfare, it seems to me to be the duty of parliament to call the attention of the sovereign power to the conditions which prevail.

Bagehot, in his work on 'The English Constitution,' referring to the position of the cabinet, says that what is mostly needed is the manly utterance of clear conclusions. Mr. Speaker, in 1909 there was a question brought before this parliament which was at the time represented to be of paramount importance not merely to this Canadian confederation but to the empire of which we form a part. That question was discussed at great length, and it has from that moment down to the present been discussed in parliament and out of parliament. The public press of the country have commented upon it, have made representations, have made suggestions and every public man throughout the land, in explaining to his constituents the course which he has taken in parliament, has felt constrained to animadvert upon that question—the question of the naval policy—which was so vividly and emphatically brought to the notice of parliament in 1909 by the then hon. member for North Toronto, the hon. the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Foster). I do not wish to use any offensive terms, but in order to be emphatic I feel constrained to say that men who have come together in hodge-podge fashion are face to face with the ultimate question that must arise between them. It was put in graphic language by Mr. Carlyle in this way: 'Can I kill thee, or canst thou kill me?' It seems to me that that is the position in which the leader of the government, the Minister of Public Works and those who sit by their side are placed in the matter, figuratively speaking, by the association of ideas. The question between these two hon. gentlemen must be, and the people of the country will repeat the question: Can I kill thee or canst thou kill me? Indeed, there must have been some killing done already. I do not know who it was that was slaughtered or maimed or wounded, but apparently since the 21st of September there has been some slaughtering. The question as to whether we should have a navy or as to whether we shall make contributions in Dreadnoughts, or in large sums of money, or whether we shall have no navy at all are vital to the future of Canada and vital even, Sir, to the future of this government. The people of Canada are not going to sit idly by and be content with but one answer.

The Minister of Public Works, for whom I have the greatest personal respect, fell far short of my ideal when he attempted to ignore the remarks of the hon. member for Rouville (Mr. Lemieux) by the statement: 'We are here, and you are there.' Apparently that is the crux of the whole situation, apparently that is the aim of the agitation that has been going on in Canada for two or three years back.

Mr. MONK. My hon. friend must remember that was a quotation. I quoted something that had been said previously.

Mr. EMMERSON. I would have preferred to have had something original from my hon. friend; something that would have given us an insight into his inner conscience, but by using it as a quotation my hon. friend adopted it as his own, and apparently there is no other reason to be given for this coming together of the present cabinet. There is only the inference that they were brought together for the common purpose of: 'Being there while we are here.' I do not think that is an ideal way in which to explain the position of public men who are supposed to stand together within the cabinet on vital questions respecting the country. I do not think the Minister of Public Works did himself credit. I would have been prouder of him had he taken the House into his confidence. It is due to the people of Canada and this parliament that there should be some exposé of the circumstances under which the Minister of Public Works accepted office as the leader of one party with the Prime Minister who is the leader of another party. It is laid down as authority that the men with whom the Prime Minister associates himself as his ministers have probably been engaged in actual political co-operation with him before, although from time to time he may seek additional strength in fresh alliances. The leader of the government had certainly the right to invite Mr. Monk to his cabinet, and personally I am glad he did, but from the standpoint of principle, and from the standpoint of constitutional government the people have a right to know in what manner their divergent views were unified. Michael McDonough, in his work on Parliament, page 151, says:

The Prime Minister, who like the body of which he is the head, is in turn not unfettered in the choice of his colleagues in the administration. He is obliged to select them from among the more able or rather the most prominent members of his party.

It is not always easy for a Prime Minister to select the most able men; there are conditions which make it necessary to make a choice from another standpoint; he is met with alliances; there are connected with the party, members of a former administration, and these men look for an invitation to take a seat in the ministry. I know it must be very annoying to those who have been offered an inferior post in a cabinet when in a former administration they occupied a higher position, and that is a difficulty a Prime Minister must meet, and it is one of the irritations which arise in connection with the formation of a ministry. It is none of my business personally as to what views the Prime Minister may have as to the standing of this man and that man, but it is my business in common with every elector of this country to know the common platform upon which men of admittedly divergent views on vital questions unite. Lord Melbourne on one occasion in connection with a condition similar to that we are now discussing said, speaking of his ministry: 'It it not much matter what, we say, but mind we must all say the same.' That expresses in a nutshell the requirements from a cabinet under our constitutional system. These principles are enunciated by every authority on constitutional government. A constitutional axiom seems to be:

Governments must consist of persons of the same way of thinking in politics, and that way in accordance to the opinion for the time of the majority in the House of Commons.

I wonder whether this government has been brought together in accordance with the opinion of the majority for the time being in the House of Commons, and in wondering that, I am compelled to wonder also which wing of the government is in accord with the opinion for the time being of the majority in the House of Commons. Do those who sit before me as loyal supporters of the Conservative party deem themselves in accord with the views expressed by the Minister of Public Works? If not, are they in accord with the views which have been enunciated by the leader of the government? We cannot compel the ministers to answer these questions, but it does seem to me that the House is entitled to an answer, and that the country is expecting an answer, and an explanation They tell us they have had no time to make up their minds, no time to formulate a policy, no time to explain to the people of Canada just where they stand on that vital question, but during the sessions of the last parliament they had already made up their minds, and they went before the people of the country on their declared policy.

Whether they have completed the details or not, there must be some principle which must guide them, there must be some consensus of opinion on their part. We are not particularly concerned with matters of detail, but we have the right to ask or demand an answer from those who speak for the government on a matter of such vital interest to the people of Canada. Above governments, above Prime Ministers, there is the omnipotence of parliament. The First Minister, although entrusted with the authority to frame a cabinet, is not above the Crown, and much less is he above the omnipotence of parliament. From the standpoint of those who represent the sovereign people of Canada, these men who form the cabinet should explain to the country the position in which they stand with regard to that naval policy, with regard to the course we are to pursue in connection with the defence of the empire, in connection with the defence of our own shores, and the protection of our own commerce. But singular to relate there is no mention in the speech from the Throne regarding this question. That is a very strange omission, but it is no doubt due to the fact that there is really no coalescence in this coalition government, and that the members of the cabinet have not reached a consensus of opinion. But in view of that omission in the speech from the Throne, we ought to have a declaration from the First Minister on this subject.

True, the government have not had very much time in which to formulate policies. Certainly they have not had time to branch out into new highways and byways; but in view of the past history of this country within the last two years, they certainly should be in a position to immediately place before the country a statement regarding the policy which has been threshed out in this House and was referred to by them in the election campaign that wafted those gentlemen into the position of cabinet ministers. I have wondered how it is there is no mention in the speech from the Throne regarding the acquisition of branch lines over the Intercolonial. That is a subject which was brought before this House time and again during the last parliament and also in a previous parliament. It is a subject which has received the attention of members of parliament, and the people throughout the country. It is a subject which the newspapers of the country have repeatedly and constantly been commenting upon. It is a subject of vital importance and interest to the people of eastern Canada. The people of eastern Canada are not concerned with the deepening of the Welland canal and the St. Lawrence waterways and the Lachine and Soulanges, and other canals along the St. Lawrence, but they are concerned, materially, sentimentally and in every way, with the question as to the course this government proposes to take for the expansion of the Intercolonial, and for the purpose of affording to the people of eastern Canada those railway facilities for which they long have sought, and for which they have mourned because they found them not. That question was before parliament last session. It was then discussed by the then leader of the opposition (Mr. Borden) who is now leading the government. It was discussed during the last campaign in the constituency I have the honour to represent. In the neighbouring constituencies, in Nova Scotia, my hon. friend the leader of the government took such a deep interest in it that he found it necessary to send a telegram to Charlottetown, when campaigning in Prince Edward Island, to the people of New Brunswick assuring them that his party, if returned to power, would take steps to acquire branch lines for the Intercolonial, and thus afford to the Intercolonial advantages it could not have without the assistance of those branch lines. I had hoped that on that question of securing of branch lines, which had been approved by the outgoing government, and resolutions relating to which had been discussed and adopted by this House—I had hoped that it would not take months and years for this government to formulate a policy regarding these branch lines especially as it was the declared policy of the leader of the government (Mr. Borden) to acquire them.

I have no comment to make with respect to the construction of a highway from ocean to ocean. I know nothing of the details, and shall not speak on that matter at this stage.

As regards the division of portfolios the people of Canada are not materially concerned, they are not agonizing for information as to what action is to be taken with respect to the Department of External Affairs, or some other department, but they are interested in the transportation question, they are interested in matters which affect them vitally, which affect them in their homes and communities, and they have a right to ask what is going to be the course of the government with regard to the development of communities which will necessarily and naturally be served by these branch lines, particularly should these lines become a part of the government railway system. Again, the people are somewhat concerned regarding the continuance of the Intercolonial as a government road, constructed by the government, as contemplated by the British North America Act. We ought to be enlightened in this connection, especially in view of the frequent mention made in the press of the possible transfer of this railway. I should be glad, indeed, if the unrest on this point should be quieted, and the people assured that the Intercolonial will continue as a government railway, and that these branch lines will form part of it.

I would not wish to leave this subject without making some further reference to the manner in which the members of this government have come together. I have said that some one has made a sacrifice, or, if there has been no sacrifice already made, that the preliminaries to a sacrifice have been taken and somebody apparently has abrogated his principles. I am reminded of the saying of Hosea Bigelow:

> A marciful Providence fashioned us holler
> On purpose that we might our principles swaller.

I do not know who it is who is going to be called upon to swallow his principles, but if any one is called upon to do so it must be a matter of gratitude on his part that he was thus fashioned hollow in order that he could swallow them.

I have mentioned that there were two main questions involved in the issue which was raised before the people of this country arising out of the resolutions which were moved by Mr. Fielding at the last session of the preceding parliament, and that one was with respect to the effect of the reciprocity pact upon Canada. The other was with respect to the results that might accrue to the British Empire from such a convention of trade between the United States and Canada. We have heard much, in this House and out of it, with respect to that trade agreement. It has been spoken of as if it were a new thing, something that had been born in a night and had been first brought to the attention of the people of Canada in the previous parliament. Why, Sir, I am reminded that the question of reciprocal trade relations between Canada and the United States had its origin previous to confederation—indeed, in the discussion of the confederation question. I remember that in the year 1867 I was but a boy going to school, and it was my privilege, during the first general election held in Canada for the Dominion parliament, to listen to those two gladiators in debate, Howe and Tupper, discussing the question of confederation. I can see them even now in the manner of their presentation of their respective views. That was during July or August, a year after the abrogation of the Lord Elgin treaty, which had been in operation in the British North America provinces from 1854 to 1866. I remember distinctly the arguments which were advanced by the then Dr. Tupper, now Sir Charles Tupper, in behalf of the confederation scheme. The reciprocity treaty had had a marked effect, and the people of the maritime provinces were alive to the benefits which had accrued to them from it. Sir Charles Tupper was appealing to the people of Cumberland county to support the confederation pact, and one of his strongest arguments was that by reason of a confederated union of the four provinces of Canada, there would be a greater leverage upon the people of the United States to secure a renewal of that treaty. It is within the knowledge of hon members of this House that immediately after the abrogation of the treaty Joseph Howe carried on a campaign in the northern states in favour of a renewal of it. It is within the knowledge of those familiar with the political history of this country that Sir John A. Macdonald and all the other great public men of Canada were assuring the people of Canada that they would seek a renewal of that treaty, and Sir Charles Tupper, in assuring the people of Cumberland that confederation would be a means to an end, and that end a renewal of the reciprocity treaty, used a powerful and a potent argument, so powerful and potent that the Hon. Joseph Howe, who was the anti-confederation advocate, was staggered at the effect of it, and he had no adequate answer to make, with the result that the people of Cumberland returned Sir Charles Tupper as their first representative to the parliament of Canada, with the hope and the assurance that reciprocity would be the result of the confederation. Sir Charles Tupper was certainly true to his word with respect to the efforts he would put forth to that end, because I find in the first tariff that we ever had in the Dominion of Canada, a clause which reads as follows:

Any or all of the articles mentioned in Schedule D, when the growth and produce of the United States of America, may be imported into Canada from the said United States free of duty or at a less rate of duty than is provided in the said schedule, upon proclamation of the Governor in Council, whenever the United States shall provide for the importation of similar articles from Canada into the country free of duty or at a less rate of duty than is now imposed on the importation from Canada of such articles into the United States.

Now, what were these articles mentioned in schedule (D) ?

Schedule D.

The following goods when the growth and produce of any of the British North American provinces may be imported free of duty, viz.:

Grain, flour and breadstuffs of all kinds.
Animals of all kinds.
Fresh,smoked and salted meats.
Seeds.
Green and dried fruits.
Fish of all kinds.
Products of fish and of all other creatures living in water.
Poultry.
Butter.
Cheese.
Tallow,
Timber and lumber of all kinds, round, hewed, sawed, but not otherwise manufactured in whole or in part.
Fish oil.
Gypsum, ground or unground.

There, Sir, is a reversal of the situation. During the last campaign which was carried on in this country there stood on the statutes of the United States a proposal similar to this, a proposal under which they would admit free of duty into the United States all the articles I have mentioned and others, and under which there should be a proportionate reduction of duties with respect to other articles. They had that on their statute-book as we had it on ours in 1868. They were awaiting an answer of the people of Canada as we in 1868 awaited an answer from them.

In 1879, a new tariff policy was to be formulated in Canada. A readjustment of the tariff was made which proved to be an increase of the tariff. And as a palliative of these increases of taxation upon the people of Canada, it was proposed by the national tariff of Canada:

Any or all of the following articles, that is to say: animals of all kinds, green fruit, hay, straw, bran, seeds of all kinds, vegetables (including potatoes and other roots), plants, trees, and shrubs, coal and coke, salt, hops, wheat, peas and beans, barley, rye, oats, Indian corn, buckwheat and all other grain, flour of wheat and flour of rye, Indian meal and oatmeal, and flour or meal of all other grain, butter, cheese, fish (salted or smoked), lard, tallow, meats (fresh, salted or smoked), and lumber, may be imported into Canada free of duty, or at a less rate of duty than is provided by this Act, upon proclamation of the Governor in Council, which may be issued whenever it appears to his satisfaction that similar articles from Canada may be imported into the United States free of duty, or at a rate of duty not exceeding that payable on the same under such proclamation when imported into Canada.

There was a renewal to the offer of reciprocity to the people of the United States. That tariff was formulated by the Conservative government headed by Sir John Macdonald whose Finance Minister was Sir Leonard Tilley. Why, Sir, in 1878, Sir Charles Tupper, when, on behalf of his leader Sir John Macdonald he came to the maritime provinces to urge the people to vote for the so-called National Policy, sought to convince them that high taxation carried with it the hope, and indeed the assurance, that the United States would immediately sue for reciprocity, and so the high tariff would be simply the means to an end, that end being the securing of a lower tariff with the people of the United States. That was the hope and aspiration of the people, in many instances, I am sure, in voting in favour of the National Policy. The hope was that reciprocity, which has been the foundation, aye, indeed the corner stone, of every tariff that has ever been made by the parliament of Canada would follow. Indeed every economic problem in Canada has been gauged by the hope and aspiration of the people to secure better and reciprocal trade relations with the people of the United States. And such an appeal was certainly a powerful one to the people of the maritime provinces. In those days they had not forgotten the splendid effects of the Lord Elgin treaty of 1854. Every farmer, every fisherman, every stonecutter, every ship carpenter, every worker whatever his employment, was cognizant of the fact that throughout that period of twelve years there had been nothing but prosperity, contentment and hope among the people of the British provinces by the sea. These halcyon times had been preceded by dark days, the days from 1849 to 1853, when annexation manifestos were issued in the city of St. John, when public men of the province of New Brunswick met together and formulated resolutions in favour of annexation with the express desire of cutting the connection with Great Britain and launching out for ourselves, hoping that as a province we should be enabled to have free trade relations with the people of the United States. It must be borne in mind that the abrogation of the reciprocity treaty of 1854 arose out of the irritation that existed between Great Britain and the United States as a result of the civil war. It must not be overlooked that that irritation caused Canada a setback which she struggled against for years. It would be interesting to know just what were the effects of that treaty whose term of existence was from 1854 to 1866. It is true that the statistics of trade in those days were no more accurate, perhaps, than those of to-day. And we can best judge of the effects of better trade relations with the United States at this distant day by examining the statistics both of Canada and of the United States. The statistics compiled in Canada and those compiled in the United States do not always agree even in the present day; but, in the main, they point the same lesson. The first lesson is that there was no great invasion of American products from the United States into Canada, as the following table will show.

I present a table showing imports and exports according to both Canadian and American reports:

American Goods brought into Canada.

	Canadian Reports.	American Reports.
1854	$15,533,090	$24,157,612
1855	20,828,676	27,741,808
1856	22,704,508	29,025,349
1857	20,224,648	24,138,482
1858	15,635,565	23,604,526
1859	17,592,916	28,109,494
1860	17,273,029	22,695,928
1861	20,206,080	22,676,513
1862	22,642,860	20,573,070
1863	18,457,683	27,619,814
1864	7,952,401	26,574,624
1865	14,820,577	28,829,402
1866	15,242,834	24,828,880
1867	.....	21,020,302
1868	22,660,112	24,080,777

Now, on the other hand, we find that the Canadians did find in the United States the market they were looking for:—

Exports of Canadian Goods to the United States.

	Canadian Reports.	American Reports.
1854	$ 6,721,539	$ 8,784,412
1855	12,182,314	15,118,289
1856	17,488,197	21,276,614
1857	18,291,834	22,108,916
1858	11,581,570	15,784,836
1859	14,208,717	19,287,565
1860	18,853,033	23,582,796
1861	18,645,457	22,724,489
1862	15,257,812	18,511,025
1863	18,670,773	17,484,786
1864	32,422,015	29,608,736
1865	30,547,267	33,264,403
1866	46,199,470	48,528,628
1867	.....	25,044,005
1868	22,387,846	26,261,379

These figures show that during that period our exports to the United States increased sixfold. Another salient fact is that, according to the American statistics, for the first three years of the reciprocity treaty the balance of trade against Canada was over $35,000,000, while according to Canadian reports it was $23,000,000. During the continuance of the treaty, Canada made such inroads into the American market that the adverse balance was turned in our favour, and the last three years, according to Canadian reports, we sold to the Americans $71,000,000 more than we bought from them; while the American statistics showed that the balance was at least $41,000,000 in Canada's favour.

These favourable conditions were due unquestionably to the operation of reciprocity, and the experience of those who were familiar with the conditions in those days will bear out my statement. I live in a community where, within cannon shot of my residence, there were ten building stone quarries in operation, employing at least one thousand men. To-day, and for many years previous, those quarries have been as silent as the tomb; a cemetery would not be more silent than they. Why? They have been closed because the American market was closed to us. Under the proposed reciprocity agreement the people began to entertain hopes of a brighter day. My hon. friend from North Toronto talks about home markets. There was a home market for at least 5,000 people. Where have those people gone? To the State of Maine, and to the quarries of Ohio. There was a better home market for the agriculturist than even the home market of Moncton, created as it has been by workmen in the Intercolonial shops. Under the reciprocity treaty, in former days, that home market was equal to if not better than the present home market, it was furnished by the reciprocity treaty during its operation. At that period there were in operation shipyards in various portions of the provinces. At these shipyards schooners were built for the purpose of plying to and fro between the ports of the maritime provinces and those of New England and the middle states. That industry has gone, because there is now no longer any use for coasting vessels. Is it any wonder that under these circumstances the people of the maritime provinces still desire better trade relations with the people of the United States?

Sir, I am always glad to listen to the optimistic utterances of our hon. friends from Western Canada. I delight to observe that buoyancy of spirit, that large hopefulness, that grand outlook which they exhibit in speaking of our great western heritage. I join with them in rejoicing at present conditions in that country, and the glorious prospects for the future. But I cannot forget the eastern section of Canada which I am more particularly called upon to represent. I see there a loss of population going on every year. Our agricultural industries, the production of hay, for instance, our stone quarries and their products, our gypsum quarries, our small lumber are all in a lethargic condition, and at times in a condition of stagnation. It is only here and there that there is activity and hopefulness.

Now, with respect to the census, I had occasion during the last campaign to visit some of the historic spots in the maritime provinces. Let me refer to the community known in former days as Beauséjour, in later days called Fort Cumberland. It is on the isthmus between Nova Scotia and New Brunswick, and is one of the most beautiful agricultural sections to be found, I venture to say, in any of the provinces. The people are a sturdy stock, many of them Yorkshiremen who have come from old England, many Scotch, and other people of sturdy races, who went there to make homes for themselves. They have lived there for generations, yet I found in that one small community that, whereas there were in 1901, 835 souls, in 1911 the census showed that there were only 696. In ten years, in that small agricultural community, there had been a decrease of 139 in the population.

That is simply an illustration of the conditions which prevail in the maritime provinces to a great extent. I bow to no one in my optimism in regard to the future of Canada. I will not agree to take any second place with any hon. member of this House as to the future of our country, but I feel that there must be consideration given to the east as well as to the west. The people of Ontario it is true, have pronounced in no uncertain way against the government which advocated better trade relations with the United States. It may be that they did it upon the question itself, or it may be that they did it because of underground organization. I care not how the result was brought about, I know that a great wrong and harm was done to the people of eastern Canada when that pact was rejected. I have no concern with respect to the loss of power, or to the change of government, but I do hold that in the interest of the people of eastern Canada we had a right to hope for an arrangement whereby our trade relations with the people of the United States would be advantaged.

We live very near to the shores of New England. Our transportation facilities are not only excellent but cheap. Our relationships are of the most intimate character. Indeed, when you consider the position in which we stand as Canadians towards the people of the United States, you must realize that if there is not reciprocity in trade there is reciprocity in social intercourse and in education and religious matters. There is not an organization in Canada, whether it is a labour organization, a charitable or a church organization, but is international in character. Take your labour union, your Christian Endeavour Society, your Epworth Leagues, your great temperance and social gatherings, all these are international and the people of that country mingle with the people of this country and we with them, first in their country and next in ours. It does seem to me reasonable that we can, without endangering our loyalty, without any menace to the ties which bind us to the motherland, have social and religious intercourse with the people of the United States, we can also have trade intercourse without in any way endangering our autonomy or our status as a dependency of the British Crown. I am borne out in this by statements that have been made in this parliament. In 1894 Sir John Thompson stated in the House that the Conservative government of that day had intimated to Washington:

> That Canada would be glad to know of any desire or willingness on the part of the United States government to take measures towards the extension of trade between the two countries and that Canada would be willing to reciprocate.

These are clear-cut words, strong, definite and conclusive, in favour of reciprocity, and they were uttered by Sir John Thompson who, if he was not at that time leader of the government, was at a latter period Prime Minister of Canada. During that same session my hon. friend the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Foster) who was then Minister of Finance of Canada, made this statement:

> When they, the people of the United States, look over the items in our tariff as it shall have passed the House, they will find that line after line, article after article, grade after grade, we have given them a better chance to get into our market than they have given us to get into their market; consequently, legislative reciprocity, so far as trade is concerned, shines out from the proposition that the government put before the House to-day in a far greater degree than it does out of the legislation which they proposed, and which is in progress through their Congress.

The former Minister of Finance then looked forward to legislative reciprocity. It seems to me a remarkable fact that we could have legislative reciprocity in 1894 without endangering the British constitution or our connection with the empire, but that now in these later days we cannot have that same legislative reciprocity because, forsooth, we are endangering British connection. To me it shows that there was a wrong impression promulgated before the people, that the people got a wrong and erroneous idea with respect to what might be termed the loyalty side of the reciprocity pact.

This reciprocity arrangement, this agreement entered into between this country and the United States last year, was born of the labour and the travail that have taken place since confederation, and so it comes, that we as a people have been looking for it during all these years. Even in the days anterior to the confederation of the four provinces we hoped for it, we sought it but we failed in getting it. The moment we get it, the moment it is within our reach, it becomes disloyal on the part of any one to seek to have it, and newspapers and extras are circulated through the land with great flags embellishing them, and we are asked the question: Under which flag? Here are the Stars and Stripes in one corner and the British ensign in the other, and under these flags the question is put: Under which flag? Mr. Speaker, that question was settled in Canada one hundred years ago and from that moment down to the present time it has been the steadfast desire of the people of Canada to cling to their flag. The only time that there has been any hesitancy or any doubt with respect to it was when Sir John Abbott, himself a great Conservative, and other Conservative leaders throughout Canada, issued annexation manifestos and appealed to the people in favour of annexation as against the British Crown.

I have great faith in better trade relations with the people of the United States. I am sincere with respect to the reciprocity agreement. I believe that Canada lost an opportunity which she will not soon have again. I believe that no greater calamity could have occurred to Canada than the rejection of that agreement. The going out of the government of Sir Wilfrid Laurier is nothing; the changing of the personnel of those who are to administer the affairs of Canada is a matter of very little moment, but the condition of the people of Canada is of large moment and the future of eastern Canada and the contentment of the people are matters that cannot lightly be thrust aside. They cannot be laughed out of this parliament. This question will not die because the people will not permit it to die.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

Mr. EMMERSON. My friends opposite may laugh, and perhaps they are not concerned because as they say: We are here and you are there. But, the underground organization by which you got there, and we got here, is a matter of some moment to the people of Canada; it was the means to the end, and oh, the end is so glorious. I hold that the reciprocity agreement would minimize the baneful influence of trusts and combines and monopolies, to the advantage of the producer and the consumer alike. I hold it would afford an additional market and furnish a choice of markets. I hold it would stimulate and increase production which would demand increased labour, and thereby create a larger and better home market for all producers, agricultural and manufacturing alike. It would expand our imports of luxuries from Great Britain due to increased purchasing power and furnishing a greater revenue it would permit a greater preference on British goods. The Minister of Trade and Commerce spoke highly of the home market, and I agree with him, but the difficulty is that our home market is too restricted for the volume of our production. If there is a stimulation of agricultural production in Canada it will necessitate more labour and more labour will mean a larger population and a larger population will create a greater home market not merely for the agriculturist but for the Canadian manufacturer. If there is a larger population and increased agricultural production, there will of necessity be a greater demand for manufactured goods. The people of the west and the people of the east would have greater purchasing power, and they would not only indulge in the luxuries which are brought from Great Britain, but they would be able to purchase to a greater extent of the manufactured goods of Canada. And when the Manufacturer's Association opposed by might and main, and means, the reciprocity pact they stood in their own light because they lessened the possibilities of the home market, the extension of which would be beneficial to them. There would be no discrimination under that agreement against any section or class of people. The opposition of the manufacturers was based on a fallacy. What they feared really was British competition as the result of an increased British preference. I have it from the lips of manufacturers in my own constituency that they did not fear the competition of the American manufacturers, but they did fear that the greater expansion of trade with the United States would mean greater purchasing power on the part of the consumers, larger importations, a larger revenue and a larger surplus, and that with a larger surplus there would be an insistent demand from the people that there should be a lessening of taxation which would possibly take the shape of increasing the British preference from 33⅓ to 50 per cent. Therefore, the manufacturers of Canada had before them the bogey of an increase in the British preference and that is what they fought against, although one would think these persons who claim to have the exclusive monopoly of all the loyalty that is going would surely not object to an increase in that preference. The Manufacturer's Association, great and powerful as it is, must be actuated by sentiment sometimes, and surely they ought not to repine if the increased prosperity from reciprocity would bring increased benefit to the heart of the empire which they pretend to love so well. There is no treason in trade and if there were we would all have been traitors long ago. Our trade with the people of the United States has been growing year by year until it is now one-half of our total trade with the world. We buy from them because we have to; we get from them our raw sugar, our raw cotton, our anthracite coal, and many other things which come in free of duty. The balance of trade is against us; we buy from them to a greater extent than they buy from us, and if reciprocity had been adopted there would have been a possibility of evening-up that trade. Our lumber, our building stone, our hay, our potatoes, our fruits and all products of the soil pay a heavy toll to-day in entering the market of the United States, but we must have the market and so we must pay the toll. Is it a more loyal thing to contribute this taxation to the United States than it is to seek from them advantages whereby our natural products would find entry into their markets free of duty? Is it a crime to trade with them in natural resources without tariff barriers, and not a crime to deal with them when we have to pay them toll?

I know that our people everywhere throughout Canada are anxious for greater trade; I know that it is taken as an accepted axiom of trade that the volume of our exports largely influences the material prosperity of a people, and that such axiom is recognized by the business men of Canada whether in the east or the centre or the west. The Maritime Board of Trade met in the city of Moncton in August last and there discussed trade relations—but not trade relations with the United States. They said that was a political subject. But they discussed trade relations with Cuba and the West Indies, and they passed resolutions—Boards of Trade are great on resoluting—and a clause in the preamble of one of their resolutions was :

Whereas the volume of export trade largely influences a country's material progress, be it resolved that we ask the federal government——

They always ask the Federal government to do something——to use every available means to win this trade.

What trade ? The trade with Cuba and the West Indies—

To win this trade, especially that of live stock for Canada, and further—— —and here comes the real crux of what this movement with respect to the betterment of trade with countries which are remote, amounted to :—

Further to inaugurate a modern and up to date steamship service——

Of course by subsidizing some such service. Here, for a day or more business men of eastern Canada were discussing the question of better trade relations with Cuba and the West Indies, and at that very moment there was a live, vital question under way with respect to better trade relations with our neighbours, the United States, and that question they ignored in spite of the fact that the principles which they laid down, as respects the enlargement of trade with the West Indies and Cuba, would apply with greater force to the enlargement of trade with the United States. Yet not one of them had the temerity to stand up and encourage the efforts that were being put forth in order to bring about a condition of things that would mean a wider and larger market and a better condition generally throughout every section of the country. It seems to me that this shows the hollowness of this whole movement. It shows the hollowness of the opposition to this reciprocal trade arrangement with the United States. We had some illustration of that when this parliament was convened. I think that there are some references in the speech from the Throne to the bettering of trade relations with Guiana. Well, we might as well propose to have better trade relations with Timbuctoo or Morocco or some other remote section of the world; but it would not do to suggest in the form of a resolution before this House the desirability of expanding our trade relations with the people of the United States, although my hon. friend the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Foster), went to New York the other day and there said that he wanted to trade with the people of the United States.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear Hear.

Mr. EMMERSON. My hon. friends say 'hear, hear.' We are here and you are there. But take heed lest you fall. The day may come when you will not be there unless you take some steps with regard to the enlargement of trade; and certainly you will not deserve to be there, and that is of greater moment than you being there and our being here. When I see the attitude of hon. gentlemen opposite I am impressed with the opinion that they have imbibed some of the ideas of the pious editor which are set forth so beautifully in the pious editor's creed. In order to bring to the notice of my hon. friends the position in which they find themselves and in which they acknowledge themselves to be when they reply to everything by saying : 'We are here and you are there,' let me quote to them Bigelow again :—

I du believe in bein' this
Or thet, ez it may happen
One way or t'other hendiest is
To ketch the people nappin;
It aint by princerples nor men
My preudent course is steadied,—
I scent which pays the best, and then Go into it baldheaded.

I think my hon. friends have pursued that course. Certainly they have followed the scent closely. I do not know how long they may keep in that pathway, but there is one thing which the people of this country do realize, and that is that they have been humbugged. They realize that the means whereby my hon. friends got there and we got here were a species of humbug, and they might fairly say with Bigelow :—

In short I firmly do believe
In humbug generally,
Fer its a thing that I perceive
To have a solid vally;
This heth, my faithful shepherd been,
In pastures sweet heth led me;
An' this'ill keep the people green
To feed as they hev fed me.

An hon. MEMBER. Amen.

Mr. EMMERSON. My hon. friend is not often called upon to say 'amen,' but I am glad he is training in that direction. But I am sure that in his heart of hearts my hon. friend is responsive to the idea I have quoted and is reconciled to it by the repetition of that other sentence : 'We are here and you are there.'

Now, during the last campaign we had in eastern Canada some so called 'empire candidates.' They were a new species of candidate to me. I was quite familiar with municipal candidates, and city candidates, and candidates for the local legislature, and candidates for the Imperial parliament, but I never had before brought to my notice the empire candidates. And of course I had formed some idea that both as to brain and to stature, an empire candidate must necessarily be colossal, must necessarily take the whole world within his grasp, and stand apart from and above ordinary candidates and ordinary people. But we had these candidates in eastern Canada, and I am not aware that anything they advocated was imperial in any sense.

I was not familiar with any of their imperial utterances, but I know that they placarded themselves as 'empire candidates,' and according to the rule of parliament, when a member makes a certain statement we are compelled to accept it; so of course, when empire candidates flitted before my view, I was compelled to recognize them as such. What was there in this campaign which made it differ in any sense, as far as the empire is concerned, from other campaigns that we have had? The Liberal party had given a British preference; they were the first to hold out the hand of friendship even to the people of the British Isles; and the Liberal party will, in my judgment, be the first in the future to extend that preference, and thus help to build up and cement the empire with respect to its trade. We talk about an Imperial Federation; we talk about trade within the empire. I have often wondered, when statements have been made with respect to the attitude of Joseph Chamberlain towards the fair trade proposition, so-called, in Great Britain, what would happen to our hon. friends opposite, who talk in glittering generalities on this matter, if there came before parliament and the country a concrete proposition for inter-imperial reciprocity of trade. What would happen to the Manufacturers' Association? Where would those hon. members of this House who are interested in the woollen industry be if it were proposed to have reciprocal trade with the mother country in woollen goods in return for favours that might be granted by the British parliament? Where would any of the manufacturers of Canada be if such a concrete proposition were brought before this parliament? I know this, that if any such proposition comes before the Canadian parliament, the men who will oppose it, Mr. Speaker, are the men who sit at your right, headed by this coalition government. I do not know that I am so agonizingly an advocate of that idea as to twit anybody for his views in respect to it. I believe in British connection, but I believe in the autonomy of Canada. I believe that we as as a people are called upon to work out our own salvation fiscally and in all other respects, and when I make that statement I believe I am but following the utterances of leading statesmen in both England and Canada. In the last campaign Mr. Buxton, the Prime Minister, David Lloyd George, Balfour and all the other great publicists and public men of Great Britain recognized this principle, that the autonomy of the dominions beyond the seas should be recognized, and that it is in the interest of the empire, of Great Britain, of Canada, and of all the other overseas dominions that that recognition should be given. The genesis of the British Empire is to be found in those victorious contests that resulted in giving political autonomy and liberty to each unit of the empire as it is to-day constituted and organized. Let us beware lest any restraints of political or class apron strings contract the largeness of those liberties and that responsible self-dependence. There is such a thing as making an attempt to bind together the British Empire with bands of steel, and cementing them by legislative enactments; but Sir, I believe in my heart of hearts that the way to keep the British Empire together is to have those intangible ties, those sentiments, unfettered by any legislative enactments or legislative interference by one part with another. The government of Great Britain recognizes this. The government of Great Britain has had experience in just such conditions. Go back to 1775, to the war of the American revolution, gather from the pages of history the dealings of Great Britain with the dominions beyond the seas, and you must perforce conclude that the way for the British Empire to stand together is for each unit of that empire to recognize its autonomy and have that autonomy recognized; to have no fettering or contracting or restricting legislative enactment that would in any way impair the freedom which we as citizens of the young nation beyond the seas enjoy in our present condition as responsible, self-governing people.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I do not often crave the indulgence of this House; I did not in a previous parliament, and I feel like apologizing for taking up so much of the time of the House.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

Mr. EMMERSON. Hon. gentlemen say, hear, hear; if they are disposed to worship themselves simply because they are there and we are here, they must not forget that there are people in this country who take a wider view and grasp of the situation—that there are people in Canada who are still interested in the questions, some of which were brought to light during the campaign; questions brought from the darkness and the twilight into the open light of day, and settled it may be for the time being, but not settled in so far as the future of Canada is concerned; questions that are vital to us. We are a country of wonderful commercial assets; we are a country of great possibilities, and as such we have the right to guard and safeguard our future. In my judgment, though you may not attach very much importance to it, I believe that we are but on the threshold of an agitation not only for freer trade relations with the people of the United States and with the people of all other countries, but we are on the threshold of an agitation that has for its goal the reduction of the tariff duties of this country in the interest of the great consuming masses of the people. That agitation cannot and will not down. We may attempt to laugh at it. We may say, 'We are here and you are there:' but that is no answer and will not be accepted as an answer. I venture to repeat my statement, this issue is not dead; and the government, if it has even its own selfish interest at heart, will do well not to forget the fact I have endeavoured to enunciate.

At six o'clock, House took recess.

After Recess.

House resumed at eight o'clock.

Hon. W. T. WHITE (Minister of Finance). Mr. Speaker, I desire to join in the congratulations to the eloquent mover and seconder of the address, and to say with what interest and pleasure I have listened to the succeeding debate, which has been maintained on a high level throughout. I have no intention of making a lengthy contribution to the discussion. But before entering upon my argument, I desire to advert to some personal references to myself on the part of the hon. member for South Wellington (Mr. Guthrie) and the hon. member for Welland (Mr. German). I do not desire to take matters of this kind too seriously, but I feel that I must deal with these allusions in simple justice to myself. The hon. member for South Wellington asserted that I was the 'representative of trusts, mergers and corporations.' The hon. member for Welland said:

> I think that the present Minister of Finance was forced into the position without his knowledge, because he had to obey the suggestions of the managers of his trust company.

Now I desire, Sir, to enter an absolute and unequivocal denial to these allegations. I say that no more unjust, unfair, and, in my judgment, ungenerous accusations were ever made across the floor of this House. The hon. gentleman in charge of this government is not the man to submit to political duress, and I am not the man to accept appointment under the conditions alleged. The people of Canada are well aware of the circumstances of my entry into public life, they are well aware of the circumstances of my inclusion in the cabinet, and I am quite content to leave the matter to their judgment, and in their hands. With regard to mergers and trusts, I have not, and I never have had, any interest of any kind, direct or indirect, in them. I say that to-night I am as free and unfettered to discharge the duties of my position as any other hon. member who has the honour to sit in this chamber.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I propose to offer some observations on subjects that have been brought up in this debate. It seems very curious to me that, although reciprocity was not mentioned in the speech from the Throne and although it is not mentioned in the amendment of the right hon. gentleman who leads the opposition, it has yet furnished the principal topic of this debate. Now, I am the more surprised at this because I had believed, and I do believe, that reciprocity is absolutely a dead issue in Canada. Some hon. gentlemen are unwilling to admit that reciprocity is dead; they seem to think it is in a state of suspended animation. Not so, my hon. friend from South Wellington. He has no doubt whatever as to the matter, he has no hesitation whatever in saying that reciprocity is dead. For his part, he has come to bury Caesar, not to praise him. What would our Liberal friends of Ontario say as to the suggestion that reciprocity is not dead? I think most of them would not only agree that reciprocity is dead, but I think most of them are sorry reciprocity ever was born.

Now, what has been the character of this debate up to the present time? I will not call these proceedings an inquest, but we have undoubtedly been present at the obsequies, at the last sad rites of reciprocity, and this debate has in very truth been its funeral oration. Hon. gentlemen opposite are slow to accept the verdict of the people, they are slow to admit that they have been the victims of a mistaken policy. They say the result was due to passion, not to reason. Now, Mr. Speaker, it is easier to say that than to admit that the negotiations for reciprocity were in fact a political mistake of the first magnitude. The agreement was before the people of Canada for no less a period than six months. And yet it is alleged by hon. gentlemen opposite that the result of the election was due to passion and not to reason. Now, surely, the agreement having been before the people of Canada for six months, that was a period long enough to allow passion to cool. Reciprocity was debated as no other question was ever debated in Canada, it was debated upon thousands of platforms, and I doubt very much if Canada ever saw before such earnest audiences throughout its length and breadth as those that listened to the addresses and discussions upon reciprocity. It was the constant subject of editorial comment and of public discussion. Now, Sir, the people of Canada are intelligent. Man for man, I believe the people of Canada are among the most intelligent in the world, if not the most intelligent. The result of the election was decisive. Was there ever a more decisive political overthrow? Is it not a reflection upon the capacity of the Canadian people to say that the result was due to passion and not to reason?

Now, Sir, I do not propose to introduce the hustings into the deliberations of this assembly, so I shall deal with the question of the rejection of reciprocity briefly and generally. On what grounds was reciprocity rejected? In my judgment, both upon economic and upon national grounds. Speaking for myself, I say it was rejected on economic not less than upon national grounds. The national aspect was the first one considered. During the first few weeks the discussion of the economic side of reciprocity was hardly heard, but rather the national side of the question. It was only afterwards that the economic argument had its full force and effect, and I need not tell hon. gentlemen opposite, or hon. gentlemen on this side of the House, that as the campaign proceeded the chances of the government grew less and less, and I believe that if the campaign had lasted two weeks longer the Liberal party would have been annihilated. How many hon. gentlemen opposite would have the hardihood to-day to appeal to the country again on the issue of reciprocity? Objection has been impliedly made to the people of this country deciding a question of this kind upon national grounds. What objection can there be to the Canadian people deciding any question on national grounds if they so desire? Have not the people a right to be the judges of national considerations as well as of business or economic considerations? I say that the instinct of the Canadian people, both upon the economic and upon national grounds was sound; I say that the instinct of the people is worth all the reasonings of all our statesmen. I say that the verdict of the 21st September was the voice of reason and the voice of patriotism, speaking at the polls as it had a right to do, under the constitution of this country.

Let us now consider the matter from an economic standpoint. This country is, and has been, a protectionist country. Both parties have adopted that policy as a matter of necessity. It is the obvious and necessary policy for the upbuilding of this country. We have had a tariff wall against the United States, and they have had a tariff wall against us; in consequence we have taken our own line of development. That tariff wall has profoundly affected the trend of our trade and the distribution we have given to our industries. It has also profoundly affected our railway policy in constructing the great National Transcontinental systems. We have built up great industries, we have spent enormous sums upon railways, some of them still incomplete. Our interprovincial trade has grown enormously, we are in the constructive stage of our development. Our mixed farmers, our fruit growers, our vegetable growers, enjoy the advantage of a magnificent home market, probably the best home market, actually and potentially, in the world to-day. Now, under these circumstances, was it wise to negotiate an agreement the purport or intent of which was to introduce so sudden and so radical a change in our economic system?

Then our people were profoundly impressed with the fact that there was no assurance of the continuance of the agreement. While upon the face it apparently gave either side the right to withdraw, our people felt that while the great nation to the south could withdraw if they so chose, and could threaten to withdraw, in so far as we were concerned we could not do so. They were afraid of the entanglement which might result. In that connection, when my hon. friend opposite (Mr. Emmerson) was speaking this afternoon of the Lord Elgin Treaty of 1854-1865 and its discontinuance in the latter year, I thought of the negotiations which were then instituted for its continuance. There is a singular analogy between the negotiation of that time and the negotiation of the early part of this year between our ministers and representatives of the United States government. In 1865 Messrs. Hay and Howland, representatives of the Canadian government, went to Washington to see if they could bring about a continuance of the Lord Elgin Treaty. Being unable to do so they entered upon negotiations whereby, under concurrent legislation, a reciprocal agreement might be entered into. The hon. Geo. Brown, then a member of the coalition government of Canada, said that he dissented entirely from any such proposed agreement, that he was afraid of the entanglement which might result, and the hon. Geo. Brown, one of the leading Liberals of Canada, actually resigned from the coalition government by reason of this proposed negotiation of a reciprocity agreement. As I say, the people of Canada were afraid, among other things, that we might not be able to extricate ourselves from the agreement, that it was a one-sided, a unilateral agreement although appearing to give both parties the right to withdraw.

As far as the province of Ontario is concerned, I may say that practically all classes were against reciprocity—farmers, manufacturers, and artisans, and Sir, when a verdict is got from such a province is it not the part of wisdom to accept it? The farmer of Ontario had learned the value of his own market. His cities had been built up and he had come to realize as the campaign progressed that he had probably the most valuable home market in the world. He realized also that he would have been exposed to the competition in his own market of American trusts and of thirteen favoured nations and all the British colonies from none of whom he would receive any reciprocal advantage whatsoever. The manufacturer, on his part, feared commercial union. Boards of Trade all over Ontario and all over the Dominion of Canada passed resolutions against reciprocity. Therefore, is it not presumption to set up the opinion here that the people of Canada on this issue were misled, that all classes were misled and acted upon passion rather than upon reason? Labour was against it. The interests of labour were bound up with the interests of the manufacturer, and labour throughout the length and breadth of Canada was opposed to reciprocity.

Now, we have heard from the right hon. leader of the opposition (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) with regard to the west and he seemed to express the fear that the west was greatly discontented with the result of the election. He stated among other things that the price of wheat was higher across the line than in our own west. It is a fact that the price of grain at Minneapolis, for special reasons, is higher than it is at Winnipeg at times. But let me ask my right hon. friend, having regard to the special conditions which prevail at Minneapolis, what would happen to the difference in price if the tariff wall were thrown down between Canada and the United States and an avalanche of our wheat were allowed to descend upon Minneapolis? What, I ask, would happen to the difference in price then? The price of wheat is determined by the export price and the people of the west are well informed of that.

What about our great transcontinental railways, and, in this connection, I desire to call attention to the speech which the right hon. leader of the opposition made on July 30, 1903, with reference to the Grand Trunk Pacific railway. He said:

We consider that it is the duty of all those who sit within these walls by the will of the people to provide immediate means whereby the products of those new settlers may find an exit to the ocean at the least possible cost, and whereby, likewise, a market may be found in this new region for those who toil in the forests, in the fields, in the mines, in the shops of the older provinces.

Such is our duty; it is immediate and imperative. It is not the duty of to-morrow but of this day, of this hour, and of this minute. Heaven grant that it be not already too late: heaven grant that whilst we tarry and dispute the trade of Canada is not deviated to other channels, and that an ever vigilant competitor does not take to himself the trade that properly belongs to those who acknowledge Canada as their native or their adopted land. Upon this question we feel that our position is absolutely safe and secure; we feel that it corresponds to the beating of every Canadian heart.

In view of that speech, in view of the millions we have sunk in the National Transcontinental railway, and in view of the policy of the government with regard to the Grand Trunk Pacific, what, I ask, is to be said of a policy that would divert the wheat of the west to the American roads and the other vigilant competitors referred to in the speech of the right hon. gentleman? I have to read in that connection a clipping from the 'New York Sun' in reference to reciprocity. It is as follows:

The scheme will give the United States greater control of the wheat market than it ever had before. It will enable its milling plants to turn Canadian wheat into flour and send the finished product abroad, and it will stimulate the sale of manufactures and other things that we have to sell to Canada. Canadian grain will pour into Minneapolis, to the benefit of American millers, handlers and exporters of grain. For every bushel that comes across the border a bushel will be exported at New York so long as the United States continues to raise more wheat than it consumes.

Why should Canada not do the milling business that will go to the millers of Minneapolis, and why should not our railways and our railway operatives have the carriage of the grain from the west if the farmer of the west will derive no more advantage under reciprocity?

Let me advert for a moment to the business side of this question. Is it not a fact that on the evening of the 21st September, as a result of the election, practically every business man in Canada felt a sense of relief? Is it not a fact that nearly every business man in Canada breathed more freely as a result of the election?

Some hon. MEMBERS. No, no.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Yes, yes.

Mr. WHITE. What about the improvement in business which has been shown since the 21st day of September last? What about the judgment of the London money market, the great financial market of the world? Ask any financial man as to the situation with regard to Canadian securities prior to the 21st September, 1911, and subsequent to the 21st September, 1911. I desire to say with all due respect to hon. gentlemen opposite—because I know that this agreement was negotiated in the best possible good faith, although I believe a serious mistake was made—that the rejection of the reciprocity agreement constituted the best advertisement that Canada ever received in Great Britain.

And I say further that the work of the people of Canada on the 21st day of September last—I say it also with due respect to hon. gentlemen opposite—was as good a day's work as they have done since confederation.

I come now to the question of the United States, and notwithstanding all that has been said to the contrary, judging from the tone of their public men, and the tone of their press, I believe the people of the United States have received the verdict of the Canadian people without any feelings of animosity or resentment. There was a standing offer of reciprocity upon our statute-book for eighteen years, and when the people of the United States failed during that period to take advantage of it surely they have no ground of complaint if the people of Canada in the exercise of their judgment failed to approve of the proposed agreement for the exchange of natural products. And, as for Canada, there has been growing up here a more neighbourly feeling for the United States which I feel certain will continue. But, is it wise to suggest, as the right hon. the leader of the opposition did, the possibility of an unfriendly feeling? Is it in the interest of this country that even the possibility of an unfriendly feeling should be suggested? Let me recall in this connection a speech of the right hon. gentleman delivered some years ago in which he said that in the course of his experience he had found that our best policy as far as the United States was concerned was that Canada should be absolutely independent of her.

I come, Mr. Speaker, to the question of the navy, and I do not know that any greater compliment could be paid this government than to suggest that within the few weeks in which we have been in office we should have been supposed to be capable of maturing and bringing down a naval programme that would commend itself to the judgment of this House. In that time we have been very busy.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

Mr. WHITE. Yes, we have all had to be re-elected, and according to popular report one of us needed a good deal of time to get elected. At all events we have been so busy that we have hardly had sufficient time to properly consider the bill for repairs to the 'Niobe', let alone being able to mature and bring down a naval programme that would commend itself to the judgment of this House, and of the country, and of Great Britain. As to the naval programme of the late government, I have just this to say: I say they deserve some credit for having taken up the question, but I say that their naval policy was not only not satisfactory to the people of Quebec, but it was not satisfactory, as I read public opinion, to the people of Ontario, or to the people of any of the other provinces of Canada. The general opinion is that the proposed navy would be a source of great expense in peace and would be absolutely useless in war. Now, the Prime Minister purposes consulting the British Admiralty, and what better course could he take preparatory to maturing a naval programme? After he has consulted with the British Admiralty, we shall be in a position to deal with the whole question, and I believe, Sir, that we shall have public opinion both in Canada and Great Britain behind us in the policy which we shall adopt.

Much time has been consumed during this debate in personal attack upon the members of the ministry. I am not prepared to say that such attacks are unprecedented in constitutional annals, but it is my opinion that this attack has been carried further than is warranted by precedent. I can assure you, Sir, that such attacks must fail of effect. If there is dissension in the cabinet, it is strange that none of the ministers have even heard of it. Dissension in the cabinet! —why, Sir, there has been nothing but the utmost harmony and hard work since the beginning. As I have said, it is not my intention to make any lengthy contribution to the debate, but I wish to say before concluding that it is the object of this ministry to administer the affairs of Canada to the satisfaction and advantage of the people whose servants we are, and, notwithstanding the personal attacks that have been made upon us it is my belief that we shall continue to do so. This, Mr. Speaker, is my first experience in addressing the House; I have to thank my hon. friends, and especially hon. gentlemen opposite, for the kindly and courteous attention with which they have listened to me.

Hon. FRANK OLIVER (Edmonton). Mr. Speaker, most of the speakers who have addressed the House during this debate have opened their remarks with congratulations. I wish to congratulate the leader of the government upon his choice of his Minister of Finance, and I wish to congratulate the Minister of Finance upon the choice of language, and of ideas with which he has favoured the House to-night. It is important that the man who occupies the position of greatest importance in the government should bring to that position ability and judgment, and I think we are safe in assuming that when the Minister of Finance has spoken on the question of reciprocity, the best has been said that can be said by its opponents on the economic side of the argument. We have waited more or less patiently to hear an expression on the economic side of the reciprocity argument from gentlemen occupying the Treasury Benches and their friends, but we have had to wait until the Minister of Finance spoke to-night for even a shred of argument. If I were to make any criticism on the address of my hon. friend (Mr. White) it would be that he has mistaken Ontario for the Dominion, and that when he wonders why Canada does not accept Ontario's verdict with regard to reciprocity, he has hardly that view of the scope and responsibility of the position he occcupies which no doubt he will have in a short time.

I was glad to hear my hon. friend disclaim most emphatically any connection on his part with or any interest in trusts, mergers and combines. At the same time, as the leading representative in the government from that province which has declared so emphatically in favour of the rule of the trusts, mergers and combines in the economics of this country of ours, we are bound to assume that if he is not of them at any rate they are behind him; and while the voice may be the voice of Jacob the hand behind is the hand of Esau. Let me relieve my hon. friend's mind from the impression under which he appears to labour that reciprocity is dead as an issue in Canadian politics. In so far as the reciprocity proposals were proposals for the reduction of taxation and the increase of trade in this Dominion, I would like him and his friends to understand that they were never more alive than they are at this moment and that, although he and his friends may have been able, by appeals to passion and prejudice——

Some hon. MEMBERS. Oh, oh.

Mr. OLIVER—during the recent elections, to snap a popular verdict, I think that the course of this debate will enlighten the people of Canada somewhat on the merits of the arguments placed before them during that election, and that, when the question comes to be considered again, the policy of lower taxation and larger trade will win in Canada.

My hon. friend and his associates have extracted a great deal of comfort out of a word let fall by the hon. member for South Wellington (Mr. Guthrie) when he said that reciprocity was dead. Reciprocity is dead.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

Mr. OLIVER. Reciprocity involves, by its very nature, an arrangement between two parties; and so far as the party of the United States is concerned, that party, which for forty years refused and rejected reciprocity, but which, under the stress of circumstances, accepted that policy for a moment, need not be expected to accept it again as the policy of that country for the next forty years. So that when my hon. friends comfort themselves with the idea that reciprocity is dead, they surely are to entitled to be congratulated on the fact that when the opportunity came to Canada to so greatly benefit her material conditions they were able to destroy that opportunity. It is assumed in the course of this debate that the United States were clamoring for reciprocity with Canada, that it almost needed a regiment of soldiers along the boundary line to prevent the people of the United States from forcing their goods upon us and from taking ours without the impediment of a tariff barrier. But the facts of the case are that the monopolies, trusts and combines of the United States fought reciprocity in that country.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Oh, oh.

Mr. OLIVER. Just as the monopolies, trust and combines of Canada fought reciprocity in this country. And I do not think there is any doubt that had reciprocity been submitted to the people of the United States, as it was submitted to the people of Canada, the same line of tactics which was successful in securing its defeat in Canada would have secured its defeat in the United States.

Our friends, the monopolies, trusts and combines in Canada, fought a good fight, and they did not fight single handed either.

Mr. CURRIE. What trusts?

Mr. OLIVER. I have here a list of gentlemen of Canada, patriots—they had been Canadian patriots inasmuch as they had been Liberals up to a certain time—who, as stated by the Toronto ' World ' on February the 20th, announced their opposition to reciprocity. And I notice in that list of patriots the name of the present Minister of Finance (Mr. White), I also notice another name—that of Mr. W. K. George. It is, Sir, a matter of record that Mr. George—this Liberal whose patriotism compelled him to come out and declare himself against this reciprocity arrangement, because it had a tendency to turn the trade of Canada to the benefit of the United States—it is a matter of record that Mr. George was a hireling of the United States trusts at the time. It is of record that another gentleman of the same class and kidney, named McNaught, also from that patriotic city of Toronto which will not truck or trade with the Yankees, was also a hireling of the Yankee trusts, and this is what was done under the name of protection of Canadian interests.

But they had their help, Mr. Speaker. I read a despatch which appeared in the Toronto 'World,' of July 30. The heading of the despatch, placed over it by the editorial management of the Toronto 'World,' not a part of the despatch itself, is:

Will Help Borden to Fight Election; British Tariff Reformers are Raising Campaign Funds for Use in Eastern Canada; They Rely on the West to Vote Strongly against Reciprocity.

Mr. PUGSLEY. Who is the proprietor of the 'World'?

Mr. OLIVER. I do not know.

Mr. BENNETT (East Simcoe). Get a committee to inquire into it.

Mr. OLIVER. Mr. Speaker, the hon. member who has just spoken has the liberty to move for any committees he desires to inquire into any matter in which he finds an interest. The despatch reads as follows:

London, July 29—(Special)—In all the fury and billingsgate of the fight between the two chambers of the British parliament and the public uneasiness over Morocco, British tariff reformers do not lose sight of their fiscal ideal. They will leave no stone unturned to help Mr. Borden and his Conservative followers in the Dominion, defeat the Knox-Fielding pact.

Large money has been raised in Chamberlainite circles for ' educational purposes ' in eastern Canada, the assumption being that western sections do not require any fresh stimulus to oppose the proposed commercial relations with the United States.

If the Laurier ministry should decide upon a September general election the contribution to the war chest of its opponents will be greatly increased from Birmingham and other protectionist strongholds.

Mr. CURRIE. Will the hon. member state——

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order.

Mr. CURRIE. I wish to ask the hon. gentleman a question.

Mr. OLIVER. Mr. Speaker, I do not wish to be questioned during my remarks. Any hon. gentleman who has not yet spoken in this debate will have every opportunity to take the floor and favour the House with his remarks when his time comes. Now, what I want to point out to this House is that there was the most gigantic aggregation of capitalistic influence that this world ever saw——

Some hon. MEMBERS. Oh, oh.

Mr. OLIVER—brought to bear to win the elections of the 21st September. For Canadian patriotism, for imperial loyalty. No! In the interests of the trusts, mergers and combines of Canada, of the United States, and even of Great Britain. You will notice, Mr. Speaker, the delicate reference in this despatch to the west. The west was counted upon to vote against reciprocity without any educative effort. Two of the provinces of the west voted for reciprocity very strongly. Is it because the means of educative effort that were applied so successfully in other parts of Canada were not applied to these provinces? It looks very much as if we must concede to the over-confidence of this grand aggregation and association of patriots and imperialists the fact that the western provinces were able to send representatives here to support their own interests in connection with the economic affairs of this country. If they only had thought to reach far enough, they might have succeeded exactly as the Minister of Finance thinks they ought to have succeeded.

My hon. friend the Minister of Finance was kind enough to give us some information as to economic conditions in the prairie west of Canada and as to the economic results which would flow from such an arrangement as was proposed between Canada and the United States. He told us that wheat was worth more in Minneapolis than it was in Winnipeg, and I suppose he wondered that the western farmer wants to sell his wheat at that higher price. If he has any doubt about the fact, I want to assure him that the western farmer is just like the eastern banker or the manager of an eastern trust company or of a manufacturing industry or of any other enterprise in eastern Canada, even in the city of Toronto, and he would really like to get for his product all that the market will give him. It seems to me, Mr. Speaker, that in that the western farmer is not unreasonable, although it would seem that he is considered unreasonable by the gentlemen who are behind my hon. friend the Minister of Finance. But the Minister of Finance seems to think not only that the western farmer is unreasonable, but that he is not gifted with reasoning powers, and so he gives us an argument that I am sorry to hear come from a gentleman occupying the high and responsible position of Minister of Finance. He tells us that owing to special conditions in Minneapolis wheat is worth more there than it is in Winnipeg, but he has not told us why the Manitoba farmer should not have the benefit of those special conditions as long as they exist. I forgot, Mr. Speaker, he did tell us why; the reason was because if the Manitoba farmer got the Minneapolis price for his wheat, the railroad companies would not get that wheat to haul to Canadian and American ocean ports.

Some hon. MEMBERS. No.

Mr. OLIVER. Then I shall be delighted to hear the Minister of Finance tell us what he did say.

Mr. WHITE (Leeds). I told you once.

Mr. OLIVER. Then will the hon. member take my word for my understanding of what he told us?

Mr. WHITE (Leeds). What I said was that the western grain grower, in the event of the tariff wall between Canada and the United States being taken down, would not derive a higher price for his wheat than he does at present because the wheat would be put at once on an export basis.

Mr. OLIVER. If I may be pardoned, that was only part of what the Minister of Finance said. He went on to say—and if I am quoting him incorrectly I ask him again to correct me— that if the wheat went south, the railway companies of Canada, these very transportation interests, would not get that wheat to carry. And he read from the speech of Sir Wilfrid Laurier, then Prime Minister, on the Grand Trunk Pacific, the statement that the Grand Trunk Pacific was to be built for the purpose of carrying the wheat. Am I right?

Mr. WHITE (Leeds). Yes.

Mr. OLIVER. I am right. Then, let me say this to the Finance Minister, that if the tariff wall comes down, and the price of wheat in Minneapolis falls, then the wheat will not go to Minneapolis and the eastern roads will get the carriage of it just the same. The only reason a bushel of wheat goes to Minneapolis instead of to Fort William is because it will be worth more at Minneapolis than in Fort William. But if what the Minister of Finance said is true, that the taking down of the tariff wall will bring the price of wheat on either side of the border to a level, then he has nothing to fear on behalf of his railway companies, on behalf of his milling interests, on behalf of his monopolies, trusts, mergers or combines. I say he has nothing to fear on behalf of any of these interests if what he assured this House would take place does take place.

Now, we say this on behalf of the western farmer, and on behalf of Canada at large—that it is to the interest of Canada at large, as it is to the interest of the western farmer, and it is the right of Canada at large, as it is the right of the western farmer, that the western farmer should get the best price for his products that it is within the power of the government of this country to allow him to get, whenever he can get it, wherever he can get it, and for as long as he can get it.

Now, I hope my hon. friend (Mr. White) has a better understanding of the position. He shakes his head he says he has not a better understanding of the position. Then I am sorry, but I shall have to withdraw what I said in the beginning of my remarks, and to suggest that the Prime Minister did not make as wise a choice as I had thought. Mr. Speaker, we are told that there were economic arguments put up against reciprocity. You have heard from the mouth of the Minister of Finance the only economic argument ever attempted to be put up; and I ask you, Sir, of what value is it? Mr. Speaker, did it ever strike you that there is no possibility of a valid economic argument being put up against a fair proposition to reduce taxation, and to extend trade? Why, the thing is a contradiction in terms. There is no economic argument applying to the people of Canada as a whole that can be put up against the proposition to reduce the burden of taxation upon the people, and to widen the opportunities of trade for the producers of Canada's goods.

Now, let me trespass a little upon the time of the House to give a few facts with regard to the values respectively of the greatest of Canada's products on either side of the boundary line. The quotation that I have is from November 15, and is as follows:

	Wpg.	Minn.	Difference.
1 Northern wheat... ..	98⅝	1.05⅝	(7)
2 Northern wheat... ..	95	1.03⅝	(8)
3 Northern wheat... ..	90½	1.01	(10½)
No. 2 C. W. oats.. ..	40⅜	46½	(.06)
No. 3 barley..	65	1.20	(.55)
No. 4 barley..	55	1.12	(.57)
Feed barley	50	1.05	(.55)
No. 1 N. W. flax.. ..	1.87	2.04	(.17)

In order to understand the matter thoroughly it is necessary to bear in mind that No. 3 Northern wheat in Canada is equal to No. 1 Northern wheat in Minneapolis; that Canadian oats are 34 pounds to the bushel and Minnesota oats 32 pounds to the bushel. But there are other products besides grain. Let us consider the prices of cattle. On November 18 for choice butchers' cattle at Winnipeg, the top price was $5 per cwt., and choice export cattle $4.75 per cwt. In Chicago on the same day, beeves were from $4.40 to $9.10; western steers $4.30 to $7.30; stockers and feeders, $2.90 to $5.75. You will notice, Mr. Speaker, that stockers and feeders were worth 75 cents per cwt. more in Chicago than choice export steers were worth in Winnipeg. Texas steers in Chicago were $4 to $5.75. On August 25 grass-fed steers were $4 to $4.50 in Winnipeg, and $7 to $7.10 in Chicago. Now, in order to give an idea as to what these figures mean, let us understand how many bushels of this wheat, and barley, and flax, and oats, and how many head of cattle are to be disposed of each season. The Grain Dealers' Association of Winnipeg estimates the total wheat crop at 178,000,000 bushels, of which they expect that the farmers will sell 130,000,000 bushels. The oat crop is estimated at 187,000,000 bushels, the barley crop at 33,000,000 bushels, the flax crop at 5,500,000 bushels. To be well within the mark in making the calculations I will take, not the figures of this year's crop, which is larger than last year's, but the figures of the crop of last year as inspected by government inspectors—that is the crop that actually passed out of the farmer's hands, and was inspected for market purposes.

There was of wheat 84,000,000 bushels, of oats 28,000,000 bushels, of barley 4,000,000 bushels, of flax 3,500,000 bushels; and of cattle there were exported 46,000 head.

Now, Sir, estimating the loss to the western farmer by the rejection of reciprocity at 6 cents per bushel on his wheat, and estimating that he sells all this year's crop, on 84,000,000 bushels he loses $5,000,000; and if we add for the increased crop of this year 46,000,000 bushels, he loses $2,225,000 more. On the 28,000,000 bushels of oats, at a loss of 5 cents a bushel he loses $1,500,000; on 4,000,000 bushels of barley, at a loss of 50 cents a bushel, he loses $2,000,000; on 3,500,000 bushels of flaxseed, at a loss of 15 cent a bushel, he loses $500,000. On 46,000 head of live cattle, at 1,200 pounds per head, estimating the loss at only one cent per pound, he loses another $500,000. On the transactions of this current year, taking the minimum of exports, taking the actual market prices of the present day, the farmers of the three prairie provinces lose no less than $12,000,000, as a result of the rejection of the arrangement to admit their products free of duty into the United States markets. Estimating the population of the three provinces at a million and a half, it means $8 a head for every man, woman and child in town and country throughout those provinces, as a result of the vote of the 21st of September. But if you say that one-third of the population is in the towns, then it means $12 per head for every person residing outside the towns, on the land. Estimating each family at five persons, it means that each family of five occupying land in those prairie provinces, loses this year $60 as a result of the accession of our hon. friends to office. I want to say to them, talented though they may be, worthy though they may be in many respects, from our point of view the price is too high, they are not worth the money.

I said something about monopolies, trusts and combines. I have given the House the result of the triumph of the monopolies, trusts and combines on one end of the farmers' transaction. Let me give a little light on the other end, that is to say, on the buying end of the farmers' necessities. It is given on good authority that the Cockshutt Plough Company of Brantford, which makes an eight-furrow engine gang plough, sells that plough at Brantford for $600. They sell the same plough in Winnipeg at $680; in Saskatoon the same plough costs $705. But this infant industry which requires a protection of some 17½ per cent tariff to prevent those villainous Yankees from selling ploughs in Canada, it appears, is able to pay a 15 per per cent duty and sell their ploughs in the United States. The remarkable thing is that after paying the 15 per cent tariff duty, they sell their plough at Peoria, Illinois, at $525, and at Minneapolis at $502. The same plough that is sold in Brantford at $600 is sold in Minneapolis at $502, after paying a 15 per cent duty besides the freight. There is no manner of doubt that interests such as the Cockshutt Plough Company did feel a stupendous relief as a result of the election.

Now, we have heard it said that the victory was won by economic argument. We have had the refutation of that to-night from the lips of the Minister of Finance. He said, however, that there was no reason why the people of Canada should not vote on the national aspect as well as the economic aspect. I want to say that I fully agree with him. There is no reason why the people of any country should not decide a question on national as well as economic considerations. I am absolutely at one with him on that point. He said further that the decision was given on economic considerations as well as national, and not because of appeals to prejudice and passion. Well, I would not contradict my hon. friend, but I would suggest that his memory is at fault. I will trouble the House to read only a few samples of the arguments that were made, to show how far they were removed from any relation to economics, and how closely they were related to passion and prejudice. I will only refer to one or two. Probably the leading newspaper in the campaign which defeated the plain people of this country on behalf of the mergers, trusts and combines, was the Montreal 'Star.'

The Montreal 'Star' of September 20, the day before the election, in a double column article on the first page, contains the very last appeal to the electors, and almost the first paragraph is as follows:

> The vote will decide whether Canada is to remain a distinct nation or is to become an appendage of the American Republic.

Our old friend of the Toronto 'World,' on September 2, used this careful phrasing, this sane and hard-headed appeal to economics. The 'World' was satirising the Liberal position, and it said:

> Let us be hewers of wood and drawers of water for them; let us dig and plant and sow for them; let us reap and thresh for them and sell to them; let us be their bond slaves and the hired men slaves of their politicians, and the hired men of their merchants. We shall finger their greenbacks, and we shall sing the praise of the star spangled banner, and by and by we shall be allowed to vote for their President.

What does my hon. friend the Minister of Finance think of that economic argument? I think I can see him blush; I hope I can, at any rate. I think I heard the leader of the government declare in his place in the House that the economic argument was the principal argument. I think he denied that it was the sole argument, but he declared it was the principal argument in the campaign so far as he was concerned. But, I find on September 18, three days before the election, as reported in the Toronto 'World,' he issued one of his numerous manifestos, and I find the following paragraph in that manifesto:

> Throughout this Dominion the electorate now understand that they are called upon to determine not a mere question of markets, but the future destiny of Canada, and perhaps the empire.

Mr. BORDEN. Hear, hear.

Mr. OLIVER. My hon. friend does not blush; I am sorry. We have another specimen of economic argument, which introduces another feature, from the Toronto 'News,' dated September 5, under the heading 'Play Borden.' The 'News' cogitates in this way:

> Suppose on the other hand that the rest of Canada regrets this insidious advice and gives Borden not 75 but 100, 105, 110, Quebec will add its quota to his following for the opposition to Liberalism in Quebec is far from being confined to Nationalism. At once he is placed in the saddle, what then? Will he conduct the business of Canada glancing over his shoulder at the Nationalists? The way to answer that is to ask what be the source of his strength in Ontario and, once reciprocity is cleared out of the way, the entire west, that is where he will look for inspiration.
>
> Thus the British Canadian in this juncture is offered his choice. He can vote for Laurier, and deadlock for Laurier and government to satisfy the Nationalists.
>
> He can vote for Borden and a policy which will pay undue deference to no one section of public opinion.

We have a despatch from London appearing in the Toronto 'World,' and which is as follows:

> Among the more modern of the tariff reform morning newspapers, the feeling of triumph is tempered by expressions of regret at the disappearance from political life of such a staunch Imperialist as Sir Wilfrid Laurier, and the recognition that the victory is partly due to the Bourassa party. These papers declare they are glad that R. L. Borden has a majority large enough to render him independent of Mr. Bourassa's support.

We have another authority that we may quote on this question of economic argument and to settle the point as to whether passion and prejudice or economics had most to do with the result of the 21st in this province of Ontario. The 'Orange Sentinel' of September 28, says:

Sir Wilfrid Laurier and his colleagues evidently miscalculated the strength of the sentiment of loyality to the mother country. They depended on the selfish tendencies of Canadians, whose natural desire to add to their material prosperity the ministers imagined was stronger than their determination to resist any movement that might have in it the germ of separation from the empire. The appeal of the Liberal party was to the pocket; that of the Conservatives to national pride and love of the flag. In a most emphatic way the country pronounced in favour of the policy which puts national integrity first. Canadians will take their chances of prosperity under the present tariff rather than jeopardize their future political condition.

Defeat was due to our roused Protestantism as much as to reciprocity.

There grew up a settled conviction in the minds of Ontario citizens, Liberals and Conservatives, that the time had come to put an end to Catholic rule in the Dominion.

And my hon. friend said that there was no passion or prejudice in this campaign that achieved the victory of September 21.

Now, Mr. Speaker, again I say that I have no quarrel with my hon. friend the Finance Minister when he says that there is every reason why a self-respecting country ought to put national considerations before economic considerations. If the victory of September 21 had been won on national considerations there would be no fault to find, but, when the economic considerations upon which the victory was won were the economic considerations which take out of the pocket of the western producer the sum of $12,000,000 in cash in this present year, and when that is done at the demand of the transportation companies, the milling interests and the manufacturers of Ontario and of every class, kind and condition of selfish interest that was brought together in the campaign, I say the victory was not won for national interests, but that it was a victory of sectional interests of the most debasing and destructive kind. If we are to have a Canadian nation, Canadian nationality must be based on fair and equal opportunity to all the people of the Dominion according to the conditions surrounding them and that government which deliberately and definitely takes from the people that opportunity is pursuing a policy and manifesting a spirit which are not such as will build up a Canadian nationalism. My hon. friend the Minister of Finance said to-night, in effect, that the western farmer should not be allowed to sell his wheat in Minneapolis, because, in the interest of Canadian nationality, if you please, it ought to be milled in Canada. It can be milled in Canada to-day and it could be milled in Canada to-morrow if reciprocity had become the law, if the milling companies would pay the fair market price for the farmers' wheat.

These men who talk of Canadian patriotism, and ask that the western farmer shall be sacrificed to their selfish interests, let them show their patriotism by paying the farmers a fair market price for their product, and not come into the political campaign to prevent the farmer from getting access to the market he can reach to the best advantage to himself. I say that if the transportation companies, and the millers, and the manufacturers of this province of Ontario; if this financial oligarchy which sits at Toronto and Montreal is to sacrifice the interests of the people of all the rest of the Dominion to their interests, that is not the way to build up a Canadian patriotism, it is not the way to build up a Canadian nationality. And, I say it is absolutely to be demonstrated out of the mouths of those who have spoken on the other side that that and that alone is what the defeat of reciprocity means. It means that these interests combined—assisted from the other side of the line, and even from the other side of the water—to fasten upon this country the control of monopolies, trusts and combines, such as has not been fastened upon the neck of any other country, and my friend who sits opposite is the means and instrument by which this is being done.

They have told us that reciprocity meant the handing over of Canada and Canadian trade to the monopolies, trusts and mergers of the United States, and they tell us that the United States is full of trusts and mergers, and so it is. But it is again a remarkable fact that these same trusts, and mergers in the United States were fighting reciprocity on that side of the line just as ours were fighting it on this side of the line. Let me point out however, and it is worth the while of the plain people of this country to understand it, that the beef trust of the United States pays a higher price for the farmers' product and sells the result of their manufacture to the consumer at a lower price than does the beef trust of Canada; that the milling trusts of the United States pays the United States farmer more for his wheat and sells the flour cheaper to the consumer than does the milling trust of Canada; that the manufacturer of the United States pays higher wages and sells his product at a lower price than does the Canadian manufacturer. I say that the conclusion is irresistible that though Canada has been pluming itself in the belief that while the people to the south of the line were cursed with trusts, mergers and combines, we were free of them, the fact is that this financial oligarchy in Montreal and Toronto holds this country under the control of trusts, mergers and combines more merciless, more comprehensive, more pitiless, than are the trusts, mergers and combines of the United States.

Mr. BORDEN. May I ask my hon. friend a question?

Mr. OLIVER. Yes.

Mr. BORDEN. How long has this dreadful condition of affairs prevailed?

Mr. OLIVER. This condition is a growing condition; it is growing in Canada as it has been growing in the United States and the reciprocity proposal was the means to be taken by the people of Canada—one step at any rate—to shake themselves loose from its grasp. Did this list of philanthropists in the city of Toronto get out to fight reciprocity from motives of pure Canadian patriotism, or did they get out and fight it because they felt that reciprocity was an attack upon the special privileges that they were holding at that time and that they would not hold in such great degree if reciprocity passed. Why was it that the manufacturers of this country lined up their employees before the election and told them in so many words that if reciprocity carried the factories would close, and told them that whether they were affected by reciprocity or not. It was because there was a combine of combines to defeat this proposal which would at any rate have opened the door to a better condition of things in regard to trade matters in this country. Don't let these gentlemen forget that the people of this country know whom they were fighting and what they were fighting, when the last campaign was on, and don't let them forget that so far from the battle having ended the battle has only begun.

Mr. SCHAFFNER. It is a very poor beginning for you.

Mr. OLIVER. My hon. friend should not speak too loud; he had quite a chase to save his neck.

Mr. SCHAFFNER. I got here all the same.

Mr. OLIVER. I rather think that with the experience the country is likely to have during the next four years my hon. friend will find the sledding a little harder next time.

Mr. SCHAFFNER. Speak about the present.

Mr. OLIVER. It was said from every anti-reciprocity platform and in every anti-reciprocity newspaper that this campaign was a campaign of Canadian patriotism and imperial loyalty. Did these hon. gentlemen ever think that when they arrogated to themselves the whole of the Canadian patriotism and the whole of the imperial loyalty of this country they were placing Canada in a very sorry position in the eyes of the empire. If they were able to prove their case that those who voted for reciprocity were disloyal and unpatriotic, then there is only a difference of 43,000 votes in the million and a quarter cast, between loyalty and disloyalty. Our friends opposite have proved too much.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Oh.

Mr. OLIVER. I say they have proved too much because they have brought into question their own loyalty and their own patriotism. I am one of those who considers that my loyalty to Canada is involved in my loyalty to the empire, and that the maintenance of the prestige of the empire is a guarantee to Canada of her rights and liberties and the opportunities of her citizens. I am bound to say that although the triumph of our friends on the other side, on the 21st of September, has laid a heavy burden on the people of this country, yet they would be willing to bear that burden if the interests of Canada and the empire demanded it. But there have been developments since this parliament met which bring seriously into question, not only the good faith of our friends on the other side in this matter of Imperial loyalty, but their actual loyalty itself. The amendment which is before you, Mr. Speaker, is of more than an academic character. It is a test by which we find where this government stands on this question of imperial loyalty. They have asked to be judged on that question. They have admitted that economics were not the most important part of their argument and they have asked to be judged by the test of their loyalty to the empire.

It will be remembered that two years ago there was a German war scare, as the result of which a resolution was unanimously adopted by this House, and that resolution was the basis of a most important departure by Canada in the matter of imperial defence. The government accepted that resolution as it was offered; and taking the responsibility that properly rests upon the shoulders of a government, appreciating the demands of the situation and voicing, as they believed, the opinion of the country, they proceeded to take measures to aid in the naval defence of the empire. Time will not admit of a full discussion of the merits of their proposals, but I will say this, that their proposals were absolutely in line with the resolution which was unanimously passed by this House and that the steps which were being taken were taken with due consideration. They were taken in the face of strenuous and disloyal opposition—an opposition that might very well have caused the government to hesitate before taking such an important departure. Notwithstanding that opposition, the government of the day went forward with their naval policy. That policy has been ridiculed. Some of our hon. friends on the other side objected to it because the vessels were not big enough, and others objected because the vessels proposed were going to cost too much and would take too long to build. Well, let me say that with regard to this naval proposition, it was one which was accepted by the British authorities as satisfactory to them. It was also in line with the autonomy of Canada, and was of a character which would give the Canadian government its best defence in time of war. Who is there who does not know that Britain's danger in time of war is not greater from the Dreadnoughts of the enemy than from the enemy's privateers preying upon the commerce on which Great Britain depends from week to week for the living of her people. Will those people who say that Canada should build Dreadnoughts tell me how a Dreadnought could protect Canadian boats when traversing the ocean from Canadian to British ports from the privateers of any country that might be at war with Britain? I say that the policy of a cruiser navy was the only sound policy for Canada, if the interests of Canada and Britain were to be properly served. A Dreadnought in the battle line in the North sea would not prevent the people of England from being starved for wheat. I would not be astonished at anything the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Monk), might say, but it did occur to me, when he was declaring that the one thing which we needed for the defence of our country was to build Dreadnoughts, that in this he was differing from so eminent an authority as Lord Charles Beresford, and I may be permitted to take Lord Charles Beresford in preference to the Minister of Public Works with regard to naval matters.

But whether we agree with the policy of the government or not, whether we want cruisers or Dreadnoughts, it was the consensus of opinion of this country, it was the settled policy of the government of this country, that Canada should participate in the defence of the empire, and that a definite, tangible policy should be entered upon for assisting in that defence.

Two years ago there was a German warscare. Well, what is the condition to-day? If there was necessity to prepare for naval defence two years ago, how much greater is that necessity to-day? Two years ago there was merely a suspicion of danger, but to-day Germany and England are exchanging what are practically defiances. It is admitted that the only security which the British Empire has to-day is the British fleet; and that without that fleet the prestige of Britain would be gone and the liberties of Canada would be endangered.

My hon. friend the Minister of Public Works said that he supported the unanimous resolution of the House because, he said, 'I and my friends are not those to fall back in the matter of aid at a time of stress and necessity.' That was two years ago; but to-day he sits a member of a government, at a time when those two countries are exchanging defiances, and although every effort has been made for more than a week to get a definite declaration of policy from that government, it has not been possible to get such a declaration. There is no effort at assistance of Britain; there is no effort at preparation for a navy. What we have on the record is that the Minister of Marine has stated to this House that the steps which had been taken by the previous government are to be cancelled, that the Admiralty is to be consulted. We are bound to assume, from what has been said, that before this government formulates a policy, a plebiscite will be taken. In other words, this government which came into power on a cry of loyalty to the empire at the time of the empire's greatest danger—and I say that the empire admittedly, never since the days of Napoleon the First, has been in greater danger than it has been within the past two months. Does anybody deny it? I would not trouble to discuss the matter with any gentleman who would deny it in the face of the facts. I say that at such a time this party, elected on a policy of loyalty to the empire, cancel the preparations that were made by their predecessors to assist in the defence of the empire, and bring forward no other proposition in its place, and on the face of the record, cannot be expected to bring forward any proposition for the space of a year or two years. Worse than that, so far as we have been able to get anything from these gentlemen, we are bound to conclude that they not only have no policy with regard to naval defence, but that they do not intend to have any policy with regard to naval defence—that they propose to put this question to a vote of the people of Canada. They have rejected the proposals of the late government, they have already by resolution in this House placed themselves against a direct contribution, and under these circumstances it cannot be expected that the people of Canada will vote for a naval policy. These gentlemen think that they are escaping responsibility by refusing to declare themselves on this subject. That might be true if the circumstances were other than they are. But I say that under the circumstances which have occurred during the past two months, when only yesterday the telegraph wires were awaiting and expecting an announcement that might have meant war, these gentlemen cannot escape responsibility by saying that they have no policy. The responsibility is there, and they must discharge it or be held responsible for not living up to their professions. Mr. Speaker, the question is too serious to bring it down to the point of showing the lack of good faith on the part of those who achieved power on a cry of loyalty and then go absolutely contrary to the most pressing and urgent necessity of the case, a more pressing and urgent necessity than has ever occurred before in the history of this confederation. I am compelled to draw only one conclusion. We have been told that the government is in accord on this question. We have it on record that certain members of this government have the promise of the Premier that the naval question will be submitted to a vote of the people before any action is taken. Then, if this government is in accord, and if the member of the government who has made that statement has told the truth, there is no question that the naval policy of this country, the policy of maintenance of the prestige of Britain, is dictated by that section of the government which represents an idea and a campaign that to my mind is neither more nor less than a campaign of disloyalty to Canada and disloyalty to the empire. We are not ignorant of the campaign that has been made by the party called Nationalists in the province of Quebec. We know what the ideals are that that party has expressed. Are they the ideals of a united Canada? Are they the ideals of a strong empire? These men are not Nationalists; they are Separatists. If I read their utterances aright, if I gather correctly their ideal, it is the ideal of a separate state on the banks of the St. Lawrence, and not the ideal of a united Canada or the ideal of a strong British Empire. And these men sit in the councils of the government, and, so far as the record shows, dictate its policy on that question which is to-day most vital to the interests of Canada and of the empire.

This government is a coalition, so it is said. If so, it is a coalition on these terms, that the party of the Nationalists, the party of sectionalism, has agreed to support the mergers, trusts and combines in grinding the faces of the producer and consumer throughout Canada, in consideration of the party of loyalty which to-day represents those trusts, mergers and combines of this country, assisting to attain the ideal of the Separatist party for the establishment of a separate state on the banks of the St. Lawrence.

Mr. Speaker, the economic question that was decided on the 21st of September—that was decided adversely to the best interests of the people—was an important question; it was important from a national and from an imperial, and if you like, from an international and world-wide point of view. The proposal was a step in advance in the interests of the common people of two great countries. To that extent it was important. But, Mr. Speaker, I consider that the development that has taken place since the 21st of September, is still more important. I am one of those who agree with the Minister of Finance (Mr. White), and in that I may be agreeing with the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Foster) that the national interests and imperial interests are greater than economic interests. And, to my mind, the question of what the attitude of Canada is to be in this matter of the naval defence of the empire is even more important than the question as to whether the monopolies, trusts and combines shall control the affairs of this country for the next four years. And I should be satisfied to fight it out with them on that line, on the merits of the case, on the economics of the question. But I say that when they enter into an alliance, such as, apparently, they have entered into, whereby the interests of the empire itself are being sacrificed, then I have no words in which to express my opinion of that government and that arrangement. Mr. Speaker, I will vote for the amendment.

Mr. W. M. MARTIN (Regina). Mr. Speaker, I desire to claim the attention of the House for a very short time to discuss some of the questions which have been brought before us in this debate. I have no apology to make for taking up the time of the House, and particularly so in view of the fact that no one from the province of Saskatchewan has yet spoken in this debate.

I join in the congratulations expressed by hon. members on both sides of the House to the mover and seconder of the address for the exceedingly able way in which they presented their views. I join also in the congratulations expressed in the speech from the Throne on the fact that Canada to-day is prosperous, that trade has increased by leaps and bounds. And I say that it will stand as a lasting monument to the late administration that our foreign trade went up from $225,000,000 in 1896 to $800,000,000 in 1911. I congratulate the government also on some of the planks of the platform—

if I may so express it—laid down in the speech from the Throne. I notice that the government intends to push forward the construction of the Hudson Bay railway. As a western man, I commend and congratulate the government upon adopting the policy of the late government on that subject. I notice in the remarks, some of them very eloquent, made by the hon. member from Brandon (Mr. Aikins), in this debate, that he could not leave the question of the Hudson Bay railway where it stood in the speech from the Throne, but had to get in a 'knock' at the late government, for having, as he said, promised for years to build that railway, yet not having done it. Every man who has been in this House for three years, every man who has read the political history of those years, knows that the late government did not promise to build that road until three years ago. It was in August or September, 1908, I believe, that Sir Wilfrid Laurier, the present leader of the Opposition, promised that his government would adopt as its policy the construction at an early day of the Hudson Bay railway. Everybody knows that in the first session of parliament in January, 1909, a vote of this House was taken providing $150,000 for the construction of that road. And in the second session of the parliament, in 1910, a further estimate of $500,000 was voted for the construction of a bridge across the Saskatchewan at La Pas. And, during the last session of that parliament, the contract was let for the first hundred and seventy-five miles of that road. I have heard—I do not know if it is true—that the present government cancelled that contract, or at least discontinued the work of construction. I see the Minister of Railways and Canals (Mr. Cochrane) is not in his place. I would like to know whether it is true or not that the work has been stopped. I can assure you, Mr. Speaker, that the people of western Canada as a whole, would view such a condition of affairs with great disappointment. The hon. member for Brandon pictured eloquently the situation that exists in places in regard to railways in western Canada. Every hon. member in this House agrees that the building of the Hudson Bay railway is necessary in order to partially solve the transportation problem. The people of western Canada, and I speak especially for the people of Regina district, whom I have the honour to represent, will view with disappointment the action of the government, should it be true that they have discontinued the building of the 175 miles of the Hudson Bay railway.

The speech from the Throne informs us also that the government intends to appoint a tariff commission. I want to place myself on record as being against a tariff commission, should that step mean placing upon that commission the responsibility for tariffs and taxation and taking it from the government and from parliament where it belongs. I think I am correct in saying that the first suggestion of a tariff commission came from the Canadian Manufacturers Association. I must say I view with suspicion any suggestion for the appointment of such a commission that comes from that association. They have only one end in view, and that is to increase the tariff and put more money from the pockets of the consumer into the pockets of the Canadian manufacturer. And I have very little hope that a government as at present constituted, when every man on that side of the House is getting up and making protectionist speeches,—I have little hope that, for the number of years this government may remain in power there will be any reduction in tariff or taxation for the benefit of the people. What is a tariff commission for? They say it is to obtain information. I say if they want information, let them increase the staff in the Department of Trade and Commerce and get their information through that department. I noticed in the newspapers a suggestion as to the tariff commission. I do not know from what source it comes, and I have some hesitation in referring to it, because both the men spoken of are personal friends of my own. I notice that it is suggested to appoint a certain gentleman residing in the city of Toronto who has been writing articles in magazines in favour of increased tariffs, and at the same time in favour of a tariff commission. That is one of the men that, according to the newspapers, the present government intends to appoint to the tariff commission. I also note that they intend to appoint the present paid agent of the Canadian Manufacturers' Association, who has been coming down to Ottawa for years urging both the late government and the present government to increase the tariff. I presume he is already at Ottawa asking the present government to renew the bounties on iron and steel. So I say to the government that if that is the kind of a tariff commission they are going to appoint, we in the west, at all events, will have very little confidence in it, so far as reduced taxation is concerned.

Now, I will refer briefly to this question of reciprocity. I did not take an opportunity of speaking upon it when the debate ran four or five months in succession in the last House of Commons. I will say now, however, that if hon. gentlemen opposite think that reciprocity is dead, as the Finance Minister seems to think, they are making a big mistake, for it is a very live corpse indeed. The Minister of Finance did not deal with any other subject, at any rate while I was present in the House, except that dead subject of reciprocity, and he tried to show why the people of Canada rejected it on the 21st of September. I will tell you why reciprocity was defeated. I believe that in western Canada, in the province of Manitoba, as well as in Saskatchewan and Alberta, reciprocity was discussed on its merits; but I do not believe that it was discussed on its merits in any other province of the Dominion of Canada. I lived in the province of Ontario for many years until a few years ago when I went west. I took some interest in politics in Ontario before I left for Saskatchewan, and I can tell this House that in western Ontario, one of the things that helped to defeat reciprocity was the anti-Catholic and the anti-French feeling in that part of the province. I can say further that in the county in which I was brought up, when I went to cast my first vote—I was only 21 years of age then—I was approached by Conservatives, by two or three prominent men who said to me: You must not vote for Sir Wilfrid Laurier, because he is a Frenchman and a Catholic. I have heard that said dozens of times in the province of Ontario, and I say without hesitation that in my belief one of the things that defeated reciprocity was the anti-French and anti-Catholic feeling. And yet these hon. gentlemen deprecate appeals to sectionalism, and pretend to blame us on this side of the House for appealing to that sentiment. I do not believe there is a man in the Dominion of Canada who, during the past fifteen years, has done more to cement the two races, French and English, together than Sir Wilfrid Laurier has done. He has always stood for equal rights and equal privileges to all, he has always pursued a course that I believe was in the best interests of all the provinces of this great Dominion.

Another thing that defeated reciprocity, we felt it in the west to a certain extent, was the loyalty cry. We were told, you cannot trade with the United States without affecting the loyalty of Canadians. I am not going to refer to that further. Another thing that helped to defeat reciprocity, was the money of the manufacturers, the combines and the trusts of this country, and if reports are true, the money of the manufacturers, the combines and the trusts not only of this country but of the United States, all combined to defeat reciprocity and to keep us in the west, at all events, from getting the advantages of reciprocity. The people in the province of Ontario did not think it was of any use to them, but we in the west thought it was a great deal of use to us, and I venture to say that there is not a man in this House from Manitoba, unless it be the hon. member for Winnipeg (Mr. Rogers) and the hon. member for Brandon (Mr. Aikins) who will say that he does not believe reciprocity would be in the best interest of every man living in western Canada to-day. The men from Manitoba think they gained a great victory; but I would point out to you that reciprocity was a fairly popular issue in the province of Manitoba, outside of the city of Winnipeg. The hon. member for Brandon, who I am sorry to see is not in his place to-day, endeavoured to prove that the farmers of Manitoba and the farmers of the west—I think he used that expression—voted against reciprocity, and he told us why the farmers of the west voted against reciprocity. At the same time, the hon. member for Brandon himself was defeated by the vote of the farmers in his own constituency by no less than 124, and he got his majority in the city of Brandon. The hon. member for Brandon well knows that so far as the farmers of the west are concerned, and the farmers of the constituency of Brandon, they were in favour of reciprocity. The hon. member for Souris (Mr. Schaffner) for whom I have a great deal of respect, knows very well that reciprocity was a most popular issue with the farmers in his constituency, because his majority which, in 1908, was about 860, was cut down in 1911 to 64. The hon. member for Macdonald (Mr. Staples) knows that he had the chase of his life in the recent election campaign, and he knows how popular reciprocity was with the farmers of his constituency. The hon. member for Lisgar (Mr. W. H. Sharpe) actually crawled into this House on the issue of reciprocity, with a majority, I think of 16 or 20 votes. The hon. the Secretary of State himself, whom I congratulate on his preferment, saw his majority of 760 in 1908 reduced to 126 in 1911. And still they tell us that reciprocity was not a popular issue in the province of Manitoba. Now, in the province of Saskatchewan there was only one side to the question; there is no doubt that in Saskatchewan both Liberals and Conservatives were in favour of reciprocity. And mark you, Mr. Speaker, the criticisms that were made in the province of Saskatchewan were not against the reciprocity pact; they were in favour of lower taxation, and larger markets, better markets for our farm products, cheaper agricultural machinery, and the complaint was that the reciprocity agreement did not go far enough, that it should go further. In order to prove to you what the people of Saskatchewan think of reciprocity, I will refer you to the resolution that was passed in the legislature of that province in the spring of 1911. The resolution was passed unanimously, both Liberals and Conservatives voting for it, and it represents very well the opinions of the people on that subject.

Mr. STAPLES. Tell us about your homestead inspector.

Mr. MARTIN (Regina). I will give the hon. gentleman an opportunity of proving, if he can, that there was a single homestead inspector in the province of Saskatchewan who took any part in the recent election.

Mr. STAPLES. I have not got a list of them, but I will tell the hon. gentleman that every homestead inspector in the province of Saskatchewan was most active, every one of them.

Mr. MARTIN (Regina). I know something about the province of Saskatchewan. I won't venture to speak for the northern part of it, but I will venture to speak for my own constituency and the adjoining constituencies, and I will say this on my responsibility as a member of this House, that there was not a solitary inspector in my district or in the adjoining districts, who took any part in the recent Dominion elections. I will say further for the benefit of the hon. gentleman, that the Conservative party in Manitoba during the recent election has nothing to be proud of. The Liberal party, fighting a battle for larger markets, for lower prices for agricultural implements and reduced taxation, was opposed by a political machine in the province of Manitoba which has not its equal in the whole history of Canada, a political machine that has not hesitated on many occasions to prostitute justice to political ends, a machine which demands that every hotelkeeper in the province of Manitoba should be a Tory, a political machine, further, that is not satisfied with fighting through its paid officials in the federal elections, but which, during the provincial elections in Saskatchewan, shipped those officials in there by the dozen to draw the wool over the eyes of the people of Saskatchewan. Up to the present time they have not succeeded very well in doing so. But I was going to read the resolution that was passed by the legislature of the province of Saskatchewan, passed unanimously, supported by every Conservative member as well as every Liberal in the legislature. What did it say? It simply regrets that the reciprocity agreement did not go far enough in the way of reduced taxation and larger markets. I will read the resolution, because it shows clearly, to my mind, what the people of Saskatchewan think of reciprocity, and what they think of any measure to reduce taxation that may be brought before this parliament.

That this House is of opinion that the proposed reciprocal trade arrangement between Canada and the United States will be a benefit to the people of Saskatchewan.

That while expressing this opinion, this House is nevertheless of the opinion that the proposed arrangement does not fully meet the desires of the people of Saskatchewan with regard to general tariff reduction.

That this House also desires to express itself as strongly in favour of a Canadian trade policy looking to an immediate increase of the British preference and the ultimate establishment of free trade within the empire.

Also that in the opinion of this House the said agreement by its promotion of the prosperity and development of Canada will thereby greatly strengthen Canada's power for Imperial defence and thus directly assist the British Empire.

And further, that in the opinion of this House the duties on agricultural implements should at an early date be further reduced if not abrogated.

This resolution passed the House unanimously. So, the situation in Saskatchewan and the west in general was not that the reciprocity agreement was taking away a certain amount of protection from the manufacturers in Ontario or, as was said in this House, taking away one of the bulwarks of protection, but the Conservatives in Saskatchewan actually said: You are not taking away sufficient protection from the manufacturers. I say to hon. gentlemen opposite, and I say to every hon. member of this House that if you are labouring under any delusion that reciprocity or the principle involved in reciprocity, that is larger markets and reduced taxation to the farmers of the west, is dead, you are living in a fool's paradise.

I was somewhat surprised at the remarks made by the hon. member for Brandon (Mr. Aikins) in this House and also at the remarks reported to have been made by him in an address which he gave before the Canadian Club in the city of Montreal. I have read his speech delivered in Montreal very carefully and I see he is reported to have said that there was a division between the east and the west, and that we will have to take measures to prevent it. As far as the part of the country from which I came is concerned there has been no division and there is no division now. We think in western Canada that eastern Canada might have sympathized a little with the west by voting for reciprocity which was in our interests because it would give us access to the larger markets of the United States. The east did not see fit to do so and we bow to its decision, but in the course of time the population of western Canada will be such that it will overwhelm the voters in eastern Canada, and we will insist upon the right to gain access to larger markets and to trade with the United States. There are some natural divisions between the east and the west; there is no question about that. Coming down from the west to the city of Ottawa a person travels through Northern Ontario for hundreds of miles where, as far as you can see there is nothing for cultivation purposes. There are no inhabitants practically and this is one of the natural divisions between the east and the west. I say to you who live in eastern Canada that you must be prepared to sacrifice something for the benefit of western Canada. We in the west are prepared to meet you half way. Up to the present eastern Canada has not met us half way. During the last twenty-five or thirty years, or ever since western Canada has had a political and commercial existence, we have been bled by the railway corporations and bled by the Canadian manufacturers by means of an unjust tariff. We are not going to stand for that kind of thing from now on to the end of time. Take the question of freight rates; we have been suffering from that unjust burden. The hon. member for Calgary (Mr. Bennett) knows that what I say is correct. I will not take up the time of the House, because I have not the statistics here to give you the figures if I chose to do so, but I will tell you that freight rates in western Canada are undoubtedly higher than they are in the northern states or than they are in eastern Canada.

Mr. SCHAFFNER. What was the late government doing that it did not relieve the people from the burden of high freight rates?

Mr. MARTIN (Regina). I am not concerned with what the late government was doing; I am concerned with what the government that has assumed the reins of office is going to do. We are going to look to the future and not to the past. I could give the hon. gentleman (Mr. Schaffner) a great many instances of assistance being given to western Canada by the late government but I do not propose to discuss that question now. I shall not go into details as to the difference in freight rates in western and eastern Canada, but I want to point out two or three instances of discriminations that exist between Winnipeg and Regina. Ship a car load of fourth class freight from Toronto to Winnipeg, and a similar car from Toronto to Regina and the rate to Regina to-day, after allowing for the additional mileage, is $21.60 more than the rate charged on the same class of freight to Winnipeg. On a car of fifth class freight you have to pay $50 more, after allowing for the additional mileage, in shipping to Regina than to Winnipeg. In spite of this discrimination by the railway men of western Canada persons were to be found who said: You are going to injure the Canadian railway corporations. How are you going to injure them? You are going to injure them by bringing in competitive railways from the United States and yet there is no man from the West in this House who would not in one minute support any application from any American railway to come into the southern end of any of these provinces.

Mr. MARTIN.

Yet, the logical outcome of the argument which was used was that you are going to injure the railway corporations.

I also said that one of the troubles that we have to put up with in western Canada is the matter of the tariff. The hon. member for Brandon said that we must get manufacturing institutions into western Canada. It may be possible that in some parts of western Canada that can be done and I am not going to dispute that it may be the case, but in so far as the province of Saskatchewan is concerned I do not think that in my time, or in the time of any hon. gentleman who sits in this House, we will see manufacturing to any extent carried on in that province. We have no water-power, we cannot get cheap fuel, labour is high at the present time and I do not believe that the manufacturer can carry on his business successfully or remuneratively in Saskatchewan. We are purely an agricultural province. I believe that we will more or less remain the agricultural province of the Dominion of Canada. It may be possible that in the city of Calgary, where they have good water-power, they may be able to get a great many manufacturing industries, but I do not think it is at all possible in Regina. But, notwithstanding the fact that there is no division as far as I can gather between the east and the west at the present time, unless the east is prepared to meet us in matters of tariff to some extent the situation will not always continue. Take the Canadian Canners' Combine and let us see what has been the result of the formation of that combine. Right up to the time that the reciprocity agreement was defeated you could buy canned tomatoes, not the canned tomatoes that the hon. member for Colchester (Mr. Stanfield) is accustomed to, at two cans for a quarter or two cans for thirty cents in the city of Regina. Immediately after reciprocity was defeated you could buy two cans of tomatoes for forty-five cents. I could give similar quotations for almost all kinds of canned goods in Regina. What is the cause of the high cost of living to-day in the west as compared with what it is in the east? It has increased in the east but it has not increased to the same extent that it has in western Canada. There are two causes in western Canada for the high cost of living. One is the tariff which puts up the price and the other is the excessive freight rates which we have to pay in western Canada.

Mr. LALOR. Is not the hon. gentleman aware that the price of tomatoes depends largely on crop conditions?

Mr. MARTIN (Regina). I am aware that the price of tomatoes depends on what the Canadian canners combine says it will be, and I should judge from the haste of the hon. member (Mr. Lalor) in rising that he has something to do with the canners' combine, and just as long as we have men in this House of Commons who have made hundred of thousands of dollars out of such a combine there is very little chance for the consumers of the Dominion. I have not studied the cement question sufficiently to say how the tariff affects that commodity, but I know what the railway rates on cement are to western Canada, and I know that you have to pay $3.25 in Regina for the same barrel of cement that costs you $1,20 in Owen Sound. Is it any wonder the people of the west feel that they have been bled more or less by the railway corporations and by the manufacturers of eastern Canada? I say, Sir, that the necessaries of life should be placed on the free list, in the best interests of the consuming masses of the country. Why should we have to pay a tax of 25 per cent or 30 per cent on the woollens we use? Why should men be permitted to make millions of dollars on the tinware and kitchen utensils we use to cook our food, on account of the tariff which protects the manufacturers of these articles? That is how we look at these things in western Canada, and I tell the men of the east that if they are not prepared to meet us by reducing the tariff on certain items, they need not be surprised if a feeling does arise between eastern and western Canada, and if such a feeling does arise it is the manufacturers of eastern Canada who will be to blame. Yes, the manufacturers are loyal just so far as their pocketbooks are concerned. What is Canadian nationality to them but their pocketbooks? There are men in this House of Commons to-day who are proclaiming against the farmers of western Canada and who have actually made millions of dollars out of the consuming masses of this country. I do not know whether or not there is a manufacturer of agricultural implements in this House, and I don't care.

An hon. MEMBER. There are some on your side.

Another hon. MEMBER. In the Senate.

Mr. MARTIN (Regina). Perhaps before I conclude some member on that side will bob up and say he is a manufacturer of agricultural implements. Perhaps the hon. member for Portage la Prairie, who brought the matter up in the House last session, can tell us why it is that in the southern parts of Saskatchewan and Manitoba the farmers pay more for their agricultural implements than the farmers of the adjoining northern states pay for the same implements. I have here figures obtained from implement men, and no doubt they are correct, and they show that in southern Saskatchewan the farmer has to pay $90 for a wagon which in Montana or Minnesota he can buy for $80; that the farmer in southern Saskatchewan pays for five-foot mowers $57, which are bought by the farmer in the northern states for $47.50 each. These figures also show that binders cost the southern Saskatchewan farmer from $150 to $160 each. I am told that last year they sold in Regina for $180, and the same mower can be bought for $140 in the northern states. Then the Saskatchewan farmer has to pay $85 for a gang plough which can be bought for $70 across the line, and $57 for a hay fork which his neighbour in the northern states can purchase at from $28 to $35. How is that explained? Is it fair that the southern Saskatchewan farmer should pay from 10 to 20 per cent more for what he needs than does his brother farmer to the south of the line, just for the benefit of affording protection to the Canadien manufacturers? You can only ascribe the difference in cost to the tariff or to the freight rates, and you can divide the burden on the Canadian farmer between the two just as you please. Now, I have always stood for a moderate tariff, excepting perhaps on the necessaries of life. I have always told the people of my province that I believed it to be in the best interests of the whole Dominion that we should have a moderate protective tariff. But, when the reciprocity agreement, making for reduced taxation and larger markets, was put before the electors, and the eastern manufacturers—by what means it matters not—succeeded in defeating it, headed by the loyal city of Toronto, is it any wonder that there should be a divergence of opinion and a sort of separation existing between eastern and western Canada?

I want to say a word in conclusion about the amendment moved by the right hon. the leader of the opposition. Every one who was in this House last session knows full well that the head of the Nationalist party was the Minister of Public Works, and every one knows that he and the present Prime Minister were then at daggers drawn on the navy question. I saw printed in the newspapers statements that were alleged to have been made by the Nationalists of the province of Quebec and if such statements were made by any man who occupies a seat in this House he does not deserve to be here. Whether they were made or not as alleged, the people in my part of the county have an idea that they were made, and if such statements were made by the Nationalist leaders in Quebec then all I can say is that these men are traitors to their country and their flag. In view of the great divergence of opinion that existed between the two divisions of the present cabinet on the navy question not longer than a few short months ago, I would like some one to tell me: have the traitors given in to the imperialists, or have the imperialists given in to the traitors. The people of Canada would like an answer to that question, and they are entitled to be informed as to what policy on the naval question has succeeded in bringing together the divergent views represented in the present cabinet.

Mr. L. J. GAUTHIER (St. Hyacinthe). When I was returned for the electoral district I have the honour to represent I made up my mind that when first I would address this House I would speak in my own language, it being easier for me to do so, and I thought that if on the 21st September last the voice of Toronto had been heard all over Canada it was nothing but fair that the French voice of Quebec should be heard at least once in a while in the House of Commons, and that my native tongue should have the right accorded to it by the constitution of this country. Since the opening of parliament, Mr. Speaker, you have been appointed to your high office, and prompted by courtesy and deference to you, Mr. Speaker, and also by the desire that my remarks should be understood by the majority of hon. gentlemen in this House, I decided to address the House in the English tongue, although I cannot master it as I would like.

In taking part in this debate I of course understand that I shall not have the sympathy or favour of hon. gentlemen who are supporting the government of the day because every one of them who has taken part in this discussion has declared that speeches were of no use and that we were simply wasting the time of the House and squandering the money of the people in taking up so much time on the question at issue. Well, if we read the remarks which have been made by different members supporting the government, we can quite understand why they should like this debate to be short. For instance, if you take the last utterance of the Finance Minister (Mr. White), he began by saying that he had no connection whatever with corporations, combines, trusts and mergers and that he was free from all entanglements with these concerns, but every one in the country, who will read to-morrow the speech he has made, will be rather surprised to find that the only aspect of the question of reciprocity which he would discuss, that the only argument he advanced against reciprocity in reply to those who opposed the government, was that it was better for the farmers of the west to lose the profit they could make on their grain so long as the railway corporations got the hauling dues on that grain.

Mr. WHITE (Leeds). I never said that.

Mr. GAUTHIER. I want to refer to a remark made by the hon. Minister of Marine and Fisheries (Mr. Hazen). That hon. gentleman told us that the government had decided to cancel the naval policy of the late administration. It is all right for the government to make such a statement, but does the government believe that the people of this country will think for a moment that all the members who sit on the Treasury Benches have come to a decision to set aside the naval policy of the late administration without also having come to an understanding as to their policy which is to take the place of that which they have cancelled. No one will believe that. There is no one who will not come to the conclusion that when this government decided to set aside the naval policy of the late administration, they must, before doing so, have come to some understanding, and we are entitled to know what that understanding or agreement is.

My hon. friend the first minister (Mr. Borden), has said that during the course of the debates in the last two years he did not, it is true, see eye to eye with an hon. colleague the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Monk), but the difference of opinion between them, he claimed was but a small one, it was only regarding the question of a referendum. Well, if I remember aright the leader of the government wanted a referendum because he claimed the late government was not doing enough on the naval question, whereas the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Monk) wanted a referendum because he thought the late government was doing too much and he did not want it to do anything at all. Well, if these two gentlemen have come to an agreement, we are entitled to know what were the terms of that agreement. I must admit that when the hon. the First Minister (Mr. Borden) saw fit to take into his cabinet the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Monk), that hon. gentleman was good enough for me personally. I have no objection to his personality, but the people who, during the late electoral contest, were told by the friends of the hon. Minister of Public Works (Mr. Monk) in the province of Quebec that there were three parties in the Dominion, namely, the Liberal party, having Sir Wilfrid Laurier as its chief, the Conservative party, having Mr. Borden as its chief, and the party of honest men having Mr. Monk as its chief—these people will want to know, and are entitled to know, what agreement has been come to between the Minister of Public Works and his leader. If the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Monk) was the chief of the third party—the party of honest men—the people have the right to know if it is his party which is holding the reins of power to-day; and if it be not, they are entitled to know what were the terms of the understanding by which that hon. gentleman consented to enter the cabinet.

Hon. gentlemen opposite have tried to create the impression and started the legend that we on this side are dissatisfied simply because we are beaten. Not at all. We admit that the people voted against us and we abide by the decision of the people, but if the government, if the First Minister has rights and privileges, we on this side have rights and privileges and have duties to perform, and it is our duty to compel the government to state what were the terms of the agreement entered into with the Minister of Public Works and his party, because otherwise—if we take the resolution of the 29th of March, 1909, and if we take what has been said on the floor of this House by the Minister of Marine and Fisheries (Mr. Hazen), we shall have to come to the conclusion that the government of the day has no policy at all on the naval question. Speaking for myself, it is my opinion no government in Canada should set aside a policy so important as that adopted on the naval question before being in a position to state to the country by what policy they were going to replace the one which they were setting aside.

The late government, in the eyes of its opponents, was a faulty government. That may be, but we claim that, in the management of the affairs of this country, it was loyal to the empire, it was loyal to Canada and true to its principles as set out in the platform of the Liberal convention in 1893.

I claim, Sir, that the late administration was loyal to the empire, and I think we have proved it. What was the government in power at the time of the South African war that was willing that the Canadian soldiers should go and fight for England on the African veldt? Was it not a Liberal government headed by a French Canadian, who our opponents claim was not loyal to the empire? I appeal to the members here who represent the voice of Toronto, and I am not ashamed to tell them that it was a French Canadian and Liberal Prime Minister who, without fear of prejudice, without fear of hatred, proposed to this country a naval policy which did justice to the empire, justice for the autonomy of this country, and justice for all our population, and who, when he went to defeat on that policy, fought like a man, and was defeated like a man. He does not deserve a single reproach, he does not feel a single remorse, and he went out of power with his party without regret, because that party fought like men, and were defeated like men.

Now, the Prime Minister stated that the late administration must have favoured trusts, mergers and combines, because they existed before the 21st of September last. Well, I do not want to discuss that matter with the Prime Minister, but I think he is not doing justice to the people who fought with him in the recent campaign, in which the masses of the people were on one side with the Liberal party, while the trusts, mergers and combines were on the other side with the Conservative party. More than that: I claim that the late administration did its duty in fighting against the trusts. For instance, it enabled the Gall-Schneider Oil Company to fight the Standard Oil Company in 1897; it also fought the American Tobacco Company for the rights of the people.

The Minister of Trade and Commerce said that the late administration reaped what had been sown by its predecessors. But if it was in the same country, with the same population, and the same policy, my hon. friend must admit that the late administration understood that policy, and the needs of the population better than his own party did, because the late administration increased the population, the trade, and the wealth of this country and had surpluses all along, whereas our opponents had deficits during the 18 years of their administration.

Now, I come to my hon. friend the Minister of Public Works. He says he was a Conservative; but, Sir, everybody who followed him or met him on the platform in the last campaign must remember that he stated all over the province of Quebec that he had severed his connection with the party that is now in power, and with the chief of that party, that he had denied to the hon. member who now leads the government the right to give him orders and commands.

Mr. CODERRE. Will the hon. member please tell me where he met Mr. Monk personally during the last campaign?

Mr. GAUTHIER (St. Hyacinthe). Yes, I met him in the town of Lachine, at Cote St. Paul, and at the town of St. Laurent.

Mr. CODERRE. Do you declare on your honour as a member of this House that the statements which you have put in Mr. Monk's mouth were uttered by him on those occasions?

Mr. GAUTHIER (St. Hyacinthe). The declarations made by the hon. Minister of Public Works were not made in a Tory parish, or in the manufacturing centre of Cote St. Paul; but in the parish of St. Laurent, those were the words he used. During the campaign of Drummond and Arthabaska I met the hon. Minister of Public Works on nomination day at Drummondville, and what did he say there? That he did not want any navy for Canada at all, that he was against the navy, that he would fight against the navy, that he had severed his connection with his party on that question, and that he would never go back to the fold of the Conservative party as long as it was in favour of that policy. Now, what did he say on the floor of this House when he took part in this debate? He said that the Prime Minister would choose a type of vessel that would be convenient. What a change of principle. What caused me the greatest surprise was the statement of the hon. Minister of Public Works that he adhered to the resolution of the 29th March, 1909, and the reason he gave for doing so was that it carried out the suggestions made by the British Admiralty, at the Imperial Conference of 1907. But the greatest surprise that I felt was when I heard the Minister of Public Works summing up the whole situation with a cynical impudence—if that term is parliamentary I will use it—by saying: 'We are here, and you are there, and that is the game.' These words will be repeated throughout the whole Dominion of Canada as proving to the people of this country that our opponents did not fight the late administration as statesmen, but as people who wanted to play a game. And, Sir, it is only just that they should be there and that we should be here, because this is our reward and that is their punishment, and the people of Canada will never stand for public men who say on the floor of the House of Commons that politics is a game. If politics is a game, Sir, we do not envy hon. gentlemen opposite their responsibility, but we want them to shoulder the responsibility, and we expect that the people of this country will soon be able to call them to account. When the electors of this country voted on the 21st of September last, they never voted to favour people who were playing a game; but they thought that the hon. gentlemen who have now the reins of government were fighting the fight of the empire and the fight of Canada and were working for the welfare of the whole community. They never supposed that these hon. gentlemen, under the veil of the public welfare, were working for their personal ambitions, merely to secure portfolios in the administration that was to replace the late administration. I do not wish to detain the House, but I wish to say this—that it is without regret that we have crossed the floor of the House—

Some hon MEMBERS. Oh, oh.

Mr. GAUTHIER (St. Hyacinthe). Without regret, I say. Hon. gentlemen opposite who have been 'playing the game' may laugh at such an expression from a representative of the people But, Sir, I utter these words as a representative of the people ; we crossed the floor of this House without regret. We have been true to our policy; we have been true to the trust given us by the people of Canada. The House, by unanimous vote, decided on the 29th March, 1909, that it was time for Canada to work for the speedy organization of a naval service. The government of this country went to work; they decided upon a naval policy after having it endorsed by the Admiralty of His Majesty. We had to face prejudice—we do not complain of that; there is no recrimination whatever on this side. Hon. members opposite try to create the impression in the mind of the people that we are recriminating. Not at all; we bow to the wish of the people knowing that we have done our duty. But, for having done our duty we met opponents who, instead of seeking as statesmen the solution of a public question, as to the navy, decided that it was time to 'play the game.' But if you look at this navy question and at the resolution which was brought before the House in 1909 by the hon. member for North Toronto (Mr. Foster), now Minister of Trade and Commerce, and if you follow the discussion that then took place, you will see that after the House had voted unanimously on the question, the government of that day sent two of its representatives to London to discuss with the British authorities the whole situation of the protection of Canada as a confederation and as part of the empire. They decided on the course that was to be followed. And after the representatives of the government came back, a policy was announced in accordance with the terms of that resolution and with the views of the Admiralty. But, Sir, we have since seen part of our opponents claiming in the English-speaking provinces, that the government did not go far enough, while in the French-speaking province, Quebec, another part of them were claiming that we were going too far. That is the double policy that was followed up to the 21st of September last. But, Sir, the game was not alone on the navy question, but also on the reciprocity pact. Since 1866, the Conservative party, as declared by the utterances of its greatest men, has been in favour of reciprocity in natural products with the United States. There was a clause in the traiff of 1879 which was a standing offer to that effect. In the convention of the Liberal-Conservative party in 1884 this standing offer was made one of the planks of their platform. In 1891, they sent representatives to Washington to discuss the situation and try to enter into a reciprocal pact with the United States. In 1893, the Liberal party at its great convention declared for reciprocity with the United States in natural products. So, the two parties were united on this question, for it was one of the planks in either platform. When the measure was brought down by representatives of the late government, coming back from Washington last session, hon. members who now sit on the Treasury Benches, but who were then sitting to your left, Mr. Speaker, could not believe that the government of that day had succeeded in getting from the United States an acceptance of the policy which up to that time they had always advocated. But, Sir, after the honour of Canada had been pledged to the United States, we found our opponents trying to arouse prejudice and loyalism against the government; trying to arouse hatred against it; trying to represent the members of the late administration as bad Canadians, disloyal to the empire. I suppose this was the other part of the 'game.' We cannot but be aware of the declarations of the different members of the present administration who are now trying to conceal the terms of the understanding that brings together men who were fighting against one another up to the 21st of September last. During the campaign the present Prime Minister (Mr. Borden), held a small meeting for the electors of one section of Montreal in His Majesty's theatre. At the same time, the present Minister of Public Works (Mr. Monk), was holding a meeting in the parish of Cote des Neiges, in the county of Jacques Cartier. And after the meetings, these gentlemen were closeted in the rooms of the Windsor hotel discussing the whole situation. And next morning the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Monk), was on the stump trying to arouse prejudice, not only against the right hon. gentleman (Sir Wilfrid Laurier), who led the government, but against the hon. gentleman (Mr. Borden), who then led the opposition, and who leads the government to-day. 'Small differences of opinion,' they say. I think that when they come before the people it will be hard for them to explain the situation to the people's satisfaction.

I shall vote in favour of this resolution. Not because we on this side pretend that we should have been consulted as to the formation of the cabinet. That is none of our affair,—

Some hon. MEMBERS. Oh, oh.

Mr. GAUTHIER (St. Hyacinthe). Yes, Sir, I say that, and it is true. But the people of this country who have been induced to believe that there was a strong difference of opinion between the leader of the government and the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Monk), are entitled to know the terms of the agreement that has been entered into. I hope that the amendment of the leader of the opposition endment of the leader of the opposition will compel hon. members who sit on the treasury benches to tell us by their votes what they think of it, and I hope for the sake of this country and for the sake of the Conservative party that they will not set aside the naval policy of the late government without telling the people by what they intend to replace it.

Mr. J. J. HUGHES (Kings, P.E.I.). Before this debate closes I deem it my duty to present to the House very briefly the views of my constituents upon the question of reciprocity between this country and the United States, also their views and my own upon the question of our contribution to the Imperial navy, to make it, so far as we can, supreme and invincible upon the ocean; also the views of the people of Prince Edward Island on the very important question of transportation between that province and the mainland. With regard to reciprocity, I notice that several Conservative newspapers and a great many Conservative gentlemen in this House appear to be anxious that the Liberal party should drop it. I am pleased to know from the utterances of the chief spokesman of the Liberal party that there is no idea of dropping that question. If the policy of larger markets and steadier markets was sound, the Liberal party would be unworthy of its name if it dropped that policy. If it was sound a few months ago when the present Minister of Trade and Commerce recommended it in the University Magazine, with some limitations of course—it is sound to-day. If the policy of reciprocity in trade matters between the two countries was sound some years ago when it was advocated by the leading men in the Conservative party, by Sir John Thompson. Sir Charles Tupper and the present Minister of Trade and Commerce, why is it not sound to-day? If it was sound when Sir John A. Macdonald made it a part of the statute law of this country, why is it not sound to-day? Our Conservative friends tell us that these Conservative leaders I have mentioned were statesmen, were men who looked into the future, were men who knew the potential resources of this country, and that they legislated not for a few years only, but for all time. But they now tell us that the policy these Conservative statesmen advocated 20 or 25 years ago, would at the present time be ruinous to this country. Why, Sir, no greater condemnation could be pronounced against the foresight of those men. It must be a good thing that they are dead and gone, as otherwise they might have rushed Canada into an agreement with the United States that would have broken our connection with the mother country, and annexed us to the United States. It is true, as they tell us, that our conditions have changed within the last few years. Conditions have greatly improved in Canada during the last 15 or 20 years. The prices of farm products having advanced, but they have also advanced in the United States; and relatively speaking, the conditions now are as favourable in Canada, and indeed more favourable, than they were 15 or 20 years ago. I have taken pains to look into this matter, and I find that relatively speaking, the prices of agricultural products in the United States are higher now than they were when these Conservative statesmen were advocating reciprocity with that country. What is the reason that induced the President of the United States and his associates to desire to bring about reciprocal trade relations with this country? It was the high cost of living in the United States, and the fact that in that country consumption is fast overtaking production. The people of the United States wished to have access to the products of this country in order to reduce the cost of living in the United States. The House will permit me to quote a few figures. I find that the exports of animals from the United States, going back only ten years, have fallen from $43,000,000 in 1900 to $17,000,000 in 1910, or over 60 per cent. In breadstuffs they have fallen from $262,000,000 in 1900 to $133,000,000 in 1910, or 50 per cent. The exports of meat and dairy products fell from $184,000,000 in 1900 to $130,000,000 in 1910 or 30 per cent. Now, Sir, the very reverse of that is true in Canada. We are essentially an agricultural country. Our exports of agricultural products are increasing rapidly year after year, and we must of necessity look abroad for markets. Where can we find a better market than in that great country to the south of us? the greatest consuming country in the world, a country that is ready to open its markets to us. I find that the exports from Canada in animals and their products, from 1896 to 1909, increased from $36,000,000 to $51,000,000, or nearly 50 per cent. In agricultural products they increased during the same period from $14,000,000 to $71,000,000, or 500 per cent. Under these circumstances, there can be no doubt whatever in the mind of any man who wishes to give the matter fair consideration, that the natural market of the maritime provinces is the New England states. The maritime provinces produce in abundance potatoes, barley, oats, animals and their products, sheep, swine, dairy products, and for these things we must find a market. The only market we have at present is either the British market, or the local market in the maritime provinces themselves, whereas our natural market is the New England states.

Now, I want to call attention to the unfortunate condition in which we are placed in the province of Prince Edward Island in the matter of transportation. That is one of the reasons why our population is decreasing, why we are far from holding our own in comparison with the other provinces. We have to contend with very inadequate transportation facilities. I find on examination that it costs the people of Prince Edward Island to ship a car of farm produce 160 miles, or from a point in Prince Edward Island, say Miscouche or Souris, to Truro, in Nova Scotia, 21 cents per hundred pounds.

While for the same distance on the mainland it costs 14 cents per 100 lbs. From Chatham, Ont., to Halifax, a distance of probably 1,500 miles, it costs 21 cents per 100 lbs., and to Sydney 24 cents, while, if we send 100 lbs. of potatoes to Ottawa or Montreal it costs us 31 cents to 33 cents, a difference of over 10 cents per 100 lbs. Largely by the vote of Ontario we have been shut out of our natural markets, or prevented, at all events, from having these markets opened to us. The people of Ontario will not allow us to secure access to these markets and at the present time we are unable to ship our products to this province. This is a condition of affairs which cannot last because it is unfair to the maritime provinces and particularly to Prince Edward Island. I want to call attention to the fact that the hon. Prime Minister, who is aware of the condition of things and who, when he was in Prince Edward Island some two weeks previous to the last election, stated that if returned to power he would take the earliest opportunity of remedying this grievance. I wish to read you his words:

TRANSPORTATION.

And now, Mr. Chairman, ladies and gentlemen, I come to a question of vital importance to your prosperity. I refer to the transportation question. You can never fully enjoy the benefits of the markets of Canada and of the outside world under your present dislocated traffic arrangements. I believe the conditions as at present existing are not such as you anticipated when you gave up your status as an independent colony and became part of the Dominion. A solemn compact was then entered into, binding as well on the government of Canada as on you as a province, and the hardship is manifest that whilst the Dominion government have exacted a strict performance on your part, they have not in my judgment used reasonable diligence to obviate your insular disadvantages in this regard. I believe that instead of this subject being controlled by different departments it should be under the supervision of one department only, and your steam communication with the mainland should be arranged in conjunction with the Island railway and the Intercolonial railway, thus doing away with the exasperation of the three short hauls.

I say that the government of Canada has not in my opinion taken effective or reasonable steps to demonstrate the feasibility or otherwise of a tunnel connecting your beautiful and fertile island with the mainland. This matter has been dangled and played with too long to your very great detriment.

I promise you that, if in my power after the 21st inst.,—and at present I have reason to believe such will be the case—that I will, with as little delay as possible cause such action to be taken as will settle this question. If it is shown that a tunnel is reasonably feasible I will enter upon the undertaking as soon as possible, but if it turns out to be impracticable I will then use my best endeavours by the best means obtainable to remove as far as possible the disadvantage of your present communication and make an honest effort to give you in this connection what you expected to receive when you joined this great confederation.

The problem of transportation including a thorough and efficient system of cold storage is of enormous importance to the people of Canada and especially to Prince Edward Island. That problem begins at the farm or the factory and does not end until the market is reached whether at home or abroad. Your markets to-day are all that could be desired, provided your means of access thereto were as cheap, rapid and efficient as they ought to be.

I do not present this as a criticism of the present administration, because I know that the ministers have not had much more than time enough to look into their offices, but I want to take this early opportunity to call the attention of the Prime Minister to this promise he made to the people on the eve of the last election, and I will tell him that if he implements this promise, as I believe, he will have the support in this respect at all events, of the electorate of the province. If he does not do that—and I have no reason to believe that he will not— he will certainly receive the condemnation of that province. I see the hon. Minister of Marine and Fisheries (Mr. Hazen) present; he will have something to do with this arrangement, and the hon. Minister of Railways and Canals (Mr. Cochrane) will have more to do with it. I ask these hon. gentlemen to give it the earliest possible attention they can, and if they do that I will promise them that in so far as that is concerned they will have my support.

Now, I wish to say a word with regard to the question of our contribution to the imperial navy. I believe it is the well understood desire of the constituents I represent that we should do our duty. They are quite willing to do their duty and to contribute their fair share towards the maintenance of the imperial navy, towards making a contribution in whatever form it may be decided to make it in order to make that navy supreme upon the ocean. The people of the maritime provinces, in so far as I could ascertain their views, were strongly in favour of the policy laid down by the late administration. That policy was well represented by the present hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Foster). These ships were to be constructed in our own ocean ports, as far as possible by our own workmen and out of our own material and manned by Canadians. In that respect we would have a vital interest in it because incidentally it might and probably would encourage commercial ship building and give to the maritime provinces in the construction of steel ships that preeminence that they occupied in the construction of wooden ships. It would assist greatly in building up cities at some of our ocean ports and therefore give a market to our farmers and fishermen. Inasmuch as we are shut out now from the markets of the United States we want to a still greater extent our own markets and the policy of the late government in that respect would certainly have been of great advantage to the ship building interests of the country.

In these few words I have endeavoured to present my views and the views of my constituents upon these points and I ask again the Minister of Marine and Fisheries to give his serious and prompt attention to the grave question of transportation between Prince Edward Island and the mainland. That question is of vital importance to us. I would ask him to take the earliest opportunity of having a proper survey made in order to ascertain whether or not a tunnel is feasible. If it is found to be not feasible then we want another sister ship to the 'Lady Grey' that will give us as constant communication as possible between that province and the mainland, and above and beyond all we want equality of traffic rates. We want to be able to send our produce from Prince Edward Island at the same rate per mile as people are enabled to transport their produce on the mainland.

Mr. STANFIELD. Why did not your party give you that?

Mr. HUGHES (King's, Prince Edward Island). Our party did a good deal towards that. They did not do all and a good deal remains for this party to do. Our party, when they came into power, found one steamer playing between Prince Edward Island and the mainland—the 'Stanley.' The Liberal party provided a sister steamer called the 'Minto,' and later on, they provided a third steamer, the 'Lady Grey.' That was doing a good deal but they did not take hold of the question of transportation rates as they should have done, and as I hope this government will do.

Pending the construction of the tunnel, if it is found to be feasible, a sister ship to the 'Earl Grey' is much needed, and I hope the government will take that into consideration. I repeat that we should have equal transportation rates for equal distances, that we may be put upon an equality with the people on the mainland. That is not asking too much, and I believe the people on the mainland will concede it to us. We ought to be able to ship our produce from Prince Edward Island to the markets of Ontario at the same rates as the people of Ontario can ship their produce into our market. The Minister of Marine is a maritime province man and I think he will agree with me that that proposition is a fair one, and I trust he will do all he can to bring this condition of things about.

Mr. W. S. LOGGIE (Northumberland, N.B.), moved the adjournment of the debate.

Mr. HAZEN. I was informed by the premier that an understanding had been come to between the chief whips that the hon. member (Mr. Loggie) should go on with his speech to-night.

Mr. LOGGIE. With the concurrence of the chief whip I have moved the adjournment of the debate.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Go on.

Mr. LOGGIE. I would prefer not going on until to-morrow as the debate will be adjourned.

Mr. HAZEN. I am sorry the chief whip of the Liberal party is not in the House, but I believe it is necessary that the hon. gentleman should speak to-night so that the further agreement can be carried out that the division will take place to-morrow afternoon. That was agreed to in good faith on both sides of the House. I would be the last to urge my hon. friend (Mr. Loggie) to proceed unless he desires to do so, but in view of the agreement arrived at I think he should.

Mr. OLIVER. May the matter stand until the chief Liberal whip comes into the chamber?

Mr. FOSTER. Meantime the hon. member for Northumberland (Mr. Loggie) can give us the first instalment.

Mr. LOGGIE. I agreed with the chief whip to limit my remarks to-morrow afternoon to 40 or 45 minutes and perhaps he has not communicated that.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Go on.

Mr. LOGGIE. As suggested by the Minister of Marine and Fisheries, I may make a beginning to-night. I think on one occasion before I had to make three different attempts to finish my speech and I was only at it a short time on each occasion. First of all I take this opportunity of congratulating the hon. member for Calgary (Mr. Bennett), who moved the address. He is an old friend and a townsman of mine, and it was my pleasure to sit with him around the council board of our town, so that it is a peculiar pleasure to me to congratulate him on the eloquence of his speech. I take this opportunity of congratulating the Prime Minister upon his accession to office, and I join with those on both sides of the House who have eulogized him. Neither can I refrain from adding a word of congratulation to my old friend the Minister of Marine and Fisheries (Mr. Hazen). It was my pleasure to follow him in the legislature of New Brunswick once when we had a coalition government, and although I was a Liberal in federal politics and my leader (Mr. Hazen) was a Conservative in federal politics we found ourselves rowing in the same boat in the New Brunswick legislature. I am not at all surprised to find the Minister of Marine in another coalition government. While I congratulate the hon. gentleman from Calgary on the manner of his speech I cannot agree with the sentiments he has propounded. The speech from the Throne says:

> Our trade both with British and with foreign countries is rapidly expanding and there is every prospect that its volume in the present year will be in excess of that attained at any time in the past.

Well the hon. member (Mr. Bennett), urged that we should protect our manufacturers, our farmers, and our artisans so as to develop the home market, but there was not a word in that part of his speech as to our foreign markets, and yet the vast extent of the foreign trade of the mother country is the glory of the great statesmen of the old land. The only foreign markets the hon. gentleman referred to for extending trade were the markets of the British West Indies and Guiana, but to my mind, and in the minds of others, our foreign trade is quite as important to us as our home trade.

The hon. the Minister of Finance laid great stress to-night on the fact that we have a great home market, one of the best in the world. I do not take issue with the hon. gentleman regarding that statement, but I do take issue with him when he makes no mention of the foreign trade and the foreign markets that we have to-day. It is a noticeable fact that Canada's population is made up of about two of a rural population as compared with one of an urban population, whereas the population of the United States is about two of an urban population to one of a rural. That being the case, it seems to me it ought to draw our attention to the possibility of the United States using a large portion of our surplus natural products, and as a matter of fact in 1910, we did use the American market to a considerable extent. I wonder how it is that hon. gentlemen opposite, in addressing the House, have made no reference whatever to the value of foreign markets. The question of reciprocal trade relations with the United States was before the last parliament and before the country repeatedly. That question was fully discussed on the public platform. It is alleged that in some portions of the province of Quebec at least, other matters were discussed; but for my part, I spoke on the platform in my county on no other issue. I regret, however, to find that what was alleged by the press of this country as the cause of the defeat of the government in Ontario, after the election was over, has been verified by hon. gentlemen opposite. We had the hon. member for West Peterborough (Mr. Burnham) the other night giving us definite information as to why the Liberal party were beaten in the province of Ontario. It is to be regretted that such an important matter as reciprocal trade relations with the United States should be placed before the people and that then other issues should have been brought in to defeat a measure so vital to our interests and of such great benefit to this young and growing nation.

I beg now to move the adjournment of the debate.

Motion agreed to, and debate adjourned.

The CRUISER 'ABOUKIR.'

Hon. J. D. HAZEN (Minister of Marine and Fisheries). Before the orders of the day were called, my hon. friend from Halifax (Mr. Maclean) called attention to a despatch from London to the Canadian Press which reads as follows:

London, Nov. 28.—The crew of the cruiser 'Aboukir,' purchased by Canada, is being paid off to-day. It will be thoroughly overhauled and transferred to Canada next spring.

My hon. friend asked me if we had purchased a cruiser of this description and what the facts were. I had no knowledge at all of Canada having purchased a cruiser of this sort, but having been in charge of the Marine Department only a short time, I did not wish to speak positively on the subject. I, however, got in touch with the deputy head of the Naval Department and have received this memo. from him:

The department has not purchased any cruiser and I have no knowledge of what has been referred to in this article which has been going the rounds of the press.

THE MANITOBA BOUNDARIES.

Mr. PUGSLEY. I would like to call attention to a despatch which appears in the Montreal 'Star' of the 31st November last, and which reads as follows:

After many years of fruitless negotiations the question relative to the extension of the boundaries of Manitoba has at last been adjusted.

An announcement to this effect was made last night by Premier Roblin, following a final conference yesterday with the Premier, the Hon. R. L. Borden.

In short, the boundaries of the province are to be extended on the lines suggested by Sir Wilfrid Laurier, and accepted by the Manitoba government, but the other issues which formed the obstacle in the past are also adjusted. The territory north of the present boundaries and paralleling the line of Saskatchewan is to be added to the province, which will go as far as Hudson bay and include Port Churchill.

The annual subsidy payable to the province and the indemnity in lieu of the control of public lands are to be re-adjusted on a basis of equality with Saskatchewan and Alberta.

Legislation will be introduced at the present session to give effect to the arrangement, the conclusion of which is eminently satisfactory to the Manitoba Premier.

Mr. Roblin expressed himself as delighted with the reception accorded him by the government, and the fact that a long-standing and vexatious issue is now removed. He announced that the provincial government will lose no time in building a line of railway from Winnipeg to connect with Hudson bay, whose shores and chief ports will now be in Manitoba territory. A detailed statement of the case will probably be made in the House very shortly.

I think it is scarcely in accord with parliamentary usage that an agreement which has been arrived at between this government and the government of a province should be first communicated to the public by one of the parties concerned instead of to parliament; and I would ask my hon. friend if he would be good enough to-morrow to inform the House whether this statement is correct, and whether an agreement has been actually arrived at as indicated.

Mr. HAZEN. It seems to me that my hon. friend is entirely out of order in reading a long newspaper article to this House. There may be of course cases of urgency which call for immediate information, and my hon. friend, if this were such a case, might then be in order. But this is not a case of that kind, and the hon. gentleman would have to give the usual notice of motion required by the rules of the House before the question can be answered.

Mr. PUGSLEY. Might I be allowed to point out—

Mr. SPEAKER. I think that the hon. member was out of order in putting this question, and that would be my ruling on an occasion of this kind. But I understand that on a motion to adjourn, the only argument that can be raised is on the question of adjourning, and that on a question of the nature of that mentioned by the hon. member the usual two days' notice would be required. If it were something of great urgency, such as that which was brought up yesterday, with regard to the reported massacre of missionaries, that might be permissible; but in this case the usual notice should be given, and, therefore, the question is out of order.

Mr. PUGSLEY. With your consent, Mr. Speaker, I would say that I was following what the Minister of Marine and Fisheries said with respect to the proper question of the hon. member for Halifax (Mr. A. K. Maclean), and I was simply following the practice pursued ever since I have been in parliament, under which the member acting as leader of the opposition for the time being has been permitted to ask a question on some matter of great public importance, as the question of the boundaries of Manitoba and the financial terms certainly is.

Motion agreed to, and House adjourned at 11.50 p.m.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

WEDNESDAY, November 29, 1911.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Two o'clock.

ADDRESS IN REPLY TO THE SPEECH OF HIS ROYAL HIGHNESS.

House resumed the adjourned debate on the motion of Mr. Bennett (Calgary). For an address to His Royal Highness the Governor General, in reply to his speech at the opening of the session, and the proposed amendment of Sir Wilfrid Laurier thereto.

Mr. W. S. LOGGIE (Northumberland, N. B.). Mr. Speaker, when the House adjourned last night I was expressing my regret that a matter of such great importance as the proposed trade agreement with the United States should have been defeated at the polls on extraneous issues. I substantiated that fact by referring to the statement made by the hon. member for West Peterborough (Mr. Burnham) in which he emphatically said that side issues caused the defeat of the government candidate in his riding, and as I understand it, the same applies to practically all the ridings in the province of Ontario.

I shall now make a few brief references to the statements made by the Minister of Finance whom I take pleasure in cordially welcoming to the high position he occupies. In considering this question from the economic standpoint he said that both parties have adopted a policy of protection, and that protection is the settled policy of this country. I take issue with the hon. gentleman on that broad statement unless it be that he means that a moderate tariff is protection, and incidentally it is, but it is framed with a view of securing the necessary revenues to carry on the great public works of this country, and not with a view of protecting any specific industry. When the Liberal party came into power in 1896 they did very materially alter the tariff then in force. At that date nineteen dollars on every hundred dollars was being collected from the people of Canada who used imported goods, and last year that nineteen was reduced to sixteen dollars, so that the Liberal party had reduced the rate of taxation by about 14 per cent. By the reciprocity agreement proposed it was expected the tariff would be still further reduced by three per cent or a total reduction of seventeen per cent on the tariff in force under the Conservative regime Then the Minister of Finance told us that because of the United States tariff wall we had taken our own line of development. That may be true. If our tariff has incidental protection in it, and we use the textiles, &c., that are made by our own manufacturers then of course the trade must be interprovincial because we have no other customers except our own people. But it does not seem to me that the proposed trade arrangement in any way interfered with that line of development or with that distribution of our industries, and when the Minister of Finance speaks of industries I presume he means manufactures as distinguished from the products of the sea, the land and the forest. Then the Minister of Finance assumes that we had attempted to make a change in our economic conditions and he used these words:

> Now, under the circumstances was it wise to negotiate an agreement, the purport or intent of which was to introduce so sudden and so radical a change in our economic system.

I fail to realize what is meant by that statement inasmuch as we in no way proposed to interfere with our industrial development, and that our home industries would not be in any way adversely affected. Another reason given by the Minister of Finance as to why this reciprocity arrangement was rejected was that we had no assurance of the continuance of the agreement, and he went on to say that it was admitted the United States could withdraw from the agreement if that great country saw fit, but that it was a grave question whether Canada could do the same. The Minister of Finance made that statement in view of the fact that it is plainly set forth in the wording of the agreement that the power to withdraw applied to each country alike, and that being so I cannot understand what the hon. gentleman meant. As a further reason why the Liberals were defeated, the Finance Minister said that the people of this country were afraid of the entanglement which might result. Well, the trade arrangement was that we could send our natural products to the United States market without paying into their treasury, and that in return we should allow the natural products of the United States to come into the Canadian market without their paying into the Canadian treasury. In 1910 Canada marketed in the United States forty million dollars' worth of natural products on which we paid into Uncle Sam's treasury no less a sum than three and a half million dollars. The proposed arrangement simply meant that if next year we sold forty million dollars' worth of natural products in the United States we would not have to pay into Uncle Sam's treasury a single dollar, and yet the Minister of Finance tells us that because Canadian products can go to the United States without Canadians paying tribute to the United States' treasury, forsooth that may bring on entanglements. I shall later on state what the people in the Old Land had to say about entanglements, but meantime the Minister of Finance should bear in mind that that statement of his instead of being considered a progressive policy for his government is rather what I would call a fly policy, because we know that flies are caught on tanglefoot made in the United States. I cannot understand the dread of the Minister of Finance with regard to entanglements, because the fisherman who lives on the Canadian side of the lake can market his fish in Cleveland without paying duty.

I wonder if the hon. gentleman saw a cartoon in one of the daily papers a short time ago. That cartoon represented an automobile with two gentlemen in its back seat. One had the Stars and Stripes around his hat and the other the Union Jack. The one represented the great American republic and the other the motherland, and beneath the cartoon was this phrase : 'Another passenger wanting to get on.' What did that mean? It meant that President Taft, and the representative of the United Kingdom were riding in the same carriage and that the President of the French republic wished to get on board and keep company with them, and bring his country into the agreement. Just think of it. Under this great masterpiece of policy inaugurated by the present government of the United States, American and Canadian neighbours living along a 4,000 mile border could trade together in natural products without paying any customs duty, had that policy not been rejected by the Canadian people.

Then the hon. gentleman spoke of the danger to our transportation companies which would result from that policy. He said :—

> What, I ask, is to be said of a policy that would divert the wheat of the west to the American roads and the other vigilant competitors referred to in the speech of the right hon. gentleman?

The hon. the Finance Minister seemed to apprehend that our western wheat would be brought to Minneapolis and there ground into flour and shipped to Europe. But I would like to ask him what is there to hinder that being done to-day ? The hon, gentleman drew the presumption that if the duty were taken off wheat, that remission of duty would have the effect of diverting our Canadian wheat south of the line, and transporting it to European markets through American channels. But what is the position to-day : the hon. gentleman knows that if he had ten cars of wheat, there is nothing to prevent his shipping it to Minneapolis and there having that wheat ground into flour and thence exported to the United Kingdom.

He would pay the duty of 25 cents per bushel, but when it was exported 99 per cent of the duty would be refunded. So that to-day Canadian wheat ground at Minneapolis when exported is practically free of duty.

There is no duty on wheat exported from Canada via the United States. That wheat goes through in bond. Why then does our wheat not go through American channels to-day ? Why does it not take the southern route over American railways and thence to Europe ? I would suggest to the hon. the Finance Minister that he might perhaps read with profit what the great chief who leads the Liberal party said on that point when the reciprocity pact was under discussion in this House. He would then discover that the reason why our western wheat does not go south to-day is because Canada furnishes the shortest and best route to the old land and not because of the rejection of the reciprocity pact at all. Our wheat can reach the seaboard through Canadian channels much easier and with less mileage than over the American railways.

Then it is only fair to draw the attention of the hon. gentleman to this further fact. We ought not to forget that the day is coming when we shall have a very large surplus to export and will have to look for other markets. To-day the United States have only two-thirds of a bushel per capita of wheat to export, whereas Canada, with only a small portion of her land under cultivation, has 16 bushels per capita to export, so that the time is near at hand when the United States will not have any wheat to export but will have to import wheat for home consumption, and it will be a happy day when Canada can have the United States market free of duty for natural products.

I do not wish to transgress on the time of the House but I would like to say a word with reference to another statement of the Minister of Finance. Speaking of the effect of the elections, he said that the rejection of the reciprocity agreement was the best advertisement Canada ever received in Great Britain. I do not know exactly what the hon. gentleman meant by those words, but I would point out that the present policy of the motherland is friendly to a reciprocal trade agreement between Canada and the United States; and in pointing to the public opinion of the motherland on this matter, I take it that that opinion is represented by the party now in power, the great Liberal party of the United Kingdom. Well, what did the people of the United Kingdom say about this proposed trade arrangement? Did not Mr. Asquith himself say that the United States were in a position to offer Canada reciprocal trade advantages which it was impossible for the United Kingdom to give Canada because of geographical and other reasons. Mr. Asquith went on to say that he believed in having the dominions over the seas make the best trade arrangements they could in their own interests He believed in the principle of the fullest autonomy for the overseas dominions, and he added that anything which could make these dominions more prosperous would favourably affect the textile manufacturers of the United Kingdom. In like manner, when we make our fishermen, our farmers and our lumbermen more prosperous we incidentally favourably affect the textile manufacturers of the motherland and our own home industries.

I want to revert to one or two remarks made in the speeches of the hon. member for Kings (Mr. A. De Witt Foster) and the hon. member for Brockville (Mr. Webster) to the effect that under the reciprocity agreement United States citizens could come over into this country and take our forests and our fish. These statements are absolutely without foundation. I challenge any hon. gentleman in this House to show me one sentence in the reciprocity agreement that would give an American citizen a right to put an axe into a Canadian tree that he has not to-day, or a sentence that would give United States fishermen a right to put a hook or a net into Canadian waters. It is not fair for hon. members to make speeches of this kind that are not borne out by the facts and that go broadcast throughout this country.

The Minister of Finance stated that the discussion of the situation from a national standpoint was the scheme for the first portion of the campaign. I verily believe the hon. gentleman, for that was the case. They aroused the people of this country with a false alarm from a national standpoint. Listen to what the Montreal 'Star' said to our Conservative friends on the 18th of July:

> The members ought to know more accurately what the electors think than they did before adjournment. The mistaken tendency of the opposition to discuss reciprocity largely as an economic question—precisely the ground on which the government prefer to discuss it—has deprived the electors of a clear lead on the national phases of the proposal; but it is not too late yet for that lead to be given, and there is abundant evidence that the people are looking in that direction very suspiciously, without much serious inspiration outside of the press.

The inspiration from the national standpoint came from the press, led by the 'Star' of Montreal and the moneyed interests of Toronto, forming themselves into a league. The 'Star' says further:

> To the plain man who loves Canada and wants above all things to see her keep her name, position and independence, this Greek gift, from a source whence we are more accustomed to receive blows, has a significance far deeper than its tabulated schedules.

The editor of the 'Star' wants to see Canada keep her good name, forsooth! Here we have the national aspect of the question propounded by the Montreal 'Star', and then taken up by the press, and advertised in all the local papers from one end of the Dominion to the other. So I say the Liberal government was defeated ostensibly on reciprocity, but from the evidence of my hon. friend from West Peterborough (Mr. Burnham), as well as from the statements of the Montreal 'Star,' there were imported into the agreement matters entirely foreign to it. To say that because the citizens of Canada trade freely with those of the United States we shall be any the less loyal or less likely to stand by our Canadian rights and Canadian interests seems to me to be beyond conception.

Now, I want to say one word in support of the amendment moved by the right hon. gentleman who leads the opposition. There are men in the present cabinet who were diametrically opposed to each other on the naval policy represented by the resolution adopted unanimously by this House on the 29th of March, 1909. As I understand responsible government, the advisers of the King should be at one on such grave matters as the defence of our shores, our commerce and our empire. Let me read to you a Canadian press despatch found in the Moncton 'Transcript' of November 27, as follows:

> Montreal, Que., Nov. 27.—That Canada would be almost defenceless in the event of a war with the United States, that the Atlantic ports should be defended, was the theme of C. H. Cahan, K.C., before the Canadian Club to-day. 'The possibility of war is omnipresent, despite the one hundred years of peace,' he declared. 'The authorities who are responsible for the defence of Canada, cannot longer ignore the military and naval preparedness of our neighbours to the south. They must sooner or later take adequate measures for the protection of our naval internal waterways, and great transcontinental lines of railway. Despite the 100 years of peace, there are obvious questions between Great Britain and the United States that would make war inevitable.'

At such a time we have the government of the day coming before parliament with their proposals for the future legislation of the country without saying one word as to what they propose to do regarding the construction of the proposed Canadian navy. If it be true that in the past members of the government were diametrically opposed one to the other, is it not fair to the people of Canada that they should know how they stand on the great question of naval defence for our shores, our homes and our empire? Mr. Speaker, I have very much pleasure in saying that I shall heartily support the amendment moved by the right hon. leader of the opposition.

Mr. GEORGE H. BOIVIN (Shefford). Mr. Speaker, I hope that you will pardon the youngest member of His Majesty's loyal opposition, if he takes up a few moments of the time of this House and adds a few words to the many able addresses which we have heard in the course of the debate upon the amendment proposed to the motion that a humble address be presented to His Royal Highness the Governor General in reply to the speech from the Throne. I should perhaps speak in French, but I will use the English language in order that I may be understood, not only by you, Sir, but by every one here present. I do not think that I can add much to what has been said by my right hon. leader and the other gentlemen who have preceded me, but I feel that I should give you as best I can, my reasons for voting in favour of the proposed amendment. The new government has succeeded in composing a speech from the Throne which, in the words of the Montreal Daily 'Star,' sounds well but means little. It mentions the prosperity of our country and thus gives a deserved tribute of praise to the late government. It mentions improved trade relations with the British West Indies and British Guiana. We need little of their produce, they need none of ours, and I believe that the proposed improved trade relations will not take shape during the present session. Good roads are also mentioned, and the Canadian farmer is assured that he will not be forgotten. After the fiercest election campaign in the history of the Dominion of Canada, waged and won with the object of preventing that same farmer from selling his produce in the nearest, largest, and best market he could possibly desire, it will be impossible to compensate him for what he has lost by the defeat of the late Liberal administration.

The creation of a permanent tariff commission is also announced. It may be an excellent thing, and it may not; but until we know how it is composed and what powers it will have, I do not wish to enter into discussion upon it. But that is all we find in the speech from the Throne. What about the school question in Manitoba and the new provinces, which was hashed and rehashed for the purpose of getting votes in the province of Quebec? What about the Ne Temere decree which was used by hon. gentlemen on the other side of this House for the purpose of getting votes in the province of Ontario? What about the pet hobby of the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Monk), when he occupied a seat on the left of the Speaker as the member for Jacques Cartier, the Georgian Bay canal? What about the Canadian navy, that navy which, according to the opposition speakers in the last election, was so infernally imperial in Quebec, and so damnably disloyal in the other provinces? Will the navy law be repealed, and what law will replace it? The speech from the Throne says not a word about these matters upon which the people of Canada would like to be enlightened.

Still the government is surprised to think we have anything to find fault with. The Minister of Public Works says that there is nothing to worry about. It is true, that Canada has been so well administered that it will continue to grow and prosper for years to come; but if this prosperity is to become permanent, the country must be governed by ministers who agree among themselves at least upon the great and important issues before the country. The same hon. minister told us the other day, 'We are here while you are there.' Yes, Mr. Speaker, he is there, the first lieutenant of the present Prime Minister, and parliament and the country have a right to know, how after advocating two different policies, and leading two different parties these two hon. gentlemen have buried their differences and have taken the two first positions in the government of this country.

I have heard hon. gentlemen opposite accuse us of raising questions of race and creed because we found fault with the admission of three members of parliament from the province of Quebec into the Borden government. We did not mention race or creed. We would have regretted to see the province of Quebec ignored in the formation of the cabinet; but we expected to see the hon. the Prime Minister take from that province three able and competent French Canadians professing his own political faith and belonging to his own political party. We criticise him because he went outside of his party and chose three men, all able and competent, if you will, but who for years past have denounced and condemned his naval policy as being worse than that of the Laurier government. We criticise him because he took into his cabinet three followers of Henri Bourassa, whose newspaper, 'Le Devoir,' has, since the last election, but before the formation of the cabinet, published an article against the admission of the hon. the Minister of the Interior (Mr. Rogers), the Minister of Militia (Mr. Hughes), the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Foster), and the Minister of Customs (Mr. Reid), into that cabinet. They are men who have accused Borden and Laurier of conspiring together to hurl the French Canadians, bound hand and foot, into the vortex of Imperial defence. They are men who did not once appear upon the same platform with their present leader during the election campaign. They are men who took charge of the French speaking voters in the province of Quebec, while the Prime Minister looked after the English speaking sections of the same province, each preaching his own doctrine upon the navy, differing even upon the question of reciprocity when it suited their conveniences, united only upon one platform 'Anything to beat Laurier,' the platform now re-formed and made over into the song of victory: 'We are here and you are there.'

The Prime Minister says they have always agreed since 1909, but 'Hansard' tells us they have disagreed and voted against each other. They may have agreed, but if so, they agreed to disagree. It may have been the game they played to obtain the victory they now rejoice over; but if so they do not deserve the confidence of the people of Canada. If differences really did exist and concessions have been made by one party or the other to wipe out those differences, parliament and Canada have a right to know who made the concessions. If those differences still exist upon the only important question before the people to-day, they have no constitutional right to be members of the same cabinet. They cannot put us off by asking for time to decide the naval question. The present Prime Minister, three years ago, wanted things done speedily. Canada and the empire, with still greater reason, want things done speedily now. The Minister of Public Works, speaking to the amendment, asked the hon. member for Red Deer (Mr. Clark) to point out in British constitutional history any example of such a representation made to the Crown by the House of Commons within the last three hundred years. When the Minister of Public Works tells us where we can find such an alliance as that made between himself and the Prime Minister, during the last three hundred years we will answer his question. If the representation was not sooner made it was because it was not sooner required. The occasion first arose in Canada in 1911, and when it arose there was upon the floor of the House of Commons an old and beloved leader of a true and loyal opposition who was just celebrating his seventieth birthday, who had devoted his entire life to the welfare of his country, who had cemented together in the bonds of Canadian nationhood people of all races and all creeds, who had made Canada great, grand and prosperous, and who had just lost some of his most able lieutenants, and the reins of power, in a political struggle fighting for the increased prosperity of his country. He was overpowered and defeated but not disheartened; the day after his defeat he resumed the battle by making the amendment which has caused so much discomfiture to the party in power, an amendment which exactly meets the present situation, and which, although it may be defeated in this House, will be approved by every one of his supporters in this House, and by the majority of the people of Canada.

I referred a moment ago to the race and religious cries we were accused of raising; but it was only to deny the accusation and send it home to those who made it. We have the admission of the hon. member for West Peterborough (Mr. Burnham) that the Liberal government was defeated in his county, and throughout Ontario, because the Ne Temere decree had been promulgated and published in Canada. Sir Wilfrid Laurier was held responsible for the regulations laid down by the Catholic church, over which he had no control, and maliciously accused of being under the domination of the Church of Rome. In the province of Quebec he was proclaimed by the other division of the Conservative party as being anti-French and anti-Catholic. Even in my own county I was called a traitor to my faith by 'La Croix,' a Catholic paper published in Montreal, and distributed throughout the county, because I did not, like my opponent, undertake and promise to give to the French Canadian catholics of Manitoba and the new provinces the same rights enjoyed by the English speaking Protestants in Quebec.

Add to this the fact that the English voters were urged to vote against me because I was of French origin. Then conjure up a picture of thousands of Canadian children being disembowelled upon the distant seas of China and Japan, fighting the unjust wars of the British Empire, and you have a sample of the Conservative-Nationalist campaign in Quebec.

That is why they are there and we are here.

Coming as I do from the Eastern Townships, so ably represented in the late cabinet by the Hon. Sidney Fisher, the former member for Brome, and now without representation at the council board of our nation, I must correct a statement made in the course of this debate by the hon. member for Chambly-Verchères (Mr. Rainville.) I owe it to the late Minister of Agriculture, Mr. Fisher, because he was largely responsible not only for my election, but also for the election of every other Liberal member from the Eastern Townships. Like the staunch Liberal he is, he sacrificed himself to save others. History has shown us greater heroes in defeat than in victory and Hon. Sidney Fisher is one of these. The hon. member for Chambly-Verchères stated that the only things ever done for agriculture by the late government was to appoint a farmer as Minister of Agriculture. That was the first step for the benefit of agriculture, but it was not all. My hon. friend (Mr. Rainville) forgets, if he ever knew, that among other important advances made for the welfare of the Canadian farmer, have been the institution of a complete equipment of cold storage refrigeration transportation; the establishment of a complete and systematic supervision and inspection of the handling and marketing of Canadian food products from the place of production in Canada to the markets of England, the appointment of the live stock commissioners, the creation of the seed branch, the reorganization of the veterinary department, and many other reforms; besides attempting to enter into a trade agreement with the United States which would have been a benefit to every farmer in Canada. This agreement was, as every one knows, an indirect, but enormous factor in the defeat of the late government. I say indirect, because the government was defeated not upon the merits of the trade agreement, but by the ultra-loyalty cry to which it gave rise, and by the sentiment—call it something else if you like—which it awakened and brought forth from the Manufacturers' Association and other sources.

Many hon. members have said that we on this side are not all agreed upon the question of fact as to whether reciprocity is dead or not. They are mistaken. We are all agreed that Canada has refused a great opportunity which she may never again have the chance to accept, and in this sense we agree that reciprocity is dead. But the Liberal party in Canada to-day still stands for wider markets for the Canadian farmer. We believe that the free exchange of natural products would be of immense advantage to the country. We believe that Canadians are just as loyal to the British Crown as are the inhabitants of the British Isles, and that like them we can trade with the people of the United States without fear of being led into political union. We shall continue to preach the doctrine of international good will. We shall continue to be the party of the people against the trusts; of the masses against the classes. We have been called traitors and annexationists. We resent the sneers and insults levelled at our loyalty, but these sneers and those insults will not lessen our love for Canada, nor will they lessen our labours, or our efforts to make our country the greatest and grandest of all nations.

Hon. CHAS. MURPHY (Russell). Mr. Speaker, it is not in a spirit of mere compliance with custom that I desire to add my congratulations to those which previous speakers have tendered to the mover (Mr. R. B. Bennett) and the seconder (Mr. Sevigny) of the address for the very acceptable way in which they discharged the duties assigned to them at the opening of this parliament. In complimenting both these hon. gentlemen, I do so because I feel that they deserve all that has been said in their praise.

And, in this connection, let me express my appreciation of the manner in which hon. gentlemen opposite felicitated the right hon. the leader of the opposition (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) upon attaining his 70th birthday. The cordiality, the evident sincerity, of their felicitations reminded me of an incident that happened while the late Lord Russell of Killowen, was addressing the court as chief counsel for Mr. Parnell in his fabous case against the London 'Times.' Associated in that case with Lord Russell —then Sir Charles Russell—as junior counsel, was Mr. Asquith, now Prime Minister of Great Britain. In the course of his address Sir Charles Russell happened to disarrange his papers, and they fell unnoticed by him to the floor. Not finding them at hand when he required a reference a few moments later, he asked: 'Where are my papers?' Mr. Asquith, who was in the act of picking them up, answered 'At your feet, Sir, where we all are.' The words in which hon. gentlemen opposite conveyed their congratulations to my right hon. leader may not have been the words used by Mr. Asquith on the occasion to which I have referred; but their tributes no less accurately described the position of my right hon. friend in this parliament than did Mr. Asquith's tribute at the time it was uttered, describe Sir Charles Russell's position at the English bar.

Before passing to the consideration of this amendment, let me congratulate you, Mr. Speaker, upon your elevation to the high and honourable position which you now occupy. I have no doubt, Sir, that you will carry out your expressed intention of preserving an impartial attitude between the parties in this House. And speaking as a member of the opposition, I can assure you, Sir, that you will always find the members on this side of the House ready and willing to co-operate with you in maintaining the decorum of debate.

Now, Sir, the principle embodied in the amendment which has been placed in your hands by the right hon. the leader of the opposition, is one of the most importast that can engage the attention of this House. In point of fact, it goes to the very root of responsible government. To object it will be to declare that the Conservative party has decided to substitute emergency rule for constitutional government in this country and to declare that in future when a successful political leader is called upon to form a cabinet and finds himself embarrassed by the complexity of his support, he may, in the selection of his ministers, disregard their opposing views on all matters of public policy, provided that upon one question only they agree—namely the necessity, in the interest of their party, of keeping their opponents out of office. In effect, that is the position taken in this debate by members of the present coalition and by hon. gentlemen who have spoken in their behalf; and that position, I have no doubt, all the factions supporting this government are prepared to maintain.

Such a course, I submit, is without precedent in this Dominion. But it is not the only strange spectacle presented by this coalition. For the first time in the history of responsible government in any British country we have in Canada to-day a government whose leader does not occupy a seat in either branch of parliament and who, therefore, is not responsible to the people to whom the government which he leads is responsible. The titular leader of the government is, of course, my hon. friend the Prime Minister; the actual leader of the government is Mr. Henri Bourassa, the editor of 'Le Devoir,' and head of the Nationalist party in the province of Quebec. But, Sir, even that does not fully describe the situation as to the leadership of this government. The Prime Minister receives his orders not from Mr. Bourassa direct, but from either of his deputies, the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Monk) or Mr. Armand Lavergne, so that the titular leader sits not once but twice or thrice removed from the real seat of power.

Mr. Speaker, no greater tribute could be paid to Mr. Bourassa's political influence than his ascendancy over a party to which he never belonged, and in which, even now, he disdains membership. His success becomes all the more striking when you recall what was said about him and his party immediately after the general election by the 'Orange Sentinel,' of Toronto, a newspaper whose unwavering support of the Conservative party gives it authority to speak for that party. In its issue of 28th September last, the 'Sentinel' published a long article reviewing the election, in which it said:

> Nationalist Party to Remain Independent of Borden Government.
> Mr. Bourassa has declared his independence of the new government about to be formed. That is quite satisfactory. He will continue, he says, to fight for the principles for which he has struggled. Those principles, as he has explained them in his speeches, can have no support from the Borden government without alienating the people of Ontario. The Nationalist propaganda is a menace to the integrity of the empire. We have not hesitated to express our opinion of the movement or its leader. Our opposition to Sir Wilfrid Laurier was due to his surrender to the Ultramontanes. Bourassa's complaint against him was that he had not gone far enough in the service of his race and his church. The 'Sentinel' believes he went too far.

Certainly if Laurier did not go far enough to please Mr. Bourassa, there is nothing in Mr. Borden's record to encourage him to hope for greater docility to the wishes of the Nationalists. It suits our views to have Mr. Bourassa standing aloof. Let him fight his battle in Quebec. He may have some success there. But he must understand that the harder he fights for the extension of the privileges of the French in the Dominion the more solidly will the English-speaking electors gather behind the man who resists him. If Mr. Bourassa reads the returns intelligently he will discover that for the first time since confederation there is a government at Ottawa that is in a position to defy the agitators of Quebec. That is the outstanding feature of the contest. It is one which is most gratifying to the dominant race in Canada. It means, in a phrase, that the rule of the minority will cease. The tradition that a party could not win a federal election without the aid of Quebec has been destroyed. So far as Mr. Bourassa has contributed to fix that in the minds of politicians and people he has done a real service.

Brave words, Mr. Speaker, but eaten almost as soon as they were uttered. Fond hopes, Mr. Speaker, but rudely dashed on the ground almost as soon as they were formed. For Mr. Bourassa, with a better knowledge than the 'Sentinel' of the man with whom he had to deal, laughed at the 'Sentinel's' threats, pressed his advantage, and to-day stands in the pilot-house of the government ship, with his hand upon the wheel, steering the craft to an anchorage from which he and his fellow Nationalists are determined there shall go forth no Canadian navy and no contribution to the British navy.

It has been frequently asserted in the course of this debate that no constitutional model can be found for such a coalition government as the one we have at present. Where then did the Prime Minister go for his model? So far he has not told us, but as he is a gentleman of culture and widely read, he must have found somewhere laid down, a model which he decided to follow. All the signs indicate that the Prime Minister's reading led him to take for his model a form of government which prevailed on this continent at a time when the Red man was supreme. In the absence of information from the Prime Minister it is difficult to be exact but those who remember Parkman's account of the organization of the Iroquois confederacy will notice a striking parallel between that body and the make-up of the present cabinet. Parkman tells us that, sundered by dissensions the Iroquois separated into five distinct nations, the Mohawks, the Oneidas, the Onondagas, the Cayugas and the Senecas. Then there was a further sub-division into several clans, each of which had its distinctive name as the clan of the Wolf, of the Hawk, of the Fox, of the Bear and of the Tortoise. These clans as Parkman explains, were not really separate, but were mingled throughout the confederacy. Thus a Seneca and a Mohawk might each be a Bear. A Wolf and a Fox might each be a Seneca. This, you will admit, is not a little confusing to our modern ideas, and the confusion grows, of course, in proportion to the number of clans. But Parkman proceeds to point out that, divided and subdivided as the Iroquois were, they had one bond that held the confederacy together, namely, the common purpose of slaughtering the enemy and of waxing fat on the plunder to be found in the enemy's country. There, it seems to me, the Prime Minister got the model for his cabinet. When he first went cabinet-making and looked over his clans of the Wolf, the Fox, the Hawk, the Bear and the Tortoise, we can imagine, from what the hon. member for West Toronto (Mr. Osler) told the Conservatives of Ward 6, in that city, how perplexed he was by the divergence of their views; but in the organization of the Iroquois confederacy he saw a way out of his difficulty. And so in the end it mattered not whether the men he decided to select were for a low tariff or a tariff as high as Haman's gallows, it mattered not whether they favoured a gift of Dreadnoughts, a cash contribution to the British navy, or no navy at all; so long as they were united on the policy aptly described, as: 'Anything to keep Laurier and the Liberals out of office,' they were eligible to become his colleagues and the advisers of the Crown, with collective responsibility on all matters of public policy!

The parallel between the Iroquois confederacy and the present cabinet does not stop there. Parkman goes on to explain that the clans were by no means equal in numbers, in influence or in honour. To some of the clans belonged the right of giving one chief to the nation; others had the right of giving three, or in one case, four chiefs; while others could give none. This must have been the precedent the Prime Minister had in mind when he gave three portfolios and a deputy speakership to the Nationalists, and left the great Presbyterian body without a single representative in the cabinet. For a knowledge of this latter omission I am indebted to the Ottawa 'Citizen' which, as you know, is the morning echo of the Prime Minister's voice in this city.

Speaking a few days ago in this House, my hon. friend the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Monk) inquired from my hon. friend the member for Red Deer (Mr. Clark) if he could find in constitutional history in the last three hundred years, any such representation to the Crown as was contained in this amendment.

My hon. friend from Shefford (Mr. Boivin) supplied the answer to-day. It might well be answered 'no,' for the simple reason that a similar instance never occurred in England. But when the Minister of Public Works asked that question he forgot that the member for Red Deer (Mr. Clark) had anticipated it and had supplied the answer by citing the example of Lord James of Hereford, of the Duke of Devonshire, and of other gentlemen in England who had refused to enter cabinets when they could not agree with the policy of the Prime Minister.

In the further course of his speech the Minister of Public Works in replying to a criticism of the personnel of the present cabinet, cited Mr. Tarte and Mr. Dobell as examples of former Conservatives who had been included in the cabinet of Sir Wilfrid Laurier in 1896. But, these cases are not analogous to the present. In the first place neither Mr. Tarte nor Mr. Dobell had denounced the leader of the Liberal party as some of the present ministers had denounced the present Prime Minister almost up to the time his cabinet was formed. For years prior to 1896, Mr. Tarte had worked in close harmony with the Liberal party and in 1891, in conjunction with the Liberals he had conducted an investigation into the scandals which ultimately wrecked the Conservative government and at the next ensuing election he ran as a supporter of the right hon. Sir Wilfrid Laurier. In Mr. Dobell's case it is well to recall that he was returned at a by-election in 1895 and Sir Wilfrid Laurier then claimed him as a supporter because Mr. Dobell had included in his election platform a plank in favour of reciprocity with the United States. But, when Sir Wilfrid Laurier made that claim in this House what do you think happened? Why, Sir, Mr. Foster, the present Minister of Trade and Commerce repudiated the idea because, said Mr. Foster, reciprocity had been a cardinal plank in the platform of the Conservative party for many years previously. It is therefore well to remember that both Mr. Tarte and Mr. Dobell, when they entered the Liberal cabinet had not for a long time previously differed in opinion with the Liberal Prime Minister, but that on the contrary they were in entire accord with him on all matters of public policy and on all matters of minor policy as well.

Previous speakers on this side of the House have pointed out the line of cleavage between the present ministers on the navy question, and it may be interesting to pursue that subject a little further so that we may understand fully how and when these differences of opinion arose. It is true that the Prime Minister (Mr. Borden) and the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Foster) and their parliamentary followers adhered to the resolution of March 29, 1909, for several months after that resolution was unanimously adopted by this House. In proof of that you have had cited the speech delivered by the Hon. Mr. Borden in England on the 1st of July, 1909, as well as the speech he delivered at Halifax on the 14th of October of that year, after his return from England. There is, however, another speech which has not been referred to so far in the debate and that is a speech delivered by the Minister of Trade and Commerce on April 18, 1909, in the city of Toronto, before the Centre and South Toronto Conservative clubs. A despatch from Toronto to the Montreal 'Gazette,' dated April 18, 1909, says:

George E. Foster urged that a beginning be made in the formation of a navy of our own as well as taking steps to assist Great Britain in the defence of Canada. He concluded by urging that Canada should let the roots sink down into her own soil and gradually lay the foundation of a navy of our own.

And when you hear these words quoted to-day you recognize them as an old friend because they are practically the same words used by the same hon. gentleman (Mr. Foster) in the eloquent speech he delivered in this House on the 29th March, 1909, in support of the resolution which he and his party now profess to disregard.

It has been said that the Prime Minister and his English speaking followers adhered to this resolution until the result of the Drummond-Arthabaska election became known, and that then a change took place. This, however, is not an absolutely correct statement of the situation. Prior to the Drummond-Arthabaska election there were developments in the way of change in another direction, in regard to which some information may I think very properly be given to this House. You have heard several times in the course of this debate the view expressed that it was pressure from Toronto that forced the Prime Minister to abandon his position on the navy question. I am not disposed to question any honour that Toronto may be entitled to in this regard, but to do it justice I must say that the pressure, in this instance, came not from Toronto, but from the city of Winnipeg and from no less a person than the former Minister of Public Works in the Manitoba government, now the Minister of the Interior (Mr. Rogers) in this coalition cabinet. The first intimation that the public had that such pressure might be expected was contained in a despatch from Winnipeg to the Montreal 'Gazette' dated April 16, 1909, and purporting to give an interview with the present Minister of the Interior. I will read some extracts from the paragraph for the sake of tracing the genesis of this change. The despatch says:

Hon. Robert Rogers, Minister of Public Works, to-day condemned in no uncertain manner what he called Sir Wilfrid Laurier's cheap-jack naval policy in discussing the announcement that Sir Frederick Borden and Mr. Brodeur would leave for England immediately after the session to consult the Imperial authorities.

An hon. MEMBER. Hear, hear.

Mr. MURPHY. I think I heard some gentleman opposite say 'hear, hear,' but I would ask him to reserve his applause for the next paragraph:

Said Mr. Rogers, 'battleships of the Dreadnought type alone can serve to uphold Great Britain's supremacy on the seas. It is for Canada to say whether she will or will not provide for one or more of these battleships. If our answer is to be no, it would be more manly, more dignified and more admirable in every way frankly to say so and not beat about the bush in wishy-washy resolutions, and——

I commend these words to my friend who said 'hear, hear.'

—and talk of sending ministers on time-killing expeditions to London.

No, concluded Mr. Rogers, I don't think the Laurier government has any intention of implementing the terms of this resolution and you will notice that Sir Wilfrid Laurier is not receiving any congratulatory messages from the King or other personages in London on the strength of his naval policy.

That, so far as my knowledge goes, is the first intimation of activity on the part of the gentleman who has turned out to be the great tempter of the English-speaking portion of the Conservative party on the naval question. You will recall that the Hon. Mr. Borden was in England in the summer of 1909, and you will also recall that while he was in England his colleague the Minister of Trade and Commerce made a tour of the west. There was a banquet given to him at the city of Winnipeg at which the present Minister of the Interior was a very prominent figure.

At that banquet in Winnipeg and at other functions in other places throughout the west, the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Foster), made speeches, and each of these speeches indicated that he too was gradually yielding to the spell of the tempter, and that by degrees he was making up his mind to abandon the position he had so valiantly taken in this House on the 29th March, 1909.

Then, after the return of the hon. the First Minister (Mr. Borden), from England, and after he had made his speech in Halifax, re-asserting his position on this resolution and declaring it to be the same as it was when that resolution was adopted, what took place? A very significant interview took place between my hon. friend the First Minister (Mr. Borden), and the great tempter from Winnipeg, Mr. Robert Rogers. That interview took place in the city of Toronto, and perhaps it was the knowledge of that interview which led some people to believe that the pressure on the First Minister to change his position came from Winnipeg. The 'Mail and Empire' of November the 1st, 1909, gives some insight into what took place at Toronto. Of that interview between the Prime Minister, who up to that time had stuck to his guns, and Mr. Rogers, then Minister of Public Works of Manitoba, the 'Mail and Empire,' of November the 1st, 1909, gave the following account:

Hon. Robert Rogers, Minister of Public Works for Manitoba, was at the King Edward Hotel yesterday and left for Montreal last night. He was in conference with Mr. R. L. Borden during the day, but neither gentleman would make any statement in regard to the matters under discussion.

Then after some other statements which are not material to this debate, the article continues :—

Mr. Rogers was asked what was the state of public opinion in the west in regard to the proposition for a Canadian navy, and replied: 'The west is not bubbling over with confidence in Sir Wilfrid Laurier, nor with the idea that he is going to do anything for the welfare of the empire. In the west we don't think that even a Canadian navy would be the best means of paying our obligations to Great Britain for protection and services rendered in the past.'

And a little later on the writer says :—

The talk of a Canadian navy is only a means to an end whereby they can get around the matter and end in doing nothing. If we had in Canada a First Minister in whose loyalty to the empire the country had confidence, then conditions might be different.

'How about the resolution of the House?' was asked.

Resolutions are words or dead letters until a living spirit puts life into them. If the ruling spirit in Canada is not loyal to even that resolution, conditions to my mind are serious.

Mr. Speaker, in view of recent developments, let me read that sentence over again :—

If the ruling spirit in Canada is not loyal to even that resolution, conditions to my mind are serious.

I would draw the attention of the Minister of Marine and Fisheries (Mr. Hazen), to this :—

Many long months have passed since this resolution came down, and nothing has as yet been accomplished except the time-killing mission of two ministers who are sent to England.

From these citations it must be evident that a new policy was decided on at that time by the Prime Minister and by a certain section of his English-speaking following; and if there be any doubt as to where the pressure came from, that doubt is entirely removed by a speech delivered by the Hon. Walter Scott in the Saskatchewan Legislature on the 17th of December, 1909, when that legislature was discussing the Dreadnought resolution offered by Mr. Wylie, who was then, I believe, the member for Maple Creek. The Hon. Mr. Scott is reported to have spoken as follows :—

The movement to drive Mr. Borden from the position which he has taken on this naval question is a movement which, it is well known, has originated in Winnipeg. The knowledge of that fact, together with the motion before us gives good reason for thinking that our hon. friends opposite have at last discovered a way in which to exhibit at least a little gratitude for some of the things which occurred and were done in the Saskatchewan campaign in August, 1908, when the so-called Provincial Rights organization forces were directed from Winnipeg by the Hon. Mr. Rogers.

Mr. Wylie—Rogers had absolutely nothing to do with my motion.

Mr. Scott—Mr. Speaker, the rules of the House impose some very proper restrictions which I should be the last to disregard but we are dealing with a maritime subject and I really must suggest to my hon. friend that he tell that to the marines.

The part taken by Mr. Rogers in the Saskatchewan campaign last year cannot be disputed. The part that he is taking at the present time against Mr. Borden on this naval question is equally well known. That the underlying purpose of this motion of Mr. Wylie which we are considering is identical with Mr. Roger's purpose must be apparent event to a child. Let Mr. Wylie not imagine that the public are unable to add two and two together.

So I assert that there can be no doubt that the present Minister of the Interior (Mr. Rogers), was the author of the cry heard so often in certain parts of this country during the last elections, namely, that the naval policy of the late government was not British enough, just as the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Monk), and his Nationalist associates were the authors of that cry in Quebec that that policy was too British. Is it any wonder then that we on this side should demand an explanation as to how these two hon. gentlemen came together in the same cabinet? Is it not natural that we should ask further that if when this government tenders advice to the Crown on naval matters, that advice is accompanied by two riders, one bearing the signature of the Minister of the Interior, for the imperial wing of the party, and the other bearing the signature of the Minister of Public Works for the anti-imperial wing of the party? Sir, it is only necessary to mention these conditions to realize how timely is the amendment of the right hon. the leader of the opposition (Sir Wilfrid Laurier), and that it should be supported by every man who appreciates the benefits of responsible government.

So much has been said about reciprocity that it would not be showing proper consideration for the time of the House if, at this stage of the debate, the discussion on that subject were to be prolonged. However, there is one phase of the matter with which I would like to deal very briefly. When the late government took office in 1896 they were confronted with a number of outstanding questions between Canada and the United States, which had threatened, at one time or another to impair the friendly relations that should exist between two neighbouring peoples. What happened? The late government set resolutely to work to remove these sources of irritation, and in turn settled the Alaskan boundary question, the boundary waters question, the fisheries question as connected with international boundary waters, the question of the international boundary in Passamaquoddy Bay, the North Atlantic coast fisheries question and the pelagic sealing question, and it entered into an agreement for the settling of the outstanding pecuniary claims of the subjects of both countries.

Now, Mr. Speaker, the settlement of all these questions involved no loss of national honour and no weakening of the imperial tie. On the contrary, it increased Canadian national self-respect and the removal of all these subjects of controversy not only promoted more friendly relations between Canada and the United States, but it brought the British and the American peoples more closely together than they had ever been before.

And, Sir, having regard to these results, it was felt by the late government that it would have been a crime not only against Canada but against Great Britain as well to have rejected the friendly overtures of the United States to enter into a reciprocal trade arrangement confined to the natural products of the two countries. As a member of the late government, holding that view, I cannot too strongly condemn the tactics of those opponents of reciprocity who, with complete disregard for the future relations of Canada and the empire with the United States, and thinking only of attaining party success, distorted certain words used by President Taft in his message to Congress, and argued that because he said that Canadians were coming to the parting of the ways, that meant that we were being forced to choose between the road leading to Washington and the road leading to the capital of the British Empire. As that phrase has been referred to in the same sense in this debate, I would ask your indulgence, Sir, for a few minutes while I place the facts before you. Now, what are the facts? In the first place, the president's words, as they appear in his message to congress, are not open to the interpretation placed upon them. Just let us see what he did say. Here are his exact words:

> The Dominion has greatly prospered. It has an active, aggressive, and intelligent people. They are coming to the parting of the ways. They must soon decide whether they are to regard themselves as isolated permanently from our markets by a perpetual wall or whether we are to be commercial friends.

Nothing very alarming in that, Mr. Speaker; nothing there to justify the use of the annexation cry; nothing there to justify the stirring up of an anti-American feeling in this country. Those who led the people of Canada, or some of them at least to believe that the words 'the parting of the ways' were applied for the first time to Canada by President Taft, and then with a sinister meaning, have absolutely no defence for their conduct when all the facts are known.

What are the further facts? It happens that this very phrase, 'the parting of the ways,' was used by a distinguished American statesman in discussing international relations with a former leader of the Conservative party, and there can be no doubt that in repeating the phrase in his late message to congress, President Taft was but echoing the words used by Mr. Bayard, the American Secretary of State, in a letter written by him to Sir Charles Tupper in 1887 on the subject of our commercial relations. In that letter, which was dated May 31, 1887, Mr. Bayard said:

> The gravity of the present condition of affairs between our two countries demands entire frankness. I feel we stand at 'the parting of the ways.' In one direction I can see a well assured, steady, healthful relationship, devoid of petty jealousies and filled with the fruits of a prosperity arising out of a friendship cemented by mutual interests, and enduring because based upon justice; on the other a career of embittered rivalry, staining our long frontier with the hues of hostility, in which victory means the destruction of an adjacent prosperity without gain to the prevalent party—a mutual, physical and moral deterioration which ought to be abhorrent to patriots on both sides, and which, I am sure, no two men will exert themselves more to prevent than the parties to this unofficial correspondence.

There, Sir, you have almost the identical language used by President Taft, and that letter was written 24 years before President Taft sent his message to congress. When Sir Charles Tupper received that letter and read the phrase, 'the parting of the ways,' did he lash himself into a frenzy and shout that Mr. Bayard in using it had evil designs on Canada? Nothing of the kind. Did he object to the use of those words in any way? Not he. Then you may ask, what did he do? He sat down and wrote a letter to Mr. Bayard on the 6th of June, 1887, in these terms:

My dear Mr. Bayard,—I had great pleasure in receiving your letter of May 31 evincing as it does the importance which you attach to the maintenance of the cordial commercial relations between the United States and Canada, under which such vast and mutually beneficial results have grown up. I entirely concur in your statement that we both seek to attain a just and permanent settlement—and that there is but one way to procure it—and that is by a straightforward treatment on a liberal and statesmanlike plan of the entire commercial relations of the two countries.

Not one word of protest or objection, but every line of that letter constitutes a standing rebuke to our opponents who employed the tactics of which we have reason to complain. If we were seeking justification for our course in regard to that trade agreement, I submit that we could find no better justification than that which is contained in this letter of Sir Charles Tupper.

Now, Sir, if I have fault to find with hon. gentlemen opposite on matters of general policy, I have none at all to find with the candour displayed by the hon. member for Yamaska (Mr. Mondou), and the hon. member for West Peterborough (Mr. Burnham). The first of these hon. gentlemen told us that the opposition to the right hon. leader of the late government in the province of Quebec was due to the feeling that he had not done enough for the Catholics. The hon. member for West Peterborough (Mr. Burnham) told us with equal frankness that opposition to the right hon. gentleman in the province of Ontario was due to the feeling that he had done too much for the Catholics. It is true that the political vision of the average Ontario elector was temporarily obscured by some of the issues raised in the recent election; but, Sir, I have enough confidence in his sense of fair-play, in his deep-rooted love of justice, to believe that when the mists have cleared away he will see the direction in which his duty lies, and will punish the men who misled him in that election. Sir, we all remember the Gordon riots in England, and the regrettable deeds that were done by a section of the people while under the influence of religious excitement. In the account of the happenings of that time given by Charles Dickens in 'Barnaby Rudge,' there stands out one incident which I think is worth repeating in this House. When, by reason of professing the same creed as the rioters, Gabriel Varden, the sturdy old English locksmith, was urged to chalk their motto on his door and thus secure the protection of his home, he rejected the proposal with scorn, saying 'No! 'I'd neither have the protection of their leader nor chalk their howl upon my door' though for not doing it they shot me on my own threshold.' Mr. Speaker, in substance I believe that will be the attitude of the Ontario elector if in the future appeals are made to him similar to those that were made to him in the recent election.

Now, Sir, what answer has been made by the government to this amendment? The only answer vouchsafed by the Prime Minister and the Minister of Trade and Commerce is this, that it is not just to ask the government to declare its naval policy at this time. Not just to ask the government to declare its naval policy, when only one short year ago the hon. Minister of Public Works aye and the hon. Prime Minister as well—moved an amendment to the address because the speech from the Throne contained no indication of the intention of the government to submit the naval question to the people. Why could not this government have embodied in the speech from the Throne what its Prime Minister and his Minister of Public Works professed to be their view and their desire just one year ago?

Were they not bound in honour to do so when we have it on the word of the Postmaster General (Mr. Pelletier) and of Mr. Armand Lavergne, speaking to the electors in the county of Quebec, that the Prime Minister had promised them both that there should be a referendum on this subject?

Not just to ask the government to declare their naval policy!—after what took place during the recent election, when the Prime Minister at different places in Ontario, and elsewhere in the English speaking centres had been most eloquent on the subject of the navy, and had then gone to Quebec, and had suddenly become as mum as the traditional mollusc on the same subject. Have we not a right, Sir, to ask for some explanation of such a Janus-faced policy as that?

Not just to ask this government for a declaration of its naval policy!—when the Prime Minister went to Missisquoi in the province of Quebec in the recent election, and by appearing on his candidate's platform there publicly endorsed that candidate's election address which contained the following paragraph:

If I am elected I will give my word and my vote—I declare it emphatically in advance—to obtain the repeal of the Naval Bill. I will vote against any Prime Minister whether Mr. Borden, or any one else who will not repeal this Bill in its entirety.

In view of the Prime Minister's endorsement of that position during the election have we not the right to know where he stands on that question now?

Not just to ask the government for a declaration of its naval policy!—when my hon. friend the Minister of Marine and Fisheries (Mr. Hazen) speaking a few evenings ago in this House, approved of the Prime Minister sending telegrams during the elections outlining his policy on a great variety of matters. Surely, Sir, if that were proper for the Prime Minister to do, we are entirely within our rights in asking the Prime Minister to state his naval policy in the speech from the Throne.

Not just to ask the government to declare its naval policy!—when in this very debate, the Prime Minister told us that naval expenditures should stop, when the Minister of Marine stated that some members of the government should go to England to consult the Admiralty on this question. Could not the government have stated either or both of these things in the speech from the Throne? But I would ask the Minister of Marine and Fisheries why should he waste time and money in going to England on what his colleague the Minister of the Interior (Mr. Rogers) described as a time-killing mission? Why does he need to ask the views of the Admiralty? Sir, he has the views of the Admiralty. They are contained in the official reports of the conference of 1909. If he will consult those reports, and will also read the debate which afterwards took place in this House on the subject, he will find that the Admiralty favoured one of three things—first a cash contribution; second a fleet unit on the Pacific; or, third, a navy such as the late government proposed to build. If further information is required the hon. gentleman (Mr. Hazen) can get it by simply sending a cablegram to the Foreign Office, or other proper quarters in England. But, Sir, it may be that our friend and late colleague, Hon. Senator George Taylor, former member for Leeds in this House, let the cat out of the bag when he was discussing, with remarkable candour, before his former constituents the political huckstering that had gone on between himself and the Prime Minister (Mr. Borden) and the Minister of Finance (Mr. W. T. White) to obtain a seat for the last hon. gentleman in the county of Leeds. In the course of that explanation he told the people of that county that the Prime Minister had informed him that he would not be losing much by giving up his seat in this House and going to the Senate because there were only going to be two sessions of this parliament anyway. Well, if that be a fact, and I have no reason to doubt it, it looks very much as if this government were trying to shelve this navy question until after the next general election, in the hope that they may obtain another favourable verdict under false pretences. Or is it, Sir, that they are like the boa constrictor, there has been so much swallowing that they must go into a long sleep to work off the effect?

My hon. friend from Red Deer (Mr. M. Clark) in his magnificent speech last week, said and truly said, that this amendment involves the personal honour of the ministry. So it does, Sir. But possibly the hon. member for Red Deer did not know the full extent to which the personal honour of the ministry is involved when he made that statement. Mr. Speaker, the government has not only trifled with this parliament, but it has trifled with His Majesty the King, and with His Royal Highness the Governor General as well. In one breath this government tells the Nationalists that there will be no navy, and in almost the same breath they assure His Majesty and His Royal Highness the Governor General that there will be a navy. In the 'Canada Gazette' of November 11, 1911, there appears this announcement:

Department of the Naval Service.

His Majesty the King has been graciously pleased to approve of the naval forces of Canada receiving the style of the 'Royal Canadian Navy,' and of the ships of war of that navy being designated as 'His Majesty's Canadian Ships.'

G. J. DESBARATS,
Deputy Minister of the Naval Service.

If there are to be no ships, if there is to be no navy, did not the ministers, as loyal and honourable men, owe it to His Majesty to tell him so, instead of leading him to believe that we should have both by publishing this announcement of his royal pleasure? But that is not all. Just as these ministers have trifled with His Majesty, so they have trifled with His Majesty's representative, the Governor General of this country. The same number of the 'Canada Gazette' contains the following:

At the Government House at Ottawa,
Wednesday, the 18th day of Oct., 1911.
Present:
His Royal Highness in Council.

His Royal Highness is pleased to order and it is hereby ordered as follows:—

The regulations for the entry of naval cadets for the naval service, which provide that candidates shall be between fourteen and sixteen years of age on the 1st January immediately following the examination, are hereby suspended as regards the examination for naval cadets which is to be held in November, 1911, and it is hereby provided that candidates who are not more than seventeen years of age on 1st January, 1912, may compete at such examination, such alteration in age being applicable to this particular examination only.

RODOLPHE BOUDREAU,
Clerk of the Privy Council.

Now, if we are to build no ships, and have no navy, as the Nationalist wing of this coalition government desire, why was the Governor General given the assurance that we should have both by the terms of this order in council when it was presented to His Royal Highness by this government for his signature? What, in terms, is that order in council but an intimation that the naval programme of the late government is being carried on by the present coalition ministry.

Nor is that all. While assuring a section of their followers that there will be no navy this government is advertising for all kinds of supplies for the navy.

Tenders are coming in, these in due course will be accepted by order in council, and as each order in council is presented to His Royal Highness the Governor General for his signature, that will be a further assurance that the naval programme of the late government is to proceed. Surely, Sir, the ministers owe it to His Royal Highness to inform him if that is not to be the case. But, as my hon. friend from Guysboro (Mr. Sinclair) said a few days ago, what kind of treatment can the Governor General of this country expect from the hands of men who are the political heirs of the men who stoned a Governor General through the streets of Montreal? If this amendment and the debate upon it serve no other purpose than to place hon. gentlemen opposite in their true light before the people of this country, that alone would justify the vote which I intend to give in support of the amendment.

House divided on amendment (Sir Wilfrid Laurier).

Amendment negatived.

Motion Mr. Bennett (Calgary) agreed to.

Mr. BORDEN moved:

That the said address be engrossed and presented to His Royal Highness the Governor General by such members of this House as are of the Honourable the Privy Council.

Motion agreed to.

APPOINTMENT OF CHAIRMAN OF COMMITTEES OF THE WHOLE HOUSE.

Mr. BORDEN moved:

That Pierre Edouard Blondin, Esq., Member for the Electoral District of Champlain, be appointed Chairman of Committees of the Whole House.

Mr. F. F. PARDEE (West Lambton). Mr. Speaker, before this motion is carried I desire to say a few words upon it. It has been the pride of the Conservative party as long as I can remember, that they have always declared themselves, par excellence, the party of loyalty——

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

Mr. PARDEE. My hon. friends say, 'hear, hear,' I would like to hear as many 'hear, hears' when I have finished. They have always declared that to the people of this country, and although we on this side have not paraded our loyalty to the same extent as the members on that side of the House, the members of the Reform party in Ontario and of the Dominion of Canada, are equally as loyal as the Conservative party ever was or ever will be. The Conservative cry of loyalty has almost become a tradition. Not long ago another party arose in this country, a party which, so far as I can see, has for its aim and object, not the binding together of the British Empire but rather the tearing asunder of that empire—that party is known as the Nationalist party. As I have said I cannot see wherein its aims will be for the good of this country or of themselves or the British Empire. That is my idea, plainly spoken, of the Nationalist party.

Mr. MURPHY

The hon. member who has been proposed by the Prime Minister and the government as deputy speaker of this House is an avowed member of that party. He belongs, as I understand, to the Nationalist party. The post of Deputy Speaker of this House is an important one; its occupant may become the mouthpiece of the House in your place, his functions in this house are most important and on appointment he becomes the second commoner in the land or on occasion may become the first commoner. Under those circumstances it does appear to me that the government should have suggested some one whose loyalty to the mother land as shown in his acts and in his speeches, was absolutely and entirely unquestioned, one who stood first, last and all the time for the solidarity of the British Empire and I am free to say that the hon. gentleman whose name has been proposed does not possess these attributes.

In order to substantiate the position taken by members on this side of the House, I shall read from some of the utterances of that hon. gentleman. My first extract is from 'L'Evénement,' one of the leading Nationalist papers in Quebec. In this connection let me say that even such a sturdy Tory newspaper as the Quebec 'Chronicle,' one of the backbones of the Conservative press in the province of Quebec, editorially has declared that it cuts itself free from the Nationalist party and will have no more of them. I quote from 'L'Evénement,' of November 3, 1910, from a report of a speech said to have been made by the hon. member for Champlain. After giving certain information regarding the then premier of this country, Sir Wilfrid Laurier, it goes on to say:

Messrs. Lavergne and Blondin delivered speeches of a very high order.

Blondin—Canada owes nothing to England declared Mr. Blondin. The English did not conquer us for love nor to plant the cross of Christ as did France, and we are kept under her flag for the advantage of the trade. She benefited by her colony of Canada. What do we owe her?

Those are his words as reported in the Nationalist organ of the province of Quebec, the organ supporting the party to which the hon. gentleman proposed as Deputy Speaker of this House, belongs.

Then, Sir, we have something further, some remarks made by the same hon. gentleman at a meeting at which he spoke, I think in Victoriaville in Quebec, on the 22nd day of November last. In that speech he used these words, and I am quoting from 'Hansard' at page 146 of the session of 1910-11:

The only liberties which we enjoy have been snatched. England has not conquered Canada for love or to plant the cross of Christ as did France, but to establish trading posts and make money, She has sowed the world with hatred, quarrels and wars. We have had enough of England and the English.

Mr. FOSTER. May I ask my hon. friend if he is reading that as an extract from 'Hansard' from a speech made by an hon. member in this House, or if it is an extract from a paper which he finds in 'Hansard'?

Mr. PARDEE. I am quoting it from a speech made by the then Minister of Marine and Fisheries (Mr. Brodeur) in this House.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Oh, oh.

Mr. PARDEE. Perhaps hon. gentlemen will wait—(reading)

Mr. BLONDIN. I did not say the—

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

Mr. PARDEE. Hear, hear, the hon. gentleman says. Let him listen to the rest of it. I read:

I did not say the first phrase.

He never denied saying that he had had enough of England and the English.

Mr. BLONDIN. I deny it.

Mr. PARDEE. The hon. gentleman at that time did not deny it. I read:

Mr. BLONDIN. I did not say the first phrase, and I think Mr. Beland will deny it also.

Mr. BELAND. I may say that I was present at that last meeting, and I remember exactly the words pronounced by the hon. member for Champlain, and as far as I can remember, that is an exact reproduction of his speech.

Mr. BLONDIN. I do not deny that that was said, but it was not said by me.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

Mr. PARDEE—(reading):

Mr. BRODEUR. Well, it is very unfortunate, Mr. Speaker. After all, the Prime Minister was perfectly justified yesterday in saying that a victory won by such means was disastrous—

Referring to the Arthabaska election.

——disastrous to the Conservative party, and to-day they are ashamed of the work they have done.

Mr. BLONDIN. I am not ashamed. I will repeat them to you to-morrow.

It does seem to me, therefore, that taking into consideration the questions that were raised incidentally—if it pleases members on the other side to put it that way—to the economic discussion of reciprocity, if there was one thing above another we did hear in Ontario it was the appeal of John V. Borne who has gone to his reward, the appeal to the British-born, and the appeal to the loyalty of the people of Ontario. In view of all that has gone before, it does appear to be most extraordinary that this government which is constantly proclaiming the loyalty of its supporters from the housetops should propose for the office of Deputy Speaker a man who has said that we have had enough of England and the English. What does that mean when you come to analyse the expression—

Mr. BLONDIN. I deny that I used such language.

Mr. PARDEE. Is there a man in this House on either side—

Some hon MEMBERS. Order, take it back.

Mr. SPEAKER. I draw the attention of the hon. member (Mr. Pardee) to the fact that it has been emphatically denied by the hon. member (Mr. Blondin) that he used that language, and the rules require that the hon. member for Lambton shall accept the statement of the hon. member for Champlain (Mr. Blondin).

Mr. PARDEE. I should like to ask why it is—

Some hon. MEMBERS. Take it back.

Mr. PARDEE. I want to ask the House how it is that the hon. member at this epoch denies it when he did not deny it a year ago?

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order, take it back.

Mr BLONDIN. If the hon. gentleman makes proper inquiry he will find that I have already denied that I used these very words.

Mr. PARDEE. Mr. Speaker, I bow to your ruling, if you rule I must withdraw these words. But, does the hon. gentleman (Mr. Blondin) deny that he belongs to the Nationalist party headed by Henri Bourassa. He says no; he admits he belongs to that party. I say to this House and to this country that a man who could join that party and who stands to-day for the precepts and the principles of the Nationalist party of Quebec is not a man worthy to fill the office of Deputy Speaker. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Blondin) may not have used these words; well and good; but, Sir, I do say that whether he said them or whether he did not say them—

Mr. SPEAKER. Order.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Sit down.

Mr. SPEAKER. The hon. member (Mr. Pardee) is an old member of parliament, and he knows the rule that it is not permissible, after a denial is made by an hon. member, to suggest by any other argument that the denial is not correct. The denial of an hon. member must be accepted unconditionally.

Mr. PARDEE. Very well, Mr. Speaker, but I want to say that so far as I understand the platform and principles of the Nationalist party as laid down in the province of Quebec and in part of the province of Ontario during the last campaign, it does not appear to me that a gentleman owning allegiance to that party is a fit and proper person to be the second commoner of Canada. There are many men on the government side who might have filled this position with dignity and credit, and I do therefore submit that it was the duty of the government and the Prime Minister to take into consideration certain features of the political history that was written during the last campaign. I commend this appointment to the Minister of Trade and Commerce who, speaking at a banquet in New York the other night, speaking in the camp of the enemy, boldly declared, and I admire him for it: 'English I will be to the crack of doom.' I commend the appointment of Mr. Blondin to the members in this House from the loyal city of Toronto; I commend it to all those who have the best interests of the Dominion at heart. Speaking for myself, speaking I believe for the men on this side of the House, and speaking for the Liberal electorate throughout the Dominion I say it is not such an appointment as under the circumstances I have pointed out will meet with the approval of the people.

Mr. THOMAS BEATTIE (London). It seems to make a great difference, Mr. Speaker, as to which side of the House one may be sitting on. There is no member of this House for whom I have a higher regard than my hon. friend from Lambton (Mr. Pardee), but I must remind him that when Mr. M. Y. McLean, then member for South Huron, who was supporting in this House the Liberal government and sitting with my hon. friend (Mr. Pardee), rose and stated here that we owed England nothing, my hon. friend from Lambton (Mr. Pardee) never opened his mouth to object. Mr. M. Y. McLean was defeated last election, and I do not think he will ever come into this House again.

Hon. R L. BORDEN (Prime Minister). The observations of my hon. friend from Lambton (Mr. Pardee) are very much along the line with which we have been favoured by hon. gentlemen on the opposite side ever since this session opened. They seem to be characterized by a desire to raise section against section and race against race. If that is not the meaning of this demonstration I do not know what meaning it has, because by the time my hon. friend (Mr. Pardee) resumed his seat, he was obliged to take back practically everything he had said that was relevant to his contention.

And my hon. friend, who made these observations, has been sitting in parliament —and he knows it—behind a man who uttered the very words which he regards as criminal coming, if they did come, from the mouth of the hon. member for Champlain (Mr. Blondin). I quoted those very words to Sir Richard Cartwright across the floor of this House, and he admitted having uttered them, namely, that Canada owed nothing to Great Britain except Christian forgiveness for all the injuries the mother country had wrought upon us. Yet my hon. friend (Mr. Pardee), who has made these reflections on the hon. member for Champlain, sat as a humble follower eight years in this House behind Sir Richard Cartwright without ever having had his equanimity disturbed for a moment. Under the circumstances, I think we can take the utterances of the hon. gentleman (Mr. Pardee) for what they are worth. They will have no more effect than has had a great deal of what has come from hon. gentlemen opposite. We are not to be moved by these sectional appeals. We are here for the purpose of endeavouring to carry on the business of the country in a reasonable efficient and honest manner, and hon. gentlemen opposite have, since the opening of this session been endeavouring to distract attention from the real business of parliament.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Oh, oh.

Mr. BORDEN. They have been doing so by reading from day to day scraps of newspapers and going back to the pages of 'Hansard' some ten or fifteen years ago, and the best part of their speeches is to be found in their quotations from hon. members on this side.

My hon. friend has not favoured us with the observations of another one of his leaders. Why does he not enlighten the House with regard to the opinions and observations of the late Minister of Labour (Mr. King) which have been quoted in this House. Perhaps he would favour us with his comment on them now? My hon. friend does not see fit to do so. I would suggest to him in all sincerity, that it might be well, indeed, for him had he given some consideration to those utterances and many others, that I have in my mind and which I might quote to-day if my hon. friend desires to go into history of this kind.

My hon. friend the member for Champlain (Mr. Blondin) has denied every material allegation made by the hon. gentleman, and the attention of the mover of this resolution had to be called to that denial before he was willing to bring it to the attention of the House. My hon. friend from Champlain (Mr. Blondin) has perhaps been fervent sometimes in his utterances on the public platform, but I would like to tell the hon. member for Lambton (Mr. Pardee) that men have risen to very high positions, indeed, in this country in the ranks of the Liberal party, and occupy them now, whose utterances might be quoted this afternoon as deserving the denunciations of my hon. friend—if these denunciations were sincere, as I am bound to believe they were—even to a greater extent than those which he gave us only a few minutes ago. I do not think it is in the true interest of the people of this country that appeals should be made such as those we have just heard from the hon. member for Lambton. He has charged the hon. member for Champlain (Mr. Blondin) with disloyalty. Let me tell him that I believe my hon. friend from Champlain (Mr. Blondin) is as loyal a man as he is himself.

An hon. MEMBER. Prove it.

Mr. BORDEN. He is ready to prove it whenever called upon to do so. I do not desire to take up the time of parliament, though I could indulge in very interesting reminiscences, and if this warfare be persisted in by hon. gentlemen opposite, they will find that we are able to take our full share.

I can only say in conclusion that inasmuch as my hon. friend from Lambton has been obliged to withdraw everything he said pertinent to the resolution. I would ask the House to accept this motion, and by its vote to record its view that my hon. friend from Champlain is worthy of the high position the House now proposes to confer upon him.

Motion agreed to.

SUPPLY.

Hon. W. T. WHITE (Minister of Finance) moved:

That this House will on Thursday next resolve itself into committee to consider the Supply to be granted to His Majesty.

Motion agreed to.

WAYS AND MEANS.

Mr. WHITE moved:

That this House will on Thursday next resolve itself into committee to consider the ways and means for raising the Supply to be granted to His Majesty.

1. Is it the intention of the government to implement the promise made by the present Minister of Labour and other government supporters in the province of Ontario during the recent election campaign, to the effect that if the Conservative party were returned to power all those who lost money through the failure of the Farmers' Bank would be reimbursed by the government?

2. In the event of such reimbursement by the government, will the amount to be paid cover any loss sustained in the transaction set forth in the Toronto 'Globe' of August 26th, 1911, as follows:

That in or about the month of June, 1908, the manager of the Toronto 'World, of which paper W. F. Maclean, Conservative member for South York, is chief owner, made an arrangement with W. R. Travers, manager of the Farmers' Bank, to solicit deposits for the Farmers' Bank, which, it is now claimed by the 'News' and other Conservative organs, was rotten from its inception.

That in return Travers agreed to loan funds of the bank to the Toronto 'World'.

That in pursuance of this understanding the manager of the Toronto 'World' procured by the exercise of influence over Col. Matheson, the Provincial Treasurer, an increase in the deposit of the province of Ontario in the Farmers' Bank from $10,000 to $35,000.

That contemporaneously with the increase of the deposit of the province of Ontario to $35,000, Travers, for the bank, loaned Dr. Beattie Nesbitt $25,000 and the Toronto 'World' $10,000, and wrote a letter to Col. Matheson, informing him that these loans had been made, a copy of which letter is now, or was recently, on file amongst the papers of the Farmers' Bank.

That Col. Matheson denies the receipt of this letter.

That with the $25,000 thus obtained Dr. Beattie Nesbitt was enabled to pay the first instalment of the purchase price of the Keeley Mine, the speculation which finally wrecked the bank and drove Nesbitt out of the country—a fugitive from justice.

Mr. BORDEN. This question will have to be remodelled. It is subject to the same objection as the other.

Mr. McCRANEY:

1. Did the Prime Minister visit certain ecclesiastical dignitaries in the city of Quebec, as stated in the following item published by the Conservative paper 'L'Evenément' on October 14, 1911:—

The Hon. Mr. Borden at the Archbishopric.

of the government, that the Manitoba School Question had been settled.

The extension of the boundaries of Manitoba has been under consieration and a basis of settlement has been reached respecting the financial terms which have hitherto been in dispute. That basis adopts the principle of equality of treatment as between Manitoba and the other prairie provinces. The application of this principle to the details is being worked out.

COPYRIGHT.

Mr. WILSON (Laval):

Is it the intention of the government to introduce the Copyright Bill, Bill (No. 184) of the last session of the last parliament, which had its first reading on 26th April, 1911, or to introduce an analogous Bill during the present session?

Mr. BURRELL. At the time of the introduction of the Canadian Copyright Bill there was before the British parliament a Bill to give effect to the resolutions of the Imperial Copyright Conference of 1910. One of the main objects of the Canadian Bill was to make the Canadian law on the subject uniform with the law to be enacted by the British Bill. Since the introduction of the British Bill substantial amendments have been made and it is still before the British parliament. It is not the intention of this government to introduce a Bill this session.

Mr. OLIVER:

What were the financial terms agreed upon with the Premier and Attorney General of Manitoba as a condition of the extension of the boundaries of that province, which they have announced to the press?

4. The first ships of the programme could probably have been delivered in England within about fifteen months of the placing of the order.

The total programme could probably have been completed within about three years.

5. The present government is not acquainted with the reasons which prevented the late government from placing the orders for these vessels.

TRADE RELATIONS WITH JAPAN.

Mr. LEMIEUX:

1. Has the Minister of Trade and Commerce taken notice of the following remarks made by the Japanese Consul at Vancouver and published in the Montreal 'Witness' on the 23rd November ult:—

Mr. HAZEN.

CANADA FOR JAPAN.

Japanese Consul makes strong plea for greater trade relations.

Toronto, November 23rd.—'Canada has not realized by half the opportunity she has of building up a great and profitable field of trade with Japan,' is the opinion of Mr. Chonosuka Yada, Japanese Consul at Vancouver , given in an interview here yesterday.

'In spite of the fact that the reciprocal trade between the two countries has increased nearly sixty per cent within the last ten years, the Consul said Canada is still allowing the United States to send over to Japan by far the largest part of the wheat Japan has to import every year. Japan's population of fifty millions is rapidly becoming a wheat-eating instead of a rice-eating people. Her wheat lands are strictly limited, Japan being a mountainous country, and we are already importing wheat from the United States, India and other countries to the annual amount of three to four million dollars. 'We get most of our wheat from the United States, and I am surprised that Canada is not taking a bigger share of this business.

'As the elder daughter of Great Britain, we look to Canada,' said Mr. Yada, as a country not only to which we may send goods but from which we may become large purchasers of manufactured and natural products.

'Not only must Japan import a large part of the wheat she requires, but she also needs great quantities of paper, of which she is now getting from Norway, Germany and other countries one million dollars worth annually. There are over two thousand periodicals published in Japan, which consume thousands of tons of paper every day; the paper mills of Japan cannot supply half the quantity required.

'There is a large trade to be done, too, by Canadian manufacturers of machinery, hardware, cycles and cycle parts and other manufactured products.'

2. Will the Minister take any steps totowards improving our trade relations with Japan?

3. Who is the Canadian Trade Commissioner in Japan?

Mr. FOSTER: (Toronto).

1. Yes.

2. The minister will bend his best efforts towards improving our trade relations with all suitable countries, including Japan.

3. Mr. Harris.

QUEBEC HARBOUR BOARD.

Mr. LEMIEUX:

1. Have the three members of the Quebec Harbour Board been removed from office?

2. If so, by whom have they been replaced, and at whose request was the old board removed?

Mr. MONK:

1. Yes.

2. The new board consists of Messrs. Victor Chateauvert, J. B. E. Letellier and Neuville Belleau.

The old board was removed on the recommendation of the Minister of Marine and Fisheries.

POST OFFICE AT ST. JACQUES.

Mr. LAFORTUNE:

1. Are the plans made for the post office to be built at St. Jacques, in the county of Montcalm?
2. If so, will tenders for its construction be asked for and when?

Mr. PELLETIER:

1 and 2. A question affecting the rights of proprietors, adjoining the site purchased, which may interfere with the building line, has delayed the preparation of plans.

2. What was the value and style of said stoves, ranges and heaters?

4. What was the value and style of said incubators?

1. The number of stoves exported from Canada to the Argentine Republic during the fiscal year ended March 31, 1911, was 39. (The different styles or kinds of stoves not separately enumerated.)
2. The value of stoves exported from Canada to Argentine Republic during the fiscal year ended March 31, 1911, was $1,158.

CENSUS ENUMERATION AT REGINA.

Mr. KNOWLES moved:—

For a copy of all letters, telegrams, memorials, resolutions and other documents in the hands of the government, or any department thereof, in connection with the taking of the census in the city of Regina, and all complaints and protests in connection with the same; also all departmental instructions, momoranda, reports and other documents.

He said: In making this motion I do not wish to be understood as in any way interfering in the business of another city, but it is the business of every city in Saskatchewan to see that the other cities have their correct proportionate census. No harm would be done to one city by the inflation of the census of another city if all cities were similarly inflated, but any business man will agree that if you double the size of one city in your census returns, and keep another city at its correct and honest figure, you have done that other city a great injustice. Men are looking about in that western country with a desire to obtain information with a view to locating, and if they find the city of Regina on record as having a population 6,000 larger than the population of Moosejaw and Saskatoon together that constitutes a reason and an unfounded reason for them to settle in Regina and you have done Moosejaw and Saskatoon an injustice. The records will show that the census enumerators in Regina, I will not say were intentionally dishonest but were lax in their interpretation of the term 'residents of Regina." Once you define a resident in a loose way, you open the door to great inflation of the census returns. It should not be interpreted in such a way as to include every one who visited the Dominion fair held in Regina this summer or to include people on the construction gangs on railways working out of Regina, who perhaps never slept in Regina a night. I am credibly informed that men have been enumerated who were on the Grand Trunk Pacific construction 38 miles from Regina who had never slept there and who were working within six miles from Moosejaw so that they should have been enumerated in Moosejaw if they were to be counted in either city, although I think they should not have been counted in either city. It is generally agreed in the west that the figures given for Regina are many thousands too much. It is, therefore, only for the purpose of ascertaining all the facts which the department must have on its records, and to show if there has been any inflation of the census in Regina and if there has been such an inflation to have every possible step taken to rectify it, that I make this motion. Complaints and documents have been presented to the department and when they are brought down I think it will be found that there is ample material to justify my asking for a copy of the papers.

Mr. MARTIN (Regina). Mr. Speaker, I do not wish to be understood as opposing the motion of the hon. member who is no doubt perfectly within his rights in bringing this matter to the attention of the House although I think he will find when he gets any information on file that he has little justification for any statements he has made in respect to the population of the city of Regina. In Regina we have very little interest in what the population of Moosejaw or Saskatoon or Prince Albert may be. My hon. friend has made some statements about the enumerators in Regina not doing their duty, or doing their duty too well as far as Moosejaw was concerned. I am personally acquainted with a number of the enumerators in Regina and I do not believe any of these men would be guilty of such dishonesty as my hon. friend from Moosejaw has attributed to them in his remarks. Every person knows that in Saswkatchewan and in the west in general cities grow by leaps and bounds. Some hon. gentleman may not credit the statement, but I do not believe there is any city in Alberta or Saskatchewan that has grown faster in proportion to its population in 1906 than Regina has grown within the last five years.

The object of my hon. friend must be to have the census of the city of Regina taken again, but unless the hon. gentleman can bring home to the city of Regina some wrong-doing on the part of the enumerators no case can be made out for the retaking of the census especially in view of the fact that the people of Regina are not asking it. The responsibility will of course rest on the government, but it would be a most unheard-of thing for the census of Regina to be taken at the instance of the city of Moosejaw. I believe, however, that if the census of the city of Regina is taken again the returns will show a greater population than they did last June.

Hon. MARTIN BURRELL (Minister of Agriculture). It is a strange fate that has brought my friends from Moosejaw and Regina into a controversy on a matter as to which the late government which they both supported is entirely responsible and for the sins of which the present government cannot be held to account in any shape or form. Apparently my hon. friend from Moosejaw takes the ground that the enumerators in the city of Regina did not do their duty and apparently he also means that the enumerators in the city of Moosejaw did not do their duty either.

I did not quite understand that hon. member for Moosejaw as the hon. member for Regina indicated to wish that another census of Regina should be taken. I must say that I have every sympathy with those places whether cities or districts either in the east or in the west which feel that their population has been under-estimated. It is easy to understand why sympathy is due in such a case. However, this is a very involved and difficult question for this government to consider. I have pointed out to the different deputations that have approached me on this matter the difficulties that confront the government in dealing with such a question and I promised to give the matter my careful consideration, as I shall do. I cannot say what action the government may finally take on such an intricate and controversial subject. I have no objection to the order going for the return which my hon. friend from Moosejaw asked for.

Motion agreed to, and house adjourned at six o'clock.

QUESTIONS.

(Questions answered orally are indicated by an asterisk.)

INTERCOLONIAL RAILWAY BRANCH LINES.

Mr. PUGSLEY:

1. Is the government aware that there appeared in the 'Standard,' a Conservative paper published in the city of St. John on the 9th September last, being eleven days before the general elections, what purported to be a copy of a telegram from the Hon. R. L. Borden, then leader of the opposition and now Prime Minister, addressed to Mr. George W. Fowler, the Conservative candidate for Kings and Albert, as follows:

'From Summerside, P.E.I., Sept. 8, 1911.

'To George W. Fowler.

'Am convinced that interest of Intercolonial railway demands acquisition of branch line railways as feeders, and we purpose to acquire them on reasonable terms if returned to power.

'(Sgd.) R. L. BORDEN.'

2. Was such telegram sent by the honourable the present leader of the government? If so, at whose request and with what object?

3. Does the government intend to carry out the promise contained in such telegram?. If so, when?

Mr. BORDEN:

1. No.

2. Yes, except that the word 'proposed' instead of the word 'purpose' was used in the telegram sent. In reply to requests for information as to the policy of the Liberal-Conservative party respecting the acquisition of branch lines.

3. The telegram was merely a summary of previous declarations of the Prime Minister in parliament. Each case must be dealt with on its merits under the conditions mentioned.

ST. JOHN HARBOUR IMPROVEMENTS.

*Mr. PUGSLEY:

1. Is the government aware that there appeared in the 'Standard,' a Conservative paper published in the city of St. John, New Brunswick, on the twentieth day of September last, the day before the general elections, what purported to be a despatch from the Hon. R. L. Borden, then the leader of the opposition and now Prime Minister, as follows:

Mr. Borden's special message to the people of St. John.

Halifax,N.S,. September 19, 1911.

Special.—On the 5th April, 1904, I moved a resolution in parliament declaring that the public interest demanded a thorough and efficient equipment of our national ports and terminals on the Atlantic and Pacific. That has ever since been the policy of the Liberal-Conservative party and has been so declared on repeated occasions. The thorough and efficient equipment of St. John harbour is part of our policy. I desire to emphasize what I declared at St. John on the 5th September, namely, that the defeat of the Laurier government will not retard, hinder or prevent in any way the construction of terminal facilities at St. John, or the equipment and development of that port as one of the Atlantic national ports of Canada.

(Sgd.) R. L. BORDEN.

2. Was the said despatch sent by Mr. Borden?

3. If so, at whose request was it sent?

4. Was such request made by letter or telegram? If so, what were the words thereof?

5. Was the present Prime Minister aware, when he sent such despatch, of the nature of the improvements which the late government intended to make at the port of St. John, and especially of the fact that tenders had been called and received for the construction of wharfs, as breakwater, and the dredging of a channel and basin to and in Courtenay bay, with a view of affording terminal facilities for the Grand Trunk Pacific railway at the port of St. John, together with an obligation on the part of the contractor to build a dry-dock of the first class, and the providing of a ship-repairing plant under the Dry Dock Subsidies Act of 1910, and also that tenders had been called for wharf construction on the western side of the harbour?

6. What action, if any, has the government taken to carry out the promise made to the people of St. John by the leader of the Conservative party in said despatch 'That the defeat of the Laurier government would not retard, hinder or prevent in any way the construction of terminal facilities at St. John, or the equipment and development of that port as one of the national ports of Canada?

7. Does the government still retain the security deposit of $500,000 of the Norton, Griffiths Company, Limited, the lowest tenderers for the harbour works at Courtenay bay?

8. Is it the intention of the government to proceed with said works? If so, when?

Mr. BORDEN:

1. No.

2. Yes.

3. In reply to citizens of St. John, interested in the development of that port.

4. Answered by the answer to No. 3.

5. The Prime Minister is not highly confident that he ever thoroughly understood the actual intentions of the late government with respect to the port of St. John. The telegram referred to the policy of the present government, rather than that of the late government.

6, 7, and 8. These matters are under the consideration of the government. The deposit mentioned has not been returned.

THE WESTERN MINERS' STRIKE.

Mr. MURPHY:

1. Has the attention of the government been directed to the following despatch published by the Montreal 'Star' on October 28, 1911:

Strike of the Western Miners settled at last. Hon. Robert Rogers obtains complete settlement of difficulty.

Special to the Montreal 'Star.'

Ottawa, October 28—The western coal strike, which has been in progress since last spring, and in which thousands of men were involved, has been settled. Hon. Robert Rogers, who went west to conduct the negotiation with the men, last night wired the Minister of Labour: 'Have succeeded in getting full and complete settlement of strike signed by both parties.'

The following reply was sent to Hon. Robert Rogers by Deputy Minister Ackland: 'I am directed by the Minister of Labour to convey to you his most cordial congratulations on the splendid success resulting from your efforts in the cause of industrial peace in thus bringing to a close the prolonged dispute in the western coal mines. I am also to request you will kindly convey the minister's best wishes to both parties and an expression of his desire that the settlement effected may bring a season of extended prosperity and good feeling.'

2. Is it not a fact that the western coal strike continued for weeks after the Minister of Labour had congratulated the Minister of the Interior on his splendid success in settling it?

3. Has the government been advised by either of the parties interested in the strike that it has been settled? If so, when?

4. Why did not the Minister of Labour, instead of the Minister of the Interior, try to settle the said strike?

Mr. CROTHERS:

1. No.

2. After the basis of settlement was reached some time was required to refer it to the various local unions concerned.

3. (a) The government has been advised that after the referendum the agreement was confirmed.

(b) The government is advised that the mines will be re-opened Monday, November 20.

4. The course thought the wisest was adopted.

Mr. WARNOCK:

Is the government aware that on November 11 the supply of household coal in Lethbridge city, as well as other parts of the west, was inadequate, owing to the fact that householders and dealers had not ordered in advance of their immediate needs, in the belief that the strike had been settled by the Minister of the Interior when he visited Lethbridge on or about October 27?

Mr. CROTHERS. The government is aware there has been some shortage of household coal at various points in the west because of industrial disputes in the coal mining industry, but they are not aware that it is due to the reason assigned.

Mr. WARNOCK:

1. Is the government aware that there occurred on November 2 at Fernie, B.C., a riot of striking miners? If so, has the government been furnished with the particulars of the same, and will the government furnish the House with a statement of such particulars?

2. What number of miners have been at work in the coal mines of Southern Alberta and eastern British Columbia since October 24th, and what has been the output of coal during that period ?

Mr. CROTHERS:

1. No offical information has been received.

2. No returns have been made.

SESSIONAL EMPLOYEES.

Mr. MURPHY:

1. How many sessional employees have been dismissed since September 22, 1911?

2. By whom and under what authority were such dismissals made?

3. How many new sessional employees have been engaged?

Mr. BORDEN:

1. Thirty.

2. In case of those in the Sergeant-at-Arms' branch, by the authority of the Sergeant-at-Arms. In the Clerk's branch, by the authority of the hon. the Speaker.

3. Twenty-four.

FRANCO-CANADIAN PARCEL POST CONVENTION.

Mr. LEMIEUX:

Has the parcel post convention between France and Canada been signed by the French government?

Mr. PELLETIER. The agreement for the direct exchange of parcels by post between France and Canada has been signed on behalf of France by the Minister of Public Works, Posts and Telegraphs, of France.

INTERCOLONIAL BRANCH LINES.

*Mr. EMMERSON:

Is it the intention of the government to introduce legislation at the present session of parliament empowering the government to acquire the branch lines connecting with the Intercolonial railway with a view to operating the same as a part of the government system of railways? If so, at what date will the same be introduced?

Mr. BORDEN. Legislation for the purpose is already on the statute-book, chapter 25 of the Acts of 1910. The question of further legislation has not yet been under consideration.

6. Was any such promise or announcement authorized by the Prime Minister or by any member of the present government?

7. Has the government or any member thereof since the said election received from the said candidate, or from any other party or parties, or from any organization, political or otherwise, any request or representations, verbal or otherwise, as to the appointment of a maritime province representative to the portfolio of Railways and Canals? At a meeting of the employees on Sunday, November 19, at which the officers of the department were present, the tentative agreement was confirmed. On Monday, November 20, the agreement was signed by both parties and the dispute was formally closed.

Such subsidy has not been promised to any railway company or other persons on behalf of the above branch line.

2. First part of No. 2 answered by No. 1. $3,200 per mile, and an addition depending upon the cost of the railway not exceeding in all $6,400 per mile.

BRITISH COLUMBIA SUBSIDY.

*Mr. MACDONALD:

Does the government propose to consult with the other provincial governments and obtain their views thereon before proceeding to deal with the question of additional subsidy to the province of British Columbia?

Mr. BORDEN: The matter has not yet been considered.

THE MARRIAGE QUESTION.

Mr. ETHIER:

1. Has the government taken cognizance of the following question asked the last ministry on 12th April, 1911, by the member for Haliburton, Victoria, Mr. Hughes, now the hon. Minister of Militia?

Is the government or any member thereof, aware that the Hierarchy of the Roman Catholic Church, and the Courts of Quebec Province, are said to decline to recognize as valid a marriage between a Roman Catholic man and a Roman Catholic woman if solemnized by other than an ecclesiastic of the Roman Catholic Church?

2. Is the government, or any member thereof, aware that as alleged, ecclesiastics of the Roman Catholic Church declare invalid marriages solemnized between a Roman Catholic and one of another faith, throughout the Dominion of Canada, unless the ceremony be performed by an ecclesiastic of the Roman Catholic Church?

3. Under the British North America Act, section 91, does not marriage come under the jurisdiction of the parliament of Canada.

4. Is it the intention of the government to enact legislation which throughout Canada will make a marriage legal in any and every province, if performed between persons of the same creed or faith, or of different creeds or faith, in any province by any official or officials recognized for such purpose in any other province; in short, to enact a Dominion of Canada marriage law which will accept for every part of Canada, and make lawful in every province a marriage consummated under the law or form of any province?

5. Is it the intention of the government to make it a criminal offence, and to prescribe punishment, for any persons, ecclesiastic or other, who intrudes, or promulgates or publishes, or declares any rule or dogma of any ecclesiastical organization casting doubt upon, or declaring invalid, or in any sense reflecting on the legality of a marriage performed by any official recognized as entitled to perform a marriage ceremony, or setting up any such ecclesiastical dogma or rule as overriding the law of Canada?

6. Is it the intention of the government of Canada to declare valid a marriage solemnized in Quebec or in any province of Canada between two persons of the Roman Catholic faith, providing the officiating clergyman be a Protestant, and for the removal of doubt to make the law retroactive?

7. Is it the intention of the government of Canada to permit any ecclesiastical dogma or rule to override the laws of the people of Canada?

8. Is it the intention of the government of Canada to restore to legitimacy every woman who supposed her marriage legally consummated and also the children born of such marriage?

9. Will the government enact legislation compelling alimony to the woman where the man has left her under the ecclesiastical dogma of any church?

2. Does the government know the replies given to the questions thus asked by the hon. Minister of Justice at that time, Mr. Aylesworth, and which are as follows:—

1 and 2. Neither the government nor any department of the government has any knowledge in relation to the matters referred to in these questions other than such as may be gathered from newspaper articles or references to the subject?

3. Under the British North America Act the subject of marriage and divorce is one in regard to which parliament may legislate, but everything to the solemnization of marriage in the provinces is within the exclusive powers of the provincial legislature.

As to the remaining questions, other than question No. 7 legislation of the character indicated in the questions would appear to refer wholly to the persons by whom, or the form of the ceremony by which, marriages in any province could be validly solemnized, and in that view such legislation would seem not competent for the parliament of Canada to enact.

Legislation such as is indicated in questions 8 and 9 would seem also to relate to property and civil rights in the province, and on that ground as well to be matter for the exclusive consideration of the provincial authorities.

7. The government is not acquainted with any law of the people of Canada which has been overridden by any ecclesiastical dogma.

3. Does the government agree with the opinion expressed by Mr. Aylesworth? If not, what are the reasons?

Mr. BORDEN: In reply to the first question, the government has no doubt that 'the following question' appeared in 'Hansard' as stated.

In answer to the second question, the government has no doubt that the replies were given as set forth.

In reply to the third question, the matter has not been under consideration.

Mr. LEMIEUX:

Has Mr. L. A. Sauvé, superintendent of the Soulanges Canal, been relieved from his duties? If so, by whose request?

Mr. LAFORTUNE:

1. Has the hon. Postmaster General received any petitions asking for the removal of postmasters in the county of Montcalm? If so, who made these petitions?

2. Who are the persons whose removals are requested, and what are the reasons given in each case for asking these dismissals?

Mr. PELLETIER. Communications have been received from Mr. J. E. Marion of St. Jacques, county Montcalm, Que., charging Mr. Edward Rowan, postmaster at Rawdon; Mr. Theophile Lapierre, postmaster at St. Alexis de Montcalm; Mr. Daoust, postmaster at St. Emile de Montcalm; Mr. Joseph Lacroix, postmaster at Moulin Lacroix, and Mr. O. Payette, postmaster at St. Esprit, with political partisanship.

THE MARRIAGE QUESTION.

Mr. BOIVIN:

Has the Dominion government power to legalize or validate any or every marriage solemnized anywhere in Canada.

Mr. BORDEN. This question is, strictly speaking, a question of law and, therefore, not usual under the practice of the House of Commons. For the information of the hon. gentleman I may say that the Dominion government has no legislative power whatever in such matters. So far as the Dominion parliament is concerned,—and perhaps the question was directed to the power of parliament rather than to the power of the government—the jurisdiction of parliament is fixed by section 91, subsection 26 of the British North America Act, which confers upon it the right to legislate with reference to marriage and divorce. The jurisdiction of the provincial legislatures in such matters is conferred by section 92, sub-section 12, of the British North America Act, which confers upon the provincial legislatures jurisdiction with respect to the solemnization of marriage in the provinces.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. That is safe.

Mr. BORDEN. It is not only safe but accurate.

AUSTRALIAN PACIFIC CABLE.

Mr. MACDONALD:

1. Is the government aware of any proposals being made to lay a branch of the Pacific Cable from Auckland, New Zealand, to Sydney, Australia?

2. If so, has the government any information regarding the nature of such proposals?

3. If the government has such information, what action does it propose to take to protect Canadian interests in the enterprise?

4. Is Canada paying a proportional or any share towards annual deficits, if any, arising out of the operation of the said cable?

Mr. PELLETIER. 1, 2 and 3. Lord Strathcona, one of Canada's representatives on the Pacific Cable Board, submitted to the Postmaster General a proposition adopted by the Pacific Cable Board that a direct cable should be laid between Australia and New Zealand, to supplement the existing line between the two colonies by way of Norfolk Island. As the reasons given for the additional line seemed to the Postmaster General to be good, the approval of the Canadian government was conveyed to Lord Strathcona. The interests of Canada in this as in all other matters dealt with by the Pacific Cable Board are looked after by the two Canadian representatives, Lord Strathcona and A. Lang, Esquire, the London manager of the Bank of Montreal.

4. Canada pays five-eighteenths of the deficit of the operations of the Pacific Cable.

Mr. PELLETIER:

MANITOBA QUESTIONS.

On the orders of the day being called:

Mr. NESBITT. I desire to point out to the Prime Minister (Mr. Borden) that his reply to the third part of the question that I asked yesterday, reported at page 545 of 'Hansard,' is not an answer to the question asked.

Mr. BORDEN. I will look over the question again. I am sorry if I have not been able to grasp the hon. gentleman's question. I will look over it again and see if any further answer can be given.

CARETAKER OF PUBLIC BUILDING AT CANSO, N.S.

Mr. SINCLAIR. I ask permission to draw the attention of the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Monk) to a complaint I have received from Canso, N.S., about the dismissal of the caretaker of the public building in that place. It is reported to me that the caretaker has been dismissed without any investigation or notice. He has simply been asked——

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order.

Mr. SINCLAIR—to walk out of the building——

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order.

Mr. SPEAKER. I do not think this is the proper time to introduce any question of controversy or to make utterances that would call for discussion. But a simple question on any important and urgent matter would be in order.

Mr. SINCLAIR. I simply want to ask the Minister of Public Works, after stating the facts to him, if he would be so kind as to consider the question of giving this man an investigation. That is my purpose in mentioning the matter now; I did not rise for the purpose of criticising what has been done. The man says that he has not done anything——

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order.

Mr. SINCLAIR—and he thinks he has the right to an investigation.

Mr. MONK. I do not know the facts. If the hon. gentleman (Mr. Sinclair), has any representations to make, they will be taken into consideration. And, in regard to the facts, it would be better to put a question on the Order Paper, for then we could get the facts precisely. and give a proper answer.

He requests that these Bills be allowed to stand.

MOTIONS AGREED TO WITHOUT DISCUSSION.

For a copy of all papers, telegrams, letters, &c., between the Postmaster General and any other person respecting the closing or removal of the present post office at Spry Bay, Halifax county.—Mr. Maclean (Halifax).

For a detailed statement of the expenses incurred and paid for the Exposition at Paris in 1900, under the title of payments of the Colonial Committee for space, &c., $87,000 (see report of the Auditor General, 1899, D—15.—Mr. Paquet.

For a copy of all documents, &c., necessary to bring up to date the statement regarding the matters covered by sessional paper 109 of the session of 1910-1911 in reference to Canadian-Australian trade.—Mr. Ames.

For a copy of all orders in council, petitions, telegrams, letters, agreements, correspondence and all other documents generally in connection with the proposed branch line or lines of railway to connect Montreal with the National Transcontinental railway.—Mr. Lapointe (Montreal).

LUMBER DUTIES—INTERPRETATION AND ENFORCEMENT.

Mr. W. E. KNOWLES (Moosejaw) moved:

For a copy of all papers, telegrams, reports and other documents in connection with the interpretation and enforcement of the duties on lumber, together with a copy of all instructions or other communications addressed by circular or otherwise to collectors of customs, and a copy of any minute or minutes or rulings or decisions of the Board of Customs.

Mr. J. D. REID (Minister of Customs). I assume that the hon. member (Mr. Knowles), does not wish to go back over a period of years. If he wishes to cover only the present year, would he agree to add the words 'during the year 1911'?

Mr. KNOWLES. That would be all right.

Amendment agreed to.

Mr. KNOWLES. The House has had the pleasure and the profit of listening for a great many days to discussions of matters national, economical, and political in their nature. I desire to call the attention of the government and the House this afternoon to a question which is a very practical one, a question which means dollars, especially to the people of the prairie provinces who are so directly affected in pocket by any change, either up or down, in the duties on lumber. We were surprised to learn, after this government had been in office a few days. that they had acceded to the request, had gone down under the pressure of the lumber combine, and had given to its representatives such a sympathetic audience when they came to Ottawa to present their views that they issued some sort of instructions to collectors to the effect that there should be a more strict interpretation—that is an interpretation more unfavourable from the consumer's point of view—of the classification of lumber coming into this country.

It is to ascertain exactly the conditions so far as the records of the department will show them, that I took up the time of the House this afternoon to make my motion. I will read first a paragraph from the Winnipeg 'Telegram,' which I am sure will command the attention of my hon. friend the Minister of the Interior (Mr. Rogers), of date the 10th October. And to give it further validity and authority, it has on the front page almost a life-size portrait of the Minister of the Interior. On page 10, if any person cares to look, he will find the following account of a meeting of the lumber combine in the city of Calgary on the 9th of October. After I have read it I think you will agree that I would be justified in saying that there has never been given to the press of Canada an announcement, or a report of a meeting of a great financial concern, containing a more brazen or flagrant proposition than that I am now about to read. It is headed 'Coast Mountain Lumber Mills to Close Until 1913'.

Camps in B.C. will be abandoned, and 200 travellers dismissed.

Calgary, Oct. 9.—Far reaching changes were decided on at the conference held in Calgary over the week-end by the members of the Coast Mountain Lumbermen's Association. It was decided among the members that they would close down a large number of their mills this coming season, and in some of the Mountain mills not a wheel will turn until 1913. Horses are to be sold off, camps will be abandoned, and generally the lumbermen will mark time for about a year.

Only One Selling Agency.

Another important change which was agreed upon was that the lumber at present in stock in the various mills will be sold through one office, to be located in Calgary.

Possibly the Mountain and Coast Associations would have separate offices, but there will not be more than two selling agencies at the outside.

It is said that the dealers and mills are all pretty well stocked, and the idea in selling through one office is that the mills will get cleaned out of their surplus lines.

As the business has been conducted for the past year there has been some cutting in prices. If a mill had a large stock of one particular line on hand it would tell its travellers to make a cut of from $1 to $3 a thousand on this particular article.

All Competition Removed.

Under the present arrangement all competition is to be removed. The dealers can only buy from the head office in Calgary and only at one price. The effect of the new arrangement will also be to bring all the mills into the association.

It can easily be seen that independent owners will not have any chance against the members of the association, which would put the lumber in at a cut price and put the independent man out of business in short order.

The trade for the past year has been somewhat annoyed by the encroachment of the American mills. It was decided at the meeting Saturday that the association would meet all cuts that the Americans might make, and put them out of business at all costs.

Flings Lumber Travellers Out.

In the meantime an effort will be made to have the government put a duty on American lumber that will give them protection in the rough lines of lumber in which they have to meet the keenest competition at present.

As a result of the placing of the lumber from one office alone, there will be nearly 200 lumber travellers out of employment.

The individual salesman that the millmen had on the road will now be out of employment, as it is anticipated that through the new arrangements probably 10 or a dozen travellers will be able to handle all these orders.

Those in close touch with the lumber business say that there is not likely to be any advance in the prices of lumber until next spring at least.

Dealers Yards Cleared.

It is not known whether there will be even then, but it is reasonable to suppose that when the dealers yards are fairly cleared and the mills have their surplus stock disposed of, there will be another meeting of the Association and a new price will be set for some at least of their output.

I think if the House has followed what I have read, they will agree that the press of Canada has scarcely ever had the duty to report to the people a more glaring and flagrant case of a confessed combine than that which I have just read, even if they did not mix up the name of this present government with it. They make it a part of their business not only to announce this as a combine, but at the same time to say that they are coming to Ottawa to get further protection. I think it would be the duty of the government, especially of the Minister of the Interior, who has no doubt the duty of guarding the rights of the great mass of homesteaders and farmers in the northwest, to look into this matter and see what this combine really means, and what steps can be taken to end it. Our friends in the lumber combines are, of course, practically all British Columbia men, in fact I think I am within the mark in saying they are all British Columbia men. The province of British Columbia has great claims on this government, the combines have great claims on this government, and I have no doubt the lumbermen's combines supported this government almost to a man. My hon. friend the Minister of Finance (Mr. White) knows nothing about combines. But he was not long a member of the government until he found this government approached by a combine which succeeded in getting the sympathetic attention of this government, which has granted their request; and now at least he should have some knowledge of combines if he never had before. You will recollect, Mr. Speaker, and those who were in the parliament before last will recollect that we had a very full investigation into the matter of lumber combines. That investigation was initiated from the then opposition side, and was supported from the government side. Mr. John Herron, then member for Alberta, made representations before this House, asking that a special committee be appointed to make an investigation to see whether there really was a lumber combine. The Hon. Thos. Greenway was chairman of that committee, other gentlemen were chosen to act upon it, some from the mountain district, like Mr. Sloan and Mr. Galliher, who then represented Comox-Atlin and Kootenay respectively. Men were chosen to represent the consumers on that committee, I was a member of the committee myself. We examined many witnesses, and made a report to parliament, which report was adopted, that there was a combine in that business. I propose to read some remarks made by hon. gentlemen then supporting the opposition, with regard to this question. First, I will read from 'Hansard' of 1906-7, page 1816, where Mr. Herron made these remarks:

The people of that country believe that a combination exists between the manufacturers of lumber of such a nature that it comes under the Criminal Code of 1892 of which section 516 reads as follows:

Mr. Herron then read that section and proceeded:

I think, Mr. Speaker, that the lumber business today is in the hands of a combination of such a character as to bring it under the provisions of the law I have just read.

Mr. McCarthy, who was then representing Calgary, said on page 1820:

There is no doubt that there exists in that country today a combine, or combination, or association of gentlemen who have their heads together in that business to keep prices up and keep competition down.

Mr. Lake, then representing Qu'Appelle, said, on page 1828, after reading evidence in a certain case:

It seems to me that that surely was sufficient proof of the existence of a combine in regard to price.

My hon. friend the present Secretary of State (Mr. Roche) spoke on that occasion, on page 1835:

If, therefore, there is anything that unduly enhances the price to the consumer, if by reason of the millmen taking advantage of this great demand, or by reason of an illegitimate combination in that trade, or by any other illegitimate cause, the price is increased, then it is not at all surprising that there is a very great outcry against the price charged to the consumer, and that an investigation is demanded at the hands of this parliament.

On that occasion I myself shared the views uttered by those hon. gentlemen, and I believe they were single minded in what they had to say; I shared the view of the committee which had made the report. I wish to read one paragraph from the report of that committee, taken from the 'Journals of the House,' volume 42, 1906-7:

Your committee find that there has existed for some years past and still exists an association known as 'The Western Retail Lumbermen's Association.' This association included all three provinces until recently when the dealers of Alberta formed a similar association of their own called 'The Alberta Lumber Dealers Association.' These two associations amount, in the opinion of your committee, to a combination, and the objects and results of the operations of these two associations have been to unduly enhance the said prices as appears from the price lists themselves and the bylaws, minute books and correspondence and evidence of witnesses in regard to the said operations.

That report was accepted and adopted by the House. It is to me a matter of regret that one of the very first steps of this government, when they came into power, was to give an encouraging hand to that combination that had been found by a committee of this House, as shown in this report, to exist; and that report, remember, was adopted as the voice of this House. I say I regret that one of the very first things which this government did was to encourage and strengthen the hands of that combination, that was found to be acting contrary to the Criminal Code. The Alberta government, after that report came out, proceeded to take criminal action against the men who were in that combine. I am not at the present moment aware how many prosecutions were taken; but I do know the matter was taken before the criminal courts of Saskatchewan, and they found the men guilty of an infraction of that clause in the criminal code, and those men were penalized. Being a member of that committee myself, and having lived in the west, I know that the Lumbermens' Association and combine would take the last ox away from the homesteader, they would take his store out of his house if they could, they have no heart; and I think little of this government for having been in such a rush to strengthen that monopoly, when they have it in their power to check it. The old government made a certain interpretation of this clause with regard to lumber. I will read the clause, it is number 504 in the tariff :

The following are free: planks, boards and other lumber of wood sawn, split, cut and dressed on one side only but not further manufactured.

Our friends the Lumber Manufacturers' Association had their meeting in the city of Calgary, as I have read, the very day this government was sworn in. Knowing their friends were in power they said to themselves : 'The new government will strengthen our hands,' and immediately they decided to close up their mills. A great many mills, the 'Telegram' tells us, would not have a wheel turned in them until 1913, a great many more had sold their horses, a great many more had reduced their stocks, there was a desire to minimize and to lessen the supply, one of the first acts of a man who wants to have a combine and a monopoly on the poor public. Not only would they do that, but they would lessen the field of competition. They said to themselves : 'Our friends are in power at Ottawa, and we will hie down to that city and see if we cannot keep out competition from the United States.' As the 'Telegram' says in the article I have read, American competition was keen, and my constituents and the homesteaders generally of the three provinces got the benefit of that. Now I am enough of a free trader to think that we Canadians ought to get the benefit of a lower tariff, not only by avoiding an increase of the tariff but in obtaining a reduction of the price. Why should the farmers of the Northwest not get the benefit of a reduction in the price of lumber that comes in from the United States? Because there is no doubt that if that lumber did not come in prices would be raised to the consumers of the Northwest. We find that in five months there were imported from the United States lumber to the value of $2,033,620—I have not the returns for the whole year, but only of five months. But supposing that return covered half a year, at the same rate that would make about $5,000,000 worth for the whole year. Now 25 per cent of $5,000,000 is a pretty penny to some people. And not only will they have to pay that in one year, but they will have to pay an enhanced price on what the lumbermen will put on their backs afterwards. This afternoon I have the honour of standing face to face with gentlemen whose cry has been : 'Let well enough alone.' Could not this government let the poor homesteaders and the consumers alone? If they did not reduce the burden of taxation, could they not at least refrain from placing a still greater burden upon them by making them pay increased prices on their lumber ? 'Let well enough alone,' they said. Another cry of theirs was : 'Let us keep our resources for ourselves, let us keep out the Americans lest they come in and hew down our own resources.' My idea would be that we should allow the American resources to come in for the benefit of our western farmers, and get all the lumber we can from the United States, so long as we can get it cheaper than our own lumber costs, while at the same time we should be husbanding our own resources in the shape of lumber. There is nothing more essential in our country than lumber. No man has a riding more typical of that new country than myself. In my riding the population has increased three times in the last four years, practically all rural. My constituency extends 175 miles north and south, with only one railway through the middle of it. During my election I spent practically all my time in the remote parts distant from that railway. Many of the homesteaders have to draw their lumber and their supplies forty or fifty miles, or more, and the greatest burden they have to bear is in regard to lumber. Many of them, good, honest Canadians, have to live in sod shacks because they cannot afford to buy the lumber. It will be bad news to them to learn the announcement that practically one of the first things this government did was to lend a sympathetic ear to the lumber combines. Our friends will say that they have not changed the tariff. Of course they have not, they have not had a chance to do it, but goodness knows what they will do unless we put up some kind of a protest on behalf of our constituents.

But, I will tell you what they have done, in so far as they have the power; they have laid an additional burden on the homesteader. I have no doubt they will say that they have not changed anything. I would think more of them if they would come out and say that they have changed it, and if they would take the responsibility for having done it. Their friends, the manufacturers' combine, came here and got something, and they went away triumphant and successful. I do not want to use the word cowardly, but it was done in a subtle way; they were not brave enough to come out and say: Yes, we want to protect our friends, but in this subtle, underhand way they pretend that they have not changed anything. I would think a great deal more of them if they would come out and say: Yes, we are going to protect our friends, and we are willing to take the responsibility for doing so. Their friends came, they piped and the Conservative party, with the big interest behind them, danced. The manufacturers had been down here before during my short life in parliament, and they had made requests to the government. Many and many a time have I met the manufacturers of British Columbia. I do not know any men who sought protection more than they did, and I do not know any who met with a firmer refusal, from my right hon. friend the leader of the opposition and Mr. Fielding, then Minister of Finance, than did these gentlemen every time they came here. As a member representing probably 90,000 constituents who must purchase this raw material in any event at a high cost I enter my protest against any steps, whether they be subtle, or whether they be above board, which will result in granting greater protection to these combinesters, and which will also result in placing greater burdens on those whom I am honoured to call my constituents.

Mr. REID (Grenville). Mr. Speaker, I wish to say at the outset that I have no objection whatever to the passing of this motion, and will be glad to bring down the papers as soon as the department can have them ready. I would say that the government have not changed the tariff or done anything in any way, shape or form.

Mr. KNOWLES. They cannot change it.

Mr. REID (Grenville). I admit they cannot change it, and the hon. gentleman knows it. What surprises me is that the hon. gentleman admits that there has been a combine in lumber not only now but for several years, and he has never taken any action to have that combine dissolved.

Mr. KNOWLES. I do not admit that.

Mr. REID (Grenville). Let me say what did happen, and what the position of affairs is so far as I can remember it without having the papers before me. It is true that a deputation of lumbermen from British Columbia did come to Ottawa and interviewed me with respect to lumber coming into this country. They called my attention to item 504 of the customs tariff which reads:

Planks, boards and other lumber of wood, sawn, split or cut, and dressed on one side only, but not further manufactured, free.

There could not be any possible dispute about that and they did not ask for any change or that any new interpretation be placed upon that item. The next item was:

505. Sawn boards, planks and deals planed or dressed on one or both sides when the edges thereof are jointed or tongued and grooved, 25 per cent.

You will observe that the item reads 'when planed or dressed on one or both sides.' If the lumber were planed on two sides or on what is called the edge and the flat side, it would be entitled to pay duty as specified in the item. I do not think that any hon. member will dispute that fact. But, in so far as I was concerned as representing the department, I would not even take the responsibility of interpreting that item. I found in the Customs Act that had been placed on the statute-book by the government that was in power in 1907, a provision that if there was any possible doubt in the minister's mind in interpreting an item the matter could be referred to the Board of Customs. The Minister of Customs at that time had appointed a Board of Customs, and he was, therefore, at liberty to refer any question to the Board of Customs whose decision would be final. My predecessor appointed this Board of Customs. The members of it were his appointees, not mine, because the same Board of Customs is still in existence. I have not changed the Board of Customs. Rather than assume the responsibility I referred this question to the Board of Customs, and they unanimously decided that lumber planed on two sides must pay the duty. Those who asked for this interpretation produced it before the Board of Customs. It was shown that there were parties importing cargoes or shipments of lumber, planed on one side only and, mixed with it lumber planed on two sides, and endeavouring in this way to escape the payment of the duty. The orders that the Customs Department gave to all customs collectors were that they should examine the carloads of lumber, that where lumber was not planed on two sides it was to come in free, but that any importer who tried to violate the law by smuggling in lumber that was planed on two sides should pay duty. We could not do anything else than that. The law was put there by our predecessors, and there was nothing for the Customs Department to do but simply to carry out the law.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. Carry it out as your predecessors did.

Mr. REID (Grenville). Carry it out as our predecessor's did.

Mr. LENNOX. As our predecessors ought.

Mr. REID (Grenville). If there was smuggling going on before we came into power it was the duty of this government to prevent it. If my predecessor did not prevent smuggling or if he winked at it he was not fit for the office that he held. If it is brought to my attention that some person is smuggling or violating the law, I will not allow it to go on, because I shall insist that every person shall pay the proper duty on that which he imports.

Mr. KNOWLES. Was not the matter brought to my hon. friend's attention that the edge was being sawed with a fine saw, or practically a plane, and afterwards roughed? That is as I understand it. I have seen the sample's in the department. The allegation of the combine, as I understand it, is that the lumber has been trued up on one edge and then roughed.

Mr. REID (Grenville). If the lumber that comes into this country is sawn on three sides and planed on one side it comes in free. I know what the hon. gentleman means. They have probably sawed the lumber over to try and take the planing off, but have left some of the planing on. If the lumber comes in sawn with a fine saw, or anything else, it comes in free. Will the hon. gentleman tell me where there is any difference from the condition that existed before?

Mr. KNOWLES. Yes, it makes a difference of about $12,000,000 a year to the west.

Mr. REID (Grenville). The hon. gentleman suggests that we have changed the interpretation of the clause. There is no change whatever; unless the lumber shows that it was planed on more than one side it comes in free.

Mr. KNOWLES. The interpretation of the department is going to be this, that they are going to do a kind of detective work for the combine, and I will tell the hon. gentleman how.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Oh, oh.

Mr. KNOWLES. Perhaps the hon. gentleman could decide. He has asked a question, perhaps he could look after his own business. The point is that it matters not how the condition is arrived at, the combines say they will inquire how that state is arrived at, and if they conclude it ever had been planed and afterwards roughed, it will be the same as planed.

Mr. REID (Grenville). The hon. gentleman perhaps knows more about the department than I do. If the lumber comes in here sawn on three sides there is no doubt about it coming in free, but if it comes in planed on more than one side there certainly is a duty on that lumber. I do not think there is any doubt that it should come under this item. I am surprised that the hon. member who has been in this House for some time did not take this matter up before and deal with it in so far as the combines are concerned. There was a way of dealing with the combines during the last three or four years while he was a member of this House but he has never taken any steps. I feel myself that the protection put on that kind of lumber is pretty high for the farmers of the west, but the hon. member never moved in the House that the item of 25 per cent on lumber be reduced. The hon. member knows that the farmers of the west have paid a great deal of money for duties under that very same item of 25 per cent in the last three or four years, yet he never made a motion in this House that the duty under item 507 be reduced or removed. He was willing to have the farmers in the west pay the duty until there was a change of government when he could make it appear that this government had made a change. I want to tell the hon. gentleman and the farmers in the west that there has not been any change whatever or any other interpretation placed on the items in the tariff by this government or the Customs Department or any member of this government since we came into power, and we shall give the farmers in the west every advantage we can under the tariff; but if the hon. member is willing to admit here that my predecessor in office winked at smuggling into this country, and was willing to see the laws violated. While I fill the office of Minister of Customs, I shall see that the law is carried out even although the statute was made by my predecessor.

Mr. D. B. NEELY (Humboldt). The Minister of Customs has given to the House exactly the answer to the remark of my hon. friend that we all expected he would give. The hon. member for Moosejaw (Mr. Knowles) has demonstrated that there has been a different interpretation put upon item 504 of the tariff law than what was put upon it by the late government. My hon. friend the Minister of Customs tells us that when this matter was brought to his attention by the lumbermen of British Columbia he would not take on himself the responsibility of deciding whether or not the late government had placed the proper interpretation upon the statute, but he turned this matter over to his Board of Customs, the same Board of Customs that held office under the late government. But he did not undertake to explain how that Board of Customs—because this matter was undoubtedly brought to their attention again and again by the lumbermen of British Columbia in days gone by—after his few weeks of office could give a certain interpretation when they had given a different interpretation for a great many years, and when, in accordance with their interpretation, the practice of the late government was to permit certain kinds of lumber to come in free. If there is any explanation of that change of view on the part of the Board of Customs the difference must have been brought about by the realization of who their new masters were, and in that event possibly those gentlemen who constitute that Board of Customs were following out the first law of nature, which is self-preservation.

My hon. friend (Mr. Reid) charges my hon. friend from Moosejaw (Mr. Knowles) with never having done anything to protect the western farmers and homesteaders from excessive prices for lumber. Evidently he was not listening to the remarks of my hon. friend when he mentioned that in 1906-7 a committee of this House was appointed to investigate the lumber combines operating in the western prairies, and that as a result of the finding of that committee the governments of Saskatchewan and Alberta—I do not know about Manitoba—took action under the findings of that committee so that the combines were broken up and the men who formed those combines were penalized under the law.

I cannot see how the Minister of Customs (Mr. Reid) is going to expect that this House or the country or the men of the west who have to buy lumber at high prices, and who will have to pay higher prices if this new interpretation of this item of the tariff is allowed to stand, can justify himself by the very inadequate excuses that he has given to-day for the change in the manner of dealing with this lumber that hitherto has come in free from the United States of America. If I cannot say anything that will appeal to the Minister of Customs to continue this interpretation, which he himself must admit was in the interests and to the benefit of the men of the west who have to pay high prices for lumber, I shall have to turn my attention to the hon. gentleman who represents the west in the present government, the Minister of the Interior (Mr. Rogers) who, I am sorry to say, has just left his seat. We in the west look to that hon. gentleman to protect the interests of the western farmer, seeing that he is, par excellence, the man in the cabinet representing western interests. We know that he has great sympathy for the men who toil and labour as evidence the spontaneity with which he offers his services whenever we have any strikes or labour troubles in the West—in fact so well has he taken this part in the past that he has almost come to be known as the professional peacemaker in these difficulties. We look to the Minister of the Interior to use his influence with the Minister of Customs to see that the same classes of lumber that came in free under the late administration will still continue to come in free in the interest of the farmer and homesteader of the west. My hon. friend from Moosejaw has mentioned the very great cost of lumber in the west. That is something that is known to every man from Lake Superior westward, and this item permitting certain kinds of lumber to come in free, as my hon. friend from Moosejaw has pointed out, has in the past been of very great benefit to the consumer of lumber in our western provinces. For that reason I would again urge upon the Minister of Customs that he go over this matter once again carefully with his Board of Customs and find out from that Board if it is not possible for them to give the same interpretation of the statute under the present government as it gave under the government that has just left office.

Mr. MEIGHEN. Will the hon. gentleman give the House an instance in which a different interpretation was put on the law by the Board of Customs to that now put on it?

Mr. NEELY. As I understood the remarks of the minister, they answered my hon. friend's question.

Mr. MEIGHEN. He said there was no difference of interpretation.

Mr. NEELY. There is a difference in the practice, and no one has said that the late Minister of Customs went contrary to the advice of his Board of Customs in this matter.

Mr. REID (Grenville). It was never admitted.

Mr. NEELY. The late Minister of Customs must have had more confidence in his judgment in these matters than the present minister. I say the practice has changed, because on this classe of lumber duties were not collected under the late minister. The matter was undoubtedly brought to his attention, and the Minister of Customs said he had never submitted it to the Board of Customs. He took the responsibility upon himself. He must have known that the statute could be so interpreted as to be a benefit to the homesteader of the west; but my hon. friend, although responsible for his department, will not take that responsibility. He will rather give all the benefit that can possibly be derived from any interpretation of the statute to the lumber combines, who are now going to bleed the farmers an extra $2 a thousand. Now, I am free to say that when this matter was first brought to my attention, it caused very grave feelings of alarm within me. It seemed to me, Sir, that the electorate of Canada were just getting the first taste of that medicine for which they voted on the 21st of September, and I am afraid that if the present protest is not heeded by the government, there is many another and probably much more bitter dose in store for the electors of Canada from the present administration.

Mr. J. D. TAYLOR (New Westminster). Mr. Speaker, I am sure that it is a pleasure to every person, on this side of the House at least, to witness the maiden efforts of hon. gentlemen opposite at bearding the lions in their path, even though in this case the lion be only a wooden one. I thought, when the hon. gentleman who moved this resolution brought it up, that he did so in ignorance of the facts, and that he would be well advised to wait for the return for which he asked before he offered his remarks to the House. But I learned from the questions which he addressed to the minister during the course of the minister's reply that he had seen the departmental correspondence connected with this matter and was fully posted on the subject.

Mr. KNOWLES. I never saw any of the correspondence. I saw merely the samples of lumber.

Mr. TAYLOR. If the hon. gentleman had seen the correspondence, or had made the most elementary inquiries as to the facts surrounding this matter, I doubt if he would have been standing in this House to-day as a champion of smuggling. My special interest in this matter is that I represent perhaps the principal lumbering constituency in British Columbia, the one more than any other affected by the smuggling operations which were carried on, as I believe, with the knowledge and consent of the late administration. I visited the department to verify my belief in that respect, and although I had been informed from sources that seemed to me authoritative and trustworthy that strong remonstrances had been made to the department from several quarters as to the extent of this smuggling and as to the desirability of doing something with respect to it; nothing of that correspondence appeared on the files of the department. I learned from my inquiries that so far from the Board of Customs having given under the late government a decision which they since have been so mean-spirited, as the hon. member for Humboldt has suggested, as to reverse, there is no warrant whatever for reflection on a body of men whom we must regard as honourable servants of the public; but, contrary to what we might have expected, in view of the strong remonstrances addressed to the former Minister of Customs, that gentleman preferred to treat this as a purely political affair, and never referred it to the Board of Customs, who might have given him an authoritative and expert opinion on the matter. Now, so far from this matter having originated in trusts or combines, the origin of the protest made to the government was the desire to protect the labouring men who produce the lumber in British Columbia that would be sold to the consumers in the Northwest Territories if they were not purchasing the lumber smuggled from the United States, as these gentlemen must know; because these representatives from the Northwest Territories who have been offended by the decision of the Customs Department to put a stop to the smuggling, if smuggling it be, must have had their information not from any aggrieved consumer, but from the representatives of the American lumber dealers throughout the territories. It is well known that these dealers have been trying very hard to secure by any means whatever a champion of the operations they have been carrying on; and if my hon. friends opposite had learned the facts from them, they would have known that the smuggled lumber——

Mr. MACLEAN (Halifax). Why does my hon. friend call that smuggled lumber? Because no duties were paid when the department decided that such importations were duty free, it does not necessarily follow that such importations were smuggled, and I think it unfair for the hon. gentleman to use that term in that sense, and he should withdraw it.

Mr. TAYLOR. I am sorry to offend the hon. gentleman's keen sense of propriety on behalf of those for whom he speaks by referring to what I must still regard as the smuggling of lumber. So far from the ruling which is the subject of discussion to-day affecting in a material degree the toal lumber consumption in the Northwest Territories, I will read to the House the figures to show what a small proportion of the total consumption is affected, indicating that there must be some other reason than the protests of the consumers, who have hardly had time yet to be heard from. The figures which I will read show the relative proportions of the lumber brought into Canada rightly free and that brought in free because it was smuggled under a description which it was not entitled to bear.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. Why does my hon. friend refer to it as smuggled?

Mr. TAYLOR. I call it smuggled because it was passed through the customs house fraudulently under a description to which it was not entitled. For instance, if, in my business, I imported paper subject to duty and entered it at the customs under a description entitled to come in free, and if anyone were to lay information with the nearest collector of customs, that collector would come to my office and examine the paper, and if he found it dutiable he would confiscate it and fine me. In connection with this lumber, the attention of the government was called to these frauds by its own officers. The government was informed that this lumber was entered under a false description, and no doubt these officers did ask instructions as to whether they should follow up that lumber and make those who wrongly imported it pay the penalty prescribed by law. Nothing, however, was done, and I am compelled to believe that the late government exercised political rather than technical customs jurisdiction. They certainly took no steps to put a stop to this fraudulent practice. In 1910-11, the quantity of lumber properly brought in free from the United States had risen from 77,000,000 feet, the import of the previous year, to 183,000,000 feet, and in the same year the quantity improperly entered had risen from 7,000,000 feet to 17,000,000 feet. In the following year, while the lumber properly entered diminished to 147,000,000 feet, the lumber improperly entered had increased from 7,000,000 feet in the whole of the preceding year to 21,000,000 feet in five months of this year. So you will see that if those who were injuriously affected by the importations of this lumber took resolute steps to see that the attention of the government was called to it in a way that could not be disregarded, it was not necessarily because of any change in the government, but because of a realization of the rapid proportion in which these wrong importations were being multiplied. But in the end we have for this year—the year regarding which hon. gentlemen opposite have spoken and made so much protest on behalf of the consumers—in five months 147,000,000 feet of free lumber which, under every interpretation, must continue to be free, and only 21,000,000 feet of dutiable lumber imported in evasion of the duty.

Mr. KNOWLES. Where does the hon gentleman get his authority for the figures of this improper importation?

Mr. TAYLOR. I might ask my hon. friend whether he disputes the figures?

Mr. KNOWLES. No, I do not. I am an agnostic on that point.

Mr. TAYLOR. I am giving these figures on my responsibility as a member, and have every reason to believe that they are correct. So far from this being an accident or anything else than the plain evasion of the law, one has only to go across to the American side and remain a day in any lumber centre to find out how this evasion of our custom laws is practised. We on the Canadian side are a laughing stock to the lumbermen on the American side. The American lumberman will refer, with a broad grin, to what they call the Canadian planer, which is a planer that gives a rough sawn effect to lumber which is really jointed and planed. With their usual shrewdness and enterprise the Americans have made what is known as Canadian planer, which is a planer that joints the lumber in such a way that it appears to be rough sawn and thereby comes in free contrary to our customs law. This practice is notorious south of the border and they pretended to no concealment, simply because they relied on the protection afforded by the Canadian government, and did not realize that that protection which was given them in early September might be taken away by the changed conditions in October or November. But while those who were improperly sending lumber into Canada were making their gibes against us, we were gathering material to proceed against them whenever we could get a government which would administer the customs law free from politcal considerations. I think we have such a government now. It was my duty and pleasure to come to Ottawa with this delegation alleged to be representatives of this huge combine. As to the combine, I know nothing. I am not the servant of any combine. I have no retainer to work for them nor have I been offered any from any person profiting by operations in lumber, legal or illegal. I came here in pursuance of my duty to protect the livelihood of the large number of lumber workmen in my constituency in British Columbia, who, if these importations had continued—importations amounting at the time of our protest to about 50 car loads per day—would have been deprived of perhaps two months work during the dull winter season.

These two months' work they now look forward to, because this government has been sufficiently alive to its responsibility to order that the provisons of the customs law shall be carried out. I might explain further that a proper enforcement of our customs law would not injure the consumer in any way. Let me point out that the price of lumber in the northwest territories has been kept up, not by the Canadian manufacturers, to whom my hon. friend referred this afternoon, but by the American selling agents, the men for whom he has so tender an affection, who have a combine of their own, and have been holding up this lumber which they have been allowed to bring into this country free of duty, to the full price of the lumber of similar grades produced by our Canadian mills. So that, as I have said, the consumer has not received any benefit from this evasion of our customs law.

But, apart from this, the minister was offered a guarantee—not necessary or not called for, and not exacted as I am glad to say, for I think that to exact a guarantee would have been to imply a weakness, a want of decision as to the real meaning of the law which did not, and should not exist. However, on behalf of the manufacturers of lumber and on behalf of their employees, the guarantee was offered from mills turning out to the extent of three million feet per day, that no increase in price would follow the request made to the government. Now, in view of that, we can see how flimsy is the pretext that any person in the Northwest territories has been or is likely to be, injured by this operation;—no person, that is, except the American lumber dealers who have a combine, and who are at the back of any protests which have been made against the ruling of the Minister of Customs.

Mr. MICHAEL CLARK (Red Deer). Mr. Speaker, I think that a very great deal of importance is to be attached to what I hope will be the short debate in which we are engaged. A great deal that fell from the lips of my hon. friend from Moosejaw (Mr. Knowles) has been justified by the course the debate has taken. He said, and very truly, that this government owed a great deal to British Columbia— it owed a 'plumper'. Of course, one would naturally expect, in that case, evidence forthcoming that the government was grateful to British Columbia. My hon. friend traced that gratitude in their action in regard to this interpretation of the customs and this method of collecting the duty. And, in due course, of course, my hon. friend from British Columbia (Mr. Taylor), in his turn, is put up to defend the government.

Mr. TAYLOR. I would ask the hon. gentleman (Mr. Michael Clark) to withdraw that.

Mr. CLARK (Red Deer). My hon. friend (Mr. Taylor) has just made a speech; perhaps he will allow me my turn; perhaps he does not want to make both my speech and his own.

Mr. TAYLOR. Mr. Speaker, I think I am entitled to have that statement withdrawn—'that I was "put up to defend the government"'.

Mr. SPEAKER. I think the hon. member for Red Deer (Mr. Clark) should accept the denial of the hon. member for New Westminster (Mr. Taylor).

Mr. CLARK (Red Deer). In using the term 'put up' I used a phrase with which I have been familiar ever since I could read the English language, a phrase that is used in every discussion which one reads in an old country paper on parliamentary debate. As a matter of fact, we know that every member of the House speaks more or less in consultation with his leader whether he be on the government, or on the opposition side of the House. But, if my hon. friend (Mr. Taylor) prefers it, I will say, he got up. And according to my particular way of looking at things, he incurs the greater guilt in that respect, in that he is a voluntary defender of combines.

Now, Sir, I am not surprised at the course of events in this matter. In my own contest, I pointed out to the electors in various parts of my riding that one thing would follow the defeat of the Laurier government, and that was the defeat of reciprocity. But I told these electors also: You will be under a very great mistake if you think that things will remain as they were; something more will happen and happen very speedily. And in that connection I quoted speeches delivered by Conservative candidates in British Columbia, in which speeches it was clearly enunciated that when our commissioners went to Washington what they should have done was not to endeavour to get the duty taken off lumber going into the United States, but to get a duty put on lumber coming into Canada for the protection of the lumber of British Columbia. I warned them of that, and they accepted the warning; they were frightened that things would go in that direction. From the paragraph in the 'Daily Telegram' of Winnipeg which has been read in the House, it seems that I am likely to be, in this case, only too successful a prophet.

My hon. friend from British Columbia (Mr. Taylor) has defended the government. He has denied that there is a combine. That may go for what it is worth; he has, at any rate, defended the new interpretation. I wish some of the hon. gentlemen from Manitoba who have been so much interested in tariff matters in past years in this House had got up to say something on this matter. I should have liked to hear something about the views of my hon. friend from Portage la Prairie (Mr. Meighen). Doubtless he is reserving his low tariff sentiment to resume his excellent efforts in the direction of free agricultural implements.

Now, the question before the House has an important bearing upon the statement with which one has been deafened throughout Canada for years past. The electors have been told, all over the west, that there is no difference between the two parties, and that it is all the same old National Policy. Still, at the present moment, it is difficult for one to know whether hon. members on the other side believe that there is a difference or that there is not a difference. My hon. friend from New Westminster (Mr. Taylor) says that strong remonstrances were made to the late government in favour of an interpretation of this matter which would have done—what? Would have raised the price of lumber to the settler in favour of those who produce the lumber. My hon. friend the Minister of Customs (Mr. Reid) on the other hand, said, in so many words, what my hon. friend from Moosejaw (Mr. Knowles) prophesied he would, that there had been no change whatsoever. Well, it does appear to me that the hon. minister (Mr. Reid) was not the more accurate in the matter; I think my hon. friend from New Westminster is the more accurate. It is very clear that there has been a change in interpretation; and what is of the last importance to the farmer is that there has been a change in absolute fact, in that duties have been collected where they were not collected under the previous government. Now, I am rather surprised that that change should have taken place. For we heard the other day that the victory at the polls on the 21st of September was a victory for sentiment. But there is not much sentiment about the collection of duties—especially to the person who pays them. There is not much sentiment about increased prices of lumber to the settler——

Mr. SHARPE (Lisgar) Have prices been raised to the consumer?

Mr. CLARK (Red Deer). My hon friend (Mr. Sharpe, Lisgar), if he knows anything about tariffs——

Mr. SHARPE (Lisgar). I am asking for facts.

Mr. CLARK (Red Deer). My hon. friend is like a great many other people—he is very anxious for information, and he stands very much in need of it. Let me quote to him, in answer to his question, an authority that, I am sure, he will not dispute—the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Foster):

He once said in this House that, if you put a duty upon an article, the effect of that duty would be to raise the price of the article by the amount of the duty. That is not the authority of a mere tyro and a free-trader like myself, but the authority of the hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce, who knows perhaps as much, if not more, than any one on that side of the House about this particular matter. He went on to say: If it did not raise the price of the article, what would be the good of the duty? I look at it in a little different way. I would say: As it does raise the price, what is the good of the duty, especially to the man who uses the article? The hon. member for New Westminster (Mr. Taylor) put in a plea which was no surprise to me. He did not tell us that we wished to protect the combine, or the manufacturers of lumber—oh, no. Protection is a kind of good Samaritan institution. It is the labourers that he is anxious about. I very well remember reading Henry George's work twenty-five years ago and I was struck at that time with the chapter in which he shows what good Samaritans protectionists are; how they are always trying to protect the poor labouring-man. He said, and said very wisely and truly, that to talk about the poor workingman in that way is to insult him. The workingman whether in this country, or in any other civilized country, and especially in any Anglo-Saxon country, does not need protection; all he needs is fair-play and one of these days the workingmen will stand side by side with the farmers in knowing that they are both victims of this system, and when that time happens there will be short shrift for combines and governments that stand behind them both in Canada and in all other countries of the world.

The point in this whole discussion is this: I think we have elicited the fact, even before the papers are brought down at all, that there has been a change in interpretation, an undoubted change, and that there has been a change in the method of collecting the customs. Duties are collected now where they were not collected previously, and the country is within two months of this government coming into power, finding out that so far from there having been no difference between the two governments as to their tariff policies, the Liberal government and the Liberal party did stand for the farmers and for the consumers, while the present government apparently are going to stand for the combines, the trusts and the mergers by whose influence they were returned to power.

Mr. A. MEIGHEN (Portage la Prairie). It is one of the attributes of the hon. member for Red Deer (Mr. Clark) that he is able to conceal a paucity of argument, indeed the very absence of fact and reasoning, behind a very skilful and interesting manner and an intense earnestness of countenance which I would I could imitate. With the hon. gentleman's forcefulness of diction he has in the past been able to interest this House to a considerable degree. It is because the skill which he usually exercises is particularly absent from the speech which I have heard this afternoon that I rise to call attention to it now, because, without it, it appears to me that the hon. gentleman would lose the slim chance he has yet of immortality. If I have been able to catch anything of his argument it is that the government now in power is entitled to the censure of parliament, because, forsooth, it collects duties where duties were not collected before. Have I misinterpreted his argument? If I have I would like him to interrupt me.

Mr. CLARK (Red Deer). That is only half of what I said. I said that they collected duties now because they gave a different interpretation to the law with respect to the way that the lumber is pianed.

Mr. REID (Grenville). That is not true.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order, order; take it back.

Mr. REID (Grenville). I did not mean to suggest what the hon. member (Mr. Clark) said was not true. I say it is not a fact that the Customs Department are collecting duties in a different way from that in which they were collected before.

Mr. CLARK (Red Deer). That is my understanding of the case.

Mr. MEIGHEN. Then the hon. gentleman's argument has two parts, or two halves, as he states it. The first is that duties are collected now when they were not collected before and hence the government is censurable, and the second is that these duties are collected by virtue of an interpretation now that did not exist before. Three hon. gentlemen have spoken from the opposition benches. Each has been asked to say where there has been a difference in the interpretation and each has failed to point it out. It has not only been denied by my hon. friend the Minister of Customs (Mr. Reid) but it has been shown not to be the fact by my hon. friend from New Westminster (Mr. Taylor); so that, at least the second half of the hon. gentleman's speech is based upon pure fiction. What is the first half?—that duties are collected now where they were not collected before and therefore he, the lone champion of free trade, stands up in this House and censures the government. The hon. gentleman would be engaged in as reasonable and just a mission if he would go from one end of Canada to the other and uphold the smuggler from coast to coast. There was not a word that the hon. member for Red Deer uttered that could not be said in defence of the most disreputable smuggler that ever disgraced the shores of Canada. The hon. gentleman says that he would like to ask the hon. member for Portage la Prairie if he is for a low tariff or the lowering of the tariff. This matter has nothing to do with low tariffs or the lowering of tariffs. This matter concerns, as I apprehend it, only the enforcement of the law, and if he wants to know where the hon. member for Portage la Prairie is to be found on that question he will be found behind the enforcement of the law while it is law. If I am convinced, and no one does less to convince me than the hon. member for Red Deer, that it is in the interest of the people of this country to lower the tariff, I want it lowered, not by permitting smuggling, but by plain honest legislation in this House.

The case of the hon. member for Moosejaw (Mr. Knowles) stands in this position; he charges that by an interpretation permitted by the old government a large class of lumber came in free which now does not come in free, and he attributes that, or indeed it must be attributed, to one of two causes, the first one being that a different interpretation has been given by the Board of Customs commissioners, or, secondly, that that which was smuggled before is not smuggled now. It is impossible for the ingenuity of man or mind to take another view of the question.

Mr. CLARK (Red Deer). Is smuggling not a defiance of the government of the country? How could smuggling be done by a government?

Mr. MEIGHEN.

Mr. MEIGHEN. Might it not be smuggling by virtue of the compliance or complicity of the Minister of Customs?

Mr. CLARK (Red Deer). That is not smuggling.

Mr MEIGHEN. I cannot see that smuggling is any less reprehensible when done under the guise of law by virture of a plain misapplication of the law by the Minister of Customs. For instance, if machinery is brought into this country for agricultural purposes, it is subject to a certain duty; if it is brought in for other purposes it is subject to a higher duty.

If my hon. friend from Red Deer (Mr. Clark) is to have his way it would would be a right and proper thing for every importer of machinery in this country to import machinery stating it to be for agricultural purposes when it is not, and thus getting it in at a lower duty. If the Minister of Customs were to give his assistance in that he would conclude that the Minister of Customs was rendering a great service to the cause of free trade. I reject as unworthy a member of this House the imputation that a Board of Customs Commissioners, appointed by this government, or by any government, will alter its interpretation of a plain matter of law or reading at the dictation of any minister and in the face of a pronouncement uncontradicted, not attempted to be contradicted, that there never was any interpretation different from the present interpretation, then I think it becomes the hon. member for Moosejaw (Mr. Knowles) and the hon. member for Humboldt (Mr. Neely) to retract their statements.

Mr. KNOWLES. What have I said that I should retract?

Mr. MEIGHEN. The hon. member for Moosejaw should retract for this reason that unless he attributes what he complains of as wrong to the improper action of the Board of Commissioners, he has nothing to attribute it to at all. While he does not state it as plainly as the hon. member for Humboldt, he stands on the same footing or on no footing.

Mr. KNOWLES. What will I retract?

Mr. MEIGHEN. Retract the allegation that there has been wrong-doing in the department.

Mr. KNOWLES. I did not make that allegation.

Mr. MEIGHEN. In other words retract his whole speech. There are two ways of reforming legislation. The government now in power, in contradistinction to the government that once was in power, prefers to know the facts before it legislates, and having known the facts it prefers to legislate in the public interest but having legislated, it is its purpose, as now evidenced, to enforce the law as it stands. The method apparently adopted by the late government was to fix a certain rate of duty, to command their followers to abide by that rate of duty even although there was a combine, and then to allow a band of American speculators or exporters to evade that duty. I know of no method so likely to contribute to the enhancing of a campaign fund, as to place a law on the statute book in a certain form and then illicitly permit that law to be evaded. The question is not what the duty should be, I do not think that question is raised. When the question is raised, I will be prepared to discuss it, and I venture to say that if a motion is made to reduce or to abrogate the duty in any way in this House, it will not be shelved by the present leader of the government, as was a similar motion made by me in the last session by the then leader of the government. I think the hon. leader of the government to-day, (Mr. Borden) will face openly and squarely the question of reduced duty on lumber as he will the question of reduced duty on agricultural implements, and whatever decision is come to will be come to openly and every man will have the right to express his views and after the decision is come to and put on the statute-book, it will be enforced and not evaded.

Motion agreed to.

IMMIGRATION—APPOINTMENT OF MR. HAWKES.

Hon. FRANK OLIVER (Edmonton) moved:

For a copy of all orders in council and other papers relating to the appointment of Arthur Hawkes as a special commissioner in the immigration branch of the Interior Department.

He said: Mr. Speaker, in moving this resolution I wish to discuss at some length the subject of immigration generally. I think the House will agree that there is no subject of greater importance to the well being of the country, both present and future, than that of immigration, and it seems to me that the occasion of a change in government is a proper time to take stock of the policy that has prevailed in regard to immigration in the past, so that we may understand clearly any differences in policy introduced by the government that assumes office. The subject of immigration and of immigration effort is something that must be considered in the light of changing circumstances, of existing conditions, and of the conditions of the country which is under consideration. It has for many years been agreed that the immigration policy for Canada should be active and energetic, a policy looking to the securing of a substantial increase in our population. I know that that position has been countered by some of our public men. I think my hon. friend the Minister of Public Works, when in opposition, took occasion several times to state a somewhat different view, but notwithstanding that fact it has been in accordance with the settled policy of the people of Canada that there has been an active effort to secure an increase in population by drawing people from other countries,—what is generally spoken of as immigration effort. I need not refer at length to the fact that during many years this policy, while it was always the policy of the government, was not, to any great degree, successful.

The increase of our population which took place in the years from 1867 to 1896 was comparatively small, and it was not until the year 1896 and succeeding years that the policy which had always been the policy of the country was given successful effect to, and the increase of population that had always been hoped for, but until then had never been attained, began to be achieved. In order that there may be no misunderstanding, let it be thoroughly understood that this agressive and active and successful immigration policy which began in 1896 did not involve assisted immigration. The feature of assisted immigration was included in the policy of the preceding government at times; but under the government which took office in 1896 there never was a policy of assisted immigration. The policy was a policy of publicity as to the advantages of Canada and a policy which took due regard of the requirements of the immigrants upon their arrival in Canada, provided for their reception, and as far as possible within reasonable limits for their distribution to the fields which were most suitable for their efforts. For a number of years this policy was pursued, and with a great deal of success. Members of the House who were members in the parliaments of 1896 and 1900 will remember, what my hon. friend the Minister of Public Works reminded them of on occasion, that I took some exception from time to time to the policy of immigration that was then pursued. The point I took was against indiscriminate immigration. I held that no matter how great the need of our country was for people, the need was still greater that the people who were permitted to share with us the advantages of our country should be such people as would be an advantage and not a disadvantage to our citizenship. I need not say that at that time and under the conditions then prevailing, with our vast prairie country remaining vacant, as it had remained vacant for many years, and with eastern Canada standing still for the lack of the development of the western country, my views did not receive favourable consideration. As time went on, the advantages of a vigourous immigration policy came to be thoroughly understood and appreciated. We were able to change the country that had lain in grass during the centuries, that had lain vacant during the decades after it had come under the control of the Canadian government, from a non-producing to a producing country, with the result that what the so-called National Policy had been unable to do for Canada, what the great constructive work of building the Canadian Pacific railway had been unable to do for Canada, was done by an active immigration policy which secured occupation and settlement and cultivation and development of those fertile prairies, to the vast benefit and advantage of every interest in eastern Canada, whether it be industrial, financial, commercial, transportation or any other kind. It was with the development of an active immigration policy, applied if you like especially to western Canada, that Canada found herelf, that Canada began to grow, that Canada began to take the place she now occupies. It will be conceded, Mr. Speaker, that to the success of the immigration policy of the government of Canada a tremendous proportion of the advancement and the success that Canada has achieved must be ascribed, and I am sure that it will interest the House to know that the success of immigration effort, so far from diminishing in recent years, has increased, and increased to a most satisfactory degree. While our immigration in the calendar year of 1897 was 21,700, and in the fiscal year 1904-5 was 146,000, in the year 1910-11, 6 years afterwards, it was 311,000, and in the first six months of the present fiscal year the immigration of British people has been 104,000 as compared with 83,000 in the corresponding six months of last year, an increase of 25 per cent, that of continental Europeans has been 54,000 against 45,000 last year, an increase of nearly 20 per cent, and that from the United States 83,000 against 75,000 last year, an increase of 10 per cent. So that while our immigration, which had reached the high point of nearly 150,000 in the year 1904-05, and had doubled in the year 1910-11, has shown a still further percentage of increase in the first six months of 1911, the fact being that at the end of the administration of the late government the success of immigration effort was at the highest point that it had ever attained in the history of Canada.

I said a little while ago that when our aggressive immigration policy was first entered upon, I took exception to the fact that it was a policy of indiscriminate immigration.

Then I would like to call attention to the fact that although our immigration has doubled in the past six years, that increase has taken place under a policy of restricted and selective immigration, probably more drastic than that imposed by any other country in the world. So that while we have been enabled to secure such an enormous increase to our population, we have been able to secure that increase while insisting on a standard of immigrant such as we never had in Canada before—in recent years at any rate.

Mr. THOBURN. Does the hon. gentleman remember that last session I drew his attention to the negro immigration into our northwest. He speaks of the restrictions placed upon what we might call an inferior class of immigrants, and I would like to know whether anything has been done to stop the negro immigration from the southern states into our Canadian northwest.

Mr. OLIVER. Perhaps it will serve the hon. gentleman's purpose if I inform him that that immigration has, to all intents and purposes, ceased. I was saying that while we had achieved the greatest success in the volume of our immigration, we had achieved that success under conditions of selection and restriction more drastic than are imposed by any other country in the world, not excepting the United States, whose example has frequently been cited in this House.

I wish to say a word with regard to the bonus system, which has attracted more or less attention and been discussed unfavourably without due consideration of the facts. The bonus system is a means of advertising the advantages of our country and is not in any sense the bonusing of immigrants to come to Canada. That bonus system has been a part of the immigration policy of Canada for a number of years, and I might give the House a few words with regard to it. At one time an arrangement was made with the North Atlantic Trading Company which involved the paying of a five dollar bonus to that company on each immigrant of certain defined classes who landed in Canada from certain specified countries of Continental Europe. At the same time a bonus of $1.75 was paid on every English, French and Belgian immigrant of the same class. That bonus was paid to the booking-agents in those countries who had booked these immigrants to Canada. On taking office and reviewing the situation, it appeared to me that the time had come for paying a greater amount of attention to securing British immigration than had hitherto been paid. In line with that idea and with the view of spending our money in Great Britain rather than on the continent, and of encouraging British rather than continental immigration, we cancelled the contract with the North Atlantic Trading Company, and increased the bonus on British immigrants to five dollars per head. This five dollars per head paid the booking-agent in Great Britain induced a great deal of activity on the part of those agents, and we had a large increase in our British immigration. In 1904-5, we had 65,000 British immigrants; in 1905-6, we had 86,000; in the nine months of 1906-7, we had 55,000; and in 1907-8, we had 120,000 British immigrants, showing that our bonus system to the booking-agents in Great Britain had produced a very important effect.

This brings me to another feature of our policy. Up to this time our policy had been one of aggressive effort to secure immigration, but we had changed that to some extent so as to restrict our most aggressive efforts to the British isles. But now there came a time when it was necessary to apply the restrictive and selective features which mark the policy in force. It will be remembered that the conditions in Canada in 1907, were what might be called boom conditions, and these were followed by a financial collapse, with the result that while the boom conditions had been a great factor in bringing out an enormous number of immigrants, the financial collapse left those immigrants stranded without employment. Facing the condition that we found to exist, finding that Canada was being used by certain agencies in Great Britain for the disposition of undesirable elements of the population in that country, finding that our demand for labour had diminished, it became necessary to restrict the influx of people, and consequently in December, 1907, a money qualification was imposed upon immigrants. Each immigrant was required to have $50 in his possession.

If he came during the winter months, when spring came it was found that the industrial conditions were still unfavourable and it was necessary to continue the money qualification. The policy became established of a fifty-dollar requirement during the summer months for all immigrants landing in Canada, with certain exceptions. These exceptions include immigrants who are coming to engage in farm labour, female domestic servants coming to employment, and certain relatives of people already resident in Canada. Aside from these special cases, every immigrant landing in Canada is required to have money enough to carry him over the first period of his residence in this country. This restriction, I need hardly say, caused a great deal of adverse comment. It was objected to very strongly by philanthropic societies in the Old Country and by many people of influence and standing there. But from time to time it became evident that it was necessary that Canada should, in her own interest, impose this restriction, and the restriction was accordingly maintained, with the exceptions I have mentioned and some other exceptions made from time to time as occasion arose. In view of the fact that railway construction was proceeding at a very rapid rate in Canada and that there was such a great demand for railway labour, the money requirement was removed, so far as those labourers were concerned, during the working season of the year. It will be noticed, of course, that this money qualification is not imposed to keep people out of the country; it is imposed so that people who come into Canada shall be able to shift for themselves after they come. And, when they are coming to engage in work which is necessary for the development of the country, they have been permitted to enter without the money qualification. In this connection, I may point out the reasons against the removal of these requirements. Labour for industrial purposes is not admitted without the money qualification. The principle is this,—that when an immigrant is coming to enter upon an employment in which the demand for labour exceeds the supply and in regard to which there is no question that the development resulting from his work will be to the benefit of the country at large without exception, we admit the immigrant free of the money qualification. But when the immigrant comes in to enter into competition with the ordinary industrial workers of this country then we say he should have money in his pocket so that he may be able to shift for himself until he secures employment. There have been many complaints as to this restriction in the cases I have mentioned, and it is because of these complaints and of the consequent pressure, I may say, to have this money qualification withdrawn in these cases, that I lay so much stress on it in presenting the matter to the House. The fixed policy of the late government was that the immigrant coming into Canada to enter into industrial competition with the workers of Canada must be able to shift for himself on his arrival.

An important feature of the policy of the late government was the imposition of restrictions along the international boundary line. Up to the year 1908, although we had restrictions on the admission of immigrants by ocean ports, we had no restrictions upon the passage of immigrants from the United States into Canada. The United States, however, had restrictions against Canadian immigrants going into the United States. They had a very numerous body of inspectors posted at important points all along the boundary line, whose business it was to exclude from the United States undesirables who might attempt to cross over from Canada. Our effort had always been to get desirable settlers from the United States, and we had never thought it necessary to impose a corresponding restriction on our side. But the conditions which arose in 1907 made it absolutely necessary that Canada should take similar measures on her side of the line to those taken by the United States on their side of the line. The necessity of self-protection imposed that duty. The fact was that when an undesirable arrived in a town on the United States side of the boundary, and it was thought desirable to get rid of him, the municipal officers merely suggested that he could cross over to the Canadian side. And when our municipal officers desired to get rid of him and desired him to pass back to the United States side, then the United States federal officers stood in the way and said: 'Oh, no; our duty is to see that undesirables do not come into the United States.' This system was carried on for so long and to such an aggravating extent that it became absolutely necessary for the government of Canada to post exclusion officers at all important points along the international boundary, and to take action corresponding to the action of the United States officers in preventing undesirables from crossing the boundary. In order that the House may note to what extent the exclusion service has been employed, I may state that in 1908-9 4,580 persons were rejected at boundary points by Canadian officers; in 1909-10, the number of such rejections was 8,997; and in 1910-11, the number was 15,404.

Mr. FOSTER. Were many of those duplicates?

Mr. OLIVER. Very likely some would be, but not many. I think it desirable to give a somewhat full explanation of this point, because the expense of maintaining these boundary officers is considerable. We have 103 officers employed at salaries ranging from $1,000 a year up. Besides, we have 116 customs officers employed in the same service who receive an addition to their customs salaries of from $50 to $100 per year.

Now this question of the exclusion of United States and Canadian citizens at the boundary points has been up for consideration on several occasions in this House, and the suggestion has been made that this was a most unfriendly attitude for the respective countries to assume towards each other's people, and that it would be wise if it could be dispensed with, and if a mutual arrangement could be made whereby this boundary inspection could be done away with. There is nothing more true than that this inspection is a detriment to travel, and is an aggravation to the people who travel, and is undesirable from many points of view. It is especially undesirable because of the difficulty in securing suitable men to carry on the very difficult and delicate work that is involved. There is no possibility of any government in either country getting men in all cases who are able to handle such questions without friction of some kind. The most either government can do is to get the best men possible for that duty. But let me point out also that this service is an absolute necessity to the well being of both countries, and so far from increasing friction, it works towards goodwill, towards friendship, and towards a desirable condition on both sides of the boundary line. So long as the boundary line was a protection to the evildoer, so long was it the haunt of evil-doers on both sides. But with the boundary line eliminated in respect to undesirables and evildoers, which is the case now, so far as we are able to do it, under this arrangement the territory in both countries adjacent to the boundary line is relieved from the special presence of these undesirables who formerly used to haunt that territory. Formerly the undesirable in Detroit, when Detroit became too warm for him, simply stepped across to Windsor, or the Windsor crook stepped across to Detroit. To-day the Windsor man who undertakes to go to Detroit is stopped by the United States officer, and the Detroit crook who wants to go over to Windsor is stopped by the Canadian officer. The consequence is that the people of this undesirable character find that the hunting is not nearly as good in those localities as it formerly was and the credit of both countries is in that respect improved.

Now, I would like to say a word or two in regard to Oriental immigration. For one reason or another, possibly for the same reason that produced the great rush in 1907 on the Atlantic coast, there was a similar rush on the Pacific coast. In the fiscal period of nine months ending March 31, 1907, there landed at British Columbia ports some 2,700 Hindus, and in the year 1907-8 there landed 7,601 Japanese. I have not the figures of Chinese immigration for those years, but there is no doubt that was at any rate normal, if not abnormal. But this large influx of Hindus and Japanese in those years raised a new question in regard to immigration which had to be dealt with. It is not necessary for me to discuss the merits of either Japanese or Hindus as immigrants, nor to discuss the wisdom of a policy of excluding such immigrants. I will only say that it is a fixed principle that the people of Canada have the right to say who will be admitted to the advantages of residence and citizenship in Canada. In the exercise of that right it became necessary to deal with the question of Asiatic immigration. In the case of Japan, an arrangement was made with the Japanese government whereby they undertook to restrict the movement of their own people to the shores of Canada, with the result that while, in 1907-8, 7,601 Japanese came to Canada, in 1908-9 the total number was 495; in 1909-10 it was 271; in 1910-11 it was 437.

Mr. MONK. Is my hon. friend in favour of Japanese immigration?

Mr. OLIVER. No, I am not. I think the figures I have read to the House will show my hon. friend that the late government was not in favour of Japanese immigration. But it was in favour of maintaining amicable relations with the empire of Japan while at the same time conserving the interests and well-being of the people of Canada. In the case of Hindu immigration, as a result of the action taken by the government, while the number of Hindus who arrived in 1907 was 2,124, and in 1908 the number was 2,623; in 1908-9 it fell to 6; in 1910 it was 10, and in 1911 it was 5. So it must be conceded that the government standing on its right to restrict and select the people who should come and live in Canada, exercised that right to the satisfaction, I believe, of the majority of the people of Canada, and placed the matter beyond any reasonable ground of complaint.

The action that was taken did not wholly affect the people of Hindustan; it applied to all Asiatics, except Japanese and Chinese, and required that the Asiatic immigrant should have $200 in his possession on landing in Canada. This action was taken for the reasons set out, but it alone would not have produced the result that is shown in the return.

Further action was taken and what is called the indirect passage provision was made by order in council and afterwards by statute, which provided that the Governor in Council had the right to exclude any immigrant reaching Canada by indirect passage. The effect of this was to practically exclude the Japanese who had settled in the Sandwich Islands and who were thereby free from the jurisdiction of Japan, but who had been expected to add largely to the population of British Columbia by immigration. It also had the effect of excluding the people of Hindustan who where settled in Hong-Kong. The reasonableness of this provision whereby an immigrant was excluded because he did not come direct from the country of his birth or citizenship was this: If an immigrant was found to be undesirable after his arrival in Canada, and if he did not come from the country of which he was a citizen, he could not be deported because the country from which he came, if he was not a citizen of that country, would have the right to refuse him. We, therefore, claimed the right to say, before a man landed on our shores, that we would not allow him to land if we could not return him to the country to which he belong. The effect of these restrictive and selective regulations has been to keep our immigration at a high standard of excellence, while the energy with which immigration effort has been pursued has brought our total immigration up to the highest point that it has ever been in the history of Canada, and to a point at least double what it was six years ago. It may be of interest, speaking of British immigration,—and as I have pointed out it is British immigration that the late government bent its greatest efforts to secure—to state that in the period from 1890 to 1900 of immigration from the British Isles, 72 per cent was to the United States, 13 per cent to Canada, 7½ per cent to South Africa, and 5¼ per cent to Australia. In the period from 1900 to 1910, of British immigration, there was to the United States, 50 per cent, to Canada 30 per cent, Australia 9 per cent, and South Africa 11 per cent. It will be found that the returns for the last year or two will show that instead of Canadian immigration from Great Britain being less than to the United States, it is a great deal more. It may be interesting to the House to know that during the years from 1902 to 1911, there were 7,520 immigrants rejected at ocean ports and there were deported, after having been admitted, in the same period, 4,667 immigrants, I think it was been thoroughly established that we have in force to-day in Canada an immigration policy under which the government of Canada has the right to say what shall be the character of the immigrants who shall be allowed to land upon our shores, that we have in force an aggressive immigration policy which has resulted in stupendous material advantage to Canada as a whole, and that in addition to that aggressive immigration effort we have a policy of selection and rejection which ensures, in so far as such a policy reasonably can ensure it, that the standard of our citizenship will not be degraded, but will be improved by the immigration that we receive. As I have already said, immigration effort must be governed by circumstances as they arise. I want to say to my successor in office that so long as the government is prepared to follow an aggressive immigration policy and is successful in that policy, while keeping closely to the principle of selective and restrictive immigration, we will be glad to give him our co-operation and support.

At six o'clock, House took recess.

After Recess.

House resumed at eight o'clock.

Hon. ROBERT ROGERS (Minister of the Interior). Mr. Speaker, when you left the Chair at six o'clock, my hon. friend the member for Edmonton (Mr. Oliver) had resumed his seat after making an interesting statement regarding the administration of a branch of the department over which he presided, the Immigration Branch. I have little fault to find with my hon. friend's statement. He has undertaken to make a statement of the conditions of that department covering a number of years and with part of that statement I am free to confess I am bound to agree. In the short time I have been in charge of the department, I have discovered, as was stated by my hon. friend this afternoon, that a very considerable difficulty is to be met in dealing with undesirables coming across the International boundary. I recognize, after looking into this question, that it is indeed a difficult one for the Department of Immigration to treat with advantage to the people and with satisfaction to all concerned. In respect to the statement made by my hon. friend that his immigration policy was directed entirely in the interests of western Canada, I may say that the Immigration policy of the present government will differ somewhat in that respect from the policy followed by hon. gentlemen opposite during their term of office; our policy will be one calculated to assist and promote immigration in all parts of this Dominion of Canada irrespective of western Canada or eastern Canada.

I shall not attempt to deal with any statements and figures quoted by my hon. friend this afternoon as I do not consider it necessary for me to do so. The policy which this government proposes to undertake in regard to immigration will indeed be a vigorous policy from every point of view, believing as we do that the conditions in Canada warrant such a policy, that Canada has reached a point of marked economic development, and my hon friend this afternoon supplied the evidence as to why we had reached that stage of development. He recognized, as every good citizen of Canada must recognize, that our development has been due to the great policy laid down by our leader in 1878, the National Policy, upon which we have been building from that time down to the present. Under that policy we have reached a point of development that excites the admiration of every good citizen of our common country, a position that entitles us to make clear to the people in all parts of the world from which we hope to receive desirable immigration just what our financial condition is and it will be the duty of the department over which I preside to immediately undertake this task. We shall undertake this policy regardless of race, creed or nationality, and in doing so we will endeavour to have our policy a general policy for all parts of Canada.

I have no objection whatever to the resolution proposed. I shall bring down all the papers asked for at the earliest possible moment. We selected Mr. Hawkes believing that he was capable to fill this important position. We have reached a period when it is necessary to have co-operation in our immigration policy between the different provinces of this Dominion and the Dominion government, and we have selected Mr. Hawkes to make a report upon this particular matter in order that we may have all the best information possible in regard to the best policy to be adopted to bring about the best results in the interest of the people of this country.

Mr. NEELY. What does the hon. member think of the special qualifications of Mr. Hawkes for this position?

Mr. ROGERS. I am glad to tell my hon. friend that I think Mr. Hawkes has undoubtedly very special qualifications for the position. I am supported in that belief by the leading Liberal organ in the great province of Quebec, 'The Montreal Herald.' That paper said, a day or two after Mr. Hawkes' appointment was made:

> This announcement was made by Hon. Robert Rogers, Minister of the Interior, when in Montreal on Saturday. He intimated that he had in contemplation important reforms in connection with the immigration work of the government and Mr. Hawkes' appointment marked one of the first steps in the new government.
>
> It has not been definitely announced what will be the exact functions attached to the new office, but it is probable that Mr. Hawkes' work will largely consist in devising plans for greater co-operation between the Dominion and the province in the work of promoting immigration. To this end Mr. Hawkes will personnally visit the western provinces, and after thoroughly investigating immigration questions from the western standpoint will probably spend sometime in England.
>
> It is probably the case that there has not been as much co-operation between the Dominion and the provinces as there might have been, and the new commissioner will be doing excellent work if he can devise plans for ensuring this co-operation. Several of the provinces maintain independent offices in England and the work done in these offices must be in some respects a duplication of that performed by the offices of the federal government.
> Mr. Hawkes is peculiarly well equipped both by natural ability and by experience for the work which he has undertaken. An Englishman by birth he has spent many years in the Northwest and thus understands the conditions which the immigrant has to face when he takes up the task of making himself a home upon the prairies. After this experience Mr. Hawkes spent several years as publicity agent of the Canadian Northern railway, and in that position gained a large amount of knowledge as to the most practical ways of promoting the interests of a great transportation company, the success of which so largely depends upon the rapid settlement of the land through which its lines run. About a year ago Mr. Hawkes established the 'British News of Canada,' in which he has maintained an active propaganda for the movement of British people desiring to improve their fortune from England to Canada. The page which he writes each week in his paper is one of the brightest and most entertaining editorial pages in Canada, and proves that he has not only an observing eye but a facile pen, and his powers of definition and expression, backed as they are by a large fund of common sense, should make his reports to the government extremely valuable. Taking into consideration Mr. Hawkes' special knowledge, his training and his keen interest in the subject of immigration, it would have been hard for Mr. Rogers to find a man better qualified for the work which the new commissioner is being asked to perform.

Mr. MACLEAN (Halifax). Is Mr. Hawkes still editing the 'British News'?

Mr. ROGERS. I do not know if he is still editing this paper or not, but I understand he is not.

Mr. MACLEAN (Halifax). Would the minister consider it proper for Mr. Hawkes to hold the office he has and at the same time continue the ownership and publication of a newspaper which he started to encourage immigration into Canada in view of the further fact that he solicited support from the Department of the Interior in the way of advertising in this paper and that he solicited similar support from the various provincial governments?

Mr. ROGERS. I quite agree that it would not be proper, and as an evidence of that I have already refused his paper any further support from the department over which I preside.

Mr. MACLEAN (Halifax). I do not think that would be quite sufficient.

Mr. ROGERS. I do not know what would satisfy the hon. gentleman. I think that is as plain and definite as it can be; action has already been taken. Mr. Hawkes has been appointed to that position, and I have communicated with every Premier in every province in Canada, and have received replies from them all expressing their desire and willingness to meet Mr. Hawkes, to render him every assistance, and to co-operate with the Dominion government in the effort to promote a more vigorous and a more active immigration policy in the interests of the people of Canada.

Mr. ETHIER. Did Mr. Hawkes take an active part in the last campaign on behalf of the hon. Minister of the Interior?

Mr. ROGERS. I am not aware of the special services that my hon. friend refers to as having been rendered by Mr. Hawkes; but I believe that Mr. Hawkes, in common with hundreds and thousands of other good Liberals, believing that the policy of the hon. gentlemen opposite was injurious to the national life of our country, put his shoulder to the wheel as a good Canadian and rendered good service to Canada. I am sure that the work of any Canadian under such circumstances is not such as to disqualify him for a position of trust at the hands of this or any other government, in the carrying on of work so important and necessary as our immigration, and I accept with gratitude the congratulations of the leading Liberal organ of the province of Quebec on my selection of Mr. Hawkes for the important position he is filling to-day.

Mr. ETHIER. May I ask what newspapers of Quebec approved of that nomination?

Mr. ROGERS. I have quoted the leading organ of the Liberal party in the province of Quebec, and I do not know what more the hon. gentleman may want. Now, I have nothing to complain of in regard to the statement made by my hon. friend from Edmonton (Mr. Oliver), this afternoon. In some respects I entirely agree with him. Further than that I have nothing to say other than that I shall be pleased to bring down the papers and furnish hon. gentlemen opposite with all the information in the possession of the department in regard to this matter.

Mr. BICKERDIKE. Before the hon. gentleman concludes I want to ask him one question. For the last two sessions I have endeavoured to press on the previous minister the necessity of having the inspection of immigrants made before they go on board the steamer instead of having it after they arrive in Canada. A family arriving here is liable to a great many hardships. One member of it is perhaps found to be diseased, and then either the whole family or a part of them are sent back. I have been trying to impress on the previous minister, and I think the Minister of Public Works backed me up, that the inspection, if possible, should be made before the immigrant goes on board the steamer instead of at this end.

Mr. ROGERS. This is a point which has not been raised with me since I took charge of the department. I quite appreciate the importance of my hon. friend's suggestion, and I shall be glad to take the matter up and meet his wishes if I can possibly do so.

Mr. PAQUET. I wish to ask the Minister of the Interior if it is his intention to favour the repatriation of French-Canadians ?

Mr. ROGERS. This, too, is entirely a new question so far as I am concerned, and I shall be glad to take it up with my department and ascertain the facts for and against the suggestion which has been made, and give it the fullest consideration that its importance deserves.

Mr. PROULX. Is the hon. Minister aware that during the last campaign Mr. Hawkes said at Halifax that one Englishman was as good as seven French-Canadians ?

Mr. ROGERS. I am not aware that Mr. Hawkes made any such statement, and knowing him as well as I do, I would not like to credit him with having done so.

Mr. PROULX. Will the Minister inquire ?

Motion agreed to.

SUPPLY.

House in Committee of Supply.

Charges of management — Public debt, $188,941.66.

Mr. PUGSLEY. Would the hon. the Minister of Finance inform the committee what changes have been made from the estimates laid before the House by the former Minister of Finance?

Mr. WHITE (Leeds). My hon. friend will remember that of the estimates of the late government a portion was voted in full. Of the balance five-twelfths were voted, leaving seven-twelfths still to be voted. The estimates now brought down are practically the same, the total difference being $11,725. This is made up of several items. Civil government, Secretary of State, various clerkships aggregating $4,316.67. Administration of Justice, $408.33. Mail subsidies and steamship subventions, steam service between Sarnia and Sault Ste. Marie, calling at way ports, $5,833.33. Miscellaneous, $1,166.67.

Arts, Agriculture and Statistics—Census and statistics, $700,000.01.

Mr. PUGSLEY. Will the hon. minister please tell us whether this amount covers the Governor General's warrants issued in connection with the census?

Mr. BURRELL. Yes, I understand that the amount covers the Governor General's warrants.

Mr. MACLEAN (Halifax). In some of the constituencies there are claims of the census enumerators that have not been paid. I would suggest that that be done as soon as possible.

Mr. ROGERS.

Mr. BURRELL. It is the ordinary practice to keep back ten per cent to cover certain rules that may not have been complied with, certain regulations; and in some cases twenty per cent has been kept back, because of the fact that certain expenses in connection with the enumerators' work have been thought a little too big. But when all the census returns are in, the matter will be settled up.

Mr. NESBITT. Will that item include enough to pay up the arrears?

Mr. BURRELL. I think so.

Military buildings and works, $192,791.67.

Mr. PUGSLEY. Before we pass the items under Militia and Defence, I would like to call attention to a matter which I know has been more or less under consideration for some time. It has reference to caring for and beautifying some of the old forts in the country, some of the old battlefields, the idea being to restore the forts and build fences around them, to improve the grounds, and generally to beautify them. I think myself that would be a very desirable thing to do. I have in my mind what is known as Fort Howe, in the city of St. John, and which could be made into a most charming park. At present, however, it is simply a waste piece of land, though it occupies perhaps the most sightly position in the city. I think it is worthy the attention of the Minister of Militia (Mr. Hughes). The same remark might be made with reference to old Fort Cumberland on the boundary between New Brunswick and Nova Scotia. There are quite a number of others which I need not mention. I feel sure my suggestion will commend itself to the minister. The expense would not be very great, and people would appreciate the improvement.

Mr. ROGERS. I know this is a matter which the Minister of Militia and Defence (Mr. Hughes) has had under consideration. I entirely agree with the remarks of the hon. gentleman (Mr. Pugsley) that it would be very fitting for the government to undertake such an expenditure as he suggests. I will at least draw the attention of the Minister of Militia to it.

Mr. PUGSLEY. Before going into the items for public buildings and harbour works, might I ask my hon. friend the Minister of Finance (Mr. White) if we may fairly assume that by reason of the estimates of the late government being adopted, and the committee now being asked to approve of these items, the intention is, speaking generally, to proceed with the various works for which parliament is now asked to make appropriations.

I do not understand that even after the general assurance which we are given, the minister will be debarred from taking adverse action in some particular case which might be brought to his notice, and where he seemed clear that it would not be desirable to proceed. I think he should be left entirely free as to that, but. speaking generally, may we understand, as I think we do understand, that it is the intention of the government to proceed with the works for which parliament is now asked to make appropriations?

In this connection I may say that I congratulate the Minister of Public Works by reason of his having adopted the estimates which were prepared by the late government after very great consideration, and after taking very great pains to ascertain that the various expenditures which were proposed would be in the interest of the country. With regard to public works, it is gratifying to me to believe that after the two months' consideration that my hon. friend has been able to give to the matter he has felt justified in coming before the House and asking us to approve of all the estimates which were brought down by the late government.

Mr. MONK. Even two months, if they had been concentrated entirely to the examination of each of the public works begun under the previous administration, could scarcely have been sufficient to arrive at a sufficient judgment on each one of these works, but I am happy to say that it is the intention of the government, except under very special circumstances, which, of course, must be reserved, to carry out the works for which credits are asked. In many cases the works have been begun and it is a question of finishing them, but even in the cases where that has not taken place, where the item has been voted without any objection, and no objection arises, it seems to me that it would be the duty of the government to carry out the wish of parliament as expressed during the previous session. I quite enter into the idea of carrying out all these works which have been sanctioned, and in regard to these, even considerable ones, unless something unforeseen occurs, we intend, as we apply for the votes contained in the estimates of last year, to complete them and to apply the appropriations to the purposes for which they are intended.

Mr. WILSON (Laval). I would like to ask the minister if the explanation that he now presents to the committee may be taken as an answer to the question that the minister asked to stand to-day, concerning the dredging in Rivière la Prairie.

Mr. MONK. Oh, I think there is no difficulty about that particular work. It it a small work, it is eminently desirable, and it is going to be executed. To-day the delay in answering the question was due to the fact that there were some small questions, and we did not know about the depth of water or the amount spent, these details having to be obtained from the office in Montreal.

Mr. PUGSLEY. I could imagine that there would be no question about that work, because I remember that when that work, at the urgent request of the hon. member for Laval (Mr. Wilson), was put in the estimates the hon. Minister of Public Works (Mr. Monk), claimed some considerable credit for the vote being in the estimates.

Mr. MONK. I claimed a great deal of credit for it being in the estimates because it was I who asked for it in the first instance.

Mr. PUGSLEY. The hon. gentleman claimed that, but my memory did not serve me the same as the hon. gentleman's memory served him. I did not remember that the hon. Minister of Public Works was entitled to that credit, but I rather thought it was due the hon. member for Laval.

Mr. MONK. We had not the advantage of having my hon. friend (Mr. Pugsley) in this House when I began.

Mr. PUGSLEY. That may be, but I am glad the work will go ahead.

Railways and Canals, chargeable to capital—Intercolonial railway, $1,429,924.97.

Mr. MACLEAN (Halifax). I would like this item to stand as the hon. Minister of Railways and Canals (Mr. Cochrane) is not present.

Mr. REID (Grenville). The hon. member can discuss that item on some other item.

Mr. MACLEAN (Halifax). I prefer to have the item stand, because I desire some explanation from the Minister of Railways and Canals respecting the items providing for the construction of some branches of the Intercolonial railway in Nova Scotia. I think it would be well that the minister should be here himself.

Mr. MONK. Stands.

Hudson Bay railway—Construction, $1,166,666.66.

Mr. NEELY. I think this item might be allowed to stand. I have a motion on the order paper asking for certain information in connection with the construction of the Hudson Bay railway. This is a vote that was put through last session, and I believe a contract was let for a certain part of the work. That work, I understand, has been held up. I do not propose to discuss that now, but I propose to discuss it on the motion which stands in my name on the order paper. Before allowing this vote to pass I want some information from the Minister of Railways as to what the intention of the government is in reference to the prosecution of this work.

Mr. MONK. I think there will be a further vote for the same purpose. Perhaps we might pass this one and reserve the discussion to which my hon. friend refers until the further item comes down.

Mr. PUGSLEY. I do not think there is any further item in the estimates.

Mr. NEELY. I do not see any other item in these particular estimates.

Mr. WHITE (Leeds). We might allow it to stand. My hon. friend the Minister of Railways and Canals may be here this evening; if not, to-morrow.

Item allowed to stand.

Public buildings, $765,333.32.

Mr. PUGSLEY. I would point out to the Minister of Finance that under the head of public building there is an item which ought not to be there but ought to be under the heading of miscellaneous, that is, the item for surveys to ascertain the practicability and cost of a tunnel from Prince Edward Island to the mainland.

Mr. WHITE (Leeds). It does not make a great deal of difference.

Mr. MACLEAN (Halifax) Might I ask the Minister of Public Works if during the recess he could have the tops of desks in this chamber made flat? I notice one or two that have been changed, and they are very comfortable indeed, while the sloping top desks are almost useless. I am sure every hon. gentleman in the House will appreciate the change.

Mr. ROGERS. That is a very good suggestion. I had mine changed the very first day I was here.

Mr. MONK. We will do that during the recess.

Harbours and rivers, $2,055,666.63.

Mr. PUGSLEY. I wish to call attention for a moment to the vote for harbour improvements at St. John. The total vote is $950,000, chargeable to capital account, of which $395,833.34 were voted, leaving a balance of $554,166.66. That is made up of two items, one of which was in the main estimates and the other, amounting to $500,000, in the supplementary estimates. While the amount did not appear otherwise than as a grant for improvements in St. John harbour, I had asked council for that vote especially for improvements at Courtenay Bay, and I intend so stating to parliament when the matter came up, and I kept the amount in the supplementary votes intact to enable the contract for the improvements at Courtenay Bay to be let. I therefore sincerely trust that my hon. friend will see his way clear to utilize that amount of $500,000 for the purpose of beginning improvements at Courtenay Bay. If the contract were let now, under the tender of the Norton-Griffiths Company received on August 10, this amount would be more than sufficient to carry on the work to the end of the current year, March 31 next As representing the city of St. John and also, I trust, taking a national view of this question, I cannot urge too strongly upon my hon. friend the carrying out of what was the settled policy of the late government in regard to the creation of terminal facilities at Courtenay Bay for the Grand Trunk Pacific Railway Company. I observe by 'Hansard' that in answer to some remarks I made on the address, my hon. friend stated that the whole question of transportation would have to be considered together. I trust that my hon. friend will not insist on that, if it would involve delay in the commencement of this most important and most urgent work. My hon. friend said that the improvement of the harbour of Quebec would have to be considered in that connection. The late government had a well defined policy with regard to the improvement of the harbour at Quebec. When we went out of office we were engaged in the construction of a deep water wharf on the south side of the St. Lawrence at Lévis, and we had done a great deal of dredging in the harbour, near the mouth of the St. Charles river. We had built, I think, about 1,500 feet of wharf; and in connection with the Transcontinental railway it was well understood and thoroughly agreed upon that large improvements were to be carried on which would involve an expenditure of several million dollars. It does not seem to me that it is necessary, in order to determine what is to be done at St. John, that the minister should wait until the government has decided what they are going to do throughout the whole country because, as I have said, my hon. friend need only look at the estimates to see what has been done each year for several years past in the various harbours throughout the country with a view to improving what I may call the national transportation. We have been developing Halifax in connection with the Intercolonial railway; we have been developing St. John and Quebec, improving the harbour at Three-Rivers, improving the channel of the St. Lawrence, improving, through loans to the harbour commissioners, the great port of Montreal, improving the harbour of Toronto; we had items in the estimates for improving the harbours of Kingston and Hamilton, and in connection with the Canadian Pacific railway and the Grand Trunk railway we have been for several years carrying on a very large expenditure at the ports of Victoria and Midland or Tiffin on the eastern shore of the Georgian bay. We have been spending millions at Port Arthur and Fort William on the western coast of Lake Superior. On the Pacific Coast we had appropriations for improving the Fraser river to give a navigable channel for ocean steamers from New Westminster to the sea. We have purchased dredges to improve the harbours at Vancouver and Victoria. We had a well-defined transportation policy applying to all sections of the country. I am anxious, as I am sure my hon. friend is anxious, that these great works throughout the Dominion should be continued, but I am sure that upon reflection my hon. friend will see that it is not in the public interest that the improvement, the development, of any one of these great harbours should be delayed for the reason suggested by him. I may say to my hon. friend that there appears on the order paper a telegram which was sent by my hon. friend the Prime Minister as a special message to the people of St. John; I think a very proper message. I do not complain of it at all if that was the policy of the Conservative party. In that message he gave to the people of St. John the assurance that if the Conservative party was successful in the recent election, the return of that party to power would not in any way retard, hinder or prevent the work of improving the harbour of St. John. I asked my hon. friend in the question on the Order Paper whether, when he sent that telegram, he was aware of the work which the government was proposing to carry on at St. John. The Prime Minister has not, I think, given a quite satisfactory answer to that question. He states that he is not highly confident that he ever thoroughly understood what were the intentions of the late government, but he intended his telegram rather to indicate what would be the policy of the incoming government. I do not think my hon. friends opposite ought to forget that it was well known: it had been published in the newspapers and was well known to everybody, it was well known to the gentlemen who, as the Prime Minister says, requested him to send the telegram for the information of the people of St. John, that the government had advertised for and had received tenders for this great work of developing Courtenay bay as one of the national works.

When my hon. friend the Prime Minister sent that telegram to the people of St. John, they had a right to understand, and they did understand, that if the Conservative party were returned to power there would be no delay in going forward with that work, and I am satisfied that many of the people of St. John voted cheerfully for the candidates of the Conservative party because they relied on the assurance contained in that very strong and very clear telegram of the Prime Minister. I make the remarks which I have made in all kindness. I know that my hon. friend the Minister of Public Works is sympathetic with these movements for the development of our country. The great difficulty under which Canada has been labouring in the past has been that we have been developing the interior of the country and have not been paying sufficient attention to our ocean ports; we have been giving the opportunity for getting out the grain from our fertile prairie lands, and have not been giving as much opportunity as the country should give to ocean steamers to come to our ports and have the cargoes transferred from the railways to the steamers in the most expeditious and cheapest manner. It will not be long before the Grand Trunk Pacific will be completed, and will be knocking at the door of the government for accommodation at Canadian ocean ports, in the winter season at all events. If you begin to-morrow, you cannot get these facilities ready in time for the Grand Trunk Pacific. To do the dredging works and build the breakwater and the wharfs is going to take at the least three or four years and long before that time the Grand Trunk Pacific will be completed, and it will not have an ocean port which for heavy freight can compete with the port of Portland in the state of Maine. The great effort of our people for a quarter of a century has been to divert Canadian trade in the winter season from American ports to Canadian ports. Again I make the most earnest and sincere appeal to my hon. friend to look into the matter carefully, to look at the tenders which have been received, and if he does I am sure that he will realize that it will be in the public interest that this work should go on, and go on without delay. I was extremely pleased to learn from the Prime Minister, in answer to my question, that the deposit of $500,000 which had been made to the government as long ago as the 9th or 10th of August last was still in the hands of the government. I hope I can take that as an assurance that the government intends, during the coming winter, to carry out the work which we contemplated, and for which we called for tenders. St. John is admirably circumstanced in that respect. There is no ice at any season in St. John harbour, even in the most severe winter, so that the work of dredging can go on in all the months of winter, and a great deal of work can be accomplished during the months of the winter now before us.

Mr. FOWLER. Before the hon. Minister of Public Works answers the pathetic appeal of the hon. member for St. John (Mr. Pugsley), I would like to have a thorough understanding of what the hon. gentleman means by asking that a portion of this vote be reserved for work in Courtenay Bay. As I understand, there is to-day a considerable amount of money in arrears to the company that has been doing the work on the west side of the harbour. and this total vote will not be more than sufficent to pay those arrearages. Does the hon. gentleman suggest that this $554,000 should be reserved for work in Courtenay Bay, and that these gentlemen who have performed the work, and who are friends of his, should go without their money?

Mr. PUGSLEY. I may say that the amount that was due for dredging on the west side at the time the late government went out of power would not amount to a quarter the amount of this vote. There will be ample money for beginning the work in Courtenay bay as well.

Mr. FOWLER. I have been informed that on the 1st of October there was due $200,000 or $300,000.

Mr. PUGSLEY. Oh, no, unless there has been a very unexpected increase in the dredging since that time.

Mr. FOWLER. Does the hon. gentleman suggest that the work should be stopped on the west side for the purpose of reserving the vote to begin the work in Courtenay bay, which could not be done before next spring?

Mr. PUGSLEY. No, but I will tell my hon. friend what I suggest. There were formerly three dredges at work on the west side; latterly there have been two. I have been told quite recently that arrangements have been made for putting at work a third dredge. If it were a matter of apportioning the money, I think this $500,000 should be kept for Courtenay bay, and if necessary a supplementary estimate should be brought down to provide for the payment for dredging work on the west side.

Mr. FOWLER. I think it would be exceedingly foolish to allow this money to be used for that purpose when it is required to pay what is due for work that has been done.

Mr. MONK. It was hardly necessary for my hon. friend to impress on me quite as strongly as he did the necessity of following up these very important works. I have been in the House for some years since we received the report of the Transportation Commission, and I am not aware that I have failed in any one year to urge on the government the necessity of carrying out the suggestions of that commission, particularly as regards our national ports.

Mr. PUGSLEY.

Every year when we were asked to vote large sums in the aggregate for small local improvements — improvements very often of no urgent character—I insisted that we should, if possible, lay aside for the moment those small local works in order to carry out the more urgent and essential recommendations of the Transportation Commission. One of the first of those recommendations was the establishment of free national ports. That report was made as far back as 1903. These ports are enumerated at page 31 of that report. They are Fort William, Port Arthur, Depot Harbor, Midland, Port Colborne, Kingston, Montreal, Quebec, St. John, Halifax, Sydney, Vancouver, Victoria, the terminus on the Pacific ocean of the Grand Trunk Pacific and the terminus on the Pacific of the Canadian Northern ; and I ventured the observation the other day that it would have been a bold but proper policy at the time, when we first had communication of that report, to have gone to work and carried out its recommendations, even if they had cost us $25,000,000 or $30,000,000. Even if it cost us more than twice that amount, we should have undertaken these works, and we would have been far more advanced than we are. That was the opinion to which I gave expression every succeeding session. When I heard this year, on assuming office, that my hon. friend had made an effort for the purpose of carrying out the recommendation of that report as regards the harbour of St. John, so far from showing hostility, I gave the matter all the attention I possibly could under the circumstances, and what I said in the House was rather calculated to give the assurance to my hon. friend that that matter would be promptly attended to.

Mr. PUGSLEY. I hope so.

Mr. MONK. But the committee must consider that when I came into the department I found a very large scheme proposed which stood to cost not less, I think, than $8,000,000. I do not think it would be feasible to carry it out at that cost. We would be very fortunate if it could be carried out at that figure.

Mr. PUGSLEY. The tenders were less than that.

Mr. MONK. The tenders were, I think, $1,700,000 ; but so far as I can judge by the reports of the officers of the department, we must provide proper termini at that important port and must do it promptly.

Mr. PUGSLEY. Hear, hear.

Mr. MONK. We must provide for facilities for the Grand Trunk Pacific. That road is not there yet, but it is going there and we must be prepared to give it proper terminals. The same remark applies to the Intercolonial, and the situation at Courtenay bay is very favourable. But it was impossible, with the amount of money at my disposal, to go further without careful examination, and I do not think I am mistaken when I state to the committee that my hon. friend himself (Mr. Pugsley), was estopped from concluding any contract because the amount required was out of proportion to the amount voted by parliament.

Mr. PUGSLEY. Not on that account. The sole ground on which I was estopped, as my hon. friend will see from the memorandum left by the right hon. the leader of the opposition, who was then First Minister—the sole reason was that owing to the magnitude of the work, we thought we should not deal with it after being defeated, but should leave it to be dealt with by our successors.

Mr. MONK. Of course I accept my hon. friend's statement, but the work is very considerable and we must proceed carefully. I am not prepared for very large expenditures of that kind. I think they should have been gone into long before, but we must proceed carefully in order that we may be sure of getting value for our money. In my opinion, these improvements throughout the country must be considered together, and they must be considered in the light of the report of the Transportation Commission. We must consider St. John and the other ports, and it would be far better that we should see the necessity of immediate development on the lines laid down by the Transportation Commission everywhere and simultaneously rather than to act only in some places. The improvement of our ocean and inland ports will entail an expenditure of nearly $100,000,000, if they are to be equipped as similar ports are in other countries, and if we are to put up proper rival facilities of transportation to those possessed by our powerful neighbours. If the plans laid out for the port of St. John commend themselves to the approval of the House, it will not be in my department that objection will be raised. Reference has been made to Montreal. In Montreal a very small amount comparatively speaking has been spent by the government. There was granted a loan to the harbour and we have carried out improvements there. In Quebec, there are great improvements to be made. Very large demands, even in the short time since I have assumed office, have been made to me regarding the increasing necessities of our great Pacific ports. Large demands have been made by inland ports, and I believe we cannot do better than recognize the necessity of carrying out the improvements suggested by the commission. I have often reproached the late government with not having faced that necessity. I assure my hon. friend that very favourable attention will be given by me to the necessities of the port of St. John. There will be as little delay as possible, so far as my department is concerned, in giving prompt satisfaction to the demands of that harbour.

Mr. CURRIE. It is indeed a great pleasure to hear the ex-Minister of Public Works (Mr. Pugsley), lecturing the House along the lines he has just done, especially when we remember that a few months ago he supported a policy which was intended deliberately to take the trade of this country down to the United States. Now, however, he takes up the cudgels for our national ports and urges that they should be deepened and enlarged to meet the trade of the country, which no doubt is very desirable since the country has decided to keep this trade within its own borders as much as possible. In view of the fact that the port of St. John requires something like $8,000,000, and that the total work done on the St. Lawrence as far as Montreal amounts to date only to some $35,000,000, we ought to look into this matter a little further in order to see if much better work cannot be done for much less money.

Those of us who know the ex-Minister of Public Works (Mr. Pugsley) know very well that where he expended any money on behalf of his department he did it first with an eye to the main chance of political advantage. However, the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Monk) has stated clearly that he intends to follow out the recommendations of the Transportation Commission. To that report the ex-minister never paid the slightest attention. I do not think he ever even knew of its existence until it was called to his attention, as it was, on several occasions.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Oh, oh.

Mr. CURRIE. That is the state of the case—that hon. gentleman never did any work along transportation lines, but he did it entirely for a political purpose and with a political view. If his friends were there to take dredging contracts there were large expenditures in that section. But if there were no friends of his to take the dredging contracts, the expenditure would be very limited. I hope the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Monk) will not rush into the making of contracts, but will wait until the engineers have given him a proper report. The ex-Minister of Public Works (Mr. Pugsley) ought to know—the reports of his department will show it, and so will those of the Department of Marine and Fisheries—that year after year the business of the country has been going to American ports, that the exports of Canada to too large an extent have been going through the ports of Portland, Boston, New York and Baltimore. These exports have been growing larger every year until, if I remember the figures correctly, about one-third, or perhaps forty per cent of the whole trade of Canada went through those ports. It is clear we must do something. But, the late Minister of Public Works (Mr. Pugsley), though these matters were called to his attention, did not care two straws which way the trade went so long as a political purpose and the ends of his party were served.

Mr. MONK. The hon. member (Mr. Pugsley) is aware no doubt—I mentioned it the other day—that we have started a considerable work on the west side of the harbour. That necessitates negotiations with the city of St. John. We have put these through.

Mr. PUGSLEY. The negotiations with the city of St. John had been carried through and completed under the late government. An agreement was executed with the city, the Canadian Pacific railway and the department.

Mr. MONK. It was completed the other day.

Mr. PUGSLEY. It was completed before the hon. gentleman (Mr. Monk) became minister.

Mr. MONK. It was not signed.

Mr. PUGSLEY. My deputy told me it was signed and completed and put on record.

Mr. MONK. We had to wait for the adhesion of the city of St. Jonn.

Mr. PUGSLEY. It seems a pity, when we were getting along so nicely that my hon. friend from North Simcoe (Mr. Currie) should so unexpectedly burst in. That hon. gentleman does not seem to have an eye to any section of the country except that in which he resides. But a great deal was done by the government, even for Collingwood; some six hundred thousand or seven hundred thousand dollars being spent to make an excellent harbour, which, I am glad to say has enabled a great business to be done through the port which otherwise would not be possible. My hon. friend does not do the late government justice, when he says we have not had regard to the report of the commission on transportation. I do not think he can point to a single harbour mentioned by that commission in which the late government has not been carrying on very important work in harbour improvements.

Mr. MONK. I could mention several.

Mr. PUGSLEY. But what makes me feel badly is this—that, though my hon. friend (Mr. Monk) feels, just as I do, that the work of harbour development should be carried on vigorously, yet he wants to stop the work until he can work out the whole problem of improving the harbours in the way suggested by the Transportation Commission. Think, for a moment, what that means, if it is all to be done at once. It means taking over a debt on the harbour of Montreal amounting, I think, to $18,000,000. It means buying out the Canadian Pacific railway's wharfs at Victoria harbour, and the Canadian Pacific railway wharfs at the harbour of Vancouver, which, I venture to say, would cost many millions of dollars. It means taking over the wharfs in the harbour of St. John, which would not be so very expensive, but which would cost quite a considerable sum. What I want the hon. gentleman (Mr. Monk) to do is to think out this great problem at his leisure, but in the meantime to go on with the work. Every dollar you spend in dredging a harbour or in building a wharf to be owned or controlled by the government is a work towards the nationalization of that harbour. That is what nationalization of harbours means —the vesting of harbour property in the Crown to be managed by the Crown. But in the last two or three years we have built a fine wharf in the harbour of St. John which is owned by the government. That is a step towards nationalizing that harbour. The wharfs we built at Quebec are steps in the direction of nationalizing that harbour. I am glad that the Minister of Public Works, from the examination and inquiry he has made, agrees that Courtenay bay is admirably adapted to afford terminal facilities for the Grand Trunk Pacific. I will give him the credit, or I will give it to the Minister of Marine and Fisheries (Mr. Hazen), whom our people united to return as minister, for the development that we hope will take place. I shall be happy, as a citizen of St. John, to see this great work go forward. I want to see Canadian trade drawn through Canadian channels. I think it is a reflection upon the country that we have so long allowed such a large proportion of the trade of our western country to pass through the ports of Buffalo, New York, and others. But it is only of recent years that even the great railway companies have awakened to the necessity of bringing the trade through Canadian channels. It was at the time I became Minister of Public Works—I do not claim undue credit for it — that the Canadian Pacific railway and the Grand Trunk railway came to the government and said they wanted to co-operate with us in building up these two ports on the Georgian bay. They offered to do their part. The Canadian Pacific railway offered to build a through line of railway direct from Victoria harbour to Montreal with a grade of 3-10 of one per cent so that they should be able to carry forty cars of grain where to-day they carry only twenty. The Grand Trunk railway said: If you will help us at Midland—or Tiffin; it is the same thing—we will be able to build a line with a grade of 4-10 of one per cent. And both companies are working away.

They believe that they will be able to draw the traffic away from Buffalo. We are helping, we are spending hundreds of thousands of dollars in that great work. The work which we are doing at Port Arthur and Fort William is all along the same line. Don't let my hon. friend imagine that this work which we have been doing is not largely along the line suggested by the Transportation Commission. It is entirely along the lines suggested by that commission, except that we have not gone to the extent of making all these ports free, taking over their indebtedness. But in the meantime, whenever we make an expenditure for dredging and building wharfs, we are doing that much towards the nationalization of our harbours.

Mr. MONK. My hon. friend knows that the works we have done on the great lakes in dredging to assist those great transportation companies, is absolutely contrary to what was recommended by the Transportation Commission. They wanted a free national port, and we have been expending millions to help the dockage of private companies.

Mr. CURRIE. In order to justify the House in supporting the Minister of Public Works in undertaking this enterprise, I am pleased to see that the hon. gentleman who held the portfolio of Public Works under the late government is calling attention to the harbour of Collingwood. That is an example of work in his department which shines very brightly in the annals of Ontario. It is quite true that a very large sum of money was expended by the government upon this harbour. It was to be put down to a depth of twenty feet. The harbour works continued for many years, until I had the honour to be elected for that riding; then it was discovered suddenly that the harbour was already finished and completed and nothing remained to be done. Month after month vessels were grounding in mid-channel where they had this twenty feet, or where they were supposed to have twenty feet of water, until at last absolutely no vessel on the lake would risk making the harbour of Collingwood, which had, according to the Minister of Public Works, a depth of twenty feet, and was completed. Several times I called the attention of the minister to this work, in the House. He caused an examination to be made of the harbour. and what did he discover? He found that what the government contractor who had been working at it for many years, ten or twelve years, had been doing was to dig holes along the bottom of the harbour where there was soft digging, where it was easy to do the work, and whenever he encountered a boulder he left it in the channel. The result was that a large sum of money had to be expended to remove those boulders. I think I am speaking by the book when I say that if the harbour is cleared now it is due to my efforts. There still remains a large amount of work to be done in connection with that harbour. The work already done, or proposed to be done by the late Minister of Public Works, to my mind, requires very close scrutiny from this side of the House and from the minister in charge of the department, and I think he is justified in going slow for a few months in order to see how things will turn out.

Mr. HAZEN. I think my hon. friend opposite (Mr. Pugsley), is certainly in error in stating his belief that the agreement between the city of St. John, the government and the Canadian Pacific had been finally determined upon and settled before the hon. gentleman went out of office. I may say to my hon. friend that within the last ten days, certainly within the last two weeks, difficulties arose between the city of St. John and the Canadian Pacific railway with regard to that agreement, which I am glad to say have now been settled, and the agreement has become a finality. I know that my hon. friend was candid in saying that the matter was finally determined, but he was in error.

Mr. PUGSLEY. The recorder of the city, Mr. Baxter, whom my hon. friend knows very well, sent me three printed copies of the agreement which had been executed by the Canadian Pacific railway and by the city, sent it to me to be executed by my department; and I asked my deputy to execute the work and my deputy told me that he had done so.

Mr. HAZEN. It was actually held up at the request of the city of St. John, my hon. friend was not aware of that fact—of course I am not suggesting that my hon. friend was not absolutely sincere in his statement to the House. It seems to me that this whole question of the development of our ocean ports is one that should be looked upon rather from a national than a local standpoint. I do not think that when a sum of money is put in the estimates for the development of the port of Montreal, for instance, or the port of St. John, or any other port, this House should regard it merely as an expenditure for the benefit of the locality in which that work is to be performed. I had the pleasure the other day of inspecting the great work that is being carried on in the harbour of Montreal by the Harbour Commissioners of that city. The hon. mem bers will remember that some years ago a sum of $6,000,000 was voted, and from time to time was placed at the disposal of the Harbour Commissioners for the purpose of developing the capacity of that port, and the Harbour Commissioners of that port had plans prepared for the development of the port that would ultimately involve an expenditure of some $18,000,000. I understand that the Harbour Commissioners of Montreal have from time to time paid interest on the moneys that have been advanced to the commission by the Dominion of Canada. But while the work carried on in the harbour of Montreal is a very great one, I could not help being impressed by this fact, from the opportunity I had of inspecting the work a short time ago, that for years to come it would be necessary to continue making expenditures in the port of Montreal in order to keep pace with the increasing commerce and trade of this country. Now what is true of the port of Montreal is also true of other great ports in Canada. I do not suppose any one in this House would for a moment think that we should view the work that is done in the harbour of Montreal from a local standpoint. I do not think that any hon. gentleman who considers the work that is being carried on in the harbour of St. John should view it from a local standpoint either, because it is a work which, while incidentally of benefit to St. John, as the money spent in Montreal is incidentally a benefit to the people of Montreal, is far reaching in its effects, because it is an expenditure which will benefit the trade and commerce of Canada as a whole. We have spent in Canada hundreds of millions of dollars for the purpose of constructing railways, railways in some cases running from Atlantic ports to Pacific ports, running through the western portions of Canada, and one of the main reasons for such construction was that these railways might carry the products of the country to the ports on both oceans, there to be shipped out to the markets of the world, whose people are anxious to obtain the products of our farms, our forests and our fisheries. It has always seemed to me that if it is the duty of this country to provide railway facilities, it is also equally its bounden duty to equip the ports to which the railways run, so that the commerce of the country can be quickly and speedily sent forward to the markets of the world. Therefore, I say that I think these expenditures on the ports of the country should not be viewed from a local standpoint, but rather from a national standpoint. I sincerely hope that this House will be generous in voting moneys for the purpose of equipping our ports throughout the country, so that we may be able to compete successfully with our competitors for the trade of the world to-day.

Mr. PUGSLEY. Under our constitutional rule this House cannot be generous or otherwise until the government asks it to be.

Mr. HAZEN. I have every belief that, in the administration of the Public Works Department, my hon. and highly respected friend who sits in front of me, the Minister of Public Works, will not be backward in asking for generous expenditures for the carrying out of necessary public works in the country, including the development of our ports. I am sorry that I was not in the House when my hon. friend (Mr. Pugsley) first addressed it, but from what I have heard since I came in, I judge that my hon. friend was addressing himself to a little criticism of the expenditure of this sum in the balance of the estimates for 1911-12 for carrying out the work in the port of St. John. I understand from what I have gathered that my hon. friend had the idea that a portion of it ought to be set aside for the work on the Courtenay bay side, and that it should not all be spent on the western side of the harbour.

Mr. PUGSLEY. What I said was that of this amount $500,000 was included in the Supplementary Estimates. I asked from my colleagues of the late government that this amount should be set aside for Courtenay bay and I was expressing the hope that the Minister of Public Works would still keep that $500,000 available so as to let a contract this fall in order to do as much work as possible at Courtenay bay during the coming winter.

Mr. HAZEN. I am very much obliged to my hon. friend for telling me what he said, but from information I have received I doubt very much if that can be done and at the same time have the necessary work carried on, on the western side of the harbour. My information is that when the change of government took place a very large sum of money was owing to the Maritime Dredging Company.

Mr. PUGSLEY. About a quarter of this sum.

Mr. HAZEN. That is the company in which Mr. McAvity and Mr. Moore were interested. I understood that a quarter of a million dollars was due them.

Mr. PUGSLEY. My information is that it is not half that.

Mr. HAZEN. A very large sum of money in addition to that has to be spent there. This contract is under way and a great deal of work will have to be done. The work will have to be continued not only up to the 31st March next but for a long time after that. Provision will have to be made for docks and wharfs and further dredging will have to be done towards the western shore of the harbour.

Mr. PUGSLEY. This money cannot be used after the 31st March.

Mr. HAZEN. I understand that, but the money is being spent on the western side of the harbour preparatory to the construction of docks and wharfs in order to accommodate the increased business which will be done there, and only a few days ago a contract was entered into for the construction of a wharf here at a cost of about $740,000. There is an immense amount of work to be done at Courtenay bay. The lowest tender received, that from Messrs. Norton, Griffith & Co., was for an amount between $7,000,000 and $8,000,000. When such a very large amount of money is required to prosecute this work I do no think it would be advisable until a contract is entered into for the work to go ahead and spend $500,000 when, as we know, the work will involve an expenditure of $7,000,000 or $8,000,000. I entirely agree as to the necessity for carrying out that work at Courtenay bay, although I do not say according to the plans that have been prepared. These plans may be perfectly right and correct if they are looked into, but I believe the time has come when that work has to be done at Courtenay bay, and it may be possible by some changes in the plans to afford greater accommodation at little, if any, greater cost. A beginning was made by the joint efforts of the Department of Public Works, the provincial government and the city of St. John, and the boring that was undertaken demonstrated that the work is perfectly feasible.

Mr. PUGSLEY. That was done entirely by the Public Works Department.

Mr. HAZEN. All I can tell my hon. frined is that the government of the province of New Brunswick was asked by the Department of Public Works to join in the work with the result that the Public Works Department agreed to become responsible for one third of the cost, the city of St. John for one third, and the provincial government for another third.

Mr. PUGSLEY. They were never called upon to pay their share.

Mr. HAZEN. They stand prepared to do so whenever they are called upon. Perhaps the Dominion government decided that they would not call upon them to pay.

Mr. PUGSLEY. The government and the city never paid.

Mr. HAZEN. This survey demonstrated the fact that it is possible to make a safe harbour there. The work involves not only dredging and the building of wharfs but the building of a dry dock. In view of that would it be wise to proceed with such a small expenditure until the whole matter was clearly considered and a general plan worked out?

Mr. PUGSLEY. A thorough and complete plan was arrived at after three years' study. The dry dock will be built under the Dry Dock Subsidy Act of 1910.

Mr. HAZEN. While that is true my hon. friend knows that the building of the dry dock is a part of the Norton Griffith Company's tender. There is a general impression amongst those who are contractors that the aid which is offered to these dry docks will not be sufficient in its present form to build that dry dock standing alone, and therefore, when it is coupled with the dredging and building of wharfs in Ccurtenay bay, the whole thing should be made one work. I think this is a matter which ought to have very careful consideration at the hand of my hon. friend in front of me. At any rate when the Grand Trunk Pacific will come into the city of St. John it could not find a better place than Ccurtenay bay. It will come into St. John over the St. John Valley railway, a work which was made possible by the public spirit, courage and generosity of the local government of New Brunswick. But, I sincerely hope that when the Grand Trunk Pacific is in a postition to do business in the east, when the time has come for freight from western Canada to be carried over the Grand Trunk Pacific, across the St. Lawrence at Quebec, and be carried down to St. John, the Department of Public Works will have taken such steps that the facilities will be ready to handle all the freight that will come over that road to the port of St. John. I will not say that my hon. friend is evincing undue anxiety and hurry on this work, but I will say to my hon. friend that the work has not gone on as quickly in the past as my hon. friend led the citizens of St. John to believe it would. In 1908 my hon. friend came down to take part in the local elections, and he held out the hope in very positive terms to the people that within two years we would find ships of 10,000 tons sailing into Courtenay bay and finding docks there ready to receive them.

Mr. PUGSLEY. Not at all. My hon. friend is not quite original enough. He is quoting what he saw in the St. John 'Standard.' I saw that some time ago. I looked up carefully what I said in 1908 and there is not a word of truth in that statement.

Mr. HAZEN. My hon. friend is reported during the campaign as saying so not only in the 'Standard' but in that good staunch Liberal paper, the St. John 'Globe.'

Mr. PUGSLEY. What I said was that we must get ready for the Grand Trunk Pacific.

Mr. HAZEN. Yes, and I think that my hon. friend with that optimism that has always distinguished him, held out the alluring hope to the people of St. John that within two years we would find ships of 10,000 tons sailing into Courtenay bay and their cargoes being received at the harbour there.

Mr. PUGSLEY. No; what I did say was that he must go on as rapidly as possible.

Mr. HAZEN. Any way that was the impression that he left in the minds of the people of the community. I am satisfied that when my hon. friend (Mr. Monk), who has only been in office for a few short weeks, has grappled with this and other problems he will do so in a way that will satisfy not only the aspirations of the city of St. John, but will also satisfy the aspirations of the country which wants these great works to go on.

My hon. friend says we brought down the estimates of the hon. gentlemen. I ask what other course was open to us. At the last session parliament voted five-twelfths of the estimates of the year and what could we do except to ask for the other seven-twelfths.

Mr. PUGSLEY. I say you have done the right thing.

Mr. HAZEN. We have done the only thing.

Harbours and Rivers—Nova Scotia, $763,679.85.

Mr. MACLEAN (Halifax). I would ask the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Monk) if it was through his efforts that the dredge 'Northumberland' was directed to proceed from the La Have river to Lunenburg some time ago? I think the directions were given when the hon. gentleman had the pleasure of attending a banquet tendered to his leader at Halifax. I understand that my hon. friend there had a very uncomfortable time and that many delegations were sent to meet him from the county of Lunenburg. Was the reason for directing the dredge to go to Lunenburg to render some assistance to his political friends in that county at the time of the local election then on?

Mr. MONK. I could not answer exactly the question of my hon. friend. I am quite prepared to say that there were absolutely no political considerations in the matter. It was urged on me that it was necessary to make a transfer of some dredge, but if my hon. friend will put a question on the order paper I will look up the facts; I have not the advantage of having my officer with me.

Mr. MACLEAN (Halifax). Is it intended that this dredge should get to work before next May or June?

Mr. MONK. I think so.

Mr. MACLEAN (Halifax). The minister only thinks so.

Mr. MONK. I am quite sure of it.

Harbours and Rivers, Ont., $1,126,457.72.

Mr. McCOIG. Has the minister received any request to change the location of the harbour to Two Creeks at Wheatley?

Mr. MONK. I do not think there has been any request so far.

Mail subsidies and steamship subventions, $198,663.82.

Mr. PUGSLEY. For some years a subsidy was given for a steamship service between the cities of St. John and Halifax, and the Windward Islands. The contract expired some months ago while the late government was in office, and the contractors, in consequence, I think, of the British government withdrawing the aid which they had been giving to the service, declined to continue it in the same state of efficiency as before. In consequence of that, and in order to prevent a discontinuance of the service, the late Minister of Trade and Commerce made a temporary agreement, as I understand, with Messrs. Pickford and Black. That agreement has been thought by the merchants of St. John who do business with the West Indies to be very unfair to that city. Under it, if I remember rightly, the city of Halifax gets a service every eleven days while the city of St. John gets a service every twenty-two days. Quite a large trade was being built up between Canada and the West Indies through the port of St. John, and a number of our enterprising merchants were taking a great interest in it. This decreased and comparatively unsatisfactory service was a cause of very great disappointment to the merchants of St. John. They made representations to the late Minister of Trade and Commerce, which were received very sympathetically by him, but the difficulty which confronted him was as to what could be done in the meantime. I would ask my hon. friend whether this temporary service is still going on, and whether any steps will be taken in the near future to improve it. It does seem to me that the present time, when we are seeking to develop trade between Canada and the West Indies, is not a time to make the service less efficient either for passengers or for freight.

Mr. FOSTER (Halifax). No change has been made in the temporary or permanent services provided for in these estimates. Whatever arrangements have been made have been time arrangements, and no change can be made until that time runs out. I think all these services run out at the end of the present fiscal year. The Jamaica service and the Windward Island service are both in a temporary condition.

Mr. PUGSLEY. Would my hon. friend be good enough to keep that in mind?

Mr. FOSTER. Yes. With regard to the services to the West India Islands, my view shortly stated is that it is better to have good services and pay more money for them than to have poor services and pay quite a large proportion of what you would pay for good services. I propose to give a broad and sympathetic consideration to the whole question of our trade with the West India Islands, and South America, not excluding other countries, of course. For some of these services we had hopes that the British government might still continue the aid it gave before. That hope has pretty well dwindled; but there are some negotiations on now out of which some good results may perhaps come for the improvement of the services both to Jamaica and the Windward group and to British Guiana.

Mr. MACLEAN (Halifax). The service, however, will continue as at present until the end of the present year?

Mr. FOSTER. Yes.

Mr. PUGSLEY. When it was hoped that an arrangement might be made by which the British government would give large assistance in conjunction with Canada and the West India Islands, the idea was to have a service in the summer season between Montreal and the West Indies via St. John, and in the winter season direct to St. John, and to give Halifax a direct service all the year round, so that there would be the two services. I talked the matter over with a good many prominent business men of St. John, and they felt that that would be a fairly satisfactory service for the three ports. It would take the place of the present service to the Windward Islands and would give Halifax and St. John each an independent service. The only disadvantage, so far as the port of St. John is concerned, would be that the point of departure in summer would be Montreal. Would my hon. friend give consideration to that aspect of the case?

Mr. FOSTER. Yes I have gone over the matter with a good deal of interest. I have had some conversations with gentlemen both from Montreal and the maritime provinces who are interested in the service.

Mr. MACLEAN (Halifax). Who were the gentlemen from the maritime provinces?

Mr. FOSTER. I think nearly all the steamship men in one way or another had some communication with me.

Mr. CLARKE (Essex). There was an item in the estimates last session for a small service between Pelee Island and the mainland in the county of Essex but I do not see it here this year.

Mr. FOSTER. There has been no change made in the estimates. If that item is not here I do not know why, but will get the information.

Mr. MACLEAN (Halifax). Would the proposed steamship service from Montreal to the West Indies mean the elimination of the service now existing between Halifax and the West Indies?

Mr. FOSTER. If the service in the summer time commenced at Montreal, and then went from Halifax and St. John alternately, it would not be an elimination, but an extension of the present service.

Mr. MACLEAN (Halifax). Would it be an additional service?

Mr. FOSTER. No, not in the way of having the present service plus another one.

Mr. PUGSLEY. What the commissioners recommended was that in place of the present service there should be a direct service from Halifax all the year round both winter and summer, not going to St. John; and in addition that there should be another line from Montreal to the West Indies in the summer calling at St. John, and in the winter that line would go exclusively from St. John. So that in the winter there would be two independent services—one from Halifax, and the other from St. John.

Mr. FOSTER. I am not prepared to say that I would accept that proposition, or some other one as I have not given the matter sufficient examination.

Mr. PUGSLEY. We have done more this evening than we succeeded in doing in five weeks during last session; and as there are some hon. members absent who would probably have something to say on some of the items, I think the committee should now rise.

Mr. WHITE (Leeds). We have done very well, but I had hoped we would get through to-night as the matter is very urgent. However, I shall not insist if my hon. friend objects.

Some resolutions reported.

Mr. FOSTER moved the adjournment of the House.

Mr. MACLEAN (Halifax). When the motion is made to-morrow to go into Supply some hon. gentlemen on this side propose discussing the matter of the dismissal of officials.

Motion agreed to, and the House adjourned at 10.40 p.m.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

FRIDAY, DECEMBER 1, 1911.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

PRIVATE BILLS—FIRST READINGS.

Mr. SPEAKER. I have the honour to inform the House that the Clerk has laid on the table the first report of the examiner of petitions for Private Bills, and that in pursuance of rule 99 the following Private Bills are read for the first time.

Bill (No. 10), respecting the British Colonial Fire Insurance Company.—Mr. Coderre.

Bill (No. 11), respecting the Canadian Birkbeck Investment and Savings Company, and to change its name to 'the Canadian Mortgage Investment Company.' —Mr. Osler.

Bill (No. 12), respecting the Erie, London and Tillsonburg Railway Company.—Mr. Clarke (Essex).

Bill (No. 13), to incorporate the Liverpool-Manitoba Assurance Company.—Mr. Bickerdike.

Bill (No. 14), to incorporate the North Arm Bridge and Railway Company.—Mr. Stevens.

Bill (No. 15), to incorporate the Vancouver Life Insurance Company of Vancouver, B. C.—Mr. Stevens.

Bill (No. 16), respecting certain patents of Thomas Wadge.—Mr. Aikins.

I would like to say with regard to the laying of these Bills on the table that to my mind there is a divergency between the rules which ought to be removed.

Rule 48 says :—

> Every Bill is introduced upon motion for leave specifying the title of the Bill; or upon motion to appoint a committee to prepare and bring it in.

These Bills are not introduced on motion for leave, but under rule 99 which provides that :—

> All private Bills are introduced on petition, and after such petitions have been favourably reported upon by the examiner of petitions or by the Committee on Standing Orders, such Bills shall be laid on the table of the House by the Clerk and shall be deemed to have been read a first time, and to have been ordered for a second reading when so laid upon the table, and recorded in Votes and Proceedings as having been so read.

This, in my judgment, is the reverse of the other rule which provides that they shall be read three separate times. It appears to me that these two rules are rather contradictory and confusing.

DOMINION ELECTIONS ACT.

Mr. A. C MACDONELL (Toronto) moved for leave to introduce Bill (No 17), to amend the Dominion Elections Act.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. Explain ?

Mr. MACDONELL. I have always understood that the explanation should be made upon the first reading.

Mr. SPEAKER. Looking up the rules, it seems to me that the explanation may take place either when the Bill is introduced or on the first reading—I think perhaps preferably on the motion for leave to introduce it.

Mr. MACDONELL. This Bill is similar to the one I had the honour of introducing during the last two sessions. The first part provides for the abolition of the provision requiring a deposit of $200, and proposes to substitute therefor a requisition signed by at least 100 electors in the electoral district in which the candidate offers himself for election. It seems to me that the cash deposit should be abolished now that the qualification is removed, but that no one should offer himself as candidate unless there be some demand for his services by the people of the riding. Further, the Bill asks that the hours for polling be lengthened. On two previous occasions when I introduced a Bill to increase the facilities for polling, I desired to have election day proclaimed a holiday, but the House looked upon that proposition as too radical. In order, therefore, to meet the views of the House, I have asked that the polling hours be extended and the polls kept open from eight in the morning until six at night. At present the hours are from nine to five, and those hours are found inadequate, especially in large city districts. I further asked that the House adopt a principle which has been adopted by the Ontario Legislatude. The Bill copies the Ontario law, which provides that during the hours of polling any elector in a city or town shall be given two hours, from 12 until 2 in the day, during which he may poll his vote without suffering any loss of pay or wages. This has been found to work satisfactorily. There is a further provision requiring the returning officer to transmit to the Clerk of the Crown in Chancery on nomination day the names and addresses of the various candidates so that the work in the office of the Clerk of the Crown in Chancery may be facilitated. The Clerk informs me that this is very desirable.

Mr. MACLEAN (York). If I might make a suggestion, it would be this. The half holiday on Saturday is gradually becoming the rule in Ontario. In France the elections are held on Sunday, when the people are free, but I would not ask that that should be done here ; but I think that on Saturdays, when a half holiday is the rule, especially in our cities and towns, it would be a good thing to have the elections. If we had a provision requiring the elections to be held on a Saturday and giving every man an opportunity to absent himself from his work in order to poll his vote, I think that would be an improvement in the law. The fact that men cannot get away from their factories or offices increases the cost of elections, as the candidate has, in some way or other, to supply carriages to take these men to vote.

We should relieve the candidates of great responsibilities if there were a holiday or half-holiday on election day in order that every one could get out and vote. If it is a duty to vote—and I believe it is—every facility ought to be given to a man to record his vote. Under this plan men would vote without loss of time to themselves, and without inconveniencing employers. I am confident that Ontario would be prepared to have her elections on Saturday, and I believe that every province would equally favour that idea.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the first time.

SUPPLY—PUBLIC OWNERSHIP.

Hon. W. T. WHITE (Minister of Finance) moved that the House go into Committee of Supply.

Mr. W. F. MACLEAN (South York). I was not able, for business reasons, to be in the House when the debate on the address was on, last week. But I am here now, and I intend to take the occasion of this motion to make a few remarks upon some of the questions that were brought up in that debate, and still more to refer to some questions that were not brought up. A good deal of the time of the House was taken up in discussing the question of reciprocity, and the question of Nationalism—I believe it is called—in connection with the province of Quebec. These two questions, to my mind, were settled in the elections, and settled in the right way, and the people are pretty well rid of both now. As to the question of reciprocity in trade, we were discussing in this House and in this country, something that could not be accomplished in this parliament If we wish to get freer trade with the people of the United States, it must come from the people of the United States, they alone have the right to give it, and if they desire closer trade relations with us, and if they wish to take down barriers, let them begin and take them down. But until they do so, it is futile for us to devote attention to the question. We should be much better occupied in discussing questions that we can deal with. There are grievances in this country in connection with trade, and they can be rectified, and rectified in this House; and they should be rectified right away. To some of these I wish to draw public attention. The people of the west who were said to be the moving spirits in regard to closer trade with the United States have grievances which have been brought up in this House, and they may have grievances in regard to trade. The tariff, may be in some respects, objectionable to them. In whatever respect the tariff may be objectionable to the people of the west I hope these objections will be stated in this House and that this House will try to meet the views of the people of the west, and give them relief. They may have grievances against the tariff, and they may be desirous of obtaining the American market. Well, let us try to cure any grievances they may have in regard to the tariff. But, if they wish the markets of the United States, I can only tell them that they must allow the Amercian people and the American Congress to give them entrance to that market—that this cannot be secured by way of this House.

The people of the west have great grievances and to these grievances I wish to call attention. In doing so I do not think I am wasting the time of the House, because these are matters that the House can deal with. What are those grievances? The grievances of the people of the west are in connection with the railway situation. They have great grievances in regard to every feature of the service that the railways give. And these are equally grievances of the people of the east—they are the grievances of the people of all Canada.

There are grievances of the people that we can cure at once. The people of the west, and the people of the east also, are suffering to-day from excessive express charges. The remedy is within the power of the government and of parliament; it is simply the establishment of a parcel post system that will bring the express companies to time. We do not even need legislation from this House. An order in council, or even a direction by the Postmaster General, can put in force in Canada to-day a first class parcel post system that will relieve the people of the excessive charges they are now paying. It is true, the Railway Commission took up this question of express charges. But they were very long in dealing with it and their dealing with it has not been very satisfactory. Now a great new principle in economics has been developed in my own province of Ontario and in my own city of Toronto, and in this city of Ottawa also; that applies wherever there are great private corporations exercising franchises in the way of public services. The only way to compel those corporations to give the people fair treatment and reasonable rates is by public competition—competition of the state. In the province of Ontario, and in the city of Toronto a monopoly existed in the supply of electrical energy. The rates imposed by the private companies exercising public franchises were exorbitant. The very day the province of Ontario was able to carry out its hydro-electric power policy and the municipalities were thus enabled to supply electrical energy, that very day the rates were cut in two. And where, formerly, you could get no fair treatment from any of these private companies, as soon as competition came in there was a very pleasant change. The same thing will happen in the case of the express companies the moment the government inaugurates a parcel post system. Opponents of this idea say that the parcel post system is in the interests of the large merchants of the cities. There may be something in that. At any rate the express companies always speak through some one who says he speaks for the country storekeeper. But it would be to the benefit of the people of all Canada to have express rates reduced, as could be done by the establishment of the parcel post system. I have said in this House before, but it is no harm to repeat it, that Germany controls the parcel post system the express system, and the railways, and there the people get good service at low rates. In Great Britain they have a splendid parcel post system. And some one representing the government of the United States announced yesterday that an arrangement had been made between Great Britain and the United States for the extension of the parcel post system to parcels between the two countries. But to-day the people of the United States are in the same position as ourselves and have to pay exorbitant express rates. The other day the Railway Commission intimated to the express companies that they proposed to overhaul their charges. That very day 'the coon came down' and the companies submitted to a great reduction in their tolls. And the same thing would happen in Canada, if the Postmaster General should proclaim that the parcel post system was to be extended on lines already worked out by the officials of the department. The people of the west want these reductions, as do the people of the east.

There is another thing where state competition can bring the greatest monopoly in the world to time, and that is in the matter of the telegraph service, and by that I mean both cable messages and land-line messages. In regard to cables, as I said, the greatest monopoly in the world was centred in England. According to statements made in the British House of Commons recently this great monopoly in England has passed under the control of the telegraph companies in the United States, private companies of enormous capitalization and of the greatest influence. In regard to express companies and telegraph companies also the Senate of the United States have overridden the rights of the people of that country, and this same monopoly now proposes to regulate the cable rates of Great Britain and of Canada. This government must have information in regard to the matter, because the previous government had information, and the late Postmaster General (Mr. Lemieux) stated in this House, in answer to me in the last session of the late parliament, that this government was ready to get a reduction of the cable rates. Well, then, why does not somebody do it?

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. Hear, hear.

Mr. MACLEAN (York). Why did not the right hon. gentleman do it when he had power? I hope this government will do it now and that, in consequence of the mere announcement to the world at large that this government of Canada proposes to follow in the line of government ownership and put the state into active competition with the cable companies, the cable tolls to-morrow will come down one-half. I believe, perhaps, the mere statement of the case here to-day will have the same effect on those companies, those American companies that now control the cable tolls and control more or less the telephone tolls in this country. The Canadian Pacific railway is a very rich corporation, it is making enormous profits out of its franchises in the west and in the east, and it ought to reduce the telegraph tolls that are charged in the west and here in the east. I say that the telegraph tolls in Canada to-day are exorbitant, and especially are they exorbitant in the east, and if they do not reduce them, and if the Railway Commission in this country is not more active in securing a reduction, then I say that this government representing the state ought to declare that it is the duty of the state to embark, not only in the cable business, but in the telegraph business, and to give the people lower telegraph tolls.

Is there anything else into which state competition can be carried in order to secure benefits to the people? I believe the time has come when, if we are not to have complete government ownership of the railways of this country, we should at least have state-owned railways in competition with private-owned corporations. That alone would be very effective in reducing the freight rates in this country. The freight rates are exorbitant, and the people of the west feel them to be exorbitant, but no substantial effort has yet been made to reduce them. Take the question of passenger rates. I have brought that matter up time and again in this House, but I am talking now about the economic conditions that come home to every man, woman and child in this country, conditions on which the progress and development of the country depend. There is a grievance, a great grievance, in regard to the passenger rates in this country, and I am prepared to show, as I have tried to show in this House before, that a reduction in the passenger rates will not only increase the convenience to the people and the service to the people, but it will in the end increase the revenue to the companies. It is like the reduction in postage; the greater the reduction in postage, the greater has been the convenience to the public and the profits to the post office. So the great Canadian Pacific railway which can afford to pay enormous dividends, and to cut melons and distribute them amongst its shareholders, is in duty bound by its charter, and by the law of fair dealing to the people, to give the people from one end of the country to the other a two-cent a mile passenger rate.

Mr. KNOWLES. What about a reduction in the tariff? Would not that bring the same effect?

Mr. MACLEAN (York). I am dealing now with the railways, and if the hon. gentleman will give me a little support in this House in regard to the railway grievances of the people of the west, we will be more likely to get relief. I say that we cannot deal with the tariff now. We will get relief in regard to the tariff when the Democratic party come into power in the United States, because I believe they will then take down their bars, and when they do that we will thank them for it. But we cannot do that ourselves because it is like trying to lift yourself up with your boot straps, you cannot get relief in any other way.

Mr. KNOWLES. I will support the hon. gentleman in every reasonable way to get reduced rates if he will support me in getting a reduction of the tariff in the interest of the western farmers.

Mr. MACLEAN (York). I said I was prepared to discuss the grievances of the western farmers, and I am, because they have grievances, and we have always had them. I will help him to get rid of those grievances. But it is not through the Congress of the United States that relief is to come from telegraph tolls, it is through the parliament of Canada. Let the hon. gentleman state his case, and it will be dealt with in this House, and when he makes out a good case he will get support. The people of the west want these reductions, and there is a way of getting them, and you can get them to-morrow. We can get lower express rates by putting a parcel-post system in competition with the express companies. We have a right to ask that great Canadian Pacific Railway Company, with its enormous surpluses, that it should now reduce its tariff both on telegraphs, on express and on passenger rates. Now the very peculiar doctrine has been set up in this country that if the Canadian Pacific Railway Company, by reason of its successive surpluses, were compelled to reduce its tariff, the other railways might suffer. Well, they take that chance in business. We have not guaranteed anybody in this country that they shall be free from competition. The Canadian Pacific Railway Company, by its charter, by the railway law, and by what has happened in other places, is bound to give the people of this country great reductions in the charges. One way of bringing this about is to show that the Canadian Pacific railway is in this cable monopoly. It is a cable monopoly that is keeping up these excessive rates, and making even the press rates excessive. They are a party to it. Well now, let us in this House, get down to business, to what I call practical business, in dealing with the grievances of the people; let this House undertake now to get lower express rates, to get lower freight rates and to get better railway service of all kinds. A great corporation when it gets a franchise, undertakes the responsibility of giving a service, and this House has a right to define what that service should be. The Railway Commission also has a duty to do in regard to the matter, but it does not do its duty.

And here I beg to call the attention of the Prime Minister to something with which he agreed with me when I brought it up before in this House, and that is that hitherto we have had no provision in Canada for the enforcement of Federal laws. We pass Federal laws but we do not enforce them, we make no provision for their enforcement. I pointed out before, and I point out now, that in every great Federal law passed in the public interest in the United States, there is a clause that it is the duty of the Attorney General to enforce that law, and money is voted in supply for that purpose. Now, after a great deal of trouble we have had some enforcement of railway law in this country, and I say it is the duty of the government forthwith to provide for the enforcement of the Railway Act in this country by the Attorney General of the day and by his officers, and that money ought to be given him to enforce our Federal laws. If the bringing of the railways to time was a duty specifically imposed upon the government, as it ought to be, I say that the grievances which the people suffer to-day from the railways would be rectified, even by that means.

But, in some way, whether by this House, or through the government undertaking the enforcement of federal law or by any of its departments entering into practical competition with the railways the thing must be done. The people of this country and the people of the province of Ontario in particular are altogether in favour of what is called progressive government, and progressive government is all in the direction of regulating the corporations that do exercise public franchises in this country. There is only one way to do it, and that is by making laws, and when you have made them, enforce them. If you are not able to bring them to time in that way you have the right to compete with them, and state competition is the new doctrine that I preach here to-day, and have preached here before. It is recognized by the people of Ontario, and especially by the municipalities that public competition is the only way to bring these corporations to time. The rates have been cut in two for electricity all through Ontario.

An hon. MEMBER. It has been the same with school books.

Mr. MACLEAN (South York). That was not by competition, but the price was reduced, and the state brought the publishers to time.

Mr. COCHRANE. It was by competition.

Mr. MACLEAN (South York). My hon. friend here (Mr. Cochrane), who ought to know, says that they forced competition and reduction. Here we are spending the time of this House—I do not say it is being spent wastefully—but taking up too much of the time with the discussion of constitutional questions—lawyers' issues—when it is the grievances of the people, and the rectification of these grievances in every direction, within the limitation of the powers of this parliament, to which we should be directing our attention.

So, I desire to say in connection with this motion to go into Supply, and after having read the debate that occurred in the House last week, that the immediate duty of parliament—and probably the government has a programme in that respect—is to give the people relief in regard to express charges, telegraph and cable tolls, and railway freight and passenger rates, either by active competition, or by an insistence on a reduction of the charges before the Railway Commission. It is necessary at these hearings that the rights of the people shall be stated before that commission not by a single man, but by the state, represented by the legal department, or represented by the best counsel that can be obtained for the purpose. Why should a farmer have to come himself before the Railway Commission or send a lawyer to have his rights respected? If he has a grievance the state ought to see that the cure of that grievance is brought about. In that way, and in that way only we will be doing the people of this country a substantial service. We would be better occupied, I think, in discussing these economic questions rather than these constitutional questions that appear to take up so much of the time of the House, or discussing the respective merits of the parties. It is all very well to discuss the respective merits and records of the parties, but in the meantime it is now known to be the fact that relief with regard to trade, and the widening of markets, especially in connection with the United States, is not within our jurisdiction, and that if we leave that to the Americans they may do something. But there are some things that can be done, and the people are looking for relief with regard to these railway charges and telegraph and cable tolls.

One thing more I wish to say and that is in the progressive platform of the people of Canada—which I am glad to see was mentioned in the opening speeches in the debate on the address—in addition to these things which I have enumerated, is the regulation of the capitalization of companies. The United States have been trying to do it, they are doing it, and they are having great battles over it. The commission which was appointed to deal with this question is about to make its report in the United States, and I have no doubt what the finding of that commission will be. It will be that the capitalization of public companies is a matter of extreme concern to the public, that the tariffs imposed upon these companies must necessarily be based upon the capitalization, and that therefore control of capitalization in the interest of the public is absolutely necessary. We must come to that in this country. I ask the people of the west, I ask the members here from the west, irrespective of party, whether they do not think it was a wrong, a crime against the people of this country that the great Canadian Pacific railway should increase its capitalization as it did increase it by distributing free stock among its shareholders. A great wrong was committed by the Bell Telephone company which did the same thing. How much longer are these abuses to be allowed to continue? The country and parliament are entitled to an early declaration of policy on the part of the government with regard to these questions. I believe in a progressive programme in that respect, and I hope it will soon be produced. I would like to hear an early statement as to what is to be done with these great questions that come home to everybody in the country. Constitutional grievances are all right, and men may spend their time over them and lawyers may like to argue them, but the people are asking for something progressive on the lines of relief which I have indicated.

They have in United States politics what they call insurgency. There will be a great many insurgents in this country from either of the parties if something is not done with these questions, because all I can make out of the charge of being an insurgent in the United States is that the man who is guilty of insurgency is the man who is seeking progressive legislation in the way of the regulation of companies, the regulation of their capitalization, the regulation of their charges, and compelling them to give good service.

A great many taunts at different times have been thrown at this proposition of public ownership. The sentiment in favour of public ownership is growing steadily all the world over. There is no recession from public ownership in any portion of the world where it has been tried. It is advancing every day, and until we get public ownership I want to see public competition as against the great corporations. There is the key to the position, there is the obligation, and it is up to this House to make a step in that direction. Neither the Conservatives nor any other party in this country can claim any great credit now with regard to reciprocity or things of that kind. That is settled and past, but these questions are here, and must be settled, and they can only be settled in that way, because the demand of the people is for progressive legislation in regard to these great questions which we can settle ourselves. I hope that before long, I hope even before this House rises, if there is to be an adjournment, certainly at a very early date, we will have a declaration along the line of progress. The progress that has been made in Ontario is phenomenal. While the western part had public competition with regard to electrical energy, and the services that went with it, the east had not, but now the Hydro-Electric system is to be extended from one end of the province to the other. The city of Winnipeg has gone into public ownership, and the day that its wires began to conduct the energy that day the old line companies said: We are going to compete for this business now and we are going to cut the rates. They did cut the rates. The people of the United States are almost in rebellion at the condition of things, yet, apparently, they have not the means to get public competition that we have here.

We have the necessary legislation to hand for the purpose, and if the announcement is made in this House to-day that Canada proposes to lead in binding the empire by cheap cable tolls, the monopoly, whether in New York or in London, will surrender in a day. They are willing to surrender now, but if they reduce their tolls, they want to make a term that there shall be no competition from the state. I am opposed to any such arrangement. Some years ago an infamous agreement in a similar respect was made by the province of Ontario with regard to hydro-electric power, and in connection with which the province actually surrendered its sovereignty, but such a surrender by the state to private corporations must never be made in this country again. We should assert that we are imperial by proving it, and not by talking it, and for imperial reasons and for business reasons we should at once declare that we will have cable tolls cut in two even if we have to build a cable of our own. Why, it only requires a few million dollars to build a cable and the Canadian business alone at half the rates now charged would support that cable. I give the late government credit for encouraging the Marconi system which afforded some slight relief, and the money was well spent in that direction, but it would have been ten times better spent in the interest of Canada and the empire if the government had laid an Atlantic cable. I recommend to the governor that they should tell this cable monopoly that they intend to cut the rates in two by building a cable between Canada and the mother country, and if we have our own cable we must have our own land lines and the post office can take them over and do what they did in England namely, double the number of words for the existing price. These are practical questions that come home to every man in this country. If the government wants to show it is progressive it will make an early pronouncement in favour of all these things. I sympathize with the people of the west; they sought to get relief in the reciprocity proposal, but that is not whence their great relief is to come. It is the excessive charges by private corporations that causes most of the trouble, and I give credit to the Winnipeg 'Free Press' for being able to show—notwithstanding the statement of the late Minister of Railways, and no doubt he was sincere in making the statement—that the freight charges in western Canada are to-day heavier than they are in the western states. I do not seek to get into any squabble with hon. gentlemen from the west whether they are Liberals or Conservatives; I shall be glad to join with them on every occasion in their attempt to get relief for their people in the directions I have suggested. I again warn the government that the Canadian Pacific railway may in a few days endeavour to make a further issue of free stock to its shareholders. That to my mind is an abomination and should not be allowed. The sooner we have a law regulating the issue of securities by these federal companies the better it will be for the people of Canada. We want such a law in the province of Ontario, and I call Sir James Whitney's attention to the fact that such an announcement ought to be in his progressive platform, and that I am sorry to see it absent therefrom. There ought to be a regulation in all the provinces with regard to the securities issued by these corporations. I make these statements to-day absolutely in the public interest, and so as to give the government an early opportunity to say to the people that they intend to effect reforms on the lines now indicated by me.

Mr. EMMERSON (Westmoreland). My hon. friend from York (Mr. Maclean) semi-occasionally favours this House with his presence, and it is notable that when he so favours the House it is fully advertised next morning in some papers that are published not far from Toronto.

Mr. MACLEAN (York). Is that a crime?

Mr. EMMERSON. I am glad the hon. gentleman does come semi-occasionally because he comes in a breezy way, but if he takes his own utterances seriously he is very much like Dundreary's peacocks in that he flocks all by himself alone in that respect.

Mr. MACLEAN (York). Hear, hear.

Mr. EMMERSON. My hon. friend (Mr. Maclean) has evidently been doing the Rip Van Winkle act for some time, because he announces that the remedy for grievances suffered by the people in eastern and western Canada with respect to trade relations with the United States is only to be found in the United States Congress, forgetful that there has been for some time on the statute-books of the United States a provision whereby relief can be afforded to the people of Canada in the west and in the east contingent on the sole condition that the parliament of Canada shall do its part in the undertaking. When he states that this parliament has no power to grant this relief the hon. gentleman is forgetful of the main fact that the people of the United States have enacted a law by which the people of Canada can have free entrance into the markets of the United States provided the parliament of Canada will afford the people of the United States like privileges in Canada.

My hon. friend (Mr. Maclean) is to-day much agonized with respect to economic conditions, but since when have these agonies overtaken him. A few weeks ago the hon. member was not seriously affected by anything involving economics, but was entirely governed by sentiment. I do not know that the hon. gentleman would wish to repudiate that idea, but if he speaks true to the fact, as no doubt he always wishes to speak, then he will acknowledge my accusation.

I knew he would acknowledge that sentiment governed him and that he was not particularly interested with economics in the question which was submitted to the people, namely, as to whether their products should have free entry into the markets of the United States. My hon. friend has referred to the fact that in United States politics there is the cult of insurgency. Well, we have always recognized my hon. friend as the prince of insurgents in this country, and I presume that he is now going to lead another insurgent party in this parliament as he did in the last parliament. But I would suggest to him—and I do it most respectfully and in all good feeling—that in his insurgency he should stick closely to the facts and not seek to mislead the people by representing to them that there is no possibility of relief within their reach from the parliament of Canada and that they must turn their eyes to Washington and look to the United States Congress if they would have any favours in the way of tariff regulation on their exports to that country. My hon. friend should not forget, when he states that parliament can do nothing to meet the desires and aspirations of the people of Canada but that they must wait for the American Congress to do something, that the Congress of the United States had passed legislation giving the desired relief provided the parliament of Canada would give its concurrence:

Mr. MACLEAN (York). And the Canadian people refused that concurrence.

Mr. EMMERSON. True our people nominally refused to concur, but my hon. friend did not preach that doctrine of economics to them.

Mr. CURRIE. He did.

Mr. EMMERSON. Some hon. gentleman said that he did.

Mr. MACLEAN (York). I think I did. I never made an argument that was not based on facts and the people listened to me and were convinced, and along came some gentleman who talked the contrary but could not convince me.

Mr. EMMERSON. I do not know what kind of facts my hon. friend is referring to.

Mr. FOWLER. Real facts.

Mr. EMMERSON. I do not think my hon. friend always indulges in real facts. If he does, my hon. friend from Kings

(Mr. Fowler) who interrupts does not follow him in that respect. I can only suggest that my hon. friend would do well to have some remedy applied to himself with regard to the railwayphobia disease with which he seems to be troubled, and that he should for a moment turn his attention from the Canadian Pacific railway and some of the other railway corporations of Canada and give it to the true economics in which our people are deeply interested. With the energy he possesses, with his breezy manner of expression, I am sure he could do very much in convincing those hon. gentlemen on the other side who sit behind him. I am sure his efforts would have an educative value and that he would accomplish something. For many years he has been beating the air with respect to his express and freight rates, but apparently he never comes down to the practical side of these things. Certainly if he has any ideas that are practicable, he does not put them into effect, but contents himself with coming here ocasionally and giving utterance to them without doing the work that is necessary in order that the government may practically take hold of the grievances which he alleges to exist and relieve the people from them. I am quite in accord with him with respect to many of his ideas in connection with government ownership. I have often thought that he was accidentally right, but I have felt that he should be more serious. I am not saying that he is insincere but I would advise him to direct his efforts towards measures that may accomplish something, and not content himself with coming to this House semi-occasionally and airing himself on these subjects.

Mr. MACLEAN (Halifax). Before you left the Chair, Mr. Speaker, last evening, I gave notice of the intention of some hon. gentlemen on this side to discuss this afternoon the matter of the dismissal of officials. One or two, however, who wish to take part in the discussion are unable to be present, and, therefore, the discussion will take place on Monday next.

Hon. R. L. BORDEN (Prime Minister). Before this motion is carried, I would like to say that I trust my hon. friend from South York (Mr. Maclean) will realize that we have not been in office more than a few weeks, and that our time has been so much occupied with the work of preparation for parliament that we have not been able to give to the subjects he has brought to our notice the consideration which no doubt they deserve. I would like to say with reference to the observations of my hon. friend from Westmoreland (Mr. Emmerson) that he does my hon. friend from South York an injustice when he suggests that my hon. friend's arguments in the recent campaign were not based on economic grounds. I had the pleasure of speaking with him on one occasion, and I know that the speech he made then was almost entirely based on economic grounds. I have personal knowledge also that the newspaper with which he is very closely connected published daily during the campaign, the results of actual investigations into facts which were entirely of an economic character, and dealt solely with the economic phase of the question at issue.

As regards information which my hon. friend alleges to be in possession of the government with respect to the parcel post service, I can only say that up to the present I have not had an opportunity of ascertaining whether such information was in possession of the late government or not; but if any such is available, we shall give it our consideration at the earliest possible moment.

My hon. friend refers to state competition as an effective remedy. Of course there is another school of thought which holds that the true principle is not so much based on state competition as state monopoly. In other words if the state undertakes the operation of any great public utility, it ought to undertake it in the way of a monopoly rather than in the way of competition with private enterprise. I am not offering any opinion at present but merely suggesting that there is a difference on that point. My hon. friend says that the Railway Commission of Canada has not dealt satisfactorily with express rates. I am not prepared either to admit or deny that statement, because I have not given the matter careful study; but I would like to say to him that if he will indicate to me in what respect the Railway Commission of Canada has not dealt satisfactorily or effectively with express rates, I shall make it my duty to communicate his complaint without any delay to the chairman of that commission, and ask him to investigate it or report to me the reasons why he does not think any further investigation necessary.

The parliament of Canada has constituted the Railway Commission as a tribunal for the purpose of keeping the rates charged at a proper standard. As far as I have observed their work it seems to me they have made an excellent attempt at bringing that about. I am not prepared to say that their work is perfect, or that it might not be improved in some respects, but at the same time I am not prepared at the moment to point out in what respect they should have done more. If the hon. member for York (Mr. Maclean) or any other hon. member of this House will bring to my attention any matter in respect to which he thinks the Railway Commission has not achieved the purpose for which it was formed, I shall undertake that the matter shall be brought to the attention of the commission without delay. My hon. friend also made some observations with regard to passenger rates. I am prepared to submit any complaint of that kind to the Railway Commission. The Department of the Minister of Railways and Canals, I think, is authorized by the terms of the statute to bring any matter of that kind to the attention of the commission and to ask them to investigate it, and it would be a proper thing for any member of this House or any citizen who has any demand of that kind which he wishes to bring to the attention of the government, and in that way to the Railway Commission, to lay it before the Minister of Railways.

My hon. friend also mentioned several other matters, but I do not know that at the moment, I have any observations to offer upon them which would be of service. The regulation of capitalization to which my hon. friend called attention is a very important matter indeed and I can assure him that as soon as the report of the tribunal in the United States, which was constituted for the purpose of investigating that question, is available it will receive the careful attention of the government, because I am inclined to think that there is good reason for the government and parliament of Canada taking up that matter in some reasonable and effective way. Whether or not it will be possible to do so this session I cannot say, nor do I intend to assure my hon. friend from York (Mr. Maclean) that we shall be able to overtake any of the matters to which he has called attention during the present session, because, as I have said, the present government have been in office for only a few weeks, our time has been almost unceasingly employed in preparation for the session and in connection with arrears of public affairs, and the ordinary transaction of public business. In order to convince my hon. friend that I am speaking entirely within the mark I may assure him that it has been my practice for several days past to receive a delegation on the way to lunch, another one at lunch, and a third during my return from lunch, and in that way to be as economical as possible of my time; so I trust he will receive my assurance that every member of the government has been fully occupied with matters of urgent daily concern to the utmost extent of his energy and capacity. At the same time, some of these matters to which my hon. friend has called attention will at the earliest possible moment receive the consideration of the government.

Mr. BORDEN.

Mr. TURRIFF. The Prime Minister has said he will be very glad to have information in respect to excessive express rates. The last decision given out by the chairman of the Railway Commission permits express companies to charge express rates in the west of $1.66 and in British Columbia of $2 for carrying any parcel the same distance as they charge $1 for in the east. It is well known to every member that the cost of building roads in the west is much less than the cost of building railroads down here. The wages for operating may be a little higher, but if you take the upkeep and the interest on the investment in the railways, mile for mile, the total cost of running a mile of railway in the prairie provinces—I am not speaking of British Columbia—is considerably lower than down here.

Mr. CURRIE. How about the revenue?

Mr. TURRIFF. The revenue is twice as large because they charge twice as much.

Mr. MACLEAN (South York). And the government subsidy is ten times as much.

Mr. BORDEN. The hon. gentleman's statement in regard to the cost is very interesting and rather surprising to me. What would he believe to be the average cost per mile of railroad construction in the three prairie provinces under ordinary conditions?

Mr. TURRIFF. I am not a railway constructor, but any man who has common judgment, and who goes over the roads in the west——

Mr. FOWLER. Oh, oh.

Mr. TURRIFF. The hon. gentlemen think I will make some remarks that will let them criticise the cost of the Grand Trunk Pacific, but they cannot catch me in anything like that. A railroad built as the Canadian Northern railway, or the Canadian Pacific railway, or the Grand Trunk Pacific is built, can be constructed, one hundred miles with another, at a lower cost in the west than the same class of road would cost in the eastern provinces. That being the case I ask why we in the west should pay $1.66 where the man in Ontario pays $1, and the man in British Columbia has to pay the still more unreasonable charge of $2. That is a statement of fact and I think that something should be done. I took this up with the late government a few months before the prorogation and pointed out the difference. There is something radically wrong when the people of the west are bled in this manner, and I am pleased to hear the Prime Minister say that he will take the matter up with the Railway Commission.

I have myself applied to the Railway Commission in connection with this matter, and they claim they are investigating the whole condition and hope to be able to bring about a satisfactory solution. But I want to say that there will be no satisfactory solution of that matter as long as the people of the west are charged two prices as compared with the people of the east.

Mr. CURRIE. What about that car of flaxseed you were telling the House and the country about?

Mr TURRIFF. Does my hon. friend mean to say, as he did in a letter to a newspaper in the west, that I had made a misstatement of fact when I said that flax had been shipped last year from Saskatchewan?

Mr. CURRIE. My hon. friend (Mr. Turriff) was making a statement through the west that several cars of flaxseed were shipped from Saskatchewan, and that the shippers had lost from $300 to $400 a car owing to excessive freight rates in the west compared with those of other provinces. But the question was asked in the House how much flaxseed had been shipped from Saskatchewan to Duluth last year, and the government reported that none had been shipped. That is the kind of stuff the hon. gentleman has been giving to the people in the west.

Mr. TURRIFF. I thought that my hon. friend (Mr. Currie) at some time, with his usual freshness, would bring that matter up, so I thought I would get ready for him. When I made the statement that one of my constituents had lost money on shipping his flaxseed to the United States I made a statement that was absolutely correct. But I did not say the loss was on account of the freight rate, I said that it was on account of the duty of 25 cents a bushel on the flax. Then somebody—I think it was my hon. friend from Macdonald (Mr. Staples) asked the question in the House, and a return was given from the Department of Customs—

Mr. STAPLES. Allow me to correct the hon. member. I did not ask the question. It was the hon. member for Prince Albert (Mr. Rutan).

Mr. TURRIFF. But my hon. friend (Mr. Staples) referred to it.

Mr. STAPLES. Yes.

Mr TURRIFF. And the reply to the question was that no flax had been shipped during the year 1910 from Saskatchewan to the United States. This reply was read in House the day before the closing of parliament. I immediately went to the Customs Department to inquire. I found that the clerk, not being very well posted in his duties, I must acknowledge, thought they were referring to 'flax' as flax straw and not as flaxseed.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Come off.

Mr. TURRIFF. That was the report I got from the Customs Department. The next day I got an official statement from them on this subject, which statement is as follows:

STATEMENT showing exports of flaxseed during calendar year ending 1910.

North Portal is in my constituency and is the port from which the constituent to whom I have referred shipped his flax. Now, nine-tenths of all the flax grown in the Dominion of Canada is grown in Saskatchewan, and practically all that flax shipped from Fort William and Port Arthur was the product of Saskatchewan. And it will be noted, from the statement, that over a million and a half of bushels were sent into the United States from those ports. So, when my hon. friend rushed into print in a western paper accusing me of trying to mislead this House and the country, he should have been a little more certain of his facts and should have been careful not to make statements himself which had no foundation whatever. I am very glad of this opportunity to refer to the matter and to show that what I said was absolutely true. Every farmer who shipped a bushel of flax from Saskatchewan to the United States last year or this year was compelled to lose 25 cents a bushel through not having free access to the market of that country. You cannot sell the flax in Canada; there is no demand for it, nor can you sell it all to Great Britain. Therefore, some of it simply must be sold in the United States, and the farmer must pay this duty of 25 cents a bushel. Last year the farmers of Saskatchewan paid over $400,000 in duties on flax that was shipped into the United States. And while I am on this subject, I would like to say to the hon. member for York (Mr. Maclean) that, while I agree with him in a great deal that he has said about the railways—and I intend to go into that question during this session—yet, for every dollar we lose through the railways, we lose ten through not having the American market as we should have had it under reciprocity. Had we in the west the American market we could stand to be robbed some, but not having the American market we cannot afford it. Access to the American market to-day would make a difference of from 15 cents to 20 cents on every bushel of wheat we have.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Oh, oh.

Mr. TURRIFF. It is all right for hon. gentlemen to say 'Oh, oh.' But I know what I am talking about. Take No. 3 Canadian wheat to-day at Fort William and compare the price with No. 1 wheat in Minneapolis—and our No. 3 will grade No. 1 in Minneapolis—and the difference will be found to be fifteen cents a bushel, and sometimes more. At the present time, owing to the poor crop you have not a market in Canada for some grades. We have millions, and tens of millions, of bushels of wheat this year that will not grade, and there will be a difference of 25 cents a bushel on that low grade wheat as compared with what you could get for it in the American market. While my hon. friend (Mr. W. F. Maclean) is right in a great deal he has said, let him bear in mind that the one chance of his life to help the people of the west—about whom he is so anxious and whose representatives in this House he criticises as not doing their duty—he neglected, and that in the course he took he went against the wishes of the people of the western provinces where the wheat is produced.

Mr. SCHAFFNER. I would like to ask the hon. gentleman (Mr. Turriff) a question. As I understand it, he says that the difference in the prices of wheat is because of the difference in grade.

Mr. TURRIFF. Partially.

Mr. SCHAFFNER. And I think he said that grade No. 3 in Canada was grade No. 1 on the other side. Now, I would ask him, who made these grades, if it was not the late government?

Mr. TURRIFF. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Schaffner) knows who made the grades as well as I do.

Mr. CURRIE. The hon. gentleman from Assiniboia (Mr. Turriff) has been giving a lot of so-called facts to the House. Now, from what department did he receive these?

Mr. TURRIFF. I got them from the chief clerk of the statistical branch of the Customs Department, and I should be glad to send the statement to my hon. friend (Mr. Currie).

Mr. TURRIFF.

Mr. CURRIE. Now, I would ask, are there any sworn statistics of these exports from Canada to be obtained from the Customs Department. I might ask that question of the Minister of Customs, and I am sure he would answer, 'No.' The flax that the hon. gentleman (Mr. Turriff) speaks of went not to the United States, but to Great Britain. A gentleman who was opposing me in my riding, told the farmers that he had bought 40,000 bushels of barley in the riding and shipped it to the United States, and that the farmers had lost something like $15,000 on that transaction. I happened, fortunately, to have the figures from the United States Treasury Department showing the imports of barley for 1911. The 1910 figures were shown in the blue-book published by this government. These figures proved that not a single bushel of barley had been taken into the United States for home consumption during 1911. It will be found when the facts are discovered that these millions have gone to the United States to be shipped abroad, and that takes all the argument out of his story. The flax seed was shipped to the United States for re-export to Great Britain.

Mr. EMMERSON. Was it shipped in bond?

Mr. CURRIE. From Buffalo in bond. The American officials will furnish you the figures to show what amount was reshipped. The Canadian statistics are not definite, because the Canadian government does not require a sworn manifest of the exports.

Mr. EMMERSON. I was going to ask my hon. friend if the Canadian statistics would not show the quantity shipped in bond from this country?

Mr. CURRIE. The Canadian statistics do not take that into consideration at all. I am a shipper, and I ship lots of stuff, and I know what I am talking about.

Mr. ETHIER. The hon. gentleman is out of order. He has put a question, and now he is making a speech.

Mr. CURRIE. I have a perfect right to make a speech, and that is what I am doing. I am also putting a few questions, which I find the hon. gentleman from Assiniboia (Mr. Turriff) cannot answer very clearly. The statistics as to the exports from Canada are valueless for the reason that no sworn statement is required of the goods shipped out of Canada, whether they go into the United States in bond or for home consumption. We do not pay any attention to that. As a matter of fact, a large amount of exports leave Canada that are not taken into account by our statistical department at all. The only statistics that will show the true figures are the American statistics, they will show the articles taken into the United States, because they have to be accompanied by sworn manifests and invoices.

Now as to freight rates in the west. A deliberate plot was laid to make the western farmers discontented with the Canadian government. About two years ago, if I remember right, the state of Minnesota undertook to legislate in the matter of railways and railway freights. They established a board similar to our Railway Board, and this board made rates of a highly socialistic character. They decreed that freight rates in the state of Minnesota should virtually be cut in two. Now the railways had to bow to this ruling, but they immediately appealed to the courts, and the courts have sustained the railways in their contention that the state of Minnesota has no right to force these rates on the railways, for the reason that under the constitution of the United States certain principles are laid down, which were violated, because these freight rates were confiscatory. But what do our hon. friends do? Although they knew otherwise, thousands of copies of these fake freight schedules were spread broadcast by hon. gentlemen opposite all through the west, to stir up dissatisfaction among the farmers, to show the farmers in the west what terrible freight rates they had to pay in Canada, whereas if they lived in the states they could get their stuff shipped for one-half the money. I want to tell hon. gentlemen opposite that they established a Railway Commission which has absolute control over all the freight rates in the west, and if any farmer has a grievance, or if any shipper has a grievance, if the hon. gentleman has a grievance about freight rates in the west, or if his neighbour has any grievance, he can go to that Commission and demand a hearing. That is a fact they cannot deny. Now if they have any confidence in that commission established by themselves, if they have any confidence in the officials appointed by themselves, why do they not appeal to them? Apparently, from the agitation they have been carrying on over these freight rates, one would think they had not the slightest confidence in any official appointed by them on that Railway Board. Those are the facts, and if the hon. member who has just sat down is anxious to help his friends in the west, he ought to go to work and get a schedule of these overcharges, as a practical business man, and lay them before the Railway Commission in the west. He should have done that two or three years ago, when his party was in power. But the people did not believe him. The only place where the people believed him was in the west, where they had managed this campaign of misrepresentation. But in the east where the people were seized of the situation, they came to the conclusion that so far as the Liberal party was concerned, they had lost the confidence of Canada, and the result is the remnant we see in this House to-day.

Mr. TURRIFF. I would like to answer a question the hon. member asked me. He made the statement——

Mr. SPEAKER. I would remind the hon. member that he has already spoken two or three times. If he merely desires to ask a question or to answer one without debate, there is no objection. But to enter into a debate would be irregular.

Mr. TURRIFF. I just wish to answer a question. The question was, if I knew that no flax had been shipped into the United States from Canada in the year 1910 for consumption in the United States, and coupled with the question was a statement that the flax shipped into the United States from Canada during 1910 was shipped in bond and sent through to Great Britain. Well, I find that during 1910 there was $1,256,436 worth shipped into the United States, on which the Americans paid a duty of $353,158. If it was being shipped through to Great Britain it would have gone through in bond, and would not have paid any duty.

Mr. COCHRANE. I may say that I have received petitions from Boards of Trade in Winnipeg and other cities in reference to freight rates, and I immediately forwarded them to the Railway Commission, and I have an answer from the chairman that he will investigate them at once. If there are any other complaints, I am willing to take them up in the same way.

Mr. FOWLER. This discussion which started about freight rates and express charges has wandered somewhat far afield. The hon. member for Westmoreland (Mr. Emmerson) treated us to a lengthy dissertation, in his usual florid style, on reciprocity. The hon. member for Westmoreland seems to feel very sorely the position in which he sits at the present time on the left of the Speaker, and consequently he sometimes says things that are a little nasty—if that be not unparliamentary, as I have been out of parliament for some time; he is a little nasty in his rejoinders. I happened to interject a remark that the hon. member for South York (Mr. Maclean) was dealing in real facts, and the hon. member for Westmoreland found it necessary to remark that I was not following the example of the hon. member for South York. I do not quite understand, Mr. Speaker, why the hon. gentleman should say that. He has had one experience with me with regard to certain facts, and he seemed in that experience to have run up against real facts, so real that the hon. gentleman exchanged the office which he then held for a seat as private member.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. Perhaps it might be as well to come back to the real question which was brought before the House by the hon. member for South York (Mr. Maclean). I do not altogether agree with the observations of my hon. friend from South York. We all understand that he is most persistent in pursuing the question he has brought up. Whenever he comes into the House, he is not long here before he brings up the subject of freight rates, passenger rates, and railway questions in general. My hon. friend in this matter is a radical, he is not only a radical but he is revolutionary, according to my humble judgment. My hon. friend is persistent in pursuing his object of securing the nationalization of railways. He could not persuade the late government to go so far as he wanted them to go, and to nationalize the railways; and I doubt if he will persuade my hon. friends opposite to do so. The policy of my hon. friend is too radical, I believe, for Canada at the present time. We have a good system of railways, as everybody will agree. It is not giving universal satisfaction, because every man who has to pay railway freights always thinks that he is paying too much.

We have been gradually reducing rates. In the west rates have been reduced a good deal. They were reduced once, and then they were reduced again. I believe that everybody will agree that we went very far, as far perhaps as public opinion would justify, or the needs of the country demanded, when we established the Railway Commission eight years ago. The Railway Commission has done remarkably well. Everybody is pleased with it. I believe that my hon. friend who has just addressed the House on this side, will agree with me that it is giving satisfaction. It may be that with regard to a certain decision it has not done so. I would like to know the court which has always given satisfaction to every suitor. It may be that upon the occasion to which my hon. friend referred the decision rendered by the commission was not altogether satisfactory to the people of the west. As I understand the statement made by my hon. friend, the commission made three classes of rates, one for the east, one for the west, and one for British Columbia. If they have adopted that basis that was the true basis to adopt. We acknowledge that there should be a different basis for freight charges and passenger rates in the east and in the west. It may be possible that the commission went too far in the use, and in the application of that doctrine. But, if the commission went too far the remedy is with the commission itself. The Prime Minister can do nothing with the commission. The commission is a perfectly independent body, independent of the government, independent of the opposition, and amenable only to parliament.

Mr. BORDEN. We can merely bring matters to their attention.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. That is all, and if a decision has been improperly rendered I am sure that the commission will be the first to give a new hearing, and to reconsider its determination. So, I think the remedy of my hon. friend from South York (Mr. Maclean) is more with the commission than with this House. But, I have an observation to make to my hon. friend from North Simcoe (Mr. Currie). I do not understand the statement he made a moment ago that our customs service do not take account of shipments going out in bond. My hon. friend is in error about that.

Mr. CURRIE. I say that the customs service do not take into consideration anything shipped out in bond. The right hon. gentleman who has been Prime Minister and leader of the government of this country apparently does not know that.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. Then my hon. friend was altogether in error in saying that goods shipped in bond are not taken into account. We have been accustomed in our statistics to keep track of the goods that have been shipped in bond, and those which are shipped to the United States for consumption. I think that my hon. friend is altogether in error.

Mr. CURRIE. I have no desire to show up the right hon. gentleman's knowledge of this question——

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order, order.

Mr. CURRIE. —because anybody knows—

Mr. SPEAKER. Order; the hon. gentleman (Mr. Currie) has already spoken.

Mr. CURRIE. I do not desire to speak, but I stand by the statement I made.

Mr. BLAIN. Mr. Speaker, I wish to direct the attention of the House to the question of the express charges, particularly in the province of Ontario, which have been mentioned by my hon. friend from South York (Mr. Maclean). We have operating in Ontario two very strong companies—the Dominion Express company and the Canadian Express company. One of the chief complaints I find in Ontario is that where a parcel is sent, say, a distance of 100 miles, to be carried part of the distance by one company, and part by the other company there is a double charge. In my opinion these should be an arrangement between the two express companies to divide the rates and the person receiving the express parcel should not be compelled to pay more than one charge, although the charge may have have to be divided between the two companies. That is a very universal complaint, and I think it is one that should receive the attention of those who have authority over it.

Mr. MACLEAN (South York). That was one of the substantial grievances of the fruit growers, was it not?

Mr. BLAIN. Yes, the fruit growers have some substantial grievances in respect to express charges but I do not wish to go into that question just now. I simply wish to direct the attention of the House to a complaint which has been heard for many years, and I think it is one which should receive the immediate attention of the Railway Commission. If they are not powerful enough to remedy this matter I think the government should step in and see that something is done in the interest of the people with reference to the carriage of express parcels.

Motion agreed to, and House went into Committee of Supply.

Mr. PUGSLEY. Mr. Chairman, before you take up item 135, I wish to say a word or two with regard to a couple of other items. First I desire to say something with regard to the appropriation for the harbour of St. John. My hon. friend the Minister of Marine and Fisheries (Mr. Hazen) and, I think also my hon. friend from Kings and Albert (Mr. Fowler) were both under the impression that there is a very much smaller amount available for St. John harbour than is actually the case, and I would like to give my hon. friends the figures in the hope that they would be good enough to look into them, and if they do, I think they will see that I am right. In the Supplementary Estimates passed last session there was an item of $500,000, of which five-twelfths was voted. That would make $208,334. When the late government went out of office, that amount, as I understand, remained intact. I might have used it to pay for the dredging upon the western side, but as I had said to my colleagues that that amount was intended for the improvements at Courtenay bay, it remained intact until the late government went out of office, and I presume it is intact to-day. Then, in the estimates which we voted last night, there is also for St. John harbour a sum of $554,166.66. That makes a total amount now available for St. John of $762,500.66. I am satisfied that, after paying the amount due for dredging when the late government retired from office, and making all provisions for dredging upon the west side, assuming it is carried on with ordinary speed up to the end of the present fiscal year, the 31st March next, there will still be available probably some $300,000 with which the work at Courtenay bay can be started, and which would pay for all that could possibly be done before the 31st March.

If the work at Courtenay bay is not started I believe that about $300,000 of the vote will lapse on the 31st March. In connection with the vote for the parliament buildings I wish to draw the attention of the Minister of Public Works to the fact that the allotment of accommodation to the Liberal members is very unfair indeed. While our numbers are greater than the numbers of the opposition in the last parliament, two of the rooms formerly occupied by Conservatives have been taken away from us. The result is that six New Brunswick members are huddled together in a small dark room in the basement which is not fit to be occupied by gentlemen. When I was minister, the hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Foster) was given a good room by himself because of having been an ex-minister, but three of us are now obliged to occupy the same room, and the six New Brunswick Liberals are accommodated as I have described. I remember that I gave to two Conservative members from New Brunswick a room in the basement, but which looked out on the terrace, and that has been taken away from us. The accommodation for the opposition members in that respect is very unsatisfactory, and I wish the Minister of Public Works to look into the question, and see that the same measure of justice is extended to us that we extended to the Conservatives when in opposition.

Mr. EDWARDS. There were eight or ten of us in the garret last parliament.

Mr. FOSTER. I regret that the Minister of Public Works is not in his seat at the moment, but I understand that Mr. Speaker in connection with the Chief Whip of each party has undertaken to apportion the accommodation. I thank my hon. friend for the accommodation given me last parliament, but I was not alone in that room as he says; I occupied it together with another good friend who was in exile with me. I have no doubt that Mr. Speaker and the Whips will endeavour to make satisfactory arrangements.

Mr. PUGSLEY. Would my hon. friend come down to room 103 in the basement and see the accommodation we have?

Mr. FOSTER. If my hon. friend will give me a formal invitation I may expect something.

Mr. PUGSLEY. Yes, if not Ottawa water we might have some ginger ale.

Intercolonial railway, $1,429,924.97.

Mr. MACLEAN (Halifax). I am particularly interested in the items providing a subsidy for the construction of a railway from Dartmouth to Musquodoboit harbour, and thence through the valley of the Musquodoboit to Deans Settlement, and also the proposed railway in the county of Guysborough. I beg to point out to the Minister of Railways that it was the settled policy of the late government to construct these two railways as branches of the Intercolonial railway, and further, that the present Prime Minister expressed his concurrence in that policy. During the summer months tenders were asked for the construction of these two branches and some time after the 21st of September, contracts were formally awarded as I understand it, to the lowest tenderers. I quite appreciate the fact that the Minister of Railways and the other ministers have been exceedingly busy of late, and I should not in the least be surprised if they say they have not yet had an opportunity of looking into this matter as fully as they would desire. But, that I may urge the Minister of Railways to immediate action in prosecuting the work I would point out that the people living in the section of the country to be traversed by these proposed railways have been long and anxiously waiting for railway service. I would also point out that it is possibly a serious injury to the contractors who are the successful tenderers to have construction delayed unreasonably. I trust the Minister of Railways will at once enter into formal contracts so that the construction may be commenced immediately. The minister will on consideration have no difficulty in reaching the conclusion that my suggestions should be adopted. I think the minister will also agree that the policy of the late government in reference to the construction of these two branches was sound, and not open to any substantial criticism.

Mr. SINCLAIR. This question is of special interest to the county I have the honour to represent, and I am pleased that my hon. friend (Mr. A. K. Maclean) has referred to it. The question of the Intercolonial railway branch lines has been before this House and the country for years, and it was after considerable difficulty that the members from the provinces through which the Intercolonial railway passes were able to convince the late government of the necessity of embarking in the construction of branch lines to the Intercolonial railway.

There was a good deal of hesitation, I understand, on the ground that a great deal of money would be required to build all the branch lines necessary along the line of the Intercolonial railway. At first the government adopted the idea that roads already built might be leased on the report of the chief engineer that they were earning sufficient revenue to warrant the government taking them over, and it was only last year that the government finally arrived at a decision to embark on the construction of branch lines as well as the leasing of them. The argument urged was that it was impossible for a company to profitably operate short branch lines which had to deliver all its traffic over the Intercolonial Railway. In sections such as the one to which my hon. friend has referred, with one branch going through the eastern part of the county of Halifax and another branch going through the county I have the honour to represent, the traffic would be all delivered to the main line of the Intercolonial and they would get a long haul, and branch lines of that character might be profitable to the Intercolonial, when they would not be profitable at all if built by an independent company and weighted down by the expenses necessary to run an independent company. The Intercolonial has now a staff of managers and engineers and shops at Moncton and other places and a complete equipment, so that it can equip and run branch lines at much less cost than would be possible to an independent company. Impressed by this argument and the great importance of opening up undeveloped sections of the country by railway accommodation, the late government undertook to adopt the policy of building branch lines in Nova Scotia. Three branches were projected—one on the island of Cape Breton, one reaching into the county of Guysborough from Sunnybrae to the town of Guysborough, with a branch to Country Harbour, and a third from Dartmouth and east through the county of Halifax. My hon. friend has pointed out that tenders were asked for during last season, and in answer to a question asked by the hon. member for Pictou (Mr. E. M. Macdonald) information about these tenders was given to the House. The question of my hon. friend from Pictou was as follows:

1. Who were the tenderers for the construction of the portion of the new branch of the Intercolonial railway from Sunnybrae to Guysborough, between Guysborough and Country Harbour and Melrose?
2. What was the amount of each tender?
3. When was the contract awarded?
4. To whom was it awarded?

Mr. COCHRANE:

1. Nova Scotia Construction Co., Ltd., Sydney, N.S.; M. J. O'Brien, Renfrew; James H. Corbett, Moncton, N.B.; Kennedy & Macdonald, Antigonish, N.S.; S. Pearson & Son, New York, N.Y.; M. P. & J. T. Davis, Ottawa; McArthur Bros. Co., Halifax, N.S.; John W. McManus, Co., Ltd, Memramcook, N.B.

2. Nova Scotia Construction Co., $1,057,122.19; M. J. O'Brien, $1,165,189.17; James H. Corbett, $1,145,326.10; Kennedy & Macdonald, $1,085,470.86; S. Pearson & Son, $1,446,020.98; M. P. & J. T. Davis, $1,066,695.40; McArthur Bros. Co., $1,272,614.76; John W. McManus Co., Ltd., $1,300,947.61.

These accounts are based on schedule prices.
3. Contract was awarded by order in council dated 2nd October, 1911.
4. Nova Scotia Construction Co.

It would appear then that the late government had gone so far as to award the contract to the Nova Scotia Construction Company, and I am informed that that company was ready, at the time the contract was awarded to commence the work. But it would appear that they were stopped by the new administration and no work has been commenced; and in answer to a question asked by myself yesterday, the Minister of Railways replied that the government had the matter under consideration. With my hon. friend from Halifax, I have no complaint that the government should give the matter due consideration, but I trust that it will not be very long until they can see their way clear to begin the construction of these lines. No doubt the districts along the line need railway accommodation very much, and the people there are very much interested as to whether the new government really intend to construct those lines and thus carry on the work begun by the late government. I hope that the Minister of Railways is in a position now to say what the policy of the government is, and to assure us that although he has not yet been ready to do any actual work, it is the policy of the government to go forward and build those lines of railway.

Mr. McKENZIE. I fully concur in what has been said by the hon. member for Guysborough (Mr. Sinclair) and the junior member for Halifax (Mr. Maclean) as regards the necessity for building railways into those counties which they represent, but their arguments apply with greater force to the county of Victoria which is part of the riding I have the honour to represent. A discussion on this question of extending railways into Cape Breton was had in this House a little less than a year ago. On the 12th of December last the policy of extending branch lines through the different sections of the province of Nova Scotia came up on a resolution moved by myself. That resolution practically stated that in view of the railway development in the Dominion generally, the time had arrived when the Intercolonial should extend branch lines into the counties of Nova Scotia hitherto unprovided with railways. There was a very full discussion of that resolution. I would commend to the Minister of Railways (Mr. Cochrane) the speech on that resolution made by the present First Minister, then leader of the opposition (Mr. Borden). That gentleman spoke at length on the subject. He declared emphatically that the government should not hesitate a moment in going on with this work and that it had already vacillated too long. In view of that declaration of policy and in view of the fact that the former leader of the opposition is now in a position to carry out the policy he then advocated, we are entitled to ask for a declaration to that effect from the Minister of Railways.

The item now before the Chair is divided into three parts. One covers the railway from Halifax, the other the railway to Guysborough, and the third the railway from Alva, in Inverness, to Baddeck, in the county of Victoria. Surveys have been made under these items of which five-twelfths of the amount was voted, and a very practicable route has been found by the surveyors. Everything was in readiness for construction, tenders had been called for, the last day for receiving them being October 12, last. I find from the answers to questions I put on the order paper that two tenders were received from contractors, but I am sorry to find from the answer to one of my questions that it is not the intention of the minister to proceed with the work at present. I am sure that will be a very great disappointment to the people of Victoria county who are very much in need of this development, and who have no railway at all. Yesterday we were told it was a matter of great hardship to some parts of the west that farmers have to haul grain 70 or 80 miles. That is bad enough in a new country, but here in Victoria county, one of the oldest in Canada, there are places that are over 100 miles distant from a railway and people have to haul their produce that distance if they would ship it by rail. It will be understood with what delight they received information last year that railway connection was to be given to them, and they will be equally depressed when they find it is not the intention of the present government to proceed with that work. I would strongly urge the Minister of Railways and Canals (Mr. Cochrane), to read the discussion when this matter came up in parliament, and particularly the speech made by the Prime Minister on December 12, last. I am sure he will conclude that if the Premier will carry out the views he then expressed there will be no delay in proceeding with the construction of this road.

Mr. COCHRANE. As the hon. member for Halifax (Mr. A. K. Maclean) has said, I have had little time to go into this question. There have been verbal reports about the routes, in fact one gentleman told me down there that the road should proceed from Windsor Junction and cross over, that being the shorter route to the outlet of the good valley of which the hon. member spoke. Others said that the classifications were all wrong, that where there had been reports of a large amount of earth and very little rock the reverse is the case. So many representations were made and there was so little data on which I could lay my hands, that I concluded it was best to hold the matter up for a short time.

While the policy of the government on the general matters of railway construction has not been laid down, I realize as the head of the department, that it is the duty of this or any other government to develop the country and to provide facilities for the taking out of the natural resources of the country in the cheapest and most economical way. I feel though that when any proposition is laid before the government to build or subsidize a railway there ought to be a clear statement of the conditions in the section of country affected and the future prospects for such a railway in order that we may be satisfied that the railway will be able to stand on its own feet. The government will not lose sight of the three roads mentioned and I hope that before long, if the evidence will justify the construction of the roads, we will be able to proceed on the regular lines. I cannot say yet just in what way it will be done, whether we will accept the tenders that are in or ask for new tenders. That will take time to find out and I am not letting the grass grow.

Mr. PUGSLEY. I wish to ask the Minister of Railways and Canals with regard to the construction of a spur line from Hampton station to Hampton village for which there is an amount in the estimates. I asked a question a day or two ago, and it was answered yesterday. The question and answer were as follows:

Mr. PUGSLEY:

1. Is it intended to proceed with the work of constructing the spur line of railway from Hampton station to Hampton village, for which an appropriation was made by parliament last session?

2. Who submitted the lowest tender for the work, and has the contract yet been let?

Mr. COCHRANE:

1. No, not at present.

2. Only one tender was received which was not dealt with and contract not awarded.

Would the minister now state who the tenderer was, and the amount of the tender?

Mr. COCHRANE. I could not offhand, but I will be very glad to produce the information.

Mr. PUGSLEY. Has it been decided not to proceed with this spur line?

Mr. COCHRANE. I would want a good deal more information than I have of the necessity for this line, before I could undertake to build the road. At present I have not information sufficiently strong to warrant the construction, but I shall go into the whole matter and see what can be done.

Mr. PUGSLEY. I would be glad if my my hon. friend would do so. I should perhaps call the attention of the Minister of Railways to the condition of affairs at Hampton. Hampton village is a thriving village, quite populous and there is one very important industry there employing a good many hands in the manufacture of lumber which it would be a very great advantage to ship by rail. The village to which it is proposed to build this spur is situated upon the Kennebecasis river, whereas Hampton station is a mile or a little further by the route the spur would take from the village.

Mr. COCHRANE. Is the extension for the purpose of helping to get the lumber out to the market?

Mr. PUGSLEY. That is one object, there would be a very considerable traffic in lumber. The question of building this spur has been more or less under consideration for the past quarter of a century. The necessity of building this spur has been pressed on the different ministers from time to time so the matter is not a new one at all. In addition to lumber there would be a very considerable passenger traffic. A great many people who are in business in St. John have their residence in Hampton in the summer season.

There is a suburban train which runs from St. John to Hampton station, where the train remains over night. If the spur line were built, the train would run on to Hampton village. There would be no increase of cost for the trainmen, and very little extra expense in running the train to the village. I believe the cost of construction was estimated by the engineers of the department at something like $50,000. I am satisfied that if my hon. friend (Mr. Cochrane), would look into the matter, giving it his personal attention, he will reach the conclusion that it would be in the public interest to follow the decision come to by his predecessor.

Mr. MACDONALD (Pictou). I am sorry I was not here a few moments ago when the attention of the Minister was being called to the desirability and necessity of proceeding with the railway provided for in the vote now under discussion in the eastern part of Nova Scotia. I wish to refer particularly to the item :—

For the construction of a railway from a point on the Intercolonial railway at or near New Glasgow, in the county of Pictou, or from Sunnybrae in the said county, (in the event of the branch line of that railway to that place being acquired as it may be under this application), to the town of Guysborough and from the said line of railway at Cross Roads

County Harbour to the deep water of said harbour.

As, no doubt, my hon. friend pointed out who dealt with the matter before, the question as to the wisdom of the construction of these railways was thoroughly threshed out in the last session of the last parliament. And the present Prime Minister (Mr. Borden), joined his support to the resolution moved by my hon. friend from North Cape Breton (Mr. McKenzie), with special reference to the construction of this line and for the branch line from Dartmouth to Dean Settlement. The policy had the approbation of all the members in the last parliament, so far as could be learned as a result of the debate. As, no doubt, the hon. Minister is well aware, the work under this vote has already been proceeded with and the railway from Sunnybrae to the station at Ferrona on the Intercolonial railway has been purchased by the government, and is now being operated by the government. Therefore, the policy of the construction of the road from Sunnybrae to the town of Guysboro, is ont to which, I take it, the country as a whole is irrevocably committed. As to the policy, we have the assurance of my hon. friend (Mr. Cochrane), as I understand, that all he desires is that matters of detail shall come under his attention so that he may have no doubt as to the course he is to adopt. As to the general policy with regard to this particular enterprise, I am sure the judgment of his leader as expressed last year and repeatedly affirmed in Nova Scotia during the campaign, is one which he will be willing to accept. As I understand it, the contract has been made, and valuable time will be lost, if there is unnecessary delay in permitting the contractors to proceed. The right of way could be cut out more advantageously in the winter than in the summer. If the hon. Minister can, as I trust he will, see his way clear to permit the contractors to proceed immediately, he will take a step that will entitle him to the fullest consideration of the people of that portion of the province and of hon. members of this House who come from that part of Canada.

Hudson Bay railway—Construction, $1,166,666.66.

Mr. MACLEAN (Halifax). Some hon. member asked that this should stand. I am quite willing that it should pass, providing that the hon. member who asked that it should stand is given an opportunity to discuss the matter in some other form.

Mr. COCHRANE. On notice of motion. Quite agreeable.

Mail Subsidies and Steamship Subventions—Steam service for not less than fifty-two full round weekly trips between St. Johns and Halifax via Yarmouth and other way ports during the season of 1911, $5,833.34.

Mr. LAW. Will the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Foster), please state if the steamship company receiving this subsidy is obliged to make fifty-two round trips per year now ?

Mr. FOSTER. The item says : 'not less than 52 full round weekly trips.' That is a term of the contract.

Mr. LAW. I think that has been changed to a smaller number of trips. That is what I wish to inquire about.

Mr. FOSTER. I take it that it could not be changed if it were a contract founded upon that item. I am sure I could not pay for any smaller number of trips.

Mr. LAW. They could be paid for, I suppose, pro rata.

Mr. FOSTER. No, I think there would to be fifty-two full round trips.

Mr. PUGSLEY. The Minister of Trade and Commerce stated yesterday that it was intended that these items should be exactly the same as they were passed at the last session of parliament.

Mr. FOSTER. Yes.

Mr. PUGSLEY. I am inclined to think there are two items omitted—perhaps a mistake of the printer. My hon. friend from Essex referred to the communication with Pelee island. And my hon. friend from Carleton (Mr. Carvell), has just called my attention to the fact that the item for the service between St. John and Cuba seems to have been omitted.

Mr. CLARKE (Essex). I would call the attention of the proper member of the government to the fact that the statutes of last session have not yet found their way into the Library.

Additional for Canada, China and Japan service, $28,388.88.

Mr. MACDONALD. I would like to ask the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Foster) as to whether there is anything in the main estimates this year for a service between North Sydney and Newfoundland. In that connection I may be permitted to say, that I understood some representations were made to the late government about providing an increased subsidy to maintain a better service between North Sydney and Port au Basque, in Newfoundland, involving the running of a daily train from Port au Basque to St. John's, Newfoundland. I trust the minister will consider some means of giving Canada better steam communication with the sister colony of Newfoundland. Our trade with that colony has increased materially during the last ten years. Our neighbours to the south of us are competitors for the trade of that colony, and there is a service between St. John's and New York and Philadelphia. Such a service as is now in operation, if increased, will provide additional traffic for the Intercolonial. If a new service was provided, furnishing daily communication between Canada and the sister colony, undoubtedly our trade would greatly increase. I hope that the minister will look closely into this matter, and will give it favourable consideration.

Mr. McKENZIE. This service advocated by my hon. friend from Pictou (Mr. Macdonald) is one directly interesting my county, and I endorse what he has said. The traffic between Canada and Newfoundland has grown 400 per cent within the last ten years, and has been of he greatest advantage to the Intercolonial. Steamers running between North Sydney and Port au Basque are the best avenues for trade that that railway has got. The tri-weekly service now in operation is insufficient to meet the trade in passengers and freight that is offering I hope, therefore, that when application is made for an increased subsidy, and to put two steamers on the route instead of one, the minister will remember what has been said in the House. I brought the question before the former Minister of Trade and Commerce, and he intimated that as soon as a company was ready to put on additional steamers a larger subsidy would be given.

Mr. SINCLAIR In connection with all these steamboat services I would like to suggest to the Minister of Trade and Commerce the importance of obtaining information from these companies, who are getting these large subsidies from the government, respecting their profits. No doubt it often happens that we are paying subsidies unnecessarily. We pay subsidies from year to year, and it is impossible for the members of this House or for the government to get exact information as to the profits these companies are making. I see no reason why they should not be required to show their balance-sheet to the Minister of Trade and Commerce at the end of the year, so that we may know what profits are made by the company that we are subsidizing. That would enable us to decide whether we ought to continue the subsidies. I have not the slightest doubt that in the past we have been paying subsidies where they were not required, because we have not had that information. I know there is an objection on the part of these companies to disclosing their affairs, and it is a natural objection. But where the government is contributing such large amounts towards the profits of these companies I submit that it would be no great hardship if they were required to give a statement at the end of each year showing what profits they have made from the trade they are carrying on. There are statements required at the present time, I understand, showing the amount of freight and the number of passengers that are carried. But that does not give us any information as to how much money they earn, or whether it is necessary that we should continue paying them these large amounts in order to help them carry on their business. In England joint stock companies are required to publish a statement at the close of the year in the official papers, showing what profits they have made. I think that is a good plan, and might properly be introduced here.

Mr FOSTER. I may say that when we come to vote the subsidies for 1912-13, and come to this branch of the subsidy granting, I will be able to discuss some of the points that have been raised by my hon. friends. I think there are some things to be guarded against in voting sums of money for steamship subsidies. Some may be entirely unnecessary. The country does not want to give money unnecessarily to any of those lines. Some may not make much profit, and yet it may be absolutely necessary for the convenience of the people that the government should come to the aid of such companies. Others may be getting too much, and therefore making too great profits. All these things will have to be taken into account, and so far as possible be supervised, so that the country, while doing its duty in all cases, may not do more than its duty in any case. With reference to the returns, of late years the quantities of freight carried are returned, but the values of the freight carried have not been returned.

I have given instructions already that for all companies to whom we grant subsidies there shall be the further condition that they shall give us not only a return of the quantities of the freight but of the values of the freight carried, so that we may get an idea of the service that the company is doing. With reference to the Newfoundland service, my position towards Newfoundland is entirely sympathetic—of course it will be sympathetic towards Canada—and whatever can be reasonably done to assist in that service I should be glad to recommend to the House. There are new propositions already before me with reference to the service, and these will be thoroughly considered before the main estimates are brought down.

Fisheries, $510,708.32.

Mr. MACLEAN (Halifax). A few evenings ago my hon. friend from Guysboro (Mr. Sinclair) while discussing the address, made the statement that it was one of the many planks of the Conservative party in the recent election that free medical aid and free medicine should be extended to the shore fishermen. It did appear that the hon. Minister of Marine and Fisheries (Mr. Hazen) had never heard of this policy before, and it seemed to hon. gentlemen on this side of the House a very strange thing. I would like to ask my hon. friend the Minister of Marine and Fisheries if he has yet learned whether this was a part of the programme of the Conservative party prior to the recent elections. I would like to inquire of him if he has had an opportunity of seeing the statement made by his leader on this question and, if not, if he would be gracious enough to accept from me a copy of the manifesto of his leader containing this declaration promising inshore fishermen free medical attendance and free medicine. I can assure the hon. gentleman that if this policy is put into force his department will be a very busy one and he will probably be the busiest physician and chemist in the Dominion of Canada.

Mr. FOSTER (North Toronto). They will all take their medicine.

Mr. MACLEAN (Halifax). I am afraid we will have to call the hon. gentleman the Lydia Pinkham of Canadian politics. I have had numerous inquiries from inshore fishermen of my own constituency who consider themselves more or less ill and who are already looking for assistance by reason of the statement made by the Prime Minister. I hope the hon. Minister of Marine and Fisheries will acquaint himself with the various gospels of his political leader so that he will be in a position on the floor of the House to answer any questions relating thereto. I hope that by the time the House reconvenes after the Christmas holidays he will have had sufficient time to have made himself acquainted with this matter and will be in a position to enlighten us upon it.

Mr. PUGSLEY. Before passing away from fisheries I would like to call the attention of the Minister of Marine and Fisheries to what I think is a grievance of which some people have a right to complain. It has been the custom for some time past in the Department of Marine and Fisheries to make a contract with the stewards of the steamers engaged in the fishery protection service under which they are paid so much a head for boarding the crews. The stewards are alone responsible to the merchants who supply groceries and other articles required for the steamers. In the case of the steamer 'Stanley' the gentleman who was lately steward of that steamer incurred bills to a considerable amount in the city of St. John. Some time ago he, having become heavily involved, left the city and as a consequence quite a number of people who furnished supplies to the steward of the steamer are unable to collect the amounts which are due to them. I understand that my hon. friend has been advised by the Minister of Justice that the government is not responsible. I remember bringing the matter to the attention of his predecessor, or at all events, to the attention of the deputy minister, before the late government went out of office, and the same view was taken, but I urged very strongly that the matter was one to which the department ought to give equitable consideration. To begin with, I think it is very questionable whether it is the proper way in which to deal with the crews of these steamers, but whether it is or not, certainly, if public notice were given that the government would not be responsible for supplies furnished to a vessel, that it was a matter entirely for the steward, everybody would be on his guard. I think that the claimants have a strong case for consideration. In the case of the 'Stanley', as I understand it, the steward ordered the goods in the ordinary way, they were furnished to him as the steward of the steamer, and people, while they rendered their bills to the steward, still rendered them to him as an officer of the government and they were very much surprised I believe when they found that the government did not hold itself responsible for these bills. It is a very great hardship that the people who furnished supplies to the steward of the steamer in good faith should not be able to collect their accounts. I do not find any fault with my hon. friend because he has acted in accordance with the law and acted on the advice of the Minister of Justice, but I would hope that my hon. friend may see his way clear to take the matter into his equitable consideration, approach it from an equitable standpoint, and I think that if, under the circumstances, my hon. friend would feel justified in asking parliament for authority to pay these bills, parliament would be glad to accede to his request. In future, if it is intended to continue this practice, I think that in every port where any of these steamers are there should be public notice given that the government is in no way responsible, that the steward has a contract with the government and that people who furnish him with supplies do so at their own risk. We know how it is with people who furnish supplies to government officers. They naturally look to the government. They would naturally expect that he had the authority of the government to incur these obligations. I noticed that in a copy of a letter which my hon. friend had sent to one of the claimants he dwelt upon the fact that the people had rendered their bills to the steward of the steamer. I would remind my hon. friend that that is exactly the way in which they would render their bills. They furnish these supplies to the steamers and they would render their bills to the stewards of the steamers, or perhaps the steward may have asked them to make out their bills in that way; but that would not show that they did not rely upon the fact that, he being an officer of the government, in furnishing these supplies, the government would be responsible.

Mr. HAZEN. I may say that the facts are correctly stated by my hon. friend and the matter is now under my consideration. When I first heard of the practice prevailing in the department under which the steward contracted to supply meals for the officers and men at a certain amount per meal or per diem, I thought like my hon. friend that it was not a wise system, but since talking the matter over with the officers of my department my views have undergone some change. Under the old system by which the department paid this expenditure directly, there seemed to be no way of curbing it, and one year when the food consumed on these vessels was averaged up it was so enormous that it could not have been possibly used by the officers and men. Under the present system a great saving has been effected, but the weakness of the system appears to be that the steward who takes the contract for supplying the food was not asked to give a bond for the faithful performance of his duties, and indemnity to those who might lose by his transactions. This morning I instructed the purchasing agent to ascertain what the cost of such a bond from each steward would be, as it seemed to me that it might be better for the government to pay the cost of these bonds, rather than have these questions arising in the future. I also instructed the officer to prepare a detailed statement of the persons to whom these sums were owing and the particulars in each case, as some cases may differ from others. The contention is that these stewards wearing the uniform of Canadian ships had purchased the supplies and that those who sold to them naturally thought they were selling to the government of Canada. The purchasing branch of the department is inclined to dispute that because some of these bills were contracted over a year ago, and up to the time this steward left St. John no bill was rendered and no claim made to the department. The purchasing agent feels that at least some of these people knew they were dealing with the steward personally, and that the government was not responsible.

Mr. PUGSLEY. Might they not suppose that the stewards had not been placed in funds?

Mr. HAZEN. The matter is receiving my careful consideration, and when I get the details of the accounts I will be able to form a conclusion on that. For instance, one of the banks in St. John discounted $800 worth of paper for this steward, and it is very doubtful if the government is liable morally in that case. I do not understand how the manager of that bank could have thought that the government was in any way responsible.

Mr. PUGSLEY. That may have been in a different position from the others.

Mr. HAZEN. I am having inquiries made into the matter. My disposition is to view it from a generous standpoint, and if I can justify doing so, to ask the House to make a refund, and afterwards take steps to secure bonds so that such a thing will not occur in the future. That might be better than advertising that the government is not responsible for these Bills, although that suggestion is worthy of consideration.

Mr. SINCLAIR. The fish scrap produced at the government refining works Canso is a valuable fertilizer which for years has been used by the farmers in eastern Nova Scotia, and I am advised that recently the price of it to the farmers has been raised from $20 to $28 per ton. I believe that the latter price can be received for it in Boston, and different parts of the United States, but the lower price was in a way assistance given to the agricultural interest of eastern Nova Scotia, and considerable hardship has arisen from increasing the price. No doubt $20 a ton is a low price for this fish scrap, but the farmers have had it at that price for years, and it is after all good policy to encourage our farmers to use it on the land rather than to have it sent to the United States where it is mixed in the factories and shipped back to Canada and sold at a high price.

Mr. HAZEN. I will have inquiry made, but I have some reason for doubting the correctness of my hon. friend's statements, as I have not issued any order to increase the price since I have been in the department. Possibly it may have been done by some official without advising me. If the price of this fish scrap has been increased, I will ascertain what the reason is and inform my hon. friend.

At six o'clock, Committee took recess.

After Recess.

Committee resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. HAZEN. My hon. friend from Guysboro (Mr. Sinclair), asked about the price being charged for fish scrap from the reduction works. I have consulted the deputy Minister who informs me that the rule of the department is to sell this scrap to the people in the neighbourhood at the market price, which is at present $28. Really the market price is a little over $28, but the department are charging that amount.

Mr. SINCLAIR. That was not the rule of the department previously ; it was sold at a fixed price of $20 a ton for a number of years, and farmers were invited to send in requests for the number of tons they would require, some months before the opening of the season, and they received it at that price of $20. I wish to know why the old system was changed to the market price of $28.

Mr. HAZEN. I have no knowledge of the matter myself ; I can only give the information I have from the deputy minister.

Mr. PUGSLEY. This seems to me to be a particularly inappropriate time to raise the price of this fertilizer to farmers, in view of the paragraph in the speech from the Throne, saying it is proposed to devote considerable money to the encouragement of the farmer.

Mr. HAZEN. I am informed that the change to $28 was made some months ago, before the present government took office.

Mr. PUGSLEY. Perhaps that is what defeated us.

Mr. McCURDY. If I may revert to the votes for subsidies for steamships, large sums are provided in the estimates for various steamship services, particularly West Indian services. The speech from the Throne foreshadows increased trade between Canada and the West Indies, and I would suggest to the Minister of Trade and Commerce the advisability of the establishment by the Dominion government of a steamship service to the West Indies to act in conjunction with and to implement the business of the Intercolonial railway. It is common knowledge that many large railway enterprises find this a profitable and proper adjunct to their business, and I would suggest that, the government should carefully consider the establishment in conjunction with the Intercolonial railway of a line of steamships to the West Indies and British Guiana, from which we naturally expect to draw a larger trade in the near future.

Mr. FOSTER. The suggestion of my hon. friend (Mr. McCurdy), is a new one to me and involves quite a change from the system which has been in vogue for a number of years. That does not argue that it is not a defensible system or might not be an improvement. I shall talk the matter over with the Minister of Railways and Canals, who would have to have a finger in the pie. The first thing involved would be an addition to the capital account for steamships to run the service, or else we would have to hire steamers. The line of action outlined by my hon. friend is in accord with the practice of the large railway systems. Perhaps a company could do that better than a government, but it is a matter well worthy of consideration, and I shall discuss the matter with the Minister of Railways and Canals, who is kindly disposed to projects of that kind.

Mr. PUGSLEY. My hon. friend from Guysboro (Mr. Sinclair), has suggested to me to ask whether or not the Minister of Trade and Commerce would consider the establishment of steamship communication between the maritime provinces and Porto Rico. It appears that Porto Rico affords the very best possible market to the fishermen of the maritime provinces, and it might be possible by giving a reasonable subsidy to so reduce freight rates as to overcome the duty which would have been done away with if the reciprocity arrangement had gone through.

Mr. FOSTER. I am afraid my hon. friend from Guysboro (Mr. Sinclair) has been putting mischief into the head of my hon. friend from St. John (Mr. Pugsley). Probably, the number of propositions already before the department is sufficient for a year or so. As we have gone back to the question of steamship subsidies, I desire to make a change in items 141 and 142. They are both votes for the same object and read as follows:

141. Steam service between Quebec and the Isle of Orleans during the time between the closing of regular navigation in the autumn and the taking of the ice-bridge between the island and the mainland, also after the breaking up of the ice-bridge until resumption of regular navigation in the spring, $291.67.

142. Steam service between Quebec and ports on the north shore of the Isle of Orleans, $1,458.33.

I would like, in item 142 to drop out the words ' ports on the north shore of ', making it read simply, ' steam service between Quebec and the Isle of Orleans '.

Amendment agreed to.

Trade and Commerce—Bounties on manufactures of steel; lead contained in lead ore; crude petroleum and manilla fibre. To cover expenditure in connection with the administration of the Acts, $4,083.34.

Mr. MACDONALD (Pictou). What bounties are payable under the Acts?

Mr. FOSTER. Bounties on lead, on petroleum and on manilla fibre.

Mr. PUGSLEY. This is to cover the administration only?

Mr. FOSTER. Yes.

Mr. MACDONALD (Pictou). I wished to know what bounties were still alive, and to which this administration would apply.

Mr. FOSTER. Bounties are paid on lead ore, on crude petroleum, and on manilla fibre which goes into the manufacture of cordage and, being exported from the Philippine Islands is subject to export duty which does not apply in similar fibre going to the United States.

Mr. MACDONALD (Pictou). Does the hon. minister contemplate a bounty on iron and steel?

Mr. FOSTER. Not contemplating anything.

Mr. MACDONALD (Pictou). The hon. minister is not able to give us a statement about that?

Mr. SINCLAIR. Is it the policy of the government to renew the bounties on steel that are now expiring?

Mr. FOSTER. That is too large a question to give an answer to just now. It is under consideration.

Mr. OLIVER. Have the bounties on steel entirely expired?

Mr. FOSTER. Yes. This wording of the estimates was drawn when bounties on steel were still paid.

Mr. MACDONALD (Pictou). I understand that representations were made to the minister with regard to bounties on steel and pig iron?

Mr. FOSTER. Yes.

Mr. MACDONALD (Pictou). Do I understand the hon. minister to say that these are under consideration?

Mr. FOSTER. Yes.

Mr. MACLEAN (South York). Will the hon. gentleman, (Mr. Macdonald, Pictou) say whether he is in favour of them or not?

Mr. MACDONALD (Pictou). As the Third Party is so curious, I will tell him when the government's action is made known.

Mr. MACLEAN (South York). Well, I can tell the hon. gentleman now that I am in favour of them.

Mr. MACDONALD (Pictou). It would be much more interesting if he could tell us whether the hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Foster) is in favour of them or not.

Mr. MACLEAN (South York). The hon. gentleman has brought the matter up, and might explain his own position.

Mr. MACDONALD (Pictou). I will tell you.

Mr. MACLEAN (South York). When?

Mr. FOSTER. We know very well where the hon. gentleman (Mr. Macdonald, Pictou) was.

To provide for the expenses of administering the Act respecting annuities for old age, $26,250.

Mr. MACLEAN (Halifax). Has the hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Foster) recommended the dismissal of any of the officers in the annuities branch of his department?

Mr. FOSTER. I can say with reference to the Annuities Branch, that the administration of annuities will be transferred from the Department of Trade and Commerce to the Department of the Postmaster General on the 1st of January.

Mr. MACLEAN (Halifax). I was not curious about that. I asked the minister if he had recommended the dismissal of any officials from the Annuities Branch of his department.

Mr. FOSTER. All the outside officials that have been employed heretofore in lecturing and canvassing will have their services dispensed with on the 31st of December.

Mr. MACLEAN (Halifax). On what grounds?

Mr. FOSTER. On the ground that the policy of the government is opposed to the administration of the Annuities Act on that basis, and proposes to hand it over where it can be, we think, better and more economically administered.

Mr. MACLEAN (Halifax). Did the minister recommend that himself?

Mr. FOSTER. I did.

Mr. MACLEAN (Halifax). I think the minister might have waited until the transfer was made to the Post Office Department, so that the Postmaster General might have an opportunity of ascertaining whether that was a wise thing to do.

Mr. FOSTER. Does my hon. friend ask whether there have been any dismissals, or whether there will be dismissals?

Mr. MACLEAN (Halifax). I asked whether any had been dismissed.

Mr. FOSTER. One has been dismissed.

Mr MACLEAN (Halifax). What is his name?

Mr. FOSTER. McArthur.

Mr. MACLEAN (Halifax). What was the offence?

Mr. FOSTER. He did not attend to his work. He attended a little more to political work than to the work of the annuities.

Mr. MACLEAN (Halifax). Where did he come from?

Mr. FOSTER. He came from Ottawa.

Mr. MACLEAN (Halifax). Did the minister give this official an opportunity to answer the charge, or was he summarily dismissed on the recommendation of the member for Ottawa?

Mr. FOSTER. The member for Ottawa never had any communication, good, bad or indifferent, with the Minister of Trade and Commerce, neither had any politician outside of my office. It was entirely a departmental act. If my hon. friend wants the papers, all he has to do is to call for them, and I will be glad to lay them on the table of the House.

Mr. PUGSLEY. I think it might be well if my hon. friend could tell us what principle will guide the government with regard to the removal of employees of the government. The late government, I understand, after the election of 1896, adopted the policy that they would not remove any officials against whom charges of a political nature were made. except after investigation. That policy was substantially adhered to. I know that applications were made, made since I became a member of this House, for the dismissal of employees of the government. I have in mind a number of postmasters who had taken quite an active part in politics, and the Postmaster General declined to make removals except in cases where there was an investigation, or where the member for the constituency pledged his word that he had personal knowledge of an employee having been guilty of offensive partisanship. There was a statement made, so it was reported in the newspapers, by the hon. member for King's and Albert (Mr. Fowler) a few days ago, which I am sure, if my hon. friend read it, must have come as a great shock to him, in view of the many speeches he has made in this House in favour of permanency of the tenure of officials as far as possible. That hon. gentleman is reported to have said that he believed in the principle that to the victors belonged the spoils, and he assured his friends that in the county of Albert, so he is reported in the Conservative organ in St. John, that was the principle upon which he was going to act. I do no think that such a course can possibly commend itself to the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Foster). I speak thus because of remarks which I have frequently heard my hon. friend make upon that matter in this House. I think it might be well if we could have some assurance as to what will be the course of the government in that respect, whether they will remove officials simply upon the allegation of partisanship, or whether they will give to the officials against whom allegations of that character are made an opportunity of defending themselves by a reasonable and fair investigation.

Mr. FOSTER. I do not think my hon. friend who has just taken his seat (Mr. Pugsley) could have followed the course of events during the last few days. Yesterday we had a notice given that on motion to go into Supply the junior member for Halifax would raise that point. On going into Supply this afternoon my hon. friend was not ready for it, or rather thought it would be better to postpone it until Monday, when several of the members who wished to take part in the discussion would be here, and could do so. Under these circumstances, probably it would be better if my hon. friend would allow the matter to go in that way, with the understanding of course that the government and members on this side of the House are quite ready to discuss it at any time.

Mr. MACLEAN (Halifax). I am sorry to hear the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Foster) say that he proposes to transfer the administration of the annuities branch to the Post Office Department. I think that would be a very grave mistake, and I think we would hear the last of government annuities if such a transfer was made. I trust the minister will not decree that this be done until next year, so that we may have an opportunity of discussing this matter after recess, which no doubt will soon take place. I would say that the Post Office Department is not equipped for the carrying on of this work, and there must be officials now in the Trade and Commerce Department who have acquired some experience, and which experience cannot be found in the Post Office Department. I wish to submit, without having given the matter very much consideration of course, that it would be very much against the interest of this important service to make the proposed transfer. I hope the minister will at least postpone the matter for a short time, so that we may have an opportunity of discussing it later.

Mr. FOSTER. I would be disposed to allow the hon. gentleman an opportunity of discussing it if it could reasonably be done. However, action has already been taken, and it will not be possible I think to postpone that action. I would be very glad to have the House discuss the whole matter thoroughly, which no doubt it will do. But I would like the House to do it with all the papers before it. I would be glad to bring down the papers which will give the course of the administration for the last two and a half years, and give the grounds of the government for making the transfer. I am inclined to think when the whole matter is brought down and discussed that my hon. friend will agree with me that it was the best thing that could be done.

Mr. MACLEAN (Halifax). I suppose the transfer will not take place until after March 31, in any event?

Mr. FOSTER. The transfer will take place on the 1st day of January.

Mr. PELLETIER. I should regret if my hon. friend from Halifax (Mr. Maclean) was under the impression that this very important branch of public business is transferred to my department for the purpose of carrying it to the burying ground. That is not the intention at all. When the question was discussed between the Minister of Trade and Commerce and myself it was with the fullest intention of carrying on that branch with greater care. After discussing this matter also with Dr. Coulter, my Deputy Minister, we have come to the conclusion that it could be handled in our department very successfully. This is all I can say for the moment. I think the hon. member for Halifax will find by the results that the Post Office Department can handle this business in a very effective manner.

Mr. MACLEAN (Halifax). I have an open mind on the matter, I am open to conviction. I would not like to see the annuities go to the burying ground, and I hope my hon. friend the Postmaster General (Mr. Pelletier) will not allow the service to go to the Dead Letter Office, either. I am sorry the transfer is being made so quickly.

Mr. McKENZIE. Do I understand that this transfer is being made to the Post Office Department in order that the services of postmasters throughout the country may be enlisted to handle that matter?

Mr. PELLETIER. Of course the suggestion made by the hon. gentleman is a matter which will receive consideration. Certainly the postmasters will be invited to help us, and I think they will be glad to do so. The transfer will enable us to dispense with a large number of employees who hitherto have not handled this thing as satisfactorily as it might have been. I hope that the results will be such next year that the House will be unanimously of the opinion that the idea of my hon. friend the Minister of Trade and Commerce is a good one.

Mr. MACLEAN (Halifax). Does the minister propose to carry on a campaign and put lecturers in the field, or does he propose to do away with that system?

Mr. PELLETIER. I am really not in a position to go into details now. Of course, it is expected that when it becomes a branch of the business of the Post Office Department the deputy minister and I will go into it fully and try to devise something which will be workable and which will give satisfaction.

Mr. MACLEAN (Halifax). That is all very well, but I think it would be better for the minister and his deputy to work it out fully first and then make the transfer afterwards, if they think it desirable to do so. I am rather suspicious that this is the modus operandi adopted in order to get rid of some officials in the service.

Mr. FOSTER (North Toronto). I will take the first opportunity available to assure my hon. friend that there is nothing at all in that.

Mr. MACLEAN (Halifax). I will take time to consider the assurance.

Mr. FOSTER (North Toronto). If my hon. friend will date back awhile to the discussion which took place in this House when the annuities Bill was passed, that discussion will show him varying views on each side of the House. I subscribed very strongly to this policy at that time, and I am inclined to think that Sir Wilfrid Laurier himself agreed with the idea, but rather concluded that as the Act was the creation of the then Minister of Trade and Commerce it should go to his department for inauguration.

Mr. MACLEAN (South York). I would like to ask the hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Foster) if these annuities are in any way in competition with the insurance companies?

Mr. FOSTER (North Toronto). Well, it is a form of investment and, therefore, you might say they are. I think the idea is an excellent one and I think the Act is a good one to carry out the idea, but I think the House will agree, when we come to the particulars, that the expense in connection with it in the Department of Trade and Commerce, or which would be connected with it in the Department of Finance, overburdened the thing to such a degree that it could not fairly be carried out by that system.

Mr. MACKENZIE. I would like to ask if any legislative enactment is necessary for this transfer. I see that for other transfers from one department to another legislative enactments are necessary. If there is any legislative enactment necessary for this transfer, we will have an opportunity of discussing the change when the Act is brought down.

Mr. FOSTER (North Toronto). It depends entirely on the legislation. In connection with the Annuities Act there is no legislation required. The Act provides that it can be administered by any department to which it is assigned.

Mr. CLARKE (Essex). How many officials are there in the outside services whose services will be dispensed with?

Mr. FOSTER (North Toronto). All the lecturers and canvassers.

Mr. CLARKE (Essex). I understand that there is one gentleman who is a lecturer for the whole Dominion—Dr. Samson. He will be dispensed with?

Mr. FOSTER (North Toronto). He will be dispensed with; all the lecturers and canvassers will be dispensed with.

Mr. CLARKE (Essex). How many are there?

Mr. FOSTER (North Toronto). There were fifteen. Some have resigned, others have gone out and I think twelve remain.

Mr. MACLEAN (Halifax). The Annuities Act will certainly be a dead letter unless the services of these lecturers are continued and even added to. In my judgment it is utterly impossible to expect the successful operation of the Annuities Act if it is left entirely to the administration of the Post Office Department. I do not think that the Minister of Trade and Commerce should dismiss these lecturers from the service. If there is to be a transfer of administration from one department to another these officials should certainly be transferred to the Post Office Department. In my judgment the dismissal of these lecturers is absolutely indefensible, because it is utterly impossible to expect the public to become interested in this Annuities Act unless there is a campaign of publicity being carried on from day to day. One of the difficulties in the administration of this Act was that there was not a sufficient number of lecturers in the field throughout the provinces. It does look to me that this contemplated transfer is a move to get rid of some of the officials in the service of the government.

Mr. FOSTER (North Toronto). My hon. friend may have that opinion and he may revise that opinion. My hon. friend may think that and it may not be the opinion of the majority of the House. Probably we will get at a better and more reasonable conclusion when we have all the facts before us, and I would be very glad if any hon. gentleman would move for the papers, or, if no hon. gentleman does move for the papers, I shall be very glad to lay them on the table of the House.

Mr. MACLEAN (Halifax). I am not objecting so much to the transfer to the Post Office department. I concede that there may be some things to be said in favour of it, but I do not see why the officials in the service should be dismissed.

Mr. LAW. I would like to ask the Minister if the postmasters will be paid any extra salaries in connection with the duties which are put upon them ?

Mr. FOSTER (North Toronto). Now, there is a thrifty member of parliament. Postmasters at the present time are agents for the sale of annuities and are paid a certain percentage for the work they do.

Mr. LAW. Yes, and their work will be increased very largely if these duties are taken out of the hands of the lecturers and put into the hands of the postmasters.

Mr. FOSTER (North Toronto). If their duties are greater and the crop they reap is larger, their percentage will also rise in the same proportion.

Mr. EMMERSON. It will be impossible for postmasters to give any attention to work of that character, and I would like to know whether it is the intention to have this publicity work carried on by means of lecturers or canvassers ?

Mr. FOSTER (North Toronto). The transfer was based upon the principle that lecturers and canvassers should be dispensed with. They have been dispensed with and on that principle the government's policy has been carried out.

Mr. EMMERSON. No new ones are to be appointed ?

Mr. FOSTER. No.

Mr. MACLEAN (Halifax). I do not quite see why the Minister of Trade and Commerce will not give the committee the promise that this transfer will not take place until the end of the fiscal year, so that in the meantime hon. members may have an opportunity of studying the matter. Every member of the government has, on frequent occasions since the opening of parliament, given as an excuse for not doing a certain thing, the fact that he has been very busy and has not been able to give very much consideration to anything. That is quite natural and something that every hon. gentleman can quite understand.

It is quite obvious that neither the Postmaster General nor the Minister of Trade and Commerce nor any of the members of the government have been able to give this matter the consideration it deserves. Many people throughout the country take a deep interest in the principle of government annuities, and surely no public interst will suffer by postponing this transfer until the end of the fiscal year. Of course it is not at all a party question.

Mr. FOSTER. If it is a waste of public money to carry the system on as at present—and that is my firm conviction after careful consideration—then it would be wrong for the government to continue it for three months longer. I have considered the matter and have come to a reasoned conviction upon it.

Mr. MACLEAN (Halifax). What was the objection to the system; was it too expensive?

Mr. FOSTER. There were several objections, but I would prefer to discuss them with the papers before the House.

Mr. MACLEAN (Halifax). Well if the hon. gentleman has all the facts in his head now he might dispense a little of the information amongst us.

Mr. FOSTER. I think we should have all the papers before the House, and intelligently discuss the matter.

Mr. SINCLAIR. The Minister of Trade and Commerce should take us into his confidence now, and tell us why he is making this transfer. For instance. I would like to know for my own guidance how much the minister expects to save by the change.

Mr. FOSTER. I suppose I might give a general outline by saying that in the first place it never has seemed to me that there was anything germane between an annuity system and the Department of Trade and Commerce. It has seemed to me that either the Finance Department or the Post Office Department was the proper department to administer the system; the Finance Department having a system of savings gradually diminishing, and the Post Office a system of savings continually increasing. The Department of Finance has no extended agencies reaching over this country, and it would have to carry on the system by a propaganda which would involve expense, whereas the Post Office Department reaches every section of the country, gets in contact with almost all the people, has 13,000 or 14,000 offices distributed throughout the length and breadth of the land, has a large number of money order offices, and has facilities already existing for advertising and canvassing in every part of the country. It would seem reasonable that the Post Office Department can, with a minimum of expense. and a maximum of efficiency administer an act of that kind. That is the view I took when the Bill was discussed in the House, and I think Sir Wilfrid Laurier concurred in it. It was placed in the Department of Trade and Commerce, and the moment it was placed there the staff commenced to grow, and it has grown larger and larger until I found in the department some fifteen lecturers and canvassers and a large staff besides, the cost of which amounted last year to about $40,000. If the principle be good that public lecturers and canvassers shall be put in the field in order to make a propaganda, that principle could not be denied extension to every part of the country, and if you have a canvasser and lecturer in one county or group of counties, by what right should you deny every other county or group of counties lecturers and canvassers.

These lecturers, moving about from one part of the country to the other, are, to a certain extent, irresponsible. They have to arrange and to advertise their meetings and conduct their meetings, and in doing all of this, a great deal of expense is incurred. It has been found practically impossible to supervise fairly well and keep those expenses within bounds. When the papers are laid before the House, they will amply prove what I have said. The abuses incident to a system of that kind, the irresponsibility to a certain extent, and the almost impossibility of constant and close supervision, render it impracticable. In some instances we paid for lectures which were never delivered, although the papers were made out as though the meeting place had been arranged and the chairman had presided, and although the number of those present was set forth and the quality of the audience, namely, whether it consisted of traders, bankers, farmers or fishermen. All these were set forth in detail, but in the end we found that no meeting had taken place and that consequently no lecture had been delivered. The difficulty of supervising a system of that kind is at once evident to anyone that looks into it. It is perfectly right to encourage thrift in the people, but there are different ways in which that encouragement and education can be given ; and to my mind it seems quite sufficient for the purpose if the department should place in the hands of the people, as well as it can, a safe and sound form of investment for their savings. That was done under the Annuities Act, the government did its part by having these annuities put on a basis of four per cent, which was a generous one for the government, considering that the government undertook the expenses of management. In Great Britain, where the savings of the people are looked after in various ways by the government itself, the Post Office is the favourite channel for distributing information to those who wish to have a safe method of investing their earnings. Lately in Great Britain the authorities have called the attention of the smaller investing public to the value of consols at their present rate as a method of investment. But they did not enter into any propaganda for that purpose ; they simply put the matter in the hands of the post office officials and let the public make up their minds as to whether they would take advantage of this means of investment or not. The difficulties I have spoken of resulted in an expenditure of some forty thousand dollars, with the prospect of a very large increase, thus bringing the cost to the government of the sale of these annuities anywhere from nine to twenty-five per cent. I saw no possibility of diminishing that cost under an independent management by a department which had not the facilities for carrying out the scheme. Those were the chief reasons which led me to believe, in the first place, that the expense was too great, and in the second place that there was no prospect of avoiding an increase in that expense every year. It was very difficult for the Department of Trade and Commerce to supervise, in fact, it was impossible for that department to supervise the expenditure closely and thoroughly. But in the Post Office Department we have all the facilities. It is useless to say that the money-order post office people are not sufficiently intelligent and wide awake to explain these annuity investments to the public. It is also useless to say that with our numerous post offices and officials, this system cannot be more economically carried out by the Post Office Department than by an independent agency. These are the chief reasons which led me to the conclusion that it was not wise or proper to keep it under the administration of an independent department which had few facilities for carrying it out, and which had to acquire new and expensive machinery in order to carry it out. I consulted with my hon. colleague the Postmaster General and his efficient Deputy, and we came to that conclusion.

Mr. MACLEAN (Halifax). I am quite prepared to concede that the Post Office Department is perhaps the better department to administer the Annuities Act. At any rate, there is a great deal to say in its favour ; but I am sure the hon. Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Foster), has convinced every hon. member here that the administration by the Post Office Department in the manner he contemplates, will result in the Act becoming a failure, and I am convinced that the hon. gentleman and the Postmaster General have not given the matter sufficient consideration. True, he has consulted the Deputy Postmaster General—and a very efficient Deputy he is ; and I readily understand that there are many reasons why this matter should be placed in the Post Office Department ; but when the hon. gentleman justifies the transfer upon the ground that there will be more publicity by putting the administration of the Act in the Post Office, I disagree with him. It is absurd to think that the intricacies of an insurance scheme can be explained by ninety-five per cent of the postmasters with any degree of satisfaction. I submit that there is no other way of making the annuity scheme popular than by a campaign of publicity to be carried on by lectures. The hon. Minister says there have been employed only fifteen lecturers in Canada. That number was too small and should have been increased. I know that in Nova Scotia, a great mistake was made by the late administration by sending lecturers around in the summer season, but even then they did a great deal of good. I remember in the early part of June of this year, after the close of a meeting in a certain section of Lunenburg, in which I happened to be, I was told by one of those attending at the meeting, that he had decided to take out an annuity the following day.

The following afternoon I happened to be in another place where the same lecturer was explaining the annuities scheme, and after the meeting I met two other persons who told me they were very grateful for having heard the annuities scheme explained, and had made up their minds to take out an annuity. The Annuities Act might as well be repealed, as be transferred to the Post Office Department without a publicity campaign through the system of lecturers. It is in the interest of the state that thrift should be encouraged, and it is impossible to convince the citizens of the advantages of thrift except by a system of lecturing. The Minister of Trade and Commerce can hardly be serious when he says this Act can be administered by the agencies of the Post Office Department. If it has cost $40,000 a year in the past that is not a large sum for promulgating the principles involved in the annuities scheme. Even if it should cost double the amount it would be money well expended. I submit that neither minister has had an opportunity of studying this matter as it should be studied before making such an important departure, and that no public interest would suffer from postponing the transfer say until the end of the fiscal year. The ministers have given no reason for the proposed dismissal of these lecturers. The minister says that meetings have been advertised and have not taken place. That might happen any where in Canada for reasons easily explained. I happen to know of one case where a meeting was advertised during the summer in a community where it would be impossible to get an audience together at that time.

Mr. NESBITT. The decision in this matter depends largely on the object the government has in view. If they do not care to increase the annuities they are taking a very good means of stopping the increase. If the services of lecturers who are really competent are discontinued, that will further tend to reduce the number of annuities taken out. A great many postmasters or postmistresses through the country are perfectly capable of explaining the annuity system, but on the other hand some of them are not. The Minister of Trade and Commerce is well aware of that. Personally I have no money to invest in annuities, but if I had I would go to the post office to invest it. Many, however, would not do that. Competition in insurance is very keen, and the insurance agent would thoroughly explain how much better and cheaper it would be for a man to take out an annuity with the insurance companies. The services of the lecturers have done a great deal of good, and I know of people who have invested in annuities on account of the lectures they have heard. I believe the Minister of Trade and Commerce is absolutely capable of administering this system and that he really has the matter at heart, and I think it would be wise of him to reconsider his decision to do away entirely with the lecturers, if he wishes to increase the number of people who invest in annuities. These government annuities must be good and if the government pay the expense of management no company can compete with them. It is a new thing, any new business requires a certain amount of expense in introducing it, especially in a wide country like Canada, but in time there is a probability that without advertising the system could be successfully administered through the postmasters and postmistresses. If it is placed in their hands now I fear we would immediately see a great falling off in results. I have nothing but good wishes towards the annuity system, I have no interest to serve, and I only wish for its good under whatever department it may be.

Mr. MACLEAN (Halifax). I am willing to accept the offer of the Minister of Trade and Commerce to bring down the papers on Monday, and you will let the item stand over until then. If he would lay the papers on the table of the House early on Monday we would have an opportunity of seeing them before three o'clock.

Mr. McKENZIE. We may not have another opportunity to discuss this matter, there is one point I would like to have dealt with. I confess I know little about the workings of the Annuities Act. But, as the proposal seems to be that the working of the annuity system shall come in part into the hands of the postmasters throughout the country, it would be well if we could form some idea of how it will work. If the Postmaster General (Mr. Pelletier) has matured the scheme sufficiently, I would like him to explain in a general way this new proposal. Suppose the case of a person buying an annuity through the agency of a country postmaster, what would the procedure be, and what regulations does the Postmaster General intend to provide? The purchaser of an annuity has to pay money, and that money must find its way through some channel to the hands of the Receiver General. The Postmaster General must provide safeguards against the loss of the money. The ordinary country postmaster gives very slim security for the proper discharge of his duties and for accounting for the little moneys that come into his hands. If I understand this matter, it means the hand ling, possibly of large sums of money by these country postmasters, and an increase in the moneys to be transmitted by mail. What safeguards will be thrown around the handling of these moneys?

Mr. PELLETIER. As to the safety of the moneys to be handled, I think the House may rest assured that, with the very good organization that exists in the Post Office Department, there will be no great danger for the comparatively small additions that will be made to the very large sums already handled by postmasters and taken care of by the department. When this matter was first mentioned to me by my hon. colleague the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Foster) it struck me at once that there was a good deal in what he said. And I think the House, at least the majority of hon. members, must have been convinced by what he said that there are several first class reasons for the change he has proposed. I can only speak of the subject on general lines, for I have not gone into the details. So far, my deputy minister knows more about the details than I do. And I must state here that that gentleman has my full confidence, and from what I have known of him since I came to office, he is a worthy officer and fully efficient. As I say, he has gone into the question more fully than I have, and he reported to me that the reasons given by my hon. friend the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Foster) are good reasons. And he tells me that he is satisfied that the Post Office Department will be well able to take care of this part of the public business, and that many good public purposes will be served by the change, amongst others that, instead of having fifteen agents for the whole of Canada, we are going to have 13,384, which seems to me a good increase, especially as it will cost the country nothing, or practically nothing. In the first place, our present postmasters all over the country are not very well paid. Their salaries are not what they might be, and I perhaps may go so far as to say, are not what they ought to be. I think this will be admitted on both sides of the House. If we can save the country the money now spent for lecturers, and can also have an increase of business through the post office, by giving the postmasters a percentage on the business which they assist in bringing in, in an indirect way, their present salaries, and the country and the people interested also will benefit. I need not go into what my hon. friend the Minister of Trade and Commerce has said—he has said it too well, to make any repetition necessary. But the facts I have given, I think, will support what he has said. I have not gone into the matter very deeply; I have not had time. But I have gone into it deeply enough to be able to state to the House that I feel sure that we shall make a success of this work as it will be organized. With the general ideas we now have, and which we will develop more fully, I think that when we come back to the House next year, both sides of the House will agree that we have attained good results, and that the hon. members who have spoken to-night will feel satisfied that the move has been a good one.

Hon. R. L. BORDEN (Prime Minister). I would suggest to the hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Maclean) that as this is the last item it would perhaps be as well that it should pass. The principal objection that I have heard from him, is with regard to dispensing with the services of the lecturers and canvassers. I think it would be only right to give the proposals of the Minister of Trade and Commerce and the Postmaster General a fair trial. It seems to me that there is a great deal of reason in what they urge. The Post Office Department touches the community at 15,000 different points; and one would think that advantage might be taken of that organization to carry on the administration of this Act in a less expensive way and perhaps with even more efficiency than at present. However, should the hon. member prove to be right—and, no one can foresee absolutely—the matter can be taken up in the future along the lines which he suggests, and canvassers and lecturers can be employed if that course is found necessary in the public interest.

Mr. MACLEAN (Halifax). I am content that the item pass, but I do not quite understand what incentive I should have to go through this large number of papers that are going to be brought down, when a number of officials have already been dismissed, and the transfer has been made.

Mr. MACLEAN (South York). We have 13,000 postmasters who would make efficient agents, no doubt. There was a meeting of the Postmasters' Association in Toronto the other day, and they passed a resolution in favour of having increased duties imposed upon them so that they might implement their salaries. which are at the present moment rather meagre. They suggested as one additional duty the expansion of the parcel-post system, about which we have heard to-day in this chamber. It might be a good idea to increase the duties of postmasters, not only in this but in other directions. The post office in every community ought to be used in some way to render better service to the public. The post office ought to be the centre of the telegraph system, of the savings bank, of money orders, and of this annuity business. It is a splendidly organized institution, it costs very little, and can be used in many ways to render further service to the community.

Some resolutions reported.

WAYS AND MEANS.

Mr. WHITE moved that the House go into Committee of the Whole on Ways and Means.

Motion agreed to.

(In the Committee).

Mr. WHITE moved:

Resolved, that towards making good the Supply granted to His Majesty on account of certain expenses of the public service for the financial year ending 31st March, 1912, the sum of $48,680,561.37 be granted out of the consolidated revenue fund of Canada.

Motion agreed to, resolution reported, read the first and second time. and agreed to.

Mr. MACLEAN (Halifax). I would like to inquire whether the government will afford the House an opportunity for discussing the matter of the dismissal of officials. We have already discussed it on going into Supply, but will the government afford us every opportunity desirable?

Mr. FOSTER. Yes.

ADJOURNMENT OVER CHRISTMAS HOLIDAYS.

Mr. PUGSLEY. I would ask my hon. friend who is leading the House (Mr. Foster), whether he can give us any information as to what the government propose to do in regard to adjournment over the Christmas holidays. Some gentlemen on this side of the House, at all events, would like to make some arrangements based upon the time when the House will adjourn.

Mr. FOSTER. On Monday when the Prime Minister is here he can answer that question. The leader of the opposition is not here to-night?

Mr. PUGSLEY. No.

Mr. FOSTER. Then the matter had better go until Monday. I am informed by the Chief Whip, however. that an arrangement has been made to adjourn on Thursday evening until January 9.

Mr. McKENZIE. May I call the Prime Minister's attention to the fact that Tuesday is not a good day for maritime province members to be back here because that would necessitate them leaving home on Saturday or Sunday. If we adjourned until the 10th, which would be Wednesday, that would enable them to leave on Monday morning and be here on time.

Mr. BORDEN. We desire in every way to meet the convenience of members and I will give the hon. gentleman's suggestion very careful consideration.

SUPPLY BILL.

Mr. WHITE (Leeds) moved for leave to introduce Bill (No. 18), for granting to his Majesty certain sums of money for the public service for the financial year ending March 31, 1912.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the first and second time, considered in committee, reported, read the third time and passed.

ADJOURNMENT — BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE.

Mr. FOSTER (North Toronto) moved the adjournment of the House.

Mr. PUGSLEY. What business will be taken up on Monday?

Mr. FOSTER (North Toronto). That is private members day.

Mr. PUGSLEY. But, after the business of private members is disposed of, because there will be very little of that?

Mr. FOSTER (North Toronto). There are some government Bills on the Order Paper and it may be possible to take one or more of these.

Motion agreed to, and House adjourned at 9.40 p.m.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

MONDAY, December 4, 1911.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

Emmerson,

Mr. BORDEN moved that the said report be now concurred in.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. I would suggest that my hon. friend (Mr. Borden) allow this motion to stand until to-morrow, so that members may have an opportunity of looking at the lists prepared.

Mr. SPEAKER. Stand.

Mr. BORDEN. There are also the list of the House of Commons members of the Joint Committee on the Library of Parliament and the list of the Committee on Debates. I suppose it would be better to let these also stand until to-morrow.

RESTAURANT COMMITTEE.

Mr. BORDEN moved:

That Messrs. Boyce, Clarke (Essex), Chisholm (Inverness) and Sharpe (Lisgar) be appointed to assist Mr. Speaker in the direction of the restaurant so far as the interests of the House of Commons are concerned, and to act as members of the committee of both Houses on the restaurant; and that a message be sent to the Senate to acquaint their honours therewith.

Motion agreed to.

INQUIRIES ACT AMENDMENT.

Hon. C. J. DOHERTY (Minister of Justice) moved for leave to introduce Bill (No. 19) to amend the Inquiries Act. He said: The Bill contains only one clause, and perhaps the reading of that clause will be the best explanation of the measure. This is to amend the Inquiries Act, Chap. 104 of the Revised Statutes of Canada. Under Part I, authority is given to appoint commissioners to inquire into any matters that affect the general public interest; and in Part II, provision is made for the issue of commissions for departmental inquiries. This Bill provides, with regard to both classes of commissions, that, where the commission so specifies, the commissioners appointed shall have power to engage the services of such accountants, engineers, technical officers, or other experts, clerks, reporters and assistants, as they deem necessary, and also to engage the services of counsel to aid the commissioners in the inquiry. As to these powers it might be said that they were implied in the deputing of authority to inquire. But this measure goes on the principle that what would go without saying would go more clearly if said. But the more substantial part of the Bill is in what follows. It empowers the commissioners—

To authorize and depute to such accountants, engineers, technical advisers or other experts, or any qualified persons, the power to take evidence, inquire into and report to the commissioners upon any matter within the scope of the commission as may be directed by the commissioners and such persons shall, in the execution of the powers so deputed or authorized, have the same powers as the commissioners to issue subpœnas, enforce the attendance of witnesses, compel them to give evidence, and otherwise conduct the inquiry.

The power intended to be conferred is, to put it briefly, the power of delegation of the right of the commissioners to inquire. That power is to be exercised only when the commission specially confer it. It has been deemed advisable to give this power in view of the fact that in certain cases, either by reason of the wide range of the matter to be inquired into, the number of details that might be required to be considered, or for other reasons, it might be found both more expeditious and more advantageous that the commissioners should be placed in such a position that they could place the authority to inquire into some particular portion or portions of the matters committed to them in the hands of a sub-commission which would report to them.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the first time .

GRAND TRUNK PACIFIC RAILWAY.

Mr. MACDONALD. I would like, with the consent of the House, to ask leave to introduce a Bill entitled, 'An Act respecting the Grand Trunk Pacific Railway Company.'

Mr. SPEAKER. I am told there is no notice of the Bill, therefore it would be irregular.

Mr. MACDONALD. I was instructed that it could be introduced with the consent of the House. However, I will move to suspend the rule in order to permit me to introduce the Bill.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. The hon. gentleman might explain the Bill.

Mr. MACDONALD. The Bill is one which I have been asked to introduce to provide for the renewal of the charter of the Grand Trunk Pacific Railway Company, which has expired. It is necessary in order to permit construction to go on, and in order to avoid a technical difficulty which would otherwise arise unless the matter was dealt with immediately. I therefore move the suspension of the rule.

Mr. SPEAKER. I think before the rule could be suspended a recommendation is required from the committee of the House, which has not yet been given.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. I would suggest that, with the unanimous consent of the House, the rule can be suspended. I may call your attention to a case which happened many years ago where the charter of a certain bank in Prince Edward Island was renewed. In that case the Bill was introduced, read the first, second and third time in one day, with the unanimous consent of the House.

Mr. BORDEN. I think any rule, assuming necessity, might be suspended, but only with the unanimous consent of the House. The circumstances of this case are, as I understand them, that the time limit provided in the charter of the Grand Trunk Pacific for the continuance of its construction work, expired on the 1st of Dec. The same limit is to be found in the contract of the Grand Trunk Pacific railway: it is the same in both cases. These are two entirely distinct matters. The Grand Trunk Pacific Railway charter might be extended so far as the time for completing construction is concerned to a particular period, and yet the government might not see fit to extend for a similar period the term fixed in the contract. The urgency of this case was presented to the government, and it was proposed that a Bill for both purposes should be introduced; the matter came before the government only recently. It was pointed out to the company that two different questions were to be considered. Now the urgency of the situation as regards the Grand Trunk Pacific railway is this, that the time fixed for the completion of their work under the terms of their charter having expired, the company has now no legal status to continue its work on the uncompleted section until parliament shall have extended the time. As I have already mentioned, that period expired on the 1st of Dec. It seems to me, therefore, a proper case in which the rule of the House should be suspended in order that the work upon construction may not be suspended. It is a choice between one thing or the other. Strictly speaking, the company has no authority to proceed with the uncompleted portion of its line after the 1st day of December, unless parliament sees fit to extend the time for completion. The method which has been adopted in the Bill which has been mentioned by my hon. friend from Pictou (Mr. Macdonald), is to provide, in an amendment to the charter of the company, that the time should be extended for such a period as may be fixed by the government under the terms of an order in council, dependent upon authority for that purpose being given by this House. It is apparent, therefore, that the Bill which has been introduced by the hon. member for Pictou, is one of two Bills which will have to be passed by unanimous consent, if the purpose is to be achieved; in the first place a Bill extending the time fixed by the charter of the Grand Trunk Pacific railway for such a period as may be determined, and another Bill which will be presented by my hon. friend the Minister of Railways, if the House sees fit to suspend the rule in both cases.

Mr. SPEAKER. The rule I have in mind was Rule 40 :

Two days' notice shall be given of a motion for leave to present a Bill, resolution or address, for the appointment of any committee, or for the putting of a question.

Thus applying to the present case. Then Rule 41 says :

A motion may be made by unanimous consent of the House, without previous notice.

Mr. MACDONALD moved that Rule 40 be suspended in relation to Bill (No. 20), respecting the Grand Trunk Pacific Railway Company.

Motion agreed to, and Bill introduced and read the first time.

Mr. COCHRANE moved that Rule No. 40 be suspended in relation to Bill (No. 21), respecting the National Transcontinental railway.

Motion agreed to, and Bill introduced and read the first time.

Was any promise made by the present Minister of Labour, or other government supporters, in the province of Ontario during the recent election campaign, to the effect that if the Conservative party were returned to power all those who lost money through the failure of the Farmers' Bank, would be reimbursed by the government?
2. Did the Toronto 'Globe' of August 26, 1911, state as follows:—

'That in or about the month of June 1908, the manager of the Toronto 'World,' of which paper W. F. Maclean, Conservative member for South York, is chief owner, made an arrangement with W. R. Travers, manager of the Farmers' Bank, to solicit deposits for the Farmers' Bank, which, it is now claimed by the 'News' and other Conservative organs, was rotten from its inception.

'That in return Travers agreed to loan funds of the bank to the Toronto 'World.'

'That in pursuance of this understanding the manager of the Toronto 'World' procured by the exercise of influence over Col. Matheson, the Provincial Treasurer, an increase in the deposit of the province of Ontario in the Farmers' Bank from $10,000 to $35,000.

'That contemporaneously with the increase of the deposit of the province of Ontario to $35,000, Travers, for the bank, loaned Dr. Beattie Nesbitt $25,000 and the Toronto 'World' $10,000, and wrote a letter to Col. Matheson, informing him that these loans had been made, a copy of which letter is now, or was recently, on file among the papers of the Farmers' Bank.

'That Col. Matheson denies the receipt of this letter.

'That with the $25,000 thus obtained Dr. Beattie Nesbitt was enabled to pay the first instalment of the purchase price of the Keeley mine, the speculation which finally wrecked the bank and drove Nesbitt out of the country—a fugitive from justice."

Mr. BORDEN:

The extension of the boundaries of Manitoba has been under consideration, and a basis of settlement has been reached respecting the financial terms which have hitherto been in dispute. The basis adopts the principle of equality of treatment as between Manitoba and the other prairie provinces. The application of this principle to the details is being worked out.

NE TEMERE DECREE.

*Mr. PUGSLEY:

1. In view of the statement made by Mr. Burnham, the member for West Peterborough, from his seat in this House on the 24th instant, as reported in Hansard, pages 327 and 328, to the effect that in the province of Ontario the Ne Temere decree was used against the late government and that it played an important part in the recent general elections, will the government inform the House in what respect, if any, the late government was, in the opinion of the Ministry, censurable by reason of or in connection with said decree?

2. Having reference to the various questions asked of the late government at the last session of parliament, and answered by Sir Allen Aylesworth, late Minister of Justice, which questions and answers were as follows:

Questions by Mr. Sexsmith (see Hansard, page 6,269).

'1. Under the laws of Canada, or of the several provinces, are marriages valid when contracted between persons of different religious beliefs? If so, in what cases?'

'2. Has any one the right to urge persons who have contracted such valid marriages to disregard them on the ground that they are invalid?

'3. If such right does not exist what is the remedy?'

Answer by Sir Allen Aylesworth:—

'1. There is no Dominion legislation on the subject. The solemnization of marriage in the provinces is, under the British North America Act, matter entirely of provincial jurisdiction.

'Section 92 of that statute enacts that in each province the legislature may exclusively make laws in relation to matters coming within the classes of subjects next hereinafter enumerated, that is to say:

'2. The solemnization of marriage in the provinces.'

Question by Mr. Hughes, the present Minister of Militia and Defence (see Hansard, pages 7207-8).

'1. Is the government, or any member thereof, aware that the hierarchy of the Roman Catholic church and the courts of Quebec province are said to decline to recognize as valid a marriage between a Roman Catholic man and a Roman Catholic woman if solemnized by other than an ecclesiastic of the Roman Catholic church?

'2. Is the government, or any member thereof, aware that, as alleged, ecclesiastics of the Roman Catholic church declare invalid, marriages solemnized between a Roman Catholic and one of another faith throughout the Dominion of Canada unless the ceremony be performed by an ecclesiastic of the Roman Catholic church?

'3. Under the British North America Act, section , does not marriage come under the jurisdiction of the parliament of Canada?

'4. Is it the intention of the government to enact legislation which throughout Canada will make a marriage legal in any and every province if performed between persons of the same creed or faith or of different creeds or faiths, in any province by any official or officials recognized for such purpose in any other province; in short, to enact a Dominion of Canada marriage law which will accept for every part of Canada and make lawful in every province a marriage consummated under the law or form of any province?

'5. Is it the intention of the government to make it a criminal offence, and to prescribe punishment for any person, ecclesiastic or other, who intrudes or promulgates or publishes or declares any rule or dogma of any ecclesiastical organization casting a doubt upon or declaring invalid, or in any sense reflecting on the legality of a marriage performed by any official recognized as entitled to perform a marriage ceremony, or setting up any such ecclesiastical dogma or rule as overriding the law of Canada?

'6. Is it the intention of the government to declare valid a marriage solemnized in Quebec or in any other province of Canada between two persons of the Roman Catholic faith, providing the officiating clergyman be a Protestant, and for the removal of doubt to make the law retroactive?

'7. Is it the intention of the government to permit any ecclesiastical dogma or rule to override the laws of the people of Canada?

'8. Is it the intention of the government of Canada to restore to legitimacy every woman who supposed her marriage legally consummated, and also the children born of such marriage?

'9. Will the government enact legislation compelling alimony to the woman where the man has left her under the ecclesiastical dogma of any church?'

Answer by Sir Allen Aylesworth:—

'1 and 2. Neither the government, nor any department of the government, has any knowledge in relation to the matters referred to in these questions other than such as may be gathered from newspaper articles or references to the subject.

'3. Under the British North America Act the subject of marriage and divorce is one in regard to which parliament may legislate, but everything relating to the solemnization of marriage in the provinces is within the exclusive powers of the provincial legislature.

'As to the remaining questions, other than question 7, legislation of the character indicated in the questions would appear to refer wholly to the persons by whom, or the form of the ceremony by which, marriages in any province could be validly solemnized, and in that view such legislation would seem not competent for the parliament of Canada to enact. Legislation such as is indicated in questions 8 and 9 would seem also to relate to property and civil rights in the province, and on that ground as well to be matter for the exclusive consideration of the provincial authorities.

'7. The government is not acquainted with any law of the people of Canada which has been overridden by any ecclesiastical dogma.'

Question by Mr. Taylor (Leeds) (see Hansard, page 8585).

'1. Has the Dominion government power to legalize or validate any or every marriage solemnized anywhere in Canada?

'2. Has the government taken any steps to ascertain the power of this parliament in this regard?

'3. If not, does the government propose to take any steps for that purpose?

'4. Has the opinion of the law officers of the Crown been asked or obtained upon this question?

'5. Does the government propose to obtain the opinion of the law officers of the Crown thereon?'

Answer by Sir Allen Aylesworth:—

'1. The government does not consider that it possesses any such power.

'2, 3, 4 and 5. The government has not considered the advisability of taking any of the courses suggested.'

Question by Mr. Taylor (Leeds), (see Hansard, pages 10195-6).

'1. Has the parliament of Canada the power to legalize or validate any or every marriage solemnized in Canada?

'2. Does the government consider it desirable that steps should be taken to prevent cruelty and injustice by reason of marriages contracted in good faith before a duly ordained clergyman, but afterwards declared invalid?

'3. Does the government propose to take any steps for this purpose or in this connection?'

Answer by Sir Allen Aylesworth:—

'1. The question calls for an opinion upon a matter of law in regard to which the government would desire to be advised if necessity arose.

'2 and 3. The government is of the opinion that it has no power or jurisdiction in the premises.'

Does the government concur in the views and opinions thus expressed by Sir Allen Aylesworth in reply to said questions respectively?

3. If it does not concur therein, in what respects does it differ therefrom?

4. Is the government of the opinion that either it or the parliament of Canada has power to deal with such decree?

5. Does the government intend to take, or to ask parliament to take, any action? If so, what, regarding such decree, or the solemnization of marriages, or the law relating to marriage?

Mr. BORDEN:

1. The government does not feel called upon to express any opinion upon the statement alluded to.

2 and 3. The government would regard with the utmost respect and consideration the opinion of the late Minister of Justice upon any question of law whether relating to the interpretation of the British North America Act or otherwise and it entirely agrees that the question raised as to the respective powers of parliament and of provincial legislatures is one of legal interpretation upon which eminent lawyers may differ.

4. The government has no legislative power. As to the powers of parliament this question is answered by the answer to the previous question.

5. The matter has not been under consideration.

Mr. PUGSLEY. I do not think that my hon. friend the Prime Minister (Mr. Borden) has answered question No. 4. The hon. gentleman states that opinions may differ. My question is as to what is the opinion of the government with regard to the powers of parliament.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order.

Mr. SPEAKER. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Pugsley) is out of order. There can be no debate at this stage. An hon. member is entitled simply to ask a question and it remains for a minister of the Crown to answer it as he sees fit.

Mr. PUGSLEY. Do I understand that the member who has asked a question has no right to draw your attention to the fact that the question has not been answered?

Mr. SPEAKER. No.

Mr. PUGSLEY. That has been done over and over again since I have been a member of this House.

Mr. SPEAKER. Yes, but not at this stage.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order.

Mr. PUGSLEY. Do I understand you to rule, Mr. Speaker, that I have no right to call attention to the fact that the question has not been answered?

Mr. SPEAKER. When the minister has given his answer that precludes any debate.

Mr. PUGSLEY. Even though the question is not answered?

Mr. SPEAKER. Yes.

In answer to the first question: Yes. To the 2nd question; At the request of reliable parties who assert that this gentleman has meddled very actively in politics during the last elections.

To the third question: Anthime Martel, on the recommendation of Mr. Morin, lawyer, and many other persons.

WEIGHING GOODS IN CUSTOMS.

Mr. WEICHEL:

1. Is the government aware of the alleged recent issue by the French government of a ministerial decree, re weighing all goods in customs, to take effect on January 1 next?
2. Is the government cognizant of the fact that the enforcement of this decree will require all goods shipped to France to be removed, on arrival, from the cases or boxes in which they are contained and the goods weighed separately from the packing which may surround them?
3. Can the government inform the House whether this new decree will apply to Canadian exports to France equally as to the United Kingdom and foreign countries?
4. If so, will the government take steps to join with the boards of trade of Great Britain in such representations to the French government to secure modification in the decree as will minimize the inconvenience which it is feared the order will involve?

Mr. FOSTER:

1. No.
2. Answered by No. 1.
3. No.
4. The department applied to the French Consul General in Montreal for information upon the subject, who replied that he had not received any instructions from France. The government, however, has taken steps to obtain information upon the subject.

1. Has the date of opening of the lobster fishing season in St. John and Charlotte counties been recently changed?
2. If so, what is now the opening date, and upon what ground was the change made?

Mr. HAZEN:

1. Yes, for the present year.
2. 20th November. As no canneries are allowed in this district, and there is a size limit of 4¾ inches carapace measurement, it was considered, pending further investigation, that fishing might this year be allowed to commence on that date without danger to the permanence of the fishery. Last year fishing was allowed to begin on December 1. Under the regulations of September 30, 1910, the season opens on January 6.

4. What special qualifications does Captain Lavergne possess to be preferred to other officers?

Mr. HUGHES. If the hon. gentleman will be kind enough to put his question in proper form I shall be very pleased to bring down the answer. I am sure that if he looks at it he will see that it is not in proper form.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. How is it wrong ?

Mr. HUGHES. I do not feel that I am bound to hunt all over the country to find out what certain papers have said.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. All right.

Mr. SPEAKER. Stands for correction.

HUDSON BAY RAILWAY.

Mr. D B. NEELY (Humboldt) moved:

For a copy of all papers, correspondence and orders in council in connection with the awarding of the contract for the building of the Hudson Bay railway, and of all orders suspending work on the same.

He said: In moving for the papers and correspondence in connection with the letting of the contract for a section of the Hudson Bay railway and all orders suspending work on same, I am bringing to the attention of this House a matter which is of very vital interest and importance to the people of western Canada. I can assure you, Mr. Speaker, that it created no small surprise throughout western Canada when the newspapers announced that one of the first acts of the new Minister of Railways was to suspend all work under the contract which was given by the late government for the construction of a certain number of miles of the Hudson Bay railway. For the last four or five years the construction of a railway to Hudson Bay has been a matter of very great interest to the people of the west, and whatever views as to the utility of the work the people in other parts of the country may have had there has been no doubt as to the view held by the great majority of the people west of Lake Superior. There can be no doubt in the mind of any hon. gentleman in this House that no government of Canada had ever taken up this question seriously until Sir Wilfrid Laurier in the election campaign of 1908 made the definite announcement that he proposed to build the Hudson Bay railway, an announcement which gave the greatest satisfaction to the people of the west. The fact that that announcement was made in eastern Canada gave us an assurance of the sincerity of purpose of the right hon. gentleman, and, therefore, to him is due the credit for Canada undertaking this great work. We are happy to know in western Canada that so far as the two political parties of this country are concerned, at the present moment there is no division of opinion as to the necessity and the advisability of building this railroad. The present Prime Minister, during his tour of the west last summer—I think at every place he addressed an audience—made reference to the construction of the Hudson Bay railway and stated that he was quite in accord with the policy of the government building the road to Hudson bay. He went further and he told the people of the west that he purposed operating that railroad by the government itself as demanded by the organized farmers of the west. Of course we cannot give the hon. gentleman all the credit he might have had if he had taken his stand on this question when Sir Wilfrid Laurier first announced it at a time when there was undoubtedly a great deal of prejudice in the minds of eastern Canada, especially in Toronto and Montreal, against the prosecution of this work.

This prejudice was not confined to one political party, because even such a staunch Liberal newspaper as the Toronto 'Globe', on one occasion, if not on more than one, undertook to throw cold water on the proposition.

Mr. MACDONELL. I beg to state that there is no prejudice in Toronto against the construction of that road.

Mr. NEELY. While my hon. friend represents a division of the city of Toronto, he claims a great deal when he claims to know the sentiments of all the citizens of Toronto.

Mr. MACDONELL. I know them better than the hon. gentleman does.

Mr. CURRIE. What authority has the hon. gentleman for making that statement?

Mr. NEELY. I may say that again and again such a prominent Conservative newspaper as the Montreal 'Daily Star' also attempted to throw cold water on this proposition. So that, so far as eastern Canada is concerned, it had been brought to our attention in the west that there was more or less prejudice against the construction of the Hudson Bay railway.

Mr. CURRIE. By whom?

Mr. NEELY. By leaders of thought such as I have indicated.

Mr. CURRIE. The hon. gentleman has no authority to make the statement unless he produces some proof.

Mr. NEELY. I have quoted authorities that are supposed to represent to some extent public opinion in eastern Canada, namely, the Toronto 'Globe' and the Montreal 'Daily Star'. Notwithstanding the knowledge of these prejudices, the late government, realizing that western Canada had come to that point of development and progress as to require this new outlet for the products of the western farmer, and having made the promise, having put their hand to the plough, immediately after the election, and after they were returned to power, made preparations for the carrying out of their promise. As we know, there was a good deal of work in the engineering line to be done before any active construction could take place, because the country through which the road must pass is an undeveloped region as to which there was very little information; and so the government made provision in the first session of the last parliament for engineers to be sent over the territory to lay out the route of the road. Later on an estimate was submitted to the House and passed for the construction of a bridge across the Saskatchewan river at the Pas Mission, and, as we know in the estimates of last spring there was an item of $2,000,000 for the active construction of the road itself. After the dissolution of parliament, and while the verdict of the electors was still in abeyance, the late government called for tenders for a certain number of miles of construction, something less, I believe, than 200; and, according to statements made by the late Minister of Railways to the public press, a contract for that work was given to the lowest tenderer. The contract was signed and executed, and we all understood that the work was to be immediately under way. But, Sir, the elections came along on the 21st of September, and the late government were not given the responsibility of seeing this work, which they had so honestly and sincerely begun, brought to a successful conclusion.

Mr. SCHAFFNER. Will the hon. gentleman tell the House how nearly the bridge to which he has referred is completed, and how many miles of the railway for which the government gave the contract have been completed, or even graded.

Mr. NEELY. I am surprised that a member representing a constituency in the west should ask those questions. I understand that the bridge is rapidly nearing completion. So far as the road itself is concerned, it was only during the late summer that the contract was let, so that my hon. friend can hardly expect very many miles to be built.

Mr. SCHAFFNER. It was just before the election.

Mr. NEELY. About a month afterwards orders were given for the suspension of the work on this contract. It was with great consternation that the people of the west heard through the public press that one of the first official acts of the new Minister of Railways was to issue orders for the suspension of the work. It would appear that that hon. gentleman had not been reading the papers at the time that his leader made his tour through western Canada last summer, when he found very much fault with the late government because of the tardy way in which they were fulfilling their promise to build a railway to Hudson bay. I think the Prime Minister at one point went even so far as to state the exact length of time in which he could build the Hudson Bay railway if the people of Canada gave him the opportunity. I know that my opponent in the late election made the statement on platform after platform that if the Hon. Mr. Borden were returned to power at this election, we would have a railroad in operation to Hudson bay inside the term of four years; he stated that Mr. Borden had given him authority to make, or himself had made that statement. Now, that pledge undoubtedly helped to counteract to a very large extent in the minds of the western people the other announcement which the Prime Minister was so fond of making, that if made premier of Canada, he would not support reciprocity.

Therefore, I would ask the Prime Minister if he thinks the action of his colleague, the Minister of Railways (Mr. Cochrane) will enhance his reputation in western Canada as a fair dealer with the people, as a man who will keep his pledge and his word? Does he think the Minister of Railways in holding up this contract and practically holding back the work on the Hudson Bay railway, this great national undertaking, for a year, will receive the approval of the people of western Canada? Evidently my hon. friend the Minister of Railways (Mr. Cochrane) places considerable value on the spectacular and sensational in his entry into public life in the Dominion government. Something big had to be done to bring him before the public mind. He had not been a member of this House. There were members who for a number of years in their parliamentary life had devoted great attention to the study of the railway problems of this country, for instance the hon. member for Lanark (Mr. Haggart), the hon. member for South Simcoe (Mr. Lennox), and the hon. member for Lincoln (Mr. Lancaster). When the new government was being formed many people were surprised that the Prime Minister had to go beyond the ranks of his parliamentary followers to find a man suitable to fill the position of Minister of Railways in the new cabinet. Where did he go? He went to the cabinet of Sir James Whitney, Premier of Ontario. Sir James has a reputation throughout Canada as being something of a dictator, and perhaps my hon. friend the Minister of Railways learned his lesson while he was a member of that government and came to the conclusion that he could make the greatest success of the administration of the Railway Department by adopting that policy of dictation, and so we have this order suspending work on the Hudson Bay railway as his first official act—I think the order was promulgated before the hon. gentleman even had a seat in this House. That order came as a very great shock to us in the west because it is daily becoming more evident to us that if there is one work urgently needed in western Canada it is the construction of this railway undertaken by the late government. It is known to everyone that the west to-day is suffering from the worst car shortage in its history. There is a large crop, a somewhat damaged crop, needing to be transported as soon as possible to the head of the lakes; it must be kept moving in order to prevent it from deteriorating. But we are confronted with this unprecedented car shortage. This car shortage in western Canada is surely the strongest argument in favour of this new outlet to the markets of the world. Yet although we have in this evidence that the existing railways are utterly unable to cope with the situation and that the new government are equally unable to cope with the situation, for I have not heard of their doing anything to relieve the car shortage, the first official act of the new Minister of Railways is to set back that great undertaking that must furnish a new outlet to the products of every farmer west of the Great Lakes.

Is there no such thing as sanctity of contract between governments and those with whom they contract to do business? Does the Minister of Railways not appreciate the fact that governments ought to have the same code of honour as exists between individuals? Yet here we have an instance where a contract is let on a great public work, a new government comes into office and immediately work under that contract is suspended. My information is that a considerable amount of material was being shipped in to the line of this railway, that a number of subcontracts had been let, that these subcontractors had men and material on the ground. Some of these men were there possibly a day or two or three days when the order came from Ottawa that all work under this contract must be suspended. You know that in that portion of the country through which the route of the proposed railway runs, the winter season is the especial season for the shipping in of supplies and for the cutting out of the right of way. There is a good deal of work that can be done very easily and conveniently in winter that cannot be done in summer. I contend that by the suspension of work under this contract the Minister of Railways has practically held up that work for one solid year, and I think the people of western Canada are also quite convinced of that.

That may seem a light matter to my hon. friend the Minister of Railways, but if he were able to place himself in the position of the western farmer and, as in this year, find it impossible to get a car to his station for his damaged wheat and at the same time know that the government are holding up work on an undertaking that would afford another outlet for his wheat to the markets of the world, my hon. friend (Mr. Cochrane) would not sit with such complacency and make such orders.

There is another important feature of the question. There is no doubt that the contractors will have a very serious claim against the government of Canada as the result of the order of the Minister of Railways (Mr. Cochrane) holding up the work. I do not think there can be any question about that. Of course the Minister of Railways does not have to pay it; the country has to pay it

But that, Sir, is the least important feature of this order holding up the work on this contract. Why was it done? That is the question that we have been waiting to hear answered. I think this parliament and this country ought to have been given some information on the point when such an order was given. Is there anything to show that the chief engineer employed by the late government made a mistake in laying out the route? I notice that in the speech from the Throne reference is made to the fact that the government propose to investigate the matter and ascertain the best route to Hudson Bay. Did the chief engineer charged with the work under the late government make a mistake in laying out the route? Why does not the Minister of Railways let the country know that this was the reason—if that was the reason why the work was held up on this contract? And if the chief engineer under the late government made a mistake in laying out the route has the chief engineer been discharged from the employ of the new government? As I understand it, there can be no question—there is no question—that the route of the first two hundred miles would be the same (that is, if the starting point were the same, Le Pas Mission, on the Saskatchewan river) no matter whether the terminus was Port Nelson or Fort Churchill. So, I cannot see that there is anything wrong with the location of the route, for this contract covered something less than the first two hundred miles. Was the lowest tender not accepted in the letting of this contract? If the lowest tender was not accepted, then it is the duty of this House to ask for a commission of inquiry, to inquire into the matter. And I do not think the Minister of Railways ought to take the responsibility upon his own shoulders of punishing the late government for not having accepted the lowest tender. But my information is that the lowest tender was accepted and that the contract was awarded to a firm or a company that had done a great deal of this work before, and from that standpoint were absolutely reliable. In this connection, I might say that since the recent elections, we have been reading a great deal in the press throughout the country that one of the chief responsibilities of the new government will be to make a thorough investigation into all the departments of the late administration, in order to find out what abuses existed in these departments, and to correct them. Well, I think I have the right and the authority—I will assume it—to say for the benefit of these newspapers who have been making these statements and of hon. gentlemen on the government side who may have been making them, that, so far as the alloting of public works by the different departments of the late government is concerned, if there is one thing the members of the late administration will heartily welcome it is a thorough investigation by their successors in office into every department.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

An hon. MEMBER. Not very loud.

Mr. NEELY. I understand an hon. member to say I am speaking too loud, I am speaking sincerely, and I wish to make myself heard. I resent these insinuations of the Tory newspapers, and of hon. gentlemen opposite, of finding wrongdoing before hand; and I say we take up the challenge they offer us and ask them to go ahead with all the investigations they please. And I feel safe in saying that no department of the government can stand a more thorough investigation than that of Railways and Canals as administered by the late minister, the Hon. Geo. P. Graham.

So far, I have not found anything that would look like a reason why this work was suspended. Of course, the present holder of the office of Railways and Canals (Mr. Cochrane), is new to his position. We can quite understand that he had to learn what his new duties would be. But surely, Sir, it was not necessary to hold up a great national undertaking while he was learning his lesson. Perhaps the Minister of Railways, when he came to his new office was possessed of the good Tory conviction that because these contracts were let by a Grit government they must be wrong. If that be the case, I hope that his experience in mixing with members, not only on his own side, but with gentlemen on this side of the House, may convince him that there may be some little good even in a Grit government.

Now, Sir, we in the west feel very strongly and very keenly over the question of the early construction of the Hudson Bay railway. And some of us have a little fear as to what this new move actually means. I hope our fears are unfounded. I see the statement made in the public press within the last few weeks that the government of the province of Manitoba propose to build a railway to Hudson bay. If they do it, and do it honestly and expeditiously, I think the people of Manitoba will give them a great deal of credit. But that is no reason why the people in the provinces further west should not see the completion of the work which will connect them more directly with the ports on Hudson bay than any road that can be built through the province of Manitoba. I see my hon. friend from Prince Albert (Mr. McKay), in his place. I am sure that he can add his testimony to mine when I say that any movement that might be commenced in the province of Manitoba or elsewhere to change the starting point adopted by the late government for the building of this line to Hudson bay would certainly not be a welcome movement to the people of Saskatchewan or the people of Alberta.

In presenting this motion to-day, I am not so strongly condemnatory of the action of my hon. friend the Minister of Railways, I am only seeking to impress upon his mind, if I can, the paramount importance of this work in the minds of the people west of the Great Lakes. If I have any fault to find with him it is this: I assume that the proper course, in case he had suspected there was anything wrong with the route of this railway, or that there was anything wrong in letting the contract, would have been to investigate and to act afterwards. But evidently he has followed that rule the other way, he has acted first and is investigating now. Well, we ought very shortly to have the result of these investigations. I say that the people of the west, the people whom I represent in this House, are very anxiously waiting the result of my hon. friend's cogitations. Therefore, I trust that the country, and especially the people of my own part of the country will very shortly be in possession of the information, not only that which is called for by the motion I am presenting, but all other information that is pertinent to the question, and which will show why my hon. friend has undertaken, on his responsibility as Minister of Railways, to hold up for practically a period of a year, work on this great national outlet from western Canada to the markets of the world.

Mr. JAMES McKAY (Prince Albert). As the hon. member (Mr. Neely), who has just taken his seat, referred to the member for Prince Albert, I feel it my duty to make a few remarks on this question. I am prepared to endorse some of the remarks the hon. gentleman has made as to the importance the people of the west attach to the immediate construction of this road; but I am not prepared to agree with him in his criticism of the present administration with regard to their position towards the construction of the road. I submit that if the hon. gentleman had been as zealous in protecting the interests of his constituents during the last few years as he appears to be now, the construction of this road would already be considerably advanced. It is not my intention to go fully into this question. Hon. gentlemen will no doubt remember the language of the right hon. the leader of the opposition used when he was introducing the Bills for the construction of the Transcontinental railway, when he declared that there 'was no time to waste,' 'it was necessary that this road should be constructed now.' This Hudson Bay railway has been in Dominion politics a great deal longer time than the Transcontinental railway. As early as 1897 it was a principal plank in the platform of the Liberal candidate in the city of Winnipeg, and during the subsequent elections it was a very important plank in the platforms of Liberal candidates. Then we find that in 1908 the right hon. leader of the opposition, then Prime Minister, announced at Niagara, just on the eve of the election, that the time to build the Hudson Bay railway 'was now,' language very similar to that used by him when introducing his Bills for the construction of the National Transcontinental railway. Now, Sir, what was the action of the late administration with regard to those two roads? We find that construction was started almost immediately on the National Transcontinental, but we had to wait year after year while this road was being built, for anything to be done on the Hudson Bay railway. Yet the government knew as much about the country through which the Hudson Bay railway was to run as they did about the country through which the National Transcontinental was to be constructed. Then we find that the language used by the right hon. gentleman in 1908 was echoed by the Liberal leaders during the general election of that year: they all took the key-note of their speeches from the language used by the right hon. gentleman at Niagara, that the road should be constructed now. We find that the then Minister of Railways was quoted as using words to a similar effect in a speech he made at Galt, that the time to build the road 'was immediately,' 'right away,' or words to that effect. Then we find that the Hon. Clifford Sifton, when accepting nomination at Brandon, for the election in 1908, used these words as reported in the papers:

So, therefore, if the people of the Northwest give Sir Wilfrid Laurier their endorsement at this election, then in three or four years we may expect to see trains running to Hudson bay.

This quotation is a fair sample, and contains the kernel, of the speeches of the Liberal leaders during the campaign of 1908, namely, that the road was to be built 'now,' that it was to be built 'immediately,' that 'within three or four years we would see trains running to Hudson Bay,' language much stronger than that used by any of the Conservative leaders in regard to that matter. Now what are the facts? We did not see any haste adopted by the then administration in the construction of this road. We find that all they have actually done, outside of the contract, was to expend money on surveys, and to start building a bridge over the Saskatchewan river at the Pas. The question was asked the hon. member for Humboldt (Mr. Neely) how much of that bridge was constructed. I am not prepared to say now how much of it has been constructed, but I am prepared to say that during the elections just held I made particular inquiry to ascertain how much of that bridge was constructed, and I was informed on reliable authority that only two abutments and three piers had been constructed, after work had been proceeding for something like two seasons. Now, Sir, is it any wonder that the people in the west have lost confidence in the late administration for their want of expedition in the construction of this road?

Mr. NEELY. In Saskatchewan?

Mr. McKAY. I am speaking more particularly for my constituency, which is nearest to this bridge, and I submit that the people there have lost confidence in the serious intention of the late administration to proceed with the speedy construction of this road. What has been done elsewhere? We find that a bridge was constructed at Saskatoon in one season, another bridge was constructed at Warman in one season, another bridge was constructed just south of Prince Albert, over the south branch, in one season, another bridge with as many piers, and if I remember rightly with one more pier than on the bridge required at the Pas, was constructed in one season; and it took the late government, with all the money at its disposal it wanted, all this time to do what little construction has been done on the bridge at the Pas.

I submit, therefore, that the people in my constituency were justified in coming to the conclusion that the late administration were not serious in endeavouring to construct this road as speedily as possible.

In regard to the actual construction of the road, what do we find? We find that they did, just on the eve of the last election, send a contractor up there to start the construction of the road. When the contract was signed, I am not prepared to say, but this I know that the contractor did not get his men on the scene of operations until within two weeks of polling day. I submit that the latter portion of the remarks of the hon. member for Humboldt is a reply to the earlier part of his speech. He goes on to say that winter is the best time to clear the right of way. I submit that in that portion of the west the winter is not the proper time for the purpose of the construction of the road; that is the grading and so on. It may be and, I believe, it is the right time for the cutting out of the right of way, but there is still ample time without losing a whole year, for the construction of the road, to do whatever work can be done on this road during the months of winter. I hope the government will look into this question immediately and, as the speech from the Throne states, make an announcement in regard to the road as soon as possible. I hope that the cutting out of the right of way will proceed during this winter, and that no time will be lost. I am satisfied that the present administration is in earnest about this undertaking. I am prepared to give this undertaking to the hon. member for Humboldt, that whenever he rises in his place to fight the cause of the western people, I will stand by him. The government will, so soon as they investigate this matter, go on with the construction of the road more expeditiously than did the late administration. If the present government decide to go on with the construction of this road, say within a month, they would still have plenty of time to cut out the right of way for the 185 miles for which the contract has been let, and there would still be ample time for the contractors to get the material on the other side of the river. Then, if they do not get their material and contracting plant on the other side of the river before the ice breaks I submit that the bridge will be completed this winter, but the present administration are taking hold of this matter vigorously and they intend to push it to a speedy conclusion.

Mr. J. G. TURRIFF (Assiniboia). My hon. friend from Prince Albert (Mr. Mc-Kay) seems to place a great deal of blame on the late administration for not hurrying forward the work of this Hudson Bay railway, and he gives as one of the main reasons why there was a change of sentiment in that part of the country the fact that the late administration were not hurrying forward this work. If that is the case, if the people of the district of Prince Albert voted against the late administration because the work had not been carried out quickly enough I want to know how my hon. friend will reconcile his claim that this administration are in favour of this work with the fact that instead of hurrying on the work they immediately stop it, as my hon. friend from Humboldt (Mr. Neely) has stated. It is all very well for the hon. member for Prince Albert to say that the right of way can be cleared out and supplies got in at any time a month later from this. If any private corporation, company or individual had any considerable amount of work to do in that part of the country they would take mighty good care to get their men and supplies in there just as soon as the frost made it possible to allow them to be taken in over the muskegs. For the first couple of hundred miles there is a very considerable amount of that road that will have to be built across swampy land and muskegs. It is absolutely necessary to get the supplies in there this winter if the right of way is going to be cleared out, and if the contractors are going to be able to go on with the work next summer.

Mr. CURRIE. What percentage of arable land is there along that road?

Mr. TURRIFF. If my hon. friend (Mr. Currie) will take a trip over the road he will be able to form a very fair idea of the amount of arable land. I have not been over the route. The hon. member for Prince Albert seemed to think that the late government were very slow in what they were doing in connection with that road. But, my hon. friend should remember that it is only about three years ago, or a little over three years ago, that the present leader of the opposition (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) made the announcement as leader of the government that the road would be built, and that from the time he made that announcement, or from the time that parliament met and it was possible to vote money, money has been expended in no stinted way in surveying the whole route from the Saskatchewan river to Port Nelson and Fort Churchill, a distance of 500 or 600 miles. When you consider that every part of that road is beyond the farthest settlement you can realize something of what the difficulties are. I have never been opposed to taking plenty of time in having proper surveys made. There is no use in going on and spending millions and millions and then finding out after the money has been spent that it has been largely wasted simply because a few hundred thousand dollars had not been spent in the first place in finding out where the road should be built. We have an example of that in the case of the Canadian Pacific railway. I am not saying it in any spirit of criticism of the Canadian Pacific railway, but when that railway was built the people of Canada knew very little about that part of the country through which it was to run. If that road were to be built now it would not go over the same route at all. You see the Canadian Pacific railway every year spending tens of millions of dollars in changing the road both east and west of Winnipeg. Anybody who travels over that road will see that in some places they run for miles away from the old road that had been in operation for twenty years. Therefore, it takes time to have a proper survey made of a national undertaking such as the Hudson Bay railway. It was not only in connection with the road that information had to be obtained, but it was in connection with the harbour facilities as well. Nobody could tell whether Fort Churchill or Port Nelson was the better place to adopt as the terminal of the Hudson Bay railway until outfits had been sent up there and proper surveys and soundings had been made to find out which would be the better and the cheaper harbour and which would be adopted in the general interest of the country. As my hon. friend from Humboldt has pointed out, this part of the road, covering some 185 miles, for which the contract was let, will not be affected by the question as to which port should be selected. Two years have been devoted to the work of finding out the best line of railway. This work has been done under a very capable and a very able chief engineer. I do not think there is any reason to suspect that his work has not been satisfactory. He located that road and the late government let the contract.

Had the work been permitted to go on good progress could have been made during the coming summer, but that is now questionable, and the statement of the hon. member for Humboldt seems reasonable, that in all probability through the suspension of the work a whole year will be lost. The construction of the Hudson Bay railway is the most important question in the west next to the question of securing the American market, and when the present Prime Minister told the people out there that when he came to power they would not get the American market, but that they would get the Hudson Bay railway operated by the government, it was looked upon as something of a set-off. But, now that we are not going to get the American market and now that the work on the Hudson Bay railway has been stopped, what are the people of the west to think of this new government. I trust that the Minister of Railways will at once take action to remove the suspension, and allow the contractors to proceed with their work immediately. I received word last Saturday that from one station in my constituency from which we ordinarily ship a million bushels of wheat, there was such a blockade for want of cars that they have only been able to obtain 53 cars so far. Is it any wonder that the people of the west are looking for an outlet for their product by the Hudson Bay railway. Two years have already been spent in obtaining the necessary information which is now in the department and I trust that the minister will at once remove the injunction and allow the work to proceed.

Hon. FRANK COCHRANE (Minister of Railways and Canals). In order to relieve the mind of the hon. member for Humboldt (Mr. Neely), which seems to be considerably worked up about this matter, I want to tell him now that this government will carry out the promises they made when in opposition. There has been no change of policy in reference to the building of the Hudson Bay railway. Considerable representations have been made to the department that the road did not start in the right place, that the surveys were not correct, that the first hundred miles went through a deep swamp, and so on. In consequence, the contract has been held up until we have had time to investigate the matter. As to my seeking advertisement in coming in as Minister of Railways I will leave the people to answer that statement of the hon. gentleman. Indeed, the speech of the hon. member appeared to have been made for his constituents and not for the purpose of giving information to the House. There will be no further delay than is absolutely necessary for the checking up of these surveys. The hon. member (Mr. Turriff) has stated that there was a good deal of time spent on these surveys, but what information have I got, or has the government, or has the country got, that they are any better than the surveys made for the Grand Trunk Pacific railway which took several years to complete. If the hon. gentleman will look into the history of the construction of that road he will find that in every instance almost, the estimates of the cost made by those who located that road have been more than doubled. It is the duty of the present government to examine into every detail of an important work like this, and though my constituency is a long way from Hudson bay, I believe that the undertaking is in the interests of the whole country. Before we proceed we should be well satisfied that the road is located in the right place, that it starts from the right place and goes to the right place. I can assure the hon. gentleman and the House that there will be no more delay in the building of that road than is absolutely necessary in the public interest.

Hon. FRANK OLIVER (Edmonton). We have had a very important announcement from the Minister of Railways; because if I correctly gather his meaning, the situation is ten times more serious than my hon. friend from Humboldt had supposed. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Neely) assumed that there would be a delay of possibly a month as the hon. gentleman from Prince Albert (Mr. McKay) had suggested. But, if I understand correctly what the minister has said, the delay may not be for a month only, but for at least a year, or perhaps two years, or perhaps a considerable number of years, if he is going to do what he says he is going to do, namely, to make a re-survey of the various routes.

Mr. COCHRANE. I did not say that.

Mr. OLIVER. That is what he said.

Mr. COCHRANE. No.

Mr. OLIVER. The minister is to make a survey of the various routes between the wheat fields and Hudson bay. If he means what he says that is what he is going to do.

Mr. COCHRANE. I did not make the statement that there would be a re-survey; I said I was going to investigate.

Mr. OLIVER. The hon. gentleman stated that representations were made to him that the first 100 miles were not properly located and did not start from the right place, and if that does not mean that he must make absolutely new surveys, to start from whatever the right place is, then I do not understand the English language. But, Mr. Speaker, I would not criticise the minister for in any way secreting his intention because we have similar information contained in the speech from the Throne as to what was likely to be the policy of the government. I must admit that in the paragraph of the speech from the Throne alluding to the Hudson Bay railway the government tells the country exactly what the minister has told us now. That is the construction I placed on that paragraph, and I think it is a reasonable construction to place on it. It reads:

> The selection of the best route for the Hudson Bay Railway is engaging the attention of my advisers and an announcement will be made to you of the result of their inquiry.

Now, how can a selection of routes be made with due regard to the respective advantages of these routes, unless these several routes are surveyed, and unless the necessary time is taken to make these surveys?

If it is complained against the late government, as it was complained, that they took up too much time in making surveys, what is to be said of the new government that is to make not one but several surveys, according to their own statement, or according to the inference that must be drawn from that statement, before they begin actual construction? Mr. Speaker, the situation for the people of western Canada is more serious than was anticipated, and it is most desirable that we should know exactly where this government stands on this question. If we are to take the words of the speech from the Throne and the statement that has been made by the hon. Minister of Railways in the House to-day, and are to understand that this great enterprise is to be held up for an indefinite period, then certainly we are face to face with a very serious situation. I must say that the very definite promises made repeatedly and emphatically by the present Premier on this matter are not in process of being implemented, as they were understood.

Hon. GEO. E. FOSTER (Minister of Trade and Commerce). Mr. Speaker I am afraid that the ex-Minister of the Interior is not a good interpreter. What kind of a fist he would make of the business if he had the printed statement in each case before him, and devoted a little time coolly and reasonably to study it out, I am not prepared to say; I think he would come to a pretty good conclusion, but evidently, with the statements just fresh from the lips of the Minister of Railways or other members, he either makes a very improper interpretation or else he has very poorly understood what the minister has said.

Mr. OLIVER. I do not think so.

Mr. FOSTER. That is just an opinion which is modestly presented for the consideration of the House; I am not dogmatic about it at all. But the haste of my hon. friend to know where the government stands on this matter is refreshing in the light of the past. In 1908 one of the most important supporters of the late government had no doubts as to where the government stood, and he based his canvass in the city of Brandon on the statement, as explicit and definite as any words could make it, that within three or four years at the most the railway would be runnin, to a port on Hudson Bay. On that plank stood my hon. friend the ex-Minister of the Interior. On that plank stood all my hon. friends who are facing me who were in the House and supporting the government at that time. Four years have nearly gone, three have altogether gone, and on the 21st of September, that fatal day when they bade good-bye for a certain time to the administration of affairs in this country, what had they done to implement the promise of the late Prime Minister and the promise of the late member for Brandon and the position taken by the whole Liberal party? They had done almost nothing but surveys. Now, within two months after the new ministry and the new Minister of Railways come into power, my hon. friend is up on both legs demanding where the government stand on this business, and my hon. friend the Minister of Railways says: When I came into the department I considered it my duty, as the minister responsible for every bit of work that should be done on that undertaking, to test and examine the matter. I knew, of course, that the late government had made surveys; I knew that they had gone into an examination as to what port was the best, and it became my duty as Minister of Railways, before I took one step or allowed one step to be taken, to check up that information and check up those surveys, and form my own opinion; and if I came to the conclusion that the surveys and the information were sufficient for me, I would unloose the machinery and let it work; if I came to the conclusion that the surveys were faulty or that the ports selected were wrong, then it would be my duty in the interest of Canada, not to allow a single pick to be put into the ground until I knew the best routes and the best ports.' That is simply what my hon. friend said, in much fewer words than I have taken to set the ex-Minister of the Interior right.

Mr. OLIVER. That was not my understanding at all.

Mr. FOSTER. That is one of my hon. friend's misunderstandings. I have been long enough facing him in this House not to wish to take the responsibility for all the understandings of my hon. friend.

Mr. OLIVER. Will my hon. friend permit me to explain my understanding?

Mr. FOSTER. Certainly.

Mr. OLIVER. My hon. friend has just spoken as to the possible selection of the route as relating to the ports, the termini of the road. The Minister of Railways spoke of the point of commencement of the first hundred miles, and it is in regard to that I take the strong stand I do. I say that if the Minister of Railways is going to make a selection of route, choosing from amongst several starting points, then he must make new surveys.

Mr. FOSTER. My hon. friend needs a little labouring with on that point. Certainly it is almost as important for a man to know where he is going to start from as to know to what point he is going. He may get to the right point for which he aims a good deal easier and quicker by starting from the right point than he could by starting from the wrong point and going a long way round. Precisely the same reasoning applies to the point of starting as to the terminal. The information was gathered, it was in the office, and the minister did perfectly right in saying: Representations have been made to me that the road was not either started right or going right, and I will use my judgment to see that it is both started right and goes right. My hon. friend would have done the same thing if he had done the wise thing. So that, making all allowance for the greater vehemence and earnestness which my hon. friend must put into his work when in opposition than he displayed when on this side of the House, when you boil it down there is not much difference between the ex-Minister of the Interior and my hon. friend the Minister of Railways as to the question of procedure.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. My hon. friend the Minister of Trade and Commerce has shown conclusively that my hon. friend from Edmonton properly interpreted the words of the Minister of Railways. Those words were merely that the whole scheme of the Hudson Bay railway, as commenced by the late government, has been altogether given up and the whole business started anew. My hon. friend from Prince Albert (Mr. McKay) stated that he hoped the action taken by the Minister of Railways would not prevent the contract going on within a month, as it was of great advantage to the contractor and to the work itself that it should be started at once and the road located during the winter months.

If he had been correct in this supposition, then within one month at most, the Minister of Railways would have released the suspension order which he has given and the work would be allowed to proceed. My hon. friend from Edmonton (Mr. Oliver) has properly interpreted the announcement of the Minister of Railways as meaning that no release of that suspension order will be given this winter, that, in fact, new surveys altogether will have to be taken before the work is allowed to proceed. If this means anything it means that the project of the construction of the Hudson Bay railway which had been accepted by the two parties in this House for the last three or four years, is altogether set aside and everything has to be commenced anew. The hon. member for Prince Albert (Mr. McKay) said that in 1908 I stated that the work of construction of the Hudson Bay railway would be proceeded with immediately, in fact he might have said that a determination upon the matter had been come to during the session of 1908 and was announced to this parliament in the session of 1909. We proceeded all that summer with surveys to determine the proper route to connect the wheat fields of the west with Hudson bay. After ample surveys it was concluded and stated to the House that the starting point should be the Saskatchewan river at The Pas. I was not aware that from that day to this the wisdom of the department ever was challenged by anybody. There was some discussion as to whether the terminus should be at the mouth of the Nelson river or of the Churchill river. This point had not been determined when the late government went out of office, but the location of the terminus was of no immediate consequence as it was agreed by all engineers that the starting point should be at The Pas and that the line should run up to Split Lake. Proceeding upon this, we gave a contract for the building of the bridge at The Pas. This bridge has been under construction for two years and the only criticism I have heard of the selection we made of that route and our course in connection with it is the criticism of the hon. member for Prince Albert (Mr. McKay) a supporter of my hon. friend (Mr. Borden) that the work has not been prosecuted with sufficient rapidity, that only two abutment piers and one or two others have been built, whereas he says the work should have been completed in one season. There is no doubt whatever in the mind of the hon. member for Prince Albert that the road was started at the proper point, and yet we are told by the Minister of Railways (Mr. Cochrane) that everything has to be started again even from the starting point.

Mr. COCHRANE. Oh, no.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. Then what is the use of having the English language?

Mr. COCHRANE. I said we just wanted time to investigate whether it was started right or wrong.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. Exactly.

Mr. COCHRANE. I suppose I could check up the surveys we now have without making new ones.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. Exactly, my hon. friend says he wanted time to investigate the starting point; that is to say it is possible to have another starting point, and possible, therefore, that the work commenced at The Pas may be altogether cast aside and another starting point taken. If the words of my hon. friend mean anything, that is what they mean. If that is the true condition of things, if my hon. friend has it in his mind that another place can be selected, other than The Pas, that means that the work cannot be proceeded with this winter and there may be a delay of two years. That means other investigations at different points from Prince Albert down, I do not know how far. The hon. gentleman cannot do that in one season.

After giving a contract for the construction of a bridge at The Pas we gave another contract this year for the construction of 100 miles from The Pas towards Split Lake, a route as to which there can be no doubt. It has been investigated again and again, and has been agreed on as the proper location. My hon. friend cannot obtain any more information than he now has in his department. If all this means anything it means simply that the people of the Northwest will not have the Hudson Bay railway which they have expected for so many years, for three or four or five years more. The hon. member for Prince Albert has blamed us because we have not proceeded as rapidly as we should. The hon. member will have to wait a long time yet if we are to accept the announcement of policy of the Minister of Railways and he may not see the building of that railway for five or six years or perhaps longer.

Mr. BORDEN. At what date was the route settled, and was the route decided on all the way through to Hudson bay.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. It was not settled all the way to Hudson bay, but it was settled from The Pas to Split lake.

Mr. BORDEN. When?

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. I could not say, but the hon. gentleman will find that in the Department of Railways.

Mr. CURRIE. How many surveys were made of the beginning of this route to The Pas and to Split lake and are these reconnaissance surveys, in the department to be checked up?

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. Surveys have been carried on every year for the last few seasons.

Mr. BORDEN. The reason I asked that question was that I have a distinct recollection that during the last session, I think, Mr. Glen Campbell inquired of the Minister of Railways as to the location of the line, asserting that on account of the way in which the approaches to the bridge had been laid out the line must have a certain definite route from The Pas towards Hudson bay. My recollection is that the then Minister of Railways stoutly denied that any route had been selected. It was for that reason that I was asking the right hon. gentleman when this route was finally determined on. The right hon. gentleman takes a very curious view. Does he suggest that because these surveys have been made and the late administration reached a certain conclusion with regard to them the present Minister of Railways is bound to accept the conclusion of the former administration without giving the slightest consideration or attention to the character of that route?

Mr. OLIVER. As I raised this point, we are not questioning the judgment of the minister, we are not questioning his right to do as he pleases in this matter. I was trying to establish that the course which he laid down to the House meant an indefinite delay in the construction of the road which was not a satisfactory implementing of the definite promises made by the Prime Minister in his tour of that western country.

Mr. BORDEN. My hon. friend (Mr. Oliver) either finds fault with the Minister of Railways for giving consideration to the matter I have mentioned or he does not. I do not see how it would be possible for the Minister of Railways——

Mr. OLIVER. I am not finding fault.

Mr. BORDEN. Well, I am very glad that my hon. friend is not finding fault. I do not see how it would be possible for the Minister of Railways and Canals to assume responsibility, as he would be obliged to do, for this route, unless he gave it some consideration. If hon. gentlemen on the other side of the House, two or three years hence should point out to the Minister of Railways and Canals that the route selected was not the best route, would it be satisfactory for my hon. friend (Mr. Cochrane), to say : 'I did not think it worth while to consider which was the best route, because the matter had been passed upon by the late government.' I do not think he would be discharging the responsibilities of his office properly if he took that step. When the hon. member for Edmonton (Mr. Oliver), says there will be an indefinite delay, I do not for a moment agree with him ; for I understand it to be the purpose of the hon. Minister of Railways and Canals to give his attention to the matter at the very earliest opportunity and to come to a conclusion with regard to it. When he does come to a conclusion with regard to it. I do not look for the delay spoken of by the hon. member. And I would like to tell my right hon. friend the Prime Minister (Sir Wilfrid Laurier)

Some hon. MEMBERS. Oh. Oh.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

Mr. BORDEN. I am sure the right hon. gentleman (Sir Wilfrid Laurier), will excuse me under the circumstances. I have been speaking of him in that way for fifteen years and find it a little difficult to get out of the habit formed during that somewhat too lengthy period. I was about to say that the right hon. gentleman has been pointing out to my hon. friend the Minister of Railways and Canals (Mr. Cochrane), an example that he himself did not follow. He will recollect that when he came into power in 1896, he had a proposed contract before him for a fast Atlantic service and that there was a contract already to be entered into, which the contractors were ready to execute. I do not recollect that he said : ' This is not a matter to be considered by me, for it has been passed upon by the late government and therefore I will carry it out exactly as they proposed it.' He did nothing of the kind. It is true his efforts did not result in very much advantage to the country, and in that respect were quite dissimilar to those that will be put forth by the Minister of Railways and Canals. For the only result of the efforts of the right hon. gentleman (Sir Wilfrid Laurier), was to bring about a contract with certain gentlemen on the other side of the Atlantic for the construction of what were known as ' bottle-necked' steamships. And we had a wonderful pæan of praise from all the Liberal press of the country because the administration of that day had succeeded in making a contract by which a very great saving to the country was supposed to be effected. But from that time up to the present, we have heard very little indeed of the proposal to build these ' bottle-necked' ships. And the last occasion when the matter was discussed in parliament, I think, was when we were called upon to return the deposit and pay interest upon it. So, the right hon. gentleman need not set up an example for the Minister of Railways and Canals, which he himself did not follow. It would be entirely out of place for the Minister of Railways and Canals not to give reasonable consideration for the purpose of ascertaning which is the best route, not only in the interest of the people of the country as a whole, but especially in the interest of the people of the western provinces. The Minister of Railways and Canals is responsible for his own utterances in this respect ; he is not responsible for the interpretation placed upon them by hon. members on the other side of the House.

Reference has been made to some observations of mine in the west. I said in the west, on more than one occasion, that I had not the assistance of surveyors' reports and the advice of engineers and other material necessary to enable one to form a definite conclusion with regard to a great question of this kind ; but that, basing my opinion upon such information as I had been able to collect—not only information brought down and laid on the table of this House, but information derived from other sources—I thought it practicable to build the road within four years from the time it was commenced. When the hon. gentlemen on the other side of the House press upon a government that has been in power only six or seven weeks, the very great delay which it has caused in the carrying out of this work, I would like to remind them that they were in power for more than fifteen years and that during these fifteen years the only thing that they accomplished with respect to the Hudson Bay railway was to bring down to parliament last session an appropriation amounting to $2,000,000. And I said also, in the west, that if they did not get along somewhat faster it would take about twenty years to build the road. We expect to proceed with the construction of this road, to proceed with it as soon as we can possibly do so, having regard to what is demanded by the interests of the country both east and west, namely that the very best route shall be selected. That is the work in which my hon. friend the Minister of Railways and Canals is engaged at the present time, a work which it will be absolutely necessary for him to perform before he can bring down and present to the House, and defend in the House, a proposal for the construction of that railway.

Mr. HUGH GUTHRIE (South Wellington). My hon. friend the Prime Minister (Mr. Borden) stated that the hon. Minister of Railways and Canals (Mr. Cochrane) was, of course, responsible for his own utterances on the subject. The difficulty that we have on this side of the House is that the statement of the Minister of Railways and Canals is not satisfactory. It was very brief indeed and I certainly understood it as my hon. friend from Edmonton (Mr. Oliver) understood it—that if it meant anything, it meant that there was going to be delay perhaps long delay, perhaps indefinite delay, before the work on this railway would be proceeded with. The Minister of Railways and Canals did not elaborate his statement in any way; and even with the addition and explanations which the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Foster) thought well to give, and with the elaboration of my hon. friend the Prime Minister (Mr. Borden), I can well understand that members of western constituencies are not at all satisfied with the situation yet. The complaint is not that a government that has only been in power three or four months is delaying the matter; the complaint is that they have stopped the matter, and that this may mean delay indefinitely prolonged. The Prime Minister and the Minister of Trade and Commerce both know, as well as any member of this House, that there never was a dispute as to the starting point of the road. Le Pas was accepted by all persons as the starting point. Now, the Minister of Railways says he wants to investigate the starting point; that he has heard that the first hundred miles does not run through proper territory; and also that he wants to investigate the proper point on Hudson Bay. These investigations take time. The statement was made in 1908 that this road would be proceeded with. The surveys were made, and they are on the files of the minister's office at this moment, no doubt. Then the location work went on, and the road was located. The bridge is under construction over the river at Le Pas. And the contract for one hundred miles of the road was actually let——

Mr. HUGHES (Victoria). To the lowest tenderer?

Mr. GUTHRIE. Yes, so I am informed. The contract was actually let. My hon. friend from Prince Albert (Mr. McKay) has stated here that the delay asked for will probably be only a month and that the work can be proceeded with by the 1st of January. He expressed the desire of the people of the west. He did not raise any objection about the starting point; his only objection was as to delay in going on. He said that the bridge had not been as rapidly pushed forward as it should have been; his complaint is that the late government delayed the work. Only three years have passed since the work was formally announced, and great progress has been made with it.

It is true that the Hon. Mr. Sifton said the road would be running in three or four years, and perhaps had no change taken place on the 21st of September last, the road might be running in one or two, or three or four years from the present moment. But the attitude of the present government with regard to the Hudson Bay railway now appears to be that this road is going to be changed, to be delayed, and perhaps indefinitely postponed. That is not a satisfactory condition of affairs, and any one who takes the speech of the Minister of Railways, with the additions and explanations of his desk mate, and of the Minister of Trade and Commerce, together with the statement of the Prime Minister, cannot come to any other conclusion about it.

Motion agreed to.

TRANSCONTINENTAL RAILWAY STATION AT QUEBEC.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER moved for:

Copy of all papers, correspondence and orders in council in connection with the awarding of the contract for the building of the Transcontinental Railway station at Quebec, and all orders suspending work on the same.

He said: I need not say that the construction of a station and, the proper terminals at the city of Quebec is a work of great importance. It has engaged the attention of the authorities entrusted with the construction of the Transcontinental railway, of the commissioners of the government, and of the city of Quebec, for the last four or five years at least. Every precaution has been taken to locate the station at the proper place. So far back as 1906 the secretary of the Railway Construction Commission, by instruction of the chairman of the commission, issued the following circular to all the parties interested. It was dated on the 2nd October, 1906:

Dear Sir,—I have the honour by direction of the Board to advise you that the commissioners have had under consideration the matter of terminals at the city of Quebec for the National Transcontinental railway, but consider it desirable, before making a recommendation to the government of Canada on this important question, to obtain an expression of opinion from the accredited representatives of the railway and steamship companies having interests in the city of Quebec, the Quebec Harbour Commissioners and the Quebec Board of Trade, on the question of joint terminals.

The commissioners have accordingly arranged to be in the city of Quebec on Friday, the 12th inst., and would be pleased if your corporation would have a representative present to discuss the matter. The meeting will take place at the Transcontinental Railway offices, 147 Mountain Hill, in the city of Quebec, at 10 a. m. Friday, Oct. 12th instant.

Besides the Quebec Bridge and Railway Company, the following corporations have been invited to send representatives to the meeting: The Canadian Pacific railway, the Grand Trunk railway, the Grand Trunk Pacific railway, the Intercolonial railway, the Delaware and Hudson railway, the Great Northern railway, the Quebec Central railway, the Quebec & Lake St. John railway, the Quebec Railway, Light & Power Company, the Allan Steamship Line, the Dominion Line, the Leland Line, the Quebec Harbour Commissioners, the Quebec Transport Company, Limited. Mr. E. C. Fry, Lloyd's agent, etc., the Mayor of the city of Quebec, the Chairman of the Quebec Board of Trade, the Chairman of the Quebec Shipping Interests, Mr. Power, M.P., Quebec West, and Arthur Lachance, M.P., Quebec Centre, have also been invited to be present.

(Signed) P. E. RYAN.
Secretary.

Upon this invitation, issued, as I said, on the 2nd day of October, 1906, there was a meeting held on the 12th day of that month, at which most of the interested parties who had been invited were present. At that meeting there were present representatives of the Allan Line, of the Grand Trunk Pacific Railway Company, of the Canadian Pacific Railway Company, of the Grand Trunk railway, of the Canadian Northern railway, Delaware and Hudson railway, the Quebec Central railway, the Quebec and Lake St. John railway, the Quebec railway, Light and Power Company, the Quebec Steamship Line and Lloyd's, the Quebec Transport Company, the Intercolonial railway, the City Council of Quebec, the Board of Trade, the Harbour Commissioners, the Quebec Bridge and Railway Company, and Messrs. E. A. Hoare, chief engineer Quebec Bridge and Railway Company, E.A. Doucet, district engineer, Transcontinental Railway Commission, St. George Boswell, engineer Harbour Commissioners. Upon that day the question was carefully considered, and a sub-committee was appointed who, in its turn, appointed engineers to look over the whole matter. Another meeting took place on the 7th November, at which the reports were received and plans were submitted. Another, third and final meeting took place on the 20th of November, and after full discussion, the following resolution was passed:

Recommended that the Champlain Market be made the passenger and freight station for the present, at the same time contemplating that at a future date a passenger station be built on the upper level of the city.

Mr. PELLETIER. Who were the gentlemen composing the body who passed that resolution?

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. All the parties who had been invited, that is, all the railway companies who were consulted by the chief commissioner. I will read them again.

Mr. PELLETIER. That is not necessary; I wanted to have the names of the sub-committee to which the right hon. gentleman referred.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. The sub-committee was composed of several persons—I will pass the papers over to my hon. friend, though I do not think it matters much. The sub-committee reported to the larger committee. All these parties met at the appointed time on the 12th day of October. They appointed sub-committees of their own to look into the question and make reports; and further a committee of engineers was appointed to prepare plans to be submitted at a further meeting which took place on the 12th October. The sub-committee reported at a further meeting which took place on the 20th of November, and then the following resolution was adopted:

Recommended that the Champlain Market be made the passenger and freight station for the present, at the same time contemplating that at a future date a passenger station be built on the upper level of the city.

This recommendation was made to the commissioners. The commissioners reported to the government, and the Champlain market was approved by the government on recommendation of the commissioners as the site for the freight and passenger station of the Transcontinental railway.

I may say that these papers are not new. They have all been published in the press recently as well as upon a former occasion. Upon this site being chosen by the commissioners, approved by the government, and by the Grand Trunk Railway Company also, negotiations were entered into with the city of Quebec for the purchase of the Champlain market and, after years of negotiation, as my hon. friend the Postmaster General (Mr. Pelletier) well knows, the transaction was completed between the commissioners and the city of Quebec for the purchase of the Champlain market. Plans were prepared for the building of a station, these plans were submitted to and approved by the Grand Trunk Railway Company and approved by the government, the market was demolished, tenders were asked for, and after many tenders had been submitted they were opened, the lowest tenderer was awarded the contract, and the contract was signed and delivered between the government and the contractors.

Mr. CURRIE. On what date?

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. The tenders were asked for before the election, the tenders were opened, if I remember aright, during the election, and the contract was awarded after the election. My hon. friend seems to think that there was something in the date at which the contract was awarded. I submit to my hon. friend's judgment and fairness in a matter of this kind that if ever there was a contract properly awarded that was the contract. An appropriation was asked for and submitted to this parliament, this parliament was apprised of all the circumstances, the site was selected in open day, negotiations were carried on between the commissioners and the city authorities long ago, tenders were invited and the lowest tenderer was awarded the contract. Could anything be clearer or fairer or more business-like than that? Yet, Sir, I do not know for what reason, the newspapers announced that my hon. friend the Minister of Railways and Canals (Mr. Cochrane) had suspended work under this contract and had directed the contractor not to proceed at all. Nothing has been done. I have the answer which was given a few days ago in response to an inquiry by some hon. member in which he acknowledged that he had suspended the work upon this contract, and that he would not allow it to proceed. Why is this work not allowed to proceed? Is it because, as was hinted a moment ago by the hon. member for North Simcoe, the contract was awarded after the defeat of the government? I do not believe that can be the cause, I do not believe there is any one in this House who would say that this contract should not be proceeded with because it so happened that it was awarded after the defeat of the government and before they had resigned. No, it could not be that. That was a transaction which was in course of operation, which was properly completed by the government before they resigned office. No fault can be found with the awarding of the contract. If the contract had been awarded to some one who was not the lowest tenderer I would assume that some exception might be taken to it. But nothing of the kind has happened in this case. Everything is regular. What is the reason that the contract is not allowed to be proceeded with? What is the reason that this work, which is essential to the construction of the National Transcontinental railway, is not allowed to proceed? I have been told, in fact, it has been so stated in the press, that the whole thing is to be reconsidered by the government and that a new site is to be looked into. If that be the case, if it be contemplated to change the site which has been adopted, I think it would be a most unfortunate decision and one against which, I think, the whole House would protest. Of course, in a matter of this kind there are always various interests to be looked into. One prefers this site and another prefers another site. But the papers which I shall lay on the table of the House and which I shall also hand to the Postmaster General will show that all precautions were taken in order that a proper site should be selected for such an important work as the terminal of the National Transcontinental railway.

I know that objection has been taken to this site. It has been stated that there was not sufficient ground. Who were the parties who made the selection? The Canadian Pacific railway who were represented, the Grand Trunk railway who were represented, the Quebec Central who were represented, the Delaware and Hudson who were represented,and the shipping interests all agreed that, taking it all in all, with its blemishes and good points, this was the only site to be adopted for the terminus of the National Transcontinental railway in the city of Quebec. I will reserve my judgment until I have heard what the reason of the hon. gentleman is for not allowing this work to go on, for having prevented it from being started immediately, but, if the reason is, as has been stated in the press, that another site is to be selected for the terminal of the National Transcontinental railway and if the decision that has been come to in regard to this matter shall have been reversed for very insufficient and very improper reasons, a greater calamity will have been inflicted on the city of Quebec.

Hon. FRANK COCHRANE (Minister of Railways and Canals). Mr. Speaker, in answer to the right hon. leader of the opposition (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) I beg to say that the first time my attention was called to the question of the entrance and terminals of the National Transcontinental railway in the city of Quebec was when I visited that city with other members of the government to receive His Royal Highness the Governor-General. There was a great deal of complaint not only that the entrance as proposed was expensive, but that the terminals were too cramped. I did not look over the ground at that time, but a short time afterwards upon making further inquiry, I found that the statements made were absolutely correct. The objection was made that not only was the ground selected for the station too cramped altogether, but that the roads or streets leading to the station were quite inadequate. I was told as I saw with my own eyes when I was there, that there are only two narrow streets, one, if not two, with a street railway track upon it, leading to the station. These streets are, as I say, very narrow, and they would not meet the requirements of a station of the importance of this one in the city of Quebec. On the appointment of the new Chairman of the National Transcontinental Railway Commission, I instructed him to go down, look over the ground and inquire into the matter. This step has been taken merely as a precaution before such a large expenditure is entered upon, because a large expenditure will be involved not only in connection with the entrance but in providing the terminal there. I thought it was only wisdom on the part of the government to look into this matter. When men of standing in the city of Quebec, not all Conservatives, but amongst them some strong Liberals, urged objections to the site proposed I felt I was only doing my duty in reporting the facts to my colleagues and getting their permission to stop the work in order that the whole question might be thoroughly examined into. We are not delaying the larger scheme of the National Transcontinental railway at all. I am satisfied that even if a change of site takes place the terminals can be completed before the line is completed, should it be completed on time, and long before the bridge can be completed. I feel that we have the greatest justification for not going on with this work and for inquiring into the circumstances before it is too late.

Mr. SPEAKER. I would draw attention to the fact that this being a substantive motion, those desirous of speaking must speak before the mover closes the debate. If any hon. member wishes to speak his opportunity is now.

Mr. PELLETIER. In that case, Mr. Speaker, I would have just a few words to say because I am one of those who are responsible for the condition of affairs to which the hon. leader of the opposition has referred.

Far from being afraid of the responsibility which I took, I am happy to assume such responsibility and I would do it again. I did it as a Quebecker, as one of the representatives of the Quebec district, and as a Canadian. I am not afraid to say that nine-tenths of the people of Quebec are absolutely opposed to the location of the Transcontinental station at the place indicated by the late government. The site is extremely narrow, and indeed there is hardly space for a good sized way-station on an ordinary railway. As a Quebecker I take it that we have reason to hope something better for the capital of our province than such a station as would be built in an ordinary town. We have been told the National Transcontinental railway would be a factor in the progress and development of Quebec, and we have been told that the fact that the bridge was built at Cap Rouge would not be detrimental to our city. If a station were built on the location proposed by Mr. Parent it would in no small way contribute to have the National Transcontinental railway stop at Quebec merely for the purpose of delivering traffic for local destination. As has been stated by the Minister of Railways, no final decision has been arrived at in the matter. We have not taken the action we have taken because the contractor belongs to one political party or the other; we have not brought into the consideration of the matter the question of Liberal or Conservative; we have tried to rise above that. We have asked the Minister of Railways to take time to ascertain if the Champlain market site is the best one. If the contractor properly obtained his contract—I shall not go into that question at the moment—and, if he is entitled to damages because the contract deed was not executed, that question this government is broad enough to consider. Our action was not taken because Mr. Gosselin, the contractor, is a Liberal, no Sir, the question is bigger than that. I think, and a good many people in Quebec think, that the station ought not to be put on that site, but that we ought to have a union central station to be used by all the railways coming into Quebec and which would be a credit to the city and a convenience to the citizens. I appeal to the right hon. leader of the opposition to state now, if he thinks that the Champlain market site is the place to have a large station which would be an ornament to the city. I say no, decidedly no. If the new president of the Transcontinental railway, who has all the qualifications necessary for him to express an opinion on the matter, tells us after looking into the question that we are mistaken, the work will proceed on the old site. However, I will say, and I cannot be successfully contradicted, that notwithstanding that the right hon. gentleman has read to us a certain number of resolutions of committees and sub-committees which were attended by certain railway men, the Canadian Pacific railway will not recognize the station if it is built at the Champlain market. I know whereof I speak when I say that in such an event they will build their own station down at the Palais where most Quebeckers desire to have a central station located. That is my opinion and I approach it not from any narrow point of view, but from the point of view of the general interest of the capital of our province. If the railway station is built at the Palais, where there is much more space and accommodation and where all the railways can unite to use it, we can erect a very fine building there with commodious terminals, and we will have that station in the constituency of my right hon. friend. As a party we owe no special gratitude to Quebec East, but I mention this as further evidence that in considering the matter we are acting in the public interest only. In these circumstances, I think the leader of the opposition will give us credit for trying to do our best. There is no need of hurry in this matter. We all know that the Quebec bridge has been unfortunately destroyed and that the new bridge cannot be completed for four or five or perhaps six years. No doubt it will be necessary to have carferries when the National Transcontinental railway is completed, to move the traffic between the north and south shores of the St. Lawrence, and we will need a large area of ground for that purpose. All that has to be considered. What would be the use of having the Transcontinental railway at all if it were to stop at the bridge outside Quebec. In all the circumstances we have come to the conclusion that we must consider the matter carefully and take time to get the very good advice which we have reason to expect from the new president of the Transcontinental railway. I think, in stating these views, I will have the endorsement of the majority of the Quebec people. I will not now refer to the statements which have been made as to there being speculation in property, and all that kind of thing. That has had no influence on us, our object is to do the best we can for Quebec. If the engineers comes to the conclusion that Mr. Parent was right, then the station will be built where he proposed. But let us not forget that in the report of the committee referred to, and which I have read carefully, it is suggested that if the station were built at the Champlain market, another station would have to be built elsewhere. That is the only inference that can be taken from what the right hon. gentleman has read. This contract was only awarded after the general elections—I do not say that it was right or wrong for a defeated government to sign that contract, but not much work could be done this winter. We will avail ourselves of the interval of time at our disposal to try and do our best. As I have pointed out, suppose a station were erected on the Champlain market site now and in five or ten years hence, a reasonable complaint was made that the station should never have been put there, would it be any justification for us to argue that we had only carried out what the government preceding us had proposed to do?

We recognize our responsibilities in a different manner. We have to assume the responsibility for these terminals, and before assuming that responsibility we have to look into the question carefully in the effort to fulfil our duty not only to the city of Quebec, but to the whole of Canada, whose money to a very large extent is going to be expended in this enterprise.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. The observations of my hon. friend only confirm what I stated a moment ago, that on this question, as on similar questions, there is always a variety of interests to be considered. I know that when this matter was first taken up by the commission in 1906 different opinions were expressed as to where the station should be located. When my hon. friend says that nine-tenths of the present population of Quebec are opposed to the present location, I beg to differ with him. My hon. friend lives in Quebec and ought to know better. I represent Quebec and if nine-tenths of the population had been against the present selection, I ought to have known it. I know that there are persons in my division who would like to have had the station placed on the Beauport Flats or at some other point in that division. The first consideration which the commissioners, as well as the railway and shipping interests, had in mind was that the station should be located at Deep Water. If it had been possible to have it placed in my own division, I would have been only too glad; but unfortunately my division is not on Deep Water, but is on the St. Charles river. When Champlain market was selected as the site of the station, it was considered by the government that all the market boats should have their terminals on the St. Charles river in my division, and I hope this will be carried out. But, considering the broad interest of the community, I ask who is better qualified to judge of this matter than the railway companies and the shipping companies, which were invited by the chairman of the commission to confer with them on the subject. And I have not heard that there was a single expression of dissent from the selection we made. I know that the place is cramped; nothing is perfect, but the men who were consulted are all of opinion that though it is cramped, it has the paramount advantage of being on deep water so that passengers coming in on steamers can step from the steamer to the station, walking not more than about thirty feet. Everybody would wish that there were more space, but the men who had to deal with the question and knew the situation preferred it, cramped as it was, to any other.

Mr. BORDEN. How much land is available there?

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. I do not know, but I can say that all along the front, from Sillery to Champlain Market, there is ample space, as I am informed, for all the track needed for the railway, at very little cost. I do not give this as my own opinion; I do not pretend to know anything about this matter. I rely upon the engineers and other experts appointed to deal with the matter, and I do not find a single expression of dissent from the selection on the part of any of the men asked by the chairman of the commission to give their advice upon it. With reference to the statement of my hon. friend that it is contemplated to have a union station later on, this is provided for in the following resolution:

> Recommended that Champlain Market be made a passenger and freight station for the present, at the same time contemplating that at a future date a passenger station be built on the upper level of the city.

This is the opinion of the men who advised the commissioners. They did not suggest that the union station should be placed at the Palais, as contemplated by my hon. friend, but on the upper level of the city. As to this I express no opinion. I rely simply on the fact that all the parties who were consulted gave it as their opinion that for the immediate purposes of the railway, as soon as it is built and in operation, there should be a station on Champlain market. My hon. friend says that there is no hurry, because the bridge will not be built for several years. The bridge has nothing to do with this question. The railway will be built and in operation before the bridge is built, and we shall have to provide communication between the two sides of the river by means of a ferry. So that the matter is independent of the bridge. My hon. friend says: We are dealing with the matter in the best interests of the country according to our judgment. That is the very reason we took the position we did; but this is like many other questions on which men with the very best intentions will differ. It is a question of judgment. The present plan has been formed according to the judgment of the parties most interested in the project, and it is too late to reopen the question.

Motion agreed to.

UNIFORMITY IN NATURALIZATION.

Mr. E. M. MACDONALD (Pictou) moved:

For a copy of all correspondence with and from the Secretary of State for the Colonies, or other minister of the Imperial government, in relation to the passage of legislation providing for uniformity in naturalization throughout the empire since the sittings of the Imperial Conference in June last.

He said: Members who were in the last parliament will recall the discussion on the subjects to be presented for the consideration of the Imperial Conference. Among them was the important subject of having some uniform system of naturalization throughout the whole empire. The subject has not attracted general attention but when one considers that we have the anomalous condition of affairs that a man may be a British subject in Canada or some other overseas dominion of the empire, but has no right to be regarded as a British subject in an imperial sense, one feels that it is the duty of this and every other parliament in the empire to remedy that condition. Until the Naturalization Act of 1870 the theory and principle of British law was concentrated in the maxim: Once a British subject, always a British subject, and that principle obtained throughout all the wanderings of the race which sprang from the Kingdom of Great Britain and Ireland; but since 1870 the theory and the practice under which British subjects can, by residence elsewhere, divest themselves of their nationality, and their British citizenship, has resulted in a great number of people losing their allegiance to the empire, and now when they are returning to the self-governing colonies, the anomaly may exist that a person who is a British subject by birth may be a British subject in only one colony and not be entitled to citizenship in another portion of the empire having divested himself of his allegiance as a subject of the empire as a whole. The importance of this question, and the necessity of some uniform naturalization law common to the whole empire, has attracted the attention of the various self-governing colonies, and has been discussed in the different Imperial Conferences. At the last conference, the subject received very close attention.

There is great diversity in the method by which men can acquire naturalization rights in different colonies. In New Zealand, a man of another nationality may become naturalized the day he arrives if he satisfies the authorities that his character and personality are such as to make him likely to become a good citizen of New Zealand and complies with certain provisions of the law. In Australia a residence of at least two years is insisted upon before a person becomes entitled to naturalization. In both of these colonies there are restrictions which do not exist in Canada or in some of the other colonies of the empire under which no man of Asiatic blood or race can become naturalized. In Canada we require a residence of at least three years. But no self-governing colony has the right to declare that a man of foreign nationality is entitled to the rights and privileges of British citizenship. In England, possibly because that country is so near to the various European nations and has been for many years the asylum for the oppressed of all nations, the home authorities have always stipulated that there must be a residence of at least five years before an application can be entertained and the privilege of citizenship accorded under the laws of Great Britain. This strange diversity has always existed since 1870 if not before that. The result was that at the conference the representatives of Australia, New Zealand and the Union of South Africa moved these resolutions:

Australia—

That this conference is in favour of the creation of a system which, while not limiting the right of a Dominion to legislate with regard to local naturalization, will permit the issue to persons fulfilling prescribed conditions of certificates of naturalization effective throughout the empire, and refers to a subsidiary conference the question of the best means to attain this end.

New Zealand—

That it is in the best interests of the empire that there should be more uniformity throughout its centres and dependencies in the law of naturalization.

Union of South Africa—

That it is desirable to review the principles underlying the draft Bill for Imperial naturalization before its details are discussed further.

It will be remembered that previous to the conference the imperial authorities had submitted a draft Bill to the self-governing dominions proposing a solution of these problems, and it was in criticism of this Bill that the resolution of South Africa was proposed. They pointed out that there were very great difficulties underlying the Bill as originally proposed by the home authorities. This question was very thoroughly ventilated in the conference, and hon. members who have reviewed the proceedings of the conference will be familiar with the effect of that discussion, and with the fact that some common ground was reached which was satisfactory to the various representatives of the different portions of the empire. The view put forward by the right hon. gentleman who leads the opposition (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) was the view which seemed to appeal to the representatives of the other colonies.

That view is that the object of attainment should be that the man who is a British subject anywhere shall be a British subject everywhere. We hear a great deal about the glories of the empire; and the party of hon. members on the other side have been rather prone, throughout Canada's history, to claim to be the only ones who could speak for the great empire. With all humility, Mr. Speaker, as one of those who have not had either the opportunity or the disadvantage of being associated with these gentlemen who claim to be the only true imperialists in this country, and speaking for those who, though less demonstrative, are yet sincere devotees of everything which makes for the united empire, those who yield to no others in their admiration for the institutions which that empire has always embodied, I venture to say that this matter of citizenship is one of the most necessary points to be considered in dealing with all questions of the empire. If the theory be accepted that a man who happens to be born in one of our great self-governing colonies like Canada has no status within the empire when he leaves the place in which he was born, even though he goes to the Islands of Great Britain and Ireland, then everyone must agree that the very basis for the unity we should like to realize is lacking. And that unity in the highest sense is impossible unless the man born in Canada or any of the other overseas dominions is able to claim equal privileges as a British subject, as one who happens to be born in the land which, for the time being, is the centre of the empire. For that reason, I venture to make this motion, with the view of drawing to it the attention of the House and in the hope of having implemented and carried into effect at as early a day as possible the conclusions arrived at in the conference, and also for the purpose of getting all the papers, if there are any—and I presume there must be—that have passed between the Secretary of State for the Colonies and our own government, since the date of the conference in June last.

Mr. BORDEN. What is the status under the law as it exists at present of a person naturalized in Great Britain? Is he a British subject only in Great Britain, or is he a British subject also in Canada?

Mr. MACDONALD. I can only speak from the information I have gathered in reading the discussion. It would seem that a man who is a British subject in the United Kingdoms of Great Britain and Ireland is a British subject in any of the colonies.

Mr. BORDEN. I have not made myself clear to the hon. gentleman. I was speaking of a naturalised British subject, one naturalized in the United Kingdom. To make my meaning clearer, perhaps I may be allowed to explain that the status of such a person depends upon the terms of the Naturalization Act which is in force in Great Britain; and I observe in a recent comment, owing to the alleged restricted terms of the statute itself, that an alien naturalized in the United Kingdom is not a British subject outside of the United Kingdom. The reason I asked the question is that I thought possibly my hon. friend (Mr. Macdonald, Pictou) had investigated that phase of the case.

Mr. MACDONALD. It would seem to me when a man who, either by birth or naturalization in the United Kingdom, is a British subject, then, so far as civil rights are concerned at any rate, he would have such rights as a British subject in any of the colonies. Unquestionably, he would be so regarded by the home authorities in the settlement of any question that might arise abroad where his rights as a British subject might be asserted by him. And I should gather from what I have read of the discussion that the home authorities would regard such a man as entitled to all the privileges of a British subject. But the British authorities do not accord to those who have become British subjects by naturalization in the colonies, under conditions which are not as onerous in regard to residence as are applied at home, the same recognition as is given to the man who attained his rights by naturalization in Great Britain or Ireland.

After all, perhaps, this whole proposition is one which must necessarily be a subject of development. The status of the colonies is greatly improved within the last ten years. The English statesmen of twenty-five years ago regarded each of the dependencies as being under the control of the home authorities; and the theory that the empire was composed and is composed of a collection of independent nations has obtained recognition and full accord in Great Britain only within the last ten years. As a consequence, the right of each one of these dependencies, by legislation, to create British subjects who shall have all the rights that formerly had been obtained only through the central authority is a proposition which has assumed a serious phase only within the time when the recognition of the group-of-nations idea within the empire has obtained permanence in the homeland.

Mr. Churchill, at the conference, speaking in regard to this matter, explained his solution of it. He said:

We must place ourselves, in any legislation which we seek upon this subject, upon the two main principles, as I understand them, of the government of the British Empire. First of all, we must base ourselves upon the assents of local parliaments; and, secondly, upon the responsibilities of ministers. As long as we stand on those two foundations I do not think that any real difficulties will arise in practice. I certainly feel, and I am sure my right hon. friend, the President of the Conference, agrees with me, that no Imperial Act ought on this subject to deal with the self-governing colonies, unless and except in so far as it is adopted by their parliaments. We feel very strongly that, in regard to a question like naturalization, the government of the Dominion, where the certificate of naturalization is applied for, must be the judge and the complete judge. We have no desire at all that the Secretary of State for the Home Department should have the power to reach out, as it were, into the self-governing area of the South African Union or the Dominion of Canada and confer naturalization—I think that perhaps was in Mr. Malan's mind—on persons who had been refused naturalization there. We have no idea of that kind of reaching out into a self-governing area; nor have we any idea of overriding local law. That is a matter of the greatest importance. A certificate of naturalization does not entitle the naturalized person to any treatment in this country or in any Dominion of the British Empire, except as may be prescribed by the laws of this country or of the dominions in question.
