Mr. MONK. The first question and the first part of the second question were answered. To the first question the answer was, 'yes' and to the first part of the second 'no'. The second paragraph of the second question was left in abeyance at the time the question was put. I think my hon. friend will recognize that it would be a great inconvenience to the department to be obliged to secure all this information. If he could place it in a more specific manner it would be more conveniently answered. These purchases are made right and left all over the country and if my hon. friend could tell us about the date, or with regard to what locality he desired this information, we could get it for him. Otherwise, it would have to stand as an order for a return and it would involve a very considerable amount of work on the part of the department. If there was any special purchase or any special firm with regard to which the hon. gentleman desired information it might be possible to give it to him.

Mr. MACDONALD. If my hon. friend agrees that the matter is one which should be made the subject of a motion for a return I will limit it in the way he suggests.

Mr. SPEAKER. Stands as a notice of motion for a return.

PRINCE EDWARD ISLAND CAR FERRY.

*Mr. EMMERSON:

1. Is the government aware that there appeared in the Charlottetown 'Guardian' in its issue of December 29th last the following:—

Premier Borden pledges a Car Ferry and Standard Gauge for the Prince Edward Island Railway.

His telegram to A. A. McLean, M.P., a most important message. Will do away with three short hauls. Good work done by Queen's representative in securing this great boon.

'Mr. McLean, M.P., received last evening the following most important despatch from R. L. Borden, Ottawa, and has kindly placed the same at the service of the 'Guardian' for the information of the people of Prince Edward Island;

Anglo-American Telegraph Company, Ltd.,
Ottawa, Ont., December 28, 1911.

A. A. McLean, M.P.,
Charlottetown:

'In reply to representations of Nicholson and yourself during the past two months, I beg to inform you that the government has decided to undertake the establishment of a government ferry service between the island and the mainland. This will involve the changing from narrow to standard gauge on the Island railway. This improved service will do away with three short hauls, and it is hoped will result in a great advantage to the people.'

(Signed) R. L. BORDEN.

'The 'Guardian' ventures the opinion that no more important message has come to this province since confederation than this. It is the official announcement that a car ferry will be established, the Prince Edward Island railway be made a standard gauge road and that the three short hauls will become a thing of the past.

'All honour to Premier Borden for so promptly making good the promise he gave before attaining power. And all honour to Messrs. McLean and Nicholson, who in three months after their election have been influential in securing this great boon for the people of Prince Edaward Island.'

4. If the telegram was sent, how many days previous to polling day in the last general local elections held in the province of Prince Edward Island was the said telegram despatched?

5. What was the date of polling in said local elections?

6. Were the representations mentioned in said telegram, if sent, made in writing, and on what dates were such representations made? If in writing, will the government set forth the contents of such writing or writings, and the date thereof respectively, or lay a copy or copies of same on the table of the House?

7. If not in writing, what was the nature and purport of said representations, and at what date or dates were they respectively made?

Mr. BORDEN:

1. No.

2. Yes.

3. The increased cost and inconvenience of the three short hauls had been brought to the attention of the Prime Minister in parliament on several occasions, and also during his recent visit to Prince Edward Island. The Prime Minister in parliament, and during his recent tour in Prince Edward Island had condemned the existing system and strongly advocated an improved service which would dispense with the three short hauls.

4 and 5. The government have no information.

6. Representations were both oral and in writing. Copies thereof will be laid on the table of the House if moved for.

CIVIL SERVICE INVESTIGATION.

Mr. SINCLAIR:

Having reference to the statement of the Minister of Customs, quoted in 'Hansard' of the present session, page 1124, as follows: —'When a defeated candidate makes charges against an official of active partisanship I have so far sent those charges as given to me to the commissioner appointed for the purpose of investigating, and he is advised to notify whoever makes the charges and the official against whom the charges are made,' has this practice been adopted by the other departments of the government as well as the Department of Customs?

Mr. BORDEN:

In all cases where inquiry seems reasonable or necessary, having regard to all the circumstances, it will be granted. Due weight will, however, be given to the statement of a member or defeated candidate who has personal knowledge or who otherwise satisfies the minister that his information is thoroughly reliable.

CANADIAN MARINE INSURANCE.

Mr. LEMIEUX:

1. Is it the intention of the government to co-operate in the establishment of a Canadian Marine Insurance, in order to reduce the insurance rates on the St. Lawrence?

2. Was the Postmaster General speaking for the government when he declared himself in favour of a Canadian Lloyds, at the Builders' Exchange dinner on Tuesday the 9th of January last?

Mr. FOSTER (North Toronto)

A careful study is now being made by the Department of Trade and Commerce into the question of Marine Insurance as affecting shipping in Canadian ports. When this information is gathered the government will carefully consider the whole matter with a view to remedying a condition of things which appears to be seriously retarding the commerce of Canada through its own ports.

Mr. PELLETIER. As to the second part of the answer, when I spoke on the occasion in question I especially declared that I was not speaking on behalf of the government, that I was making a suggestion to the members of the shipping interest of the country.

DISMISSAL OF GEO. CRESINE.

Mr. SINCLAIR:

1. Has James Cresine, Quarter Master on the SS. 'Scotia,' operating at Mulgrave, N.S., been dismissed?

4. Has there been any investigation? If so, what was the result?

5. How long has Cresine been in the service?

Mr. COCHRANE:

1. 'George' Cresine, quartermaster on the steamship 'Scotia,' has been dismissed.

Mr. POWER:

1. Is Mr. Michael Mullaly still in the employment of the Post Office Department? If not, when was he dismissed?
2. At whose request was he dismissed, and why was he dismissed?
3. Was an investigation made as to his conduct? If so, by whom?

Mr. PELLETIER:

Mr. Mullaly, having been accused of active political interference, was asked if it was true, and he denied it.

As there were very serious doubts as to this denial being sincere, the Postmaster General invited Mr. Mullaly to his office in Quebec, and asked him if he would make the same denial on oath. His answer was in the negative. He then fully admitted that he had allowed himself to be carried away by his enthusiasm but admitted he knew he was violating the rule. He then asked not to be dismissed and to be allowed to resign. This was granted. Subsequently he said he would not resign, and he had to be dismissed.

INTERCOLONIAL RAILWAY—HOLIDAY AND SUNDAY PAY.

Mr. EMMERSON:

1. Did the honourable the Minister of Railways and Canals issue or cause to be issued instructions to the Managing Board of Government Railways at Moncton, to the effect that no person employed by the Intercolonial railway at Moncton not being members of an international labour organization should be permitted to receive time and one-half for labour performed on holidays and Sundays, and that members of such international organizations only shall receive such time and one-half for said holidays and Sundays?
2. Is the minister aware that orders and regulations to the effect above stated are said to have been in operation and effect at Moncton since January 1st of the present year-

4. Would a mail carrier lose his contract if without injury to the service he take part in elections?
5. What is the rule of the Post Office Department in this matter?

Mr. PELLETIER:

1. This contract was awarded to P. Trudel, who transferred it to N. Provencher. The contract has not been annulled. One of its clauses provides that it can be terminated after three months' notice when the Postmaster General thinks such notice should be given in the public interest. This three months' notice has been given.

2 and 3. This contract is for an amount below $200. The necessary precautions have been taken to make sure that there will be no increase in the price and that the change will be in the public interest, and consequently it is not necessary to call for tenders.

4 and 5. Each case must be decided on its merits.

Mr. BORDEN:

1. The matter is under consideration.
2. Dr. Chabot has not at any time mentioned the subject to the Prime Minister nor has there been any discussion or communication on the subject between them.

POSTAGE ON POLITICAL LITERATURE.

Mr. CLARKE (Essex):

1. Was application made to the Post Office Department by Honourable Mr. Perley, then chief whip of the Conservative party, for permission to use the mails for sending out Conservative literature without payment of postage after the dissolution of the last parliament, and after the time had expired within which under the regulations of the department such rights existed?
2. If so, was such permission granted and taken advantage of?
3. What are the names of the newspapers sent out by mail from the offices of publication during the last Dominion election campaign which were unpaid for by the persons to whom they were addressed, and upon which the postage paid was at the regular rate for newspapers sent to subscribers, or if a higher rate was paid the excess over the regular rate was refunded?

A refund has been made, but illegally, and without sufficient authority, and all those to whom such refund has been made, have been notified to pay.

Mr. CLARKE (Essex). The minister's reply to the first and second sections of this question is that he finds nothing on record about this in his department. Although there may be nothing on record I would think the Postmaster General might have learned in his department whether such an application was made.

Mr. PELLETIER. It is hard for me to answer for my predecessor in office. I am asked about a thing that occurred before I was Postmaster General and I can only speak from the records in my department. Perhaps my hon. friend would put the question to the hon. member for Rouville (Mr. Lemieux).

Mr. LEMIEUX. I am quite willing to answer it.

Mr. PELLETIER. The question is not put to you.

Mr. CLARKE (Essex). I will adopt the suggestion of the Postmaster General and ask my hon. friend (Mr. Lemieux).

Mr. LEMIEUX. I beg to state that the day after dissolution——

Mr. PELLETIER. I rise to a question of order. The question should be put to the hon. gentleman (Mr. Lemieux) in the manner provided by the rules and then ample opportunity will be given him to answer it.

Mr. CLARKE (Essex). Is the point of order well taken, Mr. Speaker?

Mr. SPEAKER. I think it is. It is competent for any member to put a question on the paper asking for information from another member of the House, but he must do so in the regular way.

Mr. CLARKE (Essex). It seems to me I am entitled to more than the Postmaster General has given. The Postmaster General still has his deputy postmaster General and if the information can be had by inquiring from him it is his duty to bring it down.

Mr. DEVLIN. As a matter of information on the point of order——

Mr. SPEAKER. The point of order has been dealt with.

Mr. DEVLIN. I rise to another point of order. When the Postmaster General delegates his powers to a member of the House with instructions to answer for him, is not that hon. member entitled to answer?

Mr. SPEAKER. I do not think there is any point of order in the point raised by the hon. member (Mr. Devlin). If information is desired of any member of the House or of the Cabinet regarding public matters before the House, the rule is that he is entitled to put the question on the Order Paper in the usual way. I do not think it would be right for the Postmaster General or any other hon. gentleman to make rules of his own.

Mr. REID. (Grenville). I do not think this motion can pass in its present form, it has not been customary to publish particulars of individual importations, and it is considered inadvisable under ordinary circumstances to disclose individual transactions at the customs from documents furnished for revenue purposes and which honest importers expect to be treated as confidential. Possibly this motion could be amended in such a way that we could give the hon. member the information he desires.

Mr. BUREAU. Can the minister suggest in what way he desires the motion amended.

Mr. REID. (Grenville). It would have to be redrafted and it would be better to let it stand.

TOBACCO GROWERS OF YAMASKA.

Mr. LEMIEUX moved for:

A copy of all correspondence and papers referring to the granting of special aid to the tobacco growers of La Société Co-operative de la Vallée de Yamaska.

He said: The county of Rouville had formed a co-operative society among the tobacco growers in the valley of Yamaska. During last session they sent a delegation to Ottawa asking for some aid towards the construction of a factory. After the general election, I renewed the request made by these tobacco growers of the county of Rouville to my hon. friend the Minister of Agriculture, and I am glad to say that I received a letter from him a day or so ago stating that he would implement the promise made by the ex-Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Fisher). I beg to thank my hon. friend publicly for what he has done for the tobacco growers of the county of Rouville.

Motion agreed to.

STE. AGATHE POST OFFICE, TERREBONNE COUNTY, QUEBEC.

Mr. LEMIEUX moved:

For a copy of all correspondence, papers and reports in connection with the investigation recently held at the St. Agathe post office, county of Terrebonne.

He said: When I was Postmaster General, I had to dismiss the postmaster at Ste. Agathe, not for political causes, but because of certain charges brought against him. The postmaster happened to be a friend of the political party I represented. He was replaced by a lady who was highly recommended both by the people of Ste. Agathe and by the summer residents of that place. She is a niece of the late hon. Mr. Marchand, who was at one time the Prime Minister of the province of Quebec. This lady's management of the post office has given general satisfaction to the community. But there have been rumours of late that this lady would be dismissed, and replaced by another party. Quite an agitation has been going on amongst the residents of Ste. Agathe, and especially amongst the summer residents, many of whom are well known in Montreal. They came to me because I happen to reside in Montreal, and they appealed to my hon. friend the Minister of Inland Revenue (Mr. Nantel), to maintain that lady in her position, and not displace her. I do not say that any decision has been arrived at by the Post Office Department, but I appeal to the Postmaster General not to make any change in this case. There are no charges whatever against this lady; she keeps the post office in a perfect manner. The Postmaster General will find any number of letters in the department praying for the continuance of this lady in the position of postmistress at Ste. Agathe.

Hon. L. P. PELLETIER (Postmaster General). There is no objection whatever to bringing down the papers asked for. I suppose the House has been very much astonished to hear that this is not a case of dismissal already. The records, when they are brought down, will show that there are requests for the dismissal of this postmistress and also petitions against dismissal. They have been in the department for quite a long time. As my hon. friend has stated nothing has been done. The papers will be brought down.

Motion agreed to.

DISMISSAL OF C. MICHAUD, POSTMASTER AT ST. GERMAIN DE KAMOURASKA.

Mr. ERNEST LAPOINTE (Kamouraska) (Translation) moved:

For a copy of all correspondence, documents, recommendations and reports respecting the dismissal of C. Michaud, postmaster at St. Germain, Kamouraska, and the appointment of his successor.

He said: Mr. Speaker, in the course of the debate which took place in this House, in connection with the numerous dismissals effected by this government, either of postmasters, or other public officers, the hon. Postmaster General (Mr. Pelletier) stated that, should he discover some mistake for which he was responsible, he would be glad to correct it as soon as it would be brought to his attention. It is because I am satisfied that a grevious mistake has been committed in connection with this dismissal that I propose laying the facts before this House, in the hope that the hon. minister will carry out his promise and make amends for the wrong inflicted.

In 1896, when the old government came into power, the postmaster of St. Germain, Kamouraska, was Mr. Joseph Moreau. Mr. Moreau, is a leading business man in the county as well as one of the leading men of the Conservative party in the electoral district of Kamouraska. He was not dismissed by the Liberal government when the latter came into the power; in fact, Mr. Moreau retained his postmastership for a period of nine long years. It was in 1905 only that he was dismissed. During those nine years, Mr. Moreau in no way relented from working with all his might in favour of the Conservative party and against the Liberal party; as a matter of fact, he is one of our most bitter opponents in the county of Kamouraska; I refer especially to what he has done during the general elections of 1904, when I was a candidate in that constituency. However, I never asked that he be dismissed. Nevertheless, in 1905, without any steps having been taken by myself or any of my workers in the constituency, I was informed through a letter received from the hon., then Postmaster General Sir William Mulock, that the postmaster of St. Germain had been relieved of his office for having defrauded the department and I was requested in consequence to suggest the name of some other person to take his place. On receipt of that letter, I proceeded to the department and I was not a little surprised to learn then that the grounds for Mr. Moreau's dismissal was that he had taken advantage of his position as postmaster to pay wholesale merchants in Quebec or Montreal by means of stamps the property of the deparment, thus increasing by 40 per cent his salary. For you are aware, Mr. Speaker, that the remuneration of postmasters is proportionate to the amount of stamps sold by them, and that such sale is the basis on which they are paid. That is the fraud which the deparment charged Mr. Moreau with having committed, and even a letter was written to me to that effect. As I stated a moment ago, that was the only reason for his dismissal. Accordingly, I was not a little surprised to learn through an answer given by the postmaster general that the reason alleged in 1905 for Moreau's dismissal was only a blind, the true motive being his refusal to work in the interests of the Liberal party. Now, I state under my responsibility as a member of this House, that I never requested his dismissal, neither in 1905, or at any other time, and that I never requested his dismissal through others, on the ground that he had not worked in the interests of the Liberal party. Although he had always been a most bitter opponent, we always continued to employ him as postmaster.

Following on his dismissal in 1905, I suggested the name of another wholly qualified and very respectable person, Mr. Chrysestome Michaud, of St. Germain. Mr. Michaud fulfilled his duties as postmaster to the satisfaction of all. So little did he interfere in politics that he did not even cast his vote at the last election on September 21. Notwithstanding which, three or four weeks after the election, without inquiry, without notice, without any notification whatever, Mr. Michaud was dismissed and replaced by the man who in 1905 had been relieved of his duties for having defrauded the department.

As I stated on opening my remarks, and I now repeat it, I cast no blame on the hon. genleman, except possibly for not having exercised sufficient scrutiny in the matter and having put too much faith in the truthfulness of his informers.

My hon. friend is not cognizant of the facts which I am now bringing to his attention, and I am satisfied that the people who insisted on that charge have not supplied him with all the facts. Therefore, I trust that after looking into all the circumstances—and I shall refer later on to the matter—he will set things right as he has stated he was disposed to do, whenever it would have been shown to him that a mistake had been committed, and I trust that the postmastership of St. Germain will be restored to Mr. Michaud, who has managed it to the satisfaction of all citizens, not having even voted at the last election, and that it will once more be taken away from the man who was deprived of it in 1909, for the reasons I have pointed out and which proved inimical to his reinstatement.

Hon. L. P. PELLETIER (Postmaster General). I do not for one moment hesitate in accepting the word of the hon. member for Kamouraska. I am satisfied that, if his memory serves him right, the facts are such as he has described them. However, their is a strange coincidence occurring in this case, and I shall point it out presently.

I should say that I take the whole responsibility for the reinstatement of Mr. Moreau. I did not reinstate him, as my hon. friend has just stated, because I was unaware of the circumstances. I reinstated him with a full knowledge of the circumstances, and ready to assume responsibility for such action before the House. Mr. Moreau is a true and honest man, and the member for Kamouraska will not deny it. Now that man has been branded by the Post Office Department as a dishonest man, and that in the most unfair way that could be imagined. Here are the facts.

Previous to the coming in use of postal notes, it was a recognized right of postmasters to make up in postage stamps the change needed to complete a remittance. As the former Postmaster General the member for Rouville (Mr. Lemieux) is aware, when the use of postal notes came into force, postmasters were instructed not to use any longer postage stamps for such remittances, but to use instead postal notes. Mr. Moreau received similar instructions. Postal notes are for amounts of 20, 25, 30 cents, etc., but there are no notes for intermediate amounts. So that, if a man wishes to remit by post an amount of 23 or 28 cents, he will take a postal note for 20 cents and complete it with a 3-cent stamp. That is the rule of the department. That is all Mr. Moreau has ever done. His reputation as a citizen is unsullied. I reinstated him, because I am satisfied as to his honesty and respectability. And that is the man who in 1905 was branded as a dishonest man. I reinstated him, in order to restore him in the enjoyment of his good name.

The file contains a report of the inspector who was sent there and that report states that Moreau used postage stamps for remittances under 20 cents. Who will find fault with that? It was his right to do so, since there are no postal notes of a lower figure than 20 cents. The inspector warned Moreau—and he says so in his report,—to be cautious in that respect.

In the departmental files, there is a report from the secretary of the department who had not seen Mr. Moreau, who has not visited the locality, and that report states that this man endeavoured to increase his salary through the unlawful sale of postage stamps. That report is not even signed by the secretary, it is only a sheet of paper containing some typewritten matter.

I corrected that wrong, and I am not sorry for doing so; I would do the same thing over again to-morrow if there was occasion for it.

The hon. member for Kamouraska claims that he has not asked for the dismissal of Mr. Moreau on account of his not working in his interests. Here are the facts, and the strange coincidence which I mentioned on rising to address the House: A day or two before the election took place in Kamouraska, a friend of the hon. member called on Mr. Moreau and told him: If you do not vote and you do not work for the party you will be deprived of your postmastership on the day following. The hon. member cannot deny that, the fact is evidenced by a declaration under oath which is on file.

It may be that the hon. member has friends who are over-zealous. I do not impute the deed to him personally, but I repeat it, he had friends who were over-zealous. Mr. Moreau made up his mind not to heed the warning, he went to cast his ballot, and after he had voted, strange to say, the threat which had been made was given effect to.

The papers moved for will be laid on the table. My hon. friend, whenever he wishes to look over those documents in the department, will be welcome, and he will find there the proof of the facts I have stated. Whenever I make a mistake, I am manly enough to admit it and make amends for it; but in this case no mistake has been made.

I have the pleasure of knowing personally Mr. Moreau. The hon. member knows that I am acquainted with a goodly number of people in the county of Kamouraska, which is quite familiar to me. As for Mr. Moreau, I am ready to answer for his perfect honesty and to say that his dismissal was unwarranted and without justification. That is why he has been reinstated.

Mr. Moreau, when the facts were brought to his knowledge, was greatly surprised, the only notice he received was a short note stating that he was dismissed. Nothing more. Had there been any reason to complain of some mismanagement on his part as postmaster, should he not have been told you have attempted to increase your salary by 40 per cent, you are a dishonest man and that is why you are dismissed. Should he not have been put in a position to clear himself of such a charge? No, he was condemned without having an opportunity of vindicating himself. I am satisfied that if the hon. member will come to my office—and I extend the invitation to him—and if he will look through the papers, he will have to acknowledge that this man should not have been condemned as a thief without having been heard.

I shall bring down all the papers moved for and the hon. member will see that I was justified in acting as I have done.

Mr. LAPOINTE. (Translation.) Mr. Speaker, I shall wait until the papers promised by the hon. minister are brought down before replying to him; however, let me say once more that Mr. Moreau's dismissal was not effected for partisan motives. In 1905, I was entrusted with the distribution of patronage in the county of Kamouraska, and I give him my word of honour that I did not take any steps personally or through any one else to secure his dismissal. It was effected solely through the department, without any request on the part of any body.

Motion agreed to.

THIRD READING.

Bill (No. 2) to amend the Juvenile Delinquents Act, 1908.—Mr. Bickerdike.

MARRIAGE ACT AMENDMENT.

Mr. E. A. LANCASTER (Lincoln and Niagara) moved the second reading of Bill (No. 3) to amend the Marriage Act. He said: Mr. Speaker, the task devolving upon me to-day in regard to this measure is one which I could have wished had been in the hands of one better able to deal with this question than I believe myself to be. However, as I said in introducing the Bill in the month of November last, I believe the matter to be of great importance to the national life of this country that, as no one else had introduced a Bill, I thought it was my duty to do so. I know of no subject that is more vitally important to the interests of this nation than the great subject that this Bill deals with. The question of marriage and the results of marriage needs no statement from me or discussion on my part as to its importance or significance in the national life of the country. We have in this country a state of affairs which, I am satisfied, requires a remedy at the hands of some parliament. The whole question that is involved in this Bill is as to the result of marriages taking place in any part of this Dominion or, for that matter, anywhere else in the world, of people living in this Dominion who are married according to the ceremonies that are lawful in the locality where the marriage takes place, and as to the effect of these marriages in one province of this Dominion, or, perhaps, in more than one province, but in one province, as far as I know. Of course, in all legislation we have to do with evil. The evil here does not consist, in my humble opinion, in the fact that the courts of the province of Quebec have made a certain pronouncement which, I must say, in passing, for what it is worth as a lawyer, I do not think is of importance as a legal pronouncement. I am not a Quebec lawyer, and, therefore, I am not entitled to put that opinion before this House. I am a humble member of the Dominion parliament representing not only the constituency which has honoured me by allowing me to represent it for nearly twelve years in this House, but I must take my part as a member of parliament and the representative of that constituency in remedying all evils which occur to me as one of the 220 odd members of this House who are sent here for the purpose of doing that very thing and performing that very duty.

Let me make myself clear at the outset. I do not care, for the purpose of this Bill, or its discussion, whether the decisions of the courts of Quebec are well founded or whether they are not according to Quebec law. What I do say is that the evil is that there is a doubt cast upon the result of a marriage lawfully performed according to the laws of the province because the parties to that marriage, one or other of them, may be of a different religion either to the person who performs the ceremony or of a different religion as regards each other, a ceremony which is valid according to the law of the province and may be pronounced a valid ceremony except for the fact that the parties belonging to different religions. The parties to this ceremony have allied themselves to each other under the most sacred conditions that a man and a woman can conform to in allying themselves to each other for the purpose of the procreation of children and for the welfare of those children in a lawful, legitimate and proper way. I want to be quite well understood on this question. The evil in my mind is the doubt. I say it is our paramount duty as the highest parliament in Canada to remedy that doubt if we can. We cannot afford to have that question looked upon with doubt from any other country whose attention may be directed towards us. I care not what immigration laws you make, I care not how wisely you may inaugurate any system for the building up of Canada, of trade, of immigration, of development of any kind, if you allow any doubt to exist in any part of the civilized world as to the results of marriages that are supposed to have legally taken place according to the ceremonies which have been legally promulgated or promoted, because, if you are going to allow that doubt to exist, you are going to stop the national life of this country in a way that is more important than any trade or immigration policy or any other question affecting the development of the country. What has happened is this: Because of certain ecclesiastical decrees issued from a foreign country in regard to marriages in Canada relating only to the religion of one class of the community, or at least to one class of religion in the community, it has been decided, not by all the judges, but by one, two or three judges in Quebec, that marriages between persons of different religions, although the parties in every other respect are admitted to be perfectly legally qualified, to have observed the proper ceremony and in every other respect to have complied with the law, are not binding and doubt is thrown upon the fruits of such a marriage and upon the legitimacy of the children who may be born of that union. The object of my Bill, therefore, is to settle that doubt. What is the position in regard to it? Here I have a Bill brought in, drawn by myself, submitted to other people it is true, devised as well as may be, to meet that evil. I do not want to go one iota further than is necessary to remedy the evil. The Bill has been before this House now for about two months. It was purposely introduced by me early in the session in order that during the Christmas and New Year's holidays it could be discussed by every one who took an interest in it, and in order that every one might have ample time to consider it, because I know it is a most important question.

In the Bill as printed one letter has been omitted by the compositor which makes a difference in the sense. In the 11th line the word 'person' should be in the plural, 'persons', 'the religious faith of the persons so married'. Of course it is nonsense to talk of a person marrying, there must be more than one.. I shall move to amend this when the Bill gets into committee.

This question must be dealt with by us entirely in the interest of the nation, entirely regardless of what any particular religion or sect of people may want us to do. I am approaching it in that way. I believe that this legislation which I am asking the House to pass is in the absolute interest of everybody, of every Christian creed, in this country. I have no doubt that, if adopted, this legislation will result in greater happiness to the whole people of this country, greater prosperity and greater national honour to the country as a whole than we have to-day with a doubt existing on this matter.

I have spoken emphatically about the evil. Let me illustrate the necessity of prompt action, let me point out to the House what I humbly believe to be the growing state of the evil. Since these one or two judgments were given in the province of Quebec, people have been aroused on both sides on this question. We find, for instance. The 'Orange Sentinel' demanding, and within its rights in demanding, in its issue of December 7, 1911, after the introduction of the Bill, that my Bill should go further, that it does not go far enough because it does not make a criminal of a priest of a certain church, who would go further into our houses and discuss our matrimonial relations. I do not think there is any such evil existing in this country. I do not propose to put any such clause as that in my Bill. That is the law they have in Italy, but with all deference to 'The Orange Sentinel' I do not think we are in Italy to-day. This is Canada, and I think if proper, calm, reasonable measures are passed we will have no need of enacting anything of that kind. I do not know that there is such an evil in the country and I do not know that it is necessary to have such a special law aimed at the priest of any church any more than it is to have a special law aimed at the medical profession, at the legal profession or at any other profession.

But if we do not apply some remedy we may get to be Italy in this country. That is why I say that delay or procrastination or hesitation about doing our duty here will not be tolerated by the people, is not right and ought not to be tolerated by gentlemen of our standing in this House, charged with making laws for the whole country. I say, and I thank God I can say sincerely, that we are not in this country in the same position as they are in Italy, but with all respect to everybody in this country and in this House, I submit that if we do not take some reasonable and proper course to enunciate that the effect of these marriages is as my Bill proposes to make it, we may get into the position where even I would admit that a year or two hence we will have to have such a law as the 'Orange Sentinel' says I should attach to my Bill.

Let us take the other side. A certain priest of the Roman Catholic church in Winnipeg, on December 24 last,—and the irony of it is that this was published in the Christmas newspapers, the 'Globe' and 'Mail'—granted an interview. I have taken great care to have this interview verified; I have made inquiries and I find that this priest of this church revised this interview before it was published, approved of it as it was printed, and it is his own actual language. That interview reads:

A PRIEST'S VIEW OF THE MARRIAGE QUESTION.

Father Comeau would Perform Secret Ceremony in some Cases.

(Canadian Press Despatch.)

Winnipeg, Dec. 24.—Rev. Father Comeau, resident priest of St. Mary's church here, has made the following statement to an evening paper in regard to the recent Ne Temere case at St. Boniface, when he refused to permit a Catholic woman to see her Protestant husband unless they were remarried by the church. 'Suppose a Roman Catholic and a Protestant wish to get married. We will imagine the husband to be a Catholic. The parties are married by a Protestant minister. The moment the marriage is contracted the husband has forsaken the Catholic doctrine and can be no longer recognized as a true Catholic. The only way he can come back into the fold is by getting his legal wife to be married to him by a Catholic priest according to the conditions of the Catholic church, that is, that she will not interfere with the practice of his doctrine, and the children will be brought up in the Catholic faith. If the wife refuses and he insists on going back to the church the husband must take a vow never to live with her again.

'If, when reinstated as a Catholic, the man wishes to marry another woman, the ceremony to be performed by a Catholic priest,' asked the reporter, 'may he do it?'

'Well,' was the reply, 'we try and get the man to seek a divorce from the state first, because, in the eyes of the law, he is still married, and, while the church does not recognize it, we do not want to lay ourselves open to prosecutions. There is a way out, and that is by having a secret marriage.

'Take this as an intance: I am sent away to a mission a long way up in the country. When I arrive a man comes to me and says: "Father, I have committed a sin for which I am truly repentant. Three years ago I was married to a Protestant woman by a Protestant minister. Later we separated. We did not get a divorce, and now I am living with another woman. Will you marry us?" I might say: "I will run the risk and marry you in the eyes of God." I then get two witnesses whom I can trust never to reveal what has taken place, and I marry the parties in secret. After this they can never part, as there is no such thing as divorce in the Roman Catholic church. Then they are married in the eyes of God and the church, though perhaps not according to the law of the state. If the former wife should get to know of the second marriage I might be prosecuted. One never knows.'

Sir, I know that that is not the doctrine of my fellow citizens of this country who profess the Roman Catholic religion. I am using that illustration to show the evil that exists in this country. I cite the language used by that one man, a priest of the church, because he is encouraged to use it by virtue of the law I am seeking to amend by the action of this House. I do not believe that any of my Roman Catholic citizens of St. Catharines believe that to be true Roman Catholic doctrine. I cannot for one moment believe they would advocate polygamy and bigamy and conspiracy to commit both of these crimes and that they have a right to do so in the eyes of God and of the law. I know that this is not a true statement of the views of these very respected people of this country, and I have a great respect for most of them. I live beside them, I associate with them, and I thank God my children associate with them; I want them to associate with them, and I do not want them to be afraid to marry them for fear of any such false un-British and unstatesmanlike doctrine as is here enunciated. But it shows how the evil is going on that in December, 1911, this priest expressed such views as that, just as the 'Orange Sentinel' thinks that the evil is so great that we must put a ban on any priest coming into a Protestant's house to discuss his marriage relations or anything else with him.

I wish to be always as candid as I have the reputation of being, and I think I deserve that reputation; if I have a fault I think it is perhaps my utter and undue candour; but I want to say here, looking at the present leader of the opposition and reflecting on the great power and majority he had behind him until September of last year, that I think he and his government are a great deal to blame for this situation.

I want to tell him that three years ago when the Ne Temere decree was promulgated in the province of Quebec, and which caused all this trouble, he must have known, representing all classes of the people as he did for fifteen years, of the conditions as they then were. But he was not without a reminder. The hon. member for East Peterborough (Mr. Sexsmith) drew it to the attention of the government away back in March last year, and Sir Allen Aylesworth speaking for the government on the question, and with all respect I say it, trifling with the matter, gave the answer. I quote from 'Hansard' page 6269:

VALIDITY OF MARRIAGES.

Mr. SEXSMITH:

1. Under the laws of Canada or of the several provinces, are marriages valid when contracted between persons of different religious beliefs? If so, in what cases?

2. Has any one the right to urge persons who have contracted such valid marriages to disregard them on the ground that they are invalid?

3. If such right does not exist what is the remedy?

Sir ALLEN AYLESWORTH:

1. There is no Dominion legislation on the subject.

The solemnization of marriage in the provinces is, under the British North America Act, matter entirely of provincial jurisdiction.

Section 92 of that statute enacts that in each province the legislature may exclusively make laws in relation to matters coming within the classes of subjects next hereinafter enumerated; that is to say:

12. The solemnization of marriage in the provinces.

Sir Allen Aylesworth answered that the solemnization of marriage is under entire provincial jurisdiction, but that is not the question he was asked, and to part two of the question the answer has no relevancy.

Then the present Minister of Militia (Mr. Hughes) in the same session asked a long series of questions on this very important matter which is dealt with in this Bill of mine, and Sir Allen Aylesworth again replied:

1. The government or any department of the government has no knowledge in relation to the matters referred to in these questions other than such as may be gathered from newspaper articles or references upon the subject.

He appears to have great contempt for the newspapers which are the chief medium of communicating information to governments as well as to the people. We will see from this that the Minister of Justice under the benign influence of his leader Sir Wilfrid Laurier shows a great policy of masterly inactivity. The member for East Peterborough (Mr. Sexsmith), and the member for Victoria (Mr. Hughes) asked questions about it, but they were answered that the provinces had to do with the solemnization of marriage and neither the government nor any department of it has any knowledge in relation to the matters referred to. But, the government is supposed to have knowledge of such an important public question. Every one in this country had knowledge of it, and when these members of the opposition drew the attention of the late government to the matter it was time that the government should do something. But, that government while it was busy trying to smash confederation by advocating reciprocity for the benefit of the United States was equally masterly in trying to smash confederation on the question of marriage between people living in different provinces of the Dominion. It was the duty of the Prime Minister and his Minister of Justice to have knowledge of these matters, and to discuss it at the council board, and to see that while confederation lasted it was not possible that Canadians marrying in one province when they moved to another province would have doubts cast on the legitimacy of their children. If there was no other reason than that, this Bill of mine ought to pass so as to settle for all time a form of marriage ceremony which is lawful throughout the Dominion. There are half-a-dozen ways of getting married in the province of Quebec, and if a man and woman select any of these forms that is prescribed to be lawful, then it must not be that ten years later a man who has a grudge against him will be able to say without being liable for criminal libel, that there is the slightest streak of illegitimacy on the offspring of that marriage. And, Sir Allen Aylesworth under the benign influence of the then Prime Minister, in answer to the member for Victoria (Mr. Hughes) instead of saying that the government was going to do something about it gave an answer which meant that the government would taken no action.

Mr. CHISHOLM (Antigonish). What does your own Minister of Justice say about it?

Mr. LANCASTER. I have always found that my own Minister of Justice is able to speak for himself, but I am representing a constituency in this parliament and I am speaking for myself. My hon. friend (Mr. Chisholm) should be manly enough to speak for himself and not swallow all that Sir Allen Aylesworth said simply because it was the statement of a Grit Minister of Justice. Then Mr. Taylor of Leeds put this question on 'Hansard,' page 8585:

Mr. LANCASTER.

LEGALIZATION OF MARRIAGES.

Mr. TAYLOR (Leeds):

1. Has the Dominion government power to legalize or validate any or every marriage solemnized anywhere in Canada?

2. Has the government taken any steps to ascertain the power of this parliament in that regard?

3. If not, does the government propose to take any steps for that purpose?

4. Has the opinion of the law officers of the Crown been asked or obtained upon this question?

5. Does the government propose to obtain the opinion of the law officers of the Crown thereon?

And what did Sir Allen Aylesworth answer:

1. The government does not consider that it possesses any such power.

2, 3, 4 and 5. The government has not considered the advisability of taking any of the courses suggested.

Why did not Sir Allen Aylesworth say that parliament did or did not possess any such powers, instead of giving the evasive answer that the 'government' did not possess such powers. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Chisholm) wants to compare Ministers of Justice, but I would point out to him that when the same question was asked of this present government the present government was manly enough to say that while the government had no power, the question as to parliament having power was in dispute and would possibly require judicial authority.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

Mr. LANCASTER. These hon. gentlemen opposite who now cry sarcastically 'hear, hear,' took what Sir Allen Aylesworth said with abject submission, although they must have known that his answer was an evasion of the question put. That is the kind of quibbling that I complain of. My hon. friend (Mr. Chisholm) wants to compare Ministers of Justice. I may or may not agree with the present Minister of Justice on this question; I have had no conference with him about it. He does not know what I am going to say and he may not know at this minute what he is going to say himself.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Oh, oh.

Mr. LANCASTER. Yes, and the reason is that being a Conservative he is willing to wait until he hears the argument and the discussion before he pronounces his opinion, and the whole horde behind the benign leader of the opposition applaud the statement—

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order.

Mr. SPEAKER. It is scarcely parliamentary for the hon. member to use the word 'horde' as he has used it. When he speaks of hon. members as the whole horde behind the leader of the opposition, the expression in my judgment is not permissible in parliament.

Mr. LANCASTER. Of course I withdraw the word, Mr. Speaker. I say that hon. gentlemen supporting the leader of the opposition applaud with derision my statement that the Minister of Justice in this government will not make up his mind as to what he is to say about an important public question until he hears it properly discussed, and that just illustrates the blind faith that those gentlemen opposite evinced in their leaders for fifteen years. So far have they descended that it is apparently a disgraceful thing for a minister of the Crown to keep an open mind on public questions until he hears what the representatives of the people have to say about them. The gentlemen opposite are prepared apparently to agree to anything that their leader says or does and they do not expect any one to exercise his own judgment upon a question after hearing it discussed. Then, finding that Sir Allen Aylesworth, Minister of Justice, was playing on the word 'government' instead of 'parliament,' Mr. Taylor of Leeds asked,

1. Has the parliament of Canada the power to legalize or validate any or every marriage solemnized in Canada?

2. Does the government consider it desirable that steps should be taken to prevent cruelty and injustice by reason of marriages contracted in good faith before a duly ordained clergyman, but afterwards, declared invalid?

3. Does the government propose to take any steps for this purpose or in this connection?

and Sir Allen Aylesworth answered as follows:

1. The question calls for an opinion upon a matter of law in regard to which the government would desire to be advised if necessity arose?

2 and 3. The government is of the opinion that it has no power or jurisdiction in the premises.

Now, am I not justified in saying that the late government, and their Minister of Justice (Sir Allen Aylesworth) were playing with the question, and thus intensifying the existing evil? I presume that Sir Allen Aylesworth had some opinion of his own in regard to the law, but he failed to give it. And I have no doubt that should a similar question be put the Minister of Justice in this government, he will not tell us that he wants advice, but on the contrary will give us his opinion whether it agrees with mine or not. For I do believe that any minister of the Crown behind the present Prime Minister would be ashamed to say, when asked a question like that a second time, and when the word 'parliament' is inserted instead of the word 'government'—that the question called for an opinion on a matter of law in regard to which the government was desirous to be advised if the necessity arose.

After this prelude let us see what the Bill is. My Bill undertakes to provide that marriages celebrated by any lawful authority shall be considered valid, notwithstanding—and here is the whole evil that is to be remedied—nowithstanding any difference in the religious faith of the persons married, and without regard to the religion of the person performing the ceremony. My Bill is purposely double barrelled. There is an evil in the country which it is our duty here to remedy. This is the place to remedy it, and to get away from quibbles and technicalities I propose that we shall enact here, by original jurisdiction, that these marriages are valid under the British North America Act which sends the general subject of marriage and divorce to the Dominion parliament. Further, under the second clause of the Bill, I propose to have parliament say that if there is a law providing to the contrary, it is over-ruled by this statute. The Bill goes on to say:

2. The rights and duties, as married people, of the respective persons married as aforesaid, and of the children of such marriage, shall be absolute and complete, and no law or canonical decree or custom of or in any province in Canada shall have any force or effect to invalidate or qualify any such marriage or any of the rights of the said persons or their children in any manner whatsoever.'

One would think, on reading these questions I have quoted, and the answers of Sir Allen Aylesworth, that the Dominion parliament never before had dealt with this question. Well, there is on our revised statutes as far back as 1906 an Act respecting marriage, passed by the Dominion parliament, and that Act provides that it is lawful for a man to marry his deceased wife's sister. That is not the law of the province of Quebec, it is not the canonical law of the Church of England, yet the parliament of Canada has decreed that, as a matter of civil law, that such marriages should be permitted, and no one has ever attacked that Act, nor has it ever been declared ultra vires. The question as to whether parliament can deal with the subject of marriage is, Sir Allen Aylesworth said, one on which the late government would want advice. But I do not know what better advice a Minister of Justice would want than a statute ten years old, which was passed by this parliament, which was never attacked, and was never repealed by the government of which Sir Allen Aylesworth was a member. That Act of the parliament of Canada declared against the common law of England, and against the canonical law of several churches, that you can marry your deceased wife's sister so long as the ceremony provided by law is gone through.

Now, let us have common-sense in the matter, let us ask ourselves where is the remedy to be found. I shall go into the question of provincial rights in Quebec because that is the only argument I have heard anywhere as to why this Bill should not be passed. Let us see if this parliament has authority. Under the British constitution there must be some parliament that has power, and no hon. member will say that the Imperial parliament has power because the British North America Act has sent all these things to the Dominion, or to the provinces. The British North America Act says marriage and divorce must be dealt with by the Dominion parliament, and section 91 of that Act reads:

It shall be lawful for the Queen, by and with the advice of the Senate and House of Commons, to make laws for the peace, order and good government of Canada, in relation to all matters not coming within the class of subject, by this Act assigned exclusively to the legislatures of the province; and for greater certainty, but not so as to restrict the generality of the foregoing terms of this section, it is hereby declared, notwithstanding anything in this Act, the exclusive legislative authority of the parliament of Canada extends to all matters coming within the classes of subjects next hereinafter enumerated.

And within these classes is the subject of marriage and divorce. There is no restriction there. It says for greater certainty, 'marriage and divorce', and there is no condition whatever prescribed. Then comes section 92 as to the power of the provincial legislature:

In each province the legislature may exclusively make laws in relation to matters coming within the classes of subjects, next hereinafter enumerated.

Then within these classes is 'the solemnization of marriage in the province'.

Now, the solemnization of marriage is one thing, the status of the people married is one thing, and whether that marriage is valid or not is another thing. I have given the question a good deal of consideration for the last year or more, and I have no doubt with regard to the solemnization of marriage, that the whole power of the province ends as soon as two people are married. The results of that marriage, the status of the children, the question whether that marriage is valid or not, are questions that must be left to the Dominion parliament to settle. That is not only my own opinion, but I have authority for it. Had Sir Allen Aylesworth looked into the sessional papers of 1877, when a government of his own political faith was in power, and when the question was submitted to the law officers of the Crown in England, he would have found a communication from Lord Grenville, then Secretary of State for the Colonies, to the Governor General of Canada, dated the 15th of January, 1870, a few years after confederation. Two questions were submitted to the law officers of the Crown in England on this very matter.

The questions asked were simply because the country was in doubt as to whether the provinces or the Dominion had the power to provide for the publication of banns and the issuing of licenses—whether that came under the head of 'solemnization of marriage' or of 'marriage and divorce'. These were the questions asked:

a) Whether the authority to issue marriage licenses is vested in the Governor General under Her Majesty's Commission or in the Lieutenant Governor of the several provinces.

b) Whether the power of legislation respecting the publication of banns or the issue of licenses rests with the general or local legislatures.

In answer to the above the following opinion was given by the law officers:

It appears to them that the power of legislating upon this subject is conferred on the provincial legislatures by 30 Vic. cap. 3, section 92 (B.N.A. Act) under the words 'the solemnization of marriage in the province.' The phrase 'the laws respecting the solemnization of marriages in England' occurs in the preamble of the marriage Act (4 George IV cap. 76), an Act which is very largely concerned with matters relating to banns and licenses, and this is, therefore, a strong authority to show that the same words used in the B.N.A. Act, 1867, were intended to have the same meaning. 'Marriage and Divorce' which by the 91st section of the same Act are reserved to the parliament of the Dominion, signify, in their opinion all matters relating to the status of marriage, between what persons and under what circumstances it shall be created and (if at all) destroyed.

There are many reasons of convenience and sense why one law as to the status of marriage should exist throughout the Dominion, which have no application as regards the uniformity of the procedure whereby that status is created or evidenced.

Why, Mr. Speaker, it does not seem to me that there was any excuse for the Minister of Justice of the late government to say that this government needed advice upon the subject. The law officers of the Crown had said that the Dominion parliament had inherent right to make laws on this subject. Notwithstanding that the laws of one of the provinces did not allow marriage with a deceased wife's sister this parliament declared that such marriages should be legal.

Now, I am obliged to point out what I believe to be the real objection, an objection, which, it seems to me, this parliament cannot listen to for a moment. I have here the 'Catholic Register' of January 18, 1912, in which appears this short editorial:

Mr. Olmstead is very fearful lest Protestant wrath be aroused against the Church of England on account of its 'deceased wife's sister' law, just as it has been roused against the Catholic Church on the 'Ne Temere' question. He need have no fear. If the worst comes to the worst our Anglican friends will buckle down and accept any legislation which parliament sees fit to enact. Standing for principle is not now and never has been an Anglican characteristic.

That covers the whole issue in this country to-day. I am an Anglican. I know that the laws of our church say that this is not the right thing to do. But, to the credit of the Anglican church be it said, as soon as the Dominion parliament declares: We are the state and we make such and such laws—the Anglican church respects the Dominion parliament and says: We will obey those laws. This that I have quoted is the thin edge of the wedge. They sneer at the Anglican church for disregarding their ecclesiastical canon; sneer at them for being loyal to the government and the institutions of this country, and for obeying laws made by parliament. That is exactly the position to-day and we may as well face it. This country wants the issue faced, and it has got to be faced; —who is to decide as to the legitimacy of our children the church or the parliament of Canada? Don't let us run away from it. Our children will bless us if we settle the matter. My children and my grandchildren, if I have any—and I hope I shall—will bless me for settling it—for not being a coward and afraid to settle it in this year of grace 1912. No one, I believe, will accuse the humble person now addressing you of being a bigot in religion. Hon. gentlemen on the other side may accuse him of being a little bigoted in politics. Perhaps I do not misrepresent the case if I speak of myself as a Tory of the Tories, and even a little bigoted in politics, for I always want to be on the Tory side and believe that the Tory party has done more for this country than its opponents. I cannot help feeling so. But no one believes more fully than I do, that a man's church makes no difference in regard to his communion with his neighbours. I know of no religion in this country that has not admirable adherents. I do not know of any boys or girls that I do not want my children to associate with merely because of their religion. I do not believe that any man will say the member for Lincoln is a religious bigot. But here is a question we have to face, and I give the 'Catholic Register' credit for its candour in bringing it forward. The question is this: If the church says that this or that is to decide the legitimacy of the children and the state of married people, is that to be the law of the land or is a parliament to be able to say: That is not the law. But parliament-made-law must prevail. That is the issue; that is what we have to deal with.

Now, what are the articles of the Quebec Civil Code in regard to this matter? They are not at all clear. Under the head 'Solemnization of Marriage,' this is not provided for. The decisions in Quebec rest upon section 127 of the Civil Code, which provides:

OTHER IMPEDIMENTS.

The other impediments recognized according to the different religious persuasions, as resulting from relationship or affinity or from other causes——

It is only under these words 'other causes,' the religious difference of the parties is said to be an impediment to marriage.

——remain subject to the rules hitherto followed in the different churches and religious communities.

Now, let me point out that this is provided in a chapter as to 'the qualities and conditions necessary for contracting marriage,' and it is not in the chapter which is headed with the very words of the British North America Act, under which alone they have the right to deal with this matter at all—'Solemnization of Marriage.' What I have read is indefinite, it is true, but its object must be, of course, to more or less effect what it intends to effect. But the next chapter is as to 'The Formalities relating to the Solemnization of Marriage,' and there is nothing in that chapter looking to the assumption of jurisdiction in Quebec on this subject. And yet the 'solemnization of marriage' is considered by the law officers of the crown as relating to the forms to be used, and is the only subject which, under the British North America Act, is assigned to the provinces. Though they have a chapter dealing with that subject, they do not say in it that a difference in religion is an impediment; in effect they say it is not because they put it in a different chapter and relating to a different subject.

Now, there are some decisions of the courts. I go into this matter at some length because it is persistently argued that the provinces must not be interfered with in this matter of provincial jurisdiction. The judges of the province of Quebec do not agree in their decisions. In the Hebert case which has raised so much controversy lately, one judge decided two things. He decided that a Protestant minister cannot legally marry two Catholics; and, secondly, that the validity of a marriage between Catholics in Quebec must be decided by the Church and not by the State courts. Now, let us face that. When did we lose confidence in the judges of our land to decide all questions? What is the reason that our judges should not be allowed to decide these questions as well as others? Where is there anything in the British constitution that permits in any way any courts excepts those established as the tribunals of the land to give decisions of this kind?

Who would say that the jurisdiction of that court did not include marriage and divorce? Every session we have people bringing cases here for divorce, and they are not granted until we pass the Bill. We are deciding that people shall be declared unmarried; will any one seriously tell me now, manfully facing this matter, not trying to shirk a vote by urging any plea of provincial rights—will any one seriously tell me that when we can divorce a man we cannot also say that he shall not be divorced, by any church court, or any other court? Hon. gentlemen argue that we should establish a divorce court, but how can we do so if this question of provincial rights stands in the way? Are we to allow each province to say whether a man's marriage is valid or not? You cannot divorce a man until you find out whether he was legally married, and this parliament enters into that question, to see if he has been lawfully married, and if it finds he has been, then it passes an Act of parliament granting him divorce. What argument can be brought forward, that is founded on sound reason, supporting a contention that this parliament has not power to declare a marriage valid if it has power to declare it invalid? The Quebec courts have always held that the civil courts have sole jurisdiction when the parties are Catholics. Are you going to have one law in Canada for Catholic citizens, and another law for Protestants? Now let us face this question. If one of my sons, or my little girl, happens to fall in love with some Roman Catholic and marries him or her, why should I object? I want the confederation to be a reality, I want social intercourse with my fellow citizens in Quebec, whether they want me there or not. I want my boys to travel into Quebec, and my little girl too, if necessary. If the people of that province are good citizens, I care not what religion they are of; I am willing that my children should marry with them and procreate children, and so help build up this nation in an honourable and proper way. Does not every citizen of this country want the same thing? Who is to decide when one of the consorts is a Protestant and the other a Catholic? Why must there be one tribunal for the Catholic and another for the Protestant? Have we not on the bench of this country Roman Catholic judges deciding civil questions? Who will say that they do not give good decisions on every other matter except marriage, and that they cannot decide that matter just as well as any civil matter? We have our benches composed of both Roman Catholic and Protestant judges, applying the law equally to every suitor that comes before them. They do it in railway cases, they do it in land suits, they do it in alimony cases, and in every other kind of cases in Quebec, and everywhere else in Canada, and why can they not decide marriage cases? Why, are you going to disrupt confederation by saying that judges of all religions are able to decide whether a man is legally married or not if he is a Protestant, but have not the authority to decide if he happens to be a Roman Catholic? One law for Canada we must have upon this question, and we are going to disrupt confederation if we do not have that law. Now, what do the Quebec courts say? They have always held that the courts have sole jurisdiction where parties are not Catholics. That has been held in the following cases:

Dorion v. Laurent (1843), 17 L. C. J., 324.
Mignault v. Haferman (1866), 10 L. C., 137.
Connolly v. Woolrick (1867), 11 L. C. J., 222.
Burn v. Fontain (1872).

All these decisions of the Quebec courts are unanimous, that when the people are not Catholic the civil courts have the right to decide the question as to whether a marriage is valid or not; but they have not that power when one is a Roman Catholic and the other a Protestant, or when both are Roman Caholics. Now, we have judges differing on this subject; we have Judge Archibald deciding that he has power to declare a marriage valid, and others deciding that they have not the power, but that in the province of Quebec the ecclesiastical court has the power. I was surprised at what I saw the other day in one of our newspapers, I thought there must be some exaggeration, some newspaper mistake, something that was going to stir up unduly the passions of the people. I picked up the Toronto 'Globe' of Friday last, and here is what I find in a special despatch from Montreal to that paper:

MRS. BLANCHET PRESENTS HER DECREE.

Appeals for an Annulment of Marriage on Ground of Consanguinity.

(Special despatch to the 'Globe'.)

Montreal, Jan. 19. The Roman Catholic marriage laws are again in the limelight. The petition seeking annulment of the marriage of Dame Anna Meunier with F. X. Blanchet has again come before the courts, the plaintiff having filed the religious decree which was missing in her first papers.

What was she doing? She was going to the civil courts to get a judgment annuling her marriage on the evidence simply of an ecclesiastical decree, just as I would get a judgment against any hon. gentleman in this House upon proof of the facts if I were suing him upon a promissory note. The note is the foundation of the judgment, and in this case the woman presents that judgment to the civil court in Quebec. Then:

Archbishop's Palace, Montreal, Nov. 3, 1911.

—Re the marriage case of Meunier v. Blanchet, Mrs. Anna Meunier, 20 McGregor street, Montreal: Madam,—I am directed to announce to you that His Grace the Archbishop of Montreal has pronounced a sentence of nullity of marriage in the case that you have submitted. Yours very truly, (Signed) Emile Roy, Chancellor.

That is what is going on. An ecclesiastical court, not judges appointed by this parliament, not judges appointed by this government and responsible to it, but an ecclesiastical court of a certain religion has undertaken to say whether a man is lawfully married, although he has gone through a legal ceremony. Now, my Act does not prevent any people going anywhere like this, but my Act does say that when they go through any forms of marriage which are legal in any province, then that marriage must stand good, notwithstanding any difference in the religion of the parties, and that no canonical or ecclesiastical court or judgment shall have any effect in annulling it. Let me go back a little further for the benefit of the present leader of the opposition, and for the enlightenment of the ex-Minister of Justice who did not know anything about this, and who wanted legal advice. I have Lefroy's work on Legislative Power in Canada. Who was Sir Hector Langevin? He was Solicitor General at the time of confederation. What was the British North America Act? How was it brought about? Everybody knows it was a bargain made between representatives of the various colonies, which bargain was sanctioned by the British parliament. The British North America Act was not an Act of the British parliament forcing a constitution upon us, but it was an Act agreed upon by representatives of all the provinces, pointing out what things should be reserved for the provinces, and what other things should be reserved to the jurisdiction of the Dominion. That was a wise thing to do, and a thing that has worked well for Canada and will work well if we do not fall short of doing our duty, else no constitution at all is any good. Sir Hector Langevin, as one of the delegates, explained the meaning of the word 'marriage.' The discussion will be found in the Confederation debates; but I also find this part of it in the work of Lefroy. I will quote from page 488 of this work, published in 1897. I find this note on the section:

As to 'marriage and divorce' and 'solemnization of marriage in the province,' reference may be made to the speech of Solicitor General Langevin in the debates on confederation in the parliament of Canada (at p 388), where he says: 'The word "marriage" has been placed in the draft of the proposed constitution to invest the Federal parliament with the right of declaring what marriages shall be held and deemed to be valid throughout the whole extent of the confederation, without, however, interfering in any particular with the doctrines or rights of the religious creeds to which the contracting parties may belong.'

There is the whole question, the object of Confederation was to invest the Federal parliament with the right of declaring what marriages shall be held and deemed to be valid.

All my Bill says is that if a marriage takes place by any ceremony in itself lawful, they must clear away from it any question of religion and, if otherwise it is a lawful ceremony, then it shall be valid. Sir Hector Langevin is an authority sufficient for me. He belonged to Quebec, he was Solicitor General, and I suppose my friends will say that he was a Conservative, and that is all you can say against him. Now, he declared that the question of the validity of the marriage laws belongs to the Dominion parliament. He thought so in making the agreement. That is the opinion of the man who wrote the agreement. The opinion of a man who did not have anything to do with the making of an agreement, which must, therefore, be construed in the light of the ordinary sense and dictionary meaning of English words, would be important, but this is the opinion of a man who was a party to the agreement in putting section 91 into the British North America Act, and which declared that the validity of marriage must always be a question for the parliament of Canada. In addition to that we have the declaration of the law officers of the Crown of England which I have quoted that the whole effect and status of marriage belongs to the parliament of Canada.

Mr. MACDONALD. Will my hon. friend read that extract again?

Mr. LANCASTER. Yes, this is what Sir Hector Langevin said at Quebec, page 388 of the Debate on Confederation:

The word 'marriage' has been placed in the draft of the proposed constitution to invest the federal parliament with the right of declaring what marriages shall be held and deemed to be valid throughout the whole extent of the confederacy, without, however, interfering in any particular with the doctrines or rights of the religious creeds to which the contracting parties may belong.

Mr. LEMIEUX. I understand that Mr. Lefroy, when he wrote his book, addressed a letter to Sir Hector Langevin, and the answer of Sir Hector Langevin is quoted in the book. Will my hon. friend be good enough to read the answer of Sir Hector Langevin?

Mr. LANCASTER. Yes, I will be glad to.

Mr. LEMIEUX. It is in a foot note.

Mr. LANCASTER. Yes. He says, in fact, that that is exactly what he meant, and he reduced it to writing. In the foot note is the following:

It appears from the official report of the debate that the above words were read by the Speaker from some written document, and when asked by the present authority to explain the source of this extract, Sir Hector Langevin most kindly supplied the following information of a letter of August 25, 1894: 'I was entrusted by my leaders, Sir John A. Macdonald and Sir George Cartier, with the explanation not only of the general features of the proposed constitution, but also of some very important details which they could not have given in their own speeches without having lengthened their speeches unduly. My explanations were those of the government, and on the question of marriage and divorce, in order that there might be no equivocation or misunderstanding, it was agreed between my colleagues and myself that I would put in writing those eight lines that you quote in your letter.

What I read were the eight lines that were in the letter. Sir Hector Langevin was very careful and he used the words 'valid,' and 'invalid.'

Then, we have this pronouncement of the law officers of the Crown in England that I have quoted and that uses the word 'status.' That is the whole gist of this Bill—that the status cannot be questioned, that we cannot afford to have in Canada any of these questions arising anywhere in the world as to there being any doubt in any part of this Dominion as to the question of marriage, or as to any marriage or as to the legitimacy of children being affected by any peculiarity of religion that you and your spouse may happen to have enjoyed before you entered into the marriage state.

Now, we have a decision here. It is the case of the city of Fredericton vs. the Queen, 23 Supreme Court Reports, p. 505. It is not an express decision upon the marriage question, but it has an important bearing upon the question of marriage. The question of marriage is there introduced as an illustration of the point the learned judge is deciding. Mr. Justice Gwynne, in that case said at page 568:

Solemnization of marriage, that is to say, the power of regulating the ceremony—the mode of its celebration—is a particular subject expressly placed under the jurisdiction of the local legislatures, as a matter which has always been considered to be purely of a local character.

Then he points out that all other matters connected with marriage are vested in the Dominion parliament; that is to say:

——the competency of the parties to the contract to enter into it—the effect upon the status of the children if presumed to be de facto entered into by persons not competent by law to enter into it—its obligatory force when entered into—the power of dissolving the tie when entered into.

These things, Mr. Justice Gwynne, says, absolutely belong to us.

Mr. MACLEAN (South York). Did he say that in the Supreme Court of Canada?

Mr. LANCASTER. He said that in deciding a case in the Supreme Court of Canada. I think I have said enough to show that there is very grave doubt whether we have not jurisdiction in this House whatever technical points may be raised by those people who argue that the provincial law has something to do with it. I am only speaking for myself, but I want there to be no doubt about the attitude that I take, I have not the slightest doubt about our jurisdiction to pass the Bill which I have introduced. I would not have troubled this House about the little part of this matter, the ceremony, the solemnization, the regulation of the banns and the issue of the license, except that these are the only matters mentioned by those who are trying to prevent this Bill being passed. But I say now that we do not need to trouble ourselves about that at all and for the reason that I hinted at very early in my remarks. It is that we have jurisdiction to remedy any evil that is in existence or that arises from any question that is in doubt. This parliament has inherent jurisdiction as a British institution to remedy an evil unless that authority is clearly taken away from it. I will concede for the purpose of my argument that both the province and the Dominion have more or less to do with the question. Then, who is going to control it? What is best for the country? Who has the paramount right? Sir James Whitney, in the province of Ontario, will have a provincial law that says that an electric railway company may not run its cars on Sunday. That company applies to this Dominion parliament and gets its railway to be declared a work for the general advantage of Canada. Our Railway Act does not prevent it from running cars on Sunday. As long as it was a provincial matter and as long as the Dominion did not undertake to remedy it the province had some right in the matter. Take the question of prohibition. It went to the Privy Council. It was held there that the provincial government had power to enact prohibition, but it was also held that if the Dominion parliament chose to have prohibition from Prince Edward Island to Vancouver they could enact such a law and that the provinces could not then have a liquor license Act if they wanted one. Here the whole question of marriage and divorce is assigned to the Dominion parliament by section 91.

If there is any question as to whether the right to pronounce upon the status and validity of a marriage goes with jurisdiction over the solemnization of marriage rather than with jurisdiction over the general question of marriage and divorce, then I say that, in my capacity as an ordinary member of parliament, it is my duty in this House to take the jurisdiction to remedy an evil respecting marriage if it exists in this country, if I am able to do so. Once you recognize that there is an evil somebody must act. If you leave it to the provinces, saying that although the whole question of marriage and divorce as a general thing is assigned to the Dominion, you are content to be cowardly enough to sit down, although you occupy a seat in this House, to shirk the question and be willing to have nine different laws in nine different provinces as to what is a valid marriage in Canada. I say it is up to us members of this House, it is up to me as a member of this House of Commons when I recognize that an evil exists, not to bother about nice questions having no merit behind them, not to seek for an excuse to avoid the issue, not to seek to shirk my responsibility, but, when I find that the main question is consigned to us by the British North America Act to deal with on general terms, to say: We will pass an Act and make a law that these marriages are to be valid and binding if we think that is a proper law to pass.

The main argument against my Bill is that it is an encroachment on provincial rights. I do not concede that there is anything in that argument, and I have spent some time in discussing that question, because I do not believe it is a bona fide contention.

As to the Bill itself, I have been told by a few gentlemen that it does not go far enough, not only for the reason I mentioned in the opening when I referred to the 'Orange Sentinel,' but because it contains the words 'duly performed according to such laws.' It has been said to me that once I put the condition precedent that a marriage in any province must be duly performed according to such law, I am at once saying that if there is a law in any province which makes it illegal for a Protestant and Catholic to marry I am not making such a marriage legal, and that the provision of my Bill can be got around in that way. But you must take the context.

Mr. DEVLIN. Does any other province than the province of Quebec, recognize these impediments?

Mr. LANCASTER. Not as to a marriage in civil law.

Mr. DEVLIN. Would the effect of this Bill be simply to reach the province of Quebec?

Mr. LANCASTER. No, it would be to have one uniform law all over Canada. I do not say that the province of Quebec does what my hon. friend said, the judges do not quite agree about that, but, as I tried to make plain, the very fact that it is suggested that in Australia or Russia or anywhere else, it can be held that although lawfully married according to the laws of a country except for the question of religion, your religion is going to interfere with your status in Canada if you go to any province, that is what I say is an evil and what I want this parliament to say is that the question of the religious faith of the parties to a marriage that is otherwise legal and according to law, shall not invalidate that marriage in any province.

Mr. DEVLIN. Leaving the religious difference, will the effect be to invalidate article 127 of the Civil Code of the province of Quebec?

Mr. LANCASTER. No, except in so far as you try to apply article 127, by saying that because the two people are of different religions they are not lawfully married; to that extent it will prevent it, to that extent it is aimed to prevent it, because I say that is a question which the Dominion parliament has a right to say shall be legal all over the country.

Mr. DEVLIN. Will article 127 still remain as law if this Bill passes, according to the opinion of the hon. gentleman?

Mr. LANCASTER. No, I want to make myself plain. I am trying to knock out part of the effect of article 127. I shall read article 127:

> The other impediments recognized according to the different religious persuasions, as resulting from relationship or affinity or from other causes, remain subject to the rules hitherto followed in the different churches and religious communities.

Under that, some of the judges in the province of Quebec decided that the question must be decided by the ecclesiastical courts and not by the civil courts of the country, and nearly all the judges of the courts of Quebec, as I understand, held that, under that section, if people are of different religions that is one of the impediments, although not mentioned as such in the clause, that would invalidate the marriage. I am trying my best to pass a law that says that in so far as article 127 of the Civil Code indicates, that the difference in religion, and that alone, will invalidate a marriage otherwise lawfully solemnized, that article of the Code shall be overridden for the benefit of the whole of Canada.

Mr. DEVLIN. Is there any article of a civil law of any province or the Dominion other than this article just quoted by my hon. friend, which might be affected by this Bill in any way?

Mr. LANCASTER. Not that I know of, but I want to make this Bill effect a uniform law from British Columbia to Prince Edward Island, so that in all parts of this Dominion, if two people go through a ceremony that is lawfully authorized according to the regulations prescribed for the solemnization of marriage in any province, the question of what religion they profess, if of different religions or not, shall not enter into the question of the validity of the marriage or throw any doubt upon the legitimacy of the children who are the fruits of that marriage.

I hold that section 127 is not authorized by the British North America Act. I claim that it is ultra vires of the province and indicates that they are assuming to exercise a jurisdiction to which they are not entitled, and we are going to be blamed for allowing them to do so. I want it to be understood, and that is why my Bill is double-barrelled, not only enacting that this thing, as a matter of original jurisdiction, is being enacted, but that if the Bill conflicts with the legislation of any province, we are deliberately overriding that law of the province.

Mr. DEVLIN. I understand the object of this Bill is to get over the difficulty of article 127 of the Civil Law of the province of Quebec?

Mr. LANCASTER. I am not trying to get over any difficulty of article 127, I am trying to make a uniform law, not one that lawyers will have to be asked about, let alone going to the Privy Council, but one so plain that the child who can read in the first or second reader in the public school can take the statute and know what is going to happen when he grows up in Canada.

I have no patience with legal quibbles and with having to go to courts and Privy Councils to decide what should be plain. Lawyer, as I am, I hold it to be my duty as a member of this parliament to make laws that the people of Canada can understand. We have a right in Canada to say what the status of married people shall be and I propose to say so in the plainest language and if any hon. gentleman can make the language plainer than it is in my Bill, so that every man, woman and child of intelligence can understand it, I will thank him for doing so.

Mr. McLEAN (Prince Edward Island). Does the hon. gentleman think that this Bill will supersede the divorce laws in force in Prince Edward Island, New Brunswick, British Columbia and Nova Scotia?

Mr. LANCASTER. I do not think anything of the kind. The divorce laws to which the hon. gentleman refers were conceded to these provinces when they entered the union and the Confederation Act does not apply to them because they came in after the British North America Act by a different statute which protects them. Besides I am simply proposing a Bill adding a clause to the Act which says that the marriage of a deceased wife's sister shall be lawful, and I am declaring that whether you are of the same religion or not as the person whom you marry that the marriage shall be binding, and I am not going one iota further than to remedy the evil which exists. The divorce laws to which the hon. gentleman refers are not an evil so far as I know, and my Bill does not interfere with them at all. What I say in the Bill is that if the people of any province, whether in Quebec or anywhere else choose to go to a Protestant minister or to a Roman Catholic priest, both being entitled to marry people under the laws of Quebec, and if that priest or minister marries them, then the question as to whether the parties are of the same religion or not shall not be an impediment and the marriage shall be binding.

At Six o'clock, House took recess.

After Recess.

House resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. LANCASTER. When the House rose at six o'clock I was answering the hon. member from Wright (Mr. Devlin) with regard to article 127 of the Civil code of Quebec, but that is not the only article of the code which should be considered by the House in connection with this matter. Articles 161 and 129 are very instructive with regard to my contention that this parliament alone has the right to deal with the matter. Article 129, which deals with the formalities relating to the solemnization of marriage, says:

> All priests, rectors, ministers and other officers authorized by law to keep registers of acts of civil status, are competent to solemnize marriage.

This clearly applies to every denomination—to everybody and any religious sect who has the right to perform the ceremony:

But none of the officers thus authorized, can be compelled to solemnize a marriage to which any impediment exists according to the doctrine and belief of his religion, and the discipline of the church to which he belongs.

The Civil Code of Quebec itself does not pretend to say that if the persons married are of a different religion their marriage is invalid, but simply that no priest or minister shall be compelled to celebrate a marriage in violation of his own convictions. For refusing to do so, he shall not be submitted to any penalty. That, however, does not say that should he do so the marriage will be invalid. This article 129, which I have quoted, I have taken from the code of the province of Quebec:

All priests, rectors, ministers and other officers authorized by law to keep registers of acts of civil status, are competent to solemnize marriage.

So that what is really required is proof of the marriage, and that is to be found in the registry. Those who are authorized to keep such records shall be permitted to perform the ceremony of marriage, but none of them shall be compelled to do so against his convictions.

The judgment given by the first court in this Hebert case decided two things. It decided, first, that a Protestant minister cannot legally marry two Catholics; and second that the validity of marriage in the province of Quebec between Catholics is decided by the Church and not by the court. But there have been decisions in other cases to the contrary effect. There are two cases, the decisions in which were opposed to that given in the Hebert case, and would show that the Hebert marriage was valid. There is the case of Burns against Fontaine decided in 1872, and there is also the case of Delpit against Cote decided in 1901. The decision in the latter, which was given by Mr. Justice Archibald, has been very much discussed more especially during this controversy. If these judges had had the Hebert case before them, they would have given in that case a very different decision from that which was rendered. There were also the cases of Laranne against Evans in 1880 and Desroches against Degris in 1901, which were decided after the Delpit and Cote case. Mr. Justice Lemieux decided in the case of Desroches vs. Degris that the validity of a marriage must be determined by the Roman Catholic ecclesiastical court—not that he would, as a judge, come to a different conclusion from that arrived at by Judge Archibald, but that he had no power because the matter was one for the ecclesiastical court to decide. But that is exactly what makes the trouble and what this parliament must settle in the interests of the state.

Just one more word in case the right hon. the leader of the opposition (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) is still in doubt as to what the leaders of his own party thought about this matter. I propose to read the statement of the hon. Edward Blake, who was at one time Minister of Justice in a Cabinet to which the right hon. gentleman (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) belonged. Mr. Blake was another gentleman who did not wish to disrupt confederation by commercial union or reciprocity, but left his party because that party advocated such a policy. In the Debates of 1882, page 491, will be found Mr. Blake's remarks on the Bill to legalize marriage with a deceased wife's sister, and in these remarks he clearly laid down the principle that the question of the validity of marriage was one which pertained to the Dominion parliament and not to the local legislature. He said:

When you find marriage given to the federal legislature, and when you find the solemnization given to the local legislature, you have in the strongest way declared that all that was to be given to the local and taken away from the federal was the solemnization of marriage. There has been this subject of discussion, and the law officers of the Crown at an early period were asked by the then hon. leader of the government to advise as to whether, with reference to the Confederation Act, it was not an attribute of the federal government or parliament to deal with the question of licenses in connection of the solemnization of marriage.

That is the very question which we are debating this afternoon, and on which an answer was given by the law officers of the Crown in England:

They decided, and I think rightly, that that power properly fell within the local legislatures, because it was in point of fact part of the solemnization of marriage; but to go further and say that the whole law of marriage is with each local legislature, subject only to this exception, that the federal parliament has a right to declare that a marriage valid according to the law of the local legislature shall be valid through the whole extent of the Dominion, is not, in my opinion, to interpret in any proper sense our Constitution, but is to give it a meaning which cannot fairly be drawn from it. I maintain that we have the right clearly to determine between what parties it shall be legal to contract marriage and between what parties it shall not be legal, and to determine all that for every province of this Dominion, but to determine how a marriage between persons who can lawfully contract it under our laws shall be solemnized, it is not within our power to adjudge. That is disposed of by the local legislature, and therefore, I think the motion of my hon. friend from Bellechase (Aymot) is not only unnecessary, but is a misinterpretation of the true meaning and construction of our constitution, and I shall certainly vote against it.

There could not be stronger language to prove what I am contending for, and that is that the whole question, except the keeping of records and deciding who shall be competent to solemnize marriage comes within the jurisdiction of the Dominion parliament.

Just one word as to the language of my Bill and I am through. It provides that:

> Every ceremony or form of marriage heretofore or hereafter performed by any person authorized to perform any ceremony of marriage by the laws of the place where it is performed, and duly performed according to such laws, shall everywhere within Canada be deemed to be a valid marriage, notwithstanding any differences in the religious faith of the person so married and without regard to the religion of the person performing the ceremony.

I put emphasis upon the word 'any' because some hon. gentlemen, on reading this Bill have taken the meaning which I think it will not bear and which was not intended; and in committee I shall be glad to adopt any language more suitable.

I cannot see how I could more clearly state what I mean. I hope I have made it quite clear that if a ceremony is performed according to the law by a person authorized to perform it, then that marriage shall not be invalidated by reason of differences in religion.

Mr. CLARKE (Essex). Before the hon. gentleman leaves that point, may I ask him: Did any courts ever decide that a marriage solemnized according to the laws of the province of Quebec is illegal?

Mr. LANCASTER. I can hardly answer that without an explanation. The courts have decided that if a certain church says that mixed marriages are unlawful then they are unlawful, and for no other reason than that there is a difference in the religion of the parties. That is, they have decided that a marriage legally performed in every other respect except on the point of difference in religion is invalid. Of course, they have not decided that a lawful marriage is invalid, but they have decided that a marriage is unlawful because of this difference in religion of the parties notwithstanding that it is performed by an authorized person, was duly registered, the age limit observed and no other impediment existing. Now, what I say is that if there is an evil, we have inherent power to legislate concerning that evil. Of course, if the majority hold that there is no evil, then what I say goes for nothing.

I should be glad indeed if, when the House goes into committee on the Bill any hon. gentleman can suggest how that which I have endeavoured to express in the Bill can be better expressed. I think that as I have put it, it is plain and definite. But if I have failed in that respect and and hon. gentleman can suggest a plainer way to put it, I shall be glad to accept his suggestion.

Now, Mr. Speaker, I have occupied the time of the House for nearly two hours. My justification is the extreme importance of the subject. I trust I have not wearied the House. I have tried to do my duty.

Hon. C. J. DOHERTY (Minister of Justice). Will the hon. gentleman (Mr. Lancaster) be good enough to point out which of the cases to which he has referred he reads as having decided that mixed marriages, merely because of the difference in religion, were invalid?

Mr. LANCASTER. Larramee vs. Evans and Doroche vs. Degree. In these the ecclesiastical courts decided that because they were mixed marriages they were invalid. And the civil courts held that they had no power to make a decision, but were bound by the decisions of the ecclesiastical courts. In that way they have decided that these marriages are not good, and they decided simply because the ecclesiastical courts said so.

Right Hon. R. L. BORDEN (Prime Minister). The subject which the hon. gentleman (Mr. Lancaster) has brought to our attention, is undoubtedly a very important one. The marriage relation is the whole basis of our civilization; and it is concerned with the moral and religious life of the whole people. Upon the validity of marriage depends the sanctity of the home, and the establishment of the relation is concerned with the every day affairs of life in the way of the descent and transmission of property; and in that way as well as in the way I have first mentioned, it touches most nearly the every-day life of the people. I concur entirely with my hon. friend in this respect, that the most important consideration of all is absolute certainty as to the formalities to establish the relation. It is perfectly evident to all of us that the law should, as far as possible, be absolutely certain and plain.

The basis of the marriage relation, as every one knows, is the consent of the parties; and in all civilized countries rules of law have been enacted by which the marriage relation must be established and can only be established with certain formalities and by means of certain ceremonies. It has been the aim and object, I think, all all legislation that publicity, as far as possible, should be given to the establishment of the relation in order that fraud and imposture may not be practised.

Now, my hon. friend, in the very able address which he has delivered, has spoken of the relation of state and church in this country with regard to this matter. So far as that is concerned, every one of us knows that under the laws of Canada, and under the laws of every province in Canada, the decree of any church cannot invalidate the civil law. That is perfectly manifest. And if the decree or the rules of any church have any effect, so far as the civil law is concerned, it must be by reason of the laws of Canada or the laws of some province of Canada giving effect to that decree or those rules. But it is necessary for us to remember that in a country that has a Federal constitution as Canada has, the state for certain purposes and in certain respects, means the executive government and parliament of Canada, and for other purposes and in certain other respects, the state means the executive government and legislatures of the various provinces of Canada.

My hon. friend has referred to the decisions upon the validity of marriage in the province of Quebec. Undoubtedly important questions have arisen and have been decided in that province. These questions, so far as I understand the decisions of the courts of that province, have principally arisen in respect of the marriage of two Catholics before a Protestant clergyman or in respect to the marriage of a Catholic and a Protestant, before a Protestant clergyman. As I understand the results of these decisions, they are as follows:

By some judges the marriage of two Catholics in the province of Quebec by a Protestant clergyman has been held valid; by other judges, however, such marriages have been held invalid. The question has arisen entirely upon the construction of the Civil Code of the province of Quebec. The ground upon which those judges have proceeded who hold that the marriage of two Catholics before a Protestant clergyman is invalid, would as I understand the law of Quebec—and I speak with all deference, because I do not pretend to be very familiar with that law—those judgments proceed upon reasoning which would render equally invalid the marriage of two Catholics if performed before a Catholic priest who was not the parish priest of the parties, or who was not authorized by him. The rule, as I understand, that has been administered in the province of Quebec is that two Catholics must be married before the parish priest, or before some person who has been authorized, with certain formalities by the parish priest; therefore the marriage by some other Catholic priest in that province would be just as invalid as the marriage before a Protestant clergyman in the province of Quebec. There are decisions in the province of Quebec which hold that the marriage of two Catholics before a Protestant clergyman in that province is a perfectly valid marriage, although, as I have said, there are other decisions which arrive at a precisely opposite conclusion.

Now, speaking with deference to the views which my hon. friend who has just taken his seat (Mr. Lancaster) entertains with regard to the judicial decisions of that province, I have always understood, and I have been so informed by members of the bar of the province of Quebec who have carefully considered the question, that the marriage of a Catholic and a Protestant before a Protestant clergyman in that province has always been held valid under the law of that province.

Now, my hon. friend has introduced a Bill, to which he has called attention at considerable length, but at none too great a length, in view of the importance of the subject. The first paragraph of his Bill is in these words:

> Every ceremony or form of marriage heretofore or hereafter performed by any person authorized to perform any ceremony of marriage by the laws of the place where it is performed, and duly performed according to such laws, shall everywhere within Canada be deemed to be a valid marriage, notwithstanding any differences in the religious faith of the person so married and without regard to the religion of the person performing the ceremony.

Now, as I understand the object of my hon. friend, and the language of this Bill, he desires to provide by a statute of Canada that a marriage of two persons before any person authorized to perform the ceremony in any case, should be valid, although, according to the laws of the province, that ceremony between these persons ought to be performed before some other official. In other words, if the legislature of the province of Ontario should enact that two Protestants in that province must be married by a Protestant clergyman, the object and intention of my hon. friend's Bill would be to provide that if those persons, notwithstanding the law of the province, were married by some other official authorized to perform the ceremony of marriage, in any case, that marriage would be valid, although according to the laws of the province it would not be valid. I understand that is the object of my hon. friend's Bill. Now, take a further illustration; if in the province of British Columbia, a law were passed that a person of European descent, and a Japanese, or a Hindu, must be married with certain formalities before a certain official, that marriage, if performed before some other official in contravention of the law of the province, could be validated by a statute passed by the parliament of Canada. That as I understand, is envolved in the argument in support of our power to enact the Bill which my hon. friend has placed before this parliament.

Mr. LANCASTER. That is what I mean so far as religion goes, it does not deal with differences of nationality. I am dealing only with religious differences.

Mr. BORDEN. I beg my hon. friend's pardon, perhaps I did not put his argument quite fairly. I was dealing with the constitutional aspect of the case, and am coming to the other aspect in a moment. If I am right, so far as the constitutional aspect of the case is concerned, such a Bill would be just as good law, and would confer just as full power to override a statute of the province of British Columbia as would the legislation now proposed. I think my hon. friend will agree with me in that regard. Or if, in any province of Canada, a provincial legislature should provide by its law that the marriage of a white person to a coloured person should be performed with certain formalities and before a certain official, it would be competent, according to the view which my hon. friend has so ably argued, for this parliament to declare that the marriage of these persons, if celebrated before some other official in contravention of the law of the province, should nevertheless be valid. Now, the question arises as to whether the parliament of Canada possesses the power to override provincial legislation in that regard and to that extent. I would like to submit in respect to that matter the following considerations.

(a) By the Canadian constitution as embodied in the British North America Act, section 92, subsection 26, the exclusive legislative authority of the parliament of Canada extends to and includes marriage and divorce. The constitution declares, however, in section 92 subsection 12 of the same Act, that in each province the legislature may exclusively make laws in relation to the solemnization of marriage in the province. It is perfectly clear that the words 'marriage and divorce' would include the solemnization of marriage if that subject had not been assigned to the exclusive jurisdiction of the province under the language just quoted. The result has been expressed by the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council in these words :

> Solemnization of marriage in a province is enumerated among the classes of subjects under section 92, and no one can doubt, notwithstanding the general language of section 91, that this subject is still within the exclusive authority of the legislatures of the provinces.

It has also been held by the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council that a provincial legislature has authority as plenary and as ample within the limits defined by section 92 as the Imperial parliament in the plenitude of its power possessed and could bestow. Within these limits of subject and area the provincial legislature is supreme, and its jurisdiction exclusive.

(b) The formalities prescribed by a provincial legislature as necessary to constitute a valid marriage seem undoubtedly within the meaning of the word 'solemnization.' It thus appears that with respect to those formalities the jurisdiction of the provincial legislatures is exclusive.

(c) The opinion of the late Minister of Justice, Sir Allen Aylesworth, the opinion of the present Minister of Justice, and the opinion of the Deputy Minister of Justice, Mr. Newcombe, K.C., are to the effect that legislation such as that now proposed is not within the legislative competence of the parliament of Canada.

(d) To the same effect is the opinion of an eminent lawyer of the Ontario Bar whose opinion upon the case submitted I will lay upon the table for the information of the House.

(e) On the other hand the hon. member who has introduced this Bill is himself a lawyer of eminence and great experience and he is strongly of opinion that this Bill is within the competence of parliament. Other lawyers who are members of this House entertain the same view. While I do not share that opinion, I am bound to respect it.

In view of these considerations it seems desirable that the question of the legislative competence of parliament to enact such a Bill should be submitted for the opinion of the highest tribunal in the empire. The whole basis upon which the proposal to enact this Bill rests is that the validity of certain marriages should be placed beyond question. If I understood my hon. friend in the opening part of his speech he said that the whole evil was the uncertainty. But if the power of parliament to enact that legislation is itself in grave question, the result desired cannot be attained. The government has therefore determined to submit for the opinion of the Supreme Court of Canada the question as to the legislative competence of parliament to enact this Bill, and any further questions necessary to define clearly the power of parliament to legislate in such matters. The case will be carried on appeal to the judicial committee of the Privy Council in order that a final and authoritative determination may thus be obtained. Pending such determination it is not desirable that the Bill should be proceeded with, and accordingly I move that the debate be adjourned.

Mr. LANCASTER. Before the debate is adjourned I would ask to be allowed to say a word. I regret exceedingly that I cannot see my way to consent to this disposition of the matter. I do not think that anybody will accuse me of being anything but desirous of agreeing with the right hon. leader of the House (Mr. Borden) in any possible way I can. But, in view of what I have said, and said with all sincerity, I could not agree to that disposition of this Bill. If the Bill were passed and sent to the judicial committee of the Privy Council, I might be willing. I am always willing to compromise upon matters. I recognize that I am only one member of this House and that my opinion must not be supposed to prevail, no matter how strongly I may feel about it. But, there is a way of dealing with this question that does not prejudice it before the Supreme Court or the Privy Council. That would be to pass the Bill, if the House on the merits desires to pass such legislation, with a clause in it that prevents it coming into operation until the question of jurisdiction has been determined. There is ample precedent for it. That is what I suggest, and if my right hon. friend wishes to not unduly prejudice this matter and at the same time accomplish all that he has argued for to-day, we have a precedent that I might quote in the Act to amend the railway Act, 1903, passed in 1904 and being chap. 31 of the Statutes of 1904. We had a matter under consideration there with which it was very strongly urged that the provinces and the provinces alone, it being a question of property and civil rights, should deal. We were enacting that Dominion railways should be obliged to compensate the widows and children of employees when the latter were killed, notwithstanding the employees might have signed an agreement absolving the railway company from the results of their negligence. The railways, seeking to avoid a decision on the merits —we all know what they are capable of doing—used this question of provincial rights in order to shelve the matter, and they said, and said with some degree of justice and with some show of reason that impressed itself even upon my mind for the time being, but afterwards I rejected it, that it was a question of contract, that the province had all to do with it, that we had no right to interfere. They argued that the province had to do with questions of insurance, workman's compensation, liability for accident, &c., and that we had nothing to do with them. What did this parliament do? They decided that they had the power to pass the Act and they passed it, but with a clause providing for a reference to the Supreme Court. I need not trouble the House with the merits of the Bill. After providing that these railways should not be able to say as against the widow or children of a deceased employee killed by their negligence that they should not be liable, parliament enacted this clause:

> Upon the passing of this Act the Governor in Council shall submit to the Supreme Court of Canada for its determination the question of the competency of this parliament to enact the provisions hereinbefore set forth; and in the event of the said court determining that the said provisions are within the powers of this parliament, and the time for appeal having elapsed,—or in case of appeal being taken and prosecuted, then in the event of it being determined by the judicial committee of the Privy Council that the said provisions are within the powers of parliament as aforesaid, —the Governor in Council shall thereupon name a day, by proclamation, for the coming into force of this Act, and this Act shall take effect and come into force upon the day so named accordingly.

I do urge upon the right hon. Prime Minister that if we are to deal with this matter we should deal with it now and put a clause, if you like, in the Bill to that effect. Those who are so sure that provincial rights prevail here will not be hurt. The Act will not come into force if they are right upon this question, but if they are wrong and I am right and you shelve this Bill to-day, do not take any action upon it, adjourn the debate indefinitely and put an academic question only to the Privy Council without the force of a Bill behind it to show what parliament wants enacted, then it seems to me that the case is prejudiced. Feeling as I do upon this question, much as I respect the desires of my leader, I cannot preserve my self-respect and consent to it. I am not going to say any more about it. I have said all I can say here and I have probably said more than some gentlemen think I ought to have taken the time to say to-day. To those who might say to me that I should follow my much respected leader in this respect, I say that if I am true to myself I cannot then be false to any man.

Mr. T. G. WALLACE (Centre York). Mr. Speaker, before the amendment is put to the House I just wish to say that I am in complete accord with the sentiments expressed on this Bill by my hon. friend from Lincoln and Niagara (Mr. Lancaster) and am in favour of the Bill.

Mr. W. F. MACLEAN (South York). Mr. Speaker, I think that the way to reach a conclusion on this matter is to have some definite form of legislation passed and then go to the courts. I will be willing to have the question decided in the speediest and best way by having the legislation proposed to-day enacted by this House. It is all very well to send academic questions to the judicial committee of the Privy Council and to get answers, because then we have not settled the question. This is the most important question in so far as this nation is concerned that is now before the people. The nation depends absolutely on the maintenance of the family relation and the certainty of the marriage tie. Following the argument of the right hon. Prime Minister (Mr. Borden), if every province is to be allowed to make a definition in regard to marriage, so many definitions may be made in so many provinces that confusion will result and we will have no marriage law in this country. If Quebec can make one definition as to the solemnization or as to the status of marriage, she can make twenty, and if Quebec can do it, Ontario can, British Columbia can, and each can in a dozen different ways—nothing but confusion will result, and the only way out of it will be the revision of the constitution, and when that point is reached there will have to be a revision of the constitution so that the state—and by the state I mean Canada—shall define what constitutes a valid marriage in this country, that no one else shall have that power and that there shall be only one form of contract.

We are forcing ourselves to come to a point where we shall have in this country only a civil marriage, we will come to this that we will have to override the churches and the other authorities, and make marriage purely and simply a civil contract. If it is to be a civil contract it must be within the jurisdiction of one power and no power is so competent, for the certainty of the subject and for the protection of everybody and especially for the protection of the children of this country in the matter of legitimacy, to exercise that authority as the central or the federal power. So the sooner we have the question tested the better and, therefore, I urge that we send something practical forward for the test.

My hon. friend who is supporting this Bill has probably overlooked the fact that in the view of the province of Quebec and the laws of that province, a marriage has not taken place. His argument is based largely on the conception that a marriage has taken place. The ruling there evidently is that a marriage has not taken place because the law has not been complied with. Therefore, if there be all these definitions, a definition in every province and a dozen prohibitions of different kinds in the different provinces, I say that only confusion awaits us, and, therefore, it becomes the duty of Canada and of the federal power, either by an amendment to the constitution or otherwise, to make marriage a civil contract within the jurisdiction of the Dominion alone. For that reason I would like to see the question go forward and for that reason I am prepared to vote for the Bill proposed this afternoon.

Mr. H. CLARK (North Bruce). I would not like this debate to end without saying a word or two in connection with this Bill. I could not add if I tried any word to the argument advanced by the hon. member for Lincoln (Mr. Lancaster), and can find no way in which to question his judgment as to the jurisdiction of this parliament to deal with it. I, therefore, wish to say that I am in complete accord with the remarks, and the arguments advanced by the hon. member for Lincoln (Mr. Lancaster).

Mr. W. B. NORTHRUP (East Hastings). I did not intend to speak on this Bill, and I do not know that I would have spoken on it had there not been the most unprecedented scene here to-night, I venture to say ever witnessed on Canadian soil. Everybody on both sides of the House admits frankly in private and will not deny in public that the Bill introduced by the hon. member for Lincoln is one of the most important measures ever brought before this House. There is not a member of this House who is not aware that the Canadian public is as deeply interested in this measure as in any measure that ever came before the House, and yet 221 representatives of the people are prepared to allow a measure of this kind to be brought before this House and to be passed out of the House without even a discussion.

It is not for me to say whether the legal grounds adduced by the hon. member for Lincoln are sound or not. I quite appreciate the statement of the right hon. gentleman who leads the House (Mr. Borden) that there is a profoundly difficult legal question involved, but I cannot forget that a Minister of Justice years ago after studying this same statute, the British North America Act, came to a conclusion which was entirely upset on every point by the law officers of the Crown in England when the matter was left to them. Therefore, I feel that I am bound to use my own judgment when such a matter comes before the House. It seems to me with all respect to the argument advanced by the right hon. gentleman who leads the House, that the point has not been touched at all. Everybody admits that the local legislatures have exclusive jurisdiction as to the solemnization of marriage, there has been no dispute as to that or as to the jurisdiction of this House. Every member is aware that the fathers of confederation, warned by the experience of our neighbours to the south where the residuum of power was left to the states and only allotted power to the federal authority which led to the unhappy civil war, took the opposite course and under our constitution all power is allotted to the federal authorities save in so far as a portion is clipped out and allotted to the provinces. Therefore, when the British North America Act said that the solemnization of marriage was allotted to the provinces, if there had not been a word further on the subject the Dominion would have had exclusive jurisdiction on everything relating to marriage and divorce. But as if to make assurance doubly sure, the Act went on and gave marriage and divorce to this House as a part of its jurisdiction. Therefore, we have exclusive jurisdiction as to everything affecting marriage except its solemnization. Then it comes down to the meaning of solemnization of marriage.

I quite understand that there can be a difference of opinion as to what these words mean, but I think that no two lawyers in the country would differ on the main point that the only question now before us is what is included under the words 'solemnization of marriage.' It seems to me that these words relate to the formalities which precede and accompany the ceremony. I would take it that the solemnization of marriage included nothing more than the forms, whether by license or banns, the selection of a person to perform the ceremony, and the forms which are necessary to complete the solemnization of marriage. We must not forget that the Roman Catholic, the Anglican, and as far as I know every Protestant church and, in days gone by, the Jews all held the same view, that marriage is a contract made by the people themselves, not by the clergy. The priest does not marry, the Anglican clergyman does not marry the couple. One has but to look at the service of the Anglican church to see that, the man takes the woman, the woman takes the man. In proof of the contract a ring is produced and then, but not till then, the priest says: Inasmuch as you have made your contract, and proved it by a ring, I declare you to be man and wife. The essence of the whole ceremony is that the two people make a contract, and whoever the official may be, he is merely a witness to the contract. As to who is to be the witness, as to how the marriage is to be performed, the province has a right to legislate, but suppose British Columbia should lay down one form of marriage for whites, and a different form, or appoint different persons to marry whites and blacks, or blacks, I would be very sceptical as to their jurisdiction because I would think the moment they began to legislate in that way they would be touching the status of the parties, and I do not think they have anything to do with that.

It seems to me that inasmuch as this question is exciting so much interest, and is not one of those religious questions where a difference of opinion depends on principle, but the only question involved, even in Quebec, is an ecclesiastical rule that has not at all been binding, when we know as a matter of fact that throughout the world marriages were not even required to be performed in churches up to the thirteenth century, when we know that the Tametsi decree was passed in order to avoid clandestine marriage, that the blood may be pure, and children inherit what is rightfully theirs, and when we are told that the Ne Temere decree is to prevent clandestine marriage, and when difficulties have arisen owing to that decree, it seems to me the government might have supplemented what they have said in asking to have this Bill stand over until the Bill can be referred to the Privy Council.

They might have said in the meantime, we will make such representations as can be made to endeavour to secure that the Ne Temere decree will be withdrawn from Canada so that Canada may be made as free as Germany, for instance. There can be no point of conscience on a Catholic, apart from the order of the church, when one country is free from this decree and another is not. I submit that the government of the day should endeavour to secure the freedom of Canada altogether from this decree and that done, a great deal of bad feeling, and possibly a great deal of future trouble would be saved to this Dominion. Then as to the question to be submitted to the Supreme Court and the Privy Council, if the only question to be submitted, and I am now speaking from my own standpoint, is as to the power of this House to pass the legislation, I think I am entitled to surmise difficulty may arise, just as a number of years ago the Manitoba School question was submitted to the courts, and when the decision had been given Conservative members of a Conservative government went up and down the country stating that although the courts had decided we had jurisdiction we were not bound to exercise that jurisdiction. I state now, so that there may be no subsequent misunderstanding, that as I appreciate the situation, if the government leave this Bill to the courts it will be on the implied understanding that if the courts decide we have jurisdiction, then of course we must exercise jurisdiction, and pass legislation in the direction of the Bill before us to-night. How absurd it would be for us to ask the courts if we have the power to pass a piece of legislation, and the courts saying we had the power, then that we should not pay sufficient respect to the courts and to ourselves as not to pass the legislation. If the questions are to be submitted, why should we not come to a conclusion now which might relieve this country from the embarrassments which beset us. It has come out in the course of the discussion that there has been a difference of opinion from the legal point of view in the province of Quebec, and so far as I am able to understand, though divergent judgments have been rendered by the courts of that province, none of these judgments have been taken to a higher court. If a kindred point is to be submitted why not take advantage of this opportunity to submit all the points, so that we may know exactly what the law is in the various provinces. And then if it should be held that we have the right to legislate here, surely we can legislate with more intelligence, more propriety, and more success if we know what the law is, than if two or three years hence when this legislation comes back we are confronted with the puzzling proposition that we do not know what powers we have with regard to Quebec. Therefore, we will have to submit another case to the courts, and perhaps be tied up for two or three years longer. I submit in conclusion, that while I have spoken on this subject with diffidence and regret, I felt that in justice to my constituents, I should make this appeal to the House. We must not forget that we represent not one single county, or one single riding, but that under the constitution we were elected to represent all the people of Canada, and those of us who are sitting here are sitting here to represent and protect the innocent girls, be they Protestants or Roman Catholics, who have gone through the ceremony of marriage believing it to be a binding ceremony, and to protect also the children of these poor women, who would never have been brought into the world had their mothers not believed that they were legally married. It is a tremendous responsibility resting on the shoulders of a member of this House, to think that possibly he has power to right wrongs that exist in regard to the mothers, the women, and children of this country, and are we to take such little interest in it, that an important measure like this is to be allowed to pass over without discussion, and be relegated to consideration three or four years hence.

Mr. S. BARKER (East Hamilton). Were it not for the remarks of the hon. member for Hastings (Mr. Northrup) I would not have spoken; I certainly had no intention of speaking on this subject. I agree with every word the hon. member has spoken with regard to the historical aspect of this marriage question. I do not think any member in this House, whatever his religious belief may be, will differ from the hon. member in what he has said about marriage in the view of the Roman Catholic Church or any other church. The only point with which I differ from him is as to the best method of getting this question settled peaceably and finally in the interests of the people at large. I doubt very much myself whether the best way to get the matter settled is for us to pass an Act about which there may be doubt and difficulty, leading to litigation more prolonged than would be the litigation involved in a reference of this matter in the way proposed by the right hon. the leader of the government. Nobody on either side of this House will, I think, disagree with what the hon. member (Mr. Northrup) has said as to the importance of the subject. I only differ from him as to the passing a Bill such as the one before us, with the idea of settling this question for ever. I do not think that our passing this Bill would hasten the settlement of the question. There would be doubt as to whether we have the right to pass such a Bill, and there would be disputes, litigation, and I fear bad feeling. I would prefer myself to have the straightforward method adopted of sending the question immediately to the tribunals and having it settled once for all. Unless the courts of Canada and the empire should be against us I do not believe that the people of the province of Ontario will ever submit; and in the name of peace and of all that is good for the whole country I do hope that the best method will be taken to settle it quietly and without embroiling our citizens in such disputes. If I thought for one moment that the referring of this question to the courts as proposed by the leader of the government, was not the best means to settle the question, then, speaking as I do on behalf of the province to which I belong, I would not have great hesitation in expressing myself finally and conclusively as to my opinion. I would not hesitate for a moment to say that I should agree with the gentleman who has introduced the Bill. But I think we should try to get this matter settled by the methods we have of ascertaining what the true meaning of the law is. I would, then, if it should become necessary, stand up with the others for any agitation to put an end to the difficulty that we have discussed here to-night.

Mr. J. H. BURNHAM (West Peterborough). I have listened with a great deal of interest to the remarks of hon. members of the opposition on this Bill. They took great care, in the early stages of this trouble, to avoid knowing anything about it, and they have developed their ignorance in a most remarkable manner until it has become coincident with the most absolute silence. For my part I know that I am too young a member to make any mistake when I apologize most humbly for venturing any remarks in this debate, but I cannot help pointing out that we have two statements before the House and two courses proposed.

The hon. member for Lincoln (Mr. Lancaster) has given us a concrete proposition embodied in his Bill. I would say let that go, send it to the fountain head so that we may see whether it is ultra or intra vires, but I must say that I have been most profoundly impressed by the statesmanlike and candid utterance of the right hon. the leader of the government. He has laid down the broad general principles which underlie the supremacy of the state. He has shown that the church cannot override the state. To my mind that is broad enough to repel any ecclesiastical decree, enactment, or laws of any description whatever. He has also said, as I understood him, that the civil law alone validates marriage and that no church can be recognized as supreme on that question. What could be more explicit, what more likely to quiet the agitation in this country than this doctrine laid down by the great statesman at the head of this government? There is no uncertain sound about it. Why then should we not fall in with that view and endorse the proposition to send a stated case to the Judicial Committee of the Privy Council for the determination of the rights of the federal authorities, as against those of the provincial authorities. To reject the proposition of the right hon. the leader of the government would be to cast aside the greatest opportunity we have ever had of settling for all time the differences between church and state. Of that I am convinced. It seems to me that never has there arisen such a magnificent opportunity for the settlement of this great question. How can it be settled except either by an infinite multitude of enactments or by a statement of a general and conclusive character which will finally establish the general principle. It cannot be settled in any other way; but in order that we may exhaust all the remedies under our control, I would suggest that the Bill of the hon. member for Lincoln (Mr. Lancaster) also be sent and submitted to the Privy Council, because you can never tell when lawyers get to work what confusion and uncertainty will result. Therefore, for my part I am prepared to endorse both positions.

Right Hon. Sir WILFRID LAURIER, (East Quebec). The hon. gentleman who has just addressed the House (Mr. Burnham) made some remarks upon the attitude of the opposition on this Bill. He should know—at all events I know—that it is never wise for any one to interfere in family quarrels; and that is why we on this side have waited to see what would be the attitude of the government and its supporters on this question. There has been in this matter, it seems to me, a great deal of misconception, as to the effect of what is known as the Ne Temere decree. That decree is not new. It is simply a modification of the Tametsi decree of the council of Trent which has been in force some three hundred years. There has been misconception in this House as well as in the country as regards this ecclesiastical legislation. We are told it was intended to override the law of the land. I take absolute exception to that statement. The Tametsi decree, and later the Ne Temere decree, is simply a rule of conduct to be followed by the members of the Catholic church. It does not pretend to impose its views on those who do not belong to that church. Its object is simply to prevent clandestine marriages. In the province of Quebec to-day, according to the terms of the Tamesti decree as modified by the Ne Temere decree now in force—it was not in force when the decisions were given which were referred to by my hon. friend—if two Catholics marry, they must marry before the parish priest and publicly—not only before the priest but before at least two witnesses. I was surprised this afternoon when I heard the hon. member for Lincoln (Mr. Lancaster) refer to an interview given by Father Comeau of St. Mary's Church in Winnipeg. I thought that interview was not correctly reported, and was more than surprised when I heard my hon. friend state that Father Comeau had himself corrected the proofsheets. With all due deference to Father Comeau, I must say, that if he be correctly reported as having said that he would celebrate marriage secretly, that is not, as I understand it, the law of the Church. If there is anything the Church abhors, it is secret marriages; and the very language of the Tametsi and Ne Temere decrees is simply to prevent secret marriages by making sure that all parties married within the Church shall be married publicly.

My right hon. friend the leader of the government said correctly that decisions given in the province of Quebec have been given in cases of marriage between Catholics and Protestants were not based on the distinction whether the marriage was between Catholic and Protestant or between Catholics alone. The Council of Trent, so far as my information goes, was never promulgated in France and therefore never had the force of law, so far as civil effects are concerned, but many of its dispositions were introduced by the kings of France into their legislation.

And all the dispositions of the Council of Trent with regard to clandestine marriages were introduced by the kings of France into the laws of France and passed into the laws of her colonies for the government of America. In this way they were introduced into the province of Quebec, and they have been in force there for three hundred years. There is nothing new in the Ne Temere decree, as I understand it, except on one point. It provides that a marriage to be valid must be celebrated by the parish priest of the parties, and the idea according to the Ne Temere decree is that parties may be considered as parishioners only after one month's residence within the parish. And, as stated by the hon. member for East Hastings (Mr. Northrup), these dispositions are eminently wise. They prevent clandestine marriages; and I am sure we all, whether on this side or on that side of the House, whether Catholic or Protestant—everybody must agree that the prevention of clandestine marriages is most wise. Similar provision is made under the civil law of France to-day. A marriage to be valid must be performed before the mayor of the locality in which the parties reside, and after due publication. Now, there is one thing I would like to make very plain. We have had in this matter, perhaps, too much passionate discussion. Let us endeavour to be free from prejudice, whether we are Protestants or Catholics, and simply look at the question from the point of view of our common Canadian citizenship. There has been an impression that the Ne Temere decree was intended to override the authority of His Majesty the King and the Parliament. As a Catholic I protest against any such interpretation. There is no such intention. The Ne Temere decree does not go beyond setting forth rules binding upon the consciences of Catholics. It is not intended to be a civil law. It is for the civil authorities, if they choose, to give civil effect to its provisions.

Mr. MACLEAN (York). But will the right hon. gentleman say that the effect of the decree is not to affect the rights of the parties to a mixed marriage?

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. No. If a Catholic in the province of Ontario is married according to the provisions of the civil law of the province, even though it be contrary to the provisions of the Ne Temere decree, he is legally married according to the doctrine of the church, his children are legitimate, and his marriage will carry all its effects. Is that plain? But the Catholic who is married contrary to the provisions of the Ne Temere decree may be subjected to the religious consequences according to the laws of his church. In his conscience he is outside his church. But, as I understand it—and I am sure I am right in this—it does not go beyond conscience. In the province of Quebec it has been understood that the civil authorities have given effect to the religious ordinances upon this subject. How far the civil laws of the province of Quebec affect the question is now in controversy before the courts. I, for my part, cannot support the Bill because its provisions seem to me to be absolutely illogical. In my humble judgment, the mover of the Bill (Mr. Lancaster) has not approached the subject in the dispassionate manner in which it should be approached.

Mr. LANCASTER. Will the right hon. gentleman (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) tell the House some thing I said which was not dispassionate?

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. Yes, the hon. gentleman referred sneeringly to the opinion given by Sir Allen Aylesworth, the former Minister of Justice. And two or three times the hon. gentleman stated—and in a tone the object of which was manifest—that this opinion of Sir Allen Aylesworth had been given under the benign influence of the outgoing Prime Minister. That is evidence of what his intention was; and I say that it was not in accordance with the dispassionate character which such a discussion should take. In view of the statement made by the Prime Minister (Mr. Borden) it must be evident to my hon. friend (Mr. Lancaster) that the opinion of Sir Allen Aylesworth, was, after all, worthy of consideration. The opinion of Sir Allen Aylesworth is endorsed by the government to-night, and though my hon. friend sneered at it, after the position taken to-night by his leader, I should think he would regret the manner in which he has approached this subject.

Mr. LANCASTER. Will the right hon. gentleman tell me what the opinion of Sir Allen Aylesworth is? For you cannot tell it from the answer he made to the question. He simply shirked it; and that is what I said, he shirked it.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. Let me read the first section of the Bill, which, it seems to me cannot be endorsed in any way:

> Every ceremony or form of marriage heretofore or hereafter performed by any person authorized to perform any ceremony of marriage by the laws of the place where it is performed, and duly performd according to such laws, shall everywhere within Canada be deemed to be a valid marriage, notwithstanding any differences in the religious faith of the person so married and without regard to the religion of the person performing the ceremony.

Now, a marriage celebrated in a province is valid or is not valid, according to the laws of the province. If it is valid, there is nothing more to say and this Bill does not affect the case. But if it is not valid, then the supreme authority of this parliament is called in to make it valid. If my hon. friend wishes to amend the constitution, that is another matter; but to say that the law of the province shall be overridden by the law of this parliament, I think, could not lead to the proper government of such a country as Canada. If the province is wrong let us go to the province and try to make it right. But to say that a system of law that has been in operation for 300 years is to be set aside by the intervention of this parliament seems to me a thing not calculated to promote harmony in this country. I think that everybody will agree with me in this. It is stated by one of the hon. gentlemen on the other side, the member for Hastings (Mr. Northrup) or the hon. member for Hamilton (Mr. Barker) that if we referred this Bill to the Supreme Court and are advised that we have power to pass it, then we must undertake to pass it. But I would very much hesitate to adopt such a course. I think it would be much better that the matter should be left to the courts of the province of Quebec before which the question is now raised. It would be far better to depend upon the decision in the case now before the courts than upon a decision of the Supreme Court in a merely academic case.

At the present moment, the very case which was quoted a moment ago by the hon. member for Lincoln (Mr. Lancaster) is before Mr. Justice Charbonneau, and the judgment is to be delivered at no distant date. It is probable that this case will be referred to all the tribunals of the land, and that we shall have an authoritative decision upon it. I think this is a better way to dispose of the matter than to refer it to the Supreme Court in the merely academic way proposed by my right hon. friend. The amendment of my right hon. friend, it seems to me, and I say it in all seriousness, and his proposal to dispose of this Bill simply by moving the adjournment of the debate, is not at all the proper manner of dealing with the question, and I think on the whole parliament would be disposed to agree with me. Now I have this further to say. It is not the first time that judges have differed upon a matter of great importance. This matter has been before the courts of Quebec for some fifteen years. Unfortunately we have never had an authoritative decision of the Privy Council upon it, or even of the Supreme Court, or, so far as I know, of the Court of Appeals of the province. Judges have decided one way and judges have decided the other way. If the judgment of Mr. Justice Archibald is confirmed, we shall never hear any more of this question; then it will be settled in a manner not to disturb the conscience of anybody. If it be settled otherwise, then will be the time for us to decide what to do. But at the present moment I think that the decision taken by the government simply to adjourn the debate is not a dignified one, nor is it an adequate way of disposing of the question.

Hon. C. J. DOHERTY (Minister of Justice). I do not think there can be any difference of opinion in this House upon two propositions at least, one of them emitted by my hon. friend from Lincoln (Mr. Lancaster) in the very forceful speech with which he has moved the second reading of this Bill, and the other which has just fallen from the lips of the right hon. leader of the opposition. The first one is that this is a measure involving a question of very great importance. I think that requires no elaboration. Anything that touches marriage, that touches what the civilized world looks upon as a sacred thing, the union of one man with one woman for the purpose of procreating a family, which family forms after all the basis of the state, anything, I say, which touches the validity of marriage is a measure of the utmost importance. Nor do I think any one will be inclined to differ with the proposition emitted by the right hon. leader of the opposition, namely, that we should approach this question with all the calmness of which we are masters, and that we should be careful to eliminate from this discussion any expression that might be inspired rather by strength of feeling than by reason, and a careful examination of the facts. It will be with my very best endeavour, at all events, to attain and retain such a state of mind, that I ask this House to listen to some observations which I feel it is proper to make on this occasion. It is just because everything that touches marriage is of supreme importance, and just because by reason of the strength of the convictions, the sincere convictions, of many people who look at questions affecting marriage from different points of view, we are exposed to the danger of advancing arguments based upon views which it is perhaps impossible to conciliate, and which might tend rather to provoke bad feeling than to a rational solution of the question before us, that it is well that before this House undertakes to deal with this matter we should be quite certain that we are right, quite certain that we are starting upon a discussion that will lead to a wise solution of the matter, and not merely to arousing animosity as the possible result of the discussion. It is very essential that we should approash this question with a view of discovering just how far we have power to deal with it, and just how far we have power to enact the measure that has been submitted to us. If we have not that power, our discussion will be useless; and if we have that power, we will exercise it more effectively after the existence of that power has been established and just as promptly as if we sought to exercise it now, and afterwards submitted the question of our jurisdiction to the judgment of the Privy Council.

The first question that it behooves us to look at is the question how far this House has the power to enact the measure that is proposed. It has been said by several gentlemen who have spoken, and I think it is not a matter of dispute, that this House has power to deal, under the British North America Act, with all matters that concern marriage, excepting the solemnization of marriage. But it is just as clear that the legislatures of the provinces have the exclusive power to deal with everything that concerns the solemnization of marriage. I, therefore, agree with my hon. and distinguished friend from Hastings (Mr. Northrup), when he says that the question that is involved in determining the extent of our power is the question of what constitutes the solemnization of marriage as distinguished from marriage itself. This House has power to deal with everything pertaining to marriage except its solemnization, while the provincial legislatures have the exclusive power to deal with everything that does pertain to its solemnization. Now my hon. friend who introduced this Bill did not dispute that proposition, but as I understand him, he sought to establish the proposition that this Bill did not deal with the solemnization of marriage, but that it dealt with the question, in some way, of the capacity of persons to get married.

He claimed that he is respecting absolutely the power of the local legislature to deal with the solemnization of marriage, because by his measure he enacts that:

> Every ceremony or form of marriage heretofore or hereafter performed by any person authorized to perform any ceremony of marriage by the laws of the place where it is performed, and duly performed according to such laws, shall everywhere within Canada be deemed to be a valid marriage.

Now, so far he says that he has left the entire matter of solemnization to be governed by the law of the province, and that the Act is simply to enact that no consideration of difference of religion between the persons to be married or of the religion of the officer who officiates shall affect the validity. In other words, he says that legislatures may—and he respects their right to do so—legislate in regard to the solemnization of marriage, but they shall not be free to say that for one class of persons a certain officer shall be required as a witness of the marriage and for another class of persons another class of officer shall be required as a witness of the marriage. I have difficulty to see how, when he says that, he can claim that he is not interfering with the power of the legislature to deal with the question of the solemnization of marriage. My hon. friend quoted the opinion of the law officers of the Crown, who, according to him, distinguished between the solemnization of marriage and what he called the status of marriage. He cited that opinion as being to the effect that this parliament had power to deal with the status of marriage, but they had not power to deal with the method by which that status was to be created. With that opinion I have not the slightest quarrel. That the solemnization of marriage consists absolutely and entirely of, and includes in its entirety, the sanction the solemnity that the law requires, to be given to marriage which in itself is a contract between the parties, and that the status of marriage thus produced by that solemnity does not come within the purview of the provincial legislature I am not concerned to dispute, and I do not desire to do so.

But the thing that intervenes between that period when people are not as yet married, and that period when they have acquired the status recognized by law of married people is precisely the solemnization of marriage and when the law says that the solemnization of marriage shall be within the exclusive legislative powers of one legislature it seems to me that you cannot undertake to say, as this legislation undertakes to say, that you may, in regard to that solemnization, legislate, provided you legislate that everybody shall be married in the same way, but you shall not be entitled in the enactment of your legislation, which, to my mind, unquestionably deals merely with the solemnization of marriage, to provide, for reasons that may appear sufficient in your judgment, that one functionary shall be a competent witness of certain marriages and another functionary shall be a competent witness of certain other marriages. That is the full extent, as I understand it, of the complaint that is directed against the existing law to-day in the province of Quebec and that is the evil, if I understand the hon. gentleman, that he seeks to remedy by his present measure. He does not avoid dealing in his legislation with the question of solemnization simply by selecting one particular disposition in regard to solemnization and saying that we will not recognize that. That is a provision in regard to the solemnization of marriage. I am assuming now that the distinction does exist in the province of Quebec. I am not called upon perhaps to say whether it does or does not, but what I may have to say upon that question I shall say in a few moments. I am assuming that the law of Quebec enacts that one clergyman is a competent witness of the marriage of persons belonging to his own church and that such a clergyman's presence is required to give the solemnity that the law recognizes to the marriage of two persons belonging to his church. In so enacting, if it does so enact, it seems to me impossible to say that it is not an enactment concerning the solemnization of marriage and concerning nothing else. I am sorry not to have the opinion of the law officers of the Crown which my hon. friend quoted, but without having their opinion, I may say that it expressly sets forth that while the status of married people may be governed and may, by means of divorce, be dissolved by legislation of this parliament, that status is created precisely by the solemnization of marriage, the thing that is left exclusively to the legislature. The hon. member also cited the opinion of the Hon. Edward Blake, a former Minister of Justice, of this Dominion, and I think you will all agree with me in saying a most distinguished minister of justice, probably one of our greatest statesmen, and for my part I am quite prepared to say our greatest lawyer.

Mr. CLARKE (Essex). What is the intention of the government as to the forms of questions to be submitted to the Supreme Court? Will they submitt Bill (No. 3), or frame certain questions?

Mr. DOHERTY. I cannot say that the precise form has been absolutely fixed, but I certainly think I am quite within my authority in saying that care will be taken to so submit the questions as to enable us to get a perfectly explicit answer as to whether this legislation could be passed Whether this Bill would be the best form to submit the question or not is a matter for consideration, but I am sure that the absolute intention is to elicit an answer that would clearly settle this question whether or not we can pass this legislation.

The opinion to which I was first referring of the law officers of the Crown cited by the honourable mover of the Bill dealt with the issue of licenses, and the publication of banns, the preliminaries to the actual solemnization. I can only explain why that particular question should have been put by supposing that those who put it had some doubt whether these preliminaries formed part of the actual solemnization. I do not think that anybody can question that what is prescribed in order that this contract that two people enter into and that is the marriage should have solemnity added to it in the way of the presence of witnesses, a certain number of witnesses forms part of the solemnization, but I can understand that possibly it might have occurred to some one that these preliminaries did not form part of the solemnization. The decision reads:

> It appears to them (the law officers) that the power of legislating upon this subject is conferred upon the provincial legislatures by 30 Victoria, chapter 3, section 92 (B.N.A. Act) under the words 'the solemnization of marriage in the province.' The phrase 'the laws respecting the solemnization of marriages in England' occurs in the preamble of the Marriage Act (4 George IV., chapter 76), an Act, which is very largely concerned with matters relating to banns and licenses.

You will notice that it is not exclusively concerned with banns and licenses, and I state without fear or hesitation, that the principal purport of the Marriage Act was to determine precisely before whom people should be married. The decision continues:

> And this is, therefore, a strong authority to show that the same words used in the British North America Act, 1867, were intended to have the same meaning. 'Marriage and divorce,' which by the 91st section of the same Act are reserved to the parliament of the Dominion, signify, in their opinion, all matters relating to the status of marriage, between what persons and under what circumstances it shall be created and (if at all) destroyed.
> There are many reasons of convenience and sense why one law as to the status of marriage should exist throughout the Dominion which have no applicaton as regards the uniformity of the procedure whereby that status is created or evidenced

What are all laws that prescribe before whom marriage must be entered into in order that it should be solemn, should have the solemnity the law requires, but laws regarding the procedure whereby that status is created or evidenced? With all respect to the hon. member, I do not think that if I had been looking for authority to justify the proposition that who shall be a competent witness, or whose presence shall give solemnity to the marriage, forms part of the solemnization of marriage, that I could have found any more to the point than that which he has cited.

May I cite an expression of opinion of the Hon. Mr. Blake, to be found in the first volume of 'Hansard', 1880, at page 301. He says:

> It belongs to the local legislature to decide by what means marriage between those persons between whom marriage may, under the general law, be lawfully contracted, shall be contracted.

By what means it shall be contracted. That is the solemnization of marriage, that is what the law allows the local legislature.

The hon. member cited the legislation with regard to marriage with a deceased wife's sister as supporting his proposition that this House had power to deal with this matter; but one sees at once that the legislation with regard to the deceased wife's sister dealt with who were the persons between whom marriage might lawfully be contracted. That is within the power of this House, that is no part of the solemnization of marriage, and that legislation, therefore, which was enacted, in my humble judgment at all events, and certainly the hon. member who introduced the Bill considers it so, was perfectly within the jurisdiction and power of this parliament, but it by no means follows that because this parliament has power to decide who may be married, to whom, that this parliament has power to decide how they shall be married.

Mr. LANCASTER. The Bill does not say a word about how people shall be married but says that if they are lawfully married, by any ceremony performed in a province, they shall remain married although their religious belief is different. The hon. minister is arguing something that is not before him, he is putting up a man of straw for the fun of knocking him down.

Mr. DOHERTY. I am quite confident it would be easier for me to knock down a man of straw than to knock down the hon. member.

Mr. LANCASTER. I do not doubt that.

Mr. DOHERTY. That is a thing I would not attempt. I am endeavouring to speak with all proper respect to my hon. friend. I desire to treat his argument seriously and while I cannot agree with his view I sincerely trust he does not for a moment think I desire to be disrespectful. If there were need for a law to say that two persons of different religions can be married I would not dispute it.

Mr. LANCASTER. What else is there in the Bill? There is nothing in the Bill except the declaration that the fact that they are of different religions shall not invalidate the marriage. What I object to is an hon. gentleman here talking about the means by which marriage may be performed.

Mr. DOHERTY. The Bill says:

And without regard to the religion of the person performing the ceremony.

Mr. LANCASTER. Yes.

Mr. DOHERTY. The hon. gentleman says that I have been dealing with the last part of the Bill, without regard to the religion of the person performing the ceremony, because so far he is endeavouring to legislate to say that the fact that persons belong to different religions shall not prevent their getting married, he is legislating to remedy an evil that does not exist. I have no hesitation whatever in saying that the hon. member will search the law and the jurisprudence of Quebec and search it in vain, if he is looking for anything that says that persons of different religions cannot be married. I shall leave that to any lawyer in this House or in this country who will take the pains to look into it. I do not mean to say that the hon. member has not taken pains to look into it but I confess that I am at a loss to explain to myself his misapprehension on that question.

I asked the hon. member (Mr. Lancaster) if he would be good enough to indicate the cases on which he relied, in which it had been held that because persons were of different religious their marriage was voided, and he cited Laramee and Evans, and Durocher and Degré. These cases are familiar to me as they must be familiar to any man who has had anything to do with the law of the province of Quebec, and speaking from memory I would not hesitate to say that these judgments deal with marriages between two Catholics. I have however before me a very carefully prepared summary of the decisions in all these cases that have been dealt with in Quebec, including these two cases. In the case of Laramee and Evans this is the holding:

Laramée vs. Evans, 1880, Jette, J., 25, L.C.J., 361.

Action to annul a marriage between Roman Catholics under a license and without banns. before a Protestant clergyman. Case referred by the court to the ecclesiastical authority for adjudication by it on the validity of the sacrament, and, upon the production of decree of invalidity the court declared the marriage null as a civil contract.

In Durocher and Degré the finding is:

Durocher vs. Degree, 1901, Court of Review, Mathieu, Curran and Lemieux, J.J., (reversing Lynch J.) 20 S. C. 456. A marriage declared null and void on the ground that the parties, both minors, had to evade the laws of their country, fled to the States and been married there 'en fraude de la loi.' No reference was made by the court to the necessity of any preliminary decree of an ecclesiastical nature.

There is no doubt that Mr. Justice Lemieux, one of the three judges in the Court of Review, who sat in this case, went into a very learned dissertation on the whole question of the marriage laws as affecting the validity of the marriage of Catholics in Quebec, and he expressed an opinion upon a number of questions not necessary for a decision of the case, but I am satisfied that the hon. member will find nothing in that case declaring that the marriage of a Catholic with a Protestant as such was invalid, or in other words, making the validity of the marriage depend upon the parties being of the same religion. As a matter of fact the parties in that case were of the same religion, both being Catholics. These were both minors who had gone to the States to get married in fraud of the law, and the court pointed out they had gone to avoid the necessity of going before their parish priest to be married, and, also of getting rid of the necessity to get the consent of their parents. I do not question that Mr. Justice Lemieux in that case expressed the opinion that the marriage of two Catholics in Quebec was invalid unless it was performed before their parish priest, or a priest representing him, but there also he was referring to the case of two Catholics. I do not pretend to be omniscient as to the law of the province of Quebec on the subject, but I have not the slightest hesitation in saying that no lawyer, and nobody else will find a judgment of the courts of Quebec declaring a marriage null because one of the parties was a Protestant and the other was a Catholic. Let me say further that there is no law and no jurisprudence in the province of Quebec that ever has held that the marriage of a Protestant and Catholic before a Protestant minister or before an officer civilly authorized, other than their proper priest, was not valid. There is no possible pretension to-day that under the law of the province of Quebec the marriage of a Catholic and a Protestant before a Protestant minister is not a perfectly valid marriage, just as valid as it could be if this Bill were and could be passed by this House and had the force of law. Therefore, so far as this Bill may be intended to remedy an evil resulting from the idea that there is a law in the province of Quebec which says that difference of religion between two persons getting married was a cause of nullity, it provides a remedy where there is no wrong to remedy, it strikes absolutely into the void. That is why I was confining my observations to this Bill, in so far as it purports to say that a marriage shall be valid without regard to the religion of the person performing the ceremony. That of course would affect the law of Quebec in so far as that law may be correctly held to be that the marriage of Catholics in order to be lawfully valid must be witnessed before their parish priest, or some one representing him. As the right hon. gentleman (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) pointed out there is the modification in the Ne Temere decree that the jurisdiction of the priest is made local, and he can marry in his own church those who present themselves, provided there has been a residence of a month prior. But, I am speaking now of the canonical rule as it was before the Ne Temere decree, and that is the only rule that can by any ingenuity be claimed as recognized by the law of the province of Quebec.

Mr. CARROLL. Has the promulgation of the Ne Temere decree in the province of Quebec affected the civil law as it stood before the decree was promulgated in Canada?

Mr. DOHERTY. Not one iota.

Mr. CARROLL. Nor in any other province of Canada?

Mr. DOHERTY. I cannot speak with familiarity of the laws of the other provinces, but I have never heard that it did. However, for whatever professional reputation I may have, I have no hesitation in stating the proposition, that the law of the province of Quebec on marriage is the same to-day as it was before the Ne Temere decree was enacted.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. Hear, hear.

Mr. CLARKE (Essex). Since the Ne Temere decree, would there not be a difference in the judgment of the Ecclesiastical Courts of Qubec?

Mr. DOHERTY. As to the validity of the sacrament I presume there would be. Before the Ecclesiastical Tribunal it would be held, I have no doubt, that the Ne Temere decree applying, the sacrament was not valid. But if the hon. gentleman means to draw the deduction that because the ecclesiastical court might, under the Ne Temere decree, hold that view, the civil courts would be in the slightest degree affected, he has drawn the wrong conclusion.

Mr. CLARKE (Essex). I understand that the addition made by the Ne Temere decree consisted of two matters. First, that it forbids marriage between a Protestant and a Roman Catholic; and second that it enunciates the doctrine that once a Catholic always a Catholic, and that although a Roman Catholic might have left the church, the church has still jurisdiction over him, so that if he should become a Protestant and be married by a Protestant minister, yet under the Ne Temere decree his marriage would not be valid.

Mr. DOHERTY. I think my hon. friend is in error when he says that the Ne Temere decree prohibits marriage between Catholics and Protestants.

Mr. CLARKE (Essex). Except by a priest.

Mr. DOHERTY. It is one thing to say that a marriage must be before a priest and another thing to prohibit it. I quite understand that before the Ne Temere decree, the church recognized the validity of the marriage between a Catholic and a nen-Catholic before an officer qualified to solemnize marriage, but that since the Ne Temere decree—dealing always with the spiritual question and from the point of view of the validity of the sacrament—the ecclesiastical authority does not recognize the validity of the sacrament, but that in no manner affects the civil law of the province of Quebec.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. Hear, hear.

Mr. LANCASTER. Is it not conceded that article 127 makes the marriage he refers to invalids?

Mr. DOHERTY. I would like to call my hon. friend's attention to the wording of the article which is most careful:

> The other impediments, recognized according to the different religious persuasions as resulting from relationship or affinity or from other causes, remain subject to the rules hitherto followed in the different churches and religious communities.

The Civil Code of Quebec came into force on the first of August, 1866, and it provided that the other impediment should remain subject to the rules hitherto followed in the different churches. The legislature had then no idea or intention of submitting this law to the various modifications which might be made in the future in the rules of the different churches.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. Hear, hear.

Mr. DOHERTY. It is unfortunate that a sufficiently close scrutiny was not given these provisions of the law before people jumped to conclusions in regard to them.

Mr. LANCASTER. Is it not the case that because of that very article the judge in the Hebert case decided that Mrs. Hebert was not legally married under the Ne Temere decree?

Mr. DOHERTY. Again I say no.

Mr. LANCASTER. Then I have been misinformed in regard to the report on that case.

Mr. DOHERTY. My hon. friend must be. In the Hebert case the judgment was on a marriage between two Catholics, with regard to which the religious position was absolutely the same before as after the passing of the Ne Temere decree, so that that judgment could not possibly have any bearing on the validity of a marriage between a Catholic and a Protestant before a Protestant minister.

Mr. LANCASTER. That is a case my Bill would apply to.

Mr. DOHERTY. What I am trying to show is that the hon. member's Bill, in so far as it seeks to remedy an evil consisting in this, that a Catholic and a Protestant, because of difference in religion, cannot be married strikes at nothing; and furthermore that in so far as it seeks to remedy a law under which the marriage of a Catholic and a Protestant before a non-Catholic clergyman is null, it is likewise striking a void, because there is no law in the province of Quebec by virtue of which a marriage of a Catholic and a Protestant before a Protestant minister is invalid or can be held to be so.

Mr. DOHERTY.

Mr. LANCASTER. Then my hon. friend would have no hesitation in voting for my Bill on its merits. It is entirely what he wants, apparently.

Mr. DOHERTY. I am not now discussing what I want or what I don't want. I do not think that a matter of this importance should be discussed according to what I do or do not want, but I do think it ought to be determined in accordance with the law of the land. I am not here to argue for anything else.

Mr. LANCASTER. Does the hon. gentleman recognize that there is an evil at all requiring a remedy. I am trying to find out what evil the Minister of Justice thinks does exist, if any.

Mr. DOHERTY. Whether it be an evil that the law of a province should enact that the most suitable officer to witness the marriage of people of a certain religious belief, is their pastor, I do not think I am called on to discuss on this Bill. But if there be an evil to remedy, that is the evil which this Bill is going to remedy and only that. If we have the power to pass this Bill and if we should pass it, and if the law of the province of Quebec be—and I shall not undertake to determine that it is—that the marriage of two Catholics is not valid unless it be celebrated before a priest according to the Tametsi decree, that is the one change which will be effected by this Bill.

Mr. MACDONALD. Has there ever been any decisive interpretation in the courts of the province of Quebec as to the effect of the Ne Temere decree on the marital relations of person in that province, or has it been urged before the courts of that province that the decree has any effect?

Mr. DOHERTY. So far as my knowledge goes there has been no case before the courts on a marriage entered into since the Ne Temere decree was enacted. That decree came into force in 1908, and I am not aware that any case concerning the validity of marriage has arisen since that date. But even if the Hebert case had arisen since that decree was promulgated, it would not have been affected by it, because that was the case of a marriage between two Catholics. I do not know that I need say anything more to show that the only rules recognized by the Quebec Civil Code are those which were in force prior to the 1st of August, 1866.

I think that, though we have no adjudication, there is no ground for serious fear that it will happen that the Ne Temere decree will be held to affect the Quebec law. And it seems to me difficult to believe that there is such a possibility of that as to constitute an evil calling for remedy.

Mr. MACDONALD. Does the Minister of Justice (Mr. Doherty) say—(I ask in order that the matter may be made clear to my own mind)—that there has been no decision of the courts of the province of Quebec in which the provision of the Ne Temere decree was urged as an element in the case?

Mr. DOHERTY. No.

Mr. MACDONALD. Does the hon. gentleman say that there can be no application in the courts of Quebec of any provisions or results of the Ne Temere decree?

Mr. DOHERTY. That is certainly my unhesitating opinion. And, while I am not afraid to rest that upon the letter of the Code, I may say that I have had occasion—not with a view to this matter particularly—to meet many people who have very considerable knowledge of law of the province of Quebec; and I have never heard one suggest such a possibility. I certainly have never heard it suggested from any ecclesiastical source, that it ever entered their minds that they were re-making the law of Quebec when the Ne Temere decree was issued.

Now, I do not wish to enter upon a discussion of the Ne Temere decree. But, perhaps it may be well to remember that this decree was issued to cover the whole world, with the exception, as I understand it, of Germany. And it may be easy to imagine that the author did not have present to his mind, when he wrote it, the particular law of the province of Quebec. And certainly its author quite realized that a large part of the territory to be affected by it, as a religious regulation, would not recognize it at all. However that may be, I think one can safely say that there is nothing in the law of the province of Quebec that subjects to the necessity of a ceremony in the presence of the Catholic priest a marriage between a Catholic and a non-Catholic. And, therefore, as I said, the whole scope of this Bill, if it were enacted into law, would be to affect the marriage of two Catholics in the province of Quebec if the law of the province of Quebec is correctly interpreted as meaning that two Catholics must be married before their priest, in accordance with the Tridentine rule, in order to make their marriage legal and civilly valid. Upon that question I do not not think it necessary to pronounce myself. But I want to be perfectly fair and to state the whole situation as it exists. As the hon. gentleman who introduced the Bill said, there are contradictory judgments on this subject in the province of Quebec. There are, I think, more judgments than the hon. gentleman mentioned; but I think there is nothing to be gained by adding to the number. But there are decisions concerning section 127 of the Civil Code that the presence of the parish priest is necessary to the validity of a Catholic marriage. On the contrary there are judgments that say that section 127 has to do, purely and simply with what are called 'impediments proper.' The courts are divided, and none of the cases have ever gone to the ultimate tribunal for decision. So, it is possible that it may ultimately be decided that the interpretation put upon article 127 does not properly represent the law of the province of Quebec. However, that may be, the extreme recognition of church rules in the province of Quebec may be said to consist in the requirement of the marriage of two Catholics before the priest. So, the evil to be guarded against is reduced at all events to that. I have no desire to enter into a discussion of the question whether that is really the law of the province of Quebec; nor, indeed, a discussion whether, if it be the law of the province of Quebec, it is a good law or not. I have only adverted to this condition of the law, because it bears upon the question how far it is important that there shall be anything in the nature of haste with regard to this legislation. There, at the outside, is the evil to be remedied, if it be considered an evil.

Now, I know it has been said that there was something particularly invidious about this law, in that it recognized the Catholic priest as having more power than the ministers of other denominations. I want to say only one word in that connection, because it may perhaps be useful in removing misapprehension as to this matter. The law—if it be the law—that two Catholics in the province of Quebec must be married before a Catholic priest, does not proceed at all upon the assumption that it is conferring power upon the priest.

As has been said here to-night, no priest and no minister, and no public officer marries anybody; people marry each other. And even in the church where it is considered a sacrament, there is no doubt made about it, I understand that the ministers of the sacrament, are the people who marry. Now, the original requirements made by the church of the presence of the pastor, was not made in order to make the marriage one whit more religious On the contrary, the decree that makes these requirements is called 'the Decree Tametsi,' because as it begins with the word 'tametsi' meaning 'although.' The effect of the decree is this: 'Although' there can be no possible doubt that consent freely given to marriage constitutes the marriage, and that people who so consent are validly married, and have had a valid sacrament, nevertheless, because that state of affairs requiring no outside ceremonial has created a situation where many married people have been able to go through the world with their marriages unknown and to contract other marriages in a more public way, and so bring about all the scandals that result, therefore, for the purpose of avoiding clandestinity, for the purpose of making it public, we require that you go before the priest of your parish, the man most likely to know all about you, and that you marry each other in his presence. And further, it requires that there should be two witnesses—and the absence of the witnesses is as serious a defect as the absence of the priest. I only say this to show that these requirements in their origin were not based upon the idea of conferring power upon the priest or upon an ecclesiastical dignitary of any kind.

They were requirements which, in that day and generation, were considered the most effective way of procuring the publicity pointed out by the right hon. leader of the opposition. The countries that refused to be bound by the decrees have actually enacted these very things in their civil law. France, for instance, France, which at that time disputed entirely the authority of the church to regulate marriage adopted substantially these decrees to secure publicity, and we inherited them as embodied in her common law. I will not discuss whether that is the best method to secure publicity; all I want to point out is that this requirement of the law does not confer any power upon any priest or minister of any denomination. But the civil law, if it is correctly interpreted in the sense I have mentioned, has adopted these rules as suitable to the existing situation where there are many different religious beliefs and different methods of procuring publicity. But the civil law dealing with these beliefs accepts the rules as they hitherto prevailed according to different religious beliefs, and if that provision applies to Quebec as regards the validity of the solemnization of marriage, it applies only because the civil law, by that enactment, recognizes these rules as the most effective method, in a population belonging to different beliefs, the majority of whom it is true belong to one particular belief, of securing the publicity of marriage and of preventing clandestine marriages. After all, I think that the prevention of clandestine marriages is of sufficient necessity to justify any legislature to concern itself with the matter. I would like to point out that these articles which are impugned are not the legislation of the province of Quebec, they are not the legislation of the legislature of Quebec they are the legislation of the parliament of Canada, of the old province of Canada, enacted undoubtedly for application in lower Canada. But assuming this interpretation of the article to be correct then that parliament enacted that the best way to guard against clandestinity was to require conformity to the rules enacted in the different religious bodies for that purpose. In doing so they may have been right or they may have been wrong, but surely it was the exercise of a judgment with regard to what was the proper method of the solemnization of marriage. That being so, we get back to where we started, that in so far as this legislation seeks to prevent its being required that the officer who is to act as one of the witnesses, to give solemnity to the marriage, should be a person of the belief of the persons being married, a clergyman in their respective churches, in so far as this legislation seeks to do that, it is seeking to interfere with legislation regarding the solemnization of marriage, in other words, invading a field that belongs exclusively to the province.

While that is my opinion, and I have no hesitation in expressing it, I have respect for the opinions of others; I have respect for the opinion of the hon. gentleman who introduced this measure (Mr. Lancaster), I have respect for the opinions of large numbers of my fellow Canadians who I know entertain a contrary opinion upon this question. Under these circumstances, I think it is only fitting and proper, in view of the difference of opinion existing, that before this measure is brushed aside without consideration for want of power, we should allow the question of the existence of our power to be passed upon by the tribunals of this country, including, of course, the tribunal of His Majesty in His Privy Council. I believe that however strong a man's own conviction may be upon a matter of this importance, the people of this country are entitled to have it determined by the proper tribunal. I cannot agree that the best way is to settle this question first, and find out afterwards whether we have any right to settle it. I think the logical method is first to make sure of our power; first to be sure you are right, then go ahead. Nor can I accept the view that the submission of the question of our power to the courts necessarily implies a decision one way or the other, after that power is determined by this parliament upon the merits of this Bill. When this power is determined, it will then be the duty of this parliament to deal with the question involved in the measure upon its merits, and it will be the duty of each one of us, knowing that we are vested with the power and with the duty of dealing with it, after giving it our calmest, our best, and our most dispassionate consideration, to deal with it in a manner that will be most conducive to the welfare of the people of this country and preserve the liberty in fullest measure of all classes, subject only to such control as may be necessary to secure the greatest good of the people of Canada.

Mr. A. H. CLARKE (South Essex). Coming from the province of Ontario, I would not be doing my duty, especially in view of the unlucky number of thirteen from that province who sit on this side of the House, if I did not give some expression to the views of the province of Ontario and to my own views upon this question, which previous speakers have said is one of the very greatest importance affecting the people of Canada at the present time. I think the discussion will be beneficial in clearing away a great deal of misconception in regard to this marriage question which existed during the last Dominion campaign. I am a little surprised, after what took place and what was said during that campaign, that no person has risen in his seat and charged the right hon. leader of the opposition with being the author of the Ne Temere decree. In my constituency, and I believe in many constituencies in the province of Ontario—I have only to refer to my hon. friend from Peterboro (Mr. Burnham) in corroboration—if there is one thing perhaps more than another outside the question of reciprocity which accounts for the small number on this side of the House from the province of Ontario, it is the feeling that has been aroused over this marriage question in that province. Not only was the late Prime Minister at that time charged with being the author of this iniquity, but it was said in the county from which I come that he had secretly gone up into that riding and had separated man and wife. There were some unfortunate things arising out of the confusion and uncertainty about this marriage question which I think naturally caused a good deal of feeling. I have known of cases where a man and wife of different religions had got the impression that their marriage was illegal. I know of one case in my own riding where a Roman Catholic woman left her husband, and of course that was all charged up against the late Prime Minister.

There have been other instances of that sort, so it is not to be wondered at perhaps that the ideas of the people of the province of Ontario in this matter have aroused a very considerable degree of interest and discontent. I fear that the attitude taken by the present Prime Minister will not give satisfaction to those people in the province of Ontario who, in very large numbers, withdrew their allegiance from the former premier of this country. We have but to read the reports of what has been said by the clergy of the Protestant Church. They had expressed the greatest confidence that, now they had got rid of this arch traitor to the Protestant Church, the Ne Temere decree would be set aside, there would be no further cause of complaint and hereafter the Protestant standard would be unfurled with nothing whatever to mar it.

It is a serious question and I think that, without passion and without prejudice, notwithstanding what may be preached here and there it is the duty of a member of parliament representing the people of both religions in this country to give it that calm consideration which is necessary if we are going to be a united people. Much abuse has been heaped upon the former Minister of Justice because he dared to give a legal opinion that this was a matter within the jurisdiction of the provinces, that the question of the legality of marriage, the mode of its solemnization was a matter over which the Dominion parliament had no jurisdiction, but that the jurisdiction rested solely with the different provinces. We have now the right hon. Prime Minister and the hon. Minister of Justice agreeing with that opinion.

Mr. LANCASTER. It was never given. The ex-Minister of Justice gave no opinion, he shirked the question when he was asked to give it.

Mr. CLARKE (Essex). My hon. friend (Mr. Lancaster) may be quite right in saying it was not given in this House, but it was given in answer to people who wrote to him. It was published and it was referred to by the right hon. Prime Minister this evening.

Mr. HUGHES (Victoria). Upon what did the former Minister of Justice base his opinion? What was the question submitted to him?

Mr. CLARKE (Essex). The opinion, as I understood it, was in answer to communications from some reverend gentlemen in Toronto.

Mr. HUGHES (Victoria). What was it about?

Mr. CLARKE (Essex). It was on the very question that we are discussing.

Some hon. MEMBERS. No, no.

Mr. CURRIE. Where is it?

Mr. CLARKE (Essex). I am afraid if my hon. friend from North Simcoe (Mr. Currie) does not know where it is no other person can tell.

Mr. LANCASTER. The ex-Minister of Justice (Hon. Sir Allen Aylesworth) distinctly said in this House that before he would give an opinion he would want to get legal advice. Those are the last words he uttered in this House on the question.

Mr. CLARKE (Essex). That is only another instance of the want of allegiance of the hon. gentleman to his leader, because he said during this discussion that the former Minister of Justice had given that opinion.

Mr. LANCASTER. Who said?

Mr. CLARKE (Essex). The Prime Minister, your leader.

Mr. LANCASTER. The hon. gentleman makes the statement that Sir Allen Aylesworth gave an opinion?

Mr. CLARKE (Essex). Just so.

Mr. LANCASTER. He was asked by members of the opposition to do so, but he declined to give an opinion.

Mr. CLARKE (Essex). The right hon. Prime Minister, during this discussion, has said that the ex-Minister did give that opinion.

Mr. LANCASTER. I did not hear him say anything of the kind.

Mr. CLARKE (Essex). I may be mistaken, but that is what came to my ears at any rate. Whether or not that is so, I saw it in the public press that he did give a public opinion and he has been much abused for it because it was said that he tried to shirk the responsibility of this burning question by saying that the jurisdiction in such matters rests with the provinces. Notwithstanding the fear of opprobrium I am bound to say that I believe that is the correct solution of this matter. I agree entirely with the hon. Minister of Justice that this question of the validity of marriages is one within the competence of the provincial legislatures. It would seem to me that it is a matter that comes within the definition of the solemnization of marriage. I think that the reason so much difficulty arises is that in the province of Ontario, and perhaps in other provinces, there is an entirely different standpoint to this question from that which exists among the Roman Catholic people in the province of Quebec. I think that can be accounted for by the history of this marriage question. In the Roman Catholic countries in the early centuries this question of marriage was treated as a question of sacrament and no religious ceremony was required by the state or civil authorities. All that was necessary in England up to the time of Lord Hardwick's Act, 26 George II., was for a man and a woman to agree to get married and to consummate it by their own act. That was the end of it as far as the state was concerned.

Mr. CURRIE. Oh no; you are wrong.

Mr. CLARKE (Essex). I despair of convincing anybody that I am right after that. However, my hon. friend from North Simcoe can correct me if I am wrong, but that is as I understand it, at any rate in England, and I do not think that I am mistaken in regard to it. I understand that until the year 1754, when the first Marriage Act of England was passed, no religious ceremony of any kind was required. Lord Hardwick's Act, which has been amended from time to time, was passed for the sake of publicity, and I think every person agrees that the object of the Ne Temere decree, in so far as it secures publicity and discourages clandestinity, should be commended. I think that every person in the province of Ontario will say that that is commendable, that there should not be clandestine marriages. But, what they say in Ontario is that a marriage is just as public if it is solemnized before a Protestant minister as if it took place in the parish church of the Roman Catholics. That is where they take issue. One says that it is clandestine if it does not take place in the church to which the parties go, and the other says that is is public and not clandestine if it takes place before some officers deputed by the civil authorities for that purpose. It is not only in the province of Quebec that people have been married, their marriage has been illegal, they have borne children and these children have been illegitimate. That has happened in other provinces than the province of Quebec, and the tendency of legislation in Ontario is to legitimize people who form those marriages, so that time after time, even in the province of Ontario, it has been found necessary, where they found that people have been illegally married, to accept the marriage, though illegal, and to pass Acts confirming such marriages for the sake of making them legal.

Mr. EMMERSON. The same is done in New Brunswick.

Mr. CLARKE (Essex). The same is done in New Brunswick, as my hon. friend (Mr. Emmerson) says, and I have no doubt in other places. That is the reason that the people of Ontario feel that this is such a shocking thing. Their tendency is not so much to look at the religious ceremony but to look at the intention of the parties and if the people have bona fide gone through some ceremony by which they think they are married, give birth to children and raise a family, then the tendency is, notwithstanding these defects, to go as far as they can for the purpose of legalizing such a marriage. If you look over the records of the courts for the last few years in Ontario you will find a decision where a woman married her deceased husband's brother, which is within the prohibited degrees of consanguinity. That was an illegal marriage, it was absolutely void according to the opinion of the court, but notwithstanding that there was a remedial clause put in the Ontario Act which provided that notwithstanding any illegality, notwithstanding even the want of a license, notwithstanding the fact that the person who performed the ceremony had no right to perform that ceremony, still if the parties act in good faith, and completed the act of marriage by the act of cohabitation, it is a legal marriage and the children are saved the obloquy and the stigma of its being treated as a meretricious union.

Apparently they did not look at it in that light in the marriages in Quebec.

Mr. PELLETIER. Oh, yes, there is a clause in the Code which says that if two people get married, even although they do not follow the Code, they are married to all intents and purposes as between husband and wife and the children.

Mr. CLARKE (Essex). You dissolve the marriage.

Mr. PELLETIER. The civil effects are there.

Mr. CLARKE (Essex). But the marriage is gone.

Mr. PELLETIER. Oh, no.

Mr. CLARKE (Essex). As I understand if the marriage is not legally performed they refer it to the ecclesiastical courts. They say whether there is any marriage but leave it to the civil courts to say what the rights are?

Mr. PELLETIER. Oh, no.

Mr. CLARKE (Essex). That does not affect my point. My argument was urging the point that the provinces had the legislation, that this is a matter of solemnization of marriage. What is there in Ontario for instance to prevent the legislature from saying that all marriages shall be performed before an English church clergyman or at certain times. That was the law in England, all people had to be married in a certain church at certain hours. Of course there was no question of conflict of jurisdiction. But once the status is established, I suppose it could be said as was said in respect to the Deceased Wife's Sister's Bill that a Roman Catholic and a Protestant had not the status to get married. I would think we had that jurisdiction, and that conforms with the opinion read here tonight. But once this parliament says what the status is, I do not see what further we can do, then it is remitted to the provinces to say how the people who have a right to be married shall be married. In other words, how their marriage shall be solemnized. There was a time when the Salvation Army could not marry people. If two people went before the Salvation Army and got married that marriage would be illegal and the parties would be in the same position as two Roman Catholics in Quebec going before a Protestant minister. That has been enlarged, now the Quakers may marry, and the Salvation Army and under certain conditions some officers of the Brethren may marry. From time to time where a religious denomination is established, the law is amended to say they may marry. I see no difference between that and what exists in Quebec. They say that certain people may marry because they say that certain people must marry before one official and certain people before another official. It does not seem to me to alter the principle of the matter. It seems to me that the principle is how that marriage is to be solemnized, whether by this person or by that person at one time or another time, it all comes under the head of solemnization of marriage, and is a matter with which the province has to deal.

Mr. HUGHES (Victoria). Are we to infer that the provinces have nothing to do with the class of persons who are being married?

Mr. CLARKE (Essex). The province cannot decide the status. I think the province cannot say who are eligible to be married or who are not eligible to be married, but once that status is established by the Dominion parliament, then the mode of carrying out that marriage, it seems to me, is delegated to the province. That was not the opinion of Sir John Macdonald soon after confederation, in the question already referred to which was submitted to the law officers of the Crown in England. He had given his opinion that a New Brunswick Act which had just been passed about that time was ultra vires, because it provided for licenses and for the marriage ceremony. The opinion of Sir John Macdonald was that it was only a Dominion officer, on account of the authority from the Crown, who had anything whatever to do with marriage. He referred the matter to England and received the decision which has been cited by the hon. member for Lincoln. The Earl of Granville, who, I think, was Secretary of State at the time, reported that they did not agree with that opinion, they said that the solemnization of marriages did come within provincial jurisdiction, the status remaining with the Dominion. That being so, the Minister of Justice and the past Minister of Justice both sharing the opinion beyond any doubt that the matter of the solemnization of marriages rests with the province, and that the Bill introduced by the hon. member for Lincoln (Mr. Lancaster) is ultra vires, it seems to me to be rather disappointing to those who expect something to be done to have it said that now it is to be relegated to the courts to trail along perhaps for years, contrary to the opinion of the Prime Minister himself and of his Minister of Justice. It seems to me that if action is to be deferred until there is some authoritative opinion in those cases now pending in the courts of Quebec on a concrete case where it seems to me the matter ought to come up squarely it will get to the Privy Council very much quicker than we would get a decision by reference of a stated case. I do not think that these stated cases are satisfactory. Where there is a case stated of an abstract position the first tendency of the judges is to shift and shelve it and get rid of it without answering the question. That is what I fear will take place in this case and if action is to be deferred until there is an authoritative decision by the Privy Council, I believe that if the Quebec case could be carried on that would be the most satisfactory way.

Mr. DOHERTY. Is the hon. member aware that in the case he is speaking of the husband has abandoned the case and consequently it is complicated with the question whether the wife can carry it on all alone which might prevent them getting a decision?

Mr. CLARKE (Essex). I understood that case was on the way for judicial interpre tation.

Mr. DOHERTY. But with the difficulty tacked on to it that the husband has withdrawn his case and of course the difficulty that arose in the first court may arise in the others and prevent you getting a decision on the merits.

Mr. CLARKE (Essex). It might have that effect but those pressing the case expect to get a decision on the merits.

Mr. DOHERTY. They hope so.

Mr. BORDEN. Another consideration has perhaps been overlooked by my hon. friend. The determination of that case would not in any way define the power of this parliament, it would simply be a determination of the meaning of the Quebec code, not of the powers of this parliament.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. Hear, hear.

Mr. CLARKE (Essex). It would determine what is the crucial point that is whether or not the decision in Quebec is in accordance with the law of Quebec.

Mr. BORDEN. Yes, it would determine that of course but I was venturing to remind my hon. friend that it would not in the least determine the relative powers of the province on the one hand and of this parliament on the other hand in respect to the matters which have been debated this afternoon.

Mr. LAMARCHE. I suppose my hon. friend (Mr. Clarke) is aware that the Hebert case to which he has referred, is complicated to a certain extent by an intricate question of fact which renders the decision on the question of law altogether difficult?

Mr. CLARKE (Essex). I am not aware of that, I am not aware that there is anything in that case which would prevent the cobwebs being brushed away and getting a decision on the merits.

If there is, that case will not give a fair precedent to govern us in the future.

Mr. LAMARCHE. I am giving this information to my hon. friend from what I have learned in my capacity as one of the counsel in the case.

Mr. CLARKE (Essex). I have read a very long argument by counsel in the newspapers, and it seems to cover the precise question which is agitating the public mind now. However, that is a matter which the Minister of Justice must take the responsibility of. Certainly, a reference of Bill No. (3) would be a most unsatisfactory solution of the question. With all respect to the hon. member for Lincoln I think if we sent that Bill to England, and asked for an opinion on it it would be laughed out of court. As I read that Bill, it asks that even if the marriage is solemnized according to the law of the province, is the marriage valid notwithstanding any ecclesiastical decree. I have never heard it suggested by any one that if the marriage is solemnized according to the law of the province of Quebec, any decree of any ecclesiastical body could interfere with it. If it is solemnized according to the law of Quebec, then it is a legal marriage, of course, and that is the end of it. And, if it is not solemnized according to the law of Quebec, what bearing is this Bill going to have upon it. That raises the question of constitutionality, and involves amending the constitution, and I do not see how that is going to be done by this parliament. It seems to me that what this Bill means —of course it could be amended in committee if it reaches that stage—what it means is that it is a defiance to any ecclesiastical court. I do not know that any person has ever dreamed for a moment that any ecclesiastical authority had anything to do with a legally performed marriage. If the marriage is legally performed that is the end of it, and if the marriage is not legally solemnized that is the end of it also unless the Prime Minister goes further—and that is what the people of Ontario expect him to do—and if there is any doubt about it to have the constitution amended, so that effect can be given to the idea of the hon. member for Lincoln.

Mr. SHARPE (Ontario). Is the hon. member (Mr. Clarke) in favour of that?

Mr. CLARKE (Essex). I am in favour of passing a law that will bring the matter squarely up. I believe it is a matter that ought to be settled, and if the passing of this Bill will have the effect of getting an authoritative decision in favour of it, I am in favour of it.

Mr. SHARPE (Ontario). If the courts decide we have no jurisdiction, is the hon. member in favour of amending the constitution to have jurisdiction conferred upon this parliament?

Mr. CLARKE (Essex). That is a matter I would have to give attention to. I would say to my hon. friend as has been said on other occasions, that I am not the person charged with the administration. I am in the minority. I was one of those elected on that ticket. I was blamed on the public platform for supporting a man who was alleged to be guilty of all those things, so that my hon. friend (Mr. Sharpe) will have to make his appeal to those in power.

Mr. BEATTIE. Do you consider the marriage of two Roman Catholics by a Protestant minister illegal?

Mr. CLARKE (Essex). I think it is illegal if the laws of the legislature having jurisdiction, say so.

Mr. MACLEAN (York). Then the matter of belief has something to do with it, and belief is introduced into it.

Hon. W. T. WHITE (Minister of Finance). I desire to make some observations upon the subject matter of this Bill, the introduction of which has been the outcome of certain decisions regarding marriage in the province of Quebec, and of the promulgation of what is known as the Ne Temere decree. With regard to the decisions in the province of Quebec, which have been alluded to in this debate, I shall make reference to only two, because they will illustrate the principle that runs through all the decisions which have held that the marriage of two Roman Catholics can only be validly celebrated before a Roman Catholic priest. I shall read the head note in the case of Laramee and Evans, decided in 1880:

LARAMEE VS. EVANS (1880).

1. That in the Roman Catholic Church of which the full, entire and free exercise is recognized by our laws, marriage is a spiritual and religious tie and a sacrament over which the Superior court has no jurisdiction.

2. That our law has not established the civil marriage but that it gives civil effects to religious marriages validly celebrated by curés and ministers regularly according to the rights of their respective churches and authorized to keep registers of baptisms, births, marriages and burials.

3. That the Superior court, where two Roman Catholics have been married by a Protestant minister, has the power to refer to the Roman Catholic Bishop of the diocese of the parties the decision of the question of the validity or nullity of the spiritual and religious tie of their marriage in order that after his decision shall be reported to the Board it may pronounce upon the civil effects resulting from the validity or nullity of such tie.

4. That according to the jurisprudence of the country the sentence of the Roman Catholic Bishop regularly pronounced and deciding as to the validity or nullity of the spiritual and religious tie of marriage between Roman Catholics, can and ought to be recognized by the Superior court.

In the Hebert case, I understand that in the first decision these points were involved and decided:

1. According to the law of Quebec a Protestant minister cannot marry two Roman Catholics.

2. According to the law of Quebec the validity of a marriage contract between two Roman Catholics must be decided by the Roman Catholic ecclesiastical courts and not by the civil courts.

Consequently the marriage of two Catholics before a Protestant Minister is null. What I wish to call attention to in connection with these decisions—true they are in controversy—which may be regarded as the decisions that would carry most weight if the matter came up for adjudication today, is, that the law applies only to the cases of two Roman Catholics, and not to mixed marriages. In that connection, because it will have a bearing upon my argument later on, I desire to read from a pastoral letter issued by Archbishop Bruchési, of Montreal, and quoted by Judge Archibald in one of these cases:

Amongst the invalidating obstacles to marriage established by the Church, one of the most important is that of clandestinity. . . Because of this impediment, in order that a marriage may be valid between two Catholics in the limits where the Council of Trent has been published, the presence of the proper priest and two witnesses are necessary. Consequently, the marriage of two Catholics before a civil officer or a Protestant minister is null.

He is speaking no doubt from the ecclesiastical standpoint.

By virtue of the constitution of the Sovereign Pontiffs there are countries, and the province of Quebec is of the number, where, in spite of the promulgation of the Council of Trent, we are to consider as valid marriages celebrated clandestinely between two parties, one being Catholic, and the other a baptized non-Catholic. The marriage of a Catholic and a baptized Protestant, or vice versa, celebrated before a Protestant minister, although gravely illicit, and calling down the censures of the Church, is, however, a marriage contracted in a valid manner, even in the eyes of the Church itself. Once consummated, this marriage cannot be broken by any earthly power, death, alone rendering liberty to the party surviving. But to judge if one of the parties is really heretical or to declare when a Catholic denying practically his faith, becomes a heretic, especially in that which concerns the sacrament of marriage, this belongs to the ecclesiastical tribunal alone, and the civil power cannot interfere without passing the limits of its jurisdiction, and without usurping a right which Jesus Christ confided alone to his Church.

Now the point I desire to make in that connection is this, that before the promulgation of the Ne Temere decree, a marriage between a Roman Catholic and a Protestant in the province of Quebec was not regarded by the Roman Catholic church as null and void. As regards marriage between two Roman Catholics in that province it was held by those decisions that the decree of the council of Trent would apply by virtue of legislation to which I shall later refer, and that consequently there might be the impediment of clandestinity.

We know that decisions in the province of Quebec on this matter have been the cause of the agitation which has swept over this country, but the Ne Temere decree has been probably the principal cause. I desire, because the decree has not yet been quoted, to read it:

Issued 2nd August, 1907, by the Sacred Congregation of the Council of Rome by the order and with the authority of the Pope and was intended to apply to the whole Church, beginning with the Feast of the Resurrection in 1908.

It recites the provisions of the Council of Trent requiring the presence of the parish priest and witnesses, that changes are required in the law regulating the form of the celebration of marriage, the desire to introduce modifications and the intention to regulate by the decree the discipline regarding marriage for the future.

After enacting that the marriage must be celebrated by the parish priest, the degree proceeds:

1. The above laws are binding on all persons baptized in the Catholic church and on those who have been converted to it from heresy or schism (even when either the latter or the former have fallen away afterwards from the church) whenever they contract 'sponsalia' or marriage with one another.

2. The same laws are binding also on the same Catholics as above, if they contract 'sponsalia' or marriage with non-Catholics, baptized or unbaptized, even after a dispensation has been obtained from the impediment 'mixtæ religionis' or 'disparitatis cultus,' unless the Holy See decree otherwise for some particular place or region.

From the standpoint of the church or ecclesiastical discipline, I understand that the Ne Temere decree is in force in the province of Quebec, but it is not at all clear that it has been given any support by the civil law of Quebec. In other words that decree is not to-day part of the civil law of that province, and I shall show afterwards that it is no part of the civil law of any other part of the Dominion. It is necessary for us, in order that all points involved may be fully considered, to examine the provisions of the Quebec civil code, because there has been a great deal of misconception with regard to it, and one of the uses of a debate such as this is that the country will probably get a more correct knowledge of the facts in connection with this most important matter.

The Civil Code of Quebec was first given statutory effect on August 1, 1866, by the old province of Canada; and when the British North America Act came into effect at the union, the civil code, which was enacted in 1866, continued in the province of Quebec as if the union had not been made, subject to be repealed or altered by the parliament of Canada or the legislature of that province, according to the authority of parliament or the legislature acting within their respective jurisductions. Article 129 reads:

All priests, rectors, ministers and other officers authorized by law to keep registers of acts of civil cases are competent to solemnize marriage.

If that article stood alone it would be perfectly clear that if two parties, no mater what their religion might be, went before a priest, a rector or other minister authorized by law, he would be competent to solemnize their marriage, but there is the paragraph which follows:

But none of the officers thus authorized can be compelled to solemnize a marriage for which any impediment exists according to the doctrine and belief of his religion and the discipline of the church to which he belongs.

Taking those two clauses together, if they stood alone, I should think it clear that if two parties went before a priest, rector or minister and asked that the ceremony of marriage should be performed between them, it was open to such official, to say I object to celebrate this marriage because an impediment exists according to the doctrine of my religion; and they might then go to some other rector or priest and have the marriage ceremony performed. But the decree of the council of Trent, to which reference has been made, was introduced into the civil law of the province of Quebec by article 127, because otherwise it could not have any effect in that province. In other words, the ecclesiastical decree could have no weight or effect unless sanctioned by the civil law. Article 127, which has been held to incorporate the decree of the council of Trent in the Quebec civil code, is as follows:

The other impediments recognized according to the different religious persuasions as resulting from relationship or affinity or from other causes, remain subject to the rules hitherto followed in the different churches and religious communities.

The right likewise of granting dispensation from such impediment appertains, as heretofore, to those who have hitherto enjoyed it.

I ask the House to observe carefully the words : 'The other impediment recognized according to the different religious persuasions as resulting from relationship or affinity or from other causes remains subject to the rule hitherto followed in the different churches and religious communities.' Therefore, it would seem, subject to what I shall say in a moment, that only those rules which were followed prior to August 1, 1866 in the different churches and religious communities, could be held to be incorporated in the civil code which received statutory effect on that day. If that be so, it must follow that, so far as the Quebec civil code is concerned, the Ne Temere decree—which became effective in 1908—did not prescribe any rule that had been hitherto followed in the different churches and religious communities.

With regard to what my hon. friend from Lincoln (Mr. Lancaster) says, and I wish to give full weight to his argument in that respect—I have this to say.

It might be held that these words 'the rules hitherto followed' were the canon rules of the church, and that from time to time these rules might become modified and as modified become part of the statute laws of the province of Quebec. I wish to be fair to my hon. friend. I say that is arguable. I must be frank in the matter: I do not believe that by judicial decision it will be held by that line of reasoning that the Ne Temere decree is incorporated. But I say it is arguable, and it is only fair to say so. Now, among the impediments according to the decisions is the impediment of clandestinity, which is derived from the decree of the Council of Trent. And I shall read that decree, or at least so much of it as affects this argument:

'Those who otherwise than in the presence of the parish priest himself or of another priest acting with the license of the parish priest or of the ordinary and in the presence of two or three witnesses shall attempt to contract matrimony the Holy Synod renders altogether incapable of contracting marriage thus and decrees that contracts of this kind are null and void'.

This decree was not accepted in England. And, to prove that, let me quote authorities. Chief Justice Tindal in Queen vs. Millis, (p. 677) says:

My Lords, I proceed, in the last place, to endeavour to show that the law by which the spiritual courts of the Kingdom have from the earliest time been governed and regulated is not the general canon law of Europe, imported as a body of law into this Kingdom, and governing those courts 'proprio vigore,' but, instead thereof, an ecclesiastical law, of which the general canon law is no doubt the basis, but which has been modified and altered from time to time by the ecclesiastical constitutions of our archbishops and bishops, and by the legislature of the realm, and which has been known from early times by the distinguishing title of the King's Ecclesiastical law.

In the same case Lord Cottenham—p. 875—says:

The civil law, as it has been said was the foundation of the law of marriage in Europe, and that by that law, before the Council of Trent, a contract 'per verba de praesenti' constituted marriage, as it does in Scotland to this day; and that there was no reason to suppose that the marriage law of England was at that time different from the marriage law of other christian countries; but, on the contrary, as the subject of marriage was under the jurisdiction of the Ecclesiastical courts, and as there was an appeal from those courts at Rome, it was to be assumed that the marriage law of this country and of Rome was the same.

Now it is quite certain that civil and canon law never had, as such, any authority in this country; but, in the language of the Statute of 25 Hen. 8, c. 21,' such laws had effect only so far as the Sovereign and people of this realm had taken them at their free liberty, at their own consent, to be used amongst them; and had bound themselves, by long use and custom to the observance of the same. In illustration of which, Blackstone following the example of Sir Matthew Hale, classes the civil and canon law in use in this country as part of the common or unwritten law. And with respect to the appeal to Rome, Blackstone observes, that the Act of Hen. 8, which subjected those who should appeal to Rome to the penalties of 'a praemunire', only punished that which was illegal before.

Lord Brougham —p.720—says:

The Council of Trent required and for the first time required, the marriage to be in the presence of a priest. But of what priest? Of the parish priest. The Council of Trent never was received or acknowledged in England; of which we may at once see the proof in this, that there we have no pretence ever set up, nor any contention, that the parish priest's presence is necessary. But if the Council of Trent never was recognized in England, have we not a right to fall back upon the common and universal law of Europe, as our own in this important matter? Now, that decree is itself the most irrefragable proof of this; for it begins by declaring all past marriages valid without any sacerdotal interposition; and consequently pronounces that the requiring a priest's presence is prospective merely, and an alteration of the former law.

And let me say further that the decree was not accepted in France as being in conflict with the tenets of the Gallican church. But, though it was not accepted in France, there were certain ordinances of the French king or kings, which are said to have given it force and effect. And if so, it is strongly arguable, and, I believe, has been decided by some of the courts in Quebec, that it would thus become a part of the French common law of Quebec before the cession. Now, let us assume that at the cession, the decree of the Council of Trent, was, by virtue of such ordinance or ordinances part of the ecclestical law of French Canada. The question then arises whether the English law which was introduced—the common law and so much of the statute law as was applicable—would supersede the French law. As to that, I pass no opinion. Judges have differed with regard to it. All I am suggesting is that the matter is very much complicated and the decisions are therefore very much in doubt; and until you can get an authoritative decision from the Supreme Court or the Privy Council, it would be very difficult indeed to say what is the law in the province of Quebec so far as this article No. 127 of the code is concerned.

Now, there is no doubt that the decree of the Council of Trent is not in effect and cannot be in effect in the other provinces of Canada. I think the statute of Upper Canada may be taken as being a specimen of the laws of the other provinces. The statutes of Upper Canada were consolidated in 1859; and chapter 72, section 1, provided:

> The ministers and clergymen of every church and religious denomination in Upper Canada, duly ordained or appointed according to the rites and ceremonies of the churches or denominations to which they respectively belong, and resident in Upper Canada, may by virtue of such ordination or appointment, and according to the rites and usages of such churches or denominations respectively, solemnize the ceremony of marriage between any two persons not under a legal disqualification to contract such marriage.

Mr. WHITE (Leeds).

Therefore I think we may quite safely say that it is only in the province of Quebec that the decree of the Council of Trent which I have quoted or the Ne Temere decree can have any civil force and effect whatever.

Now, I take up the question of article 127 of the Code again as to the impediment of clandestinity. That provision of the Code can only be changed by the parliament of Canada or by the legislature of the province of Quebec acting within their respective jurisdiction. If this impediment of clandestinity is an impediment that would be comprehended within the expression 'solemnization of marriage' it can only be removed by the legislature of the province. But if, on the other hand it is an impediment relating to the capacity or status of the parties, it can only be removed by the parliament of Canada.

Now, I want to be fair again to my hon. friend from Lincoln (Mr. Lancaster). As I understand his principal point, for he has many points, it is this: He says the province may have the power to determine the ceremonial under which marriage may be contracted, but he doubts very much the power of a province to say that two Roman Catholics must be married before a priest, or two Protestants must be married before a Protestant minister, or a Protestant and a Roman Catholic must be married either before a Roman Catholic or a Protestant clergyman; in other words, he dwells upon the question of status. The only argument I can see in favour of a possible jurisdiction of the Dominion is on that point. I say the only argument I can see in favour of a possible jurisdiction; because, frankly, I believe that while the words 'solemnization of marriage' are wide enough to include it, and put forward my view with a good deal of hesitation, it is open to my hon. friend to argue that an impediment of that kind virtually, and in substance constitutes a disparity as to religion. That is open to argument, and he has argued it very strongly. Now summarizing the situation, so far as the province of Quebec is concerned, the marriage of two Catholics, according to the latest decision, can only take place validly before the parish priest.

Mr. LANCASTER. Is that right? I am not saying that is not the case, but I ask my hon. friend, should that be so? Should we permit that to be so as a matter of law any longer?

Mr. WHITE (Leeds). I want to argue the matter first from the constitutional standpoint, I want first to develop the argument that the marriage of two Catholics in Quebec can only take place validly, according to recent decision, before the parish priest. There is a doubt as to the validity of the marriage of Catholics contracted otherwise. Now, it is quite possible that if these cases were carried to the Privy Council, it might be held that section 127 would be construed differently from the way it has been construed in the province of Quebec; it is quite possible that it might be held that section 129 alone would apply. But as to that I venture no opinion, because the matter is before the courts. But answering my hon. friend from South Essex (Mr. Clarke), I do not see how we can in any way pass on that case, because, as it has been pointed out, there are other points involved in that case. Not only that, but one of the parties has withdrawn from the case, and may be the Dominion is not in a position to do anything with regard to it. But even if both parties were still determined to go on, I do not know what status this Dominion would have to interfere.

Mr. CLARKE (Essex). It is still going on since one of the parties withdrew.

Mr. WHITE (Leeds). Now, as has been pointed out by the Postmaster General, the code protects the civil rights of the husband, the wife, and the children where the marriage was contracted in good faith; the children are legitimate in the province of Quebec if the marriage was contracted in good faith; notwithstanding the religious impediment, the civil rights of the husband, wife and children are preserved under the provisions of the code. The Ne Temere decree does not apply so far as civil marriage is concerned. With regard to the argument of my hon. friend that rights heretofore referred to in section 127——

Mr. LANCASTER. Not rights but rules, they determine those rights.

Mr. WHITE (Leeds). With the rules hitherto followed, it could be argued still that the canon law might be changed from time to time. Neither the Tridentine, nor the Ne Temere decree applies to the other provinces of Canada.

Mr. CLARKE (South Essex). Has it not been published in the whole of Canada?

Mr. WHITE (Leeds). I think it has, but my hon. friend knows, as I have pointed out, that neither this decree, Ne Temere, nor the decree of the Council of Trent, can have any civil validity in any province unless introduced by statutory enactment. Now, in this case I would like to refer to the decree which exempts Germany from the application of the Ne Temere decree, and I should hope myself that a similar decree will exempt other countries from its operation. However, such a decree has not yet been promulgated. Now, the decree Provida is as follows, and this exempts Germany from the operation of the Ne Temere decree:

Nevertheless, as happens in all human affairs, it has occurred in places, especially in the German empire, that certain grave and inconvenient results were connected with the aforesaid law, due to the lamentable and widespread division in religion and the daily increasing intercourse of Catholics with heretics. Namely, since it was the intention of the fathers of the council that the decree Tametsi would not have binding force until it had been officially promulgated in each parish; since concerning many places it is doubtful whether this promulgation has been made; since it is frequently uncertain the law of the council is likewise obligatory upon non-Catholics dwelling in this or that place; as a result the greatest diversity and dissimilarity of law has arisen in many localities of the German Empire,—wherefore very many and difficult questions have sprung up which have frequently caused perplexity in the minds of judges, a certain irreverance for law among the faithful, and perpetual quarrels and incriminations among non-Catholics.

The decree dated in 1906, declares the validity of mixed marriages contracted without the Tridentine form in Germany, and it may be argued by my hon. friend from Lincoln that it does refer to mixed marriages as contracted without the Tridentine form.

Mr. HUGHES (Victoria). Does my hon. friend say that the Ne Temere decree does not apply to the other provinces outside of Quebec?

Mr. WHITE (Leeds). It applies from the religious standpoint without question, but I say that so far as the civil effects are concerned, it has not been introduced.

Mr. HUGHES (Victoria). Is there any difference between Quebec and the other provinces with regard to that Ne Temere decree?

Mr. WHITE (Leeds). I think not. The Ne Temere decree has force and effect from the ecclesiastical standpoint in the province of Quebec and the other provinces. I have argued that the Ne Temere decree has not yet been given the force of civil law in the province of Quebec, and it certainly has not been given the force of civil law in any other province of Canada. Now the question arises, under these circumstances, what is the wise course for us to pursue? It must be admitted that it is desirable that we should know the facts before we come to any conclusion. But the public outside are not lawyers, they have a broad way of looking at these matters, and a great number of them believe—I think this will be admitted by Roman Catholics and Protestants—that the Ne Temere decree has the force of law in the province of Quebec, and may have force of law in the other provinces. But what we have to deal with is public opinion, and I say it is in the highest degree desirable that any doubts with regard to this matter should be cleared up.

My hon. friend from Lincoln commenced his very able speech this afternoon by calling attention to the fact that the most important thing in connection with this particular matter is the question of doubt.

Mr. LANCASTER. And here is the place to settle it.

Mr. WHITE (Leeds). Doubt as to whether people are married in Quebec or not. I think it is highly desirable, no matter whether the party is a Roman Catholic or Protestant, that there shall be no doubt with regard to the question of marriage.

Mr. LANCASTER. Then pass the Act.

Mr. WHITE (Leeds). It is important that a man should be capable of knowing, within a reasonable time, whether he is validly married or not.

Mr. CARROLL. If the Ne Temere decree has no effect on marriage in Quebec or any other province of Canada why introduce legislation here to overcome it, or why send a stated case to the Privy Council or to any of our courts?

Mr. WHITE (Leeds). I will develop that later on. That is not the point involved in this Bill of my hon. friend from Lincoln. His Bill is to provide for a uniform marriage law throughout the Dominion of Canada.

Mr. LANCASTER. If my hon. friend will pardon me, my Bill does not do that. My Bill says that if a marriage is legally performed without respect to the fact that people of different religion shall have been parties to it, it is valid.

Mr. WHITE (Leeds). And the hon. gentleman wants to make that uniform throughout the Dominion.

Mr. LANCASTER. I want to make it uniform that the religion of the parties shall not enter into the question of the validity of the marriage.

Mr. WHITE (Leeds). Quite so. As I have said the important thing in this is the matter of doubt. Let me argue that point. Supposing we put this law upon the Statute-book; is the doubt resolved? With very great respect to my hon. friend I believe the confusion will grow worse, for this reason: Here, you have the opinion of the previous Minister of Justice, you have the opinion of the present Minister of Justice, you have the opinion of the Prime Minister, you have the opinion of my right hon. friend the leader of the opposition, and if you put that law upon the Statute-book with all these gentlemen and other lawyers, by far the majority of lawyers, I should say in the Dominion of Canada, holding that it is a matter exclusively for the province, do you in any way help to resolve the doubt? I think there is only one answer; you do not help to resolve the doubt. What is the use of leglislation unless it will assist to resolve the doubt? Why translate a Bill into an Act, and put it upon the Statute-book if it does not resolve the doubt, if it does not help out of a difficult situation? As I have said, the people outside are not lawyers, and public opinion will never be satisfied until the highest court in the empire pronounces upon the subject matter of that Bill, and of the other questions which are agitating this country. Therefore, it seems to me that the wisest course possible is the course that has been adopted by the right hon. leader of the government. He says frankly, I believe, that, in his opinion, it is a matter for the provinces to settle for themselves, but there is a doubt about the question of solemnization of marriage, and the Bill of my hon. friend from Lincoln is probably ultra vires of this legislation. That is as I understand it. But, there is a doubt. My hon. friend from Lincoln is a good lawyer. He has argued his case well.

Mr. LANCASTER. I am afraid not tonight.

Mr. WHITE (Leeds). My hon. friend has put up a pretty good legal argument.

Mr. LANCASTER. I am making it on common-sense, not on law.

Mr. WHITE (Leeds). Well, my hon. friend is a pretty good lawyer. My hon. friend holds that this Bill is intra vires, and as a lawyer he holds that strongly. There are others who hold that this Bill is intra vires. They say that while the province may make any regulations with respect to the solemnization of marriage they cannot discriminate between people according to their different religious faiths. If he has that opinion and other lawyers have that opinion, how many people outsides have that opinion? There are thousands of people who have that opinion and there are thousands of people who hold that this matter must be brought to an issue and decided by the highest court. In deference to that situation, and in deference to these opinions, with which we may not agree, but which we must respect, and in deference to the views of the people, is it not the duty of this government to endeavour as speedily as possible to have it determined whether the subject matter of this Bill comes within the jurisdiction of the Dominion parliament?

Mr. LANCASTER. How would that be retarded by passing the Bill and sending it to the Privy Council? Why would then hundreds and thousands of people not be satisfied if this parliament showed a disposition to do its duty?

Mr. WHITE (Leeds). That begs the question. The hon. gentleman's Bill might be held valid in part. It is not proper legislation to enact a Bill of that kind subject to be taken to the Privy Council later for a decision as to its validity.

Mr. LANCASTER. It has been done over and over again here.

Mr. WHITE (Leeds). The hon. gentleman's Bill may be held to be invalid in part or it may be held to be wholly invalid and we want to have an authoritative decision on this matter from the Privy Council. The public want that, and I have seen no valid objection urged against it to-night. Some of my hon. friends have asked the question: Are you going to submit this Bill only? I understood the right hon. leader of the government to say that he will submit this Bill and such other matters as are applicable to this question so as to have a proper decision from the Supreme Court in the Privy Council.

With regard to the B. N. A. Act, section 91 gives the Dominion jurisdiction over marriage and divorce. Section 92 assigns exclusively to the provinces the solemnization of marriage. There is no doubt that sections 91 and 92 give the entire jurisdiction to the Dominion and the provinces, and it is only a question of separation. I have always understood that the Dominion jurisdiction referred to the capacity of the parties.

Mr. LANCASTER. What does my Bill deal with but capacity and status?

Mr. WHITE (Leeds). The Bill assumes that marriages are validly solemnized according to provincial legislation and then it declares that such marriages, if validly performed, are valid. It seems to me clear that the Dominion jurisdiction has to do with the question of capacity; that is to say the Dominion may say a man shall not marry his deceased wife's sister or that A may not marry B. It might create any incapacity so far as marriage is concerned But the question of form of solemnization is left to the exclusive jurisdiction of the provinces. As I said before, it is a point to be argued in connection with this matter as to whether the province has the right to say that two Roman Catholics or two Protestants, or two Methodists, or two Presbyterians shall be married before a certain named clergyman or officer. Personally I think the province has jurisdiction, but I put forth my view with a good deal of hesitation, and I say it is arguable on the part of my hon. friend that that is otherwise and that is why I think, notwithstanding the opinion of the Minister of Justice and the previous Minister of Justice and of the right hon. the Prime Minister and others, it is our duty, notwithstanding that burden of opinion is in favour of the legislative jurisdiction of the province, it is our duty in deference to other opinions which we respect and of public opinion outside, to take this matter to the Privy Council in order that we may have the authoritative pronouncement of the highest tribunal in the empire.

Mr. E. GUSS PORTER (West Hastings). This question is of such importance that no member need apologize for detaining the House while giving an expression of his opinion. I desire to preface my remarks with the statement that I am very strongly and unalterably in favour of the principle advocated by the Bill introduced by my hon. friend from Lincoln (Mr. Lancaster). It is unquestionably true that a very undesirable condition of affairs exists in this country upon the question of marriage. That unsatisfactory condition has arisen owing to the uncertainty as to whether marriages performed in one or another form are legal marriages. If there is one subject more than another in which the people of this country are interested, upon which the society of this country is founded, it is that question of marriage and issue and inheritance, for all three are involved in this matter. Agreeing then that there is that state of uncertainty, is it not the opinion of everyone who has given it any consideration that it is most desirable that that condition of uncertainty should be removed? The object of the legislation introduced by the hon. member for Lincoln (Mr. Lancaster) has in view the removal of the doubt that now exists upon this important question. There would appear to be two ways of solving this question, one by the submission of the abstract question to the Privy Council, to determine the extent of jurisdiction of this parliament in regard to this question, the other would be to pass legislation in this House and allow that legislation to prevail until such time as it should be brought in question. I have considered this question from both those points of view, and I have argued myself into the belief that it would be better for this House to pass legislation and allow that legislation to be questioned if anyone saw fit to do it, and to carry that question to the Privy Council for final determination. I have come to this conclusion because if the case is submitted to the Privy Council in its abstract form it goes there without any expression of opinion from members of this House or from the people of this country. On the other hand, if legislation is passed, and this parliament expresses its opinion on that question, in doing so it expresses the opinion of the people of this country and the question then will go before the Privy Council, if it goes at all, in its strongest possible form. In placing it before the Privy Council in its abstract form, to my mind it goes in its weakest possible form. When that question comes before the Privy Council, if there has been an expression of this parliament upon the question I doubt not but what the Privy Council would feel pressed to give that question much more serious and earnest consideration than if the question went there without an expression of opinion of this parliament. Going there in the abstract form it bears the stamp or seal of this parliament, that parliament is in doubt on the question. Possibly if the House desires legislation of this kind, it would be better to first pass legislation on the question that is submitted than to submit it in an abstract form. While I was not present when the Prime Minister spoke, I gleaned from what was said by the Minister of Finance (Mr. White) that my right hon. friend the Prime Minister was quite willing to submit the Bill introduced by the hon. member for Lincoln (Mr. Lancaster) for consideration by the Privy Council. Is it the intention of the right hon. gentleman to submit the Bill to the Privy Council in order to determine the power of this parliament on that question, the Bill just as it is drafted?

Mr. BORDEN. I have already stated that in speaking on the question before. The thing to be submitted to the Privy Council or to the Supreme Court of Canada first and the Privy Council afterwards is the validity of this Bill, that is to say, the question whether it is within the legislative competence of the parliament of Canada. But I also said that I was quite willing and the government had determined to submit any further questions in addition to that which would be necessary to define clearly the power of parliament to legislate in such matters.

Mr. PORTER. This Bill will be submitted? Then in view of the statement of the Prime Minister it seems to me that this matter resolves itself into a question of procedure, the same object is to be obtained one way or the other, and if the Bill is referred to the Privy Council for its determination of the powers of parliament with regard thereto it seems to me that the hon. member for Lincoln will be getting every advantage that he could possibly get by passing the Bill now and having it submitted in that way. I would like the hon. gentleman to say whether he would regard that as meeting his views in regard to the matter.

Mr. LANCASTER. This is the first moment I have understood from the Prime Minister he was willing to submit this Bill. I certainly did not understand him to say so when he moved the adjournment of the debate. I understood him to say, and that is what the trouble has been about for the last hour, that he is going to submit a series of questions. I object to that because I do not propose to have any one draw questions in academic form that will govern the Bill I have here. I have consulted much more eminent lawyers than I am in preparing the Bill, and I am perfectly satisfied it is good legislation as it reads. Of course you can draw up a lot of questions that a court could give answers to which would be confusing and contradictory and it is this Bill I want submitted to the Privy Council as I have drawn it. I stand by my Bill and not by a lot of academic questions.

Mr. PORTER. In view of the statement made by the hon. gentleman (Mr. Lancaster) there is no issue between us. The Prime Minister says he will refer the Bill and the hon. member wants the Bill referred.

Mr. LANCASTER. I don't want it referred. I say that this parliament should attend to this matter, but the majority of the members on both sides, some by their silence and others by their speech, seem to be of the opinion that this Bill must go to the Privy Council, and every Cabinet Minister who has spoken is so much in doubt that he thinks the same thing. It took me seven years to get a law passed through this House saying that masters and mates of vessels should be British subjects, and I would have kept at it for seventy years, if I lived that long, until I got that declaration. I believe some progress will be made if this Bill is referred to the Privy Council and referred just as fast as possible and a declaration obtained. But, I am satisfied with my Bill, I do not want any reference, but the majority of this House appear to want a reference and I am in their hands. I want progress; hurry up your reference and send the Bill to the Privy Council.

Mr. PORTER. I take the same position as the hon. member (Mr. Lancaster). I am not willing to give way in any degree to the view I hold on this question and I am a supporter of this legislation. Although I would have preferred personally to have the Bill pass this House and go to the Privy Council if need be, yet in view of the full consideration which no doubt the Prime Minister and his colleagues have given the matter I am quite willing to subject my view on this matter to that of the right hon. gentleman. While the hon gentleman (Mr Lancaster) does not desire it, yet he is willing that the Bill should be referred, and I am also willing in view of the circumstances, to have the matter dealt with in that way.

Mr. M. CLARK (Red Deer). I don't think that I would have interfered in this debate but for what appeared to be a very distinct challenge from my hon. friend from Peterborough (Mr. Burnham). He opened by remarking upon the silence of the members from this side of the House and he closed by an appeal to both sides that we should adopt both courses, which seemed to cause some amusement. Well, I understood that one course before the House was to adjourn the debate upon the Bill and the other course was to pass the Bill, and it baffles my poor wit to know how he could follow both courses. Then, I would remark, that the onus of speech upon the Ne Temere question does not rest particularly upon this side of the House. The speaking upon the Ne Temere in the last election was not done by us. It is a remarkable thing, a thing much more remarkable than our silence, that hon. members opposite who do speak upon the question speak very briefly, and be it observed that they are not tumbling over one another's heads to speak at all.

An hon. MEMBER. Go on.

Mr. CLARK (Red Deer). If I were as fond of popular applause as the Minister of Militia my momentary hesitation to proceed might have been because I was waiting for cheers. We have had in the course of this debate a great many appeals to us to approach the subject in a spirit of calm. My hon. friend from Hamilton (Mr. Barker) enjoined upon us the spirit of peace. The Minister of Justice pleaded with us to approach it in a dispassionate mood, but I wonder where the calm and the peace and the dispassionateness were during the last election campaign. The Minister of Finance delivered a speech, the first half of which he delivered very well, when, if I may say so without offence, he was evidently speaking from a carefully prepared brief, but he did not get on quite so well when he came under the cross-examination of the opposing counsel. He said that one of the effects of this debate would be to give a more correct impression to the people upon the subject. It is a wonder to me that the Minister of Finance did not have a desire to convey some of these correct impressions in the province of Ontario before the 21st September. He told us he was of opinion that the Ne Temere decree forsooth has no application to any part of Canada except to the province of Quebec.

Mr. HUGHES (Victoria). No.

Mr. CLARK (Red Deer). Well, I was extremely surprised to hear that because I thought it was very forcibly and very generally applied to the province of Quebec during the last election. I notice that the Minister of Militia takes exception to the words I have attributed to the Minister of Finance.

Mr. HUGHES (Victoria). Will the hon. member permit me?

Mr. CLARK (Red Deer). I would like to point out before I permit anything that when the Minister of Finance spoke these words which I have carefully taken down the Minister of Militia was upstairs taking his dinner.

With regard to what the hon. member for Lincoln (Mr. Lancaster) said, and I wish to give full value to his argument——

Mr. HUGHES (Victoria). I was very particular to ask, if the hon. member will remember—probably he was not cognizant of what was going on—but I asked the Minister of Finance whether he limited the Ne Temere decree to the province of Quebec or any part of the Dominion, and he said that it did not apply to any part of Canada under the civil law.

Mr. CLARK (Red Deer). That is exactly what I said, and the fact that the Minister of Militia (Mr. Hughes) put the question to the Minister of Finance shows, that his impression of what the Minister of Finance said was exactly the same as my own, so that he has proved my case up to the hilt.

I must say that there has been a terrible storm in the teapot in the province of Ontario, if the Minister of Finance is correct in this matter. The Ne Temere decree, he tells us, has no application to the province of Ontario. I wonder that men can be so lost to the sense of dignity and decency as to come in and make statements of that sort when the denunciations of that decree in Ontario during the recent election are so fresh in the minds of every one of us.

Now, I was going to compliment my hon. friend (Mr. Lancaster) upon the fact that he at least had approached this subject with a degree of courage, but I am not at all sure that that courage has not been evaporating very rapidly within the last few minutes. However he has the credit of having made a speech anyhow, and I am willing to compliment him by saying that he has been struggling very hard with his conscience. While other members beside him seem to have found a ready sedative for theirs, he was struggling with his, and delivered a very interesting speech.

But I was absolutely disappointed for once in my life, because of what was missing from the speech of my right hon. friend the leader of the opposition (Sir Wilfrid Laurier). I fully expected that he would have made a solemn declaration in this House that he was not present at the Council of Trent, and that he had nothing whatever to do with the original drafting of the language of the Ne Temere decree. I really think he owed that double denial to some of our Protestant friends in Ontario who, I am perfectly certain, were led to believe that, on both counts of this indictment my right hon. friend was a very guilty party, indeed.

I think, Sir, that there will be profound disappointment in this country on the action of this government on this question. A Presbyterian preacher in this city last night addressed a crowded congregation on the Ne Temere decree, and in his sermon—when I suppose a parson is as solemn as ever he can be at any time—he declared his emphatic confidence that in this session upon which we have entered, the hon. member for Lincoln (Mr. Lancaster) would evoke from the Prime Minister of Canada a statement which would assure the Protestants of Ontario that we had got a government which settled questions. I am perfectly certain that in this, the worthy divine expressed a sentiment widespread throughout the province of Ontario, and if I wanted confirmation of my view in that respect, I am sure I could get it from my hon. friend from Peterborough (Mr. Burnham).

But it is not only in the pulpit, but in the press that expectations with regard to my right hon. friend (Mr. Borden) in this respect have been expressed. I see that the 'Evening Telegram' of Toronto, published in the Mecca of Protestant Conservatism—and we must believe what we see in Tory papers coming from such a source—assured the people of Ontario that on this day we were to learn whether the Rt. Hon. R. L. Borden was the First Minister of a free people, or the puppet of a Theocracy. Well, I am still in the dark on that question. I think there will be great disappointment in the pulpit, and in the press over the experience we have had this last three months. Could they have anticipated this experience, the supporters of our hon. friends opposite would not have raised their expectations so high. On every question of moment the government have no decision to offer but simply inform this parliament that they have put their considering caps on. They have no views about the navy, but are considering what they shall do. Nor have they anything definite to say about the Ne Temere decree, or the Hudson Bay railway. How can the people look for guidance to a government which is continually looking for guidance itself elsewhere. On the question of the navy they are looking for guidance everywhere under the sun. I understand that they intend appealing to the British Admiralty to know what they should do; and on the question of a railway to Hudson bay, they are equally uncertain what to do and are equally groping about in the darkness. I am interested in the tariff question, and on that question neither have they any view, but they are going to create a commission to make their views for them. Why, I appealed to my hon. friend the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Monk), upon such a simple matter as putting the tower clock right, and he referred the case to a couple of officials. What guidance can we expect from a government which keeps the tower clock standing for ten days at seven minutes to twelve? If the government have no light in themselves, how can they give any light on public matters?

Evidently after all this outcry, after all the expectations raised in Ontario, the Ne Temere decree is to be referred to the courts and from the courts to the Privy Council. In the meantime, no doubt, there will be another election, and the people of Ontario will be assured that their children are illegitimate, and that my right hon. friend is responsible.

I paid a great deal of attention to my hon. friend in front of me (Mr. Clarke, Essex), with regard to what is likely to happen as the result of sending this Ne Temere matter to the Privy Council. There is no better lawyer than my hon. friend in this House, and he said that what will happen will be that the question will be shifted and shelved, and that an indefinite period might pass before we got a decision. If that be correct, I can understand why the government are sending it to the Privy Council.

If they could only shelve and shift this question for twenty years, and if there was a chance of thereby holding power not only for all time, but for a portion of eternity, they would so shift and shelve it. They are giving the cue to the Privy Council as to what they want them to do. They are shifting and shelving it by sending it to the Privy Council. Let me tell these hon. gentlemen that that is not what the people of Ontario expected when they voted on almost solid representation in this House for my right hon. friend (Mr. Borden). And he and his friends ought to know that that is not what the people of Ontario expected. I do not see any sign of evaporating courage on the part of my hon. friend from East Hastings (Mr. Northrup); he made a strong, clear and manly statement of his position. And everybody knows that he voices the expectations and sentiments of the people of Ontario in this matter. My right hon. friend the leader of the opposition (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) criticised the leader of the government for want of dignity. I think the people will also criticise him for want of courage in taking the course, upon such a question as this, of simply moving the adjournment of the debate. And now I wish to say just a word more to my hon. friend from Lincoln (Mr. Lancaster), who has greatly shaken my confidence in himself by his later appearance to-day. I want to tell him that the 'Evening Telegram' and the clientéle of that paper have expectations also, and those expectations are expressed in these words:

E. A. Lancaster, M.P., will be guilty of bad patriotism——

That is a frightful charge to bring against a Tory.

——and worse partyism if he allows himself to be bullied or wheedled or coaxed into helping the Borden government to escape an opportunity to face the great question bravely, and settle that question right.

That is the expectation of Ontario as to my hon. friend from Lincoln. I cannot split legal straws with my hon. friend (Mr. Lancaster). I just want to say to him that if he proceeds to stand for his Bill—for I understand there are two propositions before the House—if he proceeds to let it be known, without shuffling and humbugging, or anything of that kind, with the courage which I believed he was possessed of and which the 'Evening Telegram' attributes to him, he will not be without the support of at least one member on this side of the House.

Hon. L. P. PELLETIER (Postmaster General). Mr. Speaker, I will give the hon. member for Red Deer (Mr. Clark) credit for being clever and very witty. But it seems to me his speech has gone far astray from the question before the House. In order to give us a good sample of his wit on the question of the Ne Temere decree, he found it possible to speak of the tower clock and a great many other things which, I think are not issues at the present moment.

Mr. CLARK (Red Deer). They were illustrations.

Mr. PELLETIER. It seems to me that we have before us to-night something very interesting. We have had a discussion on a very important question, one that has occupied the attention of a great many people for several years, but mostly during the last five or six months. Now what is the position that has been taken, and is evidently being taken, by some hon. members in this House. The hon. member for Lincoln (Mr. Lancaster) as every one admits, made a very able argument and put his views before the House and the country in a very energetic and eloquent address. And we have had from the right hon. leader of the opposition (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) his views upon the question. And we have had the views of the hon. member for South Essex (Mr. Clarke). They have both told us that they are absolutely opposed to this Bill. But, though they put forth the view that they are against this Bill, there is as plain as daylight an intention to try to force the House into a position where the Bill would not and could not receive the consideration which it ought to receive if these hon. gentlemen were really earnest in desiring that it should not pass. We are told by the hon. member for Red Deer (Mr. Clark)—and he is one of the most eloquent members on the other side of the House—that this Ne Temere question is one which was used in the elections in the province of Ontario. Hearing the hon. gentleman make that statement, and hearing the members around him pound their desks, one might be inclined to think that nothing was discussed in the province of Ontario in the recent election but this Ne Temere decree.

Mr. LENNOX. We never heard it.

Mr. PELLETIER. Well, Sir, I was led to understand—of course, I may be wrong—that there were several important questions discussed in the province of Ontario and throughout the Dominion before the 21st of September last. And I understood that the province of Ontario like the other provinces of the Dominion declared that it wanted to maintain British connections and to keep unbroken the British tie. I understood that there was another big question discussed on the hustings in the nine provinces of the confederation and that this question had been settled on the 21st of September last. Now we are told—and told with an object in view—that nothing was discussed but the Ne Temere. Well, since the debate has taken that shape, I wish to tell the House that while my hon. friends complain so much about the fact that here and there there might have been a question about the Ne Temere decree in the province of Ontario, the saintly gentleman who complained here to-night and the hon. member for Red Deer (Mr. Clark) who told us that the right hon. the leader of the opposition should have declared that he was not a member of the Council of Trent, let me tell them that in my own province there was something else than reciprocity discussed. And there would not have been on the other side of the House half-a-dozen members elected from the province of Québec had not the people of that province been told that they must vote for the late government because the Prime Minister was a Catholic and a French Canadian.

Mr. WILSON (Laval). Mention the place.

Mr. PELLETIER. The hour is too late to begin that to-night. I should have to name every township, every parish, every hamlet in the province of Quebec.

Mr. DEVLIN. It was not mentioned, to my knowledge, in the county of Wright.

Mr. PELLETIER. From the beginning to the last day of the slection, what were we confronted with? Men came to us and said: You should try and make it clear that the question at issue now is not one between Catholics and Protestants, is not the fact that there are Tories and Orangemen in the province of Ontario. The hon. member for Wright says it was not mentioned in his riding. Why, Sir, take the Liberal papers in the province of Quebec, take 'Le Canada' of Montreal, take 'Le Soleil' of Quebec, what have they been living upon during the last 15 years? Crying out in the ears of the people of Quebec, 'Look at Sam Hughes, the Orangeman'; and other members of this House have been held up before the good people of the province of Quebec, and in my own county, as men to be afraid of. We were asked: Is it true that you are going to Ottawa to associate with people who want to destroy the Catholic religion and the French language in this province? My right hon. friend the leader of the opposition knows that himself.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. No, I do not.

Mr. PELLETIER. Well, if he does not know that he does not know much. What did we see here to-night? We saw an attempt, an open attempt, by members on the opposite side of the House so to steer this question as to put this government and the Conservative party in a bad position. That can be plainly seen. We could see the disappointment of my hon. friend from Red Deer (Mr. Clark), because one of our friends on this side of the House had made a suggestion that the member for Lincoln seemed to be inclined to accept. Did you notice then, Mr. Speaker, the disappointment of the hon. member for Red Deer? Why, Sir, our hon. friends opposite fancied for a few moments that they were back in power. They are going to be disappointed.

Now, I want to make a few remarks which I think I am bound to make. I am not speaking here as a Catholic nor as a member of any religion; I am taking my stand on this question as a Canadian. There seems to be an impression in the different provinces, perhaps our French Liberal papers in Quebec are responsible for it, that an attempt is being made to set race against race and religion against religion. I am bound to say that I regret that this question, in some quarters—fortunately not among the members of this House who realize the great mission that has been confided to them by the electors of this country—has been unwisely discussed. I have seen it stated in some of the newspapers that the Ne Temere decree must be taken up and settled in parliament, because we in the province of Quebec are a priest-ridden people, that a foreign bishop makes laws for us, and because those laws have been read from the pulpits in our province, they therefore become the laws of the province. I want to tell the people of the nine provinces of this Confederation that whilst we may, Catholics and Protestants, adore God in a different manner, that whilst we may go to different churches, we are all British subjects, and we make our own laws in Quebec. There are two lives which every Canadian leads, one is his private life and the other is his public life. His religion belongs to himself, that is a sacred thing. We have seen religious wars, we have seen discussions on religion and people taking up arms about religion. Why? Because people believe that everything in their own religion is all right.

Let everybody believe what he likes, and what he thinks right. We are strong in our religious beliefs, and why? Because we have learned them from our mother's knee, from our mothers, the sweetest effort of God's creation. We have imbibed our religious beliefs with the milk which we have found near their hearts, and that is probably the reason why Protestants and Catholics in this country differ on so many questions. But although we may differ on religious questions there are points on which we can agree. There is one point on which we can all agree, and that is that when a question like the one before the House comes up for discussion and decision, although we may look at it from different points of view, we are glad that the constitution of this country has provided for a higher court, a higher tribunal, in the Privy Council of England, where we can carry this question to the foot of the Throne and have it definitely decided. I am a Roman Catholic and a French Canadian, and I am not going to ask that this question should be decided by a Roman Catholic priest or a Roman Catholic bishop. I am prepared as a British subject to carry this question to the foot of the Throne and lay it before His Majesty, and I do not think there ought to be one man in this House on either side who should object to the question being settled in that way by the Privy Council. Everybody in this country who is a British subject and who understands his duty will bow with submission to the judgment of the highest court of the empire. A good deal of uncertainty has been created in the public mind by some of the remarks that have fallen from hon. gentlemen opposite. My hon. friend the Minister of Finance, who made a speech so eloquent and so forcible —and I beg him to accept my sincere congratulations— has tried to clear the atmosphere of some of the doubts which have surrounded this question, and he has performed a noble and patriotic duty. Some hon. members have criticised his remarks, and have said: Why, this is a strange thing, we are now told that the Ne Temere decree is not in force in any of the nine provinces of Canada. Sir, the Ne Temere decree has no civil effect in this country, and I know whereof I speak. No one of the Roman Catholic hierarchy pretends for a moment that the Ne Temere decree has any civil or legal effect in Canada. The right hon. the leader of the opposition has said so very frankly and very loyally. My hon. friend agrees with what has been said by my hon. friend the Minister of Finance.

Mr. MACDONALD. The Minister of Finance agreed with him.

Mr. PELLETIER. Well, it is all right; I am prepared to put it in that way. Let us have this question settled and let us not have any other hon. gentleman sitting behind my right hon. friend come and tell my hon. friend the Minister of Finance that he is wrong when he agrees with the right hon. leader of the opposition. The Ne Temere decree, like the Council of Trent, is a pronouncement made by the Catholic church, just like a pronouncement made by the head of the Anglican church, by the Presbyteries and Synods of the different religious bodies in Canada—even by the Orangemen. They pass laws and, if I am not mistaken, they tell me that it is forbidden in the Orange order for an Orangeman to marry a Catholic girl. If the Orange order says that, if the Presbyterian church says that, and if the Methodist church says that, are you surprised that the pope is of a different opinion? Let us have some give and take about this. Let us give to all religious beliefs the right to say as they are all saying, that they may make certain rules from the point of view of their own church that do not bind people who do not belong to that church. Such rules do not bind so far as the civil law of any country is concerned. That seems to me as clear as it is possible for any man to make it. I have here a quotation from the 'Tablet,' the organ of the Roman Catholic Archbishop of Westminster and an authority on Catholicism. What do I find on this question of the Ne Temere decree?

The decree speaks only of canonical nullity or validity of marriages; that is the nullity or validity in the judgement of the Catholic Church and in the sight of God. The Catholic Church, though she does not acknowledge that the state has any right to determine what marriages shall be null or valid, has no power to change the civil law of marriage.

That is an authoritative statement.

Therefore, nowithstanding the recent decree, if two persons of any religion whatever, against whose marrying there is no legal impediment (that is no civil impediment according to the law of England), marry each other in England according to the requirement of the English law, their marriage is (and such marriage will continue to be) in law, valid and binding, whether a priest or other minister of religion be present or not.

This is the universal opinion of all the Catholics of this country. The Roman Catholic church does not pretend to impose its views on different religious beliefs or different religions. It is preposterous to say that, and I hope and trust that before long, if there are any people in this country who still believe that to be the case, they will come to a better knowledge and understanding of the whole position. I have read with some interest a question which was put in the British House of Commons on this very subject last summer when things were at fever heat. The question was put to the government and I have here the answer which the government gave.

An hon. MEMBER. Who asked the question?

Mr. PELLETIER. I do not know who asked the question. I thought that was not very important if I had the answer.

Mr. Birrell (a minister of the British government) said 'The law knows nothing of papal marriage legislation. We believe that under it, our Catholic fellow men are not so free as we to marry and divorce and marry again. Our courts will continue to administer our own law, and all who apply for its benefits shall have them. It has lost none of its efficiency since August 2, 1907.

That is the answer that was given. I read the other day a statement in a paper over which appeared these headings:

MARRIAGE IS VALID .

Famous Case in which Papal Decree was Invoked.

In this case the judge declared that the Ne Temere decree did not apply in Ireland.

Mr. WILSON (Laval). Why go to the Privy Council after arguing for five or ten minutes like the hon. gentleman has, that the Pope and the whole hierarchy of the church have declared that this Ne Temere decree does not interfere with our civil rights?

Mr. PELLETIER. My hon. friend is a very brilliant lawyer in Montreal but he is absolutely astray with regard to the question he has put. The question that is going to be referred to the Privy Council is not whether the Ne Temere decree is of civil effect, but whether a certain Bill proposed by my hon. friend from Lincoln (Mr. Lancaster) is constitutional or within the powers of this parliament.

Mr. PROULX. If my hon. friend (Mr. Pelletier) thinks that it is only a canonical decree and has no effect in civil law, why pass an Act such as the hon. member for Lincoln proposes?

Mr. PELLETIER. I am showing that there is some misapprehension of opinion between eminent lawyers like my hon. friend from Lincoln on the one side and some hon. gentlemen on the other, and so many doubts have arisen that this Bill has been proposed. It is evident that there is doubt since some lawyers are of one opinion and others of another opinion. So we shall refer the question to the Privy Council and have it threshed out. I suppose my hon. friend will understand and appreciate my answer. I think it is our bounden duty at the present moment not only to thresh out this question and to try to have the decision of the Privy Council, but to try and remove all causes of possible friction between different classes of citizens in this Canada of ours.

If some Canadians belonging to certain religious beliefs think that another religion or some other Canadians entertaining or having some other religious beliefs are encroaching on their rights, the sooner we dispel this idea the better for the future of this country and of confederation. I was surprised when I saw that and I asked myself: What kind of a lawyer have they in Ireland who has gone before the Courts of Justice there and pretended that the Ne Temere decree could be a bugbear. It seems to me that is some trick—

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. That was not the question. You speak of the case of Usher and Usher.

Mr. PELLETIER. A landlord called Usher.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. The case was before the court, the validity of the marriage was attacked because the requirements of the Ne Temere decree had not been observed, in that only one witness was present, instead of two.

Mr. PELLETIER. The marriage had not taken place according to the requirements of the Catholic religion. We hear a great deal about the protection of women. I believe in protecting the women, and I believe the children of this country should have a standing. But what do we see in this case? We see a gentleman, a landlord named Usher, a Galway landlord who went over and wanted to be married at 11 o'clock in the evening to a housemaid; apparently he could not wait. There was one child issue of the marriage, and when that landlord, who had thought fit to put his landlordism at the feet of his housemaid, after some months thought he would throw her into the street as an outcast, wanted to have the marriage dissolved, it was not dissolved, and it serves him right.

I would not like anybody in this country or in this House to believe that the Ne Temere decree would have any such effect as this landlord desired. As I said, I am not authorized to speak for any religion here, but I think we are all Christians, we are Protestants, Presbyterians, Methodists, Catholics, but we are all Christians, and there is one thing on which we shall agree: that is that before the Christian era women did not occupy the high position which they have occupied since the beginning of the Christian era. Since that glorious time, all Christians have paid to women the respect taught to us by the one common Lord and Saviour whom we all adore, although in different ways and in different churches. I do not want anybody to believe that the Roman Catholic religion wants to make outcasts of poor women and to make illegitimate the children of those whose marriage has been declared null. There is, as has been declared by the Minister of Finance, an article in our Civil Code which says that even when marriages are declared null they produce all their civil effects as between husband and wife and as far as children are concerned. The Catholic church does not want to dissolve marriages.

Mr. CLARKE (Essex). What is the effect of the dissolution under the law?

Mr. PELLETIER. The effect is the marriage though annulled produces all its civil effects. The chidren are legitimate and the husband still bound to support his wife. I think all Christian religions are on the same footing, we are all opposed to clandestine marriages. We try and put as many obstacles in the way of clandestine marriages as possible.

Two Catholics who go to a Protestant minister, if they think they ought to go are at liberty to do so. and we respect their opinion. But why do they go there? Very often in order to make a clandestine marriage. If they do not marry before their priest they have some reason for that, and we have found, I have seen many cases of young girls who were married in this way, the clergyman who performed the marriage ceremony had the marriage license all right, he was within his rights, he was doing his duty, but sometimes marriage licenses are obtained by improper means. The result is that we see in the papers very often that the father of a boy or a girl goes after the young groom or bride as quickly as possible to bring him or her back home. It is in order to avoid things like that that these decrees have been issued by the Catholic religion. The object is good, it is very good, and it is one which members of all religions have always upheld, that marriage should be public and celebrated openly so as to prevent any possible mistake and, as much as possible, bigamy.

Mr. CLARKE (Essex). I do not think my hon. friend understood my question. I understood him to say that notwithstanding the dissolution of a marriage it does not affect the legitimacy of the children or their rights of property. I asked what, under these decisions, was the effect of dissolving the marriage.

Mr. PELLETIER. Nor civil effect. The religious is dissolved, but the legal mutual obligations remain. This is as far as two Catholics are concerned. As has been shown in one stated case to-night, it has never been pretended and is not now, that mixed marriages, that is a marriage between a Roman Catholic and a Protestant, are invalid, they are perfectly valid and legal and are considered as such by the Roman Catholic church itself.

Mr. HUGHES (Victoria). Both civil and sacramental?

Mr. PELLETIER. Yes, both civil and sacramental. The mixed marriage is ill-advised, it should not take place, but it is legal. The question is only as to a marriage between two Catholics before a non-Catholic clergyman. These are considered null by the Catholic church. Let me now quote the text of Article 163 of our civil code. It will show that we are a civilized people in Quebec.

A marriage although declared null, produces civil effects, as well with regard to the husband and wife as with regard to the children, if contracted in good faith.

Mr. SINCLAIR. Take the Hébert case, where both husband and wife are Roman Catholics, and are married by a Protestant clergyman. Assuming that the court will decide that marriage is invalid, and that the final court of appeal decides that, will the children be regarded as legitimate?

Mr. PELLETIER. Certainly.

Mr. SINCLAIR. And will the wife have all her civil rights notwithstanding that decision?

Mr. PELLETIER. Certainly.

Mr. SINCLAIR. Will the husband still be compelled to support her?

Mr. PELLETIER. Certainly.

Mr. HUGHES (Kings, P.E.I.). If the Ne Temere does not affect the civil law of any province in Canada, does not affect marriages of Protestants or mixed marriages, where is the need of this Bill? Why vex our souls and give us all this trouble.

Mr. PELLETIER. That question has been put to me once already since I rose. I have answered it and I do not propose to answer it again. I shall ask my hon. friend to read it from 'Hansard' to-morrow.

I wish to refer briefly to the question of mixed marriages. As the Minister of Finance has stated mixed marriages are valid both under the civil and the religious law. The Catholic church says they are ill advised and should not be entered into, and the Westminster Confession of Faith say the same thing, so that that great religious body, the Presbyterian church, and the Catholic church agree on that point. I wish to relate an historical fact which should be known throughout the length and breadth of this country and which will conclusively prove the point I wish to make. The Council of Trent which sat in the 17th century, declared that both mixed marriages and marriages between two Catholics would be null if they were not contracted in the presence of the parish priest. Neither this nor any other part of the Trent decree became part of the law of France, ipso facto. Henry III, Henry IV, Louis XIII, Louis XIV published ordinances from time to time incorporating, not the whole of the Trent decree, but some parts of it, in the law of France as it stood when this country became part of the British Empire. One year after that period, in 1764, there was published in Canada what is known as the Benedictine decree issued by Pope Benedict XIV on November 4, 1741. It was extended to Canada by Clement XIII in 1764, one year after the Treaty of Paris. The effect of that decree of Pope Benedict was to exempt Canada from the operation of the Trent decree, as far as mixed marriages were concerned. That is important to bear in mind, so that our Protestant friends may know that there is no pretension on the part of anybody that mixed marriages are at all affected, because the Pope himself has declared that they should not and this issue is therefore settled both from the civil and religious point of view. This is the condition of affairs which existed before the 2nd of April, 1908. The Ne Temere Decree now forbids from a Catholic religious point of view only mixed marriages before a non-Catholic clergyman, but this is a matter which affects only Catholics and their conscience. It has not civil effect, and does not affect those who are non-Catholics. As 'The Tablet' puts it, the Catholic church has no power to change the civil law of marriage. The impediments to marriage which were in force on the first of August, 1866, continue to exist, but those created after do not come under article 125 of our Civil Code, which speaks only of impediments hitherto existing. Let me point out that that important historical document the Westminster Confession of Faith contains practically the same prohibition against mixed marriages as is contained in the Ne Temere decree. It says:

Chap. XXIV., article III.—'It is lawful for all sorts of people to marry who are able with judgment to give their consent; yet it is the duty of Christians to marry only in the Lord. And, therefore, such as profess the true reformed religion should not marry with infidels, Papists or other idolators.

The first part of this article says exactly what the Catholic church says, namely: that mixed marriages are lawful but ill-advised. Replace in that sentence the words 'Papists and other idolators,' by the words 'and non-Catholics,' and you have the whole thing. Then this Presbyterian document says:

The practical result of such marriages is either a domestic life embittered in the way described above, or the growth of an indifference, commendable in the eyes of such as Mr. Lecky, but in the view of all evangelical spirits, most deplorable. Observation may convince any one of the truth of the words of Thomas Adams: 'One religion matching with another not seldom breeds an atheist, one of no religion at all.'

I am not going to call this a Protestant Ne Temere decree, but it is the faith which the Presbyterians believe, and we Catholics simply believe the same thing. In conclusion I wish to draw the attention of the House to a few facts which I consider important. I think it was my hon. friend (Mr. Lancaster) who said that one of the fathers of confederation held that parliament had power to pass such legislation as that now before us. The Conference at Quebec in 1863 and 1864 discussed the various articles which later became the British North America Act, and the fathers of confederation delegated Mr. Langevin, afterwards Sir Hector Langevin, to speak for them on this very question. And he used this language:

Well, amongst these right are all the civil laws of Lower Canada, and among these latter those which relate to marriage; now it was of the highest importance that it should be so under the proposed system, and therefore the members from Lower Canada at the conference, took great care to obtain the reservation to the local government of this important right, and in consenting to allow the word 'marriage' after the word 'divorce,' the delegates have not proposed to take away with one hand from the local legislature what they had reserved to it by the other. So that the word 'marriage' placed where it is among the powers of the central parliament, has not the extended signification which was sought to be given to it by the honourable member. With the view of being more explicit, I now propose to read how the word marriage is proposed to be understood.

When Sir Hector Langevin spoke he had the manuscript in his hand, prepared with the approval of all his colleagues, men like Sir John Macdonald, the Hon. George Brown, Mr. D'Arcy McGee, Mr. Galt, Mr. Chapais; all the great men who sat around the board where the confederation plan was discussed, and he said:

The word marriage has been placed in the draft of the proposed constitution to invest the federal parliament with the right of declaring what marriages shall be held and deemed to be valid throughout the whole extent of the confederacy, without, however, interfering in any particular with the doctrines or rights of the religious creeds to which the contracting parties may belong.

After this declaration was made, one of the great men of that day, Sir A. A. Dorion, rose from his seat and said there was nothing but the word of Mr. Langevin to guarantee to us that the laws of Lower Canada were not going to be affected and he used these words:

I can well understand what is meant by the regulation of the law of divorce; but what is meant by the regulation of the marriage question? Is the general government to be at liberty to set aside all that we have been in the habit of doing in Lower Canada in this respect? Will the general government have the power to determine the degree of relationship and the age beyond which persons may marry, as well as the consent which will be required to make the marriage valid? If so, it will have the power to upset one of the most important portions of our civil code and one affecting more than any other all classes of society.

Then Sir Hector Langevin repeated his declaration. He told Sir Antoine Dorion that the declaration had been carefully prepared beforehand, and was going to be the law. Now what do we find, and this is something which every Canadian should know. The articles of confederation, as adopted in 1864, did not contain the words 'the solemnization of marriage' which are, we now find, in the British North America Act. The words 'marriage and divorce' were in those articles, but the words of section 92 were not to be found in them. After the remarks made by Sir Antoine Dorion, and after Sir Hector Langevin's rejoinder, when those gentlemen went to London they caused those words to be inserted in the British North America Act. I am giving arguments in order that the public may understand both sides of the question. We have been given the opinion of Mr. Blake. What did Mr. Blake tell us in 1880?

> We cannot provide as to banns dispensations or licenses, preliminary to the solemnization of marriage. The right to legislate on this subject lies with the local legislature.

My right hon. friend, the leader of the opposition, will admit that this argument goes very far to show that there are very strong opinions on both sides, and that is the object I had in making these quotations. They show that there was much doubt in the minds of certain people—not in mine—and that is why this matter should be referred to the Privy Council. So far as I am concerned I have not the least doubt that this Bill cannot be dealt with by this parliament. It is ultra vires and it is a matter which ought to be dealt with by the provincial legislatures.

The Hon. David Mills, who was Minister of Justice in the right hon. gentleman's government, said:

> The form in which marriages are to be solemnized is beyond our authority and therefore it is a question which we ought not to deal with.

The late Sir John Macdonald said the same thing. Mr. Justice Girouard, who proposed the bill to legalize marriage with a deceased wife's sister, expressed a different opinion. But he said that in view of the opinion expressed by Sir John Macdonald and Mr. Blake and Mr. Mills, he yielded to their better judgment and consented to strike from the Bill the dispensation clause which was in it when it was presented to the House.

This discussion will have an important effect. In the first place it will remove a great many doubts and misapprehensions which have heretofore existed. It will prevent religious discussions which are always to be regretted, because they always leave some bitterness behind. In my opinion, the government has done wisely in endeavouring to have the opinion of the highest court in the land before allowing the enacting of any statute. When we have that opinion we shall know whether the hon. member for Lincoln (Mr. Lancaster), or the Minister of Justice (Mr. Doherty), is right, and I do not see any reason in the meantime why we should not go on and work together as Canadians, Protestants and Catholics combined, for the benefit of this country. That is our bounden duty. And when the majority of this House has removed this question, temporarily at least, from discussion, I hope that the newspapers will follow suit, and that everybody will be content to wait until we have a decision from the Privy Council, and know where we stand.

Mr. E. M. MACDONALD (Pictou). The importance of this Bill is the only apology I have to make for venturing to address the House at this late hour. In common with most gentlemen on both sides, I always listen with interest to the Postmaster General (Mr. Pelletier). He is a distinct addition to the party with which he is connected—eloquent, ingenious and an adept at flag waving and restoring the spirits of those surrounding him when they are feeling a little depressed. But I am sorry that he did not make the speech he has just given us a little earlier in the evening when the clouds were hovering around and before the sweet voice and the fine Italian hand of the Minister of the Interior (Mr. Rogers) had exerted their influence. Had he done so, I do not know whether his remarks would have been received with that enthusiasm which has greeted them. When he indulged in his reference to the province of Quebec in the last election and told us there was no question of a navy or anything else, nothing but the personality of the right hon. gentleman who leads the government—

Mr. PELLETIER. I did not say that.

Mr. MACDONALD. My hon. friend spoke with such vehemence that he led us to believe nothing else was said, that nothing was said about boring holes in the British flag, and that the only subject broached was the personality of the right hon. the First Minister.

My hon. friend complained about this Ne Temere decree having been introduced as an issue in our politics. He has not been long in this House. It is unfortunate for him and his aspirations for Canadian patriotism, that he was not here during the last session of parliament, because if he had been, and were moved by the same aspirations as those to which he has given utterance to-night, he would have been behind the man who was Minister of Justice in the late government. Who are those who raised the question about the Ne Temere decree or the marriage laws?

They were certainly not members of the Liberal party, but I recollect occasions on which hon. gentlemen opposite got up and wanted to know from the late Minister of Justice (Sir Allen Aylesworth) and the late government just what they were going to do about this Ne Temere decree. Not long ago I had the privilege of attending a curlers' banquet in Halifax and heard a distinguished member of the Presbyterian church tell us, as a proof of the great qualities of the race to which we belong, that although there was no Scotchman or Presbyterian in the cabinet, no Presbyterian had said anything about it.

But at last we have found a champion in the person of the Postmaster General (Mr. Pelletier). Not only did he undertake to speak for the doctors of the church with which he is connected, but he also told us what the Presbyterians thought about this matter. I do not know, after such a speech, but that we could rely on him in future to look after all our rights in this matter whatever they may be. But when I find him following the lead of his leader (Mr. Borden) of the Minister of Justice (Mr. Doherty), and the Minister of Finance (Mr. White, Leeds)—all of whom follow the lead of our Minister of Justice (Sir Allen Aylesworth) and our leader (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) in their views upon this question—it may be that his high aspirations will be rewarded, and that he will go not so very far wrong upon this question? Who were the men who introduced this question into the politics of this country? Last session when the previous government was in power, man after man on the Conservative side wanted to know what the government intended to do about this question. The gentleman to whose seat in this House the Minister of Finance succeeded and who was translated to another sphere, again and again, in pathetic tones which every one who sat in the last parliament knew so well, lamented the terrible fate hanging over this people as a result of this nefarious decree which the late government, he complained, would not do a single thing to stop. Was the Minister of Militia (Mr. Hughes, Victoria) disturbed upon the question. The hon. member (Mr. Lancaster) who introduced this Bill seems to have altogether forgotten his comrade the Minister of Militia——

Mr. LANCASTER. I mentioned him this afternoon. I never forget him; he is an old friend.

Mr. HUGHES (Victoria). We march shoulder to shoulder.

Mr. MACDONALD. If they are shoulder to shoulder, they are now beating a retreat and behind a leader who has taken the very opposite view from that with which they started out. Let us see where the Minister of Militia was on this question in the last parliament. My hon. friend from Lincoln seemed to forget him——

Mr. LANCASTER. I quoted him.

Mr. MACDONALD. Did the hon. gentleman qucte the whole thing? Here is the answer given by Sir Allen Aylesworth to the question put by the present Minister of Militia:

3. Under the British North America Act the subject of marriage and divorce is one in regard to which parliament may legislate but everything to the solemnization of marriage in the provinces is within the exclusive powers of the provincial legislature.

As to be remaining questions, other than question No. 7. Legislation of the character indicated in the questions would appear to refer wholly to the persons by whom, or the form of the ceremony by which, marriages in any province could be validly solemnized, and in that view such legislation would seem not competent for the parliament of Canada to enact.

Now, let us see what was the query of the Minister of Militia. Take this for a sample question—and I commend it to my Presbyterian friend the Postmaster General (Mr. Pelletier); it shows what his colleague the Minister of Militia was worrying about. Here is what the present Minister of Militia (Mr. Hughes, Victoria) asked:

6. Is it the intention of the government of Canada to declare valid a marriage solemnized in Quebec or in any province of Canada between two persons of the Roman Catholic faith, providing the officiating clergyman be a Protestant, and for the removal of doubt to make the law retroactive?

7. Is it the intention of the government of Canada to permit any ecclesiastical dogma or rule to override the laws of the people of Canada?

8. Is it the intention of the government of Canada to restore to legitimacy every woman who supposed her marriage legally consummated and also the children born of such marriage?

9. Will the government enact legislation compelling alimony to the woman where the man has left her under the ecclesiastical dogma of any church?

And Sir Allen Aylesworth, then Minister of Justice, declared that the dealing with these matters did not rest within the purview of the Dominion parliament but with the provincial legislature.

Mr LANCASTER. No. he did not. He evaded the question, he never answered it distinctly.

Mr. MACDONALD. I hope the hon. gentleman (Mr. Lancaster), if the rules of the House will permit him, will rise and declare that he does not agree with the opinion of his leader (Mr. Borden) or that of the Minister of Justice (Mr. Doherty).

Mr. LANCASTER. If the hon. gentleman (Mr. Macdonald) will permit me, that is not the point on which I contradicted him. I say again that Sir Allen Aylesworth never said distinctly that there was jurisdiction in the provincial legislature. He evaded that point on every occasion.

Mr. MACDONALD. The hon. member (Mr. Lancaster) in introducing the Bill, made an argument, which from his own standpoint was very effective. But he admitted frankly that he was a prejudiced Tory. And, as such he had to get a crack at somebody on this side, and particularly at Sir Allen Aylesworth. This is what was the latter said in answer to the question of the present Minister of Militia:

> Legislation of the character indicated in the questions would appear to refer wholly to the persons by whom, or the form of the ceremony by which, marriages in any province could be validly solemnized, and in that view such legislation would seem not competent for the parliament of Canada to enact.

Is not that clear?

Mr. LANCASTER. I do not wish to embarrass the hon. member (Mr. Macdonald), but I would point out to him that when counsel says in answer to a question, 'It appears to me that a certain view is expressed and on the basis of that view my opinion is so and so,' that is not a positive opinion. Sir Allen Aylesworth knew what he was being asked but he took care to evade the question.

Mr. MACDONALD. In the statement of the hon. gentleman's leader to-night, that hon. gentleman said categorically that he agreed with the opinion of Sir Allen Aylesworth. And the Finance Minister who went into this historically and most elaborately, and with an apparent assiduity and interest upon which he is to be complimented, declared that he followed the same views. The followers of the late government, following their Minister of Justice declared that this question was not within the purview of this parliament and that they did not propose to legislate upon it.

Mr. HUGHES (Victoria). Which question?

Mr. MACDONALD. The question which my hon. friend (Mr. Hughes, Victoria) submitted.

Mr. HUGHES (Victoria). But that is not the question brought before the House by the hon. member (Mr. Lancaster).

Mr. MACDONALD. It is practically the same. My hon. friend the Minister of Militia was not present for a great part of the speech of the hon. gentleman (Mr. Lancaster) or he would have known that he discussed the question which the hon. gentleman asked and which I have already quoted. If his Bill means anything, it means dealing with the situation which the present Minister of Militia attempted to call to the attention of Sir Allen Aylesworth as Minister of Justice. And what was the position at the close of the last parliament? The Liberals stood by the opinion of the Liberal Minister of Justice and we went to the country on that.

Mr. HUGHES (Victoria). You went to the country on reciprocity.

Mr. MACDONALD. On that and on our whole record.

Mr. HUGHES (Victoria). A bad record.

Mr. MACDONALD. One thing is sure, and that is that the Minister of Militia is not worrying about this question as he did last session. He is nicely seated in the Department of Militia and 'does not care whether school keeps or not.' But my hon. friend from Lincoln (Mr. Lancaster) is evidently vexed in regard to this question. It was evident that he felt the question ought to be dealt with. Any one who reads the press of Ontario or follows the utterances of its pulpit, knows that as a result of the representations made, this question attracts a great deal of attention and that as a result of those representations there is a demand that this parliament shall act. But in view of all the facts it is evident that the former Minister of Justice was not far wrong in his opinion. On the 30th of November a question was put in which these questions by the present Minister of Militia were quoted and the following was asked:—

> Does the government agree with the opinion expressed by Sir Allen Aylesworth? If not, what are the reasons?

In reply to the third question the leader of the government said, 'The matter has not been under consideration.' Apparently the leader of the government had no opinion on this question on November 30. The soul of my hon. friend from Peterborough (Mr. Burnham) in that same debate was vexed about the disregard of this question by the late government.

His leader on November 30 had no opinion on this question. The member for Lincoln (Mr. Lancaster) follows a leader, who told us that on November 30th he had no opinion on the question at all.

Mr. LANCASTER. My Bill was in the hands of the clerk before the House met, on the 15th of November.

Mr. MACDONALD. Then the member for Lincoln had an opinion on this question when his leader had not?

Mr. LANCASTER. Yes, and was not afraid to declare it.

Mr. HUGHES (Victoria). What is the opinion of the member for Pictou?

Mr. MACDONALD. I have the same opinion on the legal question as Sir Allen Aylesworth. Let us trace the history of this government on this question. The Postmaster General was complaining about this question being interjected into the politics of the country, while the hon. member for Peterborough (Mr. Burnham) complained that nobody on the Liberal side was saying anything. The member for Lincoln introduced his Bill, and the leader of the government, after thinking it over, finds that Sir Allen Aylesworth was right. The Minister of Justice has thought about it, and he finds that Sir Allen Aylesworth was right. The Minister of Finance finds he was right, and the Postmaster General finds he was right. And yet these doughty gentlemen have been telling their friends that they were going to be bold on this question, and act in a decisive manner. They have failed to do anything, they are trying to evade responsibility by referring the question to the courts. Why, Sir, the leader of the government knows that the most unsatisfactory decisions that have ever come from the Privy Council have been made upon academic questions submitted in the form this one will be. The Privy Council has given us decision after decision which is most difficult of interpretation and application. Who can tell us what is the relative power of this federal government and the relative powers of the provincial legislatures in regard to the question of temperance, for instance? Take the decision of the Privy Council in regard to fisheries and the rights on foreshores. Every lawyer who has studied those questions knows that the relative powers of the provincial and federal governments are as difficult as ever of interpretation. The Toronto 'Telegram said on Saturday night that the hon. member for Lincoln would not be deterred by any specious arguments, but he was going to stand by his guns, and it called upon the leader of the government to stand up and go straight ahead. How dissapointed those gentlemen will be when they find out how this government evaded the question, sending it to the courts where it will take two or three years to decide, and then we will have a decision which no one will be able to understand. We have no positive declaration from the leader of the government that he will introduce a Bill if the Privy Council should declare that the federal government have jurisdiction. We would like to know just where the government stands with regard to that situation. The member for Lincoln complained that the leader of the government had not even stated in his first speech that he was prepared to submit the Bill he had introduced for the consideration of the courts. The leader of the government says that he did say so, but the member for Lincoln declared he was not satisfied with simply submitting a copy of the Bill, but he wanted to have a Bill passed into legislation in order that it might go in that form before the Privy Council.

Mr. MACDONALD.

Mr. LANCASTER. I never said anything of the kind. I wanted the Bill itself to go to the Privy Council, and not an academic question. I made that clear twice.

Mr. MACDONALD. I accept my hon. friend's statement, but let the unrevised 'Hansard' be read to-morrow. My hon. friend from Hastings (Mr. Porter), who made a very diplomatic speech, apparently by arrangement, declared that he had argued himself into the position that it was absolutely necessary in order to have a proper decision, that a Bill passed by this House should be sent home for the opinion of the Privy Council. The sudden collapse of that gentleman when his leader intimated that he was going to accept the Bill of the member for Lincoln without any deliberation by the House upon its details, was an interesting spectacle. Both he and the member for Lincoln ignominiously retreated. They have disobeyed the injunctions of the Toronto 'Telegram' and the pulpits of Ontario, and have capitulated to the evasive policy of the leader of the government. For myself, I am absolutely opposed to the settlement of a question of such importance by submitting an academic question to the courts. My experience as a member of the bar for twenty years has convinced me that the submission of academic questions to the Supreme Court and the Privy Council has not given satisfactory results, but have resulted in decisions which are most difficult in their application. Let there be no misunderstanding; the leader of the government and his whole following have retreated, and taken cover behind Sir Allen Aylesworth. They had not the pluck he had shown to stand by their opinions. Then the Minister of the Interior, with a fine Italian hand, performed some magic feats of which the House does not know the details, but perhaps they will be disclosed in due time. which has caused a change to come over some hon. gentlemen opposite who were very valiant earlier in the day. Mr. Speaker, we oppose this proposition upon the grounds that the government have once more evaded their plain duty, and have determined to do nothing in order to avoid responsibility.

Mr. J. W. EDWARDS (Frontenac). I am impressed with the conviction that this is one of the most important questions that has come before this parliament for many a day. There is no doubt that it is a question primarily to be decided by men of legal training.

I have listened with a great deal of interest to the debate so far, and I know I cannot add anything to what has been said from the constitutional and legal standpoints. I shall, therefore, not attempt to.

I wish to state most emphatically that the impression which the great political comedian from Red Deer, endeavoured to convey to the House this evening that the Ne Temere decree was the only subject for discussion in the province of Ontario in the last election is absolutely incorrect. In the county that I have the honour to re present, the question was never mentioned on any platform, nor was it mentioned by me in my canvass to one single individual. It is very true that there was a certain amount of doubt in the minds of the people of Ontario in regard to this very question, and there are many reasons why they should doubt hon. gentlemen opposite, but the doubt was not in regard to this question alone. The people of Ontario doubted the honesty of hon. gentlemen opposite, and we have only to look over the record of their government to see that that doubt was justified. They had a right to doubt them on this question, and they have reason to recall the position taken by the right hon. leader of the opposition (Sir Wilfrid Laurier), with regard to the Manitoba school question in 1896, and to contrast it with the position which the right hon. gentlemen took at the formation of the provinces of Alberta and Saskatchewan. There were strong reasons why the people of Ontario should doubt the right hon. gentleman and his colleagues on the other side of the House. I could go to a considerable length as the hon. member for Pictou (Mr. Macdonald), did a while ago, I could go on for fifteen or twenty minutes and, like him, add nothing to the debate on this question. Every person in this House knew before the hon. gentleman had spoken at all precisely what his concluding sentence would be. Every person was aware of the position he would take. On a question which is of such importance as this, which has been looked into and studied so carefully by many hon. gentlemen, it seems that the only position left for a person who is not a lawyer, and, therefore, not competent to discuss it from the legal standpoint, is simply to express his opinion in regard to the principle involved, and that is all I rose to do. I want to place on record that in my opinion the principle involved in this Bill that there should be a uniform marriage law throughout the Dominion of Canada is one which is in the interest of the people, and one with which I agree. That is my reason for rising, and I shall not detain the House any further than to say that I felt I could best indicate my approval of the principle involved by expressing my approval of the Bill introduced by my hon. friend from Lincoln (Mr. Lancaster).

House divided on the amendment (Mr. Borden).

Amendment (Mr. Borden) agreed to and debate adjourned.

Mr. HENDERSON. A few moments before the division was called I had agreed to pair with the hon. member for Gloucester (Mr. Turgeon). As I had done so I remained in the Chamber. Had I voted I would have voted for the amendment.

Mr. ROSS. The hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Maclean) has not voted.

Mr. MACLEAN (Halifax). I am paired with the hon. member for Queens and Shelburne (Mr. McCurdy). Otherwise I would have voted against the amendment.

Mr. BORDEN moved the adjournment of the House.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. What business will be taken up to-morrow?

Mr. BORDEN. Bills, except the Grain Bill, then Supply, beginning with Public Works.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. The hon. member for Assiniboia (Mr. Turriff) will bring up the question of the duty collected on lumber, which was brought up some time ago.

Motion agreed to, and House adjourned at 2.02 a.m. Tuesday.

HOUSE OF COMMONS.

TUESDAY, January 23, 1912.

The SPEAKER took the Chair at Three o'clock.

VACANCY IN SOUTH RENFREW.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. Before the orders of the day are called, I wish to ask my right hon. friend the Prime Minister if the writ for South Renfrew has been issued?

ELECTION EXPENSES IN TEMISCOUATA.

Mr. GAUVREAU. I wished to ask a question of the hon. the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Burrell), who unfortunately is not now in his seat. I would, therefore, ask the Prime Minister if he will be good enough to take note of a complaint that has come to me that the expenses for the election in Temiscouata have not yet been paid to the deputy returning officer. I would like to know why.

Mr. BORDEN. In the absence of the Minister of Agriculture I am not able to give the information which the hon. gentleman has asked. But I shall direct the attention of the Minister of Agriculture to the question, and request him to give the information at the earliest possible moment.

THE TOWER CLOCK.

Mr. MONK. I would like to say for the information of the House that I have finally been able to reach the man who has charge of the parliamentary clock. He is suffering from a severe cold. According to his report, the clock has stopped in consequence of the peculiar climate which we are now experiencing and which occurs almost every year. Dampness has formed on the movements, particularly the outside hands of the clock, and they become so charged with frost that it is impossible to remove it without danger to the clock itself and to the building. It is necessary, therefore, to wait until a thaw releases the machinery.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. Hear, hear.

Mr. MONK. I may say to my right hon. friend that the clock stopped on Friday night last while the House had under consideration the estimates for Public Works. I do not know whether there was any relation between the stoppage of the clock and the consideration of those estimates. As we are going to resume the consideration of those estimates, perhaps hon. members will bear in mind the coincidence that brought about the stoppage of the clock.

HARBOUR COMMISSIONERS OF MONTREAL.

Mr LEMIEUX. If I am in order, may I ask the Minister of Marine and Fisheries if any decision has been made as regards the Harbour Commissioners of Montreal? I saw the other day a question on the Order Paper put by the hon. member for St. Antoine (Mr. Ames), to which no answer was given, that I am aware of. But since then, on Saturday evening or Friday evening, a political meeting was held in Montreal where a resolution was adopted praying for the dismissal of the said Harbour Commissioners. Yesterday a meeting of the Board of Trade took place in Montreal, and a resolution was passed unanimously endorsing the stand taken by the Minister of Marine and Fisheries, and praying for the retention of those Harbour Commissioners.

Mr. SPEAKER. I would remind the hon. gentleman of the rule which prohibits discussing a question on the order paper before it is reached. The notice of that question is still on the order paper.

CAR SHORTAGE IN THE WEST.

Mr. BUCHANAN. Before the orders of the day are called, I would like to draw the attention of the government to the very serious car shortage which exists in the southern part of the province of Alberta. The attention of the government has been drawn to the car shortage in other parts of western Canada during this session, but I think this is the first time a shortage of this kind has been felt in the province of Alberta, from which I come.

Mr. SPEAKER. Does the hon. member intend to start a discussion, or does he simply require to ask a question? To discuss the question would be out of order at this stage.

Mr. BORDEN. The hon. gentleman will have an opportunity when the House is moved into Committee of Supply.

Mr. BUCHANAN. I will take the matter up on going into Supply.

QUEBEC HARBOUR COMMISSION.

Mr. HAZEN. moved the third reading of Bill (No. 31) to amend the Quebec Harbour Commissioners Act 1899.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. Since we had this Bill before us, I have again read the observations of my hon. friend the minister in charge of the Bill when moving the second reading, and when we were in Committee of the Whole. The only reason I could find why my hon. friend has taken the course to abolish the present Harbour Commission of Quebec and to substitute a new one, is that the same thing was done in Montreal a few years ago. I cannot find that any other reason was given. If I correctly apprehended the cheer that was given by the Postmaster General (Mr. Pelletier), the reason was a political one, that it was done in Montreal, therefore it should be done in Quebec. The Harbour Commission in Montreal has certainly done excellent service, and nothing but praise can be said of it. But my hon. friend knows that the conditions are not at all parallel in Quebec and in Montreal. In Montreal the chief reason why the former Harbour Commission was suppressed and the present one appointed, was that it was found that on account of the magnitude of the works which were going on at that time in the harbour of Montreal, and must go on for several years to come, the old commission was found not to afford a satisfactory mode of carrying on those works. The Harbour Commissioners of Montreal are spending millions of dollars every year, out of the revenues of the harbour, for the improvement of the harbour. No such conditions at all exist in Quebec. I wish it were otherwise, I wish we could do as much for the harbour of Quebec, and that the commissioners in Quebec had as much money to dispose of as the Montreal Harbour Commissioners. Unfortunately such is not the position today, though I hope that in the near future this may come. Therefore, I do not see why the Quebec Commission should be treated in the same way as the former commission in Montreal.

There is one thing as to which my hon. friend has been absolutely silent; that is to say, what is to be the remuneration of the harbour commissioners. The harbour commissioners of Montreal are pretty largely and generously rewarded, although their remuneration is not too much, as I think the money has been earned, but are we to understand that the harbour commissioners of Quebec are going to be remunerated upon the same scale as the harbour commissioners in Montreal, or has this matter been taken into consideration at all? I do not propose to oppose the Bill. Since the government has made up its mind there will be no use in prolonging the discussion, but I would like to know what is the intention of my hon. friend upon this point.

Mr. HAZEN. In reply to my right hon. friend (Sir Wilfrid Laurier), I have very little more to add to what I said to the House when the second reading of this Bill was being considered. It is thought desirable, in the first place, by the Quebec Board of Trade, a body which, I am informed, represents very largely indeed the business interests and the best business thought of Quebec, that it would be in the interest of that port and of the country generally if a smaller commission than the one which now exists, were provided for by legislation and I fancy that, to some extent, the members of the board were influenced in the direction of this idea by the fact that the harbour commission of Montreal, consisting of three members, has proved so much more satisfactory than the larger body whose place it took. Since the discussion occurred in the House several weeks ago the matter was reported in the newspapers and there was every opportunity for any one who wishes to oppose this Bill, or who was not in favour of its provisions, to make his representations known. Not a single representation against it, however, has been made to me by any one in the city of Quebec; on the contrary, representations have been made to me not only by people living in the city of Quebec, who are in touch with the business life of the city, but by people living on the other shore of the River St. Lawrence, approving of the change, and expressing the belief that more effective work will be done by a smaller commission. It is true, as has been pointed out by my right hon. friend, the leader of the opposition, that the conditions in Quebec are somewhat different from those in Montreal. In Montreal there is an enormous expansion of the trade of that port going on every year, and it is quite evident that for a great many years to come there will have to be very large expenditures at that port if facilities for handling the traffic are going to keep pace with the traffic that will undoubtedly go there during the season of open navigation. It is also certain that with the development of the country, and with the building of new lines of railway, some of which are in course of construction, there will be a large development of business also at Quebec, that it will not all be confined to the port of Montreal, but that the ancient capital of Canada will receive its share, and will attain to that position of commercial importance, and supremacy which it is so desirable it should occupy. It is felt, in anticipation of that business, that it is desirable that the harbour board should be reorganized and an organization affected that will be able to deal effectively with the traffic as the harbour board of Montreal are dealing with the traffic at that port.

With regard to what my right hon. friend said on the subject of remuneration, I might say that it would seem to me that it would not be justifiable to pay the harbour commissioners of Quebec, at the present time, any such sum as has been paid to the harbour commissioners of Montreal, because the business to be done in Montreal is so much greater in volume, and importance, and demands a greater proportion of the time of the commission. What the Governor in Council will endeavour to do, I presume, will be to fix a sum that will be a fair remuneration for the position, having regard to the responsibility and the amount of work that is involved on the part of the commissioners. These things will all be considered before the remuneration is fixed.

Mr. PELLETIER. Mr. Speaker, I may perhaps be allowed to say a few words in answer to the remarks made by my right hon. friend the leader of the opposition (Sir Wilfrid Laurier). My right hon. friend seemed to find fault because the government is reducing from nine to three the number of the members of the Board of Harbour Commissioners in Quebec, and one of the reasons which was given is that there is much less work to do in Quebec than in Montreal. It seems to me that if there is much less work to do in Quebec than in Montreal there is no reason why we should have nine men to do less work in Quebec than three in Montreal. I am sure that will appeal to my right hon. friend.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. Far from it. Everybody's business is nobody's business.

Mr. PELLETIER. In so far as that goes, I think what my hon. friend the Minister of Marine and Fisheries (Mr. Hazen) has just said is a complete justification of the move which has resulted in the Bill now before the House. My right hon. friend seems to think that there is very little to do in Quebec. Well, I hope there will be much doing in Quebec. I think that Quebec is one of the national ports of this country and that it should be taken care of in a proper way. I think that, as the Minister of Marine and Fisheries has just said, with the completion of certain railways, if this country is going to ship its grain and have its export trade going through Canadian ports, as every true Canadian should wish and desire, the time has come to equip our national harbours and to see that we should have, as members of the different harbour boards all over the Dominion a body of men who will feel that it is their duty to try and take up this question and accomplish the good results which are expected from them. I fully hope and expect that before long the port of Quebec will be taken care of as it should be, and I hope and trust that my right hon. friend will be one of the first to help us in that matter, and to see that the equipment of the port is properly handled and taken care of. At this point I think we should have, intead of nine men attending to their own business, going once in a while to attend a meeting of the harbour board and getting $5 or $10 for being present, three men who would make it their business to attend to the matters of the port and not go to the meetings only occasionally. That is the great difficulty which we have had to contend with in the past. I can understand that it is with some reluctance that my right hon. friend sees this harbour board going. He has kept it there in spite of numerous requests which came to him when he was Prime Minister of this country. He received request after request demand after demand. He never considered that it was his duty to accede to these demands, but they were so unanimous that we thought we should recognize them and give the people there what they want. The other day, when this Bill was up for its second reading, my right hon. friend told us that we knew that the Quebec Board of Trade had passed a unanimous resolution year after year, but that the board of trade at Levis had not passed any such resolution. I did not like to contradict my right hon. friend on this point, because I had not the facts before me, but now I am in a position to tell him that he has been misinformed on this question and that this very morning my hon. friend the Minister of Marine and Fisheries and myself received a deputation composed of the mayor of Levis and the president of the board of trade, who, by the way, is one of my right hon. friend's most faithful supporters and party friends, and they told us that they also had requested the government to make this change. Mr. Auger told us, as president of the board of trade, that this change was welcomed not only in Quebec but in Lévis. We are doing what the population demand, we are complying with the demand of trade at that port, and I do not see why we should be blamed for it. What harm is there? What have these nine men done? My right hon. friend will admit that they have not done much. They are full of vigor but they have their own business to attend to and they have not accomplished much for the port of Quebec.

I am not blaming them; they were worthy citizens; they meant well; but they did not consider it an important part of their duty as citizens. Now, we propose to make it their special duty to attend to the business of the port, and I hope and trust that before long the capital of the province of Quebec will take its place as a national port, and we want three good men who will look after it as such in the interest of the whole of Canada. That is the stand we have taken, and I think that in a couple of years, if not before, my right hon. friend will admit that we have done a good thing.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the third time and passed.

THIRD READING.

Bill (No. 66), respecting the Public Archives.—Mr. Borden.

INDEMNITY TO MEMBERS.

Bill (No. 75), to amend the Senate and House of Commons Act (Mr. Doherty) read the second time, and House went into committee thereon.

On section 1—attendance for part of session,

Mr. DOHERTY. The only modification effected in the existing law is by the insertion of the word 'sitting' in the twelfth line of the section before the word 'day'. The evil sought to be remedied by the insertion of that word is that under the law as it now stands a gentleman who is appointed to the Senate or elected to this House during a session finds himself subjected to a deduction from his indemnity, of $15, not only for each sitting day that he is absent during the period in which he is a member, but for every day that elapses during the session, before his appointment and in the same way a gentleman who ceases to be a member of either House during the session finds himself subjected to a deduction of $15 for every day that elapses after he so ceases, whether the House sits upon that day or not.

Bill reported, read the third time and passed.

SUPPLY—SHORTAGE OF CARS IN THE WEST.

Mr. WHITE (Leeds) moved that the House go into Committee of Supply.

Mr. W. A. BUCHANAN (Medicine Hat). Mr. Speaker, before the House goes into Committee of Supply, I would like to bring up the matter of the car shortage in the province of Alberta, and to ask the government to take some action immediately to assist the farmers in that section of the country to get relief from the Canadian Pacific Railway Company, the only railway at the present time in that part of the country, and the only railway against which complaint is made. I would like to quote from the Lethbridge 'Daily Herald' of Friday last, which enumerates the conditions at several points in southern Alberta, in order to impress upon the government the very serious nature of this car shortage. The conditions this year in southern Alberta, as in the rest of western Canada, were unusual. The harvesting was very late, and then the snow came, so that the threshing was delayed, and the farmers have been able to get their grain threshed only during periods of fine weather, which have not been very frequent during the last three or four months. But now, when the farmers have great quantities of grain for shipment, it is impossible for them to get the cars from the railway company, and they are unable to get any money, or sell their grain. The situation is very serious, as the following statements show:

Place.	Cars on order.	Condition of Elevators.	Estimated Crop, Bush.	Amount shipped.	Car Supply during last Month.
Granum.....	400	Filled up.....	1,000,000	250,000	2 or 3 cars in last 2 weeks.
Claresholm..	250	Filled up.....	1,750,000	350,000	Practically none—no Market.
Warner.....	50	Full not crowded...	600,000	Less than half....	Getting a few.
Barons.....	480	Filled up	1,000,000	250,000	4 or 5 in two weeks.
Carmangay.	100	Filled up	1,500,000	Almost 1,000,000	Not a car for last month.
Taber	300	All full..... ...	1,000,000	300,000	What cars are unloaded.
Cardston....	Few.	Plenty of room.....	1,250,000	Probably half.....	Getting all they want.
Sterling	100	Almost full..... ..	1,000,000	About one-third...	3 or 4 a week.
Magrath....	75	Filled up.....	1,000,000	Less than one-third	Practically none.
Coaldale....	25	Filled up.....	500,000	Over half.....	One once in a while.

I think that that is a very serious charge to be made against any railway, particularly in western Canada, namely, that they were unable to supply sufficient cars. These figures have been gathered by the secretary of the Associated Board of Trade of Southern Alberta from Boards of Trade in these respective points, so that they are practically official figures from commercial organizations. Those places on the line of the Alberta Railway and Irrigation Company, running south from Lethbridge, and owned and operated by the Canadian Pacific Railway Company are in a better position than the other points mentioned. I would like to quote also the statement made by Mr. J. A. Cummings, president of the Granum Board of Trade, in his report to the Associated Boards of Trade of Southern Alberta, in which he says:

J. A. Cumming, president of Granum Board of Trade, says that grain could hardly be given away there. Four hundred cars on order; less than half the crop marketed; outlook serious. At the last general meeting of the board of trade a resolution was unanimously passed, protesting against existing conditions of the car supply, and the resolution forwarded to the district superintendent of the Canadian Pacific railway at Calgary, asking for relief.

I would like to point out in this connection that the Canadian Pacific Railway Company must have realized, from the commencement of the present season, that there was sure to be a great demand for cars in western Canada, especially in the provinces of Saskatchewan and Alberta, at an unusual time, because there was a delay in the harvesting of the crop and in the threshing of the grain and consequently the farmers would have to be shipping grain at periods of the year at which they were not accustomed to ship to such an extent. The company has been negligent of the people of western Canada especially of southern Alberta, which relies wholly on the Canadian Pacific railway for its transportation service. I would therefore urge on the government to use every effort to relieve the situation and to urge on the Canadian Pacific Railway Company that they put forth every effort to relieve the needs of the farmers of southern Alberta.

Mr. BUCHANAN.

Hon. GEO. E. FOSTER (Minister of Trade and Commerce). Mr. Speaker, the hon. member for Medicine Hat has drawn attention certainly to a very important phase of a very difficult question, namely, the condition of things in the northwest, but I am bound to say that he has done it with great fairness, and no fault could be found at all as to either the manner or the matter of the presentation he has made. He was fair enough to state what is known by all, that the present year has been a very exceptional one. The lateness of the harvest, the coal difficulty, the weather and other things less important have all combined, with the large output of grain, to make the situation more difficult than in other years. I have no disposition at all to call in question the figures which my hon. friend has read. I assume them to be correct. Of course, the newspaper, I suppose, was occupied in emphasizing the difficulty, but in the department we get some letters of a brighter character from points where the blockade has been broken and where cars have been fairly well supplied, and where conditions are much better and are rapidly ameliorating. It is, however, true that, owing to all these things which have been mentioned, there has been a serious condition of congestion in the whole of the Northwest, especially west of the province of Manitoba. I think the railways have done all they could under the circumstances. I am led to think so, not only from representations which have been made by the railways themselves, but from representations from perfectly unbiased sources as a result of examinations which have been made.

I want to read just a few figures which I happen to have in my desk. If I had known that my hon. friend was going to bring up this matter, I could have given him fuller information; but these figures will at least show another side of the case. The number of cars inspected in the western inspection division up to the end of December in 1901-2 was 30,458. Leaving several years out of account, we find that in the same period in 1906-7 the number was 34,855; in 1907-8, 35,827; in 1908-9, 59,816; in 1909-10, 69,748; in 1910-11, 59,124; in 1911-12, 83,001. Thus in a season, which was practically one month shorter than the preceding one, the number of cars inspected was very satisfactory, namely, 83,000 as compared with 59,000 during the entire season of last year.

When we come to the number of cars hauled by the different railways, the figures are also interesting. By the Canadian Pacific railway in 1908-9, 36,512; in 1909-10, 41,987; in 1910-11, 35,036; in 1911-12, 44,857; —in a period of time shorter than in the preceding year.

The figures for the other railways run in about the same proportion. They all seem to have moved more cars of grain during the period alluded to in 1911-12 than in any preceding year. The total of cars moved, as I have stated, was 83,001, an increase over 1910-11 of 23,877. That shows that comparatively the railways have been much more active, and have moved more grain during the three months or less ending on 31st December last, than during the longer period of nearly four months in preceding years. However, even that has not enabled them to take away the farmers' crop or ease the interior elevators to any very large extent. The general word that comes from the west is that the elevators are nearly up to their capacity so far as storage is concerned. Some of them are full, most of them are very nearly full, and this is true of the elevators clear down to Fort William and Port Arthur, where the storage capacity of nearly 32,000,000 bushels is now almost filled up.

Another fact to be considered this year is that owing to the increased number of grades, each of which must be stored separately, large elevators are prevented from storing as many bushels of grain as they could in former years.

As to means of relief, something has been done. I took it upon myself to ask the representatives of the three great railways to meet here in Ottawa three weeks or a month ago when this matter became very urgent, and as a result of their conferences, application has been made to the Interstate Commerce Commission in the United States for leave to file grain rates from the northwest down to Minneapolis and Duluth, and so ease the pressure in the congested districts by taking the grain away from more western areas down towards the south.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. Divert it to the south?

Mr. FOSTER (Toronto). Down toward the south, they could not take it towards the north yet as the Hudson Bay railway is not yet completed and so we were deprived of that northern exit, and had to seek a southern exit. The Interstate Commerce Commission did not seem to see the necessity for waiving their 30 days' notice, but they have been brought to see the necessity and the notice has been waived. To-day the Canadian Pacific railway is taking grain out by the southern route as rapidly as it can find cars and, what is still greater gain, it is utilizing foreign cars for that purpose. Other railways are doing the same.

One condition of special hardship this year seems to arise from the fact that a great quantity of the grain to which my hon. friend alluded which has been late threshed, or which is even now being threshed from time to time, being mixed with snow and ice and, therefore, being damp, must be treated in hospital elevators or must be dried in elevators before the warm weather sets in or, as I am informed, it is liable to become a total loss. That is the kind of grain which is being taken out now for treatment in the elevators in Minneapolis and Duluth. I may say, too, that the railways lowered their rate for wheat, making the rate to Duluth or Minneapolis the same as to Fort William and Port Arthur. In all these ways, therefore, everything has been done that could have been done to relieve the congestion, but still there is a vast quantity of grain in the northwest and the whole moral of the story is that further avenues of outlet or further storage facilities or both will have to be provided. Farmers in the east are used from old time to the necessity for providing storage for their grains and the produce of their farms. The grain growers in the northwest never have been in the habit of doing that, their desire being to transfer the grain as rapidly as possible from the field when it is threshed to the car or elevator and rid themselves of any further handling of it. So it results in the northwest grain traffic much as in the city of Toronto or Montreal when everybody wants to get home at 6 o'clock, and the cars are too crowded to hold them. Everybody wants to harvest his grain within two or three months, and a great deal of it within 3 or 4 weeks, and it is very difficult to provide the grain carriers necessary to do that.

I do not think that I can give my hon. friend any further information than this. There is a duty somewhere, and I hope we will all be able to find out what share belongs to us in carrying out the duty, there is a duty somewhere to provide for the ever-increasing crops of the northwest which are seeking an outlet now mainly towards the east, but which, by and by, to a large and increasing degree will, I think, seek an outlet towards the west. When the Hudson Bay railway is in operation and carrying facilities in connection with it are provided, that will be an additional outlet. Meanwhile, as I have said, there is suffering and there is trouble.

Another thing of which the railways complain, and any business man looking at it from a business standpoint sees the difficulty, is that the railways are not free in distributing their own cars. Owing to a certain condition of things legislation was had in this country some five or six years ago which took away from the railways their full liberty of distribution of cars. Now that distribution, as the House well knows, is conditioned by the terms of the Act, and it becomes bothersome and cumbersome and extremely uneconomical at times. I think some relief will have to be found with reference to the matter of car distribution. The Grain Bill of which notice has been given, and which will be before the House actively after the first of next week, will take up a number of these matters, and we will be able to discuss them at that time.

NOVA SCOTIA APPLES.

Mr. D. D. McKENZIE (North Cape Breton). Mr. Speaker, I beg to call attention to a matter reported in the public press in regard to one of the large industries of Nova Scotia. I refer to the growing of apples and fruit. Within the last week the fruit growers association held a meeting at Wolfville, Nova Scotia, and I see in a newspaper published in Nova Scotia the startling headline:

WESTERN APPLE MARKET LOST TO NOVA SCOTIA.

W. W. Moore tells Fruit Growers that the Apples sent to the Canadian West were Dishonestly Packed—Government will be asked to place Duty on American Fruit.

The apple growing industry is certainly one of the great industries of the province of Nova Scotia; and it has not by any means been developed to its capacity. It is too bad that a black eye should be given to it by reason of bad packing or improper handling of the fruit. Let me read a part of the discussion that took place:

Tuesday's evening session was devoted to 'The Commercial End of the Apple Business,' and the first speaker was W. W. Moore, of Ottawa, who took for his subject, 'Transportation and Markets.'

His figures were very interesting, and surprised many in the audience, when he stated that up to January 12, the total export from the province to British, foreign and home markets, amounted to 1,420,657 barrels. The only year previous which came anywhere near this record was in 1909-10, when the mark reached was 711,000 barrels. Speaking of each market individually, Mr. Moore said that this year Nova Scotia apples had won a high place and were now recognized as something to be reckoned with. The German market, practically unknown before, might, in time, become very important, and he explained the climatic situations, tariff, &c., and further said that apples sent to that market must be packed in boxes and be extra fine in quality and appearance.

The western market came in for a fair share of attention. He regretted that the opportunity of establishing a market there was not only badly hurt but practically gone, and, in fact, it might be said that the business had received a black eye,—due to the fact that the apples sent west were dishonestly packed. It will take many years to eliminate this impression. Our apples are not as well packed as in Ontario, and not as carefully graded. The barrel used here is not as attractive as the one used in Ontario, and many figures were quoted to substantiate this. Box packing is highly recommended, especially for Gravensteins. They were too fine apples for barrels, as they could not be packed tight enough to stand a long journey. The barrel he considered the best package for the majority of apples, but for the finest apples he considered the box the best.

That discussion took place on the 27th inst. On the following day, certain resolutions were passed which I wish to bring to the notice of the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Burrell):

First—'Whereas, the system of inspecting apples in the province of Nova Scotia which has been in practice for the past few years, mainly at the port of shipment is not entirely satisfactory, inasmuch as it is only possible to inspect a very small percentage of the apples at the ship and then many shipments are made through other channels, where they escape inspection;

'And whereas under the present Fruit Marks Act, the inspectors are not authorized to inspect open packages;

'Therefore, resolved, that the Nova Scotia Fruit Growers Association now in session respectfully request the Dominion government to have made such changes in the Fruit Marks Act as well as provide for a more thorough system of inspection at the packing houses, ports of shipment and elsewhere, including open packages, when or where advisable—and also to issue certificate of inspection when circumstances and conditions warrant doing so.'

This resolution, regarding the proposed change in fruit inspection, was carried unanimously. The second resolution was:

'Whereas, the Dominion Act regulating the size of apple barrels is not being complied with in the fruit districts of the province;

'And, whereas it is important that all barrels containing apples should be fully up to the standard required by the Act;

'Therefore, be it resolved that the department to which it may belong be requested to add to the duties of apple inspector, the inspection of the barrel as well in which the apples are packed;

'And also that the Act be so amended so that it will require all coopers who manufacture barrels in which apples are packed and offered for sale to brand their name and address on the side of each barrel made by them, ,and also making such manufacturer of barrels subject to a fine of twenty-five cents for each barrel so made by them not complying with the Act.'

Now, as a Nova Scotian and deeply interested in the development of the fruit growing of that province, I bring the matter as promptly as possible to the notice of the government so that steps may be taken to prevent even the owners of the fruit themselves from behaving in such a careless manner as to do injustice to this magnificent export trade of Nova Scotia.

Mr. MARTIN BURRELL (Minister of Agriculture). My hon. friend from Cape Breton (Mr. McKenzie) has outlined a rather comprehensive scheme, but one which, I assure him, the government and especially the Department of Agriculture, will take into careful consideration. I am somewhat familiar with the conditions that prevail in this province, sufficiently so to be aware of the rapid strides that the fruit growing industry has taken in Nova Scotia. And I congratulate my Nova Scotian friend upon the magnificent crop they produced last season, the larger portion of which goes to swell the export trade of Great Britain. Some points raised by the reports to which my hon. friend has referred may not be suitable for discussion at this moment, being of a more or less technical nature. But, in passing, I might say that the operation of the Fruits Mark Act has certainly done an immense deal of good to the fruit growing industry of the Dominion, not only in Nova Scotia but elsewhere; and. so far as I am concerned, I am only too glad to render the most sympathetic assistance I can to make that Act still more beneficial to the interest of the fruit growers. While not going into a full discussion of the question at this time, I may inform my hon. friend that I have arranged for the holding, within the next three weeks, of a conference of the fruit growers from the whole Dominion. At the conference there will be delegates from each of the fruit growing districts and from every province, and in addition there will be our chief inspectors and representatives from the agricultural departments of all the provinces of the Dominion. Further than that, I have issued an invitation to all the heads of our experimental stations throughout Canada to attend this conference in order, not only that they may have the benefit of the discussions that may take place there, but also that they may, in their turn, contribute practical advice on the matters under discussion. I am sure that the results of that conference will be of immense benefit, not only to the government in outlining what may be necessary in the way of legislation, but also to the fruit growers themselves. For we must recognize that fruit growing has attained the dimensions which entitle it to be regarded as a natural industry of great importance. My hon. friend (Mr. McKenzie) will understand that, pending the holding of that conference, it would be unwise to attempt to deal with any of the questions he has raised; for at that time we shall have all the light upon this subject that can possibly be thrown by those concerned in it. I shall be only too delighted to listen on that occasion and to do anything I can to carry out, in reason, the requests of the fruit growers themselves.

MONTREAL ATHLETIC ASSOCIATION AT NANCY.

Mr. RODOLPHE LEMIEUX (Rouville). I desire to call the attention of the Minister of Finance to a matter of importance. We have in Montreal an association of young men which has won not only prizes and medals but fame as well in Europe.

That association won the international tournament which was held in the city of Rome, Italy, and won all the prizes there. Last year they were challenged again by the international tournament which was held at Nancy, France. They presented a petition to the government, through the good offices of the acting mayor of Montreal, Alderman Dandurand. That gentleman came to Ottawa and presented a petition to your humble servant, the object of which was to obtain some aid towards paying the expenses of the trip. I think the association is composed of about twenty athletes. I thought it would be a good advertisement for Canada to help these young men to maintain their reputation abroad. I, therefore, brought the matter before my colleagues in council. This was a few days before the dissolution of parliament, during the adjournment which took place after the departure of the then Prime Minister for England to attend the King's Coronation and the Imperial Conference. I think my hon. friend will find the matter on record in his department; at least, the Hon. Mr. Fielding, if he were present, would say that I am right in stating that council looked favourably upon the request which was made by the citizens of Montreal and by the athletic association. I was authorized by council to inform the association that a sum of $3,000 would be put in the estimates if the association went to Nancy. I may say, entre parenthèse, that these young men did go to Nancy, and won all the first prizes and high honours in the tournament, and came back once more covered with glory. I am quite sure their presence at that tournament was a good advertisement of our country and of our sports. Acting on the assurance of council I sent to acting Mayor Dandurand of Montreal, a translation of which I will read:

Ottawa, 9th June, 1911.

My dear Mr. Dandurand,—I have handed your petition (the petition of the athletes) to my colleagues in council last week, and here is what I am authorized to lay before you. The council will put in the supplementary estimates a sum of $3,000 as a special aid on the occasion of the trip of the athletes to Nancy, France. Naturally, this is subject to the control of parliament which votes the budget. But according to my judgment there is no risk taken, as I think the amount will be voted by the House.

Accept, my dear Dandurand, the assurance of my highest consideration.

Your devoted servant,
RODOLPHE LEMIEUX.

They obtained the money from the bank. The council decided to have the money put in the supplementary esimates. As I said a moment ago, our athletes went to Nancy. They were assisted, not only by this promise of the government, but by the citizens of Montreal generally, and they won fame at Nancy. I would call the attention of the Minister of Finance to the promise made by council that that amount would be placed in the estimates. I took great care to inform the athletes that this promise was subject to the vote of parliament, and I could only say that the matter would be brought up before the House. Unfortunately, a change of administration took place.

But I suppose both sides of the House are well pleased with our Canadian athletes, and will recognize that they have done nobly for Canada, and will agree that the new government should implement the promise which was made in good faith by the late administration.

Mr. WHITE (Leeds). I may say that the matter had not yet been brought to our attention; but I should have much pleasure in putting the sum in the estimates.

THE DUTY ON LUMBER.

Mr. J. G. TURRIFF (Assiniboia). Before you leave the Chair, in accordance with the notice given by the leader of the opposition last night, I wish to ask for a few minutes time to discuss the duty on lumber as it affects the people of the northwest, that is, the class of lumber that a short time ago came in free of duty. I will move the following motion:

That the Minister of Customs, in collecting a duty of 25 per cent on sawed planks, boards, joists, scantlings, studding and other lumber of wood dressed on one side when the edges thereof are neither jointed, nor tongued nor grooved, is violating the Customs Act, and unduly and illegally imposing a heavy tax on the people.

This, Mr. Speaker, is a matter of very great importance to the people of the three prairie provinces. First of all, I will point out the disadvantages under which the new settler labours when he goes into that prairie country, and wishes to put up a building. If he goes to any other part of Canada he can probably get the umber on his farm with which to put up the necessary building in which he can live comfortably. But when he takes up a homestead on the prairie, he is unable to do that, there is no timber, in many cases, within a hundred miles of him, and he has to depend absolutely on the lumber that he may be able to purchase. Some of that lumber is cut in the provinces of the west, but the great bulk of it is brought in either from western Ontario, or from British Columbia, or from the United States. The late government, realizing the position that the farmer was in, and that when he first went out on the land he was not in a position to put up fancy houses, or spend much money in buying lumber, in order to enable him to build more cheaply, they put rough lumber on the free list, and also lumber that was dressed on one side. I may point out that under the late administration the settler was able to build his house, his stable and his barn, with lumber of those classes that did not pay any duty. I may say that for an ordinary building, an ordinary shanty, or an ordinary house even, with lumber that is dressed on one side the farmer is able to put up a good and comfortable house, and that is the lumber that came in free of duty. As soon as the present government came into power, the customs regulations governing the importation of this class of lumber have been changed. At the present time, the settlers who formerly got lumber free of duty now have to pay a duty, not of $1.25 or $2 a thousand, but a duty of 25 per cent ad valorem.

When you take ordinary lumber, boards, dressed on one side, or scantlings, beams and joists, dressed on one side, you have a class of lumber that will cost from $12 to $16 a thousand and the duty on that lumber at 25 per cent will be $3 or $4 per thousand. When you add to that the retailer's profit on the cost of his lumber, you are forcing the settler to pay $4 and $5 per thousand feet more for his lumber than he had to pay a couple or three months ago before this change was made in the interpretation of the Customs Act. Let me read to the House the clause of the Customs Act which deals with this particular item. Item 503 is as follows:

Planks, boards, clapboards, laths, plain pickets, and other timber or lumber of wood, not further manufactured than sawn or split, whether creosoted, vulcanized or treated by any other preserving process or not.

Those were free and still remain free.

504. Planks, boards and other lumber of wood, sawn, split or cut, and dressed on one side only, but not further manufactured.

Those came in free and are still on the free list. This is the item under which I am making the complaint.

505. Sawn boards, planks and deals, planed or dressed on one or both sides, when the edges thereof are jointed or tongued and grooved, 25 per cent.

In the past lumber has been coming in dressed on one side and on one edge; that is to say, one side planed and the other edge sawn with a fine saw and the Department of Customs have allowed that to come in free. But owing to the late ruling of the Customs department that lumber now comes in at a duty of 25 per cent. In the preparation of this lumber the American saw mill men who have been selling their product in Canada follow exactly the same practice as that which is followed by the lumbermen in eastern Ontario and British Columbia. They dress that lumber on one side and on one edge. It is dressed on one edge for the purpose of making it more saleable. It is more exact, more true, but it is done in the mills in Ontario and British Columbia and in Pacific coast states mainly for the purpose of reducing the weight of the lumber. It is a very common thing, in my part of the country at all events, to see an invoice for a carload of lumber. An American or a British Columbia sawmill man sells his lumber at a stated price delivered at a certain station. The retail lumber merchant who buys that lumber pays the freight on it and then remits the balance of the invoice to the sawmill man. I have seen dozens of invoices where the amount got by the railway for the freight was a very considerable percentage higher than the amount got by the sawmill men who took the logs out, sawed the lumber, dressed it, loaded it on cars and shipped it. Therefore, you see that it is necessary for the lumberman, in order to make his lumber more saleable and to save the freight, to dress his lumber on one side and also on one edge. That same class of lumber is coming in from the United States and has been coming in free of duty. A board, joist or scantling that was dressed on one side by the planer and sawn with a fine saw on the other, irrespective of whether it had been planed first and then resawed, came in free and the settlers of the prairies of Manitoba, Saskatchewan and Alberta got the advantage of that free lumber. They got that lumber at from $2 to $4 a thousand less than they are getting it for to-day. That is a hardship to the settler of the onrthwest for the simple reason that lumber is one of the most absolute necessities to him. Lumber is just as necessary to the man on the prairie as are bread, meat and clothing. He cannot live on the prairie in a tent during the winter months; he has to have a house. That house has to be made with lumber, coming either from the north of the prairie provinces, from western Ontario, from British Columbia, or from the United States. The United States sawmill men have in the past been sending that lumber in and the settler of the prairies has been getting the advantage of free trade in rough lumber to that extent. This was the class of lumber that suited him, it was the class of lumber that he wanted, it was the class of lumber that he could afford to buy. Now, under the present administration, that same settler has to pay $3, or $4 or $5 more a thousand feet for the same lumber when he goes to buy it from the lumber merchant.

Mr. STAPLES. Has the price of lumber gone up to the consumer since this law has been in force?

Mr. TURRIFF. Yes, it has.

Mr. STAPLES. What evidence has the hon. gentleman to that effect?

Mr. TURRIFF. My hon. friend, when I am through, he can give any information to the House that he pleases. Not long ago I was talking to a lumber merchant and he told me that the price had to go up because the lumber was costing them more since they had put on the duty.

Mr. STAPLES. I am quite as anxious as the hon. member for the settler of the west and I want to know if the price of lumber has gone up to the consumer. If it has then there is a grievance for which I would be very anxious to get a remedy. Give me one instance.

Mr. TURRIFF. You cannot add $2, $3, $4 or $5 to the cost of a thousand feet of lumber to the merchant without that additional cost being paid by the man who buys and uses the lumber. How are you going to get away from it?

Mr. STAPLES. I understood that the lumbermen of British Columbia guaranteed that the price would not go up and I want to know if they have put the price up. If they have I want to get after them.

Mr. TURRIFF. My hon. friend says that the British Columbia lumbermen undertook that the price would not go up. My hon. friend was not quite sincere in making that remark.

Mr. STAPLES. I was quite sincere.

Mr. TURRIFF. Well then let me tell my hon. friend that what the lumbermen said was that if the duty was put on lumber they would not put their price up until next spring.

Some hon. MEMBERS. No, no.

Mr. STAPLES. May I ask what evidence the hon. gentleman has to that effect? I want to get at the facts.

Mr. TURRIFF. It was reported in the Winnipeg 'Telegram', a paper which I do not always consider reliable. There is no use of anybody arguing that, when you add $4 a thousand to the cost of lumber you are not going to add to the cost of that lumber to the man who has to buy and use it. It is all right to talk about the British Columbia lumberman not putting the price up.

Are the British Columbia lumbermen, the men who formed the combine that made all the trouble a few years ago, a likely class of men to do that sort of thing? The lumbermen of British Columbia, western Ontario and the prairie provinces formed a combine and no man in the western provinces was allowed to go into the lumber business in any town without the consent and authority of this lumber combine. Why? Because they would not allow him to buy a carload of lumber. Not a man in the combine would sell a carload to any retail lumber merchant who was not approved of by the combine, and who was not a member of the Retail Lumbermens' Combine. The result was that the British Columbia lumbermen, the Ontario lumbermen, the lumbermen in the prairie provinces were all able to put up the prices. But that was not the whole of the evil. The retail men, knowing that nobody else could buy lumber and go into this town and sell in opposition to them, decided whether there should be one or two or three lumbermen in each market who should be allowed to handle timber, and knowing that they had no competition they were enabled to enhance the price very largely with the result that the consumer was compelled to pay very large prices for his lumber. That, Mr. Speaker, was one of the principle causes that led the retail lumbermen, and farmers who wanted to buy 2, 3 or 4 carloads of lumber, to open negotiations and open trade relations with American sawmill men living in the Pacific coast states. The result has been that for years back there has been a large amount of lumber coming in from the United States. Rough lumber comes in free and also lumber dressed on one side and dressed by a fine saw on one edge. The moment the new Minister of Customs came into power, the moment these hon. gentlemen who were going to do so much for the western settler assumed office, practically one of the first things they do is to put a duty on that lumber and compel the settler in the west to pay a higher price for the lumber, to compel the merchant to pay a higher price and to make him pay duty on the lumber, which until a few months ago came in free.

Mr. STEVENS. The hon. gentleman is giving the impression that this applies to all lumber. Will he say to what particular class of lumber his remarks regarding the raise in price applies?

Mr. TURRIFF. I read the item in the Customs Act covering the class of lumber with which I am now dealing, item 505. Under the late administration lumber that was dressed on one side and jointed or not planed, but fine-sawed, on one edge, came in free. The customs authorities dealt with the lumber just as they found it when it came to the line for admission. They did not take up the question whether that lumber had been planed on the edge and then resawed they looked at the lumber and if it was rough lumber on three sides and planed on one side, that lumber came in free.

But my hon. friends opposite at the request of the lumber combines of British Columbia and Ontario who came down here two or three months ago and had interviews with my hon. friend the Minister of Customs (Mr. Reid) and, I suppose with other ministers of the government, agreed to collect duty on that lumber which had been coming in free to the great advantage of the farmer of the west. Here is the regulation passed by the Customs Board:

> In connection with the request for a decision as to the rate of duty payable on imported lumber for which free entry is claimed under tariff item 503 or 504, the Board of Customs declared: 'That sawn planks, boards, joists, scantlings, studding and other lumber of wood, dressed on one side when also dressed wholly or partially on one edge, is dutiable at 25 per cent ad valorem, under the general tariff, on importation into Canada.'

You will notice that the Act says that if the lumber is dressed on one side and dressed on one edge it is dutiable but this Customs Board under the present administration, knowing, I presume, what the government wanted, took an absolutely different view from what they had taken before, with the result that they now say the lumber is dutiable if it is partly dressed on the edge while the Act itself says that it must be jointed on the edge, so that the regulation is curtailing the item in the Customs Act with the result, as I have said, that the settler now has to pay duty on lumber that he previously got free.

Mr. CURRIE. Is any lumber coming in free now, is any class of lumber allowed to come in free?

Mr. TURRIFF. I read two sections of the Act dealing with lumber that is free, and I shall read now to show that a certain class of lumber is still coming in free. Of that I make no complaint whatever.

Planks, boards and other lumber of wood, sawn, split or cut, and dressed on one side only, but not further manufactured.

That lumber was free and it is still free under the Customs Act, and under the regulations of the minister. That item has not been changed.

Mr. CURRIE. Is there any quantity of lumber coming in under that schedule?

Mr. TURRIFF. Yes, there is lumber coming in under that item.

Mr. CURRIE. Then there is no great hardship.

Mr. TURRIFF. I am not discussing that item at all, I am discussing item 505 in the Customs Tariff, 1907, and showing that the lumber that a few months ago came in free is now, under the ruling of the Customs Board, compelled to pay duty because the Customs Board has made a ruling that if it is partly jointed on one edge it becomes dutiable and before that the Act itself says it has to be jointed lumber in order to make it dutiable.

The Customs Department has laid down the rule that if a piece of lumber comes in planed on one side and on one edge, and a saw is then run over it so as not to leave any marks of the planer on it, that lumber will come in free; but if a plank came in showing nine or ten feet of the saw and one foot of the marks of the planer, the Minister of Customs would say that it was dutiable. The small part showing the mark of the planer made it dutiable, but the 90 per cent of it that did not show the mark of the planer would not make it free, as it was before. The thing resolves itself into this, that under the former interpretation of the Act the settler was getting lumber free of duty, whereas at the present time he has to pay duty, and the lumberman is able to get for his lumber $3 or $4 a thousand more than he did before. Take the case of a man who is building a barn. There are hundreds of farmers in my constituency who have built barns costing from $3,000 to $5,000. The lumber bill would be from $1,500 to $3,000. A great deal of that lumber will still come in free under the items I have quoted, but a great deal of it, under the recent ruling of the Department of Customs, will have to pay duty; and if in order to avoid the duty the sawmills do not plane or dress this lumber on the edge in any way, they have to pay extra freight; so that the settler is obliged to pay extra, either in duty or freight, to the amount of from $100 to $300 on the cost of a barn. That is a most unsatisfactory state of affairs. It is particularly unsatisfactory this year, because the farmer of the west is unable to get a market for his wheat. Was it not bad enough for the western farmer to have been done out of the market for his grain which was dangling right before his eyes across the boundary, where he could have got a much better price for it? But one of the first acts of the Prime Minister, in dealing with the fiscal question, is to change the regulations of the Customs Department by which this same settler is forced to pay from $2 to $4 a thousand more for certain classes of lumber than he did before. That is the condition of affairs that exists in the west to-day, and that is the condition that I protest against on behalf of the farmers of my constituency. We have heard a great deal from the lumbermen in the past about treating the United States with regard to lumber as they treated us. Under the ruling of the Minister of Customs, our tariff on lumber is much higher than the American tariff, if you include free lumber. During the late campaign one of the great cries we heard in the west was that under reciprocity we were going to give the natural resources of Canada away, that the Americans would come over and take our lumber across to the United States. That argument was put forward very strongly by the lumber interests of British Columbia; yet to-day we find these same lumber interests taking the very opposite stand and complaining that instead of our lumber going into the United States there are from 75 to 100 carloads from the United States every day coming into the four western provinces. Now, if it was a bad thing for our lumber to go into the United States, surely it would be a good thing to let that lumber from the United States come into Canada so that our own supply would last the longer. These same men now take the opposite course and say that this lumber should not be allowed to come in free. I am not very much surprised at my hon. friend the Minister of Customs taking that course; I did not expect very much else. I would have been surprised if three months ago any one had told me that the right hon. the Prime Minister would have taken that course, because of what he told the farmers when he made a tour of the west he was going to do for them. If he had told them that his first official act would have been to make them pay duty on lumber that was then coming in free, his candidates would not have received as many votes as they did. But I am not surprised, because now that he is in power he has refused to make good almost every position he took when on this side of the House. To a certain extent lumber is coming into Ontario from the United States, and according to a letter from one of the lumbermen of British Columbia brought down in the return, it is also going into the western provinces to the amount of from 75 to 100 carloads per day. Just think what that means in extra cost to the farmer at a time when he is in a very poor condition to meet that extra cost, when he was looking forward for better things, when he was promised better things by my right hon. friend if he came into power, instead of which the first thing that takes place is that he is made to pay duty on lumber that was free before.

I have not gone into the legal aspects of the Act, or the legal interpretation of that item. But the fact remains that the lumber formerly came in free, and now has to pay a duty and I have not the slightest doubt that the hon. the Minister of Customs (Mr. Reid) could have that regulation changed, and let that lumber again come in freee. Is it not absurd that because a particular piece of lumber shows on an inch of it the mark of a planer, and the balance the mark of a saw, it has to pay duty, while a piece that does not show the mark of a planer comes in free? That conclusion is most illogical, and most unfair to the settlers of the northwest, and I do not think myself that it is in accord with the terms of the Act.

Mr. SCHAFFNER. Does the hon. gentleman know that lumber can be prepared on one side entirely by the planer and still come in free?

Mr. TURRIFF. As I understand it, all the mills when they saw the lumber put the green wood through the planer for the purpose of trueing it up some, but mainly to make it lighter and thus save freight. That lumber is planed on one side, and in some cases put through a planer that planes on one side and edges at the same time, and attached to that machine is a saw that follows the planer in order to give it a sawn edge instead of planed edge. But if one inch should be missed and show a planer mark, that lumber has to pay duty. Previously it came in free. This just shows the tendency of this government. It is ever ready to turn the farmers down and protect the combines. That is the result this government is bringing about whether they intend it or not. That may not be their intention, but actions speak louder than words. The first thing they did with the tariff, on obtaining office, was to make the settler pay a duty on lumber which previously he got duty free.

Mr. A. S. GOODEVE (Kootenay). The hon. gentleman who has just taken his seat has made what he considers a very strong plea on behalf of the farmers of our prairie provinces. If all the statements he has made were in strict accord with the facts, I must say there would be some ground for his complaint against the ruling of the Minister of Customs in this lumber matter. But I have been very much amazed that any hon. gentleman who has been sent here to make the laws of this country, should dare stand up in his place and deliberately advocate that any of these laws should be evaded and broken.

Mr. TURRIFF. I did not say that.

Mr. GOODEVE. The hon. member from Assiniboia read a clause in the Customs Act and openly stated that by fraudulent subterfuge heretofore, certain lumber, which is dutiable under the Act, was admitted free, and he urges that that fraudulent violation of the Act should be allowed to continue. And that is the position taken by other hon. members opposite when they have to deal with this question of the duty on lumber. The Act itself is very clear. There are two sections which are particularly involved in this matter, namely, section 504 and section 505 of the Customs Act of Canada. Section 504 provides:

> Planks, boards and other lumber of wood, sawn, split or cut, and dressed on one side only, but not further manufactured, free.

And section 505 says:

> Sawn boards, planks and deals planed or dressed on one or both sides, when the edges thereof are jointed or tongued and grooved, 25 per cent.

It is under the latter clause that the larger portion of lumber is going into the prairie provinces, and that came in under the ruling of the late government, free of duty. In his anxiety to make his argument clear, the hon. gentleman has himself shown that the very purpose of the lumberman of the United States treating their lumber the way they do, is to fraudulently enter it into the Dominion free of duty. Only a moment ago he said that after the lumberman of the United States had passed their lumber through their planers and dressed it on one side, they had a special machine prepared whereby they would rough the edge in order that they might fraudulently escape the customs duty. That is the hon. gentleman's own statement, yet he defends that action of the American lumbermen, and actually takes the Minister of Customs to task because that hon. minister undertook very properly to enforce the laws of Canada.

Mr. OLIVER. Might I interrupt? My hon. friend (Mr. Goodeve) has asserted that the hon. member for Assiniboia (Mr. Turriff) said that the lumber was rough dressed fraudulently. My hon. friend did not say anything of the kind.

Mr. GOODEVE. What I have said is this, that the action of the American lumbermen in having a fine saw follow the planing, or the dressing on one side was for the purpose of evading the Act. Since the hon. member for Assiniboia (Mr. Turriff) has himself admitted that that was done, he must be cognizant that it was done fraudulently, and for the purpose of evading the customs law of Canada.

Mr. OLIVER. That is the hon. gentleman's opinion, but it is not that of the hon. member for Assiniboia (Mr. Turriff). If the hon. member for Kootenay will ask his friend the Minister of Customs, the minister will tell him that if that lumber comes in with a saw following the planer and not leaving the mark of the planer, it will come in free.

Mr. GOODEVE. The Minister of Customs will not tell me that. What he will tell me is what the hon. member for Assiniboia has repeated three or four times. Is there a schoolboy in the city of Ottawa who does not understand that that roughing of which the hon. gentleman has spoken, was of itself proof of intent of fraudulent entry? But, in passing the lumber through, here and there, when it is cut very true, the little saw with which they intend to rough the entire edge sometimes misses, leaving the clear evidence of the fraudulent intent to enter lumber free that should be dutiable. And yet the hon. gentleman would undertake to twist and turn that and to attack the Minister of Customs for performing the duty he is sworn to perform.

Now, the declaration of the Board of Customs is made independently of the Minister of Customs. This was an independent board of Commissioners appointed by the government to deal with any question in dispute. And their decision was along the lines I have just indicated, and what was the hon. gentleman's own interpretation of the words of the Board's decision? And let us see whether my interpretation is more in accord with the facts and with common-sense and with justice than the interpretation given by the hon. member. Here is the declaration of the Board:

> In connection with the request for a decision as to the rate of duty payable on imported lumber for which free entry is claimed under tariff items 503 or 504, the Board of Customs declared: 'that sawn planks, boards, jointing, scantlings, studding and other lumber of wood, dressed on one side, when also dressed wholly or partially on one edge, is dutiable at 25 per cent ad valorem, under the general tariff, on importations into Canada.'

And the hon. gentleman said that because the Board had said 'dressed on one side, when also dressed wholly or partially on one side,' they were assuming to turn the law. What they did was to call the attention of the officials appointed to enforce this Act, to the fact that if the lumber was only partially dressed on one side because of the re-sawing to which the hon. member has referred, therefore they were to collect the duty. And I think that every hon. member who is inclined to look at this question fairly will realize that the interpretation placed on the Act by the Customs Board was in accordance with justice and with the true intent of the parliament of Canada.

Now, having looked at that side of the question, I would like for a moment or two to deal with this so-called hardship of the prairie farmers of the west. And in dealing with questions of this nature in this House we must deal with them in a broad way, as they affect the whole of the people of Canada. The hon. member said that the Conservative party in the recent elections said the policy of their opponents would have the effect of giving away the natural resources of Canada to the American people; and, as proof that the Conservatives have changed their position, he proceeded to say that from seventy-five to a hundred carloads of lumber a day were coming in from the United States into the Canadian prairie market. The hon. gentleman has stated correctly the position we took in the recent election campaign. We said our own home market was of more value to our people than to the people of the United States, or than their market was to us. And the hon. gentleman has just now proved it. He himself has said that we are sending little or no lumber into the United States, but that they are sending lumber into our west at the rate of from seventy-five to a hundred carloads a day.

Mr. TURRIFF. I did not say that we were sending little or no lumber into the United States. I did not mention anything about it.

Mr. GOODEVE. Why, that was the hon. gentleman's whole argument. Now, we take the same stand to day that we took before the people in the election campaign. We contended that it was our duty as Canadians to preserve the natural resources of this country for our own people. Does the hon. gentleman realize that, to follow out the principle he has laid down would tend not to the conservation of our great timber resources, but to their utter and complete destruction? It would be in effect a repetition of the policy which has tended to the destruction of the large timber areas of the United States. Owing to the unfair competition that has been forced upon the lumbermen of British Columbia, they have been compelled to bring to market only that portion of the timber which they could cheaply and quickly take from their reserves, selecting only their best qualities that could be most easily surely handled and manufactured at a profit, with the result that a large portion of the timber area of that province is left to destruction by the wind and by forest fires. This is the exact opposite of the position that is being taken by all civilized people to-day. In the province of British Columbia, as in Ontario and Quebec, and in all our timbered areas, the whole object must be the conservation of our natural wealth. We may exhaust our mineral wealth, because mineral once taken from the ground is gone for ever; but by the careful conservation of our timbered areas—just as with the golden grain on behalf of the growers of which the hon. member for Assiniboia (Mr. Turriff), claims to speak—our resources can be made to last from generation to generation, growing in value as an asset of the Dominion from year to year. That is the position we on this side took in regard to this question. Why is it, let me ask hon. gentlemen opposite, there is at this very time a large importation of lumber from the United States into this country? Is it not due to the hard times and depressed trade of the nation to the south of us? Owing to the decreased demand for the rougher and lower grades of lumber, they cannot easily get rid of those grades. The largely increased use of steel and concrete in buildings, in the large centres has displaced the rougher grades of lumber, and the demand is for the interior finish lumber, and for the higher grades. For flooring and number one, they are getting very high prices. In some cases they get as high as $60 and even $70 per thousand for flooring lumber.

The result of that is that the lower grades of lumber are left over from season to season, and piled up and accumulate in the yards of those companies in the United States. There comes a depression like the one at this particular time, they have to make large overdrafts on the bank, and finding it necessary to realize on these assets their bankers say to them, you must reduce your overdraft; and the very first thing they do in order to reduce it is to try and find a market for the accumulated surplus of the lower grades of lumber that are piled up in their yards. Immediately they come to our Canadian western market, which in fairness and justice belongs to the lumbermen of Canada, and they flood that market, not with fair priced lumber, but with lumber frequently sold at less than the cost to manufacture.

Mr. SCHAFFNER. Asking for information, why would not the dumping clause apply to prevent that?

Mr. GOODEVE. My hon. friend has asked a question that I was just going to deal with. In every case where that has happened in regard to other lines of manufacture, what has occurred? Immediately, with the consent of the whole people of Canada, the government put into force what is known as the dumping clause, and charge a special duty, making them pay the duty on the real value of the article as it sold in their home market. Yet in the case of lumber, instead of asking for that advantage that they are justly and fairly entitled to under the same conditions, the lumbermen of the west have never asked for the enforcement of the dumping clause. My hon. friend has asked a pertinent question, and I think our lumbermen are fairly entitled to it under these circumstances.

Mr. SCHAFFNER. They would have to ask for it

Mr. GOODEVE. No doubt the officials of the company would have to ask the government to apply it, but it has never been applied in the case of lumber, the lumbermen of British Columbia have never asked for it. But while it is a fact which is known to every lumberman throughout the country, that the American companies at the present time, for the reasons I have stated, are selling lumber at less than the cost to manufacture, yet I want to say that the consumer of that lumber in the prairie provinces does not reap one five cents benefit from that lower price; and why? That is a very pertinent side of the question. Naturally, my hon. friend opposite argued that if the jobber in lumber purchased his lumber at a bargain price the consumer also would get part of that bargain price, and, therefore, would reap a benefit. The hon. gentleman waxed eloquent when he said it would make a difference of $5 or $6 per thousand, and that would amount to a large sum of money. I find in the speech made by the hon. member for Moosejaw (Mr. Knowles), dealing with this question, that he said it would mean a saving of $12,000,000 to the farmers of the prairie provinces. That statement is on a par with the statement and the arguments that have been advanced this afternoon. As a matter of fact, out of the total importation of 300,000,000 feet of lumber, there would, under any circumstances, only be about one-third of it dutiable, and if you put the duty at 25 per cent ad valorem, which would make it about $2 per thousand, which is the outside price, the total amount saved would only have been about $200,000 instead of $12,000,000. But I want to show you that they will not reap a benefit of $200,000, or even $2. And why? Because if a merchant to-day, going into the ordinary market for some unusual reason, is able to pick up a certain special article at a price which he knows to be absolutely less than the cost of that article, he does not immediately proceed to give away that profit to his consumer; he would be foolish to do it, because he knows that it is only under these special conditions that he buys it, he will eventually have to pay a fair price for it, and, therefore, he continues to sell it at the ordinary advance on the regular fair market price for those goods. Now I say, without fear of contradiction, the question asked by the hon. member for Macdonald (Mr. Staples) and that my hon. friend could not answer, was very pertinent; I venture to say that no man on that side of the House can demonstrate or prove that because they are selling lumber at less than cost in the United States, the consumer in the prairie provinces is receiving one dollar benefit per thousand on that lumber, not a dollar. We find, Sir, that there is a direct loss. Let me show you another side of this question before I leave that point. I have made the statement that I do not think there is a man in this House who can demonstrate that the purchase of that lumber at less than cost from the American producers, has reduced the price a single dollar to the consumers in the prairie provinces. But now I take the other side, I will admit for the sake of argument, that the buying of that lumber at less than cost to the manufacturer would reduce the price to the consumer, and I think I can demonstrate that even under those conditions it would mean an actual loss, not only to the farmer of the Northwest, but an actual loss to the people of the whole Dominion. I will try to make myself clear. If a man sells his lumber at less than cost price—I am speaking of the American millmen—directly to the consumer in the markets of Alberta, Saskatchewan and Manitoba, the farmer buying his 2,000, 3,000 or 5,000 feet of lumber for his fencing, his shed or his barn; let us say for the sake of argument, that he saves $4 a thousand on 5,000 feet, that would mean $20, and that money goes to the manufacturer of the United States. The result is that the millman of the province of British Columbia, not having that market, the money having gone out of the country, is compelled to close down his lumber camp in the woods, as he has already done, to close down his mill in the milling centres, and the loss falls directly on the farmer of the prairie provinces. Why? If he has saved $20 on that lumber, he has lost a home market of 1,000 to 2,000 men who consume his wheat, his butter, his eggs, his flour, his clothing, and all that goes to make up the great Canadian home market. So the actual loss to the farmer is greater than the trivial gain he has made. I think no man can gainsay that. That is the whole theory of interprovincial trade. Now what does that amount to? Last year in the province of British Columbia we bought $14,500,000 worth of those agricultural products I have referred to from the farmers of Alberta, Saskatchewan and Manitoba, $14,500,000 worth we purchased from them, and helped them with our home market close to the farmers by reason of the development of our own industries. I have heard hon. gentlemen on that side of the House tell me that the best market for oats that we have to-day is the market of British Columbia. We purchase their oats, we purchase their hay, we purchase their mess pork and bacon, and then, coming further east, we purchase the goods of the Ontario canneries which are to-day going into that province to feed the lumber camps in those great lumbering districts. That is the theory of the interprovincial trade, and that is the theory of the Liberal-Conservative party. We want to build up a great home market in this country, we want to develop our great cities. Let me tell you, Sir, that I am not like those men who think that the only virtue in that mighty west is that it enables you to exact from the ground its fertility and richness, and leave it a barren waste and wilderness. I believe we have a great heritage, I believe we will make that great western country of ours one of the manufacturing centres of the world; by manufacturing, I mean manufacturing for the farmer. Let him, as he will, manufacture his grain into beef, into pork, into poultry, and he enriches the soil, he enriches himself, he enriches the country. That is our whole theory. So it is with our lumber industry. We say we are justly entitled to a fair amount of protection.

I want to say for myself that I would have no hesitancy to stand on the floor of this House and say altogether that clause which says that lumber planed on one side shall be admitted free should be eliminated from the tariff. I would have hesitancy in saying that that would be to the advantage of the people of the whole of Canada including those of the prairie provinces. Why are you asking for your Hudson Bay road? Why are you asking that you may get closer to the market for the goods that you raise? There is no market in the world equal to the market that stands at your door and the only way in which that market can be built up is by means of interprovincial trade. After the speech of the hon. member for Moosejaw (Mr. Knowles) I received some telegrams and a number of letters but as the matter had passed I did not think it advisable at that particular time to bring them up. I would like to read one telegram that I received because it bears on the other question that has been raised by the hon. member for Assiniboia (Mr. Turriff). There is within the sound of my voice a gentleman who is in a position to make good his claim. He has made this offer, and he repeats it to-day, that he will pay the expenses of an investigation into the question of a lumber combine in the west. If it has been shown that in any particular there is a combine in regard to prices the entire expenses of an investigation will be borne by him and he is in a position to make good.

Mr. KNOWLES. Who will pay them if it falls through.

Mr. GOODEVE. I say that if you can prove or show that there is the slightest combination in prices, or to raise prices, all the expenses of the investigation will be paid by these parties; but, if, as I am sure it will be found, there is no combination, certainly, the government will pay for it. We have asked and urged that an investigation into this question be made and we are prepared as members representing the province of British Columbia to ask now on the floor of this House that such an investigation be made in order that the assertions which are being made in the public press and by members of this House can be shown to be absolutely untrue. Here is the telegram:

A. S. Goodeve, M.P., Ottawa.

Western press despatches state that the member for Moosejaw charges in the House that a lumber combine exists in British Columbia and that the manufacturers have closed down their mills for the purpose of advancing prices. Mountain manufacturers emphatically deny existence of combine or anything approaching one and strongly object to such unwarranted allegations unsupported by evidence of proof. We would welcome full investigation by an independent commission which would establish beyond question the absolute freedom of competition in the wholesale market for British Columbia lumber, as well as the fact that the wholesale price is too low to return to the manufacturer adequate profits on his product. Mountain mills have been closed down and logging operations largely suspended because of the impossibility of British Columbia manufacturers meeting the slaughter prices of American manufacturers whose demoralized home market caused by over production has induced their dumping lumber into Canada at prices below the cost of production. Nearly four thousand men are out of work in the interior of British Columbia owing to reduced logging operations and the loss of trade is being daily lamented by grain dealers, cattle dealers and farmers of Alberta. The British Columbia industry furnishes a most important section of the market for the produce of Alberta and for the purpose of a political argument it is unfair to ignore the strong interprovincial interests. American shippers have evaded Canadian customs regulations in the past and British Columbia manufacturers want a square deal in the future.

That is exactly our position; all we ask, all we urge is a square deal. We say that you are checking this enterprise. We are willing to pay our share of protection because we believe it is in the interest of the Dominion as a whole. We pay duty on our machinery and on everything that goes into the manufacture of our lumber; therefore, we say, we believe that we should receive a fair protection, particularly when it does not mean an increase in the cost but, from our standpoint, means an increase in the home market of other interests. I would like to show however how it is really affecting our province and I have here the very latest statistics dealing with lumber coming into Canada. The statement is as follows:

IMPORTATIONS, NOVEMBER, 1911.

PLANKS, BOARDS, &C., DRESSED ONE SIDE ONLY.

	Feet.	Feet.	Feet.	Feet.
Ontario	5,373,000	9,617,000	67,787,000	42,551,000

Saskatchewan	871,000	422,000	9,117,000	5,260,000
Alberta	1,697,000	257,000	20,528,000	4,693,000
British Columbia	12,151,009	3,623,000	91,628,000	32,573,000

DUTIABLE.

SAWED BOARDS—PLANED.

—	Imported during November, 1911.	Imported during November, 1910.	Imported Apr. 1, 1911, to Nov. 30, 1911.	Imported Apr. 1. 1910, to Nov. 30, 1910.
	Feet.	Feet.	Feet.	Feet.
Ontario	941,000	452,000	4,559,000	3,597,000
Manitoba	909,000	307,000	8,537,000	2,677,000
Saskatchewan	282 000	107,000	1,520,000	425,000
Alberta	43,000	56,000	389,000	385,000
Total	4,523,000	1,181,000	36,240,000	11,239,000

The figures absolutely bear out my argument that this is purely a question of depression on the other side and the forcing on the market at any price in order to get rid of the surplus product. This has always been recognized by protectionist countries as being unfair and Germany, France, the United States and Canada herself have very properly taken steps to prevent it.

Mr. TURRIFF. If it is a wrong to British Columbia that lumber should be imported from the United States why did the people of British Columbia import 12,000,000 feet last November?

Mr. GOODEVE. I am amazed that an hon. gentleman, who has reached the status of being elected a member of this House should ask the childish question: Is it wrong to import lumber into British Columbia?

Mr. TURRIFF. Answer it.

Mr. GOODEVE. Answer it, certainly.

An hon. MEMBER. The hon. gentleman is too amazed to answer that.

Mr. GOODEVE. I certainly am amazed that any man would make the assertion that any gentleman on this side of the House, or any man who has reached the age of discretion, would say that it was wrong to trade with another country. I have heard that argument in back counties but never on the floor of parliament.

Mr. TURRIFF. You are arguing against it.

Mr. GOODEVE. Not arguing against it. If the hon. gentleman has not understood my argument better than that I can only say that I pity him. He has my sincere sympathy. We, on this side of the House, have stood for the expansion of our trade, but we have also stood for the protection of our industries in order that we might expand that trade. This statement, then, is conclusive evidence of the conditions as we have them at the present time and, under these conditions, we are not asking that the dumping clause be placed against the importation of lumber, but merely asking that the clause already on the statute-book, interpreted by the hon. gentleman himself, should be enforced fairly, justly and legally. That is all that we in the province thus far have asked from this government and I for one say that I commend the wisdom and force of character that in spite of opposition, enabled the hon. Minister of Customs to see that the law was fairly and justly enforced.

Mr. L. THOMSON (Qu'Appelle). Mr. Speaker, I do not know that I can add a great deal to what has been said by the hon. member for Assiniboia (Mr. Turriff). Some of our friends on the other side of the House, however, taunt the people of western Canada with the fact that they have sent no farmers to represent them in this House. I have been farming in Saskatchewan for the last 30 years, and, therefore, I presume they will be glad to find there is at least one who has come from that part of Canada who is a farmer.

This question should be discussed under two heads. The first is whether or not, notwithstanding all that has been said, the lumber in question is dutiable. The two tariff items, 504 and 505, have been read repeatedly, but I shall take the liberty of reading them again. 504 describes lumber that is free. It reads:

> Planks, boards, and other lumber of wood, sawn, split or cut, and dressed on one side only, but not further manufactured, free.

Item 505 reads:

> Sawn boards, planks and deals, planed or dressed on one or both sides, when the edges thereof are jointed or tongued and grooved, general tariff, 25 per cent duty, ad valorem.

This duty will, of course, apply in the case of American lumber. I expected the hon. member from Kootenay (Mr. Goodeve) to argue the point whether or not the lumber mentioned should come within the definition of item 505. I am sorry he has not done so. If the lumber referred to in this discussion does not come under the item 505, it must come under the item 504. Nothing has been submitted to show us that it does not come under 505, and under 505 the lumber must be:

Dressed on one or both sides when the edges thereof are jointed or tongued and grooved.

There is nothing to show that the lumber in question has been jointed or tongued and grooved on the edge. If it is not it cannot possibly come under the item, and must have been intended to come under the other item.

I have been told of an argument that will be advanced here, and I presume the reason my hon. friend from Kootenay (Mr. Goodeve), has not advanced it is that he has so little confidence in it, that is that the meaning of the word 'jointed' is planed or smoothed off on one side. You will agree that we must construe a statute according to the ordinary use of the words used therein. Then by the word 'jointed,' can you say you mean planed? No man, who has any respect for his assertion, can say so. We are told, on the other hand, that it is not the ordinary meaning, but that it is some customary meaning that will carry weight here. I have never heard the argument that some meaning that is applied to a word in some particular custom or trade is the meaning you must give it in an Act of parliament. I do not think that argument can be advanced with any show of reason. I have said we must construe these words according to their ordinary meaning.

Another rule I have copied from a legal decision:

What the legislature intended to be done or not to be done can only be legitimately ascertained from what it has chosen to enact either by express words or by reasonable and necessary implication.

If that is so what construction are we to place on this word?

Mr. MEIGHEN. Does the hon. gentleman argue that the interpretation is illegal? I understand that my hon. friend is a lawyer.

Mr. THOMSON (Qu'Appelle). What interpretation?

Mr. MEIGHEN. That placed on it by the Department of Customs?

Mr. THOMSON (Qu'Appelle). The department never told us they placed that construction on it.

Mr. THOMSON.

Mr. MEIGHEN. The Board of Customs has given a ruling as to what the clause means. Does the hon. member argue that ruling is invalid for illegality?

Mr. THOMSON (Qu'Appelle). I am not sure I understand what the hon. gentleman means. If he means to ask me whether or not a ruling that the word 'jointed' there means 'planed' is correct, then I say that the ruling is wrong.

Mr. MEIGHEN. Then why do not his friends, the American lumbermen, apply to the courts for redress, instead of applying to this House?

Mr. THOMSON (Qu'Appelle). I presume the American lumbermen can apply to the courts for redress if they want to, I am not counsel for the American lumbermen any more than my hon. friend; I am here representing the constituency of Qu'Appelle. My hon. friend cannot shelve me off my line of argument that way and it is not fair of him to attempt it.

As to the construction placed upon it by the department, I am going to show that the words used by the department show plainly that they do not claim the word 'jointed' means 'planed.' I shall read you the declaration of the Board of Customs in connection with this matter:

In connection with the request for a decision as to the rate of duty payable on imported lumber for which free entry is claimed under tariff items 503 or 504, the Board of Customs declared: 'That sawn planks, boards, joists, scantlings, studding and other lumber of wood, dressed on one side, when also dressed wholly or partially on one edge, is dutiable at 25 per cent ad valorem, under the general tariff, on importations into Canada.'

So they use the word 'dressed,' they do not say 'jointed,' the department do not claim it is jointed. I do not know who will claim it later on, some of the things we hear claimed might lead us to expect anything. I am trying to show that the lumber in question is not dutiable according to the Customs Act and I think I am right. There has been no attempt to show that the word 'planed' means the same as 'jointed' or is intended to mean the same. If the word 'jointed' is intended to mean 'planed,' why have we not got something about jointed lumber? We have jointed lumber as well as planed and tongued and grooved, why is not jointed lumber referred to? Would ship lath, or something of that kind come in free?

If the construction placed on this word 'jointed' is that it must cover planed lumber, then I submit that ship lap must come in free. The hon. gentleman who has just spoken tells us that there was no increase in price. I wonder what the British Columbia lumbermen came here for. Was it on a pleasure jaunt? I do not think so.

I think they came because they wanted to increase the price of their lumber. That is the only reason they came. I presume they have plenty to do at home, and their expenses amounted to something. They came so as to increase their profits. As the hon. member for Assiniboia has said, the effect of an increase of duty is to increase the price, we know that is the universal effect. Now, we are told that the British Columbia lumbermen, and the other lumbermen, are such good, honest men that they will not take advantage of this regulation, and will not increase the price. But there is another class of men, called jobbers, who are going to buy lumber from the United States at a ruinously low rate, we are told, but are going to charge us just the same as before. Why is a jobber going to take illegitimate profits while a lumberman is not? I presume they are made of the same sort of clay. We have no more reason to trust the lumber manufacturer than the jobber. Moreover we have not the same reason to trust him in this particular instance, because the jobbers are scattered all over the country, and are not in a position to combine. We are told that there is no combine among the lumbermen. I think it was once proved that there was a combine among them, and I think, if we get at the bottom of the matter we shall find that there is a combine yet. I grant that there is not the same evidence of a combine. I know that in the town where I live people have been prevented from dealing in lumber, because the lumbermen would not allow more than a certain number of dealers in the town, because the effect would be to reduce prices. I admit that they have dropped that evidence of a combine, but I do not admit that they have dropped the combine; the combine is still there, though the evidence is not so clear as it was before. We are told that people who buy job lots at a low price do not sell them at a low price. Is there any man in this House who does not know the contrary? Is there any man here who has not often seen merchants and others buy job lots and sell them at a much decreased price? The usual thing is that when a man buys anything at a job lot price he sells it at a lower price than the ordinary price. We are told that this is a violation of the dumping clause. If that is the case, why do not our friends opposite take action under it? They are not so green as to neglect an opportunity of that kind. If there is any violation of the provisions of the dumping clause, why does not the Minister of Customs take action under it instead of making this change in the tariff regulations? I do not admit for one moment that there is any reasonable argument in favour of the proposition that lumber is dutiable. But suppose it is. The minister will probably tell us that he was obliged to put on the duty to protect the lumbermen because the Act compelled him to do so. Well, there is another remedy which he can easily provide if the Act compels him to collect 25 per cent duty, and if he believes the farmers have a right as well as the lumbermen, the remedy is to change the Act so that the lumber in question will be allowed to come in free the same as in the past. That is an easy remedy, and on behalf of my fellow farmers of Saskatchewan I would ask him to apply it. It will be only fair and just, if he believes he is obliged to collect the duty as it is at present. I do not think I have anything further to say on the question. It is quite clear that the lumber in question is not dutiable, and even if it were, it is hardly fair that these exorbitant duties should be collected. If it is dutiable, the Act is plainly a mistaken Act. The fact of the matter as it stands now is this, that the Department of Customs, as administered by the late Minister of Customs, permitted the farmers of the western provinces, and the farmers of other provinces to bring lumber into this country free of duty. I do not want to make any distinction between the farmers of the west and the farmers of the east.

Mr. REID (Grenville). Do I understand the hon. member to say that the late Minister of Customs allowed lumber imported into the west, planed on two sides, to be entered free of duty?

Mr. THOMSON (Qu'Appelle). I cannot tell just what lumber paid duty, not being a lumberman. I bought my lumber from a lumberman, but I never asked him what lumber paid duty, and what did not. I presume, however, that if lumber was planed on both sides it would pay duty. I was saying that under the administration of the late Minister of Customs we received that particular kind of lumber free of duty, whereas under the administration of the present minister we have to pay duty on it. All this fine play with interpretations may do for lawyers, but the effect on the farmer is that he has to take out of his pocket good money, and pay duty that he had not to pay before, and there must be some reason for it.

If we admit there is any question—and that is the best construction that can be put on the wording by hon. gentlemen opposite—if we admit there is any question as to the meaning of the word, we can understand well why the ex-Minister of Customs in the late government favoured the farmer and the consumer. If it was a matter of favour we can understand how a man's symathies will have some effect on his opinion, no matter how honest he may be; and I can understand well why the ex-Minister of Customs should have been more favourable to the consumer than the manufacturer, and why the sympathy of the present minister (Mr. Reid) goes out entirely to the protected manufacturer and pays no attention to the farmer who pays the duty.

Mr. H. H. STEVENS (Vancouver). I have listened with a great deal of interest to the arguments of my hon. friend who has just spoken. I may say that this matter is one which is being used by hon. gentlemen opposite for the purpose of making an unfair attack on the present government. There is no intention on their part to protect or help in any way the farmers of the northwest. Their object is simply to harass the present administration. Let me tell these hon. gentlemen that the party responsible for the interpretation—the correct interpretation—put upon that clause in the tariff is an official in the Customs department who was appointed by the late administration. That official was perfectly correct in his action. In his capacity of inspector, he discovered that lumber, which was rightly dutiable under the Customs Act and the regulations, was coming in free. Hon. members opposite have been begging the question throughout the whole of the debate, both to-day and a month ago when the subject came up before. My hon. friend who preceded me, laboured hard for the last half hour to show that the actual interpretation of the clause in question is not the correct one. But every one who knows anything about the lumber business will agree that the interpretation by the commission is perfectly accurate. Every one in the lumber trade will know that in the construction of houses, joists, scantling, boards as they come from the saw at the mill, are frequently wider at one end than the other. The mill run is invariably untrue as far as dimensions are concerned. Consequently, before that lumber can be used for construction purposes, these edges which are untrue must be trued up by the process of manufacture. Now, by the customs tariff, which was not the creation of this government, the manufacturers are protected to the extent of 25 per cent duty advalorem; and under the clause I have referred to, the lumber in question is distinctly manufactured. On no occasion has the present government sought to place a duty on rough lumber. They have no idea of changing the tariff schedules which were in operation a number of years under the late administration, but what they have done is this: On representations made by their own officer, they faced the question fairly, and put in force the true interpretation of the tariff. But the late government, on the contrary, fearing the farmers of the northwest, connived with the American mill owners, and allowed their own statutes to be evaded. Such conduct, I submit, was unworthy of any government.

My hon. friend asked why the lumbermen from British Columbia came down here, and he gave an elaborate disquisition on the plum of profit which they were expecting. They came, he said, for the express purpose of increasing profits on their lumber, whereas, as a matter of fact, what they came for was to stop a fraudulent practice which had been discovered by an officer of the late government. Not only was lumber brought in free in disregard of this clause in the statute, but the Americans were shipping in lumber billed rough, whereas in the heart of these cars was stowed away secretly considerable quantities of planed and dressed lumber. It was this grievance which the lumbermen of British Columbia came down to have redressed, and this government faced the question fairly. The lumbermen did not ask for any change in the tariff, but simply that they should be protected according to the statute law of the country. Surely every businessman has the right to demand that the law be administered as it stands on the statutes. That is not asking any favours. The farmers of the northwest and the lumbermen of British Columbia have equally the right to insist that our laws should be administered as they are enacted.

At six o'clock, House took recess.

After Recess.

House resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. STEVENS. When the House rose I had pointed out what constituted jointing, according as that term is used in the Tariff schedule. I am sure hon members will have observed that the hon. member for Qu'Appelle (Mr. Thomson) in endeavouring to discuss this question of what constituted lumber in the manufactured state described by the term 'jointed', made a gross failure of the effort, and also that the attempt of the last speaker and taht of the hon. member for Assiniboia (Mr. Turriff) would lead the House to believe that the present administration was seeking to take undue advantage of the farmers of the northwest. Let me call attettion to the wording of the resolution.

That the Minister of Customs, in collecting a duty of 25 per cent on sawn planks, boards, joists, scantling, studding and other lumber of wood dressed on one side when the edges thereof are neither jointed nor tongued nor grooved, is violating the Customs Act and unduly and illegally imposing a heavy tax on the people.

Now, the wording of that resolution is on a par with the ambiguous language used by the hon. gentleman from Assiniboia (Mr. Turriff) in discussing the question. All through that discussion a distinct and deliberate effort was made to becloud the real issue. The hon. member for Kootenay (Mr. Goodeve) stated that the lumbermen of British Columbia, and, I presume, the lumbermen of Ontario, were anxious to deal with this question on its merits and that they welcomed and asked for fair criticism of their position. But no man or body of men can deal with such ambiguous language as is contained in this resolution. As a matter of fact the hon. member for Assiniboia (Mr. Turriff) and other hon. members on that side know that the Department of Customs is not collecting 25 per cent duty 'on lumber of wood dressed on one side when the edges thereof are neither jointed nor tongued nor grooved.' That is simply a subterfuge. All these ambiguous terms are used simply to get the House to commit itself to a vote condemning the government for something they are not doing. Let me call the attention of the House to the exact terms of the Act.

This law has been in force for years and it was favoured by the late government which hon. members opposite so long supported:

> Sawn boards, planks and deals, planed or dressed on one or both sides, when the edges thereof are jointed or tongued or grooved.

Now, I contend it is not right, it is not honourable,—if I am permitted the use of that term—to place before the House a resolution of this kind taking advantage of the fact that many members are not familiar with all the technical terms of the lumber business. On the contrary, it is for these hon. members who have a grievance to clarify the atmosphere and lay these matters before the House as they are. Here is the point at issue: The lumber merchants of the northwest for years were bringing in lumber contrary to law. Not one hon. member who has spoken on the other side has dared to offer any explanation for that action. The hon. member for Qu'Appelle, I think it was, said that the ex-Minister of Customs had favoured the farmer in this matter, in other words that the minister who had this particular branch of the administration in his control had winked at the statute and given to the farmer of the northwest an advantage—at least he told them he gave them an advantage, but I will show in a minute that that advantage did not exist. And why did he do it? Simply to quiet them in their demands for the fulfilment of promises given them in years gone by by the leader of the late government. Another point is that during the past two weeks hon. members on the other side have been charging the administration with not fulfilling their promises. The House has been in session about thirty-five days altogether, and hon. gentlemen opposite expect, with their rambling attacks upon the administration, occupying much time of this House, to cause the people to believe that the administration has failed in the fulfilment of its promises; as if in thirty-five days a government could carry out every plank in the platform on which it went to the electors. The assumption of such a position is a sheer absurdity. As to this lumber question, I read in the Winnipeg 'Free Press' the other day that the farmers of Alberta had had a convention and that they were going to send a delegation to lay before the leader of the government certain matters which are of vital interest to them; and in that convention, while they referred to the duty on agricultural implements and to many other matters there was not the slightest reference to the lumber question. Yet hon. members opposite would have the House believe that the whole northwest is suffering intensely because of the correct interpretation of this clause and the proper enforcement of this statute. Such a contention can have only one object in view, especially when taken in connection with the wording of this resolution, and that is, as I have said, to harass and hamper the operations of the government; and that,I hold, is not to the credit of the hon. gentlemen opposite.

It has been stated that a lumber combine exists. The hon. member for Qu'Appelle, while admitting that there was no possible evidence of a combine, said he was sure that a combine existed. Now, if such a combine does exist, it must have grown under the care and nurture of the administration of the right hon. gentleman (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) who now leads the opposition. Ever since this session opened there have been repeated charges throughout the country that a combine existed. Is there an hon. member on that side who has the temerity to state that these combines have come into existence since the accession to power of the present administration? Any man with even a grain of common-sense knows that it takes some time to develop a combine. Again, the word 'combine' has been used very loosely. A combine, as I understand it, is a combination of a number of individual concerns under one control with the idea of eliminating competition. I do not think any hon. member opposite would question the accuracy of that definition. There are three lumber associations in the west, just as there are associations in every other trade and profession in the country. There is the wholesalers' association, the retailers' association, the grocers' and hardware and druggists' associations—even undertakers' associations. And the lawyers and the doctors have their associations as well. These associations are for the purpose of promoting the best interests of the trades or professions concerned. The three lumber associations in the west are the Pacific Coast Lumber Association, the Kootenay Lumbermen's Association and the Northern Alberta Spruce Lumbermen's Association. These three associations are independent of and in keen competition with one another. Nobody can gainsay these facts. Therefore, I do not think that hon. members opposite can substantiate their contention that a combine exists. In the next place, the late government under the leadership of the right hon. gentleman (Sir Wilfrid Laurier), if I remember correctly, held an investigation into the alleged combine on the Pacific coast, and nothing was done to deal with that combine.

If that combine existed, which I deny, if that contention is true which is made so earnestly by hon. gentlemen opposite, then I say the late government was not true to its duty as administrators of the country's affairs in allowing that combine to exist through all these later years, because the association I have spoken of has been in existence for a great many years. Now I want to go further, and say that not only is there competition between these various associations and large companies who are operating in the western parts of Canada, in Alberta and British Columbia, but there is another association which is entirely distinct from the millmen and manufacturers, namely, the Retailers' Association in the Northwest. This retailers' association is simply an association of the retail lumber merchants of the prairie provinces. I know nothing whatever of their organization or of their operations, other than what any citizen may know from general report. But the hon. member for Assiniboia (Mr. Turriff) stated to-day that when the combine, as he called it,—and which, by the way, they have not proved to exist —when the combine existed they controlled the retail market in the Northwest, and because of this fact the retailers broke away from the lumbermen of the west and formed an organization of their own. This is the explanation made by the hon. gentleman, who will correct me if I am not right—they formed an association for importing American lumber for the purpose of giving relief to the persecuted farmers of the Northwest. Am I correct?

Mr. TURRIFF. No, I did not say that at all.

Mr. STEVENS. Well, the hon. member may not have used those exact words, but that was the impression he gave.

Mr. TURRIFF. If that was the impression the hon. gentleman took from my words, he must have misunderstood me, because I had no such idea in my mind. 'Hansard' will show what I said.

Mr. STEVENS. Yes, 'Hansard' will show, but unfortunately we haven't it here. In any case, what I say is that there is a retail association in the northwest which was organized for the purpose of protecting their own interests as retail lumbermen. But the contention is, whether the hon. member for Qu'Appelle (Mr. Thomson) made it or not, that these retailers' associations were formed in self defence to protect themselves against the western millmen, and they proceeded to import American lumber. Now what is the result? Prior to the formation of this retailers' association, the price of lumber in the Northwest was cheaper than it is at the present time, since the association has been in operation; in other words, with the change in the system of distribution of the lumber direct from the millmen of the west by the retail organization as it now exists, the farmers of the Northwest have to pay more for their lumber to-day. That fact I think will not be questioned by hon. gentlemen opposite. Now I want to ask, if this combine which is talked about so glibly by hon. gentlemen exist to-day what has the late government ever done, or what has any single member who is now so agitated over this question ever done, to remedy that condition, to bring this combine to task, and break it up? Nothing whatever. The hon. member for Kootenay (Mr. Goodeve) threw down a challenge when he said that he was prepared, on his responsibility as a member of this House, to offer, on behalf of the lumbermen of the west, to pay the expenses of a full investigation into the combine, if such exists, and if that combine is found to exist they will stand the cost.

Now, I want to tell hon. gentlemen opposite and every western member here, that so far as I am concerned, if it can be demonstrated that there is a combine in existence in the west, whether in lumber or in any other article, a combine in restraint of trade, I shall take my stand in the House independently, and irrespective of the stand of any other member, against such a combination. I am prepared, and I am sure I am uttering the sentiments of a great many other members of this House, to say that if you can demonstrate there is such a thing in existence as a combination in restraint of trade, I am prepared to deal with it by legislation in this parliament. Had hon. gentlemen opposite been serious in their charges regarding combinations of various kinds, they would long ago have introduced legislation to deal with them. Combinations, as I said a moment ago, do not grow up in a day; they are, as the hon. member for Red Deer (Mr. Clark) said the other day, the direct evolution of the modern industrial system. Furthermore, a combination that is an evolution of the modern industrial system is not injurious to trade, provided it is properly controlled by the administration of the country. But if these combines have grown up and I admit that some of them are in existence in the northwest, if they have reached a state of maturity, if they have become strongly entrenched in the community, it is owing to the nurture afforded them by the late administration and is not a result of the present government's policy. These combinations have been bequeathed by the late government, and this government is under the necessity of dealing with them. Instead of meeting the conditions as they developed, instead of meeting step by step the growth of trade and the advance in industrialism, the late government have allowed matters to drift until they have bequeathed to the present government, in this and other respects, problems which it will take a great deal of time, energy and thought to solve.

Now, Sir, I want to refer briefly to the question of reciprocity to which reference has been made. Hon. gentlemen opposite have stated that in the last election campaign the lumber interests of the west were strongly opposed to reciprocity. Well, I want to advise hon. members that in the riding which I represent, the city of Vancouver and surrounding district, where there are some of the largest mills in the world, and where there are centred the largest lumber interests on this continent, there were a number of lumbermen who favoured reciprocity because it was going to advantage them individually, as it would enable them to ship their red cedar lumber over to the United States where there was no competition. But we cannot base legislation on the interests of a certain number of persons, we have to take into consideration the interests of the country as a whole, not of this section or that section. As a matter of fact, at the present time there is a great deal of lumber being shipped into Vancouver. The Transcontinental railway, which was a child of the late administration, is buying practically all their lumber from the mills in Bellingham and Seattle. I think they gave one order for ten million feet of timber to be delivered in Vancouver. Hon. gentlemen will say: How does it come that the British Columbia mills cannot compete on their own ground with the American mills? Well, the proposition is exceedingly simple. For a number of years the American mills as a matter of economy have been sawing night and day, keeping up large stocks of lumber expecting that the time would come when there would be an extra demand for their lumber and they will be able to get rid of it. As we all know at the present time, and for over a year past, the American lumber market has been in a stagnant condition. As soon as the political agitation came on two years ago, the railways shut down all their extensions, except those that were absolutely necessary. The consequence is that there is a very poor demand for lumber on the other side. In addition to that, the banking system in the United States is such that no one bank can carry a large lumber concern for a year or two, and the result is that through financial stringency they have been forced to place on the market these large accumulated stocks. I want to tell the farmers of the northwest this, that while at the present time they are receiving certain benefits from the American lumber, that will only last for a short time. It is a temporary and a transitory relief, something that will last just so long as they cannot get rid of their lumber. There is no body of men who are so willing to put up the price and corner the market as are the manipulators of various lines of business on the other side of the line. I think I am perfectly safe in making that statement.

So it is claimed that the condition of the trade on the other side of the line is a blessing in disguise to the farmer of the northwest. As a result of that stagnation there is no business, and they are forced to throw their hoarded up stocks on the market and get rid of them chiefly in order to protect themselves from going into liquidation. These are the actual conditions, which can be verified by an examination of the facts. That being so, and I do not think any hon. member would question the accuracy of the statement, it is exceedingly ill-advised that the citizens, or farmers if you like, of the northwest should use this as a lever to force the lumbermen of the Pacific coast into exactly the same commercial condition as that which exists south of the line. We are prepared on the Pacific coast to meet any fair competition, we are anxious to, but we are not prepared to meet the overloaded stocks thrown on the market in competition with lumber or anything else that we may make. I do not think that any hon. member would seriously advocate such a policy. Yet, as a matter of fact, that is exactly what is being supported by hon. members opposite.

I desire to draw your attention to another point. When we were met with the condition that our natural resources were jeopardized by the passing of that reciprocity treaty, we feared, and rightly so, I think, that our large areas of pulp wood would be placed at the mercy of the pulp interests of the United States. As a matter of fact that is exactly what would have resulted if reciprocity had passed. Instead of having, as we have at the present time, six or seven large pulp mills in British Columbia, these places would have been shut up, and the pulp wood would have been shipped to the American side, and there manufactured. As far as I am concerned, as a member and supporter of the Liberal-Conservative party, our policy is the development of our own industries in our own country and the utilization of our own resources. If there is a question of something that we cannot manufacture here I am willing to consider at any time the reduction of the tariff, but when it is a question of whether we are going to be the purveyors of raw material to the manufacturers south of the line or whether we are going to manufacture these raw materials in our own country, I stand unhesitatingly on the policy that our own raw materials should be manufactured at home. Furthermore, I contend that these large areas of pulpwood, whether in British Columbia, Quebec, New Brunswick, or any other part of the Dominion, are the just and fair right and heritage of the manufacturer of Canada. What I do agree with is that when we give certain privileges to companies or organizations in regard to these resources they should be properly safeguarded. There should be legislation which would prevent the organization of combines in restraint of trade. I most heartily agree with that proposition, and I hope that before this administration is in power for any great length of time, this great problem will be approached and dealt with. It can only be dealt with satisfactorily if we take it up properly and upon a scientific basis. When hon. members opposite charge this government with shelving these various questions, I say that such a charge is absolutely without foundation in fact. They are endeavouring to meet those problems which have been bequeathed to them as a result of the maladministration of the late government, and to deal with them on their merits as they come before them.

Mr. W. E. KNOWLES (Moosejaw). Mr. Speaker, my hon. friend from Vancouver (Mr. Stevens) has impugned the motives with which my hon. friend from Assiniboia (Mr. Turriff) has brought forth this amendment which he has placed in your hands. He seems to think that it is nothing more or less than a political game for the purpose of appealing to the rural vote of the prairie provinces, and he seems to question whether it has any practical end in view. If my hon. friend had been in the House during the last parliament he would have recalled the fact that those who are his own political friends, when they sat on this side of the House, were most ingenious in the creation and production before this House of motions, which, on the face of them, were nothing more or less than propositions for the purpose of catching votes. They were brought forth upon matters upon which the party was not united, they were brought forth to ends and purposes which, the party, since they have come into power, have not shown themselves devoted to. My hon. friend might also have been impressed with this thought that during the last parliament we had five, six or seven members from British Columbia who supported the Conservative party and there was not one of them who during those three years would arise and demand what they now conceive it is necessary and right that we should have had, namely a more strict interpretation of this clause which we are discussing this evening. To their mind to-day there is no doubt as to how this clause should be interpreted. Now it is as clear as the chimney on the housetop. There are men who were very zealous last parliament in performing their duties as the representative voices of their different districts, but during all those three years there was not one of these men, even including the hon. member for Kootenay (Mr. Goodeve) who raised the question of the true, as they say, interpretation of this clause that we are speaking of to-day. It is another remarkable fact that our good friends the manufacturers never brought before the late government the view that they have now brought down. They waited until after dissolution, they waited until the late government was going before the people, and there was possibly an equal chance as to how the elections would go, but, so long as the late government was entrenched in power, and when there was no thought of the other party coming into power they were glad to let sleeping dogs lie. My hon. friend from Vancouver expresses great surprise and regret upon finding that the persons whom he has joined as fellow members of parliament and whom he is compelled to associate with, have been here year after year, and have never done a thing to break up this combine. He speaks, thinking he speaks correctly, but he speaks very far from correctly in the face of the sessional records. He speaks without knowing whereof he speaks. The hon. member for Souris (Mr. Schaffner) will bear me out that members from the prairies on both sides of the House did what they could in the parliament before last to investigate and expose this very combine that the hon. member for Vancouver so vigorously declares does not exist, and never did exist. The hon. member for Souris, the hon. member for Lincoln (Mr. Lancaster), the hon. member for Kings and Albert, N. B., (Mr. Fowler), and other hon. members on that side of the House, who were in the parliament before last, were members of a committee that went fully into this matter of the combine, a committee that took evidence, and I have under my hand the evidence as it is printed in the sessional records. I shall read a word or two of it just to see whether we found a combine on that occasion or not, and just to see whether the hon. member for Vancouver may not find his heart a little lighter when he sees his environment not composed of men so careless about their duty, and so indifferent to the question as he says they were. We have the following finding of that committee, a finding which was unanimously adopted in a House composed of Liberals and Conservatives. This finding is signed by three gentlemen, one of them a prominent Liberal at that time, now deceased, the Hon. Thomas Greenway, who, to a certain extent, represented the consumers of the prairies, the other the hon. member for Lincoln, who, to a large extent, represented the opposition, and the other Mr. William Sloane, then representative from Comox-Atlin, whose heart was on the same side of this matter as is that of my hon. friend from Vancouver.

Their signatures will be found on page xxvii of the 'Journals of the House of Commons,' vol. 42, 1906-7. I shall read this much for the benefit of the hon. member for Vancouver (Mr. Stevens):

> Your committee also find that more recently the manufacturers formed associations known as 'the British Columbia Lumber and Shingle Manufacturers Association,' and 'The Mountain Lumber Manufacturers' Association,' which, in the opinion of the committee, amount to a combination, and co-operated with the said retail associations.

The finding of that committee was made the finding of the House of Commons of that day. My hon. friend says nothing was done. This parliament is not potent to do anything towards prosecuting combines, as the Minister of Labour has told us time and time again, but the Liberal government of Alberta, the citizens of which province were more intimately associated with this matter at that time than any others, taking that evidence as their brief, prosecuted these men, they were found guilty and penalized according to the Criminal Code enacted by this parliament. The hon. member for Vancouver (Mr. Stevens), should retract this statement with regard to the indifference and indolence of those who have been in this House longer than he has been.

A combination did exist. I shall not read much of the evidence which was wrung from the men who gave it, the men who, according to the hon. member for Kootenay (Mr. Goodeve), come with their hands up and say 'We court an investigation, we are anxious for it.' Bless their hearts, and they are ready to bear the expense of the investigation if a combination is proved. They came before that committee, and Conservative and Liberal alike who were members of that committee will bear me out that they were misleading and endeavoured to mislead the committee in every way they could without committing perjury. We had to wring the evidence from them; they evaded the question so that every answer required a dozen questions to elicit it where one should have done. It was almost impossible to get any information out of them. I shall read a word or two of the evidence before that committee. At page 191, of the same sessional record to which I have referred, there is a sworn minute from the record book of the British Columbia Mountain Lumber Association, wherein they set the prices for the sale of lumber by all men belonging to that association:

> The meeting sat as a committee on the whole and took up the price list item by item, with the result that the following changes were made up on majority votes, the advances being named below over the No. 10 list:
> | | | | | |
> |---|---|---|---|---|
> | 4-inch | boards | advance | $0 50 | per M. |
> | 6 | " | " | 1 50 | " |
> | 8 | " | " | 0 50 | " |
> | 10 | " | " | 0 50 | " |
> | 12 | " | " | 0 50 | " |
> | Resawn boards | | advance.. | 1 00 | " |
> | Dimension | " | " .. | 0 50 | " |
> throughout.
> Ten other classes of timber were advanced by the following amounts:
> $1, 50c., 50c., $1, $1, $1, $2, $1, $2, $5.

Those are the advances they put in cold blood in their minute book and which no member of that association was permitted, on peril of expulsion, which meant the ruination of his business, to violate. One poor fellow named Krapfel wanted to sell certain lumber for a bit less than the rest. At page 186 of the evidence it appears that Mr. Krapfel asked permission for the North Star Lumber Company to sell a certain stock of rough lumber piled at Cranbrook, 1,500,000 feet, for the same price as surface lumber. He explained the reason for his request and after submitting to a vote, permission was granted. Does my hon. friend think there is no combine there to keep up prices? He defined the combine as a combination of men formed to keep up prices. We find that these men set out these facts in cold blood on the record of their minute-book. We find that before Mr. Krapfel could sell he had to ask permission and give his reasons and when a vote was taken he was permitted to sell this rough lumber at the same price as surface lumber.

For my own part I am against protection from start to finish, but doubly so when we come to such unworthy combinations, to such parasites upon society as these combines are.

The proceedings of this committee lasted for a great while. It was attended by lumbermen who came in their defence, and by others who came to give evidence as to the working out of the combination. One gentleman, a retailer, Mr. Thomas Wilkinson, a well known man from Regina, gave evidence. He wanted to buy lumber from these lumbermen and they would not sell. The copies of the letters are here from the lumber people in British Columbia saying they could not sell to him because he had not a certificate of membership in the retail association. The Harrison River Mills and Trading Company wrote after he tried to get admission and could not:

I am very sorry to hear that you have failed in getting membership. No doubt it will come in due time. You will likely be able to get some lumber outside the association, but I fancy most of the mills belong to it. However, I only wish you the best kind of success in your new venture, and hope the day is not far distant when we will be able to sell you lumber. We would be only too glad to do it now if we could.

A free country? The manager of a great milling company writes that he would be glad to sell if he could but the combine will not allow it. The consumers on the prairie in the last resort feel the wring of that combine and the pressure of it on their shoulders.

I have another extract to read. I am sorry the Minister of Militia is not here because gentlemen will remember that in the last session of the parliament before last he made a few remarks on a motion to go into Supply on behalf of lumber, desiring that it should be protected. He called attention to the need of protection for the lumbermen and made out as good a case as he could with a view to bringing the matter before the people in as favourable a light as possible. I want to read the words I had the honour of using myself, on that occasion. I took the stand there which I take now with regard to protection, and I have taken it since and propose taking it so long as I am a member of this House. I said, at page 9513 of the 5th volume of the 'Hansard' of 1907-8:

One reason why we are always afraid of the men engaged in lumbering is that there is such danger that they will become combinsters, and I deliberately state that protection is the mother of trusts and combines. Tariffs breed trusts, and if there is one thing in which there should be no trust, that thing is lumber. For my part, I am against protection from start to finish, protection is to me an abomination. I support the Liberal party because of the two parties it is the one that favours the lower duties. But if a strong party decidedly devoted to free trade were to arise, I would be a supporter of that party, regarding its tariff policy, in this House, as representing my constituents, I believe I serve them best by supporting the party that goes furthest in granting a low tariff.

Mr. KNOWLES.

That is the stand I took then, and I take it now, and I repeat that I am sorry to see protection in any form, but especially sorry to see the favour of protection granted to people who so little deserve it as these heartless institutions, the lumber manufacturers' combine in British Columbia.

My hon. friend the Minister of Customs had an excellent chance of showing which way he is going to turn his footsteps when this matter came before him. It is not often that you can get at the combines. Their workings are essentially hidden. Conspiracy to be conspiracy must be in darkened places. You cannot have conspiracy out of doors. It is only in unexpected moments, when they reveal and expose themselves, that you have an opportunity of dealing to these illegitimate combinations the deathblow which they so well deserve. My hon. friend had his opportunity at that time, but did he take advantage of it? Let me tell him how the late government interpreted that clause—the brief way in which they disposed of it. I read from a letter in the return which has been brought down, signed by the Commissioner of Customs under date of the 17th of August, 1911. That was after the dissolution of parliament. This letter was addressed to the North Pacific Lumber Company, and it says:

I am to state that the rating of lumber for customs purposes is determined according to its condition when imported. That is the point. The rating is settled by the condition of the article at time of entry.

When the lumber comes to the border line the Minister of Customs insists on going back over its previous history to find out if it was planed and afterwards sawn. He seems to think that the customs tariff gives him the liberty to look into the antecedents of that bit of lumber. The answer of the late government was that they would look at it when it came across the boundary, and if it was entitled to be free there, free it would remain, and that is all that the law has to say about it. I have endeavoured to show that this combination exists. If anybody still doubts it, I would like to read the Winnipeg 'Telegram.' I read the other day when I moved for these papers. I am sorry that I am put to the necessity of wearying the House by reading at least a part of it again to show that this self-confessed combine does exist.

Mr. SPEAKER. I would remind the hon. member that it is not permissible to refer to a previous debate.

Mr. KNOWLES. If I had the paper I could read it; but, Mr. Speaker, I bow to your ruling. That article appeared after this government came into power and after this nefarious thing was perpetrated, and the 'Winnipeg Telegram' distinctly says that the Lumbermen's Association met in the city of Calgary and decided that they would close up many of the running mills, sell off their horses, dismiss some 200 travellers, reduce the supply, have only one place for selling, meet all competition from the United States and put it out of business at any cost, and control the market. One of the sub-headings in that article states 'there would be absolutely no compensation. That was in the Winnipeg 'Telegram,' a Conservative paper, and therefore it will not be doubted by hon. gentlemen opposite. There is no doubt that the minister was warned before these people came to Ottawa, because that same article said that they were sending a deputation to impress on the government the necessity of greater protection, in order that they might establish a complete monopoly. What is a monopoly but limiting the supply and making it inadequate to the reasonable requirements of the demand? And that is what they were trying to do by coming to Ottawa to get more protection. The hon. member for Vancouver (Mr. Stevens) asks what is our motive in bringing this matter up? I would ask what is the motive of our hon. friends opposite in the stand they take? Our motive is to get the Minister of Customs, even at this late date, to say that that ruling was erroneous and ill-advised and to retract it. Our motive is to warn him that when he undertakes to give greater protection to the manufacturers, he will find as determined and persistent antagonism to it as it is possible for an opposition to put up. That is our intention; what is the intention of the hon. gentlemen opposite in defending protection? What is the intention of the hon. member for Kootenay (Mr. Goodeve), with all his sophistries and twaddle about the home market? The intention is that the poor homesteader on the prairie shall be bled for the benefit of the manufacturer, and we are against that from the drop of the hat. The Minister of Customs had before him this combine on the one hand, and the consumer, the farmer, on the other hand; to which would he give the preference? He tries to cast the responsibility on the Customs board, but he is only joking. This government try to cast the responsibility for everything on somebody else. Last night, being fearful of their own friends they shirked the 'Ne Temere' business and sent it across the Atlantic to the Privy Council. They are responsible for it, and the country will hold them responsible. The Minister of Customs had to decide between this great combine, rich and powerful, and well organized, and the poor consumers, not organized, not banded together, to a great extent the wards of the government, and he was not equal to the occasion. There he was at the parting of the ways. He capitulated to the strong and the mighty, and he turned down the poor consumers. He had before him the combine on the one hand, and the consumers, who are the nation-builders, on the other; he encouraged the combine and rebuffed the nation-builders. At the beginning of his career he made the mistake of penalizing where he should have encouraged and encouraging where he should have penalized. It is worthy of remark that the lumber interests came here in equal force at the time the late government went out of power.

I should never cease to be proud when I consider that the late government, which I supported in this House a number of years, interpreted the Customs Act as they did in spite of the fact that we had a solid number seven from British Columbia at the time opposed to that interpretation and all favourable to the lumbering interests but in spite of that the Laurier government decided in favour of the consumers. But this new government have changed it to meet the views of the lumber manufacturer to the detriment of the consumer. My right hon. friend who led the late government (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) looked after the consumers. My hon. friend, the Minister of Customs, would no doubt have found it hard to refuse his friends from British Columbia what they asked. To have done so would have embarrassed him. I think, however, he would have done better to refuse his friends when they were in the wrong than betray the people's trust. The result is that the homesteader, the consumer, has now to pay a duty which he did not previously have to pay. Change the Act or do anything you like with it, the result is there, and he has to pay today what he did not have to pay before.

It is noticeable, on going through this return which the Minister of Customs has brought down, not only did the department go to the special trouble of sending out, specially to all the customs collectors, instructions to be very careful about warning all the tax collectors to get all the duty they could on lumber, but they also provided the men at the frontier ports with stamps for use in stamping the face of the manifest with the words:

This car contains dutiable lumber.

That was to be done when the frontier officer was able to give this information on inspection of the car without unloading the freight. If the officer was able to inspect it and do a little detective work and find out that the lumber was dutiable, he should stamp on the face of the manifest the words 'this car contains dutiable lumber,' and then it runs the gauntlet before the collectors of customs at Regina or Moosejaw, or wherever it eventually gets in.

There is something more which the minister does not include in the return. They got a man from Ontario and they sent him out to the west with a few bits of sticks to all the collectors of customs, and he said to them: When you get a stick with this particular mark on it, spot it.

So careful were they that by no chance would the consumers get the advantage of the interpretation which the late government had put on lumber during so many years. This shows more than a mere desire to carry out the spirit of the Act. It shows the desire of the new government to deliver the goods to their friends who had helped them into office. This shows that the right hon. the First Minister, and his friends were ready at that early day to give something to their supporters, the manufacturers, as an earnest of what they might expect later when this administration felt itself more secure in the saddle. And the manufacturers no doubt accepted this favour as an instalment of what would be given them when the government really got down to business.

It has been said this afternoon that the lumber brought to Canada was sold at prices ruinously cheap. That can be disposed of in one word. The hon. member for Kootenay trifled with it as with many other points. He said the dumping clause was never put into practice because the manufacturers had not asked for it. I do not know that it was up to them to ask for it. The government did not refer that question to them. If it was necessary for them to ask for it they could have asked for the benefit of that clause. But, in any event, according to their own statement the dumping clause has been violated and the Minister of Customs must face the issue. He stands now charged with an infraction of the law in not having enforced the Customs Act, which is more serious than a mistake in the interpretation of a clause of the Customs Act.

As regards what the hon. member for Kootenay (Mr. Goodeve) said about his precious home market. It appears that British Columbia buys some of our oats and consequently say they we should buy their lumber. I do not know where we will stop if because it suits some people in British Columbia to buy our prairie oats we are to supply them with a market for everything they have. We do not get any more for our oats because these people buy them. They buy their oats as cheaply as they can; and if they found the prices on the prairies higher than in Oregon, if they could buy their oats from Oregon and pay the duty and expenses, and get them cheaper than in our own country, they would not buy them from us. But even if they do buy a few bushels, that does not do us any good. We sell our oats on an export basis, and it is a matter of indifference to us whether we sell them to British Columbia or not. This home market business is played out. If we have to tax the whole of Canada for the sake of giving some man a home market, then we are in a very peculiar position indeed. Let us take this home market policy and carry it to its logical conclusion. If it means anything, it means that it should constitute the permanent basic principle on which we should carry on the business of the country. Let us suppose that all we produce could find a sale in the home market. If there be a home market for 5,000 sets of working harness, the harness manufacturers will produce that much and will have no object in producing more. But the farmer is in a different position. He must produce enough every year to be ready for a bad year and still have enough for the home market. But when he has supplied the needs of the home market, what will he do with his surplus? Carry this home market principle to its logical conclusion, and it leads to absurdity. In agricultural products, we must be on an export basis. There is no home market for all that we produce, and we must find markets for our surplus. In this matter the manufacturer and the farmer are like two men, one of whom has a pocket into which he tells his friend he may put his hand and his friend will find nothing in it. Then he knows that his friend has a pocket into which he would be very glad to put his hand, and he says to him: You put your hand into my pocket, let me put mine into yours. A man who could put such a policy into practical effect would soon become a millionaire. These people say to us: We want your home market and we want to have the exclusive monopoly of it because we give to you our home market in which you can sell us a few bushels of oats for our horses. If a protectionist knows that he is asking a favour or a privilege, I can talk with him intelligently.

But if he persists in arguing on the basis that he has a fair and logical argument to go upon, I confess I have never been able to reach a basis of intelligent discussion with such a protectionist. Suppose a father has four sons, one of whom gets a percentage from the rest on all they handle. That son gets a privilege, and as long as he recognizes it as a privilege, you can understand the relationship of that family. But once that boy gets the idea that he rules the home and owns his brothers, that because he is privileged he is the big one of the house, there is no reaching an understanding—you can only put that boy out, he must be disciplined. And it seems to me it has about come to that in Canada. The protectionists have so long had too much to say; they have been so long favoured and privileged, that they have lost a realizing sense of the fact that it is a privilege which we have given them, and it will be up to the people of Canada to give these people to understand that we cannot deal with them on a basis of argument, and that until they recognize that that which they hold is a privilege we are unable to intelligently discuss the matter. Now, what our hon. friends from British Columbia want is an exclusive market for their lumber on our prairies. They think that because they spend a little money in our country, because they buy some cereals—it suits them to do so—therefore they have an argument in favour of compelling us to purchase their lumber. For my part, I wish we could get rid of this home market business altogether. British Columbia can take its home market and stick it in its pipe and smoke it, so far as we are concerned. I represent 90,000 people of Saskatchewan who are not a whit better off for the home market. We are ready to do business as Canadians. The hon. member for Kootenay (Mr. Goodeve) grew patriotic—he would not be the good Tory he is if he could not grow patriotic. He presented to us a view of the whole country, each part building up the other. That is very fine, and we join with him heartily in it. But let this 'home market' talk be stopped. It does not help us in the west, so far as I know, nor does it help the agriculturalists of the Dominion generally. Consider, for instance, this 'home market' in British Columbia. We have 13,000,000 acres under crop, and we have the possibility of between 200,000,000 and 300,000,000 acres to bring under crop. The hon. member for Prince Albert (Mr. McKay) told us not long ago of an immense track north of Prince Albert which had not hitherto been reckoned as arable, but which in the future would be devoted to agriculture. I figure that your home market in British Columbia would take about two and a quarter million bushels, or about one per cent of our present production, and about one-seventh of one per cent of our prospective production. That is the 'home market' which the hon. member so magnanimously offers to give us. In all kindness I tell him to take his home market, if he is going to quote it to us as a reason why we should give him a monopoly of our market, to put in his pipe and smoke it for all we profit by it. We have not as yet heard a number of our hon. friends, especially my hon. friend from Souris (Mr. Schaffner) and my hon. friend from Macdonald (Mr. Staples) on this subject. In the past they have put themselves forward as the zealous friends of the farmer. I trust that on this occasion we shall have the opportunity of welcoming them as true advocates of what I believe is the desire of their constituents in the province of Manitoba.

Mr. J. D. TAYLOR (New Westminister). Mr. Speaker, after listening to these latter day spokesmen of what was once the great Liberal party, I am compelled to the reflection, which I am sure will be shared by many of the older members of that party, that still greater has been the fall thereof. The address which has just been delivered by the hon. member for Moosejaw might have been expected from a member of one of the legislatures of the United States. It might have been the hostile deliverance of some representative of Washington, of Idaho, or Montana, or of one of the other border states of the American union still feeling the soreness they have been experiencing since we in Canada, in our wisdom, decided that we would continue to administer our own affairs in our own way, and allow our American cousins to do the same on their side. To answer a question put by the hon. gentleman who has just resumed his seat, before the House has quite forgotten it, I will take up first some of his remarks instead of dealing with this matter as perhaps it might more properly have been dealt with in accordance with the sequence of events. The hon. gentleman asked, what is the motive of the supporters of the Conservative party in bringing this matter to the attention of this government?

I am in as good a position as any hon. member of the House to answer that question, because I had the honour, in pursuance of my duty to my constituents, to bring this matter personally to the attention of the Minister of Customs and to secure from him the action which was taken. And I have pleasure in telling the hon. member for Moosejaw (Mr. Knowles) what was one of my motives, a strongly compelling motive, in coming to Ottawa to see the Minister of Customs. My motive was to endeavour to restore the Department of Customs to the path of rectitude which for so many years it had followed and from which it had departed, so far as we know, only in the declining days of the late administration when the grafters of Canada had made of the department their latest possession. We heard from the hon. member the statement made with the boldness and with the lack of accuracy characteristic of nearly every statement of supposed fact made on that side to-day, that no one thought it worth while to approach the late government with a complaint upon this score, that it remained for the Conservative party, the friends of the manufacturers to whom the hon. gentleman so contemptuously refers, to be in power, before the people who thought themselves aggrieved came to Ottawa seeking a remedy. The House is entitled to expect from a member in the position of the hon. gentleman, when addressing it with a return in his hand, that if he purports to quote from the return he shall make a correct quotation. Yet, what do we find? In contrast with his statement that not until the Conservative party came into power was this issue raised, we find this letter in the return in the hon. gentleman's possession and in the possession of every hon. member on that side:

The North Pacific Lumber Company, Ltd.
Barnet, B.C., Aug. 9, 1911.

F. C. T. O'Hara, Esq.,
Deputy Minister
Department of Trade and Commerce.
Ottawa.

Dear Sir,—We wish to draw your attention to the tremendous increase in importations of lumber from the United States, particularly the increase in kinds admitted free of duty.

A number of manufacturers in the states of Washington and Idaho have ingeniously placed a saw behind their planers when planing their dimension lumber on one side and one edge, and by means of this saw endeavour to give the lumber the appearance of having been planed on one side only.

Lumber manufactured in this way is further manufactured and planed on one side and is therefore dutiable, but a great deal of lumber manufactured in this way is coming into our country free of duty. This is not in the best interest of trade and commerce and we cannot see why a smart practice like this on the part of the United States manufacturers should admit this particular lumber free of duty when the tariff places a duty of 25 per cent on all lumber planed on one side and one edge.

Yours truly,
North Pacific Lumber Co., Lt.,
Per J. H. MACDONALD.

Mr. KNOWLES. Does the hon. gentleman mean to say that I made some misrepresentation?

Mr. TAYLOR. I think I was plain in what I said. I said the hon. member had stated to this House that the persons aggrieved by the importation of this lumber, had not appealed to the late government on the subject, but had waited until the Conservative party, the friends of the manufacturers, had come into office before they raised this question.

Mr. KNOWLES. The hon. gentleman is mistaken. I said distinctly that not until after dissolution, when it was impossible to tell which party would be returned, was this question raised.

Mr. TAYLOR. I leave it to the judgment of the House whether the word 'dissolution' was mentioned before to-night.

Mr. KNOWLES. That is what I said.

Mr. TAYLOR. Now we have this answer, following this story for a time in its chronological order. First of all, I wish to say that this return, while it purports to give everything on the files in relation to this matter, is far indeed from presenting a complete story of the applications to this government in connection with this lumber duty. I say without hesitation—and it is unfortunate, in a limited sense, that there is so small a remnant present of the late government, because I would like to say to all these gentlemen that so far from this matter not having been presented to them until after dissolution, as the hon. gentleman has said just now, in correction of his statement as I first understood it—this protest had been presented to them a long time before, and had been discussed amongst the ministers themselves. I cannot say that it had been discussed in council, because I am not permitted to know that, but I do know that it was discussed amongst the ministers themselves, and that several ministers of the late government were deeply concerned indeed over the agitation by their own friends about this illegal importation of lumber. I believe there was in the possession of those ministers at one time an urgent representation from one of their colleagues that something should be done to stop this illegal importation. That record, this letter, it is true, is not among these papers, but there is evidence in these papers of representations made to the late government more than a year before dissolution, very strong representations, as to the illegality of the method being pursued by the importers of this contraband lumber, and appealing to them to take action.

Mr. KNOWLES. Where does the hon. gentleman find that in the files?

Mr. TAYLOR. I will supply the references when I come to them, they are under my hand; and I would suggest to hon. gentlemen that, before they stand up in this House in so serious a vein as they pretend to assume, it would be well for them to make themselves masters of their text, and to read the documents upon which they base their complaint. Now I would digress for a minute to say to the hon. member for Assiniboia (Mr. Turriff)—I am sorry he is not in his seat, but he will read it in 'Hansard'—that there is an explanation why the consumer in the northwest provinces never got any benefit from this illegal importation of lumber, and which shows how it happens that since that illegal importation has stopped the consumer suffers no injury, and the price has not been raised to him. We have another reason than the lumber bargain counter mentioned in this House, we have a reason based on the fact that in this connection the late government, notwithstanding their present professions of so warm and all-embracing friendship for the farmers of the Northwest Territoies, when they got an opportunity to stand man fashion for these farmers, declined to do it, but crawled into the cellar, and allowed the dispute to go on, making no effort to settle it. I would remind those gentlemen that if at any time this government, or any government, finds that a duty is oppressive, it has at its disposal the resource taken by the government so recently in the matter of the duty on coal imported into the Northwest provinces. If these gentlemen had thought that the tariff as enacted oppressed the farmers of the Northwest, they had it in their power to declare that lumber coming in under any one of those items in the schedule should be free of duty. But did they do it? Is there a word from first to last in this document to show that they ever made a manly statement, ever gave notice to all concerned, that they were privileged to bring in this class of lumber? I say there is not one word. But these gentlemen chose to put themselves in the questionable position of allowing the matter to be carried out in an underhand way, and allowed the lumber to be invoiced into Canada under descriptions it was not entitled to bear. If these gentlemen were seized with the idea now advocated by those who have spoken with so great an appearance of feeling in this House, if these were their real sentiments, a stroke of the pen, an order in council, would have settled the question beyond any controversy. The hon. gentleman leads the House to believe that had the Liberal government remained in power, nothing whatever would have been done in the direction of enforcing the duty on lumber provided by this Act. Now, I would call the attention of the hon. gentleman who last addressed the house to an oversight on his part when he was quoting from the return—and he was the only gentleman who handled the return—when, by some miracle, he lost sight of this little letter. The letter is an answer to still another complaint addressed to the late government from the Island Lumber Company, Limited, dated at Duncan, British Columbia, on the 2nd September, 1911.

Hon. J. C. McDougald,
Commissioner of Customs, Ottawa.

Dear Sir,—We are glad to notice through the medium of the press, that the matter of importing American lumber dressed on two sides, duty free, is to have your attention.

Now, here is the reference for which the hon. gentleman asked as to former representations to the government:

We were under the impression that the British Columbia Lumber Manufacturers' Association, Ltd., had written to you in Ottawa last year, on this important subject. We beg to state that many millions of feet, we believe more than 150 millions as a matter of fact, of material of this kind, have escaped payment of duty within the last year or two, mainly we think through the lumber being wrongly described.

The facts are these, that all joists, studding and scantlings are sized by machinery in order to bring each and every piece to exactly the same dimension, and it makes no difference whether the sizing is done by a planer or by a saw, the object can be accomplished in either way. The American manufacturers, however, do both. They are in the habit of planing this lumber on one side and one edge and then disguising the edge by slightly defacing the small surface with a circular saw, and their price lists and invoices are made to read 'Saw edged,' implying that only one side of the material is dressed.

We trust this information may be of interest to you, and it is needless to say that we shall be very glad to see that the proper duty is imposed.

Yours very truly,
Island Lumber Company, Limited,
Per (Sgd.) W. MARRIOTT.

One would think from the antics, Mr. Speaker—but I desire to be strictly parliamentary—the performances, the words of these hon. gentlemen this afternoon, that their government, upon receiving a letter of that kind, would have, to use a common expression, thrown a fit at the very suggestion that any concessions enjoyed by the farmers of the Northwest should be reduced in any way. One would expect to find that the Commissioner of Customs, or the late Minister of Customs himself, would be bold enough to address a letter calling down this man on Vancouver Island who suggested that any person in the Northwest should pay a duty on any product of the industry of their neighbours on the Pacific coast. We would have expected these gentlemen to be bold as roaring lions, and to declare that in no instance whatever, would they consent to any ruling or decision which would impose a duty as suggested. But great would be our disappointment, if we were not in that frame of mind, when we read the pacific reply, dated the 19th September, and which is as follows:

The Island Lumber Co.,
Duncan, B.C. (Vancouver Island).

Gentlemen,—I have the honour to acknowledge the receipt of your letter of the 2nd instant, respecting the importation of American lumber dressed on two sides.

I have carefully noted your representations regarding lumber sized by use of a planer or fine saw.

I have noticed in the newspapers the representations made at the meeting of the sawmill men at Vancouver on the 1st September, and expect to hear further from them in respect of the matter.

The Minister of Customs is expected to return here in a few days, when I will bring your letter to his notice.

I have the honour to be,
Gentlemen,
Your obedient servant,
(Sgd.) JOHN McDOUGALD,

From that day until the happy release of the Minister of Customs on the 10th of October, that gentleman was not brave enough to utter the first syllable on behalf of the down-trodden farmers of the Northwest, but handed them over to the tender mercies of his successors in office, the manufacturers' friends, the Conservatives, to those whom he had every reason to believe would deal so ruthlessly with them, instead of settling up the matter man fashion, and deciding before he went out what the interpretation was with respect to that grade of lumber. I would ask you to contrast the statements of hon. gentlemen with the history, as shown in this return, indicating that the late government were too cowardly, if I may be permitted to use that language, to face the issue, that they were content to allow their friends in the provinces of Alberta and Saskatchewan to go up and down on the hustings declaring their friendship to the people there while at the same time they were content to allow others in British Columbia and the manufacturing provinces to go around whispering words in the ears of those engaged in the great industries which have made this country what it is to-day, that they had nothing to fear from the continuance of the Liberal party in office. I would ask you to contrast that exhibition of cowardice with the brave words uttered to-day by these hon. gentlemen who are as impotent as they deserve to be.

One would fancy from the complaint of the hon. member for Assiniboia (Mr. Turriff), that something terrible had happened to his constituents and the farmers of the northwest generally, since a date in November, when the Customs Board, in the performance of their duty, directed collectors everywhere to enforce the law. One would fancy that these men had been impoverished by the extra amount they had to pay to the lumber dealers throughout that territory to recoup these dealers for the amount of duty they had to pay at the customs in Canada. One would fancy that if he did not know, what is a matter of notoriety, that the position is not as represented by these hon. gentlemen, that the farmers are not paying one dollar in extra price as the hon. member for Assiniboia, the hon. member for Moosejaw, and others have stated and whose addresses to this House, if taken literally, would lead to the belief that these men had been mulcted in considerable sums by the exorbitant prices that they had been called upon to pay. The fact is that they have not been mulcted one cent, that they have not paid any more than they have been paying for a long time past, and that, therefore, they could not have made any complaint to these hon. gentlemen that prices have been advanced, because of any action by this government. When we look at the records what do we see—that the whole quantity of dutiable lumber, in the form of sawed boards, and the lumber that we are considering to-day, imported into Canada during the month of November, the last month for which these hon. gentlemen can have statistics, is 4,523,000 feet. The duty, at $2 per thousand, would come to $9,000. This is the amount that was collected all over Canada on this lumber. Whilst I am referring to the hon. member for Assiniboia I would like to answer a question which he put to my hon. colleague from Kootenay (Mr. Goodeve), this afternoon which my hon. friend did not seem to understand. The hon. member for Assiniboia asked how it was that the people of British Columbia had grievance in respect to the lumber duty when, at the same time, the great bulk of the importation of that lumber was into the province of British Columbia, that they were, as he said in so many words, bringing it in themselves. I would like to suggest to the hon. gentleman that his observation showed, to my mind, culpable carelessness in the preparation of his brief. It was a clear indication to any person familiar with the facts that the hon. gentleman must have thought so little of his case, and of those for whom he said he was speaking, that he had gone into the matter in a very cursory way indeed, that he had more words than ideas in what he said to this House, and that he was not at all careful that his words should be based on significant facts. It is quite true that during November, 1911, 12,000,000 feet of free lumber, the quantity to which he referred——

Mr. TURRIFF. Listen to this.

Mr. TAYLOR—Yes, listen to this, the hon. gentleman says——

Mr. TURRIFF. I am listening; go on.

Mr. TAYLOR—It is quite true 12,000,000 feet were imported through British Columbia, but I would like to tell the hon. gentleman, if he does not know it already, that when he reads in the customs returns that any dutiable article has been imported at this, that, or the other place, it does not mean that it has been imported by the people of the place indicated, or for consumption there, but it means, as in this instance, that this lumber was imported via the ports of British Columbia, that is that it came from the mills of Washington and Idaho across the boundary line at the most convenient port in British Columbia, and was passed on through British Columbia to its destination in Alberta and Saskatchewan.

That is the answer to the hon. gentleman when he asks why we in British Columbia buy this lumber from the other side if its importation is so great a detriment to us.

Mr. TURRIFF. Is it true that a great deal of that lumber was imported into British Columbia by British Columbia sawmill men for the purpose of reselling it to save cutting their own lumber, they being able to buy it cheaper than they could bring the logs to their mills and saw them?

Mr. TAYLOR. I would not like to say that a great quantity of that lumber was imported under the conditions described?

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. Hear, hear.

Mr. TAYLOR. It is quite true, however, that lumber was so imported, particularly in the mountain districts of British Columbia near the American boundary line. It is quite true that the ruinous prices at which the rough grades of lumber are being sold on the American side make it a good business undertaking for those in the trade in certain parts of British Columbia to buy their supplies from the American side rather than to manufacture. The bearing that that has upon the point at issue is not clear to me but as a matter of fact it is correct.

Mr. TURRIFF. If that is the fact not all of the lumber imported last November could have been for customers in Saskatchewan and Alberta.

Mr. TAYLOR. Again there is an element of correctness in what the hon. gentleman says, but only an element. No doubt not all of the lumber was for customers in Alberta and Saskatchewan because it is quite credible that a board here and there was sold from the yards in British Columbia which imported it, but the fact remains—we are dealing with facts, not quibbles—that the great bulk of this lumber, practically speaking, was imported for reshipment to Alberta and Saskatchewan. I am referring to this 12,000,000 feet to which the hon. gentleman referred, the lumber which came in under the item admitting rough lumber free. The amount that came in dutiable, was, as I have said, the comparatively small total of 4,523,000 feet. The Minister of Customs has been attacked for yielding to some terrible organization known as the Lumber Combine. As I have said in this House before, I have no acquaintance with any lumber combine. The ignorance of these hon. gentlemen is perhaps excusable from the fact that their course as public men representing the territory from which they come does not encourage the establishment of industries in their vicinity. Perhaps on that account they are unfamiliar with the conditions attendant on industry, but I would like to remind them that there can be no successful combine of manufacturers or any other industrial interest without the presence of a very large body of workmen, that we have in the employment of the lumber manufacturers of British Columbia a very large number of the most skilled workmen in Canada who are amongst the highest paid workmen in Canada, men who would be a credit to any country, who are a great credit to Canada, and who are a source of pride to British Columbia, because they and their families are residents of that province. I would like to tell these hon. gentlemen that another motive compelling me to come to Ottawa and place this matter before the government, in addition to my desire to clear the Customs Department from the shadow under which it had fallen, was to preserve the livelihood of several thousand men engaged in the lumbering industry, who are residents of the riding which I have the honour to represent in this House. It was in pursuance of my duty to them, not because of any affection for or any knowledge of any combine that I addressed the Minister of Customs in these terms:

Ottawa, Oct. 25, 1911.

To the Honourable
The Minister of Customs,
Ottawa.

Dear Sir,—I am requested to call your attention to the continuance and increase in volume of the importation of certain descriptions of lumber from the United States intended by the Tariff Act to be dutiable but which is permitted to escape duty because of the application of a process of manufacture not contemplated by the Act. This contraband article consists for the most part of 'jointed' lumber, that is, lumber sized by a process additional to the first sawing, the sizing being sometimes accomplished by what is known as a 'saw-jointer,' rather than by the planer in universal use until very recently. The effect, whether saw-jointer or planer is used, is the same, namely, to render the lumber fit for use in construction without further process.

I understand that this lumber is offered for entry under the description in tariff item 504 of not further manufactured than sawn and dressed on one side, and therefore claimed to be free. The fact is, however, that as to a large portion of the seemingly saw-jointed lumber it has been planed and then subjected to a saw to roughen the smooth edges already made by the planer; which lumber having been jointed by planing is clearly dutiable no matter what disguising process may be applied to it subsequently; while as to that saw-jointed without submission to a planer that is not the sawing contemplated by the words in section 504 on which the importers seem to rely.

I have submitted to the department letters of complaint addressed to me and which clearly set out the methods adopted by foreign lumber manufacturers to evade the provisions of the Canadian law, and also a statement showing how great is the volume of importations made possible by this evasion.

Now I come to the request upon which the minister acted and for which the censure of the House is now invited and I would ask the House to pay particular attention to it:

I ask your earnest attention to the matter and that you may be pleased to direct officers at the ports of entry to make careful inspection of lumber imports to the end that jointed lumber, whether saw-jointed or planer-jointed may be recognized as such and subjected to the rate of duty provided for in the tariff.

What a monstrous request that was for the representative of an industrial riding to make to his government, that an article of manufacture, coming as he believed into unfair competition with the product of a large body of deserving workmen for whom he spoke, and so coming into competition under false pretences, should be scrutinized to ascertain whether or not the pretences were false and should be subjected, as I say here, to the rate of duty provided for in the tariff. It is for that you are asked to condemn the Minister of Customs, that he should cause something, whether lumber or anything else, to be subjected to the rate of duty provided for in the tariff. What course did the present Minister of Customs take? Did he shelve the matter? This matter had been left to him by his predecessors. It is true it had escaped his attention until it was personally brought before him at Ottawa a couple of weeks after he took office, but so late as September 19, the Commissioner of Customs, his deputy, had written to a complainant that the matter was on the files of the department awaiting the attention of the minister; that is awaiting the attention of this minister just as much as the attention of his predecessor.

It was his duty as time went on to clear the files of the department of all the business pending, and this was one item. No doubt his action was hastened by the representations made to him which I have described. But the Minister of Customs took the course prescribed by law. He recognized that the interpretation might be questioned, an interpretation which he was authorized himself to make if he chose, because to me it seems so perfectly plain that I wonder that any person could question it. But the practice, having gone on so long, constituted a question whether or not the then importers were justified in bringing in the lumber as they did; and therefore, that there might be no suggestion of political or other undesirable interference, the minister took the constitutional course of referring the matter to the Board of Customs. Who are the Board of Customs? Did that board change as a result of the elections of the 21st of September? Not a bit of it. The Board of Customs was constituted by hon. gentlemen opposite themselves when they were in the seats of the mighty, the board upon whose honour and honesty they must have had implicit reliance when they placed them in that position—this Board of Customs, inherited by the minister from his predecessors, as this question was, having had the facts submitted to it, took this position.

Declaration of the Board of Customs.

At a meeting of the Board of Customs, held in Ottawa, November 3, 1911.

In connection with the request for a decision as to the rate of duty payable on imported lumber for which free entry is claimed under tariff items 503 and 504, the Board of Customs declared, 'That sawn planks, boards, joists, scantlings, studding and other lumber of wood, dressed on one side, when also dressed wholly or partially on one edge, is dutiable at 25 per cent ad valorem, under the general tariff, on importations into Canada.'

(Sgd.) JOHN McDOUGALD,
Chairman.

What course could be more straightforward than that? Was there anything underhanded about that, any subterfuge? Was any one taken by surprise? It is not on the records, but it is a fact, that the importers of lumber and others were invited to attend at the session of the Board of Customs, and submit their case in the ordinary way? That board, sitting in a judicial capacity, took all the evidence possible, and made what we must accept as its decision.

Mr. TURRIFF. Was the consumer also given an opportunity to appear at the same time and present his side of the case?

Mr. TAYLOR. Every person was given an opportunity of being present for whom that privilege had been secured by the regulations passed by the hon. gentleman's friends, who had been administering the Customs Department for 15 years before that time.

Mr. TURRIFF. Were they notified that there was going to be a meeting on that day?

Mr. TAYLOR. I may answer the hon. gentleman in the same terms, that the Board of Customs followed the course laid out for them by the hon. gentleman's friends, who had been in charge of the board for 15 years. If there is any defect in the course provided for the board, these hon. gentlemen are responsible for it, and the new minister making his first reference to the board cannot properly be charged with any dereliction of duty, or any shifting of responsibility in not holding a serious inquiry into the constitution and habits of the board before referring the matter to them. Upon the decision of the board this circular was sent out:

Department of Customs, Canada,
Ottawa, Nov. 11, 1911.

Memorandum:

Collectors should carry out the law in regard to the collection of duty on sawn lumber, dressed on one side, which is also dressed wholly or in part on one edge.

Collectors should also instruct outports to this effect.

Frontier ports are being supplied with a stamp for use in stamping the face of manifests with the words 'This car contains dutiable lumber' when the frontier officer is able to give this information on inspection of the car without unloading same.

All cars of lumber in bond must be examined by customs officers at port of destination.

(Sgd.) JOHN McDOUGALD,
Commissioner of Customs.

What a commentary upon the condition into which the Department of Customs had been allowed to drift during the 15 years of the administration of hon. gentlemen opposite, that the very first memorandum sent out by the permanent head of that department after the change of government, was a reminder to collectors throughout Canada that the law of Canada had come into its own, and was once again law. This action of the department is nothing but a warning to the officers of customs that there is a law in Canada which they are there to enforce, and that it must be enforced. Horrible thing, these hon. gentlemen say, that there should be one law all over Canada, that there should be no longer a graft or a back door in the Customs Department, that offenders could have no longer immunity in the department if they entered as free matter that which was dutiable. We had the challenge from one of these hon. gentlemen this afternoon that if conditions are as asserted, why does not somebody do something? The hon. gentleman, like his colleagues on that side who have favoured us with their remarks, spoke without information of the regret of the only persons who feel themselves aggrieved by the action of the Board of Customs, and the Commissioner of Customs—because the minister does not really appear in it—that there has since been seized for contraband entry a large number of cars of this lumber which had been improperly manifested into Canada. This is a government that does something, and the hon. member for Qu'Appelle (Mr. Thomson), who this afternoon asked why no person does anything, if this condition of affairs exists, has his answer; and the hon. member for Assiniboia (Mr. Turriff), if he really desires to secure lumber for any of his down-trodden constituents on the best possible terms, should attend the coming auction sale of the confiscated lumber, when he will no doubt be able to secure some for his constituents at a shade under the market price. Now contrast the record I have given with the resolution offered to this House:

That the Minister of Customs, in collecting a duty of 25 per cent on sawn planks, boards, joists, scantling, studding and other lumber of wood dressed on one side, when the edges thereof are neither jointed nor tongued nor grooved, is violating the Customs Act and unduly and illegally imposing a heavy tax on the people.

How under the sun could the Minister of Customs collect from anybody, unduly and illegally, anything imposing a heavy tax on the people that is not provided for by the law? Each of these importers knows there is a law in Canada and that there are courts in Canada to enforce the law, and it remains for hon. gentlemen opposite, when people come to them with complaints to the effect that the Department of Customs is collecting a tax it has no right to collect, to put into operation an appeal to the courts which will effectually prohibit the department from doing anything of the kind. This resolution answers itself, and it is the veriest trifling with the House to ask us to resolve that the Minister of Customs is doing something which we must know, as sensible men, it is absolutely impossible for him to do.

I would suggest to the hon. gentlemen that this expression of the grievance at this particular time by the users of lumber in the Northwest Territories is rather precipitate. I ask was it in the interest of the consumers of lumber in Alberta and Saskatchewan that the late government parted with nearly all the valuable timber land in northern Alberta for a trifling sum to various favourites closely allied with the gentlemen who have addressed the House this afternoon from that side. I would ask the hon. gentlemen who spoke so feelingly this afternoon where were they when this Alberta lumber was being disposed of? Why were they silent on that occasion? Why did they reserve their outcry against the possible creation of combines, against the encouragement of combines, until by the act of the government they supported, in which they themselves had participated, which they advised, encouraged, aided and abetted in every way, a combine had been created in Alberta lumber as binding as any that has ever been created in connection with any of the natural resources of the country.

I would ask these hon. gentlemen why they confine their solicitude for the farmer to the matter of lumber and why they show so implacable hostility to their neighbours in the province of British Columbia? Do they stand for the idea that we are in Canada's nine provinces each at the other's throat to get for itself what seems best for the locality irrespective of the effect upon our neighbours of the other provinces? I would like to address my inquiry particularly to some of my hon. friends from Nova Scotia. It occurs to me to suggest to the hon. member for Pictou (Mr. Macdonald) to the hon. member for North Cape Breton (Mr. McKenzie) and the junior member for Halifax (Mr. Maclean) that at this moment they cherish the hope that the present government may look favourably upon the proposition which they so earnestly urged upon the government lately in office to renew the bounties on steel. If these hon. gentlemen subscribe to the doctrine that each province should stand for itself alone, what position would they expect the members from British Columbia to take with respect to the steel bounties? As to these we are asked to put our hands into our unprotected pockets and contribute towards the payment of bounties to the industries of a province already generously protected. Digressing for a moment I will first ask the hon. member for Assiniboia why his solicitude is confined to lumber and why he has not included coal in his demand for freedom from the tariff? As the hon. gentleman well knows a man builds a house or a barn once in a lifetime but coal is an article of constant consumption particularly in our northwestern climate. The burden of the tax on coal is therefore infinitely greater than the burden of the lumber tariff could possibly be. Yet we hear no suggestion from these gentlemen that the government should remove the duty on coal.

Mr. TURRIFF. I can only say that we are dealing with lumber to-day, but if the government my hon. friend supports will bring in a proposition to put coal on the free list, there will be no stronger supporter of such a proposition than the hon. member for Assiniboia.

Mr. TAYLOR. I would invite the attention of the hon. member for Pictou to the tactics which he will encourage in this House if he supports this amendment. Lumber to-day on the free list—coal tomorrow. I ask the hon. gentleman whether he subscribes to this programme: free lumber to-day, free coal to-morrow? I pause for a reply.

Mr. MACDONALD. My hon friend will hear from me when the occasion requires it.

Mr. TAYLOR. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Macdonald, Pictou) is a type of the government he supported. When the lumbermen came and asked for action on this lumber business, the Minister of Customs was 'away'—'would be back in a few days.' The hon. member for Pictou will answer in a few days. I put the same question to the hon. member for North Cape Breton (Mr. McKenzie). The very existence of his community as an industrial centre depends upon the prosperity of the coal mines. It is represented to the people of Ontario and Quebec who pay so heavily in connection with the coal duty that that duty is a necessity to the prosperity of these mines. I ask the hon. member for North Cape Breton—and I will give him an opportunity to answer—whether he subscribes to the doctrine of free lumber to-day and free coal to-morrow?

Mr. McKENZIE. I am not particularly concerned about lumber. I was always in favour of a duty on coal. I am now and always will be.

Mr. TAYLOR. Now, Mr. Speaker, we have a beautiful illustration of these hon. gentlemen. The hon. member for Assiniboia (Mr. Turriff) wants everything free that he consumes. The hon. member for Pictou (Mr. Macdonald) is like one of the famous products of his waters, dumb, and the hon. member for North Cape Breton (Mr. McKenzie) wants protection for himself but no protection for his fellow-citizens in British Columbia.

Mr. McKENZIE. I did not say that.

Mr. TAYLOR. I am sorry if I misjudge this hon. gentleman. The vote on this resolution will be the test. He cannot support this amendment unless he is in favour of depriving the main industry of British Columbia of what small protection is now afforded it by the law of the land. I invite the attention of the hon. members I have named to consider just where resolutions of this kind will lead us. For my part, I believe in the policy of protection as the only policy that will make of Canada—the policy that has made of Canada—a great country. I want to advance the interests of the provinces of Alberta, Saskatchewan and Manitoba in every possible way. I want to trade with them, to sell to them and to buy from them. I ask the representatives of these provinces to meet us from British Columbia in the same way. I hope I am not speaking boastingly when I say, to meet us in the same broad-minded way in which we endeavour to meet them. For our artisans must live. I would remind the hon. gentleman (Mr. Oliver) who was Minister of the Interior until lately, and who seems to think that this appeal was so great a joke, that these people have not the resources that he has had. They have only their toil to depend upon for a living. And he has not the right to sit here and make a jibe or a joke of a proposition to deprive them of their livelihood.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. The motion before the House is not a motion for the increase or decrease of the tariff. My hon. friend from New Westminster (Mr. Taylor) tells us that he is a protectionist and is in favour of a protective duty on lumber. Rough lumber has been free in this country since 1894. If the hon. gentleman is in favour of protection on lumber, being a prominent supporter of the government, he has a way to bring it about by trying to induce the government to put a duty on the lumber which now enters Canada free. But what we on this side object to is that whilst the tariff makes rough lumber free, the law is violated by collecting a duty on lumber which by law is free. That is the question before the House.

Mr. FOWLER. Why not go before the courts?

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. This is the court of parliament, the greatest of the courts; this is the place to decide whether the law is observed or not observed. I would ask my hon. friend who interrupted me, that if the fact be as we allege that the law of the land is violated by those who are now entrusted with the execution of the law, is there any place but this where the question should be threshed out? We can go to the courts, but going to the courts does not take away the primary jurisdiction of this parliament to decide whether jus—

Mr. FOWLER. But I would point out to the right hon. gentleman that if all those grievances were threshed out in this court of parliament the time of parliament would be occupied to the exclusion of our proper business, while the courts are the proper place in which to thresh out the question.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. If any hon. member has a case to bring up in this parliament, it is his duty to bring it up whatever time may be taken by it. Now, the very wording of the amendment shows that the question is highly technical, and will require some explanation even at this stage of the debate in order that its points may be appreciated by hon. members who now do me the honour to listen to me. The reason for this motion is to be found in the letter which has just been quoted by my hon. friend from New Westminster (Mr. Taylor), and which he addressed to the Minister of Customs. After having complained that certain articles were coming into Canada from the United States upon which no duty was imposed, and having stated from his point of view the duty that ought to be levied upon the same, he concluded:

I ask your earnest attention in the matter and that you may be pleased to direct the officers at the ports of entries to make careful inspection of lumber imports to the end that jointed lumber, whether saw-jointed or planer-jointed, may be recognized as such and subject to the rate of duty provided in the tariff.

Upon this the Board of Customs made a regulation. Now, the Board of Customs is not, as has been said by some hon. gentlemen in the course of this debate, an independent body. It is composed of officers of the Customs Department—well qualified, I admit—who are simply the officers of the minister, and responsible to the minister as the minister is responsible to parliament. I have nothing to say against the Board of Customs. I know them all, and I give every one of them credit for being a man of eminent ability. But, like all human beings, they are fallible; and though I do not in any way question their integrity nor the motive which led them to make the regulation which has been brought to the attention of the House, still I submit that in this matter they have greatly erred.

I again recall attention to the petition of the hon member for New Westminster (Mr. Taylor) it was to the effect that lumber imported which was jointed, whether by saw or by plane, should be subject to duty. Now what is the regulation? It is in these words:

In connection with the request for a decision as to the rate of duty paid on imported lumber for which free entry is claimed under tariff items 503 or 504, the Board of Customs declare that sawn planks, boards, joists, scantlings, studding and other lumber of wood, dressed on one side, when also dressed wholly or partially on one edge, is dutiable at 25 per cent ad valorem.

Now mark the regulation. The prayer was that lumber which was jointed either by saw or by plane should be subject to duty. The regulation is, not that lumber which is jointed, but that lumber which is dressed upon one side only or partially, should be subject to duty; a regulation altogether different from the petition made by the member for New Westminster. Why was this? Why were not the terms of the regulation in the terms of the prayer? Why did one ask for lumber jointed, when it was not lumber jointed which was subjected to duty, but lumber wholly or partially dressed on one edge? There is a reason for it, and to this I now direct attention.

Mr. TAYLOR. If the right hon. gentleman will follow me—I would like to say that as I understand it, the description in the tariff board means jointed lumber, what I understand as jointed lumber.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. If jointed lumber was meant, why didn't it say jointed lumber? It was so easy to take the language of my hon. friend. But if it had been jointed lumber, there could have been no duty then on the article. There is a difference. Here is the article 504 of the tariff.

Lumber—planks, boards and other lumber of wood, sawn, split or cut, and dressed on one side only, but not further manufactured, is free of duty.

Mr. REID. ((Grenville). Read the next item.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. I will. Now let us understand what this means. Here is a piece of lumber which goes into the mill; it is sawn into planks, boards, studding, scantling and joints; it is then planed on one side, and if it is planed on one side it is still counted as rough lumber and comes in free of duty; but if it is planed on two sides, then it is no longer rough lumber, it becomes dressed lumber and is subject to duty. Now I come to the next article:

Sawn boards, planks and deals, planed or dressed on one or both sides, when the edges thereof are jointed, tongued or grooved, subject to 25 per cent duty.

Now see the effect of the two articles. By one article lumber which is dressed on one side alone is not subject to duty; but that same piece of lumber, by the following article 505, when it is dressed on one side, or is jointed, tongued and grooved, then becomes subject to duty; but if it is not tongued, grooved or jointed, then it is not subject to duty. But my hon. friend from New Westminster asked that this kind of lumber should be declared to be tongued. The minister did not dare to say that that kind of lumber to which I referred a moment ago was tongued, but he says 'Dressed wholly or partially.' Well, if the hon. gentleman has authority to say that lumber which is not tongued, jointed nor grooved, but which is dressed on one side, wholly or partially, is subject to duty, where is his authority to say that tongued lumber is subject to duty? This is importing a new article into the code.

Mr. GOODEVE. The minister does not say that, neither does the ruling of the board. But the minister and the board say that where the lumber is jointed or planed on one or two sides, or planed on one side and jointed, it is subject to 25 per cent duty. The word 'partially' there is only to show where they tried to hide the fact that it had been jointed.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. Mr. Speaker, I think I have some knowledge of the English language, and I will read again the ruling of the department:

Mr. TAYLOR.

Sawn planks, boards, joists, scantling, studding and other lumber of wood, dressed on one side when also dressed wholly or partially on one edge.

There is no mention of 'jointed' there, but 'dressed wholly or partially.' If it is dressed but not jointed, tongued nor grooved, where do you find authority to say that it is dutiable when dressed partially or wholly? This is importing a new article.

Mr. GOODEVE. The hon. gentleman must read the ruling in conjunction with the article on which the ruling is asked. The ruling was asked by the lumbermen only on lumber that was jointed. But if they have partially planed away the joint, it is still dutiable.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. Then if it is jointed it is dutiable, if it is not jointed it is not dutiable. The ruling says that the duty shall be collected, not upon jointed lumber, but upon lumber partially dressed. Now there is some meaning in these words. If that lumber was jointed, it was just as easy to say it was jointed, then they could have collected the duty. But we shall find the explanation of the matter in the letter which is to be found on the file, and which was addressed to the member for New Westminster by the Emmerson Lumber Company on October 11. I must say that this is a very able letter. I do not know the writer of it, Mr. E. D. Rowe. He states his case very well, but while stating his case very well, he gives it all away. I will read the letter:

Dear Mr. Taylor,—I understand that Mr. L. A. Lewis has had some conversation with you in regard to the importation of sized lumber from the American side which is evading the duty. I think you will understand that certain joists and studding for use in house construction must be properly sized before it is ready to use. In other words, the material as it comes from the sawmill is too irregular in size to be serviceable. The usual method adopted by mills is to run the lumber through a planer, dress it on one side and one edge. This is the most economical way of handling it.

Now comes what has been called the alleged evasion of the law:

In order to evade the duty the American mills to-day are adopting two methods other than the above. It is usual to dress or size this lumber immediately it comes from the sawmill and pile it in the yard ready for shipment. Where this has been done our American friends are returning it to the mills before shipment to Canada and are roughing the dressed edges with a saw to eliminate the planer marks.

Allusion was made to the fact this afternoon that when the lumber had been planed and dressed on both sides it was put on the mill again and the saw run behind the planing to erase the marks of the planer, that being described as one method of evading the duty. I will come to that later on. Another thing that he says is this:

Another method being generally adopted is to dress the lumber on one side only and then to run it through a rip-saw which 'joints' or 'sizes' the lumber to an even width.

Mark the words. After it has been planed on one side only it is run through a rip-saw which 'joints' or 'sizes' the lumber to an even width. There, you have the process. The lumber is put into the mill, it is planed on one side, put into the mill again and passed through a rip-saw and they can say that makes a joint. It is a question whether it is a joint or not, but I will come to that presently. But, this sizing is not making a joint and I think I can show that also by what follows in the same letter:

The matter was brought up in the Customs Department at Ottawa and an effort was made to have lumber prepared by either of the above methods declared dutiable under items 504 and 506 of the customs tariff. Under 504 the contention was made that the lumber was 'further manufactured' because it had to go through an additional process. Under 506 the contention was made that it was a process of manufacture not otherwise provided for. I honestly believe that under either of those items we are entitled to protection, but the department ruled against us, claiming that they could only be cognizant of the condition the lumber was in when presented to them at the boundary. My own belief is that item 505 is a much more favourable clause than either of the others and that the application should have been made under that item in preference to the others. I will quote a part of the item, eliminating some words in order to simplify, the changes do not alter the meaning.

505. Sawn boards, planks and deals, planed or dressed on one side, when the edges thereof are jointed.

The words which are omitted should not have been omitted, because they are very significant. The item reads in this way:

Sawn boards, planks and deals, planed or dressed on one or both sides when the edges thereof are jointed or tongued or grooved.

Then the writer goes on to say:

I would be willing to stake the whole case on the word 'jointed.'

I call the attention of the House to this. The gentleman who writes this says that he would be willing to stake the whole case on the word 'jointed.' I appeal to the unbaised judgment of this House that the very words which follow show that the process which is there used was the rip-saw process and that the product cannot be called 'jointed.'

Any carpenter or mill operator will tell you that in the lumber business the word 'jointed' means 'straightened' or 'trued' and a board may be jointed with a plane, a saw, or a knife, or any method which will straighten or true the edges. For instance, the finest cabinet work would have to be jointed with a hand plane, other work not so particular may be done on a planing machine, but for rough construction work the saw-jointer may be used.

According even to the statement of these gentlemen the work which has been passed through a rip-saw may be jointed for rough work, as he says, but not for the higher work of the cabinet maker.

Mr. FOWLER. It is jointed.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. I will read the words again:

For instance, the finest cabinet work would have to be jointed with a hand plane——

Very good.

—other work not so particular may be done on a planing machine but for rough construction work the saw-jointer may be used.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. This is the statement of these gentlemen. Here is a piece of work that has been passed through a rip-saw. The rich man buys it, it is not jointed for him and he has to get it jointed by a plane.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Oh, oh.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. Yes, these are the very words.

For instance, the finest cabinet work would have to be jointed with a hand plane.

Therefore, the rich man who buys this lumber will not have to pay any duty because it is not jointed for him, but for the poor settler of the prairie it is jointed and he has to pay 25 per cent duty.

Mr. BORDEN. I would like to ask the right hon. gentleman how he makes that out of the statute. The statute says that if it is jointed by any means it must pay duty.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. If it is jointed—but if it is not jointed?

Some hon. MEMBERS. Oh, oh.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. What I say is that it is not jointed. If it is jointed for one it must be jointed for all.

Mr. BORDEN. The right hon. gentleman, a moment ago said that if it was planed for the rich man it would not pay the duty. When it is planed for the purpose of jointing and it is jointed in that way the statute says it shall pay duty.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. Yes, but let me say to my right hon. friend that here is a case in which the jointing is made by a saw.

Mr. REID (Grenville). No, that is free.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. Here is a case in which the joint is made by a saw It is jointed and, if it is jointed, the poor man has to pay, but here is the wrong, that for one man it is sawed by a saw while for the other it is jointed by a plane and therefore you have a different interpretation for one class of men from that which you adopt for another class of men.

Mr. BORDEN. I would like my right hon. friend to explain or withdraw what he said a moment ago. He said that if it were jointed by means of a plane for the rich man it came in free of duty.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. With the same joint.

Mr. BORDEN. The same joint and the same method by saw.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. This is the very thing that is in issue at the present time. Here is the law:

> Sawn boards, planks and deals, planed or dressed on one side or both sides, when the edges thereof are jointed or tongued and grooved, 25 per cent.

Here is a piece of timber which has been passed through a rip-saw and the minister says that it is a joint. Well, if it is a joint it is a joint for everybody. But the man who makes the demand of the minister that he should declare this a joint tells him that it cannot be a joint for the highest work, that it cannot be a joint for the rich man—

Some hon. MEMBERS. Oh, oh.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. Yes, that is what he says.

Mr. FOWLER. If the rich man bought a piece of timber that was jointed with a rip-saw would he not pay the duty on it just the same as the poor man would?

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. If the rich man who buys this in order to use it must pass it through the plane after he has got it, I say it is not a joint.

Mr. FOWLER. He pays the duty.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order, order.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. The law must be the same for everybody. If it is a joint it must be a joint for all kinds of work, cabinet work, carpenter's work or any other kind of work. If it is not a joint then it is not a joint for anybody.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Oh, oh.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. Certainly not, and what is the result? You have this as a fact that in the interpretation placed upon the law it has never been understood that a joint was made only by a plane. This is the usage of the trade.

But you have a new saw to-day, and because it is a finer saw than the one usually used, you say it is creating a joint. I say it is not, because the man who wrote me assures me that for the higher classes of work this lumber cannot be used, but must be planed again. Therefore, it is not sufficiently manufactured to be the subject of duty, and this is the reason why my hon. friend (Mr. Turriff), has drawn this matter to the attention of the House. The Department of Customs is collecting a duty which they have no right to collect. Sawing timber has never been considered as jointing it. There is a machine for jointing which is well known, and the moment you do not use that machine, but saw the lumber and not plane it, then we say you are putting upon the Act an interpretation which the law does not warrant. The statute is explicit. In order to make the duty collectable the piece of timber which had been planed on one side must be grooved, tongued, or jointed. If it is not grooved and tongued, it is not liable to duty, if it is not jointed, it is not liable to duty, and the question now is, have you any reason to say or are you justified in stating, that you would subject the poor settler, the man who must be protected above all others, to a duty that never was collected before because this lumber is sawn by a finer saw than that generally used in the past. Of course the man who buys the lumber, the man in Ontario or even in Manitoba, the rich farmer or the mechanic, or the merchantman, or the professional man may use that lumber, but before using it he would have to have it planed further, otherwise the joints would not be true. But the poor farmer is not so particular, he will take his joint, imperfect as it is, and indeed any man who has been in the Northwest knows that the settler is not so fastidious about these things, he will build up his shack of anything he can get, he does not consider whether the lumber has been jointed or not jointed. He may have two or three boards that will not be true. They may not be good joints, the wind may pass through them, but after all he will have a shelter over his head, and if he cannot have the lumber then he will have the sod on the prairie. There is no tax on the sod, and he can use it, and often does use it, when he cannot get lumber. In such a case he will take the sod and place it against a hill, and makes a shelter for his head. But you have here the department putting the most harsh construction upon the letter of the law in order to collect an undue duty, an illegal duty, from the man who of all men, ought to have the protection of this government, and of this country.

Mr. STEVENS. Does the right hon. gentleman claim that in order that this lumber should be dutiable, it must be jointed and tongued and grooved?

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. No, either. It must be jointed, or tongued and grooved.

Mr. STEVENS. Then if it is not tongued and grooved, does he claim it is not jointed?

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. I say that according to my humble view it is not jointed. I say there is no jointing done by saw, jointing is done by the plane, and you cannot have a joint unless you have a smooth surface over it.

Mr. STEVENS. Is it not a fact that this timber has chiefly been brought in jointed by plane and not by saw? This saw matter is a later consideration?

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. If it has been jointed by plane, why not say so under the regulations. If it is jointed by plane then it would have been easy to say in the order; sawn planks, &c., dressed on one side, when also jointed by plane. That would have been easy to understand and then you could collect the duty lawfully.

But it has been stated this afternoon that all of this was done by fraud. I do not see the fraud in this matter. I cannot see that there is any fraud.

I come now to the other point on which it was stated there was a fraud. My hon. friend who has moved this motion consulted me in advance, and asked whether he should bring a new point I am going to present to the House, and I told him there might be some doubt about it, and I would not, but I shall take the point which has been made this afternoon that American mills were evading the law because when the lumber had been planed on one side and one edge they would put it in another machine and run a saw behind it so as to erase the planer marks. That is what was said:

> When this has been done our American friends return it to the mills before shipment to Canada and are roughening the dressed edge with a saw to eliminate the planer marks.

If the Americans were to do that I do not know if this would be a fraud against the law. What are the words of the law upon this point?

> Planks, boards and other lumber of wood, sawn, split or cut, and dressed on one side only, but not further manufactured——

So it appears that according to the contention of hon. gentlemen opposite the American mills, after having planed the lumber on two sides pass a saw over it to erase the planer marks. Is that further manufacturing it?

Mr. FOWLER. Yes.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. No, my hon. friend is altogether wrong. This is demanufacturing it, it is making it worse than it was.

Mr. FOWLER. It does not affect the trueness of the joint, it is an evasion of the law.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. The joint has been disposed of. To show the extent of absurdity to which men can go when they want to evade the law, here is, we will suppose, an American mill with a board which is planed on two sides. This board, if it comes into Canada, has to pay duty, but the American lumberman, in order to evade the duty, does not further manufacture but on the contrary, although he has a good surface ready for use, he makes it rough again; therefore it should not be liable to pay duty at all, and I do not see how it is possible to satisfy these gentlemen. Can any man say that when a board which has been planed on two sides has been roughed on one side, and made rough lumber again it is further manufactured? On the contrary, this is bringing the lumber to the pocket of the poor farmer so that he can get it even if it was not so fine as it was the day before.

Mr. FOWLER. Why do they rough it again if not to evade the law?

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. If my hon. friend will say that roughing it again is further manufacturing it, he is going further than I would care to go.

But the point covered by the motion before the House is that when lumber is not jointed or tongued or grooved it is not dutiable, and I believe this is the very language of the law. Again I appeal to the House that the Minister of Customs did not dare say in his regulation that a joint which had been made by a saw was a joint. He simply stated that the lumber had been partially dressed. For this interpretation he has no authority whatever, and he is going beyond the very letter of the statute.

Rt. Hon. R. L. BORDEN (Prime Minister). Mr. Speaker, my right hon. friend has addressed the House at great length upon a number of technical questions with regard to the jointing of lumber, and I am sure that whether or not he has convinced us that the lumber is jointed, he has at least convinced everybody in this House that his own argument on the question is very much disjointed. Now, let us look for a moment at the regulation which is the foundation of all the argument which the right hon. gentleman has addressed to the House at very great length:

> At a meeting of the Board of Customs held at Ottawa on November 3, 1911, in connection with the request for a decision as to the rate of duty payable on imported lumber for which free entry is claimed under tariff items 503 and 504, the Board of Customs declared 'that sawn planks, boards, joists, scantlings, studding and other lumber of wood, dressed on one side, when also dressed wholly or partly on one edge, is dutiable at 25 per cent ad valorem, under the general tariff, on importation into Canada.'

Dressed on one side means something more than sawn, does it not? I think my right hon. friend will not deny that. Then the regulation says: 'when also dressed wholly or partly on one edge.' That also means something more than sawn, does it not? I am speaking of the regulation which is the basis of the whole argument which has been addressed to this House by hon. gentlemen opposite. This regulation was made by the Board of Customs, and their regulation is absolutely within the terms of the statute. My right hon. friend seems inclined to doubt that. What does he understand the meaning of the word 'jointed' to be? I suppose it means something more than rough sawing. We are all agreed on that; and I would suppose that we would all agree, in view of the arguments that have been addressed to the House, that that jointing might be done in more than one way. But as a matter of fact I am informed by my hon. friend the Minister of Customs that this regulation has been applied only where there is distinct evidence of planing and distinct evidence of the use of a saw for the purpose of concealing that planing. Uuder these circumstances the Minister of Customs would not be discharging the duty he has been sworn to discharge unless he carried out the law under that regulation made by the Board of Customs. The right hon. gentleman made a statement for the purpose of evoking the approval of hon. gentlemen opposite, which I understood to be that lumber planed carefully for the rich man would come in under the statute and under this regulation duty free. I called his attention to it at the time, and asked him either to explain or withdraw it. He did neither. I say there is no warrant for any such statement, and the right hon. gentleman well understands now that there is no warrant for it. As a matter of fact, the word 'dressed' is used in the regulation, and I understand that that word is used by those who manufacture and deal in lumber in the sense of planing. Am I right or am I wrong in that?

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. That is what I understand.

Mr. BORDEN. Then, what is wrong with the regulation in that case? What does 'dressing lumber wholly or partially on one edge' mean if it does not mean jointing? My hon. friend the Minister of Customs has already explained, and in this I am speaking by his authority, that this regulation has only been applied in cases where there is evidence, from the appearance of the lumber, that it was planed in the first instance to create that jointing which is referred to in the statute, and where there is an attempt made to conceal the jointing by running a saw over it afterwards. That is the whole gist of the case from first to last, and that is the evil which was sought to be dealt with by the regulation made.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. No, my right hon. friend is misinformed. I quoted from a letter from Mr. Roe, in which he stated that the annoyance of which he complained was made in two ways—first, by planing and effacing afterwards by a saw; secondly, by running a rip-saw without any planing at all.

Mr. BORDEN. Whether that be the case or not, I would suppose that by the use of a small saw it would be possible to joint lumber to all intents and purposes, and my hon. friend is admitting that.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. That is not what my right friend stated a moment ago.

Mr. BORDEN. I know it is not, but I am covering both points.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. In the face of the letter which I have read, I say that jointing cannot be done by sawing, because the gentleman who writes the letter says that for higher work it would have to be planed.

Mr. BORDEN. All I have to remark with regard to that is that the statute does not say anything with regard to higher work.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. No, but I find in the statute the word 'jointing', and when it is stated in the letter that sawing cannot make a complete jointing, but it would have to be planed afterwards, I say this regulation is not according to the statute.

Mr. BORDEN. The jointing may not be capable of being created by rough sawing, but it is quite possible it might be created within the meaning of the statute by a smaller or special saw.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. Not according to the letter.

Mr. BORDEN. I do not care about the letter to which my right hon. friend refers. I do not know who wrote that letter or that the writer had any authority to define for anybody in this House exactly what the word 'jointing' means.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. He is the very gentleman for whom this ruling was made.

Mr. BORDEN. Suppose he was, are we to put aside our intelligence, and our reasoning powers in connection with the interpretation of this statute because some gentleman has given utterance to a chance expression in a letter. My right hon. friend must be driven to very desperate expedients when he resorts to such an argument.

Sir WILFRED LAURIER. In a matter of this kind, in which neither my right hon. friend nor myself is a competent judge, I would take the judgment of a man who is in the business.

Mr. BORDEN. As far as regards the competency of judging, my right hon. friend can speak for himself, and not for me. I am quite content to leave that matter there and go to another point. The right hon. gentleman in this debate has taken the somewhat strange position that this Board of Customs is not an independent body.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. Subject to ministerial control certainly.

Mr. BORDEN. Now let us look for a moment at that. I find that this board was created by section eight of the Customs Act, which declared:

> There shall be a board of customs which shall consist of the Commissioner of Customs or any officer for the time being acting as such, who shall be chairman of the board, and such other duly qualified officers of customs as the Governor in Council from time to time appoints.

Under section 58 of the Customs Act, these powers are conferred and these duties imposed upon them:

> Whenever any difference arises or doubt exists as to whether any or what rate of duty is payable on any class of goods, and there is no previous decision upon the question by any competent tribunal binding throughout Canada, the Board of Customs may declare the rate of duty payable on the class of goods in question, or that such goods are exempt from duty, subject in each case to an appeal by any person interested to the Governor in Council; and any such declaration of the Board of Customs, when approved by the minister, or any such declaration when made by an order in council upon appeal, shall have force and effect as if the same had been sanctioned by statute.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. Hear, hear.

Mr. BORDEN. When any one interested presents a question of that kind to the Board of Customs, they are bound to exercise their independent judgment on it and a person who is dissatisfied with their decision has an appeal to the Governor in Council. Therefore, to contend that in the first instance this board has to act by the direction of the Governor in Council although there is an appeal to the same body—in other words that they are not to exercise their independent judgment, to admit in short that there is an appeal from their judgment to the body which dictates it—this seems to me a construction of the statute which is absolutely contrary to its terms. So far as the Commissioner of Customs is concerned, any one who knows his record and the faithful service he has given the country for the last twenty years would be the last to say that John McDougald is a man who would not exercise his absolute and independent judgment on a question of this kind.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. I did not say anything of the kind.

Mr. BORDEN. Then what is the right hon. gentleman complaining about? He is moving a resolution of censure upon the Minister of Customs because when a difference arose with regard to a decision under the terms of the statute, that difference was referred to the Board of Customs and the Board of Customs made this pronouncement and the law was carried out accordingly. My right hon. friend is condemning these men for having exercised their independent judgment on that question submitted to them under the law of the land, and he suggests that such a circumstance justifies him and his friends in moving a resolution of censure on the Minister of Customs. It does seem to me that in all the arguments presented by hon. gentlemen opposite, there is not one which has any claim to our support and I ask the House to reject the amendment accordingly.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. Let me read the complaint of the British Columbia lumbermen:

> In order to evade the duty the American mills to-day are adopting two methods, other than the above. It is usual to dress or size this lumber immediately it comes from the sawmill and pile it in the yard ready for shipment. Where this has been done, our American friends are sending it to the mills before shipping it to Canada and are roughing the dressed edges with a saw to eliminate the planer marks. Another method being generally adopted is to dress the lumber on one side only and then to rough it through a rip-saw with joints or sizes of lumber to an even width.

Mr. OLIVER. I wish to make a few remarks on the general question, but before doing so I would like to give my opinion with regard to the validity of the regulation of the Customs Department on the question of jointed lumber. When the regulation says that lumber which is partly dressed on one edge is dutiable, it purports to say that lumber which is partly dressed on one edge is jointed lumber. In my humble opinion, when the lumber is only partly dressed on one edge, it cannot be jointed lumber.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. Hear, hear.

Mr. OLIVER. I wish to say another word on the question of the respective burdens imposed as regards the higher classes of work and the cheaper work. The man who requires to use fully dressed and jointed lumber will import his lumber in the rough and dress it afterwards to suit his purposes and, therefore, will get it duty free. But the man who only requires that lumber for the purpose of building a common shack will import it ready for such use and under the ruling of my hon. friend will pay duty.

Mr. REID (Grenville). Explain how.

Mr. OLIVER. I do not wish to take up the time of the House. I repeat that the man who wants to use lumber in the higher classes of work will import the lumber rough and duty free, because he requires it to be highly dressed for the purpose for which he requires it, and because he cannot buy it in that condition from the mills. Is that plain?

Mr. REID (Grenville). Yes.

Mr. OLIVER. Then the man who only wants to build a prairie shack, but wants to have the joints as tight as may be, will buy rough lumber which, under the minister's regulation, will be called 'jointed lumber,' and will pay the duty.

Mr. REID (Grenville). If it is rough, how can I call it jointed?

Mr. OLIVER. If the hon. gentleman had done me the honour to listen to me at the beginning of my remarks he would understand. I said that in my judgment, lumber that is only partly dressed on edge cannot in the nature of things, be jointed lumber.

Now, I wish to refer to some remarks made by my hon. friend from Kootenay (Mr. Goodeve), and also some remarks made by hon. friend from New Westminster (Mr. Taylor), in which they pointed out the great sympathy they have for the settlers on the prairie, and how the settler on the prairie was not going to suffer by reason of this imposition by the Minister of Customs. We are thankful to these gentlemen for their sympathy. We are willing to do business with them on a business basis; all that we want is a square deal. We are Canadians just as they are Canadians, and we want to build up Canada; but we do not want the lumber interests of British Columbia to get what is not a square deal out of the people of the prairies. It was not the late government that made rough lumber free, it was the government of which the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Foster) was a member.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

Mr. OLIVER. They made rough lumber free because, though they were a protectionist government, they found that the burden that was laid upon the prairie settler by reason of the duty upon lumber as it had been up to that time was such as to deter the settlement of the prairies, and the progress of Canada. In the interest of the country at large they made rough lumber free. If it was sound public policy in 1894, that rough lumber should be free in the interest of the prairie settlers; it is just as sound policy to-day.

And when the Minister of Customs makes a change in the regulations whereby he imposes a duty upon that lumber not hitherto imposed, he is placing a deterrent upon the settlement of the prairies, upon the prosperity of this country, and upon the prosperity of the lumbermen of British Columbia.

Mr. BRADBURY. Does the hon. member (Mr. Oliver), wish the House to infer that that is what the hon. minister has done?

Mr. OLIVER. That is exactly what I understand the hon. minister to have done. That is what I am going to vote on.

Mr. GOODEVE. When the government, of which the Minister of Trade and Commerce was a member, made rough lumber free, at the same time they made planed and dressed or jointed lumber dutiable, and that stands to-day just as rough lumber stands free.

Mr. OLIVER. Sure. And I assume that the interpretation of these words stood from 1894 until 1911—under the government of which the Minister of Trade and Commerce was a member, just as under the government led by the present leader of the opposition (Sir Wilfrid Laurier). And it stood until the friends of my hon. friend (Mr. Goodeve) came down here, as one might say like a wolf on the fold, flushed with the victory of the 21st of September, full of the idea that to the victors belong the spoils, and with the idea that this change was what they had paid for and fought for, and they were bound to collect their proper toll in return for what they had done. They came down, they demanded their price, and the Minister of Customs delivered the goods. And the prairie settler to-day is paying that price.

Now, what does it amount to? It may seem to some hon. gentlemen that the difference in the duty on lumber that builds the settlers' shacks cannot amount to much. It cannot in each individual case; and if it did it would prevent the settler from building his shack. In the year ending 31st March, 1911, the quantity of lumber imported into Canada duty free was 193,523 thousand feet. The value was about three and a half million dollars. The object of our friends, as they have declared here, is to bring this lumber under duty.

Some hon. MEMBERS. No.

Mr. OLIVER. Not under this section. But I say that my hon. friend from Kootenay and my hon. friend from New Westminster declared themselves distinctly and emphatically in favour of putting a duty on rough lumber as well as on planed lumber. Now, what would it mean to the people of Canada, the users of lumber, if these hon. gentlemen were able to carry their point? Twenty-five per cent on three and a half million dollars is $875,000.

Mr. GOODEVE. Just that I may not be misquoted, I desire to say that, clearly stated, speaking for myself, in order that there might be no future misunderstanding that I would like to see lumber dressed on one side dutiable, but not rough lumber. I made no such statement as the hon. gentleman (Mr. Oliver) attributes to me.

Mr. OLIVER. At the least we have the hon. gentleman's words now that he declared himself emphatically that certain lumber which has hitherto come in free should be dutiable. And he knows as do others who are familiar with lumber that of that three and a half million dollars worth probably ninety per cent comes in in that condition. Besides that he declared himself for a protective policy, for building up the interests of British Columbia at the expense of the prairie settlers.

Mr. TAYLOR. Did I understand the hon. gentleman (Mr. Oliver) to say that I made such a declaration as he now lays before the House?

Mr. OLIVER. I would say most emphatically that what the hon. gentleman (Mr. Taylor, New Westminster) said, conveyed that idea to my mind.

Mr. TAYLOR. I have no recollection of using any language that would convey that idea, nor had I any intention of using language that would convey that idea.

Mr. OLIVER. Well, following the hon. gentleman's own tactics, I would ask him to say whether he is in favour of a duty on rough lumber or not.

Mr. TAYLOR (New Westminster). I think we are entitled to a duty on rough lumber; but I am content to allow the situation to remain as it is at present as a measure of assistance to my neighbours in other parts of Canada.

Mr. OLIVER. My hon. friend is well satisfied to have the condition remain as it is, levying a duty on certain lumber when the law says that such lumber should be free. Now let me point out exactly what this vast sum of money amounts to, by comparison. If these gentlemen had their way they would be taking out of the prairie settler as much money each year as the province of Nova Scotia receives in annual subsidies from the Dominion government, and $238,000 a year more; they would be taking as much money as the province of New Brunswick receives, and $237,000 a year more; they would be taking $41,000 a year out of the prairie settler more than the province of Manitoba receives to-day as Dominion subsidies.

Mr. GOODEVE. Would the hon. gentleman object to putting on 'Hansard' the figures to prove the statement he has made?

Mr. OLIVER. That is what I have been trying to do, I think my hon. friend will find them there. I was going to say that this amount is $161,000 more than the province of British Columbia receives in subsidy from this Dominion each year; it is one-third of the total subsidy of Ontario; it is nearly one-half the total subsidy of Quebec; it is two-thirds the subsidy of Alberta, and is half the subsidy of Saskatchewan. Yet my hon. friends think that the proposal to impose such a burden as that upon the prairie settlers is a joke, is something most amusing to them, and I suppose also to their constituents. I must say to them that I do not think that method is the best to build up a united Canada, or is for the well-being of this country.

Mr. GOODEVE. I do not like to interrupt the hon. gentleman again, but I must say that unless there are further figures which he has not yet placed on 'Hansard' he has not proved his case. He has made the bald statement that if certain ideas to which he has alluded were carried out it would mean so much money. What I want is the figures on which he makes his deduction.

Mr. OLIVER. My statement was this, that in the year 1911 there was 193,520,000 feet of lumber imported into Canada, duty free. My hon. friend will find that in the Trade and Commerce Report. It is also stated in the same report that the value of that lumber was something over three and a half millions. Now 25 per cent of that is $875,000.

Mr. GOODEVE. That is rough lumber duty free. It is difficult to get my hon. friend to deal with the question we have argued upon. That lumber is still duty free.

Mr. OLIVER. I think the fact that my hon. friend is getting up so often is evidence that I am dealing with the subject. Now with regard to the matter of building up the sawmill interests of British Columbia at the expense of the prairie settler, I want to say a few words. It would appear that as soon as the late elections were over, in the estimation of those who had won those elections, the time had arrived to collect their tolls, they wanted the protection that they had not had before. If this saw milling industry of British Columbia was to-day on a legitimate financial basis, if it was a question of securing wages for the friends of the hon. member from New Westminster, whatever their condition or colour may be, we would appreciate the position. But that is the smallest part of it. It is a notorious fact, Mr. Speaker, that whatever may be the conditions in other parts of Canada in regard to the over-capitalization of industry, there is in no part of Canada an industry more atrociously over-capitalized than the saw-milling industry of British Columbia. It is the demand of those who have control of that industry that the settler of the prairie west shall be bled through lumber duties in order to pay interest on that over-capitalization. That is what these gentlemen are talking for, that is the interest they are here to represent.

Mr. TAYLOR. Does the hon. gentleman refer to the petitioners who addressed those letters to me as those whose industry is over-capitalized?

Mr. OLIVER. I do not know anything about the petitioners, I am speaking of the lumber industry of British Columbia, I am speaking of the milling industries that are running in the hon. gentleman's constituency.

Mr. TAYLOR. The hon. gentleman is entirely mistaken so far as those industries are concerned. They are privately owned concerns, and have no watered stock at all.

Mr. OLIVER. I do not say that there may not be mills in British Columbia which do not form part of a merger, and which are not over-capitalized. But I say again, it is a notorious fact that, speaking at large, the milling industry of British Columbia is atrociously over-capitalized. I have here the 'Monetary Times,' which, in its annual review dated January 6, 1912, gives a statement as to the amalgamation of individual industries, and it mentions these companies as being absorbed by: The Canadian Pacific Lumber Company, Limited; The Anglo-American Lumber Company, Limited; Gibbons Lumber Company, Limited; Barclay Sound ber Company, Limited; Rivers Inlet Timber Syndicate. The initial capitalization of these five industrial organizations was $840,000. The Canadian Pacific Lumber Company, Limited, of Vancouver, which absorbed these five different organizations, was authorized to issue three millions of common stock and two millions of bonds, a total capitalization of $5,000,000, on an original capital of $840,000.

Of this amount of common stock $2,000,000 has been issued, and of bonds $1,750,000 has been issued. That particular section of the sawmill industry in British Columbia which initially had a capital of $840,000 is to-day carrying a capitalization of $3,750,000, and it has $1,250,000 of capital yet to issue. This is the industry on whose behalf my hon. friends made their eloquent plea this afternoon in order that the prairie settler should have the most unfavourable interpretation that could be put upon the Custom law enforced against him and in the interest of the lumber companies.

Mr. WRIGHT. I think the hon. gentleman referred to the initial capitalization of the company?

Mr. OLIVER. Yes.

Mr. WRIGHT. Would he give the capitalization of these companies at the time the merger took place?

Mr. OLIVER. No, I could not give that. I can only give my hon. friend what is contained in the 'Monetary Times,' and I think the authority is very good. But, however the amount is arrived at makes no difference; the initial capital was $840,000 and that industry to-day is carrying a load of capitalization of $3,750,000. If that increased capitalization is arrived at out of the earnings of the companies, then I must say that the companies have been doing very well out of their access to the Northwest market, and out of their profits taken from the pockets of the Northwest farmers. My hon. friend may have it either way he likes it; either it is largely water or it is undue profits, but in no case can that enormous capitalization be justified on fair and reasonable grounds or as an ordinary business proposition.

The hon. member for Kootenay (Mr. Goodeve) was very emphatic in his desire to furnish a market to the people of Saskatchewan and Alberta by developing the sawmill industry of British Columbia. He told us that it was the policy of his party to build up the milling industry of British Columbia in order that there might be interprovincial trade. Per contra, I suppose that it is the policy of his party to prevent external trade in order that interprovincial trade might be built up. There are something like 400,000 people in British Columbia. I do not know how many are interested in saw-milling, but we will suppose that they are all interested in and dependent upon that industry. It is estimated that the flour from seven bushels of wheat is about what the ordinary man uses during the year. The population of British Columbia, on that calculation, would use a little less than 3,000,000 bushels of wheat a year. The production of wheat by the prairie provinces in the last year, according to a statement of Sir Byron Walker, head of the Bank of Commerce, was something like 135,000,000 or 165,000,000 bushels, of which the farmer will have to sell to somebody certainly a great deal more than 100,000,000 bushels or he will go broke and the sheriff will get him. My hon. friend offers the prairie farmers the magnificent market of possibly 3,000,000 bushels. The policy of his party is to build up interprovincial trade and to make the prairie farmer rich, by giving him a market for 3,000,000 out of 100,000,000 bushels of wheat that he must sell or he will go out of business.

Mr. SCHAFFNER. Would the hon. gentleman tell us about the quantity of agricultural products that British Columbia took from the prairie provinces in 1910?

Mr. OLIVER. I can only give it on the authority of the hon. member for Kootenay who said it was about $14,000,000 worth.

Mr. SCHAFFNER. Yes.

Mr. OLIVER. That is a desirable market, we want that market, we want to increase it, but I must say that when we have to sell $150,000,000 worth of products in a year in order to keep going it after all does not make a terrible lot of difference whether the people of British Columbia take $14,000,000 worth or $15,000,000. Not but what we would be glad to have them take $16,000,000 worth or $20,000,000 worth. But, they will have to grow a great deal larger than they are to-day before their market will take up what we need to dispose of in order to keep the sheriff away from our doors.

An hon. MEMBER. We want growth.

Mr. OLIVER. We want growth and the hon. member for Westminster—or was it the hon. member for Kootenay—I forget which—has told us how they are increasing that market for us. They have shut down all their mills and their men are walking the streets in the cities of British Columbia, notwithstanding the increase in the duty that the prairie farmer has to pay.

Mr. BURNHAM. Is it true, or is it not, that the middle west is the most prosperous part of Canada to-day?

Mr. OLIVER. I cannot answer that question; I am not familiar with all parts of Canada. But, I can tell the hon. gentleman that it will never be made more prosperous by the imposition of a higher duty on the necessities of the lives of the people there, and it is not being made more prosperous by the lumbermen of British Columbia holding their meeting this fall and deciding that with a Conservative, protectionist government in power the time was ripe for them to force an increase in the price of lumber, and that they could afford to shut down their mills, throw their men out of employment, sit back and wait for the price of lumber to rise. That is not going to make the people of the prairie provinces rich and it is not going to make the people of British Columbia rich. That is what has occurred. They have told us that there is no combine amongst the lumbermen of British Columbia. They have told you to-night, Mr. Speaker, what the British Columbia lumbermen have done, and if that is not the evidence of a combine—of a combine destructive both in British Columbia and in the prairie provinces—then I do not know anything that would constitute a combine, and a most destructive combine.

My friend was greatly worried about the conservation of the timber of British Columbia, and it seemed that under present conditions it was an injury to that province because only the most accessible timber was cut and sent into the prairie provinces. Or is the theory that the worst timber, the least accessible only should be cut, and that the man in the prairie provinces must take that in the interest of conservation? We have another way of securing conservation of our timber resources. We say: Let the man of the prairie who wants to buy lumber buy it where he can get it cheapest, and if he can buy from the other side of the line, if the millers on the other side are willing to deplete their natural resources for our benefit, surely, in the interest of the conservation of Canadian resources it is no harm to let them do so. This is in line with the conservation of Canada's natural resources, for which these gentlemen stood so strongly up to the 21st September, but which they are so very much against now. The imposition of this unauthorized, unwarranted and additional duty on the lumber required by the prairie settlers is all the evidence that the country needs as to the change of policy that occurred in the administration of the affairs of this country on the 21st September. Before that time the settler, the man who needed every advantage to establish himself, got the advantage, if advantage there was; but when the 21st September placed in power the combines, the trusts and the mergers then Mr. Speaker—

An hon. MEMBER. I thought it was the Ne Temere.

Mr. OLIVER. Perhaps the Ne Temere put them in, but they are the people who are there, who are in control, and the evidence of this is that my hon. friend the Minister of Customs, on the first demand that is made, makes a change in the law that may have the effect of imposing a burden of over $800,000 a year upon the people of the prairie provinces, and he does that at the demand of the most outrageous of all the combines, of all the mergers that exist in this Dominion of Canada.

Hon. J. D. REID (Minister of Customs) Mr. Speaker, this case has been so well put by the Prime Minister (Mr. Borden), the member for Kootenay (Mr. Goodeve), the member for Vancouver (Mr. Stevens), and the member for New Westminster (Mr. Taylor), that there is little for me to add. The amendment moved by the hon. member for Assiniboia reads:

That the Minister of Customs, in collecting a duty of 25 per cent on sawn planks, boards, joists, scantlings, studding and other lumber of wood, dressed on one side, when the edges thereof are neither jointed nor tongued nor grooved, is violating the law, &c.

If the hon. member can show that we have collected duty on lumber imported into Manitoba, Alberta, Saskatchewan or any other part of Canada of which the edges are neither jointed, nor tongued nor grooved, I will guarantee that the duty will be immediately refunded to any person who has paid them. I make the statement and I defy the hon. member to name one instance where any single individual in Canada has been asked for any duty on any lumber which can be thus described. Throughout the whole discussion I and other members have asked the hon. member (Mr. Turriff) to name an instance, but he has not been able to do so. No collector of customs has exacted any duty on any lumber in accordance with this resolution. I ask him now if he can name any individual or firm? When I came into office as Minister of Customs, I found on file a letter dated September 19, from a firm applying for an interpretation of the Act claiming that lumber was being imported in violation of section 505. I asked the Commissioner of Customs what was the practice in matters of this kind. I looked up the Customs Act, and there it is plainly set forth in section 8 that the Board of Customs is appointed under the Act by parliament and I believe that these gentlemen notwithstanding what the leader of the opposition (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) has stated, are upright, honourable men whose word would not be questioned by any man in the Dominion of Canada.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. I did not say anything against them.

Mr. REID (Grenville). From the remarks made by the right hon. gentleman (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) I would come to the conclusion that the insinuation made was that I had done something to influence those men in their decisions. The only person to whom I mentioned the matter was the Commissioner of Customs, and all I said was: Take that to the Board of Customs and let them decide or do what they like in the matter, and their decision shall be final. In addition to that I said to the Commissioner of Customs: Notify every person whom you think this will interfere with. The commissioner did notify the importers. The case, as I understand was put in this way, and I only asked for the information since. The commissioner wired to have the collector at Winnipeg send a sample of a carload of lumber here, and that was submitted as evidence. In addition to that he notified the importer of the lumber and told him and any one interested to appear. The hon. member knows if he has made inquiries that they did send a representative from Winnipeg who came before that board and who did not object to the decision of the board. What did he ask for? He came here to appear on behalf of the importers of lumber at Winnipeg. In regard to the lumber entitled to free entry under 503 and 504 of the Customs Tariff he said:

I claim that the words, 'but not further manufactured' in item 504 mean that the lumber of wood, to be admitted free, . . . may not be further manufactured than sawn, split, or cut and dressed on one side only.

That comes in free, since it is planed only on one side. The board did not rule differently. It goes on:

(2) I claim that lumber of wood in the form of boards, planks, studding and furring, when sawn only by circular saws, gang saws, rip-saws or other saws, is not further manufactured than sawn, and that such lumber of wood so sawn and dressed on one side only is entitled to free entry under item 504.

The board agreed with him, and that lumber comes in free. He made another claim:

(3) I also claim that the term 'jointed' in item 505 is intended to apply to the dressing of the edges of lumber by means of a plane or planing machine——

The board agreed with that.

—and that the term jointed is not properly applicable to boards, planks, studding or furring made to a uniform width by means of any sawing operation applied thereto.

The board agreed to that. Boards or planks that are jointed with a saw come in free to-day.

Mr. TURRIFF. Might I ask him if a copy of that document was in the return brought down?

Mr. REID (Grenville). I do not know whether it was or not. This was a report before the Board of Customs. If it was not, he can have a copy of it.

Mr. TURRIFF. It was not in the return brought down.

Mr. REID (Grenville). I do not know why; it is not private. This man admitted that lumber dressed by a plane or planing machine was dutiable. The board agreed to allow lumber to come in free which it was admitted may have been planed, and a small saw run across it afterwards. So long as this obliterated the whole of the planing, so that the customs officer could not detect it, the board were willing to let it come in free. They went as far as they possibly could under the law to give the people of the Northwest lumber free. We did not make the law; the law was made by hon. gentlemen opposite. The hon. member for Assiniboia was sitting in this House in 1907 when the law was made putting on the duty of 25 per cent, and he never said one word in opposition to it, but upheld it in every way. This man goes on further:

(4) In woodwork, jointing usually applies to the planing or dressing of the edges of lumber which come together. In covering studding it is the flat surface of the boards or sheeting which comes in contact with the edge of the stud, and the point of contact is not usually described as a joint.

(5) In regard to the samples of lumber submitted, I contend as follows: that Nos. 1, 2, 3 and 4 are all partly dressed or jointed on one edge and dressed on one side.

He admitted that these were dutiable, and that was the decision of the Board of Customs. Then he says:

That No. 5 is lumber entitled to free entry under item 504. Samples 6, 7 and 9 I claim to be free, although there is a small dressed spot on edges of Nos. 6 and 7. Samples 8 and 9 have planed edges to a small extent, but are useless except for the purposes of sawn lumber. All the samples are dressed on one side.

(Sgd.) CHARLES HIGGERTY,
Customs Broker..

He was sent there by the importers of Winnipeg.

Mr. TURRIFF. What is that document? Is it a report by that broker or a letter to the Customs Department?

Mr. REID (Grenville). It is evidently a memorandum which this man submitted to the Board of Customs.

Mr. KNOWLES. Why was that not in the return which I moved for?

Mr. REID (Grenville). There is nothing private about it. Let me say that so far as I am concerned, I did not in any shape or form try to influence the Board of Customs. They acted on their own judgment. Lumber that is planed on one side only certainly comes in free. United States citizens without a doubt have used a small saw for the purpose of trying to defraud the customs revenue. If they succeed in obliterating the planing, and we cannot detect it, we have to allow it in as sawn lumber; but if it shows part of the original planing, it is evident to the customs officers that it was planed, and the Board of Customs claim that it should be dutiable. So far as I am concerned I am only administering the law as passed by this parliament. I have no desire to impose a duty on the people of this country more than the law calls for. At the same time, I claim that in this case I have carried out what has been the custom of every government in this country for many years past. I suppose hon. gentlemen opposite know that this Board of Customs meets regularly once a month, I think on the first Tuesday of every month, and at every meeting there are cases before them. I never follow these cases up. They come in and are simply handed over to the Board of Customs, whose decision goes forth as law. This is not a special case. It just came up in the ordinary way, and it came up at the first board meeting after the application was put in. Any action that I have taken in this matter has simply been in my position as minister to transfer the case to the Board of Customs, and to carry out the decision of the board which they are authorized by parliament to make.

At this late hour I do not think I can add anything to what has been so well said by hon. members on this side, and I would ask the House to reject the amendment of the hon. member for Assiniboia (Mr. Turriff).

Mr. TURRIFF. Mr. Speaker—

Mr. SPEAKER. The question before the House is on an amendment to the original motion, and the hon. gentleman therefore has not the right to a second speech. The original motion was that I should leave the Chair in order that the House might go into committee of supply and the hon. member for Assiniboia moved an amendment to that motion. The question is on the amendment.

House divided on the amendment.

1. An order in council has been passed by the present administration extending the time in which vessels of the countries named below may participate in the coasting trade of Canada between any port in Nova Scotia and any port in the province of Quebec and vice versa.

2. 8th December, 1911.

3. The steamships of not less than fifteen hundred tons gross tonnage each, of the following countries: Italy, Germany, The Netherlands, Sweden, Norway, Austria-Hungary, Denmark, Belgium, the Argentine republic and Japan.

MR. W. A. HATTIE.

Mr. SINCLAIR:

1. Has W. A. Hattie, preventive officer at Mulgrave, N.S., been dismissed?

2. If so, for what reason?

3. What salary was he receiving up to the date of his dismissal?

4. At whose instance was he dismissed?

5. Was there any investigation?

6. If not, will an investigation be granted?

7. Who was appointed in place of Mr. Hattie?

8. What is the salary of the present appointee?

Mr. REID (Grenville) :

W. A. Hattie, acting preventive officer of customs at Port Mulgrave, N. S., has not been dismissed.

DONATION OF LAND FOR DRILL HALLS.

* Mr. McCRANEY:

1. Has the attention of the Minister of Militia been called to the following news item which appeared in the Saskatoon 'Capital' of January 17, 1912:—

'Military facilities for Saskatchewan cities. Deputations from Saskatoon and other places wait upon Minister of Militia.

'Ottawa, January 16.—Deputations from Moosejaw, Saskatoon, Prince Albert, North Battleford and Red Deer have waited upon the Minister of Militia in the last few days with a view of obtaining the approval of the government for the erection of drill halls and rifle ranges, and to organize city corps in their respective cities.

'The representatives from Moosejaw asked for the acquisition by the government of sufficient land in the vicinity of the city for camp grounds.

'In every case the deputations promised to donate on the part of the city or town authorities, land sufficient for the drill hall. The following were the various deputations:—

'Moosejaw—Messrs. Willoughby, Erratt, Rothwell and Dr. McGibben.

'Saskatoon—Messrs. McLean, Balmer and others.

'Prince Albert—D. W. Adam, A. J. Manville, D. W. Baker, and others.

'North Battleford—M. J. Howell, J. W. Miller, J. A. Foley, and others.

'Red Deer—E. M. Mitchner, M.P.P., and G. W. Greene.'

2. Is it the intention of the government to require donations of land from western cities and towns as a condition for the erection of drill halls?

3. Has any encouragement been given to the minister that donations of land for drill hall purposes will be made by the cities and towns above named?

Mr. HUGHES:

1. The attention of the Minister of Militia has not been called to any such news item.

2. This government is pleased to receive donations of land not only from western towns and cities but from towns and cities all over Canada, whereon to erect drill halls. It has not been made a requirement but, as may readily be understood, the town or city showing public spirit enough to hand over a valuable site, would be more likely to receive consideration than one failing to do so. It is felt that, inasmuch as drill halls are being used by the municipalities for cadet corps, boy scouts, public entertainments of various descriptions, local, industrial and agricultural exhibitions, in short for purely local purposes as well as for military purposes, that the municipalities are merely displaying a proper public spirit by giving legitimate assistance to the government for drill halls.

3. Yes, Moosejaw offers a site valued at $40,000; Saskatoon has not given a site, but one was purchased at great expense by the late government in that town. It is regarded as unsuitable. Prince Albert offers a very valuable site estimated at $20,000; North Battleford also offers a very valuable site of several acres; Red Deer offers a site; Minnedosa does likewise; so also do Grenfell and fully a score more towns in the west and also in the east. Port Arthur and Fort William each offer sites valued at $20,000 and upwards; Regina offers one valued at from $75,000 to $100,000 in cash; Calgary offers one estimated to be worth $100,000; Edmonton one worth from $40,000 to $60,000, while British Columbia towns and cities everywhere offer sites.

SOLICITOR GENERALSHIP.

Mr. LEMIEUX:

Is it the intention of the government to appoint a Solicitor General during the present session of parliament.

Rt. Hon. R. L. BORDEN (Prime Minister). The matter has not yet been determined.

MOTIONS AGREED TO WITHOUT DISCUSSION.

For a return showing the names of all persons employed on the steamers 'Earl Grey' and 'Minto,' respectively. with the place of residence and occupation of each such person.—Mr. Macdonald.

For a copy of all letters, telegrams and all other documents, and of all complaints and charges, in any way relating to the suspension of Joseph Venoit, checker on the Intercolonial Railway at Pictou, Nova Scotia.—Mr. Macdonald.

For a copy of all the correspondence between the Prime Minister of Canada, or any member of the government, and Messrs. Fielding and Paterson, during the time the latter gentlemen were in Washington last year, on the subject of the negotiations for a reciprocity treaty between Canada and the United States.—Mr. Bradbury.

For a copy of all correspondence from the 1st day of January, 1910, to the 1st of October, 1911, between the Right Honourable James Bryce, British Ambassador at Washington, and the government of Canada, or any member thereof, with reference to the negotiations for a reciprocity treaty between Canada and the United States.—Mr. Bradbury.

For a copy of all letters, requests, petitions, telegrams, complaints or charges received by the Post Office Department since October 10th, 1911, relating to the postmaster at Glenelg, N.S.—Mr. Sinclair.

That the House go into Committee of the Whole to-morrow to consider the following resolution:

That it is expedient to amend section 477 of 'The Canada Shipping Act' so as to exempt from the compulsory payment of pilotage dues such ships as are propelled wholly or in part by steam and employed in trading between the province of Ontario and the provinces of Quebec, New Brunswick, Nova Scotia, and Prince Edward Island, or any of them.—Mr. Edwards.

ASBESTOS IMPORTATIONS.

Mr. BELAND moved:

For a return showing the total value of imports of asbestos manufactures imported into Canada since the 21st September, 1911, divided by countries or origin, and the total amount of duties assessed thereon; and the classification of manufactured asbestos goods by countries, divided into paper, millboard, cloth, sheet packing and tape, plain; treated for automobile use, as brake band lining, thread and yarns, seam and other laid packings and gaskets; pipe coverings, magnesia, plaster of Paris, air-cell and miscellaneous, itemized; asbestos shingles, sheets, &c.; the name of shipper and the port of origin; name of consignee and port of entry, and the ultimate destination of each shipment of entry; the method of assessing duty, either by pounds, weight or measure in square feet, or ad valorem, specific or both; the percentage of duty assessed; the price per pound or square feet at which goods were entered for duty. In the case of any goods having been admitted duty free, in bond or for any other reason, particulars of each entry, and the reasons for admittance without duty. And in the case of any manufactures of asbestos goods having been entered as raw material, for subsequent manufacture in the Dominion, such as asbestos paper, sheathings, or millboards, cloth, plain or rubbered for gasket manufacture, &c., the reasons for allowing such entry, and full details as to shipper, port of origin, port of entry, ultimate destination, consignee, and an itemized list of articles, with weights, square footage, entered value, &c.

Mr. REID (Grenville). There is the objection to this motion passing in its present form in that it would infringe the rule of the department not to disclose information as to names of importers and the prices they pay, &c. I would like the motion to stand until I can consult with the hon. member (Mr. Beland) so that he may be able to get all the information possible without our violating the rule.

Motion allowed to stand.

DISMISSAL OF JOSEPH MOREAU.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Kamouraska) moved:

For a copy of all correspondence, documents, recommendations and reports respecting the dismissal of Joseph Moreau, as postmaster at St. Germain, Kamouraska, in the year 1905.

Mr. PELLETIER. I thought this motion had already been adopted.

Mr. LAPOINTE (Kamouraska). No, the other motion was in respect to the dismissal of an official last fall. This concerns the dismissal of Mr. Moreau four years ago.

Mr. PELLETIER. Well, they are the same papers.

Motion agreed to.

EX-GOVERNMENT EMPLOYEES.

Mr. WILSON (Laval) moved:

For a return showing all the employees of the different departments at Ottawa, and also in the nine provinces and territories of Canada, and other places outside of Canada, in the inside and outside service, who have left their employment since the 1st October, 1911, up to the 10th January, 1912, inclusively, with their names, Christian names, age, nationality, employment and salaries respectively; the date of their appointment; the date of leaving; their salaries at the time of their appointment and at leaving; the reasons of their leaving; and if replaced or not; the names, Christian name, age, nationality, employment and salary of those who have replaced them; and in the case of dismissals, a list of the persons who asked for their dismissals; in the case of these replacing them, a list of the persons who recommended their successors.

Mr. HAZEN. I would like to call the attention of the hon. gentleman to the fact that his motion covers not only dismissals, but resignations of persons who have left the service of their own volition. The motion does not state whether it is intended to cover employees of the naval service, such as sailors and others on the ships. Persons enlisting are not persons appointed. I am willing to furnish the information if my hon. friend will be kind enough to let me know whether he wishes to include enlistments as well as employees in the naval service.

Mr. WILSON (Laval). I am not referring to enlistments at all, simply to employees. If the hon. minister is willing to have the motion carried, I shall be delighted.

Motion agreed to.

ITEMS OMITTED FROM 1913 ESTIMATES.

Mr. SINCLAIR moved:

For a return showing an itemized list of all appropriations appearing in the estimates for the fiscal year ending March 31, 1912, and omitted from the estimates of the fiscal year ending March 31, 1913, indicating the electoral division and province in which such omitted appropriations were proposed to be expended?

Mr. MONK. As the motion reads it would involve a very great deal of work. If my hon. friend would indicate the works in reference to which he wishes information, or even restrict his motion to one province, it would simplify the preparation of the return. The officers of the department are extremely busy, and this would involve the preparation of a report almost equal to a departmental report.

Mr. SINCLAIR. Many items that appear in the estimates submitted before Christmas do not appear in the estimates that have since been presented. I refer only to unexpended items, and the insertion of the word 'unexpended' after 'all' would perhaps meet the difficulty. Then it would only be necessary to compare the list presented before the holidays with that presented since.

Mr. MONK. We cannot do that until March 31. If the motion was amended by inserting 'and unexpended' before 'and omitted' it would simplify the return.

Mr. SINCLAIR. That will serve my purpose.

Mr. FOSTER (North Toronto). I would point out that my hon. friend cannot make the comparison full until he has the supplementaries for 1913. Items in the 1912 estimates that are not in the estimates for 1913, may appear in the supplementary estimates for 1913.

Mr. SINCLAIR. With that suggestion I would be willing to allow the motion to stand.

Motion allowed to stand.

Mr. HAZEN.

CONTRACT FOR THE ENGRAVING OF DOMINION NOTES, &c.

Mr. EMMERSON. I received, as I suppose every hon. member has received, a paper giving the terms and conditions of tenders for engraving Dominion notes, postal orders, &c. I desire to ask the Minister of Finance (Mr. White, Leeds) if there were restrictions as to tenders. I understood that one of the conditions was that tenders were limited to people in this country, and in Great Britain, but I do not find any limitation stated in this document.

Mr. BORDEN. The Minister of Finance was called out of the House a few moments ago, but will shortly return. I will direct his attention to the question the hon. member (Mr. Emmerson) has asked. Perhaps during the afternoon there will be an opportunity to give the information. If not the information will be given to-morrow.

THE BANKING ACT.

Mr. LEMIEUX. Is it the intention of the government to introduce the Banking Act this session?

Mr. BORDEN. That is purely a consideration of the time available for parliament. The hon. member (Mr. Lemieux) I suppose, will appreciate the importance of not having the session too long drawn out, as we were occupied with a very long session last year, and an election campaign as well. I speak without special consultation with the Minister of Finance, but I think he would be very glad to have the Bill passed if it could be done without unduly protracting the session. Possibly, when the Minister of Finance is in his place to-morrow, he can give fuller information than I can at the moment.

Mr. LEMIEUX. The reason why I inquired is that I was asked concerning this measure by a very prominent banker.

MANITOBA BOUNDARIES.

Mr. TURRIFF. May I ask the right hon. the Prime Minister (Mr. Borden) when we may expect the Manitoba Boundaries Bill to be brought down?

Mr. BORDEN. It will be announced in due course to my hon. friend.

Mr. TURRIFF. I was asking when?

Mr. BORDEN. Well, I have answered.

INQUIRY FOR RETURN.

Mr. MURPHY. May I ask the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Foster) when he expects to bring down the return in connection with the trade of the West Indies and British Guiana?

Mr. FOSTER (Toronto). I think that is prepared. I will make inquiry.

RAILWAY ACT AMENDMENT.

On the orders being called:

Resuming the adjourned debate on the proposed motion of Mr. Turriff for the second reading of Bill (No. 6) to amend the Railway Act.

Mr. BORDEN. Stand.

Mr. TURRIFF. I hope the Prime Minister (Mr. Borden) will give me the opportunity to go on with this Bill at an early day.

Mr. BORDEN. I really have not been able to give a great deal of time to it since the hon. member moved it before. But just as soon as the pretty urgent demands upon my time will permit, I will give the matter the best consideration I can. I beg to assure the hon. member that the delay I am asking is not with any desire to impede him in endeavouring to carry out his proposal, but purely for the reason I have mentioned.

CRIMINAL CODE AMENDMENT.

Mr. STEVENS moved the second reading of Bill (No. 9) to amend the Criminal Code. He said: This is a technical amendment in order to make this provision of the Criminal Code applicable to conditions in British Columbia. At the present time this section of the Code, which has reference to the piracy of saw logs, is confined to 'the rivers, streams and lakes of Canada'. The amendment proposes to make the section applicable to harbours and coast waters as well. I ask that it be read the second time to-day. When it goes into Committee of the Whole it will appear with certain slight alterations suggested by the Minister of Justice. The amended Bill should have been printed to-day but it is not ready. We can have the Bill as revised distributed to every member.

Mr. DOHERTY. I have no objection to the passing of the second reading of the Bill with the understanding that the hon. member has just set forth—that it will be modified in committee. If the Bill were to stand precisely as it is, I think there might be some objection to the effect of its provisions. But so far as I can see, there should be no objection on my part to carrying out what I understand to be the real intention of those who desire to see this measure passed.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the second time.

OLD AGE PENSIONS.

House resumed the adjourned debate on the proposed resolution of Mr. Burnham, that, in the opinion of this House, it is expedient that a select special committee should be appointed by this House to make an inquiry into an Old Age Pension system for Canada, with power to send for persons, papers and records, and to report from time to time.

Mr. E. M. MACDONALD (Pictou). I offer my thanks to my right hon. friend (Mr. Borden) who leads the House, and to his colleague the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Foster) for being good enough to agree to the adjournment of the debate on the resolution of my hon. friend from Peterboro (Mr. Burnham) in order to enable me to be present when the matter was finally determined. Hon. members who look at the order paper will see that the third order under 'Notices of Motion' is a resolution which I intended to propose to the House, and which I placed upon the order paper at a very early day, dealing with this very important matter.

The purport of my resolution was to ask the House to come to a conclusion in favour of the principle of old age pensions. My hon. friend from Peterborough (Mr. Burnham) who was thinking apparently along the same line and about the same time, placed upon the order paper, a resolution which we are now considering. Believing that it would further the ultimate and earlier attainment of the end which we both seek, the establishment of a system of old age pensions in Canada, I gladly join in supporting his resolution that a committee of this House be appointed to go fully into the question and obtain all information necessary to enable the House ultimately, I hope, to supplement it with legislation. The discussion which took place upon this matter on the original motion I have read in the 'Hansard,' and I was gratified to note that the proposition was received with a considerable amount of favour, and to note with satisfaction that the hon. the Minister of Finance speaking for the government agreed to the appointment of a committee.

I think that in Canada we have been somewhat late in dealing with this question. The colony of New Zealand led the way among the different nations that go to make up the empire, in dealing with this question. Their attitude and their legislation was favourably received in the mother country, and was a potent factor in inducing public opinion to deal with the situation there. The result of the legislation that has taken place in England has been of the most satisfactory character. Even those who at some stage doubted the wisdom of a system of old age pensions, are to-day found its most willing advocates. No less an authority than a Prime Minister of England is on record as having said of this system of old age pensions:

It is a new departure, reaching along an almost unmeasured road of future social progress.

Another gentleman who had filled the position of Prime Minister of England stated with regard to such legislation:

I view its consequences as so great, so mystic, so incalculable, so largely affecting the whole scope and fabric of our empire itself, that I rank it as a measure far more vitally important than even the great Reform Bill.

Testimony of that character is of the greatest possible value to us in considering this question. Those who are students of history have been accustomed to regard the era in the national life of the mother country when the Reform Bill was passed into legislation, as marking one of the greatest steps in the advancement of the classes there that has taken place in her whole history. This testimony from the sources to which I have referred, indicates that, in the judgment of the leading minds of the mother country, this question is of an importance even greater than the principle which was involved in the Reform Bill. I think we in Canada have been perhaps somewhat laggard in dealing with this question. We may have been too busy in laying the foundations of our national advancement and progress, too busy with what might be called the material phases of our situation to deal with what is after all an important social problem, the problem under which the men and women who are too old to work may be assured, out of the common fund of the nation to which they belong, a guarantee against that humiliation which every self-respecting person resents and revolts against, the fate of going to the workhouse or the poorhouse. It must be remembered that there are in this world two great divisions that have always existed, the class of the rich and the class of the poor. There is this singular difference of condition that marks both these classes, people of ample means, or who might be classed within the category of the rich, and the young men who always depend upon the old. The accumulated funds pass to the head of the family and are usually retained in his custody and control as long as he is permitted or can hold them. When he comes to pass away, under settled conditions, that goes to the elder member of his family, and so on. But it is when you are dealing with the men who do not belong to the rich class, that you are dealing with conditions under which the old must of necessity depend upon the young. Where you have a head of a family who has devoted to the maintenance of his family all his hard earnings in industrial life, or agricultural life, or any other mode of life where work and labour are essential to the upkeep of the family where you have to deal with a condition where the head of the family has striven to provide by education the best facilities for his family, all the time having to face the greatest problem, after all, of existence, that of getting his daily bread, where you have to deal with these conditions it must be manifest that, except in rare circumstances, the old man has to depend on the young. Then you have to consider the difficulties which the man and woman who are not of the rich class, have to contend against, with advancing years, when an epidemic of sickness in the family may sweep away all the little savings which have been the accumulation of years, and left the head of the family in such a condition that he is handicapped by reverses which years will never enable him to overtake. Continued ill health in the family produces conditions that equally can only be met by the intervention of the state in some way, if you are going to preserve the latter days of such a person from penury, which, under the most favourable conditions, in the most favoured country, is almost sure to follow.

It is said by some gentlemen who discuss this question that we have an annuity system in Canada, and that consequently, we have solved the problem. I do not appreciate that proposition at all. The annuity system does not reach the class of men, honest but poor men, who are not able to accumulate enough money to buy an annuity. Annuities after all are only within the reach of people who have a reserve fund, financially, that will enable them to speculate in a financial proposition. Yet in the cottage homes, whether in city, town or country, the great majority of people are never in a position to grapple with the proposition of buying annuities. In this twentieth century we cannot help but observe that the old men are being pushed to the wall in every employment of life, in almost every profession of life, and every profession of the arts. I would like to know from any one who has any doubt about this question, what they would say shall be the refuge of the men who have reached that stage that they are told they are too old to work. The tremendous advance in the industrial sciences, the development of machinery, and of the technical knowledge which is necessary in order to operate in the various up-to-date conditions that are found in the great industries of this country, must of necessity drive to the wall the older man. Where we have a country great as this is in its possibilities and in its actual conditions, the problem is to bring technical education to the homes of the poor where young men are growing up, and to give them the opportunity of acquiring a knowledge which will enable them to make their way in life. In Canada we have sent out a commission to look into this question, and to discover if possible, some method by which you can apply to the common people the benefits of technical education in a more diffusive way. In the meantime, all over this land there are found men who are being told that they are too old to work even though their age has not impaired their physical powers to such an extent as to prevent them from engaging in certain kinds of manual labour.

And after all, there is that penalty which attaches to men who, of necessity, have not adapted themselves to the newer conditions of life and that is the sentence meted out to them. It is in the interest of the state that the most ideal conditions possible should prevail and if you cannot have them ideal, conditions as close to that as you can get them should exist for older people. What are these conditions? They are, first, personal comfort. The very least that any one who has come to the age of 65 or older should demand inherently, supposing he has done the best he could in his own particular sphere, is that he should have an element of personal comfort which is a condition of things essential to all persons at that time of life. Then, persons who have reached this age ought to be able to have some idea of independence in their actions and thoughts. These are two essentials. It seems to me that where they do not exist, as unquestionably they do not exist in this or any other land, the least that the state can do is to provide them to the best of its ability in order to ensure that its best citizens, because from the cottage homes of England and Canada sprang in the days that are gone and are springing to-day men and women who are the best citizens of our country, may enjoy in the declining years of their lives that personal comfort and independence to which they are entitled. The very least that the state can be expected to do is to provide those conditions of comfort and independence which do not exist to-day for people who have reached the time of life of which I have spoken.

How are these conditions of comfort and independence to be obtained outside of the intervention of the state? They may be obtained by the accumulation of years of savings. I have pointed out that no matter how thrifty people may be their accumulations acquired under normal conditions and with exceptional care might be swept away by a period of illness or misfortune which might destroy the little holdings that had been got together. Then, there is the other source—the source of present earnings—the amount of money that a person of 65 or over could earn by engaging in some occupation. The impairment of the value of the labour of a man of that age is something that I have already referred to. But, where you have present earnings and where you have the exceptional case in which these earnings are sufficient, the intervention of the state is not required and it is not supposed that the old age pension system would apply except with such limitations as would guarantee its operation only in such cases as those in which this source of revenue did not exist. Then, there is the third source of assistance to aged people—their children, a common source of help everywhere, be it said to the honour of the men of our race, as previous speakers upon this question have remarked. It is a gratifying thing to know that in Canada this assistance is freely rendered and that love of parents is a characteristic which exists to a very great degree among our people.

But, look at the impossibility of such assistance being absolute in its character. Take the man and woman who have brought up a family in an industrial centre, or in any condition of life; the young people have grown up, gone out and married and formed families of their own. Here, the proposition is put forth sometimes that you should not have an old age pension system because the young will look after the old. Thus the doctrine of individualism would apply. That is all very fine to theorize about, but any one who has lived close to industrial centres knows how impossible it is to get rid of the necessity for the intervention of the state upon the theory that the children must look after their fathers and mothers. The problem becomes a successive one to be solved by the son or daughter just as it was in the case of the father. Is there anything more humiliating, after all, than to see an old man or old woman at the eventide of life absolutely dependent, without any independence or freedom of action, sitting perhaps at the fireside of the son, who feels it the greatest possible imposition no matter how strong may be his desire to perform the onerous duty of fulfilling the obligation which rests upon the child towards its parents. These are some of the reasons why we are told in some quarters that the state should not interfere.

To my mind these sources which I have enumerated are all inadequate. No matter how satisfactory the individual conditions may be amongst the poorer classes in different parts of the country, after all you have a great percentage of the people who have sprung from those who are not rich and for whom the necessary comforts of life can only be obtained by the intervention of the state in some such way as is being done in these other countries to which I have referred, and as ought to be done in Canada. Take, for instance, the conditions in very many places in the eastern part of Canada; where are the young men? The east in Canada has been the fruitful nursery not only for our own western lands but for other nations, unfortunately. Is there anything more pathetic than to find the old man and woman living alone on a small farm somewhere in eastern Canada unable to work, and, as frequently occurs, having to make some arrangement with some third party in order to obtain a guarantee that they will get their bed and board until the time comes to close their eyes? The children are so far away that it is impossible to reach them or to secure that assistance from them which might otherwise be available. Take again another pathetic case. One of the great problems in Canada to-day is the problem of the migration from the farm to the town. With our advance industrially there has gone on the depopulation of the farming districts which have been the recruiting ground in order to give us the men who work in the factories and mines. There is nothing more pathetic than to see the old man and the old lady left upon the farm by the boy who has gone to get work in the city, following him or a daughter there and finding themselves as isolated almost as if they were living on the desert, having no touch with the community in which they live and dependent upon the assistance which may be rendered by the son or daughter. Then again, the son bids farewell to the farm and goes away, and these people are left stranded with perhaps a little money, but not enough to maintain themselves under their own roof tree. These are instances of numerous cases which exist all over the country and particularly in eastern Canada where the intervention of the state is absolutely necessary not only in the interest of these people but in the interest of Canada.

In the west the optimism of the people is great as a result of the continuous immigration which is going there. The efforts of the nation are being put forth in order to solve the transportation problem by railway extension, and tremendous expenditures of money have been going on all over that country. While the people keep going there and while this money is being spent throughout the country of course they are optimists and splendid optimism it is, but this country is in its most infantile stage as far as development and social problems are concerned, and day by day there are developing the conditions under which the older men in that land will very properly feel that there ought to be some consideration of the problem of how those essential things which are demanded, and which exist in every country which has a pride in its people, can and should be provided by the state because all the other sources are inadequate.

The Minister of Finance told us that one of the things to be considered in Canada was that there was no public agitation on this question. Well, we have been having a strenuous life in Canada for the past ten years; in the east and the west the growth of our country has been marvellous, and doubtless our people have not stopped to consider the solution of these social problems. But, this question has nevertheless been discussed in a great many parts of the country. In my own province where a great number of people have been engaged for years in the coal mining industry, and where we have very intelligent labour organizations the question has been seriously considered and has formed matter for discussion in various election campaigns. That it has not been much discussed in the press is not an indication that there is no public opinion on the question, although of course as the hon. member (Mr. Verville) says, public opinion is largely formed by the press of a country. And, the reason why there is not more public opinion on this question is because our public men have not been to the fore in placing before our people the importance of dealing with it, as the motherland, as New Zealand, and as many of the other world nations have done. I do not think the Minister of Finance presented a strong argument when he suggested that it might not be wise to advertise that there were conditions in Canada which rendered old age pensions necessary. Everybody knows that people grow old in Canada as elsewhere, and the fortune-seeker who comes here and thinks that he can get everything he desires by simply landing on our shores must of course become disillusioned. Possibly, those who come to Canada imbued with such an idea never think of what will happen when they do grow old, or perhaps they dream that old age will not overtake them. No one will seriously contend that there never will be a condition in Canada which will free our people from the penalities which invariably follow old age in every land, and, Sir, while we are laying strong and firm the foundation stone of our great future along industrial lines, every patriot must believe that to be really great we must as well make social progress in a direction advantageous for our people. It becomes, in my opinion, very important for the well-being of the people of Canada that we should create here a system similar to that which obtains elsewhere in providing for our aged poor. I trust that the fullest information may be gathered by the committee which has been agreed to by the Minister of Finance as regards the working of this system in all countries, and that as a result we may look forward with hope and confidence to being able to solve in this parliament, this question, which should be of deep concern to us all.

Mr. W. F. CARROLL (South Cape Breton). I am glad that the government has been asked to take the first step to investigate this question as to the best method to be devised to make our aged poor happy and comfortable in their declining years. It will, I think, be acceded to by all, that there should be some means in this country, either by state aid or in some other way, to help those old people, who, by no fault of their own, find it difficult to provide themselves with a livelihood when age prevents them longer taking part in the battle of life. The question then remains as to what is the best scheme to accomplish this end. In many of the most enlightened countries a system of old age pensions has been devised, and in the mother country there is a system of state aid to the aged poor in the shape of old age pensions which, I understand, has worked out very well. Several schemes have been developed in other lands, and amongst them the system of old age annuities. The late government of Canada developed such a system and there is no doubt that old age annuities, by which people by the payment of a certain sum per month for a certain number of years can buy an annuity when they reach a certain age, is a sound proposition so far as it goes. But the trouble at present with us is that it is difficult to make the people generally understand and appreciate what this annuity system means. Under the late government, agents were sent to all parts of Canada to bring the system to the attention of the public, and I regret that the present government has seen it desirable to withdraw these agents. The government has not yet told us what its intentions are in the way of substituting some other means of publicity, but they must be aware that unless the system is widely and continuously advertised, and the people induced to take advantage of it, there will be not much use keeping the Annuity Act upon our statute books. Now, there is also in some countries of Europe an old age pension system which is called the Universal Scheme, and by which all persons who arrive at a certain age, whether they be rich or poor, are granted state aid. I do not think it requires much consideration to see that this so called Universal Scheme is not desirable in a country like Canada. It means that a man who is worth a million dollars, and a man who is worth nothing are equally benefited by its operation.

Mr. BURNHAM. What does the hon. member mean by saying that the rich will benefit equally with the poor?

Mr. CARROLL. This universal scheme which has been adopted in some countries but which has not been adopted in England, although it has been seriously discussed there, provides that every person of a certain age is entitled to state aid.

Mr. BURNHAM. Is the hon. gentleman aware that that has nothing to do with the question before us now?

Mr. CARROLL. I am not talking about whether it has anything to do with it or not, I am simply referring to what schemes have been adopted in other countries along this line. This, I do not think would commend itself to the public opinion of this or any other country. The scheme that has received the most cognizance and that I think should commend itself to the people of this country is what is known as the deserving poor scheme. Under this scheme a person must of course be a British citizen resident in Canada, and of the age of 60 or 65 years. He would have to show that he had endeavoured to the best of his ability to make a living and to save something for a future day while he was able to work. He must also show that he had not received poor relief during the days that he was capable of earning a livelihood unless under very extraordinary circumstances. He must show further that he has not sufficient income to keep him comfortably in his old age. The question arises, is there such a condition of affairs in Canada to-day that an old age pension system is actually desirable? Is there any public opinion on this question? We may be told that this country is and has been for a number of years too prosperous to justify us in thinking of bringing into effect any system of old age pensions at the present time. Well, it is one of the ironies of fate that the greater the industrial development of a country the more poor people it has. It is one of the ironies of fate that during the last twenty or twenty-five years, while the conditions of the labouring people in this country have been greatly improved in the way of better wages, more temperate living, more and better medical aid, yet all these things do not help to solve the problems of what is going to become of the aged poor. It is one of the ironies of fate that notwithstanding these improved conditions, it is more difficult for an old man in Canada to-day to earn a living than it was twenty or twenty-five years ago. This I take to be due to the increased pressure under which modern industry is carried on in Canada. Now, there are very many ways besides state aid whereby people in their younger days may be helped, if they have become sick or unable to work, without being obliged to go to the poorhouse or some almshouse or being placed upon the poor list. In our factories, our coal mines and our steel works, the labour unions have done a great deal to alleviate suffering in this way, by establishing relief funds, to which some of our local governments have contributed, by means of which a man gets from $4 to $6 a week if he is incapacitated for working, provided he has himself contributed a certain amount per month to the relief fund. A great number of the relief societies, however, are beneficial only to the working people when these people are themselves able to work and have not ceased to work. None of these relief societies have as yet arrived at a stage where they could provide for the aged poor without the latter contributing to the fund. That is one of the reasons urged against state aid.

The hon. Minister of Finance, who, I believe is taking a keen interest in this subject, as I think every public man should, has said that in some parts of this country to-day there is no necessity for any state aid. I agree with the hon. minister so far as the agricultural districts of Canada are concerned, which, I presume, contain 60 per cent of the population of this country. So far as the agriculturists of Canada are concerned, we need not worry ourselves about state aid, because from the time they enter on the farm they are putting themselves in a position to look after their own old age, and their occupation is well calculated to enable them to do so. But what about the 20 or 30 per cent of the people of this country who are artisans and labourers? What about the men who work in factories for from $1.50 to $2 a day? What about the men who work in mines, some of whom make high wages, while others get wages on which no man in this country should be asked to live, $1.50 or $1.65 a day? How is it possible for people in this condition to live and bring up a family, taking into consideration the very high cost of living in this country to-day? It is absolutely impossible for them to lay by anything for the comforts of their old age. These are the people we must consider. It would not require very much from the treasury of Canada to maintain and keep in good working order an old age pension system such as I have outlined, and I am happy that the present Minister of Finance is interested in the question. In the eastern section of Nova Scotia, which is an industrial section, we have our steel works and our coal works, and the question of old age pensions is a living and burning question in that vicinity at the present time. I understand also that in the coal regions of the west and in the industrial centres of Quebec and Ontario public opinion is being developed on this question; and while the percentage of people in Canada to-day who would be looking for state aid is happily small, yet it is sufficient to make it desirable that this government should take into consideration and formulate some scheme by which the old age of these people may be made more comfortabe and happy.

Mr. LEMIEUX. Mr. Speaker, some years ago, when I was Minister of Labour, this question was brought before the House and a committee was appointed to study the working of the old age pension system. Unfortunately it was at the end of a long and strenuous session, and the committee did not do very much work. It met only once and was never convened again.

I hope that this time a strong committee will be struck and that we will gather as much information as possible on this very important question. Much valuable information can be collected now that we have the results of their experience in England of the working of the Old Age Pension system. I may say, en passant, that this debate has been the means of vindicating the policy of the present Chancellor of the Exchequer which has been so much abused on the other side of the Atlantic. Every one remembers that when Mr. Lloyd George brought that question to the fore in the House of Commons in England he was severely criticised, but to-day after a few years' experience, every one admits that his old age pension has been quite a success, and it is now adopted as part and parcel of the British system.

I agree with the Minister of Finance that while the old age pension may be a necessity for England, it does not follow that it is a necessity for Canada. I am bound to say that in England there are not only the unemployed but the unemployable. I heard that expression used some years ago by the great labour leader, John Burns. He said that the question which concerns England to-day is not so much the army of unemployed, as the army of unemployable. Fortunately for Canada, we have not the unemployable, and we have very few unemployed. There is no pauperism in Canada. I would not wish to import politics into this debate but since 1896 at least, we have seen no evidence of pauperism in Canada, and my hope is that under the able guidance of the Minister of Finance (Mr. White) there will never be pauperism in Canada.

Whilst this committee would gather very valuable information and would educate the country on that very important question, there is one which, in my judgment, is of more importance still, a subject that was mentioned the other day by the Minister of Finance and by the Minister of Trade and Commerce, I refer to the annuity system organized a few years ago by the then Minister of Trade and Commerce, the Right Hon. Sir Richard Cartwright. I wish to refer hon. members to the very able and substantial speech delivered on that occasion in the Senate by Sir Richard in presenting his Bill. He made one of the best exposés of the annuities system ever made in any parliament. The annuities system has been working fairly well since its establishment in Canada. I fear, however, that it has not been advertised as it should have been by the authorities of both the late and the present government. There were, I think, ten or twelve lecturers to explain to the people of Canada how to practise thrift in a very economical way indeed. The annuity system is, after all, the system which obtains on the continent of Europe. In France they have tried to establish the old age pension system but it has come to be a complete fiasco. The system which obtains in France to-day is that of the annuity system. They established 25 or 30 years ago La Societé des Prevoyants de l'Avenir. They have had such success that the government have had to intervene and divide the profits among the more recent members of the society. The annuity system has not had the success in Canada that it should have obtained. It is an excellent system and the best means of educating our people to thrift and economy.

I am sorry that the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Foster), should have dispensed with the services of the lecturers. I know that he thought he was administering his department on safe lines in transferring this system to the Post Office Department. In England the postmasters are the agents of the government for the payment of the old age pensions, but I am sorry that, after having transferred the annuity branch to the Post Office Department, the government should not have thought proper to continue the employment of lecturers, either the old officials or new ones, to explain to the people the workings of the system. Reading over the Annuities Act it takes some time to understand its workings. The different systems embodied in the Annuities Act have to be explained carefully to the people so that they may understand the advantages of one plan over the other. It takes an expert to explain to the people the workings of the annuity system. The country and city postmasters have too much business to attend to of a very practical nature to have time to explain one by one to the applicants the workings of the various plans in connection with the annuities system. You must have agents or lecturers to explain to the labour societies, and the various bodies who take an interest in these matters, just how this system is worked. I hope, therefore, that whilst we may gather important and valuable information as regards old age pensions, the government will in the meanwhile do a little more to propagate the system of annuities. It is an excellent system when one understands it. Do you imagine that the various insurance companies, like the Sun Life or Canada Life, are satisfied with advertising in the newspapers that they have head offices in Montreal and Toronto, and are ready to receive the applications of the various people who wish for insurance policies? No, they have active agents, and you know how many agents are after you in a year's time. You find them everywhere, in the cities, in the villages; nearly every notary or doctor in my own native province is an agent for some insurance company. I would urge upon the government the necessity of spending a little more money in getting proper agents for the propagation of the annuity system. I am quite sure that the various plans would be found so advantageous for the people that, after a while, the Minister of Trade and Commerce would be in a position to show a larger increase than ever in the number of applicants.

Mr. BURNHAM. Have the various insurance companies any system of annuities?

Mr. LEMIEUX. Some of them have systems of annuities, but they are not as cheap, and, in the minds of the people at large, not as safe as the government annuity system. The very fact that it is a government annuity system is of itself an advertisement, and an inducement to bring the people to accept it.

Mr. FOSTER (Toronto). I do not wish at this time to go into the discussion of the main question, but only to touch on a point or two made by my hon. friend from Rouville (Mr. Lemieux) with reference to the annuity system. It may not be necessary, but just for fear it is, I wish to correct one or two of what seem to be misapprehensions with reference to the action of the government in this matter. In the first place, neither am I nor is the government of which I am a member, opposed to the annuities system. And in the second place, anything that has been done has been done with no other idea than that of making possible a continuous and progressive working of that system.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. Are you enthusiastic?

Mr. FOSTER (Toronto). I have some enthusiasims left yet; and this not one of the least of them, perhaps. Another impression that is not correct is that there was anything of partyism either in the policy of the change that was made or in the carrying out of that policy. My hon. friend (Mr. Lemieux) hoped that the government would come to the conclusion later, if not to employ the old lecturers then to employ new ones. I can assure him that if the system of employing lecturers had been thought a good one, there would have been no change in those appointed so long as they carried out the duties entrusted to them in a proper way. I think I explained before, but perhaps it is as well to say a word on this question now, it did not seem to me that the Department of Trade and Commerce, with its comparatively limited affiliations, was the proper department to carry on this work unless the country made up its mind to a very large expenditure. It is not fair to liken the annuities system to an insurance company. The insurance company is in the business for profits; it has humanitarian principles, I dare say, but, while it co-operates with the sentiment that demands protection, it works on the line of advantage to the shareholders. The government cannot make anything out of an annuity; on the contrary, it must add to the contribution of the purchaser, so that every annuity represents an outgo rather than an income. Therefore it would be impossible for the government to undertake to operate the annuities scheme on the basis of an insurance corporation; the expense would become so great that the system would fall of its own weight. Nor am I enamoured of the system of lecturerships; quite the contrary. We had this system for two and-a-half or three years. I can bring down a statement of the meetings held and the numbers that attended. Whatever might happen if you were to put $100,000 a year into it and carry on a propaganda that should be wide and distributed, certainly the lecture system has been a dreary repetition of unsuccesses so far as audiences were concerned. Audiences of twenty-five, seventy-five, in a very few cases over a hundred, were all that the lecturers—and some of them were men and women of ability—were able to attract. If you were to continue the lecture system, you would have to give every part of the country as good an opportunity to hear as every other part. You cannot spend money in the county of Carleton to set forth the benefits of the annuities system without carrying out the same policy in every other county. And my hon. friend will see from this—as he would see more clearly if the papers were referred to—that the expense involved would become unbearable and would in the end bring the system to ruin. Now, taking this branch from the Department of Trade and Commerce and putting it into the Post Office Department is not to smother it or clip its wings, but to give it greater freedom of movement and greater opportunities of success. The Post Office Department, as my hon. friend (Mr. Lemieux) knows—none better—covers every community in the Dominion. The gentleman who has charge of the Annuities Branch—and I give him credit for being not only able but enthusiastic—loses nothing of his ability or enthusiasm when transferred from my department to the department of the Post Office. Nor am I sure that the Annuities Branch has got into a department that has less sympathy with the object and the work than has the department over which I preside. The intention is not to hide its light under a bushel but to expand the light so that every community may know the name and object of the system, and to lay the basis for a successful propaganda. In every fairly representative post office there will be a government advertisement calling the attention of the public to the fact that there is a Government Annuities System. That in itself will be a great advertisement for the annuities and a great education for the public. Tables showing the advantages of the system will form part of that advertisement. My hon. friend says that the annuities system is an abstruse system. The actuarial calculations upon which it depends are technical, and you will find few people in this country who are capable of following them. But that is not true of the results as they are set forth in the tables of rates.

Mr. LEMIEUX. I quite agree, that, as regards publicity, it is excellent. But will there be any inducement to the postmaster to explain the working of the Act? I suppose that every postmaster could be given a commission for each annuitant secured.

Mr. FOSTER (Toronto). I was going on to show some of the ways in which the system can be better worked out under the Post Office Department than under the Trade and Commerce Department. But I do not think we need to argue any more about the question of publicity, the question of getting the system before the masses of our people.

Every postmaster and postmistress of a money order office, whether it should go further than at present I do not know, will have a distinct financial interest in canvassing, in explaining, and in actually getting the purchase and making the sale of an annuity, as a commission will be given for every annuitant obtained. Now, when we lay aside the difficulties and the technical knowledge necessary in drawing up a scheme, and making calculations of the annuities, and getting it all into concrete tabular form, the advantage to the public will be manifest. A child, any man of ordinary intelligence, can see in a moment what that leads to, that by paying in a certain amount every year he may, at a certain time, when old age comes on, be able to draw so much during the remainder of his life. Now taking all these things into consideration it seems to me you have done a great thing when you advertise it and call the attention of the people to it. If one wants a little guidance, that guidance is easily obtained, once the attention is drawn, after a man begins to think there is a chance for an annuity. There is the school teacher whom he meets every day, there is the clergyman whom he meets every day, there are neighbours who are more financially inclined probably than he is, and there are various sources in every community for a man to get more knowledge, which will help him to make up his mind. There is one other thing I will add. It is a part of this system, and it remains a part of it, to prepare careful readers for the press. This system is being pushed, and will be pushed just as largely as it can be. At the present moment my hon. friend will notice in paper after paper an article commendatory of the scheme, and we find that newspaper men generally are very willing and glad to put these readers in their papers, and give the public the benefit of that publicity. Putting all these things together, I am sure that under the present system of management, not only shall we avoid over weighting the scheme in the matter of expense, but we shall infinitely enlarge it by means of the dissemination of the instrumentalities that are now carried on as compared with the old system.

Hon. H. R. EMMERSON (Westmorland). I am sorry I cannot concur in what the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Foster) has said as to the prospects of the enlargement of the annuity system. The very first statement made by my hon. friend with respect to the slim attendance at the meetings which were held by the special agents of his department in the past, is an indication that the subject of annuities is not a live one among the people. Taking it for granted that it is in their interest to purchase annuities, it must be admitted that they are not alive to the advantages of the system. Now if it is left to postmasters throughout Canada to propagate the system, to advertise it, to disseminate it among the people, I fear that very little if anything will be done. I have only to remember the conditions prevailing in the county I have the honour to represent. I venture the assertion that there is not a postmaster in any of the more important places who would be likely to take any great interest in the subject. Take the city of Moncton, the towns of Sackville, Salisbury and other towns and villages throughout that county, if this work of disseminating information is left in the hands of the postmasters, there will not be that wide dissemination of information which, in my judgment, is desirable in the interests of the public. My hon. friend is familiar with the assessment insurance companies. Take, for instance, the Royal Arcanum, the Independent Order of Foresters, and like organizations and associations. If it were left to mere advertisement, nothing would ever be done in the way of increasing the benefits of these organizations. I remember years ago when the Royal Arcanum was first inaugurated in the province of New Brunswick. There was some progress made by means of agents who went out and remained in a community two or three weeks or a month, and after creating an interest among the people, and explaining the system to individuals, he perhaps made a movement towards organizing a court or a lodge in that community. The same with respect to the Independent Order of Foresters. But the Royal Arcanum, after they had once established their courts in the province of New Brunswick, failed to employ these agents and withdrew them. Consequently the order practically died out in that province and in eastern Canada. In face of the competition of the Independent Order of Foresters they were not making any headway, in fact they were losing ground, and the result was that they had to return to the employment of agents, and to send them broadcast throughout the country in order to educate the people to the advantage of insurance in organizations of that character.

Now I fear the same will be true with respect to annuities. I remember the agents of the department going to certain sections of New Brunswick and attempting to hold meetings. At first their efforts signally failed, and it was only by repeated attempts on their part to arouse the interest of the people by explaining to them the advantages of annuities, that they made any headway at all. Now, putting up an advertisement in post offices with respect to these annuities, while it may catch the eye, it will not attract the interest. You might let it stand there for months, and you would not have an inquiry from any one. In my judgment a mistake has been made, though I hope the result will prove otherwise. I think the course adopted by the government will be a dismal failure. A discussion with respect to annuities has arisen out of this resolution, and that is an advantage. I am in favour of the object of the resolution, which is to appoint a committee to inquire into the whole subject of old age pensions. It is to be remembered that the conditions prevailing in this country are different from those prevailing in Great Britain; yet I believe there are in certain sections of this country people who are interested in old age pensions. I think that the great body of organized labour in Canada is in favour of the system, and certainly it is due to them, and due to the interests which they represent, that a very thorough and accurate inquiry should be held into the whole subject, so that not only the members of this parliament may become seized of the necessary information to enable them to legislate with wisdom, but that the people at large in every section of Canada may have that information before them.

Motion agreed to.

INSPECTION AND SALE ACT AMENDMENT

House in committee on the following proposed resolution:

Resolved, that it is expedient to amend the Inspection and Sale Act by providing, (a) for the inspection of feed imported into Canada, and of flour, meal or feed manufactured, sold or offered for sale therein; (b) that every bag or package of flour, meal or feed shall be marked with the name of the manufacturer or packer, the place of packing and the weight of the contents, and (c) for the imposition of penalties for offences in contravention thereof.—Mr. Foster (Toronto).

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. What is the object of this?

Mr. FOSTER (Toronto). It is to make some amendments and additions to the Inspection and Sale Act. The matter will be explained when the Bill comes before the House.

Resolution reported, read the first and second time, and agreed to.

Mr. FOSTER (Toronto) moved for leave to introduce Bill (No. 78) to amend the Inspection and Sale Act.

Motion agreed to, and Bill read the first time.

TARIFF COMMISSION.

Mr. WHITE (Leeds) moved that the House go into committee to-morrow to consider the following proposed resolution:

Resolved, That it is expedient to provide for a Tariff Commission consisting of three members, to be appointed by the Governor in Council, whose duty it shall be—

1. To make, under the direction of the Minister of Finance, in respect of any goods produced or imported into Canada, inquiry as to—

(a) the price and cost of raw materials in Canada and elsewhere, and the cost of transportation thereof from the place of production to the place of use or consumption;

(b) the cost of production in Canada and elsewhere;

(c) the cost of transportation from the place of production to the place of use or consumption, whether in Canada or elsewhere;

(d) the cost, efficiency and conditions of labour in Canada and elsewhere;

(e) the prices received by producers, manufacturers, wholesale dealers, retailers and other distributors in Canada and elsewhere;

(f) all conditions and factors which effect or enter into the cost of production and the price to the consumers in Canada;

(g) generally all the conditions affecting production, manufacture, cost and price in Canada as compared with other countries, and to report to the minister.

2. To make inquiry into any other matter, upon which the minister desires information, in relation to any goods which if brought into Canada or produced in Canada are subject to or exempt from duties of customs, and to report to the minister.

3. To hold, when empowered by the Governor in Council, an inquiry under section 12 of the Customs Tariff, 1907, in the same manner as the judge of the Exchequer Court or any other judge therein referred to may hold inquiry when so empowered.

4. To inquire into any other matter or thing in relation to the trade or commerce of Canada which the Governor in Council sees fit to refer to the commission for inquiry and report.

That the commissioners shall have the power of summoning before them any witnesses and of requiring them to give evidence on oath or on solemn affirmation and to produce such documents and things as the commissioners may deem requisite to the full investigation of the matters into which they are appointed to examine, with such power with regard to attendance of witnesses and compelling witnesses to give evidence as is vested in any court of record in civil cases.

That there be employed in the service of the commission a secretary, and such officers, clerks and employees and persons having technical or special knowledge as may be necessary.

That the chairman of the commission be paid an annual salary of seven thousand five hundred dollars, and the other two members an annual salary of seven thousand dollars; that the secretary be paid an annual salary to be fixed by the Governor in Council, not exceeding three thousand dollars, and that all salaries and expenses incident to the carrying out of the provisions of any Act founded on these resolutions be payable out of any appropriation granted to His Majesty by parliament for the purpose.

He said: His Royal Highness the Governor General, having been made acquainted with the subject matter of this resolution, commends it to the favourable consideration of the House.

Motion agreed to.

SUPPLY—ENGRAVING AND PRINTING GOVERNMENT BILLS AND STAMPS.

Mr. WHITE moved that the House go into Committee of Supply.

Mr. EMMERSON. During the absence of the hon. Minister of Finance (Mr. White) I asked the government what the limitations were that were put upon tenders with respect to the engraving work for which tenders are now being asked.

Mr. WHITE (Leeds). I am sorry that I was absent from the House when the question was asked by my hon. friend. I do not know precisely what my hon. friend means by limitations, but I presume that it is as to whether there are any limitations as to the firms or corporations that may tender.

Mr. EMMERSON. Whether it is open to tenders from the United States, Great Britain, or Canada.

Mr. WHITE (Leeds). Tenders will be received from any firm or corporation no matter whether resident or domiciled in Canada or elsewhere, but, of course, the tenders are subject to the provisions of the specification. Section 7 provides that:

All work under the contract, with the exception of the engraving of the original dies of portraits and vignettes used in connection with any work under the contract, shall be done at the City of Ottawa, in such building or buildings as are approved of by the Minister of Finance, such building or buildings to be fire-proof and to contain all necessary fire-proof vaults to ensure the safety of the work, and the contractor shall not do or permit to be done in such building or buildings any work other than the work under the contract.

Section 8 provides:

The contractor shall by the first day of October, 1912, provide such machinery and plant as in the opinion of the Minister of Finance will be of sufficient capacity and suitable for executing the work under the contract.

I may say that the specification substantially follows the provisions of the specification of, I think, 1896. It is very necessary that this work should be done in the city of Ottawa. The engraving of Dominion notes especially, is a work that should be protected by fire-proof buildings, and must be carried out here, because the relationship between the department and the engraving company is of the closest, in order that Dominion notes can be supplied from time to time to exchange for gold as the demand for circulation may require.

I think that substantially answers the question of my hon. friend. In 1896, copies of these specifications were sent to the High Commissioner's office in London, and certain printing firms were notified in order to give them an opportunity of tendering, but of course they would have to be prepared to establish themselves here before they would be in a position to do so.

Mr. MURPHY. I assume that the specification contains a clause or clauses defining the character or quality of the work that is to be turned out. In drafting that clause, did the Department of Finance have the assistance of expert advice from outside the department?

Mr. WHITE (Leeds). My recollection is that we did not have any expert advice outside of the department. The specification follows generally that of 1896. Section 14 of it is as follows:

14. All work shall be executed from best quality steel plates, to be engraved in the highest style of art current from time to time, and all such work shall be of a standard and quality not inferior to that of the notes, stamps and other supplies now in use. All such work shall be done and executed by artists, artisans and workmen perfectly skilled in the various branches therof, and the contractor shall agree that from time to time during the existence of the contract he will introduce and use in connection with the work to be done thereunder, all improvements in the art of steel plate engraving and printing which experience shall show to be useful therein. For the purpose of tender specimens of the finished work may be seen at the Finance Department, Ottawa.

I think that will protect the point to which my hon. friend (Mr. Murphy), referred.

Mr. MURPHY. When the work is turned out will the hon. Minister of Finance have the benefit of an expert to pass on the quality of the work?

Mr. WHITE (Leeds). If it were necessary, I should think so. The quality of the work is subject to the approval, without question, of the Minister of Finance, as are the plates and designs. The original specification was drawn with great care. The clause I have read, I believe, was in the previous contract. And I think the only substantial modification was the introduction of the usual clause in government contracts with regard to labour, and also a clause with regard to the capacity of the plant to turn out Dominion notes—the plant must be of a certain capacity, so that there may be no danger of a shortage of supplies at a critical time.

Mr. LEMIEUX. Is there anything in the specifications calling for the printing of Dominion notes and stamps in French?

Mr. WHITE (Leeds). I thought I had explained to my hon. friend, that, while any person, firm or corporation might tender, they must establish themselves here in order to carry on the work.

Mr. LEMIEUX. No, I was asking the Minister of Finance if there was anything in the specifications providing for the printing in the French language of Dominion notes and postage stamps?

Mr. WHITE (Leeds). No.

Mr. LEMIEUX. My hon. friend must make——

Mr. FOSTER (North Toronto). Surely the hon. gentleman (Mr. Lemieux) is not going to raise a discussion on that point now?

Mr. LEMIEUX. I am simply warning my genial friend (Mr. White, Leeds), that he must make friends at once with his two neighbours, the Postmaster General and the Minister of Public Works. They have been crucifying my right hon. leader (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) and your humble servant, because, forsooth, we did not print Dominion notes and postage stamps in French as well as in English. Now that you are going to renew the whole machinery you make no provision to carry out what they promised. What have these hon. gentlemen done in council? Have they not advocated the use of the French language——

Mr. SPEAKER. I would remind the hon. gentleman (Mr. Lemieux), that he has spoken twice on this motion. While a question may be permitted, it is hardly in order for him to raise a discussion.

Mr. WHITE (Leeds). Perhaps I may be permitted to explain. The notes, stamps, &c., of course, will be such as may be decided upon from time to time. In my opinion, the contract is sufficient to cover printing in either language. The bills and stamps would have to be made in accordance with instructions.

INQUIRY FOR RETURNS.

Mr. PUGSLEY. When may I expect the return moved for some time ago with respect to the selling of rails to the Harvey & Salisbury Railway Company, and also the return with respect to the appointment of commissioners under the Boundary Waters treaty. I am anxious to have these returns as soon as possible.

Mr. FOSTER (Toronto). We are quite as anxious as my hon. friend to get the returns off our hands. I will make a note of the matter.

TRANSATLANTIC MAIL SERVICE.

Mr. LEMIEUX. I draw the attention of the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Foster) to a dispatch which appears in this morning's 'Citizen,' and which interests me as the former member for Gaspé. It reads:

WINTER NAVIGATION.

Quebec Board of Trade Letter to Postmaster General.

Quebec, Jan. 23.—The Quebec Board of Trade have sent an interesting letter to Hon. L. P. Pelletier, Postmaster General, in regard to winter navigation. The letter says:

'The Quebec Board of Trade have been informed that the government of Newfoundland has voted a subsidy of $75,000 per annum for 25 years to a London syndicate who propose to build a railway from Green Bay to Bay of Islands, Newfoundland, and a fast and powerful car-ferry steamer to carry trains winter and summer from the latter point to Gaspé or Dalhousie. This service will be in connection with fast ocean steamers from Green Bay to Ireland or England. As this project would be of very great importance to Canada, not only for a faster English mail service but also as making a daily and more intimate connection between this province and Newfoundland, the council of the Quebec Board of Trade would respectfully suggest that so as to prove the perfect practicability of this route in winter—as has been affirmed by our most experienced navigators—the government steamship 'Montcalm' on her next trip to the gulf in the month of February should make a run from Gaspé to Bay of Islands.'

I do not rise specially to advocate the scheme referred to in this article, but I wish to ask if anything has been done yet, in regard to the contract for the conveyance of the mails between Great Britain and Canada. I will inform the hon. member (Mr. Foster) that the railway from Metapedia to Gaspé Bay has now been completed and is in operation as far as Grand River. The balance of the road only waits inspection by the Department of Railways to go into operation. When this line is in operation, the shortest route from Great Britain to Canada will be from Gaspé, but as I intend to speak on this question later I shall not dwell on it now. I also see it stated in the newspapers that the ice-breaker 'Montcalm' has gone to make experiments as to the ice flow between Newfoundland and the coast of Gaspé. I am informed that that part of the gulf has been free from ice this winter, as during the last three or four winters. In view of the completion of the railway to Gaspé Basin, it is very important for us to know if winter navigation can be maintained in those waters.

Mr. FOSTER (Toronto). Other than the initial steps to gather information, and conferences which have taken place regarding the contracts for the conveyance of the mails across the Atlantic, nothing has been done yet. I will remember the statement of my hon. friend that this railway to Gaspé Basin has been finished, and that he believes it will provide the shortest transit to the old country. I am afraid, however, that much more will have to be done before we can make arrangements for the running of large steamers from that port. I have not heard anything of the subsidy said to have been granted by Newfoundland for the project hinted at. I should almost doubt it, but nothing is impossible these days. If there is a well-founded project on foot for abridging the distance especially in the winter time, I have no doubt this government would be glad to co-operate with the government of Newfoundland in demonstrating its feasibility.

Mr. LEMIEUX. There is a subsidy paid to the S.S. 'Bruce.'

Mr. FOSTER (Toronto). Yes, between Sydney and Port au Basque, and that has been re-voted.

Mr. MACDONALD. The present contract for the conveyance of the mails across the Atlantic expires in May next, and the Minister of Trade will of course admit that if he delays calling for new tenders, it is manifestly impossible to have boats of increased speed to conduct that service. There has long been a feeling in this country that the subsidy granted by Canada should involve a somewhat faster service than that now in existence, and I am sure the Minister of Trade and Commerce appreciates the necessity and desirability of that.

But we cannot have that in May next, and what does my hon. friend propose to do in the way of a service during the coming summer? I would like to point out to him that in addition to increased speed and other facilities to be guaranteed under any subsidies that he gives under a new contract, he should endeavour to see that a line of steamers runs from the nearest port in the maritime provinces to Great Britain all the year round. The passenger service of this country has increased to such an extent that that seems to be within the bounds not merely of reasonable accommodation but of absolute necessity. I know that my hon. friend desires to make progress in this matter. Both his friends and mine have been talking a great many years about increased speed, and it seems to me we ought to have it now. But if my hon. friend is only thinking about calling for tenders, if this thinking and do nothing disease which seems to have seized on his colleagues falls on him also, I am afraid that we shall not have much advance in the way of faster lines to Europe for some time to come. Apparently this year we are going to be just where we stood before. I hope my hon. friend will give us some information as to what he is going to do in the way of advance.

Mr. FOSTER. I am glad my hon. friend applies a higher standard to this government than he did to the last. For fifteen years my hon. friend has been supporting a government which I was going to say has been neither thinking nor acting on this question. I can assure my hon. friend that the question to which he has alluded is engaging the attention of the government, and I hope within a reasonable time to be able to make an announcement.

Mr. MACDONALD. What are you going to do this summer?

Mr. FOSTER. I will then tell my hon. friend.

Mr. PUGSLEY. I cannot help expressing my surprise at the statement of the Minister of Trade and Commerce that the late government did nothing to improve the steamship service between Canada and Great Britain.

Mr. FOSTER. I am not aware that I made that statement.

Mr. PUGSLEY. When the late government came into office the mail steamers were running between Great Britain and Portland in the state of Maine, making a call at the port of Halifax. All that was changed by the late government, and through the generous assistance that was given, the steamship service has been greatly improved. To-day the Allan Line, the Canadian Pacific railway, the White Star line and the Canadian Northern are running steamers between Canadian ports and Great Britain which I think are highly creditable to Canada as well as to the steamship companies which have shown such great enterprise in putting on the splendid steamers which now give service across the Atlantic. I am not one of those who are greatly wedded to what are known as ocean greyhounds. I think what we should aim at in this country is to have comfortable steamers of large capacity; not of too great speed, but cheap freight-carrying steamers, with accommodation for perishable products so as to enable our farmers to ship their products to the markets of the old world in as good condition and as cheaply as possible.

STENOGRAPHIC SERVICE FOR MEMBERS.

Mr. PUGSLEY. Some time ago there was voted the sum of $8,166, forming part of a vote of $14,000 to provide for a service of stenography and typewriting for the use of members. It was understood when that vote was proposed, as a result of some conversation across the House and of consultation among members on both sides, that the service was to be available for opposition members as well as for members supporting the government. I have heard it rumoured that our friends opposite, or some of them, have been given the services of stenographers, who are being paid for out of that vote. I have asked my right hon. friend the leader of the opposition if any communication has been made to him on the subject, and he informs me that none has been made. Certainly no communication has been made to me or as far as I know to other members on this side of the House. It does not seem to me that is treating the members on this side with the courtesy to which we are entitled. I would like to ask my hon. friend what has been done in reference to the disposition of that vote, and what arrangement, if any, has been made for the employment of stenographers for the use of members.

Mr. FOSTER. I am given to understand that this matter has not been allowed to remain without attention being paid to it, nor has there been any lack of courtesy. I believe that the Speaker and the Clerk are now carrying out the intention of the vote by arranging for the services of a stenographer for each group of members, no distinction being made between members on one side of the House and on the other. If members make application to the Speaker, I think they will get full information, and will also be satisfied that the project is being put into operation and with perfect equality to all members.

Mr. SPEAKER. I may say that I have consulted with several members of the opposition, and several groups have already been defined. I informed them that I would be prepared at any time to furnish a supply when five or six of them could agree to use a stenographer regularly. I have supplied several groups already on that side of the House, and have done the same on the government side.

Mr. LEMIEUX. May I suggest that the selection of the stenographers should be left in the hands of the members? I will explain why. I would accept any stenographer recommended by you, Mr. Speaker; but we all know that political correspondence is always more or less of a confidential nature, and it seems to me that each group of say four or five members should be allowed to suggest the name of their stenographer.

Naturally members do not desire to dictate their correspondence to a stenographer who is not more or less in sympathy with them politically. I would suggest that members of the opposition should be entitled to name their stenographers. It is a matter of confidence, and members I think should receive that measure of justice at your hand.

Mr. SPEAKER. That is exactly what has been done. Therefore I can say no more.

Mr. NESBITT. I must relieve Mr. Speaker of any accusation of partiality because he did exactly what my hon. friend suggests for a group of which I am a member. Mr. Speaker is prepared to do what is absolutely fair.

Mr. PUGSLEY. I am glad to hear that this plan has been adopted.

Mr. MONK. The Committee on Internal Economy is endeavouring to solve this problem which has been urged upon it by Mr. Speaker. We have taken it up several times, but we have not yet been able to make any concrete suggestion. At the last meeting the clerk was requested to ascertain how clerical assistance was furnished to members in the United States where they have an allowance for clerical assistance. My personal belief is that ultimately it will be necessary to make some allowance for the members themselves——

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

Mr. MONK. —which they themselves will arrange to employ in the best manner possible. It is almost impossible to give a member a stenographer whom he has not chosen himself. It is very difficult also to say to a member that at such an hour that stenographer will be at his disposal, and at no other hour, and in such a room, and nowhere else. Members who have been a long time in opposition, as I have been, know how difficult that is. I believe that ultimately those who study the question will come to the conclusion that it will be necessary to make an allowance in conformity with the exigencies of modern times, in order that a member may have some clerical assistance, without which it is impossible for him to fulfil the duties of his position. Nothing has been finally decided, and in the meantime members of the board will be glad to receive any suggestions which will show what is the opinion of the members on both sides of the House.

Mr. KNOWLES. Turning to a cognate matter, I have a suggestion to make to the Minister of Finance. Members of parliament are entitled to a certain allowance for travelling expenses when coming to and going from a session. It has come to be the settled practice that in every session we have at least one adjournment of almost a month, and another at Easter, when the great majority of the members go home, although they may miss a day or two by doing so. I would ask the Minister of Finance to consider whether the travelling allowance should not be given to all members of parliament, whenever there is an adjournment over some specified time, whatever is reasonable. I make no apology for this suggestion, because I am sure the minister will realize that the same philosophy which justifies the granting of a travelling allowance at the beginning and end of a session, would justify the same allowance when it is reasonably necessary for a member to go home during adjournments. The Christmas adjournment this session lasted over a month, and there is no alternative for the average member, but to go home. The interests of his constitutents demand that he should be there, and not idling about Ottawa, and if on no other ground than the interest of the constitutencies, this allowance should be made in order that the member may spend his long adjournments among his constitutents. Could not a section be inserted in the Act making that travelling allowance as often as there are adjournments of a certain length of time, seven days, or whatever might be thought reasonable.

Mr. WHITE (Leeds). I would be very glad, indeed, to take the matter into consideration.

SUPPLY.

Motion agreed to, and House went into Committee of Supply.

Public Works—Chargeable to Income—Public buildings, Quebec—Quebec Customs House $107,000.

Mr. LEMIEUX. Will the Minister of Public Works please explain this item?

Mr. MONK. This vote is for the restoration and placing of an additional story on the Quebec customs house. The attic and half the first floor of this building were destroyed by fire on October 16, 1909. A temporary roof was placed over the building and the openings on the first floor were closed to prevent the rain and snow combined with frost from endangering the main wall. The amount already paid on the contract is $82,120; fittings, $10,000; passenger elevator and motor, $5,650; freight elevator, $1,450; sidewalk, $1,500; contingencies and superintendence, $9,280; total, $110,000.

Mr. PUGSLEY. Is the passenger elevator yet installed?

Mr. MONK. No.

Mr. PUGSLEY. Does the minister intend to give the contract to the Otis-Fensom Company, or to call for tenders?

Mr. MONK. Though the Otis-Fensom is supposed to be the best, I think we shall call for tenders to see what can be done.

Quebec—drill hall extension, $50,000.

Mr. MONK. This is a revote to make provision for the extension of the drill hall at Quebec on land containing 8,240 feet expropriated December 6, 1904, at a cost of $20,000, in order to afford much-needed additional accommodation for new corps to be formed. The present accommodation is entirely insufficient for the existing corps of the city

Mr. LEMIEUX. Are any of the political parties allowed to hold meetings in the drill halls?

Mr. MONK. I cannot speak as to that. When we build armouries, we hand them over to the Militia Department. I think the question would come in better when the militia estimates are under consideration.

Mr. LEMIEUX. I would like to say here that I was very much amazed when, some months ago, after the general election of 21st September last, a political gathering was held at the armouries of the 65th battalion in Montreal. The hon. gentleman (Sir Rodolphe Forget), who represents two counties—and I do not know how one can continue to represent two counties in this House—was brought to Montreal triumphantly by his friends. I think the hon. gentleman was present. At all events, the hon. member from Montmorency and Charlevoix was brought triumphantly in a golden chariot to the armoury of the 65th regiment, where speeches were delivered by the would-be ministers, as I do not think the Cabinet had yet been formed. Now, while I do not object to a meeting held by Conservatives in the armouries in the province of Quebec, I ask if the Liberals would have the same privilege of holding political meetings there.

Mr. MONK. I am not able to answer the question for the reason already given. All we do is to build the armouries and drill sheds, which are afterwards placed under the control of the Department of Militia and Defence. I suppose there is some rule in the department. I will endeavour to get the information for my hon. friend. But in the meantime, I may say that we have nothing to do with it in our department. I was present at the meeting my hon. friend refers to, and enjoyed it very much. I had no cares of office at that time.

Mr. LEMIEUX. I thought it rather regrettable that a building which had been erected by the old government at the request of Colonel Forget, now member of parliament for Montmorency and Charlevoix, should be used officially for the first time in opposition to the government which had done so much for the 65th Regiment. However, I do not object. Political parties, after all, are associations of gentlemen in the public interest, and I suppose that they must at times find some place where they are protected from the inclemency of the weather while they enjoy themselves. But if it is a rule for one party, it should be a rule for the other. I call the attention of the hon. gentleman to what is likely to happen when the reaction takes place in our province, a reaction which has already set in.

Mr. MONK. There was nothing hostile to my hon. friend at that meeting, it was just a little jollification. I am sure my hon. friend would have approved everything we did on that occasion.

Mr. LEMIEUX. Is the addition to the drill hall in Quebec to be erected at the rear of the present building or in front?

Mr. PELLETIER. We have not decided yet.

Mr. LEMIEUX. What portion of the building is going to be altered by this addition?

Mr. MONK. There was a site purchased under an order in council of the 3rd February, 1904. The then acting Minister of Public Works purchased on the Grande Allée a piece of land containing 9,240 square feet, for a sum of $20,000 as a site for the addition. In order to arrive at a settlement of the price to be paid, the matter was referred to three persons conversant with the value of real estate in that city. They reported that, owing to the special location of that property on the Grande Allée, a fine residential street, and considering the advancement in values which had taken place, they were of the opinion that $1.40 a square foot frontage would be a fair price.

Mr. LEMIEUX. I understand this piece of property referred to was purchased for an addition to the drill hall. I do not think it was meant to add to the frontage of the building. I understand that a site was provided in the rear part of the drill shed, which was obtained from the Militia Department. Certainly, nothing has been paid for that, there has only been an exchange of titles between the two departments.

Mr. MONK. There may have been pour parlers, but I do not think anything has been done.

Quebec post office enlargement, $40,000.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. Is that enlargement to be made in the rear or at the side?

Mr. MONK. It is on property owned by the government along the hill, next to the present building. The present quarters are totally inadequate for the transaction of the postal business. It is a prolongation of the old building.

Mr. LEMIEUX. It is much needed indeed. The post office business in Quebec is in a somewhat congested state, and my hon. friend has some officers upstairs who have not proper accommodation for the work they have to perform. I would suggest that arrangements be made with the Grand Trunk Railway Company to purchase that lot in the rear of the post office, which would be much better than to widen the building. My hon. friend must remember that the post office at Quebec is one of the most imposing structures in the city, it is indeed a fine building, and it would be a pity to do anything which would mar the architectural beauties of that building. I think arrangements might be made by which the Grand Trunk Railway Company could co-operate with the government in building on the rear portion. There would be room enough, if I remember rightly, for all the offices of the government. Mr. Decarie, the resident engineer, would have room enough for the various departments occupying that building, and at the same time the Grand Trunk Railway Company could occupy the first floor. At any rate, I hope the hon. gentleman will preserve the architectural beauty of that edifice.

Mr. MONK. I know the locality very well. An extension in that direction would be very desirable, but the difficulty would be to get the Grand Trunk Railway Company to consent to it. My hon. friend knows from his own experience that that is not easily done.

Mr. LEMIEUX. I am sure that a friendly chat between the Minister of Public Works and Mr. Hays, or Mr. Wainwright, would settle that matter very amicably.

Mr. PUGSLEY. We had communication with the authorities of the Grand Trunk railway, and while they were not willing to sell the land, they stated that they would be very glad to make arrangements with the government under which they would put up a building they would rent to the government and that building would be constructed in harmony with the architecture of the present building.

Mr. PELLETIER. The plans which I have seen are prepared in such a way that provision is made for the future and also to preserve the architectural beauty of the building.

Rigaud public building, $15,000.

Mr. MONK. This is to complete the building.

Shawinigan public building, $33,000.

Mr. LEMIEUX. Is this for the ordinary accommodation of post office, customs and excise?

Mr. MONK. Customs and post office, but no excise.

Mr. LEMIEUX. Have you purchased a site?

Mr. MONK. Yes, the contract is let and the work actually under construction.

Mr. PUGSLEY. I think I am right in the statement that there is not an item in these public buildings for Quebec, but was provided for by the late government. I am right in that, am I not?

Mr. MONK. Well, most of them were begun, or under construction.

Mr. PUGSLEY. All were in the old estimates?

Mr. MONK. I could not say whether they were all in that position, but most of them were.

Mr. PUGSLEY. It would appear, looking down the list, that every item was in the estimates of the late government.

Mr. MONK. In most cases they are revotes.

Sherbrooke post office—rearrangement of wiring system and addition to building, $2,000.

Mr. MONK. The addition to the building is not required and I would move to make the vote $1,000 and to strike out the words 'and addition to building.'

Motion agreed to.

St. Lambert public building, $20,000.

Mr. LEMIEUX. Has the work been started at St. Lambert?

Mr. MONK. No, the work has not yet been started. The contract is let.

Mr. LEMIEUX. Who is the contractor?

Mr. MONK. N. Patenaude, of Montreal.

Mr. PUGSLEY. There was some criticism, I do not thing it was very well founded, as to the site which was purchased by the late government for the public building at St. Lambert. May I ask my hon. friend if the building is being erected upon that site?

Mr. MONK. Yes.

Mr. LEMIEUX. I am sorry that my hon. friend from Chambly and Vercheres (Mr. Rainville) is not in his seat, because he could probably inform my hon. friend of what is going on in St. Lambert. But this is a very progressive town and with the real estate development which has taken place there and at another place, the name of which I do not recall at the present moment——

Mr. MONK. Brooklyn Park?

Mr. LEMIEUX No, Green park. At all events, it is a very progressive city, and I think that within five or six years there will be at St. Lambert a very much larger population there than there is at the present time. Is it not better for the hon. gentleman to provide for the future and erect there a substantial building; Does my hon. friend know whether this building is located on the square or is it attached to some other building?

Mr. MONK. I think it stands by itself. It is on the public square.

Mr. LEMIEUX. From whom was the site purchased?

Mr. MONK. On the public square it has a frontage of 30 feet and a frontage of 100 feet on Marcille avenue and Notre Dame street. I think it is a very suitable site. It is a substantial building. I believe there will be great improvements at St. Lambert, but it will probably be necessary to provide postal accommodation in other directions, but I think the building will be good at any rate for several years.

Mr. LEMIEUX. I am not criticising the site, but I simply wanted to draw the attention of the hon. gentleman to the fact that St. Lambert is increasing very rapidly and that in the near future some addition will have to be made to the public building

St. Thérèse public building, $15,000.

Mr. LEMIEUX. Has anything been done there?

Mr. MONK. The site has been purchased, under the authority of an order in council dated 21st October, 1908, for the sum of $5,000.

Mr. LEMIEUX. Have tenders been called for that building?

Mr. MONK. Not yet. We are just awaiting the adoption of the estimates to proceed with the work.

Three Rivers—new public building to replace buildings destroyed by fire, June 22, 1908, $70,000.

Mr. MONK. This is for the reconstruction of what was destroyed at the time of the fire. There is nothing decided as to the site. We received a petition from a very important section of the city down there asking a change of site and that matter is being considered by the department.

Mr. LEMIEUX. I hope my hon. friend will not be impressed or imposed upon by any political considerations in dealing with this matter. I am sure that my hon. friend the Postmaster General (Mr. Pelletier), who always showed excellent judgment when he was a member of the Liberal party, when he was one of the faithful, will admit with me that there is only one available site at Three Rivers, and that is the old historic site near the Monument Laviolette. I understand that the substructure was started last year, and if I remember well the opponents of my hon. friend the ex-Solicitor General (Mr. Bureau) criticised the site during the elections.

Surely the minister will not yield to such pressure, but will see that this important building is erected on a proper place. The only place at Three Rivers where such a building should be erected is the old historic plateau where the governor's palace was built. I believe it already belongs to the government. It was old military ground which passed from the French government to the British government, and then to the Dominion government at confederation. When I was Postmaster General I was consulted about the post office building, and it was understood that a building which would be a credit to the city would be erected, and that it would include all the federal offices, post office, and all, which I consider a most convenient thing. I understood that the foundations had already been laid on the plateau.

Mr. MONK. There are no foundations laid; we have merely cleared away the ground. This is for a building on the original site on a place known as the Plateau.

Mr. LEMIEUX. Then we are agreed.

Gananoque post office, $25,000.

Mr. MURPHY. This item is increased by $21,000.

Mr. PUGSLEY. The original vote was for $4,000 to repair the old building, but I take it that the minister after inquiry has decided to erect a new building.

Mr. MONK. That is the idea.

Kingston Royal Military College, $75,000.

Mr. PUGSLEY. It would save inquiry as to these items if the minister would answer this inquiry: It is true, is it not, that all these items are to provide for buildings which were provided for in the estimates submitted by the late government?

Mr. MONK. Yes.

Midland public building, $25,000.

Mr. BENNETT (East Simcoe). Has a site been decided on, and will work be commenced this season?

Mr. MONK. As soon as the site has been selected work will be begun.

Ottawa—Departmental Buildings—improvements in lavatories, plumbing, &c., $12,000.

Mr. LEMIEUX. I wish to take this opportunity of vindicating myself, and I am glad to see the hon. Postmaster General in his seat. Some weeks ago the Conservative papers, especially those in the province of Quebec, came out with the statement that the ex-Postmaster General had treated his employees like slaves, that he had kept them in the cellars of the building, and that even the rats had invaded the place and had not only gnawed the files but devoured the employees themselves. I was given a very hot roasting for having dealt so ungenerously with the officials of the Post Office Department. Now, I am quite sure that the hon. Postmaster General was not responsible for the publication of such a—shall I say lie?—I do not like to use an unparliamentary expression—but such a story. Let me state in two words what happened whilst I was the incumbent of that very important office. As my hon. friend knows, the Post Office Department should occupy at least three floors of the Langevin building, but it is confined to one floor and the cellar. The business of the department has increased so tremendously of late years that it has become quite congested. The government was aware of that. I made representations to my colleagues, especially to the Minister of Public Works, and the government, in face of the necessity not only of the Post Office Department but of nearly all the departments, decided to erect new departmental buildings. We had taken nearly all the available buildings in the city of Ottawa for our offices. With regard to the Post Office Department, as I happened to be not only Postmaster General, but Minister of Labour, I directed the Labour Department to report on the congested condition of the Post Office Department, and a full report was prepared by the gentleman who was then deputy minister and afterwards became the minister of the Labour Department. That report was brought before council, and action was immediately taken. A site was purchased and expropriation proceedings took place, and the government was going to proceed with the construction of the new building. I may say in passing, that it is a question whether the site expropriated is the best one. I think we should give as much beauty as possible to the government buildings, and it is a question whether it would not be advisable to expropriate a little further on Sussex street. At any rate, as regards the Post Office Department, we might have removed some of our officials to outside buildings; but the Postmaster General knows that the work of that department is of a special nature and that the officers from the top to the bottom must be congregated together. I myself brought the matter to the attention of the deputy Postmaster General and the heads of the various branches in the department, and they were a unit in protesting against any dislocation of the department. It is impossible to have the Post Office Department divided, with one set of officers in the main building and the others in other parts of the city. As an instance of that, I may say that we were weak enough some years ago to allow the railway mail branch to take outside apartments, and it was a difficult thing to get at it. I wanted to give as much space as possible to the officers of the department. I made repeated applications to my colleagues for the upper stories of the building, but it was impossible to get them, because the other departments were also in a congested state. I wish to vindicate myself, because the papers seemed to think that I had deliberately treated the officials like slaves. I did my best to protect them and to invite the tender commiseration of the Minister of Public Works, and we did as much as possible to precipitate a change. Unfortunately it took time. As my hon. friend will find, it takes time to carry a plan to completion. It took 15 years of my work in parliament to obtain the construction of a railway in my county—the Gaspé railway. In the same way it takes time to obtain the construction of public buildings, and a man should not be branded as a persecutor because he does not succeed in getting at once what in his soul and conscience he believes should be had for his employees.

Mr. PELLETIER. I wish to state in a very few words how this matter stands, and I think the committee has a right to know after the remarks made by my hon. friend from Rouville. I may say at the outset that what the papers have said is not a lie, is not an exaggeration, but is absolutely true.

Mr. LEMIEUX. What is the truth?

Mr. PELLETIER. I am going to state the facts as I found them.

Mr. PUGSLEY. You said something is absolutely true. What is it?

Mr. PELLETIER. The hon. member for Rouville (Mr. Lemieux) has said that the statements, he did not like to call them a lie—

Mr. LEMIEUX. As regards myself.

Mr. PELLETIER. I say it is not a lie and I am going to give the conditions as I found them in the department. My hon. friend may laugh and the papers have laughed over this question of the rats in the department. As a matter of fact, one morning the money orders in the department were found with a great portion of them completely eaten out during the night by the rats.

Mr. PUGSLEY. Why does not the hon. gentleman have traps set for them?

Mr. PELLETIER. We have had some traps set that were successful lately and now we will come to deal with these. The hon. member for Rouville (Mr. Lemieux) may say what he likes. I do not say it is his fault but the condition of affairs in that department is absolutely disgraceful.

Mr. LEMIEUX. That is where I said the lie was, that it was my fault.

Mr. PELLETIER. We will see; perhaps it is the fault of his neighbour, because I find on the record that it is the fault of the Minister of Public Works, that my hon. friend did his best.

Mr. PUGSLEY. His shoulders are broad.

Mr. PELLETIER. We have heard that sometimes. I shall give credit to the hon. member for Rouville for having found on the record that he had time and again asked that this state of affairs should be remedied but that the Department of Public Works never would consent and this is the truth and the plain truth, and the record shows it.

Mr. PUGSLEY. The Public Works Department, then, is too economical.

Mr. PELLETIER. If the Minister of Public Works was so economical, I suppose my hon. friend was right in leaving the condition of affairs we found there. I say it is poor economy and it is the first time I have heard of the hon. member for St. John (Mr. Pugsley) being so economical.

Mr. PUGSLEY. It is well to know the facts.

Mr. PELLETIER. I have been told that economy was not his strong point. I am not saying that with any idea of being offensive, but I have heard that my hon. friend from St. John was pretty lavish sometimes in his expenditure.

Mr. PUGSLEY. My hon. friend must not believe more than half of what he hears.

Mr. PELLETIER. If this was done on account of economy the hon. member for St. John (Mr. Pugsley) had very little faith in his own colleague the late Postmaster General (Mr. Lemieux) because if the Minister of Public Works knew, and I think he did, at least his department did, the condition of affairs, and if, for reasons of economy, the employees of this department have been left in the position in which they were, I say it was an outrage that public employees should have been treated as these people were. There are in this department at the present moment as many as 75 people in one room. Some of the employees have no place to sit down and write, they have to stand in corners and to work the best way they can. I think the hon. member for Rouville (Mr. Lemieux) knows that.

Mr. LEMIEUX. Quite so, but can you divide them?

Mr. PELLETIER. Yes, it can be done.

Mr. LEMIEUX. Putting them in an outside building?

Mr. PELLETIER. Yes.

Mr. LEMIEUX. It was not the view of the heads of the branches in my time.

Mr. PELLETIER. Then their views must have changed, because we have found one way of coming to the relief of these poor people.

Mr. PUGSLEY. How?

Mr. PELLETIER. We have, with the present head of the Department of Public Works, a man who does not believe so much in economy at the expense of the lives of the public employees, and he tried and succeeded in getting the Blackburn block.

Mr. LEMIEUX. Is that the next building?

Mr. PELLETIER. Yes.

Mr. PUGSLEY. Is it not true that the Blackburn block has only recently been completed, and did not my hon. friend find when he became Postmaster General, that negotiations were already on foot for the renting of premises in the Blackburn building to afford this very relief which my hon. friend says has now been afforded?

Mr. PELLETIER. I found that certain negotiations had taken place between the Department of Public Works and the Blackburn people, but that they had not been able to come to any understanding.

Mr. PUGSLEY. When was the Blackburn building finished?

Mr. PELLETIER. The Blackburn building is being finished now. But if the Blackburn building had not been finished there was room somewhere in Ottawa to accommodate these people who are working for the department.

Mr. LEMIEUX. But not contiguous to the Langevin block.

Mr. PELLETIER. Contiguous or not, no reasonable man should have allowed the employees of that department to have been congested and crammed like sardines as they were in that department. Some of them are failing in health on account of it. Put them any where, but do not leave them in the position they are now in. Any man who would go into the rooms allotted to the postal stores in the cellar would come out absolutely disgusted. So bad are these rooms that the hon. member for Rouville (Mr. Lemieux), had to shorten the hours of the employees who worked there, because the physicians of these men told him, and made representations that their lives would be threatened if they were obliged to work the same number of hours which other employees are required to work. That is a fact. Can this go on any longer? We said no, and my hon. friend, the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Monk), has devoted his time to this matter and those people are going to be taken care of now. It has cost a little money, but I do not think the expenditure can be criticised, if we try and find some means to accommodate those people. I absolutely concur in the views expressed by the hon. member for Rouville (Mr. Lemieux), that it would be much better indeed if the whole department could be kept together. That is true for all departments, but more especially for the Post Office Department. We have been obliged to put our railway mail branch outside, but the head of that branch spends one-third of his time running from his quarters to the Post Office Department and back. That is most unfortunate. But for the moment we have found means of taking care of these people and the Minister of Public Works has given us three flats in the new Blackburn building. We have found means of putting Mr. Northrup with his branch in that building. He can go there with the least inconvenience, although there is inconvenience. That gives us room for the other branches. We hope to find a location for the Postal Stores before long; that has to be done.

This state of things has lasted for the last six or seven years, and I am bound to say that five years ago the Hon. Mackenzie King, then deputy Minister of Labour, came to that department at the request of my hon. friend (Mr. Lemieux) and inspected the whole department and made a report which my hon. friend from St. John (Mr. Pugsley) had absolutely no justification for not following. Mr. King, the deputy Minister of Labour, who later on became one of my hon. friend's colleagues, reported, and the report is on record, that in no manufacturing establishment in Canada would he tolerate such a condition of affairs as that which he found in the Post Office Department. That report has been on file for five years. Are we to be told that during five years this state of things should not have been remedied. Too long, that was left too long. When the hon. member for St. John (Mr. Pugsley) wants to do certain things, he does them quickly. He did not choose to do this and he must take the responsibility. Perhaps he may divide it with his leader but certainly the responsibility must be somewhere.

Mr. PUGSLEY. Very soon after I became Minister of Public Works, my attention was called to the state of affairs in the Post Office Department, but I am bound to say that the officials with whom I communicated did not put the matter quite so strongly as my hon. friend the Postmaster General does. It is true that a number of employees were crowded into one room.

But that was the case, and I presume is the case to-day, in most of the departments; there is very great need of additional accommodation. The Postmaster General must see that, after all, all that could reasonably be expected of the Minister of Public Works was to secure accommodation for the different departments as rapidly as he could conveniently do so. With regard to providing accommodation for the Post Office Department, we were met with the difficulty that it was not thought wise to divide any branch of that department and leave part in the Langevin block, while placing part of it elsewhere. I endeavoured to induce the Minister of Agriculture of that time to move to some other premises, but, while he considered the matter, he was not favourable to doing so. I was very glad when the opportunity seemed to offer of securing additional accommodation through the erection of the Blackburn building. The Postmaster General surely would not expect that other accommodations would be sought for while that building was in course of construction. The only way was to wait until it was finished. And he knows that negotiations for the renting of part of the Blackburn building were undertaken by myself, when I was Minister of Public Works. We have gone on pretty rapidly in the last three or four years in getting accommodation for the different departments. We have rented the building now occupied by the Birks concern on Sparks street, and quite a number of others; I think we have done everything that could be reasonably expected of us to give accommodation, particularly in view of the fact that accommodation must be of a temporary character owing to the plan which the late government had of erecting new departmental buildings on Sussex street.

And, while I am on my feet I must make some observations with regard to criticisms, very unfair criticisms, I think, of the purchase of the land on Sussex street.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Six o'clock.

Mr. PUGSLEY. I cannot finish before six o'clock, but with the permission of the committee I will proceed. The government had decided, before I became Minister of Public Works, to erect public buildings on Sussex street. Plans had been called for, and it had been determined to proceed with the work. I see that newspapers opposed to the government are charging that it was a great piece of extravagance to buy land on Sussex street, and then abandon the idea of erecting buildings there, before going out of office.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. I would remind the hon. gentleman (Mr. Pugsley) that I must report before six o'clock.

Mr. PUGSLEY. Then, I will resume when we are next in supply.

Mr. LEMIEUX. May I ask if any of the officials have been transferred to the Blackburn building?

Mr. PELLETIER. They are being transferred now.

Mr. LEMIEUX. And the postal notes officials?

Mr. PELLETIER. I cannot say as to that.

Mr. LEMIEUX. And the officials in the cellar?

Mr. PELLETIER. We are attending to that.

Mr. PUGSLEY. It is understood that I am to be allowed to resume?

Mr. MONK. Yes.

Some resolutions reported.

At six o'clock, the House adjourned.

PATRONAGE COMMITTEE IN MONTREAL.

Mr. CARVELL:

1. Is the Prime Minister aware that there is a patronage committee in Montreal?

2. Does the government act upon the recommendations made by such committee?

3. Of whom is said committee composed?

Right Hon. R. L. BORDEN. (Prime Minister).

2. The government exercises its own judgment in every case.

3. The government has no information.

NATIONAL TRANSCONTINENTAL RAILWAY ACT—COMMISSIONERS.

On motion of Mr. Cochrane Bill (No. 76) to amend the National Transcontinental Railway Act, was read a second time and the House went into committee thereon.

On section (1).

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. I would expect the minister to give some information on the Bill, as to the extent of the work done, what mileage is under contract, what has not yet been undertaken and how much remains to be done?

I understand, from what the hon. gentleman said a few days ago, that the work is so far advanced that the services of the three commissioners can be dispensed with. But we have no statement showing in what condition the work is, and we ought to have such a statement before putting through this Bill. The House is interested in knowing what amount of work remains to be done, how far the railway is completed, how much remains to be completed, how much is under contract, and how many miles more are not contracted for.

Mr. COCHRANE. I will be very glad to have a statement prepared when the estimates come up, if that will suit my right hon. friend.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. It must be obvious to my hon. friend that when he asks parliament to reduce the commission to one member alone, on the ground that one can do all the work remaining to be done—and I am not contradicting that statement—the proper time to give the information I have asked is when this Bill is before us. I would suggest that he let it stand until to-morrow.

Mr. COCHRANE. The chairman, Mr. Leonard, whom I would like to consult is out of the city, and I would prefer going over the statement with him so as to have it as accurate as possible before submitting it to the House.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. Perhaps my hon. friend could have that done on the third reading, but I think we should have this information before this Bill is finally disposed of.

Mr. COCHRANE. Very well.

Mr. KYTE. Have the resignations of the three commissioners been received?

Mr. COCHRANE. They have all sent in their resignations. Mr. Young asks —on the ground of having had no holidays, but one out of the seven years he has been in office —for six months salary. Mr. McIsaac asks for three months, and Mr. Calvert resigns without any condition. The matter has not been dealt with yet.

Mr. KYTE. It appears to me but reasonable that inasmuch as the resignations were demanded of the commissioners on such short notice, some compensation should be allowed them, and also because these commissioners were appointed for the period during which the transcontinental would be under construction. These men, on the strength of that appointment, became residents of Ottawa, and purchased property, which so far as residential purposes are concerned, will be entirely useless to them, as it is their intention, I believe, to leave Ottawa at an early date, and resume their residences where they formerly lived. Under all the circumstances, I think some compensation should be allowed them—say three months salary, so that these gentlemen might be considered as having been fairly treated, particularly in view of the fact that, on their resignations being asked for by the minister, these resignations were handed in.

Mr. COCHRANE. I would like to correct my hon. friend in one respect. These gentlemen were appointed to office during the pleasure of the government, and not during any specific time. I have not had an opportunity of bringing the matter before council so cannot give any definite information at present.

Mr. KYTE. I would suggest that the words 'during pleasure' mean during the time the commissioners are satisfactorily discharging their duties. I am not aware of any different interpretation ever having been given tenure of office based on such language, and I would not like to think that the Minister of Railways is putting a more restricted interpretation on these words than that which is so well understood.

Mr. PUGSLEY. Perhaps another consideration which ought to influence my hon. friend the Minister of Railways is that it is proposed to abolish these offices by this Bill, so that there will be only one commissioner in the future. I think it has always been the rule, without exception, that where by reason of the abolition of an office, resignation is necessarily involved an allowance is made. Take for instance the case of the lecturers under the Annuity System. I understood the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Foster) to say a few days ago that he intended making provision to allow these lecturers three months' salary because their offices had been abolished. Am I right in that?

Mr. FOSTER. What I think I did say was that owing to the offices having been abolished, I had decided to grant these lecturers a gratuity of one month's pay for each year of service. That is what I propose to ask the House for and that is because I am very humane.

Mr. PUGSLEY. That is in accord with the principle which has almost always been recognized, namely, that where an official is dismissed by reason of the abolition of his office the humane side of the government is necessarily appealed to. If the Minister of Railways would exhibit his humane side in the same way—and he has certainly the reputation of having a humane side, just as much as the Minister of Trade and Commerce—he would probably accede to the request of my hon. friend who has brought this matter up.

Mr. COCHRANE. I would like to ask the hon. gentleman whether, if the work were completed, he would propose giving a gratuity?

Mr. PUGSLEY. No, in that case I would think differently. These gentlemen would then cease to be commissioners and there would be no need to abolish the office. But they were appointed on the implied understanding that, if they discharged their duties satisfactorily, they would continue until the end of the term, but you are abolishing their office while there is yet considerable work to be done and before the completion of the term for which they were appointed. I think their case is exactly analogous to that of the lecturers under the Annuities Act.

Mr. BORDEN. I do not remember the precise date fixed for the completion of the road when these gentlemen were appointed.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. I do not remember that there was any specific time. They were appointed during pleasure.

Mr. BORDEN. I am not speaking of that, but of the date fixed for the completion of the road.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. 1913, I think.

Mr. BORDEN. I think it was earlier, but eventually extended to the first of December, 1911. These gentlemen have, therefore, been longer in office than the period originally contemplated.

Mr. PUGSLEY. Is not my right hon. friend speaking of the time fixed as between the Grand Trunk Pacific Company and the government for the completion of the portion of the line between Winnipeg and the Pacific coast? I think so. My impression is that with regard to the government portion of the road, all that is provided is that the construction shall be carried on as speedily as possible.

Mr. BORDEN. I am not absolutely certain, but that was my impression.

Mr. NESBITT. I think the Minister of Railways should make some statement to show the House just how far advanced the road is before these commissioners are discharged, and I endorse what the hon. gentleman who has just sat down has said, that the position which these men occupy was supposed to continue during the time of the construction of the road, and if they are to be discharged now, some small remuneration should be given them to repay them for the expense which they will necessarily incur in removing from Ottawa. I think that would be only decent on the part of the government. It is not expected by the people to be narrow in such matters.

Mr. EMMERSON. The view that appeals to me in this matter is that a certain policy was adopted in 1903, with respect to the construction of the railway from Winnipeg to the seaboard. In the wisdom of parliament, the construction of that section of the railway was entrusted to a board of commissioners comprising four men. Admittedly the work is not completed; the object of their appointment has not been fully carried out. It seems to me that the hon. Minister of Railways should give detailed information as to the progress that has been made with that work before we entrust its completion to a commission consisting of only one man. I assume that parliament would have hesitated to commit this work to the care of only one commissioner in the first instance, and there seems to be no good reason yet presented why there should be a departure from the policy then adopted. It seems to me we should have that information before further progress is made with this matter.

Mr. COCHRANE. I promised the right hon. leader of the opposition that I would have a statement before the third reading, which he accepted.

Mr. MEIGHEN. From present information I would oppose any such proposition as that made by the hon. member for Richmond (Mr. Kyte), and the hon. member for Westmorland (Mr. Emmerson). If these offices are being abolished, it appears to the ordinary mind that they must be abolished because the extent of their usefulness to the public is not proportionate to the expense—in other words, that the work can be done, and could have been done, with a smaller number of commissioners. In this regard there is a very general public sentiment adverse to the conduct of the Transcontinental railway work under the commissioners heretofore in charge, and to go beyond the strict terms of their appointment, which was at pleasure, would appear to me to be a defiance of that public sentiment. I think parliament would be better representing public opinion and better serving the public if at this time we started out on a new policy instead of this extra compensation for services which appear to me to be largely visionary.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. If there is, as stated by my hon. friend, a very large and widespread sentiment that the commissioners have not been equal to the task with which they have been entrusted, I believe there is a larger and more wide spread sentiment that they have been up to the mark, and have discharged their duties very well. The change proposed by the minister in charge of the Bill is not based upon any allegation that the commissioners have not been up to the mark and have not properly discharged their duties, but, on account of the smaller amount of work to be done four men were not required, but one would be sufficient. Upon that statement we do not object to the Bill going through, but we put it to the hon. gentleman that it would be only fair and right on this occasion, as on others when an office is abolished, that the holder of the office should receive some temporary remuneration My hon. friend the Minister of Trade and Commerce has abolished an office in his department, that of lecturer, but being a kind and humane man he decided to give to those who were deprived of their positions a gratuity equal to one month's salary for each year they were in office. I would hope that my hon. friend from Portage la Prairie would be as humane as the minister in whom he has confidence.

Mr. FOSTER (Toronto). I want to put a little rider to what my hon. friend has said—that in no case should it exceed three months.

Mr. SINCLAIR. I do not think I should without protest, allow the hon. member for Portage la Prairie to say that there is a general public opinion in Canada that the Commissioners of the Transcontinental railway have not performed their duties. I do not think any such public opinion exists. Those gentlemen have done a splendid work. I know of no expenditure in Canada that has been conducted on such strict business principles, or as to which such care has been taken, as the expenditure made in connection with the Transcontinental railway. They did their work well, and whether they are dismissed or not, I would not feel that I was doing my duty as a representative if I did not protest against any insinuation of that kind being made in this House. On more than one occasion this matter was before a committee of this House for investigation, and nothing was proven to cast the slightest reflection on the conduct of the commission or on their management of the public funds under their control. Very searching investigations were made, the result of which were altogether in favour of the commission.

That proved to the people of this country that they did their work well, that they were careful, that the expenditures were properly made, and the investigation failed altogether to discredit them in the slightest degree. I think that the people of Canada are under a great debt to these gentlemen for the way they have discharged their very important duties during the last few years and they will go out today with a good record. I do not think my hon. friend has any evidence at all on which to base the insinuation which I understood him to make a moment ago.

Mr. MEIGHEN. I stated in as plain language as I could that I believed there was a considerable body of puplic sentiment of the opinion that the work of the commissioners had not been well done, or in the public interest. The hon. member for Guysborough (Mr. Sinclair), appears to be still labouring under the same incapacity as when he was on this side of the House, he is unable to distinguish between a frank, open statement, and an insinuation, and twice referred to my remarks as of an insinuatory character. I did not consider that the occasion was opportune to bring any detailed or particular facts in support of my observations, but possibly, after the statements of my hon. friend, I should do so. I need not refer to the debates which, time after time, have occurred in this House in which the conduct of the commissioners, particularly in the matter of the payment of contractors, and the distinction between the various kinds of material paid for, was under fire. I shall give one instance which was peculiarly under my cognizance, and I would ask my hon. friend (Mr. Sinclair), if he thinks it bears out the claim that the work of the commission was well done and the public money at all times cared for sedulously.

During the session before last there appeared in the Auditor General's report an item of several thousand dollars paid by the Transcontinental Railway Commissioners to a lawyer in Winnipeg who was a leading member of the Liberal opposition in the local House, Mr. Johnston. Mr. Johnston was summoned before the Public Accounts Committee, and it appeared from his evidence that he had been paid by the Transcontinental Railway Commissioners a minimum fee of $30 for passing Torrens titles to lands purchased by the Commission. Not only had he been paid a minimum fee of $30 and all disbursements, but he had been allowed to divide up certain certificates of title into 2, 3, 4 and more divisions in order that he might at the same time multiply his fees, charging $30 for each division. The commissioners approved of that, it passed under their eyes year after year for at least two years, and they passed all his accounts. The total amount of taxation on the accounts did not reach one per cent of all the charges. Furthermore in two cases where the value of parcels of land purchased was more than usual there were fees of $600 and $400, and to show the sedulous care of the commissioners, one member wrote to Mr. Johnston and modestly expressed the fear that his stenographer had made a misprint, and that $600 was meant to be $60. Mr. Johnston replied that no such error had occurred, but, notwithstanding the fact that in the opinion of the commission $60 was an ample charge for the work, he himself was a consenting party to the payment of $600. To that extent he guarded the public treasury, and the public interest.

Mr. SINCLAIR. I was a member of that committee and was present when Mr. Johnston gave his evidence. My recollection is that Mr. Johnston made the statement, and there was ample corroboration for it, that that was the usual charge in the west for the searching of titles and the responsibility that a lawyer has in certifying a title, that it was a charge that would have been made to a private individual or another railway company for similar work. The hon. member for Portage la Prairie (Mr. Meighen) ought to know whether that is the case or not. I have had a little experience in the west, and I know that the lawyers there do not work for nothing. If it is true that the charge made by Mr. Johnston was the usual charge for similar work done by other lawyers in the west, I do not think we have much reason to complain about that.

Mr. MEIGHEN. His minimum fee was six times the usual charge.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. The charge, since my hon. friend objects to the word 'insinuation,' which has been made against the commissioners, is certainly a very great compliment to them. The hon. member makes a broad statement that the commissioners have not been worthy of confidence, that they have not discharged their office properly and he gives as an instance that they have perhaps overpaid a few hundreds or thousands of dollars, I do not know which, the amount specified was $600, when they have expended over $40,000,000. Out of all that expenditure the hon. member finds fault with a few thousand dollars and one specific amount of $600. What is that amount? It is a charge of a lawyer for having searched a title. He states that one of the commissioners was startled by the fact that $600 was charged and thought it should only have been $60. That commissioner evidently was not a lawyer, because (I was in the profession at one time myself, and I know they are not so modest as that in their fees) $600 would not shock any lawyer in the House, not even my hon. friend from Portage la Prairie (Mr. Meighen).

Mr. NESBITT. I also would like to protest against the statement of the hon. member (Mr. Meighen). My section of the country must be left out when he makes the assertion that there is a widespread feeling against the commission. I have never heard a word expressed against the Transcontinental Commission so that there is no such sentiment as my hon. friend says in my section of the country.

Mr. CLARK (Red Deer). I listened with some surprise to the remarks of the hon. member for Portage la Prairie (Mr. Meighen). He was dealing with a specific statement by one member of the House, my hon. friend from Guysborough (Mr. Sinclair), and he thought fit to include in his denunciation of that hon. member the other members on this side of the House, and said we seemed to persist in certain habits which attached to us when we were on that side of the House. As I have stated, I am not fond of the 'tu quoque' argument, but it is a great temptation to use it. My hon. friend certainly seems to have kept up a habit which was the stock-in-trade of the Conservative party when in opposition, which was to look out petty scandals and base a general charge of administrative incompetence upon some petty and local aspect of a case. My hon. friend in his first statement said that there was a widespread sentiment to this effect.

In his amended statement he showed that he was amenable to criticism by altering 'widespread' to 'considerable.' Now with regard to the statement that there was a 'widespread' sentiment, I should like to make one or two comments. The first is that perhaps the hon. member for Portage la Prairie (Mr. Meighen) is hardly in a position to speak for all of us on this particular question. Some one has said that no one of us knows everything, not even the youngest of us. Certainly my hon. friend has given us a very small matter upon which to base such a widespread charge against members on this side of the House, that they have been neglecting to find out this kind of thing. It would ill become a mere layman like myself to speak about lawyers' fees. But I do not expect that one will ever be able to satisfy a Conservative lawyer from Portage la Prairie with regard to the kind of fees that go to a Liberal lawyer in Winnipeg. It is not in Conservative human nature, and especially Conservative legal human nature, to get satisfaction of that kind. I think it is a waste of the time of the committee that we have to deal with these extraneous defences of the Cabinet. It seems to me that in this case my hon. friend the Minister of Railways has a very good example which he might well follow. We on this side of the House know how much he is indebted to my hon. friend the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Foster), as I think the whole Cabinet are more or less, for the guidance of his and their infant footsteps in the pathway of Cabinet duties. I think the fact that this guidance is so readily and so profusely given, where it is so very much needed, should meet with some gratitude in the way of following the example of my hon. friend. Now I want to say this, in all seriousness, that I commend the example of the Minister of Trade and Commerce in regard to handling the public money, because he has a well deserved reputation of having inherited the best traditions of British finance in not being ashamed to look vigorously after the public money, and in never fearing the charge that he saves the public money by looking after even the cheese parings and candle ends, within his own department at least. But even he tells us that he has found it in accordance with simple humanity to give consideration to the gentlemen that, in the course of policy, and in that particular case, I think, a very good policy, he has found it his duty to follow. I would respectfully urge upon the Minister of Trade and Commerce to follow that example. I may point out to him that if he does not, he really rests under a very serious imputation. The Minister of Trade and Commerce said that he acted from the principles of humanity, I presume he means common humanity. Well, the imputation is that if the Minister of Railways does not follow his example, he needs to have the Minister of Trade and Commerce bring home to him the full meaning of these oft quoted lines of Robbie Burns:

Man's inhumanity to man makes countless thousands mourn.

Mr. BURNHAM. On behalf of the farmers whom I represent, I wish to state that we cannot agree with the hon. member for Red Deer (Mr. Clark). He evidently thinks that it is the exception that proves the rule; and that in order to prove the absolute honesty of the gentlemen who compose the commission, all he has to do is to prove that in one material instance they were neither honest nor circumspect. I assure you that the cloud of words with which he, and some other gentlemen in opposition, endeavour to cover up their retreat with regard to the National Transcontinental Railway Commissioners, will deceive no one. His sentiments will not meet with the sympathy of my constituents. We want all these candle ends, of which the hon. gentleman speaks, saved to the farmer, because it is by financial care of that description that the farmer of this country is kept prosperous, and not by the bogus trade policies that the late government tried to impose upon this country in the name of economic truth.

Mr. OLIVER. I did not have the good fortune to hear the expressions of the Minister of Railways when he was speaking, but I think from what has been said by those who are supporting the government it would be only right and fair for the minister, if he has not yet done so, to say here and now whether the reasons or the excuses that have been offered by his supporters are the reasons for this Bill. If they are, let us know it on his responsibility; if they are not, in all fairness let us know it also on his responsibility.

Mr. McKENZIE. As a member of that committee that had to deal with the cases pointed out I think I ought to make some reference to them. I remember the Johnston case very distinctly, it was one of two that came before us with respect to the operations of the Railway Commission. The Railway Commission has been in office now for several years, and has handled millions of money, and dealt with many great works; and I think it is much to their credit that while there was a competent court to judge any accusations that might be brought against them, there were only one or two, and no discredit came to either of the commissioners by reason of such inquiries. The hon. member for Portage la Prairie is a very keen lawyer, I have learned that from my experience with him in the Public Accounts Committee, he is a bright, intellectual gentleman. He had charge of this Johnston case. It was a case that happened within his own experience and capacity as a lawyer, the taxation of costs, and the performance of certain work in searching into facts. He examined Mr. Johnston, and made Mr. Johnston produce his books, every item of work was gone over, and when Mr. Johnston had given his evidence, my hon. friend from Portage la Prairie dropped the case. He did not ask for any resolution or motion in committee, there was no division asked for in the committee. I take the responsibility of saying that whatever politics I may have, I never did anything in the Public Accounts Committee other than endeavour to reach the truth, particularly when it was the conduct of a lawyer that was at stake. There was nothing asked for by my hon friend in the way of censure on Mr. Johnston in any way whatever. He moved no resolution. The record of that transaction is on the books with the doings of that committee. I think it would be well for my hon. friend to bring that record before the House and have it examined. Two years at all events have passed since the record was given, and since the investigation took place, and my hon. friend, with all his honesty, has been content to say nothing about it, and to let Mr. Johnston enjoy his ill-gotten gains, if so they were. I think the hon. gentleman should have brought it to the notice of this House long before now, if any money was paid improperly to Mr. Johnston. But he dropped the case, and we were all satisfied. Under the rules and regulations governing the payment of the services of solicitors in the city of Winnipeg, he was given none too much. I think indeed when this agreement was made with him, as it was made, that the fees paid to lawyers in that city far exceed the amount of money he received for the amount of work he performed. If they had been taxed before the taxing officer of the city of Winnipeg the amount would have been much larger. The evidence satisfied us on that point as I remember, there were quite a large number of lawyers on the committee and it was allowed to drop. The hon. member, with his parliamentary knowledge, could have brought that evidence before this House. He could have had the report, if report there was, brought up and threshed out. He did nothing of the kind, while I did not tax my memory very particularly with the details, my recollection is that nothing in regard to it was brought before the House. As the Prime Minister sent for the law with regard to the tenure of office of the commissioners, perhaps he will be good enough to tell us what it says.

Mr. BORDEN. Apparently the section of the statute which I had in my mind relates to the western division as the hon. member for St. John (Mr. Pugsley) has stated. It is provided by the first contract that the road should be finished on the 1st December, 1908, and by the second contract that it should be finished by the 1st December, 1911.

Mr. McKENZIE. I read the Act a few days ago, and my recollection of the part which deals with the commissioners is that it says that they shall hold office, during the construction of the road but it does not say for how long. It says that a commission shall be appointed, and that the commission shall continue in existence during the construction, and the operation of the road or such parts as may be fit for operation until it is finally passed over to the company. The fact that the statute says that they shall hold office during pleasure is no notice to the commissioners that they may be dismissed or put out of office before the work is concluded, because the entity created by the law shall have charge of that work for an indefinite time, or until it is finished. The Prime Minister says that there was no time fixed for the completion of the road, and I think it will appeal to the Minister of Railways that a man taking the office of commissioner could well understand that if he did his work well he would stay there until he finished that work. For some good reason, I presume, the Minister of Railways decided to put an end to the commission and release the commissioners from work that would have kept them in office for a couple of years yet, I believe. Therefore, I think that the government ought to give them some consideration. I think it is good policy, if men are in office when large amounts of money are to be handled, and when the honesty of the officers handling money is a great safeguard to the country, that they should always understand that they will be generously dealt with by their country, and by parliament when they cease their work, or when they are improperly turned out. Otherwise, the Minister of Railways may find that some men will be making friends with the mammon of unrighteousness, and will, like the unjust steward, who was to be turned out, have another way of making money. He does not know whether men placed in that position will take other ways of providing for themselves. I think it is good public policy that officials should be generously dealt with under conditions such as these.

Mr. BLAIN. Mr. Speaker, I think the present administration is satisfying the Canadian public generally, but it does not seem to be satisfying the opposition. My hon. friend the Minister of Railways and Canals (Mr. Cochrane), coming into his department, looked for some places where he could save public money, and at once saw that we had more commissioners for the construction of the Grand Trunk Pacific than were necessary. He found three men having a salary of $7,000 a year each. The payment of $21,000 per annum in salaries the minister considered absolutely unnecessary at this advanced stage of the construction of the Grand Trunk Pacific. The Minister of Railways comes forward frankly and states that these men were asked to retire from office, not for any special offence, but simply because their services were not required by the government, and because he desired to make some saving in his department. Hon. gentlemen opposite are not satisfied with that, they insist that this amount shall not only be paid for their services, but that the country shall pay them after they have ceased to be in the employment of the government. I appeal to my right hon. friend the leader of the opposition, and I am sure that if he is going to commence in that way the country will not feel that he is leading a very economical opposition in this House. I do not wish to enter into a discussion of this matter very fully, but simply to say that I am sure that my hon. friend the Minister of Railways, in the inauguration of a saving such as I have referred to, will receive the support of the people of Canada on both sides of politics if he does not receive the support of the opposition in this House.

Mr. EMMERSON. The hon. gentleman (Mr. Blain) who has just taken his seat, has stated that by the action of this government there will be saved to the country in salaries $21,000 because the services of three commissioners are dispensed with. I would like to know of the Minister of Railways if there has not been created a new office, not even authorized or recognized under the Act, since he came into power. They appointed, as I understand it—I make this statement subject to correction—an assistant chairman with a salary of $7,000.

Mr. COCHRANE. They took the assistant engineer and appointed him assistant to the chairman at the same salary.

Mr. MURPHY. Appointed him assistant chairman?

Mr. COCHRANE. No, assistant to the chairman.

Mr. MURPHY. What is the difference?

Mr. COCHRANE. He gets the same salary that he got when assistant engineer; we are adding to his duties at the same money.

Mr. EMMERSON. Does my hon. friend say that no additional salary was allowed him?

Mr. COCHRANE. Not to my knowledge.

Mr. EMMERSON. My information then is not correct if my hon. friend states that such is not the fact. I would ask my hon. friend by what authority this appointment was made. Was it done by the order of the board or by the action of the chairman himself? It is a material point, because the question is: Did the board create that new office? There is little distinction between assistant chairman and assistant to the chairman. I cannot see where, in the Act, there is any authority provided for the creation of such an office, and if there is not, I think it is due to the House that my hon. friend should state on what authority it is done. Was there an order of the board creating this office, or was it simply the act of the chairman of the commission in bringing to his assistance an officer to be styled assistant to the chairman?

Mr. COCHRANE. He was appointed by order in council.

Mr. EMMERSON. Under the authority of the Act? My memory of the Act is that there are only five officials (the commissioners and the chief engineer) who can be appointed by the Governor in Council and that all other officials or servants are to be appointed by the board which is created; that is to say that the Governor in Council can appoint the commissioners and the chief engineer, there his authority stops and if the Governor in Council has attempted to create another office, certainly it has been done outside of the provisions of the Transcontinental Railway Act.

Mr. MIDDLEBRO. I have a distinct recollection of there being a great deal of dissatisfaction with the management by this commission of the National Transcontinental railway.

Mr. Lumsden, the chief engineer, resigned his position voluntarily because under the classification in vogue, with the consent and approval of the commissioners, he claimed that on one section $2,700,000 was paid out of the treasury of the Dominion to the contractors by reason of over-classification. An investigation took place in this House which we say was not conducted in a proper manner, but I want to point out that Mr. Lumsden's charges were afterwards investigated by Mr. Gordon Grant who succeeded him. Mr. Gordon Grant went over the work to ascertain whether or not the charges made by Mr. Lumsden were true, and when he investigated the classification of section 'F', Mr. J. D. McArthur, the contractor, voluntarily reduced the amount he was claiming by $360,000. And remember the commissioners approved of this large sum against the consent of their chief engineer, Mr. Lumsden. In view of that single fact alone, how can any person come here to-day and ask us to give these men not only what they are legally entitled to, but three months salary in addition.

Mr. MACDONALD. The House understood the Minister of Railways to say that he was submitting the Bill because the Transcontinental railway was nearing completion, and the full board of four commissioners was no longer required.

Mr. COCHRANE. I did not make the statement just in that way. I said that the policy had been adopted, that the location, and so forth had been done.

Mr. MACDONALD. That is in effect what I said.

Mr. COCHRANE. You said the building was largely done.

Mr. MACDONALD. I certainly understood the minister to say that the road was nearing completion, and that as a consequence he could get along with fewer commissioners. At all events the minister has not stated as the reason for this legislation that there was anything wrong with the personality of the gentlemen who composed the board, and it has been left for the hon. member for Grey (Mr. Middlebro), and the hon. member for Portage la Prairie (Mr. Meighen) to put in the minister's mouth reasons in justification of this measure. My hon. friend (Mr. Middlebro) has mixed up the story in regard to Mr. Lumsden in a most delightful way, and his statement is characteristic of to what extent the facts with regard to expenditures on the Grand Trunk Pacific have been mixed and muddled. The whole trouble with Mr. Lumsden was that every other person, every engineer, and all the counsel to which the matter was submitted, held that Mr. Lumsden was not correct in his interpretation of the definition of solid rock which he himself had put in the specification.

Mr. MIDDLEBRO. I can admit all that, and yet it does not affect my point, which is that Mr. Lumsden said there had been over-classification, that the commission said there was not, and that when they appointed their own engineer subsequently to go over the road he reported that there had been over-classification, and the contractors voluntarily reduced their estimate $360,000.

Mr. MACDONALD. That is another sample of the mixing, and the muddling. The hon. gentleman ought to know that in railway construction there must be difference of opinion as to the classification of the work, and the original Act provided that these difficulties should be determined by a board consisting of the chief engineer of the government, the chief engineer of the Grand Trunk Pacific, and a third person to be selected. Mr. Gordon Grant took an entirely different view from Mr. Lumsden as to the interpretation of the words in the specification, and when it came before the board, provided for in the Act, they simply determined that in these particular cases there had been over-classification, within the meaning of the language in the specification, and that could not in any way reflect upon the commissioners. My hon. friend cannot dispute that Mr. Gordon Grant, Mr. Collingwood Schreiber, every engineer, every counsel who gave opinion upon the question stated that Mr. Lumsden was wrong in his interpretation of that clause. Every member of the arbitration board held that Mr. Lumsden was wrong in his view. But, this discussion is outside the question—the minister is proposing to remove Mr. McIsaac, Mr. Young, and Mr. Calvert because they have not performed their duties properly, or he is not. If he is imputing improper conduct to them the House should know it when considering this measure. Speaking of Mr. McIsaac, whom we in Nova Scotia have known all our lives, we know it is impossible for any man to make any imputation against his honour, or his personal character.

Why then should any hon. gentleman drag in questions gratuitously which are not involved in this matter and which the government will not say had any weight with them in coming to the decision they did? The government are asking this House to pass this Bill because they say that the construction of the road has reached such a stage that they can go on with only one commissioner. We ought to be informed exactly how the case stands. There are rumours that there are many gentlemen desirous of public office and anxious to serve their country for a consideration, but none willing to take a position that is to be so transitory because, in other words, there is not enough in it. Therefore, the government having failed to find any gentleman willing to take the position with the responsibility attached to this office, the Minister of Railways decided to dispense altogether with all the commissioners save one. I would like the hon. minister to tell us whether there is anything in this rumour which is current in many quarters. We ought to know what are the facts. We ought to know why he is asking us to depart from the settled policy practically approved by both parties eight years ago. I am assuming that the minister's only reason for doing so is because he considers that one man can handle the work for the future. If that be the case, we ought to have the information on which the minister came to that conclusion. We ought to know what number of miles of railway have been completed, how many remain to be completed, and when it is expected the road will be completed.

Mr. COCHRANE. I promised the right hon. the leader of the opposition that I would bring that information down on the third reading. The reason why I do not give it now is because the chairman of the commission is not in the city and will not be here until next week, when I will go into the case with him and obtain all the information required. I would have no hesitation in giving every information at present, but I want to be accurate.

Mr. MACDONALD. Why not let the Bill stand until to-morrow?

Mr. COCHRANE. My right hon. friend the leader of the opposition was willing to accept the statement on the third reading.

Mr. MACDONALD. The information asked by him was of a more detailed and complete character than that which I am now asking. All I ask is how many miles now are completed, how many remain to be completed, and when the road will be finished.

Mr. COCHRANE. I want to give authentic information, obtained from the right quarter.

Mr. GUTHRIE. Does it not strike the hon. minister that he can hardly deal intelligently with this Bill without that information?

Mr. COCHRANE. Why?

Mr. GUTHRIE. Because it is the basis of the Bill. According to the hon. minister, there is only sufficient work to be done on that railway to occupy the time and attention of one man.

Mr. COCHRANE. I did not say that.

Mr. GUTHRIE. Words to that effect.

Mr. COCHRANE. No.

Mr. GUTHRIE. Might I ask what then is the object of the Bill?

Mr COCHRANE I said that the policy of the road had been carried out to that extent. I did not say anything about the construction of the road. I think that my right hon. friend the leader of the opposition (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) will bear me out in that. He put a question fairly, and I answered it fairly.

Mr. GUTHRIE. I did not suggest that the hon. gentleman made a misleading statement, but the difficulty is this: From anything the minister has said, the impression obtains, on this side at all events, that at present there is no necessity for a full board of the commission as heretofore existed in order to complete this railway.

Mr. COCHRANE. Yes.

Mr. GUTHRIE. That one man can now satisfactorily perform the services which were formerly performed by the whole board. But to decide that matter, the House should know what work has been done, how much remains to be done, and how long it will take to complete the road. I, for one, believe that a larger board than one consisting of a single member would be in the interests of the country generally. I believe there is a large quantity of work to be done, a large amount of money to be expended, and it is very doubtful whether it is proper, under these circumstances, to appoint a single individual to transact the whole business. According to the hon. member for Peel (Mr. Blain) the object of the Bill is entirely to save expenditure. Three commissioners are to be cut off. What does the government propose to fix as the remuneration of the single commissioner?

Mr. COCHRANE. The same as before.

Mr. GUTHRIE. How much is that?

Mr. COCHRANE. I think it is eight thousand dollars.

Mr. GUTHRIE. Can the minister not give us, without going to his department, a general idea of the miles completed and still to be completed——

Mr. COCHRANE. I cannot.

Mr. GUTHRIE. And the length of time to complete?

Mr. COCHRANE. I think the hon. gentleman will agree with me that would only be a guess anyway from even the most practical standpoint, because unforeseen conditions, such as delayed the road in the past, may arise again. Without making a precise statement, I think at least two years will be required.

Mr. GUTHRIE. I would prefer not to depend on a guess in an important matter of this kind. I would suggest that the minister should allow this Bill to stand a day or two until he can give us the information we require. I, for one, do not feel inclined to deal with the Bill as it stands on the scanty information we have. It will not prejudice the Bill if he lets it stand and will give the House a better opportunity to consider it with full information.

Mr. EMMERSON. Apparently when the hon. minister determined on the policy of having but one minister he must have had some information or he must have made a guess as to the amount of work necessary to complete the railway. Surely he either had information or he made a guess; and, if he cannot give the information, he ought to favour the House by giving us the guess. The information asked for by my hon. friend from Pictou (Mr. Macdonald) and my hon. friend from Wellington (Mr. Guthrie), we are certainly entitled to. I think my hon. friend should also furnish the House with a copy of the order in council creating an official not contemplated by the Act.

Mr. COCHRANE. I have no objection.

Mr. EMMERSON. We should have that. Is this another way of having two commissioners instead of four? Is this a process whereby there would be nominally one commissioner in the person of the gentleman who now holds the position and an additional sub or assistant commissioner in the person of the gentleman who was appointed under this order in council? That is information which is due the committee. No very great harm need occur if my hon. friend would defer further consideration of this matter until he can furnish the information which we have reasonably asked for, which it is fair we should have, and which my hon. friend can have no valid objection to furnishing. The right hon. leader of the opposition has asked for certain very full information which he is content to have before the third reading of this Bill; but there are certain details which the members of this committee should have before they can give that comprehensive consideration to this measure that it should have.

Mr. BORDEN. As far as information is concerned, if hon. gentlemen opposite are very anxious to have it in an exceedingly accurate form up to date, I presume that there is no particular reason why the Bill should not stand for a day or two in order that it may be afforded. But as a matter of fact it is not many months since the House was furnished with information under the late administration as to how far the construction of the railway had advanced at that time.

Mr. GUTHRIE. That was during the last parliament, and there are many new members in the House.

Mr. BORDEN. Quite so; but the information is available to any hon. member who desires to examine it. Everybody knows that it was expected that the road would be completed on the 1st of December last. It is not completed. I suppose it would be impossible to determine definitely the date at which the road will be opened for traffic. That would be a matter of estimate at the best, though it might be based on pretty reasonable considerations. The hon. member for Westmorland has referred to a gentleman who was appointed to assist the commission or the chairman of the commission. Under the statute any such officer could be appointed by the commissioners; I do not know whether he would necessarily be appointed by order in council or not.

Mr. EMMERSON. My hon. friend misapprehended my statement. I said under the Act the commissioners had power, but the Governor in Council had not power to appoint other than certain named officials.

Mr. COCHRANE. If recommended by the commission.

Mr. BORDEN. As a matter of fact, it would not make it either better or worse if an order in council were passed. I was speaking of the power of the commissioners to appoint persons under the conditions mentioned. It was a mere matter of convenience, and according to my recollection the gentleman appointed to the position received no additional salary.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. It is of course within the knowledge of every member of this House how far the road has advanced. Everybody knows that it is almost completed from Moncton to Quebec, and I think it is common knowledge that from Quebec to Abitibi all the contracts have been let; but we have no information as far as I know as to the gap between Lake Superior Junction and Lake Abitibi. I think that section is under contract, but whether work has been commenced on it or not I do not know.

Mr. COCHRANE. Yes, work has been commenced.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. For my part I was quite satisfied when my hon. friend in charge of the Bill told us that he would give us detailed information on the third reading; but some of my hon. friends have asked him to give a summary of the information he had as to the condition of the road, and he did not comply. If my hon. friend will not comply with this very moderate and reasonable request, he gives the impression that he went into this Bill upon imperfect knowledge. With that I am not so much concerned, but I come back to the question to which I think my hon. friend should give us an answer today. as to whether these men are going to have the usual compensation which is given to any officer of the government when the functions he has performed are abolished. In this case the office in the nature of things was not permanent, but it was reasonable to expect that the incumbents of it would occupy it as long as the work was not completed. In fact, the very wording of the section makes that evident. All we say is that if these gentlemen are removed from office without any reason of want of confidence, they are entitled to some compensation on the part of the government. My hon. friend from Peel (Mr. Blain) has appealed to me in favour of economy. Well, Sir, I have been in favour of economy all my life, especially during the past 15 years, though I am sorry to say my efforts have not been very much appreciated. But what is economy from the point of view of my hon. friend from Peel? He says we are going to abolish offices which cost $7,000 a year each. We are going to save $7,000 a year at a cost of $1,750, three months' salary, which would be the amount of compensation, or a total of $21,000 a year by spending $5,250.

It seems to me that is very good and very substantial economy, and my hon. friend will do well, so long as he administers the Department of Railways, to be so economical as that.

Mr. CROTHERS. Hon. gentlemen opposite object to the passage of this Bill on two grounds.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. We do not object to its passage at all.

Mr. CROTHERS. The right hon. gentleman, if I understood him, objects to the passing of this Bill whereby three of the commissioners will be removed from office without making an allowance on the ground that they have had no notice, that the Bill is passed without notice to them.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. The office is abolished, that is all.

Mr. CROTHERS. The effect is to remove them from office, and my right hon. friend objects to their being removed without giving them retiring allowances, in the nature of six months' salary.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. Three months.

Mr. CROTHERS. Or three months. It seems to me that these gentlemen who will be removed by the passage of this Bill have had notice for nine or ten years, and hon. gentlemen opposite who have been sitting in this House during that time, had notice that when the Conservative party got into power they would remove these gentlemen. Why? Because they contended when this board was first created that men should be appointed to it having some qualifications and some expert knowledge of the work they were expected to do. That I have heard repeated session after session in this House during the last three years at least. These men, knowing that that was the position of the Conservative party, that we insisted that men occupying that position ought to be qualified for the discharge of the duties of the position, that they should have some expert knowledge of the work they were expected to direct and oversee, have had reasonable notice that when the Conservatives came into power they would put into effect what they had been contending for and see that the men having charge of the construction of this road should have some special qualifications and some expert knowledge. I remember that argument being repeated many times by the present leader of the government (Mr. Borden), who pointed out as a contrast the character and qualifications of the men appointed by the President of the United States to construct the Panama canal. It was pointed out by the right hon. the leader of the government, (Mr. Borden), at that time that on a great work like this men should be appointed having special qualifications for the work, he objected to the appointing of paper-box manufacturers to construct the National Transcontinental railway, and it seems to me that the position taken by my right hon. friend (Mr. Borden), at that time has been fully warranted by the history of this road. We were told seven or eight years ago that this road could be constructed from Winnipeg to Moncton for $51,300,000. That estimate has varied from year to year, the board being unable at any time to give us anything like a definite statement as to what it would cost to construct or to complete this road. It is now generally admitted, I believe, that instead of $51,300,000 it will cost $200,000,000.

Mr. LENNOX. More than that.

Mr. CROTHERS. More than that I am told. We never got within $10,000,000, of the same estimate from year to year, one year it would likely be $150,000,000, and the next year probably $175,000,000, and the next year $200,000,000, although it was stated by the leader of the opposition that the cost to the government in cash would not be more than $13,000,000; of course he never contended that the road could be built for $13,000,000. The people of Canada have reached the conclusion that there is something wrong about the construction of the National Transcontinental railway, and while we have had for seven or eight years four or five members on that board none of whom possessed expert knowledge, any special qualifications for the job, and the people see that the time has come when we had better appoint to that commission a man who does know something about the work he is expected to oversee.

Personally had I been in the House in 1903 or 1904, I should have objected to there ever having been more than one commissioner. My experience is that if you appoint a qualified and competent man who has to bear the responsibility you will get better service and satisfaction in the completion of any job, than you will where the responsibility is divided among three or four people.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. You had better amend your own commission then.

Mr. CROTHERS. We have for seven or eight years tried four commissioners, none of whom possessed any qualification for the position they held. We are proposing now to appoint one man who we think is qualified, who has expert knowledge, who will take the responsibility of the work from this time forward, and I think will give this House and the people of Canada better satisfaction than a board composed of four or five members.

Mr. LEMIEUX. What about the Commission of Inquiry?

Mr. CROTHERS. The Commission of Inquiry is a different matter altogether. That was fully discussed.

Mr. LEMIEUX. What about the Tariff Commission?

Mr. CROTHERS. That is also a different matter altogether.

Mr. SINCLAIR. What about the Waterways Commission?

Mr. CROTHERS. Do not give us too much at once, the late government fixed the number of that. We discussed the Investigation Commission and I do not propose to discuss them all on this occasion. I am better satisfied with one commissioner than I would be with four. I have no objection to the Bill standing, but if this Bill passes we will have one man who knows something about the business, and who is willing to take the responsibility. Then we can locate exactly the man who is inefficient if he proves inefficient. It has been said that for years the chairman of the board was doing all the work. He did not seem to have very much confidence in the character of the work because I believe he sent in his resignation on September 22.

Mr. McKENZIE. What about the expert knowledge that his leader obtained in the appointment of a Minister of Railways? Is he an engineer?

Mr. CROTHERS. Oh, that is very clever.

Mr. MURPHY. At an earlier stage of this session a gentleman on this side of the House, in tendering some advice to the right hon. leader of the House (Mr. Borden), suggested it might be well for him to keep in mind an incident that happened in England when a certain Prime Minister there put his back against the door of the council chamber and said to his colleagues before they left the House of Commons: 'Gentlemen, let us make up our minds to act together, and let us all say the same thing.' With all respect, I venture to offer that suggestion again, because this afternoon, when hon. gentlemen on this side of the House asked the reason underlying this Bill, the Minister of Railways, with a good deal of reluctance, stated that the Bill had been introduced and that this commission was to be appointed because the policy of the commission had been settled.

He had given a somewhat similar answer to a question on a former occasion, and we understood him to say that the commission was to be abolished because the work of construction had so far advanced that it was not necessary to continue the four commissioners in office. Now the Minister of Labour gets up and says that the reason for abolishing this commission is that the commissioners have had notice for eight or nine years that as soon as the Conservatives came into office they would be dismissed, and the commission abolished.

Mr. CROTHERS. I did not say anything of that character.

Mr. MURPHY. Well, I am within the judgment of the House. I may tell the Minister of Labour that his attitude for getting up and endeavouring to crawl out of an awkward position after he has got into it, is not to be repeated, at least in my case. He is too fond of doing it. I am well within the judgment of the House, that the Minister of Labour did make that statement. Now I am thankful to my right hon. friend the leader of the government that he has promised to extend to this side of the House the measure of courtesy which the Minister of Railways and Canals, by reason of his experience in another sphere, does not seem to think we are entitled to.

Mr. COCHRANE. I did not say anything of the kind. When the right hon. leader of the opposition asked me for the information, I at once agreed to it, and said I would bring it down fully; and he accepted my word.

Mr. MURPHY. I had reference to a question that was asked by my hon. friend from Edmonton, and which the Minister of Railways, after a manner which he affects in this House, ignored, later on going out of the chamber and paying no attention to it. All I have to say is that the business of this House will be very much expedited if the reasonable requests made by members on this side are complied with. We are not asking for anything unreasonable, and do not desire to do so. But there is information that we desire before this Bill can be proceeded with; that information has been specified by my hon. friend and I need not repeat it. I say again that I am grateful to the leader of the government that he has promised to have that information for us, and will have the Bill stand a day or two until it is obtained. I may say further that it would expedite matters still more rapidly if the right hon. leader of the House would see that we are provided with a copy of the order in council appointing this gentleman as assistant to the chairman of the commission, before the Bill is taken up again.

Mr. SHARPE (Ontario). I cannot see that it will make any difference with the construction or completion of this road whether these commissioners are asked for their resignation or not. I know that in my constituency the people think that the Minister of Railways never made a more popular move in his history as administrator than when he resolved to reorganize this commission and ask for the resignation of the commissioners. The mere personnel of the commission would justify their removal, and the placing of an expert man in their place, as the Minister of Railways has done. Mr. Parent, who was chairman of the commission, was an estimable gentleman, a good lawyer from Quebec, but he knew apparently nothing about the construction of railways. Mr. McIsaac, another lawyer, and very estimable gentleman, knew nothing about railways, though he may be well qualified in his legal profession. Then we had Mr. Reid, a corset manufacturer, placed in a position to spend millions and millions of the country's money because he happened to be a favourite with the Liberal party. Then there is Mr. Young, an estimable gentleman, no doubt, and well experienced in farming lands in Manitoba, a grain dealer, who knew nothing about the construction of railways. The Minister of Railways immediately, on taking office, comes forward and asks for the resignation of those gentlemen, and appoints a man who is well qualified as a civil engineer, and has experience in railway construction, to take charge of this business. I say that in the section of the country from which I come the people think that the Minister of Railways never did a more popular act in his life than in removing these men. It is a most extraordinary thing for hon. gentlemen in opposition to condemn the removal of these men. They know that charges were repeatedly made against them. As the Minister of Railways said, we know that charges were being repeatedly made against these men of extravagance, of riotous speculation in lands. We know what happened at the Moncton terminal, how their party friends made fortunes out of speculation in lands where the terminals were to be erected. We know in connection with the Transcontinental at Winnipeg, their party friends made hundreds of thousands of dollars out of a speculation, and of course the commissioners winked at it, and allowed the extravagance to go on. We had civil engineers coming forward, and over their own signatures specifying charges that there was over-classification. And what was done? I say that the removal of these commissioners can be justified in this House, and on any platform, justified on the ground of efficiency and on the ground of economy; and the Minister of Railways is to be commended for making this change.

I have discussed this matter on platforms throughout the country, and I find that the people, irrespective of politics, are well satisfied with the change. What do we want with two lawyers, a corset manufacturer, a grocer, and a farmer, spending hundreds of millions of money in the construction of a national railway? The onus is overwhelmingly on the commissioners. The original estimate was $51,000,000, and the road has already cost over $200,000,000. There is something prima facie wrong in the administration of that road. Now the Minister of Railways appoints a man who has no claim upon the Conservative party, to take charge of that road, and he appoints a man who is technically well qualified by reason of his experience and his special qualifications to oversee that important work. I say that hon. gentlemen on the left should no longer occupy the time of the House in criticising these dismissals, and objecting to a change in the personnel of the commission. One competent man will certainly do better than four incompetent men, and will give the country better service.

Mr. EMMERSON. I wish to correct the statement made by the hon. gentleman who has just taken his seat (Mr. Sharpe, Ontario). He has said that the commissioners purchased land at Moncton. I wish to say there were no lands purchased at Moncton. He says that lands were purchased, and speculators got control of the lands. There were no lands purchased at Moncton. The Transcontinental Commissioners only wanted land for the right of way to the city of Moncton, and that was all taken by expropriation.

Mr. SHARPE (Ontario). I said that the commissioners permitted speculations in lands where the terminals were going to be placed. That is what I intended to say.

Mr. FOWLER. I think perhaps the hon. member for Westmorland (Mr. Emmerson) is confusing things. I quite understand that the hon. member for Westmorland is a little sensitive on the point of the purchase of lands in Moncton. The Intercolonial, I think, made some purchases in which my hon. friend is either directly, or indirectly, or very closely interested.

Mr. EMMERSON. I want to tell my hon. friend that the Intercolonial has not purchased, nor has it required to purchase, any land in which I am either directly or indirectly interested, and has never needed to purchase lands.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Hear, hear.

Mr. FOWLER. Mr. Chairman, you cannot rest in any security upon the statements made by certain gentlemen, and, therefore, it is not well to cheer too soon.

Some hon. MEMBERS. Order.

Mr. FOWLER. Now, Mr. Chairman, let me say that the hon. member for Westmorland has squarely denied that there has been any purchase of lands, or any lands required, by the Intercolonial for a certain change of track, a change that, when the matter comes to be discussed in this House, as it will be, will, I think, be shown to have been not desirable. It has been stated that the undesirable route which has been adopted by the Intercolonial railway runs very close to certain lands in which the hon. gentleman's family is interested by reason of a legacy from a certain estate. Surely, if it be true that any members of his family are interested, the hon. gentleman would be indirectly interested, at least, and that is what I said.

Mr. EMMERSON. With that courtesy and in that gentlemanly way which characterizes the hon. member from King's and Albert (Mr. Fowler), he has introduced a subject into this debate which is foreign to it, but, by reason of the fact that he does hold a position in this House I suppose I am called upon to make reply. There was, in the city of Moncton, action taken by the Department of Railways and Canals with respect to a spur line. That spur line was passed through near Hall's Creek against my protest, against my judgment, and I came all the way to Ottawa to protest against it. They expropriated subsequently along that route lands belonging to an estaee of which I happened to be the trustee and I have no more financial interest in it than that fact. I was appointed executor and trustee of an estate. The legacies in my family are not in any way affected because, while it is true that legacies were bequeathed out of that estate, they were not in any way dependent upon the course taken by the Intercolonial railway or by anybody else. The hon. gentleman is put to it very hard indeed when he descends to bring in a matter of this kind, something that is in no way affected by the Transcontinental Railway Commissioners. I referred to the hon. member for North Ontario (Mr. Sharpe), and I think I referred to him in a courteous way. I wished to correct a wrong impression that he had. He had stated that there had been a purchase made in the city of Moncton by the Transcontinental Railway Commissioners of land in which speculators were interested, or words to that effect.

Mr. SHARPE (Ontario). There were lands in which Mr. Lodge was interested.

Mr. EMMERSON. That was years ago in connection with the Intercolonial railway, and it was in no sense connected with the Transcontinental railway. Mr. Lodge is not a relative, and he is in no way connected with me except that he is a citizen of Moncton, a gentleman for whom I entertain the highest respect and regard and a gentleman who possesses the confidence of the citizens of Moncton. There were lands purchased for the Intercolonial railway. That is one subject, but we have had under discussion the action of the Transcontinental Railway Commission. They made no purchase of land excepting for the right of way in the city of Moncton, and I do not know the individuals from whom they obtained the land. I do know that the lands acquired for the right of way were acquired under the provisions of the Act which entitled them to acquire them by expropriation. I am sure that my hon. friend in making that statement was entirely wrong or that he had been misinformed. I do not say that he made the statement intentionally.

Mr. FOWLER. Now, the hon. member for Westmorland (Mr. Emmerson) exactly confirms my statement that his family were interested directly, in that he was the trustee of the estate and that his family were the legatees of the estate. The gentleman who had charge of the expropriation was very close to the hon. member for Westmorland, was his particular counsel, lawyer, solicitor, or attorney, and he was the gentleman in whose hands, during the time the hon. gentleman was Minister of Railways, he placed all the business he possibly could to the exclusion of his other legal friends of the same persuasion as himself in the county. I leave the general public to judge for themselves as to the version given to the House by the hon. gentleman.

Mr. EMMERSON. There was nobody connected with me who had anything to do with the acquisition of any of these lands, or with the expropriation.

Mr. LENNOX. Mr. Speaker, I used to be reasonably familiar with matters connected with the Transcontinental railway, but I do not desire to branch out very much this afternoon. I want merely to congratulate my hon. friend the Minister of Railways and Canals (Mr. Cochrane) upon his determination to dispense with the services of the commissioners referred to. I do not have to go into the question of whether the railway is nearly completed or not. I take a broader ground, founded upon statements that the then First Minister made at the time it was contemplated appointing these commissioners to construct that road. He told us, as a reason why he should assign fairly large salaries to the commissioners, that he proposed to engage the services of men of special fitness and competence, that they would have to be a special class of men, that it would require men of great judgment and experience. In that view we agreed that it was right that reasonably large salaries should be assigned. What did the right hon. gentleman (Sir Wilfrid Laurier) do in carrying out that promise? So far as the chairman of the commission was concerned I will not say anything by way of criticism.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. You ought to say that he was a very good man.

Mr. LENNOX. I do not say that he was a very good man, but I might say that he was a passably good man as compared with the others. He had some characteristics of fitness, he was lacking in some others and when I have said that I have said all that can can be said in favour of that gentleman. In so far as honesty is concerned, I am not attacking him, nor am I giving him any certificate. But, as to the others, I do say that they never did possess the characteristics that would entitle the right hon. gentleman to place them in the positions in which he did place them, and that they never did, and never could earn their salaries. They were utterly unfit for the positions to which they were appointed. Not only is that evident from the character of the men before they engaged upon the work, but the subsequent conduct of these men in carrying on the Transcontinental railway abundantly proved what we could anticipate as soon as they were appointed. Nothing more is required to justify the attitude of the minister, if it were necessary to be invoked, than the fact that these men should never have been appointed, were never fit for the positions, and that their administration of the Transcontinental railway from first to last has shown that, even if they had the characteristic honesty that has been suggested this afternoon, and as to which I shall say nothing, they were lacking in that capacity, and that fitness for the position which would enable them to make this a successful work. As regards the cutting down of the personnel of the commission, I do not think it is necessary to discuss that. What the hon. member for Pictou (Mr. Macdonald) suggested is very interesting. He could not understand the advisability of cutting down the number if there was any greedy follower of the government who wanted a position. I could quite understand that from a gentleman of the opposition.

They cannot conceive of a case where, if any of their followers want a position, that for motives of economy or commonsense, or utility, that position would be abolished. The hon. member for Pictou is sorry because we have not kept up the number of commissioners for the purpose of giving some political pap to our followers, but he will discover, if he has not discovered it already, that a new order of things has been inaugurated, and that this government will not fill positions merely for the purpose of giving some very deserving persons a lucrative office, and that the public service, and the public interests will be the first consideration. I endorse the minister in calling for the resignation of these gentlemen from positions to which they were never entitled. And Sir, I do not think we should pay them a bonus for retiring. I am ready to vote reasonable amounts of public money in recognition of great public service, but I am not prepared to pay out one dollar of the hard-earned money of the people of Canada in order to award men for retiring from positions to which they should never have been appointed.

Mr. KYTE. The friends of the hon. member (Mr. Lennox) may congratulate themselves that the government have not shown any lack of industry in providing government pap for their supporters considering the short time they have been in office. We have commissions throughout the country for the purpose of investigating the holders of public offices who are paid at from $35 a year up. The friends of the government, it would seem to most people, are pretty well looked after. Now, I want to say a word of protest on the criticism which has been made of the gentlemen who have constituted the Transcontinental Railway Commission. The hon. member from North Ontario emphasized that these commissioners were not possessed of any special knowledge to qualify them to undertake the construction of railways. I would remind him that in the construction of the Canadian Pacific railway men of no greater expert knowledge were selected to carry on that grand undertaking. What would be the use of appointing engineers to instruct a commission on technical questions, if the commissioners were ipso facto obliged to have that knowledge themselves? I imagine that the fitness for membership of such a board would be that they should be men of character, of integrity, and of business sense. The members of the Transcontinental Commission are most certainly qualified as men of honesty and integrity and business ability, and notwithstanding the insinuation made by my hon. friend (Mr. Lennox) no charge of dishonesty or even of wasteful extravagance has ever been made against any one of them.

Mr. LENNOX. I made it absolutely distinct that I made no charge whatever of dishonesty. If need be I shall do that when the proper time comes. For the present, I am saying that these gentlemen should never have been appointed because they were not fit for the position.

Mr. KYTE. I agree that my hon. friend made no charge of dishonesty, but I can see he would not hesitate to make such a charge if he felt there was any justification for his doing so.

Mr. LENNOX. That's quite right.

Mr. KYTE. I say that these commissioners possess qualifications which demonstrated that the government showed the highest judgment in selecting them for the office. They were not presumed to be engineers, and they were not expected to have experience in the actual construction of railways, and the advice in these matters was to be obtained by them from the highly salaried officers on the staff of the commission.

Mr. MEIGHEN. Do I understand my hon. friend to say that we should appoint people as ignorant as possible to construct railways in order that we may appoint competent engineers to instruct them?

Mr. KYTE. I do not know what the hon. gentleman understands, but I may say that his object in putting such a question is not intelligible to me. I was pointing out that the special qualifications required were honesty and business ability, and that the technical knowledge was to be found in the trained corps of engineers in the service. I think it but fair to the members of the Transcontinental Railway Commission to protest against the statement made by hon. gentlemen opposite that these gentlemen had not the necessary qualifications to carry out the work which has been committed to them.

Mr. COCKSHUTT. It is one thing to allow these Transcontinental Railway Commissioners to retire quietly and quite another thing to be asked to vote them a sum of money because they give up office. If we should do that, we would be giving them a certificate of character which if they are not worthy of they should not get. On that point, I believe that the hon. member for Portage la Prairie was well within the mark when he said that there is a very widespread feeling throughout Canada that the people have been robbed in the building of this road, and that feeling has prevailed amongst the people, not only during this year or last, but for many years. Let these gentlemen opposite read the speeches made by them when the Transcontinental Railway Bill was introduced to parliament in 1903, and let them examine the figures and estimates they then presented when they inveigled this country into the scheme and let them compare these estimates with the results, and then, if they are honest and reasonable men they must conclude that something has gone wrong somewhere. We were told then that the road could be built for fifty one million dollars, but it has run up a bill of two hundred millions. Are the people of the west ever going to get relief from railway rates in view of this over-capitalization in the building of the road? Somebody must pay the cost. As a business man I firmly believe that this commission in charge of the building of this railway has in many cases paid two dollars where they should only have paid one dollar. I arrived at that conclusion from a study of the question, and it is borne out by the Hodgins charges and the Lumsden charges, and remember that these charges were made not by Conservatives but by the very men who were appointed by the Liberal government. And, Sir, that Transcontinental railway that should have been a monument to the ability of the Laurier government, will when its history is written, be a tale of the incompetency of that government and a monument to the flagrant extravagance that characterized it during its fifteen years of power. These are strong words, but gentlemen opposite invite them when they ask a vote of the public money to reward these commissioners for retiring from office, when they should be very thankful to escape. Let me tell those gentlemen opposite that I would rather have one man like Major Leonard than twenty-five or fifty, yes or a hundred such men as formerly composed that commission. Some of these gentlemen were in the Quebec Bridge Company, and what happened to that undertaking? In my judgment there has never been in Canada a great work undertaken that has been so mismanaged and in connection with which so much money has been wilfully diverted from the purpose for which it had been voted, as this very Transcontinental railway. In view of all that, why should we whitewash these commissioners and give them a clean bill of health? The feeling in Ontario is that the road has not been properly administered, that the funds have been diverted from the purpose for which they were intended, that many miles of that road have cost twice and thrice what the first estimate was, and why should we give the men in charge of it a bonus such as suggested? The result of that mismanagement will be that when the Grand Trunk Pacific comes to pay three per cent on this immense capitalization caused by extravagance, it will be difficult to give cheap railway rates to the west. I would not be surprised if the Grand Trunk Pacific would some day hesitate to take the road off the hands of the government at the cost which is alleged to have been incurred for its construction. We had to advance that money; three per cent has to be paid on it, and if the company does not pay the interest the country will have to. It is not unreasonable to expect that the Grand Trunk Pacific Railway company having agreed to pay three per cent. on the cost of the road, will object and say: the money has not been properly expended, the road has cost twice or thrice what it should have cost, and that means that instead of paying three per cent as we undertook to pay we will actually have to pay six per cent or nine per cent because of this wasteful extravagance. I believe, Sir, that the Minister of Railways has not acted one minute too soon in making a change in this Transcontinental Railway Commission. I can speak from personal knowledge of the high character and the high attainments as a railway builder of Major Leonard, who has been appointed to take charge of the construction of that road. I can say that if all the appointees of the government were men like Major Leonard, then the country would have reason to congratulate itself and the results obtained in the management of public affairs would be far different from what they have been in the past. I feel it my duty to protest against the payment of any money to these commissioners when they retire, and I can say that the people of Ontario are very far from appreciating the kind of services they have rendered.

Mr. McKENZIE. If the government have reached the conclusion that it will not pay the retiring commissioners any money, if that be their policy, I do not think there will be any very great opposition from this side. But some hon. gentlemen opposite outside the Cabinet, sitting on the back benches, have undertaken to give reasons why the government is not going to pay these men anything. That alters the case. As a question of policy, the government must decide for itself whether it will give these gentlemen any compensation. All we can do is make our protest, and the people will have to decide which side was right. But when supporters of the government take the ground that the government are refusing this simple act of justice to those commissioners because of their incapacity or dishonesty, because they diverted money from the proper channels into improper ones, it is the duty of friends of the commissioners, politically or otherwise, to have the government take the responsibility of these statements or deny them. For my part I know nothing about any money having been improperly expended. If anything of the kind occurred, the Minister of Railways should lay that information before this House and have it investigated. The hon. minister did not give any such reasons. What he said was that he had reached the conclusion that the work had become so advanced, that we need only have one commissioner instead of four. As regards the gentleman appointed, no one on this side has any fault to find. I know Mr. Leonard very well, and in my opinion the government could not get a better man for the work I have no fault to find with the appointment, but what I do find fault with is the imputation cast on the commissioners by hon. gentlemen opposite, and what I do insist upon knowing is whether the government endorse these imputations and criticisms or not. This is the time when we should come to a definite understanding and not wait until a few years later to be told that the commissioners were boodlers and scoundrels. If any charge to that effect be made against them, then let it be made now or let the government repudiate any such charge.

Mr. MACLEAN (Halifax). I wish to express my entire concurrence in the remarks which have just been made by my hon. friend from Cape Breton (Mr. McKenzie). I am not much interested as to whether these commissioners are to receive some gratuity or not at this stage of the Bill. I shall be pleased to hear that they shall receive fair treatment in that respect, but beyond that I am interested very slightly. This is not an important part of the Bill. As the discussion proceeded this afternoon, it was quite evident that the reason why several members of the commission are being dispensed with is that they are looked upon by the hon. gentlemen opposite, not only as political opponents, but as incompetent and unworthy of the positions they filled. The government should be frank. If the present board are to be eliminated because of incompetence or improper conduct, as some hon. gentlemen opposite say, they should be dismissed upon these grounds, and the reasons for this proposed dismissal should be plainly stated to the committee.

Some hon. gentlemen have urged that these commissioners could not have been competent by reason of the fact that their former occupations were not along the line of railway construction. I submit that that is not a good reason. If the Minister of Finance were appointed as the sole member of the Transcontinental Commission, I am sure he would fulfil the duties of that position as satisfactorily as the gentleman who has recently been appointed. I dare say there are several gentlemen opposite me who could administer the affairs of that commission just as well as Major Leonard, who I know is an excellent man, and I congratulate the Minister of Railways upon his appointment. In the modern business world to-day the greatest measure of industrial efficiency is obtainable, not by men who are brought up in the particular occupation in which they are engaged. A Canadian banker was placed at the head of the Dominion Iron & Steel Company, the biggest iron-producing plant in Canada, and the most successful operators of railways in the world are men who have been taken from law offices. I might cite other instances in which the greatest industrial success has been attained under men of no special training but of great business capacity, who could surround themselves with such technical advisers as they might require. Hon. gentlemen opposite have not been so careful in making appointments to some commissions since they came into office. Almost every hon. gentleman opposite, we are told on the authority of a gentleman from Toronto, was an applicant for a seat in the ministry. Well, if a great number of the gentlemen opposite are capable of administering a department, I suppose it is fair to say that a great many of them are not and never will be competent for such a position. The other day the government appointed a commission to investigate the operations of the various departments of the public service and to make suggestions for a reorganization of the departments. They selected three gentlemen against whom I have nothing to say personally, but not one of whom has any special qualifications for discharging the duties assigned to them, having had practically no experience in the civil service. The deputy ministers of the several departments would certainly have been better qualified. Yet the members of this commission may perform very valuable service to the country; they may have a capacity for work of this character which we cannot to-day perceive. But if some of the members of the Transcontinental Railway Commission were not competent men, the Minister of Railways should frankly say so and dismiss them and put in their places men whom he thinks are competent. The numerical strength of that commission should be maintained; there is no good reason for the reduction of its membership to one, and I am surprised that Major Leonard, now the chairman of the commission, consents to that reduction. A vast sum of money, probably over $100,000,000, will yet be expended by that commission, and I would imagine that the chairman would have been glad to have the services of the other commissioners or of some persons who might be substituted for them. The members of the commission have been associated with the work for a number of years, and I assume that they take a certain amount of pride in it. It does seem unfair treatment to remove them from office a year and a half or two years before the completion of the work, unless the minister takes the ground that they were not competent. There must necessarily be many fragments and tail ends of the work of the commission of which the present chairman cannot very well have much knowledge, and these commissioners must surely have gained some knowledge and experience during the years they were members of the commission which could not but be of value to the chairman. If the commission was a weak one in the minds of hon. gentlemen opposite, one might very well say that it has been very much strengthened by the appointment of the chairman, and that it was very well able to discharge its duties in a manner satisfactory to the Canadian public. I protest altogether against the passing of this Bill. The matter of the members of the commission is not important just at present. But that question is not involved in the Bill, and I do not think the Minister of Railways has so far given us any reason for the introduction of this measure, or hon. gentlemen sitting behind him are not discussing the measure in the manner in which it should be discussed.

Mr. BORDEN. As far as the three commissioners are concerned, my hon. friend the Minister of Railways and Canals, as I understand him, has not come here either to commend or to censure them. He has simply come with this Bill proposing in the public interest that the work on the railway still to be completed should be performed under a single commissioner. That is the whole question. Now, certain information has been asked for. We have already said that we are perfectly willing to let the Bill stand in order that the information may be furnished. I, therefore, move that the committee rise, report progress and ask leave to sit again.

Motion agreed to.

SUPPLY—THE RAILWAY SITUATION.

Mr. WHITE (Leeds) moved that the House go into Committee of Supply.

Mr. W. F. MACLEAN (South York). Mr. Speaker, in view of the fact that the Railway Commission has now on hand a number of very important issues, in connection with transportation problems, both in respect to the rates charged and to the service given by the railways, I intend to discuss in this House the general question of railway rates and railway service. While it is sometimes urged when matters of this kind are brought before the House that we have assigned certain duties to the Railway Commission I contend that this House still has full jurisdiction over the whole railway question of Canada, and I wish to vindicate the right of this House to discuss such questions notwithstanding the creation of the Railway Commission. We have also the right in this parliament to establish principles which may be followed by the commission in the discharge of their duty.

I propose to discuss first what I would call the territorial incidence of the railway tariffs. The Railway Commission acting under the Railway Act has made what it calls discrimination of rates in regard to locality, one set of rates being made applicable to eastern territory, a second to western territory and a third to the coast or mountain section of the country. I contend that that is not just or right and that there should be no variation in the territorial incidence of the railway tariffs in Canada but on the contrary that there should be absolute equality in this respect over the whole of Canada. These roads were built for national purposes, they were incorporated by the national legislature, they were aided in many ways, by grants of land and money and franchises in order to serve the people of Canada generally. Therefore, when the railway charges come to be apportioned, my contention is that there should be no variation in those charges and that what is a fair charge in the east should be a fair charge in the west or in the coast or mountain section. If there is to be any variation it ought to be rather in favour of the newer country where the conditions of life are more severe.

Sir WILFRID LAURIER. What is the law upon this point?

Mr. MACLEAN (South York). The law as far as I can see leaves it absolutely to the judgment of the Railway Commission; there is no definition but there is a practice. The question of tolls is dealt with in the section 304 and the following sections of the Railway Act. The Railway Commission on assuming office, found higher rates in existence in the west and on the coast and that practice is being continued. Many complaints and protests against this practice have been made by the people of the west and the question is soon to be threshed out before the Railway Commission at Ottawa and in western cities. If we can decide in this House that uniformity of tolls ought to prevail all over the country that will save a great deal of inquiry, and the people will be sure that for the future there will be no discrimination based on territory or locality. I do not know that this House could be better occupied than in trying to settle a principle which would give equality in railway rates to the people of the west who are trying to settle that country under great difficulties. They are hampered by a severe climate, and still more by these excessive railway tariffs that tax them more than the people of the east are taxed. One contention is that it costs more to build railways in the west.

Mr. TURRIFF. That is not true.

Mr. MACLEAN (South York). I do not accept that doctrine, I say that railways can be built for small sums in the west. First of all there is no right of way to pay for, and many of the railways have built cheap lines which have been very profitable so that they should really give lower rates. The railways in the west have monopolies of the express business the telegraph business and they had the elevator business in their hands or in the hands of their friends. They have also the cartage and storage business, all monopolies out of which they get large profits, and they have no more reason for these higher charges in the west than in the east.

And they are the great land owners of the west, they have enormous lands in that country which are increasing in value. They own town sites, they are all well off, they are all doing large business, and we in this House allow these unfair discriminations to continue, of charging higher rates to the people of the west than are charged in the east, although these companies were chartered, were franchised, were bonused with land and money, and given everything they asked for, on the condition that they should serve the nation at large. They are not serving the nation at large, but they are making an unfair discrimination against the people of the west, and I want parliament to declare that that discrimination should not continue, but that equality should prevail. But if the discrimination is great in the west what is it in the mountains and on the coast? And while greater distances occur there, and it cost more money to build in the mountains, it was not so much to serve the people who live in the mountains, as it was to serve the nation, and get from ocean to ocean. Will the people of British Columbia forever be compelled to pay a higher rate for railway service, for telegraph and passenger rates, and for all the other services associated with railways? Are they forever to be compelled to pay higher railway rates, because they happen to live in a portion of the country where, for national reasons, a road was built, and in the building of that road great expense had to be incurred? I repudiate that idea. When the matter of railway charges was brought up some years ago in this House, and when I had something to do in bringing it up, after some trouble we got a standard passenger rate extended to the boundary of British Columbia. So we have come to the conclusion in this House in regard to one thing, or the Railway Commission has come to the conclusion, that there must be equality in regard to passenger rates from the east to the extreme western boundary of Alberta. The arrangement should have gone to the Pacific coast, and it must go to the Pacific coast if there is to be equality in this country. British Columbia is paying her share of all the cost of that railway insofar as the cost of all the railways is assessed upon the people; Alberta is paying her share, Saskatchewan is paying her share, and so is Manitoba and the northern portions of Ontario on to the east—all are paying their portion of it. Now if they have all had a hand in making these roads, and if the roads are national, nay more if they are imperial, why should there be an unfair apportionment of railway rates in different portions of the country for the reason that the road cost more in one section than in another? Now, I propose to test the opinion of the House on this question. I am not going to propose a vote of want of confidence, but before I conclude my speech I shall submit to the House that we shall declare for an equality of railway rates.

Mr. MEIGHEN. Before the hon. gentleman proceeds further, may I ask him a question? I do not wish to appear as opposing his idea, but I would like him to discuss the matter from the point of view of some who urge that such a principle would retard the extension of railways in the west, because it costs more to operate them.

Mr. MACLEAN (South York). Then I will come to the question of operation. If it does cost more to operate, inasmuch as the railway is giving a national service, there should not be this discrimination. It may cost more. Then what you do is this, you put all your receipts in the treasury and out of the treasury you pay all the expenses, those of investment, those of building, and of other things, before making an equitable distribution of railway charges. So I say it will be equitably borne by every individual in the community. We can improve the railway situation, as I said, in two ways. We can improve it by discussing it in this House, and reaching principles, and introducing those principles in specific statutes in the Railway Act; and it will be quite competent for the Minister of Railways, or any member of this House to come down with a Bill amending the Railway Act on the line of equality of charges across the whole face of the country. Another, and a better way, I think—and I have been studying this question carefully for quite a number of years—would probably be for parliament, from time to time, to declare its belief in, and its adherence to, a certain principle. It would be more easy for the Railway Commission to accord equality in this matter if parliament expressed its opinion that equality of rates should prevail all over the country, that there should be no territorial incidence in regard to the tariff, no incidence based on locality, as stated in the Railway Act.

Mr. WRIGHT. I would like, at this stage, to ask the hon. gentleman to give us some concrete cases showing a difference in freight rates.

Mr. MACLEAN (South York). I am going to leave that to the members from the west, and I hope they will be here and take part in the debate. All the authority I will give now is that of the 'Manitoba Free Press,' which has gone fully into this question, and of the Winnipeg Board of Trade, and some other boards of trade, which have given details of these charges, showing a wide divergence as between charges in the east and charges in the west. The British Columbia Boards of Trade have also given instances, so there is no doubt that there is variation in the charges.

At six o'clock, House took recess.

After Recess.

House resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. MACLEAN (South York). Mr. Speaker, at six o'clock I was developing my argument that there should be an equality all over this country in the matter of railway rates. There might be a reason for a difference in railway rates if we had railway companies operating exclusively in any one single district. Many railway companies in the United States operate in only one State and they come under the State Railway Act. If we had the same thing in this country, if we had one company operating in Manitoba, another in Ontario and another in British Columbia, and if these companies were able to say that it cost more to build and operate a road in one province than in another, a good reason would be given why they might be allowed to charge higher rates in one province than in another; in fact, they could not make both ends meet unless there was some such difference. But, here in Canada, all our railways have been declared to be for the general advantage of Canada, all have been bonused with large sums of cash and land grants and given franchises to go into the telegraph, express, hotel, land and a great many other profitable businesses. They carry on these operations all over the country. We have even guaranteed the bonds for the construction of the railways. Therefore, when we have given them all these things nationally, when they get them from all the people, they, in return, should treat the people in the different provinces exactly alike in the matter of railway charges. They put all their receipts in their treasury and out of that treasury they pay all their charges. My contention is that they make up what it costs them to build the road, and what is a fair return on that cost, they make up what it costs to run the railway all over the country, on these two items they base what they consider a fair profit and then they make their charge.

Mr. BURNHAM. How do they manage to evade sections 77 or 315 of the Railway Act?

Mr. MACLEAN (South York). I will have to look at that.

Mr. BURNHAM. The whole question was up in the case of the Regina Board of Trade vs. Canadian Pacific railway and Canadian Northern railway in the city of Winnipeg in November of last year. It was carried to the Supreme Court.

Mr. MACLEAN (South York). The way I make out that they impose these different charges is that before we had the Railway Commission the railways made the pretence that it cost more to build and operate in these new countries. That was, to my mind, a mere assumption, but it was an assumption that was taken for granted by the Railway Commission. It has not been settled yet whether that assumption is justifiable or whether, even if it can be justified, the conditions resulting from it ought to be continued. All these unfair things are happening because we have not established the principles which ought to underlie the application of th raeilway law of this country to the regulation of railway charges. There have been all these unfair discriminations and it is to try and discover a principle and to have that principle declared in parliament, either as an opinion or as a clause in the Railway Act, that I am speaking here to-night. Even if it can be shown that it costs more to build, maintain and operate a railway in the west by reason of physical disability or otherwise than in the east my contention still is that the same rates should obtain all over the country. There might be an allowance here and there for special cases which I would leave to the Railway Commission to settle, but I want to get the general principle decided with reference to an equality of rates all over the country. The man in the west has to pay higher rates because the goods that go to him go farther. I have no objection to that. If he lives a thousand miles away from where the goods are manufactured, or from where they are sent, he has to pay the thousand mile rate and it is twice as much as the man in the east has to pay. But, if he is hampered by distance he ought not also to be hampered by a higher rate by reason of geographical, territorial or physical causes or because it costs a little more to build and operate a railway in this country. Does that farmer in the west get any more for his goods because of the physical conditions there? Does he get any more for his grain? He has to pay for the long haul and he is handicapped to that extent. You handicap him by distance, which may be justified, but you must not handicap him by territory which cannot be justified in the west by a railway which was created for the general advantage of Canada. Are we to say to people in Europe and the United States, and to those who are now coming to locate in our west that we are going to ask them to come to a country where our Railway Commission is in the fixing of rates, acting on the mere assumption of the railways in the old days that it cost them more to build and operate a road in the east than in the west? Are we to forever handicap the western country and to say to the people that we invite to come and settle that we invite them to come to a country where there is to be a perpetual handicap, territorial and discriminatory, in the application of railway rates? That is the position, the people of the west have found this out and they are practically in rebellion to-day. They have invited the attention of the Railway Committee to these things, and I am told that there is to be an investigation. It may be that there will be an investigation but parliament, I contend, is the place where the question ought to be settled. If you settle the law and these principles at the first go off, then it is very easy for the Railway Commission to apply them. Instead of trying to find principles they should devote their energy to their application. I cannot see a single reason—and I am here to-night to be converted if there is anybody who can enlighten me—why there has been this perpetual stigma put upon the people of the west that they are to have railway companies discriminating against them. I want somebody to tell me why the people of British Columbia, because they live in the mountains and because a railway had to be built at great expense over the mountains or through the mountains by tunnels, should have to pay what are called coast and mountain rates under a system that is a national system designed to serve all the people and generously bonused by all the people. Does it cost any more to build a telegraph line in the Canadian west than in Ontario? Yet, when you go to the west, and get off at a station to send a telegram, you pay almost double rates as compared with those charged in Ontario.

And, if you want to send an express parcel in the west you have to pay a largely increased rate over the rate in the east. Can we justly say to the people: come to the west where the telegraph rates and the express rates are double what they are in the east. I am waiting to see somebody justify this unfair discrimination against the people of the west. Parliament is the place to settle these things, and parliament can pass an Act to settle them or it can declare that the opinion of parliament is against them and then the remedy will follow. To-night we propose to test the opinion of parliament on the question of unfair discrimination between the east and the west. I shall now speak of the discrimination of the tariff as applied to the various services that the railways give. These railways are franchised to give passenger, freight, express, and telegraph services, and it never has been settled what should be the distribution of the tariff as between these various services. It may be that the man who sends a telegram is paying two hundred per cent more than the service costs the company and is thus helping to pay the freight rates or the passenger rate of the man who is travelling on a flyer, or else he is giving enormous profits to the company which will be used for dividends or to increase their reserves. The Railway Commission has never charged itself with the settlement of that question, and it would be a great thing if it could be determined how much of the gross charges the railway collects from the public should be apportioned between the different services rendered by the company. My contention is that these services are charged for altogether higher than the cost to the company would justify, always allowing the company a fair profit. I do not propose that to-night or in the near future we should try to settle that question, but I am prepared to say that the time has come when the passenger tolls in Canada should be two cents a mile, and I am prepared to show that the companies would make more money by giving the people a two-cent passenger rate than they do now at the three-cent rate. We have been told that the people of the west don't want cheap travel, but if we can give them cheap travel and at the same time give the railways the same revenue as now, it is an object worth striving for. There are in the United States a number of what are called 'two-cent states,' and the returns published this year show that in every one of the states where there is a two cent railway rate the revenue from passenger travel has been greater and the profits higher than ever before. In view of that evidence is it not the duty of parliament, and not the Railway Commission, to declare that the people of Canada shall have a two-cent rate? They do give reduced rates if you travel both ways by their railway, but I believe that the man at Edmonton who wishes to come east on the Grand Trunk Pacific should be able to return by the Canadian Pacific railway if he chooses without paying the two single fares. I have studied this question for years and believe that what the people of Canada want is a fixed maximum rate per mile, in which the concession is made rather than in the return fare rate when you have to travel by the same road. If this parliament were to declare in favour of a uniform freight rate and a uniform passenger rate for all the country it would relieve the Railway Commission of many difficulties and I believe it will so adjust matters that the railways would still get a fair profit. In the interest of promoting settlement in the west, in the interest of encouraging the pioneer who goes into this hyperborean country, as some say it is, relief should be granted in this direction. We are told of the enormous cost of operating our railroads in winter, but if the winter is so severe, think of the pioneer settler who goes in there, and if anybody gets a preference he should.

I pass from that to another capital grievance on the people of this country in connection with the railways. This parliament has still retained its right to control the Canadian Pacific railway rates as provided in the agreement for that original deal with the Canadian Pacific railway. There was in that agreement a ten per cent clause which roughly speaking, says: that the company cannot take tolls in excess of ten per cent on what was actually spent in the construction of the railway. We have never ascertained that fact in this country, and to-day the Canadian Pacific railway is charging excessive tolls especially to the people of the west and especially on the line of what was the original Pacific railway. Do you know that to-day the Canadian Pacific railway, to the best of my judgment, has $100,000,000 in its treasury of the lands of this country which it got from the people? Do you know that it has another $100,000,000 which it can cash in to-morrow in the way of town sites and town lots which it got from our people? And further it has to-day, to the best of my judgment $100,000,000 more in cash in its treasury.

Let this parliament then have the courage to approach that question and say what shall be done with that $300,000,000 in the treasury of that company. Let this parliament order that that money must be used either in the reduction of tolls or the extension of the railway without issuing new stock, as the company might want to do. There has been for the last four or five years an effort to in some way switch that $300,000,000 now in the treasury of the company into the pockets of the shareholders. That money does not belong to the shareholders but to the undertaking, for the purposes of the undertaking, and should be applied, as the original agreement provided, to the reduction of tolls and the furnishing of a better service to the people. But instead of applying those enormous reserves to the reduction of the tolls or the extension of the system, that money is being used to pay dividends on stock which should not have been issued, and which, when issued, was not sold for what it would bring in the market. In other words it was a melon cut for the benefit of the shareholders, most of whom live out of the Dominion and who really are the masters of the Canadian Pacific railway. Should then this parliament allow the company to continue this practice and take those enormous reserves, which have been accumulated, and use them for the benefit of the shareholders instead of for the reduction of tolls and the extension of the service all over the country?

What is the cry in the Northwest? It is that the service is not equal to the demand. It is that there are not sufficient trucks or elevators, cars and engines. And yet here is this treasury overflowing. Do you think the Railway Commission can settle that question? It must be settled in this House, and, therefore, I call the attention of this House to the present condition of affairs. Whose fault is it that the people of the west have not a better service? The railway company cannot complain that it has not the money. All it has to do is to take its lands given by this country for the purposes of the undertaking and issue bonds on these lands. It can bond its town sites and other real estate and can get $100,000,000 to-morrow on these bonds on which it would only have to pay four per cent. But instead of doing this it will issue new stock on which it will distribute dividends of 10, 12 or 15 per cent, if parliament does not assert its supremacy and require that this money be devoted to the purposes of the undertaking. This parliament must see that that money is used to remove these disabilities that exist in the west. The company should be double tracking with that money and most of all should go into these sections where the farmers are crying for railway accommodation. The farmer of the west has to pay the freight rates on his grain. Why should he pay excessive rates to a company which has this enormous surplus in its treasury, which is being held for the benefit of its shareholders, many of whom acquired their stock at $25 to $50 per $100, and that stock is quoted away above $200 to-day. But as long as that is permitted, as long as the men of the west sit here in parliament and do nothing, no interference will take place.

There has to be somebody who will regulate the issue of securities by railway corporations. The money they require can be raised on bonds or debenture stock carrying 4, 5, and sometimes 6 per cent. If the necessary money for construction purposes and extension of the lines can be raised on bonds which only carry this low interest, why should it not be raised that way, and why should not this parliament, or some one nominated by this parliament, see that the capitalization of railway companies is controlled in this country. True, there was a commission in the United States which entered into the question of the capitalization of railways, and other companies, and they made a report, and the substance of that report was that it would be such a sweeping change that the commission did not see their way just at present to recommend it. But the American laws regulate the issue of securities by railways there, and we shall have to do that here. We have to tell our railway companies that they may only issue securities in such a way as to entail the least burden of interest, and only for the legitimate purpose of railway extension and improvement. That question has to be settled in parliament. We cannot send it to any Railway Commission without giving that commission special instructions. I would be well satisfied to have the capitalization of railway companies and the character of the securities they may issue sent to a board like that of the Railway Commission. Take the city of New York. In that city there is a great undertaking in connection with its underground system. That undertaking issued a lot of securities and, as there was no one to regulate that issue, the local traction system of that city, which was in the hands of grafters, was able to issue over $500,000,000 of watered securities, not 70 per cent of which went into the undertaking. As a consequence the underground system became bankrupt, and went into liquidation. Then the Public Service Commission was created, and not one security of any kind now is issued in the state of New York except with the approval of this commission. When they want more capital, they are asked by the commission: how can you raise this money, and in what way will the money that is being raised put the least charge on the traffic which you carry and for which the public pay toll? So there is an absolute regulation of the securities now issued in the State of New York. If you look at the issue of yesterday in connection with the surface traction line, you will find that most of it consisted of bonds at 4 per cent, that there was a higher traffic bond at 6 per cent and a certain amount of common stock; but every share of that common stock had to be sold on the public market and paid for in cash, and every dollar obtained for it had to go into the undertaking. Have we anything of that kind in Canada? Has the common stock of any of our railways gone for the purposes of the undertaking or into the pockets of some one who originated the railway? We are making millionaires, but are we giving service, and is the money obtained from the sale of railway securities going to provide railway service or a reduction of rates for the people? We have to deal with that question in this country, and we have to deal with it in this parliament.

I want to refer to another most peculiar thing that is happening in this country in our efforts to secure better railway accommodation. We started to build more railway lines. The cry from the west has been, we want more railways; the cry in the east has been, we want more railways. And so we started two more railways in this country—the Grand Trunk Pacific and the Canadian Northern, and they are both needed. There is more business in this country than the three roads can do. But this peculiar outcome is now beginning to develop. When the Canadian Pacific railway, which was said to have been a monopoly, is treating the people to exorbitant charges, and when, with an overflowing treasury, it is ready for the axe of some one who will reduce its rates, the cry goes forth, if you reduce the rates on the Canadian Pacific railway look what you are going to do to the two other roads that you created for the purpose of giving competition. The people of the west and the people of the east are now being treated to this new swan song, that it is not a good thing to reduce the rates on the Canadian Pacific railway because the other roads that are just coming into existence cannot stand the reduced rates. Well, what is to be the cure? It would be better to pay the Grand Trunk Pacific and the Canadian Northern something in the way of a cash bonus; but that is a queer thing to do in order to get competition. And yet we are up against it, and I want to tell this House what may be the outcome of this guaranteeing of stock. If your Railway Commission or if parliament ever undertakes to reduce railway rates, and to give the farmers of the west relief, we will default, and you will have to assume the liability of paying the interest on the bonds which you guaranteed. Are we going on with that line of business which will land us in that result? What is the railway situation in another aspect, probably the broadest in which it can be presented to the people of this country? The people of this country are absolutely dissatisfied with the railway rates that they are paying. They do not think that they are getting a square deal, and they are not; and the only way in which they will get it will be by the action of this parliament. The Railway Commission cannot settle the question whether a reduction of rates is to be enforced, because the Canadian Pacific railway can stand it while the other railways cannot stand it. That is a matter of policy which must be settled by the government or by this parliament. We are to have investigations in the west by the commission, but they will not settle it. They may get at some facts for the edification and instruction of this House; but these questions have to be settled in this House. They are becoming greater and more insistent every day, and we are putting them off; we are building more railways in order to put off the day when the Canadian Pacific railway rates must come down. How many of the people of this country know that we have landed or are about to land in that situation, that the Grand Trunk Pacific and the Canadian Northern, which have cost us so much money, are actually to be a bar to a reduction of rates?

Now, there has to be an adjustment, and men able to handle questions like this must come forth and come into this House and find a solution. The greatest grievances of the people of the west to-day are excessive railway charges and unfair discrimination—in telegraph rates, passenger rates and express rates; and the cry of the west is for better service. The cry of the west is, if the money in the treasury of the Canadian Pacific Railway Company is consecrated to the undertaking, why does not parliament see that it is used for that purpose, and that lines are built in the west where the people need them?

There is another question. If we have guaranteed the bonds of these railways or given great subsidies to them, now that branches are being built for the Grand Trunk Pacific which somebody must finance, why do we not see that the section of country most needing the service gets the railway? There is no oversight. Although we are paying the piper, either by guarantees or by land grants or by money subsidies, nobody is saying, in an authoritative way and after consultation with the people interested, where the railway is to go. The result is that in the west there are in some cases three railways where there ought to be one, which with a double track could give three times the service, and some of these tracks could be moved into a new country. But nobody is looking after the matter. We are going on in a careless way without regulation by one central authority and without the voice of parliament being expressed vigorously and along a definite line of policy.

So I say that the railway situation in this country to-day is not satisfactory to the people, especially the people of the west, if I read the papers rightly and from what I hear in regard to the efforts of the people to get relief. The relief to my mind must come from parliament rather than from the Railway Commission, either in the way of an expression of opinion in this House or in the way of an explicit clause put in the Railway Act which will bring some kind of betterment in the way of service and a reduction of charges. It is up to this parliament to deal with these questions, and we must try to find the underlying principles.

The first underlying principle that I wish to see settled is the principle of equality of treatment in the way of rates by our national railways, of all the people all over this country, that there shall be no discrimination in the way of territory. I intend to move an amendment but I do not present my motion as a vote of want of confidence in the government; I am presenting it in order to get an expression of opinion and to get action. It takes some courage and some fixity of purpose to come here and make a direct proposal that will bring the House to take consideration of a question of this kind. It is easy to let it go by and put it over to the commission waiting for the commission to make a report. I have brought up this railway question year after year and by persistent fighting I have succeeded in having a number of definitions inserted in the Railway Act and the duties of the Railway Board have been widened and their service to the country improved by reason of the discussion of the principles underlying transportation in this House. These questions have all been threshed out in the United States and the State legislatures have appointed State commissions and Congress has appointed the Interstate Commission. But Congress and the legislatures have steadily interfered and laid down the principles which ought to govern the commission.

The outstanding thing about the administration of the Railway Act in the United States is that Congress has given the commission money to pay for the best counsel they can get and to employ all kinds of experts, competent railway men, who can give them advice and collect information. The counsel thus employed institute on behalf of the people suits to secure the rights of the people. We in Canada should have counsel for the commission with power to take up suits in the investigation of railway charges, &c. Is it not high time that parliament insisted on the very best lawyer we can get in the country being counsel for our Railway Commisssion to see that justice is done to the people. We are gradually coming to it, we started without any legal advice for our Railway Commission but now we employ special counsel in special cases. The late government employed special counsel in the telephone and telegraph investigation, but that is not what I want, I want an expert legal department associated with the Railway Commission which will collect all the information, will become trained in the matter of railway rates and will take the side of the people as against the high-priced, clever and expert lawyers in the service of the railway companies. Are the people of this country not entitled to that?

I shall revert to many of these questions at other stages in the session, but to-night I wish to lay before the House a concrete motion dealing with this one question of territorial discrimination and I beg to move:

That the said motion do not now pass but that this House hereby declares that it is against the general interest of Canada to have any territorial variation in the application of tariff charges by the Board of Railway Commissioners.

If the House will express that opinion, then half of this inquiry in the west will be done away with and it will be proclaimed all over this continent and all over the world that Canada, through its parliament, has asserted the doctrine of perfect equality, as far as territory is concerned, in railway rates. The railway companies will not suffer by the passage of this Act, at least the onus will be on them to show that they are entitled to apply discriminatory rates in the west. They have never yet been able to show that this discrimination is justified, it costs as much to build 100 miles of railway in one province as in another and about as much to handle it.

Mr. MACLEAN (South York).

Mr. BORDEN. My hon. friend (Mr. Maclean, South York) has made a very interesting speech with a very large portion of which I entirely agree, particularly the concluding portion of it in which he sets forth the importance of having the Board of Railway Commissioners supplied with a throughly effective organization. In connection with the approaching investigation or inquiry by that Board of Railway Commissioners into the rates in the western part of Canada, I may say for his information and for the information of the House that the government propose to employ counsel to protect the interests of the people of this country upon that inquiry. It is perfectly true that the great railway companies in this country go before the Board of Railway Commissioners for Canada, upon any inquiry of this kind, with a thoroughly equipped staff, a staff of experts, and able counsel as well, who very thoroughly protect the interests of the great railway corporations on all such inquiries. It is equally the duty of the government and of parliament to see that the interests of the people are protected just as efficiently and as thoroughly upon every such inquiry; and it is not only our duty but our purpose to see that this is carried out upon the approaching inquiry.

Now, my hon. friend has very properly asked parliament to discuss the question of railway tolls throughout this country. As far as we are concerned, we are very glad to welcome that discussion. It is perfectly plain to all of us that the Board of Railway Commissioners have been established for a certain purpose. The Board was first established under legislation of this parliament passed in the year 1903, when we were sitting on the other side of the House. Hon. gentlemen who were then members of the House will remember that the opposition of that day thoroughly concurred in the proposals of the government, and that we did everything in our power to assist in making that Act a good Act. It has been amended in many respects since, its jurisdiction has been greatly extended, and I have always supported the extension of that jurisdiction. Indeed, at one time I took the ground that its name had better be changed, and that it ought to be called the Public Utilities Commission of Canada; and that it should be given power to control and supervise, not only the railways of Canada and their operations, but every public utility in Canada. That has very largely been carried out since. The jurisdiction of the Railway Commission has been extended to telegraphs, to telephones, to express companies, and to other public utilities. It is apparent I think to every one who has surveyed the development of the powers of the Railway Commissioners in that regard, that those powers and that jurisdiction are likely to be extended still further from time to time, and every such extension has seemed to me to be in the public interest.

Then my hon. friend has spoken of the ten per cent clause in the charter of the Canadian Pacific railway. So far as that clause is concerned we all know that practically it is not to-day, and has not been for some time, in existence. A case was to have been stated for the opinion of the Supreme Court some years ago under the late administration. By that case the question to be presented for the determination of the court was whether the time had arrived, under the statute incorporating the Canadian Pacific Railway Company, when it could no longer insist that its rates should be free from the control of the Railway Commission. The case was prepared and was about to engage the attention of the court, when the Canadian Pacific Railway Company, seeing the magnitude of the inquiry, and the government as well seeing the magnitude of the inquiry which would be involved and the long time that it would require, reached a conclusion by which the Canadian Pacific Railway Company agreed to waive their right, if they had any right, to claim that their tolls should be exempt from the control of the Railway Commission; and from that time up to the present the tolls and charges of that company have been inquired into by the Board of Railway Commissioners.

Mr. MACLEAN (South York). Did the public waive their right, and is it not the right of the public to have their tolls reviewed in the light of the original charter, which is still in force?

Mr. BORDEN. As I understand, they are reviewed in the light of the original charter. As I recollect it, speaking from memory it provided that the company should not be subject to any control of its rates until it should be in a position to pay a dividend of ten per cent. Well, the time came when the government thought that question ought to be determined, and it was about to be determined when the Canadian Pacific Railway Company said: We will not further press our claim based upon that statute. From that day to this, the rates and tolls of the Canadian Pacific Railway Company have been inquired into just as freely and as fully as the rates and tolls of the Grand Trunk railway, or any other railway in this country. That is the condition, as I understand it.

Now, so far as the regulation of the issue of securities is concerned, what my hon. friend for South York has said has a great deal of force and a great deal of cogency. I can only say at the present time that it is a subject to which we have not been able to give attention so far; but it is a subject that is well worth the attention of the government. I have taken note of what my hon. friend has said in regard to the progress of legislation on this subject in the United States. We will examine that legislation, and we will endeavour to give to that question the earnest and careful consideration which its importance undoubtedly deserves.

Now, my hon. friend has asked very urgently that there should be an exact uniformity of rates, and he has proposed a motion to that end. In the first place, the particular subject to which he invites attention is one that has been placed by this parliament under the jurisdiction of the Board of Railway Commissioners for Canada. I entirely agree with my hon. friend that parliament has not waived its own jurisdiction. That goes without saying, because parliament to-morrow could repeal the Railway Act which was passed in 1903, and resume complete jurisdiction, or confer its jurisdiction upon the Governor in Council, or upon the Railway Committee of the Privy Council of Canada, in which that jurisdiction existed before this Act came into operation. But parliament has confided that power of dealing with railway rates in Canada to a body of men who are supposed to be capable of dealing with the subject which is entrusted to them and who up to the present time, I think, have fairly well done so; I will go further than that, and say they have thoroughly well discharged their duties which have been imposed upon them under the law. I have said that when I was sitting on the other side of the House, and I am prepared to affirm that again. Now, my hon. friend has proposed a resolution, of which I will quote merely the operative part.

It is against the general interest of Canada to have any territorial variation in the regulation of tariff charges by the Board of Railway Commissioners.

If we take the literal meaning of this resolution I would suggest to my hon. friend that it seems to go further than I would be prepared to go. I have alluded to the fact that this is a resolution which deals with a subject which has been confided to the regulation and direction of a board created by the laws of this country as enacted by parliament, a subject that the men appointed for that purpose have been studying for a number of years, and who, it seems to me, must be more thoroughly familiar with it than any one in this House can possibly be. After all, the regulation of railway rates, when you take into consideration the question of the long haul, the question of the short haul, of competitive points, of the different conditions which confront those who are operating railways in various parts of the country, and the competition as well that we have on the other side of the line, is undoubtedly a somewhat difficult subject, and one which I think would be increasingly difficult to any one who had not had an opportunity of studying it, and becoming thoroughly familiar with it.

Now, my hon. friend proposes to deal with it by the affirmation of the principle to which he has called attention, and which principle is set out in his resolution. I am not positively certain as to the exact construction which my hon. friend might place upon the words which he has presented to the House as embodying the principle that he desires to have affirmed, but it seems to me that it would mean that, without regard to conditions, to the cost of operation, to the cost of construction, to the density of traffic, or to the length of haul, one must have a uniform rate, both for passenger and freight traffic throughout the length and breadth of this country; in other words, that you must apply exactly the same rates to a railway operating in the Yukon as you would apply to a railway operating in a country as fertile and densely populated as the province of Ontario. If the resolution of my hon. friend means that, and it seems to me to mean that, I can only say that I do not feel it to be wise to lay that down as a principle for the guidance of the Board of Railway Commissioners. Density of traffic, population, cost of construction, length of haul, and expense of operating vary in different localities on account of many considerations to which I need only allude, and which I need not specially detail.

Then there is a further consideration. Take the case of the province of Manitoba, where a particular concession or advantage was given to a railway company in return for certain advantages in freight rates; the terms of my hon. friend's resolution would apparently prevent any province such as Manitoba from giving to its people the advantages arrived at by a direct concession by that province for a particular purpose. Some hon. gentlemen who have been in this House for a number of years will recollect the measure which was passed by the legislature of Manitoba and which had to be confirmed by legislation of this parliament. If there is to be no territorial variation in rates it will be impossible for any province—it would be impossible for Manitoba, for example—to have carried out by the Railway Commission the terms of any such arrangement under a proposal such as that to which I have alluded.

There are some other considerations. If any rule or principle of this kind were laid down it ought to be laid down by statute and not by a resolution of one branch of the legislature. The Board of Railway Commissioners is constituted under the statute of Canada and that statute lays down certain principles and imposes certain jurisdiction, power and duties upon the Railway Commission. If these are to be varied, because it would seem to me that this resolution is designed in effect to accomplish the amendment of the statute, it ought to be done in the regular way and it ought not to be done just in this way.

I do not know exactly what effect this resolution would have upon the principle which is generally adopted with regard to the long and short haul. I understand that in some parts of the world you have railway rates which are applied mile for mile—20 miles, so much per mile; 50 miles, so much per mile; 200 miles, so much per mile, without any variation whatever. One can readily see that if a principle of that kind were to be applied to the transportation of grain from Alberta, Saskatchewan or Manitoba to Montreal, Halifax or St. John, instead of the interests of the western farmers being improved those farmers would very likely be paying higher prices for the carriage of their grain than they are paying at the present time.

It seems to me that there must necessarily be some variation according to the territory, the density of traffic and the cost of construction and operation in Canada. For example, I have already given the illustration of a road operating in the Yukon, built at very great expense, and a road built in Ontario or Quebec in a very fertile and densely populated part of the country. If you are to say that we are to have absolutely uniform rates, what rate are you to apply? The Board of Railway Commissioners must apply some uniform rate. Is it to take the higher rate, or is it to take the lower rate, or what rate is it to take? For example, no one would suggest, I suppose, that rates which might be very reasonable in respect to a road operating in the Yukon and built at enormous cost would be applicable to a road operating in some of the more fertile and thickly populated districts of Ontario or Quebec. It does not seem to me that the resolution which my hon. friend has proposed is one that it would be safe to adopt as a guide to the Board of Railway Commissioners. They are about to engage upon what, I have no doubt, will prove to be a very exhaustive and thorough inquiry into the whole question of rates and tolls in the western part of this country. I have confidence that the inquiry will be thorough and exhaustive and I can assure my hon. friend and every hon. member of this House that in so far as it is within the power of this government to make that inquiry thorough and exhaustive no effort will be spared for that purpose.

I would like to refer to what I said before, that council will be engaged, and I will bear in mind also what my hon. friend from South York has said in regard to the importance of having counsel permanently attached to the Railway Commission who will be trained up as experts in the law of railways and the regulation of railway rates. In respect to the necessity of that I do not think there will be any two opinions in this House. I am not prepared to state at the moment how well equipped the Board of Railway Commissioners may be in that regard at the present time. I have not had an opportunity to investigate that question, but if the board is not equipped as it ought to be in that regard I can only say to my hon. friend that it will be one of the first duties of this government to take such steps as may be necessary to equip it thoroughly for that purpose. Under these circumstances and with these assurances perhaps my hon. friend from South York will be good enough not to press his motion although I am perfectly willing that there should be every possible opportunity afforded for discussing the very important subject which he has brought to the attention of the House in a speech that has dealt very ably and very thoroughly with the question and to which I have listened with the greatest interest and attention.

J. G. TURRIFF (Assiniboia). Although I intended to bring this matter to the attention of parliament this session I did not come prepared to speak on it to-night, and were it not that some members from the west who wished to speak happen not to be present just now I would have deferred my observations until later. The hon. member (Mr. Maclean, South York), has correctly represented to the House the conditions in the west, and I was glad to have an opportunity of seconding his motion. The Prime Minister told us it would not be fair to apply the same rules to the Yukon as to the east, but every one knows that, and if a general principle were laid down that there should not be discrimination between different parts of the country the Railway Commission could readily decide that the Yukon was an exception. Our crying grievance is that the farmer and business man of the west pays from twenty-five to fifty per cent more than is exacted from the man in the east for the same service on the railways, and they have been compelled to do so for the last twenty-five years.

Mr. MACLEAN (South York). And they will do it for twenty-five years more if you let them.

Mr. TURRIFF. If the Railway Commission were to say that for the next twenty-five years the people in Ontario or Quebec and the lower provinces should pay from twenty-five to fifty per cent higher railway rates than the people of the west are paying that would only even matters up, but we do not want that and we do not think it would be fair, although for twenty-five years we in the west have been living under the most outrageous unfairness that has ever existed in any civilized country under the sun. We are simply asking now that in the future the railways shall make no discrimination against the west. Why should passenger rates be the same in the west as in the east when the freight rates are much higher on the prairies than in the east? It has been said that it costs more to operate railways in the west than in the east, but that statement is absolutely untrue. To commence with, it is well known that you can build railways in the three prairie provinces at from fifty to sixty per cent of the cost of construction in Ontario and Quebec. As to the cost of hauling freight I will give you the very best evidence from the mouth of the Canadian Pacific railway itself. The Railway Commission ordered the Canadian Pacific railway to furnish the cost of carrying freight in different parts of Canada, and the statement furnished by the Canadian Pacific railway shows that the actual cost of hauling one thousand tons of freight one mile (exclusive of interest or fixed charges) is as follows for each division of the Canadian Pacific railway:

Eastern division—Montreal to Chalk River, Ont..	$5 45
Lake Superior division, Chalk River to Port Arthur..	3 70
Central division—Port Arthur to Swift Current, and branches..	3 73
Western division—Swift Current to Field and branches..	4 71

It, therefore, costs only two-thirds to carry one thousand tons of freight one mile between Chalk River and Calgary of what it costs to carry one thousand tons of freight per mile from Montreal to Toronto. And in view of that is it reasonable that for twenty-five years we in the west have been paying fifty per cent higher rates than are charged in the east? Surely that is a matter for parliament to deal with and not for the Railway Commission. Last September the Railway Commission issued an order allowing the express companies to charge one dollar for one hundred pounds from Montreal three hundred miles out, and from the city of Winnipeg, represented by the Minister of the Interior, that same commission allows them to charge $1.66 for the same weight. Is that fair? Is the west to be trampled on forever? If this House passes the amendment offered by my hon. friend from York (Mr. Maclean) it will be a direction to the Railway Commission to do what is reasonable and fair and that is all we are asking, and after twenty-five years of injustice some measure of relief may be obtained. I was pleased to hear the Prime Minister say that he would supply counsel for the Railway Commission in the interests of the people and as this investigation is to take place three weeks hence I trust the Prime Minister will act at once. The railways will have the very best counsel that money can buy in the Dominion, men that have devoted years to this business, and even if counsel were appointed for the people to-morrow he would only have three weeks to prepare. I believe there ought to be a first-class corps of counsel appointed in this connection. But, the commission does not have to wait for complaints because the Act gives them authority to move themselves without complaints being received. The railways have always kept the commission deluged with little trivial level crossing cases and one thing and another like that and they have deliberately kept the commission from getting at the railway rates for a number of years. There ought to be two sections of the Railway Commission. I do not say that there should be a western section and an eastern section, but there should be one section devoted to dealing with freight rates and nothing else and first-class counsel should be placed at their disposal, and then they will have more than they will be able to attend to.

Mr. FOSTER (Toronto). I do not clearly catch my hon. friend's demonstration of the fact he alleges, that it does not cost more to move freight in the west than in the east. He gave the cost of moving one thousand tons per mile over portions of the west, but I did not hear the comparison carried out to demonstrate the difference between the east and the west in the cost of carriage.

Mr. TURRIFF. I cannot guarantee this evidence, but it is supplied by the Canadian Pacific railway themselves.

Mr. BORDEN. Where can it be found?

Mr. TURRIFF. It is quoted in the 'Manitoba Free Press' from the records of the Railway Commission.

Mr. CURRIE. Does that apply simply to the charges of operation or does it include the interest charges?

Mr. TURRIFF. I have stated that it is exclusive of interest or fixed charges, but as a railway in the west costs for construction from fifty to sixty per cent less per mile than a railway in the east, the fixed charges would be less in the west than they are in the east.

Yet although the interest and fixed charges must be a third less in the west than in the east, the company charges 25 to 50 per cent higher freight rates. That is what we want to do away with. As my hon. friend from York (Mr. Maclean) says, let us pass this resolution and show the company that the parliament of Canada wants this outrageous discrimination done away with, and you will find that the Railway Commission will then take action. I am not going to criticise that commission. In my opinion its chairman is the best man in Canada for the job, but it is swamped with work.

Mr. FOSTER. This is interesting to me and that is why I am asking for information. But what my hon. friend has said does not seem to me to prove the case. I am not saying that it cannot be proved; but when the general assertion is made that you can carry cheaper in the west than in the east, I would like to have more figures than he has given. Has he the figures of the cost of carriage in different parts of the east—from Montreal to Toronto, Toronto to Detroit, or anything of that kind? He has confined himself to a certain portion of one line of railway, and certainly has given an interesting statement, but that is not the whole statement.

Mr. TURRIFF. In answer I might say that it certainly would not cost the Canadian Pacific railway any more to haul 1,000 tons of freight one mile on their line between Montreal and Toronto or Montreal and Windsor, than between Montreal and Chalk River. I understand that the eastern or Montreal section takes in all the Canadian Pacific railway lines between Montreal and Chalk River, and therefore includes the lines to Windsor, Toronto and other branch lines.

Mr. FOSTER. So that my hon. friend thinks that $5.45 would be a fair rate to spread over the Ontario section as well as on the main line.

Mr. TURRIFF. That would be a great deal better than we in the west are made to pay, but if it only costs $3.75 a mile to carry a thousand tons from Chalk River to Calgary, I do not see why we should have to pay the higher rate that the Canadian Pacific railway exacts in the west.

Mr. FOSTER. Are you sure about those figures around Lake Superior from Chalk River to Port Arthur? It seems remarkable that the cost should be greater in the older portions of Ontario than in that rough country.

Mr. TURRIFF. I am only taking the figures supplied by the Canadian Pacific railway and have every reason to believe they are right. The explanation is this, that in the Montreal division there are many branch lines and a good deal is short haul. Whereas from Chalk River to Port Arthur it is practically all through haul, and that accounts for the cost rate being low even in that rough country with heavy grades and curves. But when you get west on the prairies, the cost includes all the branch lines as well, and branch lines add to the cost of operation; but there, the grades being so easy it is cheaper to operate, so that even with the branch lines all included, the cost of operating is only two-thirds what it is in the Montreal division.

Mr. H. H. STEVENS (Vancouver). As this question vitally affects the trade of British Columbia, I desire to say a few words on it. I regret that the hon. member for South York (Mr. Maclean), has seen fit to introduce this motion in this particular way, and at this time. It is a question of very great importance and one which is entirely technical in its character. It is a question we have been studying in the west for a great many years, and, I might say that the Board of Trade of Vancouver—the constituency I have the honour to represent—have had some of the most eminent counsel in that province working on it for a couple of years, and on three or four different occasions they argued their case very fully before the Railway Commission. Had I known that this question was coming up to-day, I would certainly have availed myself of the mass of material these gentlemen had on hand when they appeared before the commission. I do not think that any member of this House can be prepared on the spur of the moment to discuss a question of this kind. My hon. friend from South York (Mr. Maclean), may have had some time in which to prepare himself, but I think it would have been much better if he had given notice of his motion on the order paper, and thus given the members an opportunity to prepare for the debate and discuss the question more fully. But as far as I am concerned, personally, I am quite prepared to go on record as stating that the freight rates in the west are an unfair discrimination against the business men of that country. I am not prepared, however, to say that we should now pass a resolution calling for a general levelling of freight rates throughout Canada. I shall not attempt to discuss the question, as I have not the necessary data and information at hand, but it is, however, a question which I have closely followed, and to which eminent counsel on both sides have applied their best abilities in order to arrive at a solution, and found themselves in a most difficult position. I know too that the Railway Commission, which I have always regarded as one of the finest institutions in this Dominion, have applied themselves to the solution of this problem and have found it a most difficult one to solve. This being the case, I think it would be exceedingly unwise for this House, on the spur of the moment, to pass a resolution such as the one offered by the hon. member for South York. I take it to be nothing more nor less than a vote of want of confidence, not in the Government, but in the Railway Commission. No member of this House, I think, will stand in his place and say that this is not something that the Railway Commission should deal with. If that is the case, we have no right to take it out of their hands. The counsel of the Board of Trade of Vancouver, and of other western cities, have prepared elaborate briefs on this question, and I understand that there is to be a full investigation by a commission, which is to sit within a month, into this whole question, when it will be threshed out on its merits fairly and equitably to all concerned.

The right hon. leader of the government referred to the fact that the Manitoba government had given some special concessions to a local railway in return for a reduction of rates. The British Columbia government has made a similar arrangement with the Canadian Northern, and I believe it is endeavouring to make similar arrangements with other companies seeking railway charters in British Columbia. It is easy to condemn the railway companies for excessive rates; it is easy to say that there should be a levelling of rates; but it is a different matter when you study carefully the exact conditions that obtain throughout the Dominion. It may cost only a certain amount to haul a thousand tons of freight a given distance; but if there is only a very limited amount of freight originating on a particular line, whereas on another line there may be a very large amount of freight originating, it is evident that the volume of business would have something to do with the rates charged. I am not for a moment supporting the position that the railway companies have assumed for years; but I do say that before a resolution like this is adopted by this House, we should be seized of all the facts of the case. Some hon. members may in the future use the vote I shall give against this resolution to say that I have gone back upon the principles of the constituency I represent. I wish to repudiate that contention. As far as I am concerned, the position is simply this: the question is now in the hands of a commission in which I have the fullest confidence and I wish to say that I highly commend the action of the late administration in the creation of that commission. It has sat in Vancouver on many occasions dealing with matters in which I have represented the interest of the city and others, and my experience of its actions has been that it has been fair and equitable to all concerned, one of the most level-headed courts in the Dominion. With such a commission, in which we all on both sides of the House, have confidence, dealing with this problem, and having in its possessions all the facts which have been placed before it in the last two or three years, surely it is only right and fair that we should leave it with them to arrive at a conclusion, especially when such a conclusion will in all probability be arrived at within the next two or three months. It is impossible for me at this time to discuss this question on its merits and in its various phases, because I have not the data before me. I regret that the hon. member has brought such an important resolution before us with absolutely no notice. Even if it passes, it will accomplish nothing. What we should have before us, if we are going to accomplish anything, is a concrete resolution or a bill. While I am in favour of the general idea of seeking for a solution of this great problem, I am not in favour of this omnibus resolution.

Mr. D. B. NEELY (Humboldt). Mr. Speaker, as this question is one of the most vital importance to all the people west of Lake Superior, no matter what walk of life they may be in, I cannot let this opportunity go by without expressing my hearty approval of many of the things that have been said by the mover of the resolution (Mr. Maclean, South York) and by the hon. member for Assiniboia (Mr. Turriff) on the question of discrimination against the west by the railways in freight and passenger rates. During the last twelve months our western newspapers have been giving this question a great deal of prominence, and our boards of trade and the people generally are certainly alive to the fact that they are not getting a square deal from the railways. I think we in the west must congratulate ourselves on having such a splendid champion of our rights as the hon. member for South York. This is not the first time that he has taken occasion to discuss this question in the House. During last session and on a number of other occasions we have heard him discuss it, and from the amount of enthusiasm that he displays, one would think that his whole heart and soul were bound up in the prosperity and the welfare of the people living west of Lake Superior. They tell me, Sir, that there is a newspaper published in the city of Toronto which on the 22nd of September last, referring to the victory won by the Conservative party at the polls on the day before, had across its front page, in large, bold type, the words, 'Glory Hallelujah.' Surely my hon. friend from South York, who I understand is the owner and publisher of that newspaper, while he may understand the feeling of the people of the west on the question of excessive freight rates, on the morning on which he gave that remarkable expression of exultation, was not aware of the state of the sentiment of the people of the prairie provinces in favour of larger markets and of that agreement which they believed would have helped and relieved the railway situation, which certainly to them is an intolerable situation.

What is the situation? I was told on my trip west that during one week in December when the car shortage in the west was very serious, as it still is very serious, there were on the Soo line, a line running down into the United States of America, 1,600 empty cars that could not be used by the people simply because on the 21st of September, the people of Canada voted against being given the privilege of selling their goods on the United States market.

Mr. CURRIE. Did the hon. member say that these cars could not be used in Canada?

Mr. NEELY. Yes.

Mr. CURRIE. An American freight car is free to pass through Canada as freely as a Canadian. When the hon. gentleman makes that statement he is trying to insult the intelligence of this House

Mr. NEELY. My hon. friend (Mr. Currie) may, by his qualifications, be fitted for the position of Minister of Militia, but he has been chosen neither for that position nor yet for the position of Minister of Railways in the present government. His knowledge of the railway situation is not so great and comprehensive that it devolves upon him in any manner to try to correct my statement, a statement of absolute fact. These cars came over from across the line loaded with freight, coal and other things. The only possible freight that they could take back to any extent was through freight. The railways to which those cars belong wanted to get them back into their own service as quickly as possible, and I state as an actual fact that that condition of affairs existed, and yet our Canadian railways were and are still unable to cope with the situation in the west. The question of reciprocity having for the time being been settled by the electorate of Canada we have not that safety valve for the over-production of our western products, and it seems to me to be the duty and the responsibility of this House to take some steps to improve the situation in relation to freight and passenger rates, particularly in western Canada. As the hon. member for Vancouver (Mr. Stevens) has said, this question was brought up somewhat unexpectedly. With the object of the resolution I am entirely in sympathy. The terms of the resolution might be justly and fairly criticised. The people of western Canada are not desirous of obtaining anything more than their fair, just rights. If it can be demonstrated before the Board of Railway Commissioners that the cost of operation of a railway in the west is greater than the cost of operation in the east, there is not a man in western Canada who wants the railways to haul western freight at the expense of the people of the east; we are prepared to pay rightful and just charges. But notwithstanding the fact that we have always heard that the revision of railway rates is under the control and jurisdiction of the Board of Railway Commissioners, and I agree with the remarks of the hon. member for Vancouver (Mr. Stevens) as to the personnel of that commission, it does seem to me that it has taken that Board of Railway Commissioners a mighty long time to get around to the question of this unjust discrimination as against the people of the prairie provinces. My hon. friend from Assiniboia (Mr. Turriff) has given some explanation. He has said that the time of the members of that board has been taken up with a great many minor matters, and that is undoubtedly true to some extent. But, Sir, it does not appear to me that that is a sufficient excuse for the years of delay, since the creation of that Board of Railway Commissioners, in dealing with this question.

Mr. CURRIE. Why did not the hon. gentleman or some of his friends make a complaint to the commission?

Mr. NEELY. The people have been making those complaints continuously. Boards of Trade have been making them from time to time, and yet the commission never seemed to have the opportunity or the time to deal with the question. I do not know how this House can give directions to that board to deal with that question, but it seems to me that the board ought to take it immediately under their consideration. Let them consider the cost of operation, taking account of the actual operating expenses of the railways, let them take the fixed charges if they will, every feature and phase of the cost of operation of the railways, and then we in the west are absolutely satisfied and assured that there will be a great reduction of the freight rates west of Lake Superior, if not right through to the Pacific coast. I say that the people of the west do not want anything unfair. This resolution has come unexpectedly before us in this particular form. I do not know that the people whom I represent here would ask that the resolution in its present terms be passed by this House, and if my hon. friend presses his resolution to a vote, I reserve to myself the right to vote against the terms and the form of the resolution with the privilege of again bringing this question up at some future day before the House for its consideration. I say that with the objects of the resolution I am heartily in accord, namely, the amelioration of conditions in the west with reference to discrimination in freight rates. But I am not prepared at this moment to commit myself to a support of the resolution in the terms and in the form in which it has been submitted to us.

Mr. JAMES McKAY (Prince Albert). As this matter is of great importance to the west, and particularly that portion of it I have the honour to represent, I think it is incumbent on me to address to the House a few remarks on this question. I agree with what the hon. member from Vancouver (Mr. Stevens), has said, that this is a question of such great importance that it is impossible for the House to deal intelligently with it unless it has more data before it on which to act. Particularly does that apply to myself. The argument made by the seconder of the amendment, would of itself, justify me in voting against the proposed amendment, in view of its wording. I desire in the first place to put myself on record as being against the unfair discrimination in freight rates in the west. In this connection, a letter has been read to the House by an hon. member, a letter written, I understand, by the Chairman of the Railway Commission, from whom we learn that although this commission has been in existence for a number of years, no formal complaint has ever been laid before it with regard to freight rates in the west. I desire on this occasion again to put that letter on record in 'Hansard.' The letter is apparently signed by the Chairman of the Board of Railway Commissioners:

My dear Sir,—I beg to acknowledge receipt of yours of 20th inst., inclosing copy of resolution of the Winnipeg Board of Trade. This is the first complaint that has been directly made to the board regarding western rates generally. A good deal has appeared from time to time in the western papers, but no step was taken by anybody there for a general investigation regarding rates throughout the provinces of Alberta, Manitoba and Saskatchewan.

This letter, I understand, was addressed to the Minister of Railways. Now, Sir, we have this situation: The Railway Commission was appointed to look into these matters, and notwithstanding the existence of this grievance for the last twenty-five years, as stated by the hon. member for Assiniboia (Mr. Turriff), no formal complaint was made by him, or any other member of the House to the Railway Commission to deal with this matter.

Mr. TURRIFF. The hon. gentleman is wrong in one respect. It may be quite true, as the chairman of the commission says, that there is no formal complaint made. But I may say that I took the matter up with one of his commissioners more than half a dozen times, and discussed freight rates with him, complained of them on behalf of the people I represent, although I did not do so in writing.

Mr. McKAY. I do not propose to discuss this matter from a party standpoint, I am discussing it from the national point of view, as that is the point of view which the amendment takes. Now, if the hon. member for Assiniboia was desirous, and possibly he was desirous, of doing good to his section of the country, he should have made a formal complaint to the Railway Commission in order that they might deal with it, and he should have got the government he then supported to take action in this matter. Now, it seems to me this is not the proper time to lay down a principle on this question. As the member for Assiniboia has stated, for the last twenty-five years the west has been unfavourably discriminated against with regard to freight rates. He has shown us by figures that the freight rates should have been reduced in the west to a lower point than they are in the east, whereas the opposite has been the case. Now, since the new government has come into office we find that, within a few months, it has formally placed this question of freight rates before the Railway Commission, and, according to the Prime Minister's statement, the government has employed counsel to act on these complaints. Now, I submit it is nothing but right that we should give the administration an opportunity of doing justice to the west. I do not know but that the constituents I represent would take me to task if I voted in favour of this amendment; because, according to the statements made by the mover, and more especially by the seconder of this amendment, if the Railway Commission does justice to the west in this matter, we will be entitled to a lower rate than the east; and if I voted in favour of this amendment my constituents might say to me: Why did you vote for that amendment when we were likely to be treated fairly as compared with the east in the matter of freight rates? The seconder of that motion placed figures before the House to show that the rates, to be fair to the west, would have to be made lower than those charged in the east. Consequently I think I am justified in voting against this amendment, and leaving the matter to be dealt with as the government is doing, taking it before the Railway Commission whose duty it is to investigate the complaint, and employing able counsel to conduct the case for the people. But I wish again to repeat that I am not in favour of the present freight rates that exist in the west. There is a further consideration I will mention. The amendment states that it is detrimental to the whole of Canada to have any territorial discrimination in freight rates. The hon. member who moved this amendment said that there would be some reason for the present practice if there were different roads operating in different portions of Canada; he mentioned conditions in the United States. But the conditions of Canada are not such as those of the United States, where different roads operate in different states; but in Canada we have our railway companies operating all over the country. That may be true to a certain extent, but are there not a large number of railway companies now incorporated which propose to do business in certain portions of Canada, and not in other portions? It is not necessary for me to state the different railway companies that are incorporated to do business in the west only and in no other portion of Canada. But, apart from that feature of the case, do not the actual facts as they exist practically come down to this, that there are different railway companies operating in different parts of the west? I submit that in order to deal with this question intelligently we should have data to show us what the proper mileage is in the east, and what the proper mileage is in the west, of the different railway companies doing business, because we know that in so far as the Canadian Northern Railway Company is concerned by far the larger portion of its mileage is in the west, and it is doing comparatively little in the east. I submit that this data should first be submitted to us before we can intelligently deal with this question.

The mover of the amendment has been characterised as the champion of the west, and I am quite prepared to agree that on more than one occasion he has done very important service for the west. But let us remember that the effect of this amendment would tend to make him a greater champion of the east than of the west, because, as I have stated before, according to the figures that are given now, when the Railway Commission investigates this matter, and deals with it on its merits, we should get a lower rate in the west than people do in the east, whereas, if this principle is adopted by the House and followed by the Railway Commission then the hon. member who moved this amendment will be a greater champion of the east than of the west, because he would prevent that reduction in the rate which we would be entitled to and the east would get the benefit of what we should get.

Mr. CLARK (Red Deer). Does my hon. friend have the least expectation that the Railway Commission will ever make any ruling which will give us better terms in the west? If so he is a very sanguine man

Mr. McKAY. The hon. member who has put that question to me apparently has lost faith in governments owing to the treatment that he received by the late administration.

Mr. CLARK (Red Deer). Surely the Railway Commission is not a government?

Mr. McKAY. Certainly not but the members of the Railway Commission have put themselves on record that nobody ever made any formal complaint to give them an opportunity to deal with this question.

Mr. TURRIFF. The Act gives them authority to deal with it without a formal complaint

Mr. McKAY. Exactly. Perhaps I did not use the proper language, but it is very rarely that we find bodies of this nature taking action of their own motion, and I have sufficient confidence in the administration that I am supporting to leave the matter in their hands. I submit that I am justified in that confidence and the action that they have taken in this matter has given me greater confidence, if it were possible to have greater confidence, in them.

Mr. MACLEAN (South York). It was within the jurisdiction of the Railway Commission from the day it started out to the present time to initiate this inquiry itself, and unless somebody calls its attention to it in parliament it will never undertake it.

Mr. LENNOX. The hon. member for Red Deer (Mr. Clark) did nothing.

Mr. McKAY. I am perfectly willing to admit that I think that is the case, but, just as I stated in answer to the hon. member for Red Deer, it is very rarely you find bodies of this nature taking the initiative. When the late administration was in office and hon. members then supporting the government saw that the Railway Commission was not taking the initiative, why did they not take action and force them to do it? Why? The administration I am supporting had hardly been in office three months when they took the proper course. My hon. friend the Minister of Railways and Canals (Mr. Cochrane), whose duty it is to act in these matters, sends a resolution of a board of trade and formally places it before the Railway Commission. In addition, the administration employs council to back up those who make these complaints and to thoroughly investigate the matter. When we have the question in that position and when, after these long years of discrimination against the west, the administration of the day is taking hold of it in a proper manner, are we to take a stand and say there are to be no territorial changes in regard to the tariff? I say we are not to take that stand but we should let the Railway Commission deal with it and not imply a vote of censure against it and against the government who are doing the best they can in regard to this matter. For these reasons I intend to put myself on record as against this amendment.

Mr. GEO. E. McCRANEY (Saskatoon). Mr. Speaker, I wish to put myself on record in favour of the equalization of rates as between the east and the west. My hon. friend from South York (Mr. Maclean) is not fully in touch with opinion in the west. He lays a great deal of emphasis on the agitation which is going on there in favour of the reduction in freight rates. He appparently has no idea that that is a very small agitation there as compared with the desire that the people of the west have to get into the markets of the south, which efforts he so strenuously opposed. I want to give my hon. friend credit, however, for having, personally and in his newspaper, brought the attention of the public to this question of discrimination. In the west the 'Winnipeg Free Press' has also done great service. A number of articles have appeared in that paper during the past year and they have been published in two pamphlets which are now no doubt in the hands of most hon. members. Members of this House. in so far as actual experience goes, know very little about freight rates either in the east or the west and I would suggest that the writer of these articles in the 'Free Press' be asked to appear at the sittings of the Railway Commission so that his figures may be discussed and verified if necessary. It is to the 'Free Press' that this agitation is due to a great extent and I am sure that the writer of these articles could give a good deal of very valuable information. This investigation will, I presume, deal with the whole question of the tariffs of railways in our country. It will deal not only with freight rates but passenger and express rates. My hon. friend from Assiniboia (Mr. Turriff) has told the House that it appears to be a principle adopted by the Railway Commission that express rates may be very much in excess in the west, of what they are in the east, that where the charge in the east is $1 for a certain distance, in the west that charge is, say $1.66. Some time ago the hon. member for Rouville (Mr. Lemieux), then Postmaster General, proposed that the parcel post system should be greatly extended. At that time I felt that it was going to be of more use to the departmental stores in our country than to the public in general and I was one of those who told him I would not support that proposition. I must say that I have changed my mind. I think I made a mistake, and those of us, and there were enough of us to stop his good efforts, who voted in that way, did in my opinion make a mistake. I hope the Postmaster General will, unless we get better treatment from the Express Companies, extend the Parcel Post system.

Mr. MACLEAN (South York). Extend it first and then you will soon get better treatment.

Mr. McCRANEY. If we were getting better treatment from the express companies there would not be the same desire on the part of the public for the Parcel Post system.

Mr. MACLEAN (South York). Get the Parcel Post first and then you will have both services improved.

Mr. McCRANEY. If the Postmaster General introduces an extended parcel post system I will support him now because we have not had fair treatment from the express companies, and if the express companies want to head off an extended parcel post they will substantially and quickly reduce their rates. I would point out to my hon. friend from Prince Albert that it is not necessary to lay a complaint before the Railway Commission to move them to action. In 1907 there was an agitation in this House for the equalization of passenger rates between the east and the west, and that agitation was effective although no formal complaint was made to the Railway Commission. In December, 1906, the Canadian Northern railway came to us with a private Act authorizing it to take over the railway between Regina and Prince Albert, and I moved in amendment to that Bill that the rates on that line should not be more than three cents a mile. I would not say now that it would be better that that amendment should have carried because it would have discriminated between that particular piece of line and other western roads, and the three cent rate would not be general in its application, but the late Dr. McIntyre, who represented Strathcona then, was in charge of the Canadian Northern Railway Bill and he put a motion on the order paper declaring that the rates in the prairie provinces should be reduced to three cents a mile. Before that motion was discussed, on the 19th March, 1907, the Toronto 'Globe' announced that the Railway Commission would deal with the question and would reduce the rates east of the Rocky Mountains to three cents per mile. And yet, no formal complaint had been laid before the commission. I was very much interested because before the 1st of January, 1907, we in Saskatchewan and Alberta were paying four cents a mile and in order to head off the agitation in this House the railway companies reduced the rate to three and a half cents per mile. Then because of the announcement made in the 'Globe'—I do not say that the authority of the Railway Commission was had for its publication, but the statement appeared to be authoritative—the resolution was not discussed by the House. Parliament prorogued, the summer went by, we paid three and a half cents a mile, but within ten days of the 1st of November, the Railway Commission, apparently without investigation, ordered that the rate east of the Rockies should be reduced to three cents per mile, and they did that with the consent of the railway companies. This shows that the Railway Commission of its own motion did a very important thing and it shows that when the railway companies knew that trouble was coming, they came down. On the 30th of January, 1907, the present Prime Minister moved a resolution asking the Railway Commission to investigate the question as to whether two cents per passenger mile would be a fair rate and, no doubt the railways feared that if there was a general investigation the rate over all Canada might be made less than three cents. Parliament was to meet and it would never have suited the railways to leave the matter for discussion here. Now, why should the passenger rate be the same in the west as in the east if the cost of operation is more in the west than in the east? If the railways in the west are conducting their passenger business at a loss then it must be that the freight and express rates are making up that loss, but I do not think that the railways are losing anything on their passenger business in the west. I trust there will be a thorough investigation by the commission of express rates, freight rates and passenger rates. There is a phase further of this question which appeals to me. The hon. member for Vancouver spoke as though we are reflecting upon the Railway Commission when we move in this House towards equalization of rates and to give instructions to the commission. Well, parliament has very heavily bonused some of the railways in the west and parliament is interested. If counsel were to appear before the Railway Commission and state that the Canadian Pacific railway got one hundred and fifty millions in cash subsidies and in land bonuses, if you value the land at three dollars an acre, and gave that as a reason why the rates should be equalized, the Railway Commission might properly say that they knew nothing about that and that it was not a question they could consider.

I have some facts here which I have obtained in a return from the Department of Railways within the last few days which I would like to put on record. They show the subsidies paid by this government to the various railways operating in Manitoba, Saskatchewan, Alberta and British Columbia:

Statement of Subsidies paid by Dominion Government to following Railways in British Columbia, Alberta, Saskatchewan and Manitoba.

Canadian Pacific Railway.
Main line, Prince Arthur to Coast, including Pembina branch (about)	$31,000,000
The above includes amount paid out by the Dominion government on construction and it is impossible to divide it into provinces. In addition to the amount of $31,000,000, about was expended on the Canada Central railway, rolling stock, telegraph lines, surveys, Fort Francis lock, Dawson route, inspecting engineers, works west of Red river, rails, &c.	7,000,000
Main line subsidy Callendar to Kamloops	25,000,000
Branches.
British Columbia	$5,156,917
Saskatchewan	816,992
Manitoba	338,000
	$6,311,909
St. Mary's River Railway.
Alberta	$148,094
Canadian Northern Railway.
Alberta, Edmonton, Yukon and Pacific railway	$ 91,200
Saskatchewan and Manitoba	374,156
	$465,356

If any hon. member will take the railway statistical report for the year ending June 30, 1911, he will see what the land subsidies are, and I am going to trouble the House by quoting from this report. At page 15 will be found the statement as follows:

Alberta Railway and Irrigation Co. (formerly N. W. Coal and Navigation Co.)	1,114,368
Calgary and Edmonton Railway Co.	1,895,445
Canadian Northern Railway Co. (from point on C.P.R. to Hudson Bay) C. N. Ry. Co. (formerly Lake Manitoba and Canal Co.)	3,458,675
Canadian Pacific Railway (main line)	18,237,701
Canadian Pacific railway, Pipestone extension, Souris branch	278,818
C. P. R., Souris branch	1,422,966
Great Northwest Central Railway Company (formerly Central Northwest Railway Company)	320,000
Manitoba and North Western Railway Company	1,501,376
Manitoba, Southeastern Colonization railway	1,399,640
Manitoba and Southeastern Railway Company	682,412
Qu'Appelle, Long Lake and Saskatchewan Railway and Steamboat Company	1,630,097
Saskatchewan and Western Railway Company	98,880
Total	32,040,378

As to the value of this land, this report goes on to say:

As has been said, it is quite impracticable to assign any money value to the above land grants. In the case of the province of Quebec it has been the policy of the government to present to grantees the option of taking the land or receiving a sum equal to 52 cents per acre in lieu thereof. In practically every instance the cash option has been taken; so that of the 13,324,950 acres primarily granted by that province, but a small number, if any, has been actually alienated. On the other hand, as indicating the value of land grants by the Dominion, last year the Canadian Pacific Railway Company sold 975,036 acres of land at an average price of $14.84 per acre.

If any one will calculate the subsidy in cash and in lands paid the Canadian Pacific railway, he will get this result. In cash subsidy there has been given the Canadian Pacific railway, and this includes the completed line north of Lake Superior, a total of $69,460,000. The land grant given that company calculated at only $3 per acre will amount to $80,854,818, making a total of $150,314,818. Why were these subsidies given? Were they given to the promoters of the company in order that they might put them into their pockets? I would say no. But in some cases the promoters did put them into their pockets as in the case of the Qu'Appelle Long Lake and Saskatchewan Railway. What parliament had in mind when it gave those cash subsidies was to meet the very difficulties which are now given us to-day as reasons why the rates should be greater in the west. The cost of production, the cost of operation, the greater cost of living, and so forth are the reasons given; and no doubt these cash grants were given as compensation for these drawbacks. No doubt the grants given at the time were intended to meet the very conditions which are quoted against us now, so that after paying for these drawbacks in the first place we are paying for them the second time. In the case of the Canadian Northern, I find that the cash subsidy amounts to $465,356 and the land grant to 5,088,772 acres, which at $3 per acre amounts to $15,266,316, or a total of $15,731,672. And to-day this parliament has a statute covering the Canadian Northern railway thorough that country which has not much local traffic. We have a guarantee of $35,000 a mile on 1,050 miles of that road and the Ontario government has voted a bonus of 4,000 acres per mile on 500 miles of that road. Why did the Ontario legislature grant that amount? It was because of the conditions which exist there —because of the difficulty of building north of Lake Superior and because there was little local traffic, and also because of the higher cost of living. And a singular thing it is that the railway company give the higher cost of living in the west as a reason why the freight rate should be higher when a great deal of the higher cost of living is due to their freight rates.

This question was somewhat discussed during the last election campaign, and I was somewhat struck with a statement which appeared in the public press as having been made by my hon. friend from Selkirk (Mr. Bradbury). My hon. friend is here and will correct me if I misquote him. That statement was that a director of the Canadian Pacific railway had told him that the Canadian Pacific railway would welcome a reduction of freight rates but that the company would not be permitted to do so by the Railway Commission. If that be the ruling of the Railway Commission——

Mr. BRADBURY. The hon. gentleman has not understood what I did say. Although he quoted correctly part of what I said. What I said was this:

In conversation with one of the directors of the Canadian Pacific railway on this question, he told me that they would welcome a reduction of freight rates. He did not say that they would not be permitted by the Railway Commission to reduce them. He said they would welcome a reduction if the Railway Commission wished to enforce it.

Mr. TURRIFF. Did you believe him?

Mr. McCRANEY. I am glad the hon. member has made his own statement, because the impression I gathered from the statement in the press was that they were willing to do it if they only had the chance. If there is anything in that theory, it is a good reason why the Hudson Bay railway should be built. We are going to build the Hudson Bay railway not only to get our wheat out by a short route, but in order to bring about a reduction in freight rates. It is going to give us a cheaper route to the old country, and we hope the advantage will be not only to those who will ship over that railway, but to every shipper in the Northwest, because a lower freight rate to Liverpool via the Hudson Bay railway will affect the rates of all the railways doing business between the west and the Liverpool market. If there is any ground whatever for the statement made by the hon. member for South York (Mr. Maclean), and for the inference which I think I may fairly draw from the statement made by my hon. friend from Selkirk, that work should be stopped at once. If that is the law it is no good. It is a reason why we should not go any further in making new routes if we are going to leave the old routes in possession of the rates which they are now getting. I do not know to what extent or whether I shall support the amendment of my hon. friend. I am entirely with him in spirit. I do not know whether the wording of his amendment is altogether right. The Prime Minister has pointed out some objections, but I hope he will deal with this question. He is in command of this House. I hope any declaration which this House may make will not be regarded as a criticism of the Railway Commission. I believe that the Railway Commission is not only efficient in its work, but has more work than it is able to do from the very fact of its efficiency. Because it has proved efficient it seems that we are overloading it. The last government found difficulty in filling a vacancy on that commission. I have no doubt that this government is to be sympathized with because there is great difficulty in getting the right kind of men for such a commission. They have to deal with the brightest minds that can be employed by the railway corporations. I hope no inefficient man will be appointed simply because he belongs to a certain class in the community. I hope we shall get the best man the government can find, and if the government will increase the commission so that it will do its work more effectively, I can assure them of my support.

Mr. A. C. BOYCE (West Algoma). Mr. Speaker, I do not intend to address the House at any great length, but as my hon. friend from South York (Mr. W. F. Maclean) intends to divide the House on the resolution, which involves some very important principles, I feel that I should not cast a silent vote upon it. I wish to draw your attention to the fact that ever since the Railway Commission of Canada was organized, it has met with great approval from the corporations and the public generally which have had dealings with it. The organization of that board was a satisfactory act. In settling disputes as to railway rates, dealing with railway companies, and generally, by an enlargement of the scope of the statute, questions relating to public utilities, it has been beneficial. Consequently the first question I would ask the hon. member for South York and you and this House to consider in connection with this important question is, that having constituted a Board of Railway Commissioners for Canada, which is a very important, influential, and highly re spected board, doing a great service of a public nature, why should parliament be asked to delegate the functions of that board to a commission to be constituted under or independent of it? To that Railway Board are entrusted by this country, with complete confidence, public questions of a most vital and comprehensive nature affecting the management of our railway interests of this country and of other public services. I fancy that I am not greatly exaggerating the importance to be attributed to the Railway Commission of Canada when I say that, possibly, with the sole exception of the United States Commerce Commission, it is the most powerful and influential body of its kind in the whole world. Can any instance be cited of the United States Commerce Commission delegating its functions in the way asked here? The whole object of the Railway Commission of Canada is to deal with questions such as this, and why should parliament be asked to declare that because the grievances referred to arise in the west as different from the east, the Railway Commission in its enlarged sphere of action, is not competent to deal with them and adjust them? There was recently relegated to the Supreme Court of Canada a decision of the Railway Commission known as the Regina rate case, in which such an inquiry as is involved in the motion before the House was dealt with.

The Board of Railway Commissioners ordered an inquiry, the matter was referred to the Supreme Court, and the Supreme Court having decided that the Railway Commission had correctly ruled that this matter came within its jurisdiction, full scope is given to that inquiry, the door is wide open and measures will be taken to give it the widest possible scope for the regulating of all grievances involved between the shippers and railway companies. The difficulties of a railway company are not to be minimized, they must be taken into consideration, and I fancy that it is in accordance with the judgment of this House, which is a reasonable, deliberative body, that in dealing with railway companies regard is to be had to the difficulties under which they are labouring, consistent with a desire to promote the industries of the country and to protect the people in every reasonable regard. It must be remembered that railway development and extension is possibly as great a factor in the development of the country, particularly in the west, as the agricultural development. Agricultural development necessarily follows the constructions of railways. In the adjustment of grievances of this description the whole subject must be thoroughly considered, and the Board of Railway Commissioners must not be in any way restricted

Mr. McCRANEY. Does the hon. gentleman think that the board will be justified in considering the question of subsidies, which had already been granted by the parliament of Canada, in fixing freight rates in any part of Canada?

Mr. BOYCE. I am not prepared to offer my hon. friend an answer to what is largely an academic question. I appreciate the broadness of his question, but I am not at liberty to offer an opinion on so large a question at the moment. Wherever it has been found since the constitution of the Railway Commission, that its powers have been limited or restricted, it has been the policy of parliament, irrespective of party, to so enlarge those powers as to permit the commission to make all these inquiries, and to deal with all these subjects. That is as far as I can go in answering the question. Therefore, if it be found that the Railway Commission is cabined, cribbed and confined by the scope of its authority, then I take it that it is the policy and the duty of this government to so broaden the functions of that board that it will have authority to deal with this question. If it be necessary to consider the scope of the commission with reference to such a question as this, it would be far better, if necessary, to enlarge the scope of the commission than to refer important matters to another tribunal not within or under the jurisdiction of the Railway Commission. The Railway Commission should be comprehensive and should have relegated to it all these questions for final decision, subject to appeal.

In reference to the question of rates, my hon. friend will realize that the question of operation is of considerable importance. It is true that the gross income of railways has considerably increased but by reason of the increased cost of operation of these railways the net income derived from them has lately been considerably reduced. Only to-day, in the Railway Committee, in connection with a Bill to incorporate the Canadian Northern branch lines, it was stated that the extension of those branch lines undoubtedly meant greater employment for labour in the community, and, therefore, more demand for the produce raised in that neighbourhood. In connection with any adjustment of rates, it is necessary to consider the reasonableness of these rates as applied to the general operating expenses, and, in fixing rates, regard must be had to the conditions under which railway companies are being operated. If it is more expensive to operate in one particular sphere, if greater difficulties are met, these must be considered. If, on the other hand, there appears to be discrimination in one territory as against another irrespective of these different conditions, that is a question that can be pro-

Territorially speaking there is no difficulty. There has been some question about dividing the commission. I do not desire to express a view on the broad question whether it would be better to consolidate the Railway Commission into one body or to have separate bodies, but undoubtedly the question involved in these matters involves the question of interference with the functions and constitution of the Railway Board, and I do not feel at liberty at present to advocate such an interference, having the utmost confidence in the constitution of the Railway Board as it is at present.

It may be urged by my hon. friend that many of these roads are extravagantly managed, and that unreasonable expenditure is involved in their operation. That is a matter which we have not to deal with, and is not one which comes within the purview of the Railway Commission. So the question before us is whether parliament should constitutionally interfere with the functions of the Board of Railway Commissioners at the present time. Under all the circumstances, and for the reasons which I have endeavoured to condense as much as possible, I think the wiser course is to permit the Board to determine this question, and all other questions affecting similar matters, and of course to deal with grievances arising from rates fixed by the railway companies of Canada. For this reason I shall be obliged to vote against the amendment.

Hon. FRANK OLIVER (Edmonton). I did not have an opportunity of reading the motion until a short time ago, and I must say that when I heard it read at first I misunderstood its purport. I understand it to declare the principle that there should be no discrimination in railway rates because of geographical location. As a principle, I think everybody must agree that it is correct. But as I read it, it does not provide against differences in railway rates because of other conditions, because of natural conditions increasing the cost of haul, or because of population, or traffic conditions which, by increasing the amount of haulage would make it economically possible to reduce the rates. Therefore, if the resolution declared, as I thought it did at first, that there should be no different rates under any conditions in any part of this country, I certainly would not be able to vote for it. But if it declares, as I now understand it, that there should not be discrimination in rates because of geographical location, then I think the principle is sound and one that everybody must agree to.

As to the propriety of leaving this question entirely to the discrimination of the Railway Commission, I would like to say that in my humble judgment it is within the authority of this House to set limits to the jurisdiction of the Railway Commission, and that the Railway Commission is charged with the responsibility of working within those limits. I think it would be going too far to give to the Railway Commission the right to say, in practice, that in the province of Nova Scotia, for instance, all the railway rates might be doubled to-morrow, just as it would be improper to lay upon the Commission the responsibility of maintaining rates in western Canada at their present level. I am aware that under the letter of the law the commission has that authority; but the commission is composed of sane men, and they have not yet exercised that authority in an insane way; and I do not think they will. It is beyond question that railway rates in western Canada are considerably higher than they are in eastern Canada for a like service. That being so, and that condition having continued for many years, I say the Railway Commission would be justified, unless they received a mandate from parliament to the contrary, in not bringing the rates down to the general level of the rates of eastern Canada. They would be justified in assuming that the condition of higher rates existed because of some special conditions there, and that their duty would be discharged by making merely such adjustments between different localities in the west as in their judgment were called for.

Mr. BORDEN. I cannot see at the present moment why they would be justified in assuming any such thing.

Mr. OLIVER. I am not asking my hon. friend to see the matter as I see it.

Mr. BORDEN. I am asking purely for information.

Mr. OLIVER. I am only placing before the House my own views in the matter. I was going to say that when the question of express rates was under consideration by the Railway Commission quite recently, they took exactly that view. They did not bring down the express rates in western Canada to the level of those in eastern Canada. They left them at a considerably higher level, presuming, I take it for granted, that those rates being much higher as a general thing, there were conditions that justified the situation.

Mr. MACLEAN (South York). The railways of their own motion, when they first began to operate in the west, assumed that they were entitled to higher rates, and they enforced them. The commission came into operation, and it acknowledged that assumption, and that assumption will be carried on unless parliament, or somebody else, declares that it is a wrong assumption and must be justified. My contention is that parliament should declare that it has not been justified and ought to cease. Then we will get equality.

Mr. BORDEN. I am endeavouring purely to get the view point of the hon. gentleman, and not speaking by way of criticism. I would suppose it to be the duty of the Railway Commission to assume nothing of the kind, but to look carefully into all the conditions, those that have been alluded to this evening, and to apply the principle of equality to east and west in so far as the conditions would justify, instead of going upon any assumption as to what had taken place in the past before the investigation was made. I am merely presenting that view as one that occurred to me.

Mr. OLIVER. I can quite appreciate my hon. friend's view, but I would like him to appreciate mine, that the Railway Commission, finding a condition existing, which had existed for many years, and which had been accepted by everybody as a proper condition, felt, very reasonably, and, I think, they were fairly warranted in so assuming, that there was merit in that condition and that they would not be justified in dealing with the question without recognition of a condition which had existed for so long. That is what actually occurred in regard to express rates in the west, and it seemed to me that it is on all fours with the question of railway rates. It is chiefly because the Railway Commission took that view with regard to express rates that I assume that they would take the same view with regard to the railway rate. At any rate I again say that it is the business and the responsibility of parliament to make a declaration of principle and to allow the Railway Commission to work out the details of that principle.

Mr. SCHAFFNER. Without disputing the statement made by the hon. gentleman in connection with what the commission found when they went into the west to investigate freight rates, does he not think that it was the duty of the commission to go into the matter for themselves no matter how they found rates east or west, and not to be guided by conditions because those conditions happened to exist? I consider that it was the duty of the commission to make the rates in the west no higher than they were in the east, which is the very opposite to what the hon. gentleman says.

Mr. OLIVER. I will willingly admit that my hon. friend is very likely justified in what he says. Theoretically he is correct, but in actual practice and, as a matter of fact in an instance, as I understand it, practically on all fours with the question of railway rates, the Railway Commission did not do that. From my point of view—I, of course admit that I may be wrong—the Railway Commission were fairly and reasonably warranted in doing exactly as they did, failing instruction from parliament to the contrary.

Mr. FOSTER (Toronto). I understand my hon. friend to say that, as a matter of fact, the commission, in dealing with express rates, did finally come to their decision on the ground that there had hitherto been a difference? Now, does he know that, or does he know whether or not they came to their decision by looking into the actual conditions? The fact is that they reduced the rates, as I understand?

Mr. OLIVER. Yes.

Mr. FOSTER (Toronto). The commission then will reduce them because of the work they did in another case, and because for a long time they have had higher rates there than in the east?

Mr. MACLEAN (South York). Yes, they have three grades.

Mr. FOSTER (Toronto). Well, does my hon. friend know that that was the ground of their decision or is it not possible that they came to their decision not because they had regard to precedent but because they had regard to the facts of the case?

Mr. MACLEAN (South York). It was because they had regard to precedent.

Mr. OLIVER. I must admit that I do not know. I cannot answer my hon. friend's question. All I can give is my own opinion and the reasons why I come to the conclusion to which I do come. We know that express rates in the west have been higher and we know that the Railway Commission were authorized by parliament to deal with express rates. They went out, they found the express rate as they were, they made certain reductions and readjustments, but a great outstanding difference between the east and the west they did not deal with, to bring down these rates to the level of the east. In my opinion, and I think I will not be contradicted on this point, the difference in actual material conditions in the matter of express rates between the east and the west is not as great in proportion as the difference in the rates as left by the Railway Commission. Therefore, I have assumed, if my hon. friend follows my reasoning, that the Railway Commission, finding a certain condition of rates, took for granted, and, in my judgment, were fairly justified in doing so, that the difference in geography between the east and west warranted that change of rates and they made their decision accordingly.

Mr. LANCASTER. Would it not be a fair and proper assumption that the commission were actuated entirely by a reasonable and proper way of arriving at it and not imagining that they went in an improper way about arriving at their conclusion? Would not that be a fair assumption if you do not know?

Mr. OLIVER. Well, I have been trying to show the House how, in my humble judgment, I do arrive at my conclusion.

Mr. LANCASTER. But, when the hon. gentleman says that he does not know, is not that a fair guess?

Mr. OLIVER. My idea, and surely I will be allowed to hold my opinion—

Mr. FOSTER (Toronto). Oh, absolutely, I will warrant that you will hold it.

Mr. OLIVER. In my opinion the Railway Commission acted strictly and fairly and just as we might reasonably have expected the Railway Commission to have acted. If we want the Railway Commission to act differently from that we ought to take the responsibility of saying in parliament that they should take that action. I cannot understand how our friends in the House can think that they can possibly have the right to place upon a body of men, who are chosen by theemselves, the responsibility of making a difference of many millions in the earnings of these great enterprises in the west. If we have done that I think we ought not to have done it. I do not think that we should delegate such a stupendous power to any body of men. Those of us who have been elected to parliament are the only people who should properly undertake that tremendous responsibility.

Mr. LANCASTER. Was not the hon. gentleman a member of the government which deliberately delegated all these tremendous powers to that body?

Mr. OLIVER. Surely.

Mr. LANCASTER. Then the hon. gentleman has changed his mind most completely since the 21st September.

Mr. OLIVER. Not at all; I am unfortunate in some parts of my audience.

Mr. FOSTER (Toronto). Take them by sections.

Mr. OLIVER. Yes. I said in the beginning of my remarks that the Railway Commission, in my judgment, had, according to the wording of the Act, all the authority that my hon. friend (Mr. Maclean, South York) says they have, or that the right hon. leader of the government (Mr. Borden) says they have. I admit that quite freely, but, as I have said, the Railway Commission being composed of sane men and appreciating to a reasonable degree their proper responsibility, have not undertaken to act to the limit of the letter of the law and, in my judgment they were perfectly justified in not going beyond a safe and sane and reasonable point in this matter of interfering with such stupendous investments of capital and with the traffic arrangements of the whole country. I would not have occupied so much time if I had not been so ably assisted by some of our hon. friends on the other side. But, to sum up, I am prepared to vote for the resolution on the understanding that it only declares the principle that there shall not be discrimination in rates because of geographical location.

Mr. FOSTER (Toronto). How is my hon. friend going to read that into a resolution which reads another way?

Mr. OLIVER. I do not read it another way. I think the resolution is unfortunately worded. I will read it to the House and give the effect of the words as I understand it.

Mr. FOSTER (Toronto). Then you are not going to vote for the resolution, but for your interpretation of it?

Mr. OLIVER. I will vote for the resolution, but my hon. friend (Mr. Foster) must give me the privilege of interpreting the words. The resolution says:

> The House hereby declares that it will be against the general interests of Canada to have any territorial variation in the application of tariff charges by the Board of Railway Commissioners.

I think the mover of the resolution will bear me out when I say—although I think its wording could be improved—that it means that there shall be no variation in charges because of territorial or geographical location, but it does not mean that there shall not be variation in charges because of other reasonable conditions.

Mr. MACLEAN (South York). Certainly.

Mr. OLIVER. I accept the resolution understanding it to mean what I have said and I accept it as an assumption of a proper responsibility of this House in giving a direction to the Railway Commission, on a matter that in my humble judgment the Railway Commission would not be justified in acting upon without a direction on the responsibility of this House.

Mr. MACLEAN (South York). I do not want my motion to be construed as one of want of confidence in the government or in the Railway Commission, but I have achieved my object in getting a full discussion and I am quite willing now to withdraw the motion or rather to leave it in suspense with liberty to bring it up on a later occasion as I intend to.

Mr. LANCASTER. It must be dealt with now.

Mr. MACLEAN (South York). It can be dropped; the hon. gentleman had a motion here the other night.

Mr. LANCASTER. And lots of fun.

Mr. MACLEAN (South York). And he had some friends to help him through. This discussion has done a lot for the same cause. It will be heard of in the west, it will come back to the east, and it will not be long before the House will declare for equalization of rates.

Mr. SPEAKER. The matter having been once dealt with this session, it would not be in order to bring it up again.

Mr. MACLEAN (South York). I can take care of myself under that rule.

Amendment (Mr. Maclean) withdrawn.

Motion agreed to, and House went into Committee of Supply.

SUPPLY.

Ottawa examining warehouse, $300,000.

Mr. MONK. This building was applied for by Mr. McDougald, Commissioner of Customs, on December 20, and recommended by the minister. We have the offer of a site which seems to be approved by the officers and the price of it will be about $125,000.

Mr. LEMIEUX. Where is the site?

Mr. MONK. I can tell my hon. friend privately, but as the bargain has not been concluded it would be better not to disclose it. Plans are being prepared in a hurry because there is great necessity for the building. The plans are being prepared in the department.

Mr. LEMIEUX. It would be well for us to guard against building in a haphazard way in this city. The city may become a federal district, but anyway it will always be the capital of the Dominion and we should take special care about acquiring sites for these buildings. A committee of the late cabinet composed of Mr. Murphy and Mr. Pugsley and Mr. Fisher were looking into a general plan for the erection of public buildings, and it would be well for the present government to follow that example. If at confederation the government had purchased all the land in front of the parliament buildings how much better it would be now, and with the increased business and rapid growth of this country we should at this date endeavour to make provision for the future.

I would ask my hon. friend to look into the matter and follow the example which was set by the late administration.

Mr. MONK. My hon. friend was probably not in the committee the other day when this matter was fully gone into. I explained that a committee of the Privy Council had been formed under this government composed of the Minister of Marine, the Minister of Trade and Commerce, the Minister of Customs and myself. I read then from the report I had on the possibility of utilizing the site which the late government bought on Sussex Street and the necessity of acquiring other sites for public buildings. This item is not for parliamentary public buildings generally but to supply a local want, in connection with the examining warehouse. There is great necessity for enlarging our examining warehouses in the different cities. In Ottawa that necessity is very urgent.

Mr. LEMIEUX. I would like to draw the attention of the right hon. the first minister to a resolution adopted the other day by the Ottawa Board of Trade concerning the making of Ottawa into a federal district. Have the government any policy on that question? I notice that the press of Ottawa is very much exercised over it.

Mr. BORDEN. We have no official information whatever of the passing of any by-law by the city of Ottawa, and until we receive some official information we cannot take that matter up. Of course we shall take it under consideration so soon as such information is received. I am not sure as to the terms of the resolution referred to. I think it would require the legislature of the province of Ontario to make the change. Certainly it would of this parliament.

Ottawa—Parliament Buildings, improvements, $10,000.

Mr. LEMIEUX. What improvements are contemplated in the library?

Mr. MONK. There are several plans but from the construction of the library it is very difficult to add to the library without spoiling the symmetry of the building. There is a plan of adding a story on one of the neighbouring branches of the buildings which would give accommodation to most of our old volumes.

Mr. LEMIEUX. On the Hill?

Mr. MONK. Yes, and another plan which has been fully prepared by the chief architect is to build out from the library to the cliff a sort of tunnel but that would hardly be acceptable.

Mr. LEMIEUX. I am always hoping my hon. friend will find better accommodation for His Majesty's loyal opposition. Some 15 or 16 of our members from Quebec are placed in one room up stairs and consequently cannot do their work with any comfort.

Mr. MONK. I have asked my hon. friend to meet me so that we might see what can be done, of course the disposition of the rooms here has been left—and I think very wisely— in the hands of His Honour the Speaker.

Mr. STANFIELD. Where is that room which has 15 members?

Mr. LEMIEUX. I think it is number 53.

Mr. STANFIELD. We had 15 or 16 members in the last parliament in that same room.

Mr. LEMIEUX. No doubt you found there were too many.

Mr. STANFIELD. Fortunately I was not in it.

Mr. MONK. I may tell my hon. friend that most of the time that I was in opposition we had no room at all; but I do not want my hon. friend to be condemned to the same hardships that we had.

Mr. BORDEN. There is not all the accommodation that there should be, but let us realize that it is better than it used to be. I sat in this House for five sessions until I came to the front bench, and during that time I had not even a corner of a room. In that respect I fared no worse than a good many other members, because there was not at that time nearly the accommodation that there is at present. However, I realize that it is not all that we desire, and I hope at some day we shall be better off.

Mr. LEMIEUX. I think that we should play the game fairly, and that both sides of the House should be provided with proper accommodation. When my hon. friend makes the improvements to this building, I would ask him to see that all the members are provided with good rooms.

Port Arthur—armoury, $49,000.

Mr. LEMIEUX. Has my hon. friend no regret to find that under his new authority he is asking parliament to vote funds for an armoury? Is he in favour of militarism?

Mr. MONK. Not militarism, but I always have been in favour of proper military organization.

Mr. MACDONALD. Have the tenders been let?

Mr. MONK. We have so far paid $16,027 for the site, but there is still some land to be purchased. I think nothing has yet been done towards the building.

Mr. SINCLAIR. What has become of the vote of $30,000 for a public building at Sarnia which we passed prior to the holidays? Has the money been spent?

Mr. MONK. No.

Mr. SINCLAIR. It does not appear in the present estimates.

Mr. MONK. No, but, if I am not mistaken, it will be provided for in the supplementaries. I can let my hon. friend know to-morrow.

Mr. LEMIEUX. I do not see among the items for the province of Quebec anything for the pier at Gaspé. It is under contract. I suppose when the supplementaries come down there will be an amount to terminate the work?

Mr. MONK. I could not say positively as to that. I know there is a pier under construction in Gaspé and I had some talk about putting something in the supplementary estimates for it.

Mr. CHISHOLM (Antigonish). Will the minister say whether items appearing in the estimates presented before the holidays but not in the estimates for this year will be in the supplementary estimates, and if it is not the usual practice to provide in the main estimates such appropriations as those to which I have referred? I find that practically every item for my county has been dropped. Will some of these appear in the supplementaries?

Mr. MONK. Many items which are in the estimates of last year are not in the estimates of this year. But many representations have been made, and the supplementary estimates will contain many of these items but not all. Some of the works did not seem to be necessary or to have been insisted on by anybody. In some cases our district engineer reported that the works were either unnecessary or had not been insisted on or were not found urgent, and as the estimates were already very heavy we did not put them in the main estimates for this year.

Mr. CHISHOLM (Antigonish). Is there a rule that repairs and additions appear in the main estimates and new work in the supplementaries?

Mr. MONK. That is generally the case, but it is by no means an absolute rule. My hon. friend will find many exceptions to that rule. Items which have been forgotten are often put in the supplementaries, although they refer to old works.

Mr. BICKERDIKE. Reverting to the item of $4,000 for Lachine post office, it will be quite impossible to make the necessary repairs with this amount. The post-office is in a disgraceful condition, and it will take three times this amount to make it at all suitable. The minister would be ashamed of it if he visited it. Of course the minister may have something further in the supplementaries.

Mr. MONK. I am obliged to the hon. member for his suggestion, and I will make a note of it for the supplementary estimates.

Renfrew public building, improvements,

Mr. LEMIEUX. I saw by one of the papers this morning that one of the employees of the hon. gentleman was actively engaged in the campaign in the county of Renfrew. I would like to know his policy with reference to his employees taking part in a campaign.

Mr. MONK. Any public servant who takes part actively in a campaign ought to be dismissed. If my hon. friend will give evidence of that we will attend to his complaint.

Mr. LEMIEUX. I saw it in the papers.

Mr. MONK. As my hon. friend said yesterday the newspapers do not always tell the truth.

Seaforth public building, $25,000.

Mr. MONK. This is to make provision for the erection of a public building in the town of Seaforth on a site on Main street. It is for post office and customs purposes, and also to provide armoury accommodation for 'C' Company, 33rd Huron Regiment. That is quite warlike, I am going in for gore.

Mr. LEMIEUX. I notice the minister is erecting these armouries in Ontario and the other provinces, but I do not see many of them in Quebec.

Sudbury public building, $20,000.

Mr. H. BOULAY (Rimouski). (Translation.) Mr. Speaker, before the committee votes that item for a post office at Sudbury, I wish to draw the attention of the Postmaster General, whom I regret not to see occupying his seat just now, to the manner in which the post office at that place is being managed from the point of view of the use of the French language. I have a knowledge of what is going on, having had myself occasion personally to complain of the management of that office. The population of Sudbury is in part French, and I noticed that in that office there is not a single French-speaking clerk, and besides very little attention is paid to the French-speaking population having to transact business there. Letters addressed in French are delayed two or three days and are delivered on the go-as-you-please plan.

I take no exception whatever to the amount applied for, but I hope that the hon. the Postmaster General will take cognizance of these facts, and when he appoints a new postmaster, will see to it that fair treatment is extended to the French-speaking people of that district, which makes up at least fifty per cent of the population. The hon. Minister of Railways represents the constituency in which Sudbury is situated and he knows that the remarks which I now make are warranted.

Hon. F. D. MONK. (Translation.) I note what my hon. friend says. Sudbury is well known to me. I have travelled extensively through Ontario, and I realize how important it is to provide post offices with clerks who can speak and understand French, in order to meet the needs of the people inhabiting that district. The hon Posmaster General is absent, but I will see that the statements just made by the hon. gentleman be laid before him, and I am sure they will bear fruit.

Hon. Mr. LEMIEUX (Rouville). (Translation.) I am glad that the hon. member for Rimouski has called the attention of the House to what is going on at Sudbury However, it may be well for him to bear in mind that the Postmaster General is quite in a position to remedy that state of things. I appointed two years ago for New Ontario a French-speaking inspector, Mr. Limoges, a true French Canadian and an honest man.

Mr. MONK. (Translation.) Is he a Conservative?

Mr. LEMIEUX. (Translation.) A former Conservative who a few years ago joined the ranks of the Liberal party. Moreover, his political leanings have nothing to do with the question; we are only concerned with his qualifications. Is Mr. Limoges no longer to be regarded as a good French Canadian, because he is a Liberal? I appeal then to the hon. gentleman to call the attention of his colleague the Postmaster General to the fact that in the district of New Ontario there is a French-speaking inspector and that will suffice, I trust, to induce him to appoint at Sudbury a man who understands and speaks French.

There is a considerable number of French-speaking people, not only at Sudbury, but in other towns of Ontario as well, and at times the complaint is heard that our fellow-people cannot make themselves understood in public offices. I hope the hon. Minister of Public Works gill give orders towards doing away with such grievances.

Mr. MONK. (Translation.) What strikes me in the first place, it is that the condition of things pointed out by the member for Rimouski cannot be easily remedied through the inspector who has been appointed by the hon. member for Rouville,

If I understand rightly the hon. member for Rimouski, he complains that people cannot make themselves understood when they speak French. That is not a grievance which the inspector can do away with. It is a rather grievous state of things which exists since the time when that post office was under the management of my hon. friend from Rouville himself. So that we are called upon to make amends for the wrong-doing of the former Postmaster General in person.

Mr. LEMIEUX. (Translation.) My hon. friend loses sight of the fact that the Postmaster General whoever he may be, is not ubiquitous, and that, in any post office department, it is primarily to the inspector that the minister has recourse. When a complaint is made to my hon. friend, he refers it in the first place either to the architect, or to the inspector, according to circumstances. It is the first time that this grievance of the French Canadians in the vicinity of Sudbury is brought to my attention, and I am satisfied that were the case referred to Mr. Limoges, he would at once find a remedy. My hon. friend should bear in mind that there are about fifteen thousand post offices in the Dominion. Out of that number it may be found that there are some grievances which it is not possible to do away with at once.

My hon. friend, in spite of all the obloquy which has been heaped on them in the province of Quebec, has no right to insinuate that the former administration was unfriendly to our fellow-countrymen. It was my aim, while I was Postmaster General, as I suppose it is the aim of the Minister of Public Works to-day, to show a spirit of fairness for all, without distinction of race or religion.

However, did I wish to be personal in my reply to my hon. friend I might say that he showed neither liberality nor generosity in his dealing with his compatriots since he has become Minister of Public Works. What has he done since September 21st? He has dismissed ninety French Canadians as against ten of other nationalities.

In what manner did he deal wtih the employees of this House? Mercilessly, he dismissed poor labourers on the eve of Christmas and New Year's Day, most of them French Canadians, the heads of large families. Coldly, without regard to the welfare of their families, he thanked them for their services. One of these victims is to be seen just now, a piteous sight, going through the lobbies of the House of Commons. What was his crime? He threw the cloak of charity over a man who occupies a high position. And the hon. Minister of Public Works insinuates that I have neglected and ill-treated my compatriots of the province of Quebec! I think my hon. friend should show more caution, for walls have ears.

Mr. MONK. (Translation.) I very much regret that unwarrantable outburst of my hon friend's temper. What I contended was that whenever some old-time grievance is brought to the attention of the government, these hon. gentlemen opposite invariably suggest a remedy, which they claim is easy of employment. I think it is a fair answer to say: if those remedies are so easy of use, why did you not have recourse to them when you were in power, seeing that those grievances have been standing for such a length of time. As regards the insinuations which the hon. member thinks fit to make against me just now, I may say that they are entirely without foundation.

Mr. LEMIEUX. (Translation.) I am not making any insinuations; I am replying to the hon. minister who is bringing charges against me.

Mr. MONK. (Translation.) Those statements are absolutely foundationless, and I am surprised that a man of his position should cast a slur such as that. What happened? A number of complaints have been made against men in my department. I insisted that these complaints should be specific, laid down in writing. When I found myself in possession of those complaints, made by responsible people, under conditions which have been approved of by both sides of the House, complaints made by members of this House, and on a par with those which brought about the dismissal of so many men in my constituency in 1896, what did I do? I appointed a commissioner known to be just, honest and fair, and instructed him to make inquiry into all such complaints. It is absolutely untrue to say that I dismissed any of my employees. All those complaints without exception are before that commissioner, and until I get his report, subsequently to an inquiry conducted with care and in accordance with the rules of justice, no one has a right to say that he is dismissed.

Is this hon. committee desirous that I should quote from the Hansard of 1896, the answers of the ministers themselves who, on being asked, why they had dismissed a public officer answered: We have dismissed him because that was recommended to us. 'By whom?' was the further question. We shall not say. We refuse to give the names of the informers. Is my hon. friend anxious that I should give names?

Mr. LEMIEUX. (Translation.) The hon. minister is putting a question, and I shall answer it. On several occasions the Minister of Public Works has stated in this House that the Laurier government had dismissed in the county of Jacques-Cartier hundreds of men in 1896. I shall not ask for twenty-five names; I shall be content with twelve. As for me, I do say that the hon. minister has dismissed scores of them since he holds a portfolio. He instituted his commission of inquiry only after having mercilessly dismissed large numbers of my compatriots.

Mr. MONK. (Translation.) That is incorrect. When that long list was handed to me, I notified a certain number of men of what was taking place and I told them: There will have to be held an inquest on every one of you without exception.

It only seems proper that in launching charges such as those, an effort should be made to clothe them with a semblance of truth. I stated that not one of those men would be dismissed without an inquiry.

My hon. friend from Rouville is not always here, and I do not complain about it

Mr. LEMIEUX. (Translation.) Neither is the minister.

Mr. MONK. (Translation.) However, that puts me under the necessity of repeating what I already stated here, that is to say, that not a single man has been dismissed without notification, without inquiry, and without a specific charge having been laid against him and put in the hands of the minister.

On the other hand, as I have already said, in my constituency, public officers have been dismissed without inquiry and without any specific charge having been forwarded to the minister.

Mr. LEMIEUX. (Translation.) Quote a single name.

Mr. MONK. (Translation.) I shall give several.

Mr. LEMIEUX. (Translation.) Name them.

Mr. MONK (Translation.) Here they are. On May 17, 1897, I put the following question:

Mr. GILLIES (for Mr. Monk) asked:

1. How long has Joseph Sauvé, lately bridgemaster No. 5 bridge, Côte St. Paul, Lachine canal, been in the employment of the government?

2. Why was he dismissed on the 30th April last?

3. Was there any complaint against him, and by whom?

4. Who was named bridgemaster in his place, and by whom was the new nominee recommended?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS:

Joseph Sauvé, lately bridgemaster, bridge No. 5, Côte St. Paul, Lachine canal, has been employed during the season of navigation since the 1st May, 1878. His services were dispensed with at the request and on the representation of the members of parliament for Montreal districts; the department did not receive any written complaint against Sauvé. Joseph Archebierre was appointed bridgemaster in place of Joseph Sauvé.

That Mr. Sauvé had been appointed by the Hon. Rodolphe Laflamme, Minister of Justice in the Mackenzie adminstration. That book is full of similar dismissals Conditions in the civil service are improving, but there still remains much to be done before it is in such a state as I would like to see it in.

There is also the case of Joseph Deschamps, who must have been appointed under the Mackenzie regime. On the same date, I put the following question:

Mr. Gillies (for Mr. Monk) asked:

1. How long has Joseph Deschamps, lately lockmaster No. 4 lock, Côte St. Paul, Lachine canal, been in the employment of the government?

2. Why was he dismissed on the 30th April last?

3. Was there any complaint against him, and by whom?

4. Has he been replaced by one Adolphe Fichaud, of St. Henri, brother-in-law of the member for Hochelaga?

5. Who recommended the new lockmaster for nomination?

The MINISTER OF RAILWAYS AND CANALS:

Joseph Deschamps, lately lockmaster at lock No. 4, Côte St. Paul, Lachine canal, has been employed during season of navigation since the 1st June, 1873. His services were dispensed with at the request and on the representation of the members of parliament for Montreal districts, no written complaint was lodged in the department. Adolphe Fichaud was appointed lockmaster in his place.

I do not intend taking up the time of the committee reading long lists of dismissals made in 1896, without any written complaint having been filed. And whenever the minister was asked why he had dismissed so and so, on the verbal complaint of whom, Mr. Blair over and over again would answer: I do not consider myself under any obligation to tell you. Is my hon. friend anxious that I should state his very words? I have them written down here, and shall quote them: Mr. Blair would say: I do not consider that the government is bound to give such information; that is going a little too far.

I repeat it, those dismissals effected from one end to the other of the Lachine canal were made without the names of the informers being known, without a single written complaint having been brought down. We were told: It has been done at the request of the members for the districts, indeed, some of them were discharged without the minister's knowledge.

There is also the case of Daoust of St. Anne, who was discharged after a mock inquiry had been held, and barring that case, no inquiries were held.

On finding that there were numerous complaints in Ottawa, complaints which appeared to me well grounded—to my mind the outside service in Ottawa has been in a large measure prostituted, if I may use such an expression, for political ends—I did not take action on these complaints, but I appointed a commissioner, and until his report has been received, there is absolutely nothing decided as to these men.

As to the reproach which has been hurled at me of having had recourse to measures too rigorous against the French Canadians, whether wisely or not, I shall abstain from answering the charge. All my life I have been devoted, without undue sycophancy, to that section of the Canadian people. I loved them, I tried to serve them without making a boast of it, and I would feel ashamed of myself were I to-day to show more than the requsite sternness against a section of the people which is dear to me. I never intended to do so, and never was guilty of such a fault.

Mr. LEMIEUX. (Translation.) The hon. Minister of Public Works has himself brought this on himself by insinuating that the former administration had shown themselves rather hostile to the French Canadians of Ontario. He exhibited an intense love for our compatriots, when I recalled to him his dealings with the men in his department since taking the portfolio of Public Works. If his love for his compatriots is to be gauged by the number of dismissals effected by him, it must be admitted that it is a strange love indeed. If I compare his policy with that followed by his colleague, I cannot help saying that he has shown excessive harshness in his dealings with subordinate employees.

Now, as regards dismissals which are alleged to have been made in 1896, in the county of Jacques-Cartier, it is absolutely false to say that they were made by the score or by the half hundred. I challenge the hon. minister to name even ten people who have been dismissed without inquiry in the county of Jacques-Cartier.

He referred the other night to the case of Sauvé. He has just named two others, that makes three altogether, and I challenge him to name any others. It is all very well to talk with an eye to outsiders, but the hon. gentleman should stick to the facts; and let him name if he can fifty or one hundred French Canadians alleged to have been discharged in Jacques-Cartier in 1896. The hon. minister has overdone it in order to justify the odious dismissals which he effected just before Christmas and New Years, throwing out of employment hundreds of men. If my hon. friend had had more generosity he would, to say the least, have waited till the holidays were over before discharging these men in Ottawa and elsewhere.

What is going on just now? Three Montreal harbour commisioners are viciously taken to task because they are Liberals. They have made the port of Montreal what it is to-day and they have given satisfaction to every interest concerned. Indeed, the work they accomplished at Montreal has been eulogized even by foreigners. Delegations have represented to the government that these men should be maintained in office. But the hon. gentleman and his friends in the province of Quebec are just now giving a strange exhibition of themselves. They insist that these three commissioners should be dismissed, although their only fault is that they were appointed by the previous administration and are Liberals in politics. I must protest with all my might against such scandalous conduct. I state it to the shame of the minister, such things are done in the province of Quebec only. Our fellow countrymen are discharged mercilessly; nothing of the kind is seen in any of the eight other English-speaking provinces of the Dominion.

The DEPUTY SPEAKER (Mr. Blondin). (Translation.) I beg to draw the hon. gentleman's attention to the fact that we are drifting from the subject-matter of this debate, the estimates of the Department of Public Works and that this in out of order.

Mr. LEMIEUX. (Translation.) Who has brought about this discussion, Mr. Chairman? It is the hon. Minister of Publice Works, who in answer to the member for Rimouski, insinuated that the former administration did not protect the French Canadians. I am anxious to defeat that attempt at making capital out of my countrymen's feelings in the province of Quebec, and I shall not let my hon. friend repeat such insinuations as long as I have a seat in this House. Let us return to the question.

The harbour commissioners of Montreal are three in number, Messrs. Stephen, Ballantyne, Geoffrion. These thoroughly qualified men, have through their efforts, their intelligence, made the port of Montreal what it is to-day. For some years past, they have given their whole energy to the carrying out of gigantic works. Their ability, their honesty has never been questioned. All the public corporations of Montreal, the board of trade, the shipping federation, the transportation companies, are anxious that the commissioners be maintained in office. Alone a few politicians who have no interest in the business development of the metropolis, demand that the commissioners be set aside. Public bodies, represented by delegates of the highest standing—most of them Conservatives—have interviewed the Prime Minister, the Minister of Marine. They have entreated them not to sacrifice the great interests of the metropolis to the selfish and grudging views of politicians. It is a secret for no one that the Prime Minister and the Minister of Marine will not give in. Indeed, they are going to resist the demands made on them by politicians. The Minister of Public Works, accustomed as he is to beheading my fellow-countrymen, would be quite ready to sacrifice the three commissioners; but he is confronted by the opposition of the great public bodies of the metropolis. I challenge him to dismiss the Montreal harbour commissioners. He expends all his courage in throwing out of employment, without inquiry, the poor labourers in his department.

Mr. MONK. (Translation.) I find it difficult to conceive what has prompted the statements which have just fallen from the lips of my friend, and that without any provocation whatever. It seems as if the hon. member would be glad to draw me into a discussion and ensnare me into dealing with the question of the Montreal harbour commissioners, and that I shall not do. I shall not answer his charges which he has repeated, in spite of my absolute denial that men in my department had been dismissed just before the holidays, a statement which is absolutely false. The hon. member must be aware of it.

Mr. LEMIEUX. (Translation.) I can give names.

Mr. MONK. (Translation.) If any have been dismissed, it is without my knowledge, and I alone have the right to discharge people in my department.

An inquiry is being carried on, and no decision will be taken previous to the report of the commissioners.

Now, the hon. member contends that I stated public employees had been dismissed by hundreds in my county; that is preposterous, there are not such large numbers of them. I stated that dismissals had been effected in 1896 from one end of the Lachine canal to the other without any complaints having been made, without these victims having had a chance to vindicate themselves.

Does my hon. friend insist that I should give him the names of all these discharged employees? Their names are in Hansard, and the facts are common knowledge throughout my constituency.

As regards the Montreal harbour commissioners, is it not known that, in 1896, the Liberal party did away with all the then commisioners, and Liberals have very bad grace to complain to-day because it is proposed to deal with them in the same way as they have dealt with our friends in 1896. Is it not a fact, that in 1896, the Liberal party did away with these commissioners, although there were no complaints laid against them, and simply because they had been appointed by the Conservative government? Is it to be wondered at, under the circumstances, if many are of opinion that a board such as that of the harbour of Montreal, should be made up of men whose views agree with those of the government?

Is that an untenable proposition? For instance, as regards the commissioners which I have in my department. I refer to the board of advisers in connection with the art museum, whom I found in office when I arrived here, a board made up of two English-speaking gentlemen and of the hon. Senator Boyer, an old-time opponent, could not the gentlemen making up that board be changed?

Mr. LEMIEUX. (Translation.) What remuneration do they get?

Mr. MONK. (Translation.) Should we not be left free to appoint others in their stead?

Mr. LEMIEUX. (Translation.) What is their remuneration?

Mr. MONK. (Translation.) Whatever the remuneration may be, that does not alter the question. The Montreal harbour commissioners are not employees in the sense referred to this evening. That they may be changed is an opinion which may very well be defended. Their position is not at all comparable with that of employees earning their livelihood in the service of the government. Let my hon. friend from Rouville cool down, there is no justification for that sympathy which even extends to the Montreal harbour commissioners. He and his friends had no pity whatever in 1896 for the then commissioners.

As regards the question which he has brought forward, it is under consideration, and he may rest assured that the government will not show that hastiness which was a feature of his friends' conduct in 1896.

Mr. LEMIEUX. (Translation.) Before closing this debate, I may state to my hon. friend that the comparison he makes between the Fine Arts commission and the Montreal harbour commission is misleading. My hon. friend would not dare to dismiss the Fine Arts commissioners.

Mr. MONK. (Translation.) I did not speak of dismissing them, but I stated that their position was similar to that of the Montreal harbour commissioners.

Mr. LEMIEUX. (Translation.) There is no similarity whatever between these two commissions. and the hon minister will not make us believe that there is. The Fine Arts commissioners receive no remuneration, not one red cent; they give their services free to the country, and the hon. gentleman would be at a loss to find men as well qualified as the Hon. Mr. Boyer and Sir Edmund Byron Walker.

I challenge the hon. minister to dismiss them; should he do so, he would incur the censure not only of Liberals, but of his own political friends.

As regards the Montreal board of harbour commissioners, the minister says that that question is under consideration, and that these gentlemen should not complain were the government to deal with them as their predecessors were dealt with in 1896 by the former administration.

In 1896, the board was partially renewed; at least one half of the commissioners were maintained in office. Later on a change was effected, an Act was put through establishing a permanent board. That board fulfilled its duty not only towards Montreal, but towards the country as a whole, and once more I challenge the hon. gentleman to relieve them of office. He is not in a position to do so, his influence with the governement is not strong enough. He knows very well that all the public corporations in Montreal would be up in arms against such a proposition. As I stated a moment ago, his whole influence in the cabinet is expended in beheading French-speaking employees, by the hundreds in the Department of Public Works.

Mr. LEMIEUX. I suppose this is near the central station in Toronto?

Mr. KEMP. The old examining warehouse will have to be partially done away with on account of railway improvements in that locality. It is altogether too small, and I believe it is the intention of the government to erect a new examining warehouse near that, if they can get land at a proper price.

Mr. BUREAU. Is it the intention to dispose of the old warehouse?

Mr. KEMP. Part of it, I think, for railway purposes.

Mr. MONK. The examining warehouse at Toronto is absolutely inadequate. I think it will have to be disposed of and a new site bought, and a new building erected.

Mr. NESBITT. I would ask the minister to let this item stand until the hon. member for St. John (Mr. Pugsley) is here. I know he would like to speak on these Toronto items.

Mr. MONK. We can discuss this one on any other item. I would like to get through these public buildings, so that I can bring the necessary officers with me to-morrow, and the necessary notes for others.

Mr. LEMIEUX. I suppose if we leave one item, the hon. member for St. John will have the privilege upon that item of speaking of the Toronto buildings generally?

Mr. MONK. Certainly.

Mr. REID (Grenville). I would like to ask the committee to pass one item, No. 351, on page 92, to provide for the purchase or construction of a new cruiser and for expenses of maintenance. We want a new cruiser down in the gulf. The Customs Department had a steamer there for a great many years, the 'Christine.' That was abandoned, and another one was purchased named the 'Laurentian.'

Mr. SINCLAIR. Where was this steamer built?

Mr. REID (Grenville). The Marine and Fisheries Department prepares the plans and advertises for tenders. The Customs Department have nothing to do with building steamers.

Mr. SINCLAIR. Is it the policy to build these small steamers in Canada or abroad?

Mr. REID (Grenville). As I say, that is a matter belonging to the Marine and Fisheries Department. Last year we chartered the 'Laurentian,' formerly called the 'King Edward.' It is the intention to charter another steamer this year until this one is built.

Mr. OLIVER. The hon. member for Guysborough (Mr. Sinclair) asked what was the policy of the government in regard to the construction of the vessel. This is an interesting matter, and very few members are present. It is a matter of interest in a great part of the country, and many people are interested in the policy of the government regarding the construction of its vessels. There is a large public opinion that holds that it is desirable to encourage such construction in Canada. No doubt many members would like to hear the minister on the point.

Mr. REID (Grenville). I cannot say that it is absolutely urgent to pass the item to-night. So far as I am concerned, my view is that we should build in Canada all the vessels that we require. The Minister of Marine and Fisheries is building two or three vessels, and he has not presented any of his items yet.

In the estimates there are votes for new steamers, one for British Columbia and one for the lighthouse service on the St. Lawrence, so that that question can be answered when these votes come up. If there is any objection however I have no desire to press these items.

Mr. OLIVER. I am not directly interested but there are very few members here at present and unless it is urgent I would ask my hon. friend to allow it to stand until we have had an opportunity of hearing from the Minister of Marine and Fisheries as to his policy with regard to the vessels that he wishes to construct.

Mr. REID (Grenville). If the hon. gentleman wishes it to stand I will offer no objection.

Mr. DEPUTY SPEAKER. Item stands.

Some resolutions reported.

Mr. MONK moved the adjournment of the House.

Mr. OLIVER. May I ask for the business of to-morrow?

Mr. MONK. Bills will be taken up and then we will continue supply.

Mr. BUREAU. What department?

Mr. MONK. Public Works.

Motion agreed to, and House adjourned at 12.42 a.m. Friday
