This evening I have four suggestions to offer as to what parliament could do at this session to give a lead to the Canadian people. The first is that we keep Canada standing firmly with the other peoples of the world who want peace, yet who are unafraid and are prepared to beat down any aggression. This brings to mind those young Canadians serving in our forces, both active and reserve. I believe we have a splendid group of young men serving Canada. They must be enabled to maintain efficiency and, perhaps even more important, must be made to feel that their efforts are appreciated by their fellow Canadians.

Hon. members will recall that within the last few days some of those young men have been taking part in a military exercise known as Exercise Sweetbriar. It is significant that the area in which that operation was held was the Yukon and Alaska. We must be realistic about the situation today. The shortest and easiest route to the arsenals of democracy and in fact to the heart of democracy is across Bering strait to Alaska, into northern Canada and so on to the United States. The Soviet now has standing with her the communist regime in China, a nation of over four hundred million people. I hope there will be no trouble, but Russia plus China adds up to Canada being probably in greater danger under present conditions than any other democratic nation in the world.

If serious trouble should come in the Pacific area it will probably be in the north rather than the south Pacific. So I warn this parliament that it behooves Canada to take the lead in bringing the nations of the Pacific together, rather than assuming the role of an observer in Pacific affairs. I was disturbed by the attitude displayed by the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Pearson) in his address the other day. Mind you, it was gratifying to have him emphasize the importance of the Pacific area; but in reporting on the conference so recently held at Colombo he seemed to take the attitude that Canada was just sitting in. For example, he used this expression: "Canada was a dollar country at a sterling party." I know that in using those words he was referring particularly to currency problems, but that indicated his attitude. Again he said, "Canada was a persistent dollar gadfly." Then with respect to the commonwealth consultative committee, the formation of which was recommended by that conference, he made no statement as to whether or not Canada would join; in fact he said it would be of meagre value unless the United States also joined. I was reminded of the attitude taken a year or two ago when we had to have our ambassador at Washington assure the state department there that at a conference to be held at Canberra nothing would be decided. In effect the minister damned with faint praise this suggestion of a commonwealth consultative committee; and that attitude is not in line with the menace to Canada in the Pacific area. I hope that when the minister speaks tomorrow he will tell us that Canada has decided to join that committee, and I further hope he will say that the Canadian government has decided to advocate a Pacific pact just as there is a North Atlantic pact.

I believe we would have support for such a proposal. I have here a dispatch from Bangkok, Thailand, dated February 15 and headed, "U.S. diplomats want Pacific alliance." There is a great demand for a Pacific pact; and under present conditions Canada's position is so dangerous that she should take the lead in advocating such a pact. At the present time we are in the ridiculous position that of all the nations of the commonwealth only Great Britain and Canada are in the North Atlantic pact. Australia, New Zealand and South Africa cannot join.

My second suggestion as to what this parliament could do by way of giving a lead to the Canadian people at this time is that we could enact legislation at this session to raise the standard of living of those Canadians who are in want. That is extremely important when we are faced with the menace of communism. Our failure to take steps of this kind is our Achilles heel when we are attacked by Canadian communists within our own country.

Let me give you some examples of what we could do. First of all, today no one accepts any responsibility for the employable unemployed, unless they are qualified for unemployment insurance. There are many thousands who cannot qualify for that insurance. The belief is held across the country that the care of these men and women is the responsibility of the dominion government. This government should say what responsibility it will accept for those people who are having such a difficult time. I am afraid the government is evading that question. I hope a statement will be made during this session as to just what responsibility Ottawa will accept.

Another example would be the raising of the ceiling on permissible income under the Old Age Pensions Act, to correspond with the increase in pension which was provided about a year ago. Because that was not done, at least a quarter of the old age pensioners in Canada did not get the full benefit of that increase. I believe the figure is approximately 63,000 senior citizens of Canada. This means that we penalized thrift, because those people who did not get the full benefit of the increase were the people who had some small income.

I suggest further that we should, at this session, establish a system of contributory pensions and abolish the means test. The vast majority of Canadians are willing to pay towards a contributory pension scheme. They have no other way of saving enough to retire when they reach an advanced age. I venture to say that few of the members of this house have any other way of providing for their old age, taxation and the cost of living being so high today. By and large, the Canadian people are in that position. We should no longer delay in making it possible for them to protect themselves under a contributory pension scheme.

Then, too, I believe there are few Canadians who do not wish to have the means test abolished. They resent the humiliation of that means test. It is un-Canadian, and it should go. It is going to go; it is just a matter of time before it is a thing of the past. It is delaying adequate industrial pensions in Canada. I believe most of the members of this house, when they stood for election, promised the electors that they would abolish the means test. Yet, in the second session of this parliament, it is quite obvious there is no intention of removing that means test. All we are to get is a committee, which is to review the whole question and then report at the end of the session. You know, Mr. Speaker, I know, and everybody in the house knows, that is merely a delaying action.

Another group who are in want, and who should be helped at this session, are the older veterans of Canada, the men who served this nation on the battlefields of France and Belgium. In the speech from the throne, there is a statement that the war veterans' allowance is to be made payable to those veterans who served in the allied forces. The government is to be congratulated on taking that step, even though it only comes after some of us have been advocating it for 15 years. I hope the legislation will be wide enough to cover the men who served in the South African war, as well as those who served in the first great war.

Other amendments to the War Veterans Allowance Act are urgently required. I believe the war veterans' allowance should be increased to equal the old age pension. In British Columbia the old age pensioner draws $50 per month and his wife draws $50 per month, making a total of $100. In addition, both man and wife get free hospitalization, dental care and other benefits. On the other hand, the recipient of the war veterans' allowance, the man who served this country in the trenches, receives only about $40 if single, and about $70 if married. He may get hospitalization, but his wife does not. As a matter of fact, under the provincial hospitalization scheme, the veteran is compelled to pay a certain amount to the provincial government to cover his wife's hospitalization. It can only come out of his small veterans' allowance. I know of one case where a man who served in the German forces during the first great war came out here and settled, and he and his wife are now drawing an old age pension of $100. The Canadian veteran who served against him can only get approximately $70. That is a ridiculous situation, and it should be remedied at this session.

Furthermore, the time has come to decentralize the administration of the War Veterans Allowance Act. First-class administrators are now available in the districts, as well as adequate staffs. They are in close contact with the veteran, and able to deal with his case without delay. The war veterans' allowance board in Ottawa are out of touch with the veteran. Mind you, this board have done a great deal of good work, but they simply cannot appreciate the position of the veteran in the same way as the men who are out there living with him. There are long delays. I believe it sometimes takes as long to get a decision from the board in Ottawa as it took to investigate the case out in the province. Furthermore, if there are overpayments, it means delay in getting the matter adjusted. The first thing the veteran knows, he receives a letter telling him he has to pay back a large sum of money. I believe if these applications for war veterans' allowance were dealt with locally, with an appeal to the board in Ottawa, there would be far more satisfaction and far more fairness, as well as quicker action in dealing with these cases. Remember, when a man needs the war veterans' allowance, he needs it in a hurry. He is not in a position to wait for a long time for a decision from Ottawa.

I intended to say something about the men in the merchant navy, but the members of the house know my position on that question quite well. They should be getting far better treatment than they have received. I hope something will be done for them at this session.

Also, I endorse the appeals made by so many members of the house in this debate, that a special committee on veterans affairs should be set up at this session, the second session of this parliament; and there has been no such committee yet. There are many new members in this parliament. They should be given the opportunity of becoming acquainted with veterans legislation; and the rest of us should be given the benefit of their views as to what should be done to improve that legislation.

My third suggestion has to do with improving the efficiency of the government, and I am looking right at the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Fournier). In these days of threats of war and mounting unemployment, with the cost of living at an all-time high and with taxation still at wartime levels, the Canadian people become exasperated when they learn that the government is not observing businesslike precautions in awarding contracts, and is awarding those contracts to favourites. This has happened recently in Vancouver with regard to at least three public buildings, namely the Alvin building, the Begg building and the Catelli building.

There was some discussion about two of those buildings on the last day of the last session. If hon. members wish to refer to that discussion they will find it at page 3112 of Hansard of 1949. After the session ended the Minister of Public Works was good enough to send me the documents which I had requested when asking him questions on that last day.

Let us take the first one, the Alvin building. On April 6, 1948, an order in council was passed authorizing the Minister of Public Works to enter into a lease of a building to be constructed. I have here the order in council. It set out that there was a shortage of office accommodation in Vancouver and that was true, but there were buildings which could have been purchased, I believe. The order in council reads:

> An offer has been obtained, however, from the Alvin Estates Limited to construct a fireproof building on their property—

I direct attention to those words "on their property".

> —and to rent it to the crown on the following terms and conditions.

It was to be a four-storey and basement fireproof building and the rental was to be $96,000 a year, which is quite a substantial rental. The period of the lease was to be ten years from the date of occupation, and the government was to get an option to purchase the property at $554,000 at any time within the first twelve months of occupation.

You will note, Mr. Speaker, that the order in council sets out that the lease is to be from Alvin Estates Limited. No tenders at all were called. There was no competition. The company was not in existence at the time, I believe; it was incorporated a week or so later, on April 14, 1948. At all material times there have been three shareholders, and the same persons have been directors. There may have been the odd qualifying director, but substantially there were three shareholders and three directors. Two of them, Messrs. Allan and Viner, of the contracting firm of Allan and Viner Construction Company Limited, and the third, Mr. Braidwood, solicitor, all three close to the government. They apparently found out that there was a chance to do business with the government. The Minister of Public Works, in his answers to be found at page 3112 of last year's Hansard, told me that in March of 1948—and that is the month before the order in council—Alvin Estates Limited offered to construct a four-storey building. As I say, the company apparently was not incorporated until after the order in council was passed. It did not acquire the property until June 11, 1948, when such property was obtained from those same three men for $45,000. One-third of the property had been held for a couple of years by one of the men and the other two-thirds had been acquired by the others in May, 1948, for $7,000 each. That is, those two men apparently paid $14,000.

Then on July 20, 1948, another order in council was passed. This means that it is not a matter for the Minister of Public Works only. Each step was taken by the cabinet. I have here the order in council for July 20, 1948. It sets out that there shall be three more storeys put on the building and the figures go up to a yearly rental of $146,940, with a purchase price of $862,155. The order in council also sets out that there had been a parliamentary vote, number 828, for $800,000 for purchase, alterations and extensions from Alvin Estates Limited. Here again no tenders were called and there was no competition. I think it is reasonable to assume that these three men were able to finance their construction largely on the basis of the fact that they had a government lease. Debentures were issued. Although I cannot verify this, I am told that most of those debentures were held by the three men, doubtless being put up with the bank or some other lending institution as security for their financing.

Then we have another order in council of February 8, 1949—and this is the third one—dealing with equipment and fixtures for the building; this is apparently for permanent fixtures. The figures now go up by $200,950, until the annual rental mentioned in this order in council is $183,995; and mind you, this is for a ten-year lease which means getting as rent over $1,800,000 and having the building after that. The total purchase price, if the option is exercised, has now gone up to $1,063,105. The order in council sets out that it is the intention to exercise the option to purchase the building within the time specified, and goes on to say that the rental is so high that the option should be exercised quickly. This was over a year ago. The copy I have shows that the monthly rental is $13,332.90 but I think that is a mistake and the figure should be $15,332.90. The order in council, in its last paragraph, gives authority to go ahead and complete the purchase.

When I questioned the Minister of Public Works in December he said that his department was going to exercise the option and buy the building. Then there was a good deal of publicity in Vancouver, and I understand the option has not yet been exercised. The government is still paying this rent of $15,332.90 a month and apparently only a few days remain within which the government can exercise the option. I am told the date is March 16.

I would point out, Mr. Speaker, that this business was handed out by the government to favourites. No tenders were called. No attempt was made to call tenders. The city assessment of the property is $508,725. The building permit for which application was made was about $451,000 although I believe that was meant to cover only the original arrangement. The contractors did not bother to take out any further building permits. If this deal is carried through the total cost to the country will be $1,063,105, plus whatever rental has been paid, which I think will amount to between $100,000 and $200,000 additional.

In Vancouver this deal is the talk of the town. It is considered fantastic by the man in the street, by responsible construction men, by real estate men and by the workmen who worked on the building. The Vancouver Sun, which is an ardent supporter of this government—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Green: Hon. members are glad enough to get their support at election time, and certainly get it. The Vancouver Sun has taken a fighting lead on this question, demanding that it be cleaned up, and quite rightly so. They have demanded that the building be expropriated.

I say to the minister and to the government that we look to the government, and we look to our own British Columbia minister, the Minister of Fisheries (Mr. Mayhew), to see that this mess is cleaned up, and cleaned up quickly.

The second building, the Begg building, was authorized to be purchased by order in council on April 20, 1948, for $375,000. It was an automobile sales building, and that price was plenty. On January 7, 1949, a contract for extension was let to Allan and Viner Construction Company, Limited. All this took place at the time they were building the Alvin building. The contract was for $850,000. There was no competition; there were no tenders. The contract says they are to get a fee of $25,000. I believe it is the custom on the coast also to have sub-trades allow a certain commission, in some instances as high as 10 per cent. On August 24, 1949, the cabinet increased that figure by $200,000 to $1,050,000. On that increase of $200,000 the firm is allowed an additional 3 per cent. Since then I believe it has gone up another $375,000, so that the repairs and improvements to that building are costing $1,425,000, making with the original purchase price a total of $1,850,000, and I believe the work is not yet completed. It was not completed when I left Vancouver.

The third building is the Catelli building. The contract to change over that building was given to the same firm during the same period without any tenders, without any competition, at a figure of $67,197. That makes a total over $2,500,000, without any tenders, given to the same group. The government has no right to use public funds in this way. The government has no right to allow anyone to have the inside track. Therefore I suggest that at this session parliament could and should act to improve the efficiency of government in Canada.

My fourth suggestion as to what this parliament could do by way of giving a lead to the Canadian people is that it could enact legislation to ensure that Canadians are enabled to carry on with the building of a great nation by providing that our Canadian resources will be used in Canada to the maximum extent possible rather than being sold out to the United States. That is particularly important now with our promising discoveries of oil, natural gas, iron and uranium. These resources can be the pillars upon which we build a great nation. They are essential for greatness in the second half of the twentieth century. Canada needs a national oil and gas policy. We also need a national iron and steel policy both designed to give the Canadian people the utmost benefit from these resources. Without such a policy much of the benefit will go to the people of the United States. By and large they are the people who are putting up the money for these developments and naturally enough if the Canadian government, if the Canadian parliament, does not adopt a national policy the people of the United States will get just as large a proportion of these natural resources as they possibly can.

I believe—and I am glad the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe) got back today, and is here—that the government's policy is to sell as large quantities as possible of these raw natural resources to the United States, namely, oil, gas and iron. We know that the government is sending our oil down to Superior, Wisconsin. With regard to natural gas, last year we had the Minister of Trade and Commerce and the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) battling to force through a bill for a company that was going to pipe natural gas down into the states of Washington and Oregon before it got to British Columbia. With iron, members might just wait and see if the policy will not be the same; get it down to Massachusetts, get it down to Cleveland; sell it in the raw state and get the money for it, and do not worry so much about using it here in Canada to the largest extent possible, to build up this nation. Sending these commodities to the United States in that way means jobs in the United States. It means that your son and mine will probably have to migrate to the United States to get work. In the next fifty years it may mean Canada becoming a satellite of the United States rather than a great nation in her own right.

In respect of these discoveries, these great resources, we are trustees for the Canadians of the future. What this parliament does about them in the next four or five years may well be the deciding factor in Canada's rate of progress in the remainder of this century.

These are my four suggestions, Mr. Speaker. In conclusion may I say I believe that each of these suggestions meets with the hearty approval of the citizens of Vancouver-Quadra, whom I have the honour to represent in this house, regardless of their political allegiance; and I place these suggestions before the government and more particularly before the private members of the house. I have more confidence in them than I have in the members of the cabinet. I place these suggestions before the house for that serious and earnest consideration which I believe is characteristic of the members of this present parliament.

Hon. Alphonse Fournier (Minister of Public Works): Mr. Speaker, may I follow tradition and offer, at this stage of my remarks, sincere congratulations to the mover (Mr. Larson) and the seconder (Mr. Dumas) of the address in reply. Both these new members did credit to themselves and to their constituents in the way they delivered their messages to the house and country. I hope in the years to come they will continue to sit in parliament.

I have not had many occasions to congratulate those who have spoken on the address. I have not spoken in this debate myself since 1942, and I needed one special invitation to decide whether or not I should speak on this occasion. Generally I attend to the work of my department and the work of the house, doing my utmost to please everyone.

In the seven years and five months I have been head of the Department of Public Works, this is the second occasion upon which I have been taken to task for some of the doings in the department. One of those instances—and that goes back to wartime—was when I was kept on my feet for some hours during the passing of my estimates in connection with the blowing up of Ripple Rock.

Mr. Green: And it has not been blown up yet.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): That, too, was from British Columbia. This is the second time criticism has been levelled at my department, and it still comes from British Columbia. In 1947, travelling through British Columbia, I had to go over Ripple Rock. When first I awakened in the morning there was an editorial appearing in one of the papers there stating, "Sleep well, Mr. Fournier." I did sleep well. The rock is still there; a million dollars was spent to try to take that rock away from British Columbia, but without success. I went to the United States to obtain the best engineering views, but we did not succeed.

I am taken to task tonight by the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra (Mr. Green). I could see, as soon as he came in from Vancouver, that something was not the same about him. He was not smiling as much as usual. He did not cross the floor to come and shake hands with me, as an old colleague of fifteen years. I was asking myself: "What is the trouble with him? I should help him to sleep well and to digest well." Well, this afternoon, around 3.30, I received a very courteous note from the hon. member telling me he was going to show us how to run the Department of Public Works.

Mr. Green: No, I said I was going to point out some of your mistakes.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): Well, you could extend that, and try to run it; and if ever you become minister of public works I hope you do as good a job as I am trying to do.

At all events I appreciated the note. It was a mark of courtesy. I crossed over the floor and said to him, "What is the trouble? Are you violent or mild, or are you rabid?" He said, "No, I will be very mild." I said, "I am glad of that, because after dinner I like to be mild myself." So, during the course of this little speech I shall try to be as mild as I usually am.

The hon. member spoke for forty-two minutes. For eighteen minutes of that time he referred to external affairs, employable unemployed, and unemployment. He spoke about old age pensions, veterans affairs and men in the merchant navy. Then we had reached 8.20 o'clock, and it seemed that he then thought he would show us how to have a government department run efficiently. He spent eighteen minutes doing that. He told us there were three things he wanted to prove to the House of Commons, which were not correct. But he got winded and went back to gas. He then spoke about gas lines, the export of power and so on.

Well, I had heard for the last two or three months that one newspaper in the country was speaking about public works activities in one city in Canada. One newspaper out of I do not know how many daily newspapers, and I do not know how many weekly newspapers, undertook to have on its front page sometimes my photograph and sometimes the photograph of the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra, and to state what had transpired on December 10, during the last session of parliament.

I did look into that. Indeed, I was so polite that I invited several members of their staff to come to my office. I took out the files and showed those files to them. Then I said, "Now, young man, if you were sitting here, what would you think of those deals?" I am not going to give you the answer, because it was made off the record; but I was elated to see that the man had judgment.

Then, going back to their home paper, they did print certain things that I had told these people—but the comments they made! They were out of all proportion to what was being discussed in those three deals.

On the last day of the last session, two hours before prorogation, my hon. friend was about the only one who did discuss my estimates. I should think that is quite a good average, when out of 262 members only one of them could criticize the Department of Public Works. I should think that is an average of about 97·5 per cent.

Mr. Green: You kept your estimates until the last day.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): Oh, I am making a mistake; that would be 97·5 per cent of the members of the opposition. And if we take the whole membership of the house it would be about 99·2 per cent. So I was quite satisfied when the session prorogued that I had not been doing too badly. And I am going to tell you why I was not doing badly. After this cross-examination—

Mr. Green: I warned you about it the night before, did I not?

Mr. Fournier (Hull): I beg your pardon?

Mr. Green: I warned you I was going to ask questions.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): Yes, and you told me other things.

Mr. Green: But I—

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): No, he is quite in order—because we are such good friends that after this speech is over we will be congratulating ourselves on how well we have spoken. If he has any questions or interruptions, let him go right ahead.

If hon. members will turn to Hansard for December 10 at page 3112 they will find this:

Mr. Green: I should like to ask the minister about two buildings, one of which is known as the Alvin estates building and the other as the Begg building, both in Vancouver—

And then he spoke about the site for the new post office building in Vancouver. He put a number of questions as to who were Allan and Viner, and what was the cost. We were discussing an item of $1,100,000 which was in the estimates for the special purpose of purchasing the Alvin estates building. It is on this item that this discussion took place.

I shall not read the whole of what was said at the time, but if I could just give a résumé of what struck me at the time, I found out that my hon. friend from Vancouver-Quadra did not like some gentlemen by the names of Allan and Viner living in Vancouver.

Mr. Green: I do not dislike them at all.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): Well, I do not know; the way you spoke, it was far from being favourable to these people. The hon. member said this:

I hope that no more deals of this kind will be put through by the department, and that they will stop handing all these contracts to Allan and Viner.

[Mr. Fournier (Hull).]

Now, if the hon. member did like the people perhaps he would encourage me to give them contracts. But here the hon. member was not doing that. He was trying to tell me that these gentlemen were friendly to the government, and that they were getting work from the Department of Public Works. I will tell you one thing: I had enough trouble to get a place in your fair city, Mr. Member from Vancouver-Quadra; but if I had to start over again I do not know that I would undertake the task. The hon. member mentioned the Vancouver block in his little speech. That building had been built for forty years in 1945. It was quite an old building and I can give the house a description of it if needed. That building was offered to the department for $1,500,000. I had a report on the cost of renovating the building so that government employees would have some comfort and the figure given was nearly $1 million. That would have meant an outlay of $2,500,000 and the building is not as good as the Alvin building.

Mr. Green: But it is right in the centre of the city.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): The hon. member is speaking of the site now, not of the building. I am not going to speak of external affairs or any other matter tonight; I am going to refer only to these three questions. I believe the hon. member has spoken in good faith but I am going to try to prove that I was right in following advice. The Public Works Act states that I must follow the advice of these people and I did. That will be my defence in connection with these three deals.

It was said that this was giving things to friends of the government. I do not think my officials know these people, and I certainly do not know them. I have never met them nor seen them. You cannot expect the Minister of Public Works to go all over the country meeting contractors and deciding whether they will be given work. I am advised, and the law says I should be advised by certain people in the department. In the seven years and five months that I have been there I have been well advised.

Coming now to the three deals. In 1947 the pressure for more space in Vancouver was considerable, particularly from three departments. There were nights that I could not sleep thinking that unemployment insurance might be put out on the street when we were thrown out of the Vancouver hotel. At that time income tax occupied six different buildings, the Winch building, post office building, the Metropolitan building, the Macaulay-Nicolls building, the Begg building, and then for storage purposes, the Winch building, the post office, the Royal Insurance building and the immigration building. That was the income tax set-up in 1947 in Vancouver.

I do not know just how many buildings unemployment insurance occupied. There was no continuity in the government service in the set-up of those departments. How did that come up?

During the war no office building was built in Vancouver. The last building was started in 1933 and completed in 1939. We did get some space at the beginning of the war under rent control and we were so harsh with those people that members of this house who are sitting right here tonight came to ask me to vacate space occupied by the government in order to give young veterans who were coming back from the war a chance to establish themselves in business or the professions. I am looking now at hon. members who came to me to make that request.

In the fall of 1947 I had a report from Mr. Dawson on space that could be rented or bought. During the war and even up to 1947, the policy of the government was not to put up public buildings. We wanted to give the people a chance at the materials and labour available. Some of the largest construction associations in the country sent me resolutions and letters asking that public buildings be not constructed by the federal government because of the great demand for labour and materials. When my estimates were being discussed in the house in 1946 and 1947 I do not know how many members told me that I was right in not having public buildings constructed. During those years my estimates were kept down to about $15 million.

In 1947 the war had been over for two years and the demand for space was still pressing. We could not put up buildings but space had to be found and I, as Minister of Public Works acting as agent for the other departments, had to find space. What did we do? Mr. Dawson is the resident architect in Vancouver. He has lived there nearly all his life except when he was overseas during the war. He was born, bred and educated as an architect in Birmingham, England, and then he spent the rest of his life in Vancouver. The reports I get from Vancouver are that Mr. Dawson is so honest that no one in that province would dare to make any insinuations against him. I have been told so by the highest authorities in the province. He has had the confidence of my department ever since he has been in that district. I have found him to be a good adviser and under the act I am supposed to follow the advice which it is one of his duties to give.

He became so discouraged about the situation that I sent out Mr. Cherry, the head real estate man at headquarters of my department. I also sent out Mr. Boucher, chief of leases in the department. They returned without success after making efforts to meet people who would rent, sell or construct buildings for the use of the government.

We had a conference and decided to send out Mr. A. K. Mills, who is supervising architect in my department and probably one of the outstanding architects in the country. He went out to Vancouver and after being there two or three weeks he returned and reported to my deputy minister, who by the way handled quite a bit of construction during the war years. Mr. Mills reported to the effect that the only firm that could put up a building of some 75,000 to 100,000 square feet was Allan and Viner. Mr. Mills reported that he had discussed the matter with these people but without committing the department. The matter was discussed with the deputy minister and the chief architect and then those people in turn discussed it with me as minister.

If the hon. member had read all of the first order in council he would have found out that all this did not come out of the blue sky. We had worked on this matter for about six months before we could find someone who could give us a guarantee to provide a building that was needed for income tax or unemployment insurance within the year. I slept well that night because I thought that at last we would have space in the good city of Vancouver. I went to cabinet with this submission. Referring to Vancouver and the different offices that income tax occupied, I said that the space was crowded for the then staff of 981 civil servants and that it would be impossible to accommodate the additional staff required to bring up the complement to the authorized figure of 1,280.

Hon. members must remember that I am the agent for these departments. According to the law I am supposed to get them the space they need so that they can carry on their duties and functions. The Minister of National Revenue (Mr. McCann) had the right to call on me to get space. Here is what I said:

> A further difficulty arises owing to the fact that all income tax forms have to be retained for a period of four years and the space presently used for this purpose is both entirely inadequate and unsuitable for personnel to work in. As a result of a survey of the situation in this respect it is considered that the acquisition of a minimum of 50,000 additional square feet of space is necessary in order (1) that the present staff may have sufficient room; (2) that space may be made available for the additional authorized staff and (3) that adequate accommodation be provided for the storage of records and income tax forms.

I do not think better reasons could be found for entering into a deal to furnish space for one of the essential departments of government, the department that collects the money we need for the service of Canada. Here is what these officials said to me:

That as no office buildings for rent have been built since 1939 in Vancouver and, in view of the extremely rapid growth of the city—

I am glad to know it is growing every day, and perhaps that is why buildings are becoming more expensive.

—there is no available office space in the locality.

Am I to take the advice of these men, in whom I have confidence and who have been appointed to advise me?

An offer has been obtained, however, from the Alvin Estates Limited to construct a fireproof building on their property and to rent it to the crown on the following terms and conditions:

Mr. Green: What date was that?

Mr. Fournier (Hull): This was when we had seen nearly everyone who owned office space, or who might be ready to sell or build, or who had any proposition to offer which might provide accommodation quickly for these departments. It was after all this that we presented this submission to council. The rental asked for this space was $96,000. If you just stop there it seems like an exorbitant rental; but what if we had rented the Vancouver block at $3.30 a square foot for 100,000 square feet. Do you realize that would have meant a rental of $335,000 a year? In the case of the Alvin building the rate per square foot was $2.14. Now do you want to hear how much is paid per square foot for other buildings in Vancouver? I shall give you a list of seven, and you will see why I am so proud of this deal. You know all these buildings:

	per sq. ft.
Wolverton building	$2 90
Benthal building	2 75
Stock Exchange building	2 75
Vancouver block	3 30
Marine building	2 75
386 West Hastings street	2 60

Comparing our price of $2.14 with those prices, I think I could get the unanimous approval of all hon. members in this chamber, with the exception of perhaps one or two, for this order in council. Needless to say I got the unanimous consent of cabinet. But I will tell you a secret. The policy of the government was that we would not put up buildings ourselves, because I know how long it takes to put up a federal building. We always had in mind the acquisition of the property, keeping in mind the cubic content of the building, the square foot area, and so on. This was discussed with my officials, and they estimated that if built according to the specifications set out at that time, the building would be worth $554,000. So I told them to get an option to purchase at that price, not to mind the amount of rent so much if we could get the building within the year, but to try and get a price for its purchase.

Well, cabinet did adopt this submission; but time went on. Government never remains static; departments develop and need space. I cannot ask these departments to keep their employees working in fifty square feet of space per person, as I did during the war. Who would expect me to keep these employees working in unsanitary and cramped quarters? As time went on we found that the Vancouver hotel was to be torn down and that unemployment insurance, another important service in our country, would be out on the street. We tried to turn the Vancouver armouries into office space, but I was advised that it would cost too much, and that we would interfere with the activities of the Department of National Defence. So, having two departments on the street, we had to pass a second order in council on July 20, 1948. I am trying to give you the story as it developed; and while I am speaking I am thinking of those old and efficient civil servants in my department who prepared this case and advised me on it, and whose suggestions I adopted. The second order in council stated:

That the order in council (P.C. 1382) of April 6 granted authority to lease from the Alvin—

That is just repeating the order in council.

That order in council (P.C. 1466) of April 20, 1948, granted authority to purchase, for the accommodation of the Department of Labour, unemployment insurance commission, the Begg building property situated on Georgia street, at the corner of Thurlow street and extending to Alberni street, with a frontage of 132 feet on each street, from Begg Motors Limited, for the sum of $375,000 and to perform the necessary alterations and improvements to the building at an estimated cost of $354,500;

That, after consultation with the departments of national revenue and labour, it was decided that the needs of those two departments could best be met by accommodating the national revenue department in the Begg building and the labour department in the Alvin Estates building;

That the building proposed to be erected by the Alvin Estates Limited on Robson street was a four-storey and basement building but to fully accommodate the Department of Labour it was found necessary, in view of their increased activities, to provide a six-storey building for which the rental would be $135,504 per annum and the purchase price increased to $781,641;

That the chief architect of the Department of Public Works has now advised—

Listen to this, because I quote the statute to show that this was done according to the legislation under which I am operating.

—that the city of Vancouver has decided to widen Robson street at that point taking seven feet off each side of the street. This will have the effect of reducing the floor area in the proposed six-storey building and, on a recommendation from the district resident architect of the Department of Public Works and from the regional director of the unemployment insurance commission at Vancouver, the chief architect has reported it is necessary that a seventh storey be added at an increased cost of $80,514 and at an increased rental of $11,436.

In the 1948 estimates there was an item of $800,000 for the purchase of that building. That money was not expended because the building had not been completed and we could not take possession. Now, however, you see what is happening. Unemployment insurance is going over to the Alvin building, where all their activities will be centralized with the exception of casual labour, while income tax is going over to the Begg building. I have been told repeatedly that in all Canada the income tax branch has no better space than in the Begg building in Vancouver.

Mr. Green: They should have, for the amount that has been paid.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): Just wait until I discuss that, because you do not know what you are talking about. You have not studied this as I have. Be patient, and I will tell you.

Mr. Smith (Calgary West): Address the Chair.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): If I should say a hasty word, Mr. Speaker, I withdraw it before it is said. So we have one of those two departments in the Begg building; and if the minister speaks I know he will tell you that it is the best space he has anywhere in the country. When the hon. member cross-examined me on December 10, one of my colleagues stood up in revolt, and said that the unemployment insurance commission had finer offices in Vancouver than in any other city in Canada.

Mr. Green: The best price was paid for it, too.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): It has not been paid for as yet, so your remarks are premature. When we decided to have these two departments well housed so that the public would receive the service they deserved and the civil servants would be in a comfortable place to do their work properly and efficiently, I thought that in helping the efficiency of the other departments it was a sign of efficiency in my department.

On January 31, 1949, to complete that Alvin building—mind you, this work could have been done by the officials of this department, but not in the time that that firm could do it. The unemployment insurance commission subsequently advised of certain additional items of work which would be required to complete the building, and the lessors were directed to have this work incorporated, on the understanding that the annual rental and the option price would be adjusted accordingly. It was at that time that we installed three vaults, phone conduits and outlet plug-ins. We installed fluorescent fixtures and lamps to give 35 foot-candle at desk level throughout; installed a janitor cupboard and sink on the ground floor; installed engineer's shower, toilet and basin in the basement; interior partitions, railings, counters, sectional panel and glass partitions to the ceiling, sink and cupboards in lunch room and soundproof walls. All these were shown on the plans that were given to us by the unemployment insurance commission. These expenditures are detailed in this order in council. The estimates were prepared by these two bodies, the unemployment insurance commission and the officials of my department. If this amount that was added on January 31, 1949, is considered, it will be found that the three option prices we have amount to $1,063,105.

Now, that estimate was given to me by the resident architect and was confirmed not long ago by the estimators for one of the outstanding contracting firms in this country. We did not look at the building and decide it was worth so much. We asked a large firm in Canada to give us their opinion, having all the specifications, all the material and labour that went into that building; we submitted those facts to two of the outstanding estimators who work for one of the largest companies in Canada, the E. G. M. Cape and Company.

Mr. Green: When was that?

Mr. Fournier (Hull): After all this noise about giving away the public's money, and getting nothing in return. I was astounded at that charge. We have not purchased the building yet, so everything that has appeared in those articles in the Sun is without foundation in fact. We have not completed the deal.

Mr. Green: Is the department going to buy it?

Mr. Fournier (Hull): If the hon. member will be a little patient, he will find that my story is quite interesting. When I reach the conclusion, I think the hon. member will agree with me. An attempt was made to arrive at an evaluation, and accordingly a regular take-off was made such as would be done in an architect's or engineer's office, wherein the exact quantity of each component part entering into the construction of the building was determined, and the labour needed to execute the work; after which these were priced by two contractors' estimators loaned by one of the largest contracting companies in Canada. I have named the company, the E. G. M. Cape and Company.

I do not know whether they are friendly to us, but I know they are one of the largest companies in Canada.

Mr. Green: In Montreal?

Mr. Fournier (Hull): I do not know. They gave us a valuation over the one that is in the option in this order in council.

I took this matter seriously, and for my personal benefit I explained the facts to the head man of one of the largest valuating firms in Canada. It is located in Toronto and is known as the Bosley Company. I do not know whether you know the company. I met Mr. Bosley once or twice, but I have been told he has been doing work all over the country. I do not know his political faith. He was sent out to Vancouver and looked at the building. He reported it was a good buy.

I believe I have given the member for Vancouver-Quadra most of the information. If only he had read it all in the house, I would have been satisfied. When the hon. member cross-examined me on December 10 he was just fishing, and had in mind that the public works department was trying to favour friends of theirs.

Mr. Green: No, that is not fair.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): If it is not fair, I will withdraw.

Mr. Green: You see, there were no tenders called for any of this work.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): I shall take the hon. member to my office and give him a month's training. When one is buying a property, one does not ask for tenders. If that property is needed, you negotiate and attempt to get it at the best price you can. Tenders are asked whenever you are going to erect a building. It was not the policy of the government to do so. I had to find space. One does not ask for tenders when a property is being purchased. You send someone who knows values to discuss it with the owner, and try to make a good deal. In all these deals, even amongst private people, there is always one party who feels satisfied, while the other believes he has made a mistake or has been victimized. There are no fixed values when putting up a building or even buying property. Three valuators will not give you the same figure.

When the department prepares estimates before calling for tenders on a million dollar job, it receives offers varying from fifty to sixty to a hundred to two hundred thousand dollars from outstanding contracting firms. You cannot have exact figures. I would be satisfied if I paid 3 per cent over and above the estimated value for this building. I would think my advisers had been wise. Now, that was the first deal. Does not the hon. member think we should purchase it? He has listened to me and I have told him I have received the advice of my own officials, and that I have gone outside and got valuations from other firms. This is the price. Does the hon. member not think we should buy it?

Mr. Stewart (Yorkton): Oh, sure.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): Mind you, the hon. member approved of the money to purchase this property on December 10. A vote of $1,100,000 was approved and the money is in the treasury. I can purchase that building. No one tried to stop the vote, and it was voted unanimously.

Mr. Lennard: No, not unanimously.

Mr. Green: Rather a weak excuse.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): We were not so numerous then, and probably those who are saying, "No, no," were not in the house at that time.

Now, let us consider the Begg building. It was occupied by the War Assets Corporation. Since we were having trouble finding space, and the activities of that organization were diminishing, we did ask them if they could find some other location. I thought it was a vanishing department, and we could put a growing department into that building. This building had been erected under the supervision of Mr. Viner. I do not know him, but I am informed he was one of those who helped erect the first Begg building for Mr. Begg.

When it came to repairing, altering, redecorating and adding to this building, I still was told by my advisers that this gentleman knew the building better than anyone else. We had to do this quickly. It often happens that these repair jobs or alteration jobs are not given by calling tenders because even the contractors do not know exactly what is to be done; they can find out the needs as the department gives them when they go on with construction.

We needed to add to that building I do not know how many floors. The plans and specifications for those floors were prepared by an outside architect, Mr. Lort from Vancouver. His estimate at that moment was $850,000 for the proposed work. We offered Viner a fixed fee of $25,000 on an $850,000 job. He accepted. It was understood that if the plans were expanded or modified and the expenditure went over the amount of $850,000, he would be satisfied with a 3 per cent benefit. Our own man and architect was supervisor of the building. That is a building with a cubic content of 1,900,000 feet.

Mr. Green: It is not an office building at all.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): Government buildings generally cost $1.25 per cubic foot. This Begg building cost $1. The Alvin building cost approximately 92 cents per cubic foot. Compared with those figures, the other buildings that were built and are being built right now in Vancouver, I am told cost $1.06 to $1.10 a cubic foot.

I have not yet mentioned one of the most important points. These buildings were delivered to the government within the year; within eleven months. Since I have been in the Department of Public Works or even since I have been in the house I have never seen the Department of Public Works put up a million dollar building in less than three years.

Now I wish to deal with the Catelli building. When we were thrown out of the Vancouver hotel, that is the place in which we took refuge. We got a lease at 67 cents or 68 cents per square foot, for five years. You say that is not all the story. Certainly it is not. The space was not in a condition in which to house the civil servants. We spent $67,000 in making the partitions, alterations, and redecorating and fixing it up for the civil servants. Do you know what that cost the country per square foot? It cost $1.26. That is the lowest price for space that we had in Vancouver.

Mr. Green: Were any tenders called?

Mr. Fournier (Hull): No, not for a repair job. All right; I will change over right now and try to give my hon. friend satisfaction.

Mr. Casselman: It is forty-five minutes now.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): When my hon. friend goes so far as to say that the minister or his officials did not act according to the law, I would ask him to look at section 36 of the Public Works Act. I have tried to show the house that there was urgency in this matter. The hon. member may or may not believe me, but my colleagues know that there was urgency. If the hon. member will look at section 36, he will find that this is what the law says the minister shall do:

> Whenever any works are to be executed under the direction of any department of the government, the minister having charge of such department shall invite tenders by public advertisement for the execution of such works, except in cases
> (a) of pressing emergency in which delay would be injurious to the public interest;

Who is to judge if there is an emergency? I always thought it was the minister. Perhaps I should consult the members of the house before going into every deal, but I did not think that was the spirit of the law.

Mr. Green: May I ask the minister if there were in British Columbia any other no-tender contracts?

Mr. Fournier (Hull): In the country?

Mr. Green: In British Columbia.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): I recall that we did ask for tenders in that province in the last years of the war and nobody would tender.

Mr. Green: That is not what I am asking.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): I could not answer from memory. I would have to consult the files. If the hon. member saw all the works that are being done in that province where we are spending a good many millions of dollars, he would have a better understanding. Tenders are generally called and advertised. But hon. members are not getting into the spirit of the space question. Sometimes I think ignorance is bliss.

Mr. Green: The minister should know.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): If I did not know so much about public works, I would not be trying to make out the case that I am. In all sincerity, having in mind that the hon. gentleman wanted explanations, I felt that in those three cases, I should give them as fully as I could; and I have tried to do it in the best way possible.

If there is anything else on the hon. member's mind, perhaps we could save time in the house by his seeing me. We are friendly, and I will give him all the explanations he wishes.

(Translation):

Mr. Paul E. Gagnon (Chicoutimi): Mr. Speaker, the economic problems and the bright prospects in certain parts of both western and eastern Canada have been skilfully outlined by the mover and seconder of the address in reply to the speech from the throne. I congratulate them on their success and greatly rejoice in the praise that they have received in this house.

In the constituency which I have the great honour of representing here, the main concern of civil and religious authorities at the moment is the struggle against unemployment.

Last September, when I took part in the debate, I warned the government that this evil had appeared in Canada, that the people were looking to the fast approaching winter with anxiety and that it was urgent to take the necessary steps to deal with this calamitous possibility. No suggestion was put forward, however, no steps were taken to check the progress of a trend which is fatal to both the material and moral life of our working classes. People now are troubled and gripped with anxiety. The fear of want has now become a nightmare, and idleness an overwhelming burden.

Days of misfortune are still close at hand and the worker, mindful of the depression of the thirties, has an inner fear of want and of the spectre of misery hovering over himself and his family.

Insecurity is the worker's greatest enemy.

The federal authorities knew this deeply human feeling when they stated in the speech from the throne, in January, 1944:

The post-war objective of our domestic policy is social security and human welfare.

To have ideals and noble principles, or a set of comprehensive plans hidden in a drawer is one thing. Implementing them, passing from the theoretical and blueprint stage to the carrying-out of the plans is another.

But the Hon. C. D. Howe did say, in 1945, when he was Minister of Reconstruction and Supply:

In the interest of members of the three armed forces and of the civilian population, our reconstruction program should ensure a smooth and orderly transition from economic conditions that prevailed during the war to conditions that are consistent with the return of peace, but such as will maintain a high and stable degree of employment and earnings. That is the first item in the government's program. And when I say that we are aiming at a high and stable degree of employment and income, it means nothing short of full employment. The government know that employment and income will be subject to fluctuations of international trade that cannot be fully or immediately overcome; they also know that seasonal fluctuations resulting from our climate and established trade practices can be overcome only by much patience and skill.

It seems that those two qualities have been lacking in our ministers. In view of such clear and perfectly true statements, the policy of our present leaders is surprising, to say the least.

The authorities do not seem to realize that everything has come about as they had foreseen. Yet they make no concrete proposal to alleviate the people's hardships. Whatever improvements or amendments the Unemployment Insurance Act undergoes, this can only bring temporary relief instead of a permanent solution for this chronic evil.

With respect to employment and earnings, government expenditures fall in three categories.

[Mr. Gagnon.]

The minister of reconstruction continued:

First, current expenses for goods and services;

Second, transfer of sums such as pensions, allowances and similar payments;

Third, capital expenditures or public investments for buildings, equipment, roads, airports and other construction or improvement projects of a lasting nature. The last mentioned expenditures can, up to a certain point, be timed to contribute to employment when the need is felt.

The time has come to carry out this program, to help the unemployed, to alleviate the cruel suffering of the low income groups and of the poor.

The government announced in 1945 that it intended to make expenditures likely to provide alternative sources of income in areas affected by the ups and downs of export markets and also to contend with the majority of our economic crises at the very moment they appear rather than after they have spread throughout our whole economic system.

What are we waiting for to translate these fine words into actions? The people of my constituency, who did a wonderful job from the military, industrial and agricultural viewpoints between 1939 and 1945, are particularly affected by the depression that has prevailed for the last six months. For instance, Le Soleil, a Liberal newspaper, dealing with the situation in my constituency, wrote on February 10, 1950:

It is not without reason that the Chicoutimi area is applying for public works to assist families affected by unemployment. There are hundreds of them in the erstwhile prosperous centres of Chicoutimi, Arvida and Jonquière.

On the whole, it can be said that thousands of men, women and children are suffering from hunger. One lives poorly on unemployment insurance, and very miserably when he has to rely on family allowances to buy bread.

It is also the duty of the dominion government to help the working people of the Saguenay district. It can be readily seen that they have had to suffer from conditions that prevailed during the transitional period that followed the war. When the needs of new industries exceeded the number of workers that could be found in that farming region, official agencies urged entire families to move out there. They were not told that work would be of a temporary nature only and that their employment depended on the war which Canada was fighting due to fortuitous circumstances. In several cases, travelling expenses were paid to people who agreed to work in industries essential to the war effort. Under the circumstances, I believe the government should look after those families that are on the verge of starvation due to regional unemployment that could have been foreseen.

They could have been indeed, since, in 1945, the minister of reconstruction stated:

There will be some disorganization and unavoidable delay in a few areas where wartime demands entailed a large concentration of orders and an abnormal increase in population. In these centres more than elsewhere, cancellation of war contracts will require considerable adjustment.

The government, through the department of reconstruction, is working out plans to settle these local difficulties. They will be carried out to the extent deemed necessary and desirable, special attention being given housing projects and public works.

We ask nothing more, Mr. Speaker.

My constituents have long been asking that level crossings be eliminated, especially in the city of Chicoutimi, where they are very dangerous; that the wharves of Grande Baie and Petit Saguenay be repaired; that public buildings and breakwaters be put up since they are more and more urgently required. Such useful and necessary improvements would not only fill serious gaps but, if undertaken immediately, would help to restore economic stability.

The task of those gentlemen who manage the business of this country is to afford every citizen the opportunity to exercise his right to work, since work is the source of national wealth, happiness and prosperity. It behooves them to carry out this urgent obligation. The sight of all these good people, full of health, energy and courage yet condemned to inaction and idleness, is both painful and heartbreaking.

The state, to whose expenses they have contributed by their taxes and their labour, treats them with less kindness than it does foreigners.

Pariahs are still being recruited in Europe and our country is being flooded with seedy aliens at a time when the homeland has nothing to offer to those who have spent themselves on her behalf. This is both outrageous and absurd.

Immigration is one of the causes of the present unemployment. Any argument to the contrary notwithstanding, the 362,451 immigrants who entered Canada from September 1, 1945 to December 31, 1949, have taken jobs that were occupied or should be occupied by Canadians.

If it is true that today about 375,000 people are out of work, it is because of the mass of refugees which has overrun our shores and crowded the labour market. Our workers are now the victims of this overgenerous policy.

As a matter of fact immigration has never, in this country, shown itself to be the wonderful thing that railway and transportation company propaganda claimed.

Every attempt made by Canada to bring in immigrants has ended in failure.

Between 1900 and 1933 we received 4,671,927 immigrants who had come over to settle in Canada. This immigration cost the Canadian taxpayer $80 million. During that time 4,013,523 Canadians emigrated to various parts of the world. Out of 340,000 new arrivals between 1925 and 1927, 282,000 made their way into the United States. If we consider the natural rate of increase we will notice that our population has increased at about the normal rate and that in this connection immigration has played quite a minor role.

Speaking about Canada's experience in this field during the 90-year period from 1851 to 1941, Mr. Herbert Marshall, dominion statistician, stated before the Senate committee in 1946:

Undoubtedly, Canada since 1851 has brought in several million more immigrants than she could absorb. It was a disturbing and costly step but the fact that there was an outlet to the United States prevented the situation from becoming more serious.

He reminded the committee that this outlet is now closed and that therefore:

The present long-term immigration policy of Canada must be as closely related to present needs as possible. If immigrants were admitted as in the past in larger number than we could absorb them, the results would be disastrous.

That statement is clear and definite.

Our workers' minds are filled with gloomy forebodings under the constant threat of lowered standards of living because of the newcomers' willingness to accept any job, at any wages and under any conditions, in order to escape want and starvation.

Immigration must not provide a supply of workers for unscrupulous employers to hire at lower wages in order to increase their profits at the expense of local labour.

Let us remember that during the decade before the first world war, when immigration was flourishing, when vast and choice farm land was available, when huge amounts of capital were flowing into Canada, our capacity of absorption was at its peak.

"The number of immigrants," according to Mr. Marshall, "exceeded this capacity by 37 per cent."

Canada is no longer mainly an agricultural country. As a result of the war, we have taken a definite and permanent rank amongst industrial nations. We cannot get immigrants in equal numbers and of the same quality as in the past.

"In the present stage of our economic development," according to Mr. Stewart Bates, deputy minister of fisheries, "we do not need more farmers and fishermen; at best we need miners, labourers to engage in heavy work, servants, and so forth."

With all due respect to the minister of immigration.

I therefore suggest that unless we provide adequate shelter and housing to the working class, unless we secure those necessary markets for the sale of our farm products, unless our statutes provide sufficiently remunerative employment for hundreds of thousands of seasonally unemployed, unless our future as a nation is secured, we must approach the grave problem of immigration with extreme care.

Our country will not grow if we import human cattle. It will grow if we protect the family, encourage the raising of children and provide every Canadian with a happy home where he may live in peace.

If Canada can support a larger population than at present, there is no reason why, with our rich heritage, we should have poverty, unemployment and misery in our midst.

No immigration as long as there is unemployment! No favours to any foreigners as long as our own people have not been provided with the daily bread they are fully entitled to! No privileges to refugees as long as the sons of the pioneers of our country have not been treated in the fair and equitable manner to which they are entitled! Positions, salaries, comforts, leisure and security should go to Canadians first. That is what we want and expect, because we are entitled to it. That is what thousands of unemployed from the constituency of Chicoutimi expect from the federal government.

Mr. Leon Balcer (Three Rivers): Mr. Speaker, it gives me real pleasure, to congratulate very sincerely the mover (Mr. Larson) and the seconder (Mr. Dumas) of the address in reply to the speech from the throne. As a beginner, my tribute may not have the same value as that of the distinguished speakers who spoke before me. It is nevertheless paid with great sincerity. These two members indeed deserve congratulations, for their task was made the more difficult because of the inadequacy of the speech from the throne and the fact that it offered no solution to our national problems.

[Mr. Gagnon.]

Mr. Cote (Verdun-La Salle): This is not so good.

Mr. Courtemanche: Time will tell.

Mr. Balcer: At the beginning of this session, I am duty bound as member for the county of Three Rivers to deal first of all with the unemployment problem which affects so deeply our country and the St. Maurice district in particular.

As the member for Chicoutimi (Mr. Gagnon) stated so well a few moments ago, the number of unemployed is increasing daily. In spite of the optimism shown by the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe) and the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) the situation has become serious even though the government does not seem to realize it.

The situation must be examined seriously and the government must use all means at its disposal to remove or at least to mitigate the consequences.

My constituency is one of those that really have to suffer from this scourge.

The city of Three Rivers, with a population of fifty thousand, has about five thousand unemployed registered with the local employment office. According to experts there probably are another thousand unemployed who are not registered.

I do not claim that they are all heads of families, but their number is sufficient for the situation to have disastrous effects both on the commercial and the agricultural aspects of our national economy.

To the representations made, and rightly so, by the leader of our party in this connection, the government has answered that unemployment is only local and seasonal. But the whole country is only too well aware of the fact that such a situation prevails from coast to coast and that every province is affected by unemployment, a problem which the government considers as of a purely local nature.

The government seems astonished that our people should be concerned with the fact that there are approximately five hundred thousand jobless in this country.

The Liberal party finds it normal that there should be a certain number of unemployed every winter and that in various sections of the country 5, 10 or 15 per cent of the labour force should be without work. Its attitude was surely different prior to June 27.

The government should do everything humanly possible to remedy that deplorable state of affairs. In our opinion it has been remiss in its duty.

Every party in the house agrees that the scope of the Unemployment Insurance Act should be extended without delay. But such a move will only bring temporary and inadequate relief. What the jobless are requesting at present is the undertaking of public works in order to ensure prosperity in districts where there is unemployment. The large labour organizations of Canada are also pressing for such remedial action.

However the government refuses to undertake those public works, contending that unemployment is of a purely local and temporary character. That, Mr. Speaker, is a further argument in favour of those projects. If unemployment is of a local and temporary character, so are public works by their very nature.

In the city of Three Rivers, where there are at present almost 6,000 unemployed, a large scale program of public works should be carried out in order to ensure the future prosperity of the whole district. Our piers are in poor condition and new sheds are needed if Three Rivers is to remain one of the important seaports of the country.

In Three Rivers also, as in the other cities affected by unemployment, there are slums where large families have to live under conditions which from the health and social standpoint are disgraceful. In the 20th century, such a state of affairs is inexcusable in a country as wealthy as ours.

I honestly believe that there has never been a more auspicious time for the dominion government to sign an agreement with the provincial government and the municipality of Three Rivers in order to eliminate this scourge of society.

Another public project should be undertaken in our district; I refer to the building of a bridge on the St. Lawrence connecting Three Rivers and Ste. Angèle. Between Montreal and Quebec, no bridge crosses this mighty river. A bridge there would serve some ten counties and would help eliminate unemployment in that area for several years to come.

In this connection I should like to quote an editorial from the Three Rivers Le Nouvelliste of Saturday, February 25th last. This editorial, headed "Bridge claimed by St. Maurice valley city councils", reads as follows:

Mayors and aldermen of the city councils of the St. Maurice valley, who are to meet in the city of Shawinigan today, will be asked to vote upon a resolution requesting the federal authorities to expedite the building of a bridge over the St. Lawrence, between Three Rivers and the south shore, as a measure to alleviate unemployment, which is growing more and more serious in this area.

We are convinced that this resolution will be unanimously approved by all members present at this second meeting of the municipal authorities of the St. Maurice valley. In fact, the building of a bridge between the two shores of the river would be an excellent way of providing, for several years, regular employment to thousands of persons, especially common labourers, who always suffer most whenever such seasonal unemployment as we are now experiencing occurs. It would most assuredly be a sane and highly beneficial measure which would furnish remunerative employment to thousands of people.

Besides helping ease the unemployment, the building of a bridge over the St. Lawrence is needed to ensure quick and easy communications between St. Maurice river valley, the south shore of the St. Lawrence and the United States. Nowadays there is more talk than ever before of completing the Three Rivers-Megantic highway and of extending it to the American border in the state of Maine. To achieve all these hoped for results, this project requires the bridging of the St. Lawrence.

There has been much talk of this project in the past and federal authorities are well acquainted with it. A few years ago almost every municipality on both shores of the St. Lawrence forwarded resolutions to the responsible authorities requesting that the building of this bridge be proceeded with. We were then at war and it was said that the proposal might be taken up as a post-war public works project.

The war, Mr. Speaker, has been over for five years, and it is time the government did something about this.

I also wish to take this opportunity to request the building of a post office in the municipality of Yamachiche. Yamachiche is today a rural mail distribution centre for several neighbouring parishes and such a building would be very useful.

In another sphere, a field of action in which federal aid would really be appropriate is the building of waterworks in the rural municipalities in my constituency. This would be an excellent means of helping the rural unemployed, while at the same time ensuring a sanitary running water distribution system and adequate protection against fires in the beautiful rural parishes of our county. These rural parishes are already suffering seriously from the loss of our agricultural markets and such federal aid would help to lighten the burden.

I have mentioned but a few of the public works which should be undertaken by the government to help the unemployed in my constituency. I could list many more if the government were ready to undertake them.

To date, only one solution has been found by the government: let the municipalities concerned find work for their unemployed.

This is a very strange way of meeting problems and dodging responsibilities. For the people know very well that of all the taxes collected in Canada 76 per cent find their way into the federal treasury, whereas the provinces and municipalities must be satisfied with the balance, that is 24 per cent.

What can the municipalities do with scarcely 10 per cent of the taxes? It is physically impossible for them to solve the unemployment problem without any assistance from the government which grabs the lion's share of revenues, while refusing to shoulder its responsibilities.

As far as the government is concerned, the present unemployment situation may be local and temporary. All the more reason why every effort should be made to prevent it from spreading any further. The most logical way would be to implement a public works program designed to promote the future prosperity of the communities most affected.

And now, Mr. Speaker, I would like to deal with another timely matter, although along a different line of thought.

It is unfortunate that the speech from the throne has no provision for the purpose of endowing our country with a truly national and a truly Canadian flag. Such a provision would have met the wish of people from every province.

Under the present government, our country seems to suffer from an inferiority complex. Every country in the world has had a flag of its own for centuries. In the government's opinion, Canada is not yet mature enough to have a token of the spirit of our nation.

We have recently been through a world war that brought glory to our troops, but our soldiers, sailors and airmen never knew under what flag they were fighting. Since the war, our Department of External Affairs has opened more than fifty embassies, legations and general consulates throughout the world. Yet our representatives have no flag to hoist on the masts of their embassy. There are in Canada thousands of public buildings erected with funds supplied by our fellow citizens. We are unable to raise on those buildings a flag that would arouse in the minds of our people a true Canadian spirit.

In all our schools, from the smallest rural school to our large universities, devoted teachers are trying hard to instil in our young people a feeling of national pride.

[Mr. Balcer.]

At present, our department of immigration spares no effort to inform thousands of new Canadians about the country and its glorious history.

The government, however, in spite of the majority which its supporters never fail to mention, hesitates to give every Canadian a symbol that would fill them with justifiable pride.

Such an emblem should be free of all colonial ties which would not be suitable to an independent country like ours.

The Canadian flag should be neither English, French nor Ukrainian, but Canadian. Thus it would strengthen national unity which must rest upon the legitimate pride all citizens feel for their great country. The fact that our ancestors were French, English or Polish does not in any way prevent us from being Canadians above all else.

There is at present, a movement which has gained in popularity all over the country. It is called the ligue du drapeau national. It advocates a truly Canadian emblem, in keeping with heraldic requirements and of such a design which, embodying a neatly contrasting maple leaf, would be acceptable to all true Canadians.

I therefore urge the government to make a gesture of national import and adopt this flag without delay.

Mr. Arthur Masse (Kamouraska): It is not without emotion that I rise to speak, since this is the first time I have the honour to make a speech in this house and since my duties have more often brought me into contact with the great outdoors than with so distinguished an audience. However, trusting that the members of the house will bear with me, I already feel much better and I promise to deliver the message of the electors of the beautiful constituency of Kamouraska, a constituency remarkable for political clashes and for the men who have represented it since confederation. Among others, I am pleased to mention the name of one who was a disciple of Sir Wilfrid Laurier, and the father of the Solicitor General of Canada, the Right Hon. Ernest Lapointe whose name, after a quarter of a century, still holds first place in the affections of the Liberals of my constituency.

Mr. Speaker, after having listened to the debates that have taken place here, I can but congratulate you upon the dignity and impartiality with which you carry out the tasks that devolve upon you. You seem to have an innate sense of what is right, proper and reasonable.

Along with all those who have spoken before me, I wish to congratulate both the mover and seconder of the address in reply to the speech from the throne, the hon. members for Kindersley and Villeneuve (Messrs. Larson and Dumas), the latter being like myself a fellow of the surveyors' guild of the province of Quebec and of the association of forestry engineers of the same province. The member for Villeneuve is the embodiment of the character of the rich northwestern Quebec district, which he desires to see grow and prosper; he knows that part of the country well, having travelled throughout its length and breadth.

I will not dwell at any length upon a description of the constituency of Kamouraska, which is well known to the members of this house. I might however remind them that it is bounded on the north by the St. Lawrence river, on the south by the American border, on the east by the constituency of Temiscouata and on the west by Montmagny-L'Islet.

Therefore, it will be crossed by the trans-Canada highway, a project sponsored by this government to which I must convey my congratulations and my thanks.

Kamouraska is an agricultural and lumbering district. I may add that when speaking about agriculture today, one feels the need of including the wooded areas which are inherent and related to agriculture, because in a non-industrial district such as Kamouraska county, agriculture and lumbering must be held in high honour so that one may sustain the other in times when our national economy needs to be stabilized.

Mr. Speaker, I welcomed the Canada Forestry Act which was passed by the government at the last session. It is time we realized that our forests are not inexhaustible, unless we adopt an adequate forestry program.

There is in my constituency a cultural centre, Ste. Anne de la Pocatiere, which spreads its influence through a classical college, an agricultural school, and fishery school, as well as a federal experimental farm. And the beams of light from these cultural lighthouses illuminate all the surrounding region. I fear at the moment that my poor voice is insufficiently eloquent to show all the good that this cultural centre has done in the Quebec district and elsewhere.

May I urge the government of my country to be generous and increase its grants to those institutions so that they may successfully pursue their agricultural research.

It seems to me, Mr. Speaker, that some wooded lots should be added to the federal experimental farm and subjected to continuous study, in order that the forests, which are adjuncts of the farms in my constituency, may be taken care of by our governments in the same way as agriculture.

Allow me to give some figures describing the provincial county of Kamouraska:

	Acres	Per Cent
Wood lands (denuded or semi-denuded acreage included)	517,332	76·18
Farm lands	149,577	22·03
Productive lands	666,899	98·21
Rivers, lakes, etc.	7,816	1·15
Highways, railways, etc.	4,325	0·64
Unproductive lands	12,141	1·79
Total	670,040	100

The economic situation is such that we must use every method which may help develop our natural resources. I am pleased to congratulate the Liberal party upon the social security measures it advocates, for, I am sure, they act as a bulwark against subversive ideas usually nurtured by hardship.

As the representative of an agricultural district, I am pleased to congratulate the government and in particular the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) for his stand in the matter of price support for bacon, cheese, eggs and certain other farm products. By his attitude, he has brought hope to the population of my constituency.

The family allowances and the old age pensions came as a ray of sunshine in many homes. May I point out, in connection with the old age pensions, that the law should be amended or adjusted so that our people may receive a pension at 65, without the means test. I get many letters from my constituents pointing out that a man may have worked all his life to put aside a certain amount of money while his neighbour, who never toiled and who lived an idle life, is the only one eligible for the pension.

I know that legislation cannot please everyone, but I am confident that the government will give due consideration to that state of affairs.

In my opinion, the government should do everything in its power to launch public works, facilitate money transactions and create lasting works.

I said a moment ago that in a county like Kamouraska, forestry is an adjunct of agriculture; I would even say that it is a very useful complement.

This year weather conditions in our district nearly paralysed the lumber industry.

Although trees were felled under ideal conditions, the delays in hauling have temporarily jeopardized operations. May I make a recommendation. Federal and provincial authorities should co-operate in order to bring wooded lands under a forestry program so that all profitable woodlots may be used economically.

There can be no lumbering operations without the necessary means of transportation: railways, highways and the St. Lawrence river. I must congratulate the government on having built and repaired the wharves that lie along the St. Lawrence river in my constituency and from which a large percentage of the pulpwood cut in the Kamouraska forests is shipped. The St. Lawrence river will ever remain a natural channel along which exports and imports will flow. It would therefore be a mistake to neglect this means of transportation for our products.

(Text):

Mr. Speaker, may I have the honour of offering my most sincere congratulations to the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent), on the dignity with which he conducted his 1949 electoral campaign. All the population of Kamouraska is grateful to him, and as long as the Liberal party goes forward on the route which it has taken, and in which he has directed it, the future of our parishes, of our counties, and of our country, Canada, will be assured.

Mr. R. J. Wood (Norquay): Mr. Speaker, it is a pleasure for me to take part in the debate on the address in reply to the speech from the throne. It is the first time I have accepted the privilege of speaking in this chamber. Before proceeding, I wish to extend my congratulations to the mover (Mr. Larson) and the seconder (Mr. Dumas) of the address which we are debating. It is gratifying to find two prominent young men, such as the member for Kindersley and the member for Villeneuve, taking an active part in federal affairs.

I represent the constituency of Norquay in Manitoba, and wish to speak briefly on matters as they affect my constituents. Originally my constituency was known as Selkirk, but in the redistribution of 1948, the town of Selkirk, which is situated in the extreme south end of the old Selkirk constituency, was put in with some of the suburbs of the city of Winnipeg, and that was called Selkirk. The old Selkirk constituency, the one which I now represent, was named Norquay after the Hon. John Norquay, the first Manitoba-born premier of that province.

The forebears of the people of Norquay originated in about twenty-five countries throughout the world, so I can truly say the people of Norquay are a cosmopolitan people. Some of the early settlers came from England, Scotland, Ireland, France, Iceland, Norway, Sweden, Denmark, Germany, the Ukraine, Poland, the United States and some from central Canada.

As far back as 1870, a number of Icelanders came up from North Dakota and settled on the shores of lake Winnipeg and lake Manitoba. Later other groups came in, some from the Dakotas and some direct from Iceland. Two of the first points of settlement by the early Icelanders were Gimli and Hecla. These people were hardy pioneers. Their principal occupation was fishing, although many of them kept livestock and did considerable farming. The finest grazing land to be found in the country is on the east shore of lake Manitoba. The Icelanders are a sober, industrious, intelligent and progressive people.

It was in this Icelandic settlement on the west coast of lake Winnipeg that Vilhjalmur Stefansson, the Arctic explorer and author, was born on November 3, 1879. When he was four years old, his father moved back to North Dakota where Vilhjalmur attended school and university. In 1905, he joined an Arctic expedition on which he got lost. He lived among the Eskimos for eighteen months learning their language and customs. In 1914 he and two companions travelled 600 miles north of Martin Point, Alaska, living on seals and polar bears. He had been given up as dead, but returned to civilization in 1918 after exploring and mapping 100,000 miles of unknown polar territory, thus adding three large and several small islands to the map in the region north of Melville island. Vilhjalmur never gave up his Canadian citizenship. Many other men and women of distinction came out of this settlement of Icelanders in the interlake area of Manitoba, men and women who became prominent in law, medicine, education, arts, politics and sports.

In 1896, when the government of Sir Wilfrid Laurier opened the doors to immigrants of eastern as well as western Europe, one of the first group of immigrants of Ukrainian descent arrived in Canada, on May 24, 1897. Forty families from this group of new Canadians moved out of Winnipeg, going as far as Stonewall by train and from there to the district north of Teulon. Some moved by ox team, and many travelled on foot. These families all settled in the Teulon district, on land which a great many of us at that time considered unfit for agricultural purposes. However, these settlers cleared small patches of land, and drained the swamps. They erected log houses and barns with thatched roofs. The men folk would work either on the railroads or in the grain fields, and although the first few years of their lives in Canada were gruesome and difficult, each settler had a homestead of 160 acres of land. They were building their homes, and slowly opening up the land for cultivation. Soon these people were erecting new and better houses and barns. Mixed farming was carried on in a majority of cases.

In this settlement today, after fifty years, we find some of the best and most prosperous farmers in the country. These settlers now have modern homes with telephones, and hydroelectricity, large attractive barns of latest design, nicely painted. They all have power machinery, new or almost new automobiles, and good roads leading to all the small urban centres in the community. These people moved to this country from eastern Europe in 1897, with a promise of freedom. I am pleased to say, Mr. Speaker, that they protect, probably more jealously than many of the rest of us, the freedoms that we enjoy in this country. From amongst this settlement of Ukrainian Canadians who came here in 1897, we find men who have reached an important place in the cultural, educational, political and economical fields in Canada. During the two world wars many young men from this settlement flocked to join the army, the navy and air force, along with other young Canadians.

In the constituency of Norquay the people may be classed as primary producers. Their livelihood comes from farming, fishing, fur trapping, lumbering and quarrying. By far the largest percentage are farmers and, in addition to grain, they raise cattle, hogs and poultry. I believe that, although a great deal of wheat is raised, close to 50 per cent of the crops would consist of barley, oats, flax, rye, sweet clover and alfalfa seed. Our supplies of cattle, hogs, lambs, butter, milk, cream, eggs, poultry and vegetables are so abundant in the interlake area that my constituency is sometimes known as the food basket of the city of Winnipeg. Our fresh water fishing industry is one of the largest in Canada, if not the largest, last year the catch of whitefish alone in lake Winnipeg being close to six million pounds. The constituency of Norquay is composed of people whose ancestors originated in twenty-five countries, and in every case each has added something to our citizenship. Persons of no one component or breed can say they alone are Canadians and their neighbours are something else. For this reason we should like to see, without any unnecessary delay, the adoption of a distinctive Canadian flag, one which would be Canadian in every detail.

Being primary producers we depend to a great extent on foreign markets for many of the goods we produce. Markets are probably our No. 1 problem at the present time. We do not want to see enacted any kind of legislation which would disturb or aggravate our foreign markets. It always requires two parties to complete a sale, a purchaser and a seller. In case trade falls off, the fault may rest on the shoulders of either or both. We believe in multilateral trade. We believe that bilateral trading would hamper trade with our free markets. We believe that no country should be given a preference, thus discriminating against other countries. We believe that tariffs of every description should be pared down to the very bone or cancelled. We should like to see an end to what is even worse than tariffs, namely administrative orders which prevent the free movement of our goods to where they may be wanted.

As I understand, tariffs were originally put on in order to encourage and protect our Canadian industries in their infancy. Most of these industries, I might say, are located in what is called central Canada. They have been protected for over fifty years now by tariffs of every conceivable type; and in practically every instance these industries, in pricing their goods, take full advantage of the tariff structure. Although we are obliged to sell our surplus products in foreign markets, and sometimes over the top of foreign import tariffs, we the consumers of the western prairie provinces, like the consumers of the maritime provinces, when we buy, are obliged to pay higher prices on account of the wall of tariff protection, which our Canadian industry enjoys, and, in some cases, on account of administrative orders.

As I said before, markets are probably our No. 1 problem. Hon. members to the left are saying that we have lost and are losing markets. That may be true. Whose fault is it? Hon. members of the C.C.F. socialists predicted a depression four years ago and are still predicting it; and I believe I am right, Mr. Speaker, when I say they appear to be disappointed. I am sure, if the people of this country were called upon to elect a government which would provide or secure markets for our surplus products, they would not consider a socialist government. As for the Conservatives, we must remember that it was a Conservative government that first introduced tariffs into Canada. Each successive Conservative government, when elected, increased the tariff wall all along the line.

Mr. Higgins: What evidence have you of that?

Mr. Wood: In 1930 the Conservative government of R. B. Bennett climaxed all other Conservative governments by increasing the tariff wall to a height never experienced before or since in Canada. Although I would not say that they were responsible for the depression in the hungry thirties, I will say that their tariff policies certainly intensified the depression in this country, as they tended to make other countries reciprocate with tariffs and administrative orders against our surplus goods finding a market.

In 1934, when the United States congress passed the reciprocity treaty, the Bennett government failed to take advantage of it, even although we had surplus goods piled up all over the country. I remember that in 1934 we were selling cattle in the Winnipeg stockyards at a price of from half a cent to two cents a pound. In 1934 in the Winnipeg stockyards you could buy a 1,000-pound cow for $5; and I saw carloads and carloads, which came in from western Canada to the stockyards to be processed, and were sold for that price. Yet at the same time people in western Europe were paying twenty-five cents a pound for horse meat and could not get enough to eat. That is what happens when a government tries to make a country self-sufficient. But in 1936, after the King government took office, Mr. King entered into a reciprocal trade agreement with the late Mr. Roosevelt, then president of the United States. One of the items the United States agreed to take from Canada was 250,000 head of cattle per year, in quarterly quotas of 62,500, at a reduced tariff of from three cents to two cents a pound.

Mr. Warren: You are right.

Mr. Wood: As a result of that agreement, our cattle immediately advanced about four cents a pound while the quotas were being filled. In other words, instead of selling our cattle at from half a cent to two cents a pound, we were getting five and six cents a pound. That was in 1936; and ever since then, year by year, our cattle have been going up in price until today our best steers are bringing twenty-four cents a pound in the Winnipeg stockyards. Our cattle prices never went back since 1936, and we still have a Liberal government.

I want to commend this government and the ministers responsible for our trade agreements during the past fifteen years. I do not believe we are going to have a depression, at any rate while we have a Liberal government. Certainly we may take lower prices for many of our products; but as long as we have a government that will endeavour to find markets for our surplus products, the likelihood of a depression is remote.

Mr. Higgins: They had better get busy now.

Mr. Wood: Our farmers were never better off than they are today.

I should like to commend this government for having established trade missions in many countries throughout the world for the purpose of seeking markets. I should like to commend this government on its attitude towards trade with our neighbours and best customers, the United States. We should go all-out and use every means in our power to increase our trade with the United States. In 1949 the United States took over fifty per cent of all our exports. We must give the United States every consideration in our trade relations, and under no circumstances must we discriminate against her.

I should like to commend this government on the floor price set on eggs. I do not believe in a floor price set too high on any goods, because that would tend to allow stocks to pile up in this country. It is not a floor price which will solve the egg situation; it is a market. The same is true with regard to all our surplus products.

Any government which, through its lack of effort or through restricted measures, fails to provide markets for the surplus primary products of this country would find that a floor would not hold for long. Let us endeavour, by every means possible, to create a multilateral trade system among the nations of the world, to operate with some kind of an international banking system. Let us reduce or wipe away tariffs and trade blocs. There are many countries of the world which would like to buy our surplus products.

I want to commend this government for its efforts toward the construction of a trans-Canada highway. This is a project that will be welcomed by every Canadian. I also want to commend this government on a bill which was introduced and passed about six years ago, known as the Farm Improvement Loans Act. Prior to the passing of this bill, in order to secure money to finance the purchase of farm machinery, trucks, farm buildings, building repairs, drainage and fencing, farmers were obliged to pay excessive interest rates ranging from twelve per cent to fifteen per cent, made up of interest, appreciation and insurance. But now this money costs the farmers only five per cent through the Farm Improvement Loans Act. By this bill the western farmers have saved millions of dollars in interest charges; and although the act has been operating now for nearly six years, I understand the government guarantee has cost the federal treasury nothing.

Early pioneers came to this country knowing it to be a land of freedom. They prided themselves on their individual dignity and freedom. But there are amongst us today men who would destroy that freedom if they had the opportunity to set up a state control of our economy. We must guard well our traditional freedom.

Just forty miles from Winnipeg, on the west shore of lake Winnipeg, we have summer resorts at Sans Souci, Matlock, Whytewold, Ponemah, Winnipeg Beach, Sandy Hook and Gimli, each with its lovely sand beach, well shaded shores with maples, elms and evergreens. I might say at Winnipeg Beach alone during the summer vacation about 40,000 people come from many parts of Canada and the central states to spend their holidays.

(Translation):

Mr. Auguste Maltais (Charlevoix): Mr. Speaker, I am deeply honoured to have the privilege of speaking at this second session of the twenty-first parliament. I am also pleased to follow tradition, which requires that congratulations be extended to the mover (Mr. Larson) of the address in reply to the speech from the throne and also to the member who seconded the motion (Mr. Dumas). I cannot express myself as eloquently as those who have spoken before me, but my congratulations are none the less sincere.

I will take advantage of the opportunity afforded by the debate on the address to point out some of the needs of my constituency and to make some comments on the economic conditions in this country.

There is one part of my constituency whose needs I would like to point out. That part of Montmorency constituency that extends from St. Tite des Caps to Chateau Richer is made up of a predominantly rural population.

One of the better known parishes of the constituency is that of Ste. Anne de Beaupre. This parish has become an international shrine, and as it is visited by more than a million visitors every year, the problem of traffic and parking in that municipality is serious. I have often been requested to intercede with the federal government in order to obtain either a grant or the carrying out of some project which would enable the priests who are in charge of the church to extend their property so as to allow those visitors to park their automobiles. I therefore ask the federal government to give these requests most careful attention.

I would also like to call the government's attention to the unemployment situation which has developed in that part of my constituency.

I wish to talk of a problem which affects the whole of my constituency, that of the Quebec-Murray Bay railroad. That railroad was constructed during Mr. Forget's tenure of office as federal member for the riding. I know of no better way of pointing out the necessity for improvements on that road than to call your attention to the fact that it now takes four hours to travel ninety miles over it.

I shall probably have occasion to deal with this at some more opportune time.

I will not pretend that my comments will offer a solution to all the problems now facing the government. However, even a cursory examination of the economic situation of this country will show that if we are to maintain our national economy we must necessarily export a certain amount of our surplus goods.

Should there be a drop in our exports, it is only natural that it would be followed by a slowing down of business in general. When Great Britain cut down her purchases in Canada, either of newsprint or of agricultural products, it was quite natural that we should have felt some uneasiness at the thought of the problems with which we are now faced.

However, I do not share the opinion propounded by the members of the opposition and by certain newspapers that would have us believe that we are now in the throes of a serious economic depression.

I know that there is unemployment in some parts of the country. There is some in my constituency but I trust that the problem will soon be solved. I have full confidence in our young country; perhaps the fact that I am still young accounts for my optimism. I believe, however, that the situation will right itself and that we will return to a normal if not prosperous state of affairs.

I am also delighted to learn that new markets have been opened in Spain and Latin America. I do not approve the opposition's proposal to sell our export goods for sterling. That would only mean handing over thousands of dollars to another country in order to support a socialist regime that seems to be on its last legs. To attempt this costly experiment might result in our own downfall.

We have only scratched the surface of our national wealth. I feel sure the operation of Labrador's iron mines will prove beneficial not only to the province of Quebec but to the whole of Canada.

I was happy to discover, when the estimates were brought down, that the government had been kind enough to grant the requests I had made.

There is yet another question to which I would like to call the government's attention, that of pensions for incapacitated persons.

Every week I receive several letters from people who are, in a way, handicapped by some illness or accident that makes them unable to earn their living without the help of others. I realize that the government has spent large amounts on social services but I believe that serious consideration should be given to this matter.

I have a great deal of sympathy for people who seem totally incapable of fending for themselves and of providing for their own needs. It is absolutely necessary that the state help these people. The electors I have the honour to represent in this house would deeply appreciate legislation that would help those invalids.

I was also pleased to note that the government has introduced a measure dealing with unemployment insurance. In my constituency there are many woodsmen who have already started receiving benefits and I believe that will do a great deal to help my fellow citizens.

There is also another class of people that the government has not forgotten—I refer to those who are engaged in sailing on the St. Lawrence river. However, a considerable number of those people who work on ships during the summer find themselves out of a job when winter comes along. Since this class of workers has no right to unemployment insurance benefits it seems to me that the Unemployment Insurance Act should be amended. I would like the government to consider the plight of these people and to enable them to benefit also from the provisions of the act.

Mr. Speaker, I could go on, since there are in my constituency some other urgent problems. I hope that another opportunity will be afforded me of setting forth, in this house, the point of view of those whom I have the honour of representing here.

(Text):

On motion of Mr. Knowles the debate was adjourned.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Fournier (Hull) moved the adjournment of the house.

He said: Tomorrow we will go into supply, and call the first item for the Department of External Affairs. I understand we will spend the day on the general discussion of the first item. If that is completed we will ask to revert to the motion under government notices of motion, to refer the external affairs votes to the committee on external affairs. Then, if time is left, we will revert to the debate in reply to the speech from the throne.

I should add that from eight to nine is the hour for private and public bills.

Motion agreed to and the house adjourned at 10.45 p.m.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Friday, March 3, 1950

The house met at three o'clock.

DIVORCE JURISDICTION

EXCHEQUER COURT TO HAVE JURISDICTION IN ACTIONS ORIGINATING IN QUEBEC AND NEWFOUNDLAND

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre) moved for leave to introduce Bill No. 13, to provide for the jurisdiction of the Exchequer Court of Canada in matters of divorce.

Some hon. Members: Explain.

Mr. Knowles: The purpose of this bill is to transfer from parliament to the Exchequer Court of Canada jurisdiction in respect of divorce cases on the part of persons residing in the two provinces in Canada in which there are no divorce courts. The jurisdiction as to alimony, care of children and other matrimonial causes, will remain in the provincial courts of those two provinces. This bill does not change the grounds for divorce. It does not establish divorce courts in Quebec or Newfoundland, nor does it make available to persons residing in those provinces anything not now available to them. It merely transfers the hearing of divorce petitions of persons residing in those two provinces from parliament to the Exchequer Court of Canada.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

PUBLIC LANDS GRANTS ACT

AMENDMENTS WITH RESPECT TO CONVEYANCE, LEASES, DEFENCE LANDS, ETC.

Hon. Robert H. Winters (Minister of Resources and Development) moved the first reading of Bill No. 12 (from the Senate) respecting grants of public lands.

Motion agreed to and bill read the first time.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

EMPLOYEES' RATES OF PAY, ETC.—QUESTION AS TO MEETING OF INTERNAL ECONOMY COMMISSION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): I should like to ask a question, Mr. Speaker, with regard to the internal economy commission. I believe Your Honour is chairman of that commission, but since questions cannot be put to you on the floor of the house, I should like to put my question to the Minister of Public Works. Has the internal economy commission had an opportunity to meet for the purpose of considering rates of pay and other matters pertaining to House of Commons employees? If not, can a meeting be held soon? If a meeting has been held, will an announcement be made as to any decisions reached?

Hon. Alphonse Fournier (Minister of Public Works): As to the first question, the answer is yes. The commission sat on Wednesday afternoon, March 1. The second question is answered by the answer to the first one. The answer to the last question is that I hope so, but I would not want to give a final answer before consulting the other members of the commission.

PIT PROPS

INQUIRY AS TO ARRANGEMENTS FOR OVERSEAS MARKETS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. A. J. Brooks (Royal): I had intended to direct a question to the Minister of Trade and Commerce, arising out of the loss of markets for pit props in Great Britain. The minister is not here, but I left notice of this question with his parliamentary assistant. The question is this. Was the minister able to make any arrangements, during his recent visit to Europe, for the sale of pit props to Great Britain or any other country, and is he in a position to give any information with regard to present or future markets for this woods product?

Mr. G. J. McIlraith (Parliamentary Assistant to the Minister of Trade and Commerce): I think the question is one which should be answered by the minister himself. Unfortunately he is not available in the house today. Will the hon. member be kind enough to allow it to stand over until Monday?

Mr. Brooks: Yes.

AERO TIMBER PRODUCTS

REQUEST FOR INFORMATION AS TO RECORDS OF FORMER CROWN COMPANY

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Solon E. Low (Peace River): I should like to ask the Prime Minister if at some time in the future he will give us the name of the government department that has possession of the records of Aero Timber Products Limited, a former crown company that went out of business in 1945.

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister): I will have the matter looked up and will try to make the information available to the hon. member.

COAL

QUESTION AS TO MEASURES TO RELIEVE SHORTAGE IN ONTARIO

On the orders of the day:

Mr. G. K. Fraser (Peterborough West): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Mines and Resources or to the Minister of Transport. In view of the fact that there is a desperate shortage of coal, briquettes, etc., in Canada, is the government doing anything to facilitate the production and transportation of coal to the cities and towns in Ontario whose people are on ration at the present time?

Mr. Cruickshank: We are trying to get you gas.

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister): I understand that a similar question was asked some days ago, and the Minister of Transport (Mr. Chevrier) answered that the railways were doing their best to give priority to the localities in which, from their surveys, there was the greatest possibility of shortage of coal.

Mr. Fraser: The situation has become much more serious in the last week, as a result of this cold weather.

Mr. St. Laurent: And the coal miners in the United States seem to have become much more stubborn.

SUPPLY

The house in committee of supply, Mr. Dion in the chair.

DEPARTMENT OF EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

64. Departmental administration, $2,378,880.

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Secretary of State for External Affairs): I welcome, Mr. Speaker, the opportunity that this occasion affords of making the customary statement on international affairs generally, in order to initiate a debate on the subject. I welcome the opportunity because it is, as all hon. members will agree, a matter of the highest importance that the people of this country, whose future has been and will be so deeply affected by international developments, should be kept as fully informed as possible as to the general policy now being pursued by their government in this field.

[Mr. Low.]

The best way of keeping our people so informed, apart from discussions such as we are having today and discussions before our committee on external affairs, is of course to make as many facts as possible available to them in as accessible a form as possible. That is being done in a number of ways by the department over which I have the honour to preside. On Tuesday last, for instance, I tabled in the house the annual report of the Department of External Affairs, which gives a brief but I think comprehensive review of the activities of the department in the calendar year 1949, and makes it unnecessary for me to give at this time a detailed review of those activities.

The department also publishes annually a report entitled "Canada and the United Nations." That report for 1949 will be tabled shortly. The volume contains not only a review of the activities of the United Nations and Canadian participation in them, but also includes a broad selection of relevant documents. It will show, if anything is needed to show, Mr. Chairman, how seriously we take our membership in the United Nations. I will also show the contribution we are trying to make to the organization which still remains, and will remain, the foundation of our international policy, and in the long run our best hope for peace.

The department also publishes a monthly bulletin entitled "External Affairs", which is circulated pretty widely, and also texts of treaties and publications on international affairs generally, as well as reference papers and material of that kind. Thus we are trying to give the people of the country, as well as members of this house, as much information on external affairs as we can. But it may be said—in fact it has been said on previous occasions in this house—that this is merely information about what we have done; that we should give more information to the house and to the public about what we are doing, what we propose to do, and why. Up to a point, of course, Mr. Chairman, I agree with that. At the same time, as I have tried to point out before, you cannot effectively carry on delicate diplomatic negotiations by giving a sort of running account of the details of those negotiations as they are going on. We should of course make quite clear in advance the principles which guide us in these discussions. We should give the details of the negotiations when we can, and we should always give the result of these negotiations to the public. I think we do try to do that, Mr. Chairman.

In my review today I will not devote much of my time, indeed possibly any of my time, to commonwealth affairs—not because I do not appreciate their importance, but because I attempted to discuss them in relation to the commonwealth conference at Colombo. Nor do I intend to devote very much of my time to Far Eastern affairs, for the same reason. But I cannot let this occasion pass without answering, or attempting to answer, one or two questions which were asked me last night by the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra (Mr. Green), which deal with the Far East.

In respect to one of these questions I think the hon. member misunderstood what I tried to say last week in the discussion on this subject. Last night in referring to the commonwealth consultative committee, he said that I had made no statement as to whether or not we would join that committee. But I hoped that I had made it clear the other day, Mr. Chairman, that if and when an invitation comes from the Australian government—I think we have not received it yet—to join the meeting in Canberra, which will be devoted to this subject, we shall be very glad indeed to accept it and be represented at the meeting or on the committee if one is set up at that time.

The hon. member was also critical of our lack of leadership in regard to a Pacific pact. I attempted to deal with that matter in my statement last November 16 on the external affairs estimates. I pointed out at that time that the situation in the Pacific in regard to a regional pact of this kind was certainly not the same as the situation in the Atlantic, which had made desirable and necessary, the signing of the North Atlantic pact. My view in that regard was not weakened, but indeed was confirmed by the recent commonwealth meeting at Colombo. If we had taken the lead in regard to this matter—we should not of course hesitate to take leadership when the occasion demands it—we would have found that at least two of the countries most directly concerned with regional security in the Pacific, namely, the United Kingdom and India, would not have been able to support our lead, or at this time support the idea of a Pacific regional pact. Also we knew then, as we know now, that the United States would not be able to participate at this time in negotiations leading up to that kind of pact. One reason for that attitude on the part of the United States and the United Kingdom is no doubt the fact that a conference for this purpose, Mr. Chairman, would certainly have to include China and the U.S.S.R., if they were willing to accept the invitation to participate. It would be somewhat embarrassing to issue an invitation to China at this moment to a meeting of that kind. If the invitation were being issued by the government of the United Kingdom it might be addressed to a different post office than that to which it would be directed if it were to be issued by the government of the United States. And if it were being issued by the government of Canada it might be addressed to a different post office in the future than that to which it would be directed if we issued the invitation now. Therefore there are obviously practical difficulties in the way of calling a Pacific conference to draw up a Pacific regional pact.

When I say that, I do not wish to have it understood that the government is opposed to the idea of a regional pact for the Pacific. If and when the circumstances should make it desirable, we would give that matter the same kind of consideration as we gave to the idea of a North Atlantic pact.

In a review of international affairs, no matter how brief, it is not possible to ignore completely international economic questions, Mr. Chairman. Indeed, in this field it is not easy to know where political questions end and economic ones begin. The importance of sound economic and social policies in our relation to communism and to the communist states is obvious, because our strongest long-run defence against communism is wise and progressive social and economic policies. The same importance attaches to the economic relationships between the free democratic states. Economic co-operation along the right lines can and should bring us closer together. The lack of such co-operation can divide friendly states. There are signs now that, if we are not careful, our unity and ability to work together may be weakened by international economic difficulties.

If, for instance, we let the free world freeze into dollar and sterling areas, between which trade relations and commercial intercourse become difficult, that might ultimately prejudice political relationships. And so we are becoming, all of us, I think, more conscious than ever of these international economic difficulties as we realize that the post-war dollar assistance program may run out before the countries which have been assisted have recovered from the destruction and the dislocations of the war to a point where they can balance by their own efforts their trade with more fortunate countries such as Canada at a satisfactory level. What should be done in these circumstances by all of the countries concerned, and not merely by our own, is probably the most important question in the whole field of international economic affairs today. My hon. friends opposite keep emphasizing that economic and trade difficulties are increasing. They criticize the government because we have not done more to remove them—especially because we have done so little, as they put it, to maintain and develop trade between Canada and the sterling area.

I think, Mr. Chairman, that they minimize the external problems which have caused these difficulties and maximize the alleged deficiencies of the government, its sins of omission and commission in dealing with them. Yet, while inveighing against the government, what remedy do they suggest? At the present time, as I understand it, their principal proposal is a commonwealth economic conference, as a possible cure for trade ills from which we may be suffering.

Well, we have had a good many commonwealth meetings during the last couple of years, and many of them—indeed most of them—have concerned trade. But hon. members opposite say that these meetings have been merely the concern of peregrinating, perambulating representatives, acting on their own by sporadic individual efforts. But what we want now, they go on to say, is a full-dress, large-scale commonwealth economic conference of the 1932 variety, with everybody there, to discuss everything—not merely the minister for external affairs in Ceylon drinking tea, but everybody, in London, selling food—and, according to the hon. member for Kamloops (Mr. Fulton), even discussing questions of immigration and emigration. In short, bigger and better conferences, where decisions will be taken on the spot, possibly by a sort of imperial super-cabinet conference.

Well, I suggest that our way is better, where, in addition to these formal conferences —and they are of course desirable at times— ministers concerned, after full discussion in cabinet, where policy is agreed upon, meet, whenever occasion requires it, their opposite numbers in London or elsewhere to try to solve particular problems by arrangements which are then ratified by the respective governments. And in between such meetings, periodic conferences are held of the standing Anglo-Canadian trade committee, which consists of high officials. Of course there is also contact maintained every day in other ways between commonwealth governments on these questions.

Let us look at the record in this respect. In the last two years Canada has participated in four general international economic conferences, five commonwealth economic and trade meetings, three tripartite trade discussions in which the United Kingdom was involved, as well as four international trade and economic meetings called for various purposes.

I suggest that the remedy is not through conferences, though they can help very greatly at times. Nor is the remedy, I suggest, through the waving of a magic wand over inconvertibility, converting it into convertibility. The remedy, which is easier to prescribe than to take, is through the acceptance, not merely by Canada, but by all free democratic countries, of sound financial and trading policy, by sterling countries avoiding the creation of high-cost restrictive and discriminatory areas, and by dollar countries on the other hand adopting policies which will permit the sterling debtor countries to export more goods and services, thereby making it possible for these countries to balance their international trade by their own efforts and at a high level.

We think that Canadian policies have been designed in the international economic field to that end, and are becoming increasingly effective for that purpose. Our imports, for instance, were 92 per cent of our exports in 1949, an increase of six per cent over 1948. The imports of the United States of America for eleven months of 1949 were 55 per cent of exports, a decrease of six per cent as compared with 1948.

Having mentioned the United States of America I should like now to go on for a few moments to deal briefly with our relations with that country. Those relations of course continue to be friendly, and are conducted with that good will and mutual understanding which makes it possible to find mutually satisfactory solutions to nearly all the problems that appear—and a good many do appear between us.

Sometimes the government is charged with not taking action which would otherwise be desirable because, if we did, it would provoke the United States. Well, Mr. Speaker, it is of course only common sense and good diplomacy not to provoke anyone unnecessarily, especially a good friend and great neighbour. Provocation is not a good basis for diplomacy, either domestic or international. Therefore before we take action which has international repercussions we try to study the effect of that action on our friends, as I hope they do in respect of action which affects us. But I can assure the house that when action has to be taken in a certain way—that is, international action—to advance Canada's best interests, we take it. If we do not put a chip on our shoulders, as some ardent spirits would have us do, to prove how independent we are, this does not mean that our policies are decided by any other nation. They are not—though naturally in this interdependent world they cannot escape being influenced by the policies of others.

In the review of external affairs which I made in the house on November 16 I mentioned certain questions which had arisen in our relationships with the United States, questions which were in need of being solved in that co-operative spirit which characterizes our relations. I am glad to report that progress has been made in the solution of these matters.

Among our problems at that time were certain difficulties which we were experiencing in the implementation of the bilateral air agreement which was signed on June 4, 1949. Chief amongst these difficulties was the inability of the United States authorities to issue a licence to Trans-Canada Air Lines to operate the Montreal-New York route, one of the new routes granted to Canada in this bilateral agreement. The United States authorities were enjoined from granting this licence because of legal proceedings taken in United States courts by Colonial Air Lines challenging the legality of this air agreement. In the meantime the Canadian aeronautic licensing authorities charged Colonial Air Lines with failure to live up to obligations assumed in its own Canadian licence which was granted by virtue of the bilateral agreement.

Subsequently, as hon. members know, discussions were held in Ottawa, and it was agreed that some of the new rights which Canada had granted the United States under the agreement would be held in abeyance pending the outcome of these legal proceedings in the courts of the United States. These difficulties have now been removed. On February 5 Colonial Air Lines suspended its legal proceedings, and the United States authorities are now completing procedural steps which will enable them to license Trans-Canada Air Lines to operate between Montreal and New York; and all the new rights granted to Canada under the 1949 agreement are expected to come into full effect within the next few weeks.

I also described last November the difficulty which had been experienced at the border by some Canadians wishing to visit the United States. Since then officials of my department, together with the director of immigration, met with their opposite numbers in the United States to discuss these border difficulties which were causing some concern throughout Canada. At this discussion, which was held I think on December 15 last, the full range of problems involved was examined in great detail and conclusions were reached which will substantially lessen the number of unfortunate incidents in the future.

As I told the house a few days ago, we have signed a new treaty with the United States government covering the diversion of water at Niagara Falls. When I tabled that treaty I said, and I should like to emphasize it now, that we are not any the less interested in the St. Lawrence waterway development because we have the Niagara problem, as we think, satisfactorily solved. The President of the United States, in his annual message on the state of the union on January 3 last, recommended that approval be given at the present session of congress to the St. Lawrence agreement. It is still our strong hope that congress may soon be able to give its consideration to this important project.

When I addressed the house in November last I think I stated that negotiations were in progress with the United States government regarding the rights and privileges enjoyed by United States forces in Newfoundland. Those discussions are continuing satisfactorily, but, as a great many difficult and complicated questions are involved, they have not yet reached conclusion.

If I may now leave the United States I should like to say a few words about the situation in Europe.

In the free and democratic countries of Europe there has been a continuing revival of confidence and of stability since I last made a report to the house on this matter. I think this is due in very large measure to the reassurance which the North Atlantic treaty has brought and will bring increasingly as the delivery of arms and equipment goes forward. It is due also to the stimulus of economic aid from North America and to the revival of national energy and national spirit in those countries. They are still recovering from the shocks of war and of enemy occupation, but for a full return to strength there is one essential condition—there must be a sense of security.

Of course it is in the interests of the Kremlin to prevent those conditions from being fulfilled. Communist propaganda in those countries seeks to turn away men's thoughts from constructive activities and to create and maintain an atmosphere of fear and pessimism. Through exploiting the fear of war, the communists, under orders from Moscow, then launch "peace offensives" designed to weaken those essential defensive measures which their own aggressive policies make necessary—the same kind of peace offensive which is now being carried on in this country by the same kind of leadership, and for the same purpose. On the European continent, whose inhabitants have vividly in their memories the full horrors of war, it is not hard to find soil in which to plant these propaganda seeds, but they fortunately have been prevented from growing in recent months through the growth of confidence in the countries concerned. We can, I think, be reasonably sure that these sinister plans will not have any success in our own country, even though they may deceive and confuse some sincere and well-intentioned people.

Communist plans in Europe have also to some extent been frustrated by their own crude and violent tactics. The workers, even the communist workers, are getting tired of being forced into political strikes and sabotage by a little group of Moscow-appointed leaders who always put the directive of the Kremlin before the interests of their own country and of the working class. While the communists are still strong in some of these western European countries, I think their game is becoming more and more apparent to the people. There are indications of this tendency in the defeat of the communists in the elections in Finland, and in the complete elimination of the communist candidates in the recent election in the United Kingdom.

No better evidence, in fact, could be found of the greater strength of the democratic forces in the western world than the present position of the communist party in countries which have free elections. From the high point of their influence in the period immediately following the war, these parties have rapidly diminished in numbers and in strength. This change was not brought about by suppression or persecution. The communists have been left to the judgment of the electors, and only when they have taken illegal action to betray their country, or to disturb the peace, have they suffered penalties under the law. This confidence in the free processes of democracy has, I think, been justified.

In the United Kingdom, for instance, during the recent election the communists were allowed to participate fully in the campaign. They were given free time on the government radio. They were given every opportunity to win votes. They made every kind of insidious appeal for such votes, from demanding higher wages for all, immediately, to pandering to the lowest form of anti-American prejudice. But what happened? By the will of the electors no single communist, nor communist sympathizer, has been returned to the British House of Commons. They polled an infinitesimal proportion of the vote and the great majority of them lost their deposits. Here is good evidence that in the face of outside danger, people in the free world can close their ranks.

On the other hand, in the dark spaces behind the iron curtain conditions get worse and the Soviet government is attempting to seal off every possible contact between the unfortunate peoples of those satellite countries and the outer free world. Not the smallest glimmer of western light is now allowed to penetrate. Countries like Czechoslovakia, with its old parliamentary traditions, its great cultural heritage, its long-standing connections with the west, are to be put into permanent quarantine against the infection of freedom. So great is the nervousness of the Kremlin and those who take the Kremlin's orders in Prague, that even the normal social friendliness of two junior members of our legation staff towards their acquaintances in that city is regarded as dangerous and subversive. Charges have to be trumped up against them so that they can be expelled from the country. Against action of that kind we have, of course, means of retaliation which we shall certainly not hesitate to use against any country which invites and deserves it.

This communist policy of isolation and expulsion is revealing. It throws a sombre light on the fear which haunts the rulers of the Soviet union that the countries which they have drawn or forced into their orbit, realizing that their national interests are being sacrificed to Moscow, may react as Yugoslavia has already reacted. Hence the repeated purges of the personnel of these governments. Hence the series of monstrous trials and forced confessions and savage sentences in Budapest, Sofia, Bucharest, Warsaw and Prague. Hence the accusations of espionage and plotting against western diplomatic missions and individual western nationals in these countries. One must feel the deepest sympathy for the peoples of Soviet satellite countries whose governments are being compelled by Moscow to carry out policies so plainly contrary to their national interests. But I suggest the lesson of these events is not going unnoticed on this side of the iron curtain, where many waverers in many countries will hesitate before committing themselves to communism when they have such abundant evidence that it is being used as a facade for the new Russian imperialism.

In combating these dangers one of our greatest sources of strength remains the United Nations, where they can be publicly exposed, and the North Atlantic treaty, under which we can defend ourselves collectively against the aggression which might result from them. This treaty, I am glad to say—and the Minister of National Defence may and probably will have more to say about this matter when his estimates are introduced—is now a going concern, though very much remains to be done.

Since the last session of parliament the defence and military committees have met in Paris to approve programs of the military production and supply board and the defence financial and economic committee, as well as the broad principles on which defence planning by the various regional groups can be carried on. Since the meetings in Paris, problems of military production and supply and financial questions concerned with the implementation of the North Atlantic treaty have been under investigation by the appropriate committees, and planning has now begun in the various regional groups. We are getting down to the detailed problems of working out an effective system of collective defence for the north Atlantic region.

As planning for military production and supply under the North Atlantic organization gets under way—and it is now under way—account should of course be taken of the needs of specialization in production and of the availability of productive capacity in all the north Atlantic nations. Means must also be found for overcoming existing difficulties which impede the transfer of equipment and supplies among the north Atlantic nations so as to permit the maximum use of their productive capacities. Solution of these difficulties is necessary if full advantage is to be taken, for instance, of Canada's present and potential productive capacity by the north Atlantic countries. The responsibilities of membership under the North Atlantic treaty cannot of course be discharged merely by setting up committees or staffs of experts for research and planning, however useful this may be. Such responsibilities can only be fulfilled by the governments and the peoples concerned.

Under the mutual aid and self-help articles of the treaty we in Canada are committed to participation in this collective enterprise in the manner in which such participation will be most effective. But until investigation of the needs of our partners is more complete, and until military planning in detail is further advanced, it would be premature, I suggest, to predict the appropriate form and scale of our participation. It will of course have to be related to the capacities and requirements of our economy and the economies of all the other signatories.

I should like to conclude the brief mention I have made of this particular subject by quoting a paragraph from a very significant book entitled "Modern Arms and Free Men", by Dr. Vannevar Bush, in which he said:

> The race—

He is referring to the race for security, indeed the race for survival.

> —can be lost, as all long races that depend upon man's endurance can be lost, either by doing too little or by trying to do too much too soon.

He went on to say:

> It will profit us little to have stocks of bombs and planes and then to bring our governmental and industrial systems crashing down about our ears. This is a long, hard race we are embarked upon. We had better settle into harness for the long pull and mark well how we use our resources.

The world situation has been changed, not only by the developments which I have attempted to sketch briefly, but also by the realization that the perils of the atomic age will increase through the manufacture of atomic weapons of ever-increasing destructiveness, culminating, if it is culmination, in the so-called H bomb. On this question—and reference has already been made to it in the house during the present session—I suggest that our policy as to atomic weapons should be twofold. On the one hand, we of the free world must continue to strive by every means possible—and I hope to elaborate on this somewhat in a moment—for that kind of international agreement for the effective control of atomic energy that will give us some real chance of security against the horrible possibility of atomic warfare. On the other hand, so long as the danger of such warfare remains, we together with friendly states with whom we can co-operate must do our best to see that we do not lag behind in the development of knowledge and skill in the field of atomic energy. It is important also to convince, if that is possible, those with whom we find it difficult to co-operate that atomic weapons will never be used by us for any aggressive purpose.

The hon. member for Saskatoon (Mr. Knight) said the other night, in what I considered to be a very thoughtful speech:

> Somehow or other the people of the world will have to get together and solve this problem.

He was referring to the atomic problem. He also said in the same speech: "We must learn somehow or other to break that cycle" which is preventing results. "Somehow or other"—but how? He asked for some reassurance on these matters which would be a renewal of faith, and he was disappointed that I had not been able to give him such reassurance in my earlier statement. To be perfectly frank, reassurance is not easy in the light of present circumstances, but I know he can be assured, as can all other hon. members of the house, that so far as the government is concerned we will do our best and not lag behind in the search for a solution to this problem.

When a man finds himself struggling against a blizzard, a moment comes when because of fatigue and despair he longs to lie down, relax and die. There are times, Mr. Chairman, when we must all feel as though, in the international field, we were pushing through a bitter and blinding blizzard. But it would be fatal to yield to the temptation merely to sit it out, just as it would be fatal to yield to the temptation to panic and frantically rush in new directions without any knowledge of where they may lead. So far as Canada is concerned—and I am sure we all agree on this—I know there will never be any lack of willingness to search for a solution to this and the other problems which divide us from the communist world.

None of these problems is insoluble. Atomic energy need not destroy us; it can open for us a great age of human progress. Nor is there anything insuperable in the questions which have arisen about the future of Germany and Japan. Between the communist and non-communist worlds some modus vivendi, some agreement to live and let live, can be worked out. But this can never happen except through a process of genuine and mutual compromise and accommodation. If there remains any doubt about the desire of the western powers to find a basis for such compromise and accommodation then of course we must try to sweep away that doubt. This may require a great new effort on everybody's part—possibly some new high level meeting, possibly a full dress conference of the powers principally concerned, the fifteen, sixteen or seventeen powers if you lke, on all forms of disarmament, including atomic disarmament; or it may require something else. It might suggest a meeting of the United Nations assembly in Moscow, an invitation to which may not be too easy to obtain. If, for example, direct negotiations amongst the great powers would initiate a process of settlement, no one should object to them on the grounds of procedure or prejudice. In this respect, I agree with the secretary general of the United Nations, who not long ago said that he was in favour of great power negotiations, and I quote from his statement:

> . . . all the time, and on all levels . . . inside the United Nations and outside the United Nations.

Certainly, we must not become fixed in any rut, atomic or otherwise, or assume that any scheme we put forward is necessarily final or perfect.

The World Council of Churches, meeting recently at Geneva, made a moving plea for such negotiation in the following terms:

> Governments of nations have an inescapable responsibility at this hour. The world is divided into hostile camps through suspicion and distrust and through failure of nations to bring their mutual relations within an agreed system of justice and order. As representatives of Christian churches we appeal for a gigantic new effort for peace. We know how strenuously governments have discussed peace in the past. But sharp political conflicts continue, and atomic danger develops uncontrolled. We urge governments to enter into negotiations at once again and to do everything in their power to bring the present tragic deadlock to an end.

We must all agree, of course, with that. It is essential however that any new move designed to insure peace by removing international differences must be taken only after the most careful preparation. At the same time the free peoples must make it equally clear, as they can do, that they are not for a moment prepared, because of anguish over the present situation, or fear or insecurity, to make any unrequited sacrifice, through which they would weaken their position in return for nothing. There is no use in giving way to unreasoning panic. We are stronger now then we were. But however strong we might become, it would be folly to base one's policy on strength alone. As has been said, the first obligation of diplomacy is to avoid a situation where power alone talks. We can and should, therefore, reaffirm our desire to seek again, through negotiation, a settlement of the divisions which now beset the world.

Even in the best circumstances, however, a settlement of the problems which divide the communist world from the free world will not be easily reached. Some new interventions, such as those suggested by the member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell), in his interesting analysis of the present crisis, might be a useful beginning for such a process. Certainly this government would give every support to any new beginning which gave any promise of success. Let us not forget, however, in our determination or desire, our anguish to do something, that the road ahead will in any case be long and difficult. We shall have to walk it with patience and with caution, with persistence and with realism. If a new approach, for instance, did not get us anywhere—there is always that possibility —we must not even then give way to the inevitable reaction of despair which would follow.

This point is well put in a leading article of the February 18 issue of the Economist, which no doubt some hon. members have read. One paragraph of that article reads as follows:

> Behind the hopes of a quick agreement with Russia lies more than a trace of the belief that peace can really be had quite cheaply, by a single bargain, and not, as is the grim truth, by an intelligent, costly and sustained political effort lasting over a generation. Repeated talk of settlements and agreements and pacts can divert the attention of both statesmen and peoples from the fact that the only possible diplomacy for the western world—that of agreement through strength—is about the most difficult diplomacy that democratic nations can be asked to sustain. It means that for years to come a measure of military preparedness and a high degree of economic stability will have to be maintained throughout the non-communist world.

I suggest we will also need a high degree of democratic unity to face the communist policy of aggression, directed from one, and only one, centre, and without the limitation of scruples or sincerity or morality. We must, I know, pay the price for freedom, national and individual, by differing and disputing among ourselves on occasions. So we have congress versus parliament; dollar versus sterling; commonwealth associations versus European federation; security by military strategy versus security through social and political strength; international obligations versus domestic responsibilities. Every democratic state has these conflicts within its borders, and every group of states has them between its members. We should be careful, however, to see that they are not permitted to weaken us unduly as we face the dangers ahead.

At some point in the encircling barrier of unsolved problems which hems us in at the moment, there may be some new opening upon which we could begin to work. With patience and with diligence we must search for this opening, and, when we find it, set about expanding it with every tool of diplomacy and negotiation that we have available. We shall not, I suggest, facilitate this search by permitting our hunger for peace to lead us into unrealistic and specious courses. On the other hand we shall only hinder it by bellicose declarations that all is perfect on our side, and anyway we can lick Joe Stalin!

I should like, Mr. Chairman, in the very few minutes that remain, to turn to what the Soviet union is doing or is not doing in the particular field of atomic energy control.

During the past three or four months, while the United States has been going through the throes of its most difficult and fateful decision as to whether or not to push ahead with the development of the hydrogen bomb, because of the absence of agreement on the international control of atomic energy, the Russians have quietly and energetically been cultivating the impression, with some success, that they had already made new proposals for such agreement which we had turned down. Inferences are drawn from vague and speculative press reports that have passed the Moscow censors, as well as from some of Mr. Vishinsky's remarks on atomic energy in the last United Nations assembly, hinting that they have offered concessions which we are ignoring. Nothing could be more misleading or further from the truth. Nothing could be more dangerous than that this impression should spread.

Until last September our public were not particularly well informed as to what the Soviet position on atomic control actually was. Last autumn, therefore, when Mr. Vishinsky offered the assembly, as if it were something new, what he called strict inspection and effective control as an integral part of an atomic energy agreement, many people naturally thought that concessions were being made, and that at last the deadlock was being broken. Perhaps Mr. Vishinsky's intention was to concede and not to confuse, but some of his statements at that time seemed more like double talk, and in some cases were even mutually contradictory. In the course of the recent debate at Lake Success, he said everything about everything. If one makes a close and careful analysis of his statements, as I have, it reveals nothing that could not be interpreted as being wholly consistent with the Soviet proposals of June, 1947, which did not provide anything approaching adequate international inspection and control.

If Mr. Vishinsky meant us to read something new and different into his words, I hope he will make that clear to us at the first opportunity. It is of the greatest importance that we should know. At the moment we certainly cannot find out at Lake Success. Hon. members will recall that the assembly last autumn directed the six permanent members of the atomic energy commission, among other things, to discover what the new—if they were new—Soviet proposals on atomic energy control meant. But the Soviet representative walked out of the meeting without clarifying his own position in any respect. When these talks are resumed, as I hope they will be, maybe we shall be able to get that clarification, which must be insisted on because it is vital to the whole question.

To be specific and definite on this point, sir, I should like to draw the attention of the house to a comparison of what Mr. Vishinsky said in his main speech on this subject to the general assembly last November and what was proposed by the Soviet representative at the twelfth meeting of the atomic energy commission on June 11, 1947.

In summing up Soviet views on inspection —and this is the crux of the problem—Mr. Vishinsky made six points last November, which were simply a condensed rewording of the original Soviet proposals. On the heart of the matter, Mr. Vishinsky said that there should be—and I am quoting from his statement—"periodic and special investigation of the activities of enterprises extracting atomic raw materials"; that is, periodic and special investigation by some international atomic authority. That sounded fine. The Soviet proposals a couple of years previously said, and I quote from them:

> The international control commission shall periodically carry out inspection of facilities for the mining of atomic raw materials and for the production of atomic materials and atomic energy . . . and carry out special investigations in cases where suspicion of violations . . . arises.

All that Mr. Vishinsky added to that statement was that he wished—> —to make it quite clear that periodic inspection means inspection at intervals, but intervals as determined by necessity and by decision of the international control commission whenever that commission deems it fitting that such inspections should take place.

That is all very well as far as it goes, but it does not go far enough to give us that security under international control which is essential if we are to sign any international agreement. For instance, it does not allow for international inspectors to be on the job all the time, which we think is essential; nor does it explain how the international control commission could determine whether any country had declared all of its production facilities.

The Soviet union has added nothing to the most inadequate section of its proposals; for Mr. Vishinsky did not explain how "special investigation" could work in a country which would not allow inspectors to go anywhere except to the atomic establishments which it chose to declare. There is still nothing in the Soviet proposals to prevent a country hiding away, in a remote corner of its territories, a whole series of atomic installations which it would not necessarily declare, and which the inspectors would therefore never know anything about, because they could go only where they were shown, and then only at intervals.

We must be careful when we examine proposals of the kind which I have indicated; and we must be especially careful to see that the interpretation given to those proposals in our own country is not false and misleading, if we can prevent it. I am not, however, so much concerned at the moment with trying to indicate where the blame for failure lies as in finding a possible way out of the deadlock. I therefore repeat that in this search, which is literally one for survival, we must keep open every road, every by-path and every trail which may lead us to the objective we all so ardently desire to reach. But we must, at the same time, take every necessary measure, moral, economic and military, to defend ourselves collectively against aggression from those reactionary subversive forces which have hitherto blocked the road to peace.

Mr. Graydon: There is a general feeling abroad, Mr. Chairman, in this house as well as outside of it, that members of parliament generally should not seek to find differences with the government on major issues of foreign affairs but rather should try to find common ground so that the nation will be able to speak, so far as it is humanly possible, with a common or a united voice in the councils of the world.

It should be pointed out at this time, however, that those of us who are in opposition cannot be expected slavishly to follow the government on every point where they have made a decision on external matters. In no other single department of government are the dice, so to speak, so loaded against the opposition and so loaded in favour of the government as in the Department of External Affairs when a discussion of foreign affairs arises. There is no general inter-party clearing of information of a confidential sort or otherwise in Canada today. The fullest information, secret, confidential and otherwise, is in the hands of the minister of external affairs (Mr. Pearson) and his experts as he presents his case for or against a certain position which the federal government has taken or is about to take. Even the standing committee on external affairs gets little information other than that which it has already obtained or will obtain from the newspapers.

The background of current foreign affairs ought to be made available more fully to members of parliament generally; for, after all, they are the representatives of the people; and whether it is a matter of domestic or foreign affairs, the people ought to know the facts upon which the government bases its decisions. I am sorry to say this, but I think I must do so. The rivers of international information available to those outside the strict confines of the cabinet itself have pretty well dried up in this country. I urge that the government, within the limits of security and ordinary diplomatic usage, should start these streams running again. It is highly improper and completely unfair to suggest in one breath that we have a single voice in the councils of the world and at the same time to withhold information which would enable a clearer and more effective discussion of world events. I believe that the blinds ought to be rolled up in the east block so that from the centre block of parliament we can see at least something of what is going on.

It is my hope that when the standing committee on external affairs deals with the estimates which will be referred to them by the Commons shortly, an opportunity will be given to members of that committee which was denied by the committee itself last year, of hearing firsthand reports from those who have been on the ground in the countries in which the most acute crises have arisen. It is all very well to hear the various departmental officials here in Ottawa tell what somebody else has told them, and then we tell our constituents; but who is more entitled to get the firsthand information than the members of this House of Commons sitting in committee, or in the Commons itself? That should not be denied to them on this occasion. We are entitled to more than hearsay evidence.

Many arguments were advanced in the committee last year as to why we should not near Ambassador Davis, who had been on the ground in China for many months prior to that time. We were denied that after a vote in the committee, and after, I may say, the government had indicated their desire that the ambassador be not called. That should not be repeated. We ought to be able to get the full light on external affairs if the public of Canada expect us in parliament to debate and make a decision intelligently on this very important level of our work.

It is little wonder that the minister of external affairs, in reporting to the house on the Far East, struck a somewhat pessimistic note. His message could be summed up in the words: "Anything can happen there". When one realizes what a head start soviet imperialism has in the Far East, and realizes further the immensity of the problem of extinguishing the communist conflagration as it moves through the inflammable forests of misery in that poverty-stricken area, it should be sufficient to shake every supporter of democracy from the last vestige of complacency. When is added to that the record of events during the last five years, no one can look at this sector of the world front without grave concern for the future. Five years ago one out of every twelve of the world's people had a communist ruler. Today one out of every three is under communist domination. Without a single shot being fired or a bomb dropped, Russian imperialism has achieved the greatest single peacetime victory in the shortest length of time of any comparable movement in the world's long history. That is something that no Canadian can afford to ignore; it is something that no democrat anywhere in the world can afford to ignore, because it shows that the Russian campaign for world domination is on the move.

The house listened with intense interest to the Secretary of State for External Affairs expounding, not at great length but expounding nevertheless, his ideas with respect to the situation in Japan. His point of view, which seems to favour a quick and early peace treaty with the Japanese, does not carry universal support, if one reads the press and other news articles from time to time. There may be, however, a background of information available to him which is denied this parliament and many of those who take a contrary view, and anything I say will, of necessity, be tempered with this consideration.

Japan could be a valuable bastion for the democratic nations in the Far East and is in the best position of all of the nations there to stop Russian aggression in its tracks. It could also be an easy prey to the same aggression, and herein lies the importance of strategic Japan today.

The Japanese government alone, of all the oriental countries, took steps of an effective character many decades ago to westernize her economic, social and political ways of life. True, it ended up on the reefs of military dictatorship with consequent disaster; but it has within itself the elements necessary to establish a powerful democratic state, if it chooses to follow that course. If Japan is prepared to become a convert to our way of life, and a sincere convert, it can be an essential link in a world chain of democratic states.

Japan is occupied by a nation that has been her avowed enemy for years. It is only natural that there may be elements now within Japan which are not vocal, which are opposed to a continuance of the American yoke at this time. But until the western powers are satisfied that Japan is prepared to be that link in the world's democratic chain, the danger of lifting the occupation at this stage would seem to be a rather hazardous gamble at best. If Russia and her international communist propaganda were to overflow into the new state that is set up before its democratic government gets on its feet, we might readily find that the MacArthur occupation should not have been lifted so soon.

Some day the occupation has to be lifted, but a new tree in the strong wind that is blowing at the present time from the Chinese and Russian shores would be much more easily bent to communistic purposes than a sturdy oak with its roots firmly set in the ground.

To bear that out, one of the experienced staff members of the New York Times, who has been resident in Japan since the surrender, has this to say:

> The possibility that Japan itself might be taken over by the communists must be considered. While the occupation continues, there is little likelihood of this happening, but what can be said about the future—if American troops are withdrawn? It must be remembered that if, after rehabilitating Japan, we allow the country to slip into communist hands, we have handed them on a silver platter precisely what Russia has been seeking and failing to obtain since the Russo-Japanese war more than forty years ago—an industrial plant in the Far East.

So far as Japan is concerned, it is my opinion that before the western nations adopt precipitately the policy of having Japan "go it alone" they must be certain beyond any shadow of doubt that by doing so they are not playing into the hands of a giant Russian plan to conquer the whole of the Far East. That is all I ask of the Secretary of State for External Affairs at this moment.

I shall leave other aspects of the Far East in the capable hands of my leader. He may have something to say with respect to them as the debate proceeds; but in turning to another aspect of our foreign affairs, which was touched on by the minister during his address this afternoon, I do want to say that in my opinion the most vital job at the hand of every responsible nation of the world today is somehow to find the way to stop the present aimless international drifting, which is causing no end of alarm to the ordinary citizens of the world, because they have a revolting fear that a continuation of this squaring off of one group of nations towards another may end in another armed holocaust.

I suppose there is no single thing that is engaging the attention and absorbing the mind and thought of the average citizen in this country today more than the statement that I have just made with respect to the possibilities in the future.

Right now may be the critical turning point and this nation must bend her last sinew of energy, capacity and initiative towards resolving the present international impasse, which holds terrible implications while it remains unresolved. It is only natural, perhaps, to draw attention to this fact. The globe is so shrunken by means of modern transportation and communication that everybody today is everybody else's neighbour all over the world. Time and distance have been reduced to mere symbols of what they were, while into this shrunken ball of a world have been thrown two of the most destructive weapons of which our imagination could conceive. Moreover, the end of destructive enterprise and ingenuity may have only begun. From armament race to atomic race, to hydrogen race, the world races on with startling concern to all its citizens. It may well be that the choice before the world now is not just a choice between peace and war, but the choice between peace and the mass obliteration of mankind.

Whatever may be the ills of the world, they have shrunk into infinitesimal proportions when contrasted with the dangers which science is racing to make available for infliction upon our people. This makes the resolution of the main prospective causes of war an immediate must for us all.

At one time sitting on a keg of dynamite was about the most dangerous pastime of all; but sitting on a keg of dynamite today would, to the ordinary person, be a position of relative safety compared with what could happen were modern weapons ever to be used. Before it is too late, an end must be put to the atomic-hydrogen race, because history has too many instances to show that preparations like this sometimes lead to the use of the preparations which are made.

Before this world is shaken further with atomic paralysis, the peace-loving peoples of the globe must make a last, determined stand to chain the dogs of war.

It has been my fear, and I have expressed it more than once in the House of Commons, that the great United Nations Organization, which has numberless successes to its credit in the field of international peace, despite its failure to make one world out of two, has had one hand tied behind its back in its efforts to deal with world problems, because of the fact that the heads, particularly of the great powers, have seen fit to remain away from the sessions of the security council and the general assembly. This has tended to reduce the United Nations Organization, not merely in fact but in the eyes of the general public, to the position of a giant debating society, where nothing much is expected to be accomplished, and where only international hot air is released.

It may have been that those of us who attended at the birth of the United Nations in San Francisco, almost five years ago now, had ideas which were not shared by those who held other ideas concerning the United Nations Organization in general. However, my thought certainly was that when the United Nations was set up it would not simply be a second-rate meeting of people in other brackets of the public service, who would represent the nations of the world, but would be a meeting together regularly of the heads of nations to clear the decks for action, so far as world peace is concerned. Apparently that was not to be—but it certainly was one of the things for which I had hoped, and which I thought would flow from that great organization.

The United Nations has to be restored to public confidence once more, and it can be restored to public confidence in the final analysis only by the heads of the greater and smaller powers recognizing that this is the organization through which the nations of the world have chosen to work; and having so chosen, the heads of the nations should not any longer high-hat this their own close relation.

I have been amazed to find that this appears to be the state of mind of the chiefs of powers both great and small—and in this I do not include the government of Canada, because from time to time our Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) has attended. I must say about many other countries that in my view it is about time those countries came to their senses and realized that after all the United Nations cannot be allowed to remain the plaything of ordinary representatives of nations, and that they cannot continue to boycott both the assembly and the security council, so far as the attendance of the chief figures in those countries is concerned.

I have doubts in my own mind as to whether any of the recent suggestions emanating from some of the senior world statesmen quite fill the present international bill. Some have called for a Big Three conference again, outside the United Nations, for the purpose of bringing the world's hopes for peace closer to realization. The end is laudable but in my opinion the means leaves something to be desired.

My proposal today is that the United Nations should not be by-passed, but that a special meeting of the security council and the general assembly should be called forthwith, and that Canada should take a leading part in initiating this movement. I suggest that, wherever this international meeting is held, the head of every state of the United Nations should be there, in person, to make one final and determined effort to clear the decks for peace in the days that lie ahead. When a few moments ago the Secretary of State for External Affairs suggested that that special meeting might be held in Moscow, I think perhaps he was carrying things a little too far, and I believe in his speech yesterday President Truman indicated that he held that view. Because, after all, we do want to have a special meeting of the United Nations and we would like to have it at a place which would be convenient generally; but I do not think this country or, indeed, any other democratic country, wants to get down on its knees to any other competing nation. What we want to do is to meet them on fair, reasonable, equitable and decent grounds, wherever it may be.

These suggestions would meet the ends suggested by Mr. Churchill and others who have made similar proposals; and at the same time it would meet the objections of those who believe that the international organization, as at present constituted, should be the avenue through which this new peace move would be made.

Without any reflection upon the high calibre and the splendid service given by men and women in lower governmental levels, who have done their utmost to promote the cause of peace in the United Nations Organization, I submit that too much of the actual peacemaking of the world has been left to those who hold inferior positions in the nations they so conscientiously try to represent. Acute and serious issues, like the atomic and hydrogen bombs, cannot be solved by people who only take orders from other governmental chieftains at home. What the world needs is that the chieftains shall put their feet under a common table at a United Nations meeting and make an honest attempt to give the people of the world the one thing they long and pray for, a just and lasting peace.

With threatening war clouds casting their shadows over every element of the world community today, no time must be lost in implementing some such proposal. As Prime Minister Nehru said only the other day:

> If you think the world is a pretty bad show, let the hydrogen bomb put an end to it. If you want to carry on the world with any decency, then you had better put an end to the hydrogen bomb. There is no choice for you.

It would be folly to suggest that the vexed problem of outlawing the atom and hydrogen bombs is a simple one. The minister's speech this afternoon went far enough to indicate some of the major and serious difficulties which confront the nations. Ever since the days of Hiroshima, the three great powers have been making proposals and counter-proposals with a view to banning the use of such weapons as machines of war. But actually the discussions have never reached the point where the deadlock looked likely to be broken. In simple terms, the deadlock comes from the fact that the western democracies have proposed that the mining, manufacture and use of atomic energy for war should be under international control and with it full international inspection. The soviets have accepted the proposals, except with respect to international inspections, as the minister pointed out a few moments ago. This they refuse to do except to a limited inspection and the limitations they place on inspection actually mean that a nation at its will can still mine, manufacture and prepare for war the use of atom or hydrogen bombs. In effect the Russian counter-proposal is no guarantee at all as to the outlawing of these destructive works of science.

One disturbing feature, of course, of even the western democracies' proposals for all-out banning and full international inspection is that while this would be a guarantee before war came, while peace still reigned, it is evident on careful examination that it would be no guarantee once war broke out, because then international control might well be impossible of implementation. In any protracted hostilities the nerve-shaking possibilities of atomic energy being put to wartime use and inflicted upon humanity's masses of civilians would be ever present.

Nevertheless, the world should make another try at banning the bomb and at the same time making a determined effort to make nations mind their own business and to outlaw national policies directed at world revolution, which means the sticking of long foreign fingers into the domestic affairs of other states who have different systems of government. We need an international policy of "hands off" the other fellow's affairs.

These two issues, more than all others, are dividing the world into two today and before the western democracies are forced to conclude that Russia is definitely out to conquer the world and to impose her communistic system on all of us, the world meeting, which I have proposed before, should be held. It may well be the world's last chance, but at least the western democracies will know and their peoples will understand that every last thing has been done to preserve peace and to give the world's peoples a chance to live in the sunshine of international confidence rather than in the clouds and fog of fear, uncertainty and concern.

This is a severe testing time for democratic countries, for the maintenance of a high level of prosperity and employment is just as essential in the battle we are waging to preserve our way of life as the military preparedness which we have under way. We must find the way to master that problem as one of the major features of a successful fight against the inroads of godless communism.

As the minister did a few moments ago, I crave the indulgence of the house to say a few words about another matter which is closely integrated with the whole issue of peace and war. We hear once in a while of General Worthington's visits to various sections of Canada. We hear of certain co-ordinating movements with respect to our fire departments, for instance. But with the intensity with which destructive processes have been developed, all of the gadgets and services of yesterday will not do for a war the day after tomorrow. If another war comes, and God forbid that we shall ever see it, our civilians in this country and in others might, without adequate preparations, present a state of helplessness the like of which the world has never seen in previous combat. The house must be told fully and frankly what provision is being made for the safety, hospitalization and security of our people in case of trouble.

There need be no question of security reasons blurring the explanation of what Canada is doing for her own people to protect them from these perils. We read in the newspaper last week that Dr. Paul Larsen, now head of the United States office of civilian defence, has indicated that he will present a program soon for the defence of Washington from atomic attack. Larsen said to the newspapers:

> Our first job will be the relocation and redesign of the present government office set-up in the capital. Dispersion out of the Washington area and underground instalments, either in or out of the capital, will be our general means of defence. We may utilize underground shelters within thirty or forty miles of Washington.

What this nation wants to know is, "What are we doing to protect our people at home?" We do not want to hear about it nine months after we should have heard, like the combines commissioner's report or the screening of the employees of the national film board. With these rather sad experiences so fresh in parliamentary minds we have a right to ask and demand that our civilian defence preparations be made public. Actually, the defence committee which the opposition has asked for should see to it that General Worthington and his staff are called as witnesses, so that full disclosure of our home civilian defence position may be made known.

Naked diplomacy without bread and butter sometimes proves to be a cold and ineffective thing. The fact that the minister spent as much time as he did this afternoon on the economic end of external affairs would bear out the statement I have just made. An erstwhile European leader once said, "If trade does not cross international borders, armies will." Without subscribing fully to such a doctrine it may, nevertheless, be said that diplomatic relations are bound up—yes, and peace itself—in the opportunity which men and women have throughout the world to make a decent living. Of recent times our primary producers in Canada have been losing one by one their markets in the United Kingdom. There is a need to revitalize our trade position with members of the commonwealth and empire. As the minister of external affairs said a few minutes ago, there is a need, not only for prosperity in agriculture but for the prosperity of Canada generally. It is a great truth that if you have not a prosperous agriculture in Canada you can never say that you have a prosperous Canada.

At the risk of repeating what has been said already in the house this week, but which in my opinion cannot be said too often, there is much that can be gained by Canada taking the initiative in calling a full-fledged commonwealth trade conference. I must confess that when the minister made his report a week or two ago in connection with the Colombo conference—it may have been that his explanation was not understandable to me—it seemed to me that the commonwealth consultative committee upon which he laid some stress was a pretty weak and feeble excuse for a full-fledged commonwealth conference for the settlement of commonwealth trade today. I do not know what other hon. members may think with regard to that statement concerning the commonwealth consultative committee, but it seemed to me that it fell far short of what Canadians, particularly those in primary industry, would expect.

The United Kingdom has been our traditional market in the past for agricultural products and perhaps offers greater stability than any other. It should not be a conference designed to increase tariff or other barriers or restrictions against other nations; rather it should be a gathering whereby commonwealth countries could once again find a formula for successful and prosperous trading one with the other. We must leave no stone unturned to find markets and good prices for our agricultural production. It must be made part and parcel of an effective over-all policy to maintain prosperity in the interests of the preservation of democracy on the world front.

Speaking further with respect to trade within the commonwealth, reports from the Colombo conference have been couched in considerable vagueness, and included such words as:

> There exists a continuing and substantial degree of community outlook in the approach of the commonwealth countries to current problems of foreign affairs.

If there ever was a prostitution of the English language to a position where it means nothing I submit it is to be found in that kind of statement. So much was this so that one newspaperman of prominence in this country said that the announcement was like a medical bulletin about a very distinguished patient confined to hospital. The bulletin was, "the patient's condition remains good."

It is to be presumed from reports from Colombo that the new Asiatic members of the commonwealth prefer to throw in their weight with the democratic countries against the influence and spread of communism. The conference indicated that there was envisaged some program of mutual self-help and economic development which would be aided by grants of credit and technical help from commonwealth countries of more mature development.

The Washington tripartite talks last September recognized the problem of opening former trade channels for more of these Asiatic countries, and it was agreed that Canada would stockpile rubber and tin purchased from these nations for three purposes; first as a defence measure, second as an aid to Great Britain's depleted dollar reserves, and third as an aid to those Asiatic countries which have lost markets. That was six months ago, and still in the press of February 18 last there was a statement, originating from government sources in Ottawa, that talks are now going ahead between the government and Canadian industry for the stockpiling of natural rubber and tin in Canada. I am told that our stocks of natural rubber have decreased each month since last September and that our consumption is increasing, for reasons that I need not go into now. Here was one place where Canada could have acted promptly and eased greatly in a practical way some of the problems which were recognized as among the most urgent ones at the Colombo conference last month. Something could have been done about some of the problems which were covered up in that underbrush of words I quoted a few moments ago. May I point out to the house and to the government that after all there has been a lot of talk emanating from these international conferences, but it is deeds and not words by which Canada must make its contribution to stabilized trade in the Far East. If this example is to be taken as a general sample of the speed with which Canada is tackling the problems of the Far East, I suggest that there ought to be a change of policy or a change of gait in that regard.

This nation and others learned their lesson on preparedness during the early days of the last great war. Our people are not in the mood at this time to put their heads in the sand and let the world go by. Today some nations understand only the language of force and power. We have to master that language also, for while preparedness might look like war, when dealing with some realistic peoples it may well mean the guarantee against it. This nation must not be caught napping, and our external policy must be backed up by such might as will give its implementation both power and strength.

Nevertheless in our long-range plans for preserving democracy and our free way of life as against communism and its shackled way of life, we must not forget that the smashing of Russia and her satellite powers by any conceivable combination of military strength would not necessarily destroy communism. To some communism is an idea, to some it is a religion, to some it is a crusade; but who is there who believes that we can put an idea in jail, that we can blast a religion, or bomb a crusade successfully? Communism as an idea, as a religion or as a crusade does not march on battlegrounds, does not sail the seas, does not fly in the air, but marches in men's minds. It marches most successfully in the minds of men who have suffered economic and social injustice, and who are experiencing poverty, suffering privation and distress.

Collateral, therefore, to our plans for preparedness and national security we have to meet the challenge of communism on the battleground in men's minds. That means we have to show the hundreds of millions of people who are going somewhere towards a better life and independence, and who are still making up their minds in which direction they will go, that a system of freedom rather than regimentation and totalitarianism can give to the underprivileged masses of humanity a more abundant life than any other. We believe it can. We must demonstrate that it can or we fight with lessening chances of success.

The trump card of Prime Minister Nehru of India in his fight to keep India from communism does not seem to lie entirely in mass force but rather in the direction of seeing to it that India has a government which will achieve through free means a better life for all. That defence seems to be increasingly powerful in the lukewarm war between communism and freedom. Therefore let us remind ourselves that one of the powerful arms of our attack upon godless communism is bound up in the rapid and effective removal of the evils upon which that wretched doctrine feeds, and the maintenance of prosperity and good standards of living for our people. We must display to the world's masses that justice for all and humanity towards all, both big and small, is the hallmark of democracy at its best and the most effective guarantee of permanent peace. In our advance to that laudable goal, as democratic peoples we would do well to remember the immortal words of Tennyson:

> Ring out false pride in place and blood,
> The civic slander and the spite;
> Ring in the love of truth and right,
> Ring in the common love of good.
> Ring out old shapes of foul disease;
> Ring out the narrowing lust of gold;
> Ring out the thousand wars of old,
> Ring in the thousand years of peace.

Mr. MacInnis: Mr. Chairman, for two reasons my remarks at this time will be very brief. The first is that two members of the C.C.F. party have already spoken on external affairs in the debate on the address in reply to the speech from the throne, and others may have something to say this afternoon. The other reasons why I will not take the time of the committee to any extent is that by and large I am in agreement with much, if not all, of what was said by the Secretary of State for External Affairs.

The only doubt or obstacle that would be in my mind to full acceptance of it would be the assurance, and probably that assurance was implicit in the speech itself, that he was setting forth the policy of the government, and not merely his own point of view. We must all admit that, today, international affairs is a difficult matter with which to deal. It is a difficult matter to deal with because we have a division of the nations of the world different from anything we ever had before. There are two general ideas, and there seems to be no point of contact between those two ideas.

In common with many members of this house, I had the opportunity of attending a session of the United Nations. It was quite clear to me that the Soviet union had one policy, and only one policy. It was to find out what the other nations proposed to do, and then say "no." I believe that is true, not only in the meetings of the assembly, but in nearly all the meetings of the organizations and committees of the United Nations. While conditions remain on that footing, there can be scarcely any degree of co-operation in world affairs. I must admit at once that I have not the solution. I am not as confident as the member for Peel is. I assume he did feel confident that some good would come from the proposal he made, that a conference should be called at which the heads of all the nations in the United Nations would be present. To me it has always seemed unrealistic to suppose that if Churchill or Attlee, for instance, President Truman and Stalin met, their approach to international affairs would be different from that of Molotov or Vishinsky. Surely, that idea arises from a failure to understand the fundamental principles of international affairs. When Vishinsky goes to the United Nations, he is expressing Stalin's point of view. If he is not expressing Stalin's point of view, then the Soviet union is not a country with that tight control we have been told it is. Do not suppose that any representative from the Soviet union goes to the United Nations, or any other conference, with a policy different from Stalin's.

I believe the first approach to an understanding of the present difficulties in world affairs is to get rid of that idea. I was glad to hear the Secretary of State for External Affairs refer to the economic situation. To my mind, there is one danger in our military preparedness, and that is that we may put so much into military preparedness that we cannot raise our standard of living. If that time comes, we are going to get a diminishing return from our military preparedness. I quite agree with the member for Peel that you cannot stop communism by military might. We will, of course, have to prepare to defend ourselves. Ultimately, the only policy for the destruction of communism will be to raise the standard of living of our people to show that all the people, from the least to the greatest, are of importance. Let us not forget that communism itself grew out of the despotism of the czarist government. May I say that the most tragic event in world history is the position the Russian revolution has reached today. So far as I have been able to read history, there was no event that had greater acclaim among the people of the nations of the world than the Russian revolution of 1917. It embodied a hope for millions of downtrodden and depressed people. Yet, it has come to the point where, in freeing the Russian people from the oppression of the czar, it has imposed a greater oppression than the czar.

A great many people still do not understand that. In common with the people who are hoping that if only Stalin can get around a conference table with someone everything is going to be all right, these people hope that, if the suspicions that the Soviet union has of the western world could be eliminated, everything would be all right. I am convinced it is not a question of suspicion at all. It is a question of a well worked out policy for world communism. The point I wish to stress particularly is the danger of putting too much emphasis on military preparedness. I wish also to point out that any economic assistance we can give to the nations of western Europe may prove to be of greater value than if we had put that amount of our resources into military supplies. Let us remember that communist aggression is not only external; it is also internal. At any moment all that has been gained in France and Italy might disappear, if economic conditions in those countries deteriorated beyond a certain point. I believe that, above all else, the western world must remember that the standard of living of the masses of the people must be raised. The people must be given the feeling that democracy means something more than the right to vote at an election. It must mean the right to live decently, the right to bring up their families and educate their children. It must mean all those things, as well as the right to take part in electing a government. If we keep these things in mind I think we shall be able not only to supply the arms we need for defence but to increase our production so that the arms may never need to be used.

Mr. Low: At this time, Mr. Chairman, I do not rise to speak at any great length on the resolution that is before us, but I thought it would be important for the Social Credit group to put its views before the committee at this stage inasmuch as this whole matter of external relations has come to be perhaps the most important problem that Canadians face. I say that because the term "external relations" includes, among other important things, the whole matter of our trading relationships with other nations.

At the outset I wish to say that my sympathies are certainly with the Secretary of State for External Affairs. I recognize all too well the fact that he finds himself surrounded by a set of circumstances the like of which few, if any, ministers of external affairs, foreign ministers or secretaries of state for foreign affairs ever faced in times before these. Because of the fact that our world relationships have fallen into such confusion, I believe that it is not the wisest thing to become carping critics. I think that the government must realize how tremendously important it is for them to take the wisest steps that men can take in full faith, and to feel that they have the backing of all the people. In his speech this afternoon the minister indicated a desire, I thought, to keep the people informed, and to have the people feel that they know what is going on. We realize that the minister cannot tell us many things that we may want to know. I can quite understand the difficulty of giving the people a running account—I think that was the term used by the minister this afternoon—of negotiations between the Canadian government and the governments of other nations of the world, or even a running account of some of the things that are taking place in the United Nations. But I believe that there are a good many things yet that could be done to keep the Canadian people more fully informed.

I cannot at this moment make specific suggestions as to what more could be done except to say that the minister and other members of the government should more frequently make before the house statements similar to the ones we have heard from the Secretary of State for External Affairs during the past ten days. The minister this afternoon mentioned the fact that he still has faith in the United Nations as our best hope for world peace. I suppose it is his business to have that faith; but I would suggest that it is the triumph of hope over experience; it must be. As the minister contemplates what has gone on and the position that the United Nations occupies today, with a split world, it must be an expression of hope that transcends the experiences of the past.

I suppose there is a good deal to be said for an international sounding board. The United Nations has often been called that. My experience there in 1947 impressed on me the thought that such a function might be a useful one. As the minister has said on one or two occasions, I believe—at least, if he did not say it here, he said it to me; and I am sure he would not mind my repeating it—they are not likely to be shooting while they are talking. I of course agree with that. But I believe that a danger arises out of that attitude. I am afraid that we might become so enamoured of the sound of our own voices in the United Nations assembly, security council and so on, that we are not aware of what is happening while we talk. It is perfectly apparent that while the nations have blustered, have talked, and have beaten the propaganda drum at the United Nations, communism has overrun and occupied country after country; and the United Nations has shown itself powerless to deal with this situation in any effective way. I know that there is no real use in standing up anywhere and uttering bellicose declarations—such as those I believe the minister had in mind this afternoon—against Joe Stalin, communism, Russia or anybody else. But I believe that we should be aware of the shortcomings of the organization we have set up. Not to be aware of those shortcomings, it seems to me, would be a great error of omission.

Let us look at the situation for just a moment and see how effective the United Nations has been with respect to one small matter; and at the time it looked as if it was a small matter. I refer to the problem of Israel. The United Nations decided upon a certain division of territory in the country in and around what is now Israel; and the various nations of the world agreed to that division. If anyone takes the trouble to look at the map today he will find that the territory occupied by Israel is far different from what was allocated to it by the United Nations assembly. Why is that? Well, there has been, by even small countries or small groups of people, toward any decisions of the United Nations, a defiant attitude which evidently that organization has been powerless to resist. Let us just look for a moment at the latest, namely, the effort on the part of the United Nations to set up in Jerusalem some form of administration for the protection of the holy places. I just call attention to Israel's defiant attitude toward that decision, and suggest that we have to be aware of the fact that even the smallest groups of people, the smallest countries, have been able successfully to defy that world organization, and make it tremendously difficult, if not impossible, to achieve the first step toward world peace.

Like the minister, I am full of hope that some way can be found of uniting the nations that have gone to the United Nations assemblies and meetings so that peace can be made effective; but I must say that my attitude has not changed in that regard since 1945, when on the floor of this house I pointed out the weaknesses of the whole United Nations charter and its set-up, which weaknesses, Mr. Chairman, have not as yet been altered or strengthened. I hope that some way will be found of strengthening them. In the meantime let us also look at another feature of this whole United Nations question.

When I was in New York in 1947 with the Canadian delegation I got the feeling that most of the nations of the world were using the assembly as a propaganda body—almost wholly as a propaganda body. I listened to speaker after speaker, not excluding our good Prime Minister, who at that time occupied the position of Secretary of State for External Affairs. I should like to say here that I did not hear him propagandize. I am proud of the fact that he stood up on the rostrum of the United Nations assembly, not long after it had opened in 1947, and gave a forthright statement of the Canadian position, which was not propaganda. I will say, and I think the Prime Minister will agree, that following that for weeks practically all we heard was propaganda.

Here was something also I noticed. I noticed that when Vishinsky spoke, or any one of the leaders of the communist satellite countries spoke, the United States press gave them great headlines, oftentimes the biggest they could get, and in red. I recall one day after Vishinsky had spoken we had a reception. In talking to some of the Russian delegates—if they were not delegates they were employees of the Russian delegation—they told me that Mr. Vishinsky had received as many as 30,000 telegrams from United States people congratulating him on standing up in the assembly and calling Dulles, and perhaps others, war-mongers. This occurred to me then. They chose New York as the site of United Nations headquarters, in supposedly the freest country in the world, with a free press. Russia and her satellites come over, and do they make the wisest possible use of those facilities! There was no attempt at evaluating news; no attempt at placing the proper perspective on what these men were saying. In the light of these things, what would happen if we had the headquarters of the United Nations in Moscow? I have wondered too, Mr. Chairman, whether the Canadian delegation has raised the question of holding an early meeting of the United Nations assembly in Moscow. Well, Senator McMahon, I believe it was, in the United States just the other day made the suggestion. I am not sure that he did not have something. It seems to me it might be a very useful idea for the nations to invite themselves to go to Moscow. I am not so foolish as to say that Moscow would invite them or even let them go, but I will say this: If the nations of the world publicized an offer to have an early meeting of the United Nations in Moscow it might perhaps influence the thinking of a great many people behind the iron curtain. Surely there are ways of getting that information to them.

In this assembly I hear talk of an arm of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation which broadcasts from our shores to foreign countries. Surely we can use those powerful radio beams to let the people of Russia know what we are suggesting, to let them know that our intentions are peaceful and all we want to do is to come to their country and let them see what it means to have a United Nations meeting in their country. I do not know what success we would have but it seems to me that it might be very useful. I know we would not get the press in Moscow. That is all too obvious. But there are other ways than getting the press. When I saw all of these delegations and employees running around New York—I suppose literally thousands of them—I thought that they themselves were a good propaganda body, and if they were in Moscow I can well envision the sort of information that would be spread around among the Moscovites. I think it would be all to the good. However, that is a thing which we cannot decide. At any rate I should like to see the Canadian delegation make the suggestion. I am sure they would find a good deal of support among the delegations from the other countries that are members of the United Nations.

If we cannot place too much faith in the United Nations at the moment what is our hope for peace in the world? I do not think that we can put too much faith in conferences. I do not mind having conferences, sitting down in a frank way and discussing the affairs of the world, the affairs of trade and those other things that are bothering human beings. Perhaps some good will come from them. But at the present time I do not believe that conferences—with the world divided into two camps and an almost irreconcilable philosophy separating the two camps—will bring us any nearer to an understanding with Russia and her satellites if Russia and her satellites do not want to make an effort to try to reconcile our difficulties. I cannot see very much use of that.

I was attracted, Mr. Chairman, by something that was said by a speaker just the other day and reported in The Ensign, to which I subscribe. I do so because I like to keep in touch with what the various elements of Canadian life are thinking. I think The Ensign pretty well reflects what the Catholic people as a body in this country are thinking and feeling. Maybe there is something in this—I believe there is. This is the way the article reads:

> Communist Russia's most powerful enemy was not the military or political strength opposing it, but the spiritual fervour of the Christian world.

This was uttered by Robert W. Keyserlingk, publisher of The Ensign, in New York. He reviewed the political events of the last twenty years, and said:

> The battle of the century appeared to be over political methods, but was in reality between two fundamental concepts of man. These are the totalitarian concept of man as a functional unit designed to serve the state, and the Christian concept of man as created by God to achieve, with freedom and liberty, his eternal salvation.

I think various members of this group, notably the hon. member for Macleod (Mr. Hansell), the very last time we took part in this debate on external affairs, drew to the attention of the house the fact that the conflict today must be looked upon as a conflict between the forces of righteousness on the one hand and the forces of unrighteousness on the other.

It must be emphasized, too, that those forces of unrighteousness are represented by the totalitarian nations whose concept is that man must be a cog in the wheel, subservient to a supreme state, receiving direction in a regimented fashion from the supreme state. On the other hand one must look upon the forces of righteousness as representing those peoples who have declared themselves in favour of the Christian concept, which holds that man is an individual, in himself, with a spark of the divine within him, that he should be the focal point of all activity, and that he transcends all other things.

I believe that in our efforts to find some way to peace we must always be aware of what the struggle epitomizes, and we must always be aware that in this great struggle we will have to take one side or the other. I feel sure the government and the minister will never desert the cause of the Christian concept, and that the government and minister will always range themselves on the side of righteousness.

In a world of violence, fear and poverty, the United States and Canada are an oasis of plenty, liberty and comparative security. That is why we in North America have a special duty in this struggle between truth on the one hand and godless error on the other. Those are the words of Mr. Keyserlingk, and I thoroughly agree with him.

We are facing fearsome things—fear of the hydrogen bomb, fear of chemical warfare, fear of germ warfare, fear of the continued spread of communism. But I think if we are to regenerate faith and if we are to find any hope for the future we will have to look entirely outside material things. We will have to look outside the puny powers of man himself—because we have got ourselves into such a muddle, into such a confused mess, that it is time we got down on our knees and sought humbly for the guidance of Almighty God to get us out of our difficulties.

I hold in my hand a statement—and I shall read it, because I could not phrase it in such fine words. I shall place it on record as the substance of my own faith and belief with respect to this seeking for world peace:

> Dire perils threaten the world. In the final analysis it will not be through treaties, conferences of the United Nations or any purely human methods. These things are wise and necessary. But only the prayers and sacrifices of mankind can save us all from threatening disaster. The latest developments of science endanger the very existence of our world and threaten the lives of countless millions. The fearful devastation of the last war is as nothing compared to what will come should men engage in another struggle. A return to God, then, in the true sense of the word, is the price of our salvation. The issue is clearly put to us.

As a Christian nation, one that prides itself on having followed the Christian concept, I believe we can find some comfort in that. Personally, I have not very much fear of the hydrogen bomb, so long as a substantial portion of humankind will acknowledge their utter reliance upon divine guidance. When we do that the hydrogen bomb fear melts into insignificance. But we have got to make it a reality, and not mere words. We have got to put into our lives, and show the rest of the world that we believe in the Christian concept. In our approaches to our international relationships we must speak by deeds and not alone by words.

And that brings me to this division of what I wish to say, the problem of setting our own house in order so that we may speak with a united voice and so that we can show to the world by the sermon of our actions that we believe what we preach.

For a number of months I have been trying to think my way through this whole business of what we should do about communism. While I was giving thought to that question I ran across this editorial on the Finance-at-Large page of the Globe and Mail for February 22, 1950. It made me think, as I believe it ought to make every Canadian think. This is what it says:

> The Combines Investigation Act in Canada is directed against combines, monopolies and trusts among employers, but it says nothing, says the Unioneer (dominion labour unions, 73 Adelaide street West, Toronto) in a leaflet about "this new creeping paralysis known as the monopoly of human beings." It regards with great anxiety, for instance, the ability of one man in the coal-mining industry, "to stagnate an entire continent and create hardship and suffering for countless numbers of innocent people." This gigantic labour monopoly is far beyond Canada's borders but has a great effect on the Canadian economy.
> This "hidden hand" is safely domiciled beyond Canadian law, says the Unioneer, and tends to deprive industry and workers alike of the right to think. The author of the pamphlet is glad to see communism now condemned on all sides by labour on its own initiative but he does not like the fact that the law here "makes no provision for safeguarding the personal liberties of the individual worker." It actually compels him "to relinquish those rights for purposes of collective bargaining."
> It is possible at any moment for a small group of men to shut down our basic steel mills, our coal mines, our railroads, our automobile plants and each and every one of them are vital to the well-being of our peoples. Such a combine should be brought within focus of the meaning of the law without favour or consideration.

I do not know whether all those statements are founded on fact, but what I have just put on the record points up the necessity of a good deal of soul-searching on the part of the Canadian people to see whether we have perpetuated in our own midst things which are just as communistic as the bolshevism of Russia. If we have, then surely it is our duty, if we want to fight communism successfully, to put our own house in order. Certain it is that a good many thousand people have become slaves to one or two or a small group of men under the labour laws as they now stand. Can it be avoided? I do not know.

What shall we do to fight communism? There is one thing I wish to suggest this afternoon. In addition to attempting to live according to what we believe, in addition to showing to the world in our lives as Canadian people that we believe the truth of the sermon on brotherly love, I think it is most necessary to launch an educational program based on reason.

One of the problems that we have faced in the past with respect to communism has been that all too often men and newspapers and periodicals have resorted to the use of fear and prejudice in an effort to arouse the people against this insidious thing. I do not believe that that does very much good. I do not think it helps to merely point out the horrors of communism and what it has been doing in countries like Czechoslovakia, Hungary, Bulgaria, Russia or China. People soon become immune to talk of that kind. All too frequently they say, "You have overplayed the horror angle."

My view is that we ought to resort to a well devised program of education based on reason and not on prejudice and fear. It seems to me that if we would plan and execute a Canada-wide program that would make a restrained and wise comparison between the regimented economy, on the one hand, and the free economy, on the other; if we placed all the facts concerning standards of living in the various countries which were represented in the effort to make the comparison before the people, the Canadian people would react much more favourably than they would to a program of hate and prejudice and horror.

Such a program could certainly be put out by C.B.C. and give C.B.C. at least one good reason for justifying some of the things it is putting out. Along with that most assuredly we must do, as the minister has indicated we should do—we must set our economic house in order. However, declarations of that kind lose a great deal of their strength when ministers stand up on the floor of this house and say that we have to resort to scarcity methods, as did the Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott) the other night. He said that if we are to help the people in the sterling areas with some of our surpluses we will have to cut down on our own internal consumption. In effect he was encouraging the restriction of production. That is the mentality of scarcity and it indicates a fear of abundance. It indicates a fear of attempting to organize within our country an economy of abundance.

I say that we have to change our mental outlook if we ever hope to organize Canada on a sound economic basis so that we can be of help in the world and be able to demonstrate that a free economy is better than communism, so that we can show to those people who have these little aberrations, sometimes called split minds—I mention Dr. Fuchs—that without doubt a private enterprise economy divested of the abuses that have crept in can create the best standards of living for the people of any type of organization known in the world. When we demonstrate those things and when by action we lift all of our people out of the realm of economic fear of the future, then we need not worry very much about the general masses of the Canadian people ever turning to communism.

I know that we are beset by difficulties in trade, I know that we are beset by great problems surrounding currencies and their convertibility and all that sort of thing, but the fact remains that we do have in this great country of Canada almost limitless resources, almost limitless supplies of power, almost limitless supplies of labour with which to produce a high standard of living for every Canadian. The possibilities are all there. Therefore, we should not allow ourselves to be restricted in any way in the production of abundance of goods and services. We should not allow ourselves to be restricted by any group of crackpots, such as the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) spoke of, in the distribution of that abundance so that our Canadian people can have freedom from fear and freedom from want.

I think the Canadian people could gain real assurance if the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) would stand up in this assembly and say to them, "We will do our utmost to see to it that no financial restrictions stand between the Canadian people and the abundance of good things that this country can produce." Secondly, if he would stand up and say "We will organize affairs so that not one man who wants gainful employment will find himself out of gainful employment," I am satisfied it would set at rest the restlessness among Canadian people upon which communism feeds and breeds.

I want to feel that we can stand on common ground with the minister of external affairs in his approach to international relations. I close with this declaration. Social Crediters are seeking earnestly for a sound program on which we can co-operate with the government in power for the establishment of international good will and world peace. We are not going to criticize the minister when he is doing his best, but we will criticize him and the government if we think that he has not been doing his best. Furthermore, we will criticize if we feel that Canada is not taking every opportunity to act independently. I am satisfied in my own mind that Canada has not been able to act independently in a good many cases. Surely we do not want to provoke any nation, but there are times when subservience is a whole lot worse than provocation. I do not want to see this country in a position of servility to any country or group of men in the world. So long as the ministry keeps us on an independent footing and resists with all its might those forces that are determined to enslave the bodies and souls of men, then we will support it. But if we feel that they are not, then we reserve the right to criticize and tell the world where we think they are going astray.

I liked the forthright statement of the minister the other day. It did not contain very much meat, and I do not believe he expected it to. I liked his forthright statement today so far as it went. I should like to have more information. I do not know whether we can get that information in the future, but I am going into the external affairs committee, where these estimates are to be reviewed, with the idea of getting as much information as I possibly can that is founded on absolute fact so that we can discuss these things intelligently at another time when these estimates are brought back to the committee of supply.

Mr. Bradette: Mr. Chairman, I appreciate the honour that the house conferred on me a few years ago when I was appointed as the first chairman of the external affairs committee. The same honour and the responsibility accompanying it were bestowed upon me again this morning as the chairman of the external affairs committee for the year 1950. Before proceeding further I want to pay special tribute to members of that committee in former years for the fine co-operation they have given on all occasions. A few days ago I asked the hon. member for Peel if he would again accept the appointment as vice-chairman of the committee, and I was most pleased when he said he would gladly do so. The fact that he is our vice-chairman means that, so far as the external affairs of our country are concerned, political aspects will not be involved in any way.

When the committee was first formed the former prime minister, Mr. William Lyon Mackenzie King, was secretary of state for external affairs. A few months later we found ourselves under the able guidance of the present Prime Minister. Now we are working under the enlightened and capable direction of the present Secretary of State for External Affairs. When the Secretary of State for External Affairs left a secure and responsible position to enter the hurly-burly of public life he made a sacrifice, but in answering the call it was the appeal of duty that influenced him most strongly. It is most fortunate indeed, not only for parliament but also for the whole of Canada, that he found it possible to accept the heavy responsibility of his department. One cannot help but mention his humility. I have seen him in action in the general assembly of the United Nations. I have seen him in action at Lake Success and Flushing Meadow. I have seen him preside over committees charged with grave responsibilities. I have observed his fine reflective mind at work, a mind in which everything is registered that is said at meetings lasting for hours. I have noted the great respect in which he is held by every member of the United Nations Organization. Not only is it a credit to himself but it is a credit to every citizen of Canada.

I also want to felicitate him and his delegation on the fine work they accomplished at Colombo and in many sections of Asia. Again he has represented us with ability and as a true statesmen. I believe in all instances he has reflected the Canadian attitude clearly and distinctly, and that it has been based on logic and wide experience. During the present session of parliament the whole of Canada has been impressed with the fine demonstration of his qualities of observation, his statesmanship and the heavy responsibility he has been carrying. His department probably involves the greatest responsibility of any department in the government today. Every word that he utters inside and outside the House of Commons must be based on logic, and must to some extent be circumspect. I repeat to the minister that he is doing a wonderful job and the Canadian people are proud of him.

I want to make a brief allusion to the statement of the hon. member for Peel about the information that hon. members should receive in the external affairs committee. The only instance that I remember where such a question arose was one that happened last year when some members of the committee requested that the ambassador to China should appear before it. Personally I was against it. Some members thought that we might have a sitting in camera, but I was against that. If there are questions in the minds of the Canadian people at the present time which require a sitting in camera, a meeting of a committee would not hold all those who would want to be there. In such a case the two houses of parliament should meet in camera but not the external affairs committee itself. I am expressing my personal opinion on the matter, and as chairman of the external affairs committee I would not take the responsibility under such conditions and circumstances.

At six o'clock the Speaker resumed the chair and the house took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

PRIVATE BILLS

PRAIRIE TRANSMISSION LINES LIMITED

Mr. W. M. Benidickson (Kenora-Rainy River) moved the second reading of Bill No. 9, to incorporate Prairie Transmission Lines Limited.

Mr. Cruickshank: Explain.

Mr. Benidickson: This bill is practically the same as another bill, under the same name, which passed the Senate last session, but was not voted upon by this house, nor advanced to a committee of the house for further study prior to the closing of the last session. During the last session, information was requested by members of the house regarding the applicants for this private bill. Criticism was directed at the fact that some of the applicants for incorporation were members of legal firms acting for the company desiring incorporation. It was suggested that more information should be supplied regarding the real applicants. The new list of applicants in this bill constitutes the only change from the bill presented last session.

The seven applicants, who will be the incorporating directors of the company, are all citizens of the province of Alberta. I believe they are known to many members of this house. They are associated with other prominent individuals in Alberta, British Columbia, Manitoba and Ontario, and they propose to maintain the ownership of this important pipe-line project in Canada. I am informed that they do not represent any United States corporation. These applicants are Canadian citizens who believe, as most of us believe, that Canadians are entitled to the fruits of the development of Canadian natural resources. Associated with them are prominent and successful engineers, as well as professional advisers. They have secured the support of investment bankers of substance, who have expressed their willingness to form a group to sell the securities required to provide the funds necessary for a project of this kind. The plans, and other aspects of the project, I believe could best be discussed in the committee on railways, canals and telegraphs, when representatives of the company would be available for questioning.

At the last session much time was taken by a few members of the house in general argument, so an opportunity was not afforded for examining in committee the merits of the bill or the plans of the company. Believing that the opponents of the bill had a full opportunity for expressing themselves in this way last session, I trust they will now permit a vote of the house, which will enable the committee to examine all matters in which the hon. members are properly interested.

The applicants for the incorporation of this company must have incorporation in order to apply to the various regulatory bodies for permission to build a pipe line to transmit gas from Alberta to the Pacific coast area in Canada and the northwest United States. I think it is desirable that I remind this house that this is simply a bill to obtain incorporation, in the same manner as charters were granted to the five other companies in the spring session of parliament last year. In that session, parliament also enacted a general Pipe Lines Act. Under this act, parliament gave the board of transport commissioners full power to regulate any interprovincial or international pipe lines. It is a requirement of that statute that any company proposing to build such a line must be incorporated by parliament. I submit that, parliament having so decided, it is the duty of parliament to deal with an application for incorporation when the applicants come here for parliament's decision. I say that parliament should now render a decision, yes or no. It is not good enough to intolerably delay a decision by unnecessary debate, which has been widely described in the press as filibustering.

After a pipe line company obtains incorporation here, it has to appear before several regulatory bodies. As I pointed out, the board of transport commissioners have been given jurisdiction so far as the dominion parliament is concerned. Under legislation passed in Alberta in July of last year, any company proposing to export gas from the province of Alberta must first obtain a permit from the Alberta petroleum and natural gas conservation board. In the third place, as we heard last session, there is an additional public control, in that any applicant proposing to export gas must obtain a permit from the Minister of Trade and Commerce, under the provisions of the Electricity and Fluid Exportation Act.

In this connection, I think it would be useful to briefly review the position with regard to this project, which I know has created a great deal of interest in the province of Alberta and in the House of Commons. The large discoveries of oil in Alberta in recent years have produced great reserves of natural gas. Providing a market for this gas will benefit the citizens of Alberta, and will bring about additional development of both oil and gas. The proposal to build a pipe line to serve not only British Columbia, but the Pacific northwest United States, is an important development for the future of western Canada. It should be noted that perhaps over 80 per cent of the output from any such pipe line will have to be sold in the Pacific northwest United States, in order to justify the tremendous financial cost of the pipe line itself. This will mean an extremely valuable source of United States exchange.

It is of primary importance, however, to see that the interests of Canada are protected in connection with this project. The announced policy of the government of the province of Alberta is to see to it that no export permit is granted until the interests, first, of the citizens of Alberta and, second, the citizens of other provinces of Canada are given priority. Moreover, the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe), in dealing with this very question during the last session, said this, as reported in Hansard at page 1560:

> . . . the attitude of the government would be that the export of gas would be treated in exactly the same way that we treat the export of electricity, namely, that the needs of Canada would be served first, and would be protected in perpetuity for all export purposes.

Later in the debate, at page 1806 of Hansard, the minister said this:

Vancouver must be served before any considerable service is taken off for supply to the United States.

Now, Mr. Speaker, what are the interests of Canada in this matter? I suggest that the primary requirement is to see that potential Canadian consumers are provided for before any gas is exported.

Not only the supply of gas but its ultimate cost to the Canadian consumer must be considered. This is an important factor in determining the route of the pipe line. I am informed this pipe line project will cost about $100 million. To finance it, an assured market must be available, as all members will appreciate. Bonds to pay for the construction cannot be sold, unless a market for the output of the line is assured. Where is this market?

In the Pacific area it is said that 85 per cent is across the line in the United States, according to the information that is given to me from engineering sources, in the cities of Portland, Seattle, Tacoma, Spokane and the industrial areas of the state of Washington. There, natural gas must compete in price with other fuels such as coal, oil and electricity. The problem then is therefore to construct a line which is economically feasible and which thus will establish reasonable prices for the Canadian consumers in British Columbia, which is some distance from the source of supply. Obviously, the shorter the line, the cheaper the capital cost will be and the lower the overhead charges; also, if the line passes through centres of population, the tapping of the line at intermediate points cuts down the per unit cost of transportation.

For these reasons, I am informed, the best engineering advice as given to the applicants for this charter at an early stage was that a route which proceeded from southern Alberta, through Kingsgate into the United States, across the flat plains of the state of Washington, with a branch line to Trail, and terminating in the Vancouver area, would cost approximately $20 million less than the cheapest all-Canadian route. Thus more gas would be sold by Alberta producers, and the cost to the ultimate consumer in British Columbia would be less than through a more expensive pipe line route. I do not propose to vouch for these engineering details. I think that assurance in this respect can best be obtained by hon. members as a result of seeing the engineers themselves, through examination in a committee of this house. I think that wise counsel was given to us in this respect last session by the hon. member for Coast-Capilano (Mr. Sinclair) when he said, as reported at page 2103 of Hansard of last year:

The only place where that can be decided is before the standing committee on railways, canals and telegraph lines where expert witnesses, engineers both for and against the pipe lines, can be called and give members of parliament actual and not ipse dixit information. For that reason I, as a British Columbian member who yields to none in devotion to my province, say that I will vote for the bills on second reading if only to get them where they can be properly studied in committee. Unless very sound reasons are given in the committee why construction through British Columbia is uneconomic, I will vote against the bills on their return to the house.

Then at page 2104 he goes on to say:

But I say they should get second reading and go to the standing committee on railways, canals and telegraph lines if only to give the members of this house and the people of Canada knowledge of the facts rather than the opinions of members of parliament, many of whom obviously have very little knowledge of the engineering problems involved.

A great deal of discussion at the last session of parliament concerned itself with this question of route. The applicants for this bill desire to build the pipe line along the most economic route to protect Canadian consumers both as to supply and as to cost. If the government of the province of Alberta, or the board of transport commissioners, or the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe), under the Electricity and Fluid Exportation Act, decides that the route of the pipe line should proceed from southern Alberta through Canadian territory to the city of Vancouver before entering the United States, I am informed that the proposed company would be prepared to build the line along this so-called "all-Canadian route".

The whole question of the route of the pipe line cannot be settled, however, until all the factors mentioned are considered by the regulatory bodies which have to make the decisions. Considerations arise from time to time—and they have arisen—which may change the ultimate decision as to the proper route to be followed. Another pipe line project is proposed to take natural gas out of the province of Alberta eastward into Saskatchewan and Manitoba. The available fields of gas in Alberta will have to be allocated as between these projects, and this consideration may affect the starting point of the pipe line. Large additional reserves of proven gas may be discovered before any permit is granted to any company, and this also might alter the starting point of a pipe line route. Economic developments in southern British Columbia or in some of the large United States cities might similarly affect the desirable final choice of route. The competition of gas from other fields in the United States, such as those in Wyoming, or of other fuels, may dictate the choice of the pipe line route.

When the government agencies concerned have weighed all these factors they will approve the route to be followed. Other things being equal, I am informed that the applicants for this bill will favour an all-Canadian route to Vancouver. As I said before, they are Canadians who have only the interest of Canada at heart, and have no United States interest to serve.

Before closing, Mr. Speaker, I just want to remind the house that there is in existence another charter giving rights with respect to the transportation of gas through a pipe line; and in this connection it should be observed that the Westcoast Transmission Company obtained a charter at the spring session of parliament last year, through a bill sponsored by the hon. member for Fraser Valley (Mr. Cruickshank). This bill was frequently referred to in the debates last fall and the company has been called the company proposing an all-Canadian route. As reported at page 2807, I think, of Hansard of last session, the hon. member for Fraser Valley said that he sponsored this company simply because it proposed to build an all-Canadian route. At page 2807 of Hansard the hon. member for Kamloops (Mr. Fulton) is reported as saying:

> When the bill went through last year we knew at the time the company was incorporated that the route would be all-Canadian.

I want to point out to hon. members, Mr. Speaker, as I did last session, that this company, Westcoast Transmission Company, has before the board of transport commissioners, and has never removed it, an application for a route comparable to the route that the engineering staff of this company, the Prairie Transmission company, and the Alberta Natural Gas Company, have indicated is probably at this stage the most economic route. I say therefore that it is obvious that parliament placed no restriction on the choice of routes by that company and that company has certainly not observed any such restrictions in its various applications.

The applicants for the incorporation of Prairie Transmission Lines Limited only seek to be placed in the same competitive position as Westcoast Transmission Company to propose whichever route is finally seen to be both most economical and most beneficial to the interests of Canada. No company should have a monopoly in this connection, and this is the view of the government of Alberta as shown by the telegram from Premier Manning to Senator Turgeon on October 17, 1949, which appears at page 1345 of Hansard of last year, and in which the premier says in part:

> The Alberta government is not opposed to the incorporation of the Alberta Natural Gas Company or any other bona fide company under the provisions of the dominion Pipe Lines Act, but on the contrary, feels very strongly, that no bona fide company should be refused incorporation if that refusal would deprive the province of its right to deal with any or all legitimate companies interested in exporting gas and would restrict such dealings to those particular companies favoured by parliament for incorporation.

Hon. members will have noticed that the leader of the Social Credit group from Alberta in this house stated, as reported at page 2113 of Hansard of last year:

> The Social Credit members in the house feel that these bills should be brought to a vote.

I think that most hon. members will agree.

Mr. Cruickshank: Will the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. Benidickson: Yes.

Mr. Cruickshank: I should just like to ask the hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River if the company he is sponsoring is prepared to abide by its application, and do as the other companies have done—agree to an all-Canadian route. Will they abide by that?

Mr. Benidickson: I have given the assurance, Mr. Speaker, that this company is quite prepared to build a pipe line wherever any of these regulatory bodies insist that it be built.

Mr. Cruickshank: I have one other question if the hon. member is willing to answer it. Am I correct in my understanding tonight, that the directors of the company he is sponsoring have been changed since the last submission.

Mr. Smith (Calgary West): Yes, they have some friends of mine on it, now.

Mr. Benidickson: I indicated that the applicants had been changed from solicitors of the company to those who will be acting directors at the early stages of the company.

Mr. H. W. Herridge (Kootenay West): Obviously some hon. members are somewhat impatient with the continuance of this debate on the pipe line bill. I do ask them to realize that the members from British Columbia who have spoken or will speak in this debate are giving voice to the opinions of the great majority of the people of that province regardless of party because, Mr. Speaker, this is a very important matter so far as the development of the interior of British Columbia is concerned.

Before proceeding I want to give some evidence to prove that the position taken by many of the British Columbia members in this house is supported by public opinion in British Columbia. In my hand I hold a clipping from the Victoria Times, dated February 28, 1950, which is further proof of the attitude of the government of British Columbia. The article is entitled:

All-Canadian route for Alberta Pipe Line Urged

Lands and Forests Minister E. T. Kenney said in the legislature Monday, "we must do our utmost to see that the all-Canadian route is selected for the proposed natural gas pipe line from Alberta to the northwestern United States. Preliminary engineering had been completed for an oil pipe line from Edmonton to Vancouver following the same route as the proposed gas line—through Yellowhead pass, south through Kamloops to Princeton, along the Hope-Princeton highway, to Vancouver.

"This line is 725 miles to tidewater, and shorter by 350 miles than a line from Edmonton south to Montana and westward to Vancouver," Mr. Kenney said.

Based on present-day costs, he continued, the proposed oil line was shown to be entirely feasible from a construction, operating, maintaining and economic standpoint.

The minister listed six benefits from the proposed transmission of natural gas along the proposed oil line route through British Columbia: it would provide cheaper fuel; Canadians would have first draw on the supply; United States dollars would be spent for construction; Canadians would be employed in construction, maintenance and servicing; new industries would be attracted; as a national defence measure the line would provide vital fuel requirements to strategic centres on the coast.

In addition to that, Mr. Speaker, we know the opinion of the attorney general of British Columbia as given to this house by the hon. member for Fraser Valley (Mr. Cruickshank) on Tuesday evening last. Before proceeding, Mr. Speaker, I want to say this to the house: a good number of my constituents, regardless of party, have asked me to thank the hon. member for Fraser Valley for his efforts in these pipe-line debates.

I now wish to quote from the Nelson Daily News. The Nelson Daily News is the largest daily circulated in east and west Kootenay. As a matter of fact it is a Conservative paper. I read it, of course, although it is not favourable to the party I have the honour to represent. In this editorial the Nelson Daily News represents the opinion of people in those districts. The editorial is entitled:

For the All-Canada Route

British Columbia has a particular interest in the movement in Alberta to have the proposed pipe line for the export of natural gas to the Pacific coast laid through the Yellowhead pass in the Jasper area and thence southward through the Kamloops, Princeton and Hope districts to Vancouver. The alternative route—southward through Alberta into Idaho and then westward through Washington and southward to Portland—would be of little benefit in this province as far as natural gas is concerned, and would present numerous other disadvantages from which the Yellowhead pass plan of the Westcoast Transmission Company Limited is free.

The maintenance road that would parallel a pipe line from Edmonton through the Yellowhead pass to Vancouver would provide additions to the existing highway system that would be of great importance in future development, points out the Victoria Daily Times. The feeder lines that could be run off the main line would supply natural gas at minimum cost to communities in the southern interior of British Columbia which at present are not so served. A loop from Kamloops, taking in Vernon, Kelowna, Penticton and Trail, for instance, would open up facilities of great promise. The export market to Portland would still be served, but it would be a market to be supplied after the needs of British Columbia had been filled. The route through the United States would put Vancouver in the position of being able to expect only the surplus unused by the American market.

The advantage of spending the major portion of the $70,000,000 construction costs in Canada rather than in the United States, is, of course, immediately obvious, and the prospects of development for Alberta and British Columbia areas now isolated from transportation and fuel facilities are readily apparent. These are among the considerations of importance to the dominion, and particularly to its western provinces, to which it is hoped the Alberta petroleum and natural gas conservation board will give full weight in assessing the merits of the pipe line companies' applications now before it.

After returning home at the conclusion of the last session of parliament I had the opportunity to address a number of meetings of various types of organizations and groups. I had the opportunity to meet a good number of my constituents, and I was then more firmly convinced than ever that the people in the southeastern portion of British Columbia are very anxious that members representing British Columbia stand up for Canadian rights in this matter.

The public opposition to these bills from British Columbia, which we are simply expressing in this house as members of parliament, is based entirely on the belief that Canadian communities and Canadian requirements should receive first consideration. Once we are assured that these requirements will receive first consideration our objection to these bills will be dropped.

In passing I might say that, belonging to the party to which I do, I would prefer that these pipe lines and gas lines be publicly owned utilities. We know at this time that we cannot give effect to our policies on this matter in this house at this time. Therefore we are doing our best to protect Canadian citizens, and British Columbians particularly, by advocating that Canadian requirements and Canadian needs receive first consideration.

I represent a constituency in the interior of British Columbia, namely, Kootenay West, which has vast natural resources, untapped natural resources, and which still requires great power developments to utilize these resources. I have grown up in that district from boyhood. I have seen the district developed from the pioneer stage to what is, shall I say, a semi-pioneer stage. We have in that district great developments in mining, lumbering and in smelting; but if we are going to have a balanced economy we require secondary industries.

In order to understand the point of view of the people I have the honour to represent I am going to place on record a few illustrations of the situation as it exists in my constituency. I know other members representing other constituencies in British Columbia will apply their local conditions to these pipe line bills.

As I said before, we have large mining, smelting and lumbering developments; but for years boards of trade, farmers organizations and other public bodies have realized the necessity for the development of secondary industries and have urged the necessity for the establishment of a pulp industry in the interior of British Columbia. They have urged the necessity for the establishment of a steel industry. So important is that to the interior of British Columbia, so important is the establishment of those industries and secondary industries that the British Columbia government has had a representative of the provincial department of trade and industry resident in Nelson for three or four years, whose sole duty has been to make a complete survey of natural resources and of industrial opportunities, power opportunities and possibilities for power development, and then to interest outside capital, industrialists and others in the possibilities for the development of secondary industries in that area.

Power is the great question which enters into industrial development in this age. We have our largest power development on the Kootenay river. The greater portion of that power is used and required by the Consolidated Mining and Smelting Company. Some of it is used for domestic requirements in the city of Trail and for other industrial needs in the southern Okanagan. Then, we have the city of Nelson served by the Kootenay river.

In addition to that we have some smaller electrical developments throughout the district serving the smaller villages, towns and cities. At the present time we have under development a large power project on the Arrow lakes at Watshan. Most of that power will be required to serve the northern Okanagan.

There is a great shortage of power for industry. We have one more great possibility for power development in the immediate future, and that is on the Pend d'Oreille river. That power will also be required by the Consolidated Mining and Smelting Company. So, in the future we foresee a continued shortage of power. That is one reason why the people in my constituency are so interested in these pipe line bills, and are so concerned about the service they should receive from an all-Canadian route.

During the latter years of the war, and shortly thereafter, an extensive survey was made of the industrial possibilities of the Kootenay area. As I said before, we have an opportunity for the establishment of a pulp industry. I believe we have one of the largest stands of pulpwood in North America, in the Columbia river basin, close to transportation. But we cannot establish a pulp industry in that area, even if capital were available, because there is not sufficient power to operate a pulp industry at the present time.

There is also a desire for the establishment of an iron and steel industry, because we have coal and ore. According to a report by the government of British Columbia there are 25,500,000 tons of tailings at Kimberley which have a 47 per cent iron content and a 27 per cent sulphur content. We have the other minerals and materials required to develop a steel industry; but that steel industry cannot be developed until we have the necessary power.

In addition, it has been suggested that we require a corrugated sheeting plant as a secondary industry in the interior. We supply a large amount of white pine, manufactured in blocks from the west Kootenay area, for the manufacture of matches by the Eddy Match Company Limited. We produce the sulphur for matches at Trail, in my constituency. In total we produce some 5 million feet per year of white pine in the form of match blocks which come to Ontario and other match factories for manufacture into matches. We believe we should have a match industry in Kootenay West, in the southeastern section of British Columbia, so that we would not be paying freight on pine and sulphur to and from Ontario, when we have all the materials required to manufacture first-quality matches there. I can see an hon. member from Ontario, who is in the lumber business, does not appear to agree with my suggestion.

We have clays of various types which make it possible to develop a brick and earthenware industry. As a result of research these facts have been established but, here again, we have not the available power. We have large quantities of birch, cottonwood and other types of timber on which could be based a very satisfactory veneer industry—again, use for power.

We have opportunities particularly for the establishment of shingle mills and additional small saw mills. But the big bugbear which confronts the man who opens a saw mill or a shingle mill, or any other small industry of that type, is power.

That is one of the reasons so many people in my constituency are interested in this development. We want a dehydration plant to take care of some of the surplus fruits, particularly apples, in the district. We need jam and canning factories. There is a great opportunity in that area for the development of a modest jam and canning industry. We have also an opportunity for the development of a plastics industry, and for the development of a very substantial furniture industry, because we have large quantities of those woods required to produce high-class furniture.

But these secondary industries will not be developed and cannot be developed in one district until we have the necessary power. Years of effort have been put forth by the people in Kootenay West in studying plans for the development of secondary industries. These efforts have been supported by the major industries, including the officials of the Consolidated Mining and Smelting Company, the owners of the larger lumber companies, the owners of mines and others, all of whom agree that if the whole community is to have a stable foundation, secondary industries must be developed. That is why this considerable and continual research has been carried on, and why there has been investigation into all aspects of the possibilities for developing secondary industries.

In view of the present shortage of power, and the likelihood of its continuing for years to come, is it not easy to understand the attitude of the people I represent when they see the possibilities of Canadian natural resources by-passing their district, and going into the United States to serve areas in that country first?

The oil and natural gas industry is a tremendous one. One has only to read newspaper reports, magazine articles and books published on the subject to realize that this is a big and profitable business. While it is immensely profitable in the operations end according to the balance sheets and reports that are issued in the United States, there have also been immense fortunes made simply by obtaining charters from legislatures and then selling them to other companies and benefiting by the advantage created by the charter.

There are those who say: Would you have a monopoly? I think we all know that if it is going to cost approximately $100 million to build this pipe line from Alberta to the Pacific seaboard there are not going to be two or three companies building pipe lines. If you examine the network of pipe lines in the United States you will find that there is a monopoly in each area served. No one will invest such large amounts of capital in a section where someone else is already operating. A pipe line is in the nature of a public utility and from the very nature of things must develop a monopoly, like other service industries.

It is argued that those who speak against these bills are supporting a monopoly because if all these companies get charters there will be three pipe lines built. We know that that is absolutely not true. Before concluding I should like to quote from an article in Fortune of December, 1949, entitled "Natural gas—Whoosh". If anyone is interested in the subject I shall be only too glad to let him have my copy because it is a most interesting article on the development and financing of natural gas pipe lines in the United States. This article reads:

> Just for the sake of argument, consider the type of business that should excite the interest of investors these days. First of all, the product of the business would be a household necessity, selling at a price practically everyone could afford. Second, the product would serve a major general purpose in commerce and industry, and would have other specialized industrial uses that were growing in number and importance all the time. Third, for its principal uses it would be better and cheaper than competitive products. Fourth, it would embody a minimum of labour cost, and hence a minimum danger of supply interruptions due to labour trouble.
> This ideal business would have a market outlet guaranteed for, say, twenty years; sources of supply guaranteed for a similar period, at prices agreed on in advance; and a huge, unsatisfied demand that would open vistas of indefinite expansion. The business would be largely depression-proof and would operate under conditions that virtually assured an ample return on invested capital. Finally, the securities of the business would offer strong speculative attractions.
> Whether any such ideal business exists no one can say with certainty; but a great many people thought they saw it in the natural gas pipe-line business—enough, indeed, to make natural gas the 1949 darling of Wall street.

Before continuing with this quotation may I say this: While those whose names appear in this bill may be residents of Alberta, I would wager one hundred to one that the financing will be done in Wall street, New York. The article continues:

> Their estimate as set forth in the foregoing paragraphs, explains many things. For example, it explains the high stakes at issue when the Senate, under pressure generated by the natural gas industry, recently rejected President Truman's renomination of Leland Olds to the federal power commission, the body that regulates interstate pipe lines. It explains why strong men are weeping and gnashing teeth in a battle of pipe lines to reach and serve the virgin New England market, and why important New England interests have cast aside their putative dignity in the scramble to participate. It explains why great insurance companies are investing hundreds of millions of dollars in natural gas pipe line companies (Metropolitan alone has invested $345 million to date), and why an investment trust was recently formed to specialize in natural gas securities. It explains why fortunes have been made on the promotion stock of new pipe line companies, and why common stock prices of the business have moved upward in the past four years, far ahead of the Dow-Jones industrial averages. It explains why the net profits of the business average nearly 20 per cent on sales, and why nearly every natural gas pipe line company is expanding furiously.

And again:

The fact is everybody and his grandmother want natural gas in a crescendo of demand that is insatiable, incalculable, and, in all likelihood, unsuppliable. United States enterprise capital, which regards a crying need much as nature regards a vacuum, has rushed in to fill the demand. Yearly capital expenditures of the natural gas industry increased twelve-fold between 1939 and 1948 (compared to a four-fold increase for all private domestic investment), and are now approaching a billion dollars a year.

And finally:

The Pacific north-west, which is now entirely on manufactured gas, also provides a large potential market for natural gas, but is left out of this calculation because it will probably pipe in its gas from the newly discovered bonanza field in Alberta, Canada.

An examination of a map of the United States showing the development of pipe lines indicates that the eastern and southern states are well covered, as well as California and the gulf area. But we find that the north-western corner of the United States is not served with natural gas or oil and, as this article mentions, that section is looking to Canada for its natural gas and oil. In view of the enormous demands in the United States for oil and gas, in view of the fact that the northwestern portion of the United States must obtain its gas from Canada, is it natural to expect that, if permission is granted to export gas through Kingsgate into United States territory, Vancouver or other portions of British Columbia are going to get satisfactory service?

We are very concerned about this because the people we represent are concerned about it. Therefore we oppose the passage of these bills because we believe that Canadian natural resources should first serve Canadian communities and Canadian needs. We believe that Canadian labour should profit from the development of this pipe line industry. We believe that Canadian industry should profit from the sale of the materials required to build these enormously expensive pipe lines. We believe that the treasuries of the governments of British Columbia and Canada should benefit from the continuous taxation which will flow from the building of these pipe lines on Canadian soil.

Therefore, as a member speaking for his constituents regardless of party, C.C.F., Conservative, Liberal or otherwise, I intend to vote against these pipe line bills until we are assured that Canada will be served first.

Mr. Daniel McIvor (Fort William): Mr. Speaker, I congratulate the hon. member for Kenora-Rainy River (Mr. Benidickson) on the able manner in which he has explained this bill. In fact, I think he has explained it so well that he has almost converted the hon. member for Fraser Valley (Mr. Cruickshank). I support this bill. We have considerable unemployment in this country. There are people who think we are heading towards a depression. Nevertheless here is a company ready to spend $100 million for the development of the natural resources of Canada. Why muzzle them?

Mr. Arthur Laing (Vancouver South): Mr. Speaker, I have no desire to delay a vote on this measure tonight, but I should like to say a word or two. I believe it is somewhat unfortunate that it is necessary for these corporations to come to this house in the manner in which they do because the only justification for our viewing their applications would be the greatest measure of broad objectivity that we could give them. I may have very little insight into the proceedings of this house, but I have seen little of the spirit of objectivity in the debate on these measures last fall and during the present session. I think that is essential if we are going to view them in their proper light. I am of the opinion that if we persist in our attitude of insisting before the incorporation of a company that a pipe line must take a certain route we will wind up without any pipe line at all. I think the stage will arrive when we will have an opportunity to call experts on this matter, and that will be when the bill is referred to a committee of the house. These are technical matters, and we will have an opportunity then to call experts in order to ascertain whether an all-Canadian pipe line is economically feasible or practically possible.

I think we can place great reliance upon the government of Alberta and their conservation board to look after the people of their own province and the other provinces of Canada. I think there is a statute on the books at the present time having to do with the export of such commodities. I am quite certain when the measure is referred to a committee we will have a better opportunity of impressing upon the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe) the advisability of protecting the interests of Canadians first before export is made to the United States. I think we are in no position at this time to say that these companies must not be incorporated until they can guarantee a certain route. If we proceed to the committee stage we will be placed in a position where we can call experts, and we will be able to criticize these bills and the provisions and plans of the various companies with knowledge in our possession which we do not now have.

I think that hon. members who have taken part in the debates on these measures last fall and at the present session have done the public a service in bringing to their attention the tremendous assets of the province of Alberta. We in the province of British Columbia are determined to co-operate and participate in the terrific development that is going on in their marvellous province, which I contend has the greatest assets today of any province in Canada. I was glad to hear the sponsor of the bill say that his company proposes to build an all-Canadian route if it is shown to be practical from an engineering point of view. I think the people of British Columbia would much prefer that that be done. In that respect I agree with other members who have spoken. We have a centralized area in the province of British Columbia. Within greater Vancouver we have sixty-two per cent of the population of the province, and the city is only sixteen miles north of the United States boundary. The great concentration of people in that one area leads to some of the problems and troubles we have at times in regard to unemployment. We want diversification of our industries in the province. Of course we do, but I am afraid, so far as these bills are concerned, unless we use that broad objectivity to which I first referred, we will find ourselves winding up without any pipe line at all.

Mr. D. S. Harkness (Calgary East): Mr. Speaker, like the hon. member for Fort William (Mr. McIvor) I should like to congratulate the sponsor of the bill, but my congratulations are in a little different vein than his. I should like to congratulate him on making a very good speech about a very poor case. As indicated by the sponsor, the bill is the same one as was brought before the house last year with the exception of a few minor changes having to do with the men who appear as incorporators. When the bill was introduced last year those of us who opposed it really only asked one thing. We asked that the people who were asking for incorporation should include in the measure the route which the pipe line which they were proposing to build would follow, and that it should be an all-Canadian route. I indicated personally at that time that so far as I was concerned, if that were done I would withdraw all opposition to the incorporation of this company or the other company concerning which a bill was before the house last session and again in the present session.

Surely that is not a great deal to ask. If these companies had done that before coming back to ask for incorporation this year I think they could have been assured of the bills passing almost immediately. It was on that ground alone that we took exception to them, and naturally continue to do so. The bills have not been changed, and for the same reasons those of us who were opposed to them last session are still opposed to them. It was pointed out at the last session, and I should like to reiterate it now, that a mistake was made when the governing pipe line bill was passed, in that provision was not made therein that a company applying for a charter for a pipe line must specify the route it wishes to follow, in the same way that a railway company applying for a charter must specify its route. Our contention was—and I think it is absolutely sound—that in this regard pipe line companies should be put in the same position as railway companies, and that the route must be specified before a charter will be granted. No railway would receive any consideration which applied to parliament and merely asked to build a railway. They would not be incorporated. They would have to say where they were going to build the railway, and certainly the same procedure should apply to pipe line companies.

On motion of Mr. Harkness the debate was adjourned.

Mr. Speaker: The hour reserved for private bills having expired, the house will resume the business that was interrupted at six o'clock.

The house in committee of supply, Mr. Dion in the chair.

DEPARTMENT OF EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

64. Departmental administration, $2,378,880.

Mr. Bradette: Mr. Chairman, I must confess sincerely that I speak with all humility and with some trepidation concerning the estimates of the Department of the Secretary of State for External Affairs. When we enter the national forum, the House of Commons, and realize all the difficulties that we in Canada have to face in solving the problems of dominion-provincial relations, for example, which are of most active concern to us at the present time in our national life, then it is easy for us to realize the difficulty we face in discussing external affairs, international problems and foreign relations. We cannot be dogmatic in these matters because, to some extent, we are dealing in the abstract. We cannot be definite, either, because the international situation is so fluid that it changes almost from hour to hour, or at least from day to day. It is, therefore, impossible for the Department of External Affairs, any member of parliament or any person in public or any walk of life to express an opinion and be positive that that opinion will hold good tomorrow as it does today.

This afternoon the member for Peel described, vividly and eloquently, the advances of science in the past few years. As a result of these advances, this world has shrunk and distances have practically disappeared. This situation should have brought a message of hope to the whole world, but what happened? Instead of having that one world, we now have two worlds. Most of the citizens behind the iron curtain might as well be on another planet as live in this world because they have no access, politically, culturally, personally or in any other way, to the other two-thirds of the population of the world. It is a monstrous thing, a thing that all the democratic peoples, and I believe the people behind the iron curtain as well, absolutely deplore. It is a sad thing to realize that in this year 1950, with all the advances we have made in civilization, in culture and science, there are countries like Russia, Czechoslovakia and Poland, just to name a few of them, that have discontinued all communication with the rest of the world. Almost everyone realizes the seriousness of the situation.

It is not the fault of the democracies. No matter what we may say or how long we may argue, I know the Canadian government, the British government or the government of the United States would not stop an individual Russian or groups or any citizen living behind the iron curtain if he wanted to visit one of these countries. In fact, if the Russian government were to say to the Canadian government tomorrow that a party of 200 young students wanted to visit our universities I know the gates would be wide open to every one of those students. At the same time, if we wanted to send some of our businessmen or men in public affairs to Russia, it would be impossible for them to make the visit. It is easy to visualize the wall which really exists between these countries.

This afternoon we have been theorizing about ways and means of destroying that wall. How could it be done? So far as our side is concerned, there is no wall. There is nothing put in the way of those people who are behind the iron curtain if they want to communicate with us. All we desire is that those people should be able to intermix with the other peoples in the world. One of the members has said that the democracies must see to it that the people have access to all the comforts of life. This is quite true. No one can quarrel with that statement. After all, we have reached a stage in our civilization when we should be ready to conceive that there should be no preferred class. The so-called good things of life should be available to every segment of society. We are not responsible for the present situation because freedom from want cannot exist in a world which has no freedom from war or the fear of war. This section of the world is not responsible for the fear of war. Our country has never waged a war of aggrandizement. We have participated extensively in the two great wars, but we have never asked for any territorial or maritime aggrandizement. We do not want the pound of flesh from anyone. All we want is to save and preserve the principles of democracy, freedom and Christianity. The same is true of the United States, South America, and all the democracies in the world.

We must be careful not to go too far, and to talk only of the benefits of our way of life, because if a democracy can give comfort and access to the good things of life, then some responsibility and obligation devolve upon the people living under such a system. There is a responsibility towards their brother man. People must sacrifice some of their own prerogatives and comforts for the sake of the whole. When we hear that the adherents of communism are men who have suffered deprivation, that is only partly true. How any English or French-speaking Canadian or a naturalized Canadian can be a communist is beyond my comprehension. How can a man, worthy of being called a Canadian, follow directives from the old czarist imperialism under a new disguise, whose spearhead is in Moscow? Study what happened in the espionage cases, and then ask yourself whether those people were downtrodden or needy. No; they were people in high places to whom this country had been good. All hon. members recall reading in the press about the case of Mr. Fuchs. That man had the confidence of Great Britain, the United States and Canada. He has held some of the highest and most responsible offices those countries could give. Surely that man was not suffering from want. He could have no quarrel with our way of life. That man certainly never missed a meal unless he wanted to. Again I say that we must be careful if we believe that communism is spread only in areas in which there is poverty. This is only partly true. Look at those who head the communist movement in all countries. Again I ask, how can any Canadian be a communist and be a traitor to his country? How is it that some young, intelligent Canadians will leave Canada, the country in which their forefathers lived, and go to that university in Moscow where they get their minds and souls polluted with poison against their own country? It is beyond my understanding.

I cannot see how any of the citizens of my own mother country, dear old France, can be communists. For centuries that nation has led the continent of Europe in the arts and sciences, and has contributed to the cultural attainments of the whole civilized world. In France today you are faced with a group of people who would stop the gifts received through the Marshall plan. How can they look at themselves and say they are worthy of the soil of France? There are men in France, however, who have been taking directives from Moscow for the last 25 years of their political life and are ready to be traitors to their own motherland.

As the results of the British election have been received here, most of us have been glad to note that the communists only received something like 65,000 votes. This is typical of Great Britain. I cannot see how a man of Scottish, Irish, English or Welsh descent, any one of those fine groups of people in those tight little islands, who have created one of the finest empires that the world has ever known, could be a communist. Great Britain has given freedom to many people and many nations and lately we have had the example of India and Pakistan. It puzzles me how a man in Great Britain, who thought anything of his ancestors, could go to that infamous university in Moscow which spreads poison in the minds of our youth and not be ashamed of his actions. I congratulate the electors of Great Britain upon what they did during the last general election, about communism.

I believe the same principle applies with equal force to the republic to the south of us. How is it possible for an American, who is worthy of the name, to belong to the communist party in the United States? This great nation has contributed towards development in science, industry, yes, and in prosperity which has been an example to the whole world—a nation that has the highest living standard in the whole world.

There are some men who call themselves Americans who follow the directives from Moscow and the communist party. Can anyone comprehend such a degenerated state of mind? Again I must confess to you, Mr. Chairman, that I cannot understand citizens of that type. It is absolutely beyond my comprehension, because an American, a Canadian or a Frenchman worthy of the name will never follow the brand of imperialism propounded for centuries by the czarist regime and which at the present time they are using in Moscow under the name and disguise of communism to spread into the other sections of the world. The same thing applies to Italy, a fine nation descendant of the Roman empire, a great blending of the Roman and the Greek civilizations which even in their days of centuries ago produced some great seed of democracy and freedom. No Italian worthy of the name will follow the dicta and dictates of Moscow. They have nothing in common, whether it is in civilization or in culture. These men—and I repeat it from this forum—are not worthy to be called Italians. I say that definitely.

When we speak of communism today, we realize that it is more than a political ideology. It is the old virus that has infested European politics for the last six hundred years, in the czarist regime, even prior to Peter the Great, and which has been trying to spread its tentacles into every section of Europe and Asia; and why the people outside Russia will play into the hand of that great imperialistic ideology is something that is absolutely beyond my comprehension.

Then as to Greece, that fine old civilization with which everyone is familiar. How grievously Greece has suffered. In the studies of our youth at the universities and houses of education at least one-fifth of our education is based on the old philosophy and reasoning of the Greeks. For nearly six years we have seen the sad spectacle of Greece fighting to save her own soul and her own sons. Some of the sons of that great civilization receive their direction from Russia, to foul and destroy their own country.

What about China? I am no prophet or son of a prophet, Mr. Chairman, but I am going to make this prediction. Before fifteen years have passed, China will penalize Russia, because China has many scores to settle. We must visualize this fact. China, an Asiatic nation, always considered Siberia as an integral part of the Asiatic continent; and she always resented infiltration into Siberia, whether it was by politics or by force of arms into Siberia. How could the Chinese government, or Mr. Mao or the Chinese people take their directives from communistic Russia? What about Manchuria? Is Manchuria not an integral part of the great nation of China? What about outer Mongolia? Again these terrible claws of communism have taken hold of outer Mongolia. What about inner Mongolia? That again is an integral part of Chinese Russia. What about Tibet? It is true that Tibet wants to remain independent, but at the same time you can see the communist bear preparing to put one of its claws on that fine little nation. In their present turmoil the Chinese people may not see very clearly the situation as it exists with regard to their aspirations and the integrity of their own soil; but the day will come, and I believe it will be soon, when even Mr. Mao and the leading Chinese will realize that there can be no real friendship between them and Russia, and they will use all their might to shake the Moscow yoke. It is true that in the past history of China some European powers have in some instances violated the sacred soil of that great nation, but no nation went half-way or one-tenth of the way, as Russia did against the Chinese and against the Chinese nation.

In a discussion of that kind it is hard to choose and develop a special subject; but at the same time I believe this is the time and place to mention the economic war which now prevails and which we deplored after the war of 1914-18 but which has become almost as greatly accentuated after the second great war. I speak of trade restriction and of tariff walls between the nations even outside the iron curtain. Two or three years ago, speaking in these precincts, I made the statement that I hoped fervently that the day was gone when, on the frontiers of the democracies, there would be an economic war. There is today to a certain extent an economic war between Canada and the United States, because if you want to sell or to buy, in many instances you find some restrictions; you find, in many cases, a tariff which is irritating not only to our national economy but also even to the economy of the United States. It has been refreshing to every Canadian to note what it meant in the civilized world when they heard the statement made a few weeks ago by Mr. Paul Hoffman, who is director of ECA, that he wants 270 million Europeans to buy freely from one another. That is revolutionary. I am reading the heading from Life magazine. There is a message that carries great import and also some lessons with regard to the American nation. As a citizen of this country I can say that there have been many occasions when I have been baffled in my own mind when that great republic to the south of us, although we have always been their best customer, found it expedient—I am speaking of the past, not of the present; and I am speaking of the matter of tariff restrictions—to slap the Canadian nation in the face. Today, with regard to the Marshall plan, the United Nations is doing something that has never been done before in the world; because no matter what we may say, when we in Canada wish to help Europe make some gifts, to some extent we take something away from our Canadian people; and to a larger extent the same principle applies to the Americans.

Is the great United States going to make the same error it made after war No. I? In those days the economists of the United States expected that Great Britain, France and the nations in Europe would be able to liquidate the debt they owed to the United States without selling to the United States. The thing is absolutely impossible. When Mr. Hoffman, quite rightly, asked the European nations to destroy the walls which really are evidence of an economic war between the European nations—between Belgium and France, for example, between France and Italy, between Germany, Holland, Luxembourg and many other nations—he is speaking as a man of logic; and he knows in his own mind that even the American nation has suffered itself because of some of the restrictions which they applied so strictly and so vigilantly in the past. If we maintain an economic war, there is very little chance of its being entirely successful even on our own side, because there is always a price to pay when you stop the natural flow of commerce and finance of the countries of the world. You cannot get away from that fact. After world war I—and I know whereof I speak because I have relatives who still live in Normandy—the French government was bonusing the French farmers for producing wheat which cost the French government twice as much as it would have cost to buy from Canada. That was not good economics then; it cannot be good economics now. Even in this country we can learn something too. At the present time we hear that if we import certain lines of goods from Great Britain, some of our industries may suffer. Let us be fair about the matter. I do not believe that they will suffer grievously—if we try to understand one another—if we try to make trade a little more free than it is at the present time. I am not speaking as a free trader, but of freer trade, and I am speaking of some of the anomalies that have existed in Europe and in the Americas for the last four years and to some extent at the present time, and present a dangerous situation indeed, which, unless it is dealt with diligently and intelligently, may be the causes of great disharmony and friction even among friendly nations.

Surely experience should have taught us to be reasonable, to try to see the points of view of the other nations. No doubt hon. members have read an article which appeared in Reader's Digest of February last, I believe it was. At the present time, as hon. members know, they are erecting in New York a huge building for the United Nations, which is being financed actually by the United States treasury, but which will be eventually paid for by all of the nations that belong to the United Nations Organization. They have not bought any material from outside the United States. I do not say that in a critical way, but I am just mentioning things that should be mentioned among friends. When we talk of an Atlantic pact we should also talk of an economic pact between all these nations so that it will be possible to deal more freely with each other than we do at the present time.

We have more than that. In the building of the United Nations we have the spectacle of the marble coming from Vermont in the United States. As you know, some workers said they were not going to use it in the building because it was not polished in New York. This shows you what is going on in our own sections of the world. Things like these are non-existent on the other side of the iron curtain, but we do not want the conditions that they have, though on that score we may learn something from them. There the leaders dictate to the people. The people are doing things about which they have no say. When they reduced the value of the ruble over 60 per cent a few years ago Russian soldiers, Russian farmers, all the Russian people had nothing to say about it. Overnight they lost practically all their savings. We do not want conditions like that to come to the civilized democracies of the world, but at the present time our own world must of necessity know of the dangers that exist so far as an economic war is concerned. There is always some danger in a tariff war, and it generates friction and apprehensions. No matter how we look at it, there is always an element of an uneasiness because there is not the free interchange that there should be between the nations of the world. If we do not buy more from Europe the situation will not get much better in the United States or Canada. When you come to think that only $1 billion more worth of goods bought from Europe would make all the difference in the world to those nations while the national production in the United States represents over $60 billion of trading you can readily understand what a small minority group or irritating tariffs and restrictions can do to the national and international economy, and to all intents and purposes we must try to avoid those circumstances, and causes of friction and restricted trade.

Speaking of the two worlds and the dangerous situation that exists at the present time, I cannot do better than to quote the words of the present Secretary of State for External Affairs in a speech he made three years ago in the city of Montreal:

> The greatest menace to peace today is this division of the world into two basically opposed forms of society; a division which transcends all national boundaries. One form which respects the dignity and decency and liberty of the individual and in which government is justified only by the contribution it makes to his welfare; the other, in which the individual is nothing but a mere cog in an inhuman machine, where there is no rule of law, and where the omnipotent state moulds the man into conformity with the mass, and if he will not so conform, crushes him.

I want to say a few words about the United Nations Organization. There have been some criticisms of its achievements. As far as I am concerned, studying all conditions under which it has to work starting from San Francisco, I have only words of praise for that fine world-wide organization. It is true that, like the old league of nations, human ambitions, nationalistic ambitions, and nationalistic interference are also playing their role and stultifying and fouling some of the activities of the United Nations Organization. Let us visualize for one single moment that tomorrow, for instance, if tomorrow we could have co-operation from the Soviet republic as we get it from the other nations of the United Nations and her satellites. What a difference it would make immediately in the whole world, to every nation of the world, if we could get that co-operation.

I had the honour to represent Canada as a delegate to the United Nations Organization. At the general assembly we knew beforehand what the vote would be. We knew it would be six or seven or eight at the most. It would be Soviet Russia with her satellites, no more and no less. Every time that any democracy brought anything forward for the good of mankind as a whole we were sure what would happen so far as the Russian delegation was concerned.

I believe it was the hon. member for Peel (Mr. Graydon) who said very feelingly and very sincerely that he would like to see the heads of the countries of the world get together around the conference table. I agree with him to some extent, but I believe that the initiative should come from Mr. Stalin. He has never left Russia as far as we know, certainly not since the war has been over. Surely all the heads of the democracies have shown a willingness to meet the leaders of Russia in any section of the world.

There is one man today who could give the greatest measure of hope to the whole world. If tomorrow Mr. Stalin would say, I am inviting the heads of the countries of the world to come to Moscow and discuss together for two or three weeks the matter of peace in the world, it would be the greatest step toward peace that the world has known in the last six or seven years, and that message would be received with great jubilation by all mankind.

Let us not fool ourselves about that situation. You cannot deal with an adder just as you can with a walking stick. There is too much danger in an adder; it will poison you. You cannot be passive with it. Nation after nation, diplomat after diplomat, delegate after delegate have all spoken on this subject at the United Nations. Some outstanding men from Great Britain, from France, and from the United States and many other nations went over to Russia time and time again, and in many instances they came back with words of hope coming from the lips of Stalin himself. They did not have their backs turned, were not back in their own country, before the word of the head of one of the greatest nations of the world had been thrown into the wastepaper basket and deliberately repudiated by his actions. Can you deal with men of that calibre? Can you expect that they will change their ways?

I repeat, even if we have to go to Moscow, the message must come from the leaders of communistic Russia and from her satellite countries. We have made some errors, but they certainly have made some terrible mistakes. We have to co-operate with them, but they have never given a single sign of wanting to co-operate with us. We know that war is no good, that it practically never solved anything. We know that war No. 1 was a calamity to all participants. We know that war No. 2 has not solved any problem; in fact it has accentuated the older problems and created numerous new ones. Surely the heads of states in Soviet Russia, precisely as we do in the democracies, realize that another war with the new terrific equipment of destruction that human inventiveness has created might mean the end of civilization as we know it. Do we realize for one single moment, when we see fifty planes flying through the skies of the United States or of Russia, that they could destroy ten or fifteen million lives? We do not realize the import that there is in this message. But not satisfied with the present ravages that could be caused, human inventiveness is creating at the present time a bomb which it is said will have a thousand times the power of the atomic bomb. Therefore even the winning nation of the next war will not benefit in any way because it will have in its possession a devastated world in which the problems we are facing at the present time will look absolutely puny and insignificant in comparison with what they would be facing then.

In a few months, and perhaps two years at the most, they will be opening up new quarters for the United Nations in New York. During the last war, I believe in the year 1943, Life magazine sent some of the best United States artists to depict the scenes in the Pacific field of war where, with the help of Australia, the Americans were able to come back step by step and eventually crush the enemy which almost destroyed at least a part of the great nation's navy at Pearl Harbor. It was a terrific struggle, when tens of thousands of young lives were nipped in the bud, young boys who had no quarrel with the world, boys in the prime of life, thinking of love, thinking of home, thinking of their parents, thinking of their wonderful country, of their future, just at the threshold of life with all its hopes and enchantments.

They were fighting thousands of miles away from their homes, under the most horrible climatic and other conditions to which human beings could be subjected or under which they could fight. While I have not the issue before me, I did see in one issue of Life magazine a portrayal by artists of what happened in the raw, the horrifying disaster which befell thousands of young men who were pulverized on the shores of some of those islands, when they were jumping from one point to another so as to reach Japan and the Asiatic continent. I saw where corpses lying for days on the beaches had become bloated up to three or four times their normal size. One could see the wounds, with the blood gushing from them. One could see the long rows of crosses which marked the end of the lives of those who had been lost while fighting for freedom and democracy.

And I am reminded particularly of those in Great Britain who lost their lives, and the great sacrifices that all the people had to make. As a Canadian of French descent I was sometimes sceptical of what was described as the bulldog spirit of the British people; but I implicitly believe in it now. Because when you found the people on that tight little island holding the fort against the hordes of barbarism, holding it with the rampart of their human flesh for over a year, then you had to believe in British leadership and the British bulldog spirit.

I would want those who are responsible for the construction of the new buildings which are to house the United Nations Organization to be free to ask artists and sculptors to depict in marble, stone or granite, works of art to be placed right below the rostrum in the general assembly, scenes which would remind us of that great loss of life for the sake of the world and to make it as lifelike as possible. Because those boys —Russian, German, or Canadian—boys from all the armies, had no quarrel with anyone. They were all young, in the prime of life.

I am reminded of having watched the trooping of the colours by our young boys in the R.C.A.F. during the last war. They were fine and clean-cut. And I saw them coming up to parliament hill. How fine they looked! How full of life and hope they appeared to be! They were wearing the blue uniforms of the Royal Canadian Air Force. And as I watched them I said to myself, "How many of those fine boys will never see their homes again! How many mothers and fathers of those lovely youth of Canada will never see their sons again—because they will be dead!" I wondered how many of those lives would be lost away from Canadian soil. None of them had any quarrel with other nations of the world; in fact, no quarrel with anyone. But they answered the call to do their duty.

I say that, if possible, in front of the rostrum, in a special place, we should have in that United Nations building evidence of those thousands of mutilated cases, representing our boys—and our women, too—who lost arms or legs or who have been maimed for the rest of their lives. Perhaps some of them would go there and take their seats, before the commencement of deliberations in the assembly and remain there so that all nations in the world would realize the great price of war. No one could fail to see and understand evidence of this kind. Perhaps we should have there some mothers, perhaps we should have some wives who lost their young spouses, who never saw them again—young wives who to their last days will weep their eyes out because they lost their husbands in those times of tremendous stress, lost their husbands through no fault of their own.

I say these things sincerely, because if my suggestion were followed it would bring to our deliberations some realism, which one does not always find in the United Nations Organization.

I thank the committee for the close attention it has paid to what I have said. There is hope in the world yet. It is true that to some extent we have to worry; we have to hope and pray, and not despair; for worry never solved any problem. Surely God Almighty, a kind Providence, has not brought into being His jewel of creation, our world, surely He did not place men and women on this earth and infuse into them the spark of life and of divinity, only to have them destroy themselves. I am sure if they did that it would be as the result of works of their own creation and their own will, of their own passions, their own greed, but not by the will of God.

The leaders of great nations must realize that in our times they hold in the hollow of their hands perhaps the destruction of tens of millions of people. What human being worthy of the name could avoid that responsibility? What government would deliberately start such a catastrophe? They hold in the hollow of their hands the future of civilization as we know it.

By the design of our Creator, we pass through space at a terrific rate in a great journey drawn at some points in the heavens. If destruction comes, then it should come naturally, and not be caused by human beings. When I think of the great attraction felt by our planetary and solar system through space I am convinced that we are bound for a wonderful rendezvous where all will realize the greatness of creation in the Creator's infinite.

Let me say again, and with sincerity, that when one travels outside Canada the greatest word he can say is that he is a Canadian. It is the open sesame; doors are always open to you. I believe that is true because within one generation Canada has given twice of her blood and her riches and her services for the maintenance of freedom, democracy and Christianity. She has given those things we cherish most. When we attend these deliberations we do not draw a curtain across Canada; rather we extend a hand to every nation of the world to do everything possible within our power to make the world a better place in which to live, for the benefit of all.

May I conclude my observations this evening by placing on record the words of a great scientist, a controversial personality who has been in the forefront of the news for the last three years, in the United States. I refer to Mr. David E. Lilienthal, and I would quote one paragraph which I saw yesterday in the Christian Science Monitor. Mr. Lilienthal was formerly chairman of the atomic energy commission and knows not only about the destructive but also about the constructive possibility through atomic energy and the hydrogen bomb. He does not despair, because he believes implicitly in the goodness of mankind. A report of a meeting a few days ago in New York states this:

> If they allow themselves to wallow in the dark side of atomic energy, instead of realizing that mankind has "always stumbled onto solutions when it is under pressure," Mr. Lilienthal warned the American people, they never will realize the great potentialities in nutrition, medical science, and industrial development that can be theirs. But he added, "Thank God for the common sense of the American people."

And I am sure, had he been speaking in Canada, he would have said the same about the Canadian people. It continues:

> "We have to have faith in the Creator of all of us," he declared, "that He did not create man in His image and endow him with the ability to unlock the secrets of the atom to destroy the beautiful earth and all that is in it."

May God grant us the vision and strength, through our most ardent prayers, to bring about a speedy and lasting peace.

Mr. Drew: Mr. Chairman, first of all I do wish to say I feel sure every member in the house will echo the words of the hon. member for Cochrane (Mr. Bradette) when he said so confidently that there is hope. There is great hope, so long as the people who have the responsibility for expressing opinions, as the chosen representatives of the people in free countries, remember the lessons of the past, and with a clear recollection of those lessons discuss the problems of the present in terms that leave no doubt about what we are thinking or what we intend to do, and the responsibilities we are prepared to accept for the preservation of peace, for which so many of the youth of the world have died.

In the light of those remarks I can only express my regret that at this critical moment the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Pearson) should have given this house today so little real information in regard to Canadian policies. The whole future of our domestic security, the hope of employment, of prosperity and of doing those things within our borders that we think should be done, depend upon the possibility of avoiding that measure of destruction which has been pictured here in different speeches today.

Both in the speech which the Secretary of State for External Affairs made earlier in this house and in his speech today, it would almost appear that he is unaware of the existence of China. Today China represents the most critical spot in the whole world and any presentation of foreign affairs by the minister responsible for that branch of government which ignores the critical problems of that great area at this moment is an address to this house which hardly does credit to the hon. members who sit here.

After all, the future peace of this country is not something that rests alone with the Secretary of State for External Affairs or with the government. It is not only the right but the duty of every hon. member of this house to have that information which is essential to a full understanding of what course Canada proposes to follow in the days, the weeks, the months and the years ahead. A statement that our policy is related to the policies of the United Nations is hardly an adequate statement of our position at a time when events are moving with a rapidity which sometimes makes the news of last week appear like the news of very long ago.

There is one particular subject in connection with the whole situation in China which has been passed over casually and this house has not yet received any information which would give the views of the government as to those considerations which should be in the minds of members of this house and of Canadians generally in regard to the extremely important question of the recognition of the Mao regime in that country. There was a suggestion that the Secretary of State for External Affairs had that subject in his mind today when he spoke about the possibility of a change of address of the recipient of any possible message that may be sent.

It is not necessary, however, to seek to interpret those vague words, which are almost as vague as many other words in his speech, because this is a subject which has been dealt with in fairly explicit terms within the past few days. Whatever uncertainty there might be in anyone's mind as to the authority of General A. G. L. McNaughton to speak with knowledge of the intentions of the government in regard to military affairs, there can be no doubt about his knowledge, authority and responsibility when he speaks about the activities of the United Nations, particularly about the atomic energy commission of that body. He is the representative on that body appointed on behalf of this country by the Canadian government. Therefore, a special significance attaches to the statement he made in Ottawa in a public address on February 23. Before quoting his words I should like to explain the subject to which those words referred. He was speaking of the difficulties which had arisen in connection with dealing with the whole problem of the control of atomic energy because of the fact that the delegates from Russia and the satellite countries had walked out of the meetings of that commission and of other committees of the United Nations. He then used these words:

> Unfortunately the further progress of these meetings has been held up by the soviet refusal to participate as long as the Chinese delegate represented the nationalist government. However, there is reason to expect that the meetings will again be resumed shortly when this difficulty has been overcome.

Those words are open to no doubtful interpretation. They mean one thing, and one thing alone. They mean that the difficulty raised by the presence of the delegate who now sits there representing the nationalist government is to be removed and the demands of the Russians in regard to the recognition of the Mao regime are to be carried into effect. With that before us I think it is the responsibility of those members of this house who have views on this subject to express those views now. Of course the government has the responsibility of making the decision, but the time to express those views is before that decision is made. The subject of recognition was dealt with earlier in this house when the Secretary of State for External Affairs was discussing this matter during the last session. He indicated the possibility of the recognition of the communist regime in China. He then explained the conditions which it would be necessary to see fulfilled by that government before recognition would be extended. These were the words he used, to be found at page 1838 of Hansard for November 16, 1949:

If the fact of communist control of China is demonstrated and an independent—I stress the word "independent"—Chinese government, able to discharge its international obligations, is established there, which is accepted by the Chinese people . . . we will in due course and after consultation with other friendly governments have to recognize the facts which confront us.

That statement raises three important conditions. First, the government of communist China must be independent; second, it must be able to discharge its international obligations; and third, it must be accepted by the Chinese people. This raises certain questions as to what recognition really is. There has been a good deal of discussion of this subject in the press. It is necessary to deal with it as an academic subject so that in examining the broader picture we may use the word "recognition" with full knowledge of what it has meant, what it is intended to mean, and what it means today as a diplomatic term. One of the greatest experts on international law in the world today is Professor H. Lauterpacht, professor of international law at Cambridge university. In a recently published article on this subject, this recognized authority on international law dealt with the principles which govern recognition, and he placed them under four headings. Quoting from his statement I read:

1. Recognition is a declaration of an existing fact. Whenever the requisite conditions of governmental capacity exist recognition is due as a matter of right.

Then there is amplification of that and an explanation of the term. Point No. 2 is as follows:

International law prohibits premature recognition of the revolutionary government. So long as the lawful government has a reasonable prospect of reasserting its authority, recognition is an unfriendly act and a violation of international law. The presumption is in favour of the established government. As Sir William Harcourt, who was the first Whewell professor of international law in the university of Cambridge, put it in a letter to The Times during the American civil war,

"A friendly state is bound to exact very conclusive and indisputable evidence that sovereignty of a government with which it has existing relations over any part of its former dominions has been finally and permanently divested."

[Mr. Drew.]

Carrying on with the quotation from Professor Lauterpacht's article, it reads:

On the other hand, "to maintain that the lawful government holding out in one isolated fortress is entitled to continued recognition de jure is to strain to breaking point an otherwise unimpeachable rule." It is a question of fact, to be ascertained in good faith, whether the authority of the lawful government has become purely nominal.

The third point is as follows:

Can recognition properly be given to a revolutionary government the support of which by the people is not evidenced by, to use a phrase of Jefferson's, "the will of the nation substantially declared?" Is effectiveness pure and simple the decisive test or is a subsequent legitimation of the revolutionary change by a freely expressed popular approval an essential requirement of recognition? That was a condition of recognition sometimes insisted upon by Great Britain until the first world war. That was also the practice of the United States, especially under President Wilson. But that practice, rational and desirable as it may be, was abandoned after the first world war and is not at present a part of the law. It may be revived when the right of man to government by consent has become part of the positive law of nations suitably guaranteed and enforced. That day is not yet.

Then there are further observations in regard to that point, and I quote now from his statement as to point 4:

There is, finally, the question of the willingness to fulfil international obligations and of assurances to be given to that effect by the government recognition of which is under consideration.

I should like to read that fourth point again.

There is finally the question of the willingness to fulfil international obligations and of assurances to be given to that effect by the government recognition of which is under consideration.

Even if the first three conditions were met, a question might well be asked as to whether the fourth condition can be met at the present time by the Mao regime in China. But while Professor Lauterpacht can well be regarded as an outstanding authority on this subject, he has overlooked one very important consideration. When he points out that a condition of recognition sometimes insisted upon by Great Britain in the past was that there was evidence of popular approval of the government, that situation no longer exists. He seems to have forgotten the decision of the United Nations in December of 1946, when, rightly or wrongly, they definitely laid it down that consent of the government is a consideration. It was on December 12, 1946, that the general assembly of the United Nations adopted a resolution dealing with the Franco government in Spain. I think it would be well to read part of that resolution. I am quoting now from the record of the assembly:

Convinced that the Franco-Fascist government of Spain, which was imposed by force upon the Spanish people with the aid of the Axis powers, and which gave material assistance to the Axis powers in the war, does not represent the Spanish people, and by its continued control of Spain is making impossible the participation of the Spanish people with the peoples of the United Nations in international affairs;

Recommends that the Franco government of Spain be debarred from membership in the international agencies established by or brought into relationship with the United Nations and from participation in conference or other activities which may be arranged by the United Nations or by these agencies until a new and acceptable government is formed in Spain.

Mr. Pouliot: May I ask the hon. gentleman who sponsored that statement?

Mr. Drew: I believe the hon. gentleman is well aware of that, but I would be happy to hand over this record afterwards.

Mr. Pouliot: It is a polite question.

Mr. Ferguson: For once in your life, it is a bright question.

Mr. Pouliot: The hon. member should keep quiet.

Mr. Drew: I do not regard the question as in any way impolite, but I would point out to the hon. gentleman that there were several sponsors. I imagine he is referring to the fact that very strong support of this motion was put forward by the U.S.S.R., and by certain satellite powers, as well as by other nations.

Mr. Pouliot: Thank you.

Mr. Drew: I continue now with the quotation from this resolution:

Further desiring to secure the participation of all peace-loving peoples, including the people of Spain, in the community of nations;

Recommends that if, within a reasonable time, there is not established a government which derives its authority from the consent of the governed, committed to respect freedom of speech, religion and assembly and to the prompt holding of an election in which the Spanish people, free from force and intimidation and regardless of party, may express their will, the security council consider the adequate measures to be taken in order to remedy the situation;

Recommends that all members of the United Nations immediately recall from Madrid their ambassadors and all ministers plenipotentiary accredited there.

The general assembly further recommends that the states members of the organization report to the secretary general and to the next session of the assembly, what action they have taken in accordance with this recommendation.

That is a resolution on the records of the United Nations Organization. Without discussing the merits or otherwise of that resolution at the moment, the fact remains that by a majority vote sufficiently large to commend the observance of the members of the United Nations Organization, a decision was made that there would not be recognition of that government until it was a government with the consent of the governed. This becomes a most emphatic statement of international law, and remains so until it has been repealed. Certainly, it cannot be disregarded. It would be a shameful thing if it were disregarded in consideration of this problem which is being discussed at the moment. Whatever may be said about the government of Spain, it certainly is not open to anyone to suggest that the Mao regime in China was not imposed upon the Chinese people by force, and by forces supplied by the government of Russia. On the basis of existing international law, that is a consideration which cannot be disregarded if our observance of that resolution is to be looked upon as a responsible act by the government of this country.

What is the necessity for haste in dealing with this question of recognition? What is the evidence before us that these conditions have been met, even if it were possible to overcome the hurdle presented by that resolution of December 12, 1946? There is another important consideration which should be borne in mind also. It is not necessary, nor is there any occasion, to express an opinion about the government of Chiang Kai-shek at this moment. There was a time, of course, when the people of Canada did express admiration for the fortitude of the leader of the Chinese forces who, for so many long years, fought the Japanese invader. This was at a time when the league of nations was standing by, and taking no action to carry out the obligations under its covenant. That admiration may have been misplaced, but it was demonstrated over and over again by Canadians in every part of this country.

Today Chiang Kai-shek exercises authority over a limited area. It would appear that he exercises direct authority only over the islands of Formosa and Hainan, but there are many millions of people living on those islands. Those islands are still the bastions against the complete communist domination of the whole eastern coast of China. I am not raising any question about Formosa beyond this, that one of the obligations undertaken by the United States was to return the island of Formosa to the republic of China after the war. Any hasty recognition of the Mao regime as the government of China, which carries forward all diplomatic obligations and rights, would carry with it the duty of handing over to Mao the island of Formosa. That is something which will require careful consideration on the part of the government of the United States, and undoubtedly it is receiving careful consideration. Factors such as these and factors such as the present activities of the communist forces of China on its southwestern boundary call for a careful analysis and should put a damper on the enthusiasm of those who are anxious for precipitate recognition of the communist regime in China today. We are under no compulsion to act hastily, but I believe we are under great compulsion as a nation to act with caution, with great care and after a full examination of all the consequences that would flow from recognition at this time.

This is not only a question of the formality of recognition; this is not only a question as to what recognition means to us. It is a question of what recognition means to the Chinese, to the Russians, and to those countries in southeast Asia which are still doing all they can to hold the vile flood of communism from their countries. The events which have taken place to the south of China should be in the minds of every member of this house and of every Canadian who is concerned about the future of that vast area, which may determine the whole future course of the world. At the present time there is fighting in the recently-recognized state of Viet Nam. There are two groups of recognition in Viet Nam and in two of the adjoining countries. Those conflicting recognitions throw some light on the importance of recognition to the people in those areas and of what recognition means in the minds of the men in the Kremlin. There is the legitimate government of Viet Nam. It has been recognized by Britain, the United States, France and other countries associated with them in their efforts to preserve peace. There are also the Viet Minh forces; they have been recognized by Russia, and they are fighting the Viet Nam government within the boundaries of China and are receiving arms from Mao. Every time they are cornered on the Chinese boundary, they retreat into China, reorganize, re-arm and go back again into Viet Nam. In that area recognition of China would be regarded almost as a fatal blow to the government of Viet Nam which we have recognized. The Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Pearson) may nod his head; but it is a pity that he did not give us some of this information verbally instead of reserving it for this vague interpretation.

Mr. Pearson: I did give information on that point the other day.

Mr. Drew: And I may say that is the view publicly expressed by men with a great deal longer experience than the Secretary of State for External Affairs in this government. That is an area which indicates what may happen, because beyond Viet Nam lie Malaya, Burma, and farther away the great nation of India. When anyone expresses some measure of confidence that Mao has no territorial ambitions in that area, one is sadly reminded of the assurance that Hitler gave to Mr. Chamberlain and Mr. Daladier in September of 1938, when he assured them that Germany had no further territorial ambitions in Europe. The territorial ambitions of the Soviet empire, of which Mao's regime now forms a part, are not limited except by recognition of the fact that there may be some point beyond which they dare not go. The question that is presented to those who hope to preserve freedom today is a question that was presented to the people of Europe and of the world in 1938 and the early part of 1939. The question now is the same as the question then, namely: How far do we let aggression go without anything but expressions of regret? Let no one suggest that the raising of that question now indicates any thought that we should take precipitate action of any kind. But every one of us learned from the records of the German general staff and of the German government, which were exposed to the world at Nuremberg, that if a firm position had been taken against the Germans in 1938 and 1939 the likelihood was that there would have been no war at all, certainly not at that time. The evidence is all too clear that twice within a generation the world has been bathed in blood because the free nations did not stand together firmly enough at the time when firmness would have retarded aggression and preserved the freedom and peace of the world.

Let us see what it was that was under consideration in the remarks of General McNaughton when he made it quite clear that early recognition is under consideration or has actually been decided upon. A typical example of the things that have been read these past few weeks is to be found in the New York Times of January 24, under the heading: "Soviet walks out of the UN fifteenth time on China issue." Then it goes on to explain under date of January 23:

> Valentin I. Kobushko of the Soviet union walked out of the economic and social council's committee of non-governmental organizations today, after failing to oust the representative of nationalist China. The latest effort, with the now familiar routine of the Russian point of order, the Chinese retort, the vote and finally the walkout declaration, was an almost mechanical affair lasting a little over four minutes. When Mr. Kobushko turned his back on the closed meeting he brought to fifteen the total of recent Soviet bloc walkouts from six United Nations bodies.

From their point of view there may be every reason for the representatives of the Soviet government and their satellites to urge that the present Chinese representative at the United Nations should no longer be permitted to sit there; but there are other methods to use than to walk out on the conference.

On matters of major international concern the United Nations Organization has been rendered almost helpless by the veto of Russia; and now it is being rendered impotent in regard to some of those activities by the walkout, simply because these various groups within the United Nations Organization are not prepared to submit without argument to the demands of this vile tyranny to which we certainly should not bow down now or at any other time.

The situation is perfectly clear. The Soviets have never been able to muster more than three votes in the security council, and only two in the other bodies, in favour of their demand that the present Chinese representative be removed. As I said before, no one can possibly challenge their right to argue, and to submit every contention that they think is in their interests, to bring this about; but the United Nations cannot permit one member to dictate to it, or the United Nations will no longer have either dignity, self-respect or any real power to solve the problems of the world.

It has also permitted Russia far too much latitude in preventing effective action, and the time has come, in the interests of peace and the preservation of freedom, to remember that word "appeasement" that was written across the world in letters of blood only a few years ago.

Fortunately there are breaks from time to time in the solid front of the communist representation. They are the sort of breaks that support the statement made here earlier that there is hope. As a result of these walkouts Dr. Alexander Rudzinski, the Polish representative, announced to the secretary general of the assembly that he was no longer a representative of Poland, and that he was going to seek sanctuary in the United States. He gave as his reason the fact that he had received evidence that was all too clear that there was no longer any pretence of freedom in Poland; but that the final and conclusive evidence that they were not a government in their own right was furnished by the fact that the Soviet representatives had put pressure on him direct from the Kremlin, insisting that he, as a Polish representative, should walk out of the United Nations meeting. If, as General McNaughton says, that difficulty is to be removed, and if it is to be removed by recognition of Mao, then the United Nations, and the members of the United Nations, will have submitted to a form of blackmail that will completely stultify the effectiveness of the United Nations Organization in the years ahead. I have a tendency to use the term "the league of nations"; for as one sees these events taking place there is a chilling recollection of earlier events of the same kind. It is like the experience you have when you pick up one of these paper-covered books just before you take a trip on the train or in an aeroplane—and I am not referring to the type of books that were recently banned—and then you read a couple of chapters before you find that you have already read the same story some time before.

As we read of those events in China and in Viet Nam, and as we consider what may happen in Malaya, in Burma and ultimately in India, if this red flood is not held back by firm and positive action which will be understood by the men in the Kremlin, then we may well find ourselves confronted by very similar events.

When I say "firm action" I mean the kind of united action to preserve peace which the Russians will recognize today just as the Germans would have recognized it either in 1914 or in 1939. It is necessary to go back over the tragic events of the years that have passed. To those whose memories are very clear on what took place from 1918 onwards, there is a duty to keep fresh in the minds of the people of Canada, and of free people everywhere, those lessons which are of such vital concern to everyone in the world today who hopes to fulfil the terms of victory that came to us in 1945. The allies in November 11, 1918, had won the most decisive victory in all history. There was complete and unqualified submission of the most powerful land army the world had ever known. Most of us here will recall the jubilation on that day, and most of us will recall the confidence with which we looked to the treaty that was to be signed at Versailles. Most of us will remember that there was a belief in those days, a firm belief, that Armageddon had passed, and that never again would the nations of the world be engulfed in so dreadful a holocaust.

Those men who met in the Hall of Mirrors, just next unfortunately to the Hall of War, drafted a covenant which expressed in clear and understandable terms the hopes and aspirations of men and women throughout the world who never again wanted to see a repetition of a tragedy of that kind. And although the covenant was a long document, its terms were simple and fairly explicit. It left a clear understanding that every nation was to have the right of self-government and of self-determination, and that each country could choose its own kind of government without intervention by any other nation.

There was also a clear understanding—and I use the word "understanding"—that the nations would stand together to preserve peace. And it was only on that understanding that France gave up control of the eastern bridgeheads on the Rhine. They never would have made it possible for the Germans to move west again, in that generation, if they had not believed the covenant of the league of nations meant that the nations would stand together to stop aggression.

Time went on, and we all learned that the nations which had signed the covenant were not prepared to place that interpretation upon its terms. There were minor events which were disturbing; but the first great breach of the terms of the covenant of the league was the Japanese invasion of the Chinese mainland in Manchuria.

The league of nations took no steps to deal with that aggression. They applied no sanctions to prevent aggression. On the contrary, the free nations supplied to Japan scrap iron, oil, nickel, aluminum, and other things that could build their strength for those very military activities which were prohibited by the covenant of the league.

Then next came the German occupation of the Rhineland, explicitly prohibited by the treaty. No action was taken. It was accepted as an accomplished fact, just as other things have been accepted as accomplished facts in these past few years.

Then came the Italian invasion of Ethiopia. That could have been stopped at any moment without a shot being fired. Italy was sending troops three thousand miles to distant Ethiopia—and Italy had no oil, except the oil that was supplied by those nations which expressed their disapproval of what Italy was doing. Sanctions to prohibit the export of oil at that time would have prevented the Italian occupation of Ethiopia. That was not done.

And so, step by step we moved forward to the inevitable brink of the inevitable war. I hope that every Canadian, and others who remember the same events, and have the same reason to remember those events, will recall how wise we all thought we were in 1939 and 1940 when, no matter what views had been expressed before, people in the free nations said that never again would there be appeasement of an aggressor. They said, and with conviction, that they had learned the dreadful lesson that appeasement brings war, and that the way to stop war and preserve peace is for the nations that want peace to stand together and say that their freedom is a priceless possession which they will under no circumstances forfeit to an aggressor power.

That was the outstanding lesson we were all supposed to have learned in those dreadful years. The nations met in San Francisco in the spring of 1945 when it became apparent that there was no longer going to be a very extended resistance by Germany, and that the post-war world should be considered. And at San Francisco those nations which came together as the United Nations again asserted, at the very outset, the right of every nation to choose its own government, and the right of every nation to be free from armed pressure or armed intervention. Also it asserted the principle of consent of the governed.

How far have we followed those principles in the years that have passed? Surely it must have brought a dreadful realization of what has happened when the hon. member for Peel (Mr. Graydon) pointed out this afternoon that five years ago one out of every twelve people in the world was under communist domination, whereas today one out of every three human beings is under communist tyranny.

There is not one of us in this house who does not know that the communist control of Poland, of Roumania, of Hungary, of Bulgaria, of Czechoslovakia, of Latvia, of Lithuania, of Estonia and of all the other states on their borders was in no single instance the free choice of the people of those nations. Today the Soviet empire embraces nearly a third of the population of the world and that vast tyranny has been imposed upon those people by small minorities who were able to exercise their control in every case by force.

There comes a time when the lessons of the past must be remembered and accepted or we shall follow the same dreadful course to another war when all the terrible advances of science will bring destruction on a scale that we have never dreamed of before. But there is hope, and that hope rests upon the unity of purpose of those who are joined in a common bond for peace and for the preservation of freedom.

The proposal has been put forward in this house on different occasions by the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra (Mr. Green) that a Pacific pact to complement the Atlantic pact should be brought into being. Today the Secretary of State for External Affairs said that that could not be done because if the nations of the Pacific were to be invited to consider a Pacific pact it would be necessary to invite Russia and China. Russia was not invited to the meetings of the Atlantic conference and yet Russia has very direct access to the Atlantic through the Baltic or through the fact that at any time she can complete the 35 miles that separates her from the great German seaport of Hamburg.

Not a very pleasant thought, but it is a bit of reality which indicates the direct concern Russia has in the affairs of the Atlantic. Russia was not invited, and for one clear reason. The Atlantic pact was a pact conceived, shaped and brought into being for the one purpose of containing Russian aggression. Why pretend that it was for anything else? There is no use in pretending today that a Pacific pact would be for any other purpose than to contain the aggression of the Soviet empire in the Pacific area and the Orient.

Here is one of the terrible unrealities of this situation. Every voice which can be raised should be raised before it is too late to say to these people who are talking the mumbo-jumbo of diplomacy: "Wake up before our freedom is gone and the world destroys itself because you are not talking in terms that the world can understand." Why gloss over these realities in vague terms such as we have heard here today? Why not face the chilling truth? It is only by facing it that we shall avoid the dreadful possibility which the Atlantic pact was conceived and developed to prevent.

What earthly use will the Atlantic pact be if through that pact we prevent war in Europe and then the whole structure of the Orient goes to pieces under the red flood? What use will the Atlantic pact be if we keep the front of human civilization intact and let the whole vast rear of that structure be destroyed by the red flames? What use will the Atlantic pact be if that soviet power which has moved so fast down through China keeps on through Viet Nam, into Malaya, through Burma to India and spreads out to Tibet, to Afghanistan, to Persia and then presents one great solid front to the powers of the west?

That is a dreadful possibility that will be brought closer if the United Nations submit to this soviet blackmail and act under the demands of these people who have defied every ordinary principle of decent conduct when they say: "You do our bidding or we won't even talk to you." No peace will be obtained by a submission to demands of that kind any more than peace was obtained in 1939 by the acceptance of the conditions imposed during the frequent visits to Berchtesgaden.

Every word I have spoken is a word that expresses the hope of peace. Every word I have spoken is a word that is intended to remind hon. members of this house of the ghostly lessons of the past. Every word I have spoken is a word to urge upon this government the duty to say in no uncertain terms, no matter what may be said by other governments in the world: "Appeasement is going to go no further; we have learned the lessons of the past and there will be no truck or trade with tyranny of this kind unless and until they are at least prepared to accept the ordinary standards of international conduct." You do not gain anything, you do not gain any hope of peace, you do not gain any hope of security by clearing the decks for further discussions under threats of that nature.

One of the problems before us, and a very real problem it is, has been raised by the recognition of the Mao regime by the government of the United Kingdom. I submit that is no reason whatever why this government should recognize the communist regime in China. This government has it within its power to say things that need to be said. I should like to read from an article written recently by Mr. Anthony Eden which I think offers the solution to this great problem. The article was published in London on January 16 and reads:

> The Far Eastern policies of the Atlantic powers and their friends are in a rather dismal tangle. They all apparently intend the same thing but they are moving at so different a pace that they are jerkily out of step.
> Recognition of the communist government in China provides a recent example of this inconsistency, though not the most important. The divergence of view and discrepancy of action between the British and American governments in this instance may even do good if they draw attention in both countries to the urgent need to co-ordinate policies without further delay.
> As regards actual recognition, there is a fair field for argument on practical as well as on legal grounds. It is a real misfortune that in this, as in other Far Eastern matters, we should be acting piecemeal both within the commonwealth and as between the commonwealth and the United States.

I pass on to another quotation in the same article which reads:

> We must first determine the nature of our problem in southeast Asia and next consider how together we can make headway toward its solution. In the first instance, the problem is economic. We should make a fatal error were we to under-estimate the extent of the challenge free nations have to meet. The overwhelming triumph of Mao Tze-tung in China has transformed the whole position in the Far East. His methods have now become the blueprint for communist plans and the pattern for communist action throughout the Orient.

Then I should like to quote from the last part of his article:

> There should be an agreed strategy in all this area between the powers principally concerned, and their burden both in troops and political responsibility fairly adjusted. It is equally necessary that our several intelligence services in the Far East should be reviewed and co-ordinated.
> I therefore repeat that the most urgent need is for us to have a common policy in these affairs. No nation can, by itself, save the Far East. Our common policy must be founded upon determination to help the peoples of southeast Asia to live in freedom from want or fear. Without our aid they are doomed to all the consequences of communist rule, and if they should fall who can doubt that the danger to the peace of all the world would move nearer and yet nearer to home?

Those are the words of the great British foreign secretary of the war years, a man who had the courage to resign from the Chamberlain government in protest against appeasement before the war, a man who is now raising his voice to assert the same principles, a man who is raising his voice urging common action by the free nations to preserve their principles, which are the reason for the meetings of the United Nations at Lake Success.

Let us hope that conditions will exist at some future time when recognition can be extended to China and to other nations in that great area. But the highest duty of every government today, which has some responsibility in the Pacific as well as in the Atlantic, is to demand that there shall be common action, and that there shall be a clear and uniform pattern of strategy which will be known to the people of the free nations, and which will be known in the clearest detail to the nations which threaten our peace and security. Certainly there should be no recognition of the Mao regime until those conditions have been fulfilled, until the nations which have a common concern in the preservation of peace both in the Atlantic and in the Pacific are able to decide on a uniform pattern of strategy which all can follow.

After two months in Moscow Mao has returned to his own capital, and I notice that the Secretary of State for External Affairs has said that it is not possible yet to determine what the terms of his agreement with the Russians are. Nevertheless we know it is an agreement of friendship, an agreement for common action. That much we have been told. I hope that every member of the house saw the photograph of the signing of that treaty in the Kremlin. If you have not, look it up. In that photograph you will see the same three Russians who were present when the treaty of friendship was signed with Germany on August 26, 1939, and war became a certainty. There were Stalin, Molotov and Vishinsky. Mao was sitting in the very place where Ribbentrop sat at that time. They were all in precisely the same positions. Look at the picture and then think what that pact of friendship may mean to the free world unless the lessons of the past are remembered and the nations stand together to preserve that peace for which so many of our own young men and women died, and so many of the youth of the world gave up all they had.

Let no one suggest that we must wait for others. In this confused and uncertain hour the whole free world is waiting for a clear and clarion call to follow the course of honour, to follow the course that will give us peace. That call can come from Canada, which under no circumstances can be charged with any selfish interest in Asia, Europe or anywhere else in the world. I submit, Mr. Chairman, this is both a challenge and an opportunity which never may be offered to this government again.

Mr. Pouliot: May I ask a question? I congratulate the hon. gentleman on his fine speech, but I should like to ask him whether he really thinks that speech was a call for peace?

Mr. Drew: I most certainly do. I do believe that every word I have said is an appeal to follow the only course that will give us peace. I have made this appeal tonight to the Canadian government, to the members of this parliament, and to the people of Canada to wake up, because I see a very grave danger that we are following the same course that led to such dreadful results only a few years ago.

Item stands.

Progress reported.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Fournier (Hull): On Monday we will resume the debate on the address.

It being five minutes after eleven o'clock, the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Monday, March 6, 1950

The house met at three o'clock.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS

COAL SUPPLY—ANNOUNCEMENT AS TO RESUMPTION OF FULL PASSENGER TRAIN SERVICE

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (Minister of Transport): I have a statement to make, Mr. Speaker, concerning the resumption of full passenger service on the Canadian National Railways. Mr. Donald Gordon is making the statement from Montreal at 3.30 this afternoon, and he was kind enough to send me an advance copy of it so that I could make it to the house. I would not want the house to think that I am scooping him, because it is now only ten minutes after three. The statement is as follows:

When the coal shortages forced the Canadian National Railways to reduce passenger train service in Canada by twenty-five per cent, the railway management promised that the trains which were being temporarily discontinued would be put back into operation as soon as conditions justified. Now we are keeping our word. Full Canadian National train service will be restored as from Wednesday midnight, March 8. All trains in Canada that stopped running because of the coal shortage will go back on their normal schedules.

To the public who have given us their understanding support we express our thanks and say that the Canadian National Railways will, as in past years, continue to provide fast, reliable, up-to-date transportation.

In addition to restoring passenger train services, the management has given instructions that coal consigned to commercial and other users be given preferential movement over our lines.

INQUIRY AS TO SETTING UP OF RAILWAYS AND SHIPPING COMMITTEE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Clarence Gillis (Cape Breton South): May I address a question to the Minister of Transport, arising out of the statement he just made? I am sure we were all glad to hear it. It indicates the efficient manner in which the minister handles all matters that come within the scope of his department.

Mr. Chevrier: There must be something coming.

Mr. Gillis: Is it now the minister's intention to convene the committee on government-owned railways and shipping in order to complete this particular story?

Mr. Chevrier: The last time the question was asked of me I think I indicated that it was my intention to convene the committee on railways and shipping as quickly as possible. I wish I could indicate the date, but I hope it will be before the Easter recess. Perhaps I may add this: since it takes some time to prepare the reports that are submitted to the committee, such as the annual reports of the Canadian National Railways, the Trans-Canada Air Lines, and the like—and I would not want, as I am sure the house would not, the officers of the Canadian National Railways to come back twice—I hope it will be possible to convene the committee around March 27. I hope that will meet with the approval of the house.

QUESTION AS TO TAKING OVER OF BUS AND TRUCK SERVICES

On the orders of the day:

Mr. W. Chester S. McLure (Queens): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Transport. Has the Canadian National Railways made a general proposal to all the other provinces similar to that which has been made to the government of the province of Prince Edward Island, namely, to take over all the highway bus and truck services, and to place them under the control of the board of transport commissioners?

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (Minister of Transport): That is quite an order. I have had no advance notice of the question, but I may tell my hon. friend that I am not aware of any such movement. In any event I am sure that the Canadian National Railways, or for that matter the federal government, would have no jurisdiction over provincial highways on Prince Edward Island, and over one or two of the other matters which my hon. friend mentioned in his question. That is about the only information I can give him at this time.

UNITED NATIONS

FOURTH SESSION OF GENERAL CONFERENCE OF UNESCO—REPORT OF CANADIAN DELEGATION

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Secretary of State for External Affairs): I wish to table copies, in English and in French, of the report of the Canadian delegation to the fourth session of the general conference of UNESCO held in Paris from September 19 to October 5, 1949.

Inquiries of the Ministry

CONTROVERTED ELECTIONS

ANNAPOLIS-KINGS—CERTIFICATE AND REPORT ON TRIAL OF ELECTION PETITION—ISSUE OF NEW WRIT OF ELECTION

Mr. Speaker: I have the honour to inform the house that I have received from Hon. Mr. Justice Doull and Hon. Mr. Justice MacQuarrie, two of the judges of the Supreme Court of Nova Scotia selected for the trial of an election petition pursuant to the Dominion Controverted Elections Act, a certificate and report relating to the election in the electoral district of Annapolis-Kings.

Shall I read the report?

Some hon. Members: Dispense.

Mr. Speaker: I have the honour to inform the house that, in conformity with chapter 50, section 69, of the Revised Statutes of Canada, 1927, I have issued my warrant to the chief electoral officer to make out a new writ of election for the said electoral district.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, I should like to ask a question arising out of the record that you read respecting the Annapolis-Kings election. I should like to ask the government whether any investigation has been made with regard to the constituencies in which the illegal votes would have been properly cast. In other words they were cast in the wrong constituency; they belong to other constituencies.

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister): My understanding is that the votes were cast in that constituency in such form that they could not be counted elsewhere, the voter having written in the name of the person for whom he was voting, and that person was a candidate only in the constituency where it was found that the votes could not legally be cast.

WHEAT BOARD

QUESTION AS TO REFERENCE OF REPORT TO AGRICULTURE COMMITTEE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. A. Ross (Souris): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Trade and Commerce. Will the report of the Canadian wheat board for the crop year 1948-49, which was tabled in the house on February 21, showing a deficit on the 1945 to 1949 pool account of $5,235,621.37, be referred to the standing committee on agriculture this session, in order that the report and activities of the wheat board can be examined and thoroughly studied?

Perhaps when the minister is answering he will make a statement as to the meeting with Mr. Charles Brannan—

[Mr. Pearson.]

Mr. Speaker: Order.

Mr. Ross (Souris): —United States secretary of agriculture—

Mr. Speaker: Order. I must insist that when a question is being asked and I rise to call order, the hon. member who is asking the question should resume his seat.

Right Hon. C. D. Howe (Minister of Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, the report of the wheat board for the crop year 1948-49 has been tabled in the house. If the committee on agriculture wishes to review it, the department will give the committee every facility to do so. I think my hon. friend will find that the so-called deficit reported in the statement has no significance whatsoever except as a working capital item.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): Just one of those bookkeeping entries.

Mr. Howe: As to the meeting with Mr. Charles Brannan, the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) and myself met with him and discussed a division of wheat allocations to the United States and Canada, contingent upon the participation of Germany and Japan in the wheat agreement. Complete agreement was reached, but since Australia is also interested in the division, and since the final decision will be made by the international wheat agreement council, it is not thought wise to give the figures at this time. Our discussions were simply preliminary to a report to the council in London.

TRANS-CANADA HIGHWAY

QUESTION AS TO AGREEMENTS WITH PROVINCES—ROUTE THROUGH SASKATCHEWAN

On the orders of the day:

Mr. A. C. Stewart (Yorkton): I should like to direct two questions to the Minister of Resources and Development. Have agreements for the building of the trans-Canada highway been forwarded to all ten provinces? What government selected No. 1 highway in December, 1948, or January, 1949, as the trans-Canada route through Saskatchewan?

Mr. Speaker: I doubt whether that is a question that should be asked on the orders of the day.

PIT PROPS

INQUIRY AS TO ARRANGEMENTS FOR OVERSEAS MARKETS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. A. J. Brooks (Royal): On Friday last I asked a question of the Minister of Trade and Commerce regarding the markets for pit props. His parliamentary assistant said he would have the answer for us today. May we have the answer?

Right Hon. C. D. Howe (Minister of Trade and Commerce): Trade commissioners in several countries are working on the sale of pit props, and there is some hope that sales will be made. I think anything I might say in addition to that would only jeopardize the current negotiations.

Mr. Brooks: We were told that as soon as the British elections were over—

Mr. Howe: Yes; they were over last week.

Mr. Brooks: I know they were.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): You had better go back yourself.

Mr. Brooks: I should like to ask a question arising out of the minister's answer. Can he give us any idea when these negotiations with the other countries will be completed?

Mr. Howe: Just as soon as the other countries indicate that they are ready to sign a contract for the purchase of pit props.

Mr. Brooks: That is the sort of answer we have been getting.

AERO TIMBER PRODUCTS

REQUEST FOR INFORMATION AS TO RECORDS OF FORMER CROWN COMPANY

On the orders of the day:

Right Hon. C. D. Howe (Minister of Trade and Commerce): On Friday last the hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Low) asked the Prime Minister whether he would give the name of the department which has possession of the records of Aero Timber Products Limited. These records are in the custody of the Department of Trade and Commerce.

BUTTER

PRICES SUPPORT—QUESTION OF SALE OF TEN MILLION POUNDS IN STORAGE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. L. E. Cardiff (Huron North): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Agriculture, based on a statement which appeared in the press on Saturday regarding the butter situation in Canada. Is it true that the government is going to sell 10 million pounds of butter? If so, to whom, and at what price?

Right Hon. J. G. Gardiner (Minister of Agriculture): When the government undertook to take butter at a floor price it was the intention eventually to sell it all. I understand that the amount on hand at present is something under 25 million pounds. I hope that sooner or later we shall sell it all, and we hope we shall sell it in the ordinary way.

SPEECH FROM THE THRONE

CONTINUATION OF DEBATE ON ADDRESS IN REPLY

The house resumed, from Thursday, March 2, consideration of the motion of Mr. F. H. Larson for an address to His Excellency the Governor General in reply to his speech at the opening of the session, and the amendment thereto of Mr. Drew, and the amendment to the amendment of Mr. Coldwell.

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I rise in this debate to register my protest—and in doing so I am satisfied that it is the protest of many thousands of Canadians—against the way in which the government is failing to carry out one of its most important promises in the field of social security.

The people of this country, despite the fact that they have shown much patience with the Liberal party, deeply resent the breaking of solemn promises. One of the offers, one of the promises with which the people of Canada are most familiar, is the offer made in August of 1945 with respect to old age pensions. That proposal was spelled out very clearly. It was to be $30 a month, but please note these features—it was to be payable at the age of seventy to all Canadians, without any means test, and it was to be financed and administered entirely by the federal government.

I know from my experience that during the past number of years hundreds and thousands of people have been hoping each year that that would be the year in which that offer would be implemented. Last summer, after the election of June 27, many people thought then that surely there was nothing standing in the way of such a huge Liberal majority carrying out its proposal for a universal old age pension without a means test.

We are now confronted, however, not merely with a repudiation of that proposal, but with a denial that it was ever made. I wish to quote the words of the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) in answer to an interjection of mine during his speech on February 20, as recorded at page 62 of Hansard of this session. He had been speaking about old age pensions, and about the desirability, so far as the government is concerned, of moving in the direction of a direct contributory system. This was my interjection:

> Mr. Knowles: That was not the federal government's offer to the provinces in 1945. Was that offer not made without its involving a contributory system?

And this was the reply:

> Mr. St. Laurent: No, it was not. I think that if the hon. member will refer to the proposition he will find there never was any offer of a pension without a means test and without a contribution.

That is the basis of my protest this afternoon—that we have this government not only back-tracking on its promises, not only failing to fulfil them; but now we have the head of the government denying that a promise with which all Canadians are familiar was ever made.

That was not just a chance statement by the Prime Minister, because he went on to say:

> There could not be,—

In other words, there could not be such an offer.

> —because it just would not work. We cannot have that proportion of the income of the nation derived from ordinary taxation devoted to old age pensions.

Then he went on to express his sympathy toward the old people, but indicated his own personal disapproval of there being no means test by saying:

> Why should I, within the next two years, get a pension of $40 per month and hand back only something of the order of 45 or 50 per cent of it to the treasury?

The Prime Minister went on to discuss the matter further, in a lengthy paragraph which makes it clear that he meant precisely what he was saying when he declared that there never was an offer of a pension without a means test and without a contribution. I wish to document rather fully my contention that, to say the least, that is a misstatement of the facts.

I hold in my hand a copy of the proposals of the government of Canada presented to the dominion provincial conference on reconstruction in August, 1945. Under the heading "National Old Age Pensions at age 70", we find this at pages 37 and 38:

> As part of the general proposals now put before the conference, it is proposed that the federal government would establish a system of national old age pensions entirely financed and administered by the federal government, and paid at the uniform rate of $30 per month regardless of means to men and women aged seventy and over in all parts of Canada.
> The cost of national old age pensions by 1948, for example, is estimated at $200 million. (For details see table I below). There would be a partial recovery from people over seventy paying income tax.

Then on page 38 there is a further indication of what was involved in this proposal:

> The principal feature of the proposed national old age pensions is the elimination of the means test after reaching age seventy, regarding this as unsuitable for the oldest group in the community, over eighty per cent of whom are not in fact capable of supporting themselves in useful remunerative work.

That is as clear cut as it could be. The principal feature of the proposal was the elimination of the means test after the age of seventy. Yet on February 20 of this year the Prime Minister said there never was any such offer. The paragraph at page 38 continues:

> Payment of pensions as of right to people of this age offers the best kind of economic security. It removes the fear of destitution much more certainly than any other method, and relieves old people of the necessity of seeking work, or of endeavouring to keep on working in unfavourable circumstances and beyond the age at which they should be able to retire, without dependence on charity or burdening the family. In addition to providing a minimum subsistence for those with no other resources, this system would enable other persons with moderate private savings to retire from active work sooner, or in more comfort than would otherwise be possible.

That offer in 1945 was a long hoped for turning point in this country, so far as thinking about old age security is concerned. I have in my mind a vivid recollection of an editorial which appeared in the Winnipeg Free Press some weeks ago, in which some of us were condemned for having so much to say about old age pensions. One of the reasons we were condemned, it was pointed out, was that by talking so much about old age pensions we were building up the hopes of old people—hopes which could not be fulfilled.

I plead guilty to the first part of that charge; I hope I have helped to build up the hopes of the Canadian people that there would soon be justice for our older citizens. But I point out that the document that really did build up the hopes of the Canadian people that the means test would be done away with was not a propaganda statement by a political party, but a forthright proposal and a definite statement from the government—the statement I have just read. That was the position of the federal government right down to February 20 of this year—that the means test had to go.

On that same page of the government's proposals it goes on to say this:

> The removal of the means test would make it possible for these pensions to be administered by the federal government alone on a uniform national basis, without the necessity for provincial participation, and would therefore considerably relieve provincial finances. As the federal government would be assuming full financial responsibility, it would also administer the payment of these pensions.

Please note that in that outline of the proposal it is clear that there was to be no means test, and that these pensions were to be paid in full by the federal government. Now the Prime Minister stands up in this House of Commons and says there never was any offer of a pension without a means test and without a contribution. So—

Mr. Martin: Why not state the situation correctly?

Mr. Knowles: I am stating it correctly and I am going on to state a lot more; indeed I shall be quoting from the minister's own words several times before I have finished in support of my contention that since 1945 it has been the government's position to get rid of the means test.

At page 42 of the same book there are further references to this matter, one paragraph of which refers to the financing of the plans put forward in 1945. I quote:

> The proposed system of old age pensions payable as of right without means test to persons seventy or over would be instituted and administered by the dominion government, and specific agreements with provincial governments would not be essential to its implementation.

There it was in categorical terms. There was an underlying condition, the tax agreements; but, given the tax agreements, no other specific agreement was necessary before the federal government would proceed to implement its proposal of universal old age pensions at age seventy without a means test, paid in full by the federal government.

The proposals go on to say:

> It is within the power of the dominion to finance its share of the combined cost of health insurance and of old age pensions out of the consolidated revenue fund with such modification of taxation as would be justified, in the opinion of parliament, by the universal benefits of health insurance and old age pensions and by the other purposes of dominion expenditure.
> There are, however, some definite advantages, in terms of administrative efficiency, compliance, and popular understanding of the plans, in introducing features more specifically contributory in nature and tied up more closely with the provisions of health insurance and old age pension legislation. These additional and desirable features would be helpful in the early and effective inauguration of the plans, and the dominion government asks that they be provided for in specific agreements with the provincial governments.

I know what the government is now doing. The government is now relying on that subsidiary reference to a contributory plan, which was to be considered only when health insurance was combined with old age pensions. Before I conclude, I shall have something to say about the loose way in which the word "contributory" is used. It is the sort of word that needs to be defined.

I read that last paragraph which I just quoted in order to give, as it were, both sides of the story—to give the wording that the government now uses in its claim that it always had a contributory plan in mind. But I point out that, in the paragraph I have just quoted, the contributory feature comes in only when there is talk about an over-all plan, including both old age pensions and health insurance. With that I agree; but remember that the offer to go ahead and implement the proposal of universal old age pensions without a means test was categorical and definite. The paragraph I have just quoted said that specific agreements with provincial governments would not be essential to the implementation of universal old age pensions without a means test.

That proposal was put before the country at that time. It was given considerable publicity. I hold in my hand bulletin 9-A put out by the wartime information board on August 11, 1945, giving a summary of these proposals. It was on the basis of that summary that stories reached the newspapers and got to the Canadian people. Here is what it said:

> The federal government would itself finance and administer a system of national old age pensions for persons over seventy years of age. Pensions would be at the flat rate of $30 per month, regardless of means. To be eligible, the individual must have resided in Canada for at least twenty years since age eighteen, including the three year period immediately preceding the date of application for pension.
> This part of the program would cost the federal government approximately $200,000,000 by 1948, although there would be some recovery through income tax receipts from persons over seventy.

In case there is any doubt as to the interpretation being put on those proposals by the wartime information board or by the press of that day or by the general public, I call as another witness on my side of the case the present Minister of Justice (Mr. Garson). I hold in my hand a copy of the budget speech which he made in the Manitoba legislature on Thursday, March 27, 1947, when he was provincial treasurer as well as premier of Manitoba. The first subject that he dealt with as provincial treasurer was by way of a report to the Manitoba legislature on the dominion-provincial negotiations of 1946-47. The present Minister of Justice, then provincial treasurer of Manitoba, started off with a few words about financial matters and he then went on to say:

> In addition the dominion offered under the heading of social security to pay the following grants:
> 1. To everyone of the age of seventy years and over, an old age pension at the rate of $30 per month without a means test, with the dominion assuming sole responsibility for the total payments and costs of administration.

The Minister of Justice is a smart man, and you do not fool him very often. He knew what those proposals meant, and he stated that quite clearly in his report to the legislature of Manitoba.

Mr. Martin: We have done better than that, and have increased the pensions since then.

Mr. Knowles: The total amount of pension has been increased, with provincial participation, and in the case of some pensioners the federal government does now pay $30 as its share. But the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Martin) should know better than try to get me off the track. The eligible age should be lowered and the amount of the pension increased, but first of all I am contending that the most important hurdle to get over is the removal of the means test and the making of old age pensions universal for all Canadians. That is the main issue. It was the offer to do that and the denial by the Prime Minister that such an offer was made that prompts me to speak in the terms I am using now.

May I remind the house, particularly hon. members who were in the last parliament, that this whole question was discussed in the House of Commons a good many times during the twentieth parliament. We met for the first session of that parliament on September 6, 1945, and I find that on September 14 the then minister of national health and welfare, the present Minister of National Defence (Mr. Claxton), spoke in the debate on the address and dealt with the dominion-provincial proposals. I read this simply to show that the proposals as understood by the wartime information board, as understood by the press, as understood by the Canadian people, and as understood by the then premier of Manitoba, now the Minister of Justice, were confirmed by a member of this government on the floor of the house. I quote from page 182 of Hansard of September 14, 1945, where the then minister of national health and welfare is reported as saying:

> Then there are the proposals with regard to old age pensions. First, it is proposed that there shall be a national old age pension of $30 a month, payable by the federal government to everyone over seventy years of age and, second, a contribution by the federal government on a fifty-fifty basis to the cost of old age pensions, payable on proof of need to people between sixty-five and sixty-nine years of age, to be administered by the provinces.

> These proposals now put forward by the dominion government are as generous as we can make them, while at the same time keeping the whole plan in balance, and workable. We have reached a balance in our estimates; the plan hangs together, and can be made to work.

Those are the words of the present Minister of National Defence: "the plan hangs together, and can be made to work." Against those words we must now place the words used by the Prime Minister on February 20 of this year when he said that there never was an offer of a pension without a means test and without contributions; that there could not be, because it just would not work.

[Mr. Martin.]

You see we are getting not only backtracking on promises, but a denial that the government ever made certain specific promises which have built up the hopes of the people of this country that the means test would be abolished.

A little later, on September 18, 1945, I was speaking in the debate on the address. It will be of no surprise to hon. members to hear that I was speaking on old age pensions. I asked some rhetorical questions which prompted the then minister of national health and welfare to interrupt. I quote from page 272 of Hansard of that date, where I am reported as follows:

> Incidentally, it is still only a proposal, and all the figures with reference to it in the proposals made at the dominion-provincial conference, and all the figures given by the minister in his address the other day, referred to the year 1948. I wonder why 1948; is that the year of the next election?
> Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Not a bad guess; I was only a year out. The report continues:

> Mr. Claxton: May I answer that now?
> Mr. Knowles: I suggest that we should have something more than proposals for the distant future.
> Mr. Claxton: May I answer the question now?
> Mr. Knowles: I shall be glad if the minister will.
> Mr. Claxton: Most of the figures for the proposal put before the conference were based on the year 1948. That was the first year following the war when we thought full conversion from war to peace would be in effect.
> Mr. Knowles: Has the government or the minister or anyone speaking on behalf of the government given any indication that the proposal of $30 a month is to come into effect any sooner than 1948?
> Mr. Claxton: It will come into effect as soon as the provinces agree to the proposals.

There you are; once again there is confirmation. They were only waiting for tax agreements between the dominion and the provinces; but given that condition, a clear-cut, well-defined proposal for a universal pension without a means test and payable to all was to come into effect.

We came back in 1946, and in the course of that session the subject came up once more. I should like to quote again from the present Minister of National Defence, who at that time still held the portfolio of health and welfare. At page 751 of Hansard for April 10, 1946, I find these words:

> Before that, social security legislation was studied by other branches of the government and in consequence the proposals made by the federal government to the dominion-provincial conference were worked out.

Please note, in view of the study we are now asked to make, by means of a special committee, that there was a study of this question before the proposals were worked out in 1945. I go on with the quotation:

> They are proposals which we believe can be carried out by the Canadian people and which will work to their advantage. We also believe that the burden can be carried by the Canadian economy.

The Prime Minister says now there never was any such offer, and that there could not be, even though the Minister of National Defence said on April 10, 1946, as he had said in 1945, that the proposals they had worked out had been worked out on the basis of study, and would work.

Further down the same page, and continuing on the next page, the then minister said:

> The plan proposed by the federal government to the provinces would provide for the payment of $30 a month without a means test to everyone at the age of seventy, and that it is estimated would cost $200 million in 1948.
> Mr. MacNicol: To every person?
> Mr. Claxton: Yes, over seventy.

I repeat, Mr. Speaker, that is the point in the whole issue that I am concerned about this afternoon—the universality of old age pensions, or getting rid of the means test. There is still the need for a higher pension and a lower eligible age, but first we must get rid of the means test. Hon. members are aware of the fact that we are receiving a great many representations these days on this subject. Admittedly that is one of the reasons why I am speaking about this matter, on behalf of the hundreds of people who are writing me, but I am also speaking about it because I firmly believe, from the study I have made of the question, that this is the most important hurdle to overcome. We can make other changes in old age pensions, but if we have not changed their application, if we have not made them apply to all our people, it will never be satisfactory. If we get a contributory system applying only to a limited section of the community, we shall have the same troubles they have been having with some of their plans in the United States. The first and the most important thing to do is to get rid of the means test and make the plan universal for all Canadians.

To carry on with my documentation of the government's position from 1945 until the Prime Minister uttered those strange words on the night of February 20, I ask you to turn to Hansard for June 18, 1947, at page 4283. We were then dealing with a bill to amend the Old Age Pensions Act in order to provide for certain increases that year. In this case the present Minister of National Health and Welfare is speaking, and at page 4283 he said:

> As part of its program in the field of social security, the federal government proposed a system of national old age pensions. This provided for the federal government to assume the full responsibility for paying pensions at the rate of $30 a month to all persons in Canada seventy years and over.

I hope the minister will not get up and say that they are now paying $30, which is the federal government's share of the pension of $40; because they are not paying it to all persons in Canada seventy and over, and that is the nub of the problem.

Mr. MacInnis: And not without a means test.

Mr. Knowles: If you take away the means test you pay it to everyone. The government has used both ways of defining the same thing.

I continue to read what the minister said at that time, on June 18, 1947:

> The federal government proposed these pensions for all eligible persons without any income or means test whatsoever, and the federal government proposed to administer this scheme directly and bear one hundred per cent of the cost, amounting to an estimated $200 million annually.

That was not a request, Mr. Speaker, made from this side of the house. That was a forthright statement made voluntarily by the Minister of National Health and Welfare, in which he confirmed the proposals made in 1945—confirmed them in the terms in which they were understood by the press and the people of that day, and in the terms in which they were understood by the Minister of Justice who was then premier of Manitoba.

Later on in the same speech I find these words:

> This, in broad outline, represents the proposals made by the federal government to the provinces with respect to the aged and the blind. These are an integral part of the objectives in social security which this government has set for itself as soon as satisfactory over-all arrangements on social security, fiscal and other matters can be made with the provinces.

Mr. Martin: That was right and still is.

Mr. Knowles: Just a minute; you were still talking in those days about dominion-provincial agreements as the one thing that was a condition precedent to the implementation of such a plan. The Prime Minister did not mention that the other night. His position now is that the offer of a universal pension paid to all without a means test and without contribution was never even made. He even went so far as to say such an offer could not have been made, it would not work, and anyway he did not believe in it.

Mr. Martin: Why not quote the Prime Minister's statement correctly?

Mr. Knowles: I have done so several times already. Continuing with what happened on June 18, 1947, the then leader of the opposition was speaking, and the present Minister of National Health and Welfare interrupted him several times. The record is to be found at page 4291 of Hansard of that date. I need not quote it. The whole point was that the then leader of the opposition was saying that the government had changed its position, and the minister of national welfare rose on a question of privilege and said that the position had not been changed, that the position as laid down in 1945 was still the position of the government.

I now turn to page 4643 of Hansard of June 25, 1947. The present Minister of National Health and Welfare was again speaking, and he said:

> What my hon. friend can do is seriously to consider what I said about the government's over-all security proposals made to the provinces in August, 1945.

Listen to this:

> If he does not accept my assurances I call to witness the words of the present Minister of Justice (Mr. Ilsley) when he was Minister of Finance last July, when he said that once we had a fiscal understanding with the provinces, the government's social security program represented an essential part of the government's objectives. I call to witness the statement of the present Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott) twice this year, once in Toronto and once in this house. I call attention to my own statements as a responsible minister of the crown. But if that does not satisfy the hon. gentleman, let me remind him of the words of the Prime Minister in a telegram sent to the premier of Saskatchewan on July 15, 1946, and reiterated three times since in subsequent communications. This is what the Prime Minister of Canada said:
> "As emphasized in the budget address, the public investment and social security proposals submitted last August remain an essential part of the dominion government's program. As soon as there is sufficient acceptance of the proposed tax agreements"—

That is the only condition—sufficient acceptance, not even total acceptance.

> "—we shall be ready to explore, in a general conference, or otherwise, the possibilities of working out mutually satisfactory arrangements in regard to the whole or any part of our earlier public investment and social security proposals."

I turn now to page 4708 of Hansard of June 26, 1947, and I find that again the present Minister of National Health and Welfare is arguing with the then leader of the opposition; and the minister points out:

> That portion of the old age pension scheme referring to the government's willingness to pay a pension to everyone seventy and over without a means test would cost the government over $200 million a year. These, as my hon. friend will appreciate, are not ordinary figures. The government's scheme was a plan in which every part had its place.
> Mr. MacNicol: What does the minister mean by "the government's scheme"?
> Mr. Martin: The proposals put forward by the government to the provinces in August, 1945. The government stands by these.

Mr. Martin: And still does.

Mr. Knowles: I am glad to hear the Minister of National Health and Welfare say that; I hope he will so inform the Prime Minister.

Mr. Martin: Nothing the Prime Minister said is in any wise to the contrary.

[Mr. Knowles.]

Mr. Knowles: The Prime Minister said there never was any offer of a pension without a means test and without contribution, and he said that there could not be, because it just would not work.

Mr. Fleming: The Prime Minister and the Minister of National Health and Welfare cannot both be right.

Mr. Knowles: A little further on we find the Minister of National Health and Welfare repeating his stand. This is on page 4715. I need not take time to read it; it simply reiterates all the assurances the minister had given previously, quoting again the Prime Minister's telegram to Premier Douglas of Saskatchewan and the statement of Mr. Ilsley on June 27, 1946, making it crystal clear that the offer of the government still stood, that the government stood by its proposals of 1945.

Then we get on to 1948, when, on June 16, as reported at page 5346 of Hansard, we find the Minister of National Health and Welfare saying:

> I am going to say in the kindliest way, as my colleague the Minister of Labour would say, because we have to be realistic, that we have made certain proposals to the provinces. The Prime Minister, the present Minister of Justice, the present Minister of Finance and I have stated the policy of the government with regard to those proposals. They still remain in their broad essentials the policy of the government of Canada.

After that came the Liberal convention in the summer of 1948, which adopted a long platform witih twenty-one planks. Plank 14 reiterated the 1945 dominion-provincial proposals. After that came the election campaign of 1949. Here is a Liberal advertisement which appeared in the Winnipeg Free Press just before the election, advertising the various Liberal candidates, including the hon. member for Winnipeg South (Mr. Mutch), who now says he does not advocate social security but rather social justice, which is a very fine distinction; but here is his picture right opposite the words "Vote Liberal—Social security."

Similarly I have here a couple of copies of a publication known as the "Canadian Outlook," put out during the pre-election period, in my city at any rate. From where you are, Mr. Speaker, you can see the headline "Security", and then these words:

> The Liberal platform is a living, progressive, practical program of expanding social security.

That was coupled with a warning that if by any chance there was not a clear majority of Liberals in this parliament, the country might not get broader social security. Well, see what we have: an overwhelming Liberal majority, and a denial by the Prime Minister that the offer of 1945 was ever made. Here it is again in another of these pre-election pamphlets:

> Canada's business is your business. Keep Canada prosperous. Safeguard your security on June 27. Vote Liberal.

Well, Mr. Speaker, all this evidence simply makes it clear that what we declare to have been the understanding of the Canadian people is perfectly correct. Ever since August of 1945 they have understood that this government stood for the removal of the means test from the old age pension, and stood for making the pension universal for all Canadians seventy years of age and over, and possibly even younger. Now, however, we have this annoying and very disappointing denial by the Prime Minister; and I am speaking as I do today because I am convinced there simply must be a change in that position.

We hear a great deal of talk today about a contributory system. I want to say that as a matter of fact you cannot have anything other than a contributory system. The people on old age pensions today have contributed to the wealth out of which those pensions are being paid. They contributed to the building up of the economic well-being of this country. But there are other kinds of contributory systems. You could have one in which you would make a direct contribution in return for which you would get a pension based upon the amount of the contribution you had made. I hope we do not get a restricted system of that kind, for it is no better than the private life insurance companies can offer. There is another kind of contributory system under which everyone contributes to the cost of government through income tax, recognizing that one of those costs of government is social security, in return for which everyone would get the old age pension as a matter of right. I give the government this much credit; I believe that is what was in their mind when they made their proposals in 1945. I believe they had in mind that the financing of their proposals might involve adjustments or even increases in the income tax so that the total cost of old age pensions without a means test could be paid out of the federal treasury. That would be a proper scheme, because it would envision people paying according to their ability to pay, and drawing the old age pension at the proper age as a matter of right.

But what is happening now? The people who made those promises last June—especially the Liberals—are getting themselves off the hook by talking about an undefined contributory system, when they know it would take years before such a system could be brought in. One Liberal candidate at least was on the beam in this matter last June. I refer to the hon. member for Vancouver Centre (Mr. Campney) who, with some of that $21,000 he spent in his election campaign, advertised in the Vancouver News-Herald of June 13, 1949, saying:

> 6. I will fight for a contributory retirement pension plan for all persons over sixty-five as a right.
> 7. Pending the establishment of the foregoing act, I will fight for old age pensions to be paid to men of sixty-five and women of sixty without a means test, the pension to be large enough to ensure an adequate standard of living.

I wish that same member would get up in the house and express those views and fight for the things he said he would fight for, because all we are getting today is a lot of talk about a contributory system which is just an excuse for not supporting our demand for the removal of the means test. I want to say to the Minister of National Health and Welfare, the Prime Minister and those responsible for any steps that may be taken, that if you put old age pensions on a contributory basis first instead of first making the pension universal, you will bedevil old age security in this country for many years to come. That is one of the great problems they are facing in this field in the United States today despite the many good features of their legislation. It arises from the fact that they put it on a contributory basis and did not in the beginning include all United States citizens. Now the problem of extending the coverage is very difficult indeed.

The first thing we should do is precisely what the government proposed back in 1945. Just as what was put forward in 1945 represented a forward move in the thinking of the government about this matter, so .I believe it is extremely important that at this session of parliament the idea expressed by the Prime Minister the other day should be squelched at the first opportunity. I say that we should not let it go any further; that the important step, the move that must come first, is not getting the contributions started. That will come, and come easily. The move that should come first is getting rid of the means test and making the pension universal and payable to all Canadians. I say to hon. members who are getting these cards and petitions, as I am getting them by the hundreds, that I believe they emphasize the soundness of the position I am taking, that the removal of the means test should come first.

A moment ago I mentioned that in one of of the advertisements appearing in the Winnipeg Free Press of last June calling upon people to vote Liberal in order to get social security—imagine that—the picture of the hon. member for Winnipeg South appeared opposite the words "Social security". He catapulted himself into fame in this country by making an interesting speech in Toronto some days ago, in which he said that some Liberals might be confused, but he was not; that what we need in this country is not social security but social justice.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): He was just trying out the ice.

Mr. Knowles: No doubt he was flying a kite. He said:

> Social justice means lifting the fallen, aiding the unfortunate, standing between the weak and those who may seek to oppress them.

But he also said:

> During the last federal election the Progressive Conservatives and the C.C.F. talked of social security. We Liberals in our platform distinguished between social security and social justice. I confess that some Liberals have failed to note the difference.

Well, that was a very interesting speech to read. He wants social justice; he wants to lift the fallen and aid the unfortunate, to stand between the weak and those who may seek to oppress them. But don't give them social security; just offer it to them in an advertisement just before election day. He went on to say that this talk about social security is fundamentally dishonest. I wonder about this talk of dishonesty when at election time you get this sort of thing—"Vote Liberal and get social security,"—and immediately thereafter you are told in a speech that the Liberals do not stand for social security but only for a vague thing called social justice.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): After all, they can still say they won the election.

Mr. Knowles: Oh, yes; that is the usual song —they won the last election. It will probably be their last win—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Knowles: My hon. friends may laugh, but they know that if they keep on going in this reverse direction so far as these social security proposals are concerned, they will have seen their last victory at the polls in this country.

May I say to the hon. member for Winnipeg South that while a great many people are taking his name in vain because of the speech he made in Toronto, at least he has found friends in the Canadian chamber of commerce. In their most recent newsletter they have an interesting little article entitled "Plain talk from Mr. Mutch". It says that his speech is going to make him some enemies, but it will also make him some friends, and I assume that the friends are amongst the people to whom this newsletter is sent. That speech of the hon. member for Winnipeg South, according to the report of it in this Canadian chamber of commerce newsletter, included this statement:

> The term "social security", Mr. Mutch is reported as saying, "is indefinable, immeasurable and dishonest."

I am just about through, Mr. Speaker, but I want to say something about that remark of the hon. member for Winnipeg South, to the effect that the term "social security" is dishonest. I do not know exactly what he meant, but I have a notion that he meant that it is dishonest to give people the impression that they can get something for nothing. May I say that the thing that I deplore most about the economic order we have at the present time is its dishonesty, as is spelled out by the fact that thousands, yes, millions of people, produce wealth the fruits of which they are not permitted to enjoy. The glaring fact about our economy today is that millions of people do not get the full measure of the wealth they create, whereas a privileged few get far more than they produce. It is that fundamental dishonesty, that injustice, that unfairness, that we are trying to correct by advocating proper measures of social security. I call upon this parliament, and particularly upon the Liberal members of it, to put all the pressure they can on the government to reverse the trend indicated by the Prime Minister on February 20, when he said there never was such an offer as a universal pension without a means test, that there could not be, and that it would not work. I call upon the government to get back to the essential soundness of the proposals that were made in 1945, namely, that our old age pension be made payable to all Canadians, regardless of any means test, on a universal basis, and without delay.

Mr. E. A. McCusker (Regina City): May I, Mr. Speaker, join with those who have preceded me in offering congratulations to the mover and the seconder of the motion for the address, and also to the hon. member for Edmonton West (Mr. Prudham) on his promotion to the position of parliamentary assistant. A few days ago this house went into committee of supply on the Department of External Affairs. The Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Pearson) gave us a report on the operation of his department, and a general review of the international situation. He referred to some of the most important problems explored on his recent trip and conference, and stressed the generally unsatisfactory and anxious position in which the peace-minded democracies find themselves today on account of the hostile attitude and uncertain intentions of the communist-dominated countries.

He was alternately criticized and praised by those who followed in the debate. The hon. member for Peel (Mr. Graydon), who is absent today, complains that the department does not keep the members of this house in general, and the committee on external affairs in particular, fully informed on the current situation or on its plans for the future. He complains that the committee was not allowed to call before it for questioning Mr. Davis who was our ambassador to China. As one who opposed calling Mr. Davis before that committee, I should like to point out that the usefulness of Mr. Davis as an ambassador would have ended after one session in a committee in which he might be subjected to questions and his statements made public. I should like to have listened to his report on China; it probably would be most interesting; but I should like to see him continue in that service.

Those who are employed in positions such as the one occupied by Mr. Davis cannot be expected to report to anyone but the head of his department, or to the Prime Minister. I am afraid that we on that committee must content ourselves with the meagre information passed on by the department. When I say "meagre information", I do not accuse the department of withholding information to which we are entitled. We must realize that the department has certain information which it cannot divulge to a committee where it would be made public, and therefore we cannot expect them to do so.

I have listened carefully to, and studied, the speeches made on foreign affairs in this house since the opening of the session. While I congratulate all those who have spoken on the research they have done in the preparation of those speeches, I still maintain that the information contained in them is gleaned mainly from the many periodicals which fill our mail today, and is available to all our people. They cast no new light upon the problem, but tend to stress the personal fears and anxieties of those who have spoken. As far as I am concerned, the situation remains as it has been for the past few years, one of grave concern to which our Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) and the Secretary of State for External Affairs must give close attention; but the gravity of it must not be allowed to depress our people and develop in them an attitude, a complex of fear and futility. Because of this unfortunate international situation we are committed to large expenditures for the defence of democracy. Although the burden is heavy, I feel that we have the ability to carry it. We feel that within our resources we are doing everything that we possibly can do. There then remains for us who are not fully occupied in this task a duty to develop our country so that it can support these ever-growing expenditures.

Let me now direct the attention of the house to the many important practical problems which require our immediate attention. The first is unemployment. We all know that in this country, in which we have a severe winter climate, we are bound to find seasonal unemployment. This year some employers listened to the talk about depression, and curtailed employment beyond what they were justified in doing. In addition, the layoff in shipping has added to the unemployment. In the province from which I come we always have winter unemployment. This year it is greater than normal, but when the spring season comes around, which will be soon, and the people are able to return to the land, and when the construction projects that are in view are started, I feel that labour will be fully employed, and that all this unemployment will be absorbed.

The condition in Vancouver was aggravated by a great number of people who each winter go from the prairies to Vancouver looking for a warmer winter climate, and who seek positions there in order to help pay expenses for the winter. They were disappointed in their quest. In fact, I am told that the conditions in Vancouver and Victoria were so bad this year, with snow and slush so deep on the streets, that the older inhabitants had to attach outboard motors to their wheel chairs in order to get around; and this of course added greatly to the traffic congestion.

Mr. Cruickshank: Nonsense.

Mr. McCusker: There is not a member in this house who does not feel sorry for the unemployed and their families. I am sure we were all pleased with the rapidity with which the house came to their assistance by means of extension of the unemployment insurance benefits. I feel that the worker who is employed will not object to the additional premium of one cent per day, nor will the employer.

Those who contribute to that fund must have been happy to learn that it was substantial, safe and carefully administered. As the debate indicated, there are those who confuse unemployment insurance with plans to relieve unemployment. Surely there should be no confusion.

May I at this late date extend my congratulations to the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration (Mr. Harris) on his promotion to cabinet rank. I am sure he will attack the problem of immigration with vigour and determination.

The hon. member for Cape Breton South (Mr. Gillis) informs me that yearly many boys and girls upon leaving high school in the maritime provinces have to leave home to seek employment in other parts of Canada and in the United States. The industries that formerly employed them there have gone. I feel that every effort should be made to induce the boys and girls to remain in Canada, and to assist them to remain. The minister should be given wide latitude in doing that. What is the use of bringing displaced persons from Europe and allowing our own educated boys and girls to leave the country?

To a great extent western Canada was first settled by teen-agers and they played a large and prominent part in developing the country. Mr. Isaac Pitblado, who was honoured the other day in Winnipeg, was one of those. He opened his law practice in Winnipeg at the age of nineteen. I believe the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) came to the prairies in his teens. He taught school there and assisted in developing the country. To him goes the honour of first advocating the franchise being extended to eighteen-year-olds. His ideas were considered too advanced at that time, but they bore fruit some time later; for the franchise has been extended to these people in Saskatchewan. I do not think it would do any harm if we extended it federally.

During the periods in which we were engaged in two wars Canada developed in wealth and national status with a rapidity that might not have been achieved in times of peace. It is true our sacrifices were great and our suffering considerable, but what can be achieved without sacrifice and suffering? Are we to allow the gains made in those years to slip away from us, to be wiped out, because we want security, wealth and comfort? I hope not. Today our purse is full. Never before have we enjoyed such prosperity. That prosperity will last just so long as we continue to develop our many resources with all our energy.

We have great deposits of iron ore in Canada. We have the Steep Rock mines in Ontario, and great deposits in Labrador. We have great deposits of coal in the maritimes. It is true there is no coal in close proximity to the Steep Rock mines, and that ore must go south. But need the ore from Labrador all go south to the smelters, and must our people follow it to obtain work? We have coal in the maritimes; we have the people to mine it. We have a steel industry there. Why not develop those two industries? A good steel industry in the maritimes would support the entire economy of that part of the country with a population three times as large as it is today.

There is coal in Alberta. There is oil in abundance in that province, and in the Lloydminster area of Saskatchewan. Should we not develop that as quickly as possible? The Imperial Oil Company is building a pipe line, which will be completed to Regina in October of this year and on to Superior early next year. The oil from Superior will be taken down to Sarnia and Toronto by boat to be refined. Today Montreal receives its oil from South America. There is a pipe line from Portland to Montreal. I understand there is another pipe line to be built there. Why not build a pipe line from Parry Sound on the Georgian bay to Ottawa and on to Montreal and use the western oil? In the event of war does Montreal think or do we think that Montreal will have an uninterrupted oil supply? I think not. Because of the many submarines that Russia has today I think it will be considerably interfered with. Parry Sound is only 225 miles from Ottawa and 325 from Montreal. Why not build a pipe line now while we are at peace?

I should now like to direct the attention of the house to irrigation. In Alberta today there are approximately 175,000 acres under irrigation. There is a large beet industry there which employs a large number of people. Along with the beet industry there is a canning industry, because the beet crop must be rotated with garden crops and so garden crops are grown. In Canada we produce only 10 per cent of our sugar requirements. Here is an industry which we could develop quite easily. I was told by some of the men who were attending a beet growers meeting here in Ottawa recently that they are feeding 60,000 head of cattle and 125,000 sheep on the by-products of that industry in Alberta this winter. It is an industry that employs a considerable number of people.

The St. Mary river dam project is nearing completion. When it is completed it will bring under irrigation in the Lethbridge and Medicine Hat areas approximately 500,000 acres of land. I might almost say under cultivation, because in the dry years there is not much cultivation in that part of the country. The project at Red Deer will bring another half million acres under cultivation or irrigation. In addition it will supply 20 million kilowatt hours of electricity for sale a year. The greatest project of all is the one on the Saskatchewan river at Elbow. It will provide water to irrigate 650,000 acres of land. In addition to that it could produce yearly 435 million kilowatt hours of electricity. That is sufficient to supply one and a half times the needs of the province at the present time. It will produce revenue sufficiently large to pay for the project itself in about 40 years. Yet I am amazed to find that in the agricultural estimates this year only $1 million appears for this project, half of what was there last year. I understand the difficulty is that no agreement has been made between the provinces and the federal government as to the proper allocation of costs of distributing the water after the dam is built.

I think hon. members to my left, the C. C. F. and the Social Credit groups, could do a great service to this country and to the provinces of Alberta and Saskatchewan by impressing upon their friends in the governments of those provinces the necessity of an early agreement in this matter.

Mr. Wylie: Especially the Liberal government.

Mr. McCusker: Wait a few more years and you will be able to talk to a Liberal government in Saskatchewan. I do not want to have to wait that long for this project to be proceeded with.

Mr. Wylie: You never know what you are talking about.

Mr. McCusker: I cannot let this opportunity pass without saying how pleased I am to see that the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Martin) has a resolution on the order paper having to do with old age pensions. I am glad to know that he intends to place this matter before a committee where all views can be submitted and heard. I think that committee is the place to hear it, and that all hon. members will be glad to remove from this chamber much of the tiresome debate to which we have had to listen on that subject to date. Let us have those matters settled in committee.

Let me say to the hon. member who has just taken his seat that during the last campaign I said, and I have said it also from the floor of the house, that I was in favour of old age pensions without a means test, but on a contributory basis. That statement was quoted in all my literature. I repeated it when I was home this year, and it is a view, may I say, that meets with the approval of the majority of the people in Regina.

Mr. Quelch: Would the hon. member say what he means by the word "contributory"?

Mr. McCusker: I shall take the hon. member aside and explain it to him later. I have not the time to do so now because I have other things to say. There are a few other matters to which I should like to refer, now that I am on my feet. One of these is the Hudson bay route, a road which has been too long neglected and to which I suggest attention must be paid. However, I understand another hon. member will refer to this matter in greater detail at a later date.

We have in Saskatchewan an office in connection with the Prairie Farm Rehabilitation Act. In that office we find a group who are doing good work for the rehabilitation of farmers in the western part of the province, and especially in the area of Gull lake, and Maple Creek which is represented by the hon. member who the other day made what I thought was a jocular remark with respect to dividing the province. He may feel it is necessary to do that to get rid of the government we now have in Saskatchewan. That is not my view however, because I think they are on the way out now—just waiting for the next election.

Let me tell the house why I believe they are on the way out. About 1941 or 1942 the Imperial Oil Company came to Saskatchewan and initiated a program of exploration and drilling for oil. It was their opinion that the main pool of oil lies under Saskatchewan. With that in mind they brought in drilling and seismographic crews. Then the C.C.F. government took office and passed confiscatory legislation, with the result that the crews left the province and went to Alberta, where they felt they would receive a fair deal. Those crews which were driven from Saskatchewan to Alberta were responsible for the discoveries of the Leduc and Redwater fields, and other discoveries in the area.

The good fortune Alberta is enjoying today might have been ours, had we had more experienced people in charge of our government.

Mr. Blackmore: If you had had a Social Credit government in Saskatchewan you would have had the development there.

Mr. McCusker: It might be worth while even to put up with a Social Credit government if we could have that development.

Mr. Blackmore: You are right.

Mr. McCusker: Because we would have some compensation for it.

On this occasion the ordinary private member has an opportunity to review the requirements of his constituency. As it happens, I am fortunate today in that I am asking for my constituency something of national importance. I wonder if the Minister of Justice (Mr. Garson) is aware of the condition of disrepair into which the buildings of the Royal Canadian Mounted Police at Regina have fallen. This condition is not due to neglect, but rather to the age of those buildings, some of which were built as long ago as 1882 or 1883, and some even earlier than that. They are on rubble foundations and are no longer safe. The small chapel was at first a wet canteen. That building was enlarged and converted into a chapel. Today it stands as a pleasing memorial to those in the force who lost their lives while in pursuit of their duties. It would be a shame to fail to repair that building, or to permit it to be destroyed. It has great tourist attraction. Then, the barracks buildings are inadequate because, as we know, the force is constantly being enlarged. Regina is a training centre, and there is great overcrowding at that point. It is also necessary to provide additional accommodation for the instructional staff. I hope the Minister of Justice will bear these facts in mind and see that attention is given to them.

Since coming to the House of Commons I have heard many hon. members tell us what a great people we are. We take pride in our new national status. Our representatives return from abroad to tell us of the high esteem in which we are held. Today, Mr. Speaker, we have an opportunity to prove whether we are worthy sons of those great pioneers. Though the international horizon be cloudy, though our defence burdens be heavy, though our domestic problems be great, our opportunities are equally great and unlimited. In the manner in which we apply ourselves to our duties will be found the answer as to whether or not we are a great people, a nation.

Mr. G. F. Higgins (St. John's East): Mr. Speaker, it is a great pleasure again today to speak from the newest province and to extend congratulations to the mover (Mr. Larson) and the seconder (Mr. Dumas) of the address in reply. Unfortunately I did not have the pleasure of hearing them speak, but I read their speeches carefully and I must say they were excellent in every way.

I did not hear them for two reasons. The first of these, the weather, is something over which we have no control. However, the Canadian National Railways, the second of those conditions, is something about which I feel the Minister of Transport (Mr. Chevrier) could do something. I have in mind particularly the conditions at Louisburg, Nova Scotia. However, I shall not deal with that matter now because I believe it might be discussed more appropriately at a later time.

Referring to the speech from the throne my leader (Mr. Drew) said, as reported at page 38 of Hansard:

> As to the speech from the throne itself, it contains so little of a definite nature that any remarks which may contribute to the effective consideration of our problems necessarily must be related more to what the speech from the throne does not say than to anything it does say.

[Mr. McCusker.]

In the old days of the parliament in Newfoundland we had an expression which would seem to sum up what was said by the leader of the opposition. We would have said that the speech from the throne was more remarkable for what it did not contain than for what it did contain. Or, as one of my constituents said in a letter to me the other day, "Heap big smoke; no fire".

In the few remarks I shall make I intend to deal only with provincial matters. Perhaps it is better that I follow this procedure because the problems of the new province are not yet well known. I believe that, on every possible occasion other members from Newfoundland and I are permitted to inflict our views upon the house, we should try to direct the attention of hon. members to Newfoundland and its problems.

When the other day the Minister of Veterans Affairs (Mr. Gregg) unequivocally refused to set up a parliamentary committee on veterans affairs I was greatly disturbed, because among the requests received by members from Newfoundland was one from our great war veterans association asking in particular that such a committee be set up. I found it necessary to reply to them by stating that for some reason or other, which we had not yet been able to ascertain, we had received only a blunt refusal to their request. Furthermore, in the letter received there was a request that we support the Legion's recommendation for increases in the basic rates of war veterans' and widows' allowances from $40 to $50 per month for single veterans and widows with no dependents, and to $80 per month for married veterans and widows with dependents. The brief of the dominion executive council of the Canadian Legion, presented I believe in November of last year, stated that in some provinces the recipients are receiving less than they would under the Old Age Pensions Act. The Legion appreciated the extra aid given but stated that it feels strongly that a general increase in the basic rate would be more satisfactory to all concerned. I trust that the minister and the cabinet will take under advisement the necessity of reconsidering the decision already given in this matter.

I notice the Minister of Transport (Mr. Chevrier) is not in his seat, but I should like to take advantage of this opportunity to draw to his attention a situation that exists at Gander airport. Owing to a regulation passed during wartime the erection of new buildings is not permitted within five miles of the airport. The result is that housing conditions are simply scandalous. Families are paying $110 per month to live in old converted barracks. This is a ridiculous situation and I trust the necessary action will be taken to have the regulation rescinded immediately.

As the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) just said, all hon. members are receiving requests with respect to old age pensions and the removal of the means test. Along with the other Newfoundland members I have received a great number of these. The Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) more or less intimated the other day that Canada could not afford to pay for such pensions, but in view of the able argument put forward by the hon. member I am convinced that that legislation should be on the statute books.

I concur in what was said by the hon. member for Skeena (Mr. Applewhaite) with regard to the establishment of a coastguard. I spoke in this chamber last session with regard to that matter. The hon. member indicated the necessity for such a service on the west coast of Canada. As you know, the wise men come from the east and all I can say is that the need on the east coast for such a service is as great as it is on the west coast. I am in favour of a coastguard modelled on the United States coastguard. No blame can be attached to the R.C.M.P., who operate the present set-up, but I submit that they certainly should not have to do that work.

There is another matter I should like to raise but I do not know just what value my argument may have. As hon. members know, there are now three senators from Newfoundland and three more are to be appointed. I suggest to the Prime Minister that he act in accordance with past precedent when new provinces came into confederation and not appoint all the senators on party lines. When the new appointments are made I suggest that he go outside his party and appoint those who are other than Liberals.

There is another matter I should like to bring up, and here again I do not suppose there is much hope. Owing to the uncultured state of Newfoundland before we entered confederation all books were allowed to come in duty free. Since confederation any books coming into Newfoundland from the United States must pay duty. It would not cost the country very much and would be of great help, even to the people in older Canada, if the duty on books were removed. I can assure the government that the people of Newfoundland would welcome that move very much.

The speech from the throne referred to the dominion-provincial conference held in January. The parliamentary assistant to the premier of Newfoundland stated on February 15, when the Newfoundland legislature was opened, that he had been present and could not help but notice the high regard in which the premier of Newfoundland was held by all the people in Ottawa. He said that from what he could see and hear there appeared to be only three premiers at the conference, the Prime Minister, the premier of Quebec (Mr. Duplessis), and Mr. Smallwood. He compared them to Churchill, Roosevelt and Stalin, although he did not particularize which was which. I would think that there was a fairly good foundation in fact not to compare the Prime Minister with Joe Stalin. I doubt if the parliamentary assistant would compare his own premier to Stalin. It would appear to me as if we may be getting ready for war between Quebec and Newfoundland over the Labrador boundary. That by the way.

It was stated in the speech from the throne that employment and prosperity remained at a high level, but as far as my part of the country is concerned that statement is not borne out by the facts. As I stated earlier, I am not going to refer to the over-all picture but only to the picture as it presents itself in Newfoundland. The present outlook there is bleak indeed. The number of unemployed is high and the prospects are far from bright. In January the men engaged on relief work, apart from those receiving unemployment insurance or unemployment assistance, numbered 10,237.

The minister of finance of Newfoundland issued a message at the end of the year in the Daily News, stating that it was expected that that province would close the year on March 31, not with a cash surplus of $40 million but with one just under $32 million. He said that a total of $8,500,000 would have been expended from the cash surplus during the year. For the eight months April to December there was a deficit of over $4 million on current expenditure. When it is realized that the entire revenue for that period is around $20 million you will realize how grave the situation is.

Iron ore for Dosco at Sydney is supplied largely from Bell island, but the mines there are having a difficult time. It was expected that a contract with the British steel makers for the delivery of 1,500,000 tons per year for ten years would have been entered into last year, but the British government would not consent because of the exchange situation and the deal fell through. Permission was given to complete the balance of the 1949 contract. Last November a possibility appeared to sell 1,125,000 tons to be delivered this year, made up of 300,000 tons to Western Germany—Germany before the war was always a great market for our ore—300,000 tons to England and the remainder to the steel plant at Sydney. Unfortunately this deal also fell through. I understand it was to be financed more or less by means of Marshall aid, and whatever happened—I think it was the curtailment of funds more than anything else—the deal also fell through. At the present time the only prospect in sight is the amount of ore to be shipped to Sydney, some 700,000 tons, and from the latest information we have it may be reduced by another 100,000 tons.

The present position at Bell island is that they are only operating two mines on a five day a week basis, and that there are some 1,000 men actually unemployed out of a working force of 2,000. From the best advice that we can secure this situation is going to continue, and there may be an even bigger reduction in the number employed because I understand they are modernizing the plant and putting in new machinery, which naturally will cut down on employment. I take it that is generally the result of installing machinery. That is what the hon. member for Cape Breton South (Mr. Gillis) tells me, and he should know. At all events the situation is causing grave concern not only to the people of Bell island but also to the provincial government.

In order that the necessary action may be taken, I should like to draw to the attention of the minister concerned the fact that some difficulty has arisen in the payment of unemployment insurance cheques and there has been great dissatisfaction. Cheques have not been received regularly. Some of these people have been kept waiting over two months, and they have to travel twelve miles by land and water to St. John's to get their cheques. I trust that action will be taken to see that these people who have no money, and who have to get to St. John's as best they can, will be able to receive their unemployment insurance payments without having to wait two months and be paid at Bell island.

The provincial government have undertaken relief work in Newfoundland, as I think I said during last session, and the burden has been considerable. So far the Newfoundland government has expended $1,250,000 on unemployment relief, a tremendous amount of money for that little province, and how long it will be able to keep it up is very difficult to say. So long as we have a voice in this house there is one matter which we will raise. We want the terms of confederation revised upwards. They must be revised if Newfoundland is going to be able to keep up with the other provinces of Canada.

There is another matter that has only come to my attention recently, although it should have before. In talking to some of the business people of Newfoundland they have pointed out that there is a factor which was never mentioned in the confederation discussions, and which should have been. I refer to the great benefit that Canada is receiving now from increased trade, something that she did not have before. Most of our former trade with the United States is now being carried on with Canada. In other words, Canada is selling to Newfoundland $40 million more than she sold before confederation. That is a considerable factor and should certainly be borne in mind when we ask to have the terms revised, as we will have to very shortly.

I had hoped that fishermen would be included in the amendments to the Unemployment Insurance Act. I presume they could not be, although I do not know the reason why. It seems to me to be a great pity that some scheme cannot be worked out whereby fishermen could be covered under the Unemployment Insurance Act. What has become of these poor people who do not qualify for unemployment insurance? There is no federal agency taking care of them. They are left chiefly to charitable organizations, and that is a most ridiculous situation in a country which we heard described last year by the hon. member for Spadina (Mr. Croll) as a welfare state. As I have already said, there is a considerable amount of unemployment, and a lot of it can be attributed directly to confederation. That is a pretty harsh statement. I realize that even the most rabid anti-confederationist cannot blame confederation altogether for that fact, but even the most partisan—and I include hon. members on the other side of the house from Newfoundland—supporters of confederation must agree that the hitting of our secondary industries and the closing of a number of them can be directly attributed to this fact. I understand that some half a dozen have closed already, and the remainder are making a very gallant effort to keep running, but what happened in the case of the maritimes, as is known so well to maritime members of the house, will happen in Newfoundland in so far as the secondary industries of the province are concerned. The best proof I can give of that—and I am sure you will understand that I do not say this because I was an anti-confederate—is that, if I may use slang language, it comes right from the horse's mouth.

I should like to refer to the submission of the government of the province of Newfoundland to the royal commission on transportation, and particularly to that section of it dealing with the economic outlook for St. John's. Practically all of our secondary industries are located there. The submission reads:

The impact of confederation upon St. John's as the chief trading and distributing centre of the island will be revolutionary. Heretofore it has been the chief receiving centre and distribution point for imports into Newfoundland. Because of the diversion of trade from sources of supply in the United States of America and Europe to Canadian suppliers, and because of the re-routing of imports through gateways more contiguous to the mainland than St. John's, this import business, with its consequent distributing trade, will be lost irrevocably to the capital. It is safe to say that in time the trading and distributing activities of St. John's will be limited largely to the Avalon peninsula. This prospect poses a matter of grave concern to that section of the population residing within and around the Avalon peninsula. It is of particular moment to those resident in St. John's.

No basic industries exist in St. John's. No natural resources capable of providing a basic economy are to be found within its immediate vicinity, with one exception. It therefore follows that with the falling off of import trade through this port, and the consequent loss of its primary position as the distributing centre for the island, an alternative economy must be built up or St. John's will not only fail to maintain its present position, but must inevitably suffer a decline in trade and employment of serious and far-reaching proportions.

The local industries located within the area may exist precariously for some time to come, but it is difficult to see how manufacturing concerns within St. John's can compete effectively with mass-producing units engaged in the same line of business on the mainland.

There is one ray of hope in this dark outlook. It is to be found in the establishment at St. John's of a great producing and processing centre for the products of the sea. The harbour is ice free all the year round——and for this reason it can be utilized as a base for such an operation.

This is a misstatement so far as this year is concerned.

So, Mr. Speaker, in the vernacular this submission, which comes from the Smallwood administration and can therefore be taken as unbiased, means that the outlook is for St. John's, one of the oldest cities on this side of the water, as a result of confederation to become nothing better than a fishing village. That is the most it can hope for; and that is not a nice picture. I do not know what will become of the people who are going to lose their livelihood as a result of our local industries closing. The sad part of it to me, and to many others who think as I do, is that the only alternative appears to be for the people who are now engaged in these secondary industries to increase the population of the other provinces of the dominion. Without doubt we are going to see mass emigration from Newfoundland in the years ahead.

I am glad to learn from the speech from the throne that it is proposed to amend the price support legislation. I trust that these funds will be made available to the fishermen of Newfoundland because, as I have said before, the backbone of our economy is the salt fish trade. A number of Newfoundland merchants engaged in the fish trade are in this city today; and their chief purpose in coming to Ottawa is to interview the cabinet in an endeavour to arrange for the conversion of sterling. I know this problem of sterling conversion exists throughout Canada, but I do submit that the people of Newfoundland must be given special treatment for some years to come. After all you must remember that here on the mainland you have a pattern that has been woven over many years. We are now trying to come into that pattern, but it is utterly impossible to expect us to do so at once, particularly with respect to our export trade, chiefly the fish trade, where we have been dealing in markets that have no substantial attraction for the other provinces of Canada. So it is going to be very difficult for us to be assimilated into your general trade pattern unless special treatment is given our province. The special treatment we ask—and I know this will be supported by all hon. members from the province—is that for a few years to come you arrange for the conversion of sterling in connection with the fish trade. It will not amount to very much. At the most in a single year it will not exceed $15 million, but that $15 million means the difference between life and death for Newfoundland. So I ask the members of the cabinet to give serious consideration to the request which I understand was presented to them today.

There is still another matter; we are great people for asking, and it is just as well to put all our needs on record. As hon. members are aware, our seal fishery has been of historic note for many years as a source of livelihood for our people. This year the seal fishery is being carried on by only three ships. One of those ships comes from the mainland of Canada; the other two are being sent out by the firm of Bowring Brothers, I believe chiefly for sentimental reasons, because of their long connection with the seal fishery. What is the cause of this? The reason is that seal oil is no longer used by manufacturers in Canada, who instead are using United States dollars to buy vegetable oils. I submit in all honesty that these manufacturers should be required to buy marine oil at the same price they are paying for vegetable oil from the United States. The seal oil is just as good, and I do not know why they no longer use it. Certainly I feel this action should be taken. It would be a great help to us; it would relieve a good deal of unemployment and at the same time would conserve United States dollars. So I believe this suggestion is well worthy of consideration.

In discussing the matter of secondary industries in Newfoundland the question of freight rates is most important. I feel very strongly about this question, and there has been a great deal of publicity about it at home. When I say "at home" I am referring to my province; I cannot quite fit into the pattern here as I should, even yet. The position with respect to freight rates is this. As a member of the original delegation to Ottawa in 1947, accompanying the present Secretary of State (Mr. Bradley) and the hon. member for Grand Falls-White Bay (Mr. Ashbourne), I had a very clear understanding of the matter, and I am sure those two hon. members had the same clear understanding. As far as freight rates were concerned we understood that Newfoundland was to be placed in a position which would enable it to compete, by being treated as the maritime provinces are treated. That was the definite, clear understanding and undertaking that we took home with us. That was the understanding and undertaking given to those who signed the terms of union in 1948, and that has been the understanding of those who have discussed the matter.

What has happened? Instead of carrying out that undertaking an entirely different tariff rate has been applied to Newfoundland. Our tariff rate is C17 as against tariff rate C19 for the maritimes, and as a result my province has had to pay an overcharge of 28 per cent. Let me give a few examples so hon. members will be able to follow the trend of my argument. The figures I intend to give do not include the last 16 per cent increase; they were made up before it went into force, and I could not get up-to-date figures because the tolls have not been filed as yet. These are the old figures, which I presume will be increased by 16 per cent; and here is the position. From Bic, Quebec, to Campbellton, New Brunswick, the distance is 133 miles, and the charge for carrying 100 pounds of class I freight is 66 cents. The distance from St. John's to Clarenville, Newfoundland, is 131 miles, and the charge for the same quantity and class of freight is 76 cents. From Saint John to Blackland, New Brunswick, the distance is 254 miles. The charge for the same quantity and class of freight is 79 cents. For a distance of 253 miles from St. John's to Lewisporte, one mile less, the charge is $1.02. From Saint John to Campbellton, New Brunswick, is 276 miles and it is also 276 miles from St. John's to Grand Falls, Newfoundland; yet to carry 100 pounds of class I freight in New Brunswick the charge is 83 cents, while in Newfoundland the charge is $1.05.

By a peculiar coincidence, the tariff rates on all classes of freight from Oak Bay, Quebec, to Halifax, Nova Scotia, a distance of 405 miles, are exactly the same as the rates on the same quantity of freight from St. John's, Newfoundland, to Grand Falls, Newfoundland, a distance of 276 miles; the same price is charged for 405 miles as we Newfoundlanders have to pay for 276 miles.

The final example I shall give you, Mr. Speaker, is from Sydney, Nova Scotia, to Upsalquitch, New Brunswick, a distance of 547 miles; the charge is $1.14 for 100 pounds. Yet for exactly the same distance from St. John's, Newfoundland, to Port aux Basques, the charge is $1.62.

In order that hon. members may be aware of what has happened, may I point out that the government of Newfoundland applied to the board of transport commissioners to cancel the existing tariff—that is, the tariff from which I have just quoted—and to substitute therefor tariff and tolls based on the rate structure now in effect in the maritime provinces. This application was based on section 32 of the terms of union, and was refused by the board in a judgment delivered on February 14 last. Subsections (2) and (3) of section 32 of the terms of union read as follows:

> (2) For the purpose of railway rate regulation the island of Newfoundland will be included in the maritime region of Canada, and through-traffic moving between North Sydney and Port aux Basques will be treated as all-rail traffic.
> (3) All legislation of the parliament of Canada providing for special rates on traffic moving within, into, or out of, the maritime region will, as far as appropriate, be made applicable to the island of Newfoundland.

As many hon. members will recall, when this matter of freight rates was being discussed at the first session of this house in 1949, a number of those still here engaged in the discussion. As reported at page 608 of Hansard, the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent), referring to this particular agreement and these freight rates, stated:

> This matter was fully gone into with the representatives of Newfoundland, who were also quite concerned about it, and the best we could tell them was that the board of transport commissioners would have to take that into account.

Then again on the same page:

> That is something also which was carefully discussed with the representatives of Newfoundland, and they were told that all these matters would have to be taken into consideration by the transport commissioners. What is provided is that this connection to Port aux Basques is a part of the railway rate, but the maritime rate will apply within Newfoundland. It does not apply now to the traffic carried by water from Halifax to any point in Newfoundland; but in determining what will be proper rates to charge for rail movement the board will have to take all appropriate factors into consideration. The delegates from Newfoundland finally were satisfied with this position: that we do not want to have things happen which will interfere with the economy of Newfoundland, and we do not want things to happen which will interfere with the usual trading practices of the maritime provinces. We hope that instead of there being interference there will be promotion of trade relations, and that is something with which the board of transport commissioners will have to deal.

Then as reported at page 619, the Minister of Transport (Mr. Chevrier) stated:

> Under the bill the Canadian National Railways is required to file tariffs with the board of transport commissioners on March 31, assuming that confederation takes place on that date, and assuming also that the lines of railway on the island of Newfoundland and the steamer service between North Sydney and Port aux Basques are entrusted to the Canadian National Railways on the same date. Such rates will have to conform to the general pattern of rail rates in the other provinces of Canada; otherwise they would be discriminatory. Discriminatory rates, either higher or lower than in the same general territory, cannot be maintained under the Railway Act. Therefore, as stated, the rates will follow the general pattern of the rates in the other provinces.

I would ask you, Mr. Speaker, to note that word "discriminatory", because it is exactly the same word that is found in the judgment of the board of transport commissioners, and I read from the last page of that judgment:

> This subsection may also mean that the rate structure in Newfoundland is to be in general conformity with the rate structure in the other maritime provinces. But we do not think there is anything in this subsection to affect in any way the principles upon which the board has acted in the past in regard to discrimination under the provisions of the Railway Act.

The board apparently thinks it can discriminate; the Minister of Transport apparently thought it could not. The present position is that this matter is now met by the formal approach of the premier of Newfoundland to the cabinet, I believe made today, and a request from him that this section of the terms of union be honoured.

All I have to say is this, Mr. Speaker. As it was generally understood by all of us, and as the Secretary of State (Mr. Bradley) was a member of that delegation, and the hon. member for Grand Falls-White Bay (Mr. Ashbourne) and I myself were members of the first delegation, and as members of the Liberal party in Newfoundland campaigned using that understanding as one of their arguments, I therefore say that there is only one thing for all the members from Newfoundland in this house to do with the exception of my learned confrere the hon. member from St. John's West (Mr. Browne), who did not actively participate at that time. I say in all sincerity that if the cabinet does not honour that agreement that was understood by us, the Newfoundland members should resign. It may be said that it is not written into the terms of confederation but certainly it was understood by us. Unless therefore we are put on the same basis as the maritimes, in the matter of freight rates, then I say that in all honour the only alternative is for the Secretary of State, the hon. member for Grand Falls-White Bay and the other members of the Liberal party from Newfoundland, to resign from this house.

Mr. Ashbourne: On a question of privilege, Mr. Speaker, may I suggest that the hon. member—

An hon. Member: Ask your question.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. The hon. member should be allowed to state his question of privilege.

Mr. Ashbourne: The question of privilege is this. How can one member speak for someone else? I suggest that the hon. member speak for himself. I am here to speak for myself, and the Secretary of State can speak for himself.

Mr. Higgins: Let there be no misunderstanding about this matter. I speak for myself entirely. What the other hon. members of this house do is their own affair. But as for myself, if this agreement is not honoured by the cabinet, I am resigning from this house and I am going back to Newfoundland where I shall endeavour, by all possible means, to have the province of Newfoundland secede from confederation. That is what I intend to do if this promise is not honoured. That is all I have to say.

Mr. Lennard: He is speaking for himself now.

Mr. A. W. Stuart (Charlotte): My opening remarks, Mr. Speaker, will be congratulations to the mover and the seconder of the address in reply to the speech from the throne. I wish to compliment them sincerely. I think their contribution was worth while and was well delivered.

After having listened to the remarks by the member from Newfoundland I think that the house will have, when I have finished, a good idea that the members from the maritimes are much dissatisfied and in many cases are much of the same mind.

The particular part of the speech from the throne in which I was interested was a section which dealt with trade relations between the various countries of the world who were willing to trade with us. That is one of the most important things we have to deal with in the maritimes. We are in a different position from that of many parts of Canada, since we are practically wholly dependent on the United States for our markets. For that reason the closer relationship there is between the United States and Canada and the better trade agreements that can be arranged between the two countries the more beneficial it will be to our part of the country.

On many occasions in the house we hear discussions on unfavourable trade balances. As a rule when that condition does prevail every effort is made to rectify it. But I often wonder whether we give sufficient consideration to the unfavourable trade balances as between the provinces of the dominion. That is the great problem that faces the maritime provinces. At this point I might say that we have found it much easier to break into the markets of the United States than into the markets of central Canada. We have always been able to deal with the United States; we have always been able to get along with them even though the things that we produce are also produced in the United States. They have always been very considerate of us and we consider them our friends.

During the war we were told that it would be necessary to centralize industries in this part of Canada, and that after the war it was hoped that the centralization of industry would be discontinued, and that we in our section of the country might expect a better break than we had received in wartime. Many of the war plants in Ontario and Quebec, to the construction of which we paid our proportionate share, were practically given to industries in the two central provinces immediately after the war. I have seen them in Hamilton and in other parts of central Canada. We paid our proportionate part to build these very fine structures. After the war, instead of the maritime provinces receiving what they considered belonged to them, these properties were practically given away to create new industries and to induce other industries to come to the two central provinces. It was the same old story that we have had since confederation, centralization of industry.

There is a point that I wish to make, which I feel will be discussed openly some time in the near future, and which is of great interest down in my section of Canada. During my five years in Ottawa I have heard hon. members from Ontario and Quebec, who I believe were sincere, say that they would like to have an opportunity to assist the people in less fortunate provinces. We believe that today they have that opportunity. It is only a few years ago that an hon. member from Ontario visited the maritime provinces. He was the former member for Davenport, Mr. John R. MacNicol, a most distinguished Canadian. Speaking in Saint John city on that occasion he had this to say, according to the Saint John Telegraph-Journal:

> It is an outrage against the maritime provinces that the (Chignecto) canal was not built fifty or seventy-five years ago. I say further that the building of that canal would revolutionize the whole economy of the three maritime provinces.

He went on to make further flattering statements about the maritime provinces. I believe he was sincere in every way.

In the province of Quebec and in Labrador we have enormous quantities of iron ore, which has been discovered within the last few years. Iron ore cannot be manufactured without coal, and so far as I know there is no coal in Ontario or Quebec. Therefore it would be necessary to ship this iron ore to central Canada, and then use United States dollars to import United States coal if this industry is to be centralized where most other industries are. That idea has already been strongly suggested by many papers in Ontario, and by many people. At this point I should like to quote a short statement from Maclean's, which is a national magazine, read all over Canada. It was written by "the man with a notebook." It is dated February 15, 1949, and reads as follows:

> If the seaway does go through, Ottawa of course will stand up and cheer.

He is referring to the deepening of the St. Lawrence waterway in order to provide means of bringing Labrador ore into central Canada. I fail to understand why we from the maritime provinces who sit in the House of Commons should stand up and cheer over the announcement that the St. Lawrence waterway was being deepened. In other words, the people in the central provinces expect the maritime provinces to make their proportionate contribution toward the deepening of the St. Lawrence waterway in order that the ore that should be manufactured in the maritimes may be taken to central Canada to be manufactured so that they may enjoy the benefits. To me that is merely a selfish statement. It goes on to say:

> High tolls on Labrador ore would divert it from the great lakes area to the Atlantic seaboard.

I realize that in the eyes of a person living in central Canada that would be a terrible calamity; but in the eyes of the people living in the maritime provinces that would be the logical thing to do, and the economical thing as well. It would be the logical and economical thing to manufacture Labrador ore where there is coal. I am certain to hear arguments propounded in the house sometime in the near future as to why this ore should be manufactured in central Canada. I realize that we are going to be asked to stand up and support it. That ore could be taken a much shorter distance to where we already have coal, and we already have a problem in connection with our coal industry. Markets cannot be found for maritime coal. We are told that it cannot compete even as far west as Montreal. If the hon. members from central Canada are sincere this is their opportunity to assist the maritime provinces. Here is the opportunity from an economical standpoint, and from the standpoint of the saving of United States dollars, to make every effort to manufacture this ore in the maritime provinces.

When the Chignecto canal is built—and I hope it will be—much of this ore may be manufactured on the Atlantic coast of the United States. I have no doubt that some people would not like to see that happen, but I would love to see these people get Canadian ore. They have supplied us with ore for many years. They have supplied us with many commodities that we were not able to produce in this country. I would never take the selfish attitude that it should be kept at home. If we have a surplus we should not hesitate to sell it to our neighbours to the south who have always given us most generous consideration.

I should like to read another article at this time from the Northern Miner, of recent issue. This is along the same lines and, speaking about Labrador ore, states:

> With the domestic iron production on the march to an annual outpouring that could conceivably reach 20,000,000 tons, Canadians can see the basis for tremendous industrial expansion for the nation. This is a mighty giant that has been unleashed by the proving up of hundreds of millions of tons of reserves.
> It is not likely to stop with the mere digging up of the ore and loading it on a train or boat. The resulting annual influx of United States dollars from these simple operations—$100 million or more is quite possible—is nothing to be sneezed at but Canadians with courage and imagination will expect the iron ore revelations to mean much more than that.
> They can see huge growth for the Canadian steel industry, not ignoring the sixty per cent expansion that has taken place in the last half dozen years and the works currently in progress. Their ideas go far beyond. They see present steel plants much, much bigger and new steel centres established—at the head of the lakes, for instance.

Every mention made of manufacturing Labrador ore contains reference to the head of the lakes. I have yet to hear or read anything from Ontario or Quebec which would suggest that this ore should be manufactured in the maritime provinces. Perhaps I am repeating myself, but before leaving this subject let me say that we feel we have in our argument a logical approach; we feel we have coal for which markets cannot be found. We feel we have the personnel, some of whom are unemployed. We feel that from an economic standpoint there can be no argument in favour of any other part of Canada. I do hope that when any mention is made of the deepening of the St. Lawrence waterways so as to take this iron ore to central Canada, each and every one of the members in the House of Commons from the maritime provinces will stand on his feet and fight against it.

Mr. Brooks: I would sooner see it come to upper Canada than go to the United States, as the hon. member mentioned a moment ago.

Mr. Stuart (Charlotte): I referred to the surplus. I repeat, in answer to the hon. member for Royal, that I think perhaps I have a warmer place in my heart for those people to the south than he has.

Mr. Brooks: I do not doubt it.

Mr. Stuart (Charlotte): International good will has prevailed in the particular section in which I live, since confederation. Any favour that will be helpful to our southern neighbours will receive my support in every way.

There is another argument in favour of manufacturing in the maritime provinces. We have always been given to understand that it was cheaper to transport a finished article or a manufactured article than to transport raw materials. If this steel is needed in central Canada after it is manufactured, there is no question that it can be brought here. It can be delivered in central Canada much cheaper than the raw materials could be delivered.

For many years we have subsidized the manufacturers of Ontario and Quebec. It may become camouflaged by some other name, such as tariff protection. Nevertheless it is definitely a direct subsidy when it is imposed upon the people in that section of Canada. If it were a two-way arrangement I am sure there would be little difficulty in dealing with the people in the maritimes; but from the time of confederation there has been a most unsatisfactory balance favouring only one section of the country.

Speaking in this chamber a few days ago the hon. member for Dufferin-Simcoe (Mr. Rowe) had this to say about cabinet ministers, as it is reported at page 264 of Hansard:

> They are nice fellows, grand fellows. Whatever the United States says, they do.

I think perhaps the hon. member who made that statement had in mind the thought that the province in which he resides has not been accorded the generosity of the people to the south which has been accorded us in the maritime provinces. I doubt whether the hon. member would have spoken that way, had he enjoyed that generosity.

In connection with being told by the United States what we should do, may I quote briefly from a British publication dated at London, January 8. It states:

> The Financial Times says today that Canada would "do well to give the matter much thought" before relaxing restrictions on imports from the United States on consumer goods.

These are instructions from the other side of the ocean.

> In a review of a statement Thursday by Hon. D. C. Abbott, Finance Minister, on Canadian currency reserves, the paper says that marked deterioration in the dominion's internal economic situation during the past years makes Ottawa naturally anxious to find ways of stepping up supply of goods for consumption and capital development in Canada.

It would appear at the present time that there are people in other countries who are endeavouring to instruct us in Canada as to how we should carry on the business of our own country. Might I add that in our dealings in New Brunswick with the United States—and I can speak for that province at least—I am convinced the balance has always been in our favour. We have always been able to sell more to the United States than we have been allowed to buy from them. We would have purchased much more, but tariff protection in this country prohibits us from doing so. Rigid and stringent regulations compel us to make those purchases from subsidized monopolies in other parts of Canada.

The term "subsidized monopolies" may seem to some hon. members rather severe. I believe it was the Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott) however who, in describing refrigerator manufacturers in this country recently, used that very expression. He said it was a monopoly. That is the thing we have been dealing with for many years.

On Tuesday last the hon. member for Dufferin-Simcoe made another statement I was sorry to hear him make. At that time he was discussing the serious difficulty we were encountering in Canada in connection with the disposition of surplus farm products. Dealing with the question of surplus potatoes he said this, as reported at page 317 of Hansard:

> I am not going to be disturbed about whether we sell potatoes or not.

That, to my mind, is a typical Ontario statement. Potatoes were of no concern to the hon. member for Dufferin-Simcoe. This matter had reference particularly to the maritime provinces so it caused the hon. member very little concern. But statements such as this and statements such as we read in the press of the central provinces have pretty well convinced us down there that about all we are required to do is to support additional canal systems for the central provinces, and pay our proportional share, even though it may take something from us which we feel is properly ours. We must pay those two central provinces our proportional part for everything they would like to have, and yet at the same time we are denied the privilege of selling a single thing in return. It is the most unfavourable trade balance you could find anywhere in the world, nationally or internationally.

This has been going on for many years. We have heard much discussion of maritime rights. I do not believe in preaching maritime rights; I believe this is a national right. It is my belief that in order for one part of this country to be prosperous, it must all be prosperous. We have to live and let live. We must try to work together. Where there are indications of discrimination, some way must be found to rectify that condition. This same story has been placed before the house for years and years, but apparently, to date, very little has been done to rectify it.

As I stated a few moments ago, I shall await anxiously the arguments that will be used in this house before it closes with regard to the deepening of the St. Lawrence and with regard to the Labrador ore development. I have no idea what arguments will be advanced, but I can assure hon. members that they will have to come up with something good before the maritimes will take the bait.

During the short time we have been here many suggestions have been put forth by hon. members of the opposition with regard to trade relations between Canada and Great Britain and between Canada and other countries. As I sat here and listened to those arguments I wondered why one thing was said one day and something else the next. During the past two weeks I have heard members of the opposition say that everything should be done to increase trade with Britain, and then I have heard an hon. member from the same group get up and complain that an industry in his constituency is in jeopardy because of British goods coming into the country. Just a few days ago I noticed an editorial in the Christian Science Monitor which would indicate that these stories have crossed the border to the United States. I should like to quote a short passage from this, as follows:

> The facts of this incident can be explained, but they show instantly the pressure which Canadian manufacturers can be expected to throw against imports which disturb their present position.
> This government may expect larger pressure than any predecessor, for the obvious reason that in the last ten years Canada has emerged from the status of a raw-material producer into the status of a great industrial nation, with an inevitable shift in political gravity.

And again:

> There has been skirmishing only on the side lines—strong protests from a few Conservative members against new British competition.

My idea of trade with Great Britain or any other peace-loving country is that it should be on the basis of their trading with us as well. I am bitterly opposed to the way trade has been carried on with Great Britain during the last four or five years. It has been trading on a one-way street. I realize that there has been great privation and suffering in Great Britain but I am convinced also that people in this country have not been given the fair deal they justly deserve.

Many questions have been asked in this house with regard to the pit prop business in the maritime provinces. At the start of the war delegations came from Great Britain to our province and asked pulpwood producers to discontinue their contracts, contracts which would have continued until the present time, in order to produce pit props for Great Britain. They agreed to do that, but when Great Britain found that they could buy pit props for a few cents less in other countries, their purchases here were discontinued immediately. This meant considerable hardship to people in New Brunswick and Nova Scotia.

I contend that those people were not treated fairly. They did not receive the consideration they deserved. They were unable to renew their contracts with the pulp and paper people and were left with nothing. Pit props piled up on the breakwaters because markets could not be found. I am opposed to that sort of dealing. I believe some other way could have been found and the break might have been a little less sudden in order to give these people some warning and permit them to find other markets for their wood products.

In closing I want to say that the remarks I have made in connection with the St. Lawrence waterway and the development of Labrador ore represent my own personal opinions, but I want to repeat that if hon. members of this house feel that we in the maritimes are not as fortunate as the people in other parts of the country, if they are really serious in their desire to help out the situation down there, we shall anxiously await their approval or disapproval of the policy of steel manufacturing in the maritimes.

Mr. William Bryce (Selkirk): Mr. Speaker, in rising to take part in this debate after fifty hon. members have spoken, it is rather hard to say something that has not been said already. You can start off by saying that you have the best constituency in the world, which would be quite easy for me to do, and then you can attempt to cover some other topic that has been touched upon already.

I might say that Selkirk constituency was remodelled last year and now contains both urban and rural dwellers. But it still contains the descendants of the Selkirk settlers who came out at the beginning of the last century to blast a trail and build a gateway to the golden west. We are now coming to the end of the first half of the twentieth century, and as we look back over the last five decades and remember the calamity of two world wars and the greatest depression in history, we register in our minds the hope that the second half of the century will be free from such disasters.

It is true, and I think most hon. members will admit, that during the last few years our people have been better fed than ever before. It is true also that our farms and our factories have produced more goods and produce than ever before. Yet, with all that, we know that many Canadian people are not well fed today and that a great many Canadian workers are not receiving good wages. Many of our aged citizens still receive small pensions on which to live. Sometimes the means test prevents them from getting very much.

May I say in passing that I have had more requests about this means test than I have ever had about anything else. As things are today, the man who has been thrifty and has attempted to provide for a rainy day is penalized. The man who has never saved anything, the man who perhaps in many cases has never even paid taxes, can draw a full pension. As I say, the man who has scraped to save and provide for a rainy day is penalized for his thrift. No law should be allowed to exist that penalizes a man or woman for thrift, long considered one of the great characteristics of the Scottish race. We all hope that the second half of the century will prove to be happier and more prosperous for the human race than the first half.

Another problem I should like to draw to the attention of the government is the great need of financial aid for education on a federal basis. In the last few years the effort has been to move people from crowded city areas into the adjoining municipalities. This relieves the city or town of the responsibility but creates a new problem for the municipalities which have to provide education for these boys and girls. The law of the land is that every boy and girl must go to school, and one must also remember that people are demanding better educational facilities for their families than they themselves had thirty or forty years ago. It has been said repeatedly that education is a provincial responsibility but the situation is now getting beyond provincial governments. If our school districts are to have the proper people to teach the pupils and be able to pay fair wages for their services—wages comparable with other professions—build new schools, and enlarge old ones to accommodate the pupils coming in from other areas, then the federal government must come to the assistance of the provinces.

In the speech from the throne mention is made that a bill for the revision of the Indian Act is to be introduced at this session. I am sure this will be welcomed by everyone interested in the welfare of the Indians. To the members of the committee which sat for three years considering recommendations that could be incorporated in the present Indian Act, this will be most gratifying. As a member of that committee I know the tremendous job they did in the three years the committee worked, and to see the fruits of their labours in amendments to the present Indian Act brought before the house will be encouraging not only to the Indians but also to the people who worked so hard to do a satisfactory job on the Indian Act.

I have already congratulated the minister who heads the department which will now have charge of Indian affairs, the hon. member for Grey-Bruce (Mr. Harris). It is to be hoped that the revised Indian Act will be a new Magna Carta for the 135,000 Indians in Canada. I hope that the new minister will hold his position long enough to be able to do some constructive work in the Indian department. I have only been in parliament seven years but during that time the new minister is the fifth to have charge of Indian affairs, and I hope that he will have charge of the department long enough to do the best job that has yet been done.

We have heard a great deal about lost markets in the last few days, and different reasons have been advanced for the troubles now confronting us. I know there is no simple direct answer to the question. For instance, one of the reasons we hear is the one popularly known as the dollar shortage. Another reason is that improved methods of production have produced surpluses of various commodities. Another reason is that the marketing system which we have been using for the last fifty years is now out of date. Finally, only recently we have been faced with the factor of mass unemployment. There may be other causes, but let us look at those I have mentioned. So far as the dollar shortage is concerned there is actually no shortage of dollars at all. What there is a shortage of is goods that can be produced in Europe and sold to Canada and the United States in exchange for the iron ore, oil, cotton and wheat which those countries are forced to purchase from this continent because they cannot obtain them anywhere else at the present time.

[Mr. Bryce.]

The United States and Canada insist upon payment in dollars but they maintain high tariffs which prevent the sale of the goods of other countries in Canada and the United States. In an attempt to overcome this obstacle the British pound was devalued. That made British goods cheaper here and it made our goods dearer over there. In spite of this action, however, the unbalance between the two areas still exists, although possibly to a lesser degree. I do not know very much about finance, as I have said before in the house, but I do not think pressure should have been brought upon Great Britain to make her devalue her pound, or that we should have had to devalue our dollar. When Great Britain was having her good days we set up tariffs because she could produce goods so much cheaper than we could. Now we are told that the pound was devalued because it was costing her so much to produce the goods, and that such action would enable her to get into the Canadian and United States markets. I think a more simple solution would have been to wipe out the tariffs. Tariffs were instituted because Great Britain could produce cheaply, and now her problem is that it costs her so much to produce. Therefore actually the solution would be to wipe out the tariffs.

The net result is that Great Britain, and all other countries that are in the same position, are trying to get the things they need from other sources. Wheat is one of the crops they can get elsewhere. They can get eggs, cheese, bacon and butter from other countries, and naturally that is what they are doing. As a matter of fact, in order to maintain good relations with Canada and to help Canada with her problem, Great Britain is paying 5 cents a pound more for our cheese than she is paying to New Zealand.

To my mind, however, it is largely because of tariff restrictions that the countries in the sterling area are obliged to go elsewhere for the goods they need, and consequently Canada is losing a portion of that market. These things have happened just recently and they must be quite fresh in every hon. member's mind. Of course improvements in methods of production over here make it possible to turn out still more goods in a shorter time, and that aggravates the problem still further.

The old system of marketing always gave the farmer a good price when he had a poor crop and practically nothing to sell, and when he had a good crop he got nothing for it because there was a surplus. It was a case of too much crop, too low a price; high price and no crop. These great fluctuations in prices have ruined thousands of farmers. One has only to go back and review the fluctuations in the price of rye not very long ago on the open market. When the farmer was buying seed the price of rye was around $4. When he was selling rye it was around $1.50. Such fluctuations are no good to anyone, unless it is the speculator.

If we had a more rational system of marketing, in years of good crops our surpluses would be stored to make up for the times when crops are light instead of throwing the whole lot on the market at one time and bringing prices down to ridiculously low levels. With import and export boards in existence, world needs could be estimated and surpluses could be stored to take care of those years of drought, disease and insect pests when crops would be very light. At the present time, however, there is no need to talk of food surpluses because there are large areas of the world where food is still scarce. Unfortunately those areas are backward in development and are unable to give either goods or money in return for our exports. In the long run it would be the part of wisdom for us to give away our surpluses for a time rather than see them rot or spoil or be destroyed. It seems to me an international commodity clearing house, such as was discussed by the hon. member for Acadia (Mr. Quelch), would be a step in the right direction. The hon. member went into the question in some detail, and I need not go over it again; but I was sorry to see it reported that Great Britain, the United States and Canada did not approve. However, they may change their minds yet, and I hope they do.

Another result of the difficulty of trading with Canada and the United States is that the countries of Europe which formerly were glad to trade their manufactured goods for our foodstuffs are increasing their own food production. Modern methods are helping them put more land under cultivation and grow an even greater proportion of their own requirements. Formerly Great Britain produced only about one-third of her needs, but I believe that in about two years she will be producing two-thirds. I was back in Scotland not long ago; and the heather moors on which I ran about as a boy have been bulldozed until they are as level as the prairies, and they are producing crops. They have done a wonderful job in increasing production; and believe me, that is going to harm our market as much as anything else.

A typical example of what they are doing in the way of increased production can be seen in regard to milk, under the milk marketing board, which is doing a first-class job. I might mention to hon. members that this board was not set up by the Labour government but by a Conservative government. They found that it just did not work, because it was not a compulsory board, but I do give them credit for this: when they found what was wrong, they made it a compulsory board, and it has worked very well since. I wish I had time to go into it more fully, but I must hurry on. As I say, that board is now compulsory; and you will notice that in the areas in which it is operating no one voted Conservative, in case they might change it.

Milk production is increasing, and they are now producing cheese in Scotland, something they have not done within my memory, and I can go back fifty years. This shows what can be done by way of increased production.

At six o'clock the house took recess.

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. Bryce: To start from where I left off, Mr. Speaker, there is in the marketing situation another important factor that has developed only recently, namely mass unemployment. Dairy farmers, poultry keepers and livestock farmers in general should be particularly concerned about unemployment. Just as soon as a man loses his job and in fact as soon as he sees that unemployment is increasing, he begins to cut down on his expenses. He buys margarine instead of butter. At the present time in Canada there is more butter in stock than there ever was before, 46 million pounds of it. This is about 20 million pounds more than there was last year at this time. The more unemployment there is, the more margarine will be consumed, and the less butter. The unemployed man cuts down on his milk. Milk consumption per capita has decreased steadily since the end of the war, and it will go down still further. Not only will this lessen the market for milk, but it will increase the possibility of sickness. All hon. members know that milk is one of the finest all-round foods we have, particularly for children. But just as surely as unemployment increases, so will milk sales go down and so will sickness increase.

The unemployed man will cut his purchase of eggs. While he was working he could have bacon and eggs or ham and eggs for breakfast. But once he loses his job, it becomes a case of "bread and jam", or even bread without either jam or margarine, both for himself and his family. The same thing applies to meat; such as beef, pork and chicken. His meat will be confined to hamburger, bacon ends or something of that kind. When the worker becomes unemployed, he does not fill a lunch box every day, or a lunch pail as some people call it. He does not use bread or meat or fruit. This situation in turn destroys the market for the farmer and the fruit grower.

Unemployment in the cities is the worst thing that can happen to the farmers, particularly at a time when overseas markets are in danger. I am sure that every thinking man must be greatly concerned about this marketing situation. I know that the farmers who are looking ahead are greatly worried. The folk who live in the cities should be worried too; for if the farmer cannot sell his crops, his livestock and his milk, he certainly cannot buy the machinery, the equipment, clothing and house furnishings that the city folk have to sell.

Farmers and city workers are interdependent. If one is prosperous the other is prosperous too. If one is in distress, it is not long before the other is in distress also. The sooner this hard fact is recognized, the better it will be for everyone concerned. There is a definite relationship between the income of those engaged in agriculture and those engaged in industry. When the income of the one group is depressed, the other group is directly affected. Canada's net national income is about $8 billion more than it was before the war. Wages, taxes, rent, lumber, steel and farm products have all gone up in price. In my travels up and down the country and elsewhere I meet people who claim that farm prices are far too high, and that cheaper food is the answer to the problem. But if anyone cares to check with the dominion bureau of statistics he will find that in these post-war years, and years of high prices, the per capita consumption of eggs, bacon, beef and pork and dairy products was much higher than it was in the pre-war years when we were in an era of low prices. For instance, the per capita consumption figures are as follows:

Poultry	19·5 lbs.	24·8 lbs.
Pork	43·6 lbs.	52·7 lbs.
Beef	56·0 lbs.	67·7 lbs.

In every case the wholesale prices of these items was at least 100 per cent or more higher than it was in 1939. Consequently, cheap bacon and eggs is not the solution. Unless food is purchased and consumed, low prices do not work. The real answer is to have enough purchasing power in the hands of the people to consume all that is produced.

I am also told that the farmer is making unreasonable profits at the expense of the consumer, and that farm prices are away out of line. Perhaps the individuals who make such claims might be able to tell us how it is that the production of eggs has dropped in 1949 by 50 million dozen, and hog production has dropped by 338,000 hogs. The reason egg production dropped is that the cost of production is too high. A farmer can buy eggs at the store cheaper than he can produce them by keeping chickens. And so I say—and I think every reasonable man will agree with me—that our farmers are facing a serious marketing crisis. They are facing not only the loss of overseas markets but the loss of the domestic market too. We are losing out because the powers that be on this North American continent, which prospered during the war while the rest of the world suffered huge losses, have failed to live up to their obligations. They are thinking only in terms of capitalistic profits instead of in terms of production for use. There are in the world millions of people still needing food, capital equipment, houses, clothing, roads, schools and factories. But because of the artificial restrictions imposed by the Canadian and United States governments, these millions of people cannot trade with this continent. They cannot buy our goods unless they have Canadian or United States dollars. For overseas trade, Mr. Speaker, I would suggest that we reduce tariff barriers, accept part payment in sterling, and invest funds in European countries. These are only temporary solutions. The only permanent solution is the adoption of the principles of international co-operation. Produce goods in those parts of the world where they can be most efficiently produced, and use them in any part of the world where they are needed, without any trade restrictions whatever.

For the domestic trade, adopt policies that will provide full employment at the highest possible wage rates and the lowest possible profit rates. It is only by adopting some such policy that the volume of goods which is produced each year can be consumed.

Remember, a high standard of living is measured by the volume of goods produced and consumed. If high rates of profit are made, there is not enough money left in the hands of people to purchase the goods, surpluses pile up, and unemployment begins again.

I would like to ask the government to consider the advisability of having a government inquiry into the price fluctuations of livestock as paid by the packing houses in Canada. Why there are fluctuations from day to day has always puzzled the livestock raisers, as it did the grain farmer before we had a wheat board. Why should steers be worth so much on Monday and so much less on Tuesday, or vice versa? It seems competition has been eliminated from the packing business altogether. Since they all pay the same price it does seem to the farmer that prices are set and agreed to. The meat is all going to sell at the same price as the consumer's price is steady and does not change from day to day. Take hogs. Last September hogs at Winnipeg were $30 per 100 pounds. The government began negotiations with Britain for a new bacon contract. Articles in the papers suggested the price would be lower. The first thing the farmer knew was that the packer had depressed prices down to $24 per 100 pounds. There was no need for this, as the bacon was going into the domestic market and the consumer was paying the same price for what he had to buy.

Mr. Ferrie: No.

Mr. Bryce: I will debate that with you any time you like.

Mr. Ferrie: You are wrong; I buy every week. I know.

Mr. Bryce: I want to continue, Mr. Speaker. I shall be through in a few moments if I am left alone. I was interrupted when I said the consumer was paying the same price for what we had to buy. I still think I am right, and I am entiled to that view. The new price of 29 cents per pound, f.a.s. has been announced, and the government has promised to pay the packer a subsidy of 3½ cents per pound on export Wiltshire sides; so on these prices the farmer takes $9 less for his hog and the packer is taking $4.20 less. I might say here that a 200-pound pig on the hoof makes 150 pounds of pork, which in turn makes 120 pounds of Wiltshire sides. Hon. members can calculate for themselves that at this time the packer has still made $1.80 more of profit per hog than he made before.

Last year we contracted to supply Britain with 195 million pounds at $36 f.a.s. but only supplied 100 million. This year we have a contract for 60 million pounds but our domestic market will take around 900 million pounds, so we have the spoonful setting the price for the tubful. This 60 million pounds sets the price for the 900 million because the export price is cheaper; and remember it takes more to feed a hog this year than last year.

Mr. Cardiff: That is the government's fault again.

Mr. Bryce: In the past by resolution I have asked the government to consider the setting up of a board of livestock commissioners to license and regulate facilities for the handling, grading, selling and processing of livestock, poultry and their products, but up to the present I have had no success. I know the packer is in business to buy as cheap as he can and sell as dear as he can. He makes no bones about that. He tells you that is what he is in business for. But in the hands of a few firms, it becomes a monopoly which some hon. members call free enterprise, but when it gets to the stage of destroying the prosperity of the farmer it has gone too far.

In closing, Mr. Speaker, may I say I think there should be a government inquiry to look into the methods adopted by the packing houses, with special regard to condemnation insurance, price fluctuations and spreads between producer and consumer prices. Every year we set up new t.b. free areas but our condemnation insurance rates remain the same as they were thirty years ago. Surely the time has come, after all the work that has been done by the Department of Agriculture and supported by livestock organizations and municipalities to clean up t.b., to have this reviewed. The packing industry today is the same powerful monopoly that it was in 1935. Let me quote what they thought about it in 1935. I am quoting from the report of the royal commission on price spreads at page 161:

> In recent years, this situation has completely changed. This change has been brought about, mainly, by two factors. First, the elimination of the small packing company and the wholesale butcher, either by merger and absorption or by cut-throat competition. Today, as we saw in chapter IV, the meat packing industry has been concentrated in very few hands. Canada Packers, Limited, is the dominating unit with a business greater than the next five packing companies combined. This development has reduced competition to the detriment of the producer. Canada Packers' buyers are to be found on the chief stockyards in Canada, and all are instructed as to price, methods and practices from a single office in Toronto. Swift Canadian Company, with plants at six centres in Canada, has its buyers on the same stockyards, directed from head office at Toronto. Burns, Limited, with plants at Calgary, Vancouver and Edmonton, has its buyers on all western yards, all directed from Calgary. Livestock purchasing is thus concentrated, with a result, as our evidence shows, of lack of price competition among packer-buyers.
> There was uncontradicted evidence given to us by a former official of Canada Packers, Limited, that in Toronto it was the usual practice for this firm to arrange with Swifts, before the market opened, as to the prices to be paid for purchases of livestock. Also, the manager of the western stock growers' association, one of the largest ranchers in Alberta, gave evidence that if a packers' buyer gave an offer for cattle on the ranch, it would not be raised by any other packer-buyer either on the ranch or in the stockyards.
> Another method adopted by the packers, which has reduced competition on the open market, is the practice of selling to the wholesale butcher carcasses on the rail, at cost price plus killing charges, and thus removing the wholesale butcher from competition on the public stockyards.

I shall not read further from this report, because my time is drawing to a close. May I say however that they are not improving any.

Then, only last year, we received the report of the royal commission on prices, from which I shall quote briefly at page 31:

The primary livestock industry and the retail meat trade are very competitive, but the processing industry shows a high degree of concentration. The three largest packing firms account for about 60 per cent of the total inspected slaughterings in Canada, which would indicate that competition operates within a fairly restricted framework, though there may be considerable rivalry among these firms. These large firms are efficient in their operations and, though realizing small profits per unit of output, earn substantial returns on their investment. The very heavy capital investment required, together with decreasing cost ratio as the scale of the business expands, tends to keep additional competitors from entering the field.

The three largest packing firms indicated that they made a net profit of $4·3 million in the four months following the simultaneous removal of price controls and settlement of the packing-house workers' strike in October, 1947, compared to less than $1 million in the corresponding period the previous year. Firms holding beef and pork in cold storage at the end of 1947, made substantial fortuitous gains as a result of inventory appreciation as market prices advanced with United Kingdom contract prices. Four firms held over two-thirds of total cold storage stocks and it would appear that they made substantial profits on these holdings.

The profits made by these powerful companies who agree to agree among themselves are built up by a continuous squeeze on the producer and consumer.

I shall conclude with one more quotation. This goes to substantiate the argument I used before, and is taken from the Globe and Mail for March 2, 1950. The heading states "Packer Pays One Cent More; Butcher Eight Cents; Eater, Three to Ten Cents"; and the article goes on to say:

Beef prices, which have mounted about one cent per pound during the past two weeks in stockyards, have increased from three to ten cents a pound on the average retail price in the same period. During the same period the wholesale price of beef to the butcher has increased about eight cents a pound.

The rise, reflected to the consumer, ranges from a three-cent raise for short rib roasts to a ten-cent-per-pound raise for porterhouse steaks. These are prices quoted by an independent butcher in an average income and rental district.

More sensational price increases have been marked in the luxury markets but meat affected is not of the type usually purchased by the average consumer.

Meat price increases at an average market during the past two weeks are indicated in the table below.

	Yesterday per pound	Three Weeks ago per pound cents	cents
Round steak	75	60
Sirloin steak	79	72
Porterhouse	85	75
Wing roast	83	75
Short rib	58	55
Blade (bone out)	56	52
Rump roast	68	65

On February 15 good grade light steers were quoted at $21.50 to $22.50 per hundred. Yesterday they were quoted at $22.50 to $23.50 per hundred.

According to a retail butcher, his wholesale price per carcass has increased from 34½ cents per pound to 42½ cents per pound, an increase of eight cents.

And the farmer got one cent more!

He said this would entitle him to increase his retail price by thirteen cents a pound to conform with the margin on which he works. However, he said he cannot afford to increase prices by thirteen cents on some grades of beef and has to scale them so buyers of best grade must pay the higher increase.

Price of beef, he said, will vary in the neighbourhood in which the butcher is located. Butchers in high rent areas cannot afford to sell porterhouse at his figure of 85 cents a pound. He estimated in such areas the charge would be between 90 and 95 cents a pound for best grade.

He said there have been no complaints from his customers, but that many began buying cheaper cuts or smaller quantities this past week.

The time has come for producers and consumers to demand an inquiry into the operations of the packing industry, because it affects everyone either directly or indirectly in the Dominion of Canada.

Mr. H. H. W. Beyerstein (Camrose): Mr. Speaker, looking over the speech from the throne and analysing it from the viewpoint of an Albertan it does not take long to conclude that it contains nothing but matters of a routine nature. There is nothing in the speech from the throne to suggest that the government has any solution for our present problems of dwindling markets, the ever-increasing unemployment or the prevention of another depression.

However, when one considers statements made by a couple of cabinet ministers while they were in Alberta a few weeks ago, one can readily understand why there were no sound proposals in the speech from the throne for the solution of the problems I have just mentioned. It is with these statements made by the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) and the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Claxton) that I wish to deal tonight.

When he was in Edmonton a few weeks ago the Minister of Agriculture said that Alberta had failed to develop her natural resources, that she was sitting on a great store of wealth and doing nothing about it. It takes a lot of nerve to make a statement like that in Alberta, and the people of that province were not slow in making a come-back.

In an editorial in the Edmonton Bulletin of Saturday, February 11, we find this:

Not even the most bigoted critic could maintain that the Alberta government has been backward or maladroit in developing the oil resources of the province.

In most respects Alberta's oil policy is the best in the world. At the very least, that policy gets the oil out of the ground and puts it to useful work—and at the same time sends a nice flow of profits into the public treasury.

As a result of Alberta's industrial policy oil companies from all over the continent have not hesitated to go to that province. They have come into the province by the dozen with their drilling rigs and exploration crews. Leduc has blossomed out into a major field estimated to contain some 250,000,000 barrels of oil. Then came Redwater, larger than Leduc, with reserves estimated at 500,000,000 barrels. Success continued with Golden Spike, Joseph Lake, Bon Accord, Stettler, Excelsior and Normandville. To answer the minister's statement I do not think I could use any better words than those of John R. White, vice-president of Imperial Oil Limited, who had this to say about the development of Alberta's resources:

> What is there that cannot be done with 50,000,000,000 tons of coal, 1,000,000,000 or so barrels of oil, 3,000,000,000 cubic feet of natural gas and $250 million worth of farm produce every year.
> Add in salt beds that underlie most of Saskatchewan, through Alberta to Athabaska. Include the 15,000 square miles of tar sands, 150,000 square miles of timber and 106,000 horsepower in Alberta's waterfalls alone.
> With basic resources of this sort, it is hardly necessary to count the rarer materials such as potash, bromine and iodine that have been indicated in some of the oil seekers' drill holes. Unnecessary, because what few materials Alberta lacks can be brought from outside, for example, from the metal mines that surround her on all sides.
> Visible in the west are the materials for every type of plastic, for virtually all the major industrial chemicals and electro-chemical products. There is, here, the material for rayon, for nylon, synthetic rubber, phenolic and cellulose plastics, carborundum, graphite, cyanamide, acetylene and its host of relatives.
> And it follows that if the materials for these basic products are present, there is the possibility of erecting over them all the secondary and tertiary industries that have been based upon them in other parts of the world.
> Such are the potentialities of Alberta, the province that 15 years ago could not even pay the interest on its bonds. Such is the picture of the chain of events that well may have been set in motion by the discovery of that Leduc well.

As far as industries are concerned, Alberta has not been lagging behind in that respect either. We have in Alberta approximately 1,400 manufacturing establishments with an estimated production of $300 million yearly. During 1948, thirty-two new industrial enterprises with a capitalization of $31 million located in the province. During 1949, forty-three new industries were founded in Alberta. That indicates splendid progress considering the obstacles that Alberta has had to overcome.

When the present government of Alberta took over, it found the provincial treasury empty and the province with a huge, staggering debt. In addition to that, during the early days of that government there was wholesale discrimination by the lending institutions against those who had to borrow for production. The freight rate structure has been of no help to our province and still is of no help. I submit that we have been making splendid progress considering the handicaps we have had to overcome during the past fifteen years.

The Alberta Industrial Corporation was set up by the provincial government and has granted loans amounting to $2,700,000 to new industries starting in the province. In addition, the treasury branch serves a wide clientele of farmers, businessmen and plain citizens. This organization has made loans from time to time totalling over $10 million. I would point out also that the interest rates in Alberta are the lowest in Canada. In order to illustrate how Alberta helps to promote industry I should like to read from an article which appeared in Saturday Night of February 14, 1950, entitled, "Alberta Oil Sparks Growth of Industrial Economy." This article indicates how the Alberta government is ready to help even small manufacturers. It reads:

> A middle-aged farmer at Radway, in northern Alberta, noticed that farmers often had to make a long trip into town, for the sole purpose of getting the blacksmith to sharpen the blades of their disc ploughs—a job which took only a few minutes, but one which most farmers lacked the equipment and skill to do themselves. So he designed a simple device operated from the power take-off on a farm tractor, by which discs could be sharpened on built-in emery wheels without any danger of doing the job wrong. The sharpener was small in size, and could be made to sell profitably at $15.
> On a trial order from the provincial marketing board, a young blacksmith's helper at High River, Alberta, built 100 of the sharpeners. The board had the experts from the research council look them over, and when they gave the machine a technical O.K., passed it on to the department of agriculture to adjudge its usefulness to the farmer.
> As a final aid, the board helped to arrange for the demonstration of the new device at rural fairs and other places where large farm groups could be reached. In the words of Oberholtzer, "Sales after that were remarkable."
> This sort of assistance, of course, takes money—and lots of it. Fortunately for its program, money is one thing the Alberta government has lots of these days. Certainly, on a per capita basis, it is the richest provincial government in Canada.

I quote that to indicate that Alberta is not only interested in the larger industries; they will do everything possible to assist smaller industries. They will do anything to get them going. When the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) comes to Alberta and says that we are not doing anything to develop our resources, we in turn would like to ask him what is being done to develop Alberta's water powers. The Minister of Agriculture has said that that province has the highest hydro potential of any province in Canada. We would also like to ask him what is being done to get the most from our coal which the minister has indicated constitutes fifteen per cent of the world's total supply. We would like to ask him: Where is our national coal policy?

Another statement attributed to the Minister of Agriculture as having been made in Calgary appeared in the Calgary Herald of February 1. It is interesting to note from that statement that apparently he has lost some of the pep he usually demonstrates. Speaking of agriculture the article refers to what the minister had to say, as follows:

He predicted that 1950 would be a satisfactory year for Canadian farmers, "although we cannot bank on its being as good as last year, which was a peak year." He said some levelling off was to be expected. The minister felt that markets would be available for Canadian wheat produced in 1950, although he commented that no definite picture could be obtained until the crop was in. However, the expected "plenty" of markets would be open at at least the floor price of $1.40 a bushel.

If you will notice the wording of this statement you will see it is quite different from the statements made prior to the last federal election. There are such words in it as "satisfactory", "cannot bank on its being as good as last year", "some levelling off was to be expected". The minister felt that markets "would be available". He also used the words "no definite picture", although he expected "plenty of markets". These statements show that the minister is not as sure of himself as he was about a year ago.

Mr. Wylie: They were made after the election.

Mr. Beyerstein: So much for the statements of the Minister of Agriculture. I should like to pass on now for a few moments to a statement which was made by the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Claxton), and quote from the Edmonton Bulletin. The heading of the article is:

Claxton Asks Harper Help

It reads as follows:

"Get behind Harper and help him when the time comes and then we'll have a new provincial government", Hon. Brooke Claxton, Minister of National Defence, told Edmonton and district Liberals at a Liberal luncheon in Corona hotel yesterday. Support of provincial Liberal leader J. Harper Prowse, M.L.A., as strong as that given Alberta Liberals in the federal election would result in a return of the Liberal party to the "sphere of influence" in Alberta politics, the minister said.

Mr. Blackmore: And complete disaster for Alberta.

Mr. Beyerstein: Evidently before the minister made that statement he did not take time to look up the platform on which the Liberals campaigned in the last provincial election. I have here a copy of the Liberal statement which appeared in the Edmonton Bulletin of August 13, 1948, just prior to the last provincial election. The heading is:

Liberals—$100 million on Roads

The article reads:

We propose to spend $100 million in the next five years for roads. Twenty-five million dollars is to be used for the construction of "market" roads to serve your rural communities. The remainder or $75 million is to be spent to provide permanent all-weather main highways which will stand up under all kinds of weather and traffic conditions.

Mr. Low: Even the pork barrel.

Mr. Beyerstein: The article continues:

We will spend $5 million each year out of current revenue on rural roads. This is more than twice as much as the present government is spending. And we will keep on spending at least this amount each year until our rural areas are adequately served by decent roads. The kind of road we expect to build on the main highways will be permanent highways —roads which will last for at least thirty years.

Then follows the statement which interests us most. It reads:

We will borrow the money to build them and we will pay for them as we use them over a period of twenty years.

Mr. Blackmore: Mortgage the oil industry.

Mr. Beyerstein: The article continues:

The cost per year for interest charges will be $1,500,000. The cost per year to retire principal will be $3,750,000, making a total annual payment of $5,250,000. Out of current revenue we propose to add $500,000 to ensure adequate maintenance, making a total annual cost of $5,750,000, which is $3,250,000 less than the Social Credit is spending without getting us permanent highways.

It is sound business to borrow for capital improvements, such as these highways will be, provided you know how you are going to pay off your debt. We know how we can do that.

With Alberta's rich oil reserves no doubt they could pay off the debt, but what is the sense of borrowing when we can progress on a pay-as-you-go basis and still have the same thing in the long run. I should like to remind the Liberal leader for the province of Alberta that when the present government took over there was a huge debt. At the present time this debt, even after some whittling down over the period of the last few years, amounts to $128 million.

Mr. Blackmore: Most of it Liberal debt.

Mr. Beyerstein: A large portion of that $128 million was incurred by the Liberal government and the balance by the U.F.A. government. In order to gain power in Alberta the Liberals advocated the borrowing of another $100 million, and we have not been able to pay off the debts they contracted in the earlier years of the province.

Mr. Wylie: They do not need to worry. They will never be in power anyway.

Mr. Beyerstein: At the present time, as I said, the debt of Alberta is $128 million, and the annual carrying charges on it are over $5 million. With oil revenue now running at the rate of about $35 million a year, and the boom barely begun, it is obvious that Alberta could be debt free in a comparatively few years, an unprecedented achievement for a government today. Compared with 1935 the contrast is staggering. In a few years we could be debt free, but our Liberal friends are suggesting that we should borrow another $100 million and go further into debt.

Mr. Blackmore: Let them get their dirty hands on Alberta again!

An hon. Member: What about your $25 a month?

Mr. Beyerstein: There are a number of indications, however, that within the next five or ten years Alberta's oil income may approach $60 million a year which would be enough, if the government chose, to administer the affairs of the province without levying one cent of taxation. We could carry on from current revenue, and yet the Liberals say that we should borrow money in amounts as large as $100 million so that we could pay more interest to the financial institutions.

Mr. Smith (Calgary West): Don't give up the liquor. We get $11 million from that.

Mr. Beyerstein: That is right. This year, without borrowing money, the Alberta government has under way a public works program which will give us approximately $20 million worth of roads, and that is all on a pay-as-you-go basis. In addition to that, they are preparing to build a $1,500,000 300-bed sanatorium in Edmonton. Another new tuberculosis hospital is being built at the provincial mental institution at Oliver. A new occupational therapy building costing $75,000 is being constructed at the mental hospital at Ponoka. More than $1 million, part of it a loan, goes to the university of Alberta building program for a $706,000 library and a students' union. The government itself is building an eight-storey administration building in Edmonton and has also earmarked $250,000 for construction of a provincial laboratory building. New highways, bridges, irrigation projects and $1,205,610 for the conservation of the eastern Rocky mountain forests make up most of the balance of the $75 million budget for this year. So the government of Alberta is doing very nicely without borrowing any such staggering amount as $100 million.

In closing I suggest to the ministers that when they come to Alberta they should guard their statements. I am reminded of a couple of chaps who were having a cup of coffee the morning after the minister made that statement in Alberta. After reading the statement one said to the other, "You don't have to be crazy to understand those fellows, but it certainly would help a lot."

Mr. A. Earl Catherwood (Haldimand): Mr. Speaker, I am pleased to have the opportunity of taking part in the debate on the address in reply to the speech from the throne. I know it is customary to congratulate the mover and seconder on the part they took in this debate, and I personally want to compliment them on the grand job they did and the realistic approach that was made in view of the very difficult throne speech they had to work on.

I believe, as the hon. member for Kindersley (Mr. Larson) stated, that the economy of our nation is more affected by the economic position of our farmers than by that of any other class of people. I also wish to state that we have to think of this country as a unified nation. I was very sorry to hear the hon. member for St. John's East (Mr. Higgins) make the statement this afternoon that the government have been dealing with the new province of Newfoundland in such a manner. I am sure we all hope that matters will be remedied very shortly, because I know we do not want to lose the hon. member for St. John's East. This is a unified nation, and we have to think of every province as a part of our great country. We in central and eastern Canada must think of the west and the problems they have to face. They also must recognize our problems. So I think we in parliament have a real responsibility at this time, in what might be called the atomic age, to view these problems and deal with them as best we may.

One of the advantages of this debate is that it gives hon. members an opportunity to branch out and discuss matters they feel to be of paramount importance to Canada. I regret very much that this parliament did not see fit to adopt the motion that was moved by the hon. member for Lake Centre for the calling of a conference of commonwealth nations. I feel that we should take advantage of every opportunity that presents itself to increase trade, either as between the commonwealth countries or world trade itself; so I am sorry our suggestion in that regard was turned down by the government.

I should like to mention another phase of this matter of world trade, which has been mentioned also by the hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Low) and others of our Social Credit friends, as well as by the hon. member for Selkirk (Mr. Bryce) this afternoon. That is the suggestion that we should set up an organization under the food and agricultural organization of the United Nations. Canada needs an outside market for only a small portion of her farm products; but the small surplus that does exist can cause depressed prices in this great industry. So I believe that with the combined efforts of the agricultural leaders of the nations participating in the FAO it should be possible to reach an agreement which would make this plan acceptable. I feel sure it could be made workable; I believe it is sensible and sound; and through the medium of this world food organization I am confident that we could at least find a partial solution to these great problems of world trade confronting us at the present time. We must find some means of overcoming the difficulties now faced by nations trading in currencies other than our own; and I suggest there is a great opportunity for this government to show leadership in this connection. I had hoped that on his return from the conference held at Washington last October and November, which we all so greatly hoped would be successful, the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardner) would have made a statement to this house outlining the reasons for failure to arrive at the principles advocated there. Regardless of why no headway was made, I am firmly convinced that until such time as this international commodity clearing house is set up there can be no immediate possibility of a solution to a problem that is of such grave concern to all. Canada possesses an immense wealth of natural resources, but at the same time she is extremely vulnerable as far as abnormal trade conditions are concerned. I would urge the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe) and the Minister of Agriculture to give the necessary leadership, so that from the ashes of that Washington conference there may arise a new and stronger organization that will perhaps establish a new world order as far as trading conditions are concerned.

We in Canada and the United States were greatly disturbed at the announcement by a high official of the United States department of agriculture that some 50 million pounds of potatoes were to be destroyed. This is contrary to all accepted laws of civilized countries. Why is it that such measures should be necessary on the part of such enlightened and intelligent people as we in Canada and the United States claim to be? Everyone knows that while we have a surplus of food in Canada and the United States the undeniable fact remains that millions of people, particularly in the Asiatic countries, are pitifully crying for a crust of bread. I attended a theatre here in Ottawa a few weeks ago and saw a news reel which depicted conditions in those Asiatic countries. They were almost impossible to believe. There we saw pictured undernourished and starving children. We also saw the parents of those children subsisting on a bowl of soup and a few spoonfuls of rice per day. It almost made one want to shout from the housetops and ask why conditions like these must prevail.

These remarks may not be closely associated with the business of this parliament, Mr. Speaker, but I do feel that unless we take some responsibility for the alleviation of such conditions where they exist throughout the world the implications may be more far-reaching and disastrous than we can imagine; for I believe there is no more fertile ground for communistic propaganda than in the hearts and minds of hungry people. While the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Pearson) does not agree with many of the suggestions we make from this side of the house, I believe he will agree when I say that one of the main reasons for this communistic infiltration which is making such tremendous headway in China and Asia generally, as well as in Europe, is the lack of food and consequent undernourishment of these peoples.

It is very heartening to us in this house to see that at least the government have recognized the problem of unemployment, to the extent of introducing the measure to amend the Unemployment Insurance Act, which was put through the house last week. That was not a solution to the problem, however. I attended church service here in Ottawa just a week ago, and during his sermon Reverend Mr. Finlay mentioned this proposed legislation. He said, and I quite agree, that this legislation is not the solution to our unemployment problems, that what the people need is an opportunity to earn their daily bread. That is very true. As with all of us, a workingman likes to feel that he can go out and do a day's work and accomplish something, so that he can make a contribution to society and earn his daily bread.

At the time that legislation was being discussed in this House of Commons some splendid suggestions were offered to the Acting Minister of Labour (Mr. Martin) which I hope will be taken into consideration when the act is revised. I feel sure that the Acting Minister of Labour will implement all these suggestions made from this side of the house, because there were some good ones. I hope he includes all of them in the act.

I should like to make a brief reference to one item that was mentioned by the hon. member for Lake Centre (Mr. Diefenbaker); I refer to those people who are ill, are unable to collect unemployment insurance, and who in many cases have been indisposed for months. They cannot collect compensation. I hope that the minister, with his humanitarian instincts, will implement in the act that suggestion as well.

Speaking about humanitarian efforts, may I say that I have often thought that there should be some solution to the problem of our people who are stricken with arthritis or poliomyelitis and are crippled from various diseases and have no way of getting an income except through relief which they may receive from the various municipalities. I hope that some provision for them will be included by the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Martin) in his health proposals to this house.

I am also glad that in the speech from the throne reference was made to price support legislation for our farmers. I know that the press across Canada are not too favourably disposed towards this suggestion; and the press, whether we like it or not, have great influence upon the people of Canada. But I feel that floor prices are necessary at the present time. My business is farming, and I have always been a firm believer in the law of supply and demand. I have felt that it has been the greatest equalizer we have had down through the generations. But I feel that the law of supply and demand has been greatly interfered with in recent years, particularly by governments and their controls, not only in our own country but in other countries as well. They interfered with this law to such an extent that the law of supply and demand is not practical at all any more. Eventually, however, as time goes on, I hope that conditions will again return to normal and that price supports and price regulations will not be necessary. But I insist that for the present we need price support for our farm people, and that it is essential that we have it.

The memories of some people I think are very short, when they fail to recall how the farmers of Canada were asked to accept much below world prices during those war years. As long as we have farmer members in this house I hope they and our urban friends as well will continue to recognize this fact, that we for many years accepted prices much below world prices. I know that one should not mention a personal situation; but in my own case as a farmer I took a considerable loss, having regard to the world price, on one commodity, to the extent of $3,000 over a period of five years; and I am only one farmer out of hundreds of thousands across Canada. When this bill is introduced in the house, I hope it will have the support of all hon. members.

While speaking on the subject of agriculture, I should like to mention one other thing and direct to it the attention of either the Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott) or the Minister of National Revenue (Mr. McCann). I make the plea that some method be devised to simplify the instructions with regard to filling out our income tax forms. I should like to suggest to the minister that the forms themselves be simplified to the extent that they can be interpreted much more easily than is now possible. I should like to quote from a pamphlet which is sent out to the farmers, instructing them how to fill out their income tax forms. I quote from the Hamilton Spectator Ottawa correspondent:

> Where the taxpayer has in a taxation year regularly used a property in part for the purpose of gaining or producing income from farming, and in part for a purpose other than gaining or producing income, the depreciable cost of the property for the purpose of this part, is the proportion of the amount that would otherwise be the depreciable cost, that the use regularly made of the property for the purpose of gaining or producing from farming is of the whole use regularly made of the property.

That is very simple.

Mr. Fraser: As clear as mud.

Mr. Catherwood: I was glad the Department of National Revenue recognized the fact that farmers are clever people. It is true that they can interpret that instruction, but it takes considerable time; and I know that the farmers of Canada would like to spend more of the time on actual farming operations.

Another matter to which I should like to draw your attention, Mr. Speaker, is one that was mentioned by the hon. member for Camrose (Mr. Beyerstein); that is that we should have some type of coal policy for Canada. The hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra (Mr. Green), I think, mentioned the matter. One reason why I suggest that some type of coal policy be inaugurated for the Dominion of Canada is the recent coal strike in the United States, which we are happy to know has been settled. It caused a difficult situation to exist in Canada. The resulting coal shortage caused dealer rationing throughout many sections of Canada. The strike paralysed our rail transportation system. We are glad the Minister of Transport (Mr. Chevrier) announced this afternoon that the services on this transportation system will be resumed. The strike also caused the paralysing of industry throughout Canada to a large degree, all because of dependence on the whims and words of one man, John L. Lewis. I do not think there is any member of this house who is not agreeable to the salary or the wages earned by these men who go down into the bowels of the earth and mine coal. They are subject to great danger; we all recognize that fact, and we would not for one moment suggest that they are earning too much money. But we do suggest that when one man can paralyse industry in a country outside his own, it is high time that our government gave consideration to some type of national coal policy that would utilize our own coal resources in this country.

I should like to quote some figures which will indicate just how big a business coal is, having regard to importation:

Imports from U.S.	Tons	Value
Briquettes of coal or coke	166,270	$ 1,939,618
Anthracite screenings	8,708	53,143
Anthracite domestic sizes ..	2,704,553	33,312,066
Anthracite smaller sizes ...	562,048	3,954,640
Coal bituminous	16,596,310	86,539,036
Coalex warehoused ships stores	345,408	1,871,312
Total	20,383,297	$127,669,815

It will thus be seen that we in Canada are paying a fairly high price for the coal war in the United States.

I feel that this latest threat to our economy should be the straw that has broken the camel's back. We have great undeveloped hard coal resources in northwestern Canada which can be mined cheaply enough to make it possible to ship by rail to the head of the lakes and thence by boat down to southern and western Ontario.

We also have large coal supplies in the maritimes awaiting orders from central Canada, if we had a policy that would encourage and further the mining of this fuel. Assurance of a market for the product of these mines would not only contribute to the stabilization of industry but would be a powerful factor in bringing about a more equal balance of trade. I therefore urge upon the government that they give serious consideration to implementing a coal policy for Canada.

I wish to say a word about immigration and citizenship. I think that our system of immigration is one that will require a forward, selective policy on the part of the government. I am happy that the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) has seen fit to appoint a full-time Minister of Citizenship and Immigration in the person of Walter Harris. He is young and aggressive; and we hope he will give strong and vigorous leadership to this new department, something which is urgently needed in our department of immigration.

There are those who feel that our immigration should be cut to the minimum particularly in difficult times. This, to my mind, would not be a sound policy. We in Canada have always prided ourselves upon the fact that our population has been increasing year by year. When we read the statistics that are published and see that our population has increased, we are happy. I think it is very essential for Canada, if such is the case. Where would Canada be today if it did not have a good immigration system? At the turn of the century, back in 1900, we had a population of a little over five million people. In 50 years our population has increased to 13,728,000 people, according to the last figures issued by the bureau of statistics. The other day the hon. member for Lake Centre (Mr. Diefenbaker) told me that the fathers of confederation planned that we should have forty or fifty million people in Canada by 1950. Our progress has been slow, but I do feel it is necessary that we continue a selective policy of immigration in order to promote and develop the industries of Canada. By a process of a selective immigration system for our farms and for our vast new prolific fields of production that are being opened up and will continue to be opened up in an increasingly high degree as a result of the amazing recent discoveries of crude oil, iron ore, titanium, uranium and other valuable natural resources, Canada will go forward by leaps and bounds. If these new sources of production are to be fully developed, and the economic independence of our country maintained in so doing, Canada must increase her manpower to the point that will make this development possible.

It was through a selective system of immigration over many years that our great neighbour to the south, the United States of America, built up her population to the point where without question she is recognized as the strongest nation in the world today.

There is another part of this ministry that is perhaps, while generally not considered as such, just as important as immigration, namely, citizenship. It is in this connection that we as citizens have a responsibility, and in accepting it we can play an integral part in the reception we extend to our new Canadians. The part we play in this regard begins where immigration ends. These people who come to our country have left behind the traditions and associations of the old world in the hope of coming to a land where people are free. The vastness of our land, the difference in language and in culture are so significant that time must elapse before they can accept the Canadian way of life and become good citizens. The town of Thorold, Ontario, takes top honours in this country in its welcome to our new Canadians. I should like to quote from the Financial Post of March 12, 1949:

> Thorold has recognized the fact that newcomers to Canada are perhaps more susceptible to red agents and red propaganda, so through the council and the board of trade, they sell themselves to these new citizens by a heart-warming demonstration of friendliness and good will—the offer of unstinting help, opportunity offered wherever possible and genuine interest shown.

To quote the words of a grateful Hungarian, "You have made us welcome—you have showed your interest in us and that we are wanted—and that we belong—this is more than food and drink to us to know we are one of you."

The board of trade in that town visit the newcomers shortly after they become settled. They are then invited to spend an evening at some of the homes of the members. They offer the services of the board of trade to explain our customs, our monetary system, our educational and recreational facilities, et cetera.

That is but a part of the effort that is put forth to welcome these new Canadians. Let us remember also that we can show Canadianism to these newcomers only by the reception we give them, by not recognizing them as strangers, not recognizing them as foreigners. That is not a very good word. We do not like that. If we go to a strange country we do not like to be classed as foreigners. Let us recognize them as friends. Let us extend to them sympathy and friendliness. Sympathy and kindness shown and extended openly and with sincerity will create a warm feeling among them towards this new country of Canada and will greatly speed their readjustment to their new way of life.

The hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra (Mr. Green) asked the government to inaugurate a social security policy during this session and to abolish the means test and to set up a pension plan on a contributory basis. This was also emphasized this evening by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles). I do believe that this is something which is uppermost in the minds of the people of Canada today. I do not think there is any question of more paramount importance that we can deal with. Therefore I urge, as the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra did the other evening, that we immediately get down to business and indicate to our older citizens of Canada the sincerity of every hon. member and that we put this suggestion into effect as soon as possible.

In conclusion I wish to say one word about the riding which I represent. I shall be brief. We are celebrating our one hundredth anniversary this coming summer in Haldimand county. It will be one of the biggest events that has ever happened in the county during those one hundred years. The Governor General and Lady Alexander have already accepted an invitation to be present. I should like to extend an invitation to every hon. member to come down and visit us during the coming summer, beginning in July and ending in August. I should like to extend an invitation to the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent). The Prime Minister was in our county last year on official business, but I was not privileged to welcome him on that occasion. If he and all the members of his cabinet will come down next July we will give them all a very enjoyable time in Haldimand county. I promise you that all the facilities of the county will be at your disposal. We will give you the key to the county. I know that when you come back to Ottawa you will say: "Well, I have seen everything."

Mr. T. J. Kickham (Kings): Mr. Speaker, in rising to take part in this debate I wish to join with previous speakers in extending congratulations to the mover (Mr. Larson) and the seconder (Mr. Dumas) of the motion for an address to His Excellency the Governor General in reply to his speech at the opening of the session.

I should like first to say something concerning our fishing industry, which is an important industry in the maritimes, and particularly in the province of Prince Edward Island. I was greatly pleased with the progressive program, as outlined by the Minister of Fisheries (Mr. Mayhew), with a view to improving quality, extending better inspection services, finding markets, and educating fishermen and potential consumers on how to prepare fish in a palatable and appealing manner for the table, as well as assisting fishermen in submarginal areas in a financial way.

The educational features of how, for example, to defrost fish and the numerous ways that fish can be placed on the table, cannot be over-emphasized. Preparing fish in an attractive manner could easily, I believe, lead to a much greater consumption of fish in Canada. Canadians consume approximately twelve pounds of fish per person per year. In Europe the consumption is approximately thirty-five pounds per person per year, so that in relation to the European consumption there would appear to be a strong potential market to be developed in Canada. I do hope that the program outlined by the minister and his efficient staff may be vigorously pursued to fruition.

I pointed out to this house last year, and which the minister is fully aware of, the need of dredging our shoal harbours and in some harbours extending the protection to deeper water to permit free entry and departure of boats. Until this work is accomplished we will have continued dissatisfaction among our fishermen and packers.

We have come to the time when our fishermen require larger boats of the dragger type. The small-sized boats now being used for trawling hake and cod are practically useless in inshore fishing. With this boat the fishermen are waiting for the fish to come to them.

Now with the larger boats equipped for dragging, the fishermen can go where the fish are to be found. Our fishermen will be gratified to know that this government is assisting in the construction of larger boats, with an outright grant of $165 per ton per boat.

There is some argument pro and con as to whether draggers destroy the feeding grounds of fish. I have talked with experienced fishermen, and they are not decided on whether the draggers injure the food used by the fish, and kill the smaller fish. It would not do any harm in the maritime provinces if our fishermen used draggers for a time at least; and if the time came when the fishermen felt that the numbers of fish were becoming depleted other methods no doubt could be found.

I have had many electors in my county expressing their desire for the abolition of the means test and reducing the age limit to sixty-five years. In this respect, I am pleased to know that this government is naming a committee to make recommendations to the government and, based on their findings, the government will be in a position to adopt appropriate measures. I trust that the committee's deliberations will result in added security for the aged, so that this government may enact concurrent legislation.

Expressing my view on the question of radio, licence fees should be discontinued, thereby eliminating costly administration and collection costs, and substituting therefor an increase in the sales tax commensurate with the need.

Coming to agriculture, I wish to commend the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) and the government on coming to the rescue of producers of eggs, cheese, butter and hogs with support prices and bonuses. In our province in January last, eggs had reached the low level of 19 cents for grade A and 13 cents per dozen for grade C. These were ruinous prices for egg producers. The markets for beef, veal and lamb are very satisfactory.

We are hopeful that the Department of Agriculture will give us a support price on potatoes for this year only, to assist in stabilizing the very depressed market which at present exists.

Many of our potato growers believe, however, that a support price on potatoes induces speculators to grow potatoes, with the result that each year we find we have too great a quantity to market, with accompanying depressed market conditions. I would like very much to see the potato-growing industry left to the genuine and bona fide farmer, thus giving him some cash in the fall season to buy fuel and clothing for his family. These speculators in the potato-growing industry, because they command greater finances than the ordinary farmer, spoil the chance of the bona fide farmer making any profit on his operations, causing much distress and disappointment.

Because of overproduction during the past two years, the federal government is besieged with requests for a support price. The government is reluctant to meet these demands on a perishable product such as potatoes. My opinion is that a support price invites speculators other than the bona fide and stable farmer to grow more potatoes than our present and foreseeable markets can absorb.

There are two means, in my opinion, of curtailing production. One is restricting the acreage that can be grown. The second is the imposition of a levy per acre per grower. I would favour the latter as a more effective measure of controlling production, and I should like to submit tentative suggestions to the members of this house for their consideration, realizing, as I do, that any remedial action must come from the governments of each of the provinces, the federal government having no jurisdiction in this field. Nevertheless, if what I am going to suggest appeals to the members, they could discuss the matter with their provincial departments of agriculture.

I submit the following:

That all provincial governments impose a levy on all potato growers in their respective provinces.

1. In the case of those who plant over one hundred acres, a levy of $25 an acre be imposed.

2. From fifty acres to one hundred acres, a levy of $20 per acre.

3. From thirty-five to fifty acres, a levy of $15 per acre.

4. From twenty to thirty-five acres, a levy of $10 per acre.

5. From twenty acres and under, no levy.

I firmly believe that if the provinces would pass legislation to this effect it would be a practical way of controlling potato surpluses and retaining the potato growing industry for the bona fide growers. The growing of up to twenty acres per farm works nicely in with a crop rotation, having a great effect in cleansing the farm of noxious weeds, because of the intense cultivation which is necessary in the growing crop. Now, if the provinces agreed to some such measures, I think we could expect a healthy market condition each year and possibly the provincial governments might derive some revenue, rather than being subject to demands for support prices each year.

It is my duty to express my views, as I see them now, concerning assistance in our province, as compared with assistance granted to other provinces of Canada. It would appear to me that our share of federal grants, placing these on a per capita basis, is relatively small in comparison with our sister provinces. For example, there are many grants of which other provinces can avail themselves but which are denied to us because they do not apply to us. Other provinces, as I have said, enjoy money grants, such as grants for slum clearance, assistance under the Emergency Gold Mining Assistance Act, the Prairie Farm Assistance Act, the National Housing Act and encouragement for mining and the development of oil resources. So that to place us as a province on a par with the other provinces, we should receive special consideration in federal grants that do apply to our province.

At this time, I shall confine myself to one, namely, education. As I pointed out to the house last year, our teachers are the lowest paid of any province in Canada. I have here some figures from the bureau of statistics in this connection which might be of interest to hon. members. The table before me gives a comparison of the salaries paid teachers in the different provinces and, for the purpose of demonstrating the point I am making, I should like to place on record the salaries paid for male and female teachers in a one-room school first in Prince Edward Island and then in Ontario. The male teacher in Prince Edward Island receives $950 and the female $925 whereas in Ontario for the same type of work the salary is $1,580 for the male teacher and $1,516 for the female. I have pointed out that this condition exists because in Prince Edward Island we have the lowest per capita earnings in Canada.

We are in need of money to provide for technical and vocational education. Our surplus population moves to central and western Canada. I should like to have the house realize that money provided for education for our boys and girls in Prince Edward Island is not charity at all, but is the soundest investment this government can make. All the provinces would share in such investment in having our boys and girls migrating to other provinces educated as bookkeepers, surveyors, engineers, technicians, doctors, nurses, et cetera. Educated in surroundings and an environment that are ideal, as things are now, the larger number of the boys and girls educated in the province move out to the other provinces, where there is continual expansion and where the opportunities are awaiting them. These young people come from families that have funds to educate them; but for those young people leaving our province with very little education, because their parents are too poor to give them an education, they must take the pick and shovel jobs. Many of the girls find domestic work in Montreal, which I maintain is unfair. Our boys and girls should enjoy equal rights in the field of education, comparable to that which is given to the boys and girls in our sister provinces. I could give hon. members figures on our per capita earnings as compared to the other provinces, but I gave the per capita earnings to the house last session and I will not repeat them today. I believe every hon. member of the house, and the government as well, wish to treat our province fairly. Canada cannot have a healthy body if any member of that body is ailing.

I am sure that there is not a member of this house who would wish to deprive the weaker sister of the ten provinces of equal rights with the other provinces. The hon. member for Kindersley (Mr. Larson) made a significant statement when he said that the maritime provinces were regarded by western Canada as being in practically a different world. I fully agree that there should be a greater knowledge and understanding between the provinces, and the government could then more readily effect an economic levelling off so that all provinces would share equally in Canada's economy as they do in direct and indirect taxation.

Having said that, I should like to submit some figures. The prairie provinces received from the dominion government under the Prairie Farm Assistance Act during the years 1947, 1948 and 1949, the years for which I have figures, $11,156,147, $17,669,568 and $14,382,805 respectively. Under the Prairie Farm Rehabilitation Act during the same years they received $2,354,448, $3,546,627 and $4,857,560 respectively. During the past three years an amount of $4,179,742.35 has been paid out for the development of oil resources, while during the same period $3,332,196.07 has been paid out in grants by the bureau of mines. During the past nineteen months a total of $15,613,051.60 has been paid out under the gold mining assistance act.

I am firmly convinced that the federal government was fully justified in assisting these provinces to the extent they have and I hope they will continue to do so in an effort to promote further development of the natural resources of Canada. I should like to quote from a statement made in 1935 by the former Prime Minister, Right Hon. William Lyon Mackenzie King, as follows:

> The Liberal party recognizes that the problem of distribution has become more important than that of production and believes that personality is more sacred than property. It will devote itself to finding ways and means of effecting a fair and just distribution of wealth and increasing regard to human need, to the furtherance of social justice and the promotion of the common good.

I should like to add to those words the following words spoken by the present Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) thirteen years later:

We will not be satisfied until, in co-operation with the provincial governments, we have achieved a national standard of social security and human welfare which assures the greatest possible measure of social justice to all Canadians.

I submit that there is a wide difference between the treatment accorded those provinces and the treatment accorded to the maritimes, and I am now speaking of Prince Edward Island particularly. I think our young people are a valuable asset upon which the other provinces have been drawing and we have not received any equitable reimbursement for the cost of their education. It is estimated that from the beginning of a child's school years until graduation into a profession the total cost is approximately $10,000. The grant to returned veterans who wished to take advantage of the government's offer for further education averaged $2,012, making a total of $110,400,139 to October 31. Many of the 54,859 veterans who took advantage of the government's offer stayed only a short time in the training schools and this lowered the average cost. When we realize that in this house of 262 members there are 156 members who come from Quebec and Ontario, called central Canada, with only 106 from the remaining eight provinces, we have an indication of the population of that central area.

I agree with what has been said by the hon. member for Regina City (Mr. McCusker) and the hon. member for Charlotte (Mr. Stuart) with regard to the possibilities of developing a mining industry in Nova Scotia instead of having the ore sent up the St. Lawrence river. There are great possibilities and this development would create a market for our home grown products. In this connection I should like to quote the words of Premier Jones of Prince Edward Island, who on March 2 said:

When I see that 2,000,000 tons of ore are going to be stock-piled in Labrador ready for shipment up the St. Lawrence to western Ohio through the canals, it seems to me the height of foolishness. Leaving Seven Islands a boat could sail down to Baie Verte and into Portland just as quick as she could reach Montreal. It seems ridiculous to think of taking ore there because the Bethlehem Steel Company has established a big plant not far from Philadelphia. Why does not the ore go up the St. Lawrence instead of going down the Atlantic coast?

What right have they to build locks at our expense, when the bridge goes over the strait of Canso. There is no reason why Sydney could not become a great steel empire.

[Mr. Kickham.]

With the opening up of the Chignecto canal Nova Scotia could become the Pittsburgh of the maritimes. Over the years since confederation under all governments the maritimes have proved to be a prolific mine for central Canada, both economically and in the providing of talented human beings. Should the maritimes be suddenly shorn off from central Canada I am sure that the perpetually productive old milch cow would be missed. The permitted increase in freight rates further militates against the maritime provinces in their competition in central Canadian markets.

In conclusion, may I say that the young people from my province go to the other provinces of Canada entertaining no fanatical heresies or economic theories in connection with trade, monetary or social matters, such as we hear in this house from the C.C.F. group. There is no problem of assimilation as islanders have relatives and friends in every province of Canada. The C.C.F. had candidates in our province contesting the election, but they did not get to first base, losing their deposits each time. I can assure the leader of the C.C.F., the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell), that we welcome his candidates. The government can use their deposits for social aid purposes which he pretends to champion.

Our people do not lend themselves readily to flighty economic and political theories. They prefer to rely on the two permanent and stable political parties, namely, the Liberal and Conservative parties, who have led Canada through the trying stages of development and while in the embryo period. The fact that we have now reached the status of a full-fledged nation is in no small measure due to those stalwart parties.

(Translation):

Mr. Henri Courtemanche (Labelle): Mr. Speaker, may I begin my remarks on a rather sad note. A parish in my district has been the scene of a tragedy of a rather unusual nature. In the province of Quebec, as elsewhere, during the winter months river roads on the ice are used as short cuts. This practice has caused in the village of Labelle an accident which has been widely reported in the newspapers and to which I feel I should draw the sympathetic attention of the hon. members of this house.

Four people were crossing lake Labelle in a car. The ice broke and the car slid into the icy waters. Only one of the occupants was able to free himself, while the three others perished under conditions of anguish and suffering that can be well imagined. Two of the occupants were imprisoned in the car.

I wish to deplore the trouble we had in finding a properly equipped diver. We telephoned Halifax and were told no equipment was available for a 225-foot dive since the pressure at that depth would be 91 pounds per square inch. We were even informed that only the United States Navy owned equipment that could be used under such a pressure. Would it not be possible to provide the national harbours of Montreal with suitable equipment and save us in future from risking too many lives? The local people had to work in shifts of 25 on the ice surface in sub-zero weather with improvised means.

Public opinion in the province of Quebec has been stirred for some time by the question as to whether Count Jacques de Bernonville will be deported or not. I know that his case is being considered by the department of immigration. I know nothing whatever of his past in France, but recently the hon. member for Bonaventure (Mr. Arsenault) supplied us with a fairly condensed account of it.

That he was condemned to death by an exceptional tribunal, by a political court of justice made up of members of the underground forces and of communists does not make one iota of difference in his favour or against him.

Is it any wonder that he came into Canada without a passport? When leaving their country, opponents of a political system are seldom privileged to have their passport visaed.

During the rebellion of 1837, had the United States required papers in proper form from Louis Joseph Papineau and William Lyon Mackenzie, grandfather of the predecessor of the present Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent), both of them would have been returned and hanged with the others. Like every civilized nation, England has been giving refuge to newcomers without asking them whether they had been sentenced to death in absentia. Would Canada be more backward in 1950 than was Britain at the end of the eighteenth century?

I find it hard to understand the government's relentless attitude towards Jacques de Bernonville. A principle of justice and fair play is involved. Why this drastic application of a regulation which in all fairness does not hold in his case? A perusal of the files of the immigration branch will show that other foreigners have entered Canada under the same circumstances as Count Jacques de Bernonville, but they have been spared the tribulations imposed upon this man and his family over the past two years. History records numerous precedents.

In March 1939, 500,000 Spanish refugees entered France without valid passports and were granted the right of sanctuary.

In 1936, Manuel Azana, former Spanish minister, fled to France to escape persecution. He died peacefully at Montauban, November 4, 1940.

Francisco Largo Caballero, known as the Spanish Lenin, who became Spain's first socialist prime minister, in 1936, took refuge in France, without first obtaining a legal visa. He was never molested and died at Paris in March 1946.

By the peace treaty signed in the Hall of Mirrors at Versailles on June 28, 1919, 27 countries had agreed to request and demand the extradition of Kaiser William II. Yet he died at Doorn, a small Dutch village, without having been brought to trial.

All these facts add up in favour of Count Jacques de Bernonville.

Though pagans, both the Greeks and the Romans granted legal protection to foreigners and recognized the right of sanctuary. Would Canada refuse to grant asylum to a Frenchman who did us the honour of believing in Canadian freedom? The government of my country must act in such a manner that we will feel proud of being Canadians.

May I now congratulate the new Clerk on having provided the house with a bilingual diagram. This innovation was needed in order that the two official languages might be placed on an equal footing in parliament and in the country. This gesture also testifies, in the most straightforward and commendable manner, to the genuine Canadian patriotism of the man who is responsible for it.

I am sorry, however, that I cannot entertain the same flattering views about the government's present policy. It seems this country is walking into three blind alleys, namely: the loss of our markets, the resulting unemployment and, as a natural consequence, communism.

The taxpayers of my constituency are disappointed. During the last war the Liberal party asked us to make sacrifices to ensure security in the post-war period. This policy proved to be shortsighted. Though we were promised prosperity, we are now faced with a real economic depression. It is all very well for the government to claim that conditions were never better, but our farmers have had a difficult year and the future is dark, while the number of unemployed keeps growing in our large cities.

Our eyes are being opened. The Quebec voter realizes he has been duped. He was misled when Liberal orators promised prosperity and praised the agreements signed with Great Britain, which were supposed to grant us the enviable privilege of being the British market's only suppliers. While this idea was being spread among the public by Liberal propaganda, the federal cabinet was well aware that Sir Stafford Cripps, on behalf of the United Kingdom, had advised the Canadian government that they would buy nothing, or very little, from this country.

The policy of agricultural security implemented by the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) has collapsed. Actually the results of this lack of foresight have been felt for some time now. This is what Mr. Gérard Filion had to say about it in the January 31, 1948 issue of Le Devoir:

> The whole agricultural policy of this country must be completely overhauled. We have systematically refused to sell to those who wanted to buy our products and obstinately sought to sell to those who no longer wish to buy from us. Soon we will be in the rather uncomfortable position of the man who has to sit between two chairs.

Canada could have taken advantage of wartime and post-war conditions to increase the number of its export markets in order to achieve a better balance of trade. It could have found profitable markets in the United States and, through extensive exports of agricultural products, made up for its shortage of American dollars.

In order to fulfil our contracts with Great Britain, the export of bacon, cattle and cheese to the United States was prohibited. The dollar crisis was created artificially. Restrictions on travel and purchases in the United States became necessary. Our economy was upset in the hope of securing remote profits and illusory security.

It is worth-while to recall that during the war, farmers were requested to make all kinds of sacrifices in order first to win the war, then to help to rehabilitate Great Britain. Thus, while Argentina sold her wheat to Great Britain at $3.55 per bushel, we in Canada sold it for only $1.55. And the same thing applied to all our goods, to everything we exported overseas.

The Minister of Agriculture realized his lack of foresight so well that he stated last fall:

> I realize that it is rather hard for Canadian farmers to learn that Great Britain relies on them only in wartime.

[Mr. Courtemanche.]

On another occasion, the same minister, upon being questioned by reporters, probably after uttering bitter words against Great Britain, had this to say:

> On more than one occasion, I have claimed that the British authorities were endeavouring to prevent us from selling our goods on their market and I have nothing to take back.

That is how things stand, Mr. Speaker. We have lost our markets and we have sacrificed them in vain. Our industries are at a standstill and our people are worried, but we lack the markets to help them.

The machine is idle, the plant is about ready to shut down, and our workers are going through a pre-unemployment period, all on account of our lack of markets. And yet our country is rich in land, in raw materials and in manpower. Do we realize that the loss of these markets involves unemployment? We must face it. That evil, worse than one of the plagues of Egypt, the scourge of our time, is the curse visited not upon our workers but upon the responsible ones, our present leaders.

It is alarming and shameful that it should be impossible to enjoy a certain comfort in a country where everything is plentiful. Vox populi, vox Dei. The people claim the right to live and to subsist. The unemployed grumble, threaten, cry for vengeance against those who nap, beat about the bush and follow a policy from which one may only conclude that a certain propertied and ruling class is not suffering. We feel that people will not stand for this situation as they did from 1929 to 1939. In those years, there was submission, fear. Today, people realize that the guilty parties who have shirked their responsibilities are napping. Organized unemployment, as is evidenced today, is apt to bring unpleasant surprises. It will breed men difficult to handle.

How can we blame the unemployed? Call them lazy, improvident. They will tell you they were not unemployed yesterday because there was work to be had. They have none now and they are laid off by the thousands. The present rulers are responsible since, in governing, they must have foresight and they have failed to show any.

Many were startled to learn that the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) had asked municipalities to go further into debt in order to undertake projects to relieve unemployment.

The federal government caused a housing shortage by displacing workers, by sending our building materials overseas and by promoting settlement in urban centres. When the load became too heavy, it passed the buck to the provinces. By rent control, the dominion government is placing too heavy a burden on thousands of tenants, while it is dealing most unfairly with some landlords. When things reach a breaking point and protests surge from everywhere the government throws up its hands and dumps rent control into the lap of the provinces.

Let us not forget that unemployment is the breeding ground of disorder, poverty, unrest and communism. Unemployment leads to communism. It must therefore be averted. We have tried to fight it with words but that was a wasted, futile, useless effort. People do not yet understand why there was so much employment and money in wartime and why there is so little now, in peacetime. If money is found for destructive ends, it should also be available for constructive purposes. Should the fact that consumers are too few in number justify starvation in the homes of the jobless?

We now dread a third world war. It is feared that the Russians have discovered the secret of the atomic and hydrogen bombs.

Have we forgotten that communists are already waging this third war by taking over surrounding countries one at a time? Have we forgotten that, in their fifth column, which is well established in every country including Canada, they have the best weapon in existence?

This fifth column is wide awake at present but will prove even more efficient when the time comes for action.

Communists are now active in Canada in three different main groups: (a) labour organizations; (b) study and cultural organizations; (c) the civil service.

All this has been proved during the Kellock-Taschereau investigation, yet the Ottawa government refuses to take the firm steps required by the situation.

Far be it from me to make excuses for communism, which, in the words of Leo XIII, is a fatal plague that infects the very marrow of society and destroys it. I know too much about its workings not to condemn it. The communists will lose the next war, should they provoke or start it, but unemployment, this breeding ground of discontent, this mixture of confused causes, will make people look upon communism as the solution to the eternal social question.

I therefore request the government to attend to these alarming wounds, to heal them. That is within its powers as well as within its duties. There is no reason why any one of our citizens should not be able to live in a country 3,700,000 square miles in area.

In my own name, in that of my constituency, of my province, of my own race, in the name of the whole country which is threatened with the same crisis, the same miseries, I beseech those in power to put an end to this sad state of affairs.

Let us find jobs for our people. That is the only way to earn a salary. Whatever work is found, let it be, not just any work, but useful work, constructive work which will benefit our country. Let us not fight communism with words, but with action, honestly, by ensuring to the people what is rightfully theirs—order, justice, prosperity and national security in this fine, powerful and great country of ours.

(Text):

Mr. J. S. Sinnott (Springfield): I wish to congratulate you, Mr. Speaker (the Acting Speaker, Mr. Beaudoin), on the position you are now occupying. As you are my former roommate, it gives me great satisfaction to see you there. I also wish to extend congratulations to the mover and the seconder of the address in reply to the speech from the throne. It gives me more satisfaction to extend them to the mover, however, as I have known him for a considerable number of years.

In the great riding of Springfield a few things are happening which I should like the house and the people of Canada, as well as others, to know about. I refer to the $10 million oil refinery which is being built in one part of the constituency. This refinery will employ a number of men for a considerable period of time, and will be of such a size that it will supply all of the oil to Manitoba. I should like to read from a clipping from the Winnipeg Free Press of some time ago. It reads as follows:

> Construction on the Imperial Oil Company's $10 million refinery at East St. Paul, Manitoba, will begin about March 15, or as soon as weather permits, J. K. Jamieson of Sarnia, Ontario, manager of the engineering and development division of the company, stated Tuesday.
> Mr. Jamieson arrived in Winnipeg Monday with other company officials to complete plans for the construction job.
> First work to be undertaken at the 400-acre site, located seven miles north of Winnipeg's city limits, will be building of temporary office quarters, fencing the property and laying a temporary railway siding.

Biggest job now on the books of the company's manufacturing department, construction of the plant, will employ between 500 and 600 men during peak activity. May, 1951, is still the date set for completion of the project, Mr. Jamieson said.

With a capacity of 10,000 barrels a day, and working on a 24-hour, seven-day schedule, the refinery will supply all Imperial Oil's petroleum needs in Manitoba. All crude oil for processing will come from western Canada through the Edmonton-Superior oil pipe line now under construction.

"We are planning to bring tank crude to the Winnipeg plant from the oil line at Gretna," Mr. Jamieson explained. "However, possibility of the use of a pipe line from this point is still being discussed," he added.

The refinery site is adjacent to railway lines of both Canadian National Railways and the Canadian Pacific Railway, and switching facilities are to be installed from both railways.

Refinery plans also include provision for an asphalt plant. Manufacture of this petroleum by-product depends on the type of oil, the type of asphalt the market requires and the sale for it, officials explained.

Mr. Jamieson emphasized that there would be little or no chance of pollution of the Red river by waste products from the plant.

"Pollution should be kept to a minimum," he said. "We will have all the latest type of equipment to purify the 12 million gallons of water per day that will pass through the refinery."

"Actually, the water should be cleaner coming out of the refinery than that going in," he added.

When completed the refinery will have a "tank farm" of 42 storage tanks for both crude oil and finished products, having a total capacity of 35 million gallons.

Products of the plant will be high-grade automobile gasoline, diesel fuel, domestic and industrial fuel oil. No high-octane aviation gasoline will be manufactured, Mr. Jamieson said . . .

The construction company will also let sub-contracts to local firms wherever possible, Mr. Jamieson said.

Used in construction will be, 15,000 feet of fencing, 16 miles of pipe, 8,000 feet of roads, 5,000 yards of concrete, 13,000 tons of steel and 3 miles of railway spur tracks.

Mr. Smith (Calgary West): How much sewer?

Mr. Sinnott: That all depends on you.

Another project which is under way in the riding of Springfield is a $20 million power plant which is now being developed on the Winnipeg river. I take great pride in representing this riding, which is the key to all of Manitoba. In that riding is developed all the power for the whole of Manitoba, and that includes the great city of Winnipeg.

We discussed the unemployment situation here in the house for some considerable time a few days ago; and while some members regard the situation as serious, I myself do not take that attitude. Some members think that governments are a cure-all for this situation. I do not. I think that Canadians as a whole would be doing themselves a great disservice if they had in mind this idea of foisting upon the dominion and provincial governments almost the entire responsibility for handling the unemployment situation.

We must not forget that wholesale spending on giant public works is not a cure-all for unemployment. It merely takes up the slack at times, in most cases causes considerable strain on the purses of both the provincial and dominion governments, and in turn has to be met by the taxpayers themselves. If in the future we should have severe unemployment situations, and I hope we shall not, there should be more intelligent co-operative planning among the businessmen, professional men, labour leaders and other authorities. Planning by industry itself goes a long way to create steady employment. I believe that labour leaders can certainly help to develop and put into effect work-providing plans by giving both industry and the government the benefit of the workingman's ability and ideas. Let us not be panicky and be always looking at the black side of the picture, as this sometimes induces a hasty and unwise course of action.

A few days ago I believe the hon. member for Souris (Mr. Ross) stated that there were not many municipal men on this side of the house.

Mr. Ross (Souris): You have got me wrong.

Mr. Sinnott: I am glad the hon. member is in his seat now.

Mr. Casselman: He is always here.

Mr. Sinnott: Did I hear him say that I was wrong? In the cabinet we have some municipal men. The Minister of Fisheries (Mr. Mayhew) has had considerable experience. The Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) has had some experience. I believe the Minister of Labour (Mr. Mitchell) has had considerable experience as well. There are other backbenchers on this side of the house who have had considerable experience. I will refer to the hon. member for The Battlefords (Mr. Bater), who has had about 31 years' experience. We have the hon. member for Mackenzie (Mr. Ferrie), who has had considerable experience. There is the hon. member for Hastings South (Mr. Follwell); the hon. member for Spadina (Mr. Croll); the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre (Mr. Maybank), who is a parliamentary assistant; the hon. member for Middlesex West (Mr. McCubbin), who is a parliamentary assistant; the hon. member for Nipissing (Mr. Garland); the great hon. member for Fraser Valley (Mr. Cruickshank); the hon. member for New Westminster (Mr. Mott); the hon. member for Lafontaine (Mr. Ratelle); the hon. member for St. Ann (Mr. Healy); the hon. member for Moose Mountain (Mr. Smith); the hon. member for Swift Current (Mr. Whiteside); and then we have the hon. member for Springfield, who served eight years as a municipal reeve, and is reeve again, in spite of the Free Press editorials. You know, I have a new name. Now they call me two-job John. The editor of the Free Press went out on a limb so far as to call me two-job John and to point out the reason why two-job John could not handle the municipality as well as being a federal member. Well, I left it to the good taste and democracy of the county. I was asked by so many of the ratepayers of the municipality in which I live to run that I allowed my name to stand, and I came down here. I never held a political meeting of any kind, and I was elected without them. We left it entirely to the people themselves. In spite of the Free Press and its editorials we left it, as my friend from Montreal says, to true democracy and to their sound judgment. They would rather listen to someone who had served them for a number of years previously than to a crackpot editor of a newspaper.

Some hon. members on the other side of the house have said that the farmers have lost $2 million; others have said $5 million; and we are at a loss to know which figure is correct. There have been so many estimates that it is difficult to say which is the right figure. We have not yet come to the end of the contract. If there should be any loss, in view of the fact that the government has taken care of the egg producers and other producers, they should make up the loss out of the consolidated revenue fund of Canada.

Mr. Ross (Souris): You are a good finance minister.

Mr. Harkness: What about the "if"?

Mr. Sinnott: Farmers as a whole never look for handouts. As hon. members know, during the war many of them worked sixteen to eighteen hours a day, and some of them twenty hours a day to make the same amount of money that the people in the factories were making by working about eight hours a day. Therefore I ask the government to think twice before the end of the contract, and if there is any loss it should be made up out of the consolidated revenue fund of all Canada.

I wish to thank the government for introducing their health plan.

Some hon. Members: Which one?

Mr. Knowles: Where is it?

Mr. Sinnott: Under this plan a hospital has been built in my riding, costing some $22,000. Another $100,000 hospital is going up at the present time, of which the federal government is paying quite a share. Laugh that one off!

We heard from the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) this afternoon with regard to old age pensions. I believe he was giving us all of the cure-alls. What he gave was not cure-alls. He was merely asking the dominion government to remove the means test. I do not think any hon. members in this house are more in favour of removing the means test than those of the Liberal party.

Mr. Knowles: Is that why you voted against it last fall?

Mr. Sinnott: But we must ask ourselves, where is the money to come from? Can we taxpayers afford it?

Mr. Hansell: You should know; you ran as a Social Credit candidate at one time.

Mr. Sinnott: I was like a kitten at that time. It has to be nine days old before its eyes are open. As I said before, there is no one in this house who is more in favour of seeing the means test removed than the Liberal members.

An hon. Member: Why don't they remove it?

Mr. Sinnott: We expect when the two richest provinces of Canada come into the all-nation program this fall we shall be able to remove it.

We have pensions for the blind, but there is one class of citizens for whom there is no pension. I refer to those who are incapacitated and are unable to work. Being the reeve of a municipality I know who pays for these things. The whole burden falls on the municipalities themselves. The provincial governments and the dominion government should come into this field and grant pensions to these people just as they grant pensions to the blind and to the aged. These people who are incapacitated have to sit in a wheel chair day in and day out and read story books to pass away the time. They are unable to help themselves. They should come under a pension plan of the dominion government.

I should like the Crowsnest freight rates to remain as they are. They have been on the statute books for a long time and I think it would be a mistake to have them removed.

I should also like to see the completion of the trans-Canada highway as soon as possible. As we know, that highway goes through the whole of the constituency of Springfield. Not only will it help to bring east and west together, but it will result in a saving of United States dollars. With those remarks, Mr. Speaker, I should like to close.

Mr. E. B. Huffman (Kent, Ont.): Mr. Speaker, my first remarks this evening will be those of acquiescence in what has been said by other hon. members by way of congratulations to the mover (Mr. Larson) and seconder

(Mr. Dumas) of the address in reply to the speech from the throne. However, I would like to add my special word of appreciation to all who have taken part in this debate. This is the first time I have spoken in the House of Commons, and perhaps it would be well if I were to tell hon. members some of the impressions I have gained as I have observed other hon. members take part in the debates of this and the former session.

I was intrigued to hear the hon. member for Skeena (Mr. Applewhaite) describe the beauties of his constituency. He told of the great trees, the beautiful scenery and everything connected with it. I was reminded, too, of the beauty of other constituencies in Canada; but as I was enraptured by the descriptions offered by hon. members taking part in the debate my mind turned to the beauties of my own riding of Kent.

In this connection let me point out that of the seventeen major crops grown in Canada the county of Kent, which it is my honour to represent, has succeeded in excelling in twelve. Attention of hon. members was directed this afternoon to the sugar beet industry. That, I may add, is one of the main products in Kent. In Kent is situated one of the largest sugar refineries on the North American continent, and practically all the sugar beets processed in the factory are grown in the county and the counties adjoining. For every dollar a sugar company pays for the beets produced, it provides in goods and services an additional $1.25. That in itself is a remarkable fact, and serves to assist in the economy of the country as a whole.

Industry has located in that area because of the excellent public relations existing between labour and management. In 1948 the city of Chatham, the only city in the county, was known across Canada as the industrial city of the year. It had enjoyed greater industrial expansion than any other city because it was served by an alert industrial commission which spent a great deal of time promoting the advantages of the city and succeeded in persuading many industries to locate at that point.

We were told in the house this afternoon why industries are moving to central Canada. I would add that anyone who wishes to attract industry to his constituency must accept as one of the prime requisites in such an endeavour the necessity of having a good public relations officer or trade commissioner. The gentleman who serves us in Chatham in this capacity, Mr. W. M. Gray, has become known across Canada because of the excellent relationships he has developed between those wishing to establish industry in Chatham and the city executive.

The sugar industry has provided employment for many people in Kent county, and it is one of the safest crops that could be introduced to any community. Like the other hon. member who spoke this afternoon, I foresee the time when Canada will provide a much greater proportion of the sugar consumed than is provided at the present time.

To facilitate the location of industry in Chatham, we have been fortunate in the fact that the national housing administration has provided homes for those who have come to this point. For this reason labour is well satisfied and well housed, a combination of facts which has worked out advantageously. I am certain the results would be the same in other places if similar facilities were provided.

Because of its international significance, may I point out the geographical location of my constituency. We are the most southerly part of Canada, reaching as far south as part of the state of California, and for this reason we are blessed with an excellent climate, combined with good soil and climatic conditions.

In addition to these features we have a fishing fleet operating from the ports on lake Erie, and that fleet is on the lake today gathering its catch for the lenten tables of our own province, and the great consuming public to the south of us. One significant fact about one port on lake Erie stands out. It is completely landlocked, with the exception of a narrow outlet so limited in extent that a stone could be thrown across. It is nine miles in length and approximately six miles wide, surrounded by trees of a provincial forest on one side and productive farm land on the other.

I would draw to the attention of the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Fournier) the fact that a submission was made to his department some time earlier promoting the development of this port. It is the most southerly in Canada and, as I have already pointed out, the fact that the fishing fleet is at work proves that there is no ice condition with which to contend. If some work were done at the port now or in the near future the department would succeed in providing one of the safest harbours on the lakes, and one which would open first in any season and accommodate those lake freighters which might choose to tie up at that point. This work could be extended further. We have had numerous inquiries from industries that have indicated a desire to locate in this particular port. With the assistance of the Department of Public Works I am certain that a good deal could be done to develop this port. Adjacent to the port is land from which the water is diked back. On this land are located people from every country in central Europe who mix with our own people to work this productive soil on which they are able to produce two crops in a season.

There is another matter of perhaps national importance that I would like to draw to the attention of the Minister of Transport (Mr. Chevrier). There is a municipally-owned air field south of Chatham. This field is half-way between the air route from London to Windsor, and it is also on the air lane of the flights to New York, Niagara Falls, Buffalo and Chicago. It is on the route of the T.C.A. planes from Montreal, Ottawa, Toronto, London and Windsor. In 1941 one of the most unfortunate air tragedies this country has ever witnessed occurred in the adjoining county. If the facilities at this field had been extended it is quite possible the large transport plane could have been directed to this airport. If the lives of the 21 people who were killed when the plane crashed could have been saved I am sure that the expenditures would have been considered to be in the interests, not only of our own transport lines but of the transport lines operated by our great neighbour to the south.

I would like to make a few observations about agriculture. Going back in history we can note the development of agriculture, not only in our own country but in the country to the south. The early settlements were in the eastern part of Canada, but as time went on the curtain was rolled back and the plough was placed time and time again to the virgin soil of this country. In so doing we reaped the immediate benefits that accrue from an operation of this kind, but unfortunately in many cases we have not returned enough to the soil so that those who will follow will have the same heritage as those who have had access to the virgin soil of our country.

I sincerely hope that the agricultural program of Canada will be such that our agriculturists will be encouraged to return sufficient to the soil so that this great heritage may continue and our production be as it is at present. As the centuries have gone along and new avenues of production have opened up I am convinced, as I am certain many others in this house are convinced, that the areas of virgin soil are becoming smaller and smaller. We must not forget that only eight per cent of the world's surface is arable.

If we continue to mine the soil the results will be unfortunate and we will not be in position to feed the ever-increasing population of the world.

There never was a time in the history of our country when we heard so much about conservation. There never was a time that the agriculturists of this country had a better opportunity to practice conservation. I am quite certain that we can maintain a better balance within our agriculture which will permit us to meet the demands of the time in which we live. Last year the speech from the throne made reference to reforestation, a matter about which we have been negligent in the past. I am quite certain that if we work with the provincial governments on this it will be to the advantage of Canada and will continue to provide for Canada those things which are essential to our economy.

I would like to refer briefly to the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Pearson). We are proud that six years of the early life of the minister were spent in Chatham and the people of that area take great pride in the work the minister is doing. We feel that as the twig is bent, so grows the tree. I never want to make one remark about Canada that is not in the best interests of Canada. I feel that if all of us, especially hon. members of this house, would try to sell Canada to the world, the very thing that we fear most—in the words of the late president of the United States, "the only thing to fear is fear itself"—will not happen because no communist or others who think along those lines would be able to find any comfort in our remarks. We would thus attract to our country those people who possibly may not hold the same views that we do but who might be attracted to us by our actions.

The hon. member for Haldimand (Mr. Catherwood) spoke about the one hundredth anniversary of the founding of the county of Haldimand. I would like to mention at this time that the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) has agreed to visit the county of Kent on the occasion of the 157th anniversary of the founding of Fairfield village, which was founded by the Moravians and later became known as Moraviantown. As you all know from your knowledge of history, that is where the great Indian patriot, Tecumseh, came from. The battle of the Thames will be commemorated this year. As the celebration will have an international complexion, besides the Prime Minister of Canada invitations have been extended to the President of the United States and the governors of five of the adjoining states whose officers and men participated in the battle during the war of 1812 to 1814. Four of these five governors have accepted the invitation to be present on the occasion. Like the hon. member for Haldimand, on behalf of the people who have honoured me by electing me as their representative I invite each and every one of you to be present on the occasion of the 157th anniversary of the founding of Fairfield village.

I would like to refer for a moment to the people who live in the county of Kent. In the early history of our development we were fortunate that people from the adjoining province of Quebec came there, and in their early struggles to found a settlement, the first year of which was not successful, they named their community Pain Court. According to the information I have, the translation of that name into English is "short bread". I regret I am not able to honour the French-speaking members of the house by being able to make some remarks in their language, but I can say that from the time of the naming of this village these people have become some of the best farmers in the county of Kent, and their soil is among the most productive.

So far as trade and commerce is concerned, I am certain that the people of the county of Kent would want me to pay tribute to the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe). In these times many things are being said about the loss of this market and that, but it is not because of lack of effort on the part of the Department of Trade and Commerce. No country in the world today has as extensive a trade commission service as Canada. These young people have been taught in the offices of the various departments in Ottawa, and they are the best ambassadors that Canada can have. In every country they are seeking to promote the sale of the things that we produce, not only industrially and agriculturally but everything that Canada has to offer on the markets of the world. I know that they are doing their very best to sell the goods that we have to offer. I am reminded that the hon. member for Skeena (Mr. Applewhaite) said that in this imperfect world not all is perfect.

I would like to say a few words to the Minister of Veterans Affairs (Mr. Gregg). I am sure every one of us realizes that the government has done an exceptional job for the Canadian veterans of world war II. As the hon. member said, not all is perfect. I should like to mention one point that has been brought to my attention on numerous occasions. As regards small holdings under the Veterans Land Act, many veterans tell me that for two reasons they are not able to establish themselves as they would like to under the existing legislation. The first is that in an area of small communities the requirements of the Veterans Land Act as to small holdings are that if the price of the land is $500 per acre or more at least two acres must be purchased, and if it is below $500 the requirement is three acres. In many small communities adjacent land is highly productive and two acres in the county of Kent, for example, would cost from $2,000 to $2,500. This does not leave the veteran with equity enough to build a home suitable to his needs. After their return from the war many of these veterans have been living in rented houses or in rooms. They have growing families. I am certain that not one of us would deny them the right to home ownership, the pride of ownership, the home the very thing on which Canada is founded. As this matter has been drawn to my attention on several occasions I would ask that it be given consideration and revert to the half-acre requirement. I realize that the construction of homes on small holdings under the Veterans Land Act was not intended as a housing project, but nevertheless it has been a factor in the provision of housing in Canada. As my time is up there are many other things relating to the county of Kent I would like to refer to, and will on another occasion.

In conclusion I would like to observe that I am sure the people whom I have the honour to represent will not ask for, nor expect any favours except in the interests of Canada as a whole. Forming one of the 262 component parts of Canada, all that I will seek as their representative will be a fair and equal distribution of the services that Canada provides, and I shall take an active interest in their behalf.

On motion of Mr. Blair the debate was adjourned.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Fournier (Hull) moved the adjournment of the house.

He said: As the first item tomorrow we will take up the motion of the Secretary of State for External Affairs to refer his estimates to the committee on external affairs. We do not believe the debate will be very long, since the first item of his estimates came up on Friday and was discussed for the full day. Then we will take up the motion in the name of the Minister of National Health and Welfare to set up a committee on old age security. Some time during the day we will move to go into committee of supply and call the departments of transport and finance. We will call transport because many hon. members have asked to have a discussion on Friday on the first item of that department. I should like to have finance in because after the estimates of external affairs are referred to the committee not many departments will be left, and sometimes a minister has to go away or is ill; so if there is no objection I would like to have at least three or four departments in.

Motion agreed to and the house adjourned at 10.50 p.m.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Tuesday, March 7, 1950

The house met at three o'clock.

DOMINION-PROVINCIAL CONFERENCE

TABLING OF FURTHER CORRESPONDENCE WITH PROVINCIAL PREMIERS

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister): I should like to table some further correspondence between the Prime Minister and the premiers of Newfoundland, New Brunswick, Quebec, and British Columbia, respecting the proposed general conference to be held in the autumn of this year. The previous correspondence was tabled on the 16th of February. Perhaps hon. members would wish, as has been done heretofore, to have this correspondence printed as an appendix to Hansard of today.

Mr. Speaker: Is it the wish of the house that this correspondence should appear as an appendix to today's Hansard?

(For text of correspondence, see Appendix, pages 559 and 560.)

HOUSE OF COMMONS

ANNOUNCEMENT AS TO RATES OF PAY FOR STENOGRAPHERS AND AMANUENSES

Mr. Speaker: I should like to make the following announcement:

I have the honour to report that at a meeting of the commissioners of the internal economy on Wednesday, March 1, 1950, consideration was given to rates of pay for stenographers and amanuenses in the House of Commons.

Although I understand that it is not customary at this time to bring before the house such a report, I desire to do so in view of the general interest shown by members of the house in this matter.

After careful consideration it was decided to initiate a policy whereby, the commissioners believe, the stenographers and the amanuenses of the house will be remunerated according to their ability and experience, which should be an incentive to them.

I would assure the house that, before establishing the rates of pay set forth hereunder, inquiries were made as to the salaries paid outside the House of Commons for similar positions and for work under similar circumstances, and I might also say that they have been established in such manner that they may be acceptable if and when any of our continuous temporary stenographers are made permanent in the future.

In future the members' stenographers staff, except stenographers allotted to parliamentary assistants, will be divided into three groups, as follows:

Group I—well qualified.

Group II—competent but lacking main qualifications.

Group III—not as experienced as group II, or lacking in co-operation, or without experience in the House of Commons.

Salary to be paid: Group III, $5.90; Group II, $6.50; Group I, $7.00.

The rating is to be done by the chief of the members' stenographers branch, under the supervision of the Clerk of the House of Commons.

All new appointees will be paid at the minimum rate of pay, namely, $5.90 per day for the first session, after which they may be promoted to a higher group in accordance with their qualifications; and these qualifications are to be reviewed from time to time.

The stenographers working for parliamentary assistants will receive the maximum rate established for stenographers of the pool, namely, $7 per day, but only as long as they continue to work for a parliamentary assistant. If later they work for private members, they must revert to the stenographic scale above established.

In so far as the debates amanuenses are concerned, as they must have special qualifications, and during some sittings of the house have to work from 11 a.m. to 11 p.m., they will receive the following rates of pay: $7.50, $8 and $8.50 per day; the present rate of $7.50 per day to be retained for new appointments, and employees who give satisfactory service and are reappointed in ensuing sessions may be granted an increase of fifty cents per day for each ensuing session up to a maximum of $8.50 per day.

The above changes are to be made retroactive from the beginning of this session.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

REFERENCE OF ESTIMATES OF DEPARTMENT TO STANDING COMMITTEE

Hon. L. B. Pearson (Secretary of State for External Affairs) moved:

That votes numbers 64 to 84, inclusive, of the main estimates 1950-51 be withdrawn from the committee of supply and referred to the standing committee on external affairs, saving always the powers of the committee of supply in relation to the voting of public moneys.

External Affairs

He said: Mr. Speaker, the motion I have the honour to move would refer to the committee on external affairs the estimates of my department, and therefore provide an opportunity for the work of the department and the policy of the government in external matters to be given the kind of examination by a committee which has in the past proved very useful. A similar motion also, Mr. Speaker, has in the past at times initiated discussion of our external relations generally.

A discussion on external affairs was initiated in the house last Friday on a motion to go into supply. As I understand it, the discussion was not completed on Friday evening, and therefore this motion will give hon. members a further opportunity to discuss our external affairs generally, if they so desire. It will also give me the opportunity, I hope, of which I am now taking advantage, to deal with some of the points raised last Friday, and to answer some of the questions addressed to the government at that time. I hope it will also give me an opportunity to clear up some of the confusion and misconceptions which I think might be created by some of the statements then made.

The hon. member for Peel (Mr. Graydon), in his interesting contribution to this debate, said that in discussions of foreign affairs the dice, in a sense, were loaded against speakers on the opposition side of the house because, naturally, they did not have access to all the confidential information at the disposal of the government. Of course, in a sense that is true, and up to a point must necessarily be true. But we do try to keep the house as fully informed as possible about these matters. When there are questions of very general interest and of great importance, I think it would be quite proper for leaders of the opposition parties to receive confidential information from government members on those questions; and if there are questions of a kind which preoccupy leaders of opposition parties or other hon. members, I hope I may be able to show to them confidential information bearing on these matters.

So far as loading the dice is concerned, I would only say that in the discussion we have already had the leader of the opposition (Mr. Drew) spent a good deal of time dealing with the situation in China and the recognition or non-recognition of the communist government in that country. I would point out that we had already supplied him with a memorandum which included a great deal of confidential and, in fact, top-secret information on that subject—a procedure which I think it was proper for us to follow.

The hon. member for Peel stated once again that it was time we told the House of Commons and the country more about the policies of the government in matters of external affairs. The graphic expression he used was that we should roll up the blinds in the east block. I am not quite sure what he meant by that, but I hope he will take the opportunity to go into the matter in a little more detail, possibly at the hearings before the committee—because, so far as I am aware, there is no foreign office in any democratic government that makes more information available to the public and to parliament than we do. Not only are we willing to roll up the blinds, but, on appropriate occasions, we shall be happy to open the windows of the east block as well, even though it may mean that at times we will find ourselves sitting in a draft.

In the statement he made last Friday evening concerning external affairs the leader of the opposition complained that in the statement I had made earlier in the afternoon I had ignored China. In his words, it appeared as if I was almost unaware of China's existence so far as that statement was concerned. He suggested it would have been better if I had been able to give the house some information on the question of the recognition or non-recognition of the communist government in China.

On that point I would say that this is a matter now before the government for consideration. It is a very difficult and complicated question indeed, as will be apparent from the fact that countries such as the United Kingdom and India have recognized the communist government in China, while other countries such as the United States and France have not done so. Therefore the question arises whether the government, in the midst of difficult and somewhat delicate discussions on the matter, should make public at this time all the arguments for and against a particular course of action.

I can assure you, Mr. Speaker, that when in the light of all the facts a decision is made, it will be given immediately to the House of Commons and to the country. Of course under our parliamentary system that decision is the responsibility of the government—as indeed the leader of the opposition himself indicated the other night. At that time he warned us of haste in this matter. To use his own words:

> We are under no compulsion to act hastily, but I believe we are under great compulsion as a nation to act with caution, with great care and after a full examination of all the consequences that would flow from recognition at this time.

I agree entirely with that, and indeed we are acting with great caution. One reason for delay—and it is only one reason, of course—is to give to hon. members a chance to state in this house their point of view on this question. Indeed, the request was made to the government by hon. members opposite that they should be given an opportunity to express their point of view on this matter before we came to a decision. They have had that opportunity. The C.C.F. party has indicated its position. The Conservative party, through its leader and the Conservative members in the house, have had an opportunity to express their views. As a result, these views will be of value to the government in coming to a decision.

In his statement the other night it seemed to me that the leader of the opposition jumped to a completely wrong conclusion on inadequate evidence when he said that a decision seems to have been made. The evidence he quoted for coming to that conclusion was a statement made by General McNaughton. The leader of the opposition used these words, as reported at page 462 of Hansard:

> Let us see what it was that was under consideration in the remarks of General McNaughton when he made it quite clear that early recognition is under consideration or has actually been decided upon.

Those remarks of General McNaughton, indeed his whole statement, meant nothing of the kind. In the statement to which reference has been made, General McNaughton said—and I quote from his speech as it was quoted at page 459 of Hansard:

> Unfortunately the further progress of these meetings—

That is, meetings of the atomic energy group consisting of the permanent members of the security council plus Canada.

> —has been held up by the Soviet refusal to participate as long as the Chinese delegate represented the nationalist government. However, there is reason to expect that the meetings will again be resumed shortly when this difficulty has been overcome.

That was a personal statement of General McNaughton with respect to the composition and the hearings of the atomic energy group, an agency of the security council of the United Nations. I can assure you, Mr. Speaker, that in those statements General McNaughton was not referring in any way to discussions on this matter by the Canadian government. General McNaughton has not been informed of, nor is he indeed greatly concerned with, such discussions. The meaning of his statement is quite clear. He was talking about a group appointed by the security council to discuss atomic energy questions. The composition of that group and the representation of China on that group would be determined by a decision of the security council of the United Nations. General McNaughton apparently thought at that time that there might be added, to the five members out of the eleven of the security council who have recognized China, one or two others; that this would change the balance in the security council and might thereby make a change in the composition of the atomic energy group. But General McNaughton could not have been referring to Canada in that connection, because Canada is not now a member of the security council and would not be concerned in any such change in it.

In our discussion the other night the leader of the opposition devoted some time to "recognition" in international law. In discussing the question he quoted from a recognized authority in that field, Professor Lauterpacht. It seems to me, Mr. Speaker, that there has been a good deal of confusion in people's minds as to what is meant by recognition, and I think this might be a good opportunity to clear the matter up so far as I am able to do so. It is of immediate importance now in connection with this particular problem of China.

In considering this matter we must distinguish between recognition of a new state and recognition of a new government. The two things are quite different. Under recognition of a new government we must distinguish between de facto recognition and de jure recognition, between implied recognition and express recognition. We must distinguish between recognition of a government whose authority has been challenged and is still under challenge, and recognition of a government whose authority is no longer being challenged by any alternative form of government. Then finally we must distinguish between recognition on the one hand and diplomatic representation on the other—this is quite a different matter, although the two things were certainly confused, I thought, the other night.

In connection with China we are dealing at this time only with recognition of a new government, not recognition of a new state. In deciding whether recognition should or should not be given to a new government certain criteria—certain conditions, if you like—have been laid down by authorities on international law, such as Oppenheimer, Brierly, Jessup, Lauterpacht and others. But these conditions, of course, have never been, and were never meant to be, applied rigidly and without exception. I mentioned some of these criteria in my statement last December when I was talking about this Chinese question. I said then that if the particular conditions which I mentioned were fulfilled in China to our satisfaction, and I quote from my words, we "would have to face the facts which confront us."

The four conditions—I think three of them were mentioned last Friday night by the leader of the opposition, but there are at least four—are as follows. One is the effectiveness of the authority of the government concerned. The second is the independence of the government concerned—something that is not always easy to determine, especially in the case of countries like Tibet, Viet Nam and China. The third is the ability and the willingness of the government concerned to carry out its international obligations. That condition, of course, cannot always be applied too rigorously and too exactly. If it were always applied in that way we might today be recognizing the government of Mr. Kerensky in Moscow. Finally there is the question of acceptability of the new government by the people over whom it exercises authority.

In dealing with this fourth question, acceptability—and it is an important question—Professor Lauterpacht, the authority previously quoted, has stated, and I think he is right, that acceptability does not necessarily mean now acceptability by—and I quote his words—"freely expressed popular approval." There must be other evidence. There must be the question of the people's resistance to the challenger of the government, or the reaction of the people to the new government—how they accept the new government's rule. But in dealing with this question the other night the leader of the opposition said that the United Nations resolution passed in 1946 establishes once again the principle that acceptability must be by freely expressed popular approval. I should like to refer to that part of his statement. He said that in 1946 a resolution of the United Nations assembly was passed dealing with Franco Spain, and that its purport was that a decision was made by the United Nations that there would not be recognition of the government of Franco Spain until it was a government with the consent of the governed. He then went on to argue that it altered the existing system of international law in so far as this point is concerned, because this was a resolution of the United Nations, and as the leader of the opposition said at that time:

> This—

The reference is to the resolution.

> —becomes a most emphatic statement of international law, and remains so until it has been repealed.

On that point I should only like to remark that resolutions of the United Nations do not make international law by their passage at Lake Success. It has been well established there, and it is accepted by every delegation attending the United Nations, that a resolution of that body is not international law. It is an expression of international opinion, but it does not of itself alter international law, and, as I understand it, it did not alter international law on this occasion.

Furthermore, Mr. Speaker, this particular resolution had nothing whatever to do with recognition. It was a resolution which concerned the government of Spain. Among other things it was a resolution against the participation of the present government of Spain in meetings of the United Nations, and it was a resolution for the recall of ambassadors and ministers from Madrid. It did not concern in any way, shape or form the recognition of Franco. As a matter of fact it did not even recommend a diplomatic break with Franco. It merely recommended that ambassadors and ministers should be withdrawn from Spain. It did not recommend that diplomatic missions should be closed, and they have not been closed since the resolution was passed.

Therefore I suggest there is no use, Mr. Speaker, in trying to draw an analogy on this occasion between our attitude towards Franco Spain and our possible attitude towards the government of China. As a matter of fact, the Canadian government recognized the Franco government of Spain in 1939, and has not withdrawn or altered its recognition since that time.

Another argument which was made the other night against the recognition of communist China by the leader of the opposition—and I quote him again—was when he said:

> In that area recognition of China would be regarded almost as a fatal blow to Viet Nam. . . .

He was referring to the new state of Indo-China. If that is true, then in that area Burma, India, Pakistan, Ceylon and the United Kingdom all have struck that fatal blow because they have all recognized the communist government of China. The government of Indonesia, now a very important state in that area, has said that it will be glad to recognize the government of communist China as soon as that government recognizes it. Nevertheless the leader of the opposition said, with reference to the opinion that it would be a fatal blow to Viet Nam:

> . . . that is the view publicly expressed by men with a great deal longer experience than the Secretary of State for External Affairs in this government.

That might well be the case, but if so it would be helpful in our discussion of these matters if we knew who were the gentlemen who advocated that course. Furthermore, on this point the statement was made by the leader of the opposition that we had already recognized the state of Viet Nam, and when I shook my head the other evening to negate his statement I was met merely by the reply which I have just quoted. What I wanted to point out at that time, and of course can point out now, is that we have not recognized the state of Viet Nam at this time.

In dealing with this matter the leader of the opposition rejected the argument that if we did not recognize communist China the Soviet delegation would walk out of the United Nations, and that would be blackmail. I entirely agree with him. It is blackmail, but it will have nothing to do with our decision on this matter one way or the other. I have already condemned as childish arrogance that kind of tactic on the part of Soviet delegations and their satellites, and I entirely agree with the leader of the opposition that we should not submit to such tactics.

In dealing with this point the other night the leader of the opposition added that such walkouts render the United Nations impotent. They are of course unfortunate in relation to the efficient conduct of the work of the United Nations, in one sense; they bring the United Nations into disrepute, but not as much disrepute as they bring on the delegations who walk out. They do not make the United Nations impotent, and should not be allowed to do so. Indeed, since these walkouts have occurred we have had continuous meetings of some of the most important agencies of the United Nations, including the economic and social council, which has never been able to do its work so expeditiously and effectively as on the occasion when there was no Soviet delegation present. Furthermore, the security council has been meeting since these walkouts occurred.

The situation in regard to recognition of communist China and its effect on the United Nations was referred to by the leader of the opposition the other evening when he said that only two proponents of recognition were now in the security council, and only three in the other agencies of the United Nations. As a matter of fact the situation is that in the general assembly of the United Nations there are fifteen members who have recognized communist China. Of the eleven members of the security council, five have recognized communist China. Of the twelve members of the atomic energy commission, five have recognized the government of communist China. In the economic and social council seven have recognized it; in the international labour office, seventeen; in the food and agricultural organization, sixteen, and so on. More members of the United Nations have taken this step than was indicated the other evening by the leader of the opposition.

The fact is that in some of these agencies we are approaching a position where a majority of the members concerned may be representatives of governments which have recognized the new government of communist China. If we reach that position in fact, those states which have not concurred in such recognition will be confronted by a very difficult situation indeed. If we find ourselves in the minority, should we walk out? Of course that would be absurd; but if we do not walk out and we do not recognize communist China, then the alternative is to remain there and work with delegations from communist China, and by so doing give them a form of recognition. All this shows how complicated and difficult the problem is.

In his remarks the other evening the leader of the opposition stated, with great emphasis, great eloquence and great impressiveness, I thought, that we had to stem the Red tide in Asia. Well, so we do; but how? When he attempted to answer that question I venture to suggest that he got into the same kind of difficulty I often get into when I make general statements and then try to follow them up with concrete observations. He did say, however, that in answering that question we should not fall into the language of diplomatic mumbo-jumbo. I entirely agree with that. When he attempted to answer that very important question himself he set out certain things which I might just mention—and I hope I am putting them correctly.

First he said there should be no hasty recognition. I entirely agree; and I do not think we can be accused of undue haste in this matter. He said that recognition should not be granted until certain conditions were fulfilled, and those conditions he enumerated in his statement. I think the most important one—and I hope I am quoting him correctly—was that there shall be common action, that there shall be a clear and universal pattern of strategy which will be known to the people of the free nations, and which will be known in the clearest detail to the nations which threaten our peace and security. Certainly, he went on to state, there should be no recognition of the Mao regime until those conditions are fulfilled.

Well, Mr. Speaker, it is going to be a little difficult at this date to agree on a common policy, which was a condition he suggested before we could give recognition; because no such common policy is possible as long as some of the states out in that portion of the world have already recognized communist China. On that point the hon. gentleman quoted from a statement of Mr. Anthony Eden, the former secretary of state for foreign affairs in London, to the effect that we should be very careful on the question of appeasement and hasty recognition. I venture to read into the record again one paragraph of the statement by Mr. Eden quoted by the leader of the opposition, as it appears at page 465 of Hansard:

> As regards actual recognition, there is a fair field for argument on practical as well as on legal grounds. It is a real misfortune that in this, as in other Far Eastern matters, we should be acting piecemeal . . .

That was the quotation given by the leader of the opposition the other evening. The copy of Mr. Eden's statement on that occasion which I have seen, and which I would like to put on record, adds a few words to that quotation; and I now quote from the text of Mr. Eden's statement:

> As regards actual recognition, there is a fair field for argument on practical as well as on legal grounds. The decision to recognize is no doubt eventually inescapable . . .

Those are the additional words in my text.

The third condition laid down by the leader of the opposition—though I do not know whether you could call it a condition—was that we should agree on help to the peoples of Asia; and I am sure there will be no difference of opinion on that.

The fourth suggestion he made was in his reference to a Pacific pact, and on that very important question he quoted me as follows—I refer to his words as reported at page 464 of Hansard:

> The proposal has been put forward in this house on different occasions by the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra (Mr. Green), that a Pacific pact to complement the Atlantic pact should be brought into being. Today the Secretary of State for External Affairs said that that could not be done because if the nations of the Pacific were to be invited to consider a Pacific pact it would be necessary to invite Russia and China.

That is not exactly what I said. I said that would be one consideration, whether it would be possible to invite Russia and China to a conference which would be discussing a regional pact in the Pacific. Of course I am not quite so naive as to suggest that if an invitation of that kind were sent, and if it had the conditions which normally attach to such invitations, the Russians would accept it. I am not even sure whether it would be of any use to send them such an invitation. My argument against a Pacific pact at this time, which is not mentioned in this statement, was that in my opinion it would be futile and unwise to proceed with a conference to negotiate a Pacific security and mutual guarantee pact at a time when the United States, the United Kingdom and India have indicated that they would not be able to participate in any such conference. Surely that serious argument is enough to explain why we have not accepted certain advice which has been given us in this house to push ahead with a Pacific pact at this time.

I thought I had made my position perfectly clear on this matter both on Friday and on previous occasions, and that in doing so I had not lapsed into the diplomatic language of mumbo-jumbo. If, however, the situation in the Pacific should change and should become analogous to the situation that obtained in the Atlantic when we proceeded to work out the North Atlantic pact, then certainly we would have to reconsider our attitude toward this matter.

Finally the leader of the opposition made a strong and eloquent appeal against anything which might be interpreted as appeasement of communist aggression. I agree with him, though appeasement is one of those very difficult and dangerous words which can be interpreted in many ways. If by appeasement we mean prejudicing our own security or the security of the democratic world by making extorted and unnecessary concessions to a possible aggressor in the hope that it might keep him quiet; or if we mean assisting, encouraging and strengthening those whom we thought had aggressive designs, then of course I am sure everyone in this house is against appeasement. But it is a dangerous word, which should not be used carelessly. Appeasement is not the same as peace, nor is it the same as a desire for peace.

In his statement last Friday evening the leader of the opposition also said, as reported at page 465 of Hansard:

> Every word I have spoken is a word to urge upon this government the duty to say in no uncertain terms, no matter what may be said by other governments in the world: "Appeasement is going to go no further; we have learned the lessons of the past and there will be no truck and trade with tyranny of this kind unless and until they are at least prepared to accept the ordinary standards of international conduct."

In my statement I said, as reported at pages 429-30 of Hansard:

> So far as Canada is concerned . . . there will never be any lack of willingness to search for a solution to this and the other problems which divide us from the communist world.

I suggest there is no contradiction between the two statements. In this connection I referred to the necessity of genuine compromise and accommodation; and I made it abundantly clear, I hope, that the Canadian government was fully aware of the danger of appeasement of the kind I have just indicated, but at the same time was conscious of a duty to keep searching for some way out of the present impasse.

Last Friday the hon. member for Peel spoke in a similar vein, with perhaps fewer qualifications than I gave, when he said, as reported at page 434 of Hansard:

> . . . the most vital job at the hand of every responsible nation of the world today is somehow to find the way to stop the present aimless international drifting. . . .

This, I remind the house, is a quotation from a speech made by the hon. member for Peel.

> . . . which is causing no end of alarm to the ordinary citizens of the world, because they have a revolting fear that a continuation of this squaring off of one group of nations towards another may end in another armed holocaust.

With those words, Mr. Speaker, I entirely agree.

Mr. George A. Drew (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, the motion now before us has just been moved and therefore was not under discussion when this broad subject was being discussed on Friday night. I shall now, therefore, deal with the motion and with the remarks which the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Pearson) has made.

First of all I regret that, on so important a subject, the Secretary of State for External Affairs should have spent so much time in quibbling about what he said last Friday. I should start by removing the wholly improper impression he sought to convey—that any words had been withheld from the quotation of the statement by Anthony Eden. I shall correct that impression by reading the whole statement into the record, although it involves some repetition.

So far as this government is concerned, so far as this parliament is concerned, each member is responsible for the fulfilment of his duties. It is not for us to follow anyone else blindly. Nevertheless I do not hesitate to say that Mr. Anthony Eden, who had the courage to resign from the British cabinet over the Italian issue, has had longer experience than the present Secretary of State for External Affairs for Canada. I attach a good deal of importance to the views he expressed. Although it will take a few minutes to do it, I propose to read into the record, because of the suggestion that words had been left out which might have changed the effect of the quotation, the whole of the statement.

I need hardly point out to those who either have read Hansard or have followed the course of this debate that I quoted a great deal more than the Secretary of State for External Affairs mentioned. This article appeared on January 16; it was syndicated and was published in a great many newspapers throughout the world. It appeared exactly ten days after the recognition by Britain of the Mao regime—it is important to remember that it was not before that time. The article reads as follows:

> The Far Eastern policies of the Atlantic powers and their friends are in a rather dismal tangle. They all apparently intend the same thing but they are moving at so different a pace that they are jerkily out of step.
> Recognition of the communist government in China provides a recent example of this inconsistency, though not the most important. The divergence of view and discrepancy of action between the British and American governments in this instance may even do good if they draw attention in both countries to the urgent need to co-ordinate policies without further delay.
> As regards actual recognition, there is a fair field for argument on practical as well as on legal grounds. It is a real misfortune that in this, as in other Far Eastern matters, we should be acting piecemeal both within the commonwealth and as between the commonwealth and the United States.

At this point I should say that that was the quotation in respect of which the Secretary of State for External Affairs read further words. This is what immediately follows:

> The French, too, appear to be embarrassed by our timing. I regard all this as deplorable, not for any reasons of diplomatic neatness, but because it emphasizes that there was no agreement between friends on handling Far Eastern affairs.
> This is tempting to those communist forces who seek to drive a wedge between us.
> On my return from Malaya last spring I gave warning that the communist challenge in southeast Asia was growing in force. I urged that common policies should be agreed upon within the commonwealth and with the signatories of the North Atlantic treaty in an attempt to hearten and sustain anti-communist forces.
> Unfortunately, the last year has been largely wasted. The Colombo conference has given the first sign of any positive co-ordinated plan to meet this threat. There are some who have regarded resurgent upheavals in the Far East as no more than the growing pains of a new nationalism, but even they must surely now accept that in this disruption may be found seeds of mortal weakness.
> We must first determine the nature of our problem in southeast Asia and next consider how together we can make headway toward its solution. In the first instance, the problem is economic.
> We should make a fatal error were we to underestimate the extent of the challenge free nations have to meet. The overwhelming triumph of Mao Tze-tung in China has transformed the whole position in the Far East. His methods have now become the blueprint for communist plans and the pattern for communist action throughout the Orient.
> For the time being, at least, China is taking the orthodox road mapped out by Lenin, and that is the road which starts and finishes in Moscow. Independent nationalist communism is certainly possible later, but we should be unwise to count upon it.
> The problem that confronts the powers in southeast Asia is infinitely more complex than that which Marshall aid is combating in Europe. These eastern countries have widely contrasting resources in wealth, wisdom and statesmanship. Their traditions, experience, religions and sense of purpose and responsibility are poles apart. They have scarcely a common denominator, yet all must be gathered in and helped to build together with the limited contribution that other free lands can bring to the economic life upon which their political resistance to communism can be founded.
> We must make a broad plan for economic help for southeast Asia that takes account of the free world's existing commitments and remaining resources. Such a plan must facilitate foreign investment, without exacerbating national feelings, without treating such investment so roughly as to make sure that it is never repeated. There should be provision for capital equipment and new plans for irrigation, transport and communications. In all these matters the Atlantic powers and the nations of the commonwealth can help in the material and in the technical sphere.

Aid to the east should therefore take three forms. The first is essential to give that financial and economic support without which we cannot hope to create conditions that can successfully withstand the challenge of communism. Second, some military help will be necessary in the form of military missions, arms and equipment. Here close co-ordination between neighbouring countries is urgently needed. Third, there should be an agreed strategy in all this area between the powers principally concerned, and their burden both in troops and political responsibility fairly adjusted.

It is equally necessary that our several intelligence services in the Far East should be reviewed and co-ordinated.

I therefore repeat that the most urgent need is for us to have a common policy in these affairs. No nation can, by itself, save the Far East.

Our common policy must be founded upon determination to help the peoples of southeast Asia to live in freedom from want or fear. Without our aid they are doomed to all the consequences of communist rule, and if they should fall, who can doubt that the danger to the peace of all the world would move nearer and yet nearer to home?

That is the complete quotation from the great wartime foreign secretary of Great Britain. I might say that appeared, as I have read it, in the New York Times of January 20, 1950, a paper that I believe will be regarded by everyone as a completely reliable publication.

When the Secretary of State for External Affairs, in a rather jaunty manner, talks about the difficulties that he has encountered when he makes general statements and then tries to follow them up with positive statements, he is quite competent to speak for himself. I have no doubt that is an accurate description of the situation in which he usually finds himself; but I followed with the very clear statement that here was the answer to the problem. This was not a statement made before there was British recognition. When he suggests that British recognition and the recognition of India, Pakistan and other countries makes it impossible now to have a uniform pattern, he is challenging the common sense and accuracy of the statement of Mr. Anthony Eden, which I have read, in regard to this very subject; because these other recognitions had been made at the time that this positive statement was made.

Let me deal with some of these points that have been brought up today—because this is not a situation that can be disposed of by quibbling or by badinage. It is a subject that, as has been pointed out by Mr. Anthony Eden, presents a critical challenge to the whole world at this hour. It should be the first concern of this parliament and of the government of Canada to recognize that, if this critical situation should lead to an explosion, then our full compliance with every other undertaking we have accepted, and our full and wholehearted support of the Atlantic pact, will have proved completely unavailing to preserve that peace which is the aim of every sensible person in this country and of every thoughtful human being throughout the world.

I just want to make one point quite clear. I do not for a moment question the fact that the Secretary of State for External Affairs has acted in his official capacity with courtesy to the members of this house with whom he has dealt and to those who have no official positions, whether on the government side or on the other side of the house. I want one thing to be quite clearly understood. I have received no information from him on this subject which would adequately explain to me what knowledge the government now has in regard to this extremely important subject. The Secretary of State for External Affairs did present to me a memorandum dealing with the Chinese question, which was a confidential memorandum. He said it was top secret, and it was so marked. It was delivered to me on November 29, 1949. It was delivered before he was in the Orient, and incidentally before recognition had taken place by India, the United Kingdom, Pakistan or the other nations he has mentioned. A great deal has happened since that time—a very great deal. There has been a wholly changed situation in China and in the Orient. For one thing, there has been an agreement between the Mao regime and the Soviet union. I was under the impression it was suggested that the government was not fully informed in regard to that agreement. Was I correct in that?

Mr. Pearson: Apparently there are secret clauses.

Mr. Drew: The reason I asked the question is that the whole text of the agreement was published on February 15 in the New York Times. There may be secret clauses, but there is a very full agreement which does indicate the nature of the thirty-year alliance that has been signed between the Soviet union and the Mao regime following some two months of negotiation in Moscow. And as I recalled the other night, there is a startling similarity between many of the terms in this agreement and those of the agreement that was signed on August 26, 1939, between Hitler's government and the government of Russia.

I would commend to the earnest consideration of those who are following the course of history the photograph that appeared in the New York Times of February 16. There they will see Mr. Stalin, Mr. Molotov and Mr. Vishinsky taking their part in the signing of this agreement in the presence of Mr. Mao.

I commend that picture to their attention because of the extraordinary similarity of it to a picture which appeared after Ribbentrop had signed an agreement on behalf of Germany on that fateful day of August 26, 1939.

So far as that memorandum was concerned, the Secretary of State for External Affairs did make it available to me, but I want it known that I am not informed secretly of any information which would assist me in understanding what course the government is likely to take in the light of subsequent events, and it is within that period that there have been important events. Certainly we have gained no information from the three speeches made by the Secretary of State for External Affairs that would assist us in that respect.

An hon. Member: Mumbo-jumbo.

Mr. Pouliot: Jumbo yourself.

Mr. Smith (Calgary West): Jumbo's baby.

Mr. Fraser: He has not opened the window yet.

Mr. Drew: The Secretary of State for External Affairs has tried to create the impression that General McNaughton's statement was simply a personal statement in regard to what was taking place at Lake Success. General McNaughton cannot divest himself of his official position. He is there as an official appointed by the Canadian government, and he is still Canadian representative on the atomic energy commission of the United Nations. He still is the chairman of the Canadian section of the permanent joint board on defence. He occupies these official positions, and he cannot on one occasion wear the cloak that indicates his responsibility in that respect, and on another occasion divest himself of it.

The Secretary of State for External Affairs says that General McNaughton was referring to the discussions of a group dealing with atomic energy questions. General McNaughton was referring to the walkout of the Soviet delegates and of the delegates of the satellite nations—and this was not just once; there were fifteen walkouts from different committees. When the Secretary of State for External Affairs indicates that Canada is not concerned, I should think Canada should be very much concerned about this pressure that is being exerted to have the other nations bow to their will in a matter of this kind. It is not something that might take place; it is something that has taken place. And when we talk of the position that Canada would be in if they did it, I say they have done it. They have walked out, and they have walked out for the particular purpose of asserting their position in regard to the Chinese situation.

What I said the other night, and what I repeat now, is that this is a form of blackmail; and if the other nations accede to that procedure, then the discussions there will become practically meaningless. I said the other night, and I repeat today, that Russia has a way of presenting its case. It can make arguments; it has a right to make arguments if it does not think that the present Chinese representative should be there and that the representative of Mao should be there, and that that is the way they should proceed.

No; I never suggested that Canada should walk out. As the Secretary of State for External Affairs has said, it would be an absurd suggestion; and frankly I think it is absurd for him even to indicate that anyone would think of it. We do not suggest that for one moment. What was being suggested was that this is a new set of events since Great Britain and India recognized the Mao regime.

Let me come back to the statement of General McNaughton. The Secretary of State for External Affairs has read it. It states:

> Unfortunately the further progress of these meetings has been held up by the Soviet refusal to participate as long as the Chinese delegate represented the nationalist government. However there is reason to expect that the meetings will again be resumed shortly when this difficulty has been overcome.

What I said when I mentioned this before, and what I say again, is that General McNaughton's words on that occasion have no meaning unless they were intended to imply that this difficulty, the presence of the present Chinese representative, would only be disposed of by his being replaced by a representative of the Mao regime. The Secretary of State for External Affairs nods his head in seeming approval. That is exactly what I said the other night, and it is what I say now. General McNaughton was saying that the Soviet delegate and those supporting him were pointing out that we were holding things up. The Secretary of State for External Affairs says nothing is being held up. General McNaughton said, "further progress of these meetings has been held up." Well, perhaps he does not know, but he is the Canadian representative at those meetings. He is referring to a situation which relates to fifteen separate acts which were part of a common pattern.

The Secretary of State for External Affairs went on to deal with the question of recognition. He said we have to distinguish between a government whose authority is being challenged, and a government which has just been formed; also that there is a difference between the recognition of a state and the recognition of a new government. He said that in the case of China we are dealing with the recognition of a new government, not of a new state. Well, that does not in any way affect the earlier discussion. It does not affect the validity of the observations which have been made. The action taken by the United Nations on December 12, 1946, was action which removed recognition to the extent that you are seeing from day to day now, in the press, suggestions that Franco Spain is about to be recognized.

It is always very interesting to see pained contortions on the face of the Secretary of State for External Affairs, but they are not supported by words. It would seem he has some internal disturbance that indicates more information than he was prepared to give us a moment ago.

The Secretary of State for External Affairs was definitely creating the impression that what had happened on December 12, 1946, had nothing to do with recognition. It is strange, if that is so, that in many countries today consideration is being given to the question whether there should be recognition or not. That is appearing in the press time and again.

As to the interpretation of General McNaughton's words in regard to China, may I just add this comment to what I have already said. The Ottawa Journal, on its editorial page on February 27, obviously found that the words have the same meaning, because in an editorial with the heading "McNaughton sees China recognized," they say:

> But we didn't set out here to gaze into the crystal ourselves. It is General McNaughton who has done so, and we note his prophecy with interest.

I quote that merely because on its editorial page this highly respected publication has drawn the same conclusion. What I sought to point out was this, when I quoted the four points laid down by Professor Lauterpacht—and I did not quote three, as the Secretary of State for External Affairs suggested today; if he will read Hansard he will know that. I quoted four points which were set down by Professor Lauterpacht as the conditions of recognition, and I pointed out that there was this additional matter which should be considered.

Now, what is clear in Professor Lauterpacht's statement, and what is clear in the discussion of this subject of recognition in the textbooks, is that this is something that takes form from time to time as the result of experience and as the result of views that are established.

In the very article I quoted on Friday night, Professor Lauterpacht said that Great Britain until recent years had insisted upon the approval of the people as a condition of recognition, but that this had changed. The United Nations is not a body that is from day to day writing a code on international law; but the United Nations represent this great international group of nations, and surely what they do as a group does establish what may be the international point of view in regard to a particular subject at a particular time.

At that time, in December, 1946, they pointed out that recognition of the countries whose representatives met to express their views was a matter of some importance. As I said earlier,—and in view of the comment made by the Secretary of State for External Affairs I find it necessary to repeat it—if that was a ground for withdrawing recognition, or if the minister quibbles over the word "recognition" and would like to limit it to the withdrawal of diplomatic officials, then certainly the resolution was based upon the fact that the Franco government had not been the demonstrated choice of the people. I say now, and I said then, that if that was the position taken, surely it is a strange thing now for the government of any country which is a member of the United Nations to be disregarding it when dealing with recognition in China.

As for recognition, I said on Friday night that I hoped the time would come when there would be a restoration of those conditions which would make it possible to recognize a government in China, and to recognize other governments. May I say now that every person who hopes for peace will also hope—and must hope, as a basis for peace—that there be an improvement of conditions throughout the world which will make it possible for the government of Canada and every other government to recognize the lawful governments of every nation in the world.

But, Mr. Speaker, I do come back to the very strong appeal made by Mr. Anthony Eden, whose course in this respect is clear. In his case it was not wisdom after the event. In his case we find a clear understanding of the need for firm and united action in dealing with aggression of this kind. He resigned from the Chamberlain government because he felt that appeasement of Mussolini would lead to war. His view with regard to appeasement of Germany was equally strong. The Secretary of State for External Affairs has just stated that appeasement is not the same as peace, that it is not a word that expresses a desire for peace. No, appeasement is the very opposite. In 1939 we learned that appeasement is the one sure way to make war inevitable. If the nations who meet at Lake Success submit to the tactics employed by Russia and the satellite states, then it will be a repetition of the same course of action which led to such costly consequences in 1939.

Recognition of the Mao regime is only one part of this picture. Quite unintentionally, I am sure, the Secretary of State for External Affairs left some impression that I had dealt with recognition as though that were the one problem in China. There are of course many problems in China. In my discussion on Friday night I did not limit the subject in that way. I made it clear that it was a broad subject. As reported at page 459 of Hansard I said:

> Today China represents the most critical spot in the whole world and any presentation of foreign affairs by the minister responsible for that branch of government which ignores the critical problems of that great area at this moment is an address to this house which hardly does credit to the hon. members who sit here.

Then I went on to speak of the particular problem, and I said:

> There is one particular subject in connection with the whole situation in China which has been passed over casually and this house has not yet received any information which would give the views of the government as to those considerations which should be in the minds of members of this house and of Canadians generally in regard to the extremely important question of the recognition of the Mao regime in that country.

In that statement I was not suggesting that we should be substituted for the government in the exercise of its responsibility. I said that we had not been informed as to the views of the government with regard to those considerations which should be in our minds; and we are still uninformed, as far as the government is concerned, as to the considerations which should be in our minds on this important subject.

I will close these remarks with an attempt to emphasize what I believe is the vital importance of this situation. Mr. Anthony Eden, in his speech, used the words "fatal consequence." He referred to the terrible dangers that are before us. For that reason one need not hesitate to emphasize what he has said. He used such expressions as this: "We should make a fatal error were we to underestimate the extent of the challenge free nations have to meet." I am speaking only as one member of this house about a situation which may destroy all the hopes of peace that are in the hearts of the people of Canada unless the present issue is faced clearly and the facts are recognized, not dodged, at this critical moment.

What I again urge should be considered by the government is that the Canadian government, whose hands are still free at a time when all these things have become known as they were not known on January 6 when the governments of Great Britain and India recognized the Mao regime, should take a lead in asking—and they can only ask—that a uniform pattern of strategy be established in the whole Pacific area. As was pointed out in these remarks, that strategy should take three forms. It should not relate alone to the political events. There are the economic aspects. There is also to be considered the question of military aid such as is being given in Europe. There should be an agreed strategy which will be known to the nations who are seeking to stop aggression as it will be known to those who are threatening the peace of the world. This subject transcends all others in importance today; because upon the course that is followed may well depend whether we have long years of peace or whether, once again, the whole world is plunged into war.

In my hand I have a map of Europe and Asia. It is not a comforting sight. The great bulk of the land mass of that vast continent, stretching from the Atlantic on the west to the Pacific on the east, is occupied by Russia or the satellite states. While we see that at the moment there is no threatened outbreak anywhere along that line which divides the east from the west, and which is so truly described as the iron curtain, we know that in the east, and particularly in southeast Asia, there is fighting, subversive activity and disturbance, that there is a complete picture of uncertainty and unrest which suggests that a point of stability has not yet been reached.

If we are to hope for stability throughout the world, every nation on the Atlantic and on the Pacific should study these facts and examine them, as has been suggested by Mr. Anthony Eden out of his long years of experience during both war and peace; and Canada, with its fresh and unprejudiced voice, should urge other nations to meet, whether they have recognized the Mao regime or not; and if they have, it imposes no limitation. Then a broad plan of strategy should be urged, to which our future conduct will conform.

On Friday night I was asked if what I had said was with the hope of peace. The answer is yes; but I repeat that if we are going to have peace we must remember the lessons of the past. We must decide right now that the way to preserve peace is not to appease an aggressor. In regard to this whole subject there is a complacency which has been emphasized by so many people in the past few weeks. There is vigorous action in Europe to preserve peace by economic support, by the supply of arms and by constant co-operation. There is just as great a need for similar co-operation in the Pacific if the peace of the world is to be preserved. With what we can see taking place almost before our eyes in this house, and what can be seen in similar parliaments, I think at this time there should be an urgent appeal to wake up before it is too late and act together to save the peace for which so many men and women have died.

Mr. M. J. Coldwell (Rosetown-Biggar): Mr. Speaker, my first word must be to say that we support the reference of these estimates, as proposed by the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Pearson), to the standing committee on external affairs. I believe that the house should be supplied with all available information that can be given to hon. members from time to time in order that we may understand, better than we have in the past, the external relations of this country and the international situation. I am glad indeed to note that there is a greater interest in external affairs in this parliament than in former parliaments. In the days before the last war we usually had a debate for half a day which was most often asked for by the former leader of the C.C.F., Mr. J. S. Woodsworth, and it usually petered out in a few hours. It is indeed good to see the house interested in this subject as evidenced by those who were here on Friday last, although I was absent myself, and again today.

I was hoping that the debate today might range over a rather wider field than the relationship between Canada and China. It has taken that course, however, and I propose to say something about the situation a little later. What I should like to say first of all is that too often in the past and even at the present time we have been inclined to discuss international affairs apart from certain economic realities. After all, I think we should have learned by this time that economic realities are responsible to a greater degree than possibly we have appreciated in the past for the political and other disturbances that arise internationally. In my remarks I do not intend to confine myself to one type of totalitarianism because in the past twenty-five years we have seen two types, that which is called soviet communism and that which is called fascism. The seeds of both have been implanted deeply in the world and are still there, and we cannot tell when fascism may appear again in opposition to communism.

For a good many years we have tried to drive home the fact that we must pay attention to the economic conditions all over the world, including those in our own country. It was out of the misery and oppression of the czarist regime that the present form of communism arose in Russia and spread across the world. It was out of the misery and poverty of the Italian people that Mussolini was able to organize the march on Rome and set up the fascist regime. It was equally out of the unemployment and misery of the German people that Hitler and his nazi party, to our sorrow, were able to rise and obtain power in that great country.

Today the threat of communism is serious because millions of people in the world are existing in the direst poverty, misery and want. In a dispatch, for example, from London, dated March 6, Lord Boyd Orr, the former director general of the United Nations food and agricultural organization—and incidentally the 1949 Nobel peace prize winner—is reported to have said:

> Hunger and not politics is responsible for the spread of communism in Asia.

May I point out that we have also been saying the same thing continually over the years. I recollect that in discussing the government's white paper on the war appropriation bill in April of 1945 I said:

> No financial agreement can be successful unless a solution is found for the distribution of the real wealth of the world, across the world, and for raising standards of living everywhere in the world. This world cannot remain at peace; this world cannot remain free, as we call free, if one-half of the world is underfed, underclothed, underhoused and, indeed, underprivileged in any respect.

We believe that. We have tried to bring this truth before the House of Commons and the country again and again. I believe it is because nations have failed throughout the years to meet this fundamental requirement of human existence that we are faced with the serious challenge of soviet communism all over the world today. We know that the acceptance of such communism by depressed peoples involves a surrender of something that we consider to be very precious indeed, freedom of speech, freedom of thought and freedom of worship, which are the very fundamentals of the kind of democracy in which we believe. We may discuss plans for military rearmament, and unfortunately we must; we may set aside vast appropriations for the building up of war supplies, for the making of atomic bombs and all the rest of it. But we shall not have met the challenge of totalitarian communist or fascist propaganda until we have improved the standards of life for millions of people all over the world. Under present circumstances and because of our past failures we have to play our part—and I am not complaining about it—among the democratic nations of the world in preparing to defend our free institutions and our democratic way of life if they are threatened by military aggression. But if we fail to play our part in the removal of poverty, misery and want in our own country and elsewhere we shall lose the battle in which we are now engaged. I think this is the fundamental position from which we should view Canada's international relations.

A great deal of discussion has taken place in the house today and on Friday last about the recognition of China. The article by Professor Lauterpacht, K.C., F.B.A., professor of international law at the university of Cambridge, which was published in the London Times, has been referred to on several occasions. What did he point out therein? He pointed out that the problem of recognition of governments is one of the crucial issues of international law. I think we all agree with that. He said that to decline to recognize a government is to withhold from the community which it governs most of the advantages of international law. It involves, among other things, a refusal to acknowledge the validity of its legislative and judicial acts; and the denial to it and its organs of the ordinary jurisdictional immunities. On the other side it involves the government refusing recognition in a series of difficulties since it is unable to use the ordinary international methods of protecting its own nationals and interests in territory controlled by the governments which it refuses to recognize.

And if I may quote directly, he says this:

> There are some who maintain that, all this notwithstanding, recognition is a purely discretionary act of policy—an act of grace which may be withheld at pleasure and may legitimately be used as a weapon of political intervention or of economic pressure. There is no support for any such view in the bulk of the practice of this—

That is, the United Kingdom.

> —and other countries. On the contrary, overwhelming authority points to the fact that, provided that the conditions presented by international law are fulfilled, there is a legal duty to recognize.

Then he goes on to discuss what are those fundamental conditions of international law. First of all he says that recognition is of course a declaration of an existing fact. Once a revolutionary government enjoys the obedience of the mass of the population and is in effective control of the bulk of the territory, it is entitled to recognition. Then he adds, and again I quote directly:

> Its revolutionary origin or the method of the revolutionary change is irrelevant.

Then, second, he says that recognition of a revolutionary government is prohibited so long as the lawful government has a reasonable prospect of reasserting its authority; and I do not think anyone will contend that at the present moment the former lawful or legal government of China has any possibility of regaining control over its territory. Then he goes on to say, thirdly:

> The government, by consent of the governed, is not a condition, though it was insisted upon in the early part of the present century. It was abandoned after the first world war and is not at present part of the law.

He also stated there was an impression that a lawful government holding out in one isolated fortress—perhaps I should have said this earlier—is entitled to continued recognition de jure; and went on to say that to hold this view was to strain to the breaking point an otherwise unimpeachable rule. Then he said that it was a question of fact, to be ascertained in good faith, whether the authority of the lawful government has become purely nominal; but it was the fourth point to which the leader of the opposition (Mr. Drew) drew attention on Friday evening, and I quote from page 460 of Hansard where he is reported as saying:

> I should like to read that fourth point again.
> "There is finally the question of the willingness to fulfil international obligations and of assurances to be given to that effect by the government recognition of which is under consideration."
> Even if the first three conditions were met, a question might well be asked as to whether the fourth condition can be met at the present time by the Mao regime in China.

Well, what does Professor Lauterpacht say? At the risk of reading a little more than I usually do I am going to quote the paragraph which refers to this fourth point. I think it is important, particularly since that point was under discussion, and since the other day I suggested that the time had come when we should recognize the new government of China. He says:

> There is, finally, the question of the willingness to fulfil international obligations and of assurances to be given to that effect by the government recognition of which is under consideration.

He goes on to say, and this is important:

> That particular test of recognition has been often resorted to, and has recently loomed large in the public discussion, including leading articles in The Times. But it is extremely doubtful whether it is a sound test and whether it forms part of international law. It was absent from British practice in the nineteenth century. It is a condition of recognition which has often been abused, in relation to weak governments, for the purpose of extracting unilateral advantages and concessions. In relation to the government of a large state its futility is obvious, for it is a clear rule of international law that a newly-recognized government is bound by the obligations of its predecessor and of international law generally.
> No special assurances are required. Neither can it be expected that the government of a great state will be induced to give them unless on a basis of mutuality and equality. The value of any such assurance, if not accompanied by good will, is insignificant. The proper course is to assume that the government of a sovereign state will fulfil its obligations in good faith. Failing that, it is open to other states to adopt such methods of persuasion as circumstances and international law permit.

There I think we have an explanation of the fourth point, to which reference has been made. Then he goes on to say something else I should like to quote:

The distinction must be asserted between recognizing a government and entering into diplomatic relations with it. No state is legally obliged to enter into and maintain diplomatic relations with a state or government which it recognizes. On the other hand, it cannot enter into full and normal diplomatic relations with a state or government which it does not recognize.

Recognition of a new governmental authority, accompanied as it must be by automatic withdrawal of recognition from its predecessor, necessitates an invidious decision which, in relation to old friends, may be distasteful and not free from anxiety. But decisions of this nature are unavoidable. They do not become easier by dint of being postponed.

Then he adds this:

It may be of importance, in the case now before His Majesty's government—

That is, recognition of China.

—to reassure public opinion that the decision at which they have arrived is not arbitrary or intended to minister to what may be a transient advantage, but that it is in accordance with principle and with the practice of enlightened nations, including that of our closest friend and ally.

The reference there is to something he said a little earlier in the same article in regard to the historical background of the United States with respect to the recognition of revolutionary governments. Apparently the London Times agreed with this view that China should be recognized because of the conditions laid down in this article, and because of the necessity. Indeed I have here a report which appeared in our local newspapers as an Associated Press dispatch dated London, January 7, the day after the British government granted recognition to the new Chinese government. These are the main points in the dispatch: The British press, in a chorus of approval, greeted Britain's recognition of the new government of China. All papers, including Labour and Conservative, gave approval. Lord Beaverbrook's Daily Express termed the recognition wise. The London Times said Britain was accepting a communist regime in China as she already had done in Russia, but would resist any attempt by the Chinese government to enforce communism on other countries.

Thus we see that in a country with long experience in international matters and the way these things are done in the field of international affairs, all the newspapers from the London Times through to the Daily Herald, the Labour paper, welcomed recognition and approved of it. Consequently I say that under international law, and in the interests of their own nationals, this recognition was granted.

This afternoon the leader of the opposition (Mr. Drew) referred to the article by Mr. Anthony Eden which appeared some ten or twelve days after recognition had been granted. But note this, for it is on the record: If one reads Mr. Eden's article, one finds that what he was criticizing was not the recognition of China as such, but the timing of that recognition. He was deploring the fact that all the commonwealth nations, indeed all the nations with interests in the Pacific, did not act together. As the leader of the opposition indicated when he read the article, and as the Secretary of State for External Affairs pointed out in his speech, Mr. Eden stated that recognition was inescapable. It had to come. The only criticism he made was of the timing of that recognition. Mr. Eden thought a common policy should have been agreed upon. I know that for a long time that had been the position of the British Conservative party. They had always thought that there should be an imperial foreign policy, which would be controlled from one central point. None of the commonwealth nations, at least in the last 25 or 30 years, have felt inclined to co-operate in sending representatives to one point, or in the setting up of any organization, which would bring about a common foreign policy of this description.

I am certain of this, that the people of Canada would not have wanted to have this parliament approve of the establishment of a super-cabinet to deal with foreign policy on an imperial basis. I feel that this is a relic of the old plea for an imperial foreign policy, an idea which, fortunately or unfortunately according to one's viewpoint, was discarded long ago. As a matter of fact, even if we liked the idea, it is not possible to put it into effect now, because our economic and geographical circumstances are so different. A policy that is suitable for the United Kingdom would not necessarily be suitable for Canada. Certainly, as we have seen, it would not be acceptable to the new republics of the commonwealth, India and Pakistan. In my opinion it is far better to have the type of commonwealth association we have, an association of free peoples and free governments, than it is to have something rigid, because in time it would break, and we would find ourselves with no real association at all.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): Would the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. Coldwell: Yes.

Mr. Macdonnell (Greenwood): Am I not right in understanding that what Mr. Eden meant when he spoke about common action and agreed strategy, was not merely a reference to the nations of the commonwealth but would include, among others, the United States?

Mr. Coldwell: Yes, but what I am saying is that probably it is again a reflection of the old concept of the British Conservative party. May I just say this, and I was going to add it because I have a reminder in my notes, that the proposal he made in January was wider than agreement among the commonwealth countries. I intended to point out that anyone who has been following the situation in the United States, the discussions in congress and Mr. Acheson's speeches over the last few months, is bound to come to the conclusion that the United States has no settled policy in relation to Far Eastern affairs. At one time it seemed as though they were going to send aid to the Chiang government in Formosa, in conformity with General MacArthur's advice. At another time, it was quite obvious that plan had been abandoned.

On January 12, I think it was, Mr. Acheson made a speech in Washington, in which he seemed to imply that the United States had to wait for the situation to become clear, and he emphasized the need of the people in southeastern Asia for economic aid in order to meet the threat of communism. Consequently, it only reinforces the point I was making that, however desirable a common policy might be in relation to Asia and the other external matters affecting all our countries, under the present circumstances it is quite impossible to agree upon a single policy. May I add that that is largely due to the uncertainty of United States policy, and the situation in the United States congress.

When we are discussing these matters, I believe we have to remember two factors mentioned by Mr. Acheson. In Asia, there is a revulsion against the poverty, misery and want under which the people have suffered for so long. Second, there is a revulsion also against foreign control. In so many countries of southeastern Asia, foreign control has been overthrown. It may be said that China has exchanged one sort of foreign control for another. Bear this in mind, however, that the control exercised over China by the Soviet union is a control of ideas rather than a control of its economic life, though indeed that may follow. The very fact that India was so anxious to recognize the new government of China was, in my opinion, an indication that India believed, and still believes, that the way to checkmate this attempted control by Russia is not to build a fence around China and refuse to have anything to do with the teeming millions in that country. What is true in the economic sense in southeastern Asia is true of Europe and the remainder of the world. At the moment communism in Europe is being contained because of the Marshall plan and the progress that has been made in economic and social relationships in the United Kingdom.

I tremble to think what would happen if there were a breakdown of the British economy, and that were followed by great social difficulties in that country. It would destroy the hope of the whole of the continent of Europe that progress can be made under democratic institutions and by democratic regimes. The danger in Europe, of course, is still the danger of economic collapse. May I say that such a collapse would inevitably follow the failure of Britain to recover, and to make the kind of progress she has been making over the last few years. We must always remember that Russian foreign policy, indeed all her policy, is based upon the assumption that sooner or later the economies of the non-communist countries will collapse, and out of that chaos communism will spread, ultimately controlling the whole world. It is because of this that, from time to time, we emphasize the need for economic aid, rather than vast military expenditures. I do caution, however, that I realize that, as long as we are threatened and are part of an alliance, which we all agree was absolutely necessary, the Atlantic alliance, we have to bear our part in the preparations that must be made for general defence.

There has been a great deal of talk about China, but one of the sets of conditions, if I may put it that way, which worry me a good deal, is the set of conditions to be found in Western Germany today. There are two million unemployed in Western Germany at the moment, and on the other side of the iron curtain there is a communist government sending out communist propaganda. We do not know exactly what is going on behind that iron curtain. But there is unemployment in Western Germany. In spite of the fact that the general output and the general exports of the rest of western Europe have increased and are something over what they were in 1939, German production is still low, about seventy-six per cent of her pre-war production. The goods that were expected to have been exported in order to gain the raw materials and food supplies that Western Germany needs are being used within Western Germany.

As a matter of fact for several years the United States particularly urged the return to a free market, to the elimination of rationing and of controls. Well Germany returned to that under the new government, and today the shop windows are full of goods that should be exported. The people of Germany who have the money can buy more, and we are told can live better than the people across the North sea in Britain where there is rationing, where there is control and where every attempt has been made to bring up the level of exports in order to obtain supplies of goods from abroad.

In Germany they have discontinued rationing; they have discontinued controls; they have gone back to the free market. The result is that German exports have failed, and two million are unemployed. People with money are eating and living well, while a large percentage of the population is in misery. There you have the seedbed for some form of totalitarianism. Consequently you see rising in Germany again the old nazi party under a new form. You see too an increase in the influence of communism. What is true in Western Germany is true in Italy, and to some degree also in France. Therefore I say we have to see to it that we give close attention to economic relationships, and assist those countries to build up their economies so that they can resist the spread of soviet communist or fascist control in those countries. I firmly believe that Canada's whole safety and whole defence is linked of course with the improvement in conditions in Asia, in Europe and indeed across the world.

I was going to say something once again about atomic power and the hydrogen bomb, that fearful weapon with which the world is threatened at the present time; but I do not think I will do so this afternoon, because another opportunity will arise in the near future. What I did want to do today was to try to put in focus in my own mind, and, if I could, place in focus before the house the international situation as I see it, and the desirability for the recognition of China as I see and understand it. We cannot forget of course that the Chinese people were on our side during the great struggle that ended in 1945. When we look back over the last hundred and ten years or so, since the British obtained possession of Hong Kong, and other nations obtained great concessions on the mainland of China, we cannot forget the record that we have. It is not a record that we can look back on with satisfaction. We have to try to obliterate the black spots in that record and do everything we can to help the people of China and the people of the other nations of southeast Asia, of India, of Pakistan, of Indonesia, of Indo-China and the other countries of Asia, to build up their economies, to improve their standards of living, and to aid them in every way we can, giving them as far as we are able assistance in the way of food and other supplies that they need for their economic life. If we can do that we shall have done far more to defend ourselves from aggression, to defend the world from the totalitarian regimes, than we can do by building up armies, navies and air forces to defend our territorial integrity.

Mr. J. H. Blackmore (Lethbridge): Mr. Speaker, we in this group support the minister's resolution to refer the estimates of his department to the committee on external affairs. That practice has been followed for some years past with considerable success.

[Mr. Coldwell.]

Before commencing what I was going to say I should like to refer to the quotation from Anthony Eden that was put on the record by the leader of the opposition (Mr. Drew). He noted that Eden had said that the great need of southeastern Asia was mainly economic. Now, everyone at all well-informed on earth knows that. Why it should be such an important thing for him to say it I cannot quite understand. How to give the needy help is the inescapable question. It is a question that must have an unequivocal answer, an answer conveying a practicable method, adequate and realistic. Such an answer, Mr. Speaker, has not been even hinted at by any of the political figures authorized to speak for any one of the western nations from the United States down. This conspicuous fact must fill every less fortunate nation and people with a feeling akin to dismay, even to despair.

I do not quite see, Mr. Speaker, why it is that responsible officials, from the Secretary of State for External Affairs, all through the Canadian government, and similar figures in the other governments, do not realize this. What is the matter with them? Are they afraid? Do they not dare come out and say what they think ought to be done and how it should be done? Are they restrained by some outside force from facing realities as they should be faced?

If I were in another nation, say France, I would find this indisposition to be frank, not facing the future and speaking about events as they are, as one of the great causes of the troubles with which we are faced.

Let us examine our national neighbourhood. We are discussing external affairs. What sort of people are we living among internationally? May we consider somewhat realistically some of the important neighbours whose actions must modify our own? This is the question to which I should like to devote what time I am permitted this afternoon in the house. First, let us look at the United States. "America's Needs and Resources," a very important and authentic publication of 1947, contains at page 675 a statement to this effect, that the capacity of United States agriculture will be more than equal to any conceivable requirement.

First may I say this concerning the United States. One impressive fact about the United States to me as just an ordinary Canadian and a member of parliament, as the United States occupies her place in the world's economy, is the tremendous productive potential or capacity of that country. I said the other night that I thought the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) went down to the United States and was impudent in his speech. Maybe I was a little too severe in what I said, but here are some of the considerations which led me to make that statement. It was impulsive; it was not planned, but it was based upon some facts which I shall now give.

In 1935 in the United States they were capable of producing enough goods and services, $135 billion worth of them, to give every family in that country $4,400 worth of goods and services a year. That was possible without in the slightest degree adding to their equipment. Those who desire to find authentication for that statement will find it in a first-class publication in our library called "The Chart of Plenty" by Dr. Harold Loeb, an unchallengeable authority. This book was published in 1936.

According to President Truman, in the United States in 1954 it is going to be physically possible for them to give to each family $5,000 worth of goods and services a year. That is not in money, but in goods and services. This condition is discussed in the Ottawa Citizen of January 6, 1950, page one.

This is No. 1: What conceivable use has a nation like that for some of our goods, except a few such as asbestos and other things they may need, to supplement their own tremendous resources and productive power?

Secondly, the United States is a great industrial nation, as well as a great primary producing nation. One of the major blunders, in my judgment, in the thinking of men around me is that people somehow or other, both in the United States and outside it, have the idea that the United States is going to be able to import goods, just as Great Britain was able to import goods when she was the great creditor nation of the world. There is as much difference between Great Britain, almost a have-not nation, and the United States which is almost completely self-sufficient, and becoming more so every day she exists, as there is between the poles.

Until we can think clearly enough to adjust this colossal error in our thinking, we shall never be able to approach a solution of the problem which confronts us, as that problem arises out of the facts concerning the United States.

Thirdly, as a consequence the United States has an enormous urge towards exporting.

Fourth, she has a strong resistance against importing. In a publication called "The Measure of a Nation" we find at page 3 that by 1960 the United States will be able to turn out six times as much per man-hour of work as she was able to turn out in 1850. At page 90 of this book we are told that in 1944 the United States harvested 10 per cent more acres and produced 20 per cent more crops and livestock products than she did in 1939, but with 17 per cent fewer workers.

Here is another source of serious error on the part of men who think about the United States. She is in an age of abundance in which she is likely to have unemployment, a shortage of purchasing power and a lack of home markets, which helps to explain her general attitude. It has been estimated that at the present time there are upwards of $4 billion worth of surplus agricultural products now in the hands of the United States government.

Fifth, the United States found it necessary to lend abroad through private investors on an extensive scale right after world war I. The productive capacity of that country has vastly increased since that time, and her self-sufficiency has been enhanced. She is going to be forced to engage in a policy of foreign lending, if she is going to be able to sell her goods abroad, on a far wider scale than that which she used after world war I.

May I read two short excerpts from an excellent booklet to which I have referred, and to which other members of my group have referred but to which, strangely enough, no one from any other group has ever referred, although from time to time they have been told about it. This is a publication called "The United States in the World Economy" which was issued as a United States government document in 1943. It bears directly upon post-war conditions. At page 5 we find this:

> During the four years from 1926 through 1929 the amount of dollars supplied ranged between $7,300 million and $7,500 million, and foreign incomes and spending habits and the international debt structure were fairly well adjusted to this level.

That indicates the extent to which the United States had found it necessary to go in her foreign lending by 1926. Then she discontinued that foreign lending policy and thereby brought on the calamitous depression. This quotation on the same page indicates the cause of the great depression:

> The abrupt fall in the dollar supply by some $5 billion, or 68 per cent, over the short space of three years, necessitated vast changes in the foreign use of dollars and in the economic systems from which the demand arose.

May I pause to comment at that point. The United States by withdrawing those $5 billion from the European countries and from other countries forced them to put up tariff barriers of all sorts to protect their economies, forced them for example to begin to raise wheat, no matter what it cost—as happened in France and Italy. Then the important United States officials had the incredible gall to blame those tariff restrictions in their campaign of 1945, at Bretton Woods conference and in other situations—to blame those tariff restrictions on a desire on the part of western Europeans to fight against the United States economy.

If there ever was fabricated and propagated a more colossal falsehood than that, I must say it has never come to my attention. Yet hon. members have risen in this House of Commons consistently and participated in that fantastic falsehood.

No. 6: The need to lend abroad is even greater now; but there is this difficulty, that today such loans cost the nation money. The United States, in order to advance those loans nationally, must either increase her tax structure or increase her debt, something which the people of the United States are not going to be disposed to do, and which they are going to resist with more and more determination as the days go by.

So that the device of foreign lending for the United States as a means of mitigating the discomfort she will feel because of her need to export is going to become decreasingly available to the United States government. That is a solemn fact, and cannot be disregarded by anyone who is careful in his estimate of the situation.

The question arises: So what? That is what we ought to be talking about in this House of Commons, instead of a lot of foolish froth about recognizing this, that and the other nation, fighting communism and all the rest of it, which, when all taken together, does not amount to a teaspoon of concentrate. That is the sum total of what we have listened to in two debates; it is just so much froth. It has no meaning at all, having regard to the real problem which faces the nation.

What are the trends in the United States? Does it look as though she is going to change her ways? In the first place she has become more self-sufficient through synthetic industries. To all people who come in contact with this statement, I recommend a fine article in the Reader's Digest of December, 1949. This article is called "No wonder the world is short of dollars" and is written by C. Lester Walker. He names a large number of essential commodities which the United States at one time was obliged to import, and which she no longer needs to import because she has discovered synthetic processes by the use of which she can produce these various commodities in her own land.

Cryolite is the first one named; it is used in the manufacture of aluminum. The United States imported from Greenland 11,000 tons in 1939; but the United States developed synthetic cryolite in world war II, and will manufacture 27,000 tons in 1950. The United States is therefore going to have cryolite to sell abroad. Greenland, a colony of Denmark, will send a mere few thousand pounds. What does that mean? That means that Denmark and Greenland at least will be denied access to United States dollars to the extent of the cryolite not exported.

Then as to rubber, which she used to buy from such countries as Malaya, for example, from which Canada used to buy hers mainly, I am informed. In 1940 the United States imported 1·8 billion pounds of rubber. In 1944 United States plants were turning out 2 billion pounds of synthetic rubber. Where did the United States dollars go for those countries that used to supply that rubber? They evaporated. Can they ever be brought back? Of course they cannot. Does anyone pretend that the United States would be so egregiously stupid as to begin to buy her rubber abroad and to discontinue her manufacture of synthetic rubber? Do you think that we would do that? Would we dismantle the Sarnia rubber plant? Not a member of this house would vote for such nonsensical behaviour. Well, so many United States dollars are gone!

Then as to mica. In 1939 the United States imported from India 95 per cent of what she used. But the United States armies captured from the Germans the process for making synthetic mica; and so good-bye to the mica source of United States dollars and India's share therein, with all the possibilities of Britain's trading goods to India for United States dollars which she got for India mica, thus rendering moneys convertible.

Then as to camphor. Before 1933 the United States imported camphor from Formosa. Since 1933 the United States has come to produce more camphor than she can use, so she has camphor for sale on the world market. Probably she will send it in to Formosa and compete with Formosa's camphor. Who knows?

Those four commodities are merely examples of what has been going on in the United States economy during the last thirty years. At page 36 of the Reader's Digest Mr. Walker states:

> That country has now developed an almost fantastic economic self-sufficiency. No other people in history has anywhere near equalled it. The United States, always rich in many basic materials like coal and iron, has become almost literally the Colossus of Everything.

May I just say this, Mr. Speaker. As we sit here in the House of Commons, if the people of the country could just look down now upon our Conservative friends, the very men who should be well informed on this matter, and see how few of them are here, and how almost none of them are paying any attention to this vital point, I think they would be impressed.

Mr. Pouliot: The hon. member's speech is most interesting.

Mr. Blackmore: It faces actual facts; it has meat; it contains the things that must be met, and that is all.

Optical glass used to come from England, France and Germany thirty-five years ago. By world war II the United States used $12,500,000 worth annually. She bought abroad only $2 million worth. That shows how fast she has grown with respect to optical glass. Now the United States produces any and all types, so good-bye to another source of United States dollars for England, France and Germany.

Then as to cigarette papers; the United States used to get them from France. She used to buy $10 million worth of them annually. Now she produces all she needs from flax fibre, and good-bye to some more United States dollars for France.

If I may, I should like to stop and say just a word or two to my Conservative friends. I hope we do not hear any more of them talk aimlessly about convertibility until they realize that convertibility is absolutely impossible unless goods are traded back and forward so that convertibility would be justified; and that is just exactly the situation that does not exist in the world. There is not the necessary interchange of goods and there cannot be. When we face these things, we shall stop talking in this house about vapour.

Silk used to be obtained from Japan. The United States used to get 80 million to 90 million pounds annually. The United States now produces nylon, from coal, air and water of which she has a superabundance, to the extent of half a billion dollars worth a year.

The United States used to buy soya beans from Manchuria; now she produces 200 million bushels a year. The United States used to buy figs from Turkey and Greece. Now she produces over 60 million pounds of figs annually.

Mr. Pouliot: They are pretty smart, those Americans.

Mr. Blackmore: That is right. Not only are they smart but they have the resources; and above all they have sense enough to protect their own industries so that their industries can develop. They do not do as we did with our celery producers this year. We had celery producers in Ontario who produced a great deal of celery and who went to the expense of putting it in cold storage. Then we brought in a great deal of celery from the United States, causing our producers to lose the whole thing. If you can imagine a finer example of just exactly how not to run a country, I should be glad to have you call me up and tell me about it; I am interested in monstrosities. But the United States had sense enough not to do that; hence she has grown.

The United States used to get their dates from North Africa and the Middle East. Now the United States produces more than 20 million pounds of them annually. She used to get chicle from Mexico and Guatemala. Now she produces it synthetically. She used to get tungsten from China and Bolivia; now she uses molybdenum in large measure. She used to get shellac from India. Now she makes shellac from synthetic resins or she displaces it by substances which she draws from corn gluten. She used to get jute from India. Now she makes burlap bags from tough, long-fibre spruce kraft paper.

There is an indefinite list of items in addition to those I have mentioned, including Christmas tree ornaments she used to get from Germany and Czechoslovakia, which she now produces. She used to get pig bristles for brushes from China. Now she uses nylon bristles. She used to get dried pyrethrum flowers, for use in insecticides, from Japan and Africa. Now she has synthetic, American-made chemicals. Indeed, economists estimate that the United States produces 94 per cent of its needs. Economists predict that the United States will soon be producing one-third of the world's goods, with only a small percentage of the world's population: it is something like one-sixteenth or thereabouts; I have forgotten the exact figure.

These are weighty facts. Will the United States import much in the future? In the article in the Reader's Digest, the writer is whistling in order to keep up his courage. Mr. Walker talks about the few things which the United States will have to import such as critical minerals for the military stockpile, bauxite for aluminum, platinum, tin, chromite, cobalt, manganese, a few foods like tea, coffee, and bananas, and French perfumes, laces, champagnes, and china. Then there will be the "invisible" imports which will result from shipping space in foreign vessels which the United States will hire—and she is getting rid of them as fast as she can—and dollars spent by United States tourists. All things being considered, I am afraid Mr. C. Lester Walker is rather optimistic when he finds some comfort in that aspect of the whole question. He presumes, too, that the United States is not going to make any more discoveries about how to make synthetic substances.

There is one important thing to bear in mind in considering this situation of the bringing in of these substances and raw materials from other nations. When other nations export their minerals such as aluminum they deplete their own resources. No nation can continue indefinitely to export its vital minerals and deplete its resources for coming generations. To what extent then can we balance our economy with the United States or other nations by sending to the United States these vital minerals which our own children are going to need? Furthermore, when a country exports its primary products, as we do when we export cattle or barley, what we actually do is to send raw materials with which the United States can manufacture goods and probably sell them back to us, making money in the process. Any nation that engages in the wholesale selling of primary products and the buying of manufactured products from abroad soon makes itself a hewer of wood and drawer of water. We have an example of that within Canada. The four western provinces have been obliged to send their raw materials, their primary products, to markets in the two central provinces to be manufactured, and what has happened? The four western provinces have become hewers of wood and drawers of water for the two central provinces of Canada, and that is exactly where they will stay until they industrialize.

Another aspect of the whole question is that not only do the United States tend to self-sufficiency but they tend to be determined first of all to distribute through foreign trade. President Roosevelt said in a great speech over the radio in October, 1944, that he intended to find jobs for sixty million Americans by trebling exports abroad. They are determined to send more and more exports abroad. What for? To bring money into the United States to buy their own goods. That is exactly the policy that Canada tries to follow, but it just does not work, and besides that it tends to destroy other nations.

In addition to that, the United States people, just the same as the Canadian people, have a fanatical attitude towards money. The Secretary of State for External Affairs and the leader of the opposition no doubt have the same attitude. They are completely fanatical about money. They will not even give consideration to the idea of creating money debt-free and using it for the benefit of their nation. They will not give a minute's thought to it, no matter how scientific it may be. The result is they abuse the minds of the people all over the country in this regard, and consequently there is apparently no hope in the world for the bringing in of that reform at least for a long time. The United States is not going to adopt the only method which she could adopt to solve her problem under the circumstances, namely, the distribution of purchasing power by social credit within the nation to buy the goods which she can produce, thus raising the standard of living of the whole nation and finding markets at home. She will not adopt that course. She shows no indication of intending to do so. There is not much hope of relief in that direction.

The United States also tends to a policy of non-discrimination, which means unconditionally the most-favoured-nation policy of the United States which was introduced in 1922, as a result of the application of which she forced world war II, and particularly forced the Japanese into war. That statement can be completely documented, and before anyone questions it I suggest that he had better write to me and get the documentation, because it is on record. The unconditional most-favoured-nation clause in the hands of the United States has caused more trouble in the world in the last thirty years than any other one thing that you can name, and she is not giving it up. Then we have our Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott) coming into the House of Commons and telling us that he believes in non-discrimination which just renders it utterly impossible for have-not nations and weaker nations to live.

For example, let us see how it worked out in Great Britain. She came to the United States to borrow money after the close of world war II because they cut her right off lend-lease, and the United States in the course of the years during which Great Britain was spending that loan forced Britain to buy a lot of useless Yankee books instead of important things like the cotton that Great Britain wanted to buy. They forced the British people to buy a lot of tobacco from the United States when they could have just as well purchased their tobacco from Rhodesia and paid for it in their own goods. That is non-discrimination running wild. That is exactly what is in the minds of the United States officials. It means a lot to us in our external policy.

Furthermore, the United States tends towards an expansionist policy. They are not quite satisfied with the great big share of the world they have. They want to get still more and more, and monopolize markets in various parts of the world to the exclusion of other nations which absolutely must trade in order to get the things they need. What does that mean? There was a good example of it just recently in the newspapers. We are told that just recently France has had to adopt protective measures to protect her wine against Yankee Coca Cola. That shows how the United States is actuated by an expansionist policy in this matter.

Another very important consideration is the fact that the United States is unlikely to change this policy and to become informed. One of the difficulties in the way of a change of heart in the United States is the fact that there are a lot of politicians down there as there are in Canada who, when they go out on the hustings, are not concerned at all about telling people the truth. All they are concerned about is to get back into office. Therefore they misrepresent, distort and suppress the truth right and left, and the result is that people become more and more confused. All you have to do is listen to the speakers in a United States election campaign, and the nonsense they talk, in order to be impressed with that solemn fact.

In addition, the United States naturally fears unemployment, debt, taxation, insecurity of supply, shortage of purchasing power and a consequent lack of markets within her own borders, and poverty among her people, which obtains there in a very large degree. These considerations naturally make the United States tend to hold to the policies which she has embraced up to the present time.

United States reactions and attitudes are based upon sound reasons arising from solid actualities facing her under her present financial and capitalistic system. If she were to change her financial system, if she were to adopt Social Credit, she would realize that she could distribute her goods within her own country without adding to her debt, and she would change her whole impact on the world.

Having said so much about our great neighbour, let us now take a glance at some of the other nations, and especially the problems of the have-not nations. Let us take Japan as an example. I was a little unhappy when the Secretary of State for External Affairs told us, as I recall it, that trade unions had been organized in Japan, and they had done various other things that were going to force up the cost of Japanese goods so that the Japanese will not be able to compete successfully with our goods. I do not want them to compete with our goods, but will someone who thinks he knows tell us how in the world the Japanese are going to be able to sell enough of their goods to secure the things their country needs if their prices are forced up automatically in that fashion? There are seventy-seven million people in Japan in a constricted area and with very meagre resources. How are they going to live? If we want a real problem in external affairs let us just work on that one for a while. Japan tried to reduce her costs by various means, and according to information I have, as an example of what she did, in 1935 she built a bicycle that Canada could have purchased from Japan for $5.75 when Canadians were producing and selling a similar bicycle for $50. That is what the Japanese were prepared to do in order to live in this world and get the goods they needed. I think that if we had been in the position the Japanese were in we would have been thinking of something like Pearl Harbor too, don't you?

Now I turn to France, another type of nation, which may be said to be typical of Spain, Germany, Holland and a number of other countries. What happened to France? Well, according to the Christian Science Monitor of February 20, 1950, the French are quite uncertain in regard to their industry. In 1949 they produced 26½ per cent more steel than in 1948, an output of 9,000,000 tons, while also producing 6,000,000 tons more of coal in 1949 than in 1948. But they produced that coal with 187,000 workers, whereas in 1948 they required 217,000. What does that mean? It means that great numbers of the people who produced coal were turned out of work and consequently had no buying power in 1949. What were they to do about those people? If you are looking for the causes of communism, there is one. We think that is all right. Well, it may be all right, but it causes a great deal of trouble. France also increased its hydroelectric production far beyond that of 1938.

Now it seems that French industrialists are facing the necessity of competing in foreign markets; and with whom? With the United States, for example; with Great Britain, for example, in markets where already there is more of their kinds of goods than are needed. A large section of the French people have only enough money to pay for rent and food. France faces the danger of overproduction. What are they to do about it? They are faced with the same problem the United States is faced with.

According to the Christian Science Monitor of February 27, 1950, the Marshall plan is imperilled by the flow of foreign goods to the United States. Congressmen are now objecting to foreign goods, and are insisting that countries getting Marshall aid be required to buy United States goods. Senator Tom Connally is even said to be urging that European countries buy United States oil with Marshall plan money instead of Near East oil. Henry Cabot Lodge, junior, is asking why Britain should be permitted to send certain textiles to the United States when many New England textile mills are likely to be closed, with resulting unemployment. According to the same newspaper a leading British electrical manufacturer outbid his nearest United States competitor by $250,000 on equipment for a Seattle power plant, yet the British bid was rejected. Still we have men, including our Minister of Finance prattling away about how Britain should lower her costs and prices in order to compete in the United States market!

Well, what does it amount to? In the same newspaper there was a story about the United Nations building being constructed in New York city at a cost of $65 million, which was appropriated by that organization. Sixty per cent of that money comes from overseas; and congress, feeling that the necessary goods should be permitted to enter the United States because of that fact, waived all import duties in connection with that building. But what has happened? Contracts to the value of $42 million have been let already, and not a cent is going to anyone outside the United States. Is that the way the United States is going to co-operate? A committee of experts recommended a British synthetic insulating material for the building. That recommendation was rejected because of fear that the New York unions would refuse to handle it. That just goes to show how deep-seated these problems are. When bids were asked for facing material the British Bath and Portland Stone Company had the low bid, but Vermont marble was accepted, apparently for similar reasons. Some contracts have been awarded even without bids. The construction of the United Nations building is in the hands of a New York firm, Harrison and Abramovitz. Foreign bidders are still making the lowest bids, but they are getting no contracts. Let us face those facts in relation to the possibility of getting the United States to change her policy toward us.

Now I come to the question of communism, but I do not think I will say anything about it at the present time. We need only see what Russia is doing with the communist government in China to realize how the communists are setting about to win the sympathy and confidence of the peoples of the world; whether rightly or wrongly, I do not know. However, there is the cause; and if you want to fight communism you can fight it there.

Now, what needs to be done? I say there are three things which must be done if we are to solve our problems. In the first place we must have a scientific distribution system here at home, that is in Canada and the United States, corresponding to the social credit system. Then we must have a real, scientific distribution system abroad which would involve the exchange of ICCH goods to be paid for with debt-free money, so it would not involve an increase in the taxation or debt of the contributing nation. We simply must have debt-free money created if we are to do these things.

The next thing we must work for is national self-sufficiency. I know many people in this house have held out against that idea; but what did we do during the war? We produced our own rubber. Well, if we have right good judgment, I say that in the next war we will produce our own sugar and other commodities, much as the United States has done.

That country is going to be nationally self-sufficient, and is forcing that policy upon us. She has already forced it upon Britain, as the hon. member for Selkirk (Mr. Bryce) showed last night.

Then Canada must stimulate production, and we must have the optimum internal distribution on principles similar to those of social credit.

We must be ready to bear our full share of responsibility for assisting the less fortunate peoples, and must finance our contributions not with tax money or borrowed money but under a system which in due time will eliminate debt and taxation. We simply must adopt a realistic financial system, making financially possible that which is physically possible.

That, Mr. Speaker, is my contribution to this discussion of the vexed problems of external affairs.

Mr. Jean François Pouliot (Temiscouata): Mr. Speaker, I have listened with great attention to the remarks of the hon. member for Lethbridge (Mr. Blackmore), and I am in some embarrassment as to his conclusion. In the first place he read a lengthy article from the Reader's Digest to the effect that the United States had become self-supporting in many fields in which they were not so before the war. His conclusion, in that part of his speech, was that the policy of the United States was wrong; and it was my intention to send copies of his speech to President Truman and Mr. Dean Acheson.

Mr. Blackmore: You could not do anything better. I will supply the copies.

Mr. Pouliot: Now I shall send only that part of the hon. gentleman's speech, because if I sent his whole speech they would be just as embarrassed as I am; they would wonder at his other conclusion, that Canada also should be self-supporting. In the first place he said the United States made the blunder of becoming self-supporting.

Mr. Blackmore: No, I did not say that.

Mr. Pouliot: That was the inference I took.

Mr. Blackmore: Oh, no.

Mr. Pouliot: Their blunder was in discouraging international trade by producing at home some goods they previously got from other countries. That is what the hon. gentleman said.

Mr. Blackmore: I am sure the hon. gentleman does not wish to misrepresent me. I was not criticizing the United States for becoming self-sufficient; I was simply setting out the fact that this is what has happened. That is the bare fact facing us.

Mr. Pouliot: The hon. gentleman looked very indignant when he made those statements, from which I took it that he was dissatisfied with that policy. Afterwards, he recommended that Canada should be self-supporting. He was right in the second conclusion, but it prevents me from sending his speech to Mr. Truman and Mr. Acheson.

Mr. Blackmore: I shall have to do it myself.

Mr. Pouliot: Yes, the hon. gentleman will put them to some embarrassment.

Mr. Blackmore: They need embarrassing.

Mr. Pouliot: They will not know what the hon. member's conclusion was. I want him to tell us whether he believes it is a good policy for the United States to be self-supporting, and whether it would be a good policy for Canada to be self-supporting.

Mr. Blackmore: Yes, I believe in both of those.

Mr. Pouliot: I am very glad to hear that. Then, I shall send the speech, and I shall refer to the page on which this correction has been made.

Mr. Blackmore: It needs no correction. It is all there when you read it.

Mr. Pouliot: It is all there, but I did not know what my hon. friend meant.

Mr. Blackmore: The hon. member must have gone out of the chamber when I said that.

Mr. Pouliot: I was here all the time, and I listened with great attention. The hon. member has quite a voice, and I missed nothing of what he said. It was because of that that I was puzzled by what he said. It might have been the opinion of the Digest and not his own. His opinion, therefore, must be that Canada should be self-supporting, and, to a large extent, Canada is now self-supporting. Industry has made great progress. In passing through Toronto yesterday, I saw the new industries that have grown up on the west side of Toronto. I suggest the hon. gentleman should see them, and ascertain what happened in Toronto as well as many other places in Canada.

Mr. Blackmore: I am happy to hear it.

Mr. Pouliot: I am glad the hon. member is happy to hear that. What has happened is due, in large part, to the encouragement this government has given business. It has tried to see that Canadian business prospered. The policy of the government in that field is sound.

Mr. Blackmore: That is right.

Mr. Pouliot: I am glad to hear the hon. gentleman say so, and I congratulate him on being so broadminded, if not always logical.

There is one thing for which I want to praise the hon. gentleman, and that is for citing facts. I have no objection to the citation of facts. We must base our arguments on facts. I cannot understand, however, the citation of other people's opinions. An opinion is merely an opinion, whether it be that of a professor with a strange name who is teaching international law at Columbia or Mr. Eden. Perhaps the hon. member for Lethbridge (Mr. Blackmore) knows that the first and most important author on international law, I do not mean private international law but public international law, was an old man who died a long time ago named Grotius. He published a book in Paris in 1625 about the right of war and peace. It was entitled "De Jure Belli et Pacis".

Mr. Low: What does it mean?

Mr. Pouliot: It means, the right of war and peace. At the time, the French language was the recognized international language. This book was also called, "Les Droits des Gens",—the rights of the peoples. I have been told it is an interesting book, but I have never read it. I know that all the treatises and textbooks that have been published on international law since that time were merely explanations and commentaries and the fundamentals were the same as those contained in that book. If there are new principles of international law, therefore, and my hon. friend knows that there are, they must come from agreements amongst nations. They are based on the fundamentals established by Grotius more than three centuries ago.

I am not ready to agree with the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Pearson), when he says that the nations are not bound by what is said in the United Nations assembly, or in the security council. I was surprised when some hon. gentlemen applauded that statement. Naturally, all that is said in those meetings is subject to approval by the various parliaments. According to any strict interpretation, these statements may not be binding, but on the other hand they enunciate principles of international law. We will find most of those principles already enunciated by Grotius, who is the acknowledged authority on the matter.

Alberta Natural Gas Company

Turning again to what I said before, the member for Lethbridge has been wiser than the leader of the opposition (Mr. Drew)—

Mr. Blackmore: I hope so.

Mr. Pouliot: —in that he has mentioned facts. The United States is producing more mica and more jute. Instead of importing rubber, they are making so much synthetic rubber. These are facts. The leader of the opposition gave us the opinion of Mr. Eden, delivered in a pre-election speech. What was that? Mr. Eden was just boosting his chances, and the chances of his party, in opposing the policy of the Attlee government which had just recognized China. It is worth little to quote the opinion of an expert, unless we know the circumstances in which that opinion was delivered.

Mr. Blackmore: That is right.

Mr. Pouliot: The circumstances are important. This was an important occasion for Mr. Eden, who probably wanted to again become the foreign secretary of the United Kingdom. His opinion was delivered during the election campaign, when he intended to censure the government for what it had done.

Now, there is an illustrious professor with a peculiar name who has been mentioned. His name is Lauterpacht. He may be a brilliant man, but he is not as great a man as Grotius.

At six o'clock the house took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

PRIVATE BILLS

ALBERTA NATURAL GAS COMPANY

The house resumed, from Tuesday, February 28, consideration of the motion of Mr. Maybank for the second reading of Bill No. 7, to incorporate Alberta Natural Gas Company.

Mr. A. L. Smith (Calgary West): Mr. Speaker, I heard some rather imposing sentences expressed, but having the floor I still think I should give further reasons for favouring one sentiment which was expressed rather than another, and which happened to come from close to me on my right-hand side.

When I adjourned the debate on this matter a week ago tonight I had discussed the uses which might be made of natural gas. In the interval something has happened, sir, which I feel compelled to bring to your attention. If the paper which I hold in my hand is to be believed I am now a very rich man.

[Mr. Pouliot.]

I hold in my hand the Calgary Herald of March 3, and I shall read from a dispatch from Edmonton. The first paragraph reads:

Arthur Wray (Ind. S.C.)—

I will explain that in a moment.

—Banff-Cochrane, started a hubbub in the legislature Thursday afternoon, when he quoted a "man in Calgary" as having told him $200,000 in bribes has been paid out by the Westcoast Transmission Company to pave the way for its franchise.

Reading the article further down I find that the names mentioned are those of my brother and myself. It says that my brother, who is the solicitor and counsel for the board in Alberta, which deals with the export of natural gas, had stopped this gentleman from answering questions before the board which was sitting, and which I shall discuss later. Then he went on to say that this fellow, C. E. Smith, was a brother of A. L. Smith who had conducted the filibuster against this particular bill in the House of Commons. I confess that this bad man is my brother. He is one of His Majesty's counsel, one of the ablest lawyers I know—and sir, that is a plug for my firm; we are not doing so well these days since I left there, but that is what the man says. Well, I have not got the $200,000 yet. My only suggestion is that I should adopt the method of the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) who, when he was asked about the sale of butter yesterday, gave one of those lucid and clear answers. He said that he would sell it if, as and when he could. Therefore I am going to make an assignment of my $200,000 to this Mr. Wray if, as and when I get it. I think that should satisfy him. On the other hand, sir, I am inclined to think that he should pay for the trouble and the legal fees incurred in making the assignment because although I have not got any money, and I have no hope of getting any, I do not want to be out of pocket on the $200,000 deal that I am supposed to have now.

I admit, sir, with great frankness that I have never seen $200,000, although if I stay in this house long enough, a matter of thirty or forty years, and I get the $6,000 with which we are honoured here, and I do not eat anything in the meantime and I do not pay for a house to live in, at the end of those thirty-five or forty years I may get close to the $200,000. Of course I realize I am making some assumptions there which perhaps I am not entitled to make, because if I lived that long I would be one hundred years old. In the second place, I will probably be licked at the next election that takes place in the community from which I come.

I want to pay a compliment to the hon. member for Fraser Valley (Mr. Cruickshank). He crossed the floor yesterday and came to see me. He told me that the dispatch to which I referred had also appeared in a Vancouver paper. The compliment I wish to pay him is this, and I assure you, sir, it is true. With his innate modesty, and his studied generosity, he did not ask me for quite all of it. Therefore I pay him that compliment.

Strange as it may seem, through circumstances over which I have no control, this vile thing may possibly come to a vote in this House of Commons. Therefore I want to state—and I hope for the last time—why I think this bill should be defeated. This is one time when all hon. members from Alberta and British Columbia should tell us why, for example, we have had no one from the province of British Columbia on the government side, with the exception of the hon. member for Fraser Valley, adopting a position which must be to the benefit of both those western provinces. They could do it in a moment or two. In case this may be my last effort I want to explain to you, sir, and to the house, why I take this position, and why I think anyone taking any other position owes to you and to this house an explanation of that position.

When I opened a week ago I said I hoped I would not be repetitive in what I shall say on this matter. Therefore I shall try to confine myself to developments since last I spoke in this House of Commons on this same matter. I say that because the bill we have before us now is exactly the same bill with which we dealt last year, although the incorporators are different. I notice that in the meantime they have been joined by Mr. Austin Taylor and Mr. H. R. MacMillan of Vancouver, perhaps the two wealthiest men out there. There are only four. I wonder why the promoters did not get my old friends Tammy Hamber and Ronnie Graham into the picture too, because I think the four of them own almost everything that is loose in those western provinces of ours. I have no doubt that that was done in order to give a little Canadian colour to this vicious steal which is attempted to be perpetrated upon the people of western Canada.

I am indebted to the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre (Mr. Maybank) for his frankness—and I do not limit that to this occasion alone for, in my short experience, he has always been frank in this so-called deliberative assembly. I use the word "deliberative" because it implies that members of the House of Commons hear certain facts and from those draw certain conclusions. On the conclusions they have drawn they then vote.

There are many funny fables published in this world, but the one I have just given I think takes first place. My name is not Aesop, but his fables were much simpler than mine and were absorbed only by gullible people. Here of course there are no gullible people. We all form our judgment on the facts as they are presented to us. With his usual frankness the hon. member for Winnipeg South Centre, when I asked him where this line was going, said he did not know.

Mr. Maybank: That is right.

Mr. Smith (Calgary West): And for the second time he has confirmed it—which simplifies the problem with which members of the House of Commons are dealing. It is not a government measure, and I emphasize that, but rather a private bill.

Since we were here last we have heard much about certain steps which must be taken to export gas from Alberta to Vancouver over various routes, one Canadian and one 80 per cent American. Since that time the gas and oil conservation board in Alberta has been sitting. They adjourned a couple of weeks ago until April 3, the reason being that under our act all the members of the legislature must be notified of a sitting of the board in order that they may attend. However, the legislature having been called together in the meantime, these gentlemen could not attend, so that the adjournment was made until such time as it was presumed the legislature would cease to sit in that province.

Many things happened there. Let me say first that the progenitors, if I may so describe them, of the present bill were there at all times. They are very charming people. I met them socially on occasions, and found their habits were very much the same as mine. We got along rather well together. Mr. Dixon was there, who I believe is the deus ex machina, and Mr. Logan, a New York lawyer for whose ability I formed a very high opinion. They were represented by a Canadian lawyer, Mr. H. G. Nolan, who has many letters after his name and is well known to this government, having rendered great service here in Ottawa throughout the period of the war as adjutant-general to our forces.

So that these poor boys were not little lads away from home who were being run on by these rough Canadians, or anything of that nature. They were there and heard what I heard—and a great deal more, because I attended only occasionally. I visited the west coast and was snowed in for eight days in that evergreen playground of Canada. I simply could not get out because there was no way of getting out. The hon. member for Nanaimo (Mr. Pearkes) points out to me that I could not get to the island. The reason is that the snow storms were so heavy and the winds so high that nobody got to the island. As a matter of fact, most of them were blown off it.

If I may be permitted a slight deviation from our regular procedure I would point out that I heard my good friend from Kenora-Rainy River (Mr. Benidickson) say that he represented a company that would build a line in Canada if someone told them to. That is outside my comprehension, when someone wants to build a gas line, knowing it is going from here to there, which is more than the bills themselves say, and that they will build it at a certain place if the transport board tells them to. I have had a good deal to do with railway boards, and I have always found that I am asking for something. I am not asking for general powers which include expropriation of your lands and mine without telling whose lands I am going to expropriate, and in what direction, and all that sort of thing, which knowledge is completely lacking in this particular case.

The argument has been used by these New York slickers that we have got to take this through the United States, because we cannot take it through Canada. I listened out there to a number of gentlemen who belong to the firm of Ford, Bacon and Davis, the biggest engineering firm in the world. They simply said it could be done. But I was more impressed by an engineer of our own, a retired chief engineer of the board of transport commissioners, whose name at the moment escapes me. He knew the country well, had been over the ground and felt that any suggestion that this gas line has to be built across American soil is not only nonsense but completely insulting to those of us who live in the interior of British Columbia or the northern part of Alberta.

There I saw plans presented, and prepared on a basis of one-tenth of a mile. Those who have had some experience with surveys of large areas, or great distances being traversed, will find no more careful examination of terrain than on a scale of one-tenth of a mile. That is the sworn and uncontradicted testimony which was given at that time.

Then we have heard a good deal of nonsense about the length of the line, and the cost. May I say at the outset that I am not particularly concerned how much the people of Seattle, Portland, Spokane, Tacoma or Bellingham pay for gas. If they can use it cheaper than any other fuel, they will use it. But I point out this suggestion, that this mid-British Columbia line—because that is what it is—this Canadian line, means this, that anybody who is going to transport gas in quantities from Alberta to the United States market and to the Vancouver market must have regard to the real picture which exists. As you no doubt have read, Mr. Speaker, all recent discoveries of gas are in northern Alberta. I would ask hon. members to picture in their minds this situation: a tremendous gas field near Pincher Creek, which is practically on the United States border, not much gas in the Calgary area, and then these immense quantities in trillions of feet which have been proven around Edmonton and north. All that must be integrated. It must be one great pool upon which this export business must be able to draw.

If you just look at any map, and take a line from Pincher Creek up above and even into the Peace river district of British Columbia and into the constituency of the hon. member for Cariboo (Mr. Murray) where the gas arises, when you are talking about the length of a pipe line, it will be seen that it all depends on where you are going to tap that pool. I say this in a sense in opposition to my argument. If you are going to use in Vancouver gas which is produced in Alberta, you do not know whether that gas is coming from Pincher Creek or from four or five hundred miles north, which carries you perhaps 150 miles or so north of Edmonton. Hence these arguments about the length of pipe lines lose practically all their validity.

I am going to say something else along that line which I think favours the all-Canadian route, and it is this. One thing will be noticed about all of these bills. May I pause here to say that when we passed one of them at the first session in 1949, and I think it was a mistake, we made no proper examination of it. That is the company which today is applying to the conservation board of Alberta for the right to build a line, and that line goes over the Yellowhead, down the north Thompson into Kamloops, down the Okanagan covering Penticton and those three cities there; it goes across to Princeton and then down the Princeton-Hope highway which is already constructed into Vancouver.

I would ask you to remember this, Mr. Speaker. I am speaking now of oil, and these bills permit both oil and gas lines. Vancouver and the west coast of British Columbia, and to some extent into the interior of British Columbia, are getting their crude oil from California. It is a notorious fact that the California production is fast reaching its end. Hence we in Alberta have a real hope that we may some day supply the west coast of Canada with crude oil which will be refined there and sold as gasoline in that province.

Edmonton being the centre of oil production, and I hope some of my friends from northern Alberta will at least admit the truth of that statement, an oil line over the Yellowhead, down the north Thompson to Kamloops, south to Princeton along the Princeton-Hope highway, is 325 miles shorter than any other route which could be taken for oil by taking it away down through Calgary, through Pincher Creek, crossing at Kingsgate and so on. You want oil as close to the refinery as you can get it. The distance is 325 miles shorter by the northern route than it is by the southern route.

I want to say this because I am a little bit disappointed in my Social Credit friends from Alberta. Their premier says there are three classes of consumers. He says first there are Albertans, and I agree with him; and that we must have proven reserves for fifty years, having regard to increase in population and all these other factors. Second, he says the oil shall be used by Canadians. These are public statements that no one can deny. Third, he says if we have gas for export, we go ahead and export it.

I pause here to ask this simple question. If this company whose bill is before us now intend to use a Canadian route, why do they not say so? This is the time to say so. This business of passing the buck to the Alberta government, to the transport board or to the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe) is a lot of arrant nonsense. We members are sitting here in this deliberative assembly. In this bill we are going to decide one thing: Do we want an all-Canadian route or do we not? That is all there is to be decided at the present moment. Last year I said again and again—and I am sure that some hon. members may think I had too many "again and agains"—that if a five-word amendment were made in this bill to the effect that the line be built on Canadian soil between Alberta and Vancouver, I would withdraw every opposition, that I would welcome it. I made that plain. I do so again now. Could any proposition be fairer than that?

The answer of course is plain. While the sponsor of the bill, with his great honesty and frankness, told us he did not know where it was going, I know their one intention is to take the line out of the south end of our province, through Kingsgate, Spokane and so on, leaving Vancouver on the end of a little stub line. They have their plans so prepared. There is not any question about it. I will say that outside if there is any question of liability. I know where it is going. It is going out the south end to serve the United States, and the rest of western Canada be damned. That is the bill that we are likely to vote on. I think this will come to a vote. I say that because I am not in complete control of whether it will or not. But if these men behind this business will in their bill come out for an all-Canadian route, I will vote for it with both hands.

Mr. Cruickshank: Hear, hear.

Mr. Smith (Calgary West): You are looking at me, Mr. Speaker; but I also noted my time. I will accept your calculation, of course; you are so accustomed to race tracks and that sort of thing, yours will be exact. Are you suggesting that my time is up?

Mr. Speaker: I had not suggested it, but it will be up shortly.

Mr. Smith (Calgary West): I have apparently been given second sight or something of the kind; because I looked at the Speaker a moment ago and the expression I saw in his eye was not friendly toward my continuing my discourse, although he did not say one single word about it.

At this time I am not going to ask for any indulgence from the House of Commons, but I want finally to make this plain. Here we are sitting in this chamber. We were sent down here. Nobody needed to twist our arms to get us to come. We came down here to represent the people at home and also to represent the interests of the Dominion of Canada. This is a time when every Alberta member and every British Columbia member should stand up in order that he may be counted. On what? Does he favour an all-Canadian route or does he want to go outside Canada by way of Kingsgate? Let us have no nonsense about the thing. That is the simple proposition on which we shall vote.

An hon. Member: Time.

Mr. Speaker: Order. I will inform the hon. member, or any other hon. member who may have the floor at any time, when his time has expired.

Mr. Smith (Calgary West): I think the voice I heard must have been that of a distant relative of yours, Mr. Speaker, because I thought it was your voice just a moment ago. We come to this simple proposition. I want to answer the silent attitude of my Social Credit friends who received a telegram from Mr. Manning, their excellent premier in Alberta, saying that he would like to see lots of companies incorporated in order that they might make the best deal they could. The government of Alberta has not a choice between A, B and C of saying to them, "Will you produce this gas for so much money?" There is only going to be one pipe line, a monopoly, if you like. There are lots of monopolies. The government of Alberta has a whisky monopoly and they do not fail to get a profit from it—$10,300,000 from that sparsely populated area last year. The situation is just this. The Alberta government, through its public utilities board, controls the sale price of gas in that province. It controls the charges that are made with reference to the pipe lines in existence today, and it has been doing so for years from the Turner valley into the city of Calgary. Imperial Oil bring oil from the Turner valley to their refinery in Calgary. It is a common carrier and the price is fixed by that board. There have been no complaints about it.

Therefore it is not a question of holding an auction sale and saying, "What do you bid?" It does not make one five cent's worth of difference to the government of Alberta. The premier of Alberta is one of the finest men I have ever known and one of the ablest, but I do not think he has given this question the consideration which he might have given to so important a matter if he had had more time. I have glanced at the Speaker and he will not need to rise. I have not finished what I intended to say. Therefore I am glad that I did not give you an undertaking that I would not speak again. There is another chapter, and when I have recited it I am sure hon. members from Alberta and British Columbia will stand up and be counted at the appropriate time in the history of this parliament.

Mr. J. L. MacDougall (Vancouver-Burrard): Mr. Speaker, on October 28 last I addressed the house when we were considering this bill. Since then I have heard a great many speeches both last session and this on the subject of pipe lines and natural gas and oil. I must confess, however, that very few of them have shed much light upon the problem, and very few of them have taken into account the exact nature of the matter which we have to decide.

This bill, Mr. Speaker, is an application to parliament pursuant to the Pipe Lines Act to incorporate a company. The purpose of the company is to build a pipe line for the transportation of natural gas. The application is made to parliament because the laws of Canada require parliament to grant the kind of charter which this company now seeks. A charter granted by any other authority than parliament would not enable the company to do the work it proposes.

The bill does not authorize the building of a pipe line. Even if a charter is granted to the company there is no assurance whatsoever that it will ever build a line. It would be impractical for it to do so without first having a permit from the government of Alberta to remove gas from that province. It would also require the assurance of an export permit from the Department of Trade and Commerce before it could export any gas from Canada. To serve markets outside Alberta, and assuming that these markets are in other provinces of Canada as well as in the United States, a company requires both these permits. I think we are entitled to assume that before permits are granted by the authorities concerned the interests of the citizens of Alberta and of Canada as a whole will be protected. I have said that the house does not issue permits, and I would emphasize again the fact that the passing of the bill does not imply that any permit will issue.

[Mr. Smith (Calgary West).]

I have also said that the measure does not authorize the building of a pipe line. If hon. members will look at the Pipe Lines Act, which was passed in the spring session of parliament of 1949, they will see that before a pipe line can be built the company must secure from the board of transport commissioners permission to build it. Section 11 of that act provides in part:

> A company shall not . . . begin the construction of a section or part of a company pipe line, until, (a) the board has by order granted the company leave to construct the line.

Mr. Cruickshank: I rise on a point of order, and it is something in which I am rather interested. Is it permissible to read speeches in the house?

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Speaker: I understand that at the present time the hon. member for Vancouver-Burrard (Mr. MacDougall) is quoting a section of an act.

Mr. MacDougall: I continue to read the provisions of section 11:

> (a) the board has by order granted the company leave to construct the line.
> (b) the plan, profile and book of reference of the section or part of the proposed line have been approved by the board.

In his speech on February 28 last the hon. member for Calgary West (Mr. Smith) is reported as having asked the sponsor of the bill the question—

Mr. Lennard: You are not quoting the act now.

Mr. MacDougall: —"Where is this line being built?" The hon. member who replied as the sponsor of the bill definitely told him that he did not know, which was quite true. No one in the house knows where this or any other line is going to be built.

Mr. Cruickshank: Oh, that is nonsense.

Mr. Speaker: Order.

Mr. Cruickshank: There is no statute about that.

Mr. MacDougall: I believe the hon. member for Calgary West did not place the proper interpretation upon the answer of the sponsor of the bill.

Mr. Smith (Calgary West): Well, if I have misinterpreted anybody I should like to know about it.

Mr. MacDougall: The fact of the matter is that no one can say where this pipe line is going to be built. At the moment the company is doing nothing more than seeking incorporation. If it does not get a charter, it must get its permit to export gas from Alberta. Then it must get approval for construction of the pipe line from the board of transport commissioners. No one can say in advance where the board of transport commissioners will direct the pipe line to be built. Subsection 3 of section 12 of the Pipe Lines Act contains this provision:

> Upon the application, the board shall have regard to all considerations that appear to it to be relevant and in particular to the objection of any party interested, to a public interest that in the board's opinion may be affected by the granting or the refusing of the application, and to the financial responsibility of the applicant.

Hon. members will note that under this section the board of transport commissioners must consider any public interest which may be affected by the granting or refusing of an application to build a pipe line. Certainly the question of route is a factor which affects the interests of the general public. A route over rough terrain which is impossible to maintain without incurring enormous expense means that the consumer must pay a higher price for his gas. This would not only affect the consumer in Alberta; it would affect every British Columbia consumer as well. If the cost of building a pipe line is increased by several million dollars by reason of the choice of the route, then definitely that is going to be a cost factor to every consumer who utilizes the gas put through that pipe line.

From a perusal of this section hon. members will further realize that the board is required to listen to the objection of any party interested. In view of the many speeches that have been made in this house on the subject of the route of the pipe line, it is obvious that many hon. members are interested in the matter of the route; but I put it to the house, Mr. Speaker, that this is not the place to debate what route a line should follow. By passing this section of the Pipe Lines Act, parliament has said that the board of transport commissioners will decide where the pipe line shall go. I should think it would be proper on a point of order for you, Mr. Speaker, to declare out of order any further discussion on the question of route on the ground that this is not a matter with which parliament can now deal.

Many hon. members have stated that they would approve this bill if it contained a section providing for an all-Canadian route. If such a section were included in the bill the functions of the board of transport commissioners would be usurped. Suppose for the sake of argument that this bill should provide for a route to Vancouver entirely over Canadian territory, before any line is built into the United States; and suppose that with such a proviso the company applied to the board of transport commissioners for approval of its route and the board decided that the route in question would not best serve the interests of the Canadian public. In that case it is quite obvious that the board would not be able to deal with the company until its charter was amended.

Mr. Cruickshank: What statute are you reading from?

Mr. MacDougall: Mr. Speaker, I must say that a week ago tonight I was not so rude as to interrupt the hon. member for Fraser Valley (Mr. Cruickshank) or any other hon. member.

Mr. Speaker: Order. I think I should point out that all interruptions are not necessarily rude, so I would ask the hon. member to withdraw the implication of that remark.

Mr. MacDougall: I withdraw with pleasure. When I addressed the house on October 28 last I also said I wanted the interests of Canadian consumers to be protected. I want Canadians to have first call on this natural gas, and in particular I want citizens of British Columbia, more particularly those of greater Vancouver, to have a call upon the gas before a call can be made on behalf of citizens of the United States. I believe that can be accomplished by the authorities who grant export permits; and that these authorities, both in Edmonton and in Ottawa, will see to it that this is done. I said also at that time that I hold no brief for any company in particular, but I am against the creation of a monopoly on behalf of any company already incorporated, through the refusal by parliament of this or any other application.

I say further that we in this parliament are looked upon as a democratic and eminently fair body. I believe that the people behind the Alberta Natural Gas Company have relied upon our fairness in coming back at this time. In doing so they have incurred additional expense. I understand it has cost them several thousand dollars extra just to advertise in the newspapers of this country their intention to make this further application to parliament. If they were not sure of our fairness of mind, and if they were not sure of their ability to serve the interests of the Canadian public, they would not have come back.

Alberta Natural Gas Company

Now I should like to quote a few sentences from the oldest publication in British Columbia. This article appeared in the Columbian of New Westminster only last week:

> Large scale discussion of the great Alberta reserves of natural gas and the chances of exporting some of that valuable fuel to consumers in British Columbia has come out of the pipe line hearings in Calgary recently. And with the discussion some new facts have come to light.
> To those close to the subject it might not be new, but to the B.C. citizen who just wants to see Alberta gas piped in to this province, it is interesting to note one fact on which everyone apparently agrees. Piping natural gas from Alberta to the coast is not going to be economically possible for anyone unless they also pipe some of the gas into the more populous area south of the border, the state of Washington. It may wound our provincial pride a bit, but we'd do better to accept this fact for what it is, the key to our own chances for getting Alberta gas.

So, Mr. Speaker, for the various reasons I have already enumerated, in order that this debate may be brought to an early conclusion I move, seconded by the hon. member for Burnaby-Richmond (Mr. Goode):

> That this question be now put.

Mr. O. L. Jones (Yale): Mr. Speaker, I feel I would be remiss in my duty if I did not enter into a discussion of this particular bill, on behalf of the people I represent in British Columbia. The last speaker put the controversy in a nutshell, when he said that no one knows where this pipe line is going to go. The trouble is that no one knows, and no one seems to care, providing the bill passes. We in British Columbia want to know, and we do care. It is for that reason I am speaking tonight.

Our objection to this pipe line going directly to the United States is the same as that expressed at the last session. On that occasion, we expressed the opinion that the pipe line would go directly to Spokane, and thence across country to Seattle and Tacoma. That has not been denied, nor has a good case been put up by the other side refuting our claim that this would be to the detriment of the province of British Columbia. The absence of that denial indicates to me that our claims are correct. In speaking against this bill, I want to make it quite clear that I cast no reflection on the company or the personnel forming the company. I have heard of most of them, but I do not know them. So far as I know, they are just the usual company whose motive is profit, and in order to get the most profit they want to get to the biggest market in the cheapest possible way, disregarding the people of British Columbia as well as the people of Alberta, who have a great stake in what is to be done with this natural resource.

Not only does this application before us tonight ignore all the suggestions we have made, but I believe it ignores the expressed views of this house. I know that one group has been quite silent, but possibly some of them agree with our point of view. I can assure you that until the clause for which we have asked is inserted in the bill, to the effect that the pipe line will follow a Canadian route, we will continue to raise our objections.

Public opinion in British Columbia is really aroused about this issue. I think I can do no better than to read to you an editorial which appeared in the Vancouver Sun on the third of this month. The Vancouver Sun has the largest circulation of any paper in our province. I believe it is Liberal in its politics, and would naturally try to indicate to the British Columbia Liberal members the course that they should follow. The editorial reads as follows:

> Ordinarily we'd be ashamed of the spectacle of a filibuster in which MP's waste the time that Canada's parliament might usefully devote to other issues.
> But in the case of the filibuster now under way at Ottawa, under leadership of George Cruickshank of Fraser Valley and A. L. Smith of Calgary West, we are merely ashamed of the necessity for it.
> These members believe that desperate situations require desperate remedies. They are struggling, in the only way open to them, to hold the line against American interests which seek to siphon off the petroleum resources of Alberta to the detriment of British Columbia.
> So Mr. Cruickshank and his associates are trying to block the incorporation bills of these American companies.
> The issue is whether surplus gas from Alberta shall be piped to Pacific coast markets through British Columbia or directly south into the United States. One company already incorporated has undertaken to route its pipe line through the interior of British Columbia. The other applicants will give no such undertaking. There is every reason to suspect that they have no such intention. Apparently the majority of MP's—other than Mr. Cruickshank and his group—don't care.
> The matter is vital to the development of British Columbia. The outcome will strongly influence our economic future. With so much at stake, we wish to convey sincere thanks to the filibusterers and to wish them all the strength and volubility that may be necessary to thwart a major economic injustice.

That, Mr. Speaker, is the view of the Vancouver Sun, and it expresses quite well the view of the people of British Columbia regarding this particular bill. In common with the editorial writer, I believe we should not waste the time of the house in discussing this bill. Unfortunately, there is no other way in which we can stop such a bill passing than by talking it out. We are quite willing to discuss it, or to have the other side come forward and give logical reasons why they are unable to take the pipe line through British Columbia. So far, I have not heard any reason. I have before me a report, but I shall not read it at the moment, indicating the feasibility of taking the pipe line through the Cariboo to Vancouver.

I should like to draw to the attention of the members the fact that we are dealing with possibly the last great pool of oil on the North American continent. When I read the newspapers, I sometimes feel that we are developing it rather irresponsibly, like a bunch of drunken sailors. I am glad to note that the government of the province of Alberta has taken steps to conserve the supply of gas and oil. I sincerely hope that the provincial government will do what the government at Ottawa is obviously failing to do, and that is to conserve our natural resources for future generations. The irreplaceable nature of these resources should be appreciated. There is nothing more desolate than a worked-out area, whether it be oil, timber, or anything else. The area becomes a bunch of derelict homes, empty schools, and empty stores. There is a movement of people away from the area.

We have not taken a great deal of interest in the conservation of our natural resources. I thank the province of Alberta for having filled the gap with proper conservation measures. The resources of that province can be responsible for a high degree of prosperity for over a hundred years to come; but, at the present rate of consumption, I doubt if they will last more than 30 to 50 years. It is true that great wealth can be accumulated, and great use can be made of these natural resources before they peter out. Those of you who remember what happened in the Turner valley and in California, where the natural resources were exploited without any conservation measures, will look with dread at the indifference of our government in allowing the products of our wells to be siphoned off to the United States.

It being nine o'clock, Mr. Speaker, I should like to move the adjournment of the debate.

Motion agreed to and debate adjourned.

Mr. Speaker: The hour reserved for private and public bills having expired, the house will resume the business that was interrupted at six o'clock.

QUESTION AS TO MOTION FOR COMMITTEE OF SUPPLY

Hon. Alphonse Fournier (Minister of Public Works): Before resuming the business which was interrupted by the six o'clock recess, Mr. Speaker, I wish to make a suggestion to the house, which is less contentious than the subject we have been discussing for the last hour. Last night, when I announced the business of the house for today, I mentioned that some time during the day we would move to go into supply to call two departments, transport and finance. I gave as my reason for doing so that on Friday many members had asked for a discussion under the first item of the Department of Transport. At that time, we thought we would try to meet the wishes of those members. The other reason is, if we carry the motion to refer the estimates of external affairs to the committee on external affairs there will be only two departments left that we can discuss on Friday, and I am not too sure that I could have the two interested ministers here on that date. Therefore, what I would wish to ask the house right now is to move to go into supply and to call these two departments. Necessarily, if there were discussion on the motion I would withdraw it immediately, because I would not even think of carrying it through. We would rather continue with external affairs.

If we cannot move tonight, and this is the last day this week that we can move to go into supply formally, the position will be that I do not know exactly what estimates we can take up. If it were the unanimous consent of the house to adopt this motion I would ask the hon. member for Temiscouata (Mr. Pouliot) whether he would adjourn the debate on the motion to refer the estimates of external affairs to the committee on external affairs.

Mr. George A. Drew (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, no matter how much anyone might wish to accommodate those who desire to follow a particular course, there is a debate before the house at the moment, and it can only be disposed of by a motion to adjourn. No one is in a position to state what will happen in regard to another debate when we have not even disposed of the debate that is now before us.

I would suggest that there is only one course that can be adopted, namely, for the decision to be made as to which course is to be followed and the motion made appropriately.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): Mr. Speaker, just to explain, I have mentioned that the hon. member for Temiscouata has assured me that he would be ready to move the adjournment of the debate on this motion of the Secretary of State for External Affairs; but I would not request that unless I had the assurance that there would be no debate on the motion to go into supply. I have the assurance of certain groups that they will not discuss this motion. I know that if the leader of the opposition would just throw a kindly word to his supporters I would have no difficulty in that direction.

Mr. Drew: Mr. Speaker, the very suggestion that has now been made is a child of events of the first day. At that time there was an indication of an intention to depart from the established rules of this house. Since then we have been seeing one effort after another made to keep the procedure in this house in some sort of order, as a result of the confusion which followed that original step. The rules have been long established and for a definite reason. It is only because of the departure from those rules that a suggestion of this kind presents itself. I am not in a position to give, nor do I intend to give any undertaking or to make any suggestion as to what any member does. It is for the member who is speaking to determine whether he proposes to proceed, or if he does not, to move the adjournment.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): Mr. Speaker, this is really as contentious as the pipe lines bill, and I will not move to go into supply.

EXTERNAL AFFAIRS

REFERENCE OF ESTIMATES OF DEPARTMENT TO STANDING COMMITTEE

The house resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Pearson for reference of certain estimates to the standing committee on external affairs.

Mr. Jean François Pouliot (Temiscouata): Following what was said before six o'clock, the hon. member for Lethbridge (Mr. Blackmore) was in order in discussing trade under external affairs, because the consuls and the trade commissioners are under the Department of External Affairs. In my humble view, all those who are connected with the development of our trade should be under the direct supervision and control of the Department of Trade and Commerce, and it would simplify the work of the Secretary of State for External Affairs.

When the house took recess I had just reached a point where I was saying a word about Professor Lauterpacht. Did it not come to the mind of the leader of the opposition that the opinion expressed by that gentleman was in line with the external policy of the United States government? I am not imputing motives to anyone, but I would not be surprised at all if Mr. Acheson had asked that professor to give some elaborate opinion against the recognition of China, just to serve his own political purposes. I do not know Mr. Acheson; I do not know the professor; but I presume that the thing might have happened, and it is of the order of possibility.

Since my hon. friend, the leader of the opposition, was gracious enough to insist on the continuation of the debate, at this point I should like to be useful to him. I shall tell him that not today but Friday I was greatly surprised when he spoke as he did, although he made a very fine speech. Before the last election he was rather dogmatic, but since then he has become academic, and I like him that way. He and I are in the same position. Neither of us is a member of the committee on external affairs. The leaders of the other groups, the leader of the C.C.F. group (Mr. Coldwell), and the leader of the Social Credit group (Mr. Low), are members of the committee on external affairs. Therefore when that committee sits, the members will have the opportunity to express their personal opinions as well as those of their respective groups.

When the estimates of the department were called on Friday the first item was the administration of the department. I was really surprised that the leader of the opposition did not give his views and those of his party on the estimates as they are. Sometimes they complain about high taxes. There are some increases and decreases in the estimates. It would have been most interesting to have had his views and those of his party on these matters. They meet every morning in caucus. I am not in a position to say that the conclusion of their caucuses is collective truth or collective wisdom or collective error. I will not go so far as to say that. I give everybody the benefit of the doubt. But if he had said, for instance, "There is an increase of over $91,000 for departmental administration; what is that for?"—he could have asked that question. He did not do so. Then there is a decrease of $708,571 for representation abroad. Why that drop? Why that decrease in the amount? These would have been interesting questions, and the genial Secretary of State for External Affairs would have been only too pleased to inform the leader of the opposition and the committee about it.

There are other matters. I shall bring item 71 to the attention of the leader of the opposition. There is an item of $7,500 for the chairman of the Canadian section of the Canada-United States permanent joint board on defence. That is an interesting matter. Who is the gentleman to be selected? Why is he to be paid now when nobody was paid before? He might have asked that question. I am trying to help him. The minister would have answered, and we would not have had to wait for weeks before receiving the answer. I speak as one who has an interest in external affairs and who receives no secret information. I cannot complain about the fact that the minister does not give special information to the leader of the opposition. He has no right to get more information than any private member in the house. One of my complaints in the last parliament was that when the former prime minister was secretary of state for external affairs he took the leaders of the opposition into his confidence more than he did any of his supporters. I remember he was telling secrets to Mr. Hanson, and to my friend Mr. Graydon, but none of his supporters knew anything about the inner workings of external affairs policy.

Now it is different, and I am glad the leader of the opposition has complained about it because I believe it is a sound policy that he should not have more information than is given to those who support the government. Why should he be given secrets? It would be impossible for the government to give him secrets, because the ministers are bound not to tell what happens in council before policies are enunciated in the house. If a minister were to take the leader of the opposition into his confidence and to tell him what happened behind closed doors in the east block, he would be betraying his oath.

The leader of the opposition has had enough experience as leader of his party and as the premier of his province to know that. Another thing I wish to tell him, and I may hurt his modesty in doing so, is that I cannot conceive why he has quoted with such gusto from Mr. Eden. Mr. Eden is no more than I am; he is a member of parliament. He was more before when he was foreign secretary.

The leader of the opposition occupies a position of trust. His party has appointed him leader, and he now stands as leader of the great Progressive Conservative party. Therefore he is much more in the commonwealth than Mr. Eden could be. Besides that, I give him credit that when he speaks in the house I am sure he is in earnest, and would not have the same motives as Mr. Eden had when he made his statement. Therefore it is not for the leader of the opposition to quote Mr. Eden; it would be for Mr. Eden to quote the leader of the opposition. That is clear; no one could object to that.

We have heard a good deal about the recognition of China and about a pact on the Pacific along the lines of the Atlantic pact. The leader of the opposition makes fine speeches outside the House of Commons.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Pouliot: It is better to wait until I have finished before applauding. He makes fine speeches. He spoke the other day to the Dominion United Church men's association in the church hall, and referred to the Atlantic treaty and what it should mean to us. The Atlantic treaty was a good thing and, may I add, was sponsored by the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent). As there was a failure in what happened at San Francisco, because of veto, and the required unanimity of the United Nations on important matters, it became necessary for those who believe alike to join together and to present a united front for the defence of democracy.

I understand it that way. As the leader of the opposition knows very well, it was the Prime Minister who made that move, which found a response in many countries of the world. Now we have the Atlantic treaty signed by many nations who seek peace.

The leader of the opposition referred to a Pacific pact. Would he sign such a pact if he were secretary of state for external affairs or prime minister of Canada? For instance, would he sign a pact with Japan at the present time? A couple of weeks ago some representatives from Japan came here. They belong to the liberal-minded people of Japan, were well received here, and I believe it was a good thing that they came.

Our minds turn to Australia, a country which is doing well at the present time. New Zealand is in a similar position. A short time ago Mr. Nehru, Prime Minister of India, addressed us in this chamber, and was received with all the honours due him. If there is no pact between Canada and those countries it does not mean that they are not friendly with us—far from it. In addition to India, Pakistan, Australia and New Zealand, there is China. I shall not remind the leader of the opposition of what I have said in the house on other occasions. Perhaps when he was not here he was engaged in other business and did not have time to read my speeches. However, some time before Madame Chiang Kai-shek came to Ottawa I mentioned in the house that all that had been done for China was completely useless because of the mandarins, the men who had exploited the Chinese people for so long.

The leader of the opposition knows that in China thousands if not millions of people die of hunger every year. Naturally those people who were suffering in China were not very enthusiastic when they saw our government and the governments of other countries supplying funds, arms and other materials to Chiang Kai-shek, because they knew that those around Chiang Kai-shek were enriching themselves with that which was to have been given to the poor people. That is a well-known fact. It is not necessary to read all the books that have been published about China. Everyone knows the facts—and those are the facts.

Therefore there was a feeling against the Chiang regime, and the Soongs and all the other exploiters of China. That was the beginning of the revolution. It is because Mao appealed to them and represented them that he overturned the regime. Now Chiang is in Formosa. The name "Formosa" means beautiful—and it is a beautiful island. Next to it is Hainan. But what are the populations of those two islands compared to the hundreds of millions of people who live in China?—nothing at all.

In international law, just as in ordinary business, what counts is the accomplished fact. In this instance the accomplished fact is that Mao now is the acknowledged authority in China and he has signed a thirty-year pact with Russia. I hope that we shall come to real business in order that we may have peace in the world. What is the use of denouncing any country from one's seat in the House of Commons? What does it change? Where have we been since the end of hostilities? What is the news we read in the papers? It is always the same thing, with the same denunciations; and the more it changes, the more it is the same thing. Why is everybody a challenger instead of trying to come to some understanding with the other powers of the world? I do not think there are any communists here in the house. I will not say of any one of my colleagues that he is a communist. But if we are to have peace, should we work for war all the time? Should we challenge the other nations of the world, as was done the other day by the leader of the opposition (Mr. Drew) and as some other members have done? If we do, we shall have here the same atmosphere that prevails among the diplomats at Lake Success, at Paris and other meetings, with the same result. I hope that, in the future, when diplomats and representatives of nations meet together, they will try to understand each other, and come to some agreement in order that war may be postponed as long as possible.

Who can speak with authority about what happens behind the iron curtain? Who knows about it? If the minister knew, I am sure that he would tell us. He does not know any more about it than we do. It is a close secret. When someone asks the minister to tell him secrets of that kind, it is pure humbug; I regret to have to say that. The discussion of such important matters of life or death for millions of Canadians should be considered more seriously, and not in a dogmatic or academic manner. It is time to put politics aside when we discuss questions of life or death for the whole Canadian people. Are we to stand aside? What can we do if we stand aside? We have the United States, which is our ally. We have the United Kingdom, which we cannot trust more than necessary after what has happened in connection with Hong Kong. Everybody knows about it. I do not come with long quotations. I appeal to everyone, and I ask every member to recall what he has read in the press at one time and another. Everybody knows that if China has been recognized by England, it is precisely because England was afraid of losing Hong Kong. We know that.

What happened during the last war? Not long ago we read in the press that Alger Hiss had been found guilty and sent to jail because he was considered to be a traitor. He was defended by Mr. Acheson. But nevertheless Alger Hiss was the adviser of Roosevelt at Yalta and it was because of the representations of Alger Hiss that Mr. Roosevelt made so many concessions to Russia. And why was the United States government wrongly informed about the strength of Japan during the last days of hostilities? Everybody knows that; it is no news. But one feels obliged to assume a solemn tone and to look dogmatic when we discuss that matter. Mr. Roosevelt unquestionably was a great man but he had some wrong advisers. He was like the leader of the opposition in that respect. I will make a special appeal to the leader of the opposition. I will ask him to put politics aside every time such momentous problems come before the house. He can do that, and do it well. I have had great respect for him since he said that Canada is a sovereign nation. He said that last year, and I congratulated him. It was a great change from the Tory policies of the past.

I should like to mention one other thing, namely, what was said by Mr. Churchill about the representation of the United States and of Canada to France. At page 508 of Mr. Churchill's book on the second world war, entitled "Their Finest Hour" I read as follows:

> At the same time it was necessary to keep in touch not only with France, but even with Vichy.

It is not a question of opinion; it is fact.

> I therefore always tried to make the best of them. I was very glad when at the end of the year the United States sent an ambassador to Vichy of so much influence and character as Admiral Leahy, who was himself so close to the president. I repeatedly encouraged Mr. Mackenzie King to keep his representative, the skilful and accomplished Mr. Dupuy, at Vichy. Here at least was a window upon a courtyard to which we had no other access.

We had as representative at Vichy Mr. Dupuy who is now an ambassador of Canada somewhere else.

Mr. Fleming: To the Netherlands.

Mr. Pouliot: Yes, to the Netherlands. He was doing the errands of Churchill at Vichy. Canada recognized Vichy, and Vichy was recognized by the United States; it was implicitly recognized by the United Kingdom because Mr. Dupuy was representing the United Kingdom in an official capacity at Vichy. If you ask me why I say that, my answer is that I find that some erroneous statements and declarations have been made about Marshal Petain, the head of unoccupied France during the war. He was treated just the same as if he had not been recognized by the United States, by Canada and unofficially by the United Kingdom. As those facts must be true, and I use the evidence of Winston Churchill himself, I wonder why people do not admire the old man who has done his best to save the largest possible number of lives of his countrymen? Who could have done any better than he has done to save the lives of Frenchmen who were there? It was a sacrifice for him to accept that position at his age. Not only that, but my colleague the hon. member for Bonaventure (Mr. Arsenault) the other day made a speech about de Bernonville. I do not know him. All I know about him is what has been said in the house by the hon. member for Bonaventure. Those who complain about him do not know any more than does the average citizen. It is easy to utter abominations against any man. Who are the Canadians who have died on account of de Bernonville? Why do we not have the names? Tell us who they are. It is said that Canadians have been killed on account of de Bernonville, but no name is given. What is most important, Mr. Speaker, is that he has been condemned in his absence by the court of Toulouse, and Toulouse is a city of France which is in complete control of the communists. Recently there was a seizure of arms there. We hear denunciations by the communists; and when a man is attacked by the communists, everybody is credulous enough and naive enough to say, "Let's get rid of him".

The behaviour of the former French ambassador to Canada on the question of de Bernonville was shameful. I do not know what was the matter with him but let us remember at the present time France can expect much more from Canada than Canada can expect from France.

In referring to the estimates a moment ago I thought of one thing. So far as external affairs are concerned it is not so much the Department of External Affairs which is the most important. It is the Department of Citizenship and Immigration. I congratulate the new Minister of Citizenship and Immigration (Mr. Harris). He must realize the importance of the tasks that have been assigned to him by the Prime Minister of Canada (Mr. St. Laurent). He must educate those who are not real Canadians, who may be good citizens but who have not in their hearts a real pride in their country, and who do not yet consider Canada first when matters of importance have to be decided.

I noted what the leader of the C.C.F. group (Mr. Coldwell) said about the mentality of Anthony Eden. He said it in a discreet manner but I was in agreement with him. When I think of the progress that the Conservative party has made with regard to a Canadian spirit since the present leader of the opposition (Mr. Drew) has been at its head in the house I am surprised. I never expected that to happen, and I say that sincerely. For a time I thought the great division between the party would be on the one hand a Canadian party and on the other hand a party composed of imperialists, all those who have an inferiority complex, communists, everybody. Now I see there is progress, and I congratulate the leader of the opposition and the leader of the C.C.F. group. I see that there is some progress being made in the other corner also. Let us be Canadians; let us be proud of our race and of our great country and let us not be frightened by the false declarations that are made by some people who cannot support them.

Mr. Knowles: No progress on your side?

Mr. Pouliot: This is a good side; come over. As I said, this is a new era. It is a complete change, and hon. members know that very well. That is why I am prouder than ever of my party.

Mr. Johnston: You had better be careful or you will not stay there. You will be over here again.

Mr. Pouliot: No. I say there is progress, and no one is more blind than he who will not see.

Mr. Knowles: The hon. member ought to know.

Mr. Pouliot: The hon. member for Bow River (Mr. Johnston) is too clever, too bright, and has too much experience in politics to deny it. He would not deny evidence. I will not insist on it. I am just about finished. I rely on the spirit of justice, patriotism, dignity and pride of the new incumbent of the office of Minister of Citizenship and Immigration not to do something that he would regret all his life. I thank you, Mr. Speaker, and I thank the house for having been so kind to me once more.

Mr. L. T. Stick (Trinity-Conception): Mr. Speaker, it may be a task for a new member of the house to address this gathering on the question of external affairs. Much has been said about the eastern situation during this debate. The complaint has been made that we do not receive sufficient information on foreign affairs so that we may intelligently debate the issue. At first sight we may be in agreement with that statement. I take the view that today foreign affairs are so important that we should consider having a united foreign policy supported by all members of the house so that there will be no contention among us as to what our policy should be either in the east or in the west in the interests of the maintenance of peace.

As a member of the committee on external affairs, I am in agreement with the chairman, the hon. member for Cochrane (Mr. Bradette), when he intimated on Friday night that he could not be responsible for receiving confidential information from the department without proper safeguards having been made. As I understand it, one of my duties in the house is to safeguard the safety of the nation. Much as I might desire more information on external affairs, I agree with the statement of the hon. member for Cochrane, and I am not prepared to receive such information if by any chance it might get into enemy hands and thus endanger the state. In view of what has happened in the past in Canada so far as espionage is concerned, and in view of recent world events, I take the view that we cannot be too careful about what information is given in this respect. We have had the spectacle of the Alger Hiss trial in the United States. In recent weeks we have had the spectacle of Dr. Fuchs in London. Lo and behold, we now have a secretary for war in England who a few years ago had communist leanings. Where are we going? Whither are we tending?

The communist peril is a serious question for Canada and the whole world, and we will do no good unless we recognize it for what it is. I should like to quote an article from the New York Times of February 12, 1950, which may open the eyes of some members of the house as to where we stand on the question of eastern policy, and where the great nation to the south of us stands. It may open their eyes to the peril in which we both stand from communist activities in the world. The article is written by Arthur Krock, political correspondent of the New York Times in Washington, who is commonly known as the dean of the correspondents there and as the pundit. He writes as follows:

> The president, and secretary of state Acheson, reviewing the bases of American foreign policy in the light of recent and dynamic events, said in substance this week: The United States cannot do business with Soviet Russia (just as it could not do business with Hitler) except where a set of facts creates entrenched realities that force the Kremlin to adjust its aggressive policies downward. This happened and was proved in Berlin, Greece, Turkey and Iran; and all our efforts are to be directed toward increasing the number of such areas in the world.
> To which important democrats as well as republicans in congress, some of whose demands for affirmative policy produced the executive statements, responded about as follows: You reject the concrete proposal by Senator Brien McMahon that a new approach be made to the problem, offering $50 billion in gifts and loans over ten years to nations everywhere, including Russia, in exchange for effective suppression of atomic weapons. You say experience has demonstrated the futility of attaining such an agreement with Russia, or of Russian adherence to any agreements that could be made.
> By the same reasoning you reject the concrete proposal by Senator Millard E. Tydings that a general disarmament conference be attempted.
> On the ground that the moral commitment of this government makes it dishonourable as well as self-defeating to diminish or abolish the sovereignty of the Chinese nationalist regime on Formosa, you decline at least one hopeful opportunity to confine the international communists to the territory which they have now acquired in Asia.

Now I should like to mention the situation in the state department in Washington, as it is set out in this same newspaper:

> In other executive departments and at the capitol, however, nerves show signs of high tension. This correspondent does not attribute that to panic in any degree or to lack of any of the items in Mr. Acheson's formula. Many of the president's sub-executives are frankly worried over security, not only with respect to atomic secrets but with reference to general fifth-column activities in the government itself.
> One such official told this correspondent he felt certain there was such a column at work in the department where his jurisdiction is just short of the top, but that he was still unable to bring persuasion for forceful purging. Another said he would be uneasy over the successful execution of any foreign policy, however sound and strong, until "five or six individuals" are removed from a very important government office indeed.

Then I should like to quote a dispatch from the New York Times correspondent in Paris:

> The United States' attitude is that there is no use beginning once again an exchange of words when it is clear that the Soviet union has no intention of implementing them by actions. Premier Stalin himself once said:
> "Institutions and systems are not changed by words—they are changed by natural causes."
> The "natural causes" which appear to be predominant in the minds of the Soviet politburo belie the "words" of amity. The U.S.S.R. is pressing a cold war against the United States and its friends. Until such deliberate hostility ceases, mere "words" can be of no avail.

We have heard a great deal said in this chamber about peace, from a humanitarian standpoint; and we all agree with what has been said and the way it was said. We all desire peace; we desire it now more than ever. But we must be realistic about this peace, and I contend that Canada must speak with a united voice. If she speaks with a divided voice advantage will be taken of that fact. If we are not united, no matter what policy we adopt it will not contribute to the peace of the world.

Much has been said of an eastern policy for Canada. I served in the east for two years, and I know what rioting there is like. I know what a wrong policy adopted by the western nations can mean to the east. The late President Wilson adopted a policy of self determination for all people. It was a high-sounding policy; and how was it received in the east? That news went through the bazaars like wildfire, and they interpreted it to mean that they could do as they liked, that they could disregard law and order. That was the way they acted, and troops had to be called in.

We do not understand the eastern mind. We in the west have developed the material or practical side of life, while the people of the east have developed the abstract or mystical side. If we think we can adopt a policy here, with our western ideas, without fully understanding the eastern mind, we shall fail and fail badly. Let me give just one simple illustration. A carpenter in Canada saws from the top down. A carpenter in the east saws from the bottom up. In other words they view life from the opposite standpoint, and we must understand their point of view; we must understand their civilization, their religion, their social problems, if any policy we adopt is to be successful.

I was in India when the London Times came out with a policy to which, on the face of it, every man in the western world could subscribe; but if that policy had been adopted in India it would have led to untold trouble, and we who lived there knew it. I was through the riots in India. I was through Delhi, Amritsar and Lahore shortly after those riots took place, and I know how bad they were. I know how serious the eastern problem is, and I believe that any policy Canada adopts must be undertaken with a thorough knowledge of the eastern mind. One reason the Russian policy has been so successful in the east is that the Russians are half oriental themselves, and understand the eastern mind.

We have a situation in China which is not clear. We have a communist government, but we have the two islands of Hainan and Formosa held by the nationalist forces. The problem before us today is what to do about those islands. If we support the nationalist forces in China we will be accused of meddling in the internal affairs of that country, because Formosa was ceded to the Chinese republic after the war. If we decide to support the nationalist forces there it will mean that we will have to supply them with munitions and money to carry on the struggle. The best military advice in the world today is that Formosa cannot be held by the nationalists once the Chinese communists re-arm and reorganize their air force with Russian help. If that situation arises, Formosa cannot be held.

What do we do then? Do we send men and munitions to hold it? And if we decide on such a policy will the people of Canada and the United States back us up? If we do not support the nationalists and Formosa becomes communist territory, it will provide a springboard for communist propaganda and infiltration in the Philippines and the eastern islands. I do not know the answer, but there is the problem. I agree with the leader of the opposition when he asks for caution, and for time to be taken in order that consideration may be given all these matters.

We have more or less the same problem in Indo-China. We are fighting a guerrilla war against communism in the Federated Malay States. We have Siam not knowing which side of the fence to stay on. She has 30,000 communist troops within her borders, and she is afraid that if she disarms and interns them she will become unfriendly with the communist regime in China. Like so many of the weak states in the east, she is sitting on the fence waiting to see which way the wind will blow. We have chaos in Burma, and a situation in India which requires careful consideration.

How many men in this house know how India is composed? When we speak of Canada we think of it as one nation; but when we speak of India we must think of it as a conglomeration of peoples. In India and Pakistan over three hundred dialects are spoken. There is more difference between a Mahratta and a Sikh than between a Frenchman and a German. There is a greater difference between a Bengali, a Rajput, a Tamil and a Punjabi. How is Mr. Nehru going to bring all these people together?

He has our sympathy. He spoke here, and he received a grand welcome. Mr. Nehru has a problem which is colossal in the extreme, and just as complex. The United Nations decided they would send a mission to settle the Kashmiri dispute. They are trying to settle it according to western ideas. They said, "We shall take a plebiscite, and let the people decide for themselves." This mission has been there for many months, but no plebiscite has taken place as yet. Kashmiri is a thorn in the flesh of India. If this question is not settled promptly, it may well lead to civil war between Pakistan and Hindustan. You have a situation there which is fraught with great peril. If we can help Mr. Nehru and the Indians to solve this problem, by all means let us do it.

India is the bastion of democracy, such as it is, against the communist influence filtering down from Afghanistan through the Khyber pass. We must support Mr. Nehru in any move he makes to keep the communist influence out of that part of Asia, because if it gets down there it will spread further.

Much has been said here about peace in the world. I have dreams about the peace of the world. Last fall the Prime Minister made a statement that war was not imminent. His statement was received with a great deal of relief by all the members of this house. The Prime Minister cannot guarantee future peace, nor can anyone else. As the article in the New York Times states, that has been demonstrated time and time again. The holding of conference after conference and getting nowhere is not the way to peace. What are Russia's intentions in the world? Hitler wrote a book called "Mein Kampf", in which he set out the plans he intended to carry out. When people read that book, no one would believe he would be foolish enough to tell us what he was going to do, and then do it. But he tried to do it. Lenin has written that communism and the Christian ideology cannot exist side by side on this earth; one must go. We would do well to believe that, whatever policy Russia has, and however she may trim her sails to suit this mood and that mood, the basic principle of communism is that Christianity must be destroyed or communism will be destroyed. We have to face that fact. To sign pacts with people for whom the ten commandments and the sermon on the mount have no meaning is useless. They can but be binding on us, and they will not be binding on them.

If we call a conference now at the higher level, and trust them, we shall be sadly left. The only language they understand is the language of force. This nation, and all the other democratic nations, must be strong; strong to resist aggression and show these people in the Kremlin that if they do start a war they may destroy, but they will be destroyed. One of the reasons why gas warfare was not begun by the Germans during the last war was that they were afraid of the retaliation the allies would make. We have to get it into the minds of the people in the Kremlin that if they do start a war we shall retaliate; that is the only language they understand. If we cannot penetrate their minds, we must penetrate the minds of the Russian people, and of the people who are under communist domination. We must impress upon them that the policy they are adopting is a policy of destruction, and that, while they may destroy, they will be destroyed. Nobody wants to commit suicide. That is the language they understand, and that is the language which we must put across to them if peace is to be maintained in this world.

[Mr. Stick.]

We in Canada together with the other democratic nations of the world, must be strong or we shall have a war. That is the road we are travelling, so let us admit it, whether we like it or not. I do not want a war. I have seen enough of it. Any man who has seen anything such as I have seen does not want war. But I do not want my wife ravaged or my children taken to God knows where, if that is the price of communism. I want freedom in this world. I fought for it years ago, and I am prepared, old as I am, to fight for it now. I want peace in the world, but I also want freedom. If we think we can have peace without freedom, we are making a grave mistake. During the interval between sessions, I have travelled this country from the east coast to the west coast. I have met many Canadian people, and I have talked with many of them. I say to you that this is a grand land; it is a good land. I could describe it as a land of hope and glory; hope, because of the faith that the people of Canada have in the future of their country; glory, because of the achievements of the people in the past. Thank God, it is still a land of the free. Let us keep it that way.

Mr. Clarence Gillis (Cape Breton South): Mr. Speaker, there are a few remarks which I should like to make at this particular time. This foreign affairs debate is generally reserved for the experts. I have been in this house sufficiently long to come to the conclusion that there are no experts. It is mostly because of the experts that we get into difficulty. I rise at this time because of a speech which I read that was made by the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Pearson) at Lake Couchiching. It was reported by The Canadian Unionist of September, 1949. This speech is a masterpiece, and I recommend that every member of this house secure a copy and read it, particularly the members opposite. In that discussion, and it was quite lengthy, the minister covered practically all the obligations of a free society. If, in the administration of his department, he follows the mechanics described in that talk, he will not go very far astray.

I accepted that speech as the embodiment of his opinion, so I was rather disappointed, when he opened this debate, to get the impression that he was not as free as I had seen in the house on former occasions, when he had returned from the field behind the scenes of external affairs. In this speech the minister seemed to be a bit shattered. I got the impression that, as a member of the cabinet, he was placed in the position of attempting to apologize for internal government policy by using external matters to cover up. I hope I was wrong. It seemed to me he was doing a bit of clever footwork, and I was a bit disappointed. One of my reasons for rising at this time was to recall to the minister's mind that particular speech, and the mechanics outlined in it so that he could reset his sights.

As I said a moment ago, this business of external affairs should hold no mysteries for the members of this house. I am reasonably sure it does not for most of the citizens of Canada. Within the memory of most of us in this house, we have seen two wars—wars that have come to us from the outside. We have seen Canada's position in those wars, and we had a fairly good idea of the things for which we were fighting. I well remember the old league of nations. I was a member of the league of nations society. I decorated many platforms between the two wars in preaching the gospel of collective security. I thought we had everybody in the world convinced. I remember very well the leader of the opposition being in that organization before he became a politician. He too used to take a stand on matters of collective security. We remember these things, and there is nothing mysterious about it. We know how we get into depressions and what brings about wars. We have seen the machine of propaganda at work twice during our lifetime building a country up and then tearing it down. If you read the press today it is difficult to be sure where propaganda ends and facts begin.

I should like to go back over the speech of the Secretary of State for External Affairs a little bit. All through that speech—and I think correctly—the minister suggested that there were two extremes in the world; and the safe and sane and only course for this country to pursue was to provide a cushion between the extremes, so that there would not be any fear of a clash or a war during our lifetime. I agree with him on that. But I cannot see the government to which he belongs following that particular course at this time. I myself do not think that we are doing all we could. I do not think that we are living up to our obligations under the United Nations charter. I agree with the last speaker that psychoanalyzing the East, understanding them, solving their difficulties, and all that kind of thing, is a pretty tough proposition so far as we are concerned. But we have made certain commitments within the United Nations Organization that we as a country can live up to. I do not think we are living up to them. I want to qualify that by saying that I think the main requirement in the world today is to feed hungry people. With that in mind the United Nations have set up the food and agricultural organization. That body of experts from all over the world decided on certain policies; they decided on certain things that should be done with regard to feeding hungry people. At some time in this debate I should like the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) to tell us whether we as a country are doing all we can to live up to the proposals made by that particular branch of the United Nations. I do not think we are, and that is something we can do.

Secondly, I do not think we are living up to our obligations under the United Nations charter in not accepting the report of a committee of experts on economic affairs, which was recently made. The main consideration of the committee in that particular report was to devise ways and means within each country to maintain full employment. Certain recommendations were made. They are rather lengthy. I imagine most hon. members have read them. I am not going to quote them tonight. Boiled down, the committee recommended that in each country, in so far as it was possible, full employment should be maintained. They recommended certain measures that should be adopted if employment was slipping. For example, they recommended a public investment program. They recommended some social security measures; they recommended keeping purchasing power as high as it possibly could be kept if the unemployment figure went above what they considered a normal level which was, I think, around 4 or 5 per cent of the working population. Our figure has gone beyond that. We have a large number of people unemployed in the country. I do not think that any of the main recommendations of the committee have been acted upon by this government. The fact of the matter is the reverse is true, because our representative in that particular field did not agree with them. I have a copy of his statement to the committee on the measures that they recommended for the purpose of maintaining full employment. He disagreed with them completely. He told them that as far as he was concerned they should lie in abeyance until such time as the government had an opportunity to study them, and so forth. He felt that the recommendations made by these experts from every country in the world in that particular field were impracticable and could not be applied in this country at this time. If they could not be applied in this country at this time, or back in September, 1949, then they could not be applied in any country in the world; because, in my opinion, this is the only country that has surplus resources on which people could be put to work. I think we are falling down in that respect. The least we can do is to do the things that are possible within our own country that come within the structure of the United Nations.

It is not hard to disillusion people and to make them sceptical and doubtful. We have heard a lot of high-sounding talk in the last ten years, and particularly in the last three or four years. I heard the leader of the opposition refer to the Atlantic charter. In his election campaign Churchill claimed great credit for the writing of the Atlantic charter. What did it mean? It did not mean anything. It was merely a propaganda statement, drafted for war purposes, on the eve of the invasion, to stimulate the troops in that invasion. It was only a formal document. It meant nothing legally and the people have come to that conclusion. They know that now because in effect Roosevelt said so himself. It was merely a propaganda document to stimulate people and to spur them on to a greater war effort. All of the language that was contained in the Atlantic charter about free access to raw materials of the world, and so forth, was just so much eyewash. It did not mean a thing. We have to start doing things if we are to come through this period right side up.

The discussion brought on by the Secretary of State for External Affairs at this time on the question of the recognition of China is an important one. It is one that should be thoroughly understood. I got the impression that in bringing it on at this time the minister is merely flying a kite for the purpose of getting all the information he can on the subject. I think he is testing public opinion and is looking at the editorials in the press. That is exactly what I would be doing if I were in his place, and had to deal with this particular subject at this time, because I know—and we might as well be quite frank in admitting this—that there is a lot of pressure being put on at this time by sectarian sources. So far as I am concerned I do not let these things influence me. There is a certain world condition, and if in the judgment of a majority of the members of this house and of the government a certain something should be done, then so far as the house is concerned that is what should be done, because in handling this particular situation we may be hitting the key to the future; and if we strike the wrong key and someone starts throwing atomic bombs around, they will not be either Catholic or Protestant; they will be straight atomic bombs without any discrimination, and we had better have a thorough understanding of it.

The leader of this group has already said that so far as he is concerned he thinks we should recognize China at this time. The leader of the opposition has taken an adamant stand to the effect that he does not think we should. He thinks it is the road to appeasement. Well, no one should know the route to appeasement better than that party—and I am not saying that to cast any reflection upon the present leader of the opposition. But I do know they were behind appeasement as it developed before the last war, and leading into it. However, I shall not comment further upon that.

Then the government are doing exactly what I said they were doing. They are flying a kite—and I do not blame them because, in the final analysis, it is their responsibility. They are the ones who have to make the decision. I cannot see much similarity between the position developing now and the one which prevailed before the last war on the question of appeasement. I do not think we are appeasing anyone.

I am not concerned about the legal aspect of the matter. Someone said this afternoon that some professor had made a decision based upon international law to the effect that we have to recognize the fact that a certain government is there—and that that is international law. The question which arises in my mind is this: Who writes the international law? Certainly there is no international government, nor is there any statute as such. It is merely the opinion of someone who is a "supernatural" lawyer. He hands it on and some think it must be accepted as gospel. I am not concerned at all about that aspect of the matter.

I am concerned about the position of Canada, and her relations with China, and whether we are able to give the Canadian people an intelligent lead from the House of Commons. We have recognized many satellite countries, not because we liked them or because we liked their philosophies, but simply because they are there. We have established trade relations with them, and that is about all.

Our position with respect to China, as I see it, is this: In that country there are 450 million people who, because of mismanagement in the past, a lack of the means of life, and a high degree of manipulation, are prepared to accept anything in preference to what they had. That is the kind of government they have in China today.

There is much talk about an iron curtain, lack of opportunity, and getting in to tell the people what we are trying to do. Well, instead of appeasement, as set out by the leader of the opposition, are we not in a position where we must ask ourselves whether we are willing to close the door on China, have another iron curtain, and cut them off completely from any relationship with the outside world, thus throwing them directly into the arms of Russia?

Is it not better for us at this time to recognize the fact that, so far as China is concerned, there is no complete control of that country today?—and I do not think anyone, at least during our lifetime, will have complete control of it. It is in a fluid state. The armies of a certain section representing communism are in there, but they have not much to work on. My recollection of the Chinese people is that they are most versatile, and it will not be easy to ignore them.

Is it not better for us now to recognize what Great Britain recognized? She recognized China because she was faced with an immediate war, with the possibility of being driven out of Hong Kong. Indeed, I do not believe she could have held on. So, was it not better for her to stay there and to hold that section of China so that she could open up trade relations and have people in that country working along with the Chinese people at this time, while the situation is still fluid within that country?

Would it not be better for us to do that now? Would we not be wise to establish trade relations because, whether we like it or not, we are part of the United Nations set-up? In my opinion the delegates from the present government of China will be recognized and within the near future will be seated within the United Nations. Where is there any appeasement in our wanting to take the only logical step we could take at this time, that of keeping in there and helping the Chinese straighten out the mess they have at the present time?

I come from a riding which is well informed on international affairs, and in which there is an old established union with a co-operative set-up. They have studied this question thoroughly. I was in touch with them on it while I was home, and I have no hesitation in making the statement here that they believe this is the responsibility of the government.

The minister has set out certain definite steps which must be taken before recognition is granted. When these steps are taken and when the government is assured that the government they are going to recognize and with which they are going to establish relations can live up to its international obligations, then I believe it would be proper for this government to take those steps and thus keep as close as possible to the Chinese people.

I have no hesitation in saying that, and I believe the great majority of people outside the house would support the government, if they understood the situation. However, most people are confused by the double talk they hear on this matter. So many people are afraid to take any stand until they see which way the straws are blowing, with the result that people do not have leadership and do not understand. Then, they are confused by the editorials in the different newspapers, one pulling this way and the other that—not because they are particularly concerned with the government's responsibility but because they can make certain propaganda and capital out of the subject. The result is that people are confused. This question is so serious and can create so much confusion that I believe the minister and the government are entitled to the expression of definite opinions, without any double talk, as to where each member stands. In this way the people outside may be enlightened and have a clear lead from the House of Commons.

Ninety-five per cent of those who sent us here have not the time to read and understand the implications of all these matters. Members have that time, and should make a study of these subjects. It is my belief that members of the House of Commons are morally obligated to give the people some understanding of what should be done when a matter of this kind comes up—because this question may become the key to the future, so far as war is concerned.

I should like to see the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Pearson) take strong steps within his own party for full implementation of the recommendation of committees within the United Nations structure, because I do not think in the world today there is any country in a better position to carry out the recommendations with regard to full employment and the recommendations made by FAO. I believe if we can show our people, people outside and those within the structure of the United Nations, that Canada is accepting her commitments and living up to them, it will be the best way to influence the Czechs, the Yugoslavs and the Chinese, and all those who go with them.

I believe I have said in the house many times that I am not afraid of a shooting war. First, I do not think the United States will ever take aggressive action to start a war. Secondly, I do not think there is any country in the world more afraid of war than Russia. As I see Russia today, and as I have seen her for some time, she is in much the same position as Germany was in 1944. She has spread herself—and the farther she spreads the weaker she gets. Today I see her as the fly who captured the flypaper—he was there, and he was stuck with it. When a country has to police half of Europe, and then pitch in and help China, and has her forces scattered all over the world, she is not getting any stronger.

If someone wanted to shoot tomorrow, what do you think the Czechs would do, or the Poles, or the Roumanians, or the Bulgarians? Do not make any mistake about it, nobody knows better than Joe Stalin what will happen. There will be a roorback. These people are not subjected. They are under the hand of the Soviet for the time being. I cannot see Uncle Joe wanting to start a shooting war and perhaps open up his own borders to counter-revolution. I do not think the United States of America will ever toss either an atomic bomb or a hydrogen bomb. I do not think they are built that way. I do not think they have any imperialistic, expansionist aims.

This cold war that Russia has been throwing at us is all part of the game. Anyone who has read the philosophy of the program of the communist party—and I think most hon. members here have—will know that the period they are in now is known as the period of national revolutions; that is, promote revolution within each country as you go along, and have your satellites take over. That is their program now. Their program is not to start shooting. But if they can create unemployment and bring about the inevitable break-down of capitalism, as they say—create confusion and chaos and soften the people up—that is good propaganda for Russia. It is good propaganda to build up their machine within this country.

Hitler did the same thing. It is not new. It is the totalitarian method of conquering a country. They are doing now exactly what Hitler did prior to the outbreak of war. The people in Europe were starving. Hitler was offering them bread. He asked them to give up their freedom. All we have ever said to them is, "Cling to your freedom"—freedom to go hungry when you have not any bread. We must offer them both freedom and something to eat. The game is the same today as it was prior to 1939. It is just being played by a bigger and a better card player; that is all. But I think we have learned something ourselves in the meantime. I trust that the minister will have good luck and good health in the administration of his department, and I hope that he will occasionally pick up this copy of The Canadian Unionist, have a look at it and read back his speech. In my opinion that speech is a masterpiece; it is worth reading. I advise every member of the House of Commons to read it. I hope that he will apply the philosophy contained in that speech at every step of the way as he goes along, both nationally and internationally.

Mr. Alistair Stewart (Winnipeg North): After listening to the hon. member for Cape Breton South (Mr. Gillis), Mr. Speaker, I always find that he has expressed a certain amount of common elementary horse sense which is most refreshing. Once again he has done so in this debate on international affairs. It was opened last Friday by the minister, and much of the discussion which has followed has centred around the recognition of China. It is not a matter about which I am greatly excited. Last November, during the course of the last debate, I said that the recognition of China had to be an ad hoc business, that we should recognize China before it was too late to get advantage of the recognition but not so early that we might give aid and comfort to a regime that we disliked. Obviously that last qualification has disappeared. I still repeat that the recognition of China is not a matter of ideology. It is a matter of assessing the facts of the situation and acting accordingly.

I was asked by a friend on Saturday afternoon what I thought of the minister's speech and about what he had to say in it. To some it may have appeared to be a rather prosaic statement of the facts of the situation, but I could only describe it by an analogy, by saying that he started off with a pack of hounds along a certain defined track, and on occasion one of the hounds would pull away from the pack and go into the brush; but before he got too far the minister had whistled him back to join the pack and at the end of the journey they were once again all together. I think it would have been much more interesting had the minister permitted some of these intellectual hounds to wander still further into the underbrush; but for his own good reasons he has refrained from doing so.

Following upon his statement there was a speech made by the leader of the Conservative party. On listening to it I came to the conclusion that the hon. gentleman was asking for a jehad, for a holy war against the infidel. When I read the speech, however, I was much less certain that I was right; and when I reread it, I must admit that I am still even more uncertain as to what he meant. I think that his whole statement might be boiled down to this sentence which I quote from page 466 of Hansard:

> But the highest duty of every government today . . . is to demand that there shall be common action, and that there shall be a clear and uniform pattern of strategy which will be known to the people of the free nations, and which will be known in the clearest detail to the nations which threaten our peace and security.

But what form of common action? Does he envisage common action under the United Nations or common action under the Pacific pact which he would like to see but which is, as yet, impossible. If not, under what aegis does he envisage this common action and how would he like it to take form? It is hinted at again at page 462 of Hansard where he is reported as saying:

> The territorial ambitions of the Soviet empire . . . are not limited except by recognition of the fact that there may be some point beyond which they dare not go.

But again he left questions in my mind. What is the point at which the Soviet union will stop? Does the leader of the opposition know that point; or does Mr. Stalin, for that matter, know it? I do not know, and I think the leader of the Conservative party ought to give his opinion as to where that point is. Is it in Viet Nam? Is it in Malaya? Is it in Thailand or is it even as far as India?

Then as reported at page 463 he talks again of firm action and he says:

> When I say "firm action" I mean the kind of united action to preserve peace which the Russians will recognize today just as the Germans would have recognized it either in 1914 or in 1939.

But again he has left too many "i's" undotted and too many "t's" uncrossed. It seems to me as though he desires to impose his terms upon the Russians, and I do not think there is any nation in the world today which can impose terms of any kind on that country. As reported at page 465 of Hansard, for instance, he tells us this:

> Appeasement is going to go no further; we have learned the lessons of the past and there will be no truck and trade with tyranny of this kind unless and until they are at least prepared to accept the ordinary standards of international conduct.

Again the hon. gentleman seems to wish to impose upon the Russians his desire and his conception of the ordinary standards of international conduct. I am afraid that his standards and mine differ, because only too frequently the standards of international conduct which we have seen in operation are the standards of the jungle. He asks for peace, yes. He tells us that his speech is geared to peace. But again I suggest that the peace which he envisages is peace on our terms; and the Russians I think have already made it amply clear that they are not prepared to accept those terms.

He stated that there should be no recognition of Mao until common action is decided upon. The view has already been expressed, I think, that common action now is impossible in view of the fact that certain members of the commonwealth and of the Pacific area have already recognized Mao while others, including the United States, have not. I suggest further that common action is impossible in a world of national sovereign states, where what will most appeal to a state is its national interests. The British have recognized Mao not because they like him but because they thought it was essential for trading relationships that they should do so. The Americans have not recognized him for their own good reasons, not the least of which is the matter of prestige.

How then can we reconcile these two national views? The leader of the official opposition (Mr. Drew) also asked members of the house to express their views on the matter of recognition. He stated that the Mao regime was imposed by force. I am not prepared to dispute that, but nevertheless it is very obvious that it was a force which was acceptable to the great mass of the Chinese people. It was a force which was acceptable to the peasants and the workers in the cities, and also to the intellectuals of China. Obviously the Kuomintang regime had little hold on the loyalty or affections of the Chinese people. One has only to consider the defections of the Chinese armies, and the constant surrender after surrender of Chinese cities to realize that Chiang had little hope of holding either these towns or the loyalty of the people. The reason he had little hope was that the communists offered the people of China food. A bowl of rice today in China is an infinitely greater argument than all of the ideologies which the wit of man has devised. We have to learn again the lesson that the strongest argument against communism in Asia today is food. And now we see Formosa groaning under the bureaucracy of nationalist refugees, and also under threat from the Peking government. I think there is little doubt but that island will eventually fall.

There are certain arguments for recognition. I have already advanced one of them, the national interests of our country. I am not prepared to say exactly when and at what time China should be recognized, but there is another aspect of the situation which must be considered and that is that the recognition of China undoubtedly is a weapon in the strategy of the cold war which is being waged all across the globe. Non-recognition by the western powers may mean a surrender by default to Moscow of leadership which we ought to be giving Asia. That is one of the dangers which we face.

We know that Mao signed an agreement with the authorities at the Kremlin. On the face of it, it appears to be not unfavourable to the Peking government. They are going to get the help of certain technicians from Russia. They are going to be given back certain cities in Manchuria, and we shall have to wait until 1952 to see if that promise materializes. They are getting a loan of some $300 million spread over five or six years which, so far as the rehabilitation of China is concerned, is nothing but a drop in the bucket. Nevertheless one can adduce that as evidence to show that there is close integration between Peking and Moscow. I should like the house to remember that even although that agreement exists China is not necessarily lost. If Moscow is going to behave towards China as it has behaved towards other countries which communist parties have taken over; in other words, if Moscow is going to try to make China another satellite nation, then I am certain that the Russian policy is doomed to failure.

On the other hand, I am equally certain that we cannot make an ally of China. Therefore our policy should be designed to try to ensure its neutrality, and anything which looks like hostility towards that country will have the effect merely of pushing it further into the arms of the Russians. Today in Asia communism is not the strongest force. Nationalism is the strongest, and after nationalism the desire for economic progress. We have to realize these things, and if we do then I think the west is capable of giving the lead which is so essential.

There was another part of the argument of the leader of the opposition which rather intrigued me. In part he objected to the recognition of China on legalistic grounds, but at the same time and in the same speech he welcomed the recognition which had been accorded Viet Nam. I do not know on what grounds he did so because there is infinitely less reason in law for recognizing Viet Nam than there is for recognizing China. On the other hand, it may be that his argument is the moral one that we detest and despise communism and therefore we should not give the accolade of recognition to any such regime. If we are going to argue on a moral basis then we must be consistent, and we must be prepared to withdraw recognition from those communist-dominated nations to whom we have already accorded it. I will go much further than that and say that communist-dominated nations are not the only ones whose customs I dislike intensely. I would think if we are going to be thoroughly logical in our moral condemnation we have to go the whole way, and if we do that we will have to cut down our diplomatic staff until it is perhaps the size of a corporal's guard.

I said that Viet Nam does not satisfy the legal conditions necessary for recognition. Again that is not a matter which worries me unduly because recognition of Viet Nam is not a legal matter. It is a diplomatic maneouvre and another step in the cold war. I think we ought to give some consideration to what is happening in that country because of the consequences of the actions of the western powers and of Russia. There are two factions in Viet Nam. The first is headed by Bao Dai. He is a French puppet who was educated in Europe. I am informed he is a bit of a playboy, but then he is youthful. He abdicated in 1946 and afterwards served under Ho. On the other hand there is Ho Chi Minh, his great rival. He is a communist agent, one who worked with Borodin in China, one who is playing a very skilful and cagey game today. He is the one of course who is recognized by Russia, and that is important because I do not think Russia would have recognized Ho unless the Kremlin had been reasonably certain that he was going to be successful in his struggle. The house will remember that Russia did not recognize the insurgents in Greece, but they have given recognition to Ho who may of course have received the kiss of death recently when he found that Tito had also accorded him diplomatic recognition.

There are certain arguments in favour of the recognition of Bao Dai. The first is that recognition by the United States, the United Kingdom, and France, as one would expect, has raised his prestige amongst the native population, an argument which is probably quite valid. Another is that he controls the large centres of population in Viet Nam. Nevertheless over the whole picture I doubt very much whether he controls the loyalty of 25 per cent of the people of that country, and certainly he does not control the majority of the land mass. It has been argued that he is the only alternative to Ho and that we could do nothing else. It is perhaps also true that we are endeavouring to support France, that the French wished to recognize Bao Dai to preserve to some extent the stability of the French government on this matter, and it was essential to go along with their desires. Perhaps the best argument of all is that the reality of the cold war demanded that recognition.

On the other hand—and I am presenting these alternatives to the house—there are arguments against it. In the first place Bao Dai is obviously a French puppet. He does not control the foreign affairs of his country and he does not control the armies of his country.

He does not control the finances of his country, nor does he control the judiciary. All these come under the control of France; and until the people of Viet Nam have more control and more to say in their own country I doubt very much whether it will be possible to persuade the nationalists to swing in behind Bao. What we in the western world seem to have done is try to bolster a colonial regime. We are faced with the fact that the Russians have recognized Ho; and having recognized him, they may feel it right and proper to support him. The western world has recognized

Bao, and having done that they have to support him or suffer another loss of prestige. Thus we who wish Bao well may find that whether we like it or not we have become mixed up in a civil war in this country in southeast Asia; and that is a great and grave responsibility for us to undertake. Once again we seem to have been manoeuvred into the support of a regime whose only merit is that it is anti-communist; and that is not a good enough way either to contain or defeat communism. This is a distinct testing ground if ever there was one; and if we wish to see Bao successful he will require something more than good wishes. The western world will have to realize that it has material obligations to him as well.

Perhaps if the minister is going to close this debate he will be able to enlighten us still further as to what happened at the Ceylon conference when the majority of the commonwealth members agreed to recognize Bao but Mr. Nehru held out against them on the ground, which I think was good and sufficient, that Bao's position is something more than precarious.

In his speech the minister dealt with another matter that is worthy of careful thought. He gave us a résumé of Russian proposals for the control of the atomic bomb and pointed out that there has been no significant change in the Russian position over the last two or three years. Two things are obvious. In the first place the Baruch plan—I call it that though it has been amended—is not acceptable to Russia. In the second place they are not prepared to agree to full-time inspection. That is not a new position but one they have taken right from the beginning; and these are facts which must be considered. In his remarks the minister said Vishinsky's proposal does not give us that security under international control which is essential if we are to sign any international agreement. That is true; it does not give us very much security. But there is no security at all today; and perhaps even the most limited degree of security will offer a little more hope than the nothing we now possess. Since Russia obviously has the atomic bomb I suggest that there is less reason than ever for expecting her to accept the United States proposals which were put forward two or three years ago.

What then is going to be our answer to this Russian refusal? We must have some answer. Again the minister gave a glimmer of hope when he said we must keep open every road and every path in the search for survival. I think we may agree that today there is no complete defence against enemy attack; but unfortunately the only answer of the west is to find greater means of destruction in the hope that we can make an enemy suffer more than we do. That is not the most constructive or most sensible approach to the problem. We in the west seem to be obsessed with the idea of increasing our military power under the illusion that it is going to make us safe. I maintain that it will do nothing of the sort; that if that is the extent of our answer to the Russian "no" there is no safety at all.

So we must have some sort of control, no matter how inadequate it may be. While I am not prepared to accept everything the Russians suggest, at the same time I do think we have to settle down a bit ourselves until we can find some common ground for discussion. We must find some sort of control not only over the atomic bomb but over the right to wage war. Even if Russia accepted the Baruch plan, can one say there is any fully proved method of achieving security under it? I doubt it, with a nation the size of Russia. So we have to start again.

There has been a change in tactics and also, in certain quarters, a change in outlook. I read an editorial in yesterday's Ottawa Journal commenting upon something which Mr. Lilienthal said in condemnation of certain scientists who feared that the advent of the hydrogen bomb might mean the end of the world. He called their statements intellectual nonsense. This editorial went further, and said that Hiroshima was a pin point in the world, and that even if the hydrogen bomb should be a hundred thousand times worse it could not be very much more devastating. Hiroshima was not a pin point, and here is surely an example of the moral stultification which many have reached. What happened at Hiroshima was that thousands of innocent people were murdered in the name of war. I do not attack the use of the bomb, nor do I defend it, but surely in heaven's name Hiroshima was something more than a pin point on this map. In the body physical a pin point may mean the beginning of a cancer which will cause death. In the body politic that sort of pin point may also lead ineluctably to the same sort of death. Hiroshima was not a mere pin point. Time after time in this same newspaper I have seen the editors invoking Christian beliefs; yet by their own moral paralysis they have shown that these beliefs have very little meaning to them, when they count the death of tens of thousands of innocent people as merely a pin point. That perhaps is an interpolation, yet I felt I had to say it.

I say there has to be a change in tactics. Containment in the negative sense obviously is not enough. Containment allied with a desire to improve the condition of peoples throughout the world might have worked, but I do not think we are doing quite enough to help. Growing sums of money are being spent on weapons, but surely we should learn the lesson of history that when we spend more money on weapons our possible antagonists also are going to spend more. The eventual result must be growing fear, growing tension, and the distinct possibility of war.

Today almost everything is being placed second to the illusion of national security. In the North Atlantic pact we are trying to provide ourselves with security, but again we have not gone far enough. Here Canada has a grave responsibility, because the government, rightly and properly, insisted on the insertion of article 2 in that treaty. That is the article which deals with closer economic collaboration. Unless we can get rid of the economic rivalry and economic war which now exists, we are not going to find the security we want in military co-operation. We must have economic as well as military co-operation; then there may be for us an element of safety. I believe it is the responsibility of the government to press that view not only in private but also, if necessary, in public.

So far as I am concerned, I firmly believe that it is national sovereignty that is keeping the world in a turmoil. Until we get rid of national sovereignty, I see no hope of ultimate security. We have learned a lesson in surrendering some of our own individual rights in our communities. Each of us has been required to give up some part of his individual sovereignty to the community, so that it could maintain law and order. In that way, security and freedom have been maintained. We have not yet had the intelligence to project that lesson into the field of international affairs. Until we have seized the initiative, and attempted to catch the imagination of the people of the world, we shall not succeed in containing communism. The suggestion I have to make may be greeted with a certain amount of derision in some quarters, but I do think we could seize the initiative by suggesting at the United Nations that an element of national sovereignty be surrendered to that collective body. This element of national sovereignty would, of course, deal with national defence.

I do not think for a moment that the offer would be accepted by the Russians or by their satellites, but at least we would have made the offer. If that does not work, then we have to try to achieve something within a narrower group. The only group I can see is that composed of our allies in the North Atlantic treaty. If we do that, if we collectively give up part of our sovereignty then I can see hope. I believe this government has to give leadership, not only to the people of Canada, but as we can and as we must do, to the people of the world.

Mr. Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the house to adopt the motion?

Mr. Hansell: No, Mr. Speaker, I would beg leave to move the adjournment of the debate.

Motion agreed to and debate adjourned.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Fournier (Hull) moved the adjournment of the house.

He said: Tomorrow we shall resume the debate on the address.

Motion agreed to and the house adjourned at 10.50 p.m.

APPENDIX

FURTHER CORRESPONDENCE BETWEEN THE PRIME MINISTER AND PREMIERS OF SOME OF THE PROVINCES WITH RESPECT TO PROPOSED DOMINION-PROVINCIAL CONFERENCE

OFFICE OF THE PREMIER
Province of British Columbia

Victoria, February 10, 1950

Right Hon. Louis S. St. Laurent,
Prime Minister of Canada,
Parliament Buildings,
Ottawa, Canada.

My dear Mr. Prime Minister:

I have for acknowledgment your letter of January 27, and may say that the government of the province of British Columbia will be pleased to participate in a conference to discuss questions of common concern to the provincial and federal governments at a time to be designated.

I note your desire to have my views regarding matters to be discussed at the conference in the fall. I shall be pleased to forward you my comments regarding the agenda following the prorogation of the British Columbia legislature.

With kindest personal regards,

Yours faithfully,

Byron I. Johnson

OFFICE OF THE PREMIER
Province of Newfoundland

St. John's, February 17, 1950

Right Hon. Louis S. St. Laurent, K.C., M.P., Prime Minister of Canada,
Ottawa.

Dear Mr. Prime Minister:

This government will be most happy to attend the dominion-provincial conference which you have called for the coming autumn. We have at the moment nothing in particular to suggest for the agenda, but will govern ourselves largely by the suggestions which our sister provinces will submit to you.

With all good wishes,

As ever,

Cordially yours,

J. R. Smallwood

OFFICE OF THE PRIME MINISTER
Province of Quebec

Quebec, February 22, 1950

Right Hon. Louis S. St. Laurent, K.C., P.C., Prime Minister of Canada,
Ottawa.

Mr. Prime Minister:

The very important additional work necessitated by the session of the legislature of Quebec has prevented me from writing you before today on the subject of your letter of the 6th of February, concerning the new Canadian intergovernmental conference in September or October next.

I wrote you December 14 last:

"The government of the province of Quebec is always pleased to co-operate in the pursuit of the provinces' and the country's welfare and prosperity, on a basis of fairness and within the framework of constitutionality.

"The Ottawa conferences obviously involve a considerable amount of trouble and inconvenience for provincial authorities. Nevertheless we accept that with pleasure, when it results in greater prosperity and progress for the Canadian confederation and for the provinces of which it consists and which have given it birth."

In your letter you say:

"But there are other problems of interest to both the federal and the provincial authorities. It is with a view to discussing these problems that I made my proposal of a general conference next fall."

Do you not believe, Mr. Prime Minister, that it would be opportune to proceed in a way that would not complicate or delay the solving of our constitutional problems? In our humble opinion the multiplicity of conferences could result in making the situation more difficult.

Assuredly, apart from the constitutional questions which were the object of the conference in January, and the vital questions mentioned in the letter which I wrote to you on the 1st of February, there are numerous other problems in this connection. To mention just a few—and this is obviously not complete—there are the problems relating to the exclusive rights of the provinces in the matter of insurance, unemployment, radio broadcasting, etc., etc.

Are you of the opinion, Mr. Prime Minister, that it would be practicable to consider all these problems together? Don't you think that we should first study and decide the fundamental questions in respect to the rights of the federal authorities and provincial authorities in fiscal matters? It seems to us necessary to establish first in a precise and incontestable manner the fiscal powers of each authority, that is to say, our means of action and possibilities of realization.

You may rest assured, Mr. Prime Minister, that it is the sincere desire of the government of the province of Quebec to co-operate diligently and in a friendly way in the study and the settlement of all these problems on a just and constitutional basis.

It is our firm conviction that these problems ought to be studied and decided without any partisan approach. It is our most ardent wish, respectful of the rights of all, to co-operate for the progress and prosperity of Canada and of the provinces, and of ours in particular.

The cordial invitation of the government of Quebec to hold these conferences in the old capital applies to each and every one of them.

Appendix

Accept, Mr. Prime Minister, our sincere greetings and the assurance of our complete willingness to do everything possible to solve these various problems in a friendly, just and constitutional way.

OFFICE OF THE PRIME MINISTER
Canada

Ottawa, February 28, 1950

Hon. Maurice L. Duplessis, M.L.A.,
Premier of the Province of Quebec,
Quebec, Que.

My dear Premier:

I have received your letter of the 22nd of February with further reference to the conference between the federal and provincial governments proposed for next September or October.

The federal government is, like you and your colleagues, convinced that it would not be desirable to complicate or delay the solution of our constitutional problems. We believe, however, that the procedure agreed to at the conference in January constitutes an important step in that direction. We have no desire for a multiplicity of conferences, but, like several of the provincial governments, we are of the opinion that there exist many other problems which require consideration as soon as possible.

As for the particular subjects mentioned in your letter, namely, insurance, unemployment and radio broadcasting, the federal government would certainly have no objection to their being placed on the agenda of the proposed conference, if that is generally desired by the provincial governments. We hope, however, that the question of unemployment will not assume proportions which will make it bulk very large at that time.

It is obvious that any general conference would inevitably be primarily concerned with fiscal questions. While the federal government does not see any possibility of any definite renunciation of constitutional rights in fiscal matters, we do feel that there is plenty of scope for practical workable agreements based on a general desire for co-operation.

In conclusion I may say that we fully share the conviction expressed in your letter that these problems should be studied and decided without the intervention of any partisan considerations.

Louis S. St. Laurent

THE PREMIER
New Brunswick

Fredericton, February 23, 1950

Right Hon. Louis St. Laurent,
Prime Minister of Canada,
Ottawa, Canada.

Dear Mr. Prime Minister:

On January 27 you wrote regarding the proposed dominion-provincial conference suggested for the autumn of this year to discuss general questions of common concern to the provincial and the federal governments and inquiring as to any suggestions we might care to advance for a tentative agenda. This letter was acknowledged on January 31 by my secretary in my absence from Canada.

Since my return I have given thought to this matter and it is my present intention to direct a study by our appropriate departments to the end that this government may shortly advance suggestions in this connection.

I shall be in further communication with you with reference to it shortly.

Yours sincerely,
John B. McNair

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Wednesday, March 8, 1950

The house met at three o'clock.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

SUGGESTED CHANGE IN PRAYER AT OPENING OF DAILY SITTING

Mr. Bona Arsenault (Bonaventure): Mr. Speaker, on a question of privilege, I wish to draw your attention to a matter connected with the House of Commons. I submit that the third paragraph of the prayers of the house is outmoded and not in keeping with the present constitutional status of Canada; nor does it express the intention of members of the House of Commons who wish to include in their prayers all the sovereign states of the commonwealth. Therefore I suggest that the paragraph should be redrafted.

QUEBEC HANDICRAFTS

EXHIBITION IN OTTAWA—INVITATION TO MEMBERS OF HOUSE AND PRESS GALLERY

Mr. Jean Lesage (Montmagny-L'Islet): Mr. Speaker, the members of the house and our friends the members of the press gallery have received an invitation to visit the Quebec handicraft exhibition at the Chateau Laurier tonight at 8.30. I may assure everyone that he will be received with the legendary French-Canadian hospitality. The exhibition itself is a marvel of art and good taste, and is displayed here in Ottawa to show all Canada the refinement our people have attained in the craftsmanship handed down through generations by our forefathers.

As member for Montmagny-L'Islet I am proud to draw your special attention to one of the finest displays: the wood carvings of the world famous Bourgaults of St. Jean Port Joli.

WHEAT

REFERENCE TO ARTICLE IN "GLOBE AND MAIL" OF MARCH 7

Mr. J. A. Ross (Souris): Mr. Speaker, on a question of privilege, in the Globe and Mail of Tuesday, March 7, page 3, appears an article headed "P.C.'s likely to oppose rise in wheat price". The first paragraph of the article reads:

> Progressive Conservatives may be laying the groundwork for an attack on the government's pre-election policy of increasing the initial price paid to western wheat farmers from $1.55 a bushel to $1.75 a bushel, effective April 1, 1949.

I do not think there is any doubt that I have been persistent in pointing out to the house the very great loss suffered by the wheat producers as a result of this wheat policy, and that to some extent the loss should be made good by the government.

Some hon. Members: Question.

Mr. Speaker: Order.

Mr. Ross (Souris): I beg your pardon?

Mr. Speaker: I am asking the house to come to order so that the hon. member for Souris may make his statement without interruption.

Mr. Ross (Souris): Thank you, Mr. Speaker. I shall not quote all the article, because it is lengthy. It is based upon a question I asked the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe) the other day, whether the last report of the wheat board would be referred to the committee on agriculture for further study.

I wish personally to refute the interpretation set forth in the heading of this article. In fairness to the reporter, Mr. Warren Baldwin, may I say that as the report is written I do not think it called for the heading it bears.

COMBINES INVESTIGATION ACT

MATCH INDUSTRY—ANNOUNCEMENT AS TO PROSECUTION

Hon. Stuart S. Garson (Minister of Justice): Mr. Speaker, I should like to refer to the statement I made in the house on February 23 to the effect that the match report under the Combines Investigation Act had been submitted to outside counsel for an opinion as to whether prosecution is warranted. I said then that the opinion was expected in the near future. That opinion has now been received, and it is to the effect that prosecution is warranted. Mr. John G. Ahern, K.C., of Montreal has been retained as senior counsel on behalf of the Attorney General of Canada, and has been instructed to proceed with the prosecution. He will have associated with him Mr. Guy Favreau, barrister, also of Montreal.

Mr. Smith (Calgary West): Is that the same Mr. Ahern who is referred to in the original report?

Mr. Garson: We submitted the report to Mr. Ahern for an opinion as to whether prosecution was warranted. In retaining him to prosecute we are following what has always been the practice in submitting a report to counsel for an opinion as to whether prosecution is warranted, and, if he says it is, he is usually retained.

Mr. Drew: You mean you sometimes do.

Mr. Smith (Calgary West): I read in the report by Mr. McGregor that he is greatly indebted to Mr. Ahern, who had conducted the investigation. Is it the same Mr. Ahern who conducted the investigation, reported to the commissioner, had the report referred to him, said it was all right to go ahead, and then is retained? You have only the one man throughout the whole picture.

Mr. Garson: Yes.

Mr. Claxton: Do you think there should be four or five?

INCOME TAX

FARMERS—CHANGES IN METHOD OF COMPUTING DEPRECIATION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. M. J. Coldwell (Rosetown-Biggar): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of National Revenue with respect to order in council 458, passed on January 31, 1950, making certain changes in computing depreciation. In view of the fact that this order in council was made effective for 1949 taxation and may cause confusion among farmers who, in accordance with the law, filed their interim returns on December 31, will the minister consider delaying its coming into effect for this year?

Hon. R. W. Mayhew (Minister of Fisheries): The Minister of National Revenue is not in his seat today, but I shall have this matter brought to his attention and he can answer tomorrow.

ROYAL CANADIAN MOUNTED POLICE

REMOVAL OF PATROL VESSEL "ST. ROCH" FROM ESQUIMALT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. G. R. Pearkes (Nanaimo): May I direct a question to the Minister of Justice with reference to the R.C.M.P. patrol vessel St. Roch? Is it the intention to remove this patrol vessel from Esquimalt, and, if so, will she be replaced by another vessel?

Hon. Stuart S. Garson (Minister of Justice): The answer to the hon. member's first question is that the St. Roch has been under care and maintenance at Esquimalt since she came out of the western Arctic two years ago. As she can be used to advantage on the east coast this summer, it is the intention to remove her to the east coast for that purpose.

[Mr. Garson.]

The answer to the second question is that the matter is under consideration.

NATIONAL FILM BOARD

QUESTION AS TO REPORT ON MANAGEMENT ACTIVITIES, ETC.

On the orders of the day:

Mr. G. K. Fraser (Peterborough West): Mr. Speaker, I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Resources and Development. At the last session the minister stated that the government had engaged a business management firm to check the management activities, etc., of the national film board. Has that firm completed its report, and, if so, is the minister going to table the report in the house?

Hon. Robert H. Winters (Minister of Resources and Development): The survey by the management firm has been completed but the report has not yet been submitted. I expect that when it is received it will be tabled in the house.

Mr. Fraser: Does the minister know when the report will be made? We should like to have it before the estimates of that department come up.

Mr. Winters: The survey was completed about a week ago, and I do not know how long it takes a management firm to write a report of that kind. I would expect that it will be available within a period of say two weeks.

Mr. Fraser: And the minister will table it?

Mr. Claxton: He did not say that at all.

Mr. Winters: I said that I expected it would be tabled.

PIT PROPS

REPORT AS TO PURCHASES BY TURKEY IN CANADA WITH U. S. FUNDS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. C. T. Richard (Gloucester): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Trade and Commerce. A report was issued yesterday that Turkey was seeking permission to spend United States dollars for the purchase of pit props in eastern Canada. Has the minister any pronouncement to make on the subject?

Right Hon. C. D. Howe (Minister of Trade and Commerce): I have not seen the report referred to. Turkey has been a purchaser of pit props in the past. Negotiations with that country have been in progress, and probably the report is correct.

DOMINION ELECTIONS

REPORT ON TRIAL OF ANNAPOLIS-KINGS ELECTION PETITION—QUESTION AS TO SETTING UP OF SPECIAL COMMITTEE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): I should like to direct a question to the Prime Minister. In view of the fact that the report on the Annapolis-Kings election, tabled in the house by Mr. Speaker on March 6, included recommendations to the House of Commons that changes be made in the elections act or in the elections regulations, may I ask whether consideration is being given to setting up a special committee on the elections act and referring that report to such a committee?

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister): Consideration had been given to the setting up of a committee on the elections act even before this report was received. The house will remember that there were special provisions in the terms of union with Newfoundland which enabled the chief electoral officer to adapt the Dominion Elections Act to actual conditions in Newfoundland for the first general election. But the chief electoral officer has not that power now that the general election has taken place, and in order to make the elections act fit the situation in Newfoundland the chief electoral officer has advised me that amendments will be required. My colleagues and I are waiting for further recommendations from him for the purpose of having the material submitted to a committee to consider the elections act.

Mr. Knowles: Will this report be referred to that committee as well?

Mr. St. Laurent: The chief electoral officer has told me that the practice is for him to make recommendations, and in addition to submit all representations made to him by any interested parties.

Mr. Higgins: Arising out of the answer of the Prime Minister to the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre, I should like to ask him whether the provisions of the Dominion Elections Act are legally enforceable in Newfoundland.

Mr. St. Laurent: They have been declared to be a part of the laws of Canada which apply to the new province of Newfoundland, but there are some expressions in the Dominion Elections Act for which no application can be found in the province of Newfoundland.

WHEAT

INQUIRY AS TO PAYMENT ON SALES, 1945 TO 1949

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. G. Diefenbaker (Lake Centre): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Trade and Commerce, arising out of a number of representations and resolutions which have been received from farmers' organizations in the western provinces on the question whether there will be any further payment this spring by the wheat board on account of the sales of wheat during the years 1945 to 1949. Is the minister in position to say whether consideration has been given by the board to that matter in particular?

Right Hon. C. D. Howe (Minister of Trade and Commerce): The matter is under study, but there are difficulties. The number of cheques involved is something like 1,200,000, as it involves the payments on five crops. The cost of making the interim payments is estimated by the board to be about $500,000. I have not been able to refer the matter to my colleagues to obtain a decision as to whether or not payment should be made under these circumstances.

Mr. Diefenbaker: If it is possible to do so before spring work commences, I know it would be appreciated.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS

COLLISION OF EXPRESS TRAINS BETWEEN MONTREAL AND HALIFAX

On the orders of the day:

Mr. W. J. Browne (St. John's West): Mr. Speaker, a few days ago I directed a question to the Minister of Transport about a collision between two express trains on the main line of the Canadian National Railways between Montreal and Halifax. The minister said he would have the answer in a few days.

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (Minister of Transport): I asked the officials of the Canadian National Railways for a report. I am sorry I have not yet received it, but when I do I shall be glad to give the information to the hon. member.

SHIPPING OF POTATOES AND TURNIPS—SUPPLY OF REEFER CARS IN PRINCE EDWARD ISLAND

On the orders of the day:

Mr. W. Chester S. McLure (Queens): Mr. Speaker, I desire to direct an urgent question to the Minister of Transport. It arises out of long-distance telephone calls from Charlottetown and Toronto which I received just before coming into the house. Will the minister advise, instruct and demand that the Canadian National Railways provide reefer cars for the shipment of potatoes and turnips from Prince Edward Island? The shortage of reefer cars at the present time is the greatest they have experienced in years.

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (Minister of Transport): I shall be glad to make a survey of the position in Prince Edward Island so far as reefer cars are concerned, and make a statement to the house.

HOUSING

REPORT AS TO ONTARIO PLAN FOR CONSTRUCTION AND SALE UNDER DOMINION-PROVINCIAL AGREEMENT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. W. Noseworthy (York South): I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Resources and Development. Has there been any discussion between his department and the provincial authorities at Queen's Park, Toronto, as to the housing policy announced there two days ago, namely, that of building and selling houses under a joint dominion-provincial agreement with no down payment? Has that policy the approval of the federal government?

Hon. Robert H. Winters (Minister of Resources and Development): I thank the hon. member for giving me notice of his question. In yesterday morning's papers I saw a Canadian Press report in which Premier Frost is reported to have said it was possible that no down payment would be required. I am not aware of the context from which Premier Frost's remarks were taken, and I do not think it is safe or fair to interpret them as a statement of policy at this stage.

INQUIRY FOR RETURNS

IRRIGATION, PRAIRIE PROVINCES—PRAIRIE FARM REHABILITATION, SASKATCHEWAN

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. R. Argue (Assiniboia): I should like to direct a question to the Secretary of State. On October 31 last two motions for production of papers were passed in my name, and on December 7 last an order for return was passed in my name. None of these documents has yet been produced. Will the minister look into the matter in order that they may be brought down at an early day?

Hon. F. G. Bradley (Secretary of State): I shall be glad to do so.

[Mr. McLure.]

HOUSE OF COMMONS

CLOCKS IN CORRIDORS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. G. K. Fraser (Peterborough West): I should like to ask the Minister of Public Works if he will be kind enough to have the clocks in the corridors of the House of Commons attended to. Some of them are out as much as half an hour.

Hon. Alphonse Fournier (Minister of Public Works): Mr. Speaker, the moment I am through with my work in the house I will attend to the clocks.

SPEECH FROM THE THRONE

CONTINUATION OF DEBATE ON ADDRESS IN REPLY

The house resumed, from Monday, March 6, consideration of the motion of Mr. F. H. Larson for an address to His Excellency the Governor General in reply to his speech at the opening of the session, and the amendment thereto of Mr. Drew, and the amendment to the amendment of Mr. Coldwell.

Mr. W. G. Blair (Lanark): Mr. Speaker, the debate on the address in reply to the speech from the throne provides an opportunity for members to bring before parliament conditions affecting the welfare of the ridings which they represent. The constituency of Lanark, which I have the honour to represent, has for years been the centre of the cheese industry in the Dominion of Canada. Because of the type of land it is well suited for pasturage, and there are large areas of fertile tillable ground for field crops. The county of Lanark had its place in the establishment of the cheese trade with Great Britain as far back as sixty years ago, and especially Cheddar cheese. Near the Canadian Pacific Railway station in Perth there is a monument commemorating the fact that the largest cheese ever made in the world was manufactured there. The Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) will remember this, because he was present and officially unveiled the monument some years ago.

The story of the mammoth cheese is of interest in view of our trade relations with Great Britain, especially as to the export market for Cheddar cheese. I am going to tell the house the story of how the export trade in Cheddar cheese was first initiated with Great Britain. The mammoth cheese was originally made for exhibition at the Chicago world's fair of 1893. Officials of the dairy branch of the Department of Agriculture co-operated with the Lanark county cheesemakers in producing it. A great press of steel boiler plate was erected to accommodate the casing of the cheese. The casing was nine feet in diameter, six feet high and weighed 3,000 pounds. The estimated weight of the cheese was 22,000 pounds, and 272,000 pounds of milk were used in its manufacture. The total weight of the cheese with its casing and cover was thirteen tons.

The cheese was kept during the winter at a constant temperature of 40 degrees Fahrenheit. In order to arrange for its exhibition at the Chicago world's fair it was necessary to build a special stand, and a special truck had to be built for hauling. The truck was a massive affair specially designed to increase the impression of size made by the cheese. When the time came to move the cheese to Chicago it was loaded on a flat car, and another car carried four 1,000-pound cheeses made in the county of Glengarry. The Canadian Pacific Railway Company provided a special train. When the mammoth cheese arrived at the Chicago exhibition it caused some excitement by crashing through the floor, which was too weak for the concentrated weight of the cheese. This caused so much publicity that newspapers gave it more attention than any of the other exhibits at the fair. At the same time British and European papers carried illustrated descriptions of the cheese. The publicity was an excellent thing for the Canadian cheese trade. There was no refrigeration in the year 1893, and the cheese underwent a severe test, because it was exhibited during a whole summer under a glass roof. At times the temperature in the room in which it was exhibited was as high as 93 degrees; nevertheless the cheese scored high enough points at the fair to secure the exposition diploma and bronze medal. Dairy experts praised its quality. However, a rumour spread that the cheese had gone bad; and Sir Thomas Lipton, who had purchased it, repudiated his contract. It was purchased by a caterer in London and shipped to Britain. When it arrived at the London dock, special permission had to be obtained from the London city council to move it through the streets to the warehouse from the point where it was unloaded. Six heavy draft horses were used to draw the special truck with its load of cheese; and the fact that the London authorities were afraid it might break through the streets when being drawn from the dock added a great deal to the publicity. When it was cut up, the high commissioner for Canada and many other notables were present. A section of the cheese was sent back to Ottawa in May of that year, and samples were widely distributed, one being given to each member of the House of Commons and the Senate.

While this story of the world's largest cheese is very interesting, it should be noted that it was the advertising and publicity gained by this mammoth cheese, which was made in the county of Lanark, that were responsible for the beginning of the cheese export trade to Britain; and this trade has been carried on successfully since 1893. In large measure eastern Ontario has been the centre of this trade, and the manufacture of cheese is one of its most important industries.

The cheese industry means dollars for people in eastern Ontario. In 1904 we exported to Britain 253 million pounds of cheese, which returned us $21 million. The price was low; but the price obtained for that cheese was on a parity with the prices of other commodities. In those days cheese was the main export outlet for our surplus milk. During the last war another outlet was developed; the dry milk market offered competition to convenient local cheese factories. Now, however, cheese is our only dairy export surplus, and cheese fixes the prices of all other dairy products. If the floor price for butter is fixed at 53 cents, as is reported in the press, the cream producer will get a net return of about $1.80 per hundred pounds for 3·4 per cent milk. With cheese at 28 cents a pound, and allowing four cents for manufacturing, the net return to the farmer will be approximately $2.15 per hundredweight. This is a price that is below the cost of production.

Some market for our surplus cheese must be found which will pay the farmer a reasonable profit. Britain can use more Canadian Cheddar cheese than we are selling this year under our contract for 80 million pounds; and again I point out that in 1904 we exported to Britain 253 million pounds of cheese. The British market for Cheddar cheese, which has existed for sixty years, should be maintained, since it has been in the past and will be in the future our best market. This market has been lost largely through competition from other countries. It is obvious that if Britain is to buy more of our cheese we shall have to buy more from Britain; but our imports from Britain should be diversified in order not to interfere with our own industries.

Not only do I wish to stress the importance of maintaining our cheese market in the United Kingdom. I want to point out that we could increase the sale in the domestic market by putting up a packet of good Cheddar cheese for home consumption. We could also increase our domestic market by making five and ten pound cheeses aged for local consumption. The possibility of selling more cheese in the domestic market was recently shown through a survey conducted by the Department of National Health and Welfare, which indicated that thirty-five per cent of the homes of this country never serve cheese. The Canadian consumption of cheese is approximately four pounds per capitae. If we could increase this consumption to seven pounds per capita, while we would still be among the lowest consumers of cheese in the world, home consumption would amount to more than 90 million pounds. An increase in the per capita consumption of cheese to seven pounds per year would mean just over two ounces per person per week; or, if you wish to put the figures on a more practical basis, it would mean two cheese sandwiches per person per week. National cheese week, held last November, proved that the consumption of our product can be boosted by sales promotion efforts; according to the records of one large company, cheese sales increased in some centres by 100, 200 and 300 per cent. The beneficial effects of this campaign during national cheese week were shown in the increased sales of cheese after the official campaign was over.

If steps could be taken to promote sales of fluid milk back to the per capita level of 1945, it would be beneficial to the whole industry. In that year the per capita consumption of milk and cream reached the figure of 479 pounds. Since 1945, however, it has dropped steadily, and in 1949 was down to 419 pounds. If we could bring about that increase in the per capita consumption of fluid milk in 1950 our surplus of dairy products for which we would have to find an export market would be down from seven per cent to three per cent of total milk production. If we could increase milk consumption it would benefit not only the fluid milk market but also the market for other dairy products. Boosting our domestic sales to a high level would appear to be a sound policy, and would cut down our export surpluses.

There is another factor entering into the cheese business which should be given consideration by the government. The dry cheese exported to the United Kingdom market today requires more milk per pound to manufacture. For the past ten years our cheese graders have been asking for a drier cheese for export. In my opinion the United Kingdom is demanding this dry cheese in order to get more cheese and less moisture. A considerable portion of the cheese used in the United Kingdom is processed; and it is quite understandable that the drier the cheese the greater percentage of profit to the processor. In Wisconsin cheese is purchased on the moisture content; the price is fixed at approximately one cent per pound under and over the standard of moisture as fixed by state law. The amount of milk required to produce a pound of cheese has increased during the past ten or twelve years by almost one pound. Formerly 11¼ pounds of milk made a pound of cheese, but in 1949 a pound of premium cheese required 12 pounds of milk or more. Therefore in the matter of the price received for our cheese we must also consider the extra pound of milk now required to make a pound of cheese.

Mastitis and Bang's disease forced New Zealand to pasteurize her milk in order to make cheese; and in the pasteurizing process they lost the flavour which now exists in Canadian Cheddar cheese and which is very popular in the United Kingdom. Pasteurization has added another manufacturing cost. The only reason we are able to meet the competition of New Zealand, where they have year round pastures, is that their manufacturing costs are higher than ours. Because of the climate in New Zealand, cattle are able to pasture twelve months in the year, while in this country there is a period of some months during which it is necessary to do stable feeding. The health of animals branch of the Department of Agriculture should give consideration to what has happened in New Zealand as a result of this disease. Such a situation might readily develop in this country, and we might be forced into the position of pasteurizing our milk in order to make cheese if we do not take some action to control mastitis.

To overcome the organisms which exist in our cheese, a storage period of 90 days is necessary. Already the prevalence of mastitis in dairy districts in Ontario has reached serious proportions. When the cheese leaves the presses it contains lactic acid. There is also present gas-producing bacteria and disease-producing germs, in addition to the rennet, which sets up a digestive process in the cheese. If our cheese were stored from 8 to 10 days at higher temperatures than at present, it would allow the rennet and lactic acid to overcome other disease-producing bacteria, and would prevent our best cheese from going fruity and rancid after three months in storage.

I suggest that the question of mastitis should be given serious consideration by the Department of Agriculture, not only because of its effect on the milk used in the dairy business and the production of cheese, but also because of the widespread destruction caused to high-grade dairy animals. With the improvement in breeding and the development of high-grade registered stock, it seems that these animals become more susceptible to the disease and show a lack of resistance. If we are to continue to develop high-grade stock, particularly for our dairy farmers, it will be necessary to give every assistance to breeders and owners in checking the ravages of these diseases.

In the month of January the farmers of Lanark county held a protest meeting in the town of Perth. This meeting was well attended by representative farmers of all the various branches of agriculture common to the district. They were deeply concerned over the falling prices of bacon, eggs, and dairy products, as well as the situation in our overseas markets. These farmers were an unusually fine group of people, and in all fairness I must say their requests were most reasonable. They recognized that agriculture is Canada's basic industry. When agriculture is prosperous, the rest of Canada is prosperous. They were not asking for high and unwarranted prices for their agricultural products, but only for a price which would return to them a reasonable profit. This group realized that if the farmers had to buy goods at a higher price level than that set for the products of their farm, it would mean not only a reduction in buying power for them but a general loss of agricultural prosperity. They are aware of the fact that lower prices for agricultural products mean increased unemployment and reduced buying power for those products which are already becoming surplus on the market. They were asking only for a balanced economy and parity prices.

The resolutions passed at that meeting contained requests that agricultural prices be supported in keeping with the price of manufactured goods. One resolution contained the suggestion that it was necessary to receive 42 cents a dozen for eggs in order to cover the cost of production today and called on the government to establish a floor price of 42 cents. The meeting also passed resolutions asking for a bacon floor price of 36 cents per pound for grade A Wiltshire sides at the seaboard, and a price of 30 cents per pound f.o.b. factory for Cheddar cheese.

I have stressed the importance of cheese to the county of Lanark, and I again point out that it is essential that we maintain our traditional market for Cheddar cheese in Britain. It is essential that the farmer receive a price sufficient to compensate him for his labour and investment.

With regard to the question of egg and pork production, the meeting felt that these producers were in the same position as the cheese producers. The cheese industry and hog raising have, in the past, been coupled together. Whey, as a by-product of cheese, has a food value for hogs which helps to cut down feeding costs. It is estimated that whey has a feeding value of one-tenth the value of hog feeding concentrates, which cost as high as $80 per ton. I may say that there is an export market for whey from certain parts of eastern Ontario. It is shipped to the United States and is used in the manufacture of penicillin.

There has been a great deal of misunderstanding about the agricultural situation among people who are not conversant with conditions. While we are proud of our industrial advancement and growth, we must remember that agriculture is the basic industry of Canada. It is an industry in which the farmers are not limited to a certain number of hours per day or per week, but is one of constant occupation. Not only is it an occupation of long hours and arduous toil, but any successful farmer must make investments in machinery and in the general upkeep of his farm.

I have stated that, because of the diseases which affect livestock, this branch of farming has now become a somewhat hazardous occupation from a financial point of view. During the war farmers were encouraged to increase production in every way. When controls were introduced, it was generally felt that the prices of agricultural commodities had not reached the level of other commodities in Canada. Farmers were advised to increase production. It was not easy to obtain farm labour at that period. Industry was geared to a high pitch in the production of war materials, and wages were generally on a high scale.

In return for higher production, the government of Canada promised the farmer that, following the war, adequate prices for farm products would be maintained. One clause in the Agricultural Prices Support Act, 1944, reads in part:

> . . . shall endeavour to ensure adequate and stable returns for agriculture . . . and shall endeavour to secure a fair relationship between the returns from agriculture and those from other occupations.

It will be recalled that the former prime minister, Mr. Mackenzie King, made an announcement regarding floor prices for farm products. In a national broadcast on December 4, 1943, Mr. King said:

> I wish tonight to thank the famers of Canada for their magnificent contribution to the battle of production. I wish as well to appeal to them to continue to help hold the front line against inflation by continuing to support the price ceiling.

If, to help win the war, the farmers are asked to accept a ceiling on prices, we believe they are entitled to a floor under prices to insure them against an agricultural depression after the war. As an essential part of its post-war policy, the government intends to ask parliament, at the next session, to place a floor under the prices of the main farm commodities.

In the speech from the throne at the prorogation of parliament on January 31, 1945, it was stated:

As a further safeguard of a basic standard of living, provision was made at the present session for floors under the prices of farm and fish products. These measures insure two great primary industries against the hazard of a collapse of markets or prices after the war.

Farmers now find themselves in a position where the cost of production has continued to rise, but the prices of agricultural products have not kept pace with that rise. Cheese producers do not feel that prices existing at the present time permit the farmer a return which is sufficient to pay for the cost of production and allow him a profit in keeping with his labour and his investment on his farm. Any decline in farm income will mean that there will be a reduction in the purchase of the products of industry, and it will affect all workers in Canada as regards wages or work. While consumers have prospects of lower prices in dairy products, it should be pointed out that to a larger degree wages received by industrial workers are dependent upon our domestic markets to farmers. If the purchasing power of farmers is reduced, then the industrial workers will be the first to experience hardship. If a better understanding could be reached, and if the difficulties of the agricultural industry could be recognized by people in other walks of life, it would tend to the solution of some of the problems that the farmers of today are experiencing. The matter of adequate prices for agricultural products, giving fair return for labour and investments, is something which affects the whole economy of the nation.

Right Hon. J. G. Gardiner (Minister of Agriculture): The debate on the address, Mr. Speaker, has been continuing now for some time and it is not my intention this afternoon to attempt, in forty minutes, to answer all that may have been said with reference to the activities of the Department of Agriculture. I wish, however, to reply with regard to two or three matters which were referred to, some of them by the last speaker and others by previous speakers on the opposition side of the house.

Before going on to deal with the general charges which have been made with regard to the activities of myself as Minister of Agriculture before the election, during it and since, I should like to join with all those who have commented upon the speeches of the mover and seconder of the address. It goes without saying that I was much interested in the speech of the mover owing to a fact of which probably not many members of this house are aware. When I went into the legislature of Saskatchewan in 1914 my seatmate was one of those fine Scandinavian immigrants that we were getting into western Canada about that time, some of them coming direct and some of them coming by way of the United States. That particular seatmate was the grandfather of the present hon. member for Kindersley (Mr. Larson). I know that all those who are representative of that fine race of people that we had coming into western Canada at that time will be pleased with the fine showing he made at the opening of this session.

I was not able to follow the speech of the seconder owing to the fact that I do not speak any language but English; and some people think I do not speak that language well. But I find that the translation reads just as well as the part of it which was in English and which was of a high character. I wish to congratulate both of these young members in the house upon the showing they made.

The two matters to which I wish to refer directly and which were introduced into the debate at an early period, one by the hon. member for Souris (Mr. Ross) and the other by the hon. member for Melfort (Mr. Wright), are of interest particularly to the people of western Canada. I therefore desire at the very beginning to clear away some impressions that might have been produced by statements which were made.

I recall that when the hon. member for Souris was speaking he quoted an editorial from the Winnipeg Free Press. I do not know that he subscribed to what the editorial said, but nevertheless he read it to this house; and a member is supposed to subscribe to everything he reads to the house, particularly when it is critical of government policy.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Do you?

Mr. Gardiner: Yes, I subscribe to most things that I read to the house, unless I declare at the time that I am in disagreement with what they say. Sometimes I am.

The statement was to the effect that the wheat which was exchanged this year from the 140 million bushels which we were required to deliver under the wheat contract, in order to induce the British to purchase from Canada pork products which they otherwise would not have purchased, to induce them to purchase lumber or wood products which they otherwise would not have purchased, or to induce them to purchase fish which they otherwise would probably not have purchased, would likely result in a loss to the wheat growers of western Canada. What I want to say is what the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) said to the farm delegation when that point was raised at the time the Canadian Federation of Agriculture met us a short time ago just before the opening of the session. When the remark was being made the other day the Prime Minister asked me if I intended to speak—and I said that I probably would—and suggested that that matter ought to be answered in the house just as he answered it to the farmers.

There is another reason that I am referring to it. It has not particularly to do with the affairs of my department; it has to do with the Department of Trade and Commerce. But the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe) was not here at the time that the farm delegation met the government and he therefore was not a party to the discussion. But he was here when discussion took place as to whether or not the exchange would be made. What I wish to say to this house, and through this house to the country, is that the Prime Minister stated to the farmers that it was decided during the first discussion that every dollar the wheat pool was entitled to as a result of the British agreement would be paid into the pool by the end of this crop year, on the basis on which the British agreement called for the deliveries, and that therefore there would be no possibility whatsoever of any loss being taken by the farmers of western Canada as a result of that exchange. The money will be paid into the pool by the government of Canada and any loss which is taken—if any loss is taken; and we do not expect that there will be any—would naturally be taken by the treasury or by a settlement that we get from the British under the "have regard to" clause rather than by the farmers themselves. I thought it was necessary that that matter should be cleared away at this time in order that we may avoid discussion of the idea in the future.

The other question, which was raised by the hon. member for Melfort and which I think should be cleared up, is again to an extent a question which is of direct concern to the Minister of Trade and Commerce. He has stated to the house since that question was raised that it is his intention, if it is the desire of the house, to have the report of the wheat board referred to the committee on agriculture. Therefore it is unnecessary for me to discuss the matter at further length, more than to say this, that when the wheat board was asked in 1948 to pay out in 1948 all of the money which was then in the treasury of the wheat board, as a result of the trading of 1945, 1946 and 1947, every member who spoke from the opposition side of the house was insistent that that money be paid out. As a matter of fact, as I recall it, the hon. member for Lake Centre (Mr. Diefenbaker), back at the time when we were discussing what the initial price would be—the price of $1.35, back in 1946 and 1947—insisted, and a motion was moved in the house, receiving the support of all the opposition, that that advance payment ought to be $1.55, the claim being that the government had no right to keep in the treasury money which actually belonged to the farmers of western Canada, rather than to hold it for final payment at a later time.

So in that year three payments were made, 20 cents on 1945, 20 cents on 1946, and 20 cents on 1947, which resulted in a very considerable sum of money. In other words there was not any great carry-over from that year into the next one.

Then, in the fall of 1948, after one of the most difficult crop failures western Canada had ever experienced, one as great as any we had had in the thirties—with the possible exception of 1931 and 1937—a crop failure which matched the failures of other years, and which had been preceded by a crop failure in the preceding year, the farmers of western Canada, as was indicated the other day by a resolution read into the record by the hon. member for Qu'Appelle (Mr. Dewar), indicated that they desired to have a 20-cent payment made again, and that such 20-cent payment should be made before seeding—not after.

In order to make sure that I was right the other night when I raised the question while the hon. member for Melfort (Mr. Wright) was speaking, I caused a hurried look to be taken through my own files and found it contained many resolutions such as those I now hold in my hand, and along the lines of the one which was read into the record the other day.

These are not resolutions passed by individuals; they are resolutions of municipal councils, representing the views of farmers in the municipality. All I need to do, in order to indicate their widespread nature, referring even to this limited number, this half dozen I have in my hand, is to tell the house that the first one is from municipality 220 in Saskatchewan and the second from municipality No. 221. Those two are side by side. This third one is from municipality No. 141, a long distance removed from the first two. This fourth one is from municipality No. 108, and the fifth from municipality No. 315.

Mr. Johnston: What are the dates?

Mr. Gardiner: They are dated November 4, 1948, December 7, 1948, January 11, 1949, January 8, 1949, February 28, 1949, and December 29, 1948. As a matter of fact, with the exception of those in January and February of 1949, they are all in the latter part of 1948.

What is the nature of these resolutions? Well, they are not all in the same wording, but all have a similar meaning. Here is the one from municipality 108, directed to me and stating:

> That we ask the federal government to use their influence in having the 20 cents per bushel payment on the 1945, 1946 and 1947 wheat crop paid in the areas which have suffered from drought at the earliest possible date and that a copy of this resolution be sent to the Hon. J. G. Gardiner, federal Minister of Agriculture and to the Canadian wheat board.

Those resolutions were passed throughout the country. I say this only in reply to the suggestion made the other day by the hon. member for Melfort that the farmers did not ask for 20 cents. They did ask for 20 cents. They put it in resolutions, asking that 20 cents should be paid.

There is only one way in which money can be secured to handle wheat throughout the wheat crop year, when payment was made in the preceding year, and that is by borrowing at the bank. Ever since we have had a system of wheat board handling of wheat, we have had the provision whereby the board was to be in a position at all times to borrow money. There is no other way of carrying on from year to year. When the wheat starts to come into the elevators the farmer is to be paid his initial price. He is being paid this year on a basis of $1.75 per bushel. Previously he was paid on a basis of $1.55. Every bushel of wheat that was delivered into the elevators had to be paid for as soon as it was dumped into the elevators, and the money with which to pay for it was borrowed at that time.

The transaction goes on. The wheat is gradually moved to seaboard and then over to Europe, Great Britain or some other place. Until that wheat is actually disposed of and payments are made, financing must be done by that method—and always has been done by that method.

The effect of the complaint being made by those who do complain—and, so far as I know, they are all in this house, and in the other place—is that somebody did not guess exactly what the payment was going to amount to. In other words, in paying out $213 million, they found when they got to the end of July that they did not have quite as much cash proceeds from sales as they had borrowed at the bank in order to make the payments. My hon. friend's accusation in connection with this is that someone in the government—and I think I know as much about the wheat business as anyone in the government; I am sure, too, that my colleague the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe) knows just as much as I do about it—was in error. I venture to say that neither of us would claim that we could estimate the payments which were going to be made within some $4 million or $5 million of what the amount would actually be. Payment was made at 20 cents per bushel over a period of four years and, as was suggested a while ago, this time when payment is made it will be for five years.

That being so, we have no criticism to make of the hon. member for taking his cue from an hon. member in another place, and introducing it into this house. But we have been wondering why everyone stopped talking about it as soon as he did introduce it. I think probably he got good advice to the effect that there was no other way of doing the job, that if we were going to do it again we would have to do it in the same way and, since he wanted us to do it again, probably he had better keep quiet from now on. I think probably that is the answer to it, or the reasonable conclusion which could be drawn.

Those are the two or three matters which had been brought up and with which I wanted to deal. But there is another phase of the discussion which has taken form in this debate, and to which I think I should pay some attention. There appears to have been a great deal of worry in the minds of hon. members from the opposition side of the house on the question as to how we on this side of the house managed to get three-quarters of the membership of the House of Commons at the last election. They have been worried about it.

Mr. Cardiff: You are going into that again?

Mr. Gardiner: Yes, and probably you will wish you had not gone into it. Mr. Speaker, I have been in public life for almost thirty-six years, and while I am not very good at quoting Shakespeare or any of the great authorities on English, nevertheless I remember that somebody once wrote something like this: He who steals my purse, steals trash, but he who robs me of my good name, robs me of something which leaves me poor indeed.

I have always thought that under our democratic system of government there is only one way you can get elected more than twice. Sometimes you can get by once and sometimes you can get by twice by misleading the people, but you are never able to get by very often if you continue to mislead them.

I have managed to get by on twelve occasions. Therefore I am somewhat concerned when members of this house, beginning with the leader of the opposition (Mr. Drew) and following through to the leader of the C.C.F. group (Mr. Coldwell)—I do not think my friends of the Social Credit went quite so far although they seemed to be playing with the idea—say that we have the great representation that we have on this side of the house because we misrepresented, and that the greater part of that misrepresentation had been carried on by the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe) and by myself as Minister of Agriculture.

I have my own idea why we have so many members on this side of the house and why there are so few on the other side. I think if the Conservative party had talked more Conservatism in the last election they would have had more members. I think if the C.C.F. had not agreed so much with the Conservatives they would have had more members. In view of the campaign which they both conducted I was a little surprised that the Social Credit party did not have the largest group on the opposition side because after all they were talking a purer kind of Toryism than anybody else on the other side.

I think I should take the opposition over a little of the route they should have travelled if they were looking for votes. There is a publication in Canada which is considered to be a classic on the matter of trade by a man named Porritt and called, "Sixty Years of Protection in Canada". It contains a complete record up until a certain date of everything that happened having to do with the establishment of protection. One paragraph in that book establishes when and how and by what means the Conservative party adopted the policy which they followed for many years with regard to trade. The book quotes a speech by the grand old leader of the Conservative party, who by the way established the party in the beginning, Sir John A. Macdonald. This speech was delivered at Stanstead, Quebec, in 1877, prior to the election of 1878, and he said:

> Shall we not say Canada is for the Canadians, and protect our markets for ourselves.

A few moments ago when the last speaker said something like that I noticed that the hon. member for Lethbridge (Mr. Blackmore) said, "Hear, hear". Then Sir John went on to say:

> Shall we not say if we have a short crop, our own people shall consume it, and pay a fair price for it.

And again:

> We will say to the United States, "We were free traders. We took our cue from the mother country. We did not recognize the differences between the circumstances of an old country and a new one like ours. We will pay you the compliment of saying we were wrong and you were right; and we will do to you as you do to us."

That is the good old policy of the Tory party. That is the policy which our friends have in mind when they keep twitting the government on this side of the house with being too friendly with the United States. That policy is as old as the Tory party and was enunciated when the policies of that party were being laid down. But it will be said that that is a long time ago, that was in 1877. May I say that there has not been a Tory government elected in Canada during the whole history of our country on any other policy. Mr. Borden was elected on that policy in 1911. Mr. Bennett was elected on that policy in 1930. There never has been a Conservative government elected on any other policy.

A good many people who belonged to the Conservative party wondered during the last campaign why the Tory party took as their chief advocate George McCullagh of the Globe and Mail. I listened to a speech which he made over the radio. I had not heard his name announced as I began to listen in the middle of the speech. I remarked, "That fellow is certainly making a cracking good Liberal speech; who is he?" The members of my family said that they had not heard his name. I waited until he finished. Just before finishing, and after making a cracking good Liberal speech advocating many of the things which the Liberal party had been doing—trying to tell Liberals that they were not liberal enough—he finished up by saying, "Go out and vote for Mr. Drew and his policies."

That is not the way in which people in Canada are induced to vote. One must believe in something. One must go out and defend something. One must sell it to the people of this country. When any man speaks over the radio or on a platform and tells people that the best policy for them is the policy believed in by another party, they rush right out to the polls and vote for that party. There are a good many of us here who might not be here if something else had happened, although I am not too sure that we would not have been here anyhow.

Coming down to 1935 after Mr. Bennett had blasted his way into the markets of the world, what do we find he said? I quote from page 85 of Hansard of 1934 where Mr. Bennett is reported as follows:

> Where a market existed thirty years ago, there is none today; where one existed ten years ago, there is none today. We are endeavouring to supply our own wants and other countries are doing the same.

In other words, there is not any possibility of saving this country by trade. Our C.C.F. friends, not to be outdone, had their leader get up at the next session and say, as reported on page 97 of Hansard of 1935:

I suggest that it is only as we get away from the idea that we must solve our problems by a larger measure of trade that we shall begin to set our feet on the road that will lead to a permanent solution of our economic problems.

The Prime Minister (Mr. Bennett) has well said that the open market is a thing of the past. I do not think he has quite so clearly realized that the world market, the expanding market, is also a thing of the past.

In other words, those people were in agreement in 1935. I may say also that the organizer for the Social Credit party agreed with them in a very few words when he said: 'Disregard all this nonsensical talk about trade and tariffs". We at least have them all on the one side of the house. There is not a very large group even when you count all who are sitting over there. The fact that they did all get on the one side of the house at that time may be one reason for our winning elections.

Bringing you down nearer to the present time I am amazed that during this session of parliament our friends have not carried out so far what they were boasting before they came here they were going to do. I had a good speech all ready for them, and I had to change it completely because they did not do what I thought they were going to do.

Mr. Harkness: It is too bad to disappoint you.

Mr. Gardiner: You did not disappoint me at all; you made it better. There is always a reason for everything that anyone does.

An hon. Member: You put your foot in it that time.

Mr. Gardiner: A short time ago we had a by-election in the province of Saskatchewan, and the government of that province thought I was so busy attending these great protest meetings in Ontario, one of which was referred to a few moments ago, that I could not possibly go out there. Therefore they said: We will have an election right away; we will run it on federal issues and we will defeat the provincial Liberal candidate who was running provincially but defeat him on federal issues. You can travel very fast these days and I managed to get out there all right. Just before I got there the hon. member for Lake Centre (Mr. Diefenbaker) made a speech, and here is what he said:

"The agricultural policies of Canada affect everyone and the agricultural future presents a dangerous picture. Mr. Gardiner is responsible for those policies and I say that they are one of the main issues in this election." By virtue of his agreements Mr. Gardiner had assured farmers of future markets for their produce in the United Kingdom. That experiment in security, Mr. Diefenbaker said, had failed completely.

Then he goes on to say:

To support the Liberal candidate will be construed by the federal Liberal party as approval for its agricultural policies.

That was the Conservative party. Let us see now what the leader of the C.C.F. party (Mr. Coldwell) had to say at about the same time. He said:

"I am particularly anxious at this time to prevent the election of Liberal candidates, provincially and federally, because of the effect it would have on the Liberal administration at Ottawa. Of particular interest to this constituency," said Mr. Coldwell, "is the manner in which the Hon. James G. Gardiner and the federal government have failed to protect the interests of our agricultural producers. Our farmers have seen their markets disappearing and their incomes slashed."

You could not get words uttered by two men on two different platforms at two different times and without their having met—I do not think they did meet—more nearly similar than what was said on the one hand by the Conservative party and on the other by the C.C.F. Do you know what happened? We have run elections in that constituency for a long time. We won it once by nineteen votes and another time by twenty-nine votes. I think one of our highest majorities was a little over 400 votes. In that constituency they took the words of the hon. member for Lake Centre and they did not vote for the Conservative party. There were only 373 votes polled for the Conservative party in the whole constituency. The Conservatives came within nineteen votes of defeating the Liberals in that constituency on one occasion, and within twenty-nine votes of defeating them on another, and I know where the greater part of the votes went that they did not get this time. When they put the two together and added them all up we still had them trimmed by 132. I can understand why no one raises that issue any more. We have heard very little about it in the house during the present session.

Mr. Ross (Souris): Would it not be fair to refer to Mr. Tucker's statement that night?

Mr. Gardiner: Mr. Tucker's statement that night was all right. There are some Conservatives who follow good advice, and we did get some of them. That was the position in 1935 and the position in 1949. All I want to say about it is that from the time Sir John A. Macdonald made his speech at Stanstead, Quebec, in 1877 to the present day Conservative policy has been a policy opposed to trade as a solution for the problems of this country, and the policy of the C.C.F. party as announced is the same. On the other hand, the policy of the Liberal party has been one of trade in order to improve the affairs of this country.

Mr. Hatfield: Free trade.

Mr. Gardiner: Therefore we have had good times when we have had a Liberal government in power, and we have had bad times when we have had a Conservative government in power.

Mr. Knowles: Did you forget to say "free trade"?

Mr. Gardiner: I have here a considerable file which proves that everything that has been said in criticism in this house by the opposition with regard to what I said before the election and since is wrong, but I want to say that it proves that the press is right. Whenever I say anything which hon. members on the other side of the house rise and say is not correct, then they say that I am condemning the press. I do not say anything of the kind. Everything in this file is correct. Everything in it quotes me from 1944 down to the present as having said that when we brought in the support act we were introducing it to deal with a condition which might develop when the time arrived—which possibly would arrive—when we would not have contracts for the sale of farm products. Opposition speakers claim that was not said until the election was over. That was the appeal made to the people during the election campaign. My friends say that I misrepresented the situation to the people. I think that hon. members will permit me to do what it is not my usual habit to do in the house. I think they will permit me to follow my notes of a speech which I delivered over the trans-Canada network of the Canadian Broadcasting Corporation on May 28, not very long before the election. It was an address I made at the request of the Liberal organization in order to set forth to the farmers of Canada the policy of the government concerning agriculture. This is the statement which we made, and upon which I appealed to the farmers to support Liberal candidates from one end of Canada to the other. At that time I said:

> We have entered upon a federal election. The date fixed for voting is June 27. The Right Hon. Louis St. Laurent has given a nation-wide broadcast. He has pointed out that the Canadian people are being guided through a period of transition from war to peace in a prosperous condition. We are sure that the majority of the people will give credit to the government for having given that guidance which assured the present degree of security and prosperity.

Then I dealt with the Conservatives as follows:

> We have two sets of critics. The Conservatives say we should have removed wartime controls immediately war was over and given a free hand to everyone who desired to make profit by developing our natural resources.

Mr. Drew: You knew that was not true.

Mr. Gardiner: You will think it is true before I am through with it. I went on to say:

> They also say we should take off those forms of taxes which were found necessary for the prosecution of the war. This they claim would have given incentive to men and corporations to produce for profit and then distribute those profits through giving employment.

That is the good old policy of Sir John A. Macdonald.

Mr. Drew: Did you speak about the millers?

Mr. Gardiner: I continue reading:

> They do not seem to think there is any possibility of any person or corporation when given an absolutely free hand taking more out of the primary producer or labour than he is entitled to by retaining too much profit.

Mr. Knowles: What about the free hand you gave the millers?

Mr. Gardiner: I find it hurts both the Tories and the C.C.F.'ers now just as much as it did out in the country. I am going to deal next with the socialists.

Mr. Knowles: What about the McGregor report and the way you kept it secret?

Mr. Gardiner: You are just giving your case away when you come to the protection of the Tories. They will be coming to your protection in a minute. Then I went on to say:

> The socialists or C.C.F'ers, and communists on the other hand, maintain that this and every other country should retain at all times the controls which they claim brought prosperity to the masses during the war. They say there should not be profits; production should be for use and not for profit. They claim that if you allow production for profit the average run of person, when he becomes a capitalist, that is when he acquires property, is so selfish that he cannot be trusted to manage it. They claim that either the property itself should be taken over by the state or the product produced by the application of labour to the natural resources should be taken over and marketed by state boards. They claim that when the product is marketed the planning boards of the government should see to it that all that part of the return which previously represented profit should be spent by boards to give service to the people. Sufficient should be returned to the producers so that they can go on producing, but no more.
> The C.C.F'ers know that this is not a very popular doctrine, so they plan to water it down in its presentation until they get control of enough provincial governments to put themselves in power at Ottawa. When this is accomplished they will then enforce the policy in its entirety.
> The Liberals think neither of these criticisms to be well founded. Liberals believe that war is the most foolish possible method by which to try to settle anything. Nevertheless we realize that during each of the last two wars we had experiences which taught lessons. We should benefit by those lessons.

We do not agree with the Conservatives that every form of control and all taxes necessary to the conduct of the war should have been done away with at the end of the war. On the other hand we do not agree that every control or every tax found valuable during the state of war is good in peacetime.

Liberals believe that individuals should be free to own property and acquire rights to develop our natural resources. We believe that individuals, companies and corporations should be encouraged to make profit and be free to make their own decisions with regard to the expansion of their operations or the transfer of their investments from one operator to another. Liberals believe that if the development of an industry is dependent upon the utilization of products of primary producers or labour, the individual, company or corporation responsible should be free to see that the proper proportion of earnings is distributed to primary producers or labour before profit is allowed to increase unduly. Liberals believe that if individual or corporation management places undue emphasis upon profits, or even inadvertently allows profits to exceed reasonable levels, then the state should step in either to control or to tax excessive profits into the treasury.

Liberals believe that after those profits are taxed into the treasury they should be so distributed as to put back in the hands of primary producers or labour amounts which management might have put there in the first instances. This is done either through direct payments or through social services. In answer to the socialist we say indiscriminate regulation and a system which denies the individual or corporation the right to handle what might be termed profits robs the individual of a freedom which was won from the state after centuries of struggle.

Then what about our experience and practice? This is what I stated to the voters of Canada:

The government had an experience during the war which they have benefited by since the war. We wanted ten times as much money to finance the war as we were able to collect before the war. The old practice was to go to a country such as Britain or the United States and borrow the money.

During the last war we raised $5 billion a year. Half of it we borrowed from the Canadian people and the other half we taxed from them.

The Liberals decided to do neither of the things that were suggested by the other two parties; and I went on to say:

The Liberals decided to do neither but to collect a considerable part through special taxes after the individual or corporation had shown what profit could be realized. They decided at the same time to distribute vast sums to veterans back from the war, to mothers through family allowances, to labour through unemployment insurance, to old age pensioners, to the sick through hospitalization, and to the public in general through assistance in industry and agriculture.

Each of these policies greatly increased the purchasing power of individuals and thereby provided a better home market for all our commodities. This purchasing power among the masses of the people has been greatly accelerated through a 32 per cent decrease in the income tax on those who are in the lower income brackets. 770,000 persons who paid income taxes prior to January 1, 1949, pay no income tax now. The income tax reductions together with other reductions leave $369 million in the pockets of those who paid higher taxes last year. Family allowances put $271 million more in the hands of mothers in 1948-49. Old age pensions paid by Ottawa put about $67 million in the hands of the aged. Unemployment insurance makes available $49 million. Demobilization and reconstruction payments amount to $434 million . . . These policies increased the purchasing power where assistance is most needed by over $1 billion, $800 million of which is provided for through these special taxes.

What does that mean? I went on to say:

This increased ability to buy has had a marked effect upon Canada's home market for Canadian food products.

I am sure my friends at the other end of the house will agree with that statement.

Canadian farmers have produced more food in the last ten years than in any other ten-year period. During the first half of that period there was great difficulty in disposing of grains, with the result that much of it was converted into meat and dairy products. In spite of that we were carrying 600 million bushels of wheat in the middle of the period about a year before the end of the war. This wheat, together with all we have grown since, or about 2,500 million bushels of wheat, has been disposed of in five years.

That is the greatest problem we have in western Canada, disposing of our wheat; and here we disposed of 2,500 million bushels in a period of five years.

That is as much as entered into world trade a few years ago. Our oats and barley, with the exception of a small quantity for malting, have all been turned into meat and dairy products . . .

We have not had quite so many hogs on our farms in the last five years as in the previous five, but the average dressed weight of slaughterings has been higher. There is no surplus of hog meat begging for a market, and we have been obtaining a higher price recently than could be obtained on the American market. We are not able to fill our British contract.

Our milk production has been higher in the last five years than in any other five years in our history. There is such a demand for milk in other forms that cheese production is at a long time low in spite of the fact that the Canadian price is higher than the Minnesota price. The British contract quantity has been greatly reduced in each of the last two years because we knew we would not have the surplus cheese. We have not produced the reduced quantity. The reason is obvious. We have been consuming the milk in other forms. There is no surplus begging for a market.

That is a statement my friends sometimes condemn me for having made. There is not a surplus begging for a market.

There is not a single one of the staple farm products of western Canada searching for a market. Until very recently we have had markets closed to most of them because we could not otherwise supply our best long time market. Even now, when Britain is temporarily short of dollars, we have been able to negotiate contracts which would take more to supply than we have to sell.

My hon. friends should listen to that.

This being the case it is not only foolish but untrue to state that Canada is losing her markets.

My friend the leader of the C.C.F. party is foolish enough to believe I was applying that remark only to him. He was not as important as all that, at least in my opinion. I was applying the remark to everyone making that statement.

This being the case it is not only foolish but untrue to state that Canada is losing her markets. A much truer statement would be that Canada cannot fully supply the markets available for staple food products.

One of the reasons for this is our own greatly increased purchasing power. Almost 50 per cent more of our wheat disappeared in Canada in the last five years than ever before. Wheat can be fed when livestock products are at present prices. We consumed 33 per cent more beef in the last five years than during the previous five and last year 50 per cent more than ten years ago. We consumed about 20 per cent more pork in the past five years than in the previous five, and about 70 per cent more than ten years ago. We are consuming more milk and milk products than ever before. As a matter of fact we are consuming nearly all we are producing.

It is true that we are having a little trouble cleaning up some war specialties such as linseed and berry pulp, but they too are disappearing. The only product we are having any real trouble with is apples. We have been having that trouble ever since the war started and partly because of the 1932 trade agreements. But the government has seen to it that the Canadian apple crop has been marketed at the highest returns to the grower he has ever experienced and there are none of those lying around in surplus. The storages are cleared for the new crop.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I am sorry to have to inform the hon. minister that his time has expired.

Some hon. Members: Carry on; put it on the record.

Mr. Gardiner: There is only a little more of it. It reads as follows:

There is no part of our policy we can appeal upon with greater confidence than that upon trade. And there are no parties which should be more hesitant about raising an issue of finding markets than the Tories and C.C.F'ers. The then leader of the Conservative party stated a few years before the war that: "Where there were markets thirty years ago there are none today. Where there were markets ten years ago there are none today." The then leader of the C.C.F. party agreed by saying that was the truest statement the leader of the Conservative party had ever made.

I read that statement a few moments ago.

The Social Crediters were maintaining that the only way to sell our products was to increase the purchasing power of our own people. The Conservatives were maintaining the only market was the home market. We have been in power ever since those statements were made. We got into power by stating there were markets and we would find them. We did not, however, lose sight of the fact that the home market could be improved. We had cut unemployment in half before the war started. We have seen to it that it has not returned. We have increased the purchasing power of the masses by taxing those able to pay and reducing taxes on those with lowest incomes, by increasing old age pensions, by making payments to returned men and by establishing family allowances. In addition to all this we have found and are finding a market for practically all farm products.

The Liberals have reason to be proud of the conversions they have made on the matter of trade. The Tories now claim that the only solution for any possible problems of the future is foreign trade. The C.C.F'ers are shouting that there is danger of our losing world markets. Both are stating that if we lose world markets we are in for all the calamities of depression including unemployment.

When the Liberal government took office we were being warned by both parties that there are no markets. We have succeeded in convincing them that trade is our only salvation. The record which convinced them is an impressive one.

Canada's annual average trade was $2,250 million during the last four years of the first King government. It dropped to one-half that while the Bennett government was blasting its way into the markets of the world between 1931 and 1935. Canada's annual average trade increased by 60 per cent under the Liberals between 1936 and 1940. From 1941 to 1945 it increased by 245 per cent over 1936-40. But our opponents will say that was during war. We have not been at war during the years 1946 to 1948. The increase in trade has been greater than ever. The average annual figure is $5,455 million which is 300 per cent over 1936-40, the last period of peace prior to the war, and five times as great as during the last period of Tory rule in Canada.

No wonder they have dropped their slogan "There are no markets" and substituted the Liberal slogan of 1935-40 and 1945, "Markets Bring Prosperity".

That prosperity is demonstrated in the fact that whereas there were only 3,700,000 gainfully employed persons in Canada in 1939, there were 5,031,000 in 1948 or an increase of one-third.

That prosperity is demonstrated in the fact that whereas the net income of farmers in 1939 was $484 million it is over $1,700 million in 1948. In short it is more than three times as high. That prosperity is demonstrated in the fact that our national income is three times as high in 1948 as in 1938.

Finally that prosperity is demonstrated in the fact that since 1945, or the last year of war, taxes have been reduced by approximately $1,300 million and the public debt by $1,600 million.

It is no wonder our opponents have come to the conclusion that the slogan of the Liberals "The Liberals Believe in Trade, Trade Brings Prosperity". is the only one upon which to appeal for support.

They admitted it, Mr. Speaker, and I repeat that the people of Canada believed that the only party to put back into power was the party that had always advocated trade as the road to prosperity and not recent converts, and that is why they voted as they did.

If we have converted the leaders of the opposition groups that only means that the mass of the people have been convinced. You know that those who proclaimed the idea 15 years ago and applied it so successfully throughout the period are best fitted now to continue the policy in operation.

The home market has improved to an unprecedented degree under the Liberals.

The export market gives us five times as much under the Liberals as under the last Tory government.

Markets bring business and trade; trade brings prosperity. Liberalism fosters business, trade and prosperity.

But the Liberal party does not intend to rest upon its laurels. It is fortunate for Canada that we have markets for our surpluses at home and abroad. It is fortunate for Canada that we have high national income. It is fortunate that we have practically no unemployment. But these must be maintained and improved upon.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Gardiner: My hon. friend groans, but I venture to say that during the election campaign he did not demonstrate in any way that there was any considerable unemployment in this country. I continue reading the speech.

The greatest periods of development in Canada's history have been under Liberal policies.

Mr. Knowles: The minister has been continuing on borrowed time, and he is not going to make a statement such as that. I certainly did speak about unemployment, and I pointed to the proposals which the government had made in 1945, and which have not been acted upon.

Mr. Gardiner: I continue to read from the speech:

Now that the war is over and we are facing a period of peace we must assist in perpetuating it by developing this country.

Then, I go on to deal with policies under which we could bring about that development.

Mr. Knowles: Did you forget to deal with the McGregor report?

Mr. Gardiner: I wound up by making an appeal to the people of this country to vote for the Liberal candidates on Liberal policies, particularly as applied to agriculture. I venture to say that every statement that I have been criticized for making is contained in the speech that was delivered over the radio, but the people of Canada did not criticize it. The people of Canada supported it. That is why we have three-quarters of the members.

The opposition members of this house have stated that the Minister of Agriculture and the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe) had something to do with obtaining the majorities that were obtained in the last election. They went on to state that we did it by misrepresentation. I want to tell them that we made the same statements throughout the election campaign as we had made from 1944 until the election campaign. That fact is borne out by the press reports and by Hansard. In addition to that, I would point out that everything we said during that election campaign has come true since the election.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Harkness: No one was ever more wrong than the minister has been.

Mr. Gardiner: Within the last week we have received a request from the FAO committee for the surpluses we have in Canada to offer to the world. You could put them all down in three words, and to each one you could add a few million pounds, then there would not be anything left. And all these surpluses, a little bit of cheese, a little bit of butter and some honey.

An hon. Member: How much?

Mr. Gardiner: A little bit. A year ago my hon. friends were insisting that we had to have 10 million pounds distributed over Canada as a surplus in order to make it possible for butter to be distributed to consumers at the end of the year. We are not going to have much more than that by the time we get to the end of the year.

An hon. Member: Three times that.

Mr. Gardiner: In other words, we would hesitate to say to the world today that there is a large surplus that could be available.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Gardiner: We have also a small surplus of cheese, a small surplus of butter and a small surplus of honey—

Some hon. Members: Time!

Mr. Gardiner: —and my hon. friends get excited about time. If they were in power, we would be back to the old unemployment position we were in in the thirties.

Mr. Johnston: Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Ross (Souris): Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. The hon. member for Bow River.

Mr. Ross (Souris): I just want to ask one question.

Some hon. Members: Sit down.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order.

Mr. Ross (Souris): Are no questions to be allowed?

An hon. Member: No questions.

Mr. Ross (Souris): May I just ask the minister this question?

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. The hon. member for Bow River.

Mr. C. E. Johnston (Bow River): Is it any wonder, Mr. Speaker, that the Liberals obtained so many votes in the last election,—

Mr. Knowles: And only 49 per cent at that.

Mr. Johnston: —when one listens to that great political speaker, the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner). There is no doubt in my mind that there is no better political stump speaker than the Minister of Agriculture. The thing that amuses me is that the people are so easily misled. The Minister of Agriculture is an expert at saying one thing today and another thing tomorrow.

When I was listening to him—and I always listen to him with a great deal of pleasure—I was shocked at his references to the great production of this country. It is true that this country is able to produce an abundance of agricultural goods; but when he was saying just a moment ago that we in Canada now could not supply the market, and when he said that when the FAO conference was requesting him to supply surplus products for world distribution he had to inform them that we had a very little surplus, I was shocked.

My mind went back immediately to what the minister said in December, 1948. I have not the exact speech here but the hon. member for Peace River (Mr. Low) was mentioning it this year on February 28. I just want to put on the record, so that it will be clear following the minister's speech, what the hon. member for Peace River had to say in regard to the speech that the minister gave to the Canadian chamber of commerce in December of 1948. The hon. member for Peace River was speaking, and as reported at page 323 of Hansard he had this to say:

> I should like to draw to the attention of this house the surpluses that are here in reality, or that could be here, but for the policies of this government—policies of taxation and restriction that discourage production.
> I should like to read briefly from what the Minister of Agriculture said in a speech before the Canadian chamber of commerce in London in 1948.

I should like hon. members and the people of Canada to notice the difference between the statements made by the minister on this occasion today and those that he made in London a year ago. The quotation is:

> "It is difficult for us to understand why anyone should expect us to be other than disappointed with the 1949 contracts. They provide for 160 million pounds of bacon, for 50 million pounds of cheese, and no cattle or beef."

Where is the great production the minister was talking about a moment ago? Then the hon. member for Peace River goes on:

> A little further along, he says:
> There are no dollars available in the United Kingdom with which to purchase Canadian apples. Partly because of this we have financed the pulling out of 240,000 apple trees in Nova Scotia. There are no dollars available with which to purchase Canadian fish.

Where are those great markets the minister was just talking about? Where is this extra production that he was talking about? They are finding markets—how? Certainly we have no surpluses to export now because we have been destroying, and discouraging production in this country. The hon. member goes on:

> I suppose if it were possible to pull out the fish beds, the government would do that, and pay for it. It is a policy of discouraging and restricting production. I say that when you do that you are making it impossible for the Canadian people to help a world that is sadly lacking in food.
> It is important for us to keep in mind that the minister went over to England, and negotiated with the British people, not for 160 million pounds of bacon. At another point in his speech the minister said:
> "All of our discussions on food bulk contracts were proceeding satisfactorily until difficulties arose in adjusting the relationship between dollars and sterling. We were aiming at being able to provide the United Kingdom with 350 million pounds of bacon, 125 million pounds of cheese, 75 million dozens of eggs and having 400,000 head of cattle which we could dispose of either to the United States or to the United Kingdom."

I think that answers effectively the question of what has happened to our production and our markets.

I want to turn to another point which closely follows those remarks I have just read and it greatly concerns the agriculturists of today. In view of the fact that we have been rapidly losing our markets over the years, and particularly the last while, the people in agriculture in Canada are greatly discouraged. It will be of interest to them to note that the Agricultural Prices Support Act may be made permanent. So far it has been on a yearly basis, but now it is proposed to make it permanent legislation, something which the Social Credit members of this house and others have been advocating for a long time.

When speaking at the C.F.A. convention at Niagara Falls on December 1, the Minister of Agriculture said:

> Farmers cannot expect floor prices to be set at the highest level prevailing during the last three years. In most cases the price was set about ten per cent lower than the highest level.

Let me point out to the Minister of Agriculture that farmers particularly are concerned about this support price because of the dropping markets. One remembers that during the war years this government particularly announced to the farmers that they were not going to lose money because they were selling goods then at less than the world market price. I was interested just the other day in an article which appeared in the Ottawa Citizen of Monday, March 6, 1950, in regard to this matter. It is headed "Butter Price Slash Would Alarm Farmers" and reads in part as follows:

> The butter price now is supported at 58 cents a pound. Dairy experts predicted in Ottawa Friday that agriculture minister Gardiner will announce shortly a drop of five or six cents a pound in the floor price.

Mr. Milburn was speaking at this convention of the Canadian Federation of Agriculture. The article goes on to say:

> Mr. Milburn said in a statement that there is a downward trend in agricultural prices and that eventually all other prices will fall.

"It means there will be a reduced income for farmers at a time when labour and other callings are receiving increased prices and wages. We see no reason why the farmer should take less."

That is the danger farmers see ahead of them. On every hand they find that the commodities they must buy are increasing in price, while the prices of the commodities they sell are being lowered.

Let me pass a warning on to the farmers at this time in regard to markets. It seems to me that the only source of marketing they will have at their disposal will be those organizations which they may themselves set up by way of co-operative marketing.

The Rural Co-Operator of Tuesday, February 28, says this:

The January 6 issue of the United States News carried in its business outlook for 1950 an interesting forecast:

"Corporate profits estimated up $1·6 billion. Farm cash income estimated down $1·6 billion."

And then later on it says:

If the United States News' forecast is correct the money farmers won't get in 1950 is going into the pockets of the coupon-clippers!

Time to wake up, Farmer! Time to buy yourself an organization that can fight back!

It seems to me the only possible way left of marketing goods successfully will be through those co-operative marketing agencies which the farmers themselves set up. That would seem to be the position from now on. It appears strange that now the government should take the view that it ought not to have anything to do with helping the farmers to dispose of their surplus products. Yet there was no hesitancy during the war, when it was easy to sell. Now when it has become more difficult the farmers are being told, "You take this thing, yourself. We want to get rid of it."

I was pleased to note that when he spoke a few moments ago the minister made reference to another matter, namely the operations of the wheat board. What he said was of interest to me. I believe one of the reasons he gave for people voting Liberal was that they must believe in something. However, as I said at the outset of my speech, the Minister of Agriculture surpasses anyone else in Canada in making statements today and contradicting them tomorrow. He said he had been able to be elected twelve times, and that that was a pretty good record.

Mr. Knowles: He said he got by.

Mr. Johnston: Oh, I beg your pardon, that is right—he got by. He was able to be elected.

Mr. Gardiner: A majority of forty-seven hundred is not bad.

[Mr. Johnston.]

Mr. Johnston: There is no mystery about that, because the minister could go out on a platform and make the farmers believe—and probably did—that they were being treated better under a Liberal government than even they themselves ever expected to be.

I want to speak about the operations of the wheat board, and perhaps what I shall say will explain to the minister why so many people were fooled at election time. To my mind the functions of the wheat board should have always been to market the farmers' produce at the best prices obtainable. In that respect the board would be a worth-while organization. It could continue to function very successfully with the co-operation of provincial marketing agencies. I would like to see it continue as such an agency, and particularly have it operate to dispose of Canada's surplus production through ICCH.

The minister made particular reference to the interim payment of 20 cents discussed here the other day by the hon. member for Melfort (Mr. Wright), and went on to point out again today that the only possible way in which those payments could be made to farmers was by borrowing. He made that definitely clear today—and if it was not clear today, certainly it was made very clear on February 27 when, replying to the hon. member for Melfort, the minister said, as reported at page 284 of Hansard:

May I ask the hon. member if he is not aware that every farmers' organization in western Canada, including the pool locals, were asking for that 20-cent payment before seeding,—

I think I can agree with the minister on that, because when I asked him a moment ago when the resolutions he was reading were received he said they were from November 4, 1948, to February 28, 1949. No wonder the pool organizations, the farmer organizations and even members of the House of Commons were asking that that payment be made because they all thoroughly believed that the payment which was about to be made would be from moneys which had accrued to the credit of the wheat board. In fact, the insinuation was made as early as March of 1948, before the minister began to receive these resolutions, that there would be a payment of 20 cents. Of course farm organizations, pools and members of the House of Commons did insist that those payments be made. But they had the knowledge that that money was right there, in the treasury of the wheat board.

Mr. Gardiner: By way of correction may I say that my hon. friend has said my statements will not bear investigation. Therefore I do not want him to put any on the record which will not.

Mr. Johnston: I do not want to.

Mr. Gardiner: The whole question the hon. member is now discussing was discussed before the board of the wheat pool. Everyone associated with the wheat pool knew the position. As a matter of fact every grain dealer in Canada knew it, and the fact that there were some members in the House of Commons who did not know it only indicates that they do not keep check on the records available to them.

Mr. Johnston: I am glad the minister said that, because I shall refer to the records in a moment or two, to prove what he says now is not the fact.

Mr. Gardiner: But you cannot prove it. The record shows $65 million was available, and $213 million had to be paid out. How could you pay that out without borrowing?

Mr. Johnston: I will show whether I can prove it or not. But, before turning to that, I wish to finish with this quotation. On February 27 the minister said to the hon. member for Melfort:

—and is he not aware of the fact that there could not be enough money to pay it without borrowing?

There is no misunderstanding about that statement made on February 27, when he said that there is no other way of making the payment except by borrowing. He has just repeated it today, so there can be no argument as to his meaning in that respect.

I wish to go back to the record as it appears in Hansard for February 27, 1948, page 1677, when the relevant discussion took place in the house. On that occasion the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe) was speaking in a debate on the Canadian Wheat Board Act, and had this to say regarding this 20-cent payment:

Instead, the government is taking power to increase the initial payment from time to time, whenever the cash position of the pool would appear to justify such action.

"Whenever the cash position would appear to justify such action". No member in the house could doubt for one moment that the cash was right there to make the proposed distribution.

If there is any doubt about that—because the Minister of Agriculture may well say "I am not responsible for statements made by the Minister of Trade and Commerce"—

Mr. Gardiner: I will agree with that; nevertheless, it does not bear out your statement.

Mr. Johnston: Yes, it does. Then, let us turn to page 1719 of Hansard for February 27, 1948, at which time the Minister of Agriculture was speaking about the same thing. I intend to prove that every party in this house was of the same opinion that I am expressing now, that the money was there to the credit of the wheat board. The Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) had this to say, as reported on page 1719 of Hansard of February 27, 1948:

We would have to go to the bank and borrow money and pay interest on it, and the farmers of western Canada are not asking us at the present time to go to the bank and borrow money and charge the interest up to them and pay them another twenty cents over and above the possible twenty cents we may pay under this legislation. They are asking us to sell their wheat at the best returns we can get, to retain funds sufficient to carry on and make sure we shall be able to carry this through to the final conclusion.

There is no misunderstanding about that.

Mr. Gardiner: What is the date of that?

Mr. Johnston: February 27, 1948, just before you received the resolutions.

Mr. Gardiner: Before we received the further requests from the municipalities.

Mr. Johnston: The minister then went on to say:

Then they are asking us to amend the act so that as time goes on we shall be in a position to pay out any sums of money we may have to their credit.

That is not borrowed money.

Mr. Gardiner: That was my statement to this house and to the public, and even after that they sent in their resolutions and said that they wanted it paid.

Mr. Johnston: That view was not expressed in the resolution which the minister has placed on Hansard. As I recall it, they expressed the view that they wanted that payment made and certainly they had every right to expect that this money was there to their credit because the minister told them. Lest there be some mistake, let me quote again from that same page 1719, where the minister is reported as follows:

We should be in a position, Mr. Speaker, not only once a year but at any time throughout the year, if the operations up to date have given them sufficient cash—

How much clearer could it be that it was not borrowed money?

—with which to make payments to the farmers—whether it is in the summer, in the winter or any other time—to determine that they are in a position to make those payments.

The minister told us in unmistakable terms when this very payment was being discussed that there was the cash to the credit of the board. In case anyone might say that that was my understanding of it and that no one else in the house or in the country had such an understanding—

Mr. Gardiner: I am not saying any such thing. I am saying that with that information before the country they still said they wanted the twenty-cent payment.

Mr. Johnston: The minister is trying to imply that those organizations and the members of all parties in this house knew very well that the money would be borrowed. It is a mistake to get up in this house and say one thing one day and then contradict it the next, because the record is here.

Mr. Knowles: The minister did not tell them that in the speech he made over the radio and which he read today.

Mr. Johnston: He did not tell them that in the election. Is it any wonder that they voted for him? They were hypnotized by his great oratory. I turn now to page 2114 of Hansard of March 11, 1948, which is a little before June 27, where I find the hon. member for Provencher (Mr. Jutras) is speaking. The hon. member for Provencher had quoted some of the things which I have quoted here today. Let there be no misunderstanding about every party in this house being of the opinion that the money which was about to be paid out on that twenty-cent payment was cash in hand.

Mr. Gardiner: What is the date again?

Mr. Johnston: This is March 11, 1948.

Mr. Gardiner: That is the payment that was made on the first three crops and it has nothing to do with the payment we are discussing. That payment was made in the middle of the summer on the crops for 1945, 1946 and 1947. What the hon. member is presuming to discuss now is the next year's payment.

Mr. Knowles: The payment was made just before the election.

Mr. Gardiner: This is the year before the election.

Mr. Johnston: This is the payment the minister was talking about the other day. Here is what the hon. member for Provencher said on that occasion:

> That is exactly the position now; and I think it should be made clear to all members that when they vote this amount they are not voting public money. I am referring to the initial price. From remarks made to me from time to time, I know this is a misconception common to many members. One cannot blame them, because they are told they have to vote for a certain amount of money to be paid to the western farmers when, in actual fact, they are only giving power to the Canadian wheat board to pay out another few cents, or some specific sum of money, which belongs to the farmers.

There was no misunderstanding about that when one of the Liberal members was speaking in this house.

Mr. Hetland: Are the farmers kicking?

Mr. Johnston: They are kicking when they have to pay millions of dollars in interest, to be bribed for voting for the Liberals.

Mr. Hetland: They are well satisfied.

Mr. Johnston: Let me go now to another part of the house. I quote now from page 2189 of Hansard where a member of another party—

Mr. Gardiner: The hon. member will not find anything there to prove what he is trying to prove, so I shall go out and read my Hansard.

Mr. Hansell: Exit the expert.

Mr. Johnston: The hon. member for Lake Centre (Mr. Diefenbaker) was speaking on this matter and he evidently had the same impression when he said:

> The payment per bushel is not an additional amount per bushel payable to the farmer as an initial price. It is, in fact, a predistribution out of the participation account. The government knows how much it will pay; $230 million, I believe, is the amount that it now holds to the credit of the Canadian farmer.

The exact amount was $213 million, according to the board report, so I am speaking about exactly the same thing. Then the minister interrupted to say:

> Everyone but the hon. member for Lake Centre always knew those facts.

Always knew what facts? That the $213 million which was about to be paid out was cash in hand. Yet the minister tries to tell us that everyone in the country knew that this money was to be borrowed. I take still another portion of the house and quote from page 2191 of Hansard of 1948 where the hon. member for Battle River (Mr. Fair) is reported as follows:

> Let nobody make the mistake that the farmers are getting money from the treasury of Canada, because this money belongs to the farmers of the prairie provinces, as well as many millions of dollars that are not in the fund at the present time. In many cases farmers are still paying interest on their debts which should have been discharged with these belated payments on their wheat.

Then I should like to quote from page 2183 of Hansard where the member of another party, the hon. member for Melfort (Mr. Wright), is reported as follows:

> With the amount that is available for this payment—and I believe it is $234 million—I think a fairly substantial payment could be made . . .

There was no misunderstanding in any part of this house that the money which was to be paid was cash in hand. We only found out what the true situation was when the wheat board report was tabled in the house. We were assured by the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe), and doubly assured by the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner), that the money being paid out was cash in hand, but the fact of the matter is that when the wheat board report was made available to us we found that such was not the case. I should like to refer to page 18 of the report of the Canadian wheat board for the crop year 1948-49 under the heading "bank loans," where it reads as follows:

In accordance with the provisions of order in council P.C. 919 of February 24, 1949, the initial price paid to producers was increased from $1.55 to $1.75 per bushel—

May I point out again that that is the payment we were talking about, and not the one that the Minister of Agriculture tried to drag in as a red herring. The report goes on to read:

—basis No. 1 northern wheat in store Fort William/Port Arthur, or Vancouver. This increase became effective on April 1, 1949, and under terms of the same order the board was directed—

Against the board's better judgment they were directed to pay in accordance with the policy of the government, and therefore when anyone says that the wheat board was being used as a political agent to further the interests of a political party he is absolutely correct. The report continues:

This increase became effective on April 1, 1949, and under terms of the same order the board was directed to pay to producers the sum of 20 cents per bushel in respect of deliveries by producers to the board on the 1945-49 pool account for the period from August 1, 1945, to March 31, 1949.

Therefore there is no misunderstanding about it. We were not referring to any other payment at all. The report goes on to say:

This payment involved a cash distribution by the board of $213,445,541.88 which was commenced on April 1, 1949.

That was about two or three months before the election. I continue:

To meet this and other cash commitments, the board as at March 31, 1949, had funds on deposit with the chartered banks totalling $25,051,551.87 and investments in Dominion of Canada ⅜ per cent treasury notes in the amount of $40 million. The funds provided from the foregoing sources, together with funds received from daily operations of the board, permitted the board to meet its cash commitments from April 1, 1949, to June 8, 1949. On this latter date board funds became exhausted and on June 9, 1949, the board commenced to borrow its daily cash requirements from the chartered banks at the established interest rate of 3 per cent per annum compounded monthly.

Note that, Mr. Speaker: three per cent compounded every thirty days. That is not a bad profit when you consider that the board was receiving five-eighths of one per cent for their money. No wonder the Liberals have lots of campaign funds. There cannot be any doubt about it, Mr. Speaker, that the reason people voted Liberal in the 1949 election was that they were bought by the farmers' own money. That pool payment was made for one specific purpose, to fool the farmers, and I must congratulate the Liberal party because they did fool them. To the sorrow of the farmers they are finding out now that because they received that payment in the manner in which it was paid it is going to cost them millions of dollars in interest charges. Not only must they take a drop in the price of agricultural products at this time but they must also pay through the nose for having a Liberal government elected on that occasion.

Mr. Boucher: Your remarks are an insult to the farmers of Canada.

Mr. Johnston: My remarks are based on facts. If you had been listening you would know that I quoted from Hansard, and they were not my words. You would also have known that every party in the house, including your own, was of the same impression as I was.

Mr. Boucher: I say your remarks are an insult to the intelligence of the farmers of Canada.

Mr. Johnston: Some people just do not know when they are insulted so I will not comment any further.

I want to say a few words to the Minister of Resources and Development (Mr. Winters). I do not do so in a critical manner because I think in the time allotted to him he has done a fairly good job. He has made some worthwhile improvements in the National Housing Act, and I want to congratulate him on that. He has taken some good steps, belatedly it is true, as to a highway across Canada. I am not going to discuss the route of the highway because that has been talked about on many occasions. I spoke about it last year. I said at that time I thought the judgment of the minister was good in allowing the provinces to make the decision as to the route. I was sure that the decision the province of Alberta would make would be a satisfactory one. They have decided that it should go through the city of Calgary, and I think their judgment was good.

When I was speaking on this matter before, I suggested to the Minister of Resources and Development that in my judgment provision should be made to construct a four-lane highway. I pointed out that as time went on traffic would increase, and in certain localities it would be necessary to build a four-lane highway to accommodate the tourist and freight traffic wanting to travel over it. He indicated at that time that was his plan, and I think that showed good judgment on his part.

I also indicated to the minister on that occasion that care would have to be taken as to the regulations respecting trucking. I was of the opinion at that time that the government might endeavour to interfere with the free exercise of trucking privileges in Canada, and I was not mistaken. There are two reasons why I am concerned about this matter. In eastern Canada there is some competition for the railways particularly in the transportation of freight. You have the St. Lawrence river, the great lakes and the canals involved in that waterway system which offer effective competition to the railways. In western Canada we do not have anything like that. The only competition we can hope for there is that in time trucking will become a more effective competitor. I think such a hope is only natural, and trucking should be allowed to provide fair and reasonable competition to the railways.

I think the people of Canada are justified in concluding that one of the reasons why the trans-Canada highway was put off for the last twenty years was to protect the railways of Canada. Goodness knows they are getting enough protection from the government as it is. I find that my suspicions are verified. I have here a clipping from the Ottawa Citizen of February 23. The heading of the article is:

Says issue on highways prejudged.

The article reads:

G. M. Parke, president of the Automotive Transport Association of Ontario, said yesterday the federal government "prejudged" the issues being studied by the royal commission on transportation. Mr. Parke, addressing the convention of the Ontario good roads association, referred to a speech here Monday by transport minister Chevrier. He quoted Mr. Chevrier as saying: "I think that the present-day development of highway trucking is a very serious threat to the well-being of our railway system."

Surely the railways are not afraid of a little free competition. Are they trying to drive trucks off the roads so that they will be able to hoist their rates another 10 or 20 per cent as they have just recently? It seems that the Minister of Transport (Mr. Chevrier) is assisting them. Then he goes on:

If it is left unchecked it will undoubtedly impair the efficiency of our railroads and destroy the economic advantages which we still enjoy . . .

I would not like the impression to prevail that I am advocating the complete curtailment of highway trucking operations . . . but I am equally convinced that trucking has gone beyond its economic radius of operation, so much so that it has contributed in no small measure to the thorny transportation problem which faces Canada today.

It is clear that the minister has in mind exactly what he wants to do. He says he does not want to completely curtail trucking; but he also says it has gone beyond its economic radius of operation. Who is he to judge in that regard? The only people who can decide that are the truck transport associations themselves. When they begin to operate beyond the economic radius of operation they will soon find it out from their returns, and will cut down that radius. There is no doubt in my mind but that this government intends to limit the radius of operation of trucks so they will not even give fair competition to the railways, and will not be able to operate beyond a radius of fifty miles; and what would be the result? It would mean that if a person living in Calgary wanted to move his furniture to Edmonton, it would have to be done by rail. At the present time a truck will come to your door, load all your furniture, even though you have a five or six-roomed house, deliver it the same day in Edmonton, and unload it at your other house. The Minister of Transport takes the view that this would be uneconomical. What a lot of rubbish. We had better face the issue while it is clearly before us. It is clear that this government, through the Department of Transport, is going to hamstring trucking in this country in order to benefit the railways. I think that is something about which this House of Commons should be very careful. They should see to it that industry has a chance to operate unmolested by the federal government sticking its nose into things it knows nothing about.

Now I want to say just a few words about old age pensions; I would not like this opportunity to pass without having something to say with respect to the elderly citizens of our community. I am pleased to see the motion on the order paper to have this matter sent to a committee, where it can be gone into thoroughly and from which recommendations may be brought back. I believe the time has come when we should begin to delve into this problem, and should start treating these elderly people as human beings. I have often thought one of the best ways to find out whether or not the old age pensioners were receiving enough to maintain a decent standard of living would be to have members of this house limit their budgets to the amount allowed for old age pensions. If that were done I am sure there would be no need for a single speech in this house to urge that old age pensions be sufficient to keep body and soul together.

The Social Crediters have always maintained that old age pensions should be given as a right of citizenship when a person reaches the age of sixty-five. I firmly believe that it should be on a non-contributory basis. Let no one think for a moment that the old age pensioners do not contribute toward the cost of their pensions now. Every time they buy an article they make a substantial contribution to the revenues of this country through the payment of indirect taxation. When this matter is considered in committee I hope all these points will be taken into consideration and that a recommendation such as I have suggested will be brought in.

There is one other point I want to mention, though my time is passing very rapidly; that is the means test in regard to the old age pension. I believe that the means test should be eliminated. It may be that during the first stages of the inauguration of this non-contributory plan without a means test we will have to move slowly, so it may be necessary to alter that position in some respects; but I shall deal with that in just a moment. I was amazed at the remarks of the hon. member for Maple Creek (Mr. Studer) on this matter, as they appear at page 252 of Hansard:

> I believe that everyone in this country, regardless of party, is in favour of the elimination of the means test.

May I say right off the bat that the hon. member is due to be disillusioned. Here again the people of Canada probably were fooled, because all parties in this house do not agree with the elimination of the means test. One party that does not agree is the Liberal party.

An hon. Member: No.

Mr. Johnston: Who said that? It sounds like someone from the west. I want to point out that the Liberal party in western Canada, to be exact the Liberal party in Alberta, does not believe in the removal of the means test. I do not hear any interjections, though I waited for them.

An hon. Member: Baloney.

Mr. Johnston: Baloney, is it? I can assure you that anything coming from the Liberal party in the west is baloney, and everyone out there knows it. I have a clipping here from the Calgary Herald of January 4, 1950, headed "Liberals favour means test." You will be surprised to learn who were at the meeting; but let me read the clipping:

> The Edmonton Liberal association Tuesday night approved a resolution to be presented at the party's provincial convention next month that the annual convention be held either in Calgary or Edmonton each year.
> The association defeated an amendment to a pensions resolution, one of many passed, that would have urged abolition of the means test. The resolution called for bringing old age pensions to the same level as those in British Columbia.

So at that meeting it was moved that the means test be abolished; but the Liberal organization as such, in convention, defeated that resolution. Even those from eastern Canada should know better than to trust the Liberals from the west; but now we all know that the Liberal party in Alberta, not as individuals but as a party, stands for the maintenance of the means test. Let me quote further:

> Another resolution called on the Alberta government to relax some of the provisions of its part in the federal hospitalization plan.

The provincial hospitalization plan is endeavouring to provide hospitalization for anyone anywhere in the province at a cost of a dollar a day, but the Liberal party in Alberta is against that. And do you know who were at the meeting? This should be of interest to hon. members. The report states:

> Fred Macdonald and George Prudham, Liberal M.P.'s for Edmonton east and west, addressed the meeting.

Now let us get it straight. The Liberal party is not in favour of removing the means test; so when the hon. member for Maple Creek says everyone in this country, regardless of party, is in favour of the elimination of the means test he does not know what he is talking about. Then he went on:

> If it is to be eliminated and there is not sufficient money available to carry the additional burden of old age pensions, what particular social service could those who moved the amendment offer to reduce the burden of providing additional pensions for the aged?

Now, it would seem that we were in a rather bad state. The Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) told us a moment ago how much we could produce in this country, and what a wealthy country it was. Then, a Liberal member gets up and says that if we eliminate the means test, we must eliminate some other social service.

Then, he goes on to say:

> There is only one way of carrying old age pensions without a means test, and that is to increase production.

Where has the member been all this time? The Prime Minister told him something about production when he spoke on February 20. It is recorded at page 55 of Hansard, and reads as follows:

> Our gross national product, that is the total value of all goods and services produced in the country, has tripled. Our foreign trade is nearly four times what it was in 1939.

Do you want to increase it any more, before we give the old age pensioners a sufficient amount to keep body and soul together?

Then, the Prime Minister goes on:

> Those gains are striking in themselves, and they are striking in comparison with what has happened in other countries.

As a matter of fact, I believe the gross national product was something like $16 billion.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I am sorry to interrupt the hon. member, but I must inform him he has exhausted his time, and can only proceed with the unanimous consent of the house.

Some hon. Members: Carry on.

Mr. Johnston: I shall be only a few moments, as I do not want to take advantage of the generosity of the house. I should like the members to recall that, if we are basing the amount of pension we can give to the pensioners on our ability to produce goods and services in this country—I would say that should be the only limit upon it—then, when we have had an increase in production such as the Prime Minister says, we should not be quibbling about what social services we are going to cut out if we eliminate the means test.

We further agree, Mr. Speaker, that the age should be lowered to 65, and that the wife should automatically qualify when the husband receives a pension. I believe that is self-explanatory, so I shall not take the time of the house to explain it.

A moment ago, I spoke about the initial steps that might be taken in eliminating the means test. Let there be no misunderstanding about my position. I believe the means test should be permanently abolished. I think it is a criminal thing. As a first step, we might have to apply a principle which is advocated by the Alberta pensioners society in a statement which I received the other day. I should like to put that statement on record, as I believe it has some merit. It says this:

> We want the standard of living that is recognized in the Income Tax Act. That is to say the ceiling on income, in the Old Age Pensions Act for a single man over 70 years of age is $600, but the single man over 65 years of age is exempt from income tax below income of $1,500. The married man with wife over 70 years old in the Old Age Pensions Act has a ceiling on income of $1,080. The married man with wife is exempt from income tax if his income is less than $2,500. What we maintain is that the same standard of living should be recognized in both acts, and that the old age pensioners, single and married, should have their ceiling on income raised to the level of exemptions on income for single and married as in the Income Tax Act; both are based on a standard of living.

Now, Mr. Speaker, may I say that I hope when this old age pensions bill goes to the committee it will receive the very best consideration, and will come back here embodying some of the suggestions I have already made.

Mr. Cote (Verdun-La Salle): Did I understand the hon. gentleman to say that he believes the means test will eventually have to be abolished?

Mr. Johnston: Yes.

Mr. Cote (Verdun-La Salle): So the hon. member considers that, at this time, there may be some difficulty in the way of doing that; there may have to be a levelling off before the test is abolished?

Mr. Knowles: Eventually, why not now?

Mr. Johnston: I have stressed that I am quite aware the Liberal government does not intend to remove the means test, and I believe everybody in Canada should know that. Let there be no misunderstanding about that. What I am trying to do at this time is to get as much as we can for the old age pensioners, despite this Liberal government. As the first step towards that, the very least the Liberal government should do is to recognize the income tax exemptions as the ceiling on income for old age pensioners.

Mr. Cote (Verdun-La Salle): How could the hon. member be aware of the policies of the party? I have never seen him in any of our caucuses.

Mr. Johnston: May I say to the hon. member that on one occasion the Liberals were having a caucus in the railway committee room. They even had policemen on duty there, but in all innocence I walked into that meeting. I was allowed to remain until I found out with whom I was associating, and I certainly got out.

Mr. Major: It being nearly six o'clock, may I move the adjournment of the debate?

Motion (Mr. Major) agreed to and debate adjourned.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Fournier (Hull) moved the adjournment of the house.

He said: Tomorrow we shall continue this debate.

Motion agreed to and the house adjourned at 5.45 p.m.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Thursday, March 9, 1950

The house met at three o'clock.

BUTTER

ANNOUNCEMENT AS TO SELLING PRICE OF GOVERNMENT-HELD STOCKS

Right Hon. J. G. Gardiner (Minister of Agriculture): Mr. Speaker, as a matter of privilege, and in the public interest, I wish to make a statement regarding butter.

I issued a statement through the press yesterday which is a summary of what will be issued to the trade. I am sorry that the interpretation placed upon it by some reports was such as to render it misleading; therefore I wish to make the announcement to the house, where I probably should have made it in the first place.

The announcement given the press was as follows:

Ottawa, March 8, 1950.—Right Hon. James G. Gardiner announced today that it was not anticipated that there would be any change in the selling price of government-held butter before the end of March. Mr. Gardiner also announced that if the government did decide to change its selling price downward on butter, those who had purchased butter from the government would be protected against loss resulting from the change to the extent of the stocks on hand.

This is the announcement going to the trade, and it will be fully understood by those concerned. Anything added as though it came from the department could result in misunderstanding, and therefore I wish to make this statement at the moment.

For the benefit of hon. members I wish to state that the last ten-year average storage of butter, as of March 1, was, in round figures, 19 million pounds. The highest storages as of that date were 23 million pounds in 1940 and 24 million in 1947. The storage as of March 1, 1950, is 36 million. Of this amount the government had 25 million pounds.

The end of the dairy year is April 30. The last ten-year average storage as of May 1 was, in round figures, 10 million pounds. The highest during that period was, in round figures, 12,700,000 in 1945 and 13,500,000 in 1949. We bought butter last year so that we would have a carry-over sufficient to make distribution possible.

On the basis of these figures there would be about 25 million pounds of butter in addition to current production to market between March 1 and May 1 to leave the usual carry-over at the end of the year. The government disposed of two and one-half million pounds last week.

It should be remembered that neither the producers of butter nor the government ever encourage the production of more butter than can be consumed in Canada. It is because of the adjustments which will be necessary to maintain this objective that the announcement made yesterday was thought advisable. I wanted to put these explanations on Hansard.

Mr. Wright: Mr. Speaker, in view of the minister's statement, and with your permission, I should like to ask him a question. What will be the position of small dairies throughout the country which have stocks of butter on hand as at April 1? Will they be protected in the same way as purchasers of butter from the government reserve?

Mr. Gardiner: They are protected by the fact that any time up to the dates referred to in this announcement they can deliver butter to the board itself.

Mr. Wright: Must that butter be in carload lots, or may it be in less than carload lots?

Mr. Gardiner: It has been customary to have it in carload lots. I do not know whether other arrangements can be made. That is a matter of arrangement with the trade.

Mr. Drew: I should like to ask a question arising out of the minister's statement. To whom and at what price was the butter sold last week?

Mr. Gardiner: It was sold to the ordinary dealers across Canada. I understand that three of the principal dealers telephoned this morning as a result of the announcement made yesterday, and their understanding is the same as the announcement conveyed. One of them said: "We will probably have three carloads of government butter at that date and one carload that we shall have obtained elsewhere; does that mean we will get a settlement on three-quarters of the butter?" His question was answered yes, and he said they fully understood the principles involved. The sales were all made last week to the Canadian trade.

Mr. Drew: At what price?

Mr. Gardiner: At 60½ cents.

Mr. Smith (Calgary West): I should like to ask the Minister of Agriculture whether any butter has been sold to the industry in recent weeks below the figure which he gave a moment ago.

Mr. Gardiner: I do not know of any butter that has been sold below the figure based on 60½ cents up to date. That is the price at Montreal. There may be different prices in other parts of Canada.

Mr. Smith (Calgary West): I am not concerned about a cent or two. Will the minister make inquiries? To be perfectly frank, I am thinking about soap.

Mr. Gardiner: We have not had any butter that we have been required to sell to the soap industry so far as I know. Sometimes that does develop.

RADIUM

THEFT OF NEEDLES FROM SHED AT REAR OF NATIONAL RESEARCH BUILDING

On the orders of the day:

Mr. G. K. Fraser (Peterborough West): I should like to address a question to the Minister of Trade and Commerce. Are press dispatches correct in stating that radium needles representing thousands of dollars of taxpayers' property were stored in an unprotected shed at the rear of the national research building, instead of in a vault, as is the general custom, and that as a result these radium needles were stolen and now endanger the lives of any who may come in contact with them?

Right Hon. C. D. Howe (Minister of Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, I have not received a report on that subject as yet, although I have asked for it. I will answer the question tomorrow.

Mr. Fraser: Thank you.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS

SHIPPING OF POTATOES AND TURNIPS—SUPPLY OF REEFER CARS IN PRINCE EDWARD ISLAND

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (Minister of Transport): I should like to deal with a question asked yesterday by the hon. member for Queens (Mr. McLure). It had to do with the supply of reefer cars, and part of it was to this effect:

> Will the minister advise, instruct and demand that the Canadian National Railways provide reefer cars for the shipment of potatoes and turnips from Prince Edward Island? The shortage of reefer cars at the present time is the greatest they have experienced in years.

I promised the hon. member that I would get a report from the Canadian National Railways. I am advised by them today that there are 454 reefer cars on hand or in transit for Prince Edward Island traffic. This total is made up as follows:

Cars on P.E.I.	292
In transit at Cape Tormentine	43
Moncton	30
Truro	22
Campbellton	22
Monk	45
Total	454

Officers of the Canadian National Railways report that a satisfactory position as to reefer cars is considered to be around 300. When it exceeds this figure there is a danger of transportation difficulties arising in connection with the movement of the cars. Therefore my hon. friend can see that there is no shortage of cars. On the contrary, the situation is a good one.

COLLISION OF EXPRESS TRAINS BETWEEN MONTREAL AND HALIFAX

On the orders of the day:

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (Minister of Transport): Yesterday the hon. member for St. John's West (Mr. Browne) repeated his question about an accident which took place between two Canadian National Railway trains in the province of Quebec. I have a statement here which is not too lengthy, and I could either give it to the hon. member or put it on Hansard. It is a report of the accident. It is not a report following investigation, because investigation is not yet complete. It is the report which I was able to obtain from the officers of the Canadian National Railways. I think perhaps I had better send it to the hon. member.

Mr. Isnor: Are we to understand that the report will be placed on Hansard?

Mr. Chevrier: Perhaps I had better read it to the house. It is a report concerning the accident on the Canadian National Railways at St. Cyrille, Quebec, on February 24, 1950.

At about 10.45 p.m., February 24, passenger train No. 60, the Scotian from Montreal to Halifax, collided head-on with passenger train No. 1, the Maritime Express from Halifax to Montreal, about two miles east of St. Cyrille station, some six miles east of Drummondville. Ninety-three passengers and twelve employees were injured, but none of these seriously.

A formal investigation will be made by the railway officers with regard to the accident, but from reports received it appears the accident was to some extent due to another accident which occurred twelve hours previously, when a train struck a truck at the public crossing at St. Cyrille, damaging the central traffic control circuit between Drummondville and St. Cyrille so that trains had to run on train orders over this section.

Train order was given to train 60, at St. Hyacinthe, together with several others, to the effect that No. 1 was to run six hours late and that No. 60 was to run Drummondville east to St. Cyrille west. No. 60 should have stopped at the signal at St. Cyrille west, which was displaying "stop" indication, and contacted the train controller at Levis, who would have authorized it to proceed to St. Cyrille station, at which point a terminal clearance would have been issued. Instead, however, train 60 passed the signal at "stop" indication, failed to obtain the terminal clearance form, passed governing signal at east switch at St. Cyrille also displaying "stop" indication, and ran through the switch of siding which was set for No. 1 to enter, thus entering the central traffic control territory in face of No. 1.

INCOME TAX

FARMERS—CHANGES IN METHOD OF COMPUTING DEPRECIATION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. M. J. Coldwell (Rosetown-Biggar): May I ask the Minister of National Revenue if he is ready to answer the question I asked yesterday regarding the computation of depreciation on farm properties?

Hon. J. J. McCann (Minister of National Revenue): Mr. Speaker, the question which the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar asked yesterday has just been brought to my attention. He asked whether the minister would consider delaying the coming into effect of the depreciation rates that were provided for by order in council on January 31, and applied to the year 1949. The answer is that it would not be advisable to delay the coming into effect of these depreciation rates with reference to farmers, because of the fact that at the end of the year farmers file only interim returns. Like every other taxpayer, the farmer makes his final return on or before the 30th of April of the next succeeding year. Therefore he will have plenty of time to readjust it, and it is not an inconvenience to the farmer. There may be a little inconvenience in so far as administration is concerned, but we are prepared to take on that extra work.

Mr. Hansell: May I say that I have a letter from an accountant who points out that over fifty of his clients have already made their returns, not knowing of these changes. Will the regulations be enforced, so far as those who have already made their final returns, on the basis of the old rates? Some of them have made their final returns.

Mr. Knowles: Because of advertising encouraging them to do so.

Mr. McCann: The new rates are of much greater advantage to the farmer. If he does not care to take advantage of the increased rate of depreciation, then he will be assessed upon the rate which he has used as the basis in filing his return.

Mr. Hansell: It is a decrease in depreciation on farm machinery.

Mr. Ross (Souris): On the 1st of March I had a question answered pertaining to the same subject. I have studied the order in council, and I have had correspondence from farmers who have made out their returns. They find there are changes which are not as beneficial to the farmer as the former provision in that regard, and there will be much contention on that very point.

Mr. Charlton: If I may ask a supplementary question, when the budget was being discussed last year did not the government give the farmers an undertaking that this change would not be made effective with respect to 1949 taxation?

Mr. McCann: The hon. gentleman will remember that objection was voiced in parliament, and it was urged that the new depreciation rates should not affect farmers and fishermen on the diminishing balance scheme; so the old rates still obtain for the farmers, as they were prior to these orders in council. As I say, it is a matter of administration. The farmer has the advantage in that he can write his losses backward and forward over a period of years, and it is only a matter of adjusting them through the administrative officers.

Mr. Charlton: Am I wrong in my understanding that there has been a change under these orders in council reducing the depreciation on power equipment by five per cent? Of course there has.

Mr. Ross (Souris): I should like to have this made clear, because I have had correspondence with people who have automotive equipment. In past years they have been allowed to depreciate it at twenty per cent, but this order in council distinctly sets out a rate of fifteen per cent. Will they be allowed to depreciate at the rate of twenty per cent, or not?

Mr. McCann: There has been such a multiplicity of questions in reference to the matter of depreciation, some of which I did not get very clearly, that I shall have to prepare a statement on the matter, either for tomorrow or the next day.

SPEECH FROM THE THRONE

CONTINUATION OF DEBATE ON ADDRESS IN REPLY

The house resumed, from Wednesday, March 8, consideration of the motion of Mr. F. H. Larson for an address to His Excellency the Governor General in reply to his speech at the opening of the session, and the amendment thereto of Mr. Drew, and the amendment to the amendment of Mr. Coldwell.

Mr. W. J. Major (Glengarry): Mr. Speaker, it is a great privilege for me, as I rise for the first time to take part in the debate on the address in reply to the speech from the throne, to voice a word on behalf of those whom I have the honour to represent.

At the outset may I offer my congratulations to the mover (Mr. Larson) and the seconder (Mr. Dumas) of the motion we are now debating. I listened to the hon. member for Kindersley (Mr. Larson) with much interest, and I am sure the people of his constituency have justifiable reason to be proud of their representative.

(Translation):

As for my friend and deskmate, the hon. member for Villeneuve (Mr. Dumas), I congratulate him most heartily on the splendid manner in which he performed his task and particularly for the wonderful description he gave us of the Canadian shield which is so dear to his heart.

Mr. Speaker, I take this first opportunity to pay tribute to our leader, the right hon. the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) for the great victory he won last year. He must surely be proud of the great confidence that has been placed in him by the Canadian people, so that he may keep on directing Canada's affairs with the same wisdom he has shown in the past.

(Text):

May I also join other hon. members in congratulating the hon. member for Grey-Bruce (Mr. Harris) on his appointment as Minister of Citizenship and Immigration.

During the last session of the house, while some hon. members constantly referred to the calmness of our new members, I can assure you, Mr. Speaker, that I followed the deliberations with great interest; and though I was at times inclined to retort, from my sixteen years of municipal experience I felt that this would not be the wisest course. I can also assure you that with the wisdom of your guidance, Mr. Speaker, together with my endeavour to observe the workings of parliament, I have gained much benefit both for myself and for my constituency.

If I may be permitted the latitude at this time since much has been said about national unity, I would say that this is one of the greatest assets we have in the constituency I represent. Glengarry is the home of the loyal and brave highland Scots and United Empire Loyalists who first settled it. I need not try to tell you of their congeniality; their stalwart sons who have settled all over Canada have made this unnecessary for me. Glengarry being also the easternmost county of Ontario, and bordering on Quebec, it was to be expected that people with two great traditions, the French and the Scots, could not be neighbours without eventually having an influence on one another. Consequently neighbourly comradeship led to an intermingling of these two races, so that we now find in Glengarry as many of the Quebec neighbours as of the gallant first settlers. You need not be in Glengarry long to feel the perfect harmony and understanding which exist between them.

Most of the people of our county are dependent upon agriculture for their income, either directly or indirectly. Our towns with their growing industries are largely dependent on the farmers for business. The farm producer's income is derived from three main sources—dairying, hog producing and poultry farming, of which dairying is the largest. Since the greater part of the income from our dairies is derived from milk manufactured into cheese, you can readily understand the primary importance our producers attach to the sale of and the price realized from this product.

We have been enjoying also an excellent export market in the United States for our dairy cattle. Recently the sixth t.b. test has been completed in our county, and out of 34,690 cattle tested, only nine reactors were found. This indicates the healthy condition of the cattle, and should result in an increased sale of Glengarry cattle in the export market. It will be easy to understand, therefore, that the price received for these products has a great deal to do with the happiness and success of the producers.

One might better understand the exact position of our producers if I were to refer back to the thirties, when food prices were extremely low, and when the average earnings from the production of dairy and other food products was not sufficient to provide for the immediate necessities of the producer. You can readily understand to what extent the maintenance of farm buildings and machinery had to be neglected. The anticipation with which the producer was looking forward to the time when the prices of his products would be sufficient to allow him to put an end to the continued dilapidation of his property and the replenishing of his equipment can easily be realized. The farmer was faced with the necessity of making immediate repairs to his buildings, which were so vital to economic production, and he realized also that he could not continually draw from the soil without making certain disbursements to add to its fertility.

Then came the war period with its restrictions. Prices began to adjust themselves, but in the adjustment heed was taken of the need to encourage the people of Great Britain in their war effort. Although higher prices could have been obtained, and although higher prices prevailed in the United States, our farmers accepted lower prices for the food they produced. The net margin obtained, however, was not sufficient to allow them to attend, as they would have liked, to the repair and upkeep of machinery and buildings, as well as the fertilization of the soil.

Unlike industrial production, which is timed and controlled by the will of men, farm production is more or less timed and controlled by nature. The farm producer, being conscious of the food requirements of his country, must always aim at a larger production than the immediate need, so that there may always be enough to meet requirements. I believe everyone will agree that the farm producer should receive sufficient for his food products to cover the cost of production, as well as the cost of maintenance. If the producer must produce a surplus in his endeavour to satisfy the requirements of his fellow citizens, then I would say that the disposal of the surplus food is the responsibility of all the citizens of the country. The producer should not be asked to accept a price lower than the cost of production, and thereby bear alone the full burden of cheaper food. This burden should be borne jointly by the producer and his fellow citizens.

As you know, the producer of mixed food products must work strenuously for long hours. His is not a task involving an eight-hour day with paid vacations, but a task which usually extends from daylight to sunset, and for seven days a week. Stock must be cared for and cows milked, even on Sundays. It is no wonder, therefore, that the farmer's son is leaving this arduous toil, which brings little or no remuneration, for the less arduous job in which he can find time to enjoy himself before calling it a day. When the displaced persons first arrived, the farmers were of the opinion that to some extent the farm labour problem would be solved. It took only a short time, however, for these men to remind us that our day was too long, and our man-hour effort too strenuous, for the remuneration obtained. Long before their year's contract was up, these displaced persons had made arrangements for employment which would bring them a higher take-home pay with fewer hours of work.

As long as the food producer can exchange the value of a day of agricultural labour for the value of a day of industrial labour, he does not mind too much the hard work and long hours. If and when it happens that he has to give more than a day for a day's return, then his ambition is weakened and his purchasing power reduced. Care should always be taken to make sure that neither his ambition nor his purchasing power is reduced to the extent of jeopardizing the stability of our country. The old method of free markets, and allowing the law of supply and demand to function, might have served a purpose when labour was not a factor and when the producer could have leather tanned in his home village and his boots made by the local shoemaker at a nominal price. The fluctuation of prices may not have been felt as much at that time; but now that the farmer must equip himself with the most modern devices necessary to produce as successfully and economically as possible, both in quantity and in quality, the producer cannot afford to have trade set a lower price for his product than the cost of production. Not only could he not carry on, but the disappearance of farm purchasing power would have most serious repercussions on all other industries.

A vivid and glaring example of this was recently brought to light with the ending of the egg contract with Great Britain. At that time the handling of the product was placed at the mercy of the regular trading channels. It is true that for some time the trade had been requesting that it be allowed to handle the product without intervention. It is unfortunate that the trade had to prove its inability to cope with the marketing of the product and maintain a reasonable price. The sudden and drastic fall of egg prices has been the result. We have seen also the parade of poultry to a depressed market, and this would have continued but for the fact the government used its power under the Agricultural Prices Support Act and announced that the eggs in storage next fall would be bought at a fixed price. You may rest assured that the parade of poultry to market would have continued long enough to change the egg from a welcome food to a scarcity.

It may be said that the misfortune of the producer was the fortune of the consumer, who for a short time could obtain unreasonably cheap food. But, Mr. Speaker, this is mere illusion; because while the consumer was buying unreasonably cheap food for a fortnight, the producer was disposing of his producing stock at an unprofitable and discouraging price, with the result that he may replenish sparingly; and there is a strong probability that the egg market will be on the short side this fall. Thus it can be seen that by depressing a product beyond reason the producers must take a loss and the consumer is more likely to be called upon to make up more than the difference caused by the reaction in scarcity.

Fortunately for both the consumer and the producer, the government in its wisdom undertook to readjust the low egg price; and, by the price coming back to a reasonable level, the producer was given the necessary incentive needed to prevent the total disposal of his stock. He was also given encouragement to replenish his stock sufficiently to avoid unreasonably low production, so that the consumer may expect a reasonable quantity at a price fair both to himself and to the producer.

Remembering and reacting from the unfortunate and depressingly low prices they received in the thirties, and encouraged by their various farm organizations, together with their knowledge of the well-considered policy of our government, the morale of our farm producers at this time is higher than it has ever been before in the history of our country, and this is bound to have a strong reaction on our future prosperity.

It is also with deep interest that the farm producers welcome the announcement by the government that at this session a bill will be introduced to amend the Agricultural Prices Support Act to provide authority for continuing price support, and I wish to commend the government on the action it has taken. I am sure that this will be one of the means required to ensure a stable price adjustment and an ever-prosperous Canada.

Mr. J. G. Diefenbaker (Lake Centre): May I be permitted, Mr. Speaker, to extend my congratulations to the hon. member for Glengarry (Mr. Major) on his maiden speech in this house. As I do so I recognize that it is one of those amenities that bring together members in all parts of the chamber; for all of us realize that parliament can only fulfil its purpose of legislating so that Canada may achieve the destiny that all of us hope for when it can attract to the halls of the legislature young men of ability and capacity; there are far too many who regard public service as something worthy of ridicule.

In extending my congratulations to my hon. friend upon his ability to express himself in both languages, I am not discharging a perfunctory duty; it is a capacity envied by those of us who are not possessed of it, and it is one that is of inestimable value in understanding the aspirations not only of the race to which I belong, but also of the French race whose contribution has meant so much to the building of our country. I wish I could express myself in French; although I understand the language, Mr. Speaker, I am afraid that if I tried to speak it the house would need a translator to translate my translation.

I was impressed by the speeches made by the mover (Mr. Larson) and the seconder (Mr. Dumas) of the address. The bringing into this House of Commons of young men of their ability and capacity makes for the continuance of the heritage that parliament has handed down to us, and which it is our responsibility to hand on to others.

Having said this, I feel impelled to make some comments on the address delivered yesterday by the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner)—which was more important for what it did not say than for what it did say. Before doing so, however, I desire to bring before the house one or two suggestions that I believe will be non-controversial.

The first has to do with the examination of the accounts of parliament; and I have made this suggestion on previous occasions. If private enterprise is to be maintained in this country there must be a greater return to the individual; and there can only be a greater return to the individual if the national income is maintained and taxation is reduced. The federal government annually spends some $2,400 million as compared with $500 million before the second world war, and the municipalities are spending $1,300 million this year as against $600 million in the days of the war. The examination of expenditures is one of the major responsibilities of the House of Commons, and something should be done to improve our facilities in that connection. Canadians this year will spend over $400 million on defence—an increase of some $40 million over last year. In view of the world situation as portrayed by the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Pearson), and by my own leader in his address the other evening—one of the most powerful ever delivered in this house on the international situation—the people are not averse to expending money on defence and the preservation of peace; but as with other expenditures, they have the right to know whether or not a maximum return is being secured for the expenditures made. I suggest that the public accounts committee of this house as now constituted is ineffectual; it is merely window-dressing. It scarcely ever meets, and when it does, it does not discharge its responsibilities.

In the British House of Commons there is a public accounts committee, a replica of which I should like to see established here. On that committee the majority are not members supporting the government, but they are opposition members. The chairman is not appointed by the government, but it is a member of an opposition party appointed by the members of the committee. Such a committee operates for the purpose of assuring that maximum results shall be secured for all expenditures made. I bring this to the attention of the government; for, sir, if expenditures are being made economically, and if there is nothing to hide, such a committee could not find any over- or mis-expenditure. I suggest that such a public accounts committee be convened. We cannot go on increasing expenditures year by year with parliament having merely a passing acquaintance with them and with no knowledge whatsoever as to whether or not economies are being practised.

I shall now touch on matters of particular interest to Saskatchewan and to the western provinces and of national importance as well. The new members from the province of Saskatchewan who have spoken so far have brought to the house a breadth of purpose that has appealed to all of us. Hon. members from that province are united on certain things. Mention was made before the orders of the day were called by you, Mr. Speaker, of the matter of depreciation for income tax purposes. I say to the Minister of National Revenue (Mr. McCann) that never before has that department been as efficient in the forcing of people to pay and in following them up as it is today. It has been so efficient that injustices have crept in; it has been so forceful that in a number of instances the actions taken have been hard to understand.

Recently a regulation as to maximum rates of depreciation allowable for income tax purposes was sent out by the department. I ask the minister, in the light of experience, to reconsider the rates. In considerable measure the farmers in my constituency are power farmers. They have written me about the rates of depreciation, which are as follows: combines, self-propelled, 15 per cent; combines, 10 per cent; sleighs, 15 per cent; swathers, 10 per cent; tillers, 10 per cent; tractors, trailers, trucks and wagons, 15 per cent. A number have suggested to me that the changes are almost incredibly stupid and the reasons for some rates are difficult to understand. Automobiles, self-propelled combines, tractors and trucks have been reduced from 20 per cent to 15 per cent. Sleighs, wagons and trailers have been raised from 10 per cent to 15 per cent. The maximum on swathers and one-way disc seeders is only 10 per cent. In view of the rapid rate of depreciation of this machinery and equipment, changes should be made in these rates in order to meet practical conditions. All hon. members from the western provinces will support this request, I trust, and we should be supported by hon. members from other provinces and wherever power machinery is used.

Mr. McCann: May I interject a remark? I ask the hon. member's pardon for doing so. We realize that the rates will have to be adjusted from time to time in the light of experience which we gain with reference to the life of these particular implements that are used.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I thank the hon. gentleman. It is with the realization of that fact that I bring these matters to the attention of the house. I hope the minister will act soon, because there is a considerable amount of complaint that the present rates do not operate in justice to the farmer.

I wish to refer now to freight rates. Generally speaking, so far as the western members are concerned, there should be a request on their part that the increases recently allowed by the board of transport commissioners be held back by the cabinet until such time as the discrimination and discriminatory rates now in effect against western Canada and other parts of the country are removed. I do not suggest a permanent hold-up, because all of us realize that there must be an increase in freight rates to meet the added costs of operating railroads if that is established to the satisfaction of the commission. The recent increases if allowed will accentuate that discrimination that now prevails.

Another matter to which I wish to refer is the protection accorded to statutory freight rates under the Crowsnest pass rates. Attacks are being made on these rates. Without regard to party considerations, I feel that every western member should rise in his place in this house and demand that those rates be not interfered with. If they are interfered with; if they are raised, it will impose upon the western farmers a tremendous additional and a correspondingly large reduction in the amount of the farmer's income on his grain crops.

Under the Crowsnest pass rates the average freight rate in Saskatchewan is 13 cents a bushel. That rate would be approximately doubled. So far as the Saskatchewan wheat pool is concerned it would mean that the freight bill would be increased to approximately $41,236,000, or almost double what it was last year. The western farmers have a right to demand that these Crowsnest pass rates be not removed, and generally, so far as the freight rate structure is concerned, that the discrimination that prevails against western Canada and the maritime provinces shall be removed.

I wish to make some comments on another matter, to which I have referred on one or two previous occasions. Having regard to present conditions generally in the western provinces—and this is particularly true in the province of Saskatchewan, because we have had a crop failure there unequalled since the days of the thirties—our farmers remember that, during and prior to the election campaign, they were informed that there was sufficient money on hand to have paid not 20 cents a bushel in April last but from 33 cents to 35 cents a bushel from the money on hand. The Minister of Agriculture himself spoke on that question in the city of Moose Jaw in April last. He pointed out that the 20-cent payment made in the spring of 1949 was only a partial payment, and there was still to the credit of the farmers an amount of from 12 to 15 cents a bushel. Because of that statement the farmers throughout western Canada are asking why it is that any question has arisen as to why that payment of 20 cents a bushel resulted in an amount, greater than that to their credit, being disbursed by the wheat board. I make the appeal that I made on previous occasions in questions directed to the minister: That at the earliest possible moment the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe) arrange to distribute to the western farmers whatever amount is to their credit, or at least that a substantial interim payment be made, to the end that they may be assisted in their spring work, particularly farmers in the areas where the crop last year as a result of drought conditions was a complete or partial failure.

To help meet the unemployment problem I ask the government to carry out the promise made by the Minister of Agriculture during the election campaign, particularly at Melville, Saskatchewan, on April 29, 1949, that this government would proceed with the South Saskatchewan river dam and irrigation project. I have the quotation here, as I have many other quotations. The heading of this particular article is: "Gardiner predicts 1950 start on dam."

The leader of the opposition (Mr. Drew), after studying the situation and determining the necessity of that development as a national project, gave an undertaking both before and during the campaign that it would be proceeded with as a national work. There was no question raised before the election that this dam was to be proceeded with only if the province made a contribution. But it is being held up because of the federal demand that the government of the province of Saskatchewan must undertake to pay part of the expenditures in connection with irrigation. There never was any question of that, either during or before the election of 1949.

Mr. Gardiner: May I be permitted to say something? I have not had an opportunity of saying what I am going to say.

Mr. Diefenbaker: The minister—

Mr. Gardiner: I will ask Mr. Speaker to allow time to the hon. member, if he takes any in replying; but I just want to make a statement.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Gardiner: All right; if you don't want it, I shall make it later.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I only hope the minister does make it later, because that is what I want. Yesterday in a speech of one hour he devoted himself to reading a radio speech made in 1949.

Mr. Gardiner: The matter which I am going—

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Gardiner: Just let me say this. This statement could not have been made yesterday; it could be made only today or later. If you want it, I shall give it to you; if you do not want it, go on and make your speech.

Mr. Speaker: I think we should observe the rules of the house. The hon. member who is addressing the house should not be interrupted without his permission.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Yesterday I sat and listened to the minister; I am recorded as making one interruption, and I did not even do that. I just sat and listened and now I am going to refer to some of the things the minister did not deal with yesterday. This is one thing he should have dealt with in yesterday's speech.

Mr. Gardiner: What I am going to say could not have been said yesterday. It was only agreed to today.

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Speaker: Order.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Mr. Speaker, I hear nothing but a continued mumble which cannot be recorded in Hansard. I listened carefully to the minister. He said many things, and many things he did not say, to both of which I am going to make reference this afternoon. If the minister wants to make another speech, he will have an opportunity later of doing so.

On behalf of the people of Saskatchewan I am asking that this project be proceeded with as a national undertaking, and that the promise recorded in the Regina Leader-Post of April 21, 1949, be carried into effect.

There is one other matter I should like to discuss which particularly affects western Canada; I refer to the Hudson Bay railway. Even when our farmers are not getting the highest prices for their product, they can get a greater return if the costs of production are kept down. I should like to see hon. members from Alberta and Manitoba join with us from Saskatchewan in demanding a greater utilization of this railroad and the facilities at Churchill. We from Saskatchewan want to build up a two-way traffic on the Hudson Bay route through Churchill, and we do not want to see it thwarted by any off-the-record policy of top-flight individuals in Ottawa, or by the Department of Trade and Commerce. We want to see an opportunity given to this railway and to the facilities at Churchill to assist the western farmer. This has been requested for many years. The facilities are there, but to all intents and purposes they are not used.

I now come to the speech delivered yesterday by the Minister of Agriculture. I have a few quotations here; indeed, if I were to gather them all up I would have an assortment of contradictory statements that would establish anything, any place, any time. Yesterday my right hon. friend spoke of the 1930's. That is the old stock argument of my hon. friends opposite. They talk about the 1930's and say that the Conservatives were responsible for the low agricultural prices. That is what they say, and my hon. friend was back at it yesterday. It is not long ago, to be exact on January 19, that the right hon. gentleman made a statement in Ottawa at a press conference. He was referring to the action of the United States in dumping farm products on the market, and I quote:

> It certainly can affect the Canadian export market for farm products.
> The United States policy is not new, it has been going on since the 1930's. In 1932, when the United States first started paying its producers higher prices than they could obtain on the market, the United States government started selling grains at below cost.
> That's what caused our wheat to go down to 36 cents a bushel.

Mr. Gardiner: The Ottawa agreements were in effect in 1932.

Mr. Diefenbaker: We have that statement vouchsafed by the Minister of Agriculture.

Mr. Gardiner: They understood what I said.

Mr. Diefenbaker: That is true enough. We had a statement yesterday, and a different one on January 19. At that time the minister said that the cause of the fall in wheat prices during the thirties was the action of the United States—I think that bears repetition—when all through the years we in this party have been held responsible for the fall of wheat prices that had fallen all over the world.

When the minister spoke yesterday he drew a picture that was optimistic in the extreme. What are the facts? So far as the United Kingdom is concerned, sales to that country in January, 1950, which have fluctuated in recent months, fell by $7,205,000 to $48,608,000. The total value of exports to all commonwealth countries, including the United Kingdom, was $62,336,000 as against $88,706,000 a year ago, according to statistics issued by the Department of Trade and Commerce. That gives the picture.

As I listened yesterday to the minister I wondered if this was the same minister who during the campaign had drawn such optimistic pictures of trade. Yesterday the minister read from his radio address of May 28, 1949. It was a masterpiece. In order to keep the record clear I am going to refer to some of the other speeches made during that campaign. When speaking yesterday, why did he not tell the farmers what their markets will be after 1950, and in 1951 and 1952? Why did he not tell the Canadian people how much sale there will be for wheat outside of the international wheat agreement? Why did he not answer the question that has been asked him so often as to what he meant when he spoke in Brantford, Ontario, on December 6? In an address to the board of trade of that city on that date he is reported to have said:

> There is a very decided official effort to drive wheat and several Canadian food products from the British market.

Why not tell who these people are? What officials in Great Britain are interfering, for that is what it amounts to, with commonwealth trade with that country whose market is of such great importance to Canada?

Mr. Gardiner: It does not mean that but I must not say anything.

Mr. Diefenbaker: The minister himself spoke of the British market when he addressed the food and agricultural organization in Washington.

Mr. Gardiner: It is not "officials"; it is "official".

Mr. Diefenbaker: At that time he said:

> I hope that nothing in the report will suggest that the United States should not follow the conservation measures which have been outlined by the delegate from that country. That, together with the removal of the embargo on the export of wheat from Canada to the United States, would eliminate most of our difficulties and would go a long way to solving any international wheat problem with surplus wheat.

I ask, what has been done to remove the embargo?

Then he dealt with the British market and he said:

Canadian farmers, therefore, are still vitally concerned with world markets and are fearful lest monetary difficulties and other trade obstructions deny them entry to their natural market which is the market of Great Britain.

I ask him to tell the house what he meant at Brantford and what he meant on other occasions when he talked of obstruction in high places, or were they merely statements in a long series of statements in which at one time he said that there is not a surplus and the next day said that there is a surplus? Indeed when he spoke to the United Nations food and agricultural organization in Washington he pointed out that Canada was in grave danger from surpluses, and I should like to refer to what he said:

The report further points out that we may be threatened in the near future by "surpluses"—however artificial they may be from a world standpoint —in such commodities as bread grains, coarse grains, rice, sugar, fats and oils and fish. We have already been threatened in Canada by surpluses of most of the foods referred to, the exceptions being rice and sugar.

I ask the minister: what did he mean when he delivered that speech at Brantford in the fall of 1949? Who are the people in Great Britain who are interfering with our trade which, as the minister said in Washington, is so important? Surely the minister said either too little or too much. Indeed the Winnipeg Free Press of December 9, 1949, said:

According to the Canadian Press, Mr. Gardiner did not enlarge upon the source or the extent of the "official effort" and until evidence is forthcoming the existence of such a "drive" should be discounted.

Mr. Gardiner: You will notice it is "official effort", not "officials' effort".

Mr. Diefenbaker: Official effort. Let the minister tell the House of Commons exactly what official effort in Great Britain is denying to Canada her natural markets. Surely among the members of one's own family there should be the fullest degree of trade which, as the minister pointed out in his address in Washington, is the natural trade. Surely frankness should characterize every relationship between the governments of the commonwealth. Yesterday the minister talked about the absence of surpluses. Here is something interesting. On February 13, 1950, he said, when speaking at the opening session of the Canadian horticultural council:

Some people in the world are making it difficult for Canada to distribute food surpluses to areas where they are needed. Conditions are not yet normal and Canada is producing surplus foodstuffs which are needed somewhere.

That was on February 13. He was speaking to farmers who know what the situation is. If he had told them there were no surpluses they would have said, "No surpluses? Well, what is wrong?" Therefore when he spoke to them he said there were surpluses. Then in the Globe and Mail of October 1, 1949, there is a report of a statement as to markets made by the minister. On that date he was interviewed about Canada's foodstuff markets in the United Kingdom and he said this:

We are trying to maintain Canada's markets in Britain, but there is no certainty that we can do so.

Then, mark these words:

However, Canada was not being "hurt by anything that has happened in Britain up to date. We haven't lost any markets if we haven't got anything to put into them."

In one speech in January he said that there were surpluses and in another in October, after the harvest was over, he was advising that there were not any surpluses. I suggest that we find out once and for all which statement is correct. Is there a surplus or is there not? In view of his diversified statements the Minister of Agriculture finds himself on the horns of a dilemma.

Mr. Gardiner: Read the whole speech. They are all the same.

Mr. Diefenbaker: All right.

Mr. Speaker: Order.

Mr. Diefenbaker: You know, Mr. Speaker, when I get reactions like that it indicates I am saying something that is not altogether agreeable.

Mr. Gardiner: It is not agreed with by anybody who was at the meeting.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I am not through reading yet. I cannot begin to cover all the diversified fiction that I have before me.

Mr. Gardiner: If you would finish reading, it would answer your own idea.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I am sure I have never seen my hon. friend so agitated before. I sit and listen to him as he fires brimstone on us but he cannot take it himself.

Mr. Speaker: Order.

Mr. Diefenbaker: He says to producers that there are surpluses because he cannot tell them that there are not, and to others, in order to show why the situation is what it is, why trade is being lost and where our markets abroad have gone, that we have not any surpluses to sell anyway. To one he says we have plenty and to the other he says we have nothing. In a well-known song there is the line, "I got plenty of nothing", which would combine both of my hon. friend's versions.

Mr. Warren: Is there anyone over there who could make a better job of it?

Mr. Graydon: Stop that official effort over there.

An hon. Member: Quack, quack.

Mr. Diefenbaker: We have a surplus of ducks in the house. Alone and by itself the radio speech which the minister placed on Hansard yesterday would feel almost like an orphan, and it must have companionship. I give it that companionship, with a number of speeches delivered by my right hon. friend during the election campaign. On May 12, speaking at Simpson, he said:

Market is safe, Gardiner says

Hitting out at political opponents who have been accusing the Liberal government of losing Canada's markets, agriculture minister Gardiner declared at a public meeting at Simpson Wednesday night there is no truth in such suggestions. "We could sell much more of most farm products if we had them in surplus supply," he said.

Then on June 11 I find this:

"We are not losing our overseas contracts," declared Mr. Gardiner. "All contracts automatically expire at the end of the year and are then renewed with amendments if need be. Canada has no surplus of goods and we are not losing our contracts."

On May 10, speaking at Regina, the minister is reported as follows:

"Wheat selling is not a problem. The problem facing Canadian agriculture was not the question of selling wheat to Britain but the question of finding additional markets for Canada's wheat surpluses," agriculture minister Gardiner said in Regina on Monday.

That is why, when the minister spoke yesterday, I expected him to tell us what is being done in this connection. He mentioned FAO and said they were going to buy some of our surpluses; but that is merely a temporary expedient.

Mr. Gardiner: Read the rest of those speeches and you will find the answers.

Mr. Diefenbaker: That same report goes on to say:

Mr. Gardiner said there had never been any doubt of Britain's ability to buy wheat from Canada.

Then on June 24 he said:

There is no evidence to support the contention . . . that Canada is losing the British market for food—

Mr. Gardiner: You are not reading from that speech at all. Read the Simpson speech.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Well, Mr. Speaker, the minister wants to choose the speeches I am to read. I have been fairer than he asks; I have not indulged in any selectivity, but am reading the whole record.

Mr. Gardiner, addressing a nomination convention of the Moose Jaw Liberal association, said there is no difficulty now, as there had been in the thirties, in finding markets for our wheat. The minister added that "we are going to have an election but I don't know when it will be."

I suppose it is merely coincidence that those last two sentences come together. Then I have another dispatch dated May 30:

Agriculture minister Gardiner Saturday night predicted that the United Kingdom soon will have sufficient dollars to buy more foodstuffs from Canada. "The United Kingdom and other countries," he said, "are going to be able to pay shortly." "In Canada two things were needed in the immediate future," Mr. Gardiner said, "more food products to sell—

Yes, Mr. Speaker; to the horticultural association we have a surplus; to the House of Commons yesterday there is no surplus. Well, my time is up, though I have many more quotations.

Mr. Gardiner: I will read the rest of them when I get up again.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I trust it was only modesty that kept the minister from reading the rest of them yesterday.

Mr. Gardiner: It was only the fact you would not give me more time.

Mr. Diefenbaker: I conclude by asking the minister and the government to place the trade situation before this house. The ministers say that trade is flourishing, that we have nothing to fear; yet while the right hon. gentleman was speaking yesterday this dispatch was coming over the teletype from Geneva:

Britain gave notice yesterday that she will order new cuts in her dollar imports if the demand for British products in the United States declines.

The minister told us how well trade was being maintained and developed; yet the record for January, published by the bureau of statistics, showed a falling away in British trade, and yesterday at Geneva the British government announced that there might be further restrictions. That is why, at the risk of reiteration, we on this side of the house, believing in our responsibility, have asked and repeated, the trade situation being so serious and the time so propitious, that at the earliest possible moment a commonwealth trade conference should be convened. It was in a spirit of helpfulness that the motion was moved, and that is the spirit in which it is again advanced today. People have a right to know the facts, instead of having from ministers of the crown statements which are so utterly incongruous. On the one hand that there are no surpluses; on the other hand that there are surpluses.

Let us know the facts; let us have an end to the Janus-faced trade policy of the government.

Mr. L. A. Mutch (Winnipeg South): Mr. Speaker, like other hon. members I desire to open my remarks this afternoon by expressing my appreciation of the efforts of the mover and seconder of the address in reply to the speech from the throne, on the workmanlike way in which they carried out that duty and brought credit both to themselves and to the constituencies which sent them to this house.

I have been here a long time, and I think I am as free from political malice as some of the arguments I have had to listen to during my seventeen sessions here have been free from logic; but I think perhaps I would be expected, and certainly it will be my pleasure, to address myself this afternoon to some remarks made in the house the other evening. The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) paid me the honour of referring at some length to newspaper reports of an address I made in Toronto. I know he did not hear the speech; it was quite obvious he had not read it, so he must have had only the information contained in the newspaper dispatches. I regret that I was not in the chamber to hear him, because while the hon. member is very often wide of the mark in what he says he is seldom dull, and he keeps on shooting no matter how often he misses. I think perhaps it could be said of him, as it was said of another student many years ago, that he has dipped into many pools of knowledge and bottomed none of them. Certainly when he dipped into the factual matter with respect to what was said during the course of that speech which he essayed to criticize in this house the other evening, he did not quite bottom it.

The quotations the hon. gentleman read from the Liberal campaign literature used so successfully in Manitoba were perfectly correct, I am quite sure, since I have no reason to doubt that he procured copies of that literature. If he had heard or read the speech he was undertaking to criticize, however, he would have appreciated that I stated that in some of the views expressed at that time I might be at variance with some of those with whom I am associated in this party.

Mr. Knowles: I said that.

Mr. Mutch: That is quite true; but in his desire to make me appear to speak with two tongues I am afraid the hon. gentleman has tried to make me say what he would like to believe I said, without troubling to find out what I did say. The hon. gentleman has had a long interest, and I think a sincere interest, in social security. When I knew him first, his interest in security was largely concerned with that security which comes in the next world. His personal interest in it was probably in collecting his fair share of the manna which falls from heaven on a tin plate. At some stage, he did enter public life in Canada, and he realized that there was a form of temporary security in public life. I do not think the hon. gentleman will take exception if I say that his reaction, when he first came here, was a little like that of the Scotchman who bet two shillings on a horse race and won 30 shillings, and then asked the Englishman how long this sort of thing had been going on. These people seem to believe that a little social security is such a good thing that a great deal would be better.

At no time, either in the speech in Toronto on the 14th of February or at any other time, have I attacked the normal and healthy desire of all self-respecting people to achieve social security. I believe it is one of the strongest motivating forces in civilized people. I do, and I did, contend that by providing social justice this government has made it possible for more Canadians to achieve social security. I said on that occasion, and I repeat, that fear has led people in all walks of life to put too much faith and too much confidence in legislated social security. I said then that this cult of social security had undermined confidence in ourselves, and in society as it is organized. I did deplore, Mr. Speaker, and I repeat, that state assistance is a snare and a delusion. I now add that it is a fraud. It presupposes that we can continue to get something for nothing. In spite of my hon. friend's eloquence on this subject the other night, it is still a basic and elementary fact that you cannot get something for nothing.

Mr. Knowles: But a lot of people are now getting it.

Mr. Mutch: I believe that modesty should restrain my hon. friend from making a remark like that. I should think that the most realistic comment my hon. friend made in his discourse on my speech was when he said, "I do not know exactly what he meant."

The hon. member continued by saying that many are taking my name in vain, because of the views expressed in the speech delivered at Toronto. I am not unduly concerned if that is the case, but I cannot help wondering if the source of his information about that is any more accurate than the source of his information with respect to what I said. He then sneered at me because the Canadian chamber of commerce, in a publication the name of which I have forgotten, quoted something from that speech with apparent approval. I have never been too much moved, either by praise or by blame. Perhaps in fairness to myself and others who hold similar views I should say that I have stayed in this house for quite a while, without too much to recommend me except a capacity for doing my own thinking and a willingness to express my views frankly.

I can quite understand that my hon. friend, and the member who interjected when he spoke, might wonder why I am taking a line of action which might be at variance with that of some of my colleagues in the Liberal party. I should like to say that I am under no illusions that some of the views which I hold, and sometimes express, would get support from my own party. Freedom of speech, however, and freedom of thought are still a reality in the party to which I give my allegiance. The party to which my hon. friend belongs is a party in which a member either conforms or walks the plank, as two of the members in the province of Manitoba have recently had to do. I am pleased to say that in this party it is still possible to express views based on honest convictions, although they may not necessarily be shared by all those within the party. As a matter of fact the party line, as expressed by the Liberal party in my time here, has not been so much a designated party line, but a considered opinion which comes from the meeting of many minds. This method of devising policy has worked quite successfully in this country.

A moment ago I said that my hon. friend has seen fit to sneer at the fact that some remarks quoted from my speech in Toronto had been cited with approval by an organ of the chamber of commerce. I have no objection to my hon. friend taking a dim view of my opinion. Frankly, I believe the chamber of commerce is adequately equipped to take care of itself; but in passing, I think it would be fair to say this: While I do not pay too much attention to either praise or blame, so long as I am able to express those views which I honestly hold, I believe I would feel much better about approval expressed by some of the men who are associated with that organization than I would about the expressed approval of my hon. friend, or those with whom he is associated. I appreciate the fact that he expresses the party line on those matters. Within the chamber of commerce, however, there are men who have helped to keep this country a healthy and prosperous place. It is a strong and virile organization. These men have made our country strong enough that the political termites can fuss and fret without tearing down our economy, with the consequent disastrous results which that might have.

Mr. Knowles: Is that the description you apply to the people of Winnipeg South who want social security?

Mr. Mutch: No, I do not apply it to anybody. I use it because I think it is an inoffensive way of describing those people who, by their attacks, seek to tear down a thing which they are wholly incapable of replacing if they should succeed.

In my view, it is seldom that anyone loses friends or loses face by being honest and outspoken. It is when anyone tries to talk with many tongues, and look in two or three directions at once, that the public catches up with him. I am flattered, you know, that a speech made outside this house to a group of businessmen should have attracted the attention of my hon. friend. I am not unaware of the reason for his interest. He may have felt that, by expressing an honest view to an audience of people who might be expected to have some interest in that point of view, I might have said something which would be politically disadvantageous to myself. I believe that was the inspiration for his attack. Speaking as one politician to another, I see nothing wrong with one seeking to find, from the spoken word of another, something which might at a later date be disadvantageous to him. If that was the desire, then I am afraid my hon. friend has only succeeded in giving me a little unsolicited publicity without achieving what he desired.

Mr. Knowles: The hon. member is achieving that purpose much better himself.

Mr. Mutch: I shall have to stand on my record in that respect. I was here first, and I fancy I shall be here last. I believe the real purpose of the hon. gentleman, in directing so much of his attention to me and a speech which I say he did not read, was that he hoped to take advantage of the press reports of the speech to make it appear that I was unsympathetic to, and opposed to, a program of social justice leading to a degree of social security, which was espoused by this government and by myself in the last campaign.

My support for things like adjustments of old age pensions, additional pensions for the blind, assistance in the matter of education, and assistance in matters of welfare legislation generally goes back, of course, far beyond 1949. It is perhaps legitimate political strategy—no matter how ill-formed, or, alternatively, insincere—to seize on certain statements from quotations, and honest quotations. In these quotations from anything I said published by anyone or quoted by my hon. friends or anyone else, I have not seen anything which I did not say; but I must say that certain things that I did say have been left out of the context. The fact remains, however, that there is nothing in my record and there is nothing in what I said that would give rise to the honest opinion that I was opposed either to legislation that now exists or to the expansion of any form of state assistance, or legislation for social security, which is properly a charge on the community as a whole and for the benefit of the nation as such.

I have not said that I believe that some of the methods by which this and other governments in the past—and as most Canadian social legislation was enacted by this government, we can perhaps leave it at that—dealt with the matter have been the ideal methods of approach; but I have supported that which has been done. While I confess that in some respects those things which I think it has been not only necessary but wise to do have been more of a confession of failure to meet a situation in any other way than a tribute to those particular methods as a way of meeting social problems in this country, I do not think it lies in the mouth of my hon. friend or anyone else to suggest that, so far as I am concerned, when these matters have been under consideration I have given less than earnest and sincere study to them.

I have been consistent in my support of them. Whether or not my judgment was right is something which neither he nor I can decide; but of the four times I have been elected, the first time I was taken on faith; but three times the majority of the people seem to have accepted my sincerity. Whether or not some of the things which have actually been done are indeed ideal is a moot question and subject to debate; and whether or not I am right when I suggest that some of the social legislation, even that which exists, is a mere confession of failure and not a new nostrum which is desirable, generally speaking, for the advancement of mankind, makes very little difference, because in a practical world one faces realities; and the wasting of the human assets of a nation is too high a price to pay for economic idealism, either on economic or on humanitarian grounds.

These measures are conservation measures, shared by all for the advantage of the nation. I have not failed nor do I propose to fail in my support of anything which can qualify within that definition. But, Mr. Speaker, and I say this quite frankly, I have a holy horror of the modern conception of the welfare state. I have a congenital distrust of planners, and a passionate, persisting faith in the good judgment of that great mass of people who, above all things, desire to be protected from the dishonest and rapacious few and to be left alone to work out their own salvation.

[Mr. Mutch.]

I confess that I look with a jaundiced eye upon subsidies in any form. If we must put up with them, I urge that they be open, obvious and labelled. I suggest that we do not advertise them as a new nostrum for the general good but that we honestly admit them to be what they are, namely, the confession and the price of failure. We have been and still are sloughing off some of the extraordinary restraints of war. But too many of the restraints of longer standing still remain.

I should like to say just a word or two about trade. For the consideration of the government and the house I should like to suggest that the private trader, if he were given a free hand, would find markets for the merchandise which this country has to sell and would either trade his way back home, as has been done from time immemorial, or else invest the proceeds of his trade in foreign countries, and in that way help to create a market for his homeland. In fact, as far as is possible in an addled and overly regulated economic world, I should like to urge now that we begin to free the channels of trade and that we permit our exporters of goods, money and services to trade where trade can be found. Risk capital can still be found for an honest risk. In recent years the problem has been, and still is, that too often the field for expansion of trade is either regulated, occupied or restricted by government competition, our own as well as that of other countries.

We have been and are being pressed to take longer strides in the direction of legislated social security. I believe it is time to say that there is grave danger that the idea of state-provided security, if persisted in, will destroy the possibility of any real measure of social security at all for any of us. At the considered risk of being both honestly and maliciously misunderstood, I want to say now that I for one am not anxious to see any further groups, as such, of Canadians put on the payroll of the government of Canada. I do not withdraw what I said earlier this afternoon with respect to my support for those measures of legislation for social security which are borne by the public generally and are in the public interest and for the public good. But I think we should invariably approach these questions from that standpoint rather than from the standpoint that we are being asked to discharge a debt which the public, through its government, owes us. I am well aware of the unfortunate tendency of those who seek to do even that which is justifiable and good and at the same time seek to enforce on this and other governments the exercise of their powers to accomplish these ends. We approach these questions too often not from the standpoint of their being desirable and good and in the public interest but from the standpoint of "ask and it shall be given unto you", because after all it boils down to the fact that all of us in the person of the state owe somebody something. That I conceive to be a doctrine which is not only fallacious but exceedingly dangerous. Because I do not condemn the state for the steps—some of them, at any rate —which have been taken in connection with social legislation, I am now by some being accused of insincerity.

The Montreal Star of February 28, 1950, suggests that to me socialistic paternalism is acceptable if proposed and enacted by a Liberal government. The editor of that paper is himself too well informed to forget, and incidentally knows me well enough to know, that I can remember and understand what socialism did for the British Liberal party between 1900 and 1923, when the party became the prisoner of the planners. I do not like socialism any better when proposed by Liberals—in fact I am more afraid of it, because Liberal paternity gives it at least an air of respectability.

As a student of history and politics, I studied with some sympathy the ideas put forth in my student days by the Fabian socialists in the early 1900's. To me they appeared to be a left wing of the then powerful Liberal party. I confess I looked forward in those days with interest and with some hope and with a good deal of expectation to the fruition of some of the plans which they proposed at that time. Looking back today and reviewing the events that have happened in the years since then, I do not mind telling the house that I am not only disillusioned, I am scared at what the planner can do, first under the guise of left-wing Liberalism, and then frankly as socialism.

When I am tempted to be smug about the situation in Canada today, and I might be forgiven for being so after last year, I must confess I look not at but for the Liberal party in Britain and I do not like what I see. It is urged that in principle the difference between the socialist and the Liberal is this, not so much a difference of objective as a difference of method. I confess again that I may have been guilty in the past of holding that point of view, and even of expounding it on some occasions. If I did, I say to the house with complete sincerity that if I ever espoused that doctrine I now renounce and denounce it.

I know that when one comes to look at the general picture of state aid programs for social security there is one great weakness. That is the great weakness which I referred to on a former occasion and which I now wish to refer to again, namely, the tendency to wait until the idea is sold to the public generally, to wait until an appeal is made or, as was the case with the Fabian socialists, to inject, by methods of infiltration, into another party whose reputation brings confidence an idea to make state aid somehow to be something different from what it is, a sort of benign influence and to lull the public generally away from their realization of what the cost is. I am not thinking entirely in terms of cost in money, because I am of the opinion that we can probably maintain and expand the welfare legislation we have in this country at the present time. But I am concerned now, not only for a future day when it may not be true, about the effect that it has upon our people themselves.

The thing which makes the socialist planner so potentially dangerous is his, quite usual, completely sincere advocacy of something which appears to be both humane and closely related to human aspirations and human needs, without any attempt to impress upon people at the same time the price of these objectives if they are realized by the methods which he suggests.

Few people seem to realize that, as they succeed in selling the basic idea that the state owes a man a living, a little later on we shall establish through the state what the standard of living is to be. In so doing man is made hostage to the extremes of a political philosophy which ultimately must result in, if it is followed through to its logical conclusion, a communist state.

Today the communists among us are quiet and restrained. They can well afford to be, because many of those who sincerely hate communism and decry the communist himself are doing his work for him. When the planner has conditioned his unintentional victim by making statism palatable, the stage is set for the emergence, in this or any other country, of the communistic state.

The social planner then puts emphasis on what the state can or should give. If one points out the magnitude of what socialism takes away, or attempts to estimate the cost, as my hon. friend suggested the other day—this would be my argument then and I make it again—one is pilloried as being a reactionary, lacking in humanity, or even un-Christian. The basic idea is that the state owes every man a living. With respect to that let me say this, sir. When men accept that as being true there is no appeal to reason; there is no warning that will be heeded; there is no set of values that can stand against the acceptance by people, of any nation, of that philosophy.

In commenting on the much mentioned speech, another gentleman who interests himself in social security of a different form, namely, Mr. H. H. Hannam, gave a press report based on press reports of my speech. He asserted that large numbers of Canadians have no chance of ever providing their own security without government help. I submit, sir, that is of course untrue, except in the narrowest personal sense, and even then only for the unfortunate minority. The shattering truth is this, that this condition could become true if we continued to take his advice and the advice of those of like mind. The cost of his kind of security has to be borne by all of us. It could be that his ideas would reduce all of us to a position of dependence on government for any measure of security; and if that happens the ultimate result will be no security at all.

Mr. H. R. Argue (Assiniboia): I listened with a great deal of interest to the hon. member for Winnipeg South (Mr. Mutch). I am sure there are many people in Canada who will be sorry to hear him reiterate what he said at the now famous board of trade meeting. He seems afraid of placing more people, as he says, on the government payroll. I am sure that the old age pensioners of Canada would be very happy indeed if they were on the government payroll as are the hon. member and myself. But I would say to him that if he makes many more speeches like that probably the electorate will take him off the government payroll.

Mr. Mutch: Will the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. Argue: Yes.

Mr. Mutch: Did the hon. member get anything out of what I said in my recently concluded remarks which would indicate any unfriendliness on my part, or on the part of anyone connected with me, to the plight of the old age pensionersé

Mr. Knowles: No, just unsound judgment.

Mr. Argue: As I understood the hon. member, he is opposed to the removal of the means test.

Mr. Mutch: I never mentioned it. I suggest that my hon. friend read the speech. If he could not hear it I apologize.

Mr. Argue: If I can get nothing more from reading it than I got from listening very carefully I doubt whether it would be worth my time.

As other hon. members have done in this debate, I wish to congratulate most sincerely the mover (Mr. Larson) and the seconder (Mr. Dumas) of the address in reply to the speech from the throne. I believe both hon. members did credit to themselves and to their constituencies. I was happy to see the hon. member for Kindersley move the motion, particularly because he comes from my own province of Saskatchewan, and I was glad to see our province recognized in that way. I was glad also to see that a farmer, and a young farmer at that, was chosen to move the address in reply.

I had intended originally to speak on the problem of soil conservation and land utilization and to indicate that we really do need a comprehensive program of forest, land and water conservation. Our resources are being depleted at a rapid rate and it is high time that this government, in co-operation with other governments and public organizations, embarked upon a program of soil and forest conservation. I would recommend to hon. members of the house an excellent article on this subject in the Agricultural Institute Review of January last by Mr. C. Gordon O'Brien, general secretary of the Agricultural Institute of Canada. The Agricultural Institute of Canada is composed of some 3,200 trained agriculturists. They feel as an organization that this nation can afford no further delay in dealing with the problem of land use and conservation.

I turn now to the remarks of the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) made yesterday in this house. I noticed the minister said that he was glad that the press had quoted him correctly during the election campaign and at other times. I was interested to note yesterday that he did not attempt to deny the press reports that have been made from time to time. It seems to me that the Minister of Agriculture says all things to all men. It appears that the Minister of Agriculture, along with other members of the cabinet, was guilty of making statements during the election that they have since contradicted. I should like to quote a statement made by the Minister of Agriculture at Indian Head on June 24, 1949, as reported in the Leader-Post of January 27. It reads:

> Refusal of the Saskatchewan C.C.F. government to pay its share of the trans-Canada highway is one of the reasons for delay in finalizing plans for its construction, agriculture minister Gardiner told a political meeting here Friday night.

The Minister of Agriculture said that the Saskatchewan government was the reason for the delay in finalizing the plans. I should like to quote from a letter written by the Minister of Resources and Development (Mr. Winters), in charge of the trans-Canada highway, to the Saskatchewan minister of highways (Hon. J. T. Douglas), on April 7, 1949, the second paragraph of which reads:

> It seems clear from the helpful attitude you adopted at the conference and from subsequent correspondence that you are anxious to proceed at an early date.

In my opinion that is proof positive that the Minister of Agriculture's statement at Indian Head was not based on fact. I remember during the session last fall the debate that took place in respect to irrigation. The hon. member for Moose Jaw (Mr. Thatcher) smoked out the Minister of Agriculture in a very able manner and brought to light his changed views regarding irrigation in Saskatchewan. In spite of the minister's statements over the years that irrigation projects, particularly the South Saskatchewan irrigation project, would be built by the federal government, at the session last fall he said that the federal government would go ahead with that all-important program only on condition that the government of Saskatchewan would contribute $50 million to $60 million over a period of years. Let me quote from the Regina Leader-Post of June 23, 1949, which reports a speech made by the minister at Lemberg. I quote:

> "The South Saskatchewan project would provide cheap power and encourage building of industries in small towns, provide an incentive for young people to stay in this province. I think we have made a fairly good start now," said Mr. Gardiner. "Send us back to complete the job. . ."

Lo and behold, when the people of Saskatchewan, along with the people of other provinces in Canada, sent the minister and the government back to Ottawa to complete the job, one of his first announcements was that if that job was to be completed the province of Saskatchewan must raise $50 million to $60 million. I can well understand the minister's view at the present time with regard to irrigation. He knows that there are surpluses of agricultural products on hand which he is finding great difficulty in marketing. He knows that neither he nor the government have a policy whereby those surpluses can be marketed. So he says, "Why go ahead with an irrigation development in Saskatchewan which will make our farm surpluses even more unmanageable?"

One cabinet minister after another went before the country previous to June 27 and either made statements and promises that they have since abandoned or else failed to give the public the information it had a right to expect. I might refer to the attitude taken by the minister and the government in respect to the Prairie Farm Assistance Act, an act directed toward maintaining some income for farmers when they suffer a crop failure.

An amendment to the act was announced at the session of parliament previous to the election but we were not told what it would contain. In my constituency—I am not talking about any other constituency at this time—a number of the inspectors under the Prairie Farm Assistance Act went around saying that if the Liberal candidates were elected and the Liberal government returned the Prairie Farm Assistance Act payments would be doubled. When I took the train for Ottawa last September one of the inspectors said to me, "I suppose you will support the amendment calling for an increase in the bonus from $2.50 to $5 per acre?"

I know that the minister never said that the payments would be increased to $5 per acre, but nevertheless the impression got around that they would be increased by the new amendment and the minister did not have enough courage to tell the farmers of Saskatchewan exactly what would be in that amendment if the government were returned to power. No cabinet minister I wager can dig up a quotation from any of his own speeches or those of his colleagues which would indicate in any way that if the government were returned to power and if within eight months after the election Canada had widespread unemployment the government would completely abandon its shelf of public works program. I was amazed and disheartened to hear the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) announce in his first speech of this session that the government was not prepared to undertake a comprehensive program to deal with the present serious and widespread unemployment. He said it was spotty, seasonal, regional, and that the coming of spring would take care of the situation. In the meantime, even if the Prime Minister is right—as I very much doubt—there are 375,000 unemployed in Canada who are living either on a pittance from unemployment insurance or on some form of municipal relief. If one also considers the dependents of these 375,000 unemployed, then there are a million Canadians today who have no income except a small pittance from unemployment insurance or some form of relief assistance. If any minister of the government had said in the election campaign, "If the people of Canada return us to power and if within eight months a million Canadians do not have a decent standard of living because there are not enough jobs to go around, we will do nothing," then the government of course would have been thoroughly defeated.

I could go on and quote many other instances where the government in my opinion misled the Canadian electorate before June 27. For example we have the old age pensions question before us at this time, particularly because of the widespread desire that the means test be abolished. The campaign is based largely on the belief that it is time the people of Canada reminded the government of its past promises. I should like to quote from page 38 of the federal government's green book proposals to the provinces made in 1945 as follows:

> The principal feature of the proposed national old age pensions is the elimination of the means test.

That is the principal proposal, and not until this session of parliament has the government announced that even if the provinces sign financial agreements they will not remove the means test from old age pensions. Since the 1945 conferences broke down we have been told repeatedly by government speakers in the house that the whole fault lay with the premier of Quebec, Mr. Duplessis, and the then premier of Ontario, the present leader of the opposition (Mr. Drew). I know now why the government has changed its attitude. It is because very soon the present financial agreements will end. Then new financial agreements will be discussed. And the government is afraid that this time all of the provinces may be prepared to sign, and the government then would be called upon to implement its own program. Therefore what do we get? We get a committee of inquiry, and I doubt very much whether the old age pensioners will get much more than that for some considerable time.

In recent days there has been another increase in freight rates. First of all there was a 21 per cent increase in 1948. At that time seven of the provinces objected strenuously to the 21 per cent being added to a freight rate structure which was already unfair and discriminatory. Therefore they took their complaints to the governor in council, and on October 12, 1948, order in council P.C. 4678 was passed by way of instruction to the board of transport commissioners to commence a general freight rates inquiry. In part it reads:

> The committee observe that one of the representations made by the petitioning governments is that a horizontal or flat percentage increase of 21 per cent in all freight rates disregards and accentuates existing disparities in the freight rate structure, and that this had already been the subject of a direction to the board, as set out in order in council P.C. 1487 of April 7, 1948, in which the board was directed to make a thorough investigation of the rates structure of railways and railway companies which are under the jurisdiction of parliament with a view to the establishment of a fair and reasonable rates structure which will, under substantially similar circumstances and conditions, be equal in its application to all persons and localities . . .

Further on the board is instructed to consider the matters set forth in the petition of the provinces concurrently with the pending application for a further increase in freight rates. In other words, the government instructed the board of transport commissioners to make a thorough inquiry into the freight rates structure, at the same time to consider the railways' application for an increase, and then to bring in a decision with regard to both matters. The board did not get around to making the inquiry. Instead we have the so-called 16 per cent increase in freight rates, but it works out at 19·36 per cent over the rates existing before the 21 per cent increase.

The increase in freight rates last fall and the one of a few days ago took place after the election campaign in which the government said to the people of Canada that there might or might not be an increase in freight rates, but in any event the board of transport commissioners had been instructed that if there was to be any change it had to be brought about in such a manner as to make freight rates more equitable and just. That has not been done. If the people of Canada had known that there would be a further 16 per cent horizontal increase in freight rates on top of the previous 21 per cent, then I am sure that the results of the election on June 27 would have been substantially different.

Yesterday the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) spent a great deal of time discussing markets. He wound up by saying that we had a few agricultural surpluses. He said we had a surplus of cheese, a surplus of butter and a surplus of honey. I should like to tell him that the farmers think we have a surplus of eggs also, because they know that the wholesale price of eggs at Saskatoon for example went down from 52 cents a dozen on December 23, 1948, to 33 cents a dozen on December 23, 1949—a price netting the producer as little as 20 cents a dozen average grade. At Winnipeg from August of last year until February of this year hog prices were reduced by $7 a hundred. The farmers know that there is a surplus of agricultural commodities when they see such terrific drops in the returns they receive. We all know that we have lost the British market for eggs. We know that we have a bacon contract with Britain for only 60 million pounds this year as compared with 160 million last year. We know that contract will end in July. We all realize Canada is rapidly losing the British market.

The Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) took the Conservative party to task yesterday. He went back over its history and condemned R. B. Bennett for his policy of trying to blast his way into the markets of the world. I would say to the minister that the Bennett policy, unsuccessful as it was, of trying to blast a way into the markets of the world was better than the policy the minister is now following, of doing his best to blast his way out of the markets of the world as quickly as he can.

Then, too, I noticed that the interjections by the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) yesterday with respect to the McGregor report were not answered by the minister. If on June 27 the people of Canada had known that the Minister of Justice (Mr. Garson) had broken the law, and that he was aided and abetted by the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe); if they had known that after the McGregor report was tabled nothing would be done about the alleged combine in the flour-milling industry and that because nothing was done the commissioner would resign; then I say the result would have been very different indeed.

The Minister of Justice and the Minister of Trade and Commerce were successful in keeping the McGregor report buried for some ten months, breaking the law of this country. The Minister of Trade and Commerce and the Minister of Agriculture were equally successful in keeping from the farmers information as to the financial position of the wheat board. Through statements made by the Minister of Agriculture on many occasions in the past the farmers were led to believe that the wheat board, making a payment of 20 cents a bushel in the spring of 1949, would make that payment out of a surplus on hand. Yesterday the minister built a great part of his case around resolutions he had received in November and December of 1948 and January of 1949 asking that a 20-cent payment be made. Why did he receive those requests? Because in the House of Commons on February 27, 1948, he said he felt there was no doubt in the world that at least another 20 cents per bushel would be paid on wheat in 1949. On November 13 last, according to the Leader-Post, speaking to the wheat pool convention in the province of Saskatchewan, the minister said the wheat board would be in a position to make an additional payment, probably 20 cents a bushel. After that announcement was made municipalities in the drought area passed resolutions saying to the minister, "If the wheat board is making a payment, as you say it is going to, then we want our payments first, because our farmers are in financial need."

Reading a lecture to the hon. member for Souris (Mr. Ross) the minister said it would be most unwise to pay out an additional 40 cents a bushel at that time because, he said, that would put a great strain on the resources of the wheat board. Let me quote his words, at page 1719 of Hansard for February 27, 1948:

> We would have to go back to the bank and borrow money and pay interest on it, and the farmers of western Canada are not asking us at the present time to go to the bank and borrow money and charge the interest up to them and pay them another 20 cents over and above the possible 20 cents we may pay under this legislation.

He told the farmers of Canada and the members of this house that the government would not instruct the wheat board to pay 20 cents a bushel if as a result the wheat board would have to go to the bank to borrow the money. So the farmers naturally assumed last year, when the 20-cent payment was made, that the wheat board had sufficient funds on hand without going to the banks.

It has been stated in this house on a number of occasions already that the wheat board ended its fiscal year on July 31, 1949, with a deficit of more than $5 million, and that at the time they owed the banks more than $23 million. At that date the wheat board was completely bankrupt; its liabilities exceeded its assets by more than $5 million. When the board went to the banks to borrow money it had to pay an interest rate of three per cent compounded monthly; but this generous, benevolent government that looks after the funds of the farmers so well pays the wheat board five-eighths of one per cent on any money the board invests in treasury bills.

Yesterday the minister said the wheat board is borrowing money every year to handle the new crop. Of course it has to borrow money; that is not what we were objecting to at all. Let us take a look at the financial position of the wheat board on July 31, 1949, as compared with its financial position on July 31, 1948. According to the consolidated balance sheet, last year the board had on deposit in the banks just a little more than $4,000 and owed the banks almost $24 million. The previous year the board did not owe the banks anything; the banks owed the wheat board more than $57 million, because the board had that amount on deposit, and the federal government owed the wheat board $50 million by way of treasury bills, making the total cash reserves of the board $107 million as of July 31, 1948. But on July 31, 1949, its cash reserves were $23 million less than nothing.

Why was that policy followed? The government knows, as we all know, that on the price of wheat a government stands or falls in the province of Saskatchewan. So they said, "We will pay the farmers 20 cents a bushel; we will lead them to believe there is another 20 cents a bushel coming, and we know they will vote for the Liberal party." But farmers are really going to be up in arms now, when they find that the best they can hope for when the five-year period is over, unless Britain pays a higher price, and that I doubt, is an additional payment of not more than six cents a bushel.

Before the election the farmer might go into his post office one week and find a cheque for perhaps $800 for 1945 wheat. The next week he got a cheque for perhaps $1,000 for 1946 wheat. Within the next two weeks he received a cheque for perhaps $1,200 for 1947 wheat, and the day before the election he perhaps got a cheque for $1,000 for 1948 wheat. In other words he was paid, 3, 4 or 5 thousand dollars just previous to the election and from the statements made by the minister from time to time they expected to get another 20 cents a bushel.

Mr. Sinnott: What about The Battlefords election?

Mr. Argue: I am coming to that. Let me quote what the Minister of Agriculture said at page 1720 of Hansard for February 27, 1948:

> Under the plan of five-year payments that was brought into effect in 1945 the farmer knows that if there is drought he will have more money coming to him at an increase of 20 cents in each year, no matter when that drought comes—

The minister was replying to a suggestion by the hon. member for Souris that the payments should be increased by 40 cents. He said, "No, that is no good. We have had a dry year; we may have a dry year next year; we may have dry years throughout the balance of the five-year period." He believed it was a better thing to give the farmers 20 cents a bushel each spring from now until the end of the five-year pool. The farmers now know to their sorrow that the wheat board has been used as an instrument to elect the Liberal party. The farmers know that the Minister of Agriculture was right when he said in February, 1948, that the farmers did not want the government to go in debt to the bank, and bankrupt the wheat board in order to pay an additional payment.

If one goes over the wheat board consolidated balance sheet for 1949, one finds that the farmers have made a real contribution to the consumer by providing wheat at a low price. The farmers made a contribution towards keeping United Kingdom wheat prices down. The figures show that the average price for class II wheat, at the time the British agreement began to operate, was $2.39 per bushel. Under the United Kingdom agreement, the price was $1.70, that is the average for the first three years. Over the same period the domestic price amounted to $1.61 per bushel. I do not say the assumption is a good one, but if we assume that the farmers had received the price of class II wheat for all wheat going into the domestic market, the wheat board would have on hand now another $159 million. If under the British contract the price had equalled the price of class II wheat for the first three years, the wheat board would now have an additional $332 million. The farmers know they have made a very large contribution indeed.

I say to the government that if it is going to maintain a stabilized wheat program, as I think it must, if it is going to give the farmers of Canada even elementary justice, then when the government brings down amendments to the wheat board act it should establish another five-year pool, in which the initial price is not less than the money derived by the farmers from the five-year pool just ended. Agriculture was willing to accept the government's stabilization program on the understanding that stability would not mean just keeping farm prices down, but in future years would also mean keeping farm prices up. If the government will bring in, as I hope it will, another five-year agreement, under which the initial price is not less than the price obtained for the last five-year pool, then I believe the farmers will say the government's wheat policy has after all been a good one.

I have one more quotation I should like to place on the record, Mr. Speaker, and then I shall be finished. The quotation has to do with the interjection made by the hon. member for Springfield (Mr. Sinnott). Yesterday the Minister of Agriculture, as recorded at page 572 of Hansard, made a reference to the by-election in The Battlefords constituency. Before I quote exactly what the minister said, may I refer to the fact that he alleged the C.C.F. brought in federal issues, and that the whole campaign was fought on federal issues. He said the Liberals had a great majority, and a great victory, and therefore the government's policies were endorsed. He wound up by making this statement, talking again about Liberal votes, Conservative votes and C.C.F. votes:

> When they—
> Meaning the C.C.F. and Conservatives.
> —put the two together and added them all up we still had them trimmed by 132.

That quotation, as with so many others, is not in accordance with the facts. The Liberal party won, but not with an over-all majority of 132; they lacked 243 votes of having an over-all majority.

I should like to quote the results in that particular constituency in the last three elections. In the provincial election of 1948 the Liberal majority was 436. In The Battlefords constituency in the federal election of 1949 the Liberal majority was 1,319; in February, 1950, the actual majority over the C.C.F. amounted to 138 votes. The Liberal party won by a fair majority in 1948, and by a whopping majority in 1949. They only "skinned through" in 1950. The Minister of Agriculture says that the election was fought on federal issues. If that is correct, and if this vote on February 8 last is indicative of the opinion of the people of Saskatchewan, if a provincial election had been held on that date the C.C.F. party would have won 38 of the 52 seats.

Mr. E. D. Fulton (Kamloops): Mr. Speaker, in taking part in this debate on the speech from the throne, I should like to deal first with two problems of general interest. Then, as other speakers have done this afternoon, I should like to turn my attention to the problems of trade as they affect the agricultural situation in Canada today.

The two general subjects I should like to mention before passing on to trade and the remarks of the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) concerning it are, first, the widespread appeal which has been made throughout this country for the setting up of a veterans affairs committee at this session. Every member has had requests from the Legion branches throughout his constituency, as well as from many of the women's auxiliaries to the Legion and other interested bodies, asking that that committee be set up. It is a request which is widespread and well-founded. This request cannot be disposed of by the brusque statement of the Minister of Veterans Affairs (Mr. Gregg), that the government does not intend to set up such a committee. There has been no amplification of that statement, nor has there been any explanation of the reasons which led the minister to that conclusion. I have no hesitation in saying that, in view of the problems which confront this country and the veterans as citizens of this country, there is every need for that committee. We on this side of the house, as well as the veterans organizations throughout the country, are not satisfied with that answer. We shall continue to press for the setting up of a committee until our efforts meet with success.

The other general question to which I should like to refer is the widespread agitation for the immediate removal of the means test. I am only one of 262 members, and I do not say I have received more of the printed cards in favour of that request than the others—I may not have received as many. I do know, however, that my correspondence has become increasingly difficult to keep up with owing to the number of those requests which have come to hand. If the number I am receiving is any measure of the number the other members are receiving, then there must be many hundreds of thousands coming into this House of Commons from the people throughout the country. That volume of requests, Mr. Speaker, would not be in such proportion as we find it, if it were not for the fact that the people of Canada, particularly the old age pensioners, were encouraged, by statements made by government candidates from coast to coast during the election campaign in June of last year, to believe that the means test would be removed.

Mr. Knowles: Including Winnipeg South.

Mr. Fulton: I do not believe in pressure groups, Mr. Speaker, any more than do you or any other hon. member; but this is not a pressure group. It is a heartfelt request from the people of Canada for the implementation of what they understood, by the ordinary meaning of words, to be a declared part of government policy if the government was returned, as it was, in June. It is no sufficient answer for the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) to put this matter off by saying that we cannot do it without agreement with the provinces. He did not say that in June or May of 1949. It is no sufficient answer to say that we are appointing a parliamentary committee. In the election campaign of 1949 he did not say that he would do that.

The impression was clearly given, and it clearly remains, that if this government was returned to power a contributory pension scheme would be introduced and the means test would be eliminated. To refrain from implementing that promise is nothing short of a breach of faith, Mr. Speaker, and a denial of the understanding deliberately given during the course of the election campaign. In the course of debate in these last two days we have heard a good deal about double talk and about saying one thing and meaning another. The history of this promise to remove the means test is merely a part of the over-all pattern.

I should now like to deal particularly with the subject of Canada's trade situation. Probably no other problem looms so large in the minds of the people of this country as that of declining markets, in overseas countries, for Canada's produce. We in the opposition have pressed for one step to be taken that might solve that problem. We have pressed, and will continue to press, for the summoning of a commonwealth trade conference. That subject was debated for one whole day in this house, Mr. Speaker; and I think it is significant to note that during that whole day's debate there was only one speaker on the government side who even bothered to discuss the question of trade. Indeed, sitting here, I had the instructed its followers that they were not to impression that the government had say anything about trade.

An hon. Member: That is not the situation.

Mr. Fulton: I am glad to hear it, but that is the impression I had. There was only one government speaker, and no private member on the government side appeared to feel that the subject was important enough to warrant his giving his views on the situation. It is also significant that the only speaker on the government side—the Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott)—spoke for something under five minutes, and the sum of his contribution was that a trade conference would not necessarily solve the problem, that he could not see that any good purpose would be served, and that it was not up to Canada to take the initiative. That was the sum total of the government's contribution on that day to the discussion of Canada's great problem. It is true that references have been made to the matter in passing by other speakers on other occasions. For instance, in the course of this debate we heard from the Secretary of State of External Affairs (Mr. Pearson) and he dealt with the question of a commonwealth conference on trade matters. He said that he could not see that any good purpose would be served by it. When it comes to the matter of atomic energy and the difficulties which exist between ourselves and the Russians, he said he would attend limitless conferences. But on trade matters as between members of the commonwealth, the inference would seem to be that it is nonsense to assume that we can solve these problems by conference. Of course, when it comes to atomic energy, we and the Russians have never yet been able to agree. But the inference is that a conference would probably produce good results. But on trade matters between friends, nations of the commonwealth, who normally get along fairly well, the suggestion seems to be that a conference would probably not produce any results at all.

The Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe) has not yet spoken in this debate but he recently returned from Europe. I have here a press report of an interview or what I take to be an interview with him when he landed in New York. It appears datelined "New York, March 1" and is headed "Howe Predicts More Exports—Trade Minister Returns From Six-Week Visit to Europe." Both before and after the election the Minister of Trade and Commerce, of course, from coast to coast has been predicting more exports; but the more he predicts more exports, the more our overseas trade seems to decline. On this occasion the minister did not give us any facts which would seem to substantiate his moving faith that there will be more exports. The article goes on to say:

> Mr. Howe, who arrived aboard the Queen Mary, said the over-all outlook for increased trade with Europe is "improving all the time." He added that the dominion is not "overlooking any possibilities" in its efforts to foster more trans-Atlantic trade.

The minister did not say how European countries would be able to pay for our exports with non-convertible currency. According to the article he went on to say:

> Canada was encouraging private businessmen to arrange barter deals where such are more desirable. But the Canadian government was not directly involved in any such trade.

About the only impression we can get from an analysis of the minister's statements —at least until he gives us more detailed information in the house—is that, as a result of currency restrictions, we have had to turn the clock back some four hundred years, and have come to a point where money is no longer a useful means of exchange for international trade, and private businessmen are being encouraged to enter into barter deals. The government will not have anything to do with those deals. Oh no, that is not the government's responsibility. Its only responsibility appears to be to encourage private businessmen to arrange these deals and then to insist that they take the whole responsibility for such deals if they go bad.

Presumably, the situation is this, Mr. Speaker. You, coming from an apple-producing area of Ontario, are now encouraged to make a deal with the United Kingdom if you want to sell your apples; and it would be fine, from the government's point of view, if you would care to accept, shall we say, Egyptian cotton in return. Then you would have to set yourself up in the cotton business and find a market for the cotton. But the government will not accept any responsibility for that deal nor, presumably, will they come to your assistance if you are left with a lot of cotton on your hands.

The situation we see confronting this country now with respect to its foreign trade looks a great deal like the situation which developed in 1928 and 1929 when, you will note, Mr. Speaker, the trend toward the loss of Canada's overseas markets, and particularly the sterling market, first set in. Let no one be misled by the oft-repeated and completely unfounded assertion of the Minister of Agriculture in this house that the loss of Canada's overseas markets was the sole responsibility of the Bennett government. The fact is, as I shall show later on from the dominion bureau of statistics' own figures, that the trend set in and was experienced at its most violent pace in the last two years of the King government in 1928 to 1930. It was not until the Bennett government did something about it in 1932, by summoning the imperial economic conference, that the trend was halted and Canada's trade finally began a long, slow uphill climb toward recovery from the situation that the Liberal government had brought about.

Mr. Ferrie: Nineteen-cent wheat.

Mr. Fulton: If the hon. members of the Liberal party want to interrupt me I would ask them to do so one at a time so that I can deal with them.

Mr. Ferrie: All right; what about 19-cent wheat?

Mr. Fulton: The 19-cent wheat that my hon. friend is so interested in was explained in the quotation read by the hon. member for Lake Centre (Mr. Diefenbaker) this afternoon, in which the present Minister of Agriculture, a leading figure of your own party, explained that the fall in the price of Canadian wheat was due to the United States policy, and that trend started in the years 1928 to 1930. If my hon. friend will contain his patience a little longer I shall give him the figures which substantiate my position.

Mr. Ferrie: Give me the money that they took out of my pocket and I will be happy.

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Fulford): Order.

Mr. Smith (Calgary West): On a point of order, Mr. Speaker, I want to be the first to congratulate you on being able to exercise your authority now. I am looking to my left.

Mr. Ferrie: Thanks a lot.

Mr. Fulton: Mr. Speaker, the press is full of information today which supports—although the statement is so frequently denied by the ministers of the government—the assertion that Canada is losing her overseas markets. I hold in my hand a quotation from the Toronto Star, dated February 15, 1950, which reads:

> Canada fails to close Trade Gaps with U.S., Britain in Big Year
> Although Canada's foreign trade, a key factor in the nation's prosperity, remained high last year, there were several "low pressure" areas which may mean rough weather ahead.

They were dealing with 1949 when the trend had already become evident. The report goes on:

> The year-end report of the dominion bureau of statistics reveals Canada is no farther ahead today in solving the currency exchange problem than she was a year ago.
> It's generally agreed that the long-range solution, as far as Canada is concerned, is for her to buy more from Britain and to sell more to the U.S. Both of these things she failed to do in any substantial measure in the twelve months ending last December, the report showed.

Then we have the dominion bureau of statistics release, to which reference has been made on one or two occasions previously, covering the first month of 1950, coming to hand at the very time that this particular question is being discussed, coming to hand at the very time that the Minister of Agriculture and the Minister of Trade and Commerce and others are saying that to talk of Canada losing her overseas markets is nonsense. It is a pity that the ministers do not have time to read the publications of their own departments, or if they do read them they do not seem to have that confidence in their accuracy which we on this side of the house have.

This release shows that our exports to the United Kingdom in the month of January as compared with the month of January, 1949, fell by $7 million.

Mr. Howe: My hon. friend knows the reason. He knows that the railroads in British Columbia, which carry our exports to seaboard in the winter months, were blocked.

Mr. Fulton: They were not blocked during the whole month of January.

Mr. Howe: They were blocked for a good part of it. The drop in wheat shipments accounts for nearly all of the deficit.

Mr. Fulton: It is comforting to hear the minister make that explanation for the first time, but it does not explain the tendency which was so evident during the preceding months of 1949.

Mr. Howe: My hon. friend is aware—

Mr. Fulton: Were the railroads closed all during 1949?

Mr. Howe: During 1949 exports dropped by exactly 2 per cent, and that was due to the drop in prices in the last half of the year. If that is a calamity in trade, then I hope we shall have no more serious ones.

Mr. Argue: By volume?

Mr. Howe: By dollars.

Mr. Fulton: I am glad to hear that the Minister of Trade and Commerce is consistent in his statement now and those which he made before the election. He might pass a little of his consistency on to the Minister of Agriculture, who told us that—

Mr. Howe: Incidentally, it was 2 per cent down from the highest peacetime export that this country has ever known.

Mr. Fulton: I grant the minister that. No one has ever quarrelled with the fact that in the last few years our export trade has been at higher levels; but I can give the minister his own statement that a large part of that is due to the inflated value of currency, and a substantial measure of that is due to Marshall aid being extended by the United States.

Mr. Howe: If my hon. friend would talk about something he understands and leave Marshall aid alone, it would be a great help.

Mr. Fulton: Perhaps the minister will let me complete my statement.

Mr. Howe: You make so many misstatements.

Mr. Fulton: The minister has given no indication that any policies are being instituted that will solve the problem which will exist in double measure when the Marshall aid program comes to an end. It will be interesting to hear whether the minister is going to blame the British Columbia weather for the decline in exports in the whole sterling area in the month of January, 1950, of $21 million. British Columbia weather can take a lot of responsibility, Mr. Speaker, but I do not think it can be blamed for that.

Mr. Diefenbaker: It has been blamed for unemployment, too.

Mr. Fulton: As the hon. member for Lake Centre has said, British Columbia weather has been used to explain unemployment out there. I hardly think it explains the unemployment in New Brunswick, where those engaged in the pit prop industry have lost the United Kingdom market. I hardly think that British Columbia weather explains the fact that the apple growers in British Columbia have not sold a box of apples to the United Kingdom in two years. It hardly explains why it was necessary for the British Columbia apple growers to give away a million boxes this year.

Mr. Howe: It was not necessary. That was the result of their generosity.

Mr. Fulton: Perhaps the minister will explain these matters when he makes a contribution to the debate. The dominion bureau of statistics figures show, Mr. Speaker, that trade in the whole sterling area in the month of January, 1950, declined by $21 million as compared with the month of January, 1949.

At six o'clock the house took recess.

[Mr. Fulton.]

AFTER RECESS

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. Fulton: Mr. Speaker, just before the house took recess at six o'clock we had heard the Minister of Trade and Commerce make the extraordinary statement that the British Columbia winter was mainly responsible for the decline in trade with the United Kingdom. That statement is almost as extraordinary as the statement made—or the impression sought to be left yesterday—by the Minister of Agriculture that the policies of the Bennett government away back in 1932 are responsible for the present decline in trade with the United Kingdom. Anything and everything is blamed by the government except their own policies which have been proved in detail, and with facts and figures in support, to be the main reason for the decline in our trade.

We heard this evening another most extraordinary statement by the Minister of Trade and Commerce which will be found in Hansard, that the gift of a million boxes of apples to the United Kingdom by the British Columbia fruit growers was made, not because they had a surplus but merely because the fruit growers were in a generous mood. Of course that is the most extraordinary and I would say irresponsible statement of them all. If that is the attitude of the government toward our fruit growers then I feel that there is not much prospect of assistance or of any realistic measures being taken to tide them over a most difficult situation. That remark is an example of the sort of remark that is tossed off when the government finds itself in difficulty. They have not any real explanation and therefore they seek to deal with a thing by flippancy and evasion. The fact is that we have a situation where our trade with the United Kingdom and the sterling areas is declining at such a pace as to call for measures of the most energetic sort to be taken in conjunction with other countries of the commonwealth to put an end to this trend.

In dealing with the remarks made yesterday by the Minister of Agriculture we find that not only does he appear to indulge—and other hon. members besides myself have suggested this—in double-talk, saying one thing at one time and another thing at another, but he now wants to make his speeches in duplicate. For instance, yesterday he felt it would be a good idea to read at length from a radio speech he made in the election campaign last June. Not content with reading his own speeches over again to the house, he wants us to read them too. We heard him this afternoon trying to have the hon. member for Lake

Centre (Mr. Diefenbaker) read his speeches over again. If they had been any answer to the situation, that would have been bad enough, but when they are not, when their only purpose is to further confuse the situation, that is confusion worse confounded.

The minister's whole position that the export of agricultural commodities to the United Kingdom is continuing at a satisfactory level is contradicted, not only by others of his statements but by the facts as well as by other members of the cabinet. We have the Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott) taking a very serious view of our declining trade with Great Britain. When the Minister of Finance was presenting his budget to the house last March he made the definite statement that the Canadian authorities had made official representations to the United Kingdom authorities against the barter deals being entered into between that country and other countries, some being behind the iron curtain. I feel that this situation is serious enough to warrant us in asking the government and the minister to let us know what representations were made, to whom they were made and the results of those representations.

Mr. Fleming: They also warrant the minister's attention.

Mr. Howe: Can't you make a speech without us? It is not very interesting.

Mr. Fulton: I sometimes think the country could be run without you. I suppose a speech in the house could be made without the minister's attention.

Mr. Abbott: The only trouble is that my hon. friend makes too many speeches and too dull.

Mr. Fulton: That is typical of the attitude taken by the government. They think that all speeches made by the opposition are too many. They would like to run the country without any opposition at all but it will be some time before they do that. However, let us not become heated. It did so happen that I was dealing with some statements made by the minister at the time he presented his budget last spring and I should like to quote now from a press report of his remarks as follows:

> The government of Canada has made repeated requests at the very highest level that authorities in the United Kingdom and other commonwealth countries do all that they can to take advantage of the favourable opportunities which Canada has offered for their exports.
> The Canadian government has also made it clear that it does not look with favour on purchasing arrangements or bilateral trade deals which tend to divert away from Canada either British or colonial products which otherwise could be sent here,—

I was hoping, in view of the somewhat similar statement made some time ago by the Minister of Agriculture, that the Minister of Finance would tell us to whom the representations were made and what have been the results. It is stated here that the representations were made on the official level. I refer to that as indicating that at least one or two ministers, for a short while at any rate, recognized the fact that our trade situation vis-à-vis the United Kingdom and the sterling area is in a serious position.

But we find the Minister of Agriculture at this time departing from or contradicting the statements which he made formerly that we could not dispose of Canadian agricultural production because of the situation with respect to sterling trade and saying that we have no surplus production to dispose of. The Minister of Agriculture made a statement, as reported on page 288 of Hansard of February 27, that the only surplus we have now is cheese and he said, "We are carrying that right now".

I ask the Minister of Agriculture: If there are no surpluses why did the British Columbia apple growers have to give away a million boxes of apples to the United Kingdom? The minister is contradicted in connection with this matter, not only by his previous statements but by the facts. He is contradicted in this matter as he is in so many other matters. For instance, we all recall his words during the last year or two when this subject was being discussed when he said that there was no market for Canadian apples in the United Kingdom. Not only did he say that the United Kingdom cannot buy Canadian apples; he said that the United Kingdom is now producing all the apples it needs for its own domestic consumption.

He painted a picture of millions of apple trees in England groaning with apples, their branches loaded down to the ground. If that was the fact why did the British government accept so gladly and so readily the gift of a million boxes of surplus Canadian apples, and incidentally turn around, as I have heard, and market them in their domestic market at a substantial profit? We find the Minister of Agriculture making this statement on June 6 in the election campaign at Spy Hill, Saskatchewan.

You know, Mr. Speaker, I think it would be interesting if the Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott) and the Minister of Trade and Commerce would let the house in on this little tête-à-tête they are having. It seems to be very interesting or amusing. They are certainly gesticulating wildly at each other. I hope it does not indicate another split in the cabinet. However, the ministers can carry on their little tête-à-tête. I assure them it does not bother me because if their statements to each other are as wildly inaccurate as their statements to the public they probably would not be very edifying anyway.

Mr. Abbott: I can always follow my hon. friend better when I read him in Hansard afterwards.

Mr. Fulton: That is more than we can say for some of the minister's statements and for some other statements which do not always appear in Hansard in the way in which they are heard in the house.

Mr. Speaker: I do not know whether the hon. member is reflecting on Hansard.

Mr. Fulton: Far from it, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Abbott: I do not think so.

Mr. Fulton: I intended no reflection whatsoever on Hansard. Quite the other way around. I think this situation we have now, and the conflicting statements coming from the ministers as to whether or not there are any agricultural surpluses in Canada, are sufficient to warrant us calling for a meeting of the agricultural committee before which experts of the various departments might appear and let us have the facts and figures as to agricultural production in Canada and the existence or otherwise of surpluses in these various commodities.

Yesterday when the Minister of Agriculture was dealing with the question of the marketing of our agricultural goods in the United Kingdom and sterling areas he resorted to what has become a favourite trick. When confronted with a situation for which he has no real answer he went back to the 1930's, and he tried once again to say that the whole responsibility for the situation rests on the Bennett government and the imperial trade conference of 1932. I should like to refer to what the minister said yesterday as reported at pages 572 and 573 of Hansard. As a matter of fact he went back away beyond 1932. He started back in 1877. This government has been in power for fifteen years and yet they are still blaming what goes on today on what Sir John A. Macdonald said in 1877. The Minister of Agriculture is reported as follows:

> All I want to say about it is that from the time Sir John A. Macdonald made his speech at Stanstead, Quebec, in 1877 to the present day Conservative policy has been a policy opposed to trade as a solution for the problems of this country, and the policy of the C.C.F. party as announced is the same. On the other hand, the policy of the Liberal party has been one of trade in order to improve the affairs of this country.

At that point he was interrupted by the hon. member for Victoria-Carleton (Mr. Hatfield) who said "free trade." Incidentally, I should like to differ there even though that member is a member of my own party. I should like to point out that the Liberal party, avowedly a low tariff party, has in fact during the period of its power had higher tariffs than any other government in the history of Canada. The minister continued:

> Therefore we have had good times when we have had a Liberal government in power, and we have had bad times when we have had a Conservative government in power.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Fulton: I am glad to hear my hon. friends applaud that statement because perhaps they will applaud the figures I am now about to give them. If they will look at the dominion bureau of statistics volume entitled "Trade of Canada for the year ended December 31, 1948" volume I, there they will see the record of our trade with the United Kingdom and other countries year by year up to and including 1948. If they will look at those figures and examine particularly the ten years from 1928 to 1937 inclusive they will see that the decline in our trade with the United Kingdom, the sterling area and all other foreign countries started in the year 1928, and continued with increasing velocity up to the year 1930. Certainly it has to be admitted it continued until 1932. A Conservative government came into power in 1930 but the downhill momentum was so tremendous that it could not be arrested until 1932.

In that year steps were taken to correct it and restore Canada's trade with the sterling areas. Those efforts were successful. If hon. members will analyse these figures they will find in every year from 1932 on our trade increased, and continued to increase, gradually working its way back to the position it was in before it was wrecked by the policies of the King government as they took effect in the years 1928 to 1930. I have the figures here, Mr. Speaker, and I should like permission to table them in Hansard. First, however, I should like to make this analysis. If you take the table showing Canadian exports to the United Kingdom you will find the highest figure before 1930 was in 1925; the lowest year was in 1931. From 1928 to 1930 our exports to the United Kingdom declined by 47 per cent, nearly one-half the volume. They reached their lowest point in 1931 and they started up again in 1932. From 1931 to 1935 they increased by 77 per cent under the Bennett government as against a decrease of 47 per cent under the King government.

Taking Canadian exports to other British countries, the highest figure before the depression was in 1929. They reached their lowest level in 1932. From 1928 to 1930 there was an over-all decline of 18 per cent. They reached their low in 1932 and increased from 1932 to 1935 by 94 per cent as against an 18 per cent decline in the last two years of the King government. If you take Canadian exports to all British countries the trend is the same. They were highest in 1926 and they were lowest in 1932. From 1928 to 1930 they declined by 44 per cent. After the economic conference of 1932 they began to go up, and between 1932 and 1935 they increased by 73 per cent as contrasted with a decline of 44 per cent in the last two years of the King government. Therefore there is good foundation for the statement that the Liberal party is absolutely wrong when it tries to saddle the responsibility for the depression on the Bennett government knowing full well that is not the fact, that the depression started in 1928.

I will give one typical set of figures; our exports to all British countries. They declined from $545 million in 1928 to $316 million in 1930, a decline of $230 million in two years. Yet my hon. friends say the depression was caused by the Conservative government under R. B. Bennett, when the fact is that the Bennett government inherited this accelerating and tremendous decline in our overseas trade. They had the courage to take steps to deal with it, as they did at the economic conference of 1932. The figures further substantiate the statement that from that period on our trade with the United Kingdom and the other commonwealth countries, as well as with the rest of the world, expanded steadily under the impetus of that imperial economic conference.

That is why we say the time has now come, when we see a similar trend beginning, to take steps to counteract it. The Minister of Trade and Commerce admits a two per cent decline in trade with the sterling area in 1949.

Mr. Howe: In our exports, not in trade.

Mr. Fulton: Two per cent may not sound very much, but it is in the neighbourhood of $15 million, and indicates a trend which, according to the releases that are coming to hand, is continuing. That trend certainly demands that the government take some step such as the immediate summoning of a commonwealth trade conference to deal with the situation and put Canada's trade on the upward track instead of allowing it to continue on the downward trend it is now taking.

Mr. Dickey: Would the hon. gentleman care to put on Hansard the comparable figures showing Canada's trade with all countries for the years he has mentioned?

Mr. Fulton: I shall be glad to do so, and I would ask permission to place these tables on Hansard. They are taken from the volume of the dominion bureau of statistics to which I have referred.

Mr. Speaker: Has the hon. member consent to place these tables on Hansard?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Fulton: And in reply to the question of the hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Dickey) I may say that the figures showing Canada's exports to all countries other than those of the commonwealth show the same trend, declining from $794 million in 1928 to $547 million in 1930 and to $272 million in 1932, when the low point was reached. From that time on they began their slow, steady climb until the high point was reached in 1941. The tables are as follows:

Mr. A. J. Bater (The Battlefords): Mr. Speaker, in rising to support the motion for the adoption of the speech from the throne I first want to pay the usual tributes. I desire to pay a tribute to the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent), in that last December by a vote of several of the newspaper editors of our country he was selected as Canada's man of the year. I am happy to state also that running him a close second was an hon. gentleman to whom we listened with great interest this past week, none other than the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Pearson). I regret that my tribute to you, Mr. Speaker, is rather belated; but while late, it is none the less sincere, and I take this opportunity of congratulating you upon your elevation to your high office and the manner in which you are carrying out your duties. I am sure the message you gave us last session on the occasion of the visit of the Prime Minister of India will long linger in our memory.

Since coming here for this session I have heard that there was an election in The Battlefords constituency just a month ago. I am not going to say anything more about that election; enough has been said already. Speaking of elections, however, early in this debate something was said about ballots and ballot boxes in the last election, and there was some reference to ballot boxes as they are used in Russia and ballots as they might be used in China. Well, Mr. Speaker, I contend that there is not and never will be any comparison between the ballots we use in this country and the ballots used in Russia or China, and that is so for one great reason. We have a great pillar of the democratic system which I believe will prevent anything like that happening in this country. That great pillar is none other than the Canadian press. As our press operates from day to day, during election campaigns, between campaigns, and even in this very chamber, with its piercing eye and ever-listening ear, it will see to it that the ballot continues to mean just what it should mean.

We have heard a good deal about the right hon. Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner). I am not going to take up very much time in this connection, since I noticed this week that he is well able to take care of himself. I believe he and his colleagues are well aware of the fact that as agriculture prospers so does the rest of Canada, and I am sure he will see to it that agriculture in this country does prosper. I do not believe anyone in Canadian politics has ever attempted and accomplished more not only for western agriculture but for agriculture in general than has the minister.

A great deal is being said about trade. We hear hon. members say, "Why are we not importing more from Britain, because that is the only country that buys our wheat?" On the other hand they say, "Oh, but we must be careful about what we bring in. You must not bring anything into my constituency that will interfere with any factory already operating there." I contend that we are rather inconsistent when we discuss the question of trade with Britain. We have been told a conference should be called. I believe that before we sponsor a conference of the British commonwealth nations we should call an all-Canada conference, so we can all get our feet under a table and decide just what should be brought into Canada and what should not, and how much we are going to send to Britain. We should do that instead of one moment saying we must have more trade with Britain and the next moment saying we must not bring in lawn mowers or textiles because they interfere with the economics of our own country. These are things which I believe should be given careful consideration.

Now I should like to say just a word or two about the constituency of The Battlefords, which I have the honour to represent. No doubt others have spoken about it previously, but I should like to say just a word in passing. As most of you are aware, the constituency of Battleford reaches from a point thirty miles west of Saskatoon to the Alberta border. No. 5 highway, as it is known now, and which I hope will eventually be known as the trans-Canada highway, cuts right through my constituency. In the centre of it there is the city of North Battleford. In the western part, on the Alberta border, there is the oil town of Lloydminster. The agriculture is chiefly mixed farming, although considerable grain is being grown, but not as much as on the wheat plains farther south. A considerable number of cattle are raised, and we have some of the finest herds of Hereford, Shorthorn and Aberdeen Angus cattle that you will find in any constituency in the dominion. In 1947 the largest fat stock show in the dominion was held in the city of North Battleford sponsored by the North Battleford agricultural society.

I believe most hon. members are aware of the fact that at Lloydminster there is the largest black oil field, not only in Canada, but I think I am safe in saying on the North American continent. Speaking of the oil field at Lloydminster, I should like to say a word or two about the curtailment of railway service which took place recently. I believe the service is to be resumed today. I want to sincerely thank the Minister of Transport (Mr. Chevrier) and the president of the Canadian National for their prompt replies to me, and the courtesies they extended while I was writing on behalf of the travelling public, the businessmen of the city of North Battleford, as well as the railwaymen of the divisional point of North Battleford. I hope this curtailment will turn out to be a blessing in disguise. It is my opinion that, in so far as the Canadian National Railways are concerned, a thing of that sort should never be permitted to happen again. If necessary, higher subsidies should be paid on our own Canadian coal and our oil, so that it could be transported to the points at which it is required. This would enable the Canadian National to have plenty of both, and not require American dollars to purchase. If we do this, we will be creating more work for the coal miners, as well as the men in the oil fields. We will be creating more jobs for the men on the Canadian National Railways.

The mention of railways recalls to my mind that the Hudson Bay railway was mentioned this afternoon. I should like to point out that, so far as this railway is concerned, no party has done more towards the construction and operation of the Hudson Bay railway than the Liberal party. They built it, and they built the elevators as well. I have received information to the effect that one can bring cattle from Scotland to the port of Churchill at a rate of £100 per head—not dollars, but pounds. I believe I mentioned this specific case at the last session. I think this is something that requires investigation. Some insurance company should look into the matter of underwriting the rates on stock, and possibly on other commodities that could be brought to the port of Churchill. Perhaps the Saskatchewan government could investigate the matter, because I understand it is in the insurance business. I just received this information the other day, and I think it bears investigation.

Mention was made today of the Prairie Farm Rehabilitation Act. It is my belief that this is something for which we should give credit to the right hon. Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner). I believe he has made an honest endeavour to have that act extended to every section of western Canada, as well as to other parts of the dominion. In speaking about the Prairie Farm Rehabilitation Act, the member for Lake Centre (Mr. Diefenbaker) followed his usually critical line. He has constantly blamed the federal government for the delay in the completion of the South Saskatchewan project. I would point out to the hon. member that both the Saskatchewan and Alberta governments have at last agreed with the contention of the Minister of Agriculture, that the provinces have a financial responsibility in connection with these irrigation projects. I have no doubt the member for Lake Centre will be surprised, and I hope delighted, to know that an agreement has been finally entered into between the Alberta government and the federal government concerning the St. Mary's project. It is hoped that this agreement will serve as a model for other agreements, as the Minister of Agriculture prophesied at the last session.

Some reference was made also to the Crowsnest rates. I should like to point out, Mr. Speaker, that the only time we were in danger of losing the Crowsnest rates was during the period when Mr. Meighen was in charge of the government. At the end of the first great war a bill was introduced into the Commons, and passed, which would have done away with the Crowsnest rate. The late Senator Watson, a Liberal from Portage la Prairie, moved in the Senate that the bill be returned to the Commons to have a clause inserted that the rates could be suspended for three years only. When the matter came up in 1922 the Liberals were in office, and the rates were finally restored to their statutory position. Coming to a more recent period in connection with these rates, it was at the last session that the western Liberal members in this house signed a petition requesting that these rates be not interfered with. This petition was forwarded to the board of transport commissioners.

I am sure all members were pleased to note the reference in the speech from the throne to the forthcoming Indian Act. At the last session, I believe the Indians were referred to as the forgotten men. I am sure we are all pleased, and hopeful, that something will come out of this that will give the Indians a better deal in these changing times.

There is another group I should like to mention, not quite so numerous as the Indians, and that is the Northwest Mounted Police. I recall, as I suppose many of the members from the west do, that in the severe winter of 1906 and 1907 the mounted policeman used to ride into our yard. At that time we were living about 22 miles from Battleford. He did not ride into the yard then in a snowplane, but on horseback. On several occasions the policeman stayed for dinner, fed his horse, and before leaving asked my father to sign his patrol book to show that he had been looking after the settlers to see that no one was going hungry or suffering. These are the men who, today, should not be allowed to want for the comforts or necessities of life. I hope that something will be done for them. Just prior to coming down here I was speaking to the wife of one of those members who is eighty-two years of age. She informed me that they were not in want but she knew others that had been in the forces along with her husband in the early days who, she thought, could well do with assistance. I hope the government will give consideration to these men. There are not many left and they should not be allowed to want.

should like to ask what price must be paid to attain a world of peace and plenty. The terms are easy and are such as will finally benefit all and harm none. We shall not have to surrender any greater measure of our national identity, aspirations or ideals than you and I have to surrender as individuals in co-operating to maintain law and order within the nation; but we shall have to abandon the fallacy which teaches that we can become prosperous by limiting production and restricting trade, because political co-operation and economic isolation cannot exist side by side. What is required does not involve some new and untried scheme of social relationship or fantastic economic theory; it is simply the removal of those artificial barriers between men and nations that have been at the root of all our international differences, and the restoration to all the people of that most valuable privilege of organized society, the right to trade freely, one with another. Freedom of trade and intercourse between men and nations goes hand in hand with understanding and good will, and provides the only way in which all can be assured of that equality of opportunity that should be the inherent right of citizenship.

As our ship of state takes to the high seas of nationhood and international affairs, with the Prime Minister as the captain, his cabinet colleagues as his officers and the hon. members who support him making up the crew, I think I can safely say that our Prime Minister is well aware of the fact that in order to reach a port we must sail, sometimes with the wind and sometimes against it. We must, however, sail; we cannot drift or lie at anchor.

In conclusion, Mr. Speaker, I should like to quote a poem by Will Allen Dromgoole, which in my opinion should express the outlook of this parliament. I should also like these words to be my personal tribute to one whom it was not my privilege to know for a long period of time; I became acquainted with him during the last session. On a few occasions we walked together from this building down to the hotel. The person to whom I refer and to whom I wish to pay tribute is the late T. L. Church. The poem is as follows:

An old man going a lone highway
Came in the evening, cold and grey,
To a chasm vast and deep and wide
Through which there flowed a sullen tide.

The old man crossed in the twilight dim,
The sullen stream had no fears for him,
But he stopped when safe on the other side
And built a bridge to span the tide.

"Old man", said a fellow pilgrim near,
"You are wasting your strength with building here;
Your journey will end with the ending day,
You never again will pass this way.
You've crossed the chasm deep and wide,
Why build you this bridge at evening tide?"

The builder lifted his old grey head,
"Good friend, in the path I have come," he said,
"There followeth after me today
A youth whose feet must pass this way.

"This chasm which has been naught to me
To that fair-haired youth may a pitfall be.
He, too, must cross in the twilight dim,
Good friend, I am building the bridge for him."

(Translation):

Mr. Raoul Poulin (Beauce): Mr. Speaker, I have only a few rather brief remarks to make in this debate on the address in reply to the speech from the throne. I should be sorry, in fact, to take up an undue amount of the time of this house. I shall therefore be brief.

I am pleased to congratulate the mover (Mr. Larson) and the seconder (Mr. Dumas) of the address in reply to the speech from the throne. In my humble opinion, both have done excellent work and any praise I might offer would not add to the intrinsic value of their speeches.

By means of the speech from the throne the government has made known the problem of unemployment in this country. Although I do not wish to indulge in unnecessary discussion, I feel it is my duty to point out that unemployment has reached alarming proportions in the constituency I have the honour to represent. From nearly all parishes in my constituency I received petitions signed by hundreds of people and resolutions from municipal councils expressing concern at the seriousness of the problem. After a summary survey, I am in a position to state that there are over 2,500 unemployed in my constituency at the present time. Some villages are greatly affected. And then the fact that the great majority of the unemployed are labourers and lumberjacks, and therefore not entitled to unemployment insurance benefits, makes the situation all the more serious. One readily realizes, Mr. Speaker, the alarming situation of those men who, for the most part, are heads of families. They have been out of work for the past four, six and even ten months and their only income is derived from family allowances which, useful as they may be, under the circumstances are admittedly inadequate to ensure a decent standard of living. And yet the situation would not be so serious if all those who are fortunate enough to have a job were being paid fair wages.

Speaking in this house on February 20 last, the right hon. Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent), as reported at page 53 of Hansard, stated:

> Our pulp and paper people felt that it would be a prudent thing to reduce the size of their inventories in which so much of their working capital was tied up at rather high costs of production.

I admit these production costs are rather high, but the companies have reduced their inventories. They have not omitted, however, to reduce, in a shameful manner, the price paid to small operators for pulpwood, and the salaries paid to woodcutters for job work. In view of the price the paper companies get for pulp, it really is a shame that they should be allowed to pay these forest labourers the meagre wages they force them to accept with a knife at their throat, if I may say so. The forest labourer is not concerned with the fact that the paper companies have reduced their inventories. He is uneasy and wonders what has suddenly happened in the pulp industry that his salary should be cut by one-half or even two-thirds, while paper is still selling as high as a year or two ago, and even higher.

Last week I went through my constituency. It is inhabited by responsible people, by good workers who usually earn their living through hard work. A year or two ago, those people were getting between $5 and $7 to cut a cord of wood; this winter, under almost identical conditions, the companies are only paying $3, $2.50 and even $2. Would that be the result of exploitation by a combine or trust? With bitterness and resentment, the forest labourer ponders over the question. This would undoubtedly be an excellent field of inquiry for the investigating body that has become famous since last year's report on the flour milling industry.

Mr. Lesage: Will the hon. member permit a question? Is he aware that a provincial law deals with minimum salaries for forest labourers in Quebec? Under the circumstances the law is administered by the provincial government. Therefore, as the matter concerns workers of the province of Quebec, it should be referred to Mr. Duplessis.

Mr. Poulin: I am perfectly aware of that legislation. It hardly matters what political party has the right and duty to see that people abide by the law. As far as I am concerned, I avail myself of the means at my disposal to defend the lumberjacks' rights.

In any case, I have not blamed the federal government for lumberjacks' low wages. If any combine is operating, however, this is a splendid opportunity for the investigating commission I mentioned earlier to resume its task. I therefore urge with all the energy I can muster that lumberjacks be paid wages worthy of human beings.

If the government should ever decide to undertake public works for the relief of unemployment in the Beauce district, our municipalities would gladly supply a list of practical, useful, feasible and reasonable projects that would prove an asset to our parishes.

Discussing means to relieve unemployment, the Prime Minister also stated in the house, on February 20 last, as reported on page 58 of Hansard:

> But there will inevitably be some residuary problems from time to time in some areas, and the initiative in dealing with them must be taken by the local authorities.

That is, in my opinion, exactly what local authorities are doing and that is why the heads of municipalities in my constituency sent me several resolutions and petitions asking the federal government to help them solve a problem with which they did not feel competent to deal.

These municipal governments are acquainted with local needs. Better than anyone else, including members of the cabinet and the representatives of all the parties in this house, they know that inadequate means are at their disposal to meet these needs. Our parish authorities know perfectly well that local governments are not capable of coping with this crisis. Our municipal governments are prepared, or should be, to do their share, in a very small way, of course, towards paying for these projects I mentioned a moment ago.

Everywhere enlightened people ask us to intensify the struggle against communism here in Canada. May I modestly point out that poverty is a poor counsellor, that it is always in the seedbed of undeserved poverty that communism takes root most easily. Would not the expenditure of a few hundred million dollars to give the poor jobs which would preserve their dignity as free men be a way of making them happy and, as a result, of making them impervious to the come-hither of communism? It is only fair, I think, that we should ask ourselves this question.

And now let us look into another matter. I was very much interested in the remarks recently made in this house by the hon. member for Portneuf (Mr. Gauthier). In his capacity as a practising physician he dealt with a subject to which he has often addressed himself and which, to my mind also, is of great importance. As a matter of fact it is one which commends itself to both of us, since we are members of the same profession. I am speaking now of alcoholism amongst our people.

Is there anyone here who has any doubt whatever in regard to the importance of that problem in this country? Let us consider the statistics which I am about to quote; they give a comparative estimate of what the average Canadian spent towards the necessities of life, during the year 1948. I quote:

(Text):

According to the Temperance Advocate of October, 1949, the average Canadian spent in 1948:

Private and university education	$ 5 00
Jewelry	5 50
Tobacco	24 00
Fuel	27 00
Medical and death charges	28 50
House furnishings and appliances	47 00
Alcoholic beverages	48 00

(Translation):

Those figures, as will be readily admitted, are worthy of consideration by any serious-minded person.

I believe that the hon. member for Portneuf is altogether right in requesting the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Martin) to intensify his preventive medicine campaign by the inclusion of the fight against alcoholism.

The prevention of alcoholism is a matter of education at all levels: at home, at school and after graduation. I do not believe that either rules or the police can stop people from drinking. The experience of hundreds of years confirms my conviction. The following is a statement made a few weeks ago in Montreal by Dr. Adrien Plouffe, associate director of the health department of the city of Montreal:

[Mr. Poulin.]

The prevention of the manufacturing and of the sale of alcoholic beverages is a myth, a fabulous thing impossible of attainment. The prevention of alcoholism is a matter of education.

Mr. Speaker, no one is made virtuous by order in council, and long ago Cicero, the prince of lawmakers, said:

What good are laws without morals?

What good are laws without a willingness to respect them, and without the convictions necessary to accept their yoke? And where can we acquire such convictions, if not from education?

And such education must come from above. A Chinese proverb states:

If you start cleaning stairs at the bottom, they will always remain dirty.

To start teaching temperance to the lower classes is a good thing, I admit, but it is not enough. And in this connection, I wish to express my admiration and gratitude to an organization which has devoted itself to the fight against alcoholism through the simple practice of complete abstention. This organization is known as the Cercle Lacordaire. It extends over all of the province of Quebec and to part of the provinces of New Brunswick and Ontario.

Having reached its tenth anniversary, it already has 90,000 members who, as human beings, are apt to make mistakes but who nevertheless bring their important, I would say essential, contribution to the organization of the fight against alcoholism. I might call this group a sort of people's university. It is far from being sufficient, however, and I would urge the minister of health to launch and support a wide educational campaign of temperance. Again I ask the hon. minister, who is apparently well disposed, to use all his influence in order that our Canadian universities may join, support and even lead the movement. Besides, it would be of little avail for our universities to pour into our communities hundreds of graduates, technicians, and scientists if these very communities are being gnawed by the cancer of alcoholism.

What is done elsewhere, and especially in the United States, could and should also be applied in Canada. Every Canadian university should scientifically teach the nature of alcoholism, its evils, its prevention and cure. Each medical faculty in Canada should have a clinic for the treatment of alcoholics, not only to cure drunkards, but also for the purpose of teaching how to prevent alcoholism. All our universities and schools of medicine have departments or clinics dealing with social scourges like tuberculosis, syphilis and infant mortality. But, like the monkey in the story that forgot to light the lantern, we forget only one thing: to look after that other social scourge that all too often breeds the others, alcoholism. And I have proof to support my contention.

Mr. Speaker, I wish to add a word about another matter which bears some relation to the one I have been discussing since it also deals with education. On April 8, 1949, the Prime Minister tabled in the house order in council P.C. 1786, setting up a royal commission on national development in the arts, letters and sciences. The commission was brought into being, among other reasons, to inquire into and submit recommendations on the following matters, as stated in section (d):

> Relations of the government of Canada and any of its agencies with various national voluntary bodies operating in the field with which this inquiry will be concerned.

Public hearings have been held in many places in Canada and numerous organizations or individuals have stated their views on various aspects of the problem.

Now, before the hearings had come to an end, before the commissioners paid by the public treasury had finished gathering and collecting the evidence, one of them prematurely issued a statement which is questionable in content. Indeed, Reverend Father Lévesque of Quebec city, a member of this commission, is alleged to have said something to this effect:

> Mere academic education and culture are two different things, when education in general is being referred to. The former comes under the direct jurisdiction of the provinces, while the latter might be a matter to be dealt with by the federal government. No one is more anxious than we are to leave exclusively academic education within the purview of the provinces. There remains popular education or culture in general. We are concerned here with human thought. In this field, the federal government can legitimately play its part. I have quoted Le Devoir of February 20, 1950. Since then, I have never seen any denial of this quotation. I therefore have every reason to assume that the quotation agrees with the facts.

The least I can say is that nothing was forcing this commissioner to make so hasty a statement. Had he waited until the end of the survey, he might have altered his judgment. Perhaps he would not have uttered a statement disapproved of by an important section of the people of his province.

I hold this great educationist in the highest regard, yet I feel I have a right to discuss his opinions just as he is entitled to discuss mine. Is he ready to accept for our young people all that will come from federal institutions? If not, who will distinguish between what is acceptable and what is not? For my part I refuse to accept that and I am far from being the only one who holds that opinion in the province of Quebec.

Moreover that premature judgment is liable to influence the reports which have been or will be submitted to the commission. Why make a survey if the minds of the commissioners are already made up?

I would therefore advise those who are responsible for this commission to make representations to the commissioners and suggest that some of them show themselves less anxious to hand over to the federal government those things which, in my humble opinion, are better left with the provinces. Should the federal government assist education under certain well-defined conditions? Yes, of course. But I am humbly though unalterably opposed to any direct intervention such as has been prematurely expounded by Father Lévesque.

I wish to add that the Canadian government should give the utmost consideration to the solving of the problem of the marketing and prices of our agricultural products. I know that this is a very complex problem and the government should therefore deal with it carefully. I recognize that the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) has done a great deal in the past few months to try and solve this problem. I am aware that the minister has followed a reasonable part of the suggestions which he received from the farmers. Some progress has been made but much remains to be accomplished. It must not be forgotten that in many provinces of Canada, including the province of Quebec, the success of agriculture is the very foundation of our economic and social security.

Agricultural associations are unable by themselves to solve the problem but they are in a position to advise the government. I wish to point out this particular aspect of the question. I believe that the professional agricultural associations who have made a detailed study of this problem and who, therefore, are well acquainted with it have already submitted many suggestions to the minister.

As for myself, several agricultural organizations in my constituency have acquainted me with their views and I have duly forwarded them to the authorities concerned.

I am confident that in the light of this information and with the good will of the minister it will be possible to better the lot of an extremely important and extremely interesting group: the Canadian farmers.

Even if I am perhaps imposing, Mr. Speaker, I would not want to conclude my remarks without recalling an incident in which you took part yourself last night, that is the handicraft exhibition of the province of Quebec now being held at the Chateau Laurier. This was not the first time that I saw most of the exhibits but to see them all exhibited in one place, especially outside the province of Quebec, and in a city so hospitable and sympathetic as Ottawa the beautiful, I believe is something that gives us a feeling of legitimate pride.

I noticed two items in particular. I might have been somewhat prejudiced at that moment, since the exhibits were being displayed by people from my own constituency of Beauce, Mr. Henri-Louis Lévesque and Mr. and Mrs. Gérard Poulin. These people have done magnificent work. The house will allow me to extend to them my congratulations and to assure them that their achievements are truly wonderful.

(Text):

Mr. T. A. M. Kirk (Digby-Yarmouth): Mr. Speaker, to the mover (Mr. Larson) and seconder (Mr. Dumas) of the address in reply to the speech from the throne may I extend my hearty congratulations and assure them that the brevity of my comment is in inverse proportion to the respect and admiration I have for their most excellent presentations.

As a new member I am deeply conscious of the outstanding representatives from western Nova Scotia who have sat in this house during the last two decades. One calls to mind immediately such eminent and outstanding parliamentarians as the Right Hon. J. L. Ilsley, who is now chief justice of the supreme court of Nova Scotia, and the late Colonel the Hon. J. L. Ralston, both of whom filled with great distinction many portfolios in the government. One also recalls Vincent J. Pottier, K.C., now a county court judge in the province of Nova Scotia, and judge in admiralty for Nova Scotia of the Exchequer Court of Canada, and Major Loran E. Baker, former parliamentary assistant to the Minister of National Defence.

Although the new constituency of Digby-Yarmouth had its borders altered to conform with county lines, with Digby municipality replacing Shelburne county, its general make-up as to economy and population is practically unchanged. The constituency is essentially a district of small primary producers, each with his own particular problems, and it is still unique in its inclusion of two great races—each bringing its own special characteristics to the moulding of a common citizenship. The counties of Yarmouth and Digby are a part of Canada where for generations those two great races, English-speaking and French-speaking Canadians, have lived side by side in perfect sympathy and understanding.

With reference to one of our primary industries, may I say that the statement made by the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe) on Monday last in the house, to the effect that trade commissioners in several countries are working on the sale of pit props and that there is some hope that sales will be made, is a ray of encouragement to the farmers and truckers of Digby county in particular.

As to the primary industry of fishing, may I say that during the last thirty years the production of fish in western Nova Scotia has doubled, and in my constituency the fishing industry is keenly aware of the program of development outlined by the Minister of Fisheries (Mr. Mayhew) to the house on December 6 last.

Canada has access to the world's greatest fishing resources in the Atlantic, and we want to see an expansion program that will not in any way permit the reappearance of any economic weak spots. The trend from salt fish to the fresh and frozen products is continuing, and we are fully cognizant of the necessity of modern processing in filleting, packaging and freezing.

Along the Digby coast investigations have been and are being made into the effect of dragging operations with particular reference to the complaint that the feeding grounds are being destroyed. The complaint that draggers are interfering with other methods of fishing by inshore fishermen is also being investigated. We await with keen interest the report on these two specific investigations.

There are certain other matters pertaining to the fishing industry which I look forward to discussing at a later date when the estimates of the Department of Fisheries are before the house.

Upon leaving the subject of commercial fishing, may I refer briefly to the international tuna tournaments held annually at Wedgeport, a centre of 1,500 people, practically all of whom are of Acadian French descent. The headquarters of the tuna tournament is Wedgeport, and from here the boats set out for the now internationally known Soldier's Rip, where the huge blue fin are caught by rod and line.

Last fall teams from the Argentine, Brazil, the British empire, Cuba and the United States took part in this competition. Next year we expect that there will be at least two teams from the Scandinavian countries. Last year in a period of a few weeks the anglers caught approximately 1,800 tuna, most of them in the four, five and six hundred pound class. The largest caught to date by rod and line weighed 890 pounds. Tuna fishing is rapidly becoming one of Nova Scotia's greatest tourist attractions, and next summer we hope to have two of the hon. members from the front benches to the right of the Speaker take part in this sport as guests of the Wedgeport tuna guides association.

A constituency which depends in so large a measure on fishing and which has a coast line of several hundreds of miles is of course always in the minds of the officers and officials of the departments of fisheries, transport and public works. Such a coast line, with its many small peninsulas, capes, bays, harbours and coves, must of necessity have innumerable aids to navigation. Aids such as buoys, spars, lighthouses and lightships must be continually serviced and repaired. As a large part of this work must be done from a ship, it is the feeling of those who are always making use of these aids that it would be more economical and efficient if one of the ships being used for this purpose were stationed at Yarmouth, which is the central point of the coastal area from point Prim to Cape Sable.

At this time may I bring to the attention of the Minister of Transport (Mr. Chevrier) the request for the basing of such a ship at Yarmouth and refer him to the various resolutions concerning this matter which have already been forwarded to his department by interested organizations.

Now that the main estimates have been tabled, we of Digby-Yarmouth are exceptionally pleased to note certain specific items which have been included, but we regret particularly the exclusion of certain other items of great importance. I have already brought to the attention of the Department of Public Works certain of these projects which are of extreme necessity to the fishermen of the areas concerned. May I urge on their behalf that these projects be included in the supplementary estimates.

I know that the residents of the coastal areas of my constituency are exceedingly pleased with the field personnel of the Department of Public Works with whom they come in contact, and look forward to seeing the membership of the district engineer's staff brought up to full strength in the near future. In bringing these matters to the attention of the hon. the Minister of Public Works may I add one more request; that is, that additional small dredging units be made available in order to maintain full use at low water of the small fishing harbours, channels and wharves.

The inclusion in the estimates of one million dollars to be applied towards the construction of the automobile ferry which is to run between Yarmouth, Nova Scotia, and a port in Maine was received with acclaim by Nova Scotians in general. As announced by the Minister of Transport on December 7 last, the federal government and the government of the province of Nova Scotia are sharing in the capital cost of this ferry, which it is estimated will amount to three million dollars. The announcement of the inclusion of the one million dollar vote in the estimates is evidence of the intention of the federal government to proceed with the project as rapidly as possible. It is my understanding that at present Ottawa is awaiting a reply from the Nova Scotia government indicating its agreement with the details of the proposal. Just as soon as this is received the committee representing the various departments concerned will, I understand, be able to proceed immediately from the already prepared sketch plans to the detailed scale plans of the ship and to finalize the decisions concerning propulsion machinery and docking facilities.

This proposed ferry service will aid in maintaining the prominence of Yarmouth, the southwestern gateway to Nova Scotia, which for many years prior to world war II was the port of entry through which the greatest number of people entered Nova Scotia. It is the considered opinion of objective-minded citizens of western Nova Scotia that the inauguration of an automobile ferry service between Yarmouth and a port in Maine is as forward-looking a project as was the inauguration of a steamship service between Yarmouth and Boston during the latter years of the last century. Travel conditions have changed greatly in the last two decades, and a short daylight run across the Bay of Fundy from Maine to Yarmouth will prove of inestimable value. Such a ferry, designed primarily for passenger and automobile traffic will, I am certain, permit the development of both refrigerated truck and passenger bus businesses.

In closing may I say that many of those in various lines of business in the constituency of Digby-Yarmouth are now considering, and upon the announcement of the start of construction of the ferry will be making, definite plans to handle the increased tourist traffic and business in 1951.

Mr. W. J. Browne (St. John's West): Mr. Speaker, I should like to join with other hon. members in congratulating the hon. member for Kindersley (Mr. Larson) on the way he carried out his task of moving the adoption of the address to His Excellency, and also the hon. member for Villeneuve (Mr. Dumas) on the admirable way in which, in two languages, he seconded the motion.

I was especially interested in the description of life in that strange province of Saskatchewan given by the mover of the resolution. It was interesting to hear of the busy ranches, the golden grain gleaming in the late summer sun, and all the happy, contented homes, where the people live long lives of Arcadian simplicity. But I think hon. members will agree that they had a rude awakening when the hon. member for Maple Creek (Mr. Studer) rose and said that taxes in that province were so high he was considering selling his farm, and recommended that the portion of the province west of the third meridian should be given to Alberta and the portion east of the third meridian should be given to Manitoba.

The hon. member for Villeneuve told us how rich and varied were the resources of his constituency, and painted a picture of giant ore carriers sailing up the deepened St. Lawrence with iron ore from the Quebec-Labrador mines to smelters that would be established in Quebec. That brought no applause from hon. members from the maritime provinces, because already established at Sydney are great blast furnaces which have been in operation for fifty years, where the coal from Sydney is used to smelt iron ore that comes from Bell island in Newfoundland, while the limestone from the west coast of Newfoundland is also brought in to help out in the process.

Iron is considered the most necessary element in the establishment and development of industry; and today Canada seems to be the richest country in the world in that respect. In addition to the iron ore mines of Bell island, which are capable of almost unlimited expansion, we have the new workings at Steep Rock, as well as the recent discoveries on the Quebec-Labrador boundary. There should be no reason why in addition to the blast furnaces in Sydney we could not have other blast furnaces in Quebec and Ontario. The future of Canada seems very bright with such large supplies of iron ore within our boundaries, particularly since the supplies of the United States in Minnesota appear to be on the verge of petering out.

The hon. member for Charlotte (Mr. Stuart) complained, as I have heard him complain before, about the indifference and neglect which the maritimes have suffered from the central provinces. He stated, as I am quite sure is the fact, that the goods purchased by the maritimes from the central provinces far exceed in value the goods which the central provinces buy from the maritimes. Yet in many sections of the maritimes, as those who have travelled there know, particularly in the country districts, there are homes that have an air of solid comfort.

There have been many interesting speeches and many very fine speeches during this debate, and one is tempted to discuss many subjects that have been brought to light. For example, the right hon. Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) went to a great deal of trouble to give a detailed analysis of the unemployment situation which the government have been trying to minimize. He also gave us the work projects in hand for the construction season of 1950. However, I am very much puzzled by the various statements we have heard from members of the government. Listening to the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) and the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe) one would not think there was any great amount of unemployment in the country; but the figures show differently. Unemployment insurance paid out for the month of December was equal to that paid out for April of last year, a little over $7 million; but in January the amount paid out almost equalled the amount received in insurance premiums, nearly $12 million. So we had the spectacle of the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Martin), acting in the absence of the Minister of Labour (Mr. Mitchell), bringing in a bill and beseeching hon. members to let him rush it through the house as quickly as possible because so many people were out of employment and had been without work for so long that they had exhausted all the benefits to which they were entitled, and it was necessary to extend the benefits until April 30 of this year and provide that in future years those benefits should be extended for three months beyond January 1.

Is it not paradoxical that in this great, rich country, where the grain elevators are filled to overflowing with wheat, where there are surpluses at various seasons of the year in some commodities—even at the moment in butter, cheese, eggs and bacon—unsold and sometimes unsalable, that there should be 400,000 people receiving unemployment insurance? These people, because of the small amount received in proportion to their ordinary earnings, must be living at a reduced level. I ask hon. members of the government to give serious consideration to that paradox. It seems to me to be an extremely serious situation, which unemployment insurance does not cure. Public works on a large scale will not cure it either, because those are only temporary expedients and do nothing to eliminate the cause.

You will find, Mr. Speaker, that in talking about this subject most hon. members think of the income the people receive, without thinking of the property from which income is derived. It would be much better for the government to attempt to arrange for people to have productive property in their possession, as has been done in the administration of veterans affairs. When the veterans came home, they were assisted in securing land, from which they could earn a livelihood. Many of them were also taught trades. It seems to me that the huge amounts of money that are being spent on unemployment insurance are not producing the permanent results that we would like to see. Year after year, we are faced with this problem. It may become a serious problem. Neither the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent), the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner), the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe), nor the Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott), nor any member of this house, can tell what will happen in the next twelve months in this country. One can only surmise. There is wealth here, but has it been well distributed? It is for that reason that I say it is urgent for all, whether in the provincial government or the federal government, to do all they can to assist people in getting possession of productive property, because that is what counts, more than mere income.

Only recently we heard that there were surpluses of farm products in the United States as well as in Canada. In that country there has been destruction of these products, as there was in the thirties. There has been destruction of potatoes, just as there was destruction of sows in the thirties. I remember at one time in 1933 when the government of Newfoundland was encouraged by the late Sir Wilfred Grenfell to ask the United States government to give us some of the sows that were being destroyed. We were not able to get them. If they had been available, the people of Newfoundland would have been able to raise pork. The government of the United States has arranged for the sale of a large quantity of potatoes to Spain at a nominal price. Owing to the drought in that country, there is a scarcity of vegetables and wheat. If Canada has a surplus of food, and I understand there are surpluses in some commodities, it would be better to give them away than to destroy them.

Another interesting speaker, who gave us a delightful speech in many respects, was the member for Saskatoon (Mr. Knight). He argued in favour of the recognition of the government of communist China, and stated that the sweep of the communist armies over China did not constitute a communist revolution. I should like to know what the hon. member desires to have as evidence of a communist revolution. I feel quite sure that Mao Tse-tung would not consider it a compliment if he were called something other than a communist, or something other than a revolutionary. I wonder if my hon. friend would ask the missionaries, who have escaped from that country, what they think of what happened out there. Missionaries have been insulted, murdered; and their churches have been desecrated. The missionary dispensaries that were used for the benefit of the people of China have been confiscated and destroyed.

The hon. member for Saskatoon also made an extraordinary statement, which he challenged anyone to deny, when he said at page 189 of Hansard:

> The only political force active at this moment against communism between the iron curtain and the Atlantic coast of Spain is the socialism of the democratic socialist nations such as Belgium, Norway, Sweden and Great Britain. Such socialist nations stand on guard for democracy in the Europe of today. I doubt if there is a member in the house who can deny that.

I am sure that my hon. friend will recognize that the presence of United States forces and United States officials in Europe administering the Marshall aid plan are also to be considered as political forces of some value. I think my hon. friend will recognize that in Belgium there is a strong Catholic party, and that in France the government of the day is mainly composed of members of the Mouvement Republique Populaire. The alliance between the socialists and the M.R.P. is intended to keep General de Gaulle from getting into power. In Western Germany there is a government of Christian Democrats, in which the Catholics and Protestants have combined to run the country through the dangerous and difficult problems confronting it as a result of the welter of hate that was engendered during the war. In Italy there is the Christian Democratic government of de Gasperi, assisted by the socialists it is true, but socialists of the right rather than socialists of the left. In Holland, there is a Christian Demoeratic government. I consider, Mr. Speaker, that the socialism of those two Scandinavian countries, Norway and Sweden, is not the kind of socialism to be found in other European countries. The people of those two countries are quite individualistic, and there are strong capitalistic enterprises in both of them.

Then, what would my hon. friend say of the government of General Franco? Would he not call that a bulwark against communism? In 1936, General Franco came over from Africa and fought his way through Spain until he had conquered the communists. Surely he is to be regarded as a political force of some account in the area the hon.

member mentioned. What does he say of the government of Salazar in Portugal? He has been in office for 24 years; once when he resigned he was invited by the people to return. What does he say, after the election in Great Britain, when the number of people who voted against the socialist government amounted to 15 million, while the number who voted for it amounted to 12 million? Will he not say they are a political force of some value who stand on guard against communism? "Christian Democrat", which is the term I have used to denote these Christian Democratic parties, was a term that was coined by Leo XIII. It meant that the government was to be guided by Christian principles. As my friend may be aware, the socialist parties of Europe are largely anti-Christian, and have not the same Christian outlook which I presume my hon. friend has.

I shall leave the members of the C.C.F. party alone for the moment, and revert once more to the members of the government. I am sure that many of us listened with amusement as well as amazement to the speech delivered by the Minister of Agriculture yesterday. No one will deny that the minister is a patriotic man. He is the most attentive person in this house. I should like to give him credit for that. He listens to all the speeches, even some which he must find quite uninteresting. I did not think he did himself justice yesterday. In the future, I do not think the minister will be proud of the exhibition he gave us. He knew that he was not giving a fair picture of the situation. He was exaggerating, and he was stating things that were entirely out of proportion. I listened to him speak about the great work which the Liberal party has done. I have no doubt the Liberal party has done good work; it has done wonderful work. During the past ten years trade has flourished under the Liberal government. If it had not flourished during the last ten years, it would not say very much for the intelligence of the members of the Liberal government.

After listening to the hon. gentleman, Mr. Speaker, I went to the library and asked for a book that would give the statistics on world trade. I found the United Nations statistical year book for 1948, and I have here many pages dealing with the trade of the whole world, or of the principal countries of the world. The Minister of Agriculture knows better than anybody else that the picture of trade between 1928 and 1948 was practically the same in every country throughout the world except in Europe during the war; there was a decline certainly beginning in 1929 with the stock market crash of that year when the bonds of some countries plunged down from $100 to $10, and the shares of all the stocks on the stock markets went down like an avalanche. For several years following that there was a depression all over the world, and it had not really finished when the war began. In 1939 I remember being in an ordinarily busy station in Boston and seeing the porters playing baseball because there were no people travelling on the trains. I remember travelling from Boston to New York in May, 1939, when there was only one other person besides me in the car on the train. There was a world depression on. I could show my hon. friend the figures for trade in Newfoundland since the war began. We did not have the blessings of a Liberal government in Newfoundland at that time. We had a commission of government; and even a commission of government was able to build up surpluses. I would say this for the benefit of the hon. member. If we had had a responsible government in power in Newfoundland in those days, we would have been able to build up large surpluses, just as the commission of government had done.

The most notable thing, however, about the right hon. gentleman's speech was not what he said but rather what he did not say; and, Mr. Speaker, I am going to ask you and the other members of this house to listen to what I have to say just now. I imagine that when the right hon. gentleman had finished that radio speech there was another voice that came on immediately after, the still small voice of conscience which spoke as follows:

An hon. Member: Oh, no.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): "Listen, folks; I have to tell you a secret".

An hon. Member: Quiet!

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): "Mr. F. A. McGregor, the commissioner under the combines act, considered that the flour millers of this country had agreed to put up the prices of flour all over Canada and in September, 1947, he started the investigation which he finished in December, 1948. He put in a report. The Minister of Trade and Commerce was mad about it. He of course has tremendous influence with the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent), who has great confidence in him; and he persuaded the Minister of Justice (Mr. Garson), who is new at the job and did not know much about it, not to publish the report".

An hon. Member: Rubbish.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): The voice went on, "We are not going to publish the report, folks. We did not tell parliament about this report when parliament was sitting. We kept it secret because the Conservatives might make use of it in the election; and the C.C.F., if they ever got hold of it, might be the next government of Canada. So we did not tell them anything about it, and we are not going to tell the people either. What the people don't know won't hurt them". I have imagined that the right hon. gentleman was frank enough to tell the people what his conscience was pricking him about all the time. The right hon. gentleman, I think, has some ground to boast about his accomplishments, although there are many who would not say that. But I would say, Mr. Speaker, that this country would be more greatly honoured in the United Nations and everywhere else among right-thinking men if it would put respect for law and love of justice before its ability as a trading nation; it would be better for this country to have respect for the law so that rich and poor would be equal before the law. I ask hon. members who sit to my right and hon. members who sit on the other side of this house if they would not rather have Canada known as a country where the law was respected and justice was carried out by those entrusted with that duty, whether a man was rich or poor, than that it should have the greatest trade of any nation in the world.

At the last session of this house I drew attention to the fact that in negotiations leading up to confederation a principle which was considered at Charlottetown, at Quebec and at London and which found a place in the British North America Act, was thrust aside by the members of the Canadian government. I refer to the fact that Newfoundland, when she was negotiating a pact of union with Canada, had at the time a large surplus and a low per capita debt. That principle was enshrined in those documents which are so highly respected and which have become the law of this country. If hon. members would take the trouble some time to look at the Quebec conference resolutions they will find laid down in paragraphs 60 to 63, and especially in paragraph 63, the principles that I have outlined, that Newfoundland at that time, and Prince Edward Island, Nova Scotia and New Brunswick, were to be given a credit of 5 per cent per annum on the difference between the total debt of the country and what it would be if it was the same per capita as the debt of Canada. If that had been done for Newfoundland we would have had a large annual allowance instead of what we have now as a diminishing transitional grant.

While I am on that subject I want to support what my hon. and learned colleague, the hon. member for St. John's East (Mr. Higgins), said about representation in the Senate. If hon. members will look at paragraph 14 in the Quebec resolutions and paragraph 15 in the London resolutions they will find there the principle which I recommend to the Prime Minister and the members of the government. "The first selection of the members of the legislative council (as the Senate was called then), shall be made, except as regards Prince Edward Island, from the legislative councils of the various provinces. Such members shall be appointed by the crown at the recommendation of the general executive government upon the nomination of the respective local governments, and in such nominations due regard shall be had to the claims of the members of the legislative council and the position in each province, so that all political parties as nearly as possible be fairly represented."

I ask if hon. members of the government feel that they own the Senate. Can they appoint members who are their supporters and nobody else from Newfoundland? So far we have four appointments; and four of those were supporters of the Liberal party and four of them were supporters of confederation. What about those representing the 48 per cent of the people who voted against confederation? What about the people who voted against the Liberal party? Have they no right to representation? When a province comes into this great dominion, is it fair that it should be without representation by parties in that chamber? I suggest to these hon. gentlemen, especially to the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Fournier), who is sitting there and doing me the honour of listening to what I have to say tonight—and he is a fair-minded man; he has told me he is a fair-minded man—

Mr. Fournier (Hull): And you believed it.

Mr. Gardiner: We were just discussing the matter of how few Liberals there were in the Senate when we came into power.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): Yes, maybe there were. But two wrongs don't make a right. If that was done in the past the Liberal party with its huge majority here and in the other place could now afford to be a little generous with that little province.

If the principle I mentioned, which is contained in the British North America Act, of the difference in the per capita debt, had been recognized it would have made a striking difference to the present government of the province of Newfoundland. They would have had a substantial annual allowance which they have not got at the present time.

After three years have expired, the grant that they are getting now of a little over $6 million begins to diminish, and where are they going to find the revenue? At the fisheries conference the other day down in the east the minister of fisheries and co-operatives said that the island was eighty years behind the rest of Canada. That is because Newfoundland did not have the advantage of the great industries in the central provinces from which to draw its taxes. It was unable to have the same developments that took place in Canada. But now that we are a part of Canada we should have the means to have these things carried on.

One outstanding fact, Mr. Speaker, is that Newfoundland's economy has deteriorated during the past twelve months more rapidly than that of any other province of Canada. I would not attempt to say that it should be attributed to confederation, although it is partly due to that fact, as I shall show in a moment. We who opposed confederation foresaw it. We warned the people about what was going to happen, especially in St. John's, and it is recognized by all Liberals and Conservatives now that what we said was true. I suppose the Liberals knew then that it was true. The factories in St. John's cannot compete with the great factories in the central provinces, and so they have had to close down. By November eight of them had closed down, and when I left one was going on short time, two days a week. It will be only a matter of time when it will have to close down unless something happens to help them.

That is not a very bright picture for those of us like my hon. friend and the hon. member for Trinity-Conception (Mr. Stick) and myself who were born and bred in that city and who have spent so much of our lives there. It is hard for people to see the factories closing down and to see work coming to a standstill. We have a regard for that city. It has a great history behind it. It was the first place in the new world where European sailors dropped anchor. Six years before the Spanish Armada, Sir Humphrey Gilbert claimed it for the English crown. Before Cartier came up the St. Lawrence he visited Newfoundland. Before Champlain, before Maisonneuve, fleets from Spain, Portugal and England mingled together in the harbour of St. John's. It has a long and interesting history. It played a prominent part in the Napoleonic wars, in the war of American independence, in the war of 1812, and in the last great war it was the chief base of the Royal Canadian Navy. That is a fact that I should like to bring to the attention of the members of the government and ask them not to overlook it.

The present government of Newfoundland inherited a wonderful legacy of over $40 million, but I do not think that the federal government should assume that that is going to last forever. The provincial government is trying to put their province on the same basis as the other provinces in regard to social benefits. That is what they are doing, and they are working with feverish energy and zeal to make the country prosperous, but that money will not last forever. With the diminishing transitional grant they will be faced with what I consider to be the insuperable problem of trying to balance the budget with expenditures on a par with those of the maritime provinces when there is so much unemployment in the country.

The terms of union contain a provision, section 29, which I should like to draw to the attention of the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Pearson), who had something to do with drafting them:

> 29. In view of the difficulty of predicting with sufficient accuracy the financial consequences to Newfoundland of becoming a province of Canada, the government of Canada will appoint a royal commission within eight years from the date of union to review the financial position of the province of Newfoundland and to recommend the form and scale of additional financial assistance, if any, that may be required by the government of the province of Newfoundland to enable it to continue public services at the levels and standards reached subsequent to the date of union, without resorting to taxation more burdensome, having regard to capacity to pay, than that obtaining generally in the region comprising the maritime provinces of Nova Scotia, New Brunswick, and Prince Edward Island.

I consider that the presence of this section in the terms of union is evidence of the good will of the government of Canada, and shows a recognition of the problem that has now come to the forefront. To set up a sound economy in Newfoundland, agriculture must be fostered and developed. At the last session I asked the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) whether he would do all that he could to assist Newfoundland to get its agriculture on its feet. So far as I know, not very much assistance has yet been given; but I am going to plead with the minister now because agriculture is the most important thing in Newfoundland.

We cannot eat all the fish we catch, but we can eat all the agricultural products that we produce. During the past season we have had many ships from the neighbouring provinces come down there to sell their produce. They peddled their produce from cove to cove and harbour to harbour around the island. I know they have great surpluses of potatoes in the maritimes—100,000 tons, I was told in Prince Edward Island—and they can bring them very cheaply across the short neck of water over to Newfoundland and sell them around. But if Newfoundland is not to be encouraged to develop its own agriculture what is going to become of it? It is going to go back 450 years and become what it was in Cabot's day, just a fishing vessel moored to the banks. If we want to see that country develop, we have to develop its agriculture. Agriculture is the basic industry of Canada and of the province of Newfoundland. It will surprise hon. members to know that we can produce all the agricultural products that we need. I am thinking now of vegetables. I am not going to say that we could produce all the milk, butter and meat. We could do that, but perhaps it would be at too great a cost. It would be a comparatively simple thing to produce all the vegetables that we need. I am going to tell hon. members that the quality of the vegetables we produce in Newfoundland is as good as any that you will find in Canada, so far as I can see.

I noticed in the report of the Duncan commission of 1926 that the same thing happened in Nova Scotia after confederation. The people got into the habit of importing their produce. They brought in from outside Nova Scotia huge quantities of agricultural products that they could have produced themselves.

In Newfoundland before confederation we were accustomed to our own legislation. We did the best we could. We had a railway and we had a few highroads. We did the best we could with public health. Nevertheless our population increased at a higher rate than that of the maritimes. It did not increase at a higher rate than Canada generally. It is very hard to calculate the actual natural increase in Canada because there is so much immigration into this country, but we were increasing when Prince Edward Island was decreasing. In 1910 the population was 220,000. Today it is nearly 350,000. It will not stay at that figure very long if the factories are closing down in St. John's and Bell island ore is to be curtailed. If we cannot sell our fish and the produce from the maritimes is to be sent down there, who is going to stay in Newfoundland?

I am aware of the great benefits that we receive from the social services in this country provided by the federal government. The old age pensions have brought blessings to many an old man and woman. Family allowances, which I have advocated personally since 1938, have brought untold blessings to hundreds of families in Newfoundland, but I think hon. members will agree when I say that a country cannot exist on those things alone. They have social benefits in the province of Quebec and those who are unemployed at the head of the lakes get unemployment relief, but are they satisfied? Who would be satisfied? Certainly no man or woman over 16 years of age and under 70 years would want to stay in a country for the sake of those things. They will leave and come up here to swell the ranks of your unemployed, or perhaps try to get to the United States.

The greatest advocate of confederation in our country stated the same thing that I am stating now. He has said that the future of Newfoundland depends, not on these things but on the energy and ability of the people. They must "produce or die" and it is the intention of the present provincial government to "make her or break her" in the next three years. I am afraid that honourable gentleman will break his heart before he will be will be able to succeed under such circumstances unless he gets the assistance he should have had in the first place by way of a substantial annual grant from the federal treasury.

Any reasonable man listening to these desperate statements can come to no other conclusion than that confederation in itself has not meant the salvation of Newfoundland. Hon. members here have been most kind and gracious to us all. They frequently say to me, "How are things down home?" I would like to be able to say they are fine, but I must say, "I am sorry to tell you that they are not so good." Then hon. members get a little disinterested, they become a little bored, but I tell them that it is true. Industry is slowing down and places are closing. At Bell island two great mines have closed down and the third one is working on short shifts. We had a contract for ten years with Great Britain for 1,250,000 tons of ore. That was reduced to 300,000, and then that was wiped out. We had a contract to sell 350,000 tons of ore to Germany, but that is gone. All that is left is the market at Sydney. I ask the government on behalf of this poor little sister, this new little sister of Newfoundland: Cannot you give us some help in selling that ore to Great Britain? I am sure that the Secretary of State for External Affairs is a most influential man in the United Nations and he should be able to have funds provided so that Germany can take that 350,000 tons. That would make all the difference between poverty and wealth in my hon. friend's constituency of St. John's East.

These men work very hard. If it is hard for John L. Lewis' coal miners to shovel coal for $14.75 or $15 per day with other bonuses, how hard do you think it is to shovel iron ore which weighs much more? If hon. members were to try that for a day I think it would be a good thing. If we went down in the mine for a day we would have more sympathy with miners than perhaps we have at the present time.

When I tell hon. members of the difficulties we have they say, "You just came in in time to get the benefits of unemployment insurance and family allowances." This matter is very serious for us. As the great advocate of confederation said, "We must produce or die." We cannot live on social benefits. The government of this country must recognize that the terms were inadequate. We do not desire to have to wait forty years as Nova Scotia had to wait until 1907. Listen to what Sir Wilfrid Laurier said when he introduced the amending legislation on March 25, 1907, and I quote from column 5297 of Hansard of that date:

> The experience of forty years has brought this fact again and again to the attention of the parliament and the people of Canada. If I needed any evidence in support of that assertion, I might remind the house, that not once, nor twice, nor thrice, but periodically and systematically parliament has been asked, at almost regular intervals, to vote in favour of now one province and now another province, appropriations far in excess of anything that had been stipulated in the British North America Act; and, every province which has since joined confederation has entered upon terms in excess of the terms provided for in that act.

Whether we entered on terms in excess of those provided in that act, we did not enter on equal terms. There is a great necessity to have those terms ameliorated unless we are going to duplicate the sad history of Nova Scotia. The royal commission known as the Duncan commission when making its report in 1926 said that the representatives of the federal government were overweighted with fear when they went to deal with this question; they were afraid of what someone in Manitoba, Saskatchewan or British Columbia was going to say. But they should have no fear when they are going to deal out justice.

They must know that there is a minimum below which the provincial government cannot possibly carry on. That government is now bringing in new social benefits in the way of mothers' allowances and allowances for crippled people, such as they have in Nova Scotia, I believe, and such as were brought before this house in the form of a motion asking for the opinion of this house at the last session. They are doing that in Newfoundland today. I am afraid they are more enthusiastic about the welfare state than the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Martin). In addition to that they are trying to promote industrial development as I have said already.

There is another matter that must be considered by Newfoundland, a matter coming under the Minister of Resources and Development (Mr. Winters). I refer to the trans-Canada highway. Much of our country is unpopulated and when you have a stretch of highway going 500 miles across such a country it will take a large sum to keep it up. Where is the revenue going to come from to keep up that new road? It is not going to come in immediately and the provincial government will be faced with further difficulty. Any proposition that is made to the province will require their consideration of what is going to be expended and where the revenue will be obtained. With dwindling employment and revenue how can the province keep this new amenity in repair as it should be kept?

The present revenue with the addition of the transitional grants is insufficient to balance the provincial budget by several millions. This year there will be a deficit of between $8 million and $10 million which will have to be drawn from the surplus. Under the British North America Act, Nova Scotia was promised the Intercolonial Railway, but it was built 250 miles longer than was needed for strategic reasons. I believe that is one reason why freight rates to the maritimes have been reduced below what they are in other provinces.

I do not want Newfoundland to have to bear a burden which it cannot bear, and I believe that is the situation today. When the surplus runs out the provincial government will quickly find out that they must come here, as they have had to come for many things which were not properly set out under the terms of union. While the situation is not desperate at the present time, it is very serious and urgent. I submit that this is the first test of the good will and sense of justice possessed by members of the federal government.

All down through the years since the railroad was built we carried goods across the strait from North Sydney to Port aux Basques free. What goods were carried? Canadian goods were carried without any subsidies whatsoever. Last year before confederation we bought $55 million worth of goods from Canada while Canada bought only $10 million worth of goods from Newfoundland. As my hon. colleague said, formerly we had a favourable balance of trade with the United States of over $25 million which has now been diverted to Canada. Canada's trade has been increased by $40 million. I am quoting him as my authority for that. I do know that a large quantity of that United States trade has been diverted to Canada. That will bring benefits to the central provinces. Therefore I think it entitles us to some consideration on the question of freight rates that is now before the government. In addition to that, there are special geographical and other considerations such as the narrow gauge track which should be considered in our favour as a reason for giving us extra benefits so far as freight rates are concerned rather than as a penalty whereby we will have to pay higher rates than are paid in the maritimes.

The federal government has an army of ambassadors, consuls, and trade commissioners abroad. In paying taxes I presume the people of Newfoundland help to keep them there. What benefit are they to us unless they are going to help our trade? I hope they will help us out. I am very glad to be able to say—and I presume the hon. member for Trinity-Conception (Mr. Stick) will be glad to know this—that Spain has agreed to buy 200,000 quintals of fish this year. I raised that matter last year on several occasions, and I am glad to see that the deal is going through. I trust that trade will continue. It is an old trade which goes back 400 years. We should also have trade with Italy and Greece because those countries want our cod. The little province of Newfoundland only has 350,000 people, and codfish is a commodity which I believe means more to a larger number of people in Newfoundland than any other commodity means to the people of any other province of Canada. It will be very helpful to the people of Newfoundland if codfish can be sold in these countries. That means that dollars must be found for the sterling with which we will be paid.

I hope I am not unmindful of all the difficulties confronting the government, the huge expenditures involved in foreign affairs, the transportation system, social benefits, national defence, industry and agriculture. I believe the social benefits provided to Newfoundland by the federal government amount to over $20 million a year which is a very sizable sum indeed, and we are certainly grateful. Nevertheless it must be remembered, and I think everyone will admit, that we have to pay our share towards these expenditures. Beneficial as they are, the welfare of any country depends more on the development of its agriculture, trade and commerce and other industries than on social benefits. It is not possible to tell how confederation is going to work out for Newfoundland, but it is not a one-way street. We pay taxes to the dominion also. On the purchase of goods we spend money which is put into circulation in the other provinces of the dominion. It is very difficult to estimate the amount of money which we pay in taxes. Of course the solution of the problem will depend upon the policy of the dominion in regard to the matters I have mentioned.

Finally, I trust hon. members will appreciate what I am about to say. When I came here last year I did not come with any special love for Canada. I admit that I was welcomed and received as a brother, and I appreciate that. I took the attitude that I would use whatever talent or ability I possessed to further the interests of the whole nation. I can understand the feelings of my colleague as expressed in his passionate outburst the other night. I know how he feels about things. I believe I understand how he feels better than anybody else. We are only flesh and blood and we can be stirred to say the things that are deep in our hearts. I am prepared to work for the prosperity of this country in any way that I can with my poor humble ability.

Therefore, in all seriousness I should like to make the following recommendations as a concrete suggestion. Hon. members of the government may think they are extravagant, and they may find them difficult to accept. Nevertheless I recommend that now, and not eight years from now when Newfoundland has gone into a morass: 1. A royal commission should be set up under section 29 of the terms of union (a) to determine the annual grant necessary for Newfoundland to carry on its provincial activities, bearing in mind the revenue it can produce itself, and (b) to determine the freight rate structure. If they cannot come to a final decision at the present time let them make a temporary decision on the freight rate question. Let that be a subject into which the royal commission can go more fully at their leisure. (c) They should investigate how they can best assist the fisheries because these mean so much to the people of that province.

Then I recommend that the federal government do all it can to assist the development of agriculture. Last year the sum of $80 million or $90 million was spent on agriculture. What proportion of that was spent in Newfoundland? I suggest that it was very small, much less than we were entitled to. I also recommend that the federal government arrange for the provision of dollars for the sale of fish to the sterling area. The merchants of Newfoundland must carry on that fish export business. They have a nightmare and constant headache with 28,000 fishermen to consider. Think of how many families and how many thousands of people are involved in that proposition. That arrangement should be made by the federal government. They should create a national harbour at St. John's. There are national harbours in New Brunswick and Nova Scotia, and there should be one at St. John's. The government should provide more funds for the construction and improvement of public and marine works which were neglected for so many years. The Minister of Public Works knows—I have drawn conditions in my district to his attention from time to time. He also knows he is spending a good deal of money in other districts. Wharves have fallen down and harbours are full of silt. I hope he will soon be able to get his dredge completed so that it will be able to go down there and start operations.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): It is nearly on its way.

Mr. Browne (St. John's West): Finally, as an assurance that the government will act fairly to all Newfoundlanders, I recommend that they grant equal representation to all political parties in the other place.

Mr. J. W. Noseworthy (York South): Mr. Speaker, first of all I want to add my congratulations to those that have been offered already in this house to the mover (Mr. Larson) and seconder (Mr. Dumas) of the address in reply to the speech from the throne. Because we have in the greater Toronto area some 20,000 unemployed at the present time, I want to examine the erstwhile employment policy of the government in relation to the Prime Minister's speech on February 20. I want to refer to the employment policy set forth in the white paper tabled in this house in April, 1945, which was given in greater detail in the proposals placed before the dominion-provincial conference in August of that year, and put away in mothballs on June 28, 1949. If we turn to page 23 of the white paper we find the following statement:

> In this paper, the government has stated unequivocally its adoption of a high and stable level of employment and income, and thereby higher standards of living, as a major aim of government policy.

On page 1 of the paper we read:

> The central task of reconstruction . . . is to maintain a high and stable level of employment and income. The government adopts this as a primary object of policy.

Again on page 1:

> In setting as its aim a high and stable level of employment and income the government is not selecting a lower target than "full employment."

Then the paper goes on to say that full employment depends upon four classes of expenditures: upon expenditures made in export trade, expenditures made in private investment, consumption expenditures, and public investment expenditures. In that white paper the government recognized that a high level of employment depended to some extent upon the fluctuations of international trade. These, however, were not to interfere with the government's policy of full employment. We are assured on page 7 of the white paper that they can be overcome by patient and resourceful work. Again on page 7 we are told that bold and imaginative policies of collaboration in peace as in war would be taken to expand export trade and to reinforce the government's domestic employment policy to secure freedom from want. Those were the days when the Liberals were talking about the new order they were to bring in after world war II. One of those bold and imaginative policies outlined in the white paper was to be the extension of credit to countries to whom we wanted to sell our goods. On page 9 of the white paper we read:

> The government is willing to extend to such countries . . . adequate credits to finance, to the degree necessary, their import requirements from Canada.

I should like to call attention to that statement that adequate credits would be advanced to finance, to the degree necessary, the import requirements of these countries from Canada. A few evenings ago the Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott) told us that we were making available all the credits we could possibly afford at the present time. I think it is admitted by the government that those credits are not sufficient either to enable the United Kingdom to buy all the goods she wants to buy from Canada, or to buy all the goods that we could sell her. The government now substitutes the formula "what we can afford" for the 1945 formula "adequate credits to the degree necessary". My point here is that the government has changed its policy in relation to those credits.

Mr. Abbott: We extended $2 billion in credits in 1945.

Mr. Noseworthy: If their policy was right in 1945 apparently it is wrong today. However, I think the minister will agree that if tomorrow we got into a shooting war instead of a cold war and we had guns to sell to Britain instead of food, and if Britain needed those guns as she needs food today, we would find a way of doing exactly what we did during the war years; we would find a means of making financially possible what is physically possible. It is now physically possible for us to produce more food for Britain and the sterling area than it is financially possible for us to sell them. I submit, Mr. Speaker, that is just one example of good orthodox capitalist economy.

The second form of expenditure on which a high level of employment depended was private investment; and to encourage private investment in plant, equipment and other durable goods and stocks we read on page 11 of the white paper that a quite different taxation policy will become an appropriate part of policies directed to the maintenance of employment and income. Again on page 11:

> It is proposed particularly to eliminate or minimize taxation which contributes to a higher level of production costs.

And on page 21:

> The government will be prepared, in periods when unemployment threatens, to incur the deficits and increases in the national debt resulting from its employment and income policy . . .

Then on page 8, in the proposals, the government says it will design both its spending policies and its tax policies throughout the cycle to levelling up the deflationary valleys and the inflationary peaks. And again on page 8, they say that a modern government budget must be the balance wheel of the economy.

Last evening the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) read into the record a broadcast he made in May, 1949. Incidentally, Mr. Speaker, I suggest that it would be unfortunate if every hon. member of this house took advantage of this debate to place one of his own election speeches on Hansard. Others as well as the Minister of Agriculture could do that. As he pointed out, some changes have been made in the taxation policy, some reductions in income and other taxes. Probably we shall have more to say on that point when the budget is under discussion. Perhaps in the 1950 budget we can look forward to that new and quite different taxation policy of which the white paper speaks. We might even hope to see the sales tax eliminated, in keeping with the outline given in the white paper.

Another factor in maintaining a high level of employment is this:

> An absolute essential in achieving this objective is to keep prices in hand.

I think we can leave it to any Canadian housewife to decide whether or not the government has carried out that policy of keeping prices in hand.

The third form of expenditure that was to maintain a high level of employment is called consumption expenditures. On page 12 it is pointed out that consumption expenditures will depend upon the maintenance and distribution of the income. Then we are assured that in addition to various social security measures such as unemployment insurance, the family allowance, agriculture and fisheries prices support acts, which were already in effect in 1945, a greater distribution of income was to be achieved by new social legislation. We were to have the old age pension from 70 years of age paid in full by the federal government without a means test. We were to have an old age pension scheme for those between 65 and 70, part of the cost of which was to be borne by the provincial governments. We were assured we were to have a health insurance scheme, also partially paid for by the provincial governments, all as a means of distributing income and maintaining a high level of employment.

Speaking in the house on February 20 on this subject of consumption expenditure, the Prime Minister said, as recorded on page 55 of Hansard:

> Production, and with it individual consumption, has increased 50 per cent per person, in terms of real goods and services, since 1939.

I submit what we should consider is not what has happened since 1939, but what the trend has been in the last two years, 1948 and 1949. It is true that during the war years, and for the two years following the war, we made some progress in raising the standard of living of our people. But what is the picture since 1947? From 1948 to 1949, our population increased 318,000, that is 2·4 per cent. In the same year, the cost of living increased from 155 to 160·8, an increase of 3·7 per cent. Together, those percentages total 6·1 per cent.

To have the same disposable income in 1949 as in 1948, our disposable income should have increased by 6·1 per cent. If we check the figures on page 17 of the publication "Canada at the Halfway Mark", we find that our disposable income for that year increased 5 per cent, one per cent less than would be required to maintain the same consumer purchasing power as in 1948. Looking at the picture from another angle, in 1947 our personal disposable income, according to a sessional paper tabled in this house on March 23, 1949, was $754 per capita. According to the figures on page 17 of "Canada at the Halfway Mark", our personal disposable income for 1949, in terms of the 1947 cost of living index, was $740 per capita, a drop of $14 per capita. This decrease of $14 per capita amounts to about $180 million less purchasing power in Canada in 1949 than in 1948.

I shall give you another illustration. According to a table placed on Hansard at page 1429, under date of March 14, 1949, by the parliamentary assistant to the Minister of Trade and Commerce, the consumption of consumer goods and services, pegged at the 1935-39 level, dropped from $521 in 1947 to an actual $500 in 1949. Incidentally, the forecast in that table for 1949 was $509, an overestimate of $9 per capita. These figures I submit, Mr. Speaker, show that the Prime Minister's statement in Hansard of February 20 gives an erroneous impression of consumption expenditure during the past two years, and reveals that purchasing power has been declining steadily since 1947. There is every indication that it will decline still further in 1950.

Mr. McIlraith: That does not follow at all.

Mr. Noseworthy: The fourth type of expenditure that was to maintain employment and income is referred to as public expenditure. On page 15 of the white paper we read the following regarding public expenditure:

. . . it is the firm intention of the government to institute a system of managing its capital expenditures so that they may contribute to the maximum to the improvement and stabilization of employment and income.

The same statements are repeated in other forms on page 16 of the white paper. I shall take the time to read a few sentences from this page because they are interesting in the light of the Prime Minister's statement on February 20. On page 16 we read about:

The undertaking of advance planning of all necessary and desirable dominion projects so that there may be available a shelf of soundly planned projects, ready for execution when prospective employment conditions make it desirable to increase public investment expenditures.

Then again:

The implementation, in co-operation with the provinces, of a new dominion policy of expenditures on the development and conservation of natural resources.

A little further down:

The resources of the farm, forest, mines, fisheries and rivers, are basic to Canadian development, and prudent expenditure on their conservation and development will be true investment expenditure yielding valuable returns . . . such expenditures would provide some measure of alternative income in the areas affected by declines in export markets,—

Even in 1945, the Liberals thought there might be a decline in export markets.

—and thus would fight most of our depressions at the point of first contact, rather than after they have spread through the economy.

On pages 23 and 24 of the proposals to the dominion-provincial conference, there is a program of public works outlined in detail, the public works that were to constitute this shelf to be put into execution when signs of unemployment begin to develop. These projects are set forth under no less than 7 headings and 17 subheadings. This was to be the program of public works for which the federal government was to assume full responsibility. They are set out in great detail under 17 subheadings which cover two or three pages. Those works which the government was to undertake in co-operation with the provinces are set out under four headings, with 8 subheadings, occupying about two pages of that book.

We were told that the expenditures on those projects were to be timed so that they could be expanded in times of low employment, and would decline when employment was high.

At page 8 we read:

In periods of declining business activity arising perhaps from depression abroad, it is proposed that these expenditures will be boldly expanded.

[Mr. Noseworthy.]

That shelf concept was recognized by Liberal speakers and cabinet ministers during the June election of 1949; it was recognized by cabinet ministers from the Prime Minister down. Speaking in Moncton on May 19, as reported in the Toronto Daily Star—and unfortunately, or fortunately, that is the paper I usually read—the Prime Minister is quoted as having said:

Canada's employment now stands at record levels, and the government will seek to maintain it by promoting trade, natural resources development, and projects like the St. Lawrence waterway, and the trans-Canada highway.

Then listen to this:

Planned public works projects will be started as needed to provide work.

To me that sounds very much like a promise. I know that in his broadcast a few nights ago the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Pearson) said that the Prime Minister made no election promises. He repeated the statement the Prime Minister made after the election, on election night, in which he said that the one and only promise he made was that he would do his best. If that sentence "Planned public works projects will be started as needed to provide work" is not a definite election promise, then English words have lost their time-honoured meaning.

Speaking at Nelson, British Columbia, on May 28, the Minister of Fisheries (Mr. Mayhew), as reported in the Regina Leader-Post of May 30, stated that there was "a considerable shelf of projects" that could be put into action at short notice.

Again, in Stratford on June 3, as reported in the Toronto Daily Star of June 4, the Prime Minister is quoted as follows:

The Liberal party is pledged to do its utmost to maintain full employment.

Then at Hamilton on June 5, as reported in the Toronto Daily Star of June 6, the Prime Minister stated:

We Liberals promised to work for full employment in 1945, and we have had a higher level of employment in Canada than ever before. The maintenance of full employment is just as much a Liberal objective now and in the future as it was in 1945.

Then, and this is the point I want hon. members to note, he says:

But we are also preparing for possible emergencies when employment may need to be stimulated by even more direct action . . .

From end to end of Canada there are great potential development projects like the St. Lawrence seaway, which, within the next few years, will create a great deal of employment, provided we have faith in the future of Canada and provided we have the determination to translate our faith into action.

Judging by present circumstances it would appear that the Liberal government has neither that faith in the future of Canada nor the determination to translate that faith into action.

I find it difficult to make the statements made by the Prime Minister during the election campaign, and which I have quoted, jibe with that statement made on election night and repeated by the Secretary of State for External Affairs, in which he says:

> And now you have given to my colleagues and to me the vote of confidence for which we appealed. I wish to repeat the promise which is my only election promise—to give you the best services of which I am capable.

Again I say that, if all of the quotations are reported correctly by the Canadian Press and by papers such as the Toronto Daily Star, then either those were definite election promises by the Prime Minister with regard to that shelf concept of public works, or the English language no longer has any meaning.

What is the government's present policy with regard to that shelf of public works? The Prime Minister gives us the answer at page 57 of Hansard of February 20, where he is reported as saying as follows:

> A survey was made last year of the state of planning of all capital projects of the federal government, including some, like the trans-Canada highway, to be executed jointly with provincial governments.

Then a few paragraphs further on he continues:

> The results of the survey satisfied the government that the shelf concept, when limited to its own public investment program, was not the best approach at the present time.

To my mind this can mean one thing, Mr. Speaker, and one thing only, namely, that the shelf concept of public works so elaborately set forth in the white paper, in the proposals to the dominion-provincial conference, and in the clear-cut promises of the Prime Minister and his cabinet ministers during the election campaign, has now been abandoned as far as meeting the present unemployment situation is concerned.

Mr. Knowles: The shelf has been put on the shelf.

Mr. Noseworthy: Again, Mr. Speaker, I think we are justified in asking at what time that survey was made last year. Was it before the election or after? If it was made before the election, then surely the Prime Minister and the cabinet ministers were misleading the electorate when they announced their determination at that time to stand by the shelf concept. Even if the survey was made after the election, it must have been so soon afterwards that the words in which the promises were made to the electors were still fresh in the memories and minds of the Prime Minister and his cabinet ministers.

I want to quote again in connection with that matter; it is a quotation I have already given but I want to repeat it. It is from page 16 of the white paper and is as follows:

> Such expenditures—

That is, the shelf concept of capital expenditures.

> —would provide some measure of alternative income in the areas affected by declines in export markets, and thus would fight most of our depressions at the point of first contact, rather than after they have spread through the economy.

Surely the Prime Minister's statement of February 20 is a reversal of that policy. Surely such public works are needed now. Surely there are in Canada today areas affected by the decline in export markets. Surely if we are to fight a depression at the first point of contact, instead of waiting until it has spread through our economy, that time is now.

What are the reasons given in the Prime Minister's statement for the abandonment of this shelf? I want to examine them. It is not just that the time is not ripe. The reasons given by the Prime Minister indicate that they are much more fundamental than this matter of timing. They indicate a complete change of policy and a complete change in the thinking of the Liberal government. Let us take a look at the four reasons—if you can call them reasons—or excuses. The first reason he gives is this; and it is a reason that might have applied up until the election, but which certainly does not apply since then. The reason that there was no labour or material available for this public works program could have been true up until the early part of 1949. It certainly is not true today and has no application to the present time.

The second reason which is given on the same page is as follows:

> We feel it is only whenever it might appear that private enterprise was lagging that we should stimulate public investment so as to maintain employment and prosperity.

If private investment is not lagging today when we have 400,000 unemployed in this country, then when will it be lagging? Surely that is no excuse for not applying that shelf concept at the present time.

The third reason is:

> As a further practical consideration, adequate technical personnel to carry out a program of advanced planning over and above the regular departmental work was simply not available unless we attempted to compete for those who were capable of performing that work, with private enterprise that was already employing them.

There is no statement of that kind in the white paper of 1945. Pages of that paper are devoted to an outline of what the government was going to do, and going to start doing even before the war was over with Japan, in the matter of research and training personnel for this kind of a job.

The fourth reason is:

> Not only has the nature of the unemployment we were providing for changed radically from the possibilities envisaged in 1945, but the practical experience acquired in attempting to develop a shelf without provincial and municipal co-operation indicated the need of a more flexible method of preparing to meet possible eventualities.

In other words, the reason is that the government could not get the co-operation of the provinces and the municipalities. What has the government done since 1945 to secure that co-operation? It called one dominion-provincial conference when two provincial premiers refused to accept the terms which were offered. Then the conference ended. So far as I know no attempt has been made in the four or five years since to call another such conference. People from all over Canada were clamouring for another conference. The government has shuffled off its responsibilities by blaming the provincial premiers for having wrecked the one conference it did call, but has made no effort to call another until next fall. We do not know that even then this shelf concept will be discussed at that conference.

From the statement of the Prime Minister it would appear that the government has completely reversed its policy in that respect and that the shelf concept is off so far as the Liberal government is concerned.

During the course of the Prime Minister's speech of February 20, and referring to the co-operation with the provincial and municipal government, he tried to show that most of these public works which have to be carried out within some municipalities should be a municipal or provincial matter. He said:

> But there will inevitably be some residuary problems from time to time in some areas, and the initiative in dealing with them must be taken by the local authorities. If they need assistance they should go first to their provincial governments.

In other words we are back where we were in the depression days, with groups coming to the municipal government for some solution to the unemployment problem, the municipal government passing the buck to the provincial government and the provincial government passing the buck on to the federal and the federal throwing it back to the provinces and municipalities. During the five years that have intervened since the war, five years when the government has had every opportunity of preparing for the kind of situation that is facing us today, the government has failed to reach any closer understanding with the provinces and municipalities in relation to meeting the unemployment situation. Today the unemployed in Toronto, 20,000 of them, go from the city council to Queen's park, to Ottawa, and back to Queen's park, just as the unemployed did in the thirties.

Mr. Sinnott: You made a good job of doing nothing.

On motion of Mr. Boucher the debate was adjourned.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Fournier (Hull): Mr. Speaker, tomorrow we shall proceed with the motion of the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Martin) to set up a committee to inquire into old age security. If that is concluded we shall take up the resolution in the name of the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe) to amend the Research Council Act. If we dispose of these two we shall try to conclude the resolution to refer the estimates of the Department of External Affairs to the external affairs committee.

Mr. Drew: What after that?

Mr. Fournier (Hull): I think we would adjourn at any time if we got through that much business.

At eleven o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Friday, March 10, 1950

The house met at three o'clock.

STANDING COMMITTEES

AGRICULTURE AND COLONIZATION—PRINTING OF PARLIAMENT—CHANGES IN PERSONNEL

Mr. W. G. Weir (Portage-Neepawa) moved:

That the name of Mr. Herridge be substituted for that of Mr. Argue on the standing committee on agriculture and colonization.

That the name of Mr. Noseworthy be substituted for that of Mr. Knowles on the joint committee on the printing of parliament, and that a message be sent to the Senate to inform Their Honours thereof.

Motion agreed to.

RADIUM

THEFT OF NEEDLES FROM SHED AT REAR OF NATIONAL RESEARCH BUILDING

Mr. G. K. Fraser (Peterborough West): I rise on a question of privilege. As the orders of the day will not likely be called today, can the Minister of Trade and Commerce give me an answer now to the question I asked yesterday in regard to radium needles and the handling thereof?

Right Hon. C. D. Howe (Minister of Trade and Commerce): With your permission, Mr. Speaker, I shall be glad to do so. The statement is as follows:

For years radium needles have been sent to the national research council for calibration purposes. A specially constructed receiving depot was built at the back of the main building to hold shipments for a brief period. Before being taken into the main laboratory building these shipments are checked for undesirable contamination and leakages which would seriously affect supersensitive scientific instruments used for research purposes. Needles are calibrated and returned to the owner as soon as possible. The commodity is commercially valueless until accompanied by a certificate.

Since the question was asked, the radium needles referred to have all been recovered; but as this receiving depot has been forcibly entered and the radium needles and lead containers to the value of from $2,000 to $3,000 and other equipment stolen, the national research council, together with the Royal Canadian Mounted Police, are giving careful consideration to ways and means of improving protection against such vandalism.

An editorial in this morning's Citizen is based on an almost complete misunderstanding of the facts.

First, the suggestion that radium had carelessly found its way into garbage cans at the back of national research council property is nonsense. The receiving hut, which is substantially built, was forcibly broken into and the heavy lead containers with the needles in them, along with miscellaneous other tools and equipment, were stolen. As yet only the needles have been recovered.

The suggestion that radium to the value of $145,000 was in the hut and stolen is wrong by a large factor; the value of the radium needles was nearer $3,000.

The suggestion that the needles in small quantities are deadly is not correct, as these needles are prepared for treatment of people, and several are often inserted into one person. In quantity they would be a hazard and, if swallowed, would be dangerous. The reason we cannot take the needles directly into the main building is that it has been found some needles leak and in the past we have had trouble with contamination, not from the standpoint of any health hazard, but the presence of even small quantities of radioactivity in a scientific laboratory makes it impossible to carry on precise physical measurements.

On the other hand the incident proves that our receiving hut is not burglar-proof, and we are reviewing the situation with the R.C.M.P. who have general supervision over security matters.

Mr. Fraser: Is it not true that there was just a pane of glass between the radium needles and the intruders, and that was all they had to break?

Mr. Howe: No; there was a pane of glass covered by a heavy grating. The building was constructed for this particular purpose. It is not a hut; it is a well-constructed building. Nevertheless it was broken into by persons unknown, and everything in it was pretty well looted.

CURLING

WINNING OF DOMINION CHAMPIONSHIP BY KIRKLAND LAKE RINK

Mr. Walter Little (Timiskaming): Mr. Speaker, on a question of privilege, I desire to inform this house that a team of curlers from the Kirkland Lake curling club journeyed to Vancouver and came back with the championship. We in northern Ontario are very proud of these men, as I believe everyone in Ontario should be, because we are still part of Ontario even though we are the most northerly part. I am particularly proud of these men, because I have known them since they were young lads.

NATIONAL DEFENCE

METHOD OF AWARDING CONTRACTS—MOTION FOR ADJOURNMENT UNDER STANDING ORDER 31

Mr. M. J. Coldwell (Rosetown-Biggar): Mr. Speaker, before we proceed with the next order I should like to move, seconded by the hon. member for Vancouver East (Mr. MacInnis), the adjournment of the house under standing order 31 for the purpose of discussing a definite matter of urgent public importance, namely, the report that a group of Liberal members of parliament have met with the managing director of the Canadian Commercial Corporation for the purpose of discussing the placing of defence contracts on a patronage basis, together with the report that consideration will be given to reasonable demands for the distribution of some defence contracts where they may do the most good to party supporters.

I may say the last sentence is directly quoted from a dispatch coming from a well known correspondent in the press gallery and appearing in this morning's Montreal Gazette. I think the country would wish to have this matter discussed and cleared up at once.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member has moved the adjournment of the house in order to discuss a definite matter of urgent public importance. The matter referred to is a report that a certain group of Liberal members of parliament have met with the managing director of the Canadian Commercial Corporation for the purpose of discussing the placing of defence contracts on a patronage basis, and so on.

This motion is moved under standing order 31, which reads:

(1) Leave to make a motion for the adjournment of the house (when made for the purpose of discussing a definite matter of urgent public importance) must be asked after the ordinary daily routine of business (standing order 15) has been concluded and before notices of motion or orders of the day are entered upon.

It seems to me the motion has been moved at the proper time.

(2) The member desiring to make such a motion rises in his place, asks leave to move the adjournment of the house for the purpose of discussing a definite matter of urgent public importance, and states the matter.

(3) He then hands a written statement of the matter proposed to be discussed to the Speaker—

The hon. member has done that.

—who, if he thinks it in order and of urgent public importance—

I think I must determine now whether this is a matter of urgent public importance, taking into consideration the matters the house will have an opportunity to discuss from time to time. It seems to me this is a matter that can be discussed during the debate on the speech from the throne, which will be resumed in this house on Monday.

Mr. Coldwell: Before you make a definite ruling, Mr. Speaker, may I point out that so far as discussing this matter in the debate on the address is concerned, I should like to do so but I have exhausted my right to speak in that debate. In the second place, since very large amounts are being provided for defence expenditures, I believe it is a matter of urgency that this question should be discussed before any further contracts are let.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member is right when he says he cannot speak on the amendment to the amendment, nor on the amendment itself; but I should point out that he will have an opportunity to speak on the main motion, since he has not done so already. Therefore in the debate on the speech from the throne the hon. member will have an opportunity to speak on this subject. I should also point out that I gathered from what the Prime Minister said the other day that he would endeavour to arrange the business of the house so that at least one day a week a motion for the house to go into committee of supply would be moved on a day when hon. members could discuss their grievances.

In view of what I have stated I do not think that under the rules of the house this is a motion I should put at this time.

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister): This question having been raised, may I say that the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) sent me notice of a question, which I received at five minutes to three, in the following terms:

Has the Prime Minister's attention been drawn to the report in this morning's Montreal Gazette concerning the appearance of the managing director of the Canadian Commercial Corporation before a group of Liberal M.P.'s a couple of days ago on the basis of which it is stated that there has been partial restoration of the party patronage system, with particular reference to defence contracts? Is this report true either in whole or in part?

I had not seen the report. Since the hon. member was kind enough to send me a copy of it, I have glanced over it. It is entitled, "Revolt reported in Liberal ranks aimed to restore party patronage," and was written by F. C. Mears, Gazette resident correspondent. It reads in part as follows:

Ottawa, March 9. A sixty-man revolt by Liberal members during the past week has produced a partial restoration of the party patronage system, it was learned today from several reliable sources, even though efforts have been made to keep both feet on the soft pedal.

I have never had any suggestion from any quarter whatever of there having been a revolt of sixty, or even of one member. My own impression is that the newspaperman must have been drawing very heavily upon his imagination, or must have been naïvely led up the path by what he calls "reliable sources."

Mr. Drew: Mr. Speaker, in view of the fact that the Prime Minister has reopened this discussion, I submit it would be appropriate to have the motion which was placed before you dealt with.

Some hon. Members: Order.

Mr. Drew: Unless the Prime Minister's remarks were directed to that motion, they had no place at this time. After all, the Prime Minister has seen fit to express an opinion in regard to that report; doubtless that is his opinion. I have no doubt that the laughter of the Liberal members was laughter at the fact that anybody should doubt that such a meeting took place. I believe this discussion should proceed now, on the basis of the remarks that have been made by the Prime Minister.

Mr. St. Laurent: My remarks were made because the hon. member for Peterborough West (Mr. Fraser) referred to the fact that the orders of the day were not being called; therefore the member for Winnipeg North Centre would not have an opportunity of receiving an answer to a question which he considered to be of importance. It was for that reason I volunteered the answer.

Mr. Coldwell: I think the point made by the leader of the opposition should be considered by Your Honour and by the house. According to the press dispatch, this matter involves not only some government supporters in the Liberal party, but also a civil servant, one who occupies an important position which enables him to place contracts. Since the question has been reopened by the Prime Minister—I think it should have been dealt with when the member for Peterborough West (Mr. Fraser) asked the question he did—the house should have an opportunity of discussing it today.

Mr Speaker: When I made my ruling, no appeal was taken from it. May I point out to the leader of the opposition something which I am sure he realizes, namely, that he will have an opportunity of discussing this matter, because he has not spoken on the amendment to the amendment to the motion for an address in reply to the speech from the throne.

Mr. Drew: I do not rise for the purpose of questioning the ruling or reopening the debate. I would point out, however, the validity of the contention put forward by the mover of the motion. If there is any basis for the report it should be discussed before we deal with the estimates of the Department of National Defence. If it is true, it is a most serious situation which should be known to the members when the estimates of the Department of National Defence are being considered.

OLD AGE SECURITY

APPOINTMENT OF JOINT COMMITTEE TO STUDY LEGISLATION, ALTERNATIVE METHODS, ETC.

Hon. Paul Martin (Minister of National Health and Welfare) moved:

That a joint committee of both houses of parliament be appointed to examine and study the operation and effects of existing legislation of the parliament of Canada and of the several provincial legislatures with respect to old age security; similar legislation in other countries; possible alternative measures of old age security for Canada, with or without a means test for beneficiaries, including plans based on contributory insurance principles; the probable cost thereof and possible methods of providing therefor; the constitutional and financial adjustments, if any, required for the effective operations of such plans and other related matters;

That twenty-eight members of the House of Commons, to be designated by the house at a later date, be members of the joint committee on the part of this house, and that standing order 65 of the House of Commons be suspended in relation thereto.

That the committee have power to appoint, from among its members, such subcommittees as may be deemed advisable or necessary; to call for persons, papers and records; to sit while the house is sitting, and to report from time to time.

That the committee have power to print such papers and evidence from day to day as may be ordered by the committee for the use of the committee and of parliament, and that standing order 64 of the House of Commons be suspended in relation thereto.

And that a message be sent to the Senate requesting that house to unite with this house for the above purpose and to select, if the Senate deems advisable, some of its members to act on the proposed joint committee.

He said: Mr. Speaker, in moving the adoption of this resolution, I should like to set out certain basic facts and considerations which may be of interest to the proposed committee and may receive further study at its hands.

At the outset let me say that, as the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) stated in the house on February 20, the government attaches the greatest importance to improving old age security in Canada.

Regardless of any improvements that may be made in our present pensions system, or any new system that may be suggested or instituted, all of us in this house, regardless of party, can agree on one common objective. This is to develop the best possible old age and retirement system that can be devised, with full consideration for the well-being of all Canadians. This proposed joint committee can do a real public service by its investigations in clearing the way for a better system of pensions, if that is thought desirable after analysis, for our senior aged citizens.

The idea of a parliamentary committee on old age pensions, sir, is not new to this house. Committees were set up in 1908 and in 1924; and in both instances were followed by beneficial results. The committee of 1908 was followed immediately by the enactment of the government annuities measure. The committee of 1924 led to the introduction in 1926, and the passage in 1927 by parliament, of the first Old Age Pensions Act. The act of 1927 is the foundation of the legislation which is in effect in all parts of our country today. It is based on the principle of dominion-provincial co-operation and partnership, thus conforming to the constitutional situation which prevailed in 1927 and which prevails today.

So far as the proposal to establish a joint committee of both houses on old age security is concerned, the facts of the situation will speak for themselves. What we want, and I think what the country wants, is a committee to study in objective fashion all the various aspects of this important and complicated problem.

I do not feel it would be appropriate at this stage for me to argue the case for any particular type of old age security legislation. I do believe, however, that changing factors and the complexity of the problem, which have been given intensive study by the department which I administer and by the government itself, should also be examined carefully and studiously by parliament, and that public opinion should at the same time have the opportunity to express itself on all aspects of this matter. The committee, if and when established, will represent both houses and all political parties. It will provide an opportunity to representatives of labour, industry, agriculture and social welfare organizations, as well as other interested groups, to make their views known on this vital social question.

The study which the joint committee will give to this problem will naturally, of course, take into account the limits of the constitutional powers of parliament in connection with old age security, and the relative areas of jurisdiction of both federal and provincial authorities. It was with full recognition of this division of constitutional responsibility that parliament passed the Old Age Pensions Act of 1927.

I think it is only fair to say that there is undoubtedly a growing feeling in Canada for some type of contributory system of old age security. While there are indications that some members are changing their views in this particular, the fact is that until recently, within the last few days, no members of the house except those of the Social Credit party have opposed this idea. It must be recognized, however, that a contributory scheme calling for compulsory payments by beneficiaries on a national basis will involve a constitutional amendment, just as our Unemployment Insurance Act was preceded by an amendment to the British North America Act.

These limitations on the federal power to legislate in the field of compulsory contributory social insurance remain today a vital factor in any consideration we may give to the question of planning proper measures of old age security for our population. At the conference to be held this fall undoubtedly the matter of old age retirement will provide a basis for discussion between the federal and provincial governments.

It will be a matter of the greatest importance, therefore, for the government, and I think also for the provinces, to have considered and careful study given to this problem, in the light of changing factors, by a committee made up of representatives of all political parties and both houses of parliament. When this committee starts its work, one of the first things it will want to do will be to assess carefully the facts of social benefit that have emerged since the passage of the act in 1927.

As the house knows, successive amendments have been made to the original legislation, particularly those of 1937, 1947 and 1949, which have greatly extended the benefits and the coverage of this important social security measure. It will be found that the present old age pensions provisions—in the language of the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent), by no means perfect—do provide features that make our legislation compare favourably with that of any other country in the world. Here are some of the facts that the committee will want to assess.

1. The number of pensioners has increased sevenfold, from 42,000 in 1930 to 293,000 in March of 1950.

2. The number of pensioners has doubled in the last thirteen years, from 146,524 in March, 1937, to 293,000 in March, 1950.

3. The maximum pension has been increased 100 per cent in the last seven years, from $20 at the start of 1943 to $40 in 1949. There has been a sixty per cent increase in pension in the last three years, from $25 in 1947 to $40 in 1949.

4. The amount of allowable income, including pension, has been increased from $365 per year to $600 a year for single persons, and $1,080 for married persons, with even higher limits of $1,200 and $1,320 where one or both spouses are blind.

5. The federal government's annual expenditures on old age pensions have increased threefold in seven years, from $33½ million in 1943-44, to $67 million in 1948-49, and to $103,626,000 in 1950-51.

6. Federal expenditures on old age pensions have more than doubled in the last three years. For the fiscal year 1946-47 the expenditure on federal account was $45½ million; for 1949-50 the expenditure on federal account was $94 million. When these figures are compared with those of comparable countries it will be seen that they represent a significant portion of expenditures on social security in one field, and are part of a significant contribution in the whole field of social security in terms of the total income or total expenditures of the nation.

7. Federal pension costs have increased in the last year alone by $27 million, from $66,-764,285.03 in 1948-49 to $94 million, estimated, in 1949-50.

8. Total expenditures, federal and provincial, are today running at the rate of $135 million annually.

9. Since March, 1947, as a result of amendments introduced at that time, 77,000 new pensioners have been added to the rolls, a 35 per cent increase.

10. As a result of amendments made with respect to the blind in 1947, when the eligible age was reduced from forty to twenty-one years, the number of blind pensioners has increased from 7,311 in March, 1947, to 10,300 in March, 1950—an increase of 40 per cent in the three years following the 1947 amendments.

If one may say anything about the inadequacy, if that be argued, of the present measure, let no one fail to assess the very important contribution that has been made thus far, by the existing legislation and amendments, to the older people of our country.

I should, of course, add that a number of provinces have supplemented in varying degrees the statutory amounts provided to pensioners under the old age pensions legislation.

British Columbia leads the way in this by payment of a $10 supplement, without means test, to all persons on old age pension in that province, making a total available pension of $50 a month in British Columbia.

Mr. Low: The same is true of Alberta.

Mr. Martin: Alberta also pays a supplement of $7.50 a month—

Mr. Low: $10 a month.

Mr. Martin: —of $7.50 a month—

Mr. Low: $10 a month.

Mr. Martin: —to all its pensioners on a basis similar to British Columbia, making a total available pension of $47.50 a month.

Mr. Low: May I interject at this point? I am sure the minister wants to have the facts. The budget introduced by Mr. Manning early this week provided for an extra $2.50 to the old age pensioners of Alberta, which brings the supplementary pension to $10.

Mr. Martin: My hon. friend will see as I go along that I am not trying to draw invidious comparisons. When he hears my next remark I think he will be happy.

Saskatchewan pays a somewhat more modest supplement of $2.50 a month—

Mr. Low: That does not make me happy.

Mr. Martin: —and even this is, of course, subject to a means test—not on the basis of regulations prepared by the federal government, but on means-test regulations of its own, and similar in principle to the means test applied in connection with the Old Age Pensions Act itself.

All three provinces provide, in addition to the cash supplements, fairly complete medical care and hospital service free of charge for their pensioners.

Ontario, Manitoba, and Nova Scotia, which formerly provided cash supplements prior to the increase in pension in May, 1949, have now discontinued these supplements; but Nova Scotia and Ontario provide a limited service in the field of medical care to their pensioners.

It will be apparent from the facts which I have recited that a great deal has been done, even within the framework of our present legislation, to improve the position of our aged citizens and to provide them with a measure of security equal to that which other countries provide for their older people.

The committee, I feel sure, will wish to study not only the facts of the present situation, but also the progress which has been made; and, in particular, it will no doubt wish to consider in the light of its study how our present program in Canada compares with schemes already in existence in other countries comparable to our own.

How does our program, for example, compare with that now in effect in the United States, Australia, New Zealand and the United Kingdom?

In the United States a twofold system is now in operation. First, a contributory insurance scheme has been in existence since 1935. Employers and employees each contribute 1½ per cent of payroll to a special old age insurance fund. The federal government makes no contribution to that fund. From this fund are paid old age insurance benefits to insured persons sixty-five and over so long as they remain out of covered employment. The average primary benefit after fifteen years of contributions amounts at present to approximately $26 a month. This benefit is forfeited in any month when the beneficiary earns more than $15 in covered employment. Today approximately 1,200,000 retired workers, 10 per cent of the United States population over sixty-five, receive benefits on behalf of themselves and their dependents under this insurance program.

Second, side by side with this insurance scheme—the house and the committee will want to know and to consider this—we find in the United States an old age assistance program similar to that in effect in Canada. The numbers receiving old age assistance have continued to grow each year, despite the expectation that as the contributory insurance scheme developed the numbers on the means test program would decline. The maximum contribution to any state old age assistance scheme from federal funds is $30—exactly the same as the federal contribution under the Canadian program. The federal government in the United States, however, contributes seventy-five per cent only in respect to the first $20; whereas in Canada the federal government contributes seventy-five per cent in respect to the first $40 of any pension paid.

While the federal contribution in the United States is roughly comparable to that under the Canadian scheme, state contributions are in some cases more generous than those made by the Canadian provinces. The result is a wide range in average benefit payments—from $19 a month in Mississippi to $75 a month in Colorado. The average means test pension for all states is just under $45. Almost 2,700,000 individuals—twenty-three per cent of the aged population—are receiving assistance under this means test program. The means test itself varies from state to state, but is on the whole more severe, as the committee will find, than in Canada.

In the state of Michigan, which I know best because of its proximity to my own city and my own constituency, the pensioner, either single or married, who has real property exceeding $6,000 in value is automatically debarred from pension, and the provisions effective in Michigan are among the most generous in that country. What is the situation in Canada in this regard? Such a person in this country would have his property taken into account on a fair rental value basis in the calculation of his income, but would undoubtedly be entitled to a partial or full pension, depending on his marital status. Likewise, in the state of Michigan, an individual with cash in the bank in excess of $500, or $750 if married, is automatically debarred from pension until he reduces his cash reserves to the figures mentioned.

Under the scheme in our country, a single pensioner can have between $1,400 and $1,500 in the bank and still draw full pension. He is not completely debarred unless he has liquid assets in excess roughly of $6,000, because the calculation is not on the basis of liquid assets but on the basis of income derivable from those assets.

In the case of married pensioners, in Canada, a man and his wife would have to have liquid assets of almost $12,000 before going off pension altogether; and if the wife is under seventy years of age and not on pension, a married man could have close to $7,000 in the bank without affecting his right to a full pension of $40.

I wonder if hon. members who have been criticizing the administration have taken into account the liberality of the provisions of our Old Age Pensions Act as against those on a comparable basis. These comparisons are given to illustrate the great variance of the means test as it is applied in various countries.

In a committee such as the one now proposed, it would no doubt be the wish of the house to give detailed study to various features of the legislation in other countries whose systems are comparable to our own. It will be helpful, I believe, to have the committee examine, for instance, the New Zealand system, which has been referred to so often in the house, and which has an interesting feature known as the universal superannuation plan. Under this act at the present time payments are made, based on contributions under the general social security tax but without a means test, to all persons of sixty-five years and over.

Mr. MacInnis: Mr. Speaker, may I ask the minister if those contributions are made specifically in regard to the old age pension—the universal superannuation benefit, which is the real name for it—or is it for the total social security?

Mr. Martin: No; the one I am talking about, the figures to which I am referring, are only with regard to old age pensions, the derivable income from the social security plan in that country.

The present old age pension under the plan in New Zealand amounts to £32.10s. a year, or something less than $100 a year. This amount increases annually by £2.10s., or $7.75, and will eventually, in 1988, reach a maximum of £130 a year, or roughly $400 in Canadian funds. Our maximum pension now in this country is $480 a year.

Mr. MacInnis: What is the difference in the age?—and no means test?

Mr. Martin: I am not arguing the case; I am simply giving the comparable figures. I have told my hon. friend there is an age of sixty-five years. There are benefits there which we do not have. But I think my hon. friend will find out, before I have finished, that the judgment which I know he would like to give to this matter will not produce exactly the results which he thinks.

During the forty-year period while this scheme is maturing, New Zealand relies on a means test pension scheme providing a maximum pension of £130, or $400, as compared, as I said a moment ago, with $480 in Canada, to persons who can qualify on the basis of a means test roughly similar to that which we have in this country.

Now, coming to Australia—

Mr. MacInnis: Before you leave New Zealand—

Some hon. Members: Sit down.

Mr. MacInnis: What is the difference between the eligible age for pension in New Zealand and in Canada?

Mr. Martin: I have already answered that twice.

Mr. MacInnis: No, you have not.

Mr. Martin: Yes, I did; I told my hon. friend.

Mr. MacInnis: What is the age in New Zealand? In New Zealand it is sixty and in Canada it is seventy.

Mr. Martin: I am giving the plan in New Zealand.

Mr. MacInnis: I know, but you are not telling it all.

Mr. Martin: I did say what the plan was, that there was a difference in age, and I repeated it. I have given it now a third time, if that will satisfy the hon. member, for whom I have the greatest affection and respect.

The situation in Australia is more comparable, because, like Canada, it is a federal state, and presents an interesting basis of comparison. Its system, in fact, is more closely comparable to that of Canada because it relies exclusively upon the means test program, just as we have done up to the present time. But that was not always the situation in Australia. Under the former Menzies government, a contributory old age insurance law was placed upon the statute book in Australia. It is interesting to note that the Labour government a year or so ago repealed this legislation and decided to rely upon expansion and improvement of the means test program, rather than to adopt a program embodying contributory insurance features. Full details of all these schemes, together with that now in effect in the United Kingdom, will be made available to the joint committee.

May I say this further with regard to Australia. While it rests entirely upon the means test basis, its means test basis is not as liberal as the means test basis in the act passed in 1927, with amendments thereto, in this country. It is of further interest to note that the amount of pension payable under the Canadian legislation at the present time is more generous than that payable under the schemes now in effect in New Zealand, Australia and the United Kingdom. It is also more generous than the average benefit paid at the present time under the United States contributory insurance scheme. It is, however, slightly less generous than the average means test pension paid in the United States, the reason in part for this being, as I have already indicated, the relatively greater generosity of the state contribution in the United States as compared with the provincial contribution in Canada.

After intensive study of the details of existing plans in other countries, such as those I have mentioned, it will be desirable that the committee here proposed should consider possible varieties of proposals which could be considered for Canada. I am not seeking to indicate that our system is perfect; I am not seeking to suggest that it does not require improvement. But I am pointing out that in trying to find a basis for improvement it will be very helpful to rely, in part, on the experience of other countries, as well as to consider certain other contingencies, to which I shall later refer, in our own country, under our own economy, affecting all the people of this country.

In all this study it will be desirable, I believe, that such a committee make a full assessment of the financial implications of each proposal. Why? Because I believe every hon. member will agree that we want to show a sense of responsibility and maintain a sense of balance in any plans that may be considered desirable. We must not be unaware of our responsibility, financially or otherwise, in a wide variety of fields. There are other social security benefits which we shall want, and we shall not want to do anything now which would in any way interfere with the realization of some of those benefits.

I wish to say right here and now, by way of digression, that I take second place to no one in this house in the desire to see the means test eliminated. But we recognize that this depends upon arrangements to be worked out with the provinces, and upon the kind of system which is ultimately devised.

It will do us no good, I think, but rather infinite harm as a people, to embrace a scheme which is beyond our capacity to continue in future years. In that connection one knows what is happening in California. One knows something of the retrenchments which have had to take place in social security benefits in other countries, and we have read about the effects that this has had on the people of those countries.

It will likewise be unwise for us to embark upon a proposal of such magnitude that it will effectively prevent us from considering other important social security measures, such as health insurance, invalidity benefits and other measures which must be in the realm of the development of a social security program.

We shall be prepared, if the committee wishes, to present a variety of possible proposals for its consideration, and to submit along with the proposals themselves, full details as to the financial commitments which would be involved in any of the various plans.

In this connection, with the permission of the house, I should like to place on Hansard a table showing the cost of various old age security proposals, at various ages and amounts on a universal basis, free of means test, and incorporating many of the proposals which have already been made in the house. I shall place them on record for the convenience of hon. members, and comment on only one or two of them.

Mr. Speaker: Has the minister leave to put the table on Hansard?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. Martin: The table is as follows:

COSTS OF VARIOUS OLD AGE SECURITY PROPOSALS AT VARIOUS AGES AND AMOUNTS (on a universal basis, free of means test)

	Population	$30	$40	$50	$60	$100
Age 70—	674,500 (1951)	$ 242,820,000	$ 323,760,000	$ 404,700,000	$ 485,640,000	$ 809,400,000

.....	2,366,900 (1971)	852,084,000	1,116,110,000	1,380,136,000	1,644,162,000	2,760,272,000

This table shows, for example, that the cost of a $30 pension to all at seventy without means test would be $243 million in 1951, $313 million in 1961 and $375 million in 1971. A $40 pension to all at age sixty-five without means test would cost $529 million in 1951 rising to $659 million in 1961 and to $782 million in 1971. To take another example, a $50 pension free of means test to all women at sixty-five and all men at seventy would cost $526 million in 1951, $672 million in 1961 and $802 million in 1971. In my commentary I have not taken other figures in the table dealing with certain proposals made in this house which will bring us in 1951 up to a total for one particular phase of social security alone of more than the government of Canada is spending for all phases of social security, including old age pensions, family allowances, veterans benefits, the health program and so on, and not taking into account expenditures made for social security by the provinces and voluntary organizations in this country.

I will take second place to no one in trying to develop a social security program. I am not afraid to defend the principle of social security. I do not necessarily make the distinction between it and social justice that has been made, but I do say that no one who really wants to act in a responsible way in the development of such a program can fail to take into account the capacity of the nation to meet these charges. In view of the widespread interest in contributory old age pension schemes—

Mr. Diefenbaker: We did not hear about that before.

Mr. Martin: My hon. friend says that he did not hear about it. I should like him to show me one speech I have ever made in the house or outside it to which I did not attach the important addendum to which I have referred.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Financial responsibility.

Mr. Martin: The trouble with my hon. friend, for whom I have every respect, is that he does not pay the attention to my speeches that I wish he would. In view of the widespread interest, as I said, in contributory old age pension schemes, I feel sure that the committee when established will wish to study with particular care the nature of the various contributory schemes in effect in other countries. It will want to know the essential characteristics of these various plans. It will want to study the various features of the New Zealand scheme which, as I have already said, operates side by side with a means test scheme. It may come as a surprise to some to see how low these benefits are in the initial years of the scheme, how long a period of time is required for the scheme to mature, how heavy a rate of contribution is required, and how heavy the financial costs of the scheme will be when it fully matures in that country in 1988.

The features of contributory schemes in other countries would also need to be examined, I am sure, in order that all possible approaches may receive full attention. The question of contributory pensions is of particular importance at the present time because of the development within recent months of a new approach to old age security by way of supplementary industrial pensions, particularly in the United States. I think we will all recognize, Mr. Speaker, and I think we will all agree that it is only right and proper for industry to appreciate that it has a responsibility to its employees, not only with regard to old age security but also with regard to other social security benefits as well. For that reason the interesting experiments taking place today in the United States will deserve the committee's careful attention, and I am sure the house will find that development to be one of increasing interest.

A number of agreements have been entered into in the United States between the unions and the employers calling for the provision of a total pension amounting to $100 a month to employees who retire at sixty-five after twenty-five or thirty years' service with an individual employer. This $100 pension is made up of two parts: (1) the benefit payable under the federal old age insurance scheme; (2) a supplementary benefit paid on a non-contributory basis by the employer to bring the old age insurance benefit up to $100.

Current developments in the field of industrial relations in Canada make it clear that there is a desire in some quarters to develop industrial pension schemes similar to those of the United States which I have described. This approach to industrial social security most certainly will warrant the careful consideration of the committee which I am proposing in this resolution. We need to know, after careful study of all the details, whether we wish to adopt for Canada a scheme similar to that now developing in the United States. Before adopting such a scheme to which many attach great importance—a scheme which is finding favour now with some trade union organizations and being accepted in a significant number of cases by Canadian employers—I feel we should make certain that all the facts in connection with these schemes, and all their implications, are fully appreciated by the unions, by the employers and by members of this house.

In this connection I might mention one outstanding fact which I think is not fully realized, namely, that the $100 industrial pension in the United States is in all instances provided entirely at the expense of the employer and the employees.

Mr. Coldwell: And the consumer.

Mr. Martin: The government does not pay one cent. My hon. friend is of that opinion—

Mr. Knowles: We say "and the consumer".

An hon. Member: Who else is going to pay it?

Mr. Martin: And the consumer in the sense that he purchases products, but so far as direct benefit is concerned, no contribution whatsoever is provided by the individual states nor is any contribution provided by the federal government of that country. I do not want to prejudge the matter, but my question will indicate how I feel personally. Is that the kind of old age security scheme we want in Canada? Do we want the government to get out from under its present financial responsibility which involves the payment of $135 million annually by the federal government and the provinces? Do we want them to shift this burden to the employees concerned, and to industry, and leave it to industry and to its employees to pay the entire cost of their old age security schemes? The federal government could easily do this and, to the extent that it was successful in doing so, it would relieve itself and the provinces of the present pension bill of $135 million annually. All it would have to do to place itself on an equal footing with the federal government in the United States, in so far as the $100 industrial pension is concerned, would be to provide, at no cost to itself, the administration of the employer-employee contributions to a federal old age scheme.

Do we wish to develop in this country a contributory insurance scheme which places the full burden of the cost on employees and on industry and which is designed to relieve governments correspondingly of the burden which, to a great extent, they are carrying from general revenues at the present time? I place great emphasis on this because from the correspondence I am receiving from all over the country suggesting the merits of that scheme it seems to me, with great respect, that the question has not been examined as carefully as it should be.

I ask this question simply to illustrate the point that we need to study with the greatest care all the implications of these programs before making up our minds as to the scheme we would like for our own people.

Perhaps one of the most significant facts of all those the committee will want to consider is that, owing to the increased longevity of our population, the numbers of our aged are increasing. As of June 1, 1949, it was estimated that there were 625,000 persons seventy years of age or over in the Canadian population. In addition there were 398,000 persons between the ages of sixty-five and seventy, or a total of 1,023,000 persons sixty-five and over. But this is not the whole story, by any means; and in the calculation of policy for years to come we as legislators, and the committee particularly, will have the responsibility of assessing this problem in terms of the next decade in particular, and perhaps the next two decades.

Each year the number of our older citizens increases by from 25,000 to 35,000. By 1951, when the regular census will be taken, our best available estimates indicate that on the basis of present standards the total number of persons sixty-five and over will be in the neighbourhood of 1,100,000, of whom 675,000 will be over seventy. By 1961 the total number over sixty-five will be close to 1,375,000, of whom 870,000 will be over seventy. By 1971 the total number over sixty-five will be in excess of 1,600,000, of whom well over 1,000,000 will be over seventy. In other words, twenty-one years from now the total number of persons over seventy will equal or exceed today's number of persons over sixty-five. This demonstrates, I think, with startling clarity the rate of increase in our aged population.

Some will say, of course, that this is a long way off; but twenty-one years is not a long time. We are now considering an act, to which possible amendments will be considered by the committee, which was passed twenty-two or more years ago. When you think of the tremendously increased application of that act these figures, important in every context, will need to be considered by the committee. I should point out, of course, that our total population will not keep pace with this increase in the number of aged. All these and many other considerations which I have not time to mention I am sure will be given careful consideration by the committee.

It may be said, I am sure it will be said, and I would not expect it not to be said, knowing the character this debate might take, that this move to establish a joint committee is nothing more than a delaying action.

Some hon. Members: Hear hear.

Mr. Martin: I knew I would hear that at this point. I want to say most emphatically on my responsibility as a member of the government that this is not the case. We consider the next steps to be taken in developing a comprehensive program of old age security to be of vital importance to the people of this country, and we want to be sure of our ground in detail when we take these steps. I believe the country will expect that kind of responsible attitude.

In this connection I should like to stress again that we must view this problem as one in which we are associated in a close working partnership with ten provincial governments. It is important, therefore, that we should seek the solution of this problem in joint consultation with the provinces, since the jurisdiction for contributory old age insurance is clearly in their hands at the present time, and since the only way that financial responsibility can be properly apportioned is as a result of discussion and agreement with them. This procedure of consultation was begun when we called the provinces together in January of this year to discuss important conditions precedent to the discussion of social welfare matters in the fall. I know every hon. member of this house will share my feeling that substantial progress was made at this conference, thanks to the wholehearted co-operation of all the provincial premiers who were there represented. With this auspicious beginning we feel the chances of success are good in the further negotiations which will take place in the latter part of this year.

The over-all objectives which the government hopes to realize in discussions with the provinces have been stated already by the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent); and with particular reference to the question of old age security I would direct attention to the statement he made a few months ago and which apparently has been overlooked in the discussions that have taken place in this house within the last few days. I think what the Prime Minister said last year in Vancouver deserves to be noted in the context of what I have to say today. He said:

> One of our main domestic concerns is the provision of social security for all Canadians. The funds distributed under old age pensions, family allowances, pensions for the blind, health grants and other measures have also, in addition to the direct benefit received by the direct recipients of those amounts, added a strong upward influence in maintaining levels of employment. Our social security program is, as you know, by no means complete. We still have a good way to go before provision of social security in Canada reaches the level which will satisfy . . .
> We are certainly not satisfied with our old age pension legislation, even though the scale of pensions is fifty per cent higher in dollars, than it was before the war. What has been our aim is a contributory system of old age pensions, one under which our old people will receive their pensions as a matter of right and without there being any means test.

Mr. Diefenbaker: Where was that statement made, may I ask?

Mr. Martin: In Vancouver.

Mr. Diefenbaker: On what date?

Mr. Martin: I have not the exact date at the moment. The Prime Minister went on:

> By contributory pensions paid by the state I do not mean the kind of pension that any one of you could obtain by going to an insurance company and paying an annual premium. It is not a pension where there is going to be a separate account for every Canadian and where he will get as his pension only the return of his own contributions and interest thereon. What we mean by a contributory old age pension scheme is a scheme whereby all Canadians will contribute each year to a fund for old age pensions and where old age pensions will be paid out as a matter of right to those who will have attained the pensionable age—

Then he went on:

> It will be a pension of an equal amount for everyone at pensionable age to which everyone of taxable age will make a direct contribution. But we cannot have a contributory system without an agreement with all provincial governments to have the constitution amended, as was done in the case of unemployment insurance . . .
>
> In respect of old age pensions, and of all social insurance, the constitution of 1867 placed those matters under provincial jurisdiction, and as long as I am in parliament I will always oppose any attempt by the parliament of Canada to take from the legislatures of the provinces one iota of the jurisdiction given to them by the constitution unless they agree to that being done.
> If, and when, that is done, there will be the possibility of a contributory old age pension scheme which will be the same for Canadians in every province of Canada.

Then he continues with this second and concluding paragraph. I commend these words to the member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles). It reads as follows:

> These are matters which require, and which are receiving serious consideration. I here repeat the assurance that we will stand by the proposals we made to the provinces in 1945, although of course we are always ready to consider modifications, if changes can be made which are justified by the conditions of today or the conditions of tomorrow, and which would make agreement easier to reach.

Mr. Knowles: Is this still part of the Prime Minister's speech delivered in April, 1949?

Mr. Martin: I do not know what the date is, but this year.

Mr. Drew: No, not this year.

Mr. Martin: The leader of the opposition is right, it is last year. That is still the view of the Prime Minister and the members of this government.

Mr. Drew: I do not want to interrupt, but the statement which has just been attributed to the Prime Minister is of sufficient importance that we should have the date of that speech on the record, as well as the circumstances under which it was made.

Mr. Martin: I do not believe the circumstances would make much difference. My hon. friend is entitled to the date, and I shall get it for him. I believe the Prime Minister has now become known throughout this country as a man whose word can be relied upon, no matter what the circumstances.

Mr. Drew: That may be, but we have a right to know whether we can rely upon the repetition of it. We do not know the date.

Mr. Martin: I shall certainly see that my hon. friend gets the date before the end of the debate.

These words of the Prime Minister make abundantly clear the relationship between our attempts to achieve a better system of old age security for our people, and the consultations which are to take place later this year with the provinces. As we approach these discussions with the provinces, it will be helpful for us to have the considered views of all the parties in this house, of organized labour, of industry, of representative social welfare organizations, and of other interested groups in our population, who have given study through the years to the important question of old age security. I believe that in the formulation of a policy nothing could be more desirable, before we finally meet the provinces, than to take the organized labour groups of this country into our confidence through this committee, as well as the farmers and other organizations. I think that attitude, and that approach, will commend itself to all hon. members.

I must repeat however that, whatever we do, we must take care to ensure that any program we develop lies within the capacity of the Canadian people to maintain.

In this connection, I will recall the statement made by the hon. member for Vancouver East (Mr. MacInnis) as reported on page 469 of Hansard for October 3, 1949. It reads as follows:

> Up to this point I have not said anything about how a social security program should be financed. I am dealing with broad principles and not with details. I do not believe that I have any illusions about how measures of this kind are paid for. They are paid out of the national income. That in turn comes out of national production, and the national production is the product of those who work. When we provide social services of any kind we are providing material things such as food, clothing, shelter and services of one kind or another, which must be produced by those who are working.

On the same page, he said:

> I say that, because there is an idea abroad that there is some mysterious source from which food, shelter and clothing can be paid for without taking it from those who produce it or have claims of ownership to it. There is no such way.

I believe those words of the hon. member for Vancouver East, Mr. Speaker, deserve to be re-echoed in this house. It cannot be too strongly emphasized that social security has to be paid for out of production. It is the people themselves who, through their hard work, must provide governments with the financial resources to maintain those social services. I believe we should deal with this thing frankly. As we go along with these various subjects, we should point out their cost, point out what it means by way of additional responsibility for the citizens. It seems that is the way they want it, and that is the responsible way to proceed.

With that in mind, what we wish to do is to develop, within the limits only of the financial capacity of our people, and with due regard to our over-all commitments in all fields of social security and other governmental responsibilities, the simplest, most effective and most humane system of old age security that it is possible for us to devise. We wish to do this, not in open disregard of provincial rights or interests or concerns, but in full consultation, agreement and partnership with them. This, Mr. Speaker, is our objective in the field of old age security. It is with this, along with other equally important matters in mind, that we look forward to our conference with the provinces in the autumn of this year. It is for the purpose of enabling us to consider every possible point of view which could be of advantage to us in formulating future plans and programs that we are proposing to set up this joint committee of both houses.

In this way, we will be able not only to find out what is in the minds of the various parties in the house and in the other place, but to examine the program and the experience of other countries. We will be able to obtain the views of organized labour and of industry; we will be able to hear the expert testimony of representatives of social welfare organizations; we will be able to study the implications of the current movement for varied industrial pension schemes, and the extent to which these can be fitted into any over-all pattern; we will be able to assess the relative strengths and weaknesses of our present scheme; we will be able to study the relative merits of contributory and non-contributory measures, of means test programs such as still prevail in all the countries of the world; we will be able to study the reasons why Australia, when its Labour government was in power, rejected contributory old age insurance in favour of a continuation, with improvements, of the existing means test program; we will be able to examine the orthodox contributory insurance program of the United States, the universal superannuation scheme of New Zealand, the national old age security scheme of the United Kingdom, and the old age security schemes in other countries.

In effect, we will be giving this committee the opportunity of assessing the alternative plans in Canada which, among others, are at least four. First, do we want an extension and improvement of the present system, based on joint dominion-provincial co-operation, of a means test program, such as Australia has? Undoubtedly, much could be done to improve this. Second, do we want an orthodox contributory system as in the United States, limited as to its coverage, and gradual in its approach to full benefit rates? Third, do we want a universal superannuation scheme as in New Zealand, gradual in its approach to full benefit rates, designed to eliminate the means test gradually for all the aged, but requiring 30 to 40 years to do so? Do we want to levy a special social security tax to finance the cost of this? Fourth, do we want a universal pension scheme, with full benefits to commence immediately at a stated age, as proposed by the dominion in 1945 in its proposals to the provinces? These are but four of the alternatives the committee will want to consider. I submit to you, Mr. Speaker, for the reasons I have stated, this resolution should commend itself to the house.

Mr. Donald M. Fleming (Eglinton): Mr. Speaker, the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Martin) has chosen a new role for himself today. Usually, when the minister speaks in the house, he adopts the air of one who is announcing the advent of a new heaven and a new earth. His speech today was of a different nature. On the whole it was a most depressing speech. The information which the minister sought to recount must have had a most depressing effect on everyone who had come here with any hope of action on the part of the government or parliament in the near future.

In his speech the minister in effect sought to justify the existing old age pension system. His whole speech was in essence a defence of the status quo. He praised what he called the liberality of the present system. His words in connection with the means test—whether he so intended them or not I cannot say—were in essence a defence of the means test. The minister's statement leaves one wondering what possible purpose the committee can serve, because it would appear that the government has completely prejudged the situation and the committee must face a role of utter futility. I think a fair summing up of the speech the minister made this afternoon would be that the case for the appointment of a committee with any hope of performing a constructive or useful task is weaker now than it was before he started to speak.

From the resolution one would infer that the committee is to be a sort of fact-finding body. There are several things that the committee is to be permitted to examine and study. If it is information that is sought, I suggest that that information is available now. The minister has catalogued a good deal of information of a rather depressing sort, and it is quite apparent that when this committee is set up it will have to go to the same sources for its information as those from which the minister obtained his, namely, the officials of the department.

It is not more information that is required on this subject. I will put it briefly: what is required is resolute action on the part of the government. There is plenty of information available. All the information in the hands of the government today could be made available to the house by means of a white paper, in a speech or by some other method. It is not more information that is the great need in this field at the present moment.

The minister has sought to put some information before the house looking to the present and to the future, information as to the situation both in Canada and in countries abroad, particularly in the sister nations of the commonwealth to which he referred. Again I say the committee will have to obtain all its information from government sources; there is no suggestion that the committee will seek firsthand information from the other countries of the commonwealth. I say to you, Mr. Speaker, that if that is all this committee is to be permitted to do, it is not going to have a useful or successful role.

Questions of law and the constitution have been introduced by the minister. Where is the committee to go for instruction on those points? It will have to obtain it from the law officers of the crown, if the law officers of the crown are to be permitted to come before the committee and submit to questioning. All this is available to the government now and can be made available to the house in five minutes if the government has not been neglecting the preparation of information.

I sum up my approach to this subject by saying that what is needed right now is not more information—there is ample information available; what is needed is action. We have been waiting for action on the part of the government for a very long time.

Let us in all fairness examine the proposal with respect to the functions and powers and purposes of the proposed committee. Its shortcomings are manifest.

In the first place, its scope is very narrow. It is to be confined to the subject of old age security. It is not to be permitted to inquire into questions of security for those who are disabled and prevented from obtaining a livelihood just as are those who are advanced in years. The minister talked about the danger of action with reference to old age pensions prejudicing or precluding action in other fields of social security; and he referred to health insurance. Would it not have been the part of common sense, if the minister is seriously hoping for the results he pictured from this committee, to enlarge the scope of the committee so that it could take that broad and well-balanced view of the situation that it must take if the matter is to be considered in any other way than that characterized by this government's approach to social security questions in the past, which has prevented a thorough and comprehensive solution, namely, a piecemeal approach and piecemeal politics? What is needed is a comprehensive approach to the problem, and this committee with its limited scope will not provide the opportunity to make a comprehensive study of social security.

In the second place, I would point out that the committee will be too large. There are to be twenty-eight members from this house, and, as it is to be a joint committee, presumably the other place will appoint a similar number. A committee of fifty-six members will be a clumsy committee, and it will not make rapid progress with this problem. It may serve the government's real purpose to have a clumsy committee which will be bogged down by its own numbers, but such a committee will not achieve the purposes the minister has pictured.

Two years ago, when a similar proposal came from the government, for the appointment of a special committee to investigate the causes of the rise in prices, one thing the government put forward in defence of the committee was that it would be a small committee of only sixteen members, including the chairman. It was to be kept small so that the task could be more expeditiously disposed of. But this committee of presumably fifty-six members is going to be hopelessly bogged down.

Mr. Martin: I think my hon. friend will want to know that it is not intended to have such a large committee. There will be twenty-eight members from this house and I understand about nine members from the other place.

Mr. Fleming: The minister has no control whatsoever over the number that will be appointed to the committee by the other place.

Mr. Knowles: Put them all on. They are on pension anyway.

Mr. Martin: You just wait and see.

Mr. Fleming: The resolution states that the other place is to be invited to appoint some of its members to serve on the proposed joint committee.

If it is an effective committee that the government want, why do not they follow the advice they gave the house two years ago and appoint a small compact committee? They said then that such a committee could proceed with the task much more expeditiously.

I come now to the third obvious shortcoming of this committee. It is given no power whatsoever to make so much as a single recommendation to the house.

Mr. Martin: It will have that power.

Mr. Fleming: It has not that power. There is not a word in this resolution that gives the committee the slightest power to make one recommendation to this house. That is a matter of first importance.

Mr. Martin: I rise to a point of order. My hon. friend is now interpreting the rules of the house. Under the rules of the house there is no doubt that a committee has power to make recommendations. My hon. friend will remember the prices committee, and he knows that it made recommendations. I expect that this committee will be so inclined.

Mr. Fleming: Mr. Speaker, I take direct issue with the statement made by the minister, and I shall have something to say about recommendations made on a previous occasion, and the way in which they were smuggled in after the committee and the house had been told that there was not such a power.

Sir, on this question of the power to make recommendations, let us go back to the instance of two years ago that the minister mentioned. On February 2, 1948, the house had under debate the government's motion for the appointment of a committee to inquire into the causes of the rise in prices, and we of the official opposition said, if we are going to have a committee let us have a committee that will really do a job. We asked that that committee be given power to make recommendations. And, sir, we brought in an amendment to the government's motion. We sought to add these words to the government's resolution, which will be found on page 760 of Hansard of February 2, 1948:

> That as well as reporting its findings the committee shall from time to time make recommendations to the House of Commons, as in the opinion of the committee may be considered necessary to secure as far as possible fair and just returns to producers, employees and employers and fair and just practices in marketing and distribution that will safeguard the interests of consumers as well as of producers.

That amendment was ruled out of order, if you please. On objection taken by my hon. friend's leader of those days, they got the amendment ruled out of order, and when the ruling was challenged the house divided and of course my friend, and those associated with him, lined up in support of the ruling that eliminated the amendment as being out of order. If the minister will take the time to go back and read the debates leading up to the adoption of that resolution two years ago, he will see there that the prime minister of that day defended the motion lacking any provision for recommendations because he pictured the danger of recommendations, the danger that the committee would make recommendations at variance with government policy. It was that embarrassment that led the prime minister, and the government of which the minister is still a member, to oppose giving to that committee two years ago any power to make recommendations.

I submit to you, sir, that the reason we find no power to make recommendations provided for in the present resolution is the very same reason: that the government is seeking to handcuff the committee so that it will not bring in any recommendations which might run counter to government policy. Every syllable the minister uttered this afternoon shows clearly how anxious the government is to keep the brakes on this committee, to prevent it from making any independent recommendations that might offend the dictates of government policy.

My fourth observation on the shortcomings of this proposal is that it is a recommendation for the appointment of a special committee. If there is need for a committee—and there is—then it ought to be a standing committee of the house, not a mushroom committee that will be permitted to sit while it serves the purpose of the government, and then will be eliminated when it has served the government's purpose.

Mr. Pearkes: Like the veterans affairs committee.

Mr. Fleming: The same thing again. The government will have a special committee when it tends to suit the government's purpose, but the moment the committee shows any independence, or ceases to knuckle down to government orders, or tries to meet the needs of the veterans, then of course the government steps in and says it will have neither a standing committee nor a special committee in that field. The same thing is true here, Mr. Speaker. If there is any merit in the arguments the minister has submitted to the house this afternoon for the appointment of a committee, the merit lies in the appointment of a standing committee, not a mushroom committee.

At the last session of parliament the government had the opportunity to accept my proposal for the appointment of a standing committee of the house in the fields of health, welfare, social security and housing. That resolution was debated in this house on October 12, 1949. It was defeated on a called division by the government voting against it, after the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Claxton), then acting minister of the department which the Minister of National Health and Welfare heads, had vigorously opposed it as being the sort of thing that he said would run counter to proper parliamentary practice and responsible government.

I do not say that the minister is wrong today in recommending a committee. The trouble with him is that he does not recommend a proper or adequate committee. The minister who was speaking for him last October 12 was utterly wrong in his condemnation of the establishment of a standing committee of the house in these important fields.

It is worth remembering, sir, that when the then acting minister of national health and welfare was commenting on the scope and purposes of such a committee he had this to say concerning recommendations, which will be found at page 725 of Hansard of October 12:

> In the first place a committee considering policy, administration, appropriations and expenditures would be useless unless it made recommendations to the house.

On the reasoning of that minister this committee, which is not being given power to make recommendations, is accordingly doomed to be useless. I do not know how many hon. members will wish to approach a committee task like this with a feeling that their efforts are doomed to futility before they start.

The next observation I make is that if the purpose of the government, when they conceived this committee, was to fly a kite and obtain whatever information they wanted as to the views of various political parties, or other organizations interested in the field, or the people of Canada, they have had ample opportunity to obtain those views. There has been ample discussion on this question in the house in recent debates to show the minister and the government where the political parties stand on this question. It goes back to this, sir, that what is needed now is action, and resolute action. While there is ample ground for the appointment of a standing committee in this field, the government does not give us any assurance of action.

What is the real reason for this recommendation now, this proposal from the government, which in effect runs counter to and in the teeth of the case sought to be made out by the Minister of National Defence, speaking in the debate that I have referred to, namely, on October 12, 1949?

It is a well-known fact, Mr. Speaker, that the government is under pressure on the subject of old age pensions. Members of parliament are under pressure on the subject of old age pensions. The public is aroused to the inadequacies of the present pension scheme, and to the intolerability of the continuation of the means test, as it has not been aroused thereto before.

Undoubtedly supporters of the government in this house, in the light of promises that so many of them made so readily during the election campaign last spring, are under very great pressure to fulfil their promises. Therefore the government has obviously found it necessary to steer a course now that is somehow going to relieve the pressure. I submit to you, sir, that is precisely what we have before us now. The pressure, sir, has unquestionably doubled ever since the government showed its position very firmly on September 19, 1949, with reference to the means test. There was ample opportunity at that time for the government to say that they were going to replace the present system, and its means test, with a national contributory system that would eliminate this invidious means test; but oh, no, the government chose to line up solidly in favour of the maintenance of the means test. Government members, including the Minister of National Health and Welfare, voted to a man against the amendment which will be found on page 50 of Hansard of September 19, 1949, in these words:

> We regret, however, that Your Excellency's advisers have failed to propose legislation to remove the means test from the old age pension.

Mr. Martin: That was not the purpose of the motion.

Mr. Fleming: That was the effect of the motion, and these are the words of the motion. The government accepted it at its face value, and they voted against it to a man, and the minister was one of those who voted against it.

I have said enough to indicate quite clearly that the government felt it necessary to devise some tactic which would offer an opportunity to relieve the pressure because, as hon. members must be well aware, the pressure is very strong. So we see the government sitting down and cogitating on the problem, not with a view to meeting the real necessities of the situation, not with a view to facing up to the realities or shortcomings of the present pensions system, but sitting down to devise means of evading the issue and delaying.

Sir, you see a very good example this afternoon, in the speech made by the minister, of the full flower of that favourite government tactic—to gain time, to spar for time. Obviously we have before us today evasive action, and the well-known government Fabian tactic.

Mr. Knowles: Not on your life!

Mr. Fleming: The hon. member to my left is a little too modern. The real reference to the original Fabius is a reference to a man who delayed. That was his chief military tactic; he was a man who delayed. The Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Martin) fits very well and naturally into a government whose principal tactic is the tactic of delay.

There are those who were members of the house two years ago, and who will recall the debate of February 1948 respecting a problem which was then just as acute as the problem of old age pensions today. Those hon. members will not have failed to observe both the similarity of the conditions and the similarity of the government's method of meeting the problems.

I am sure it will be well recalled that at that time just the same kind of pressure was exerted on parliament to take some action to halt the soaring cost of living. Many of us had some direct proposals to make as to how the government could meet that problem, and concrete suggestions were made from the official opposition. But the government were not prepared to take that kind of action. No, they fell back on a method by which they would relieve the pressure—because the pressure, we will all recall, was very great indeed. So they devised this pretty tactic—I shall be generous enough to call it a tactic, sir, though in reality I think it is a stunt—to sidetrack that pressure, and to route the steam engine off on a siding.

I point out to the house the similarity between the government's method then and the government's method today, because what is going to follow is directly relevant. The house will be neglectful of its duty today if it tolerates treatment of this committee it is asked to set up, in the way the committee was treated which was set up two years ago. I point out that while that committee was sitting prices continued to go up, perhaps even faster than they had been going up before. Today, while this committee sits, those who are suffering from the inadequacies and shortcomings of the present outworn old age pension scheme are going to be permitted to continue to suffer.

In the second place, that committee sat for a very long time—four and a half months altogether—and held in all seventy-seven public meetings. It spent a great deal of the country's money to find the facts. Apparently today we are to be treated in the same way. A committee is to be appointed to find the facts—when the facts are known. It is not more facts or more knowledge of the facts that are required; it is action.

Third, that committee embarked upon a perfectly futile task when denied the right to make recommendations, and, unless the government lifts the hampering restrictions, this new committee will be doomed to equal futility.

Fourth, I am sure no hon. member can believe that this fact was absent from the minds of the government when this resolution was devised, namely, that it is going to have the effect of preventing discussion in the house of matters which are within the scope and purview of the reference to the committee.

Won't that be a happy situation for the government! In the debate on the throne speech many attacks have been made upon the government because of its indifference and its inaction in the face of the very serious situation facing many of the elderly people in this country, and the conditions from which they are suffering—and I use the word "suffering" advisedly. Can one imagine anything that would suit better the purposes of the government than to have a stop put to all that kind of discussion in the house? Nothing would suit the purposes of the government better, as happened in the instance two years ago to which I have referred when, for four and a half months, while the cost of living was continuing to soar, any discussion of the subject in the house was precluded. Nothing on the subject could be discussed in the house until the committee reported a day or two before prorogation, at the end of June, 1948.

So hon. members will see that, despite all the protests of the minister—and, I think like the queen in Hamlet, "The lady doth protest too much"—the minister had a very uneasy feeling somewhere in the locality of his conscience when he started out today to assure the house, with great seriousness and gravity, that the idea of a delaying action or of preventing discussion in the house was far from his innocent thoughts. Well, there are in the house, perhaps, some in reference to whose simplicity of thought the house could be naive; but I think the Minister of National Health and Welfare, before he hopes to convince the house that this consideration was absent from the minds of the government, will need to buttress his arguments much more than with a statement such as he made today.

As did the prices committee which sat two years ago, we have on this occasion the problem of interim reports. As one who went through the anguish of sitting on that committee and wasting four and a half months on a task which, before the committee ever began its deliberations, was doomed to uselessness, I well remember that some of us on the committee held the belief that we were in a position from time to time to say something worth while to the house, and wanted to make an interim report. As a matter of fact the prime minister of that day had said in February of 1948, before the committee was appointed, that it could bring in an interim report. But there was a dominating government majority on the committee, and every time we made the suggestion that an interim report be made to the house, that proposal was rejected by the majority on the committee.

I submit, sir, that if this committee is appointed, with no expansion of its powers or its status, the house will not receive from it an interim report which the house could discuss, and will not get a report until the end of the session, I suspect, on the eve of prorogation.

I do not need to reiterate what I have said about recommendations. I might touch again upon the fact that the committee of two years ago was told all the way through that it did not have powers to make recommendations. That attitude on the part of the government was reflected through its spokesman, the Minister of National Health and Welfare, as chairman of that committee, all the way through—"no recommendations", because the committee was not given power by the house to make recommendations for which we of the official opposition had asked.

Do you remember what happened? I, for one, will never forget it. I will never forget that at a sitting of that committee in executive session—oh, what a euphonious title, "executive session"!—at a private meeting, where the public was not admitted and the press were not admitted things were done and perpetrated that the government would not have dared to permit to happen in the committee, if it had been held in public. The draft report the committee considered from ten o'clock in the morning until late at night—

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Beaudoin): Order. I think I have given the hon. member sufficient latitude in his attempt to set out the similarity between the committee then set up and the one indicated in the resolution. I believe I should now ask him to come back to a discussion of this committee, and to speak about it rather than the one which sat two years ago.

Mr. Fleming: Mr. Speaker, I am sure you will be relieved to hear that I am nearly finished with this subject, but may I say that I prefaced what I had to say by drawing parallels between this committee and its terms of reference, and the committee of two years ago and its terms of reference. You will remember that it was the minister himself who, by way of interjection in my remarks, introduced in this debate a reference to the committee of two years ago on the question of the power to make recommendations. With great respect to you and your ruling, Mr. Speaker, I submit I am entitled to deal with a subject raised by the minister.

On the question of recommendations I want to point out to you, Mr. Speaker, that we were told all the way through that the reference to the committee of two years ago did not include on its face the power to make recommendations, and that therefore it did not have the power to do so. I know that the minister is going to tell me that the committee made recommendations, and I want to answer that by telling him that though the committee sat all day in executive session, there were not any recommendations before it, and an adjournment was proposed at eleven o'clock. The majority of the members went out for a five-minute recess, came back about three-quarters of an hour later, and after midnight the committee was handed a whole group of fourteen recommendations all ready made, just as neatly done up as any cute little package you ever saw. I do not wish to see the present proposed committee treated in the same way as the committee of two years ago because of the fact that there is no power to make recommendations given to the committee in the terms of reference under debate today. I do not want members of the proposed committee to be told all the way through their sittings that they have not the power to make recommendations when some of those who may be members of it may desire at some stage to make recommendations to the house. I do not want to see the committee told then that we have not the power to make recommendations, and then have the government majority in the last hour of the sittings of the committee bring in a whole list of recommendations handed to them in a neat package by the government. If the government has any recommendations to make to the house, then I submit that now is the time and this is the place to make them.

There is one matter that I think deserves more than a passing reference. The subject of old age pensions is not a new one in the house.

Mr. Dickey: It was introduced in the house in 1926 by the Liberal party.

Mr. Fleming: That is about as far as the Liberal party has ever progressed with old age pensions.

Mr. Knowles: Under pressure.

Mr. Fleming: From that day to this anything that has been done so far as old age pensions are concerned while a Liberal government has been in office has been done by a house that went about the task of prodding the government. It has been just like drawing teeth to try to induce them to take some action.

Mr. Maybank: Is prodding like drawing?

Mr. Fleming: As a matter of fact we have had to resort to almost every honourable means at our disposal to flay the government into taking some action. As everyone knows, it has been an uphill battle in the face of the needs of many people who were not getting enough to live on decently in past years. Of course the government would not take action. It was the same old story. I repeat for the benefit of the hon. member for Halifax (Mr. Dickey) that every action that has been taken since 1926, in the direction of providing a better system or a less inadequate allowance, has been taken—

Mr. Dickey: By a Liberal government.

Mr. Fleming: —as the result of insistent prodding and effort on the part of the opposition to rouse a government that showed itself unwilling and reluctant to take action to meet the needs of our old people. This government has always been away behind public opinion on this question. Having regard to the position of the parties, I would have thought that was perfectly clear.

I shall leave the parties to my left to speak for themselves, but when the minister talks so airily, as he did today, about the other parties, I want to say that, so far as the Progressive Conservative party is concerned, it made its position clear long ago with reference to old age pensions. That position had been made clear before the national convention of the party held in Ottawa in 1948, but at that time it was made a plank of first importance in the platform of the party, a plank adopted by the unanimous vote of all delegates at the convention, in these words:

> The Progressive Conservative party proposes a "contributory social security program", available to every Canadian irrespective of occupation to include the following benefits:
> 1. Retirement pensions at 65 without a means test;
> 2. Accident, sickness and disability benefits;
> 3. Health insurance—to include adequate medical and hospital care;
> 4. Extended unemployment insurance benefits—to include payment for time lost due to accidents or sickness.
> 5. Similar benefits on a non-contributory basis for "unemployables".
> This "contributory social security program" will be established in collaboration with and be administered by the provinces. Enabling legislation will be enacted with permissive power to the provinces to adopt the plan, thus avoiding the necessity of constitutional amendment or immediate over-all dominion-provincial agreement. Until the contributory plan becomes fully operative the dominion will pay 75 per cent of a retirement pension of not less than $40 per month.

That is the verbatim statement appearing in the platform of the Progressive Conservative party which was adopted by unanimous vote at that great national convention. The views of the Progressive Conservative party on this subject are these. We believe that the present old age pension system is entirely inadequate, outworn, and the time is long past when it must be replaced by a national contributory pension plan. The features of the plan that we propose are:

1. The plan shall be national in scope. It is to include every Canadian irrespective of occupation.

2. The plan shall be contributory. It will in effect be a savings plan.

3. It will provide a pension, not charity. The pensioner will be entitled to it as of right.

4. It will be paid on a retirement basis, that is to say, it will be designed to enable everyone to live in decency in advanced years.

5. It will be payable at age sixty-five. The present age limit of seventy debars many who are in need.

6. There will be no means test. This objectionable test has often penalized the thrifty, created unfair discrimination in the treatment of elderly Canadians, and has resulted in officious intrusion into the private affairs of good citizens. It must be eliminated in favour of a contributory scheme.

7. The plan will require joint dominion-provincial participation in view of the requirements of the Canadian constitution. The provinces under the constitution must administer it, but the dominion ought to bear most of the governments' share of the cost.

I say that such a plan is urgently needed. The present old age pension system has many shortcomings. One of its worst features is the means test. The amount paid is not adequate. At the present time the pension is not acquired by the recipient as of right; it is not, in fact, a pension at all, but a charitable allowance based on necessity. We should have something better than this in Canada. Canada should have had a national contributory pension plan long before this. The need of it is seen more clearly today than ever before. The public are impatiently waiting for it.

A new and very strong argument has lately appeared in its favour. The inauguration of a national contributory pension plan will help to prevent industrial unrest. Adequate provision for retirement in advanced years is one of the avowed objectives of organized labour. A national contributory pension plan can make a major contribution to industrial peace, and thereby to the creation of wealth through the one possible source of new wealth, namely, production.

It is quite obvious, I think, as we look over the record of the government, that there has been too much toying with this problem by the government in the past. What we need today in Canada is a resolute, well balanced approach to the problem of social security; and we need a comprehensive plan. Parliament's approach in the past has been bedevilled by piecemeal politics practised by this government. The time has come for bold and resolute action. Canada wants a national contributory pension plan.

I am left to wonder just what really is the government's position today. One gathers that the program or platform or policy of the government in reference to old age pensions is simply to appoint a committee. That is all we learned from the minister's speech this afternoon, except a great many negative arguments which, if they were accepted, would lead us to throw up our hands in despair and say nothing could be done.

The minister and two other members of parliament were invited to contribute articles to the Canadian railway employees' magazine of February of this year setting forth their views on the subject of old age pensions; and as interpreted by the minister we find that the policy of the Liberal party is to appoint a committee. That is the extent of government policy today to meet the needs of the situation and satisfy the requirements of many elderly people in this country who are suffering hardship now and who will continue to suffer while this committee is sitting.

There is one thing we of the Progressive Conservative party always take pains to say in reference to questions of social security. Today the minister spoke of the cost. Certainly the party of which I have the honour to be a member has a very responsible approach to this question of social security. What we say as to the needs of the situation carries with it our statement as to the means by which those needs may be met. We say and have always said that social security measures do cost money. The source from which the cost of those measures must be met is the national income. Therefore if we are going to be able to afford the measures of social security the people of this country desire it will be necessary that those policies be followed which will contribute most to the enlargement of the national income. There is no other source of wealth than production. There is no other means by which the cost of social security measures may be met than the national income, represented by national production. Therefore we say and have always said that the system which promises most in the way of social security for the people, the system which will produce the highest national income, is this system of free competitive enterprise which we have so stoutly supported.

The Minister has sought to arrogate unto himself a great deal of credit for alleged action taken by parliament at the request of the government in connection with the tardy measures of improvement introduced in this house in 1947 and 1949. He makes this becomingly modest statement at page 69 of the magazine to which I have just referred:

> It has been my privilege over the past three years to get the approval of parliament—

That sounds as though this crusader was just wringing out of an unwilling parliament these needed measures of improvement for the benefit of the aged pensioners, when as everyone knows the situation has been exactly the reverse. Actually the opposition were prodding the minister and government to do something, and had waited a very long time for this delayed action on the part of the government. But in his modest way the minister said:

> It has been my privilege over the past three years to get the approval of parliament to increase pensions, relax income ceilings and lower the age of eligibility for the blind—increasing the number of pensioners by one-third and more than doubling the payments.

That is worthy of a thought or two. I have said something in general about the people who stirred this government to action after it had shown great reluctance and tardiness; but I wish to be a little more specific now. The minister speaks about relaxing the income ceilings. It is true that there was some relaxation of the income ceiling by chapter 67 of the statutes of 1947. But what about the amendment of 1949, which the minister introduced with a great hurrah and much fanfare, on the eve of the election? I submit that if it had not been for the fact that we were on the eve of an election, and if it had not been for the action of my leader in demanding that the government really get down to business on the resolution it had on the order paper, we would not have had that amendment put through at that time.

Let us look at what happened in 1949. With much fanfare the minister introduced amendments which had the effect of increasing the basic pension, to which this government would contribute 75 per cent, from $30 per month to $40 per month. He was asked in the house, and quite properly, "What are you going to do about the allowable income of these pensioners from other sources?" Of course the minister just passed that over; that was one of those embarrassing questions, and he did not have time to deal with embarrassing questions at that time.

What about the situation now, when we have the minister claiming great credit for what he calls the relaxation of income ceilings? What is this generous income ceiling? The fact of the matter is that since the amendment of April, 1949, a person receiving old age pension is not entitled to any greater aggregate income, including pension, than he was previously. Today he is allowed the handsome sum of $120 a year, or $10 a month apart from the pension. If he gets one copper over that it comes off his pension of $40 a month; and that is the minister's idea of liberality. He spoke today of the liberality of the present system. What about married people? They are permitted an aggregate income, including pension, under this act of $1,080 per annum. No change was made in that total when the increase was made from $30 to $40 in April of 1949. What is the position of a married couple receiving old age pensions? Well, $40 a month each for two people is $960 a year, and they are allowed a total income of $1,080, so there we have the princely allowance of $120 other income per year for two people. In other words, those two people are permitted to receive an additional $120 a year or $10 a month between them; but if they make a copper over that the minister has what satisfaction he can get out of seeing that a corresponding deduction is made from the basic pension of $40 a month.

In the face of that situation the minister has the temerity to put in print a statement in which he speaks of the credit due him for relaxing the income ceilings!

Then let us come to another of these boastings by the minister. He speaks about lowering the eligible age for the blind. Who is entitled to credit for that? In 1947 this government brought in an amendment to the act under which they proposed that the age of blind pensioners should be reduced to forty years. My then leader, Mr. John Bracken, rose in the house and in one of the best speeches to be heard here in a long time challenged the government to do the sensible thing and reduce that age to twenty-one instead of forty. It was his effort that drove the government, before that debate ended, to reduce the pensionable age from forty to twenty-one, as we find it in the Old Age Pensions Act today. Forty was the age the government thought suitable when the amendment was introduced in 1947. I say to you, sir, that the full credit for that change goes to the opposition.

When one looks at this vast majority to your right and to your left, sir, one would have thought that, if the government was looking for ample support before taking action, with 193 members they must by this time have mustered enough strength to warrant their showing a little bit of courage in grappling with this problem. How many more members are they going to need, Mr. Speaker, before they screw their courage up to the point where they will take action to meet the needs of the situation? If 193 members are not enough, then it is utterly impossible for any person to look hopefully for any action whatever from this inactive and reluctant government.

What is their position? I have suggested it is difficult to find the government's position. We do know that their policy is to appoint a parliamentary committee, and apparently that is all the policy they now have in this field of old age pensions. Yet, I recall that the Minister of National Health and Welfare made this statement in a speech in Kitchener on March 27, 1949, as recorded in a Canadian Press dispatch:

> The Liberal government program is now directed toward giving the national contributory old age pensions and a national health program.

Well, how about it? How about some action, Mr. Speaker? Let us have less talk and more action on the part of the government towards bringing about that promised national contributory old age pension system. If the government meant business when the minister made that statement in March, 1949, why all the obstacles that the minister plastered on the record during his speech today?

Then, of course, there is a speech made by the Prime Minister. The Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Martin) has not indicated to us as yet just when it was that the Prime Minister made that speech in Vancouver, but it may have been on that tour the Prime Minister took through the west during the Easter adjournment last year. At that time, he put his toes in to feel how warm or how cold the election water might be. While the Prime Minister was on the same tour, he made a speech in Edmonton which was not read today by the Minister of National Health and Welfare, but which is recorded in a reliable newspaper, the Toronto Telegram. The press report was written by a highly respected member of the press gallery, who accompanied the Prime Minister on that tour. The article reads as follows:

> "Most people do feel that a basic pension of $30 a month isn't worth, in purchasing power at the present, what the pension was worth before the last increase," he said.
> The basic pension policy of the government is directed towards a contributory system without a means test, he added, but that end can't be achieved until some way is found to assess the contributions. He foresaw no difficulty in getting an amendment to the British North America Act to permit the setting up of a national system of contributory old age pensions.

Let me just interject: If he saw no difficulty in getting that amendment, why on earth was it not obtained long before this, to bring about a national contributory old age pension system?

Then the article continues:

> The more attractive the present pension becomes, however, the greater difficulty of preparing the public mind for acceptance of the contributory plan, Mr. St. Laurent said.
>
> To delay increases in old age pensions until a contributory system is worked out might be unfair to present pensioners and to those about to qualify for them, Mr. St. Laurent added.
>
> To pay pensions under the present plan without a means test would take another $200 million a year from the federal treasury, something not practicable if the people want reduced taxes. The inauguration of a contributory system depended not so much on parliament as on public opinion.
> A national contributory system of old age pensions and social services generally would make all Canadians equal, said Mr. St. Laurent. A Canadian might move about from one province to another without having to consider whether he would gain more in these benefits than he would lose. As national unemployment insurance, made possible by the consent of the provinces, had increased the mobility of Canada's labour force, so would a national social security system make Canadians freer generally.

I am convinced that the Prime Minister was right in saying that there would be no difficulty in securing whatever was required, either in the way of provincial co-operation or by means of an amendment to the British North America Act, to make the inauguration of a national contributory pension plan possible. Other government officials are on record on this subject. The minister of welfare in the province of Ontario, the Hon. W. A. Goodfellow, said in September of 1948 that he urged the immediate establishment of a nation-wide contributory system of old age pensions. He gave detailed reasons why that system would remedy the serious difficulties that exist under the present system.

Before I leave this subject, I have one final quotation from a speech made by the Prime Minister in Ottawa on December 16, 1948, which reads as follows:

> The Liberal aim is a contributory scheme in which everyone can pay in something during his working years to help provide security for his old age.

Now, sir, if that is the policy and program of this government, then I say to this government and to the house, there is no excuse whatever that will justify continued delay and inaction on the part of the government. No more information is required; no more delay is justified. What is required at this time, having regard to the needs of the people of Canada, and what is demanded by the members of this house who are alive to the needs of the people, what will be required of this government having regard to the promises made by it and many of its followers who were elected in June, 1949, is action—immediate and resolute action, to bring about that co-operation with the provinces which the government itself admits will be easily obtained, and to inaugurate a national contributory old age pension plan.

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, during the eight years I have been in this house, I have listened to a great many fine speeches. In fact, a number of those speeches have been the sort that could lead one to believe that a new heaven and a new earth was just around the corner. I think of the speeches that were made by the prime minister during the war years, when we were told that the government was planning then for a better world after the war. I think of the speech made by the minister of reconstruction and supply (Mr. Howe), as he then was, in April, 1945, in which he outlined the government's post-war employment policies. I think of the speeches we have had from time to time about housing. I think of the important speech delivered by the former prime minister in May of 1948, with respect to health matters. I think now of the speeches we have heard before, and the speech we heard today from the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Martin) about old age security. All of them have been fine speeches, phrased in such a way that press reports could give the country the impression something wonderful would happen very soon. We are still waiting for that new world; we are still waiting for the implementation of those employment proposals; we are still waiting for adequate housing; we are still waiting for health insurance; and we are still waiting for adequate old age pensions in this country. Having listened closely to the speech of the minister and having thought about it since he made it, my candid opinion is that it is in the same category with the others. It was nice to listen to; he gave some interesting quotations to which I shall refer; but it does not envisage any early action on this problem of old age security.

I think the minister started off on the wrong foot. In the first few minutes of his speech, I take it in an attempt to give the impression that it was a good idea to set up a committee on old age pensions and that action would follow, he said, if I heard him correctly, that there have been committees on old age pensions on two other occasions, one in 1908 and the other in 1924. The minister said that immediately following the committee in 1908 something happened, the old age annuities act was brought in, and he said that the committee of 1924 led to the introduction of the Old Age Pensions Act in 1926 and its enactment in 1927. I assume the minister knows that those were not the only two committees on old age pensions.

[Mr. Fleming.]

Mr. Martin: Two others.

Mr. Knowles: There was a motion for one made in 1907 which was withdrawn. There was the committee of 1908; there were committees in 1912, 1913, 1921, 1924 and 1925. The minister told us about only two committees. As for claiming that the committee of 1908 had anything to do with the inauguration of government annuities, I should like to read this paragraph about that committee, taken from a later report. It reads:

> On the 10th February, 1908, a select committee of nine was appointed. The chairman had made arrangements with Messrs. Blue, Acland and King for certain information to be supplied to the committee. Professor Adam Shortt and two other eminent sociologists had been communicated with who were expected to give valuable evidence, but after three sittings had been held it was found impossible, owing to morning sessions of the house having begun, to reconvene the committee. No report was presented to the house, other than a verbal statement made by the chairman on the 10th of July, ten days before the Old Age Annuities Act, 1908, was assented to by the Governor General.

A report was made on July 10, and second reading of the bill—I remember this very well because it was the day I was born—was on June 18, 1908. The point is that that committee was not responsible for the annuities act. The reason I mention that is to deflate, and I feel a job of deflation should be done, the inference made by the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Martin) that the setting up of committees produces results. We have had a great many more committees than the two he mentioned and it has taken a long time and a great many committees to bring results of any kind.

In addition to the committees I have mentioned there was a committee on social security in 1943 and a committee on reconstruction and rehabilitation which went into these matters as well in 1944. I submit that the record is not very good so far as this parliament is concerned as to the effectiveness of committees on social security. They pile up a lot of information that can be used for debate on the floor of the house and I should admit that they help to educate our people in the whole field of social security, but they are not vehicles for bringing about action.

In connection with the setting up of committees, I think it should be emphasized, as it was by the previous speaker, that when committees are asked for from this side of the house to go into various matters the government spokesmen take an opposite attitude. On October 12, 1949, when a motion was made by the hon. member for Eglinton (Mr. Fleming) for the setting up of a standing committee on social security, housing and related matters, the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Claxton) opposed it vigorously.

The minister pointed out that it would be a case of cutting across the whole theory of responsible government, that you could not have policies made, particularly where they involved the expenditure of money, by committees representing all parties. The minister said that policies have to be brought before the house by the government which is responsible to parliament and in turn responsible to the people. The minister went into the matter at some length. He is an expert on this question because at one time he wrote an article in a magazine in which he took the other side of the question. Having changed his mind, and he has stated that change of mind several times on the floor of the house, he opposed the committee idea again on November 3 and November 18, 1949, when the leader of the opposition (Mr. Drew) was asking for a committee on defence.

That is the position the government takes. I agree that we have responsible government. At times we have tried to get into the heads of the ministers what that means. We had quite a battle with the Minister of Justice (Mr. Garson) last fall as to what responsibility on the part of the government meant. But at the moment I am talking of this in relation to committees of this house. Committees can make studies; committees can bring out information and disseminate it among members of parliament and in turn throughout the country; but they are not vehicles for getting action. The only way to get action is for the government, which is responsible to parliament and in turn to the people, to bring its policies before this House of Commons in the form of legislation.

I regret very much that the Minister of National Health and Welfare has today done the very thing that the Minister of National Defence on October 12, 1949, said should not be done, for he failed to state the government's views on the matter and simply said that the whole question will be referred to a committee.

I should like to indicate the nature of the minister's speech. He put a number of opinions on the record and by asking rhetorical questions, the answers to which were supposed to be obvious, he hinted at his own opinions on one or two points. He quoted the speech of the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) in Vancouver on April 14, 1949. He commented on the situation with respect to the plans in the United States. He lined up four different plans which might be assessed by the committee. As a result of all these words that were uttered, I have no doubt that the newspaper reports will give the people of Canada the impression that something is coming out of this committee. But the minister on behalf of the government did not pinpoint any one of those propositions and say, "We are going to bring in legislation to implement this policy or this point of view." The whole matter has been left to the committee, which in turn has no legislative power. As the Minister of National Defence said last fall, "What is the use of having a committee unless it can make recommendations, and what is the use of a committee making recommendations if they have to be approved, first of all, by the government?"

I submit that it was the responsibility of the minister today not just to give us this interesting discourse on the subject of old age security but rather to tell us what the government intends to do by way of legislation at this session.

Mr. Ferrie: What about Ontario and Quebec?

Mr. Knowles: The hon. member for Mackenzie is again making references to the provinces and perhaps I might as well deal with that right now. I was going to deal with that later, but it is just as well to do it at this time because the Minister of National Health and Welfare said that he hoped that we could get rid of the means test but it depended upon making necessary arrangements with the provinces. If I heard him correctly there was a somewhat similar reference in the quotation he gave from the speech of the Prime Minister in Vancouver last April.

May I remind the government and the hon. member for Mackenzie that that sort of argument figured largely in the discussions back in the middle twenties when old age pensions were being considered in this House of Commons. At that time there were the same objections raised to old age pensions that are being voiced today against a better old age pension. One of them was the constitutional argument and another was that you had to consult the provinces. Another was the financial problem. Another one was the supposedly high moral consideration that the hon. member for Winnipeg South (Mr. Mutch) is now advocating, namely, that we have to consider whether this kind of thing is good for the people as a whole.

Mr. Blackmore: Anything for an excuse.

Mr. Knowles: As I say, back in the middle twenties one of these committees, I think it was the committee of 1925, collected reports from the various provinces as to their attitude toward instituting old age pensions at all. In addition they got an opinion from the Department of Justice, and I want my hon. friend, the hon. member for Mackenzie (Mr. Ferrie) and the Minister of National Health and Welfare—I assume the minister is fully aware of this—to realize that the opinions of the provinces, and the opinion of the Department of Justice at that time, looked liked hurdles that could not be got over. The provinces in their replies to the queries sent out from Ottawa ranged from lukewarm to cool—in fact, to cold—toward the whole idea.

I will not take the time to read them all, but here is an interesting one. This was a reply under date of November 19, 1924, from the Hon. Mr. Gardiner, who was then the minister of labour and industries in the province of Saskatchewan. Listen to this. I am reading from the Journals of the House of Commons of 1925 at page 456:

> The government of Saskatchewan is of opinion that an old age pension scheme for Canada can best be adopted by the federal government alone.

That was the young Jimmy Gardiner of November, 1924. I continue:

> There would seem to be so much difficulty in the way of providing any scheme that would be suitable to all the nine provinces of Canada as to make it almost impossible, and it will be readily understood that if any number of the provinces were to remain out, it would be almost impossible to adopt any scheme that would not subject those provinces within the arrangement to considerable expense that should rightfully be borne by those outside the scheme.

Listen to this last sentence:

> While we are disposed to think that an old age pension scheme should be undertaken, the difficulties in the way of the suggested scheme appear almost, if not entirely, insurmountable.

As a matter of fact that is not the most negative of the replies of the various provincial governments. In addition to that, the committee of 1925 got a ruling from the Department of Justice, which was to the effect that in the view of the Department of Justice the whole question of pensions lay with the provinces, and the federal government could not institute any old age pension plan if it involved the federal government trying to obligate individuals within the provinces to make contributions toward it. That same ruling from the Department of Justice admitted that the federal government could go in for the paying of old age pensions—and the assumption is that they could pay them out of the general tax revenues—but they made it clear at that time that any attempt to obligate individuals to pay directly for old age pensions would be unconstitutional. I do not know that there has ever been a court ruling on the matter. All we have that is stated officially, so far as I know, is this opinion of the Department of Justice, but at any rate it has stayed there ever since. I was thinking when the hon. member for Eglinton (Mr. Fleming) was speaking about the possibility that we might have to call the officials of the Department of Justice before the committee and get their opinion on this, that old rule of stare decisis that we heard so much about last fall might stand in the way of our getting any other ruling than the one given twenty-five years ago.

What I want to say is this. In addition to the opposition of the provinces toward the federal government in 1925 and 1926 going ahead with old age pensions, in addition to the adverse opinion of the Department of Justice, there was a strong and spirited opposition to the measure on the floor of this house from the official opposition, the Conservative party of that day. I hold in my hand some quotations. Here is one from Mr. Bennett—

Mr. Fleming: Can't you let him rest in peace?

Mr. Knowles: —of March 26, 1926, which will be found at page 1971 of Hansard:

> The members severally—

Mr. Bennett was referring to the members of the committee of that day.

> The members severally were of the opinion that there should be no old age pension legislation by this parliament unless the various provinces had agreed and had arrived at a conclusion with respect to it, and as the correspondence indicated that they were not agreed, and as the minister stated this afternoon there has been no further correspondence, therefore it follows that this parliament should not proceed with this matter at this time, and, Mr. Speaker, I do venture to plead with my friends opposite not to urge the government to proceed with it at this time.

Mr. Stevens also took part in the debate. My time is going by, therefore I will not read all of these quotations.

Mr. Martin: Who was the speaker the hon. member just quoted?

Mr. Knowles: Mr. Bennett. I started to say that I have a quotation from Mr. Stevens who was here at the time, and who urged that the legislation of 1926 be not proceeded with until, as the hon. member for Mackenzie says, the government had seen the provinces. What did Mr. King say after Mr. Stevens asked him not to proceed with the legislation? On March 26, 1926, as recorded at page 1979 of Hansard the following appears:

> Mr. Stevens: Therefore would it not be better to have the conference prior to the passing of this legislation?
> Mr. Mackenzie King: I think my hon. friend, if he looks into his heart of hearts,—

That is quite a phrase.

> —will agree with me when I say that if we are in a position to put before representatives of the provinces a plan which has been drafted and carefully considered, and an act passed by this parliament, and to invite the attention of the provinces to what may be essential in the way of amendment to it or its relation to their own legislation, a measure of co-operation can be obtained that would not be possible if the provinces were simply brought together without any concrete legislation before them for consideration.

Later in the same session, on April 15, 1926, as recorded at page 2487 of Hansard, Mr. King said:

In reference to the answers from the nine provinces, which the hon. gentleman has just read, I might say that those very replies convinced the government of the futility of ever having an old age pension scheme enacted by correspondence with the provinces. We concluded that the best way would be to enact concrete legislation. We thought that was the only way we could get anywhere.

I submit, Mr. Speaker, that if the government of 1926 had listened to the objections of the provinces, had listened to the ruling of the Department of Justice, had listened to the protest of the official opposition, that act would not have been passed that year, and who knows whether we would have had the beginnings of old age pensions on the statute books yet. But no, the government of the day—under pressure, to be sure—felt that it was necessary to act, not just to consult, nor just to hold conferences, not just to study, and so they put the act on the statute books. Well, that act, as most hon. members know, was defeated in the other place. The hon. gentlemen over there seemed to agree with the idea of pensions for themselves, but they voted down the first old age pension act. To complete the record I must say that it was the Conservative majority over there that killed the first old age pension bill. What did the then prime minister do? He made it an issue in the election campaign of that year, and said that if he came back to power he would put that act back on the statute books. In the next session it was put on the statute books, and the leader of the Conservative party at that time got up in the House of Commons and said that they were in favour of the measure.

I submit, Mr. Speaker, that what happened in that case was that the government went over the objections of the provinces, the objection of the Department of Justice, the objection of the official opposition, to the highest court in this land, to the people themselves. The people said they wanted that legislation, and when the next parliament met the legislation was put on the statute books.

I submit that is the way the government should be acting now, not finding all possible ways and means to stall; rather, legislation should be brought in at this very session.

I have criticized the minister for not pinning himself or the government down to anything concrete. I would have to criticize the hon. member for Eglinton on the same score. He says that what this house wants is not a committee, but resolute action, and he stated the general position of his party as being one in favour of a national contributory old age pension plan. But I did not hear him tell the minister what he thought should be put into legislative form and brought before parliament at this session. Since I have criticized both of the previous speakers for that shortcoming, I must try and state clearly and without evasion what I think should be done; I must and will state the view of the party I represent on this matter.

In what I am about to say, I am going to have to use a word that I wish to define a little more fully. I refer to the word "contributory". But, bearing in mind the fact that I am going to define it, may I say that we believe in and advocate an over-all social security system on a contributory basis. But let it be clear that we support the contributory idea only in relation to an over-all plan. Anything piecemeal would have to be non-contributory. By "over-all" we mean a social security system which includes old age and retirement pensions, unemployment insurance, health insurance, sickness benefits, pensions for invalids, family allowances—everything that is necessary to provide real social security in the modern sense.

That is what we advocate. It is set out clearly in the platform we have circulated throughout the country, and it is toward that end this party is working. We recognize that a program of that extent will have to be attained by a few stages. Having admitted that, the next thing for me to do is to state clearly what I think the first stage should be. That is what I wanted the minister to do this afternoon; and I am sorry also that my hon. friend to my right failed to do it.

What do we say should be the first stage? As I said on Monday in another debate, we say—and I repeat it now—that the first thing to do is to get rid of the means test. I believe there is real significance in the way public sentiment has welled up against the means test the past few years. No one would now stand up and defend it. The idea of saying to people who have saved a little, who have got their own homes together, who have paid taxes and helped contribute to the wealth of the country, that, whereas others in destitute circumstances can qualify, those people cannot qualify for the old age pension—that just does not make sense at all. I insist that these thousands of cards which are coming to this building these days represent a very sound opinion; and I hope that even the hon. member for Winnipeg South (Mr. Mutch) will credit the people who are sending them in with holding very honest convictions that the time has come to do away with the means test.

Mr. Mutch: The hon. member for Winnipeg South seems to have got under your skin. Make your own speech.

Mr. Knowles: I have not heard anything so amusing for a long time as the speech made yesterday by the hon. member for Winnipeg South.

Mr. Mutch: I am getting along very well with the people in south Winnipeg.

Mr. Knowles: It is interesting to note that the press seemed to get the point which he was trying to get over.

I have said that we say the first hurdle to get over is the removal of the means test. Liberal members in the house who have been embarrassed by the fact that they voted against our amendment on September 19, 1949, to do away with the means test, are trying to get themselves off the hook by saying that they favour the abolition of the means test along with the introduction of a contributory system. In other words they are taking that good word "contributory" out of our program of over-all social security, taking it completely out of its context, and trying to put over on the people of this country something which is, if I may quote a couple of words from my home town friend across the way, a snare and a delusion.

Proof of what I am saying was given by something the minister said in his speech today. If I heard him correctly, he said that only ten per cent of the older people in the United States are receiving retirement allowances on the basis of contributory schemes now in effect in that country. He said that in addition to that small percentage there were a great many people drawing pensions from public assistance schemes such as we have in Canada. But the point I make, and which he substantiated, is that when you start with the contributory idea, as related only to the old age pension, you leave unsolved the major problem, namely the problem of universality, the problem of getting the pension to everyone, as of right.

There are a lot of things which could be said about the program of social security in the United States; but their major fault is their lack of universality. They made the mistake of going in for the contributory element first, rather than for getting rid of the means test first.

The thing that concerns me, and the reason that perhaps I get worked up about it, is that I fear from what the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) said in the house on February 20, and from what is being said by Liberal party members about this whole question, that the government is going to be under pressure to get started on a partial system, a system which is contributory and without a means test, but which would cover only a limited number of people.

Bear in mind the difficulty we have had getting unemployment insurance applied to all the people of the country. Bear in mind the difficulty the government has in collecting income tax from all the people of the country. And when you think of those problems, any body of officials who are instructed to work out a contributory system are going to balk at the idea of trying to work it out so that it will collect from everyone in the country.

The kind of pressure that is being put on today, to my way of thinking, is likely to result in the drafting of a scheme which is only partial in coverage, but which takes the heat off government members of the House of Commons, because it will solve the problem for some of the Canadian people. I urge the minister most strenuously to resist any pressure from members of his party or others in the cabinet to start off on that foot. Let us start the right way, by taking off the means test and by making the pension completely universal.

Mr. Ferrie: May I ask a question. You say you represent your party, and you talk about the means test. Why have they carried out the means test in your party in Saskatchewan?

Mr. Knowles: Apparently the hon. member did not listen to the quotation I gave a moment ago, referring to the present Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) when he was a minister in the Saskatchewan government.

Mr. Ferrie: That has not anything to do with it.

Mr. Knowles: It certainly has. The Minister of Agriculture knew when he was in the provincial field that this sort of thing could not be carried out provincially, and that the only possible way to carry out a universal old age pension would be on a federal basis. Not only did the Minister of Agriculture know it in 1924, when he was a minister in Saskatchewan, but he knew it in 1945 when, as a member of the federal government, he was party to a proposal for a universal old age pension in Canada that was to be paid for and administered one hundred per cent by the federal government.

There is nothing embarrassing about the question the hon. member for Mackenzie has asked—

Mr. Ferrie: You see—

Mr. Knowles: Just a moment—for the fact of the matter is that it is only at the federal level where there is control over the economy of Canada, and it is only at the federal level where there is unlimited power in the raising of taxation and other revenue. That is the only place where a complete social security program can be totally financed.

That, if I may say so, is one of the things which I dislike and deplore about the kind of talk that is going on and the kind of things the hon. member for Mackenzie is saying. If any legislation which is recommended by this committee is still on a dominion-provincial basis, then we will not have solved the problem, and we will not have complete social security.

Mr. Cote (Verdun-La Salle): What about British Columbia?

Mr. Speaker: It being six o'clock I do now leave the chair.

An hon. Member: What about Alberta?

Mr. Knowles: We live in Canada; don't you?

At six o'clock the house took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

PRIVATE BILLS

PRAIRIE TRANSMISSION LINES LIMITED

The house resumed, from Friday, March 3, consideration of the motion of Mr. Benidickson for the second reading of Bill No. 9, to incorporate Prairie Transmission Lines Limited.

Mr. D. S. Harkness (Calgary East): Mr. Speaker, a week ago, when I spoke for a few minutes on this bill, I indicated that my opposition to its passage is on the same grounds on which I opposed it last year, namely, that the route to be followed is not indicated. As a matter of fact all indications are that the company intend to build the major portion of the pipe line through the United States if they can secure the necessary permits and permission. I think this is abundantly shown by the fact that the company in its original application for a charter set out the route it was going to follow. On November 22, 1949, during the discussion of this bill, I read their application into the record, and it is to be found at page 2094 of Hansard for that date. I will not take the time to read the application again, except to refer to that part of it which deals with the route and reads as follows:

> . . . commencing at a point in the general Calgary area in the province of Alberta and thence to a point in the vicinity of Blairmore in the said province and thence to a point in the vicinity of Kingsgate in the province of British Columbia and thence to the United States of America, leaving Canada at a point at or near Kingsgate in the said province of British Columbia and re-entering Canada in the vicinity of Blaine in the state of Washington and proceeding north to Vancouver area in the province of British Columbia . . .

The company indicated the route clearly at the time they made their original application, and evidently they were then under the impression that they needed to specify it although subsequently, as I have said, it was not included in the bill which was submitted to us. In addition to that fact, the sponsor of the bill in introducing it a week ago today indicated that the company still wished to build the pipe line via this route. At the same time he said that the company was willing to build it wholly in Canada if they were forced to do so. He went on to speak of the Board of Transport Commissioners for Canada, the Alberta government and the Minister of Trade and Commerce from whom it would be necessary to secure permits before the company could build the line.

I think that establishes the point that the company will build the route through the United States unless they are forced to build it in Canada. From the first my contention has been that the primary step necessary to make sure that the route is constructed in Canada is for it to be specified in the bill which the house will pass, and that it should not pass unless an all-Canadian route is specified therein. I should like to refer to some remarks which the sponsor made when he introduced the bill a week ago. At page 445 of Hansard for March 3, 1950, he said:

> It is of primary importance, however, to see that the interests of Canada are protected in connection with this project.

On the next page there are these words:

> Now, Mr. Speaker, what are the interests of Canada in this matter? I suggest that the primary requirement is to see that potential Canadian consumers are provided for before any gas is exported.

I agree thoroughly with those statements, but all along my contention has been that the interests of Canada can only be served if the route is an all-Canadian one. To begin with, it seems perfectly obvious that the requirement which the sponsor of the bill has laid down, namely, that potential Canadian consumers should be provided for before any gas is exported, can only be met if the pipe line is constructed so as to serve the maximum number of Canadian consumers. There is no question that an all-Canadian route is going to bring gas to far more Canadian communities and thus far more Canadian people than one the major portion of whose length is on the United States side of the border.

In addition to that, once the gas leaves Canada and enters the United States it passes beyond our control, and whatever the needs of the people of the United States may be in regard to gas they are going to be met before any of it is shipped back to Canada to serve the needs of Canadians. Following that, the sponsor of the bill argued that the cost of gas to consumers in British Columbia will be less if the route runs through the United States than if it is an all-Canadian route because the line will be shorter. That argument will only stand up if you assume that the gas to be sent through the pipe line is going to come from the Pincher Creek gas field in the southwest corner of Alberta. As a matter of fact the probability is that the major source of gas for export will be from fields considerably farther north in the Edmonton area. By the "Edmonton area" I mean the big perimeter around the city and the area to the north of that. If the major portion of the gas comes from those areas, then a route entirely on Canadian soil from there to Vancouver will be shorter than a route through the United States.

There is another point that enters into our consideration of the matter. Various people who have investigated the piping of gas from Alberta to Winnipeg are on record as saying that the best field for them to draw from so as to have the shortest and cheapest pipe line is the Pincher Creek field. If the pipe line is constructed through the United States it will draw off the major portion of the gas from that field, and it will probably be impossible for another pipe line to be built from there to serve Winnipeg and the cities in between.

During the past month a gas hearing has been going on in Calgary. It has to do with the application of the Westcoast Transmission Company for permission to build an all-Canadian pipe line to the west coast. In the course of the inquiry before the Alberta natural gas and oil conservation board, as I believe it is called, some interesting figures were brought out. I have here an article from the Calgary Albertan of February 2 of this year which gives some of this information. I should like to put it on record, in order to indicate the comparative costs as between a Canadian and a United States route for a pipe line, as far as consumers of gas in Vancouver and other points in British Columbia are concerned. The article is headed, "$14 million annually from Canadian route" and it reads:

> Transportation costs of gas by the all-Canadian route would put an annual $14,500,000 into Canadian pockets, it was revealed in Thursday's gas hearings.
> On the previous day it had been shown that out of $114 million of construction costs, $95 million would be spent in Canada.
>
> The total transportation costs of the gas, which after the fifth year would run around sixty billion cubic feet annually, would in a large part accrue to Canadian pockets in American dollars, it was evident from the Thursday testimony of William B. Poor, maintenance engineer on the staff of Ford, Bacon and Davis, U.S. engineering firm with headquarters in New York.
> Mr. Poor estimated the average transportation cost for the first five years of the line would run about $17 million a year. Some $14,500,000 would be spent in Canada and $2,500,000 in the States from the international boundary to Portland.
>
> It had already been revealed that three-quarters of the gas exported would be consumed in the States. Therefore the great bulk of the transportation costs would be payable on the Canadian side of the border in American funds.
>
> It was obvious that if the line were constructed through the States with Vancouver at the tail end, the great bulk of the transportation costs would never reach Canada but would be paid to an American affiliate company with headquarters in the U.S.A.
>
> The annual amount, it appeared, would be considerably increased when the line swung into full steam operation from the fifth year forward.
> Transportation costs for gas sold in British Columbia would total 29·2 cents per thousand cubic feet. This would be made up of 5·9 cents per thousand cubic feet gathering costs in Alberta, and 23·3 cents transportation costs from Edmonton to Vancouver.
> The U.S. would pay the total of 29·2 cents per thousand cubic feet plus 6·4 cents per thousand additional transportation costs from the border to U.S. points. This would amount to 35·6 cents per thousand cubic feet, compared with Vancouver's 29·2 cents. About three-quarters of the gas would cross the border for U.S. consumption, and costs on the Canadian line would be payable in American dollars.

That summary of the proceedings at the gas hearings in Calgary brings out very clearly, I think, the advantages to Vancouver and other British Columbia points of having the line run entirely in Canada. It indicates that the delivered price of gas to them would be between 5 and 6 cents less than the delivered price to the United States cities immediately to the south. What that would mean from the competitive point of view, with respect to the cost of manufacturing for companies using gas for that purpose, is quite obvious. It would mean that plants in Vancouver and other British Columbia points would be at a decided advantage as compared with similar plants in the United States. If on the other hand the line ran through the United States, with a stub up to Vancouver, exactly the opposite situation would prevail. The cost of gas in Vancouver would be 5 or 6 cents higher than in the United States cities to the south, with the result that people using gas for manufacturing purposes would be at a distinct disadvantage. The same thing, of course, would apply to people using gas in their homes for heating and cooking.

Those facts which were brought out at the gas hearing, and reported in this dispatch, in themselves should be sufficient to persuade almost everyone in British Columbia that this should be an all-Canadian route; and it seems to me that if these facts were appreciated by the members of this house they also would be persuaded that the route should be all-Canadian.

Now I should like to turn to another phase of this matter. There is no question but that a gas pipe line from Alberta to the west coast will be a natural monopoly. Only one pipe line will be built; there is only a sufficient market for one line to justify the very high expenditure involved. Since that is the situation, and since it has now developed that there is sufficient gas to justify the construction of such a line—or at least assuming that to be the case—the main consideration facing us is where the pipe line should run, what should be its route in order to bring the maximum benefit to Alberta, to British Columbia and to Canada as a whole. It seems to me that is really the only important point we have to consider in connection with this or the other pipe line bill now before the house. These bills call for the incorporation of companies; but if we are to exercise any influence in relation to this extremely important matter of where the pipe line will run, our only opportunity to do so is before any charter is granted.

With regard to the best set-up as far as Alberta, British Columbia and Canada are concerned, I do not think there is any doubt but that it would consist of two things, first a gas-gathering system in Alberta, and second a pipe line to take out to the Pacific coast the gas so gathered. The gas-gathering system in Alberta of course would consist of pipe lines linking up the gas fields in the south with the field at Pincher Creek, then on to Turner valley and Jumping Pound west of Calgary, then on up to Edmonton, linking the numerous gas fields east and north of Edmonton, and then north again to the Peace river country in both Alberta and British Columbia. No matter where the pipe line may be built, I think there is no doubt but that a gas-gathering system of that sort will come into existence. The only question in that connection may be the extent of the gathering system.

The second main requirement is the pipe line to carry that gas to the market on the Pacific coast. It might run from anywhere along the length of that gathering system; but my contention is that, other things being equal, the farther north that pipe line runs the greater will be the advantage to us in Canada, for the reason particularly that the farther north it runs the more new country it will open up for development, not only in the way of drilling oil and gas wells, but also the building of roads, railways, and the opening up of the area for agricultural purposes.

At the last session, I believe I made two or three speeches on this subject. At that time I outlined, as did various other people, the advantages of an all-Canadian route. These are so obvious that I think anyone who studies the subject is bound to be convinced that such a route is a must, so far as we are concerned. However, I should like to summarize those reasons. Some of them I have repeated tonight, so I will not expand upon those.

The first of these advantages is that a Canadian route will give the maximum number of Canadians a supply of natural gas; that is quite obvious. There is no question but that the more Canadian communities the line goes through, the more opportunities there are going to be to develop industries along that route, and the more people will be able to heat their houses and do their cooking with this cheap fuel. Second, control of the gas would remain in Canada until Canadian needs were satisfied. I have dealt with that question to some extent tonight. Third, more Canadian employment will result from the construction and maintenance of the pipe line, if the Canadian route is chosen. At the same time, more Canadian employment will be provided through the manufacture of pipe and fittings, things of that sort, in Canada. At a time such as this, when a considerable amount of unemployment has developed in this country, and when there is fear as to what the employment situation may become, it seems to me that any project which is going to increase the amount of employment in this country should be given the greatest consideration.

It is, of course, quite obvious that if three-quarters of the length of this pipe line is built in the United States, it is going to be built by American labour; the maintenance crews that keep the pipe line running afterwards are going to be American. All that employment will go to people in the United States, and not to Canadians. If the line is built in Canada, somewhere between two and three thousand Canadians will be given employment during the construction period which will cover two or three years. Then, the people who are required to maintain the line will have jobs indefinitely. In the same way, if three-quarters of the length of this pipe line is built in the United States, the pipe used in the construction of it, the various fittings and compressor stations, will all be manufactured in United States plants.

The fourth advantage is that more new country will be opened up by the building of this line in Canada. As a result, some stimulus will be given to new drilling. One way in which that will be done will be by the amount of road construction which will be necessary, and this will open up new areas. As a result, people will be able to get into places where they cannot get at the present time. The story of the search for oil is also to some extent the story of the search for gas. If a pipe line runs close to a certain area which it is possible to develop as an oil-producing area, even if oil is not found in large quantities but gas is discovered, a considerable amount of drilling will result in such areas. When there is no market for the gas, or no market to which the gas can be taken, such areas are left undeveloped.

The fifth point I should like to make is that the Canadian route will mean that the cost to the Canadian consumer in British Columbia will be less than if the route were built in the United States. I have already dealt with that point, so I will not enlarge upon it.

The sixth point is this: The competitive position of the manufacturers using gas will be advantageous as compared with the same type of manufacturer in the United States coast cities. I have dealt with that point tonight, too.

Number 7: More American dollars will be earned by having a Canadian route. I believe that point was dealt with in the article which I read from the Albertan. It indicated that with the Canadian route some $14,500,000 in American funds would be earned in transportation costs. With a route chiefly in the United States, you would probably have a proportion of approximately $3 million in United States currency for transportation costs, and the remainder of the transportation costs would be paid in the United States. The advantage of receiving that amount of United States dollars, considering our present trade situation and the adverse balance with the United States, is important in itself.

The eighth point I should like to make is that it will be a distinct advantage from the defence point of view to have the line in Canada. The construction of wartime factories in the mountains, which could make use of a source of cheap power of this kind, might be a distinct advantage. Certainly it is a considerable advantage to have that cheap and vital type of fuel available in the interior of our country, rather than having to depend upon other fuels for our power. This applies particularly, of course, to inland British Columbia points, such as Kamloops, Trail and so on.

I should like now to say something about another point. Last year, and again this session, speakers have been arguing that we should pass this bill, and that the route is none of our business. They say that is a matter for the board of transport commissioners, for the Alberta government, and for the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe). We have not anything to do with it. All we have to do is grant a charter or not grant a charter.

I think nothing could be farther from the truth. In matters of this sort, the members of parliament have a responsibility to see that no charter is granted which may be used to dissipate Canadian resources, or which would result in action being taken which would be injurious to the various parts of this country. In this case, I am referring particularly to British Columbia. It seems to me that as members of this house we must decide whether the route should be indicated in the bill. It is not possible to move an amendment to that effect at this time; if it were I would do so. It is also our responsibility to decide whether the route of the pipe line should be Canadian.

Some hon. members have said that they will vote for second reading in order to get this bill into committee so that the matter of route and other things may be discussed in detail. In view of what has been indicated so far this year, and in view of what was indicated last session by the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe), I have no doubt that the bill will be pushed through. If the bill should go to committee I am sure that the information given to hon. members will be along the lines I have indicated and will show clearly that all the advantages are with the Canadian route. If hon. members are not satisfied with the information they are given, if a Canadian route is not specified, then I hope they will oppose the bill if it should come back to this house for third reading.

Mr. A. F. Macdonald (Edmonton East): Mr. Speaker, as the member for Edmonton East, which constituency is located in the midst of the most productive oil fields in the province of Alberta, I rise to express my concern that a small minority in this house should attempt to delay the business of the country. This minority is controlling our right to vote on the question we are now discussing. This minority is not allowing us to proceed with public bills and private members' resolutions which I believe are most important to this country. I submit that hon. members of this house should now be permitted to register their opinion on this matter, and I move, seconded by the hon. member for Jasper-Edson (Mr. Welbourn):

That the question be now put.

Mr. G. R. Pearkes (Nanaimo): Mr. Speaker, at the last session of parliament the Prime Minister of Canada (Mr. St. Laurent) felt it desirable to allot extra time for the discussion of a bill similar to the one now before us because of the importance of that bill to the people of Canada. For an hon. member to get up and suggest that it is not in the best interests of democracy that all phases of this bill should be discussed is simply preposterous.

I spoke on a similar bill last session because I believed that if the pipe line was routed through Canada it would be advantageous to that part of the country which I represent. I felt that it would be advantageous to Canada as a whole to have the pipe line routed solely through Canada. I am not going to repeat the arguments I advanced at the last session, but I do submit that we should look at this proposal from a broad national point of view rather than to consider only the advantages which might accrue to our particular constituencies.

In his closing remarks the hon. member for Calgary East (Mr. Harkness) referred to the importance from a national defence point of view of routing this pipe line through Canada. I want to enlarge upon that because I believe it to be of prime importance from a defence point of view that the line should be routed through Canada. It was mentioned that industries might be located along the line and that certain military establishments might be constructed or maintained in the mountains at points in the vicinity of the pipe line where they could get cheap power.

Before I deal with that particular point may I say that I think it is well for this house to realize the position of our defences on the Pacific coast. I spoke about this at the last session when I referred to the gap in our defences which exists along the Pacific coast from the United States boundary between British Columbia and the northwestern states to the boundary between British Columbia and Alaska. Nothing has been done since last session to fill that gap. In fact the situation has deteriorated.

Last year the Royal Canadian Navy had on the Pacific coast a cruiser which was considered to be an operational vessel. Toward the latter part of last session we were informed by the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Claxton) that that cruiser was to be turned into a training ship. There are no submarine hunting units on the Pacific coast such as there are on the Atlantic where they have the carrier Magnificent and certain frigates which would be available for the hunting of submarines which might lurk in those waters should there be another war. Within the last few months there have been reports from United States sources that unknown submarines have been off the shores of British Columbia and the western states. On the Pacific coast we have no vessel of the Royal Canadian Navy that can hope to cope with the new submarines that we know other powers possess. That is merely one phase of it. Only a few months ago, when answering questions which were prompted by the Mainguy report, the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Claxton) made it quite clear that in his estimation the defences on the Pacific coast had to play second fiddle to the defences on the Atlantic seaboard. Even questions such as a laundry, which was one of the very minor points brought out in the Mainguy report, which the naval authorities at Esquimalt had been asking for for years, was turned down because other places had a higher order of priority.

Only today I received a copy of the Victoria Colonist, dated March 4, in which I find an editorial deploring the fact that there is no air force headquarters at Victoria.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. The remarks of the hon. member are not relevant to the pipe line bill.

Mr. Pearkes: Mr. Speaker, my endeavour now is to show how weak our defences are on the Pacific coast, which emphasizes the supreme importance of the moving from the vicinity of the coast, and the coast cities, some of the manufacturing establishments that are there. After removing them where are they to go unless they are to go where they can get cheap power? And if the cheap power is to be sent east of the Rockies and south of the international border, then there is no place to which these industries can be moved.

I do emphasize the point that the air defences of the Pacific coast are amazingly weak. Year after year those who have been connected with the R.C.A.F. in Victoria have been pleading for an auxiliary squadron to be established, or for a headquarters from which the training of air force personnel might proceed. As this editorial says—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I would ask the hon. member to confine his remarks to the principle of the bill.

Mr. Graydon: He is right on the beam.

Mr. Fulton: Mr. Speaker, I would remind you that natural gas is a very hard element to confine.

Mr. Pearkes: If you so rule, Mr. Speaker, I will not refer to the headquarters which the air force personnel wish to have established in Victoria, except to mention a letter that I received today from the Minister of National Defence in which he said that the matter will be kept under review along with other requirements, and that construction will not be proceeded with until such time as a number of other needs of greater priority have been met. I should like to emphasize the words "of greater priority". Quite obviously the Minister of National Defence feels that there are other places where defence votes should be spent first before they are spent on the Pacific coast. One might almost come to the conclusion that British Columbia is to be written off as expendable, should there be a third war, so deplorable are the defences on our coast. That only brings out in greater emphasis the importance of moving from such metropolitan centres as Vancouver, Burnaby and New Westminster these manufacturing establishments which are being maintained there, and which will be so vulnerable in the event of a hostile attack on the Pacific coast.

All up the Fraser valley, all up the two trans-continental railway lines, up the valley of the Thompson river, there are many opportunities to decentralize the industries that are now collected around Vancouver and are so vulnerable to the possibility of attack.

Some years before the last war, plans were made to select a point where reserves of stores and ammunition might be collected. The most central point that was found was in the area of the city of Kamloops. Army, navy and air force stores have been established there. I am not going into the nature of the stores. Let it be sufficient to say that they are of immense importance to the defence not only of British Columbia but of the whole of Canada. These stores have to be maintained. Certain of that equipment has to be maintained at constant temperature. Certain of that equipment requires repair facilities, machines and so on which are required to do the necessary repair work. It requires power to carry out those tasks. That is only one centre. It is a logical centre because the two trans-continental railways go through there, and so will the trans-Canada highway. There are other highways leading up to the north country, going from Ashcroft up to Cariboo, up to Prince George and perhaps on from there ultimately connecting up with the Peace river block and on up to the Alaska highway. There is also the possibility of a road being constructed following the line of the Canadian National railway.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I am sorry to interrupt the hon. member. The debate is not on highways or on railways; it is on pipe lines. I would ask the hon. member to confine his remarks to the principle of the bill.

Mr. Pearkes: In order that this pipe line be constructed, it is essential that there shall be a railway and a road. I cannot conceive of a pipe line being constructed without either a railway or a road on which to bring the material to that pipe line. I would point out that those facilities do exist on the Canadian National railways running from Edmonton, through the Thompson valley to Kamloops, along which there is a road at least partially constructed. I am sure that road would have to be improved.

From all the reports one reads in the newspapers I do not believe the trans-Canada highway is to follow that route. Only last week I received a copy of the Edmonton Journal, I believe it was, which went to considerable lengths in advocating that the trans-Canada highway be built through the Yellowhead pass. I do not imagine that that route is to be constructed as part of the highway. However, there is no earthly reason why a second route should not be constructed along there which would—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. The principle of the bill is not the construction of roads or highways, but rather the construction of a pipe line.

Mr. Pearkes: I apologize if in the point I am trying to make I have become a little involved, but I have been prompted to speak by the observations of the hon. member for Edmonton East (Mr. Macdonald), and I had not prepared my speech in advance.

The point I am trying to emphasize is that while that area may not be served by the trans-Canada highway, either it will have to be served by a highway before the construction of the pipe line is completed or else a highway will have to be constructed and maintained after the pipe line has been laid, so that there will be an alternative route.

That is a matter of immense importance so far as the defence of this country is concerned, because at the present time there is no highway striking northeast from Kamloops up toward Edmonton. One has to go around the Big Bend, through the Rockies, through Banff national park, or in to Calgary and thence up to Edmonton. This would shorten the route tremendously.

So the very construction of this pipe line, with its attendant road, would be of value not only from the point of view of national defence but also from that of opening up that country. I hope therefore that before final consideration is given to the bill, however indifferently I may have presented my argument, these serious points may be considered. There is a Canadian aspect to be considered, and the defence point of view which is affected by and dependent upon the route selected for this pipe line.

If British Columbia is to be liquidated, if British Columbia is to be considered as expendable, if the government is going to adopt in that province a scorched-earth policy, then by all means put the pipe line east of the Rockies and run it across into the United States. But, please, tell the people of British Columbia that you want to wash your hands of them, and perhaps they might even then consider that the Rockies would provide a good defence.

Some hon. Members: Carried.

Mr. Clarence Gillis (Cape Breton South): Mr. Speaker, it is not my intention to delay the passage of this measure. Perhaps I would not be on my feet now were it not for the amendment moved. Perhaps the hon. member felt that by offering the amendment he would expedite matters. I would advise him however that the amendment gives everyone who has spoken the chance to speak again.

Mr. Cruickshank: Hear, hear—and we will, too.

Mr. Gillis: It merely throws a monkey-wrench into the matter. I am not particularly anxious to accept that kind of measure.

Mr. Smith (Calgary West): It is part of a pattern.

Mr. Gillis: In the House of Commons there is sufficient latitude for the consideration of any matter, and I do not like anyone to inject these methods into debate. In many organizations throughout Canada high priests have grown up, and this is the kind of method we find them adopting. They receive their orders from the head table, and carry out those orders. But we want to keep clear of that in the House of Commons.

I am interested in the principle of the bill. Thus far the discussion has been between Alberta and British Columbia, Alberta apparently wishing to sell oil and wanting a pipe line built as quickly as possible, and British Columbia, on the other hand, saying that it should be an all-Canadian route. There may be some selfishess in both arguments, but I am with the British Columbia group in their desire to have this an all-Canadian route.

With all due respect to the hon. member who presented the bill, he told us that it would go to a committee, that they want to get a franchise and want to build a pipe line. That is as far as he could go. But what happens after these pipe lines receive their franchise? We have already put five bills similar to this one through the House of Commons. On those occasions we were told that the building of these pipe lines was going to create a lot of employment in Canada for Canadians, that factories in Canada would be turning out pipes—hundreds of thousands of tons—and that Canadians would be working on them.

Well, the Saskatoon Star-Phoenix states that 78,000 tons of pipe required to build the line from Alberta to Wisconsin is being imported from the United States into Canada. Those who sponsored the bill at that time, when they said it would provide work for Canadians and keep our factories and steel plants going, believed that.

Mr. Robinson: On a question of privilege, I think I sponsored the bill to which the hon. member has referred, and I made no such remark.

Mr. Gillis: There were five of those bills, and a lot of speeches were made.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order.

Mr. Green: Adjourn the debate.

Mr. Gillis: I move the adjournment of the debate, Mr. Speaker.

Motion agreed to and debate adjourned.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The hour reserved for private and public bills having expired, the house will resume the business that was interrupted at six o'clock.

OLD AGE SECURITY

APPOINTMENT OF JOINT COMMITTEE TO STUDY LEGISLATION, ALTERNATIVE METHODS, ETC.

The house resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Martin:

That a joint committee of both houses of parliament be appointed to examine and study the operation and effects of existing legislation of the parliament of Canada and of the several provincial legislatures with respect to old age security; similar legislation in other countries; possible alternative measures of old age security for Canada, with or without a means test for beneficiaries, including plans based on contributory insurance principles; the probable cost thereof and possible methods of providing therefor; the constitutional and financial adjustments, if any, required for the effective operations of such plans and other related matters:

That 28 members of the House of Commons, to be designated by the house at a later date, be members of the joint committee on the part of this house, and that standing order 65 of the House of Commons be suspended in relation thereto;

That the committee have power to appoint, from among its members, such subcommittees as may be deemed advisable or necessary; to call for persons, papers and records; to sit while the house is sitting, and to report from time to time;

That the committee have power to print such papers and evidence from day to day as may be ordered by the committee for the use of the committee and of parliament, and that standing order 64 of the House of Commons be suspended in relation thereto;

And that a message be sent to the Senate requesting that house to unite with this house for the above purpose and to select, if the Senate deems advisable, some of its members to act on the proposed joint committee.

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Mr. Speaker, I wish to draw together the remarks I was making before six o'clock in reference to this motion for the setting up of a committee on old age security.

I had pointed out that we in the C.C.F. believe in and advocate a program of over-all social security. We believe that the program should protect Canadians against all the exigencies over which they have no control, and that it should include health insurance, sickness benefits, unemployment insurance and the like, with an emphasis, in the light of the motion before us, on proper old age security. I said before, but I wish to emphasize it now, that when a social security program is an over-all program we believe it should be on a contributory basis. I want to make it equally clear that we do not support the contributory idea for any piecemeal one point plan such as seems to draw support from many sections of the house. I think the remarks of the minister this afternoon should be qualified on that point. He included us with those supporting a contributory system, without stating the qualification I have indicated. We do support a contributory over-all system but when you talk about one point coverage we feel that to put any such piecemeal proposal on a contributory basis would be "a snare, a delusion and a fraud," if I may again quote the hon. member on the other side.

I have stated that, Mr. Speaker, as a summary of our basic position, the ideal towards which we are working, and towards which we believe this country should strive. Before us at the present time, however, is a motion that does not deal with over-all social security. It deals with only one phase, namely, old age security. The motion envisages only the setting up of a committee, but if I can anticipate that it might involve some legislative changes after the committee has done its work, at the most it envisages a change by way of perhaps one step with respect to one phase of social security. In concrete and practical terms the question that is actually before parliament at this time is this. What is the next step to be taken in the field of old age security? I said on Monday of this week, and again before six o'clock this afternoon, that we feel the first step to be taken is the removal of the means test from the present old age pension.

Mr. Larson: Would the hon. member permit a question?

Mr. Knowles: I permitted so many interjections before six o'clock that my time is just about up. If you will ask me your question just as I sit down I will be glad to answer it. Don't forget to do so.

[Mr. Deputy Speaker.]

Mr. Larson: I will ask it.

Mr. Knowles: Mr. Speaker, I have already said that I think there is real significance in the thousands of petitions we are receiving these days which emphasize the need for removing the means test from the old age pension. I think it is also significant that in the memorandum presented to the federal government yesterday by the Trades and Labour Congress of Canada the section having to do with old age pensions asked for a number of changes, but the first point was that the means test should be abolished. The point I am driving home as strongly as I can—and let me repeat it—is that at best there is before us the possibility of some one change being made in the field of social security, indeed one change in the field of old age security. I insist that the first change to be made should not be the introduction of the contributory feature, thus getting into the difficulties that they have got into in the United States. The first hurdle to overcome is to get rid of the means test, thus making old age pensions in Canada universally payable to all of our citizens as a matter of right.

Since that is the situation at the present time, one of the things that I dislike about the wording of the motion now before us is that it does not give to the committee that it is proposed to set up the right or authority to discuss or study the possibility of the immediate removal of the means test from the present old age pension. Hon. members know that the terms of reference of a motion setting up a committee are very important. They become the constitution which restricts the activities of the committee. Please note that the committee is to have the right to study the operation and effects of existing legislation. Then it is to have the right to study possible alternative measures of old age security for Canada, with or without a means test for beneficiaries, including plans based on contributory insurance principles.

I submit that that clause is the heart of the motion. The rest of it refers to the right to study the probable cost, the constitutional changes that may be necessary, financial problems and so on, but the heart of the motion is in the words that the committee is to have the right to study possible alternative measures of old age security for Canada, with or without a means test for beneficiaries, including plans based on contributory insurance principles. Please note that what it gives the committee is the right to study other schemes altogether, not possible changes in the legislation now in effect. It does not give the committee the right to study the possibility of taking the one step which I insist is the first step to take, namely, the removal of the means test from the present old age pension. Therefore, Mr. Speaker, because of that serious shortcoming in the motion as it is before us—

Mr. Martin: The committee can study anything. This motion is very wide.

Mr. Knowles: Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Ferrie: Don't put a stumbling block in the way.

Mr. Knowles: The minister can make interjections and the hon. member for Mackenzie (Mr. Ferrie) can throw in his interruptions, but anybody who has been here for any length of time knows that a committee is limited by the terms of reference. Anyone who has been on committees knows that chairmen of committees see to it that the committee does not go beyond the terms of reference.

Mr. Martin: This does not limit anything, and you know it.

Mr. Knowles: Pardon?

Mr. Martin: Nothing is limited by this motion, and you know it.

Mr. Knowles: Mr. Speaker, it is extremely limiting. It limits study to possible alternative measures, and the emphasis with regard to possible alternative measures is on plans based on contributory insurance principles. Please note that—

Mr. Martin: Pure quibbling.

Mr. Knowles: —it does not provide for a discussion of the kind of contributory scheme that the minister referred to this afternoon when he quoted from what the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) said in Vancouver in April of 1949. The Prime Minister was not talking there about contributory insurance principles; he was talking about people paying in accordance with their ability to pay—in other words, on a basis built into the income tax structure—and drawing their benefits as of right rather than in relation to the amount paid in. On the other hand, the so-called contributory insurance principle is what the Prime Minister talked about on February 20 in this house when he said he favoured a direct contributory system, when he said it had to be a matter of contract, when he said he knew of no way in which you could get rid of the means test unless there was a contract on the basis of which the individual person had paid for his own pension.

I am glad that the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Martin) put on the record this afternoon the statement of the Prime Minister on April 14, 1949, in Vancouver so that it can be set against the statement the Prime Minister made on February 20, 1950. In fact I hope the statement put on the record today washes out what the Prime Minister said on February 20, and that we are through with that kind of approach.

I now wish to move the amendment I suggested a moment ago for the purpose of making absolutely sure that the committee will have the right to discuss the step that is most important in old age pension legislation in Canada at the present time, namely, the removal of the means test. Therefore I move, seconded by my colleague, the hon. member for Vancouver East (Mr. MacInnis):

That the motion be amended by inserting therein after the words "contributory insurance principles" the following words: "and also the possibility of the immediate removal of the means test from the present old age pension."

The Minister of National Health and Welfare has interjected that the committee can discuss anything. I have already argued with him on that point, but from the experience I have had I know I am right when I say that your terms of reference must include what you want to discuss for you cannot go beyond them. If, however, the minister means what he implied, namely, that it is all right for the committee to discuss the possibility of the immediate removal of the means test from the present old age pension, then let him accept this amendment so that the terms of reference of the committee will be quite clear.

Mr. Martin: Will you let me make an observation on that point right now? The resolution as drawn will permit the widest study of the question of old age security. The purpose of the amendment, I suggest with great respect, is not to clarify in any way what is already clear, but something else.

Mr. Knowles: Oh, no. The purpose of my amendment is very clear, even though the minister may try to suggest that there may be some untoward motives behind it. The fact of the matter is—and I think he will agree with me—that the question involved in this amendment is one that certainly has to be discussed at the present time. I hope he agrees with me that it is the most important step to be taken in the field of old age security; but I repeat, and there are plenty of members around me who know from experience how right I am, that when you get into a committee whose terms of reference are not broad enough, you are soon prohibited from discussing those matters which are not included.

Mr. Martin: You will not be prohibited.

Mr. Knowles: I suggest that the minister would render a far greater service to the cause of improving our old age pension legislation by accepting this amendment rather than by trying to suggest that I should not have moved it. If, as he argues, he favours the taking of forward steps in the field of old age security legislation, let us not find ourselves in the position when we get into committee of discovering that we have to stick to a discussion of alternative schemes, and with particular reference to plans based on contributory insurance at that. Even if the committee should bring in a report on that basis I suggest that nothing could be done in that connection at least until the conference next fall, and perhaps not even until the time of the next election. What we want, and what I have been arguing for throughout my remarks, is to have less of this general talk and something specific put before parliament at this session.

Mr. Ferrie: Let's go to work.

Mr. Knowles: For once I agree with my hon. friend. Let us go to work and get rid of the means test in connection with old age pensions at this session of parliament.

Mr. Ferrie: But you won't let anything go through the house.

Mr. Larson: In this year 1950, when everyone is social security minded, I should like to know how the hon. member reconciles the position taken by the socialist government in Saskatchewan, where they impose a means test on one of the smallest supplementary old age pensions in the country, and have the smallest mothers' allowance in the country, while the party in this house takes the position that we should remove the means test entirely.

Mr. Knowles: If I may answer that question, I have two things to say. In the first place, this afternoon I quoted from a statement made back in 1924 by the present Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner), who is my hon. friend's high priest, to the effect that provincial governments could not possibly participate in any old age pension scheme. The Minister of Agriculture knew in 1924, and so stated; and he knew in 1945, when he was a party to the proposals made to the dominion-provincial conference—

Some hon. Members: Answer the question.

Mr. Knowles: I have been asked a question; let me answer it. The minister knew that the only way you could pay for a universal old age pension without a means test was on a federal basis. Not only Saskatchewan; no province in this country could afford a universal old age pension without a means test.

[Mr. Knowles.]

Mr. McIlraith: Don't skate around; answer the question.

Mr. Knowles: Hon. members do not even seem to want an answer. The only government that can finance a universal old age pension without a means test is the federal government; and that applies to all provinces. The other answer to the question asked by the hon. member for Kindersley (Mr. Larson) is that the means test in effect in the province of Saskatchewan is the means test laid down in the federal old age pension regulations.

Mr. Ferrie: What about the mothers' allowance?

Mr. Knowles: Oh, go and get one.

Mr. E. G. Hansell (Macleod): Mr. Speaker, after this bit of by-play my contribution to this debate may appear to be a sort of anti-climax. Sitting in this corner as I do, surrounded by hon. gentlemen of socialist mentality, I must say that I sometimes feel like Daniel in the lions' den. I do believe the question just put to the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) was rather well taken. I agree with the hon. member that any over-all social service scheme perhaps would have to be on a federal basis; but the question asked was why a provincial government, which is also able to tax the people for revenue, should impose the means test for an extra $2.50 a month. That was the question, and it cannot be answered by saying it must be done on a national basis.

The answer is that the province of Saskatchewan is short of revenue; we may as well admit that. So are other provinces that cannot augment the present old age pension. There is no mystery about that. Saskatchewan is not as fortunate as some other provinces, which are able to collect higher revenues. British Columbia, I understand, has a sales tax. Saskatchewan had one and then took it off.

Mr. Stewart (Yorkton): Does the hon. member not know that Saskatchewan's revenues today are $55 million, the highest in its history, and that it still has the sales tax, which yesterday was increased by one cent?

Mr. Hansell: If that is so it is all right with me. I am not quarrelling with Saskatchewan; let them run their own business. All I am saying is that to use the argument that it must be done on a national basis is but to avoid the question of whether the means test must be imposed by Saskatchewan if the pension is to be increased by $2.50; so I say that answer is not well taken. However, I will let those hon. gentlemen fight it out between themselves.

Some of us have been sitting in this house for a long time, Mr. Speaker, and some of us on the opposition side have been waiting patiently for many years to have the government in office bring down some legislation that would eclipse in proportion what I have termed over the years as the miserly old age pension scheme we have today. Each election the Liberals go to the country saying, "Put us in and we will do something to better the lot of the aged." I have kept a record of the advertising that has been carried on for several past elections, dating back to 1935; and almost every election the same thing occurs.

Now, I am saying this for a purpose. The other day the member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) asked a question of the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Martin) concerning what might be done for the incurables. What was the answer? The minister's answer was that this subject is continually under review by the government. Of course, that is no answer. What is responsible government supposed to do but review things, and on the basis of their review bring down legislation? If the review had only occupied about six months, the answer might have some merit. Since the review must have been going on for the last ten years or more, I do not believe that sort of answer is good enough. Surely, if the government has been reviewing the question of old age pensions, even under a contributory scheme, they should be in a position today to bring down definite legislation covering their proposals and policies.

It is for this reason that some of us believe this motion to set up a committee becomes a sort of red herring drawn across the trail to attract attention, to make people believe we are about to do something, the only result being to delay the start of a better old age pension scheme. I am in agreement with some of those who have spoken today in saying that, if the government has been reviewing this question over a period of ten or fifteen years, they surely have the facts and figures before them. They must have these facts and figures in sufficient detail that, even though the committee is set up, they could not get them in any greater detail. If that is not so, then the government has failed in its attempt to adequately review the situation.

I am going to suggest to you, Mr. Speaker, that the reason for having this committee investigate the matter of old age pensions according to the terms of reference is that the government has reached the limit of its ability to tax the people of Canada. They say, "We know that if we are to bring in a better old age pension scheme, it is going to cost a tremendous amount of money." The next question is, where is the money to come from? The people cannot be taxed any more, and that is the government's problem. They say, "We shall go further and bring in a contributory scheme of old age pensions; by that means we will shift the burden from the general tax revenues, and place it upon the people who pay into a designated fund called the old age pension fund." What they are really saying is that they will not tax the whole nation in the sense it is being done today; they will not raise the taxes of the nation as would have to be done in order to bring in a better scheme. But the people will be taxed in another way. By adopting a contributory scheme, the people would have to pay into that fund, which of course is just another form of taxation. Then the government would argue that the more the people can put into this fund, the more they will be able to draw out. I suppose that might be logical.

I am not so confident as the minister seems to be that this will lead to progressive legislation. I believe it could be regarded as a way of escaping responsibility, because the government cannot put in a more elaborate scheme without raising taxation. This, therefore, is just a way of escape for responsible government, by bringing in a contributory scheme and shifting the burden of taxation from the ordinary revenue to the old age pension fund.

I do not know whether this question has occurred to the government, but I should like to ask what they consider the purpose of an economic system is. It seems to me that the purpose of an economic system is to give the highest standard of living and security that the production of the nation is able to obtain for the people; in other words, the goods and services the nation is able to produce and distribute. How does this government operate the economic system, or any other government that might replace it which would have the same monetary mentality? Under our present administration, the way it works is simply this: We reach a high capacity of production, and then when our people do not have the money to buy it we attempt to get rid of it in a series of ways, instead of devising a distributive system that would make it available. Surpluses continue to pile up, and unemployment becomes prevalent. We then have low incomes and unemployment in the midst of abundance. The government begins to sweat and stew about what it is going to do.

Then, of course, they look at our aged citizens with heads bowed in shame and say, "We are sorry; although there are plenty of the necessities of life, we cannot give you more than a pittance." That is the picture, and I do not think anyone will gainsay that picture. What is going to happen under the proposed contributory scheme if the financial policy is not changed? The old-line party thinkers will look at our aged people and say, "It is your own fault; here you are in the midst of abundance with no pension to draw upon. You did not contribute enough in the past." I believe that is what will be said. Not only is the government shifting the burden of taxation, but they intend to shift the responsibility.

Let me say this, that personally I do not think it takes any brains to run a government under a taxation system. Surely it does not take any brains to say, "We will do just what we are able to pay for and that will be counted in terms of how much we are able to get out of the taxpayer." It does not take any brains to work that out. Any schoolboy could figure that one. He goes downtown to buy some marbles or something and he says, "I can buy only the marbles for which I have money to pay." That is schoolboy stuff. It does not take any brains for a government to run a nation's business if they have the ability through legislation to stick a gun in the taxpayer's ribs and say, "Now, pay up; we need so much money to run the country." It does not take brains; it takes a little gall and political acumen to do it and still stay in office.

What is going to happen under a contributory scheme to those who cannot contribute? What is going to happen to those who have been transients in bygone years through no fault of their own? What is going to happen to those farmers who are on submarginal lands? Some of us know of these farmers who in days gone by lived on a starvation level. I am not one to paint harsh and dark pictures when there is no need, but we remember how in the thirties the farmers were coming to us. They were mortgaged to the hilt, prices were depressed, crops were not good and the mortgage companies were going to take their land. They came to us almost on bended knees and said, "Isn't there something you can do?" That was the reason the Aberhart administration brought in a moratorium on debt—simply to save the farmers.

It was not until war broke out and prices began to rise that the farmers were able to get out of debt and retain their farms. How are they going to contribute to a contributory scheme when there are no crops or prices are depressed?

Mr. Cote (Verdun-La Salle): Those are questions for the committee.

Mr. Fleming: Has not the government the answers yet?

[Mr. Hansell.]

Mr. Knowles: I thought we had responsible government.

Mr. Hansell: I hope that goes down in Hansard. I hope the parliamentary assistant to the Minister of Labour speaks with some authority because I have doubted that that committee would investigate the economic factors that this country has had to deal with over the years. If they do they will have to come to us who are Social Crediters for assistance. I do not want the minister or the parliamentary assistant to keep quiet now; I want them to stick out their necks just a little further.

It is all a matter of whether the government is willing to change its financial policy It should be willing to face the facts and say "We will change our financial policy if the suggested policy is sound and reasonable, if it will work; we will do it in order to bring about the operation of an economic system that will give our people security and contentment all their lives".

There is one sentence in this motion to set up a committee to which I should like to draw attention. This sentence in the terms of reference might go unnoticed if I did not mention it, and besides I intend to expand upon it. It says in the first paragraph that the committee is empowered to investigate the probable cost thereof and possible methods of providing therefor. I thank the minister for putting that in the motion. I believe he was conscientious when he did it. I am going to ask him to answer this question: Is it understood that the committee will call in various financial experts of the different schools of thought so that the committee can recommend changes in financial policy?

Mr. Knowles: The minister told me the committee could study anything.

Mr. Hansell: I want the minister to answer that question when he replies. The minister said in his speech that they were desirous of having the views of all parties. They will do this anyway, but let the Liberal party call in their financial experts. Let the Conservative party call in their financial experts.

An hon. Member: the same ones.

Mr. Hansell: Most likely they will be the same ones. If they are not, I am certain they will give the same advice. Let our socialist friends here call in their financial experts.

An hon. Member: They will be the same.

Mr. Hansell: I am inclined to think they will be the same also.

Mr. Knowles: They will be the intelligent ones.

Mr. MacInnis: Whom did Aberhart call in?

Mr. Hansell: Let the Social Crediters call in some of their financial experts.

An hon. Member: Douglas?

Mr. Cote (Verdun-La Salle): We want to conclude our business this year.

Mr. Hansell: I do not think they dare do that. If it is a matter of getting money the Social Credit experts will be the only ones able to give an answer.

Mr. Blackmore: I defy them to come out and debate it on the floor of the house.

Mr. Hansell: The minister said that he wanted to have the views of all parties and then he began to lay down the views of himself and the government as to monetary policy and then he said: There is no other way. If there is no other way, then why does the minister want the views of all the other parties?

An hon. Member: Why does he want a committee?

An hon. Member: He loves you all.

Mr. Hansell: When the minister said, "There is no other way," he said it with such emphasis that I thought he was speaking with the voice of the gods. When he looked around for a monetary explanation as the only way, I fancied that he would have gone to some other authority, some wizard of finance, some top man versed in monetary techniques. Perhaps he did, I do not know; but the best authority he could get was that great wizard of finance and monetary technique, the hon. member for Vancouver East (Mr. MacInnis). I have a great regard for my hon. friend from Vancouver; he has been here a long time. He has a good many years' experience behind him. He is an original thinker and a practical man in many ways. I have a high regard for him, but I do not think he would class himself as an exceptional wizard on economics and finance.

Mr. MacInnis: I have proved that I am not.

Mr. Hansell: I am happy to have my friend say that. The Minister of National Health and Welfare, who is sponsoring the resolution, quoted him, and then he said: "I believe that. That is my position. There is no other way; for money must come out of production."

Mr. Hatfield: Social Credit.

Mr. Hansell: We believe that money must come out of production. We Social Crediters believe that, but the interpretation as to how he should get it out of production is entirely different from ours. The hon. member for Eglinton (Mr. Fleming) also said the same thing. Of course he amplified his remarks a little bit. He said it has to come out of national income, and that of course if there were a Conservative party in power they would follow policies leading to the highest national income. But that was talk, because he did not say what policies they would pursue, and I am saying to him—

Mr. Knowles: That is a secret.

Mr. Fleming: Free enterprise.

Mr. Hansell: The hon. member interjects "free enterprise". I am an admirer of the hon. gentleman, as I admire the hon. member for Vancouver East. He says: "We would follow policies of free enterprise." So has the present government. When he tells us that, he must say what policies he would pursue that would raise the income any higher than the policies pursued at the present time have raised it. Then he says: "There is no source of money other than production."

Mr. Fleming: I did not say "money"; I said, no other sources of wealth than production. There is a difference between money and wealth.

Mr. Hansell: I will not engage my hon. friend in that at the moment because I fancy he is tying himself up now. I do not want to take an advantage of that kind. Let me ask this question, and let the minister answer it. If the only place you can get money is out of production, let him answer this. The war was fought out of our national production and not out of our national income, because there had to be an expansion and the creation of $4 billion during the war, and yet the war was fought out of production, not income.

I am not arguing against the axiom that money must come out of production. I am saying that our interpretation of that phrase is different from those advanced by other parties. Furthermore, let me ask the minister this. If he believes what he said, let me take him back to the period of the thirties just as an illustration, and it is apt to happen again. It is beginning to happen now. Here are goods piled sky high on the shelves of our warehouses, on the shelves of our department stores, and rotting on the ground. That is high production. And here are the citizens standing by looking on with empty pockets and unemployed. Here they are on relief, unemployed, with no money, and there is the production. Let him tell me how he is going to get money out of that production. There is the production. Does the government get money out of it? No, they do not do that. They destroy the production. Does that bring them money? In the United States they dye their potatoes blue. Does that bring them money? These are the questions I am asking these hon. gentlemen who say the only source of money is production. Let them answer that. If they cannot answer that, then they will never broaden the old age pension scheme and bring the security and contentment to our people that this wealthy productive country is able to give them.

Once again I am saying the only group in this house that can answer that question is the Social Credit group. There you have it. You have to tax or you have to get the money in some other way, shift the burden, contributory pensions. You have got to do it in that way or listen to us. It is either one thing or the other. You can turn a deaf ear to us if you want to. That is your responsibility.

Let me conclude by saying this. There is something about this resolution that I am disappointed in. I feel that there is a class of citizens that could very well be included in this resolution so that the committee without very much extra effort would try to investigate as to whether they could come under some sort of pension scheme. I refer to the incurables. There is a class of people that could not possibly come into any contributory pension scheme, because by reason of their physical condition they are not able to earn an income. I believe that that is one of our first responsibilities.

Without taking up any more time of the house I wish to move an amendment to the amendment that has already been moved. I move, seconded by the hon. member for Bow River (Mr. Johnston):

That the following words be added at the end of the first paragraph: "and to examine the possibility of granting pensions to incurables who are unable to earn a livelihood."

The Acting Speaker (Mr. Beaudoin): Perhaps I might refer hon. members to standing order 50. I would direct the attention of the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) and the hon. member for Macleod (Mr. Hansell) to that standing order, and would also suggest that they look up Hansard for May 17, 1929, page 2588, and also the Journals for 1945 at page 234.

Mr. David A. Croll (Spadina): Mr. Speaker, I am very pleased to see this resolution on the order paper. Before your comments, sir, I had thought that the subamendment offered by the hon. member for Macleod was one that had a good deal of merit, and which certainly would have received my support. I did gather from the amendment that there were by-elections in the offing, and that the hon. member had probably guessed that this was a good time for it.

The amendment would seem to indicate that, because from reading the resolution I gathered that it provided ample opportunity to discuss almost anything within its scope. In any event I am happy to see that now for the first time in twenty-five years we have an opportunity to deal with what I consider to be our foremost domestic problem, and one that has very great implications.

Here is an opportunity for a committee to make a comprehensive examination into the pension schemes in Canada today. Anyone who knows what we have by way of pensions in this country will surely agree with me when I say that our plans at the present time are not only unbalanced but overlap and, in some ways, compete. We have the federal and provincial old age plan, with the means test; we have the employer-initiated plans in this country; we have the union-negotiated plans. Along with that we have to some extent provincial supplements.

This resolution in my opinion gives us an opportunity to take stock, to see what we have done up until now, and to recommend what we ought to do in the future. As the minister pointed out, for twenty-three years we have been building a welfare state—and I emphasize the word "welfare". I conceive it to be the duty of a modern state to ensure the security and welfare of its citizens; and the desire for economic security in old age, in one form or another, is generally looked upon as one of the normal desires of enlightened human beings.

I am a believer in social security and I am a believer in the welfare state. I would remind hon. members, particularly those sitting on this side of the house, that we were the welfare-state party at the last election, and that the people endorsed us overwhelmingly. So I take this opportunity to do what I have wanted to do before, namely, to protest emphatically against statements made in this chamber or in the other place that by extending welfare by way of further social security we are making of Canadians a nation of leaners, that we are pampering them and coddling them, that we are making them soft and taking away from them their initiative.

I have heard that story twice in my generation. I remember hearing it in the thirties, when it was my responsibility from 1929 to 1939 to look after the welfare of people in Ontario, through the operations of various offices I held, particularly my provincial office. At that time it was my direct duty to look after their welfare—to feed them and to clothe them. I remember well that when we decided to increase the relief we were told we were making people soft. When we decided to make the allowances in cash rather than by chit we were told that the recipients would spend the money and use it for things other than food.

I remember these stories; but I also remember that there was a war in 1939, and that our enemies never looked upon Canadians as soft. No one ever suggested that we did not have the proper initiative to become the arsenal of democracy. And so when I hear this talk once again in my own generation I know exactly how it should be treated—because I do not believe that social security makes bums out of people. I do not believe that unemployment insurance makes bums out of the unemployed.

Is there anyone in Canada who believes that we were better off before we had old age pensions, unemployment insurance or family allowances? Does anyone suggest that the social legislation of the last three administrations has been bad for Canada, or that we have not been able to afford it, or that it is beyond our means?

I said it was a natural desire for everyone to want a measure of security. Our own personal security is threatened when we are in want, when we suffer from ill health or when we reach old age and are unable to work. That condition breeds instability, anxiety and fear—and fear is a very contagious thing.

I conceive that this resolution gives the committee an opportunity to make recommendations in keeping with the times, so that we may arrive at a new era of long-term security for the individual, and so that no one need have any fear of spending his declining years in poverty or disability.

There are in our society two groups who need our help most at the present time; they are the young, and they are the old. We must provide for each of them according to their needs, and compatibly with our ability. But we must not prefer one to the other.

Let me remind the house that there is no reversal in the security trend in the world. If there is any lesson we can learn from the British election, it is that all the parties and the people endorsed the social security measures which, by the way, are one generation in advance of ours. Remember that.

I agree with the minister that we must wait for the dominion-provincial conference. There are problems which must be solved—financial problems and constitutional problems. But we can be heartened by the last meeting which was held early in January, and which indicated to all of us that there were around the council table men of good will who meant to come to an agreement, and who know that they must come to an agreement. Because we now have upon us not only the old and the near old, but we have the industrial workers, we have management, and we have finance, all of whom are more united than they have ever been in their lives. They are converging upon us wanting leadership and action with respect to pensions, because the shoe is beginning to pinch a little for the industrialist and the financier.

The committee has a job of great magnitude and of tremendous scope to perform. It need not be concerned with constitutional and economic problems. But the matter of pensions is one of the great human problems with which we have to deal. It is true that we require a knowledge of the plans of other countries—a knowledge of all plans, both private and public. I agree with the speakers who have said that the committee must produce a national over-all retirement plan. I believe that plan must compare in scope, purpose and effect with the Archambault report which was a landmark for thoroughness in its own field.

Most of the objections that have been raised today by the opposition have carried the suggestion that we are stalling, that we are playing for time. I say to the house that if that were true I would be the first to protest. This is too important a matter for us to be stalling on it. I believe it was the hon. member for Eglinton (Mr. Fleming) who said that we have plenty of information available. How much do we know about pension plans in Canada? I should like to refer to the dominion bureau of statistics, an organization which ought to know. In their reference papers issued in December, 1949, they say:

> There is little information available on the cost and the adequacy of protection provided by employees' pension plans in Canadian industries.

Evidently the dominion bureau of statistics does not know all the answers as to the various pension plans in the Dominion of Canada. I conceive that the committee will make recommendations to provide adequately for the old by way of a retirement pension which will at the same time be a basis for industrial pensions. Any recommendation will have to be tailored to our future needs in an expanding economy, and it must cover every person in the country no matter where he finds himself.

How many pension plans are there in Canada? I think the house will be interested to know that at the present time there are 464. Of those 64 per cent, or 293, were established during the war. I call that to your attention particularly because it is an important aspect. Sixty-four per cent of our present operative plans came into effect during the war. Perhaps you know the reason. During the war years wages could not be raised but pensions could be granted. Employers wanted to hold their employees. Possibly other people were offering them more money, so employers provided for pensions. There was also such a thing as excess profits taxes and they were minimized by the provision of pensions. All the money they were paying out for pensions in the war years was deductible as it is now, except that at that time there was more of it. Therefore these pension plans grew. We have a responsibility with respect to them which I will point out later on.

Of these plans 455 were contributory and nine were non-contributory, and as to the 455 contributory plans all took advantage of the tax exemption which they were entitled to under the income tax law. I assure hon. members that the more thought you give to the pension problem the more complex and difficult it becomes. I confess that I do not know all the answers. I am not as fortunate as the hon. member for Macleod (Mr. Hansell) who seems to have many answers to the problem.

Mr. Blackmore: You have got a lot to learn from him yet.

Mr. Croll: There is one thing I do know. I know that the many-headed monster called the means test certainly must go as a result of any committee that we set up at this session of the house. I think it is far too late for anyone to attempt to bolster the means test by raising the question of permissive earnings or by saying that it is generous in many respects. It is more generous than some other plans, but it is just a question of which of two teeth that are hurting hurts more. Neither should be there.

I say to the minister that the means test has been discredited; its time has run out; but in any event people will not have any part of it any more. They have made up their minds on that point. I was very glad to see that the legislature of Manitoba passed a resolution on Tuesday of this week endorsing a contributory system and at the same time suggesting that the means test should be done away with. In the past our greatest opposition to doing away with the means test has come from industrialists and financiers, but there is a remarkable and rather interesting change. In the Globe and Mail of March 3 there is a report of a pension dispute in Windsor between the Ford Motor Company and the United Automobile Workers. They could not agree on the amount and the newspaper article says that they came down here to see the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Martin) in order to discuss the means test with him. There is one part of the article which is significant, and which reads:

> The delegation came here at the suggestion of the company, and were accompanied by Wallace Clark, personnel director of Ford Motor Company.

They are the people who want the means test removed, and they are just as emphatic about it as their workers. As a matter of fact, I have considerable information here that is rather enlightening. For instance, there is a report on the Bank of Nova Scotia monthly review in the Toronto Telegram of March 3, and in it are these words:

> It is widely felt that contributory schemes encourage self-respect, that the absence of a "means test" allows other forms of saving and removes the stigma of pauperism . . .

While I am on that subject I might as well let you have it all. May I refer now to an article in the Ottawa Journal of January 27 which reads in part:

> "A minimum needs" pension without a means test was suggested today by H. D. Burns, president of the Crown Life Insurance Company . . .

My object in reading these to you at this time is to indicate that those who are opposed to doing away with the means test are thinning out. The numbers in their ranks are becoming less and less, and now we find ourselves in the position where industrialists and financiers are advocating the taking away of the means test. Mind you, they may have a motive. I do not suggest that they have not a motive, but I am not concerned with their motives. I agree with them. Certainly it is going to be cheaper for them if we do away with the means test, but at the same time if we are serving the public what right have we to look for a motive? When you look around today it is difficult to find anyone who is in favour of the means test. The only answer you get is that we cannot afford it, that it is beyond our capacity. I was not here when old age pensions were first introduced, but I have read the record, and they said the same thing then. I certainly know they said it about family allowances, they have repeated it, and some of them are still repeating it despite the fact that family allowances are here, we require them, and we can afford them.

The usual thing that one hears is that we must have a contributory system. We say "contributory" quickly and glibly and it sounds very good; everybody seems to agree with you about it. But there is nothing magical about a contributory system. In the first place you have to consider how much a man can contribute. We say that a man should not spend more than 25 per cent of what he earns for housing and yet there are very few who can secure housing at that figure. We say that a man should not spend on food more than 25 per cent of what he earns, and yet there are very few who can purchase the food they need for that amount. We must not forget that we have to leave something in a man's envelope for him to take home. The word "contributory" means so many things to so many of us. If we mean the insurance principle, then all he receives is what he pays for, and I assure you it will take him all of thirty years in order to buy himself a pension of $40 a month. If, on the other hand, we mean the public treasury, to which everyone contributes, then that is another matter entirely. In the common comparison that is made at the present time people say, "Well, let us have contributory retirement pensions in the same way that we have unemployment insurance." That is a great fallacy; people just do not understand the exact problem when they say that. That is one reason I think it important that we should take our time and discuss this problem so that people may learn and understand it.

It must not be forgotten that unemployment insurance was introduced about ten years ago. For the first nine months no money at all was paid out; it was just collected. Then for nine years it was all "put" and very little "take", with the result that the fund was built up to the extent of $600 million; and it was not until February of this year that expenses were even a little higher than receipts.

The problem is very different with respect to retirement pensions. Pensions have to start payment immediately. The old are here; the others are becoming older at the same time, and there is no ten-year period in which to build up a fund. We have to start paying immediately. The usual retiring age in this country is considered to be sixty-five, but the life expectancy of men is twelve years greater than that and of women fourteen years greater. Surely the increased longevity is something that should give us comfort and pleasure. It cannot possibly be a matter of either regret or neglect on our part. It seems to me a hideous mockery if we spend millions of dollars on science in order to make it possible for people to live longer, and cannot meet the challenge properly by providing for them decently.

I support a contributory system, but I have no delusion about it at all. I know its coverage is incomplete. I know that under the contributory system in Britain twenty per cent of the people are not covered, while in the United States forty per cent are not covered; and I know that the pension is very small. I know that in New Zealand after ten years of payment into the contributory pension fund a person is able to draw only $9 a month, while in the United States after fifteen years of payment a person draws only $26 a month. They need supplementary assistance, and they apply the means test. So if any of us are telling the people that if we add a contributory system to the system we have at the present time, with a means test, this will be the answer to our problem, we are wrong in telling them that, because that will not solve any problem for us at the present time. It may solve a problem thirty years from now, but not today; it is confusing and misleading, and if we are giving that impression we ought to stop doing so.

My feeling is that there is only one solution. I believe we must have a universal pension plan under which everyone is covered, farmer, self-employed, domestic; everyone must be covered, and there must be a guaranteed minimum at a fixed age. We should pay for it in the way we pay for other things, by a social security tax which ought to be imposed to the extent we can afford. Here is an opportunity for us to do some original thinking on this problem comparable to the thinking we did in connection with the family allowance. Our family allowance legislation was copied; we were praised for it everywhere. So far in connection with this problem we have been groping, and I think it is time we started thinking it through.

When we speak of a contributory system, that will look after the future of those who are working today; but what about the present? Are we doing for those aged people what we expect will be done for us? Are we not penalizing the older workers because we procrastinated and failed to introduce a contributory system many years ago? Why, the labour unions of this country have been pleading for a system of that kind for as long as I can remember. Now we have on the scene the new industrial pensions. They are no longer academic; they are really here. The unions are concentrating upon retirement pensions and disability and sickness benefits; and they have made progress in the United States in textiles, in automobiles, in rubber and in the mining industry.

An hon. Member: And in coal.

Mr. Croll: Yes; I thought the mining industry covered coal. I said we have some 464 plans in Canada covering textiles, pulp, mining and some other industries. At the present time we have before us the Ford plan which provides $55 a month, subject to a means test; but the unions are prepared to fight to a finish for their demand that the pensions be free of a means test. It may surprise hon. members to learn that management regards their request as very reasonable in principle, and supports it. I could read some statements by management which might surprise hon. members. Here we have the United States chamber of commerce appearing before a committee in Washington requesting that the minimum benefits paid to a family should be increased from $85 to $120. That is something new; but it shows how aware they have become of these problems.

The tendency has been for the labour contract in the Canadian branches to conform with that of the parent plant in the United States if the situation is the same in both countries. The joker is that the situation is not the same in both countries. Here lies a potential cause of great industrial strife, and that is one reason labour and industry are pressing so hard for a solution of this pension problem. In the United States they have a pension base. As I have indicated already, after contributing for fifteen years there is a pension base of $26, which in some instances may be somewhat increased. In the United States the worker has an opportunity to build on that pension. He may do so as a result of collective industrial agreements or from his personal savings. We have no such base in Canada, because we have the means test, which is the big stumbling block. I think the time has come when we in Canada should have a universal pension with a minimum guaranteed as a floor under poverty.

The hon. member for Macleod (Mr. Hansell) asked some questions, and I am going to ask this question. Here we have two men working in the same plant, receiving the same wages, having been employed for the same number of years. One scrimps and denies himself to buy an annuity which will pay him $40 a month at the age of seventy, and finally he gets that annuity. The other man saves nothing, but at the age of seventy he draws $40 a month in old age pension, and if he is lucky enough to live in British Columbia he gets $50. Should we not try to correct a situation like that? You may say there is something the matter with the man but I believe there is something the matter with a system which permits that sort of thing.

Let us look at some of the larger plants. I will agree that Ford, Chrysler, General Motors and Goodyear can pay pensions; but can the smaller plants employing fifteen, twenty, thirty or forty men pay pensions, and if they do, will their pensions be the same? In order to have harmony in this country are we not obligated to see that we have a plan upon which people can build? Have we not a responsibility, particularly where we grant tax exemptions, to see that pensions are paid every month and every year for life? The government should have something to say about those pension plans when they give tax exemptions. I can think of no greater catastrophe that might befall this country than if some of the pension plans could not pay off when they ought to. So the government must safeguard, it must certify, in the same way that it handles insurance companies at the present time. I have said that my own feeling in the matter was that we ought to have a universal pension, in the same way as we have family allowances. It has an advantage. You may think of some disadvantages. I know what crops up in your minds: can we afford it? I shall deal with that problem in a moment or two. A universal pension gives Canadians uniformity of treatment, and it averts formidable administrative problems.

This thought occurs to me. I know quite well that the industrial workers will get their pension, even if they have to hammer it out on the picket line. Everyone knows that. What will happen under those circumstances if the farmer, who also makes a contribution to the economy of the country, finds himself paying for the industrial worker's pension while, at the same time, not having one for himself? Are we not asking for trouble? I think the time has come when we must provide a basis that will permit all individuals, whether they are farmers or labourers, to build upon that base with their savings. The industrial worker could, at the same time, build upon it through his collective agreements. You must not forget that what goes to the industrial worker by way of a pension is deferred wages, and it must be non-contributory. Then the provinces may supplement the pension.

I welcome this committee, because I feel the country is looking for guidance, leadership and action. The usual objection to a universal pension is that it will cost money. Of course it will cost money. Are we not paying too big a price in this country in fear and insecurity? Must we not look at this as a great human problem, rather than as a financial problem? I feel certain that we can afford the $200 million or $250 million we were talking about. In addition to that, it seems to me that if I were living outside the province of Ontario, I should look at the redistribution of wealth such a scheme brings about. There is a levelling process going on, as there is with family allowances, and it is a levelling up.

I come from the province of Ontario, and we pay 45·5 per cent of the taxes in Canada. We collect in family allowances 29 per cent of the tax. Some 16 per cent, therefore, is levelled out through the other parts of Canada. The same thing would be true with respect to universal pensions. In Ontario we would only be receiving 24 per cent of any pensions that were paid, so there would be 21 per cent more of that money that would be distributed to the less fortunate parts of Canada. I have always believed that if I raised the standard of living of a man in Saskatoon I improved the job possibilities of a man in Spadina.

I feel that the true measure of our strength as a nation is not our military establishments alone, but the vigour, health and spirit of the people themselves. That is what makes up the living tissue of Canadian democracy, and that is our greatest all-round defence, come what may. I realize that I have not been very specific about a universal pension. I believe, however, that if we endorse the principle, we will not have any difficulty in agreeing on the details. I agree with the statement by the member for Vancouver East (Mr. MacInnis), and what was repeated by the member for Eglinton (Mr. Fleming), that the money to be paid must come from the national product. The man who works must pay for the benefits going to the man who cannot work. Employers will charge their contribution to the cost of doing business; therefore in some instances consumers may have to pay higher prices—although from the appearance of profit sheets which are published now and then in our newspapers, I would not know why. In short, the man who has earned a loaf of bread must share a slice or two with his needy neighbour.

In all the history I have read, I have never read about a state that went broke by reason of underwriting a social minimum for its citizens. I have, however, read of states that disappeared because they did not do it. I believe, Mr. Speaker, that this motion, which gives us an opportunity to hold an open forum on pensions, which gives us the opportunity of having men, women and organizations come before us to present their views, will have an educational value in this country. People will more readily understand what our problem is, and perhaps will help us to reach a solution.

Last session we passed what I considered a very important amendment to the housing act. It is beginning to bear fruit for the people of Canada in the form of more and better houses. I believe that this parliament can write its name indelibly in the history of our country by bringing in a universal security measure which will make those homes secure for the people. I intend to support the motion.

Mr. J. H. Dickey (Halifax): Mr. Speaker, this is the first occasion on which I have had the pleasure of immediately following the hon. member for Spadina (Mr. Croll). I should like to congratulate him on a very fine speech which this house has enjoyed during the last few minutes. I agree with him, Mr. Speaker, in welcoming the motion to set up the proposed committee. The wording of the motion outlines the government's intention to hold a full examination of our old age pension system. The government is turning to the proper instrument of parliament in order to carry out that examination under our parliamentary system.

The subject of old age pensions is one which is being discussed a great deal these days, both in this house and throughout the country. It is quite apparent, I submit, Mr. Speaker, that the extent of the problems involved in expanding our old age pensions, as well as other social security measures, is not fully understood by some individuals in this house, or by many individuals throughout the country. Since the opening of this session we have heard members calling for increased pensions, the removal of the means test, and other changes in our present system. From this it would seem to be clear that we should at least take a searching look at the question of old age security in this country, and come to some conclusions upon it.

For example, the Prime Minister, in speaking at Vancouver on April 14, 1949, said:

> We are certainly not satisfied with our old age pension legislation, even though the scale of pensions is 50 per cent higher in dollars than it was before the war.

We have had old age pensions in this country, Mr. Speaker, for 23 years. It is still an interim program which has been improved and extended on five occasions in that 23 years. I agree to some extent with the hon. member for Eglinton (Mr. Fleming) who said this afternoon that in the past we had dealt with old age pensions in a not too well organized manner. The changes that have been made have been forward steps and as far as they went they have been productive of good to the social well-being of the people of this country. The government is proposing today to the hon. member for Eglinton and all hon. members of this house that we use a committee of parliament in order to look at the whole question, to see how we have progressed in the past, to see how we should move in the future in order that extensions of this program will not be open to criticism of having been adopted without full consideration of all the circumstances. For that reason I submit that much of the opposition expressed this afternoon by the hon. member to the setting up of a committee was illogical and not well taken.

There are four main points around which the discussion of the extension of our old age security program has revolved. These are:

1. The abolition of the means test.
2. The reduction of the age at which men and women shall become entitled to old age assistance.
3. The payment of pensions on a higher scale than at present.
4. The introduction of a contributory system of old age pensions.

In order to illustrate some of the important and complex problems which have to be considered in dealing with this question, I should like to discuss briefly each of the four points which I have mentioned and which have been referred to by previous speakers in this debate to some extent or other. At the present time we are paying old age pensions on a means-test basis to persons over seventy years of age. There are approximately 625,000 people over the age of seventy years, and some 42 or 43 per cent or approximately 265,000 are receiving old age pensions of $40 per month, plus certain additions in various provinces, on a means-test basis. The pensions now being paid involve an expenditure of over $100 million on federal account, something over $33 million on provincial account, or a total of $133 million.

Suppose we consider putting into practice what the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles) referred to this afternoon as the first step in improving and extending our old age security program, that is, the abolition of the means test. By doing that one thing alone we would increase the annual cost of a $40 pension to all persons over seventy years of age to $300 million a year, or an additional $200 million.

The hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre pointed out that the speakers who had preceded him had not suggested any concrete step that should be taken with respect to abolishing the means test or anything else. He said that he was satisfied that the first step we should take was to abolish the means test. However, he did not go any further and explain just where he thought the additional $200 million that would be required to take that step was to come from. I am not saying that we will not have to find that money, but the point I want to make is that if the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre or any other hon. member is going to come to grips with this problem he will have to say, not whether we should do thus and so but that we should do thus and so and the money will come from such and such a source.

The purpose of this committee is to study what we should do and how we are to provide the funds wherewith to do it. The hon. member cannot point the finger of scorn at any hon. member in this house for not making a concrete suggestion when he himself makes only half a concrete suggestion in saying, "Abolish the means test", but omitting to say anything about where the money is to come from. That is one consideration we have to keep in mind when we say, abolish the means test.

The second suggestion is the reduction of the age of eligibility for pension. Suppose that in addition to abolishing the means test we considered that the time has come when the age of eligibility should be reduced. One suggestion that has been made outside the house is that the age of eligibility for women should be reduced to sixty-five years while the age of eligibility for men should be kept at seventy years, with a $40 pension for all. To pay a $40 pension to all women who had reached the age of sixty-five years and to men who had reached the age of seventy years would cost $390,624,000 this year. If we were to lower the age of eligibility for both men and women to sixty-five years, the cost this year would be $491 million, or almost $500 million.

I point out these figures merely to show the problem that has to be met, not to say what should or should not be done or what we can afford or what we cannot afford. I simply point out that in advocating these changes we must come to grips with the problem of how they are to be paid for. Suppose it is decided that a pension of $40 is not sufficient. Many in this house have argued strenuously that this is an absolute minimum pension that has to be added to; that it cannot be left at that level. Suppose we decide that a minimum pension of $50 would meet the present requirements. For a pension of $50 at age sixty-five the bill this year would be $614 million, and by 1971 the pension bill on that basis would be $960 million, almost $1 billion. That shows the extent of the problem that we have to meet.

I have dealt with three of the points that I mentioned earlier. The last one, the introduction of a contributory system, has been dealt with more fully by some of the speakers who preceded me in this debate. However, I should like to point out that any system is a contributory system. The money comes from the production of the country and goes into the fund, either the general fund of government through taxation, or into a special fund from special taxes which are called contributions. Simply by saying that it is a contributory system does not change one iota the expense involved. It simply is a suggestion of methods of raising the money that is required.

The committee is being empowered to look into and to examine all these important complex questions. I say to the hon. member for Winnipeg North Centre (Mr. Knowles), with respect, that in my view the wording of the resolution is as wide as could possibly be expected within the limits of the English language; that the power that he wishes the committee to have, as expressed by his amendment, is there in the wording that has been used, and that we would simply, by adopting his amendment, be saying the same thing twice.

Mr. Knowles: Then it would not do any harm.

Mr. Dickey: It would do you a lot of good, though. I do not think it is necessary to adopt the amendment.

In addition to these questions that I have outlined there are other important problems that the committee will have to face. Because of the legislative authority of the provinces on property and civil rights there is involved in this question a constitutional problem which must be solved by agreement with the provinces. In passing I might point out, Mr. Speaker, that that is not always an easy problem to solve. The agreement with all the provinces to bring into effect the system that we now have took nine years from the time of the passage of this act in 1927. It was 1936 before the last two provinces came in and joined in that scheme. That is another problem that the committee is going to have to consider.

The committee is going to have to consider the opinions of many people who do not all agree. For instance, there is general agreement that something should be done about the means test. I agree with what the hon. member for Spadina (Mr. Croll) had to say in that respect; but there are many people who have expressed the opinion to me that the first thing to do is to make sure that we are providing for all the needy cases before we provide public funds to pay old age pensions to people who clearly do not need them, and that would be one result of removing the means test.

The hon. member for Macleod (Mr. Hansell) made a plea which has been expressed in this house before, namely, that attention be paid to the needs of the incurables. Many people in this country think that some action should be taken about that before we pay pensions on a no means test basis. Many people feel that other aspects of our social security program need attention before some of the problems arising out of old age pensions.

I should like to add something to what the hon. member for Spadina has said about industrial pensions and the view being taken by many people in industry in this country today about the means test. Many hon. members seem to think that, when they rise in their places and say, "we must do away with the means test", they are saying something that is unique and does not meet with general agreement. I think that today in this country it does meet with general agreement. Just over two months ago I heard the president of one of the greatest corporations in this country tell a meeting of a board of trade that he felt the means test was working a hardship on the employees of his company who had a company-financed retirement fund and retirement scheme, and that some consideration should be given to adjusting the means test to remove any unfairness to men in that category.

In conclusion, I should simply like to say that all hon. members who think that they have access to all the information which may have a bearing on this subject, or even those who think that all the information that is necessary to make a wise decision on this question is in the possession of some hon. members—all hon. members who think that they have the answers to these questions, and all hon. members who are satisfied that they can stand up and say to the people of this country, "I have a solution to this whole problem which is bound to be the right one, and which takes into consideration everything that should be considered"—should vote against this resolution and the committee because the committee is not necessary. To all those hon. members who, like myself and the hon. member for Spadina, feel that there is a great deal of information on this question that we have not been able to obtain, and have not been able to comprehend—who feel that they have not all the answers to these questions and that in order to carry out our responsibilities to the people of Canada we should see that all these questions are gone into with the greatest care and as fully as the powers of this parliament will permit—I say they agree with the hon. member for Spadina and myself and should vote for this motion and be glad to see this committee set up.

Mr. Brooks: Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Pouliot: Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Deputy Speaker: The hon. member for Temiscouata.

Mr. Jean François Pouliot (Temiscouata): Mr. Speaker, I do not wish to be unfair to the hon. member for Royal (Mr. Brooks), but when I sent a note I was the last one on the list. No one had sent word to Mr. Speaker that he was to speak before me. My name followed that of the junior member for Halifax (Mr. Dickey). However, I do not want to take the place of the hon. member for Royal, and if he wishes to proceed I shall be happy to take my seat.

Mr. Brooks: Go ahead.

Mr. Pouliot: Thank you, sir.

Mr. Speaker, this resolution contains in the first paragraph a summary of the whole social question. I congratulate the industrious and diligent Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Martin) on having sponsored it today. It is timely for members of parliament to meet together and to discuss all these questions without partisan spirit, in an effort to come to the most satisfactory conclusions for all.

Old Age Security

As the junior member for Halifax has pointed out, we shall consider the whole matter objectively for the good of those who are to benefit from any enactment by parliament. At this stage I should like to congratulate all those who have spoken on this most important matter. May I remind the house that some personal friends of mine, the hon. member for Terrebonne (Mr. Bertrand), the hon. member for Compton-Frontenac (Mr. Blanchette) and the hon. member for Bellechasse (Mr. Picard), have taken a particular interest in the matter.

I agree that hon. members in the Progressive Conservative party, the C.C.F. group and the Social Credit group, and even my independent friend from Chicoutimi (Mr. Gagnon), are also interested in the matter. No one should contend that he is more interested in it than anybody else, because we are all interested and are trying to do our best for the people of Canada, especially those who suffer from disability and who are in an unfortunate condition that can be remedied at least partially.

Any member of parliament meets a large number of people. I am not boasting, but I state as a fact that when I am at home I see between fifty and sixty callers a day at my office. I do not practise law; my parliamentary duties do not leave me the leisure to practise my profession as I did before. I take a case occasionally, but I cannot follow the practice regularly.

My office is almost a drawing room or a reception room for those who come to see me and tell me about their troubles. And, sir, you will realize that when a poor man comes to you to disclose to you his intimate feelings and to tell you troubles he would confess to no one except a friend, you feel honoured by that confidence. This happens very often. Constituents will go to their member of parliament for the redress of their wrongs and to tell him their troubles.

This is the only way one can become informed as to the effect of legislation passed by parliament. People come to us in all confidence and speak openly, asking for something. That is legitimate. I do not complain about it; and so long as we keep our mandate to represent the people of Canada we have to do it. It is part of our job; I am not complaining, and the day I feel like complaining I shall resign with the feeling that I am no longer fit to be a member of parliament.

From the stories told to us of the intimate events of the lives of our constituents we can form a composite picture. Each member of parliament who listens to his constituents has in mind that same composite picture of the happiness and misery of certain sections of the Canadian people. Those with whom I sympathize most are the ones whom, in French, we describe as "les pauvres en habit noir", the poor who are just as well dressed as they can afford to be. They try to make the best of it. They are too proud to beg but, for the sake of appearances, they show up as best they can. No one should be insensible to the approach of these people who are so proud, but who will come to someone to tell them their handicaps and their disabilities. No one should fail to pay attention to what is said in order some day to be in a position to help them.

An hon. Member: Eleven o'clock.

Mr. Pouliot: One moment more. When I say this I feel sure I am expressing the feelings of my colleagues in the House of Commons who have been in similar positions—and I am sure all have been.

Therefore I consider this problem placed before us by the minister as one of the most important to be discussed by parliament. Light comes from discussion. While this is not the only important subject for our consideration, certainly it is important, and we must not take for granted that every request will be acceded to.

When the old age pension was granted with only one condition attached, namely that of age, I stated sincerely that a mistake had been made. I have repeated that to my constituents, and have received a good response to what I have said. In my view, age should not be the factor in granting a pension; rather, it should be need. There are men and women who have not reached the age of seventy but who are deserving of pensions. Proof of this is that pensions for the blind are given to younger people; parliament has agreed to that, the only objection being that the age was not low enough.

Before concluding I shall make only one further observation, following which I shall adjourn the debate. Pensions will be paid from taxes; but pensions to the disabled will be paid from taxes paid by people who are not so unfortunate and who, although disabled, are in a position to earn their living. The higher the pensions will be, the less will the taxpayers be in a position to pay for them.

I move the adjournment of the debate.

Motion agreed to and debate adjourned.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Fournier (Hull): Mr. Speaker, on Monday we will resume the debate on the address in reply to the speech from the throne.

At eleven o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Monday, March 13, 1950

The house met at three o'clock.

ALBERTA

REPORT AS TO THE APPEARANCE OF FIRST LIVE RAT

Mr. A. L. Smith (Calgary West): Mr. Speaker, over the week end I read in the newspapers that the first live rat had appeared in the province of Alberta. That is a fact—I am not joking about it, and we understand the menace. Strangely enough, it came from the east, and was found in the city of Edmonton. Since we have all received copies of the Edmonton newspapers concerning a certain route for a certain highway, I must say I thought the choice of this animal to blaze a trail through the wilderness was very peculiar.

VETERANS AFFAIRS

HOSPITALIZATION—WIDENING OF REGULATIONS

Hon. Milton F. Gregg (Minister of Veterans Affairs): Mr. Speaker, I desire to table copies in English and in French of a regulation made under the Department of Veterans Affairs Act by order in council P.C. 1266 of March 10, 1950.

This regulation permits this department to give hospitalization and treatment to veterans who are ineligible under present regulations, but who are covered as to hospital costs by private or provincial government insurance plans; or who, though not insured, have the means to pay for the treatment for which they may apply at D.V.A. hospitals.

The prime responsibility of the hospitals maintained by the Department of Veterans Affairs is to treat those who have pensionable disabilities, and such veterans will continue to have an absolute priority in rights to beds in our hospitals. Treatment under the new regulation will be given to paying veteran patients only to the extent that beds are not required for entitled veterans.

It is the intention to try out these new arrangements for the period of a year, during which their value will be assessed and the appropriate regular scale of rates for the various districts of Canada worked out.

For the immediate future the number of beds available for this purpose will not be great, so that no assurance is given that accommodation will be available for all who apply.

Fuller details on the plan will be available after March 31 next at D.V.A. district offices and through veterans organizations.

Mr. Green: Will this cover the men of the merchant navy?

Mr. Gregg: No.

Mr. Wright: Will the minister file the rates to be charged?

Mr. Gregg: It will be noted in my statement that the rates are now being worked out. Between now and the end of the month the head of our medical services will consult with all concerned in the districts, and the rates will be determined. The aim is to achieve a rate generally comparable with that charged by civilian hospitals in the various districts.

Mr. Pearkes: Will the minister say whether the charges made to veterans who have entitlement to hospitalization will now be adjusted to the provincial scheme in British Columbia? Will the veterans who are not able to pay the full amount of the hospitalization charges also be admitted, or will it be extended only to those who are able to pay the full charge made by the D.V.A. hospitals?

Mr. Gregg: As I indicated in my statement, many of the matters related to the question just asked are now being worked out. To answer the hon. member's second question first, under this regulation only those veterans will be accepted who pay the full amount which will be set for that particular hospital. As to his first question, an attempt is being made to work into the plan those benefits accruing in British Columbia and Saskatchewan under their provincial insurance plans.

WIDOWS OF NON-PENSIONED VETERANS

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): Has the Minister of Veterans Affairs received representations asking for certain improvements in the provisions under the War Veterans Allowance Act relating to widows of non-pensioned veterans? Will consideration be given to those representations before the bill is brought in amending the act?

Hon. Milton F. Gregg (Minister of Veterans Affairs): I have received the representations referred to, and it is not my intention at the moment to recommend to my colleagues that any amendments based upon those representations be brought forward at this time.

Inquiries of the Ministry

INCOME TAX

FARMERS—CHANGES IN METHOD OF COMPUTING DEPRECIATION

Hon. J. J. McCann (Minister of National Revenue): Mr. Speaker, last week a number of questions were asked in reference to order in council P.C. 458, having to do with depreciation. The one of which I received notice was asked by the hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell), and was as follows, as reported at page 562 of Hansard:

In view of the fact that this order in council was made effective for 1949 taxation and may cause confusion among farmers who, in accordance with the law, filed their interim returns on December 31, will the minister consider delaying its coming into effect for this year?

That, together with other questions, prompted me to say that I would make a short statement on the matter, which I propose to do now.

Under the Income War Tax Act, which applied to 1948 and prior years, no depreciation was allowable except what the Minister of National Revenue, in his sole discretion, approved. The Income Tax Act, which applies to 1949 and subsequent years, provides that allowances in respect of capital costs will be as prescribed by regulation of the governor in council. If the regulation is suspended, the taxpayer will be deprived of his right to make any deduction for depreciation for 1949. It is for that reason I quoted the request for the suspension of the order in council.

Important changes were introduced in the 1949 budget, and, at the request of some members of parliament, the government agreed to amend the law so that certain provisions would not apply to farmers and fishermen. These were specifically the new method of computing depreciation, and the recapture provisions. As soon as possible after parliament approved the legislation, regulations were prepared, approved by the governor in council, and published. The rates applicable to farmers and fishermen are clearly set out therein. These rates have been made uniform with the rates available to all other taxpayers in Canada, having regard to the fact that farmers and fishermen are excluded from certain provisions of the law as mentioned above. For example, the fifteen per cent rate, allowed to farmers and fishermen on the straight-line basis on automotive equipment, results in an asset being depreciated by ninety per cent in six years. The thirty per cent rate, on the reducing-balance basis on automotive equipment, applicable to all taxpayers other than farmers and fishermen, results in an asset being depreciated by 88·24 per cent in six years.

[Mr. Gregg.]

The comparison, therefore, is rather in favour of the farmer, as I indicated when I was making my reply.

FREIGHT RATES

APPLICATION OF RAILWAYS FOR INCREASES—REQUEST FOR POSTPONEMENT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. R. Argue (Assiniboia): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Transport, arising out of a Canadian Press dispatch on Saturday to the effect that the railway companies are applying for a further 3·4 per cent increase in freight rates. My question is, will the government consider postponing, under section 52 of the Railway Act, the coming into effect of the authorized eight per cent increase, or any other increase in freight rates, until after the royal commission on transportation has submitted its report, and until after the completion of the general freight rates inquiry by the board of transport commissioners?

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (Minister of Transport): I believe this question was asked in another form during this session by the leader of the hon. member's party. In any event my recollection of the meaning of section 52 is that the powers of the governor in council are judicial in nature. To my knowledge those powers have not been exercised since confederation, except on one occasion. I would not think that the circumstances are such today that the power should be exercised at this time.

WHEAT

INTERNATIONAL AGREEMENT—LONDON CONFERENCE—REALLOTMENT OF WORLD SUPPLY

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. G. Diefenbaker (Lake Centre): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Trade and Commerce in connection with the international conference on wheat that is opening in London today. Is he in a position to say what Canada's representations will be concerning the reallotment of the world wheat supply, and in particular what additional number of bushels Canada will receive under the new arrangement?

Right Hon. C. D. Howe (Minister of Trade and Commerce): The Canadian representatives at the conference have been instructed to favour the accession of Germany and Japan to the agreement. I might say that there is some opposition to their accession, but Canada is favouring it.

Assuming that both countries are admitted, an additional 100 million bushels a year wil[l] be added to the agreement, a quantity which will permit Canada to have its allotment revised upward to the 230 million bushels that was originally thought to be our fair share of the world markets. That quantity is about as much as we safely can assume on a continuing basis. There are some details of the arrangements for this year, next year and the following year that I would prefer not to announce until they are announced in London. These arrangements were worked out by negotiation with the United States government, and, if adopted, they will be very satisfactory to those responsible for the marketing of Canada's wheat crop.

PUBLIC BUILDINGS

ALVIN BUILDING, VANCOUVER—QUESTION AS TO VALUATION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Howard C. Green (Vancouver-Quadra): Press dispatches appearing in Vancouver on Saturday indicate there is some possibility of the option to purchase the Alvin building being extended beyond the sixteenth of this month. It is also indicated that the Minister of Public Works is having the building valued by two local valuators. Can he tell us whether or not that statement is correct, and, if valuations are being made, by what firms?

Hon. Alphonse Fournier (Minister of Public Works): After listening to the hon. member the other night, I gave instructions to my department to have two Vancouver firms make a valuation of the Alvin building. The valuation work has proceeded, but I have not yet received a report. The firms retained for this work were McCarter and Nairne, architects, and the Northern Construction Company and J. W. Stewart Limited. If I continue to have valuations made, I may be obliged to pay more for the building.

THE BUDGET

INQUIRY AS TO PROBABLE DATE OF PRESENTATION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. G. K. Fraser (Peterborough West): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Finance. Is the press report correct in stating that the budget will be brought down this month? If it is not correct, when will it be brought down?

Hon. Douglas Abbott (Minister of Finance): That is the usual careful speculation on the part of the press. I am not yet in a position to say when I shall be able to bring down the budget, but it will be as soon as possible.

SPEECH FROM THE THRONE

CONTINUATION OF DEBATE ON ADDRESS IN REPLY

The house resumed, from Thursday, March 9, consideration of the motion of Mr. F. H. Larson for an address to His Excellency the Governor General in reply to his speech at the opening of the session, and the amendment thereto of Mr. Drew, and the amendment to the amendment of Mr. Coldwell.

Hon. R. W. Mayhew (Minister of Fisheries): Mr. Speaker, my colleague the Secretary of State for External Affairs (Mr. Pearson) when earlier he was making his first report on the Colombo conference intimated that I would take part in this debate. My remarks will be divided into four main sections: the first concerning the international labour organization convention which was held at Mysore; the second with reference to the commonwealth conference in Colombo; the third, a reference to our own position, economically, in those countries; and the fourth, my own observations or speculations as to what we might do.

I want to assure you, sir, that at this time I am speaking entirely on my own behalf. Before proceeding with what I wish particularly to say, I wish to pay the usual well-earned tributes to the mover (Mr. Larson) and the seconder (Mr. Dumas) of the address in reply to the speech from the throne, but I shall do it in a slightly different way. I think they have had an opportunity of becoming a little better known in the country as a whole. It is a great encouragement to us in this house to hear the younger men when they come in and make their maiden speeches. I think it is also a great encouragement to the people outside of this house to realize that there is a constant inflow of younger men who are capable, well-trained and prepared to fill vacancies as they occur in the ranks of the government of Canada. The fact that these young men have the urge, the spirit and the courage to go ahead with this career is, I think, one of the reasons why we should have so much confidence in our democratic system.

I should like also to say how grateful I am to the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) and to the Secretary of State for External Affairs for making it possible for Mrs. Mayhew and myself to take this extended trip, which has been interesting and beneficial to us. It is my hope, and I am sure it is that of Mrs. Mayhew, that the country will receive great benefit also, and in the same proportion; but I doubt whether that will be so.

I intend to speak about the meeting of the international labour organization, attendance at which was my chief mission while abroad, because I feel that the ILO is doing most valuable work and should be supported. The ILO is one of the oldest and most successful of all international organizations. It was established after the first world war as an agency of the league of nations; and it is the only part of the league that survived the second world war. It has increased its membership and expanded its activities considerably during the past few years, a fact which affords ample proof of its vitality and the support it is receiving. There are now more than sixty member countries represented in this organization.

The purpose of the international labour organization is to promote social justice in all countries. It seeks to do this by improving industrial relations, raising living standards, and helping to bring about economic and social stability through legislative action and international agreement. It is a unique organization in that it is tripartite; its members represent governments, employers and workers. This I believe is the secret of its strength. The ILO delegates appreciate the view of others and try to bring about harmony out of diversity. The ILO meetings are unique also in that, so far at least, they have been fairly free of the ideological and political differences which have so hampered the work of the United Nations.

The governing body of the international labour organization meets four times a year. It was the 110th meeting of the governing body which I attended in Mysore, India, late in December and early in January. This was a significant and important meeting, because it was the first in the thirty years' history of the ILO that has been held in Asia. It signified the increasing interest which Europe and the Americas are showing in this part of the world, and it was a tribute to the new and independent nations which have come into being. By holding this meeting in India the ILO gave proof of its desire to fulfil its obligations to all regions and to live up to the principles of universality.

This meeting in India achieved the useful purpose of focusing attention on the many and difficult labour and social problems in Asia. It brought to light the urgent need of these countries for financial and—chiefly—technological assistance. It also revealed the serious consequences which might result were such aid not forthcoming. I think that all the delegates became acutely aware of the fact that they could not, in their own interest, ignore the many problems of Asia. Social and economic improvement and higher standards of living cannot be obtained for one-half of the world while the other half is left to struggle for existence.

During intervals between meetings and on week ends I had the opportunity of travelling by car some four hundred miles around southern India. Mysore itself is somewhat off the beaten track; hence what we saw there, though typical of country life in India, is not what will be found described in visitors' handbooks. We saw much that was beautiful, and we saw much of the potential wealth of that fascinating country.

Hon. members may be interested in the agenda of the governing body meeting; it will give an idea of the scope of the work of the organization. Perhaps I might then conclude this brief report by commenting on one or two of the more important items which were discussed.

I will not name all the items on the agenda, but only some in order to indicate the type of work they were doing: Proposals concerning fellowships; questions relating to freedom of association; report on action against unemployment; safety in coal mines; labour statistics; report of committee on salaried employees and professional workers; report of committee on recreation; report of committee on juvenile employment; report of officers of committee on social security experts; report of the technical assistance committee; proposed establishment of an Asian advisory committee.

These are some of the twenty-six items on the agenda of the session.

One of the more interesting proposals was that concerning fellowships. The governing body agreed to establish a fellowship scheme under which young men and women, chiefly from underdeveloped countries, could obtain practical training in countries technologically more advanced. This scheme would supplement a similar but larger fellowship scheme already in operation under the United Nations. By adopting this proposal the international labour organization recognized the need for technical assistance in backward countries.

Another important item on the agenda was social security. In the early years after the first world war the ILO drafted conventions and recommendations on standards of social security, and these became the models upon which many countries based their national legislation. Now the organization is planning to review these conventions and recommendations, to integrate them and make them more practicable in view of the advances that have been made in recent times. It has instructed a special committee of experts to revise these international instruments and set forth the objectives and minimum standards of an integrated, fully-rounded program.

The most difficult and contentious, and certainly the most important, subject discussed at the 110th session of the governing body was the proposal that the ILO set up an international fact-finding and conciliation commission to investigate violation of trade union rights or freedom of association, alleged to exist in member countries. Canada, of course, supported the proposal, because nationally as well as internationally we are interested in maintaining union rights as well as union responsibilities.

The proposal approved by the governing body envisages the establishment of an international commission to investigate all bona fide charges alleging the violation of trade union rights. It would consist of nine members, all of whom would be respected and recognized authorities in labour matters. Complaints referred to them would first be examined by the governing body who would weed out all frivolous charges, and only legitimate grievances would be investigated by the commission.

As the request of the government concerned is required before action can be taken by the commission, it remains to be seen just how far Russia and her satellite countries will go in permitting investigation of conditions within their territories by an international body.

In concluding this report on the ILO meeting, I would like to say how much impressed I was by the manner in which this international labour organization operates. I am proud of the fact that Canada has been a member of it since its inception and is now rated as one of the eight nations of chief industrial importance. We have always had close ties with the ILO, having been host to its secretariat during the war. I hope that Canada will continue to participate as fully as possible in the work of this organization.

A detailed report has been forwarded to the Minister of Labour and is available for reference if anyone wishes any further information regarding it.

After the meeting of the international labour organization at Mysore, to which I have already referred as being somewhat off the beaten path, an opportunity was given to us of seeing some of the village life of India. We left our plane on the first part of our journey to Bangalore. It was some ninety miles into Mysore, and in that stretch of ninety miles we passed one Indian village after another. We spent ten days in Mysore, and drove back to Bangalore. There we took a plane to Madras and from Madras to Colombo. At Colombo we joined my colleague the Secretary of State for External Affairs at the conference of ministers of external affairs.

I was very much pleased to have the opportunity of attending this conference and of meeting men whom we read about but rarely have a chance to see. To me—and I am off the regular path now—the chief good of the conference was not so much the deliberations of the meetings as the discussions at the functions, by way of various entertainment, and so on, that were held there and in Mysore; the opportunity it gave to each of the delegates to sit beside his neighbour at luncheons and other gatherings and to have informal talks. You can depend upon it that the good will that was generated in this conference was well worth while.

I would not like to have the house or the country think that we were a group of peregrinating individuals going round the world on a magic carpet, with a special magic eye pointed down to the oases and comforts and hospitality, and that only in those places did we try to do a job. Whether it was a magic eye or not, our trip was well planned. We met nothing but friendliness and the most cordial hospitality. I hope that some of my words—at least some of the earnestness that I try to express—will go back to the countries that received us and gave us such a wonderful time and the opportunity of seeing and knowing them.

Mr. Harris (Danforth): While the minister is thinking about Colombo and the places at which he was entertained at different times, perhaps he will say a word of encouragement to the natives and the people of Colombo with regard to their standard of living as compared with our own, and indicate that the Canadian people would be ready to help them out.

Mr. Mayhew: I hope that nothing that I have said or will say will in any way be considered as disparaging of these people. Indeed it is the very opposite. I could readily be quite optimistic if I were asked to live in that country. They have every reason to be hopeful for the future, and I would be the last to bring back a message of despair about India, Pakistan, Ceylon or the other countries that we had a chance to visit.

We hear a good many people speak of the magnitude of the task connected with bringing a better standard of living to these splendid and hard-working people. They are as kind as any other people in the world, and they are anxious to do better. To hon. members who are interested I would recommend a reading of an article by Edwin Muller in the March issue of the Reader's Digest, entitled "A way to lessen world hunger". There you will get some idea as to what could be done without spending a vast amount of money.

It must be remembered that India and Ceylon, as well as all of south Asia, are not one-crop countries. They have no difficulty, if they have water, in getting three, four, and in some places five crops a year. It must also be remembered that that part of the world is very backward in the matter of tools. In a sense they are the victims of the kind of thing that we are victims of in Canada; they are as much afraid of the modern tool displacing workers as we are afraid of immigration. Both will bring prosperity—in India, the advanced tool, and in Canada, immigration.

Anyone in the United States or Canada who would think of employing a tractor, a large combine or a heavy plow would have in mind something which is not known over there and which would not do the job. The agricultural areas are divided into plots of three, four or five acres. Plots of these sizes are about all one family could cultivate properly if it is to take off three or four crops in the year.

Perhaps I should tell the house, however, what we did see. In watering the land—and what I am about to say is more particularly true of Egypt—they dip the water with buckets which carry it to the top of the bank, at which point it is poured into a sluice to irrigate the land. A treadmill may be used to pump the water. Others use the ancient method of the Archimedean screw, the principle of which I am sure is familiar to all hon. members. In that process a man turns a crank and a small volume of water comes up. A farm pump, with which we are familiar in Canada, would probably irrigate twenty times as much land as the methods they are now using.

It will be seen from what I am saying that the problem is neither colossal nor spectacular. On the contrary it could be handled in a simple fashion. These people should be encouraged to see whether the modern equipment we have been using could be used to their advantage. These are new countries with a new lease on life and new leaders. They are driving ahead at a rate which commands the admiration of all and requires very little encouragement. As they make progress they will have more rubber, more tea, more coffee, more spices—more of all the things which are needed in this country and which will be available there in greater quantities when they really get going. I look forward with confidence to the possibilities of these countries reaching a high level of production in quick time.

I fear I am completely off the track so far as what I had intended to say is concerned. I shall not take up too much time in saying some of the things I had intended to say, and which are set out in my notes, in the careful preparation of which I received some help but which because of the shortage of time I cannot complete.

[Mr. Mayhew.]

One point I should like to make which, it seems to me, has been overlooked in the debate thus far. There seemed to be a feeling that all that took place at Colombo was a conference of foreign ministers, and that the discussions were all political. That, of course, is not so. Concurrently with those discussions were others concerning trade and commerce and finance. From Canada there were three representatives who attended and who worked continually while the other conference was in progress.

At the conclusion of the Colombo conference we left for Karachi, at which point we spent two days with the people in that capital city of Pakistan. We did not see much of Pakistan outside the capital, but I can say that in Karachi we saw in progress the building of a new capital which in a few years' time will be well worthy of that fine country. While there, however, we did have an opportunity to talk about trade with practically all the ministers. Perhaps in my conversations I was in a position to speak with greater freedom than was my colleague, and to take greater advantage of the time to speak about trade, not forgetting, of course, sales of fish.

I believe that in those conferences we had considerable success. I have before me some trade figures in which hon. members may be interested. They disclose that as to Ceylon, Pakistan and India, only Ceylon has a favourable balance of trade with Canada, and the amount is fairly substantial. In 1949 Canada exported to Ceylon approximately $2,159,000 worth of goods, the important commodities being milk products, railway ties and newsprint. In the same period we imported $11,635,000 worth of goods, of which tea accounted for $8,765,000 and rubber $1,593,000.

Our exports to Pakistan in 1949 amounted to approximately $18,097,000, in which was included over $2 million worth of commercial vehicles and more than $8 million worth of defence stores, plus another $1 million for ships and aircraft. During the same period we imported about $1,193,000 worth of goods, consisting mainly of jute and tea.

Canada's exports to India in 1949 were valued at approximately $72,551,000, of which $22,960,000 was for wheat and flour, and $27,125,000 for locomotives and parts. Other important commodities included newsprint, railway rails and track materials, commercial vehicles, railway cars, non-ferrous metals, fertilizers, aluminum and ships. Our imports in the same period amounted to $26,233,000 including $8,555,000 worth of tea, $10,528,000 worth of jute fabrics, $1,564,000 worth of nuts, and $1,270,000 worth of carpets.

Leaving India, we had a brief stay in Singapore. Here, despite political unrest in the northern part of the Malayan federation and Indonesia which could affect the flow of rubber and tin, government officials and businessmen interviewed did not appear apprehensive, but on the contrary were optimistic.

In 1949 Canada exported to Singapore approximately $5,439,000 worth of goods, of which $1,741,000 was for milk products; $800,000 was for commercial vehicles and parts; over $400,000 was for wheat flour, and about $450,000 for newsprint. In the same period we imported goods valued in excess of $16,208,000 from the same area, the main items being rubber to a value of $10,139,000, and tin to a value of $4,834,000.

Our next stop was probably our most spectacular, to the extent that our plane, having been adroitly navigated, despite low-hanging clouds, through a mountain-studded approach to the airstrip, decided to blow two tires just after we touched down in Hong Kong. No two blowouts ever received as much attention as they did.

Here again we found a spirit of confidence and evidence of considerable current development. The dislocation in the trade with China is, however, making itself felt, and stores and warehouses are stacked with merchandise destined for China when trading facilities are restored.

Last year Canada exported to Hong Kong goods valued at approximately $10 million, including $3,438,000 worth of wheat flour, over $840,000 worth of fountain pens, and $490,000 worth of newsprint, plus quantities of fish, milk products and fertilizer. We imported from Hong Kong during the same period goods worth $2,989,000, including approximately $810,000 worth of tin, $230,000 worth of peanuts, and $185,000 worth of fireworks.

Our final trade talks were held in Tokyo with General MacArthur and members of his staff, and with Japanese ministers, officials and businessmen. External trade policy was placed in the hands of the Japanese authorities only as of the first of this year. Nevertheless we were satisfied that Japan was anxious to spend just as many dollars in Canada as we spent in that country, and that in any case there was no tendency to discriminate against Canada in favour of other hard currency countries.

In 1949 we exported to Japan goods valued at nearly $5,860,000, including $2,145,000 worth of pulp, some $818,000 worth of whisky, and quantities of beef, newsprint, nickel and sulphur. Our imports from Japan last year amounted to $5,551,000, including toys, approximately $950,000; textiles and products, approximately $1,350,000; oranges, approximately $493,000; and small quantities of porcelain, pottery and tea.

In my opinion a peace treaty should be negotiated with Japan at an early day. Until that is done and Japan is able to see her way through the clouds, I do not know exactly what is going to happen. She has lost her colonies; only 20 per cent of her land is arable; her population is increasing, and all she has to sell is what can be produced with her own hands. Neither we nor the United States are any too anxious to take in the products she makes, because we fear it will put our own people out of employment. We must take a realistic view of the position, but I do not think anyone can measure what will happen to Japan until after a peace treaty has been negotiated.

I hope I am not interfering with the affairs of the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe), but I do want to indicate one plan which may or may not have merit. I do not think any plan can be offered that would not entail a considerable amount of speculation and meet with great difficulties.

Our export position has been unique. Generally we have developed sufficient balances with overseas countries to pay for our dollar deficit with the United States. In the past this overseas trade has been regarded more as a financial operation than as a disposal of exports. Essentially this problem remains, although it has greatly changed its character in the past few years. Our dollar deficit with the United States is gradually contracting, and our industries have made many readjustments in the last four years to the new international trade position.

The fact remains, however, that these overseas markets remain essential for certain raw materials—wheat, flour, tobacco, fish, cheese, eggs and bacon, and certain manufactures, such as automotive goods, textiles, rubber, machinery, and chemicals. In relation to primary commodities, overseas restrictions will produce export surpluses for us; in relation to manufactured commodities, the market restrictions will show themselves in unemployment. The federal government will be pressed to take different kinds of action to meet these problems, but in effect the problems will be identical and similar in origin, and will best be met by action that expands our overseas business. Our need, therefore, is to find means of disposing of export surpluses to the non-dollar areas and of finding acceptable imports from these countries. It is clear that a solution cannot be found by attaching ourselves to the dollar or the sterling currency areas. The problem is not a financial one, but one of the exchange of commodities. So far as Canada goes, the problem is perhaps unique, and a unique solution has to be found. In short, Canada has to find a middle way.

Because of our previous rather elementary trade mechanism we lack many of the facilities necessary for meeting problems of this kind. We lack the knowledge to be found in many of the European brokerage and merchant houses, the shipping knowledge, etc. The sterling area has these facilities within it and uses them in handling the European and oriental trades. Because of this, our exporters lack direct contact with many markets that might want our goods and that might in return supply us with imports. Many countries may not be earning all the dollars they can in sales or in potential production. Individual Canadian firms that look for barter arrangements often find themselves faced with a sale of commodities in which they have no interest. Many of these difficulties may be overcome by extending the scope of barter arrangements for the particular commodities we have in surplus.

As the idea of the joint stock company developed originally to handle foreign trade in days when international financing was impossible, perhaps it can now be extended. Instead of using the concept only on a company basis, it might be extended to an inter-company basis. We might consider, therefore, the establishment of a national export-import corporation, beginning its use with countries that now take few Canadian goods. We should recognize that this may be more possible in Canada than in almost any other country, because so large a part of our trade now is concentrated in only a few firms. Likewise, large parts of the primary surpluses may soon be owned by government.

It seems possible, therefore, to work out in Canada a combination between the very large groups of manufacturers and wholesalers, to provide both the management and the finance to operate bilateral deals and to overcome the lack of facilities that faces any single corporation. The government, through the corps of trade commissioners, could furnish valuable assistance. Such a body could barter parcels of mixed Canadian merchandise for mixed imports from the non-dollar countries, and such merchandise could of course include capital equipment as well as foodstuffs or raw material.

This instrument might be used experimentally as an additional means of meeting the surplus-unemployment problems. If the subject is not approached in some such way, there is a danger that the various boards handling surpluses will operate independently on a give-away basis, and that the various local unemployment problems will also be tackled by relief, public works or other means that will alleviate but not remove the basic difficulty.

[Mr. Mayhew.]

This last part is purely my own, but it is the result of thinking while away and after coming home. We have to find some way out of this difficulty. If anyone knows of a better way, it is up to him to tell us. I assure the house that I am not speaking in any way for the government in offering this plan. I imagine it is new to the government.

Mr. J. A. Charlton (Brant-Wentworth): Mr. Speaker, in rising to take part in this debate I want first to congratulate the mover (Mr. Larson) and the seconder (Mr. Dumas) of the address in reply to the speech from the throne on the splendid job they did, considering the material that was placed at their disposal. I should like also to congratulate the hon. member for Grey-Bruce (Mr. Harris) on his appointment as minister of the new Department of Citizenship and Immigration.

In speaking at this time I am aware that much of what I have to say may be repetition, but I have no apology to offer in view of what was done last Wednesday by the right hon. Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner). It was bad enough to have to read the press report of the speech he made on May 28, 1949. To have to sit and listen to a repetition of it here was only adding insult to injury, and I am sure many farmers across this country will agree with that statement. What the minister hoped to prove is beyond my comprehension, unless it was to show—and I am sure it was not necessary to have further proof—that he is one of the smartest politicians, with a capital "P", that Canada has ever seen.

The low price program to which Canadian farmers submitted during the war years to my knowledge was without parallel anywhere in the world, and simple justice demands that their sacrifice be rewarded by the fulfilment of the government's pledge to provide a measure of stability in the post-war years, when economic readjustments might threaten to undermine farming. Here I should like to quote from a speech delivered by the former leader of the Liberal party, Mr. King, in a national broadcast on December 4, 1943:

> I wish tonight to thank the farmers of Canada for their magnificent contribution to the battle of production. I wish as well to appeal to them to continue to help hold the front line against inflation by continuing to support the price ceiling. If, to help win the war, the farmers are asked to accept a ceiling on prices, we believe they are entitled to a floor under prices to ensure them against an agricultural depression after the war. As an essential part of its post-war policy the government intends to ask parliament, at the next session, to place a floor under the prices of the main farm commodities.

In 1944, therefore, the Agricultural Prices Support Act was passed, with the unanimous approval of all members of the House of Commons. Section 9 (2) of that act reads:

in prescribing prices under paragraphs (a) and (c) of subsection one of this section, the board shall endeavour to ensure adequate and stable returns for agriculture by promoting orderly adjustment from war to peace conditions and shall endeavour to secure a fair relationship between the returns from agriculture and those from other occupations.

As most hon. members will realize, this was the Progressive Conservative policy formulated under our previous leader, John Bracken, and forced upon this government by pressure from our party and from farm organizations across the country.

Mr. Speaker: Order. I do not know whether I correctly heard the hon. member a few moments ago, but did I understand him to say that the Minister of Agriculture, who I notice is not in his seat, was a smart politician, with a capital "P"?

Mr. Charlton: Yes, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: I do not think the hon. member should use that expression, especially when the minister is not in his seat.

Mr. Charlton: Hon. members opposite applauded, and I thought I was paying the minister a compliment.

Mr. Speaker: I do not think the expression is permitted. I do not believe it is parliamentary to refer to an hon. member as a smart politician with a capital "P".

Mr. Charlton: Then I will delete the capital "P".

Mr. Speaker: I think the hon. gentleman should withdraw the expression, and I ask him to do so.

Mr. Charlton: Very well, Mr. Speaker. Last fall, however, the intention of the government was made clear in a resolution placed on the order paper by the Minister of Agriculture, as follows:

That it is expedient to bring in a measure to provide that section nine of the Agricultural Prices Support Act, 1944, shall continue in force for such period or periods as the governor in council may from time to time fix by proclamation, but shall expire upon the dissolution of the twenty-first parliament.

Since that is the only portion of the act that is workable as far as floor prices are concerned, I should say that resolution indicated the intention of this government to do away with that legislation.

By special efforts during the war Canadian farmers brought bacon exports up to a peak of 675 million pounds during the thirteen months ending December 31, 1943. By 1947 our exports had fallen to 225 million pounds, and in 1949 a contract for 160 million pounds was signed, with the quantity sent to Great Britain only a little more than half that amount. It was never expected that we could retain peak wartime bacon exports, but there was every reason to believe that a part of that market could and would be maintained. I want to quote the words of the Minister of Agriculture as they appear in Hansard for September 24, 1945, at pages 408 and 409:

. . . I wish to call attention to the contracts with Britain, because, after all, those contracts have established the floors right from the beginning of the war down to the present time.

And further:

If we in the dominion of Canada can produce 450 million pounds of bacon a year over and above what we require in this country, for the years that are ahead of us we shall just about be able to supply that part of the British market which we hope to retain after this war is over.

That we would retain a goodly portion of the United Kingdom market was one of the promises made by this government; but when the minister embarked upon his program of subsidy controls and other juggling tricks, many farmers, particularly western farmers, went out of hog production. By 1947 the minister explained to the House of Commons that the target amounts which were the incentive of Canadian production had been replaced in the negotiation of British food contracts by an estimate of the amount which Canadian farmers could supply. I well remember that on that occasion he took pains to explain that this did not represent a paring down by the United Kingdom government, but now he says it did. The truth is that as a result of his manipulation of feed grain subsidies Canada in subsequent years failed to fulfil the British bacon contracts, thereby encouraging and indeed forcing the United Kingdom to seek her bacon elsewhere.

With each downward revision of the contract our exports continued to fall below the stipulated quotas. The minister and his colleagues knew at least two years back, as he admitted in the House of Commons on December 10, 1949, that the United Kingdom would drastically reduce her imports from Canada; yet in the face of that fact the minister stubbornly maintained during the last election campaign that our British markets were not being reduced, but that they were quite normal. That is substantiated by Canadian Press reports of the minister's statements. I quote from a report dated June 23, 1949:

Agriculture minister Gardiner said tonight "There is no evidence" to support the contention of C.C.F. leader Coldwell that Canada is losing the British food market. Mr. Gardiner said, "The evidence is quite the opposite."

Then again on November 18, 1949, he is reported to have said:

"In any conversations I have had with Sir Stafford Cripps and food minister Strachey, I have never gathered the impression they were not prepared to take all the products they could afford to pay for from Canada," Mr. Gardiner said.

I had the privilege of listening to the minister in Brantford on December 5, when he reached the ultimate in double-talk and self-protection during his address to the board of trade farmers' night in that city. The minister's remarks seem fairly well explained in an editorial appearing in the Ottawa Journal of December 7. It reads as follows:

Our Minister of Agriculture makes a discovery.

In Brantford on Monday night our Minister of Agriculture, Mr. James Gardiner, told the board of trade there was "a very decided official effort" to drive wheat and other Canadian food products from the British market. Said he: "During the last two years a very decided official effort has been made to drive every one of these products (pork, cheese, beef, eggs, etc.) off the British market. And now that the four-year wheat contract is drawing to a close an effort is being made to drive off a considerable part of our wheat as well."

Sounds more, this, like Erle Stanley Gardner, the detective story writer, than James G. Gardiner, Canadian Minister of Agriculture. But as we must assume there is no case of mistaken identity on the part of the reporter, we feel constrained to ask: If this British official conspiracy against our food products has been going on for two years, how come that Mr. Gardiner just tells about it now? And telling it, not in the House of Commons, where it should have been told, and where Mr. Gardiner could be cross-examined, but to an audience in Brantford.

Not that we ourselves are at all startled by what Mr. Gardiner says. Ordinarily we should be inclined to say to him that at Brantford he said too much or too little, and to tell him that he should identify the British officials who allegedly work against us. What we feel, however, is that what Mr. Gardiner seemingly "revealed" in Brantford was not a revelation at all, but simply that he is now admitting something the British have been saying to us, and quite frankly, for more than a year—things which Mr. Gardiner, like the rest of us, knew all about, but which, because of promises he had made often to many, he stubbornly refused to admit. In other words, all that really has happened is that events have caught up with Mr. Gardiner, making a rubbish-heap of what he and some of his distinguished colleagues tried to tell us, for their own political good, before, during, and since the election.

One part of this very important speech has been missed in this editorial, and that was Mr. Gardiner's statement—very conveniently made, it would seem, in a city such as Brantford, which is one of the greatest implement manufacturing centres in Canada—that being a free trader himself, he would have to advise all farmers to buy where they could sell, in Canada. The only conclusion that could be arrived at from this statement is that the minister is now suggesting a policy of national self-sufficiency. This statement, from a minister of a government pledged to freer expansion of trade, would surely make strange reading to his western supporters.

A later confession of failure was made at the closing session of the tenth annual dominion-provincial agricultural conference held in Ottawa on December 14. I have here an article from the Globe and Mail, a Canadian Press dispatch dated December 15, 1949. The headline is, "Little bacon, no eggs: U.K. food pact collapses, still chance for cheese." The subheading reads as follows: "Gardiner says outlook dismal for agriculture: Hears price support plea."

The article reads:

Agriculture minister Gardiner today painted a dismal picture of 1950 Anglo-Canadian food contracts.

Of the 1949 contracts for bacon, cheese, eggs, salmon and apples, no contracts appear in sight except for cheese, and even that still is uncertain. Wheat is covered by a two-year agreement which expires next year.

The minister was finding it increasingly difficult to pull these United Kingdom contracts out of the hat just before Christmas. Yet, we have the statement made by the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) at Moncton on May 19, 1949, as reported in the Toronto Daily Star. The statement reads as follows:

The outlook today is far brighter than at the end of the war—wherever there are markets to be found for Canadian exports a Liberal government will find them.

Then we have the parliamentary assistant to the Minister of Agriculture trying his best, under difficult circumstances, to fly a trial balloon at the rural life conference held at the university of Western Ontario on December 28. I quote from a press dispatch appearing in the Globe and Mail on December 29, 1949, which reads as follows:

Farmers would be better without government aid is advice of McCubbin.

An early return to selling Canadian farm products by private enterprise rather than by government contracts was urged today by Robert McCubbin, M.P. for Middlesex West and parliamentary assistant to agriculture minister Gardiner.

"The sooner the dominion government gets out of handling the farmer's products the better the farmer will be in Canada," he told 100 farmers and junior farmers attending a three-day rural life conference at the university of Western Ontario.

"Government contracts were all right during the war, and for the first two or three post-war years, but I feel that now farmers should handle their own farm products," he said.

I remember quite well, Mr. Speaker, that two years after the war was over this party tried its best to persuade the government to get out of the field of business, and let the farmers' organizations handle the products for the producer. The parliamentary assistant's speech sounds very much like a good Conservative speech.

Mr. McCubbin: Oh, no.

Mr. Charlton: The article continues as follows:

"As a farmer, I wonder if farmers wish the government to keep bolstering their products with floor prices and subsidies."

I am sure, Mr. Speaker, that if the hon. member had attended as many protest meetings across the country as I did, he would know the answer to that. It would be a definite "yes". The article continues as follows:

"When the beef contract with Great Britain was cancelled, Canadian farmers shipped to the natural market, the United States, and got a better price. It was the same with poultry. In 1948 a record amount of poultry was sent to the United States. And it was all sent without government help," said Mr. McCubbin.

Speaking on the future prospects of world markets for Canadian farmers, he said he felt "it is impossible to balance our trade with Great Britain. To ask 13 million people to balance trade with 50 million is impossible—it never will be possible. We can never buy as much as we can sell to Great Britain."

Just here, Mr. Speaker, I should like to quote a few of the trade figures with Great Britain and the United States. I might say that during the last four years we have had a lesser plus trade balance with the United Kingdom than we have had a minus balance with the United States. I do want to quote those figures, and commencing with 1946, the unfavourable balance of trade with the United States was $496·7 million; 1947, $918·1 million; 1948, $283·6 million, and 1949, $427·8 million. The favourable trade balance for those same four years with the United Kingdom was: 1946, $397·4 million; 1947, $564·3 million; 1948, $389·2 million, and 1949, $401·8 million. It will be realized that practically every one of those figures shows a greater minus for the United States than a plus for Great Britain. If we cannot be expected to balance our trade with Great Britain, which only has 40 or 50 million people, how can we balance our trade with the United States with 150 million people?

The article from which I was quoting continues as follows:

Apart from the disparity in population there was a second big reason why Canadians would never balance trade with Great Britain, he said. "We are Americans, and whether we like it or not we are going to stay close to the States, and we are going to buy the majority of our goods from the States. We're a dollar country and we'll stay that way. Even if it means paying a little more for our goods we'll still buy from the States."

He said he felt that some solution to world trade problems might be found if "some method of common currency" could be brought into being to do away with exchange rates.

There had been a lot said about Britain's decision not to renew her egg contracts and her reduction of bacon contracts, "but you must remember the British have not changed in the last 500 years. They are still shrewd traders and are going to buy where they can buy the cheapest."

I might say, Mr. Speaker, that that is not much of a compliment to the people of Canada, to say that the British are smart traders and will buy where they can buy the cheapest; but he tells us that we are going to pay more for our products from the United States, whether we like it or not. He then goes on to say:

"Unless we can give them as cheap an egg as other people they will buy from other countries. And the same applies to bacon. If we can produce bacon at a price comparable with other countries, then Britain wants our bacon."

He suggested farm organizations could very well start formulating plans to lower food production costs to meet world and especially western European competition on the European markets.

Is it the parliamentary assistant's suggestion, Mr. Speaker, that the farmers should be singled out as the only group to lower production costs? We realize that we are pricing ourselves out of the European markets; but the same could be said of practically every other industry in this country.

I should be glad if the parliamentary assistant could tell us how to reduce our costs without becoming miners of the soil; and that situation, as I am sure all will agree, is a dangerous one. Farmers are not complaining so much about price reductions as they are about the fact that they alone of all producers are expected to take less income at the present time. If the prices of manufactured articles and services were falling, it is conceivable that the farmers' attitude might be different. But at the present time there appears little prospect of that; the tendency appears to be in the other direction.

As the result of new contract prices and their effect on all domestic prices, farmers face an income drop of between $200 million and $250 million this year from their average of the past two years.

Some serious consideration was given to this rapidly-descending deflated trial balloon put up by the parliamentary assistant. The minister discovered that it was not going to be so easy to throw his worn-out market basket back to the producers when surpluses began to appear and prices began to degenerate. It is the age-old squeeze to which the farmers are expected to submit, but national economics in these modern times are more delicately balanced than they were when the unorganized producers of foodstuffs were merely hewers of wood and drawers of water. Agriculture is an industry now, not only a way of life; and it provides a tremendous market for the goods of our mills and factories. Agriculture, however, provides that market only when it has buying power. By increasing the cost of operation and lessening the income, rural people will be forced to buy less and their plight will soon be reflected in bank clearings, sales and monthly employment figures.

This fact became increasingly evident to farmers, industry and government as unemployment increased rather sharply to levels near the peak of the thirties. Something had to be done, but how, and when? Criticism was piling up and protest meetings were being held. Finally, contracts were signed with the United Kingdom for bacon and cheese at greatly reduced prices. In the case of bacon the contract was for 60 million pounds of Wiltshire sides at 29 cents a pound, with a government subsidy of $3.50 a hundredweight; and the contract was for 75 million to 85 million pounds of cheese at 25 cents a pound, f.o.b. Montreal, with a government subsidy of 3 cents a pound.

Our Canadian Cheddar cheese is the best in the world. It constitutes one of the best markets for our surplus milk production. The United Kingdom could and would take more of our cheese; but as I have stated previously in this house, we must modernize our packaging and marketing methods if we hope to hold this market. It is my belief that we should establish a processing and packaging plant in the United Kingdom. When 90-pound Cheddars arrive there, they could be regraded, cut, and packaged as the demand required, and the trimmings could be processed into soft cheese. Certainly we cannot expect to sell our cheese by the same methods we used fifty years ago, against competition from packaged cheese of New Zealand and Australia. It is a question of going out and doing a selling job. It can be done.

The minister states that there is a little surplus of cheese. The total as of March 1, 1950, was 38,613,000 pounds as against 27,873,000 pounds at the same date in 1949, showing an increase of nearly 11 million pounds. What about the 17 million pounds held over by the government from last year? Is it still good or will it have to be sold to processors?

It was not, however, until January 26 that any announcement was made by this government regarding the floor price on eggs. For over a month and a half this government allowed poultry producers to flounder hopelessly. As a consequence whole flocks were liquidated at bargain prices. Ungraded eggs were sold for as little as 16 cents a dozen. The damage has been done, and unless hatchery sales increase considerably in the next two months, consumers will pay dearly for their eggs this fall because of another government blunder. The floor price of 38 cents to dealers, plus at least 4 cents for storage, is no guarantee to the producers. It is only the more efficient who can survive at that figure. Hence the low hatchery orders. In January, for instance, hatchery orders were only 25 per cent of orders in January, 1949. There is little increase in the orders for February. In order to avoid wide fluctuations in production, the floor price should have been set as nearly as possible to the average cost of production. In this way only the inefficient producer is forced to liquidate his flock, and violent price changes are avoided. This is one contract that was definitely lost, whether the minister admits it or not.

On January 26, while speaking at the convention of the dairy farmers of Canada which I had the privilege of attending, the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) tried to justify a 10 million to 20 million pound surplus of butter this spring when the new production season begins. Again last Wednesday he tried to dispel any fears of a little butter surplus and twitted the opposition that it was no more than we had asked for a couple of years ago. I believe the minister realizes all too well that the situation with regard to butter has changed somewhat in the past year. The minister or his government did not have the courage to deal with the margarine issue but passed the buck to the supreme court and from there to the provinces. Now that margarine is on the market, the danger is not a scarcity of butter as it was previously, but a surplus as exists today.

Appearing in the Ottawa Journal of March 3 of this year is an article headed "Six cent slash coming", which reads in part as follows:

> Dairy farmers are expected to submit to the government that they should have greater protection against the inroads of margarine. They set forth that in no other dominion is so little assistance given dairymen in saving their industry from the inroads of vegetable oil products.
>
> They submit that their income in 1949, even with the price support program, showed a decline of 12 per cent in the six months ending in September, and if this was spread over a year the loss to Canadian dairy farmers would total $46 million. With a reduced butter price the loss would be even greater.

Then a little further on:

> The increasing competition offered by cheaper margarine was indicated by January figures showing its consumption in that month totalled 8,152,000 pounds compared with 19,400,000 pounds of creamery butter disappearance.
> On February 1, total stocks were reported at 46,500,000 pounds including the 30,000,000 bought by the government under the price support program. This was 12,000,000 pounds more than the previous record for this date and 27,500,000 more than for the same date last year.

Then again, there was a Canadian Press report in the London Free Press of March 10, headed "Production of margarine exceeds creamery butter", which reads in part as follows:

> For the first month in history, the production of margarine has exceeded the output of creamery butter.
> It happened in February, when butter production in Canada is always at its lowest point for seasonal reasons. During that month, production of margarine totalled 8,646,000 pounds compared with creamery butter output of 8,494,000 pounds.

On Thursday, March 9, the minister gave a report to the house on the butter situation. I quote from Hansard at page 585:

For the benefit of hon. members I wish to state that the last ten-year average storage of butter, as of March 1, was, in round figures, 19 million pounds. The highest storages as of that date were 23 million pounds in 1940 and 24 million in 1947. The storage as of March 1, 1950, is 36 million. Of this amount the government had 25 million pounds.

According to the figures I received from the department the total is a little larger than that, but the difference is not too great, only 578,000 pounds. As a matter of fact that would be considered nothing by this government.

Incidentally I might mention a few other little surpluses which the minister seems to have pushed aside as unimportant. As of January 1, 1950, there were 10 million pounds of honey on hand—a million more than at the same date last year. As far as white beans are concerned, I am sure the parliamentary assistant to the Minister of Agriculture has heard about the estimated figure of 200,000 bushels above our domestic requirements. The minister might also use the word "little" to describe our potato surplus. Total holdings are only 432,020 tons as of March 1 of this year, the largest amount ever known in this country at this time of year. Translated into bushels it is 17,280,800. It is also interesting to note that to date this year we have exported a total of 3,298,112 bushels of table stock, while the total for last year was only 3,444,965.

The total hold-over at this time this year is 82,625 tons more than last year. These figures are taken from the dominion Department of Agriculture, fruit, vegetable and honey crop market report, No. 49. The figures for this year are 432,020 tons, while the figures for last year were 349,395 tons. That is the total for all Canada. This difference of 82,625 tons amounts to 3,305,000 bushels.

With regard to apples, there is also a little surplus in the country. Let us start with the maritimes. These are cold storage and common storage figures. In 1949 there were 9,111 bushels in cold storage. This year there are 210,165 bushels in cold storage. No doubt if there is a by-election down there shortly they will all be disposed of before that time. I shall not mention all these figures. In Quebec this year there are fewer apples in storage than there were last year. In eastern Ontario there are a great many more than there were last year. In western Ontario there were 229,951 bushels in storage last year; this year there are 258,783 bushels in cold storage. I remind the house that these are cold storage figures, and do not include common storage. There are many more in common storage as well. The total for all Canada as of March 1, 1950, was 2,332,663 bushels, as against 1,181,308 bushels at the same date last year. The difference is over a million bushels.

The Minister of Agriculture has bungled the agricultural policy of this country. He has laboured to create a condition in which it is most difficult for us to do business with our best customer, and an atmosphere of uneasy mistrust exists between Canada and the United Kingdom. He condemns Canadian farmers to their fate with only a vestige of former markets abroad left to them and no substitutes in sight.

This government has depended too much on ECA funds from the United States supplying the dollars for our United Kingdom markets—a fund which is diminishing rapidly for our use in view of large surpluses in the United States.

The farmers of Canada have paid the premium—a very dear one of over one billion dollars—on a policy of price stability handed to them by this government and accepted. Paid for in advance they now expect that policy to be honoured, not thrown back at them without even a return of premiums paid.

Not all Liberal campaign advertising followed through with what their leaders were saying. I have here an advertisement which appeared in the Prairie Examiner under date of June 13, 1949, in which it seems they were very frank in what they intended to do. Referring to their past policies they said this:

How successfully it tackled that job is charted above. Never have Canada's farm families been so prosperous, so secure. Never have they enjoyed so large a share of the nation's income.

But in referring to the future they say:

Floors under farm prices to assure farmers a minimum guaranteed return; the Prairie Farm Assistance Act to protect grain growers against the hazards of crop failure; long-range programs of conservation.

And so on. Then they say:

These and many other constructive steps reflect the Liberal policy "not only to provide farmers with a minimum of stability and security but also to help them to achieve an ever-increasing prosperity."

This advertisement was inserted by the national Liberal committee.

Mr. Fulton: An official pronouncement.

Mr. Charlton: I have consulted several dictionaries and there seems to be no difference of opinion as to the exact meaning of the word "minimum". They all agree that it is the least or smallest possible proportion.

From all indications thus far, Mr. Speaker, that Liberal election advertisement may prove to contain the truest words ever spoken or printed.

As stated by the parliamentary assistant to the Minister of Agriculture, the trend is toward the United States and depreciating the value of the United Kingdom market. I would point out to the government that the United States is a very unstable market for most of our agricultural products. They are a competitor nation, and while we may sell certain products there we are never sure that quotas or restrictions will not be placed on them as surpluses appear on their markets.

We have always had an unfavourable trade balance with the United States and a favourable balance with the United Kingdom, as figures I gave previously clearly indicate. It would seem that there are many articles now purchased in the United States that we could buy from the United Kingdom and thereby strengthen our own position with regard to the sale of our agricultural products. This would not endanger our own industries but simply transfer purchases from the United States to the United Kingdom.

I would therefore urge this government to arrange a trade conference with the empire countries and try to work out some solution to this very pressing problem. We must keep at least one foot in the United Kingdom market.

I would also urge the government to continue a support policy until adequate marketing legislation can be put into operation by producer organizations.

During his speech last Wednesday, the Minister of Agriculture jokingly referred to the fact that he had taken time to go out to a provincial by-election in his home province of Saskatchewan and had won that election. I should think, with the tremendous majority this government have, they would abandon the arrogant indispensable attitude they have adopted and that the hon. minister, having adopted the word "little" to describe our surpluses, could quite well forget a little politics and get down to a little business.

Mr. J. H. Harrison (Meadow Lake): Mr. Speaker, I should like to begin my short address with the usual congratulations to the mover (Mr. Larson) and seconder (Mr. Dumas) of the address in reply to the speech from the throne. In this connection, Mr. Speaker, I might say that the people of Saskatchewan are very much honoured in the choice of the mover of the address in the person of the hon. member for Kindersley.

No doubt farmers from the west will be surprised to read in Hansard the speeches delivered by the hon. member for Melfort (Mr. Wright) and the hon. member for Assiniboia (Mr. Argue) in which they protest against the twenty-cent interim payment on grain which was made last spring. Both hon. members suggested it should not have been made, and one said it should have been only ten cents or less. This is a strange attitude for hon. members representing agricultural constituencies. I know that in the southern part of my constituency, where we had three years of crop failure, this twenty-cent payment was an absolute necessity. They pointed out that the government had to borrow money. Naturally it had to; any farmer would be well aware of that situation, because he cannot have grain in his granary and money in the bank at the same time. Until the wheat is disposed of the money would not be available to make payments.

It was also pointed out that the interest charge in connection with this borrowing would be charged against the farmer. That may be so; but they would have had to go to the bank to borrow it, in any case, and perhaps would not have had as easy a time as the government did. The farmers may have had to borrow the whole amount whereas the government had to borrow only a small portion because it was selling grain from time to time. If the constituents of those hon. members are like mine, then they will have some difficulty in explaining the attitude they have taken in the house.

It was also suggested by the hon. member for Assiniboia that if the farmers had known in June of last year what they know now they would not have voted as they did. I went through my riding during the Christmas season, when they knew considerably more than they did at the time of the election, and I believe that there were more Liberals at Christmas than there were on June 27. Perhaps that is not because of any action I have taken, or that has been taken by any member of the government; possibly it is more due to the action of the C.C.F. government in Saskatchewan.

I do not wish to be unduly hard on hon. members across the floor, because I do not think they subscribe to much of the action taken by the Saskatchewan government. Certainly their attitude in the House of Commons is usually just the opposite to that of the Saskatchewan legislature, as indicated by the action it takes.

The further criticism is made that the twenty-cent payment was made available so as to influence the farmers at the time of the election in June. We realize of course that the system followed by the C.C.F. to exert influence at election time is somewhat different; but let us not forget that they have ways of influencing the voters.

Mention has been made of the election in The Battlefords, and I do not intend to discuss it in detail. Perhaps I might point out however that the first action taken by the C.C.F. candidate in that campaign was to go on the radio and make the statement that if he won the seat he would spend $200,000 in it. Of course that was done to influence the voters. Then, if we want to go back as far as 1944, we know that many things were said by members of the C.C.F. party to influence the voters.

I well remember that the leader of the C.C.F. spoke in our hall at Medstead, where I live. I went to hear him and I must say he made an excellent speech. Referring to the education tax that had been imposed in years of depression by the Patterson government, a tax which had been imposed for educational purposes in those difficult times, he described it as being very bad and said that it was inequitable. Indeed he went on to say that the tax was most iniquitous, and that they were going to take it off.

If it was iniquitous at that time surely it must be more so now. We have just read of the announcement of the Saskatchewan budget, and we find that in that budget the education tax has been increased from two per cent to three per cent. If it was iniquitous in 1944, then the iniquity is now fifty per cent greater.

I do not know whether hon. members have looked over the new Saskatchewan budget, but if they did they would see at once that it runs contrary to the attitude taken by C.C.F. members in this house. They tell us here that we are facing hard times, that we are likely to have a depression, and so on. They always take the stand that things are going to be tough. If that is so, one would expect them to have those thoughts in the back of their minds in Saskatchewan.

Delivering his budget in Saskatchewan it would seem that Mr. Fines said something to that effect. A report in the Regina Leader-Post, referring to Mr. Fines' budget, states this:

> "In my opinion," said Mr. Fines, "we have now passed the peak and from now on revenues will decline. I do not anticipate any sudden fall during the next six months but rather a steady gradual decline. What will happen after that time will depend on crop conditions and ability to dispose of our agricultural products at reasonable prices."

In the face of that statement one would expect that he would take some heed of the future. Instead of that however the budget is expanded, showing an increase of some $6 million, from $49 million last year to $55 million this year. Then, if one considers grants from the federal government, compulsory insurance on automobiles and hospital taxes, all of which must be classed as taxes, it is clear that the legislature this year is going to spend in that province about $69 million.

The attitude of the C.C.F. party in Manitoba, where the government is about to spend $39 million, is to the effect that this amount is out of all proportion, and that it is far too high. Yet, in Saskatchewan, with a C.C.F. government, they propose to spend $69 million.

Bearing these thoughts in mind, one finds it hard to reconcile the budget with what the provincial minister of finance says in his budget speech. It is hard to reconcile that budget speech with some of the speeches made by members of the C.C.F. in the House of Commons, wherein they point out that we must expect at least a recession. In brief, this means a contribution of about $80 for each man, woman and child in Saskatchewan, or a total of $400 for the average family of five. It is possible that if we do not continue to have favourable crops such as we have had in the last few years, when they have been fairly good, we will be pricing ourselves out of the land picture. If the tax is not paid the land will be taken over, rather than leave it in the possession of the people who now own it. The net debt as shown by the Saskatchewan budget has been increased by about $3 million, and the new education tax of three per cent will provide an additional income to the province of between $3 million and $4 million.

Some hon. members heard the discussion which took place the other evening following the speech of the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Martin) in which he pointed out that the means test was imposed in Saskatchewan on the $2.50 supplementary payment basis. I well remember during the campaign of 1944 seeing placards in my constituency displaying the legends "Humanity first" and "People before profits." These were distributed in considerable quantity. One would wonder at a government supporting those slogans imposing a means test of the kind indicated—and then going out and saying that the means test should be removed.

I, too, believe that that should be done; but certainly they are in a position to do it when it is imposed on only $2.50. Some hon. members may not be aware of this fact, that the share of pensions borne by the Saskatchewan legislature is no more now than it was in 1927, when the scheme was first established. At the same time the income of that government has been trebled. Other provinces, such as British Columbia, have been paying $50 or over. That is what they believe in and that is what they fought for in this house. Naturally you would think that they would do that in Saskatchewan.

Mr. Knowles: Tell us what Ontario and Manitoba pay?

Mr. Harrison: They pay something less, but they did not get up in this house in 1944 and say that we should pay a pension of $50. That is a point I want to make, that your actions are entirely different from what you say.

An hon. Member: Double-talk.

Mr. Knowles: Will the hon. member permit a question? Is he aware that within the last few minutes he has criticized the Saskatchewan government for spending too much money and now he asks them to spend more money? Which way does he want it?

Mr. Harrison: That is a good question. You have $69 million. I can easily tell you how to do it. In the 1944 campaign your leader criticized the then government for having too many employees. The hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell), when attacking the education tax, said that he would fire 600 of those people. You now have about 1,600, more than they had then.

I want to say an odd word or two about my own riding.

Mr. Knowles: Odd is right.

Mr. Harrison: I want to refer to some of the things required in that part of the country. The Prairie Farm Rehabilitation Act has proved to be most desirable. Considerable dairying is carried on in my constituency, especially in the southern end, but we are precluded from the benefits of this act because we are outside the Pre-Cambrian shield. The water table in this part of my riding has dropped 25 feet in the last 20 or 25 years and this is causing considerable concern to those engaged in the dairying business. They are faced with the possibility of having to reduce their herds at a time when they should not have to do so. When this matter is up for consideration I shall urge that this act apply not only to territories like my own riding but to the maritimes and other parts of the country. We should get rid of the "prairie" in the title of the act and consider it as a rehabilitation scheme for the whole country.

The hon. member for The Battlefords (Mr. Bater) referred to the curtailment of train service and urged the use of our own coal and oil, particularly by the Canadian National Railways. Some action should be taken to see that our own coal is used, possibly exclusively, even though it meant the payment of additional subsidies. If more of our coal and oil were used it would mean the saving of United States dollars and our own industries would be helped.

I noticed a newspaper article the other day stating that the Canadian National had converted 200 locomotives in the Alberta area to oil. That is a step in the right direction. The Lloydminster field, which is just to the south of my riding, would benefit greatly from such a move. The Saskatoon Star-Phoenix of March 9 states that the Lloydminster field is now in full production. Last year it produced 123,000 barrels and they say that they can double that production quite easily if a market is available. I repeat that consideration should be given to using our own oil and coal on our national railroad.

Many people back home will expect me to say something about the Hudson Bay railway. However, there is a resolution on this matter standing on the order paper in my name and I shall discuss this at greater length at that time. I want to thank the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Fournier) for the excellent building that has been erected at St. Walburg to be used as a post office and barracks for the Royal Canadian Mounted Police.

As hon. members may know, Meadow Lake constituency is in the northwest corner of Saskatchewan and it still leads the field in many respects. Although looked upon by many as being a region of lakes and timber—being quite a size it has its quota—there is a considerable amount of fertile agricultural land. The people are mostly engaged in agriculture, trapping, fishing, lumbering and the dairying industry. I should like to mention that something under 4,000,000 bushels of grain will be marketed this year in the town of Meadow Lake. It will be seen that we are not just an area of timber and waste water. I doubt if there is a country delivery point either in this country or in any other that will take delivery of anywhere near that amount of grain.

I was pleased to read in the Saskatoon Star-Phoenix of March 8 an article with regard to uranium production in the northern part of my riding. This article is dated Toronto, March 8, Canadian Press, and reads:

> The lake Athabasca area of northern Saskatchewan shows the most progress in the development of uranium ores, and Ontario has the largest number of prospects.
> These points came out Tuesday in a panel discussion at the annual convention of the prospectors and developers association.

And again:

> Undoubtedly most of the prospectors feel that a higher minimum price for uranium oxides should be paid by the federal government than the present $2.75 a pound.
> Lake Athabasca and the area centring at Goldfields shows the most progress because Eldorado

Mining and Refining Company Limited, a crown company, and Nicholson Mines, Limited, are engaged in actual operations.

That development is occurring on the north shore of lake Athabasca in the northern end of my riding. I want to devote the main part of my speech to the subjects that have been referred to already, the loss of our markets, our agricultural policy and the antidote that has been suggested by the Conservative party in the calling of a commonwealth conference. My constituents are mostly interested in that part of the throne speech that forecasts the establishment of floor prices for agricultural and fisheries products. Such a policy will assure them of stability in their markets.

The throne speech also touched upon international trade, external affairs, the cold war, defence, the Atlantic pact and unemployment. These form the backdrop for the speeches that have been delivered up to this time. In moving an amendment to the address the leader of the opposition (Mr. Drew) condemned the government for losing the British market and suggested a conference of empire countries to promote trade. There should be no difficulty in holding a conference at this time with Great Britain and the other empire countries but the first question that would arise would be: What shall we use for money to pay for your food products? As far as Great Britain is concerned, the fact is that she is not manufacturing enough to pay for the food products that she requires. The only things that are keeping her going are Marshall aid from the United States and the billion dollar loan from Canada.

At a conference such as has been suggested we would be faced with the proposition of either giving her goods on time until she could manufacture sufficient products to pay for them, or making a gift of our food products outright.

The hon. member for Lake Centre (Mr. Diefenbaker) moved an amendment with respect to a conference of this kind. In replying to the argument of the leader of the opposition (Mr. Drew), the Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott) said he did not see how a commonwealth conference could do any good. No doubt when he said that he had in mind the situation I have outlined; that if we are to give Britain our products, either outright or on time, we can arrange all the details through our regular trade commissioners.

It is my opinion that though we want in the worst way to do business with Britain, and wish to help her to the limit of our ability in getting back on her feet, there is also a limit to what Canada can afford to lend or give. As a matter of fact, on a per capita basis, no country has given as much to Britain as Canada, not even the United States; and this is a remarkable record for a country so young —still in the growing pains stage, if you like— with a population of less than 14 million people. As I have said, there is a feeling that we have done all we can afford for the present.

There is a growing feeling in the United States, and the same view is held by many Canadians, that Britain is not approaching her problems in a realistic way, that she cannot support her tremendous free social services and eat as well. These services run into billions of dollars, and include such things as two wigs for any bald person who applies. He cannot get only one; he has to take two, at a cost to the country of from £32 to £60 which, at today's exchange rate, means from $90 to $168 to cover each bald head. I do not know what such a scheme would cost in Canada, but in looking over this chamber I am afraid it would cost the country a considerable amount just to equip the members of this house.

It may also be said that Britain's approach to her production shortage is equally unrealistic for a country in such dire straits. Certainly no individual in a comparable position, owing the butcher and the baker and having to depend on loans and gifts to keep his family going, would try to get back on his feet by working eight hours a day for five days a week and buying himself a wig. In other words it is very doubtful if Britain can afford the luxury of socialism and at the same time pull herself out of the hole.

It can be argued, of course, that the eight-hour day and five-day week are very successful in the United States. That is quite true; but with their superior machinery of production they produce more in eight hours than a comparable labour force in England does in twelve hours. Not only do they not owe any money to their neighbours; they have all the food they require pretty well in their own back yard, and they have plenty of money in the bank. In short, they can afford a five-day work week; they can take a well-deserved holiday occasionally, and provide most of their own requirements. Those who pioneered in the Canadian west or elsewhere will remember when they were in a position comparable to that of Great Britain. They did not have tractors, or the machinery of quick and easy production that is available today. They had a team of horses, or perhaps a team of oxen. They had to buy everything they used. There were forests to cut and sod to break, and they worked every daylight hour. Finally they got on their feet. Now they can work eight hours a day, and if they feel like taking a day off they may do so, or they may have a couple of weeks at the lake, and things are as they should be.

It is possible that these thoughts were in the back of the minds of so many Canadians who were pulling for Winston Churchill in the recent British election. Certainly he could have made a clean sweep in this country if Canadians had been allowed to vote. No doubt they felt he would have insisted upon an approach to Britain's problems as realistic as when he came out with the "blood, sweat and tears" that brought us all through the war. Certainly it will be the hope of every Canadian, especially those in the west, that Britain will soon regain her prosperity, and have her eight-hour day and the odd holiday at the beach, as we and our neighbours across the line are able to do. Until she is able to do this, she will buy from us only what she has to have, or we will have to loan or give it to her. If she will approach her problems realistically she will not find Canada wanting in giving her aid, for by so doing we will help ourselves regain one of our best cash customers. I do not want this house to think I am condemning Britain too severely, but I believe she should face her problems in a different light. I should be one of those in sympathy with her, because I was born there and usually you have a soft spot in your heart for your native land. Certainly I have for mine. I do think, however, she might approach her problems in a different manner and obtain better results.

The answer of the leader of the opposition to our trade problems was to suggest a commonwealth conference. In the light of realities a conference makes little contribution to a solution. As I said before, you would be faced immediately with the question of what to use for money. The leader of the C.C.F. party (Mr. Coldwell) suggested that we should take sterling in payment of our goods. That would have some merit if we were in a position to extend more credit, because that is what it would amount to. Sir Stafford Cripps made that quite plain in an interview reported in the Toronto Star of February 11, when he said:

> The acceptance by Canada of sterling instead of dollars would not in itself solve the problem. This really wouldn't solve anything. It would only defer payment. It would really be a Canadian credit given without interest.

That is the long and short of it. The leader of the Social Credit party (Mr. Low) went a little further and suggested that the sterling might be reinvested in empire countries. I thought his proposal had considerable merit; but I am afraid the only country in the world in a position to accept that responsibility is the United States. That is about the only country with enough money to develop her own economy and have anything left over for development elsewhere. We are in the position of a young fellow just starting in business, who needs all his capital for his own affairs. Canada has much to develop here, and in fact needs outside money in order to proceed with the development of her own resources. Having that in mind I agree with the leader of the Social Credit group that the policy he suggested would be a good thing not only for us but also in the promotion of peace. I am afraid acceptance of that theory, however, is precluded by the fact that we require our money here in Canada.

The picture as to the sale of our agricultural products is not too dark, though it will require thought and wise merchandising by this government, and a realistic approach to her problems by Britain herself. She will buy a great deal from us in any case, but we may have to eventually reduce our acreage in wheat and grow more coarse grains, marketing that as beef in the United States. In other words we will have to make some adjustments. We may have to increase the production of hogs for our own use, because right now we are using about 90,000 per week and are not producing much more than that; and we are not going to be able to fill the small contract we now have with Britain.

The economic outlook for 1950 is one of continuing general buoyancy. Surveys of the research branch of the Department of Trade and Commerce covering all levels of government and some 17,500 business firms show that this year we will spend over $3,500 million in improvements and expansion of plants. This is always a criterion by which to judge the progress of a nation. This is the largest expenditure on expansion in our history, and represents 22 per cent of the estimated national income, which is expected to reach an all-time high of $16,250 million this year, or about eight times our pre-war income. We are the third largest trading nation in the world, though we only have one-half of one per cent of the population of the world. Per capita we trade three times as much as the United States, and twice as much as Britain. To further diversify and stabilize our economy, great oil fields have been discovered. Add to all this a great national leader in the right hon. Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent), and we can look to the future with confidence.

For my constituents in Meadow Lake I have only one wish to assure their prosperity; that is, that they may be up to their knees in mud about June 1. This, together with the leadership I have mentioned and the proven policies of the right hon. Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner), will assure a high level of prosperity for my constituents.

Mr. Angus MacInnis (Vancouver East): Mr. Speaker, the member who has just taken his seat referred to the fact that he had a soft spot in his heart for the country in which he was born. I would fear for what might happen to Britain if he did not have that soft spot. He wants the British to take a more realistic attitude toward their problems. Does he not know that, according to international statistics compiled by an international authority, Great Britain has made a greater and more rapid recovery than any other country that was engaged in the war with her? Great Britain's production is now more than 130 per cent higher than it was in 1938.

An hon. Member: And who paid for it?

Mr. MacInnis: It came out of the sweat of the people of Britain.

An hon. Member: And loans.

Mr. Knowles: These members do not know the difference between money and production.

Mr. MacInnis: They do not know anything. It is assumed that Britain was living on the loans she got from the United States. It is not so well known, however, that Britain has loaned to other countries, despite her meagre resources, approximately as much as she received in loans from the United States. If any hon. member desires the exact figure, here it is: Britain received in loans from the United States, £1,538 million, and she loaned to other countries £1,494 million.

The hon. member for Meadow Lake (Mr. Harrison) suggests that the British should work from sunrise to sunset so that they could buy from us. Does he not know that the longer the hours British workers laboured the harder it would be for Canada to compete with her in the markets of the world, as we must do? During the discussions we had in this house on the need for a market in Britain, I received the impression that we were not thinking altogether of helping Great Britain, that the predominant thought was of helping ourselves. We need the British market as much as Britain needs ours. I shall have to leave the matter at that for now.

Before discussing the various questions with which I want to deal on this occasion, Mr. Speaker, I should like to refer to two matters in which my name was brought into this debate. When the member for Kootenay East (Mr. Byrne) took part in this debate, he took exception to my reference to him as a representative of labour. I am afraid my hon. friend misunderstood me. I had in mind his position as a trade unionist and as a trade union official, of which he has been careful to remind us almost every time he addressed the house. If I made a mistake, I believe my mistake is understandable. I am in complete agreement with the hon. member when he says he is here as a representative of the people in his constituency. Of course, that is the position of all of us. I hope he will believe me when I say I had no intention of misrepresenting his position.

The other matter in connection with which my name was mentioned, also by the member for Kootenay East, is of a more serious nature. When he spoke in this debate, he concluded his speech in this way, and I quote from page 391 of Hansard:

> Recently in the debate the hon. member for Vancouver East (Mr. MacInnis) intimated that the union to which I belonged and of which I was an officer—since coming to this house I have resigned that office—has been thrown out of the Canadian Congress of Labour. This is quite true. If the hon. member meant what he said when he pointed out it was for ideological purposes, that was also quite true; the ideological reason being that my union steadfastly refused to become a part of or to join the political machine of the C.C.F. socialist party.

The short answer to that statement is that it does not square with the facts of the case. There are two issues involved in the struggle that is now going on in the international union of mine, mill and smelter workers. The first may be called a jurisdictional dispute between the mine, mill and smelter workers union and the united steel workers. With that, I am not concerned. I cannot let pass, however, the unworthy charge made by the member for Kootenay East against the Canadian Congress of Labour. It is a serious statement for one to make, and it becomes doubly serious when it is made by a person holding the responsible position of member of parliament.

It is well known that there is a struggle taking place in the trade unions of Canada to rid them of communist control. The people of Canada should know on which side the member for Kootenay East is in that struggle. Is he supporting the communists, or is he with those who are working to destroy the communist influence in trade unions? The mine, mill and smelter workers union is not the only union that was expelled from the trade union movement in Canada because of communist control. The united electrical workers union was also expelled from the Canadian Congress of Labour, and for the same reason. The Canadian seamen's union was expelled from the Trades and Labour Congress of Canada and, so far as I know, the Trades and Labour Congress is not influenced by the C.C.F.

The C.I.O. in the United States found it necessary to expel the international union of mine, mill and smelter workers from that body. Again, so far as I know, the political influence of the C.C.F. does not extend to the C.I.O. in the United States. Since this question has been raised, it may be of interest to the members of this house to hear the concluding paragraph of the report of the C.I.O. committee which investigated the charges against the mine and mill union. It reads as follows:

> For the reasons stated, therefore, and on the basis of all the evidence presented to it, the committee unanimously concludes that the policies and activities of the mine and mill are consistently directed toward the achievement of the program and purposes of the communist party rather than the objectives and policies set forth in the C.I.O. constitution.

The member for Kootenay East cannot be unaware of the fact that the mine, mill and smelter workers union is controlled by the communist party at top level. He cannot be unaware of the fact that Harvey Murphy, who is in charge of the organization of his union in the British Columbia district, is one of the top members of the communist party in Canada. He cannot be unaware of the fact that the government of Canada has found it desirable to deport from Canada organizers of the mine, mill and smelter workers union, the latest deportation being from the British Columbia district a few weeks ago.

In the struggle that is now taking place to destroy the influence of the communist party in the trade unions of Canada, the member for Kootenay East should clearly state where he stands, with Harvey Murphy or with Pat Conroy. Before he makes his decision I, as a friend, suggest that he have a talk with the member for Sudbury (Mr. Gauthier).

Mr. Gibson: Does the hon. member have to be a socialist or a communist?

Mr. MacInnis: The question does not arise, and when the member for Kootenay East makes statements such as the one I quoted from his speech he is parroting Harvey Murphy.

My main reason for taking part in this debate, Mr. Speaker, is to draw the attention of the government to the concern of the people of British Columbia, and the city of Vancouver, with the question of unemployment, as well as other important questions which are now confronting us. With 15·8 per cent of the labour force of the province unemployed, the question of unemployment has reached the proportions of a major emergency. Furthermore, the concern of the people of the province and of my city is increased by the unconcern of the authorities here.

When the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) spoke in this debate he concluded his speech by reading an editorial which appeared in the Montreal Star and which was headed: "1950, a Year of Adjustment." I think it was fitting that the Prime Minister should conclude his speech by reading a conservative editorial from the most conservative newspaper in Canada, for his own speech was as Conservative as anything I have heard in this house for many years.

That 1950 is likely to be a year of adjustment is one of the reasons why so many people are filled with concern. People are worried because they see the pattern of that adjustment emerging before their eyes, and what they are seeing does not inspire them with hope or confidence in the future. They have experienced similar adjustments in the past and know what they mean in human suffering. They see the cost of living increasing, employment decreasing and, worse still, they see the government throwing overboard the program for full employment and extended social security on which they won two elections. If anything further was required to complete their disillusionment and to increase their fear of the future, the Prime Minister's speech on the address provided it.

To hon. members on all sides of the house may I suggest that the times we are facing require of us that we should give the most searching analysis to the operation of our economic system. In my opinion the functioning of our economy has reached a stage which capitalism in the past has never been able to surmount. I shall explain what I mean. The so-called free enterprise system under which we operate fluctuates between periods of booming production and stagnating depression or, in other words, between high employment and mass unemployment. In boom periods, such as we have had since about 1939, everyone is more or less prosperous. When times are bad, millions are in want. We should try to understand what are the causes of our periods of prosperity and also what are the causes of our periods of depression.

Our periods of prosperity are caused either by supplying war needs, as we have done twice in the last thirty-five years, or a high demand for capital goods for use at home or abroad, or both. The amazing paradox of our system is this. When we have supplied our needs or other people's needs for capital goods, hard times begin. This is just the reverse of what the situation should be in any sane system of production. When our need for capital goods is met, we should then be in a position to start increasing our production of consumers' goods. But paradoxically, the reverse of that happens: we start curtailing the production of consumers' good

The truth of what I have said will be clear to anyone who will take the trouble to analyse the periods of prosperity and depression during the last one hundred years. It has been a succession of booms and busts, with the booms getting shorter and the busts getting longer with each economic cycle. Every time we have reached the stage when we should be in a position to make a mass attack on poverty in order to reduce it and to raise the standard of living of that part of the population which is always living below the line of health and decency, business begins to slow down, opportunities for investment begin to decline, unemployment increases and hundreds of thousands lose all they gained when production was booming. That has been the picture ever since I can remember, and it has been the picture for one hundred years before that. I am convinced that in this year of 1950 we are fast approaching a situation such as the one I have outlined, and that it will shortly overtake us unless something is done quickly to prevent it.

What can be done? Profiting by the lessons of the great depression and the knowledge of what we demonstrated we could do during the war, when as a people we had a national objective and a common purpose, the government in 1945 in a white paper outlined what they thought the future government policy had to be if we were to avoid the ups and downs which have always plagued our economy. On Thursday evening the hon. member for York South (Mr. Noseworthy) dealt with the salient points of the white paper, and I will not repeat what he said. I believe, however, hon. members will agree with me that the proposals contained in the white paper were worth-while aims. The authors of that document were aware of the fact that the social essentials mentioned therein, namely, opportunity, welfare and security, were lacking for hundreds of thousands of Canadians in the decade before 1939. Furthermore, by the achievements in production during the war, they were convinced that that lack was unnecessary. I am satisfied that that was the reason why we had the white paper.

The government itself placed a great deal of importance on that document at the time it was issued. On April 12, 1945, when the present Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe), then minister of reconstruction, tabled the document he had this to say, and I quote from page 808 of Hansard of 1945. It may have no significance whatever, but I may mention that April 12, 1945, was the day before parliament prorogued; it was later dissolved and we had the election of that year. The then minister of reconstruction is reported as follows:

> Mr. Speaker, acting in my capacity as minister of reconstruction, I desire to lay on the table of parliament a statement on government policy, having to do with employment and income, with special reference to the initial period of reconstruction.
> I commend this document to you as deserving careful study. It is perhaps the most important government document that has been presented to this parliament in recent months.

It is regrettable that the government so soon forgot its importance. Then he went on to show some of the things that were to be done. I am now quoting from page 810 of Hansard:

> A co-ordinator of public projects will stimulate the planning of public works and map out the timing and nature of government expenditures on public works projects. The purpose will be to have in hand at all times a shelf of public projects already planned and available when needed to stimulate employment in any given area.

We were told by the Prime Minister the other day that unemployment was spotty; that it was localized. That is just exactly what the proposals and the program outlined in the white paper were intended for, so that as soon as unemployment showed itself in any locality plans would be ready to provide for it.

I continue with the quotation:

> In order to keep the department in close touch with every part of Canada, local regional councils have been appointed, one in each province of Canada, and two in the large industrial provinces of Ontario and Quebec. These committees will have a permanent executive staff. The duty of the committees will be to keep the department informed of employment conditions in their respective areas, to recommend public projects suitable for their area, and to keep citizens within their area informed about the work of the department. These committees will be representative of the various economic groups within the area, and will include representatives of labour.

I have one or two other short sentences and I shall be finished with these proposals, the outline of which was given so dramatically by the minister of reconstruction on the date I mentioned. I continue:

> The need for immediate and extensive reconstruction measures has not yet arisen, but the machinery is ready, and action will be prompt whenever we enter into the period of transition following the defeat of Germany. However, the machinery cannot operate without a comprehensive policy to guide it in its working, and set the targets for it. Here also the pattern has been set, the principles have been agreed upon, and the way cleared for action.

The way was cleared but no action was taken. In the last paragraph we have this:

> To attempt to summarize the document would be an invitation to hon. members to avoid giving study to the document itself. Therefore, I will not attempt such a summary. Once again let me urge you to read and study this important statement of government policy.

Mr. Knowles: Did the government ever study it?

Mr. MacInnis: I doubt very much whether the minister ever looked at it after it was tabled. Perhaps they did, because later some of the proposals in the green book seem to have been taken from the white paper. Certainly, now is the time when they should put these policies into effect, because there are many places where they are needed.

We have been living in troubled times since the end of the war; but nevertheless in nearly all of the countries of the world, and particularly in the democratic countries, there has been a tremendous increase in production. I noted in a publication a few days ago that in the Marshall aid countries of Europe, with the exception of Germany, production had reached 130 per cent of pre-war. In all of the countries of western Europe shortages are disappearing, and on this continent they are disappearing also. Those who now go without the things they need go without them because they have not the money to buy and not because the goods they need are not available.

I have a feeling that the ease with which the transition was made from war production to peace production has lulled this government into a false sense of security. They seem to have forgotten how capitalism works. They seem to have forgotten the depression of the 1930's, and the events which led up to it. That they have forgotten or refuse to see is apparent from their insistence that the present high unemployment is due to the weather. But to show that there are other and more fundamental reasons for the unemployment, I shall quote from the Prime Minister's speech in this debate at page 53 of Hansard. He said:

> About eight or nine months ago, as hon. members know, there was an indication of some slackening of economic activity in the United States. Our pulp and paper people felt that it would be a prudent thing to reduce the size of their inventories in which so much of their working capital was tied up at rather high costs of production.
> I am informed the result was that this year there were about 35,000 fewer jobs in the woods than in previous years. That does not mean unemployment merely for 35,000 men.

The Prime Minister went on to show that many workers in other industries were thrown out of work because of the so-called prudent action of the managers of the pulp and paper industry.

When the hon. member for Beauce (Mr. Poulin) spoke in this debate last week he showed what happened to the men who supplied the wood to the pulp and paper people. I read from the English translation of the hon. member's speech. He said:

> I admit these production costs are rather high, but the companies have reduced their inventories.

He was referring to the statement made by the Prime Minister. I continue:

> They have not omitted, however, to reduce, in a shameful manner, the price paid to small operators for pulpwood, and the salaries paid to woodcutters for job work. In view of the price the paper companies get for pulp, it really is a shame that they should be allowed to pay these forest labourers the meagre wage they force them to accept with a knife at their throat, if I may say so.

The knife at their throat is the fear of hunger, the fear of unemployment. I am drawing attention to this quotation, Mr. Speaker, from the Prime Minister's speech and also from the speech of the hon. member for Beauce, because first they show the unemployment is not wholly due to the weather; and second, they show on what a slender thread the livelihood of the people rests under the so-called free enterprise system.

In my home city I do not find any of that easy optimism which flows so easily in the speeches of the Prime Minister. Authorities in Vancouver are convinced that unemployment is due to a slowing down of business. They know that unemployment is worse this winter than it was last; and they are afraid it will be worse next winter than it is this, unless planned action is taken to prevent it.

I hold in my hand a copy of a brief sent to the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) by the city council of Vancouver. I shall read from it two short paragraphs to show how the city council of that city looks at this question of unemployment. It reads:

> This situation cannot be referred to as unique or surprising, considering the fact that just prior to the last war our economy was reeling from the worst depression known to our country. On the contrary, the last great depression served to make our people and their government more aware of the hardships of an unplanned legislative approach to the emergency which arises when an economic recession sets in. This public consciousness grew and in fact became international when it culminated in the recommendations put forward for the benefit of the peoples of the world and incorporated in the United Nations charter.
> The heartening factor to the working classes of Canada, even before the recent overwhelming victory of the government in the last election, was the publicly expressed desire and plans to overcome the unemployment situation which is critical at the present time. These sentiments so expressed with apparent sincerity no doubt accounted for the said overwhelming victory at the polls.

The sentiments to which they refer are the proposals outlined in the white paper and in the speeches by members of the government made afterwards.

I, too, have a letter which I should like to read into the record. This letter is written by a man who for many years has had the job of trying to help those who fail in the day-to-day struggle of earning a livelihood. I believe this letter is far more realistic in its evaluation of present conditions than the editorial read into the record by the Prime Minister when he spoke. This man sees life from its seamy side. He comes in contact with people who are the first to feel the effects of hard times. I shall not read the whole of the letter, but I am sure the condition this man outlines as being the case in Vancouver is the case in every large centre in Canada. He says:

> We are writing, however, to ask you to strive for immediate action to provide financial assistance for families of unemployed persons who at the moment are not eligible for unemployment insurance . . . No assistance to cover food, shelter and fuel for this group is available at the present time in Vancouver. The high cost of living and housing problems, in our experience, make it impossible for families of average income to maintain proper standards of health and decency, and at the same time to put anything by for a rainy day. With jobs not available, savings gone and the breadwinner categorically rejected as ineligible for any assistance, unemployed citizens of Vancouver are now forced to rely upon their grocer, landlord and neighbours, or go the rounds for hand-outs.
> It seems unspeakable that in 1950, in the third largest city of Canada, veterans' and non-veterans' families are suffering while our three governments disclaim responsibility for action. As you probably know, in 1945 the federal government framed a comprehensive scheme for unemployment assistance, the provincial statutes of this province include permissive legislation covering assistance, and the city of Vancouver charter sets forth the responsibility for providing for its poor and destitute. Yet, year after year, as unemployment mounts, more families are left without the basic necessities of life.

Then he shows the consequences of this neglect. Referring to the family welfare bureau of greater Vancouver he states:

> This organization for twenty-two years has stood for strengthening family life, and we regard the present impasse as both unnecessary and alarming. We know how insidiously under-nourishment, fear and desperation are undermining the physical and mental health of parents and children. In turn these will result in greatly increased public costs in combating physical and mental illness and delinquency in all its varied forms.

I am sure if the editor of the Montreal Star had had the job of looking after these people he would not be so optimistic as he appeared in that editorial to be.

I should like to have made some comment on the amazing speech delivered by the hon. member for Winnipeg South (Mr. Mutch) in the debate, but time does not permit. May I point out however that the hon. member seems to have more than his share of fear. He is afraid of statism, whatever that is. He has a congenital distrust of planners—and my understanding of "congenital" is that it is something with which he was born. He has a holy horror of the welfare state, and looks with a jaundiced eye upon subsidies in any form. I do not know whether this completes his list of phobias, but I believe hon. members will agree with me that a man who is prey to so many fears is in no condition to make a full and objective study of the problems confronting our world today.

Mr. Knowles: He should go to a psychiatrist.

Mr. Gibson: He does not vote socialist.

Mr. MacInnis: And thank God for that. I would like to tell him a few things, but I do not suppose it would do any good.

Mr. Knowles: Just add to his fears.

Mr. MacInnis: A man who has as many fears as that is—

An hon. Member: Hopeless.

Mr. MacInnis: Yes, hopeless. You cannot do anything with him. In conclusion I would urge the government and the members of this house to get back to the thinking that produced the white paper—yes, and later the thinking that produced the green book proposals. Not only should we get back to the thinking but to the spirit of the times when we were all working for a common, national objective. Until we go forward to that stage, where we are thinking in terms of co-operation, and not everyone for himself, we shall not meet effectively those problems which today confront us on every hand.

Any policy based on the assumption that so-called free enterprise will permanently, or even over a relatively long period of time, provide full employment, is bound to lead to disaster. Capitalism will provide employment only so long as substantial profits can be made. This condition applies only in periods of scarcity. It always breaks down in times of plenty. If we are capable of profiting by the experience of the past we must without delay formulate and put into operation policies which will demonstrate to our people that the harder they work, the more they produce, the more secure their lives will be. Indeed the opposite of that is the feeling that they have today where plenty breeds poverty and misery.

At six o'clock the house took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

Mr. John Decore (Vegreville): Mr. Speaker, in rising to take part in this debate I should like to take this opportunity to congratulate the mover and seconder of the address in reply to the speech from the throne. The way the hon. member for Kindersley (Mr. Larson) and the hon. member for Villeneuve (Mr. Dumas) acquitted themselves has brought honour not only to themselves but also to the constituencies they represent. I should like also to pay tribute to the hon. member for Grey-Bruce (Mr. Harris) on his elevation to the very important position of Minister of Citizenship and Immigration. As a new member of this house I am sure I am expressing the sentiments of most new members here when I say the minister has been very kind in giving us guidance in our new surroundings and encouragement in our new responsibilities. Being an Albertan—and incidentally, regardless of the Social Credit government, my province is still known as sunny Alberta—I should like to congratulate the hon. member for Edmonton West (Mr. Prudham) on his appointment as parliamentary assistant. Those of us who know him well are familiar with his ability and honesty, and we know he will carry out his duties effectively and conscientiously. We hope that in the not too distant future he will be given even greater responsibilities which will enable him to take a more active part in the affairs of this country.

I am not going to talk too much about my constituency, except to say what I suppose most hon. members already know, that the constituency I have the honour to represent includes the biggest oil sector in Canada, the famous Redwater oil field. In my constituency we have very progressive farmers, who for the last number of years have gained world recognition of their efforts. Last year the farmers of Vegreville constituency managed to capture three major awards at the Toronto royal fair and the Chicago world show.

In recent days, and indeed over the last few years, we have heard repeated statements by some members on the opposition side of this house as well as other people throughout the land to the effect that a major depression is just around the corner and that this country is heading into economic ruin. While we must be on our guard, such utterances by these calamity howlers certainly are not in the best interests of this country. In this connection I should like to direct attention to an editorial which appeared recently in the Montreal Gazette; and I chose the Gazette for a specific reason, because we all know this particular newspaper supports certain political views in this country:

Ford Head Raps Calamity Howlers

A useful and timely public declaration was made in Toronto yesterday by Mr. Rhys M. Sale, the recently appointed new president of the Ford Motor Company of Canada. He spoke out firmly against the dangers and lack of real basis in the tendency in some quarters to fear and foretell a business depression in the next two or three years. He confessed with good reason to being worried to see "professional gloom-spreaders doing their best to talk us into a depression."

Mr. Sale was rightly concerned that, even without any valid foundation or signs of economic collapse, the talk of such calamity howlers could engender public apprehension which, in itself, could bring on business stagnation and instability. Evidence presented by public opinion polls and otherwise indicated an initial undercurrent of unjustified fear akin to the panic which largely contributed to the depression of the 1930's.

The motor company head saw "not the slightest" ground for the kind of fear being stirred by "some opportunists" and by scare reports on current economic problems which, while real, had hardly brought the country to the brink of disaster. He pointed to Canada's continuing increase in population, in capital investment and creation of new wealth, and the high level of personal earnings, as some of the factors warranting a firm confidence in the future, whatever moderate or temporary adjustments there might be from time to time in the business tempo.

We all realize that we are now in a transitional period, passing from a wartime to a peacetime economy. That is bound to be reflected in conditions throughout Canada. During the war it was quite an easy matter for us to dispose of our surplus products, especially agricultural products, because the whole world wanted our wheat, our bacon, our beef, and whatever we had to sell. But gradually the economies of the European countries are being adjusted, and of course we are experiencing certain difficulties. However, I repeat that Canada has no room for calamity howlers and gloom-spreaders. It seems to me some of these people almost wish there would be a major economic depression so that eventually they would be in a position to say "I told you so." My submission is that if they continue to spread fear and distrust their efforts might very well bear fruit and bring about a depression.

At this time I should like to draw the attention of hon. members to the matter of the trans-Canada highway. I appreciate that legislation in this regard was put through last session, and I do not want to create the impression that I am dealing with a dead issue or whipping a dead horse. However, I do not believe the question of the trans-Canada highway has been settled, especially in the prairie provinces. I am referring to the route, of course. As a representative from northern Alberta you would naturally expect me to favour the Yellowhead route; and for that I offer no apologies. However, I prefer to look at the matter not merely as one coming from the town of Vegreville or as an Albertan or even as a westerner, but rather from the Canadian point of view. I am not casting any reflection upon any government, but I do not believe for a moment that any of the provincial governments in western Canada are competent to decide the route on a national basis. Naturally they will be guided by provincial rather than national considerations.

The question of the trans-Canada highway route is of great importance to the Dominion of Canada from the point of view of defence. We realize that we are going to spend large sums of money for defence purposes this year. Again, the question of where this trans-Canada highway is to go plays an important part in our defence. I have been told that the three most westerly provinces seem to favour the Calgary-Kicking Horse route. If I were satisfied that the decision to have the highway go through Calgary and Banff had been made by competent persons with full knowledge of the relevant facts as to alternative routes, then I would be prepared to abide by such a decision. But I am not satisfied.

At the moment, I believe the Calgary-Kicking Horse route is only second best, and a poor second, when compared with the Yellowhead route. A reference was made today by the member for Calgary West (Mr. Smith) to a rat, and the important role that that rat landing in Edmonton would play in coming from the east and blazing a trail for the trans-Canada highway. An interesting question arises as to why this rat, instead of going through Medicine Hat and that part of the country, stopping over at Calgary, by way of the Kicking Horse pass, in which there are hundreds of miles of desert, arid land, sand, cactus and no water, chose to go to Edmonton. I think the answer is quite simple. Even a rat knows better.

On a prior occasion the member for Calgary West referred to Edmonton, and said he never knew about Edmonton until he heard of a little place called Leduc. It was Leduc that put Edmonton on the map. He went on to say that, so far as Edmonton was concerned, for miles around Edmonton there was nothing but swamp. It so happens that takes in part of my constituency, and I must confess that I have been getting complaints from some of my constituents about it. I should like to say that those of us who come from that part of Alberta have a high regard for the member for Calgary West. He is held in high esteem and, of course, we realize his ability in this chamber. But as you know, at times most of us have to go through certain misfortunes. We are bound to do certain things we do not like to do. It appears to be the unfortunate lot of the hon. member for Calgary West to have to represent a portion of that cow town called Calgary.

Mr. Harkness: It is the only town we have out there that anybody knows anything about.

Mr. Decore: May I tell the member for Calgary East (Mr. Harkness) that I have a lot of friends living in the city of Edmonton. They tell me that if they want to get away from it all after a hard week's work, and spend a quiet week end, they do one of two things. They either go out in the country, or they go to what is now rapidly becoming a suburb of Edmonton, Calgary.

Mr. Harkness: They certainly would not stay in Edmonton if they could help it.

Mr. Decore: The advantages of the Yellowhead route have already been enumerated on the floor of this house. I am sure some hon. members have seen the edition of the Edmonton Journal dated February 28 last, which contains an editorial on the subject. A portion of that editorial reads as follows:

> The advantages of the evergreen highway have been listed by the Yellowhead route association. The most important of them are as follows:
> 1. The evergreen highway is particularly important at this time as a potential military highway. It connects central Canada with the Alaska highway most directly, and also with Vancouver and Prince Rupert. "Exercise Sweetbriar" reflects the important place the Alaska highway plays in Canadian and United States defence thinking. That northern highway is only as good as the highways feeding it from the south. And the time to build a defence highway is long before its possible need for defence purposes.

I think, Mr. Speaker, that is very important. It is certainly something that should be taken into consideration. Again I suggest the provinces are not competent enough to decide this question of defence from a national point of view.

The article continues:

> 2. The evergreen highway would prove to be the finest motor tourist highway in the west. It would link four great national parks, and five splendid provincial parks, from east to west. Its whole length would run through beautiful country, wooded, parklike, and gently rolling; not through hundreds of miles of flat prairie with scarcely a tree in sight. It would attract tourists far into the country, keeping them in Canada for longer "spending" periods.
>
> 3. The evergreen highway would cost less to maintain, particularly through the Rockies, for the Yellowhead pass is lower. Its altitude is 3,717 feet compared with the 5,337 of the Kicking Horse pass and the 4,450 of the Crowsnest.

Mr. Smith (Calgary West): It does not amount to anything.

Mr. Decore: It does amount to a lot. I continue reading from the editorial:

> Snowfall on the Yellowhead route also is less. Mud, rock and snow slides in the Kicking Horse pass are a constant threat, while in the Yellowhead they are not, for the pass there is much wider.

Mr. Johnston: Just recently the trains from the Yellowhead pass had to go through the Kicking Horse pass.

Mr. Decore: May I also refer briefly to an editorial which appeared in the Edmonton Bulletin under date of February 9. This is what it says:

> The Kicking Horse route builds into the past where development and growth have come to a halt. The Yellowhead route builds into the future where development and growth will continue for a century or more.

Now, if I may go back to that rat again, which found its way into Edmonton, they tell me that rats like to be where there is a concentration of human beings. Now, I believe that is very significant.

Mr. Smith (Calgary West): So do I.

Mr. Decore: It is significant that this rat did not find its way into Calgary. I am told that rats are conscious, as a class, and they prefer not to deal with human rats.

Mr. Speaker: Order. I realize now that there are too many interruptions.

Mr. Decore: Although the proposal is that the province pay half of the cost, and the federal government the other half, the fact remains that 100 per cent of the cost of construction and maintenance will have to come out of the pockets of the Canadian taxpayers. The Canadian taxpayer is concerned, and should be concerned, to see that the money spent on this national project is spent to the best possible advantage of this great country of ours. Again I stress the matter of defence. It has been emphasized before, and I am stressing it again, that there should be some fact-finding board or, in the alternative, a royal commission appointed by the federal government to investigate all phases of the construction of the trans-Canada highway. As an alternative, an independent board could be appointed by the federal and provincial authorities to investigate the question of a route for this highway from Winnipeg to Vancouver. The enormous cost of the work, plus the effect it will have on our whole Canadian economy, makes it necessary that the matter be determined not only impartially, but also on a national rather than a provincial level.

I believe the question of the route of the trans-Canada highway, from the point of view of national defence, national development, and national economy, is of vital concern, not only to the people of Alberta, Saskatchewan and British Columbia, but to all Canadians, regardless of whether they are in Ontario, Quebec, Nova Scotia or any other part of Canada.

Mr. Ray Thomas (Wetaskiwin): I rise, Mr. Speaker, with a great deal of difficulty to take part in this debate. I was in a difficult curling match yesterday, and I find myself stiffened up in quite a few muscles.

This afternoon the hon. member for Vancouver East (Mr. MacInnis) put on Hansard the record of production in the British isles since 1938 and said that the production this year was 138 per cent of production in 1938. We all agree that Britain needs that added production. He left the impression, however, that it was as a direct result of the Labour government regime that this increased production came about. I have here a statement written by Mr. Alfred Edwards, a member of parliament in Great Britain; he was a Labour member during the last regime. This is what he has to say:

> . . . let us look at coal under nationalization and steel under private enterprise. Heaven knows coal under private ownership was no model. England's plight was desperate and she needed full production. So the Labour party took over the mines for the people and voted the equivalent of $100 million for mechanization to increase the per capita production of the worker. Yet from June to October, 1948, in spite of the increased mechanization and in spite of the fact that it is now the people's coal—not that of the greedy capitalists—the mines produced 158,000 tons per week less than in 1938.

He goes on to say that most of the privately run industries have shown a large increase in production since 1945 but coal actually shows a loss. As a matter of fact, Mr. Speaker, it has become a laughing stock in Great Britain. One of the cartoonists has pictured a miner talking to the minister and saying: You told us that under socialism we would get more money for less work. Well, we have given you less work. How about giving us more money? He also says:

> The next target for socialism is steel. This is by all tests the most efficient industry in England—perhaps in the world. It produced 11 million tons in 1938, more than 15 million tons in 1948 with but little increase in its mechanization. It has not had a strike in thirty years. Its wages rise and fall according to an agreed arrangement in relation to prices.

This is in striking contrast to the impression left by the hon. member for Vancouver East this afternoon. It looks a great deal as though Britain has made great advances not because of the Labour government but in spite of it.

From there I should like to go to another nationally run concern, and this time one here in Canada. Since the reduction in railway service was put into force—and I am exceedingly glad to see that the regular runs are in operation again—I have received numerous letters and resolutions. I shall not take the time to put any of them on the record word for word, but they ask for an investigation into all of the details; that is, into whether or not there was a coal shortage, and if there was, why; into the effect of the curtailment on the mail, l.c.l. service and express, the loss of business to busses and to the C.P.R.; and into the employment situation as it was affected at that time.

The minister dealt with the matter in part, as reported at page 23 of Hansard, when he said that the board of directors of the Canadian National Railways, at its meeting in October, 1948, approved an objective of 2,365,000 tons of coal for stockpile as at December 31, 1949. As the result of Mr. Vaughan's instructions to cut it down to three months' supply, the stockpile as of December 31, 1949, was 1,043,000 tons. If the minister had studied the matter he would have found that the suggested stockpile came to something like 532,000 tons of coal per month; that is, for four and a half months' supply. If the stockpile had been up to Mr. Vaughan's suggestion for three months we would have had in the stockpile one-third again as much coal as we had at the end of December. That extra third would have much more than taken care of the 25 per cent reduction in passenger service that was implemented by the C.N.R.

The minister gave us the relative mileages of the C.P.R. and the C.N.R. in eastern Canada, central Canada and western Canada, and he pointed out that the largest mileages of the C.N.R. were in central Canada where no coal supplies were available. What he neglected to say was that the Canadian National Railways serve the Brazeau collieries in Alberta as well as the collieries at Mountain Park, Cadomin, Nacmine, Luscar, and various other coal mining centres. We could go on and name others. We have the Drumheller and Camrose mines, all served by the Canadian National Railways. I should say, of course, that the coal from some of these mines is not suitable as steam coal but in a good many cases it is. During January I had the pleasure of spending some time in Mirror, which is the divisional point which serves Brazeau. While I was down at the station there I looked over the bulletin for trains; and believe it or not, there were no coal cars available to run into the Brazeau mine. Trains were running out of Brazeau under tonnage; and the Brazeau mines laid off 27 men in the month of January. The mines were there; the coal was there; the will to produce was there, and in a national emergency I would think that not only would the trains be running with full tonnage, but there would be extra trains put on. Where were the coal cars? Alberta has coal reserves of 46 billion tons. If they had wanted the coal we could have given it to them; and that also applies to the great mines in the maritimes. The great Cape Breton mines are served by the Canadian National Railways.

I would suggest that a complete investigation be made into the trans-Canada freight service to determine whether or not the full possible tonnage was being carried between the Alberta coal mines and central Canada, and between the maritime mines and central Canada, and to see whether or not full advantage was being taken of the possibilities and of the reserves of these two parts of the country. The damage that has been done by cutting down this service cannot be estimated. During the depression the Canadian National Railways cut off a part of the service between Edmonton and Calgary on Nos. 13 and 14 through Mirror, and Nos. 25 and 26 through Drumheller. That was only temporary, but in that instance it was a financial necessity; at least these lines were never restored to full service. They never needed full service again because as soon as the Canadian National Railways took off that service the Canadian Pacific service between Edmonton and Calgary had to put on extra trains. The Greyhound busses increased, and every little town has a fleet of trucks. The damage can never be repaired.

I have received numerous resolutions from various branches of the Canadian Legion in my constituency, and I should like to put one of them on the record at this time. This is from branch No. 229 Millet, Alberta, and reads as follows:

> Millet branch of the Canadian Legion, B.E.S.L. No. 229 heartily concur in the following:
> First, the paramount need for a basic increase in war veterans' allowance;
>
> Second, the crying necessity to bring widows and wives completely under the War Veterans Allowance Act to accord them the same benefits as the male recipients;
> Third, the importance of setting up a special parliamentary committee on veterans affairs.

I think the basic allowance is now $40.41 for a single man, and $70.83 for a married man. These veterans are being paid for the burning out they received during the first war. They are being paid for services rendered, and it seems a pity that they should be penalized to the extent that they are now getting less than the old age pension. I would strongly urge the minister to consider increasing the basic allowance for a single man to $50 and to $85 for a married man. This would be in accordance with the recommendations of service organizations throughout Canada.

Another point has to do with the widows of the recipients of those allowances. At the present time so long as they have a husband partially to support them they are in receipt of a supplementary allowance, but as soon as their husbands die they are penalized to such an extent that they get nothing.

I would strongly urge that the means test be abolished with reference to those in receipt of the war veteran's allowance, or at least raised to the minimum of the income tax exemption.

There is another group of veterans who deserve a great deal more consideration than they have been getting. We hope that the measure now on the order paper to give the imperial veterans the war veteran's allowance will be passed. I have in mind a man who came over here in 1919 and who has worked hard to raise his family. He has been an A-1 citizen ever since, and at the present time he is getting a basic allowance of $8.41.

I should like to add my plea to the many that have been expressed to give the veterans clear title under the Soldier Settlement Act. Last summer I was approached by one old soldier who had been unable to keep up his interest payments and was unable to pay anything down on the capital because of a bit of tough luck. He owed them $2,000, so he had to get off his land. As soon as he got off, that land was sold to another settler for $800, including improvements.

What is more, I say all this could be done without any further taxation. It could be done out of the wealth of the country. I see some hon. members shaking their heads. Possibly they will remember that the Minister of Finance said that money came as a result of production. I cannot entirely agree with the minister on that. At the present time money is the result of the producer's ability to pay back a loan with interest after he has paid for his own livelihood out of his production. During 1948 production in Canada was estimated at $1,250 per capita. It was also estimated at the same time that the available purchasing power in Canada was $1,000 per capita, thus leaving a discrepancy of $250 per capita short of having enough money to purchase what we produce.

All the federal government has to do to pay for all these things, and to put forth an immense social service campaign, is to issue debt-free money and place it in circulation so as to maintain a proper balance between our production and our purchasing power.

May I leave one thought in the minds of the government in connection with the payment of family allowances? At the present time these payments begin at birth and end just when a child is reaching a stage of advanced education and requires money most. I suggest that the payment of these family allowances should be continued until a child has finished its education or quits school.

May I say a few words about the subamendment moved by the leader of the C.C.F. party. The proposed amendment to subparagraph (2) of the Progressive Conservative amendment is expressed in broad general terms. This part might be considered to state the objective toward which we are all working, an economy wherein all our people are ensured social justice.

It appears to envision an economy so organized that every Canadian can be assured of adequate food, clothing, and shelter limited only by Canada's productive capacity. Nothing is said as to the method by which the objective shall be reached. We are left, therefore, to fill in the details of method as we think they should be applied to ensure that social security for Canadians is realized. We favour the broad objective, and we propose to support this subamendment, reserving the right to say by what means we shall attempt to achieve over-all social security for the Canadian people. We want to make it clear that we do not believe it is possible to attain adequate social security by schemes of nationalization, or socialization. And if it has to depend in the main upon taxation we shall never realize social justice in this country. I am confident that we can produce a great enough volume of goods and services that every Canadian can have plenty to eat and wear and to keep him warm, comfortable, and happy. I am also perfectly sure that, through the application of wise reforms in our distribution system, a just over-all level of social security is possible.

As to the second part of the subamendment, we think it is so vaguely worded that it might mean one thing or it might mean another. We interpret it to mean that the government should have pursued a vigorous policy of curbing communism and fascism in Canada, and while doing so, to respect fully the rights and freedoms of individual Canadians.

In dealing with all such movements the appropriate and effective method of attack is to remove undesirable living conditions in Canada. Certainly the government has far too long neglected to apply a remedy to the outrageous cost of living in Canada. Therefore we propose to support this part of the subamendment also. As I said before, we shall support it, but we reserve the right to choose our own methods as to the way in which it should be carried out.

Mr. T. H. Goode (Burnaby-Richmond): Mr. Speaker, I had determined to tell the house of the beauties of the constituency of Burnaby-Richmond, and the abilities of its people.

An hon. Member: What about the weather?

Mr. Goode: The weather is good, too. However, I propose to tell the house tonight something about what our people are thinking—in fact what people are thinking not only in the House of Commons but everywhere in Canada. We hear from time to time, and we see in the newspapers, statements regarding the President of the United States and his authority to manufacture the hydrogen bomb. We wonder why in this age of modern learning it is necessary at this stage of our development to start on a crusade of destruction, when there should be no need for it.

It seems that our people are thinking, and that everyone in this building tonight is thinking, of what can be done to stop the carnage before it gets started. We believe that the cemeteries of Europe are full enough of Canadian dead. We feel something should be done—indeed we know something should be done to stop any further battles before they begin.

The situation in the world today seems to be one of fear, and there is some reason for it. We have just witnessed the conquest of China by Russia, and in a moment I shall quote some figures to prove that Russia is now embarked upon a series of conquests, and that we are not prepared to take care of that situation when it develops.

I should like to quote from Newsweek of March 13, referring particularly to an item headed "How we stack up against Russia." As everyone knows, Canada's future is tied up with that of the United States. This article in Newsweek states:

> The United States army today consists of ten divisions, including one armoured division and one airborne. Man for man, these divisions have a great deal more firepower than any of the outfits of the last war; they are fairly well trained, and their morale is high. Except for the 82nd airborne and some infantry units in Japan, however, the army is undermanned and underequipped. In contrast, the Red army is believed to have between 150 and 170 divisions, including perhaps 30 armoured divisions, all of them at fighting strength.
> The United States air force consists of 48 groups, with roughly 3,300 combat planes and 5,500 transport and support planes in operation. The Red air force has about 9,000 combat planes and perhaps 8,000 transport and supply planes. More than half of the Russian combat planes are jets; about 300 are TU-4s, a long-distance bomber much like the American B-29.
>
> The United States navy has 7 large carriers, 8 smaller carriers, 1 battleship, 13 cruisers, 140 destroyers, 70 submarines, and 414 other craft in the active fleets. The Red navy has 3 battleships, 14 cruisers, 110 destroyers, about 270 submarines—

And a force of over a thousand vessels in support.

That is the situation in bare outline. The details make it rosy in some respects and blacker in others. As I said, the Canadian future is tide up with the future of the United States. I believe and my people believe that there is no necessity to bring these two great forces into conflict. We believe that if ordinary brains are used—surely we have them in high places—and men from the top level meet around the table, in the end the world will be better off.

It may be said that Russia has refused to keep its obligations in the past. That may be true, but we believe that one more try should be made so that the world may be kept from the destruction that will follow if we go on the way we are. Scientists have told us that if the H-bomb is used at this time it will start a chain reaction that will put civilization into chaos for 500 years; there will be no living on earth. Other scientists tell us that the H-bomb will never be used. There seems to be confusion, not only at the public level, on the part of the man in the street, but in the minds of scientists and government officials.

Before the British elections Mr. Winston Churchill said that if his party was elected he would call a conference at top level immediately to see that Russia and the western democracies were brought together and some type of solution arrived at. Unfortunately—perhaps fortunately for some—that conference will not take place in the near future. My suggestion is that Canada should institute this meeting. We have men of ability who have proved themselves in the United Nations to have what it takes to do this job. Canada should take the lead in bringing Russia and the great powers together to stop this great holocaust.

Mr. W. Chester S. McLure (Queens): Mr. Speaker, I did not take part in the debate on the address in reply to the speech from the throne last session, so speaking now in this debate I wish first to congratulate you upon your elevation to the honourable office you now occupy in this house. I want to comment upon the fairness of your decisions during this and the previous session. It is customary for speakers in this debate to congratulate the mover (Mr. Larson) and the seconder (Mr. Dumas), and in offering my congratulations I shall not attempt to add adjectives to those that have been used already. It would be just a repetition of the good things that have been said of these hon. members in connection with the impression they have made with their first speeches. In my humble opinion they did a good job with the text they had to work with.

I should like to take advantage of this opportunity to congratulate the hon. member for Cumberland (Mr. Black) upon his return to the house after an absence on account of illness of three or four weeks. The hon. member is first, last and always working in the interests of the maritime provinces. He is not here at the moment, but I want to say that I am glad to see him back and I hope his health will permit him to remain during the rest of the session.

There are many subjects referred to in the speech from the throne but this debate permits a member to speak on any subject, to travel far and wide without being taken to task for irrelevancy. Any remarks made by an hon. member during this debate cannot be considered to reflect in any way upon the private or public life of His Excellency. His Excellency simply read a document which was placed in his hands by his political advisers.

The speech from the throne is vague and full of pious hopes. I have listened to many of the speeches that have been delivered during this debate and have read others when I did not have the pleasure of being present when they were delivered, and I am fully persuaded that this speech from the throne is exceptionally vague and full of pious and porous hopes. I do not intend to follow the many speeches that have been made, but there are a few remarks to which I may have to refer.

In preparing the speech from the throne the government apparently recognized its unfavourable position. It indicated the weakness of the government to cope with the various situations that exist. It seemed to be an effort to forestall criticism by His Majesty's loyal opposition. The government seems to be quite orthodox because apparently it believes in making a full confession thinking that will be good for its soul. This speech from the throne is a clumsy exhibition of an effort to befuddle the public. It indicates complete confusion and failure to grapple with the grave situations which are overtaking this country, which are now ripening and bringing about climaxing hardships.

The two main causes of the hardships that exist in this country are unemployment and the lack of markets for our agricultural products. The remedies suggested by the government in the speech from the throne are not good enough to take care of the situation. For instance, widening the scope of the unemployment insurance legislation will not take the place of good jobs. Promises made before and during the last election campaign of undertakings which would provide employment, even if immediately effective, would not give our unemployed what they deserve at the present time. What has the government to offer with respect to unemployment? As I said a moment ago, they said they would widen the scope of the Unemployment Insurance Act.

Let us go a little further and look at something else which is causing great hardship throughout the country. What about the farmers' products? They are packed away in cellars and storage houses across this country, although the government promised to market them. Today the government knows full well that many of these products of the soil are unsalable at the present time, even at prices far below the cost of production.

An hon. Member: What products?

Mr. McLure: Well, if you do not know you cannot have been listening to what has been going on here for the last three weeks. The government knows better than I can tell them what those products are, and that they cannot be sold at anything like the cost of production. During the election campaign the government promised to find markets for our agricultural products, but have they done so? They have not. All they offer the farmer now is sympathy. They say to him, practically in these words, "Live, horse; grass will grow sometime." Addressing the meeting of the Ontario Liberal association in Toronto on April 7, 1949, the then minister of reconstruction and supply (Mr. Winters) is reported as follows in the Globe and Mail of April 8:

> Federal government departments have shelved a number of public projects which would act as a bulwark if depression threatened.

He is further reported as having said that these projects would provide employment when needed and would promote the general economic welfare. Of course you realize, Mr. Speaker, that this was election propaganda, which it was hoped would bring results when the voting took place. At the same time the minister referred to different works in different departments. This assurance, so glamorously announced by the minister and consistently nodded to by his cabinet colleagues, brought many a vote at the testing time on June 27.

Now let us look for a moment at this shelf of public works. Perhaps those works were shelved so solidly they have not been able to bring them out yet. As we look across the country we find a great many people now unemployed. The latest statistics give the total as something over 400,000, and I would say a later count would show that this total has now reached more than 500,000. But even at 400,000, the figure we were given a few days ago, why were not these public projects brought out, if they were real, in order to relieve that unemployment? Today many people are in desperate circumstances. I know that in several communities from which I have heard unemployment is so great that many people are almost facing starvation. Yet the government refrains from putting into effect this shelf of public works that were promised before the election. A short time ago I read an address by the right hon. Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) himself to the chamber of commerce of Montreal, I believe, in which he was reported as having said that the government was expecting and depending upon private enterprise to supply employment to the Canadian people.

He was further quoted as saying that the shelves of public works were not intended for that purpose, only under conditions and circumstances named by the government. So to all intents and purposes this was just a June 27 promise; and it did bring results. In all my memory, Mr. Speaker, going back over many years in political life, I must say I do not think there was ever an administration that entertained such callous disregard for truth before an election and such utter contempt for promises made after an election as the government now surrounding the Prime Minister.

Let us look a little further at some of the government's election promises. Mine is an agricultural province, and as a member representing Prince Edward Island I take pride in the fact that nowhere in all Canada will you find more skilful or more scientific or more productive use made of the land than in that province. Nor have we stopped at farming the land alone. In our rich Malpeque oyster beds we even farm the bottom of the sea. I believe not only the maritime provinces but also the rest of Canada can take a lesson in farming and producing from the soil of that little province of Prince Edward Island.

This government promised our farmers markets for butter, cheese, eggs, poultry, bacon and potatoes, as well as other things. Last spring before the election, when there was a surplus of potatoes, the government purchased all the potatoes the farmers had in the bins at 69 cents per bushel. A farmer could then use those potatoes for feed purposes, or if he chose he could dump them on the compost heap. This created the impression, in fact the promise was made, that the government would see that the farmers were protected this year on the price of surplus potatoes. Have they done so? Not as yet, nor does the problem seem to be anywhere near settled. Delegation after delegation waits on the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner), to see if some assistance can be secured.

Let me look at another government promise. Before the election of June 27, the aged people across Canada were promised old age pensions without a means test. Was that promise kept? No. Furthermore, to the men who were retired on small pensions, such as the men who had been working on the railway and were retired on an allowance of $27, $30, $40 or even $50 per month, the promise was held out that they would be able to secure the old age pension without a means test. Nothing has been done about implementing that promise, and it looks as if nothing will be done.

I should like to consider further this question of unemployment. Unemployment is growing everywhere, and it is becoming more difficult all the time to keep it under control. Even in the small province from which I come, there is a great deal of unemployment. It has reached such proportions that the mayor of Charlottetown issued a proclamation to all citizens requesting their assistance in a jobs campaign, in an effort to overcome the growing number of unemployed who are daily seeking food and lodging. It is difficult to have to mention these things which are happening in your own constituency, but I am mentioning facts. If some of these promises had been fulfilled, especially those concerning public works, the city of Charlottetown would not have half the unemployment it has today.

Speaking about public works, I may say that the city of Charlottetown certainly needs public works. For the last three or four years, we have been promised a public building to house all the dominion offices and the post office. Although it has been promised for three years, it is difficult to get a statement about that public building. Even the site of it has not been fully established. The land owners and tenants, who have been ordered to vacate their premises by April 1, are wondering what the public works department is going to do. Many of these people have not had their properties appraised, nor have they been paid for them. I believe this is something that the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Fournier) should attend to immediately. I hope he will not keep these things a secret. I should like to know how many of these land owners have had their properties appraised, whether they are going to be paid for them, or whether the government is going to walk in and take the land, then make a settlement afterwards. I believe this house, and the people of Prince Edward Island, should have a statement from the Minister of Public Works as to when construction of the building will be commenced. In the interests of solving the unemployment problem, construction should be begun immediately.

There are other matters with which I should like to deal. For instance, the city of Charlottetown has been promised harbour improvements for years. The Andrew Rae Duncan commission strongly recommended these harbour improvements. Perhaps the Minister of Public Works will say that certain improvements are being made. I will admit that some money has been voted for the last two or three years for improvements to the shipping sheds on the marine and railway wharf. Apart from that, these promised harbour improvements have been dangled before us. One harbour improvement which would create a great deal of employment is the building of a marine railway slip. This was definitely promised by all parties as far back as 1911.

In 1911, the Conservative party promised to build a drydock, or marine railway slip as it is probably called now. When the Borden government came into power, it immediately started to fulfil its promises. The main one was the Borden-Tormentine ferry that was there promised and they fulfilled it, giving us the first real communication we had with the mainland, even if we had gone in under terms for proper transportation in 1873. Besides this, the Borden government went to work and purchased a shore property on which to build a marine railway slip, or, call it what you will, a place for making repairs to our steamers. What happened? They bought the property. They let the contract for the machinery to firms in Liverpool in England, but the war broke out and this matter was left dangling again until 1921 when it was again raised as a promise to the city of Charlottetown that a marine railway slip would be built.

There is the work there for a slip. We have our own boats that always have to be repaired. For instance, this railway slip should be built to take care of all the boats in the service for the province of Prince Edward Island; it should be built to accommodate all our ships. Here are a few of them that are in the government service: the Brant, the Sorel, the Prince Nova, the Charles A. Dunning, the Prince Edward Island, and the S.S. Abegweit. In addition to these there are all the small ferry boats running between various points on the island, as well as the tugs and dredges. If we had a proper marine railway slip repairs to these boats would give employment to 200 or probably 250 men the year round right in the city of Charlottetown alone. We have the mechanics and the machine shops that can do all this work. But where does it go? Every particle of it is taken away from our province; as is said, we cannot work below the water line. Where does it go? It goes to Pictou, Halifax, Saint John and Sorel; thousands and thousands of dollars' worth of work is going away that should be available for the employment of our own labourers in the province of Prince Edward Island. In addition there is the danger entailed in taking these boats on the trip up to Sorel or even to Saint John or Halifax. In 1941 we lost the S.S. Charlottetown when she was on a trip up to Saint John, I think it was, for the purpose of overhaul. We should have from this government some assurance as to whether they are going to endeavour in any way to fulfil the promises made during the last election campaign and for years before that.

A little while ago I said it was difficult to get information on any subject dealing with matters in our province. From time to time I have had my difficulties with regard to particular matters concerning our own constituency. I want to cite one of them which occurred here a few days ago. On March 6 I directed to the Minister of Transport (Mr. Chevrier) a question which was as follows, as reported at page 467 of Hansard:

> I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Transport. Has the Canadian National Railways made a general proposal to all the other provinces similar to that which has been made to the government of the province of Prince Edward Island, namely, to take over all the highway bus and truck services, and to place them under the control of the board of transport commissioners.

Here is the answer I received from the minister:

> That is quite an order. I have had no advance notice of the question, but I may tell my hon. friend that I am not aware of any such movement. In any event I am sure that the Canadian National Railways, or for that matter the federal government, would have no jurisdiction over provincial highways on Prince Edward Island, and over one or two of the other matters which my hon. friend mentioned in his question. That is about the only information I can give him at this time.

The minister's answer was really a surprise to me when he stated that he was unaware of any such matters going on between the government of one province and the Canadian National Railways of the dominion. Surely the minister should be aware of what is taking place in connection with the Canadian National Railways transport matters. With your permission, Mr. Speaker, I should now like to give him a little bit of information, as follows. Negotiations had been going on for a long time between the Canadian National Railways and the province of Prince Edward Island. As a matter of fact, the railways presented a brief; and in that brief they outlined all that they were willing to do and what they wanted to procure for themselves in this swap. We all know, of course, that the whole question would be one of jurisdiction unless it could be amicably agreed to between the parties. However, whatever the board of transport commissioners and the public utilities commission decided upon would be all that was required to have this highway traffic system established. The government of Prince Edward Island were so much at sea with regard to this railways' brief that was presented that they could not come to a conclusion. They did not feel like accepting, and neither did they feel like rejecting, the proposals of the Canadian National Railways for them to get co-ordination of the bus, truck and railway services all under the Canadian National Railways management in that province.

Before the railways' brief was presented, and it is dated February 15, a great deal had transpired by letter and conversation; because on February 22 the Prince Edward Island government stated in a letter to the vice-president and general manager of the Canadian National Railways at Moncton as follows:

Please accept for yourself and convey to Mr. F. A. Gaffney our appreciation for the lucid presentation of proposals contained in your letter of February 15, and for the exceedingly clear and forceful manner in which the same was presented verbally on February 8 and 9.

I have before me a clipping with reference to the whole matter giving the full details and the full brief of the Canadian National Railways. It is too long to read, but I shall be glad to send it over to the minister. Then I should like to have my question really answered, and the question is this.

Has the Canadian National Railways made a general proposal to all the other provinces similar to that which has been made to the government of the province of Prince Edward Island?

If they have, and if the governments of the different provinces were to accept it, the Canadian National Railways would be in absolute control of all transportation not only in and out of the province but in control of all transportation and the highways of the province. There must be something in it or they would not have gone to such detail in making up such a long brief.

I should now like to touch a little on transportation. To a province like Prince Edward Island, which is largely agricultural, transportation is without doubt the most important problem. I have endeavoured to emphasize that on the floor of the house several times since 1945. We have grappled with all the governments to see if we could not get the promises of confederation properly fulfilled. We have argued with them; we have tried different ways. So far we have had a certain amount of success. That success was accorded to us by the Borden government when they inaugurated the Borden-Tormentine ferry system.

For a few minutes I should like to give a little information regarding a second ferry system that we have in Prince Edward Island, and which has been in operation during the summer months, namely, the Northumberland ferry service from Wood Islands to Caribou, known as the Wood Islands-Caribou ferry service. Before the last war private enterprise took up this matter and established the ferry boats. At that time a great many people thought that private enterprise was making a mistake. Public works helped them build their docks for docking, and gave them some other assistance. The government also gave them a subsidy. That system has now grown to such an extent that the Canadian National Railways, and perhaps the government as well, are anxious to get control over it. The Northumberland ferry was first brought to the attention of the Canadian National Railways when they had to reduce their fares on the Borden ferry to compete with the Northumberland ferry. The idea is to get control, and it was rumoured for quite some time that that was what was going on. I asked a question with reference to it. There must have been something in the rumour. I could deal with it if I had a little more time.

When the Northumberland ferries were making their contract with the government they had written into the contract what the fare would be, and the farmers knew what they would have to pay for their produce being trucked across by this ferry.

Another part of Prince Edward Island which was promised a ferry, and which should have it, is the West Point-Buctouche area. This was one of the live issues during the last election campaign; but since then, like many others, it has been thrown into the discard. The farmers up there seem still anxious to have that ferry system.

As I said a moment ago, transportation to our province is the greatest problem, and the most important one that we have. I want to put on record the growth and development of the Wood Islands-Caribou ferry. It was stated when they started that they would not carry a thousand cars. Last year 67,000 passengers were carried from the first of May to the first of November, which is the period they run. During that time they carried 16,000 automobiles and over 5,000 commercial trucks. This will show hon. members why we have the rumours that the Canadian National Railways, or some governing body, want to get hold of this ferry, even if there is no railway line running to either terminal. It has already been said that if the government or the Canadian National Railways take over this ferry they will put on a boat that will be 50 per cent larger than the present largest boat there. That might be looked upon as quite a promise. Why do I say that? I say that because the Charles A. Dunning, one of the larger boats that we have there, draws too much water at certain times. We had extreme difficulty in getting the Minister of Public Works to dredge the harbour further so that she could dock properly. There seems to be some underlying principle or motive in the whole thing, which is to get absolute control of our ferry system and of our transportation system on Prince Edward Island.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: I am sorry to interrupt the hon. gentleman, but he has exhausted his time.

Some hon. Members: Carry on.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Is it the unanimous wish of the house that the hon. gentleman shall continue?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. McLure: I do not want to impose on the generosity of the house. I shall deal with just one item. On Wednesday last I was anxious to ask a question of the Minister of Transport. I hesitated quite a while because it had to do with reefer cars. I want to explain why I asked the question. The question was as follows, as reported at page 564 of Hansard:

> Will the minister advise, instruct and demand that the Canadian National Railways provide reefer cars for the shipment of potatoes and turnips from Prince Edward Island? The shortage of reefer cars at the present time is the greatest they have experienced in years.

The minister answered in this way, as reported at page 586 of Hansard:

> I should like to deal with a question asked yesterday by the hon. member for Queens. It had to do with the supply of reefer cars and part of it was to this effect.

Then he read the question I asked. Following that he said:

> I promised the hon. member that I would get a report from the Canadian National Railways. I am advised by them today that there are 454 reefer cars on hand or in transit for Prince Edward Island traffic.

They might have been five thousand miles away and still have been in transit.

> This total is made up as follows:
>
> | | |
> |---|---|
> | Cars on P.E.I. | 292 |
> | In transit at Cape Tormentine | 43 |
> | Moncton | 30 |
> | Truro | 22 |
> | Campbellton | 22 |
> | Monk | 45 |
> | Total | 454 |
> Officers of the Canadian National Railways report that a satisfactory position as to reefer cars is considered to be around 300. When it exceeds this figure there is danger of transportation difficulties arising in connection with the movement of the cars. Therefore my hon. friend can see that there is no shortage of cars. On the contrary, the situation is a good one.

May I say in closing that the onus was placed upon my shoulders when it was suggested that I had given wrong information and did not have the facts of the case. However, while at that time I did not reply, I knew I had the correct information, and really felt sorry that the minister had been so misinformed, or that he had received the wrong information from someone.

Since that time the minister has received the real information, and now he realizes, whether he wishes to admit it or not, that I was correct. The greatest shortage of reefer cars that ever existed at this season of the year is there at the present time.

Mr. Chevrier: I cannot allow that statement to go unchallenged.

Mr. McLure: You will have an opportunity as soon as I am through. I shall only take a moment.

Mr. Chevrier: If the hon. member would allow me: I said I could not allow that statement to go unchallenged. The statement I put on the record included figures and facts given to me by the Canadian National Railways. I believe them to be correct. They have informed me that there is no shortage of reefer cars on the island. I have to accept that statement, and I think the hon. member should, too.

Mr. Gibson: It is a good story, anyway.

Mr. McLure: The minister would have to accept it, too, were it not for the protests from the potato and turnip marketing association. I believe they wired him, and they sent me a copy of the wire. I believe I have here the reply the minister sent to them, in which he admitted that he did not realize the conditions were so bad.

Mr. Chevrier: I made no admission in the telegram.

Mr. McLure: Perhaps I had better read it.

Mr. Gibson: What paper are you quoting from?

Some hon. Members: Time.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I am sorry to interrupt, but the hon. member's time has expired.

Mr. Chevrier: Let him finish his speech.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Has the hon. member unanimous consent?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

Mr. McLure: Thank you, gentlemen. This is the minister's reply to the potato and turnip marketing association:

> Re your telegram. Am unable to understand situation described. Canadian National assures me supply refrigerator cars reasonable and that they will have no difficulty in moving the balance of the crop. Any empty refrigerator cars are being sent from central regions to take care needs in maritime provinces. Would appreciate receiving any additional information which you may have.

They proceed, then, to give this information which, I believe, was sent by letter. They say that at the present time it would take 2,000 reefer cars to move the crop that is there ready to be moved. While the price is not good, yet they do not want to see the supply destroyed. As one of the biggest shippers said, it would take 50 cars every day for the next 40 days to clean up the freight that is there ready to be transported.

I did not wish to bring this matter up, but any time I have spoken with reference to reefer cars it was always, as I thought, in the interests of the Minister of Transport (Mr. Chevrier), the railway and the people of Prince Edward Island. No man can ever prove against me that I would ever place on record any figures referring to this situation which were not founded on the best possible facts. I hope this matter will be cleaned up and that our people will have made available to them sufficient cars to move the potatoes and turnips still unsold.

(Translation):

Mr. David Gourd (Chapleau): Mr. Speaker, allow me to congratulate you on the flawless way in which you carried out your high responsibilities throughout the second session of 1949. I also wish to congratulate the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) and his colleagues on the choice they have made in selecting Mr. Larson and Mr. Dumas as mover and seconder of the address.

I also wish to take this opportunity to extend my congratulations to the hon. member for Kindersley, the mover of the address in reply to the speech from the throne, as well as to my good friend, the member for Villeneuve, whose constituency is next to mine. He brought out all the most interesting and important points concerning his county and northern Quebec. He certainly deserved the honour which has fallen to him. I am also extremely pleased to congratulate him on having been elected with such an overwhelming majority as the representative of this new and beautiful county of Villeneuve which so proudly bears the name of the illustrious late prelate. The Liberal party is fortunate in having men of his stamp, who work for the development of our beautiful country.

Mr. Speaker, I now wish to deal with a subject very dear to my heart, namely the county of Chapleau, which I have the honour to represent and which is one of Canada's wealthiest districts as far as agriculture, mining and lumbering industries are concerned. In connection with agriculture, I pointed out in my first speech in this house, in 1945, that in 1944 we had harvested, in the Abitibi district, $25,150 worth of wheat, $472,540 worth of oats, $31,680 worth of barley and $2,261,500 worth of hay, not to mention thousands of dollars worth of buckwheat, rye, peas, beans and mixed grain. Moreover, our potato crop amounted to $587,820, which does not include the returns from alfalfa, turnips and corn. For that reason, I beg the Department of Agriculture to assist as much as possible this new part of the country through grants for cold storage and drainage. The Kapuskasing experimental farm being quite remote, the district should have enough agronomists to establish demonstration farms in every parish. Needless to say, a promoter specially attached to our district would be quite welcome.

I also emphasized, in another speech I made in 1946, the importance of the mines located in the northern part of the province of Quebec and I mentioned the mining of such metals as gold, copper, etc. Here are the figures I gave: the yield in gold was $32 million, and in copper, $22 million, these amounts being exclusive of all other minerals. I then added that in the best interests of our national economy, the government should continue providing assistance to mines.

During the same speech I also said that we had exported 100 million feet of cord wood as well as millions of cords of pulpwood. Since there are such abundant natural resources in my constituency, they should be developed. First, the railroad between Barraute and Beattyville, which follows exactly the same gold mining zone and so forth, should be extended to Bachelor lake and later to Chibougamou. At present, several mining companies cannot work their mines due to a lack of transport facilities. I therefore appeal more particularly to the Canadian National Railways to examine further all the requests sent me by public bodies, such as municipalities, chambers of commerce and the economic planning council, which all show the urgent need for building this railroad immediately. As I already said in a speech I made in 1949, would it not be fair that Quebec should secure from the federal government the funds required to build, within the province, a section of the trans-Canada highway proportionate to those in other provinces? I said that the present highway, leaving the Manitoba boundary at 35 miles from Kenora and passing through Fort William, Kapuskasing and Ottawa, is 1,390 miles long. I would also point out that the highway from Point Fortune in the province of Quebec to the New Brunswick boundary, near Edmundston, covers a distance of 388 miles. That means that it is located in Ontario to the extent of 75 per cent. If my proposal were carried out, the road starting at Kenora would still pass through Fort William, Hearst, Kapuskasing and Cochrane. It would cover a distance of 894 miles in Ontario. From Cochrane, it would head for La Reine in the province of Quebec and thence through La Sarre, Mont Laurier, Montreal and so on until it reached the New Brunswick boundary. The highway would then cover a distance of 828 miles in the province of Quebec, which would seem fair to both provinces. This alternative would also make the distance from the western provinces and northern Ontario to Ottawa, Montreal and Quebec 56 miles shorter. I do not see why the Ontario government does not build a road over the mere forty miles between Norembega and La Reine. This has been long requested by the boards of trade, and I know whereof I speak because I have been chairman of the Amos board of trade.

A short while ago, I organized a delegation of some of my constituents to meet northern Ontario boards of trade, M.P.'s and M.P.P.'s and get them to keep on exerting pressure on the government of Ontario and urge it to carry this road as far as the Quebec boundary, at La Reine. This connection means a great deal to us all, for it would help strengthen the ties of good will between the two provinces.

To these suggestions, may I be permitted to add another very important one. It is about unemployment. We feel it a little, as everyone knows. Would it not be possible to reach an agreement with the government of Quebec to help colonization by building new roads to the north, as far as lake Mistassini and Mattagami? In addition, this would be a good way to check unemployment. Colonization would be the first to profit by the roads that would lead towards new land and I am sure that with the assistance given to settlers by the Quebec government, the unemployed in question would all take advantage of such developments to go and settle in these parts.

If I have spoken of my constituency and of its natural wealth as represented by agriculture, mines and forests, and if moreover I have taken the liberty of requesting your aid in developing it, it is because I earnestly wish for the progress of my constituency, that is to say, for that of my own country.

[Mr. Gourd (Chapleau).]

(Text):

Mr. E. W. George (Westmorland): Mr. Speaker, I wish to join those who have preceded me in this debate and congratulate the mover (Mr. Larson) and the seconder (Mr. Dumas). Their constituents must feel justly proud of their representatives in this house. I do not propose to tell the house all about the constituency which I have the honour to represent as that would take too long. However, I do intend to present to hon. members an idea which, if it turns out to be sound, as some of us think it is, will help to solve the present unsatisfactory economic condition of the maritimes. I believe this is the first time this project has been discussed in public.

In my opinion the maritime provinces are the best place in the world to live in, but we lack some of the economic advantages enjoyed by other parts of Canada. We complain because we have not enough industry and were not allotted enough industry during the war. The reason has always been given that we have not enough power. We have plenty of coal but not enough electricity. I am sure that everyone in this house is willing to help the maritimes and we have been told many times to present our problem and we would have all the assistance we needed in arriving at a solution.

I believe the solution has been found. It is called the St. Mary's tidal project which it is claimed will develop a maximum of 2,336,250 horsepower. This development would take place in the counties of Westmorland and Albert in New Brunswick, and Cumberland in Nova Scotia. I should like to take this opportunity to pay my respects to the hon. member for Cumberland (Mr. Black), who returned to the house this afternoon, and to wish him the best of health for the remainder of the session.

If this project were completed the Chignecto canal could not be built over the proposed route for reasons which I shall give later. I do not wish it to appear that I am trying to prevent the building of the Chignecto canal and the development of hydroelectric power at that site; I am suggesting an alternative plan which would provide for a canal and the development of two and a third million horsepower as compared with the 135,000 horsepower that would be developed under the proposed Chignecto plan. If this plan is adopted much credit will go to the Chignecto canal committee which has done so much to mould public opinion into realizing the need for some such plan.

The St. Mary's tidal project is the brain child of Mr. W. A. S. Melanson, C.E., M.E.I.C., of Moncton, New Brunswick, and is the result of many long years of study and work. He is to be congratulated upon his vision. Not every possible site for tidal power development has been investigated, and the remarks which follow will deserve the attention of all persons interested in the welfare of the maritimes. The study of any tidal power development in the maritimes could not be justly undertaken without reference to and a review of the report on tidal power, Petitcodiac and Memramcook estuaries, as published by the department of mines and resources, Canada, 1945, part 1—test, and part 2—plans, disclosing full results and findings of the field investigations carried out from August, 1944, to October, 1945, by the firm of H. G. Acres and Company, consulting engineers, Niagara Falls, Ontario.

Unfortunately the adverse findings of this report from an economical standpoint have prejudiced public opinion to such a degree that too few have bothered to read it in full. It is doubtful if our men of letters or science, either within or without our institutions of higher learning, have given this all-important subject of maritime welfare the study it most assuredly deserves. Notwithstanding this seeming prejudice, this report contains concise, terse treatises on tides peculiar to the bay of Fundy and its tributaries; on the astronomical effects of the moon and sun in their various phases on the tides; on rock-fill dam construction on unstable foundations; on inlet and outlet gate structures; on various types of hydraulic turbines and their selection; on electric generators with power house and transformer station design. All these subjects, with many others, are interwoven into a mass of finite scientific information, permitting a proper step by step design of each and every structure embodied in such a large development.

The economic feasibility of the entire project was defeated by two adverse physical features of the site. These were, first, the existence of 80 feet of silt, mud and gravel in the beds of both estuaries; second, the great difference in the relative size of the two estuaries. I will not go farther into the reasons why the Petitcodiac tidal project was unsound, except to say that if it could have been built on a more favourable site a saving of nearly half the estimated cost could have been made.

Situated ten miles from the Petitcodiac-Memramcook estuaries, there exists the confluence of the Shepody bay and Cumberland basin at the head of Chignecto bay. These two relatively large estuaries are separated by the rock-bound Maringouin peninsula that terminates in a low headland at cape Maringouin, which juts out westerly a distance of one mile into Shepody bay. Here Shepody bay, with its tributaries covering an area of 70 square miles, and Cumberland basin, with its tributaries covering an area of 60 square miles, are separated by the narrow cape Maringouin. It is proposed to construct two barriers, one from the westerly side of cape Maringouin across Shepody bay to join with the rock masses of Grindstone island and St. Mary's point, and the other from the easterly side of cape Maringouin to Ragged point on the Nova Scotia shore.

Of the many physical features of the existing rock masses that would enter into the general scheme of this proposal, the greatest and most advantageous is the present rock formation of St. Mary's point. Jutting out from the mainland at Harvey bank, Albert county, there is a peninsula of rock formation that extends in an easterly direction to St. Mary's point. It then crosses St. Mary's ledge, St. Mary's anchorage, Grindstone ledge and Grindstone island, the outer tip of which was at one time the original St. Mary's point. The height or elevation of the St. Mary's and Grindstone ledges are just below mean sea level and therefore would permit the economic construction of a large number of inlet gates. St. Mary's anchorage or Grindstone island would be ideal for the construction of a navigation lock to permit ship passage at all times. The length of the St. Mary's peninsula is 3 miles, a little over half the distance across the mouth of Shepody bay. These facts explain the origin of the title given to this proposed tidal power. The outlet gates, power house and additional inlet gates would be located at or near the south end of the Maringouin peninsula, a very central location for the distribution of power to the entire maritime provinces.

British admiralty chart No. 354 indicates the existence of the rock formation in the bed of Shepody bay at an average depth of eight fathoms below chart datum, while across the upper portion of Chignecto bay the rock formation is indicated at an average depth of five fathoms below chart datum. Very little mud or silt is indicated except on the south side of Maringouin peninsula, where there exists a body of mud. However, this is a decided asset as it will be required to make the core of the Cumberland basin dam. Mud for the Shepody barrier can be obtained from the Shepody or New Horton flats. Therefore, drilling and testing for foundations are not necessary, as not one iota of doubt exists about the rock formations.

The question of choosing either the Cumberland or the Shepody basin for the high and low water basins has been given careful consideration from all economical and practical angles. These are as follows:

1. The rock formation across the mouth of the Cumberland basin is just at the proper elevation for the most economical construction of outlet gates.

2. The southeast side of the Maringouin peninsula is the only practical location for the power house.

3. A rock-fill dam with mud core is the only economical manner of erecting a barrier across the mouth of Shepody bay.

4. The head channel can be cheaply excavated across cape Maringouin and rock used in the rock-fill dam across Shepody bay and part of Cumberland basin and permit construction of a series of inlet gates near the power house.

5. The St. Mary's rock formation permits very economical construction of inlet gates, of which there must be a large number.

6. Along the shores of Cumberland basin and its tributaries there exists the bulk of the marshlands in the maritimes, estimated to contain 40,000 acres. Using Cumberland as a low level basin will reclaim all marshlands and will forever do away with the necessity for dikes and aboiteaux. It will thereby save the federal government, the provincial government and the farmers the high cost of reclamation.

7. The existence of a large gypsum processing plant at Hillsborough, working twenty-four hours a day, with United States markets, depends in large part on water transportation for their supplies to reach the market. Also the proposed construction of a fertilizer plant at Weldon will require water transportation.

8. Of the two basins, Shepody bay is recognized as the one taking precedence in volume of navigation.

Shepody bay has therefore been proposed as the head basin and the Cumberland basin as the low water basin. The designation of the Cumberland basin as the low water basin for economic reasons will somewhat alter the proposed scheme of a canal across the isthmus. However, this proposed power development is so vast and will be so beneficial to the entire maritimes that the greatest benefit to the greatest number must be our guiding spirit.

Much praise and credit is due to the Chignecto canal committee, to the group of businessmen and to the newspapers that so nobly supported them in their struggle to make the maritimes and Canada conscious of the necessity of the navigation canal. Mr. R. Herbert Cooper, who saw the possibilities of the development of power along with the canal benefits, is deserving of much praise. His scheme is practical and contains much merit. The use of Cumberland basin as a tail race basin in a big tidal power development will not diminish the necessity for a Chignecto canal; it will rather enhance its cause.

Out of the Shepody basin there are two or three possible routes. All proposed routes have merits and some demerits, but ultimately would join the waters of the Petitcodiac river with Shediac harbour. There is one route that possesses many natural features. Along this route the distance from Moncton harbour to Shediac harbour is 15 miles. This route would reduce the distance between the bay of Fundy points and upper Canada by approximately 75 miles over the proposed route across the Chignecto isthmus.

The tidal factors which make the development of power possible are long and detailed. I will not go into them. I have here the data on Fundy tides and the possible power development; and with the permission of the house I should like to place it on Hansard.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Has the hon. member the unanimous consent of the house to put this material on Hansard?

Mr. Knowles: Is it tables and figures?

Mr. George: Yes, and it will be very unintelligible if I read it. It will be very interesting reading.

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

(See page 724.)

Mr. George: From the information available, it would appear that Mr. Melanson's project is workable. It is estimated that the cost will be in the vicinity of $190 per commercial horsepower. This compares favourably with present-day construction, which is from $200 to $250 per horsepower. I do not feel that the capital cost is as important as the operating cost. If the operating costs and upkeep are nominal, and we can get this vast supply of cheap power, then the expenditure would be justified.

The federal government is spending large sums of money protecting approximately 40,000 acres of marshland from the sea. The building of this project would protect the lands in the Cumberland basin area, and would save several millions of dollars which are required to reclaim these lands. There would be no more maintenance on dikes and aboiteaux.

In the Petitcodiac river area the water level might be above the marshlands. In this case, I am told on good authority that there would be no problem in draining the land by the use of pumps as in Holland. There should be sufficient cheap power available for that purpose. The other alternative would be to buy the land and let it out to sea.

I have great faith in the future of the maritimes. We are gradually turning from a wood economy to an agricultural economy. The forests have been depleted faster than reforestation has taken place. We are building for the future, and in a hundred years the world will need all the food it can produce. In order to prosper in the maritimes we must have industry, and industry must have an abundance of cheap power; I am sure there would be a ready sale for all that can be produced. I sincerely hope that the government will see its way clear to start a survey of this project immediately. I might suggest two phases of this study. First, a review of the H. G. Acres report, as applied to the St. Mary's idea; second, an actual engineering report on the St. Mary's project.

Another good reason, Mr. Speaker, for doing something about the project appears in a press release in the Moncton Daily Times, under date of March 10, 1950. It is headed, "Opposed to Quoddy bill," and reads as follows:

> The budget bureau informed congress today President Truman opposes a pending bill to establish the Passamaquoddy tidal-power project.

If we needed any more reason, Mr. Speaker, I think we have it right there.

I am not asking for this because it is a part of our maritime rights. I feel that we have heard too much about that. I ask for it because we are part of Canada, and because all our natural resources should be developed in order that we may continue to play our part in contributing to the prosperity of the dominion.

(Translation):

Mr. J. O. Gour (Russell): Like most hon. members who spoke before me, I am pleased to congratulate the mover of the address to His Excellency the Governor General, the hon. member for Kindersley (Mr. Larson) and the hon. member for Villeneuve (Mr. Dumas), the seconder, for the manner in which both fulfilled their task.

I also take this opportunity to congratulate Mr. Speaker—who is not here right now—and his assistants who have presided with fairness over the debates. I also wish to congratulate my colleagues for their courtesy to the members of the opposition, and for being so kind to them although I feel sometimes they are much given to exaggeration. However, I do not envy their fate for there is every indication that the Liberal party will be in office for many years.

Divine Providence protects us by giving us men as talented as our Prime Minister, the Right Hon. Louis St. Laurent.

I thank the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner)—who I am happy to see at his desk—and all the members of the cabinet for the support prices on agricultural products such as bacon, butter, cheese, eggs and so forth.

I have the honour of representing a constituency both urban and rural in character. I know that in Russell, thousands of farmers are very thankful to the government for this help. Several farmers of my constituency own herds of more than fifty milk cows, market each year from 200 to 300 hogs, and keep flocks numbering 7,000 to 8,000 hens, which they raise for the sale of eggs and poultry.

The dairy cattle of our county have been tuberculin tested for more than twenty years. Last year, my constituency obtained the best results in Ontario. As a result our cattle find a large number of purchasers, especially in the United States; this enables our farmers to breed cattle on a large scale and get satisfactory prices for their herds. They are less concerned with the high price of their products than with their net earnings with which they are supposed to live decently on the farm.

Like myself, farmers feel that the price of what they buy is too high. That also goes for the cost of living for our urban population, particularly of the workers.

I have the honour of including in my constituency one of the most prosperous towns in Canada. I refer to Eastview where an extremely up-to-date high school, a community centre, a hospital and other buildings indicative of its increasing importance are now seen beside other great institutions.

My riding includes many other localities of note, for instance Manor Park, an attractive village which is but three years old; Rockcliffe, where the most important airport for national defence is located; Overbrook and Billings Bridge, blessed by the fact that the diocesan seminary is built in the vicinity; Billings Bridge, moreover, connects with Uplands, one of the most important points for commercial air transportation. Finally, there are many other small towns inhabited by wage earners all of whom agree in hoping for a lower cost of living.

In my opinion manufacturers should be content with a smaller profit and undertake to compete on world markets. I think their profits are inordinately large and their prices too high. Farm implements, motorcars, ranges, refrigerators, furniture, textiles, lumber, plumbing and shoes are all too dear by 10 to 20 per cent.

If they cut down their prices, manufacturers would increase sales and enable farmers and small wage earners a better chance to buy more of those goods. This would compel them to increase production, which would entail an increase in manpower and would thus stem unemployment.

I can hear hon. members opposite deplore the loss of our markets and the ridiculous prices obtained for our produce. Let me remind them, however, of the years of 1930 to 1935, when our farmers were selling 200 pound hogs for $7 to $8, shipping prepaid, cattle weighing from 1,000 to 1,200 pounds for $12 to $15, shipping also prepaid, while the present government pays a premium or subsidy of $8 on a two hundred pound hog, grade A select, for export, which now brings the farmer from $40 to $50. An animal weighing from 1,000 to 1,200 pounds now sells for $125 to $150, that is ten times more than in 1942.

If I am not mistaken, one or two local agreements are made by two or more persons, while international agreements are made by two or more governments. Here, therefore, is the first rule. It is the price that counts. We have proof of that. We gave billions to Great Britain. I voted in favour of that bill myself; we did more than anybody in the world to help other nations out of their predicaments and we are still willing to do so. When the time comes to arrive at an agreement, the only thing that counts is the price of the goods. After all, that is only natural; that is the human way of looking at things!

All agree that we are one of the most skilful nations; then we can produce so as to meet the prices of the other honest competitors without lowering our present standard of living.

I would point out that people should spend less money on alcoholic beverages because, first, alcohol degrades the soul and too often takes up a considerable part of the essential income of large families. The same thing applies to many forms of entertainment which are far from being necessary to the welfare of our people.

Mr. Speaker, I believe I have given a suggestion which could prevent unemployment; I now wish to suggest another way of going about it. Since the government of the beautiful province of Ontario, in which I live, does nothing to help the farmers I feel compelled to request more from the federal government. I would therefore request the Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott)—he is not here but I trust that he will read my speech, which I have already mentioned to him—as well as the Minister of Agriculture to improve farm loans. Let me give an example. A hundred acre farm with good buildings warrants a loan of about $4,000. How can a farmer set up his sons or how can a young man try to set himself up on a farm with such a small amount? First, it costs about $4,000 to get an average herd of cattle and the equipment necessary to operate this farm, not considering the $10,000 to $12,000 required for the farm itself. If this farmhouse were built in a city, a loan of $4,000 or more could easily be secured. I therefore maintain and assert that the farm loan is not practical for our farmers.

More than half the farmers of my district did not apply because they feel it is useless. According to information I have from reliable sources, approximately half of the applications for farm loans were turned down during 1949-50 in Ontario.

I have also a request to make to the Minister of Transport (Mr. Chevrier) and to the Minister of Public Works (Mr. Fournier). I have here a plan in connection with the Nation river project, and works already carried out by the Ontario government. I am pleased to congratulate our provincial government for this well-balanced plan. I could submit a copy to each of the ministers concerned. I would now like to read a few lines showing clearly the importance of this plan. I would then ask the house that it be put on record.

(Text):

The south Nation watershed is an area of 1,511 square miles in the extreme easterly part of Ontario, and includes parts of the counties of Prescott, Russell, Dundas, Stormont, Glengarry, Carleton and Grenville.

From southwest to northeast, the watershed extends about 76 miles in a direct line, and its greatest width, from northwest to southeast, is about 35 miles. From the source of the area of the main river to its mouth is a distance of 69 miles, in a direct line.

There are no cities or large towns on the watershed; but there are a number of incorporated villages, including Winchester, with a population of 1,094; Chesterville, 1,241; Casselman, 1,089; Finch, 390; and Maxville, 812. In addition there are a few villages, which have not been incorporated, the largest of which are as follows: Spencerville, South Mountain, Crysler, Metcalfe, Moose Creek, Limoges, Russell and Bourget.

From the above, it will be seen that the watershed, by and large, is essentially a rural area of Ontario.

(Translation):

This plan consists in carrying out excavation and damming, which are most urgent and necessary since they would be extremely useful to the people who live in a dozen municipalities: Matilda, Mounta, Winchester, Edwardsburg, Augusta, Finch, Cambridge, Plantagenet South, Alfred, Plantagenet North, Chesterville and Casselman. I will read another passage from the same plan, with special reference to the damaged parts.

(Text):

Floods on the south Nation watershed present a serious threat to the livelihood of the people in all the municipalities in the area, and are detrimental to the economy of all neighbouring business centres. Indeed, it is self-evident that the periodic destruction of crops, the washing out of roads and bridges and the carrying away of thousands of tons of the best top soil in any area represents an important loss to the whole province.

Unfortunately, these severe losses are not rare phenomena but, on the contrary, have occurred in twenty-six out of the thirty years in the period 1918 to 1947 inclusive. And in six of these years the Nation river overflowed its banks at least twice in the same year.

The severity of these inundations is increasing, as is attested by the 1938 and 1947 floods which were the greatest on record.

The most extensive flooding occurs in two areas: the Brinston flooded area located above Chesterville and comprising fertile lands in Winchester, Matilda and Mountain townships and the Cobb lake area, including the flats adjacent to the river from Lemieux to Plantagenet Springs.

The flood of 1938 inundated an area at Brinston of approximately 24 square miles to a maximum depth of 9 feet.

Many dwellings had two to three feet of water over their ground floors. The 1947 flood is reported to have been just about as severe.

Floods during spring freshets cause inconvenience, hardship and distress. Farmers do what they can to meet the threat: livestock and supplies are moved to upper floors or other safe locations and seeding is delayed until the spring floods are past. The duration of these floods from the time of overtopping the bank to the recession below the banks has lasted for as long as nine and one-half days.

These floods are not confined to the spring freshets but have frequently occurred after heavy summer storms. In fact, these are the most damaging as crops are either washed out completely or ruined through lying under water. It is reported that at least one farmer lost crops four years in succession through flooding.

I shall not read all this brief because I do not want to weary hon. members, but I should like to have it included in Hansard. I think the minister concerned should have a copy of it.

(Translation):

The project is not very costly, slightly over $2 million, and should be shared by the provincial and dominion governments. Because it will be undertaken in rural centres, municipalities are not in a position of paying any share of it. It should be remembered that elsewhere in Canada irrigation projects are financed by federal and provincial authorities. The project would prevent the flooding of thousands of acres of good arable land, as well as supplying work in urban centres, which would alleviate unemployment.

I congratulate the government for passing a reforestation act last fall. Russell has the most important nursery in Canada, the "Larose Forest". Started over 20 years ago, it covers an area of more than 15,000 acres, comprising over 6 million trees: pine, fir, spruce, maple and so forth. We intend to increase it to at least 25 million trees. That is the reason I am requesting federal aid. I practise reforestation myself, having had trees planted on my own farms.

(Text):

On my own farm I have over 200,000 trees consisting of pine, spruce, maple and so forth. It gives me great pleasure to offer each hon. member of this house and of the other place, all newspapermen and all employees of the house, a tree for next Christmas free, on condition that they pay the transportation costs.

I take this opportunity to invite everyone who would like to see that forest next May to let me know and it will give me great pleasure to accompany all hon. gentlemen who would like to go there to see it. If they do, they will see that we are doing our utmost to conserve the soil.

(Translation):

Flax is also grown on a large scale in the county of Russell. As I have the honour of being chairman of the national flax council, I take this opportunity of thanking the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) for what he has already done to help this industry. At the same time, I wish to ask him as well as the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe) to grant us the financial assistance needed for the improvement of this industry already operating in Plessisville, in the beautiful province of Quebec, where flax is carded, spun and woven. Here is a sample of the work done in Plessisville. I am happy to show it to all the members of the house.

(Text):

This is what we call flax linen. This is a flax linen done with a cheaper grade of flax, what we call tow. This is a long fibre flax and it is manufactured in my own town of Casselman. This is the work we are doing with the flax fibre that I have here. Depending on the weather, and in good soil, this fibre grows up to from 36 to 44 inches long.

(Translation):

I am in a position to show the benefits this development would mean for Canada.

If we had the factories needed to process this raw material, and to manufacture both thread and tow, at least in sufficient quantity to supply the home market, it would replace cotton and all other fibres of even less value which we have to import. This is the only fibre that can be grown in Canada and also the best in the world. At the present time we have to export 90 per cent of our raw material, both fibre and tow; we sell it at ridiculous prices and re-import it as linen, thread, etc., at exorbitant prices, often 20 to 30 times higher than we sold it. Such factories would also mean jobs for our workers and give farmers the opportunity to produce more flax. They could thus earn more money, to keep their sons on the farm, to hire workers who would help them grow this product because in order to supply only the needs of the country, we would require 400,000 to 500,000 acres of fibre flax.

An area of 1,000 acres sown with fibre flax gives jobs to 40 men, for six months, in our local factories, where flax undergoes a first treatment to extract the fibre and the seeds. This work is done from autumn to spring. This enables farmers' sons and local workers to find work during slack periods in rural centres. In my locality, we give employment to a great many men who would be without a job this winter.

The reason why I would like to get financial aid from the federal government and why I insist upon such help is that flax is produced in several provinces. I would like to see flax grown in every province, since flax gives good crops in fertile soil.

(Text):

Certified No. 1; germination, 96; variety, dominion. This group of farmers is a co-operative. I was for many years chairman and manager, but ceased my operations as manager when I was elected to the House of Commons. It was one of the finest ridings in Canada.

(Translation):

Everything in this plant in useful, seed grain, linseed-producing grain, fibres of all qualities which are used in all sorts of products, from shoemaker's thread to fishing lines, nets, etc. Waste products are used for poultry beddings, and several factories use it to provide power. That is what we do in Casselman

Linen, really the most important of these products, is very long wearing and is used for tablecloths, bedsheets, pillow slips, towels, underwear, dresses, etc.

(Text):

Cheaper fibres could be used today to manufacture overalls.

(Translation):

The cheaper linen, that of coarser fibre, is used for overalls, tarpaulins, tents, mail-bags, binder twine, etc.

Mr. Speaker, I congratulate the government on having had a law passed during the last session abolishing appeals to the privy council, thus making the Supreme Court of Canada our final court of appeal. I believe our jurists are perfectly qualified. It was high time that this law was amended in a country such as ours.

I was also extremely gratified that another law was passed during the last session, enabling us to change our constitution without asking another country's permission.

I was also pleased to be a spectator at the federal-provincial conference, last January. I congratulate the right hon. Prime Minister on the very able fashion in which he presided over these meetings. I also would like to congratulate the various provincial premiers on the impartiality of their deliberations. I am convinced that subsequent conferences should follow the same pattern so that we would be able to amend our constitution in accordance with the requirements of our country's development, without infringing upon the legitimate rights of the provinces.

In closing, Mr. Speaker, may I state that it is high time for our country to have a distinctive flag, and by "distinctive" I mean a truly national flag bearing no trace of the emblems of the lands of our ancestors: France, England, Ireland or Scotland. Let us forget about the fleur-de-lis or the union jack. We are a nation and we need a flag. I have a model here which I believe would meet with the approval of all Canadians, and would help national unity and would thus increase national pride.

I also think that it would be appropriate for us to have a diplomatic representative at the Holy See; nearly all countries have one except the communist-controlled countries. I am convinced that this would have great diplomatic value for Canada. I wish that all the hon. members of this house would support this, for it should not be a matter of religion but really a diplomatic matter.

I also think that we should have a Canadian as the representative of His Majesty the King; we have Canadians as lieutenant governors of the provinces and there is no cause for complaint in this regard.

As a last request, Mr. Speaker, I believe we should allow the public to enter the galleries before we recite our beautiful opening prayer.

(Text):

Mr. Edgar Leduc (Jacques Cartier): Mr. Speaker, I rise for the first time in the house to speak on the address in reply to the speech from the throne. May I first of all join with those hon. members who have spoken before me in congratulating the mover (Mr. Larson) and the seconder (Mr. Dumas) of the address. They have done a good job and have indicated what legislation is likely to be brought up for discussion. They have made suggestions which will be discussed thoroughly by hon. members.

May I congratulate the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) upon the appointment of the Hon. Elphege Marier, former member for Jacques Cartier, to the position of judge of the superior court of the district of Montreal. Mr. Marier, with his knowledge of law and the experience he has acquired through many years of practice, together with his sound judgment, qualities of heart and spirit of justice, is an ideal candidate to carry out the duties of judge. I congratulate Mr. Marier upon his appointment, which was well deserved. I am convinced that Mr. Marier will discharge his duties honourably and in conformity with the traditions of honesty known to exist in our courts of justice. This appointment created a vacancy which opened a door to my candidature and election as a member of this house.

Before going further let me introduce myself to the members of this house. I have the honour to represent the county which bears the name of the discoverer of Canada, Jacques Cartier. There are 36,000 electors in this county which comprises an agricultural section and a more important industrial section. Here we have the most important factories of Canada which have done so much with their skilled labour to help win the war and are continuing to help make Canada stronger and more prosperous, the Dominion Bridge Company, Dominion Engineering Works, two wire rope factories, a subsidiary of the Steel Company of Canada, Canadian Allis Chalmers, Jenkins Valves, all steel industries and many other smaller plants. These industries are prosperous and are still expanding.

In our midst we have an important distillery, Distillers Corporation. We also have an agricultural college, Macdonald college at Ste. Anne de Bellevue. You will realize that I have the honour to represent a very important county.

I would like to have the experience and ability of some of the members of this house to discharge my duties as the representative of such an important county but I can assure the house that my desire to work and my devotion to the service of my constituents will supplement my oratorical ability.

We have a mixed population, about 35 per cent English-speaking and 65 per cent French-speaking. The understanding and harmony between the two races have been very good. The understanding between the heads of the industries and the labour unions has been such that no walkouts or strikes have occurred for a number of years. Grievances have been worked out to mutual advantage, and our municipalities within the county have gone ahead and are prospering.

Being a new member, I do not intend at the beginning of this session to dictate my views to this house, but I am prepared to listen, study, gather experience and submit recommendations as the occasion arises.

May I be permitted to say that I intend to pursue the course of action which I have followed in supporting the Liberal party in measures that I consider the best under prevailing circumstances, reserving my liberty of action on matters being brought up which I would consider contrary to my principles and conscience, but I hope that such controversial matters will not occur during my term of office.

During the last two months I have been in this parliament I have had fairly good understanding with the ministers of the crown, although I am just an Independent Liberal. May I hope that full recognition will be made of my status in consideration of my past services to the Liberal party as organizer for 27 years without interruption of party affiliation, until I was called Independent. I supported the Prime Minister and I congratulate him upon his success in the general election, and I rejoice personally in the results I obtained on October 24.

(Translation):

I thank the hon. members for their kind attention to the speech which I made in English, in order to be understood by the great majority of members. I shall no doubt have other occasions later on of speaking more fluently in my mother tongue.

However, I wish to mention that prior to entering the political arena, I served some sort of novitiate as a public servant for twenty-two years. I was secretary-treasurer of the municipality of Lachine for eight years, then alderman of the same city. I also served a term of ten years as chairman of the finance commission, before becoming mayor of Lachine. I have tasted of both victory and defeat.

In the past, all my work has been inspired by the following alexandrines which I learned in my school days and still remember:

La route est dure et la montagne est haute,
Mais la fleur de l'idéal pousse sur les sommets,
Et les découragés qui dorment à mi-côte,
En y rêvant toujours ne la cueillent jamais.

My motto has always been eagerness and ambition. Eagerness to work and ambition to serve. The lines I quoted a few moments ago have been my inspiration in victory and in defeat. In this ideal do I find a reward for a job well done, as well as satisfaction for a duty well performed.

(Text):

On motion of Mr. Drew the debate was adjourned.

PRIVILEGE

WITHDRAWAL OF REQUEST FOR LEAVE TO PUT MATTER ON "HANSARD"

Mr. E. W. George (Westmorland): Mr. Speaker, I rise to a question of privilege. Earlier this evening I requested and received permission from the house to put on Hansard "Fundy Tidal Facts" and available power data in connection with the St. Mary's tidal project. I understand now that I was in error in asking to have that done, and I now ask permission to withdraw my request. Any hon. member who wishes to see this information will find it available in my room.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Has the hon. member permission to withdraw?

Some hon. Members: Agreed.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Fournier (Hull): Tomorrow being government day we will move to go into supply. If the motion carries we will call three departments, transport, finance and fisheries. From eight to nine will be private and public bills. If there is a discussion on the motion to go into supply and we finish it some time during the day we will then take up the motion of the Secretary of State for External Affairs to refer his estimates to the external affairs committee. If we get through with that, we will take up the motion of the Minister of National Health and Welfare for the setting up of a committee on old age security.

That is one way of proceeding. If there is no debate on the motion to go into supply we will take up the estimates of transport.

Mr. Drew: So that we may understand what the procedure will be, may I ask if it is the intention in the following weeks to call one department as was mentioned earlier?

Mr. Fournier (Hull): Yes. I was not successful last week in getting the motion to go into supply agreed to by the house and could not call any departments. I find myself now with only the estimates of national defence that could be brought up on Friday. I hope to have them up on that day. I am asking for these three departments so that I shall have at least a few on which I can rely.

Mr. Drew: I only asked the question for the purpose of understanding the situation. I thought when the suggestion was made that three departments would be called that that was carrying forward the original intention to call two departments last week and one this week. All I wanted to know was whether the course then would be followed of not calling more than one department each week hereafter.

Mr. Fournier (Hull): It is not the intention of the government to call more than one department unless there is some understanding as to the necessity of calling more than one.

At eleven o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Tuesday, March 14, 1950

The house met at three o'clock.

PUBLIC ACCOUNTS

REPORT OF AUDITOR GENERAL—REFERENCE TO STANDING COMMITTEE

Hon. Douglas Abbott (Minister of Finance) moved:

That the public accounts of Canada and the report of the Auditor General for the fiscal year ended March 31, 1949, which were tabled in the house on October 31, 1949, be referred to the standing committee on public accounts.

Motion agreed to.

AGRICULTURAL PRODUCTS ACT

EXTENSION OF OPERATION FOR A PERIOD OF ONE YEAR

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (for the Minister of Agriculture) moved that the house go into committee at the next sitting to consider the following resolution:

That it is expedient to present a bill to amend the Agricultural Products Act to extend the operation of the act for a period of one year.

He said: His Excellency the Governor General, having been made acquainted with the subject matter of this resolution, recommends it to the consideration of the house.

Motion agreed to.

IMMIGRATION

INQUIRY AS TO DEPORTATION OF ENRIQUE MONTENEGRO AND ANGELO PARRA

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Howard C. Green (Vancouver-Quadra): In the absence of the Minister of Citizenship and Immigration, I should like to direct a question to the Prime Minister. It concerns the two young Spanish merchant seamen, Enrique Montenegro and Angelo Parra, who apparently have been sent from Vancouver to Montreal, are to arrive in Montreal tomorrow morning and are to be sent on at once to New York. I have had representations from Vancouver that these young men are political refugees, that they are in grave danger should they be sent back to Spain, and also that they have been promised by Guatemala a visa which is due here shortly. Those statements may or may not be correct, but under the circumstances would it not be possible to hold these young men in Montreal until there is a further investigation?

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister): I had not heard anything about Enrique Montenegro and Angelo Parra until the hon. member telephoned my office this morning about them. I know nothing about their political background or about what they may have been promised by the government of Guatemala; but I made inquiries and found that they were to be held in Montreal for further inquiry, and that no order would be made about them until after the inquiry report had been submitted to the minister and he had had an opportunity to consider it.

Mr. Green: I thank the Prime Minister for his answer.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

QUESTIONS AND MOTIONS FOR PRODUCTION OF PAPERS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. M. J. Coldwell (Rosetown-Biggar): May I ask the government if questions and motions for production of papers could be taken up tomorrow?

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister): We had intended to answer questions last week, but there was such great complaint about there being any departure from the rules that we thought it would be advisable to allow the debate on the address in reply to the speech from the throne to be completed before we asked for any more unanimous consents.

Mr. Knowles: It all depends on who is asking for it.

RADIUM

THEFT OF NEEDLES FROM NATIONAL RESEARCH BUILDING—RESPONSIBILITY FOR BURNS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. G. K. Fraser (Peterborough West): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Trade and Commerce. Is the government going to take full responsibility for the care and treatment of the young boy who has two radium burns on his hands caused by gross negligence and lack of proper handling and storing of radium needles by this government?

Right Hon. C. D. Howe (Minister of Trade and Commerce): The hon. member, instead of asking a question, has made certain assertions that may or may not be accurate.

Mr. Fraser: That is what I want to find out.

Mr. Howe: I will examine the assertions in Hansard, consult my officials and give a reply later.

HUMAN RIGHTS

INQUIRY AS TO SETTING UP OF COMMITTEE—APPROVAL OF UNITED NATIONS DECLARATION

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. G. Diefenbaker (Lake Centre): I should like to direct a question to the Prime Minister. It has to do with the international declaration of human rights that Canada voted for in the United Nations assembly in December, 1948. Is it the intention of the government to set up at this session a committee on human freedoms; and if not, is it its intention to submit to parliament for consideration and approval this declaration which was accepted by our representatives?

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister): The government has not yet made any decision in that regard. The position of the government was stated, with the required qualifications, when the matter was before the United Nations. Since that time the matter has not received further consideration.

BOMB EXPLOSION

INQUIRY AS TO INJURY TO YOUNG BOY AND HIS MOTHER

On the orders of the day:

Mr. G. K. Fraser (Peterborough West): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of National Defence. Does he intend to make a statement to this house with regard to the shocking accident in which a young boy's hand was blown off and his mother, Mrs. MacLaurin, was injured a few days ago by a Canadian army thunderflash bomb?

Hon. Brooke Claxton (Minister of National Defence): The hon. gentleman seems to be making a number of assertions for which there seems to be little evidence indeed.

Mr. Fraser: We want to place the responsibility.

Mr. Claxton: No evidence has been brought to my attention to indicate that this is a Canadian army thunderflash bomb. That is a matter that has to be looked into. I must say that I, like the hon. member, regret the accident; but there is no evidence whatever that it was caused by a Canadian army bomb or that the Canadian armed forces were in any way negligent. In fact the newspaper reports indicate that there would be no liability on the part of the crown.

Mr. Fraser: I should like to direct another question to the minister. Does he not feel that the only place that hand grenades or army thunderflashes can come from would be the arsenal of the Canadian government?

Mr. Claxton: Not at all. This is not a military bomb. It is a commercial thunderflash bomb, produced by commercial producers.

Mr. Fraser: And sold to the government.

Mr. Claxton: And used in commerce as well as by government agencies. There is no evidence yet that this bomb ever was in our possession.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

INQUIRY AS TO TABLING OF STATUTORY REPORTS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Stanley Knowles (Winnipeg North Centre): I should like to direct a question to the Prime Minister. Can he say now, or if not will he ascertain, whether all the reports that are required by law to be laid on the table of the house within the first fifteen days of the opening of parliament, or some such similar period, have in fact been produced?

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister): I will make inquiries, Mr. Speaker.

SUPPLY

Hon. Douglas Abbott (Minister of Finance) moved that the house go into committee of supply.

PROPOSED SPECIAL COMMITTEE ON NATIONAL DEFENCE

Mr. G. R. Pearkes (Nanaimo): The rules of this house, Mr. Speaker, provide that, on the motion to go into supply, a private member may rise in his place and voice any grievances or bring to the attention of the house any matter that concerns him with respect to public policy. I want to take advantage of that rule this afternoon in order to bring to the attention of the house a matter which is of grave concern to me as well as to other members, and is causing considerable alarm in the country as a whole. I refer to the serious matter of national defence.

Since the last session of parliament the world has been marching forward at a tremendous pace. We have seen grave events taking place in Europe, in Asia and in other parts of the world. In this house and outside of it we have listened to speeches which can only cause the greatest possible consternation among the people of Canada. As to Asia, we have seen the red tide of communism sweeping across China. We have seen the new people's government recognized by Russia. So far as Europe is concerned, only within the last few days have there been a series of general elections, the result of which it is extremely difficult to foretell, and which will undoubtedly have very great bearing upon the future of the peace of the world.

Since the last session of parliament, the fact that Russia has been able to develop an atomic bomb has been confirmed. Furthermore, we have seen the great republic to the south of us passing legislation which will authorize the development of weapons even more ghastly than the atomic bomb. Since the last session of parliament a number of defence and military conferences have been held in Europe. Our own Minister of National Defence (Mr. Claxton) attended a conference at Paris. According to the reports from that conference, not only were the broad principles of defence planning discussed, but details as to military production and supplies were gone into so that the North Atlantic treaty might be implemented. It would appear that the chiefs of staff of the various countries are getting down to the details of the problems of collective defence. These responsibilities go with membership in the Atlantic alliance, but these responsibilities cannot merely be discharged by getting together boards of experts. The one thing that is necessary is that the people of all peace-loving countries get wholeheartedly behind their experts in order that the responsibilities that the governments of the countries have assumed may be fulfilled by the peoples of those countries.

It is essential that if that is to be done there be a philosophy established amongst the people which will demonstrate a determination to work in the direction of collective security and to put their whole effort into the plans which are designed to prevent a third world war. It is to the prevention of war that all our efforts on national defence should be directed; and we can only get a nation working wholeheartedly toward that end if the people of the nation are convinced that their government is working in the right direction, and furthermore that they are in possession of the true facts regarding the defence situation.

By agreement we are participants in this collective enterprise. This is a treaty for the security not only of the north Atlantic but of the world as a whole, because no war can be confined to the coast line of the north Atlantic. Should another war break out it will undoubtedly be a global war; no part of any continent will be spared. But while these conversations have been going on there has been some uncertainty in the minds of the Canadian people as to the extent and scale to which we, the Canadian nation, are committed, and whether those commitments which have been made, or which are about to be made, bear any relation whatever to the capabilities and the possibilities of this nation fulfilling these commitments.

In the last few days the estimates for 1950-51 have been tabled. The defence estimates are the largest in the peacetime history of this country. They have been increased by some $42 million. The question which is being asked all across the country is: Can this nation, in view of its many obligations, afford that sum? Likewise, disturbed by reports that have been made in various quarters, to which I shall refer later, the question is also being asked: Is this sum adequate? And again, is this sum being correctly distributed? There seems to be a good deal of uncertainty as to whether the amount which is divided between the fighting services is being distributed in the proper proportions.

On February 16 a report was published in the Citizen which indicated a considerable change in policy in so far as the Royal Canadian Navy is concerned. It is dated Ottawa, February 16, and is a Canadian Press item. In it we are told:

> The navy today announced plans for a two-division fleet designed to build up a small, compact force ready for swift action in an emergency.
> The main feature of the plan will be division of the fleet in two main segments, one concentrating on training and the other on operational work.

As we read on we are told:

> The navy termed the two-division plan "the most important step taken by the navy since the war."

Hon. members will notice that this was announced on February 16. It goes on to describe how the first move was taken last year by the conversion of the cruiser Ontario into a training ship from its operational role. That is apparently a big and radical change in naval policy.

In the past we have heard about the submarine hunter-killer teams, for which it was announced in the white paper published during last session that special training and equipment are required. In looking over the defence appropriations for the United States I find that, according to the New York Times of March 3, the amount of money allocated for anti-submarine warfare has been increased by the United States navy to the extent of 200 per cent. In our estimates for this year we see a total increase of $4 million over the amount of $84 million allocated last year, indicating an increase of merely five per cent. One cannot help wondering whether these submarine hunter-killer teams, which we are supposed to be working upon and to be making as our first naval commitment, can be fully developed with only an increase of five per cent in expenditures.

Proposed National Defence Committee

Are we placing too much dependence upon obsolete or obsolescent ships held in reserve? A great deal of information has been published in the last few months about the type of submarines maintained in the fleets of some other countries, including Russia, which are commonly referred to as snorkel submarines. These vessels have an underwater speed of from 20 to 25 knots, a speed which is truly alarming and which cannot be met effectively by the frigates and corvettes of our Canadian navy. Nor have the destroyers of our Canadian navy been equipped with anti-submarine devices.

Therefore it would seem that although we have set as our naval objective the development of anti-submarine craft, at present we have no such craft available, although we understand that three vessels are now being prepared. I do not know the stage of development that has been reached in their preparation. It would be well for us to ponder the recognized capabilities of the submarines which do exist today in the navies of the world. Not only have they a much higher speed than those which were in operation at the close of the last war, but they can drop to depths far greater than the depths to which submarines in the last war submerged. This factor gives an unquestionable advantage to the submarine.

Can a submarine at a depth, let us say, of a thousand feet be detected by means of the appliances with which our Canadian vessels are at present equipped? Can the depth charges which might be delivered be effective against such vessels? Again, the endurance of the modern submarine is such that it may remain submerged indefinitely. It is equipped with weapons far more deadly than those used during the last war, equipped with the homing warheads that can be attached to torpedoes which, by means of either magnetic or acoustic warheads, once they have been launched in the general direction of a target can find that target, even though such torpedo has to change its course.

In naval quarters there is much questioning whether our Canadian navy is following along the right lines at the present time, and whether far more emphasis should not have been placed upon what has been described as our major naval objective.

Then, to consider the air for a moment; it was not long ago that Air Marshal W. A. Curtis announced that the Royal Canadian Air Force was now going to emphasize the operational side of its activities, and that this change represented a departure from the nucleus theory of the air force which was being slowly built up. In the estimates which will be before the house on Friday it is indicated that the ratio between the amount of money which has been spent in the past on the air force, and that which will be spent in the future, is as 42·6 is to 44·8. The question is whether that change is adequate; whether in view of our commitments we should not be placing even greater emphasis on defence and spending a larger proportion of our defence dollar on the air force.

Perhaps no real balance has yet been reached between the army and the air picture. On February 21 a correspondent who was attending the recent Sweetbriar exercises remarked that the R.C.A.F. plans to form another jet squadron this year. According to the statement in the press there are at present two jet squadrons in Canada equipped with Vampires, one at Montreal and one at Chatham. The report goes on to say it was originally intended that there should be two jet squadrons added this year, but that owing to budgetary problems it is unlikely that more than one will be added. The report goes on to quote a senior air officer to the effect that a strength of five such squadrons would be required to protect vital areas in Canada—that is, to protect merely the vital areas.

The question must again be asked: Are we saving money on the R.C.A.F. at the expense of safety? Reading from the Financial Times of a week ago it becomes obvious that these problems have been disturbing not only the senior officers in the various services but also the cabinet and other people across the country as a whole. In a report from the Financial Times we find this:

> The really big fight has been on the defence estimates. All services came up with big and potent arguments for higher spending in 1950-51. They supported these arguments with cash demands needed to pay for equipment already ordered and committed in previous years and which will be delivered in 1950-51.
> As well, there was submitted the growing demands of the cold war in terms of Canada's new North Atlantic pact commitments.
> What actually happened was a slashing of proposed defence plans.

In recent months uncertainty has been caused in the country by the reports which have been made regarding Exercise Sweetbriar which was held in the Yukon and Alaska. All these reports were loud in their praises of the individual airmen and soldiers who took part in the exercise. While there is no doubt there was a distinct improvement over previous exercises, the reports indicate that we are far below the necessary standards of equipment which would be essential if warfare is to be carried out in the Arctic.

Mr. Baldwin, writing in the New York Times, used this picturesque language in describing how warfare can be carried out in the Arctic:

> Air power has stormed the ramparts of the cold.

It is obvious that war can be waged in the Arctic provided that there is adequate air support. Mr. Baldwin's article in the New York Times has been repeated in various editorials across the country. The people of Canada have become concerned by the bold statement that the military weaknesses of Alaska and Canada were startlingly revealed by Exercise Sweetbriar. Mr. Baldwin goes on to say:

> The number of aircraft Canada plans to maintain probably will never be adequate in peacetime to airlift all three battalions simultaneously.

He is referring there to the three battalions of the Canadian active army which are being trained as airborne troops for the express purpose of operating against diversionary raids such as may be launched in the northland. We know that one regiment, the Princess Patricia's Canadian Light Infantry, has demonstrated the effectiveness of its training, but the men had to be carried in aircraft of a type which would have made it extremely doubtful that they would reach their dropping points in real operations. North Star aircraft are not equipped to permit parachute jumping.

Mr. Baldwin described the Canadian air force as being quite small by United States standards. As I said, the Princess Patricias were transported by Dakotas and C-47's which are not really efficient up-to-date aircraft for the carrying of airborne troops. An officer is reported as describing the Patricias in this way:

> We have a fine buggy in the Pats, but no horse to pull it.

I think that describes very well the situation that exists at the moment. We have a fine regiment made up of excellent men who have progressed a long way in their training as a parachute jumping and airborne battalion, but unfortunately we have not the aircraft in which to move that battalion to its proper position. That makes one ask this question: Is there really a balance between the army and the air force at the present time? Other senior officials connected with the defence department have spoken and caused considerable alarm; I refer to a speech reported to have been made by Dr. O. M. Solandt, chairman of Canada's defence research board. In that article Dr. Solandt is indicating the extent to which machines will replace men in the fighting forces of the future. After describing the replacement of men by such things as rockets, jets and other machines, he goes on to say:

> The tendency to replace men with machines, which has already begun, will spread rapidly through all the services.

After referring to the developments in connection with guided missiles, he goes on to say:

> All these things are possible through the use of existing knowledge. This means that most of them are ready to pass from the hands of the research scientists to those of the research-minded engineer who will convert the ideas into realities; the crude experimental mock-ups into finished, effective and reliable machines.

Then he concludes by saying:

> We are just on the threshold of the age of atomic power. I think that it will be many years before atomic power will be widely used in industry, but it will be used much sooner for military applications such as the propulsion of warships and submarines.

Those are some of the matters which are giving this nation concern. The only way in which the country can be satisfied and the people rallied behind the efforts being made to prevent a third world war is to make full publication of all the details. If the people are given the details of the commitments which this government has made, then I think they will respond. I quote again from the editorial in the Globe and Mail of February 28:

> No doubt the Canadian people, aware of the country's present dangers and new obligations, approve of this increase in principle. But they are interested in knowing, and entitled to be told, what they are buying with the money, what specific responsibilities Canada is undertaking and whether our defence plans are sufficient for the purpose.
> There is no substance in the argument that these matters must remain top secrets. When both the United States and Britain openly discuss the adequacy of their defences, it is nonsense to say that safety will be jeopardized by publicity for Canadian plans.

I have referred to a number of things which have happened in the last few months. In the speech from the throne at the opening of the present session information was given to the effect that it is the intention of the government to introduce a measure to revise and consolidate into one act the various acts under which the armed forces of the country have been operating for a great many years, to give to Canada the sole authority to administer her own forces, to make the various forces essentially Canadian, and to give them a uniform code. There will be new paragraphs designed to meet the present and future requirements of the services.

When explaining a bill of this nature in the Senate during the last session of parliament the Minister of National Defence emphasized the importance of it. When he referred to it in the House of Commons during the last session he pointed out how important the bill was, and said that because of its far-reaching effects he would be prepared to have it referred to a committee of the house.

In the speech from the throne there is other legislation forecast dealing with the Militia Pension Act. Although the minister has not so indicated, no doubt he will also be prepared to have that measure referred to the committee. What I want to ask for now, and what I feel will lead to a solution of the problem which confronts the people and will relieve them of their fear and anxiety, is what members of the Progressive Conservative party and others have asked for on many occasions in the past, namely, a special committee to inquire into the whole question of national defence. I do so at this time because only last night the house leader announced that on Friday next the estimates of the Department of National Defence would be called. Year after year we have had them introduced, and members on all sides of the house will appreciate how difficult it is for the minister to give in a few brief sentences the information required, no matter how willing he may be to answer the questions which hon. members of the opposition ask. Nor can members of the opposition be expected to place the minister under a prolonged cross-examination in order to disclose the innumerable details which go to make up the final picture as to Canada's defences—which, I repeat, are designed with the sole object of preventing a third world war.

If we had a committee in which members who are particularly concerned with the defences of this country, and whose past training has given them a certain experience in such matters, were able not only to ask the minister to state the general policy but also to call before the committee the senior officers of the various departments, we would be able to obtain the information we desire. As I have indicated, senior officers have been stating their views across the country. We could call before such a committee people with experience and authority in industry and science who are accustomed to looking after the social services of Canada. I do not think we are asking for too much. We have made the same request before, and it seems to me that when there are such big changes taking place in the world as a whole and in the policy of our defence forces, now is the time to ask for the widest and most thorough investigation.

Therefore I propose to move, seconded by the hon. member for Calgary East (Mr. Harkness):

That all the words after "that" to the end of the question be deleted and the following substituted therefor:

"It is expedient to appoint a special committee of this house to examine and report upon the Department of National Defence and the armed services of Canada; and that such committee have power to call for persons, papers and records, and to report from time to time to this house."

[Mr. Pearkes.]

Mr. D. S. Harkness (Calgary East): Mr. Speaker, in supporting the motion of the hon. member for Nanaimo (Mr. Pearkes) I should first like to draw attention to the fact that the experiences of the past five years have abundantly shown that a general discussion on defence matters or a discussion of the defence estimates cannot be satisfactorily carried on, either when the house is sitting as at present with the Speaker in the chair, or in committee of the whole. I think it has been shown conclusively that it is impossible under such circumstances for any member of the house to secure the detailed information necessary to enable him to form a sound and intelligent idea of what our defence situation is, and what is needed in connection therewith. That is one of the reasons why, during the past four or five years, we of this party have been urging that a standing committee on defence should be established.

During the time that I have been a member of the house the matter was first raised by the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra (Mr. Green). I think it is worth noting that at that time the government did not take the adamant position they have assumed during the last two years towards the creation of such a committee. In that regard I should like to read a short extract from Hansard which gives the position of the then minister of national defence, now the Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott), when the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra first raised the question. It is to be found at page 877 of Hansard for October 9, 1945, and reads:

Mr. Abbott: The second suggestion made by the hon. member for Vancouver South was that a special committee should be set up to look into defence matters.

Mr. Green: A standing committee.

Mr. Abbott: Yes. May I say that personally I would welcome the establishment of such a committee, because I believe it could perform a useful service. The discussion and consideration of defence matters in my view should not be the subject of party strife, and I believe a committee of that sort could perform a useful purpose. I would hasten to say, however, that I feel it would not be feasible to set up such a committee at this session, one which is of a rather special nature. While I cannot commit the government as to policy, yet I would recommend personally that such a committee be established at the next session, when I have no doubt we shall not be quite so pressed for time as, I am afraid, we shall be at this session.

That was the position taken by the then minister of national defence, a position which was almost the same as that taken by this party since that time. The only reason he did not agree to the setting up of the committee immediately was that in a short post-war session, it was not feasible.

Later on in that session the then prime minister, Mr. Mackenzie King, indicated that he was not opposed to this idea of setting up a committee. He said he thought it could serve a useful purpose. In view of the attitude of the government in 1945, why the extreme change that has taken place? Has the government something to hide about which it does not want this committee to learn the truth? If so, that is all the more reason for setting up the committee. I am not saying it is so, but I wonder if the government has come to the conclusion that the less the members of parliament know about defence matters, the better it is for the government. Perhaps that is one of the reasons why it is so firm in its refusal to set up this committee. It may be that it is part of the general disregard for parliament that this government has shown during the past few years. I am inclined to think it fits into that general pattern. In any event, no satisfactory explanation has been given for the extreme change in the attitude of the government towards the setting up of this committee.

I do not think the present Minister of National Defence (Mr. Claxton) could give any good reasons for the change in the government's attitude. It seems to me it is part of the general picture of denying all the information to members of parliament which the government could possibly deny. It is illustrative of the position in which the government virtually says: We have our fingers in this pie, so you keep yours out; we do not want you to have anything to do with the matter. So far as the value of setting up a committee is concerned, I think everyone will agree that it is not only important, but vitally necessary, that there should be a group of members who are well informed on defence matters. At the moment there is no way of becoming informed. A member of parliament is up against insuperable difficulties in securing any information on this subject.

As I indicated, the hit-or-miss discussion we have across the floor of the house is entirely inadequate. The hon. member for Nanaimo has shown that, from the time point of view alone, it would not be possible to discuss all the detailed matters upon which we would like to have information. In addition to that, we all realize that there are certain matters about which the defence heads do not want to make information public. The government refuses to answer questions on these subjects. I believe, however, that in far too many cases that excuse is used as a means of escaping the answering of any questions. Nevertheless there are some questions which fall within that category and cannot be answered publicly.

During the past four or five years, comparatively few members have taken part in the discussions on national defence. The majority of the members have paid no attention to it, and are not even present when it is taking place. The reason is that the members have little information; they do not know anything about the subject. It is an obvious truth that a man is not interested in something that he knows nothing about. The more anyone delves into a certain subject, the more interested one becomes. The setting up of a standing committee on defence would serve the extremely useful purpose of increasing the interest of the members in this important subject, as well as the interest of the people throughout the country. It would serve also the interests of the defence forces themselves. What the forces were doing would be better understood and better appreciated by the general public. As a result, I believe we would get better support for our recruiting program.

On many occasions we have indicated that we believe there should be a standing committee before which the various defence chiefs and the members of their staffs could appear. Detailed information could be presented, on the basis of which the members could make up their minds as to the adequacy or otherwise of general defence policy, as well as the particular development which defence services are undertaking at any particular time. We could ascertain also whether our defence policy was changing as conditions changed, and whether we had a set-up which met the threats to Canadian security as they develop from time to time. The need for a standing committee on defence is indicated by a look at the estimates for this year's expenditures. One finds that the three largest spending departments, so far as money voted is concerned—I am leaving out of consideration the money which is spent by statute—are national defence, with about $420 million to be voted; veterans affairs, with about $199 million to be voted, and public works, with about $100 million to be voted.

Of these departments, the Department of National Defence is the largest. The amount involved is more than twice as much as veterans affairs and more than four times as much as public works. Of the $420 million, approximately $408 million, nearly the whole amount, is in two bulk items. They are numbered 202 and 203 in the estimates, and they cover over $408 million which we are asked to vote. Surely if a committee is needed to go into the expenditures in the Department of External Affairs, a similar committee is needed for the Department of National Defence. The experience we had in the house last year, as a result of trying to go into the details of these defence estimates, well illustrates that. The estimates came up towards the end of the session, and I tried to secure information about a number of matters. Every time I rose to ask a question, a great howl of protest went up from the benches facing me, and from those to my right—cries of "sit down, sit down"; "we want to get home" and so forth.

An hon. Member: From the government benches.

Mr. Harkness: From the government benches, certainly. In addition to that I received from the other side of the house notes saying "Please do not ask any more questions." That is the situation when only one member tries to ask a few questions requesting details in connection with defence matters; he is howled down by the large number of government members in this house and every means really is taken to try to get him to desist. Under these circumstances it is quite obvious that we must have some other means whereby the large expenditures for this department can be properly examined. The only means by which that can be done, as far as I can see, and the only means that anyone has suggested so far as I am aware, is a standing committee on defence. About a week or so ago I received from a reserve force officer a letter in which he mentions several matters in connection with defence. He is a man whom I had known overseas; as a matter of fact, he is an old friend. The letter contains this sentence:

> Is there no means of discussing defence questions and putting up contrary views to those of army headquarters without publicity?

In writing back to him I was obliged to say, of course, that there was no means. That letter would indicate that members of the reserve forces who are thinking on this matter and who have ideas which are contrary to those of the constituted authorities would like to see some means whereby those ideas could be brought to the attention of the minister and the defence chiefs and their merits discussed with those people. There just is not any means of anything like that being done at the present time. It is another indication of the necessity of there being some way in which members of this house can put forward their ideas and the ideas they pick up from other people who are interested in defence matters, and at least have an opinion on these contrary ideas expressed by the heads of the defence services and reasons given why, in their opinion, they would not be practical.

One other matter I should like to say something about is that of civil defence, and I have spoken about it in this house on numerous other occasions. We have never obtained from the minister or from the government any satisfactory information in connection with what was being done, nor have we been told whether anything at all was being done. All we have ever heard was that General Worthington had been appointed to look into the matter and to report upon it.

Last year when the defence estimates were up for consideration the minister said that this matter of preparing any plan for the defence of the civilian population in the event of ordinary bombing, atomic bombing or any other sort of attack, or preparing a plan for the evacuation of our large cities and so on was a matter of timing. I am prepared to agree with that statement; it probably is a matter of timing. The impression was left, however, that the time had not arrived for us to do anything along that line. Nevertheless, a large number of people think that the time has not only arrived when we should be doing something fairly definite, but is long past. A mere perusal of the newspapers during the last few months will indicate that there is a constantly growing awareness on the part of the general public of the necessity for plans for civilian defence being put into operation or at least for getting further along than this investigation-and-report stage at which the matter rests now, as far as we know.

A committee such as the one we are advocating would be the appropriate place where a question of that sort could be discussed, where the suggestions and ideas which members receive from their constituents right across Canada could be put forward and brought to the attention of the heads of the defence services, and where they might be, we will say, prodded into action on something definite.

The hon. member for Nanaimo (Mr. Pearkes) mentioned the act with respect to national defence which was introduced in the other place last year and which will come to us in this chamber for consideration this year. As to that act of last year, the minister indicated that, in his opinion, it would have to be dealt with by a committee. There is no committee of this house which is adapted to deal with that act. It seems to me that if, in the minister's own opinion, this long and important act is to be dealt with by a committee, the only choice the government has is to appoint a committee on defence to take the matter up; and as a result of that act coming in at this session, it seems a singularly appropriate time to institute or inaugurate a standing committee of the house on defence. I hope that the government will pay to the arguments we put up now on this matter, and which we have put up in past years, the attention which they deserve, and will proceed to some action with regard to setting up this committee.

Mr. P. E. Wright (Melfort): I should like to say a few words, Mr. Speaker, in support of this amendment moved by the hon. member for Nanaimo (Mr. Pearkes) with respect to setting up in this house a committee on defence. It seems to me that there are a great many other members who, like myself, have little information on what our defence situation is in this country. It is true that the estimates on defence have been brought into the house and discussed each session; but quite often it was in the latter days of the session, when discussion was limited, and we did not obtain all the information we should like to have had with regard to this matter.

Today we are spending a large proportion of our budget on defence; it is a much larger proportion than we have spent in the last two years. This year, as a matter of fact, we are spending $425 million plus whatever supplementary estimates there may be, plus whatever we may be spending on research work, and whatever we may be spending in the matter of atomic energy: in all, the amount will probably reach some $500 million. It seems to me that in the world as it is today, with the forces of evil there are in existence, we in this house should pay more attention to our defence estimates and should try to ascertain whether we are getting the most for the money we are spending in this respect. I have no doubt that the government are trying to do the best they can, and that they are trying to see that the dollars they spend are being spent for the best purpose. Nevertheless, we get a little bit alarmed when we read in the papers, as we did the other day in the Montreal Gazette, I think it was, that when certain officials were brought before study groups of government members in this house, the matter which the government members seemed to be most interested in was the patronage they might get out of defence estimates rather than the best service they could get. This report has not been denied; and it seems to me that, under the circumstances, we should have a committee of this house before which we could call in officials of the defence department and see that we are getting the best for the money that we are spending on defence.

Prior to the war—I believe it was in 1939—we had a defence purchasing board set up under a special act of parliament. When the war broke out the duties of this board were turned over to the Department of Munitions and Supply, and that department did the purchasing for the armed forces. After the war the duties of purchasing for the armed forces were turned over to the Canadian Commercial Corporation instead of being turned back to the defence purchasing board under the old act passed in 1939. By the way, this was a fairly comprehensive act and it gave a great deal of protection to the government and to the people of this country in the purchases that were being made

My reading of the act under which the Canadian Commercial Corporation was set up leads me to believe that we have not the protection that we had under the defence purchasing board in seeing that there is no patronage in the matter of defence and that we get value for every cent that we spend in purchasing for the defence department.

There is also the matter of civilian defence. I believe General Worthington was appointed to make an investigation and report to the government as to what should be done with respect to civilian defence in Canada. Up to date, so far as I know, and I think as far as every hon. member knows, we have very little information as to whether anything definite has been done. In a war such as we might have, should there be a third war, and we all hope that we may not, with the use of bombs, atomic bombs and H-bombs, the matter of civilian defence becomes very important, of much greater importance than it ever was in former times. We should be organized. We should know what is taking place with respect to civilian defence, not only to relieve the minds of our people, not only to see that this matter is being taken care of, but to see that the civilian population is not left defenceless.

These are just a few things which I think should be discussed in a committee of this house. The idea is a good one. We would be in a much better position if we had our defence estimates referred to a committee, and if we, as members of parliament, through a committee such as this, took a greater interest in our defence, and through our interest transmitted it to the people of the Dominion of Canada.

Mr. A. J. Brooks (Royal): Mr. Speaker, it is not my intention to take up much of the time of the house, but I do wish to support the motion which has been made by the hon. member for Nanaimo (Mr. Pearkes) for the setting up of a defence committee of this house. I think the house is indeed fortunate to have a member such as the hon. member for Nanaimo, who has a wide knowledge of defence matters. I might say also that the house is fortunate in having so many other men, especially those from the last war, who are well qualified to give advice and sit on a committee of this kind.

There is nothing more important to the people of Canada, and in fact to the people of the whole world today, than this question of defence. I am sure that there is nothing more complicated, and nothing which gives the government of this country more concern, than this question of defending our country. Wars of today are not like the wars of the past. Perhaps they would compare slightly with the last two wars, but in former wars, before the first and second great wars it was just a matter of armies getting together and fighting it out. The civilian population had very little to do with it.

As has been stated by one hon. member, time for preparation would be very short in the event of a war breaking out. Today a nation must be prepared. In the first great war we in this country had time to wait for months while France, Great Britain and the other countries held the line, as it were, for us. What was true of the first great war was also more or less true in the second world war, but I am sure everyone is convinced that should another war break out the time will not be a matter of months or weeks. It may possibly be a matter only of days until we shall have to have our army and our defences ready.

There are many matters which could and should be discussed by a committee. I do not wish to repeat what has already been said. For instance, a matter which might be discussed by a defence committee is that of the dispersal of munition plants. As we know, they are more or less in vulnerable spots throughout the country. In the event of bombing there is no question in my mind but that our munition plants would be the first to suffer. The matter of the dispersal of munition plants could and should be considered and acted upon long before war comes.

Then there is the matter of supplies and storage of food. If a war comes we shall require large quantities of food, and the food will have to be stored at different points throughout the country. That is a matter that a committee could very well discuss.

A committee on defence does not necessarily discuss only the air force, the navy or the army; but it could and should discuss practically every phase of our life.

Civilian defence, which was mentioned this afternoon by the hon. member for Calgary East (Mr. Harkness) and the hon. member for Melfort (Mr. Wright), is a matter about which I intended to say a few words. I find it is not necessary for me to do so except to point out that the United States has made and is making today, extensive preparations for civilian defence. I think they are paying proportionately far more attention to that very important matter than we are. I hold in my hand a clipping from the Christian Science Monitor of a short time ago—I am sorry I have not the date—written by Josephine Ripley, called "Civilian Defense Rolls Quietly", and which reads in part as follows:

> This planning is going on quietly, but not secretly.

It is not necessary that it should be secret. The people should know what is going on. I continue:

> It is going on calmly, and without hysteria. It is going on without frantic haste, but at a steady pace—a pace admittedly speeded up, however, since President Truman's announcement of Russia's possession of the atom bomb.

Since then, of course, we have had the report on the hydrogen bomb and the suggestion that the Russians know as much about the H-bomb as we do. Some of the things which the United States is planning for is a dispersion of government departments from Washington. They are also giving attention to the dispersal of munition plants and other important manufacturing plants.

In the matter of aircraft spotters this article says:

> One of these is the call for 150,000 volunteer aircraft spotters to augment the mechanical "seeing-eye" of the radar screen.
> These spotters will cover 25 northwestern and Atlantic coast states and stand ready to scan the skies around the clock, if necessary. This sky-watch will eventually be nationwide.

I suggest we can very well learn from the United States in this matter. Another matter worthy of consideration is the special training they are giving to combat radiation injuries, and like conditions. I believe we in Canada are doing something along those lines, but I feel that probably more should be done. Every city and town in Canada which might possibly be subject to bombing attack should at the present time—not at some later date—be prepared to look after matters of this kind.

This article also states that it is not only at headquarters in Washington that this is being done, but that there are state representatives, and that every state in the union is being made conscious of the necessity for civilian defence. I do not think it is necessary for me to labour that point further; but I do believe, as I said a moment ago, that a committee might well look into and study these matters. A study of that kind would be of great advantage to the government and, I am sure, to the people generally.

Then, again, I was quite concerned not long ago when I read about the quality of arms being supplied to Europe. It is important, of course, that the allies we might expect under the Atlantic pact should be supplied with proper arms and munitions. I read an article which appeared in The Ensign of January 21, a paper published in Montreal. The headline reads, "Europe doubts quality of expected arms from United States. Experts believe special tank should be designed to meet unknown situation." This article, dated at Amsterdam, goes on to say that the supplies of secondary munitions for Europe are not good enough. It states the view is that the supplies from the last war would not stand up or be sufficient to meet any onslaught which we might have from Russia. The people in those countries feel that there should be set up some sort of western European arms industry, so that they would not have to rely too much on secondhand arms they are receiving from the United States and Canada.

This is a question which I am sure a committee could look into with great value and benefit to ourselves and to our friends. Speaking on the subject of defence last year, the minister set out as his sixth point the following:

> Since an attack on Canada could only be made by air or by sea, emphasis must be placed on defence forces; by air—radar stations and communications, backed by interceptors and a relatively small mobile brigade group; by sea—anti-submarine and anti-mine vessels for protection of shipping and coastal waters.
> The best place to defeat the enemy is as far away from Canada as possible, and our forces should also serve as the nucleus for the development of our maximum potential.

That is an ideal with which I am sure we all agree. The best place to defeat an enemy is as far away from Canada as possible. But I think the minister himself, the government and the people of Canada are beginning to realize that probably it will not be away from Canada at all that we will have to meet the enemy. His suggestion, for instance, that a small and relatively mobile brigade group is all that is necessary, I am sure would not meet the situation at all.

I was much concerned to read an article not long ago dealing with a probable attack on this country or on the United States. After all, if Russia ever goes to war, it will be against the United States, and I am satisfied her first attack would be against that country. If it is made against the United States it must and will be made through Canada. This article mentioned the fact that in Siberia, a country comparable to Alaska which adjoins the northern part of Canada, there are 25 million people, and that Russia has today some 20 divisions in that part of the world. It was pointed out that these people are not carrying out Sweetbriar operations of 4,000 or 5,000 men, but that they are training many thousands of men for long periods who are well inured to the cold and hardships of that climate. That is something else about which we in this country should be concerned, namely the training of our men in the north.

I commend the minister upon the start he has made. It was small, involving 4,000 or 5,000 men over a period of ten days. My understanding is that it was experimental, and I am sure that the department and the United States authorities gained much valuable information. I am satisfied however that as time goes on the department will realize that our northern areas are the most vulnerable, so far as this country is concerned. There was a time when we thought our north country, because of the snow and ice, and the hardships which would be encountered by men who would fight in that area, was impregnable. Today we realize it is our most vulnerable point.

I believe a committee could assist the minister greatly in studying the situation as it applies to that part of the world. I shall not take further time in this discussion, but I do believe the minister and the government would be well advised to set up a committee of the house to study not only the navy, the army and the air force, but every phase of defence, which includes within its ambit practically the whole life of the Canadian people.

Mr. G. J. McIlraith (Parliamentary Assistant to the Minister of Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, since the hon. member for Melfort (Mr. Wright) in this debate has made reference to newspaper articles which appeared in the Montreal Gazette on Friday and Saturday of last week, having reference to the subject matter under discussion today, and since those matters were raised in the house last Friday on a motion to adjourn, I think perhaps it would be proper if I were to make an explanation and to set at rest once and for all this supposed change in policy in defence purchasing.

The facts are rather simple. There has been no change whatever in policy with respect to defence purchasing. The policy as carried out by the Canadian Commercial Corporation, which does the purchasing for the defence department, is exactly as it was, and as has been set out in its annual report and stated in the house on previous occasions.

As a matter of actual fact the subject matter alleged in the newspaper article to have been discussed was not discussed. It is just a case of a newspaperman having got hold of some facts and then, I am afraid, having gone considerably beyond the facts for one reason or another—whether misinformation or excessive imagination, or for what reason I do not know. And I do not know that it is the concern of anyone as to what caused him to do it.

I have convened a study club of Liberal members of the House of Commons during the last session and at this session. They have met regularly. As a matter of fact, if it is of any interest to hon. members, they have thus far had four meetings. The subjects under discussion have all been subjects connected with the organization of the department. Emergency import controls was one subject; the economic research and development branch was another; and on March 7, Tuesday of last week, the subject matter under discussion was the Canadian Commercial Corporation. It is purely a factual study group which deals with the system of organization and governmental functions and there was no discussion whatever on that occasion about patronage.

As a matter of fact I think all hon. members will realize that it would be most improper, if such a subject were to be discussed, to discuss it with a crown employee or a civil servant. The whole thing is difficult to deny completely because it is so much out of line with the facts and because it is so ridiculous. The fact that the meeting was held is quite true. It was held in the ordinary course. These meetings have been going on and as a matter of fact there has been some press publicity about certain meetings. I recall last fall there was quite a lengthy front page press coverage about the system of study groups generally. They go on at regular intervals depending upon when the appropriate officials are available. I expect they will continue to go on as long as there is any demand for them.

I think hon. members are quite proper in feeling some concern about the newspaper article, that is the first one, because it does cast a serious reflection. Great expenditures are made by the Canadian Commercial Corporation and it would be a matter of concern if any changes had been discussed or made. No change was discussed or made or suggested in any way.

There is another rather interesting bit at the end of the newspaper article which refers to the managing director of the corporation as having been employed in a minor capacity by Canadian National Railways in Montreal before coming to Ottawa some eleven years ago to take up the matter of defence purchasing. That charge is completely ridiculous. Actually the managing director of the corporation was on the purchasing staff of Canadian National Railways. He was brought here in 1939 and has served to date, always directly associated with munitions purchasing. There was a short break in 1942 when he was recalled to the C.N.R., but I believe that his record is an outstanding one, one that would tend to inspire confidence and indicate competence in this type of work. I am quite at a loss to understand that particular reference in the newspaper article.

Perhaps it would be useful to the house if I read a letter which the managing director wrote to the minister on March 13. Hon. members will recall that the first article was published on Friday, March 10, and the second one on Saturday, March 11. This letter is dated March 13 and reads:

March 13, 1950

The Right Honourable C. D. Howe,
Minister of Trade and Commerce,
Ottawa, Ontario.

Dear Mr. Howe:

In view of the report which appeared in a Montreal newspaper recently, you might be interested in having a word from me as to what actually transpired when, at the suggestion of Mr. McIlraith, I addressed the Liberal study group at the House of Commons on March 7. The majority of those present were new members, unfamiliar with the functions of this corporation.

The remarks which I made were confined entirely to the policy and procedures followed by the corporation. While I answered many questions, the information given appeared to be well received and I sensed no disagreement whatever with the corporation's policy, which, as you know, is to seek out all possible sources of supply, irrespective of any consideration except to provide what is needed in the time required and at the lowest price, and to establish prices and award contracts by means of competitive tenders in all cases where it is possible to do so.

No member attending the meeting suggested that the corporation's policy be altered in any way.

Yours very truly,

W. D. Low,
Managing Director.

Surely that should set the matter at rest for all time.

Mr. Wright: I should like to ask the hon. member a question if I may.

Mr. McIlraith: Yes, by all means.

Mr. Wright: Is the Canadian Commercial Corporation governed by the provisions of the defence purchases act of 1939 in connection with the making of defence purchases? If not, why not?

Mr. McIlraith: I cannot answer the question at this time, but my recollection is that the defence purchases act was superseded by the munitions and supply act. The corporation is now governed by the provisions of the Canadian Commercial Corporation Act. I shall be glad to look further into the point and give the hon. member a further answer at the first opportunity.

Mr. Wright: There were certain safeguards provided by the defence purchases act which are not provided by the Canadian Commercial Corporation Act. Those safeguards should be carried forward into that act.

Mr. E. D. Fulton (Kamloops): Mr. Speaker, I am quite sure that all hon. members will be glad to have heard the statement which has just been made by the parliamentary assistant to the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. McIlraith), to the effect that no change has been made in the defence purchasing policy carried out by the Canadian Commercial Corporation. Taking those words at their face value I must say that it is gratifying to have that assurance. However, I think one would be entitled to remark that it is a pity the explanation was not made earlier because great concern was caused by the somewhat equivocal statement made by the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) on Friday, March 10, when he dealt with this matter. It will be recalled that his denial, if one could call it a denial, did not go nearly as far as the statement just made by the parliamentary assistant. The Prime Minister simply said that there had been no revolt among Liberal members so far as he was aware. Had that somewhat equivocal statement not been made, the credence given to the earlier reports might not have assumed the proportions it did. That being the case, it certainly is timely that we should have this assurance from the parliamentary assistant.

In commenting on this matter it does seem to me that this whole situation underlines the desirability of having a defence committee which could take as one subject of investigation the methods and procedure followed in making these defence contracts. If the chairman of the Canadian Commercial Corporation is free to appear before a group of Liberal members at the suggestion of the parliamentary assistant, I should think it would be quite proper and highly desirable that that gentleman should appear before a defence committee of the whole house. It seems to me, the fact that these private meetings are taking place reinforces the request that all hon. members should have the same opportunity of frank and free discussion which apparently this group of Liberal members has had.

There is one additional reason why we feel that a defence committee should be set up at this session without delay. Hon. members who have preceded me have referred to some of the occasions on which this request has been made previously. At one time we were encouraged to think that the request would be considered favourably. I intend to refer to one or two of the statements made by ministers which have not yet been referred to in this debate.

On March 29, 1946, the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra (Mr. Green) asked the then minister of national defence, now the Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott), whether he would consider setting up such a committee. That is to be found at page 406 of Hansard for that date. At that time the leader of the C.C.F. (Mr. Coldwell) made the observation:

> We supported the suggestion last year and we do so again this year.

Mr. Coldwell: And we did so today.

Mr. Fulton: As the hon. member has just reminded me, they have done so again today. At that time the then minister of national defence said:

> I think I assured my hon. friend last year that his suggestion would receive sympathetic consideration, but I pointed out that the time was too short to do something about it last session. But I did promise consideration.

Thereupon the former prime minister, Mr. Mackenzie King, said:

> I think the suggestion of my hon. friend is a very good one and, as the Minister of National Defence has just said, it is one that he is prepared to consider sympathetically. But once again the house will have to ask itself how many committees it can stand. We are enlarging the number and it will have a bearing on the attendance in the house. I think my hon. friend's suggestion of that particular committee is a very good one.

Referring to the question of whether or not the house can stand this additional committee, you will recall, Mr. Speaker, that in the discussions which have taken place since that time on the question of a general revision of the committee structure of the house it has been truly pointed out that many of our committees never meet at all, others only occasionally, and that in fact we could and should have an additional committee which would perform a regular and useful function in enabling the house to have a better grasp of defence matters than we can now have.

Later on in 1946 the matter was raised again. At page 5268 of Hansard for August 23, 1946, I asked the minister:

> What is the intention with regard to the defence committee?

The minister replied:

> I was sympathetic to it, as I indicated before. This session, as it has developed, many other committees got ahead of it. It seemed for one reason or another that a tremendous number of important special committees were set up this session, including the veterans affairs committee. I would hope that at another session it will not be necessary for the veterans affairs committee to undertake the stupendous amount of work it did this session, so that at the beginning of another session, which we could perhaps regard as our first normal session of the new parliament, it should be possible to give early consideration to that question. The real reason why it was not actively considered this time was that there were so many other matters which had to be dealt with that it would not have been possible for members to serve on another committee.

By direct inference the minister there said that the reason a defence committee was not established was that we had a very large and active veterans affairs committee. At this session, in another parliament, the Minister of Veterans Affairs and the government have made it very clear that they do not intend to set up a veterans affairs committee. Therefore on that basis there is no reason why we should not, particularly at the beginning of a session, in accordance with the suggestion of the minister of national defence of that day, have a defence committee established at this time.

Later on in 1948 when the present Minister of National Defence (Mr. Claxton) was dealing with this matter, he made it clear at that time that he was not definitely opposed to the idea of a defence committee. He was asked about it again by the hon. member for Vancouver-Quadra, and in reply is reported at page 5807 of Hansard for June 24, 1948, as follows:

The hon. member for Vancouver South again raised the question as to whether the government would entertain the possibility of having a committee on defence matters. As I pointed out when that question was raised last year, my own personal inclination would be in favour of that course. I can see quite a few advantages from my own point a view as minister in having an opportunity of talking things over and having them explained in such a committee. I must say, however, that the suggestion raises considerations far greater than any such personal inclinations, and those considerations I have put before the house and this committee on a previous occasion.

The minister was referring there to his statements made at other times that he was not altogether easy in his mind about the enlargement of the committee system because, as he said, he felt it would lead to the same committee structure as they have in the United States. He went on to say:

I do not do so in any final sense. . .

That is to say, he did not put forward these reasons or any opposition to the committee in any final sense. Therefore we have reason to hope that the minister still has an open mind, and I think we should have reason to hope that we can, upon the arguments presented this afternoon, perhaps bring the minister around to the point where he would favourably consider the setting up of such a committee. I should remind you, Mr. Speaker, that at one time the minister held definite views in favour of the setting up of such a committee. I am not going to suggest that no one is entitled to change his mind, and indeed the minister has been very frank in the past to say that on reflection he had changed these views. I hope he will allow us to suggest that on reflection we feel that his previous views, so firmly held, so clearly expressed and cogently argued in an article which appeared in 1943, I believe it was, were correct, and that his present views are not as sound as his former ones.

It seems to me that in defence at the present time, more than in any other aspect of our national life, there is need for as near an approach as we can get to a bipartisan policy. I think the need is even greater than in the case of external affairs, but surely it is not reasonable to expect that we can accept and support wholeheartedly without criticism a policy the reasons for which and the implications of which we do not know, and the background of which we have no means of understanding. Admittedly we criticize the minister and the government. It is our duty as the opposition, but I think I can assure the minister that in so far as we can properly do so we desire to facilitate his work in the building up of our defence forces, and we desire to co-operate to the fullest possible extent in the work of perfecting Canada's defence machinery. It is impossible to expect that we can do that unless we are taken into the confidence of the minister and the government, and have an opportunity of examining all the facts and factors entering into the decisions as to defence policy so that we can know the reasons behind the policy and accept and support it fully. If that is not done I suggest that we will find inevitably an increasing divergence of opinion with regard to national defence, and in fact an inevitable tendency towards criticism and pure opposition in this house.

In a matter so vital as national defence, a matter which concerns us all so personally, then as the member for Calgary East (Mr. Harkness) pointed out if we are continually to be held at arm's length in spite of efforts to co-operate, we can only come to the conclusion there is a desire to prevent us from co-operating, if indeed there is not an actual attempt to hide something. I appeal therefore, to the minister, and I assure him of an absolute desire on our part to co-operate to the fullest possible extent in this matter. I can assure him that, if he were to extend that opportunity which can only be extended through a defence committee, he would find that the gesture would not be abused but would be used to the benefit of himself and of Canada in formulating and supporting defence policies for this country.

The other reasons why I think we must have a defence committee are suggested by a study of a book to which reference has already been made earlier in this session. It is one of the most complete studies of this question of defence under modern conditions, and is entitled "Modern Arms and Free Men", by Dr. Vannevar Bush. As Dr. Bush gives the outline of what he considers to be a workable defence plan for a free democracy under present-day circumstances, it seems to me he suggests that most weapons of offence, most weapons for delivering attack on a massive scale, have now produced their own defence. He says that the process was going on during the last war, but that defence had not yet caught up with offence, or the means of delivering offence by way of mass bombing and so on. Now, with guided missiles, the defence against these mass attacks has, to a large extent, been at least brought into existence, even if it is not yet effective in an absolute sense. He emphasizes the necessity, therefore, for a highly competent defence network, a defence network which will eventually be manned at a high degree of readiness.

The author does warn against the perils—I do not think the word is too strong—of going too fast in setting up this defensive network. He also emphasizes the need for a highly compact striking defence force. This striking force would act not so much in the offensive role in the over-all sense, but would in fact be available to strike back at an enemy immediately after he had struck us. In that sense, it is regarded as a defence force. The necessity for a warning screen against surprise attack is also emphasized. All these considerations, Mr. Speaker, seem to raise new factors for discussion. They raise new elements which must be considered in the framing of our defence forces, and the assigning to its various components of the major or lesser roles. This study paints a picture of defence which is quite different from and much more complicated than anything which we have previously faced. That, it seems to me, points immediately to the corresponding necessity for a committee to give these problems the closest and most realistic study, and to consider the means and methods by which they can be met.

Incidentally, again without a desire to criticize unnecessarily, it does occur to me that, bearing in mind what Dr. Bush has said about the necessity for a highly organized and constantly ready striking force, Exercise Sweetbriar has proven—perhaps it was designed to prove it, as I know it was designed to test it—that today Canada does not possess a force capable of completely fulfilling the role of a striking defence force. As we have seen from the reports, while our personnel are trained, ready and willing, the transports are not available to build an offensive, or to make it possible for these forces to carry out that role under northern conditions. I believe that is a matter which should be studied by such a defence committee. The committee should know what steps are being taken to remedy that defect. Indeed some of the members of that committee might be able to suggest a means by which the defect could be remedied more quickly than otherwise would be the case.

Certain passages of Dr. Bush's study should, I think, be considered by the house as indicating the need for a committee. At page 53 of this paper-bound volume which I have, Dr. Bush states as follows:

> The major effort—

That is in building up a defence force.

> —should go into bombs and their delivery, until logic shows that a substantial defence effort should be added. Logic at some time will give the warning. The point will be reached at which investments in defence installations will so reduce the ability of the enemy to reach the target that this indirect effort will pay higher dividends than a direct one. It will make it more certain that if war came we should win quickly, and at a minimum net damage to ourselves from every cause. To estimate the arrival time of that point early enough to launch programs needing several years for consummation will call for pre-eminent organization for intelligence and analysis. We do not have—

Speaking of the United States.

> —such organization now, and if we value our safety, we had better get it. It will not do to bungle through, in the type of contest we are now engaged in or in the kind the future may produce.

The author goes on to point out that we should concentrate on this intelligence system, and should not rush into attempting to build up a great over-all defensive network now. If it is a fact, and Dr. Bush states it is a fact, that the United States does not have such an organization now, I think it is a fact, and at least until the minister tells us differently I take it to be a fact, that Canada has not. Admittedly, that is the opinion of one man, but one pre-eminent in his field, who states that should be the first step in our defence thinking. I believe that matter is one which should be reviewed by a defence committee, with respect not only to the actual building up and arming of our forces, but to the over-all defence planning as well. It is an approach which could be made in a non-partisan co-operative spirit.

Then Dr. Bush deals with the necessity, while we are undertaking this over-all planning and the building of our purely defence system, of guarding against surprise attack. At page 54 he says:

> Here we need to treat the surprise attack as a part of war in the open, for one thing is certain: If another great war is started by a dictator, it will be opened by a smashing, great, surprise offensive calculated to paralyse us before we are aroused.

A little later, at page 55, he says:

> In a dictatorship it is different. A surprise blow on a small scale would not be staged even by a dictatorship. It would be large, or it would not occur, for arousing a people fully by a small treacherous assault backfires. Those who study war have realized this fact since Pearl Harbor, if they did not know it before. But a dictator, if his control were tight enough and his iron curtain utterly impenetrable, might stage a large surprise opening when he decided to go to war.

So Dr. Bush says we must guard against this surprise attack. He makes certain suggestions as to how that could be done. He refers again to the necessity of staying on the alert and building up this efficient, highly organized intelligence system to warn us of any move which the enemy may make. He then goes on again to say:

We can do no more than this. We can decrease the value of surprise by staying alert, to some extent even in peacetime. We cannot reduce the surprise factor to zero, but we can cut it heavily. This does not mean that we sit with every post manned and every gun cocked throughout the years; to do so would be overly expensive and our efforts would be better placed elsewhere, for we should slacken in time if we tried to be thus continuously vigilant. Short of this extreme of having every man poised and at his post, we can do much.

One element of our strength should indeed be ready and straining at the leash. That is the retaliation force.

A force to which I referred earlier.

It is the force that would strike back within twenty-four hours of the time the first bomb fell, remorselessly, through every obstacle, pressing its attacks home, before enemy defences were working smoothly, for they will be less effective then than later, even if alerted.

The planes of the retaliation force must always be fully equipped and ready to fly, its bombs must be ready to go off, its every element must be so protected that the most severe surprise bombing cannot impede its launching. Its crews must be highly trained, fully briefed, and tested by frequent exercises. There should be an inspection system independent of the line of command up to the very highest echelons, to ensure that there is never any slackening in this picked group or any false assurance. The members of the force should be young, and rotated in duty, for men cannot stand the strain of being thus poised for long periods. But, in comparison with our full military power, the force may be relatively small.

If we just pause and consider that quotation, I think we can see inherent in the very idea he advances there the necessity for a constant review of our defence planning and system, as he himself puts it, not only by the government which naturally would be, shall I say, predisposed to view with satisfaction the plans which they themselves have prepared and put into effect, but a review, constantly and impartially, by a body such as a defence committee of the house, whose members would bring an impartial view to bear on these plans. Again I say that that review would be undertaken not necessarily in a critical attitude but in the desire to bring to bear on the problem the collective views of those who all have a joint interest in it and have something to contribute even though—and I grant the minister this point—they do not have, under our system, the immediate responsibility for carrying out the plans. To a considerable extent they might, because of that very factor, be able to contribute more usefully to the formulating of the plans and to an impartial criticism of them.

Another suggestion made by Dr. Bush, which I think can best be implemented by this defence committee, is found at page 56:

This is not the only thing we can do to decrease the potentiality of the surprise attack. Later on we can build defence systems and contrive to have them alert and ready. In the meantime our entire military system can be ready, even if it is not at all times acutely alerted, and as affairs become tense there can be means for placing it in this latter condition before a blow falls. We can build a civilian defence system and see that it is ready to cope with disaster.

The principal element of our preparation for possible surprise attack is an intelligence system of high effectiveness, capable of warning us clearly if an attack is being prepared. No iron curtain is utterly impenetrable. The operations necessary to set in motion a major surprise attack are ponderous and far-reaching. Dictatorship and oppression produce individuals who dare to flee and then dare to talk. . . . We need a modern intelligence agency in every sense of the word, using modern methods as they were partially developed during the last war, not a musical-comedy affair or a stodgy refuge, not even the half-successful affair we now have, but an organization qualified to meet our needs in this kind of world. It can cut down the threat of surprise attack. It does not cost much; by all means let us have it.

Then continuing he says:

We ought to know how to build it. . . But the really able men who functioned then—

That is, during the last war.

—have largely scattered into civilian life, the type of ability needed is rare, and the work is not attractive. The task can be done, by an individual of great mental and organizational capacity, having ample authority and the full backing of the President of the United States. As we value our peace of mind we had better be about it.

There, it seems to me, is a line of thought which suggests a new departure, a new element, in our over-all planning for defence. There is on the one hand the necessity for a radar screen to give warning against surprise; but there is the further suggestion of Dr. Bush that it is impossible and unrealistic to build up a complete defensive barrier around all the borders of your country but that your defence must be concentrated at key points. As all these points raise at least fresh thoughts, if not entirely new matters, it follows that in dealing with those thoughts and in working out the practical application of the solutions of the problems, a defence committee could contribute enormously to the work. But most important of all, as I have suggested before, a defence committee could bring to the supervision of that work the constant and co-operative effort of the best minds of those in all sections of the country who are vitally interested in, and anxious to serve in working out, Canada's defence policy.

Mr. Ray Thomas (Wetaskiwin): I shall take only a moment or two, Mr. Speaker, but I should like to say that, in view of the international situation as it is today, I recognize not only the value but the necessity of setting up a committee such as the one suggested. It is true that under the estimates we have an opportunity of discussing these things; but it appears to me that the discussion on the estimates generally evolves into a political battle. The appointment of a committee would make it possible to have a wide open, heart-to-heart talk at its meetings, and as a result of these discussions, we could gain a great deal more useful information than we now get.

We realize, of course, that it would be impossible to expect to get any of the top secret information, but we could gain knowledge of material that would give us a much better understanding of Canada's defence position. This would help the average member greatly, in that he would be able to go back to his own constituency and give to the veterans' organizations there words of assurance backed by a knowledge of the facts. That is all I intend to say, Mr. Speaker. But in view of the situation, as I said before, we intend to support this motion.

Mr. Rodney Adamson (York West): In rising to support the amendment of the hon. and gallant member for Nanaimo (Mr. Pearkes) I do so for one or two reasons which I think the house will be interested to hear.

In the past the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Claxton) has always opposed the setting up of a defence committee. He has opposed it for what appeared to him to be good reasons. He said that the setting up of committees in the congresses of the United States took away from the executive of that country executive powers of legislation. Were any committee to be set up in this house which would take away from the executive the powers and the responsibilities of governing the country I too would be opposed to it and for the same reasons. However, that is not the case.

We have a parliamentary system under which the government controls the House of Commons, and the responsibility of government is directly through the house, which is controlled by the government. Therefore I say, Mr. Speaker, that no committee set up here could possibly take executive powers away from the government. For that reason I suggest that the previous main arguments of the minister are false. He advanced other arguments. He said that it would interfere with the operation of the services; that it would jeopardize the free operation of the three armed services and would, in other words, cause inefficiency amongst the services. I feel that that also is an unwarranted assumption.

If the recent experience in the United States is of any value to us in Canada—and I suggest it is, and I am going to quote the reason why I suggest it is of value—it is this. The recent widely publicized quarrel, call it that, among the three services has done more to bring about unification of those services in the United States and to build good will now and in the future among those services than had the issue of the continued petty jealousies been suppressed and kept under cover.

There is another reason I come to, namely, the danger of the people of Canada considering the heads of the defence services as top brass. If there is any country in the world that loves peace it is Canada. There is no country in the world where the man on the back concession distrusts the brass hat as much as Canada. For that reason, and for that reason alone, I suggest that it would do an inestimable amount of good to give the heads of the three services, the technical experts, an opportunity to state, to this house and to the country, their case for the expenditure of $400 million.

In this connection I want to quote Albert Einstein on the military mentality. I shall quote one paragraph of what he had to say:

> It is characteristic of the military mentality that non-human factors (atom bombs, strategic bases, weapons of all sorts, the possession of raw materials, et cetera) are held essential, while the human being, his desires and thoughts—in short, the psychological factors—are considered as unimportant and secondary. Herein lies a certain resemblance to Marxism, at least in so far as its theoretical side alone is kept in view. The individual is degraded to a mere instrument; he becomes "human material." The normal ends of human aspiration vanish with such a viewpoint. Instead, the military mentality raises "naked power" as a goal in itself—one of the strangest illusions to which men can succumb.

There is considerable fear among the civilian population, among the peace-loving people of Canada, who want one thing only, namely, to be left alone, that the military mentality may upset them. Hon. members will recall that during the war men were referred to as bodies. They used to say: "Give us twelve bodies or fourteen bodies to do a certain job." This phrase became so prevalent that orders were issued from many headquarters stopping it. That I think shows the danger of the military mentality. If the military authority talks to a committee of the house, his problems and the problems of the defence of this country become a great deal more apparent, and I submit it would make the job of those whose business it is to create efficient fighting forces much easier, because of the sympathetic hearing they would have from the committee.

I feel that the experts should be allowed to tell their stories and to state their difficulties so that the information that we get in this house and pass on to the people would be complete or as complete as possible. Not only that, but the costs, the hundred and one different matters of defending this country would be dealt with in detail.

The committee in the United States, about which there was so much controversy, has recently made its report on unification. As the house will recall, the most bitter feelings between the United States navy and the United States air force were engendered by evidence given before that committee. The house will also recall the bitterness that existed between the two services. As I say, the committee has made its report. The report, except for one section, which had to do with one officer, Admiral Denfeld, was unanimously adopted. I will quote four of the most important sections.

They are of sufficient importance to quote verbatim to the house. Section 11 of the report had this to say:

> A political body cannot of itself reach, through deliberative processes, final answers on professional military questions but must depend upon and encourage a continuation of the process of exploration, study, and co-ordination among our officers of the several services to preserve a satisfactory doctrine of defence, to have ready applicable plans, and to devise units, suitably equipped, to meet the most probable circumstances of any emergency. The significant thing is to ensure that the national-defence structure ensures adequate consideration of all professional views, especially during these early days of unification.

I may say that every word of that is germane to our situation in Canada, because we too are going through a unification of the three armed services, and we are also facing problems identical with those faced by the United States. There are two more paragraphs in the report, which form part of that section to which unanimous agreement was given by all thirty-three members of congress. While I commend the whole report to the house, section 22 is in these words:

> Civilian control of the nation's armed forces is integrally a part of the nation's democratic process and tradition; it is strongly supported by the committee. But in supporting civilian control of the armed forces, the committee does not mean (1) preventing free testimony before congressional committees by members of the armed forces, or (2) the relegation of the United States congress to a bystander role in issues pertaining to the national defence.

Does this House of Commons want to be placed in the role of bystander in connection with national defence? I do not think so.

Sections 30 and 31 deal with appropriations. Section 30 states:

> The appropriations committee should augment its staff in order to keep in intimate touch with the development of national defence budgets, thereby easing the stresses and strains in the Pentagon and keeping the congress adequately informed on basic national defence planning as reflected in budgetary plans.

There is a definite suggestion that a committee of the house assist the high-ranking officers and act as intermediary between the congress and the three defence forces. I suggest such a body would be of great help in this country.

Then section 31 states:

> The management committee of the Department of Defence should be placed under the direction of the comptroller of the Department of Defence on all fiscal and budgetary matters.

Those are four parts of the report which was produced, admittedly, after considerable heat and after the development of a good deal of bad feeling among the three services. It was, however, a report which, apart from one clause, was accepted unanimously by the thirty-three members who produced it. It has always been the supposition that the heads of defence departments, such as the chiefs of the general staff, the joint staffs committee and their subordinates or experts in the weapons production branches, would not be able to say anything concerning their knowledge of the services. Here again I disagree, and call as witness the United States chief of naval operations, Admiral Forrest P. Sherman, who has given a most extensive interview on a question and answer basis, to a periodical known as U.S. News, which is published in Washington and is of a semi-official nature. I am sure the admiral would not have given the interview had he not had the full co-operation and consent of the executive and of the entire defence department in the United States.

These are the sort of questions the answers to which we would like to know in Canada. The head of the United States navy, and chief of naval operations, with the consent of his government, gave a most illuminating interview in which he answered many specific questions, just the kind we would like to have answered in this House of Commons. I believe hon. members would be interested in the kind of questions asked and the answers given. Here are some of them:

> Q. Do we have an over-all plan? Is there an over-all strategy?
> A. Definitely yes. There is and must always be an over-all plan and it must be revised each year in the light of the world situation and our military capabilities.

Then he goes on to discuss financial matters, which I shall not deal with at this time. Following that is a discussion of the subject which most interests the admiral, namely, the size of the United States navy and the decision to put the only battleship of that navy into a condition where it became a training ship, and would not be on active service.

With respect to cruiser strength, the questions and answers are these:

Q. The other day we noticed in the papers that the decision to make the Missouri a training ship and, with the reduced cost, use part of the money for an extra carrier was cleared by you through the joint chiefs and the secretary of defence; is that a new procedure?

In his answer he proceeds to deal specifically with cruiser strength, in these words:

Since I have been here I have proposed to the joint chiefs of staff, and obtained their concurrence and the approval of the secretary of defence in three separate propositions:

The first was the retention of thirteen cruisers instead of twelve, in order to permit us to provide Admiral Conolly (Admiral Richard L. Conolly, Commander in Chief, U.S. Naval Forces, Eastern Atlantic and Mediterranean) with a permanent flagship and also have six in each fleet for rotation to the western Pacific and the Mediterranean, on the basis of two ships in each relief, which came to a total of thirteen cruisers, as now required. This was instead of the twelve which had been agreed upon previously.

I quote that not because of its significance as part of the over-all defences of the United States but as an example of the detailed type of information which is being given by the highest authorities in the United States. Here is another question that was asked:

Q. How many landing battalions will that mean—eight?

A. Well, the commandant of the marine corps prefers, and I agree with him, that we talk in terms of marine divisions instead of the smaller components. The infantry battalions in each division will probably be more than three—nearly four. It will result in increasing the infantry component in each division by a third over what could have been accomplished otherwise. That will be done at the expense of service units, administrative units, security detachments, and so on.

Then he goes on to give further details. I submit that here are being given details about formations which we in this house and through us the country have every reason to expect will be given to us in regard to our own forces. There is a very pertinent thing here with regard to carriers and I quote:

Q. Is there any indication that the flush-deck carrier is the carrier of the future?

A. We believe we must eventually get into flush-deck carriers to handle the heavier and faster planes of the jet type.

There is information as to the different type of carrier that is necessitated by the heavier impact and faster landing of jet planes. I am sure the minister has read this article but I think hon. members will be interested in it. There follows a discussion of Russian reserves, and then there is reference to the reserves of the United States as follows:

Q. Are you satisfied with the progress you are making in maintaining reserves?

A. From what examination I have been able to make of the naval-reserve situation, I believe that our organized reserve is in a very healthy condition. Our voluntary reserve is quite large, but, of course, the effectiveness of the individuals is not being maintained to the degree that the organized reserve is. We have roughly 200,000 officers and men in the organized reserve and about 800,000 more in the volunteer reserve.

You might be interested to know that I have recently changed the organization of my office to make the assistant chief of naval operations for reserve matters responsible directly to me and thereby permit me to keep in very close touch with naval-reserve problems.

Then follow details as to numbers and classifications and types of reserves. Then the article goes on to deal with the Russian air force and the submarine question, and I want to quote the next question and answer:

Q. In case a war breaks out, would you have to wait for the reserve fleet to be taken out, or would you have enough strength to go ahead and start an initial blow with what ships you have? Would submarines, in other words, be able to stop our present navy?

A. That is a rather complicated question.

And later on:

We haven't as much anti-submarine strength as we would like to have. In the event of an emergency, we would need additional anti-submarine craft immediately—escort carriers, destroyers, patrol planes—all the elements of anti-submarine forces would have to be expanded very quickly. However, that situation would not cause us to delay using our offensive forces.

I have quoted these questions and answers because I feel that this is the sort of information our defence committee could obtain from the high officers in the armed services. There has been a candid admission of the situation with regards to the anti-submarine defences of the United States. If we had a candid admission that we needed so many more escort vessels, so many more radar screens, so many more anti-submarine devices, so many more submarines, or so many more of the other modern devices, hon. members of this house could go back to their constituents and say, "All right, it is going to cost us $400 million, or maybe more, but from the evidence given to me I know that if we want to preserve this country we have to have these things."

At the present time I cannot do that. I go back to my constituents and say that the minister has said so and so, but my constituents say, "The minister is a member of the government and is bound to say everything is O.K." I submit that it would create a more healthy position if members of this house could go back to their constituents and say that these expenditures were necessary because the information had been given in the committee on national defence. It would be information and not just a statement made by the minister standing in his place in the house and replying as briefly as possible to a question.

There are sombre, serious and even appalling possibilities in the hydrogen bomb. I should like to quote Professor Harrison S. Brown of the department of nuclear physics of the university of Chicago who I understand is one of the scientists working in the Argonne laboratories where the hydrogen bomb was either conceived or will in large part be put together and produced. He has this to say about the effectiveness of this weapon:

> Few of us fully appreciate the enormous potentialities of the new weapon for destroying life. It has been stated many times that the bomb, if it works, can be used to destroy entire cities by the blast effects. That is horrible enough. But unfortunately the destructive potentiality of the hydrogen bomb does not stop there. If the bomb works at all, there may well be no upper limit to the size of the explosion that may be created.

Then he speaks about the calculations of the force of the explosion and goes on to say:

> . . . the amount of destruction due to radioactivity from a hydrogen bomb could far exceed the destruction due to blast.

This extremely sombre statement follows:

> If the hydrogen bomb works, technically speaking it is easy to visualize a series of explosions carried out along a north-south line at about the longitude of Prague, in Czechoslovakia. The radioactivity produced by the explosions would be carried eastward by the winds destroying all life within a strip 1,500 miles wide, extending from Leningrad to Odessa, and 3,000 miles deep, extending from Prague to the Ural mountains. By the time the radioactivity passed the Urals, the intensity would be lower, and the destruction would be less. By the time the Pacific had been crossed and the west coast of America reached, the radioactivity would not be dangerous. Many human beings could survive such an attack by protecting themselves with shielding and wearing gas masks to filter radioactive dust, but radioactivity is not specific against human beings. Animals and vegetation within the area would be destroyed. Such an attack would produce a scorched earth of an extent unprecedented in history.
> The United States could be attacked in a similar manner. Hydrogen bomb explosions could be set off on a north-south line in the Pacific, approximately 1,000 miles west of California. The radioactive dust would reach California in about a day, and New York in four or five days, killing most life as it traversed the continent.

That, Mr. Speaker, is a statement of one of the principal nuclear scientists of the United States. Complete and absolute devastation of literally thousands of square miles and every living thing thereon is envisaged. Today we are spending $400 million on defence. We are spending some $600 million for all social security and welfare services. If this sort of weapon can be used against us all the money we spend on everything else other than national defence may be completely wasted. I suggest that this issue transcends every other issue facing the Canadian people today. It is an issue on which we cannot afford to be kept in ignorance. If it is necessary even to double the expenditure on national defence in order to preserve our lives and to preserve Canada we should be told about it. We should know about it because in the hands of this parliament rests the responsibility for the peace, welfare and security of the Canadian people. I therefore support the amendment.

Mr. Daniel McIvor (Fort William): Mr. Speaker, I have just three things to say, and I will say them in two minutes. The best preparation against war is the elimination of hate. I have heard cabinet ministers and the leader of the opposition (Mr. Drew), when addressing church organizations, say that the churches had the cure. What do the churches do? They believe in the providence and direction of the Almighty. They believe that peace will win, and if we can instil peace and love in the hearts of the enemy instead of hate we will win.

There is another thing I should like to say. I congratulate the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Claxton) on the fine display we saw last Saturday. I saw more than aeroplanes, and others did too. It was a chilly Saturday morning and some of us were cold. I thank the minister for the hot refreshments he served which warmed us from head to toe. A man like me could take lots of it because we could walk away as sober as when we came there. That suggests to me the thought that we have to be careful in the provision of stimulants to our youth under twenty or twenty-one years of age in the army, navy or air force. No man can give his best to his country if he cannot think clearly, and if a man has two, three, four or five hot Scotches in him then he does not think clearly. I do not drink because I do not like the look of some other people and how they act when they are under the influence. I do not like the taste and I have not a steady enough head to carry it.

Coming back to my first point, the best cure for war is to be found in the words of Sir Wilfrid Laurier, that great prime minister, that love is stronger than hate and faith is stronger than doubt. If we practise this we will drive out the devil of hate.

At six o'clock the house took recess.

AFTER RECESS

The house resumed at eight o'clock.

PRIVATE BILLS

ALBERTA NATURAL GAS COMPANY

The house resumed, from Tuesday, March 7, consideration of the motion of Mr. Maybank for the second reading of Bill No. 7, respecting Alberta Natural Gas Company, and the motion of Mr. MacDougall: "That this question be now put."

Mr. O. L. Jones (Yale): Mr. Speaker, in speaking on this bill last week, I outlined the visible support in our province behind the suggestions we have made to the sponsor of the bill that the pipe line should go through British Columbia. Since then, I have had a great deal more evidence of the public support of our efforts in British Columbia. Boards of trade and other groups, as well as many individuals, have plied me with letters requesting that we carry on the fight to prevent this valuable natural asset from being taken to the United States. We have tried to answer those letters as best we could, but it has been difficult to explain why a private bill such as this apparently has a priority which I have never seen given any other private bill.

Naturally, one wonders why this is so. I do not know the reason behind it, but I am satisfied that the people who are fighting to have this pipe line taken directly to the United States are totally unaware of the possibilities this pipe line offers for developing our own country. I, therefore, put it down to possible ignorance or indifference. Perhaps it is due to the impression these people have that money can be made quickly by taking the gas to the United States. On the other hand, I believe a long-range policy of conservation, and utilization of this natural resource in our own country, would pay big dividends over a period of years. I can quite see why a private company is anxious to take this gas to the easiest market as quickly as possible, and as cheaply as possible. It is true that they may derive some immediate benefit from the profit point of view, but I assure you that the public of Canada as a whole, and particularly the people of British Columbia, would be the losers. Any recompense given by the ultimate consumer to the private company would bear no comparison with the benefits that could be derived if we were to use this gas in the development of our own country.

At times I wonder if we lack that pioneering faith we had in the early days, when the Canadian Pacific railway first decided to cross the country. I am sure if that company had come to this house, and requested approval of a route through Spokane, Tacoma and then possibly to Vancouver, it would have been turned down with scorn. I cannot conceive any government granting the privilege, nor can I conceive of any public-spirited body of men requesting that privilege of the government. It is true that the same arguments could have been used then as they are today. The Canadian Pacific could have said that there were several flourishing towns in the United States, filled with people who would use the passenger trains, freight trains, and so on. On the other hand, there was nothing on the prairie. Such a statement would have been correct. These men had vision. They could see a future for the territory through which that railway was going to travel. They could see hope for a bright future for the youth of that day. With men of vision at the head of the government, they entered into what has proven to be a major development in Canadian history, the bringing of the railway from east to west.

I am satisfied that modern youth is just as adventurous. It is as capable of developing the utilities and factories in the wake of a pipe line as our fathers were in developing things in the wake of a railway. The other night the member for Camrose (Mr. Beyerstein) mentioned some of the possible developments that could follow in the wake of this gas pipe line. I have heard questions about the industries that could be developed, so I was pleased when he placed a list of them on the record. I should like to read what he said:

> Visible in the west are the materials for every type of plastic, for virtually all the major industrial chemicals and electro-chemical products. There is, here, the material for rayon, for nylon, synthetic rubber, phenolic and cellulose plastics, carborundum, graphite, cyanamide, acetylene and its host of relatives.

He could very well have added other industries to the list. British Columbia has not only those raw materials, but many more and base metals that could be used if the power were available. I am thinking of a cheap power such as natural gas. Cheap power is one of the essential elements, if a modern industry is to produce for the competitive markets of the world. It is for that reason we are anxious to get this type of power in British Columbia. To the south of us, they are fully conscious of this fact. If one goes to Texas, or some of the other southern cities in which industries have been developed as a result of natural gas or oil, you will find enthusiastic, prosperous cities. I have in mind Houston, Texas. Recently I was talking with an engineer, and he pointed out that no Canadian university offers a course in petroleum engineering. I do not know of a single Canadian petroleum engineer. Most of them are Americans and work in the United States oil fields or overseas. This means that Canadians are entirely dependent upon information and technical instruments obtained from the United States in the development of our natural resources. All this is the result of the fact there are no facilities for training petroleum engineers in Canada.

In the city of Houston there are 280 industries which owe their existence directly to the fact that natural gas was piped into the city. Each of those industries is large. I could mention several of them, such as explosives, chemicals, dyes, and so on, but anyone conversant with what is possible with natural gas and oil will know what I mean. I should like to read to you what an expert has to say about the possibilities. This expert, by the way, was speaking of the areas in the United States that are likely to benefit by the exportation of our natural gas over the border. He is W. Frank Prendergast, assistant to the president, public relations, Imperial Oil Limited, Denver, Colorado. He made the statement in October of last year, and I will quote it in part:

> It is impossible to predict at this time just how much the oil developments in Alberta will mean to your member areas, jointly and severally, as time goes on. Already they have meant a great deal to Alberta, to the prairies and to Canada and will mean more and more as the years pass. So far as you here in the United States are concerned it must be to your advantage to have a neighbour—that is a friendly neighbour—who is strong, and what country can call itself strong today if it is grievously deficient, as Canada has been, in petroleum?
> Again, it should be encouraging to all of us to know that there are large new supplies of petroleum close at hand for many of us and accessible to all if required.
> Then there are the enormous reserves of gas that I referred to—some 6,000 million cubic feet and much more in prospect. This might well become an available raw material for new industries in some of your member states as well as in Canada, or you may have materials south of the border which could be exported for manufacture or processing in a region so rich in gas.

That is one suggestion I should like to make, that we offer to our United States cousins facilities in this country to utilize the gas in the area in which it is produced rather than pipe the bulk of it out. The statement goes on as follows:

> In that event Canada's improved exchange situation resulting from her lessened dependence on U.S. dollar oil might be of consequence.

Then he goes on to point out to this committee:

> The area which you collectively represent is a continental area without the advantage of low-cost water carriage for its trade and commerce and so it faces more complex problems than areas which had the advantages of low-cost transportation from sources of raw materials and to major markets. Consequently its development—and I believe that in the next score of years it will be an enormous development—will set a pattern new in many important respects. It is a pattern that will evolve from the application of individual and collective imagination and initiative to the many problems and manifold opportunities. Of these opportunities it seems to me that none today holds out a greater promise than the enormous new resources that are being found and developed in Alberta.

Some time ago those reserves were estimated at 5 billion barrels of oil and 6 billion cubic feet of gas, enough to carry on for many years if properly developed and conserved.

I have here another statement that I should like to read into the record, as to the approximate reserve that is available, because I am satisfied that we in this parliament are not conscious of it; otherwise we would not be hastily trying to get this bill through, knowing what will happen in the future. The statement, which by the way was written for this month's issue of Canadian National magazine, reads as follows:

> With an estimated oil reserve of some 1,100 million barrels and reserves of 6,000 million cubic feet of natural gas in the province of Alberta, Canada is in the midst of the greatest oil and natural gas development in her history, according to S. W. Fairweather, vice-president of research and development. Edmonton, in one of the most active areas of oil exploration in the western hemisphere, is "oil capital" of North America.
> In a concise, chronological report on the Canadian oil development, complete with maps and charts, Mr. Fairweather traces the development from the first oil discovery in the Turner valley in 1914 up to the present unprecedented activities.
>
> The discovering of light oil near Leduc, 18 miles south of Edmonton, in 1947, is shown as the beginning of the present Canadian oil "boom." In less than a year, developments proved the presence of a major oil field extending from Leduc across the north Saskatchewan river to the Woodbend district. Up to the end of 1949, drilling in this field alone has indicated a reserve of 250 million barrels of oil and 500 billion cubic feet of natural gas.
> Since the Leduc discovery, the railway economist declares, oil of a similar quality has been found "almost all around Edmonton;" at Joseph lake, Whitemud, Golden Spike, Barrhead, Bon Accord and Redwater. The Golden Spike discovery well is remarkable for a thickness of oil-bearing formation that exceeds 500 feet. The Redwater field, with an indicated reserve of 500 million barrels, is the largest oil pool yet discovered in Canada.
>
> Pincher Creek, south of Calgary, has the deepest successful well ever drilled in Canada. It was recently brought into production at 12,500 feet with a record potential of 83 million cubic feet of wet gas per day.
>
> The Lloydminster field, situated astride the Alberta-Saskatchewan boundary, which came into production in 1943, still constitutes the largest known reserve of heavy oil in Canada.
> Exploration is now spreading into the sedimentary areas of British Columbia, Saskatchewan, Manitoba, and northern Alberta, Mr. Fairweather says. Oil in quantity was recently discovered by Imperial Oil, Limited, at Normandville, thirty miles south of Peace river and 210 miles north of Edmonton.

I have tried, Mr. Speaker, to indicate to you that this is a long-term proposition because of the vast known and potential reserves. I have tried to point out to you that here we have an asset which is equalled by no other that we know of in Canada today. While possibly wheat and timber have built up our country up to the present time, this age is becoming more mechanized day by day; and day by day there is a greater demand for the products of Alberta oil and natural gas. Yet instead of conserving them and developing them to our interest and benefit, we are deliberately allowing them to be taken south of the border to be exploited by people whose interests are merely commercial ones for profit and are not those of Canadians. I feel that we should not only be looking forward now to replacing some of the spent wealth we have had—and we have spent it possibly recklessly—in timber, mines and so on; I believe we should be looking for some other source of wealth that would be steady, and that we should profit by the experience we have had with regard to exploitation, and should conserve it and make it do its utmost to build up Canada. By proper conservation and development this very thing could be done, bringing a balanced economy particularly to us in British Columbia, in the interior, where we are dependent entirely on mining, lumbering and agriculture, and especially in the district from which I come where we depend mostly on fruit. I can assure you, Mr. Speaker, that we badly need that balance to our economy and we see here—and that is why I am fighting so hard—the very thing that would bring that balance and bring to our industries secure prosperity for years to come.

I understand that some objection has been made to the routes. Some say that it is too dangerous to have the pipe line alongside a railway on account of slides. I should like to point out that obviously the pipe would be on that side nearest the cliff; and the side nearest the cliff is usually the best protected from slides because they generally cross over. If the corner is protected—and the corner is protected, it is true—it slides over and takes the railway away. So the safest part for the pipe line obviously is not at the edge where it could be washed away but hugging the cliff where it is to a certain extent protected. But we are not entirely dependent on following the railway anyway. I do not believe that the route of the trans-Canada highway will have any very steep grades along any of its mileage through British Columbia. For all practical purposes it does not matter which one you decide on, the northern, the southern or the middle route. The three routes are of such a nature, so far as grade is concerned, that a pipe line could very well be put alongside the road through to Vancouver.

I hold in my hand a report which I should like to read if I had the time. It was made by Ford, Bacon and Davis for the Westcoast Transmission people. In this report they point out that an ideal route lies between Edmonton and Vancouver, through the Yellowhead pass. These people are experts on that kind of thing. It is their declared and published opinion that that is an excellent and feasible route through which to reach Vancouver. I suggest that we could possibly ignore both roads and railways, if necessary, because I understand passes are now known, through which it would be possible to lay a pipe line, but I am not going into that. Suffice it to say that the engineers are on record as saying that they have a feasible route, a cheaper route than through the United States, to reach the coast.

Personally I would favour the government taking over the pipe line and controlling it, but I know that is dreaming. I know that the present government would not consider it; therefore I suggest the next best thing is for Canadians to control it by Canadian capital. Surely we in Canada can capitalize a pipe line. Why go to the United States for the capital? What is wrong with our banking system that it will not take a chance? What is wrong with our Canadian people that they will not take a chance? I am sure that if they studied the history of the United States pipe lines and found out what an excellent investment is has proved to be they would not have to go to the United States for one cent of capital for Canadian natural gas pipe lines.

Naturally money is available. I understand they can get all the money they want provided they get a charter and provided the route goes through U.S.A. territory. I know it is a good investment. It would be a good investment for the government. It would be a good method of control for the government. It would be definitely in the government's interest to have Canadians owning the line, paying their income tax and living in Canada, rather than have that immense wealth going to the United States, as it will.

This is not sentiment; this is business. I believe the government is anxious to look after its own business, and the pipe line is its own business. It is something that we as Canadians have inherited. It is something that we own now, that once taken away from us or given away, piped away or siphoned away, is lost forever. Our only chance of maintaining a hold on our own wealth is by withholding this bill or insisting that the nature of the bill be changed for our protection by saying that the route must be through British Columbia.

The other point that I would bring to the attention of the house is a very simple one. Just think what a development of this kind would mean in revenue to the people of Canada. I saw the history of one pipe line in the United States that cost $180 million. But it started many industries in the territory that it served, amounting to over one billion dollars over a period of two or three years. That shows that the pipe line of itself is not where the wealth or the potential wealth is. It is in the industries that are created by the pipe line coming into the territory. It is that phase of the problem that worries me. It is true, we are worried about the pipe line itself. It is not so much the worry as the fact that we are wilfully, childishly and foolishly giving away such tremendous wealth through our ignorance of what it is possible to do in developing industries.

The government should take notice and if possible get this bill changed. After all, they are the trustees of the people. The people own these resources. The government as trustees have a duty toward the people. They have a duty to protect the wealth that is owned by all who are called Canadians. No other body but the government can do it. It would be in the best interests of the government of Canada and of the people to have this done. It would mean that we could start in British Columbia industries that could not possibly be started in this district or on the prairies. They could be started in British Columbia because we have a fine climate, an all the year round climate, where industries could flourish both summer and winter without the usual shutdown because of extremely cold weather.

While we on this side of the house are possibly taking a more active part in fighting this bill than those on the other side, it is not a political issue. It is not a political bill. It is a bill that is basically sound except for the fact that it has not a clause containing protection for Canada. We know we want development. We do not want to stop the pipe line being built. No. That is what the bill is going to do. I would like hon. members on the other side of the house to note that this is not a political issue, but I do think that the best interest of my province can be served by voting against this bill. Therefore I challenge them to do so in the interests of the people who have written to me from more than my own riding, calling on me to get others to help to kill this bill.

I could carry on but my time is nearly exhausted. I leave this thought with hon. members. Fifty years from now the economic history of this period will be written. Historians will talk of this period. If through neglect, or through indifference, we allow this wealth to cross the border they will look back on this particular parliament and this particular period in our economic development and say, "What stupid people they were; they did not know what they were doing." To avoid that stigma in the future we can, before it is too late, insist that this company insert a clause in the bill promising faithfully to take the route through British Columbia, and give us first access to our own natural wealth.

Mr. Howard C. Green (Vancouver-Quadra): Mr. Speaker, this is a bill to incorporate certain named individuals under the name of Alberta Natural Gas Company. The bill gives that company various powers, including the power to construct and operate pipe lines both for natural gas and for oil within and outside Canada. In other words, there is no restriction on the area in which this company can construct these pipe lines.

Of course, as we all know, the incorporation is sought in order that the incorporators, and their associates, may pipe natural gas, and also crude oil, from the province of Alberta to the Pacific coast. The great question the bill raises is this. Should these pipe lines serve Canadians first, or Americans? Or, putting it another way, shall the export of gas and oil to the United States be limited to the surplus after Canadians have been supplied? That question cannot be evaded by parliament. It must be faced; and the only opportunity to do so is when this or the other bill with a similar object is brought before us.

I am particularly and genuinely concerned, as I believe hon. members will appreciate, because it is my view that if parliament permits Canadian gas and oil to be piped out to the United States, without requiring that it first be supplied to the people of British Columbia, such action will constitute the worst betrayal of the people of that province since confederation.

May I warn members from some of the other provinces. Let us first take those from Saskatchewan. They may find the next step will be that instead of their towns being supplied with natural gas that gas will be sent down into the United States, to the south. Let me warn members from Quebec and the maritime provinces. They may find that these huge reserves of iron ore which are being developed, and which are now available in northern Quebec, may not be used in their provinces, but may be sent down to the New England states or through the St. Lawrence to the United States steel ports on lake Ontario. At present the people of British Columbia are the ones who are in jeopardy; but if the principle behind this bill is accepted by parliament, then similar things may very well happen in other parts of Canada.

It is now perfectly clear that there are two alternatives. Before dealing with them, however, let me point out two things: In the first place it is admitted that there will be only one pipe line to the Pacific coast for natural gas. There may be another pipe line for oil; indeed, I believe there will be. But everyone admits that the market will support only one pipe line for gas. Secondly, it is admitted that the route used for the natural gas pipe line is almost certain eventually to have the pipe line for oil. It would be ridiculous to have a completely different pipe line route for crude oil. These two facts must be borne in mind in considering the arguments put forward on this question.

I said there were two choices. The first alternative with which I shall deal is that offered by the people behind this proposed company, the Alberta Natural Gas Company. They have attempted on two former occasions to get incorporation from the Canadian parliament, and on both occasions have failed because they proposed to build their line largely through the United States.

What are their plans? No secret is made of their intentions. Different statements have been made in the press. Three or four years ago promoters told me all about it in this building, and told other members who were here at that time. They have made no secret about what they intend to do. Their route is to be from southern Alberta through the Crowsnest pass into the district of Kootenay East, and then east of Kootenay lake the line will swing south into the state of Washington. It will continue across that state, eventually serving the great cities of Seattle, Tacoma and Portland, and en route serving such cities as Spokane, Wenatchee and other small American cities. Apparently there are to be two stub-lines running north into British Columbia. There may be only one, namely, that serving Vancouver. There is, however, talk of a stub-line running up into Trail.

In other words British Columbia enters into the picture only for a short distance through the Crowsnest pass and East Kootenay, and then by way of two stub-lines running up to the north from the main pipe line. They propose to go direct to the main market which, it is admitted, is in the states of Washington and Oregon. That is the last large district not served at the present time by a natural gas pipe line.

I have here the December issue of Fortune in which hon. members will find an interesting article entitled, "Natural gas, whoosh!". Portions of it were read the other day by the hon. member for Kootenay West (Mr. Herridge). I shall not read them again, but I shall refer to one paragraph dealing with the Pacific northwest which states:

> The Pacific northwest, which is now entirely on manufactured gas, also provides a large potential market for natural gas, but is left out of this calculation because it will probably pipe in its gas from the newly discovered bonanza fields in Alberta, Canada.

So that this company is proposing to go direct to this American market with this Canadian resource. The people behind the company make no pretence whatever about developing Canada; they aim to sell where there is a market. Then, at the end of the line, they will put in a stub, up to Vancouver. That means that we will pay there the highest price of all, because we are at the end of the line.

Mr. Cruickshank: If there is any left.

Mr. Green: Yes, if there is any left. It will mean that very little employment will be furnished to Canadians in the construction of the pipe line, because nearly all of it is to be laid in United States ground. It means also that once the pipe line goes over the United States border it is beyond Canadian control. In other words we will get gas in Vancouver subject to the approval of some United States authorities. We will get Canadian gas in Vancouver subject only to the approval of an American authority. No treaty has been negotiated with the United States under the terms of which provision is made that this gas must be piped back into Canada. And if there is a shortage at any time—well, out in Vancouver we are at the end of the line, and we would get what is left. Only the Vancouver area, a small area in East Kootenay and possibly Trail will be served. The rest of our province will have to go permanently without natural gas and crude oil.

Mr. Cruickshank: For all time.

Mr. Green: Because there is to be only the one pipe line.

Mr. Howe: The team is working very well tonight, the chorus over here.

Mr. Smith (Calgary West): The minister is the best judge of that that I know of.

Mr. Cruickshank: We are working for British Columbia, not for Ontario.

Mr. Green: One thing about the hon. member for Fraser Valley is that he is working in the interests of the people of British Columbia. Let us consider the crude oil situation and the alternative suggested by the company which seeks incorporation this evening. Under their plan the crude oil would be refined in the United States, not in Canada. When an oil pipe line is put in it will end at Seattle or Tacoma; the refinery will be located there and the people of British Columbia will be buying the products made from Canadian crude oil. So much for the first alternative.

A year ago the Westcoast Transmission Company Limited came here for a charter which was granted, but they gave an undertaking in the committee on railways, canals and telegraph lines that they would build their line in Canada first.

Mr. Howe: How does that bill read?

Mr. Green: That company is now actually applying in Alberta for leave to construct the pipe line in Canada first. When their representatives appeared before the committee I cross-examined them and we got an assurance that the pipe line would be built in Canada first. Otherwise they would not have got a charter any more than the Alberta Natural Gas Company could get one then.

Mr. Howe: How does their charter read?

Mr. Green: It reads in the foolish way decided upon by the Minister of Trade and Commerce, just as the other charters read. If the minister had been protecting the interests of Canada he would have insisted that each group of applicants put in the charter a stipulation that they would serve the Canadian people first.

This second alternative is to construct a pipe line commencing at Edmonton and then going west through the Edson-Jasper district. I was amused the other night to hear the hon. member for Edmonton East (Mr. Macdonald) move that the question on the other pipe line bill be now put, seconded by the hon. member for Jasper-Edson (Mr. Welbourn). The districts which those gentlemen represent stand to benefit greatly if this pipe line is built in Canada first. I wonder what their constituents will think of them when they find out they took the action they did the other night?

The pipe line would then go through the Yellowhead pass, which is nearly one thousand feet lower than the Crowsnest pass. It would continue on to Kamloops in British Columbia. I would point out to the two hon. gentlemen to whom I referred a minute ago that in order to build a pipe line a highway must be constructed. Only last fall the hon. member for Edmonton East was shouting his head off about having the trans-Canada highway go through Edmonton and on through the Yellowhead pass. Here is a chance for him to get his highway built by the pipe line company and also maintained by the company in all seasons. Yet we find the hon. member standing up here and moving a motion to force through the United States route.

The plan is to run the pipe line from Kamloops down over the Princeton-Hope highway to the upper end of that wonderful district known as the Fraser valley. It would continue through Fraser valley and into greater Vancouver. There would be a branch from Fraser valley down to the United States, and there would be another branch running from Kamloops, down into the Okanagan valley through that wonderful fruit-growing district and then into Trail. It would continue south from Trail to serve Spokane and the atomic energy plant at Hanford, Washington.

Testimony was given in Calgary just a few weeks ago that this route is feasible and would be just as cheap to build as the one going almost entirely through the United States. There is another feature which has great attraction for the people of British Columbia. The Westcoast Transmission Company Limited plans to establish a gathering system in the Peace river district of British Columbia and Alberta to pick up the natural gas and carry it down to the main line running through the Yellowhead pass. That will mean that Prince George will have natural gas and it may mean that Prince Rupert on the coast will also have the advantage of natural gas. It must be remembered always that not only is there natural gas involved; crude oil also comes into the picture. If the Peace river district does not have this outlet to the main pipe line running through Canada I predict that it will be decades before that district will be able to get its natural gas and oil to market and have these resources developed as they should be.

I do not think there is an hon. member in this house who does not clearly realize what such a plan will mean to British Columbia and the Peace river district of Alberta. Many small industries will be located in the little settlements. Employment would be created by the building of the line on Canadian soil. The unemployment situation in British Columbia has been worse this winter than in any other part of Canada. Our percentage of unemployed has been higher and this condition is likely to exist each winter. We need some development project which will give employment, and this pipe line proposition would be splendid for that purpose.

As I pointed out a few minutes ago, it would mean cheaper gas because we would get it first. I have here a press dispatch dated February 18 which refers to the evidence given before the conservation board in Calgary. It reads:

All-Canada Pipe Line Route means Cheaper Gas in B.C.

Vancouver will get cheaper gas than United States cities if the proposed natural gas pipe line becomes an all-Canadian route to the coast.

Conversely, if the gas is piped through to Vancouver by way of the United States, it could cost more here than in United States cities. Testimony of the Westcoast Transmission Company before the Alberta natural gas and petroleum board here revealed that total cost of transporting gas from Edmonton to Vancouver will be 23·3 cents per thousand cubic feet.

This company, which is applying to build a line from Edmonton through northern B.C. to Vancouver and then one to the United States, pointed out that the cost of gathering it will be 5·9 cents per thousand feet, bringing the total Vancouver cost to 29·2 cents. U.S. points, though, will have to pay an additional 6·4 cents per thousand, bringing the cost there to 35·6 cents.

The costs of this Canada-first route would be paid largely by the United States because they are going to buy most of the gas. Canada has control throughout until the surplus gas finally leaves our country. Gas by this route will command a larger sum of United States dollars than if it goes any other way because the Americans have to pay for its being transported that much further in Canada.

As for oil, this plan is the best one for the use of crude oil going to the west coast. Most of the oil in Alberta is in the Edmonton district. The shortest distance from Edmonton to the coast is through the Yellowhead pass, and that is the normal way in which oil should go. I think I am soon going to have the hon. member for Edmonton East (Mr. Macdonald) converted. As I said before, the Westcoast Transmission Company Limited would never have got their charter if they had not given a pledge that they would build their route in Canada first. Yet they have no prior rights on this route. Any other companies have the same chance if they wish to take it, or to take any other Canada-first route. I am sure there will be no objection in the house from any of the hon. members who have been protesting against these particular measures if the applicants give an undertaking that they propose to build in Canada first.

The Alberta Natural Gas Company is not interested in developing Canada. Why should it be? It is a subsidiary of a United States company, the Northwest Natural Gas Company.

Mr. Smith (Calgary West): A Delaware corporation.

Mr. Green: Their purpose is to get into the United States market, and to get there just as quickly as it is possible to do so.

Naturally very strong opinions on this question are held in the province of British Columbia. All of those opinions are in favour of this Canada-first route.

Mr. Smith (Calgary West): Except the Liberal members of the house.

Mr. Cruickshank: Some of them.

Mr. Green: After all, one route misses most of the province of British Columbia and the other route serves most of our province. First of all let me give you the opinion of the government of British Columbia. The Hon. Gordon Wismer, our attorney-general, appeared before the conservation board in Calgary about a month ago, and there he asked the board to give a licence to the Westcoast Transmission Company Limited. Dealing with the reasons he gave, the newspaper article reads:

He urged that Canadian provinces be given priority over the United States who also want to buy Alberta natural gas. "We are strongly supporting the proposal that such a line be through British Columbia, and then, if sufficient gas is available, to the northwest United States," he said. "This route will assure that the domestic and industrial requirements of the people of B.C. will get first consideration. More important," he added, "a northerly route will assure greater industrial development in northern Alberta and throughout B.C. This northerly route would run through the northeastern area of B.C. The Peace river block contains about 50 million acres of potential oil and gas land," he said.

The provincial minister of lands took the same position in the provincial legislature just two weeks ago. The newspaper article refers to what the Hon. E. T. Kenney had to say and reads in part:

Stressing the importance of any attempt to pipe natural gas to the lower mainland from Alberta, Mr. Kenney said the public of this province should actively support the all-Canadian route of Westcoast Transmission Limited. Utilization of this route would mean Vancouver would be getting gas before it was piped into west coast cities in the United States instead of being at the end of the line. It would also mean a shorter line from Edmonton and would make more feasible tapping of gas reserves in B.C.'s Peace river district.

Another article refers to what Mr. Kenney had to say as follows:

Turning to the question of a gas pipe line from Alberta, Mr. Kenney saw the potential development of B.C.'s industry set back for "many, many" years if the line does not come through B.C.

The same stand has been taken by the press on the coast. I do not know of one paper which has not backed us up in the fight to have the line go through British Columbia first. I have editorials here from the Vancouver News-Herald and the Vancouver Sun, both endorsing the stand we have taken and urging the people of British Columbia to insist that the line must go through their province first.

Here in this house we have the hon. member for Fraser Valley (Mr. Cruickshank) taking a stand in the interests of his province, taking the stand that is taken by the people from one end of the province to the other. The only voices raised against us are the rather feeble ones of several Liberal members from British Columbia.

We have the hon. member for Vancouver-Burrard (Mr. MacDougall) getting up and moving a motion that the question be now put as to this very measure, and we have his motion seconded by the hon. member for Burnaby-Richmond (Mr. Goode). We have the hon. member for New Westminster (Mr. Mott) applauding their action, and we have the hon. member for Vancouver Centre (Mr. Campney) actively supporting this particular bill. Of course these men must make their own decisions, but when I see them acting in this way I cannot help thinking of the late Ian Mackenzie, the late Gerry McGeer, and men like Senator Tom Reid and A. W. Neill of Comox-Alberni. Time after time when questions concerning the province of British Columbia were under consideration those men stood up here and proved that they were British Columbians first before they were Liberals.

Mr. Howe: Nine o'clock.

Mr. Green: Yes, the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe) has had about enough. In this question there is not any doubt where the interests of British Columbia lie. I point out to those particular members whom I have mentioned that this is a private bill. There is no question of a motion of want of confidence in the government; this is a private measure.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order. I must inform the hon. member that it is nine o'clock.

On motion of Mr. Green the debate was adjourned.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: It being nine o'clock, the house will resume the business that was interrupted at six o'clock.

SUPPLY

The house resumed consideration of the motion of Mr. Abbott for committee of supply.

PROPOSED SPECIAL COMMITTEE ON NATIONAL DEFENCE

Mr. H. O. White (Middlesex East): Mr. Speaker, in rising tonight to take part in this debate which has been brought about by the amendment of the hon. member for Nanaimo (Mr. Pearkes), I do not do so because of my intimate knowledge of matters of defence but because of the people whom I represent, the man in the street who pays and pays. So long as it assures peace, any price that we may pay for preparedness will not be too great. The past has demonstrated that unpreparedness has always brought us war. The price that we as Canadian people are prepared to pay for national defence should not necessarily be an open door to careless spending of the people's hard-earned money. Every dollar should be conserved and wisely spent.

The parliamentary assistant to the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. McIlraith) went out of his way this afternoon to explain something about patronage, and other things that were happening. I am wondering whether what he said to us was not a clever way of changing the old political pork barrel into a study group. It was one of the most astute moves we have seen in this house, but I am afraid the net result is going to be the same.

Mr. Knowles: That is what he said, there had been no change.

Mr. White (Middlesex East): A moment ago I said I was speaking for the man in the street, the man who pays the bill. I believe I can say to the Department of National Defence that the government, with the gloved hand on one side and the mailed fist on the other, extracts the necessary dollars by one means or the other from the taxpayer. When we realize that in 1938 about $480 million ran the government of the country, while today it takes about $400 million for the Department of National Defence alone, we can see how taxes must have increased. Do not get the idea I am complaining about the amount spent, but I do want to see that it is spent wisely and well.

I intend to deal with this matter of national defence as it applies to my riding, and I intend to mention the airport at London, Ontario. Most of you will recall a tragedy that occurred there not long ago when a Dow Chemical Company plane crashed, and a company official lost his life. This accident resulted from the inadequacy of the equipment at that airport, not because of any failure of the personnel at the airport. An ice storm was in progress, and the plane got into difficulties because of icing conditions. No emergency power development equipment was available at the airport to take the place of the hydro, which had failed because of this ice storm. I believe that applies not only to the airport at London, but to every airport over which the Department of Transport exercises control. Emergency power development equipment should be available at these airports, and particularly those that are served by rural hydro lines, because there is greater danger of power failure on rural lines when these places are so far from the transmitting stations.

After that accident an inquiry was held, but so far there has been no improvement in conditions at the airport. The report of the inquiry resulted, more or less, in a white-washing of the conditions at the airport. We have heard a great deal about aeroplanes, airlines, and these North Star planes. The runways at the London airport are not long enough to permit these North Stars to land. They have been able to go everywhere in the world but to London, Ontario. The newly acquired jet F-86 is not able to land at that airport, and so it will not be available to the student pilots who are being taught at the R.C.A.F. station there. Recently one of the high-ranking officials of the air force was reprimanded because he said that the F-86 would be available to students across the country. If the government purchases 100 of these planes, and they are not going to be available to student pilots, they will become obsolete before they can be used. If a great deal of money is to be spent buying these planes, let us equip the airports so that they can be used.

While I am on the subject of training, I understand that the Harvard trainer is still being used. It was a good trainer in its day, but the step from a Harvard trainer to a jet fighter is too great a step for a pilot to take. In other words, as a trainer, the Harvard is as extinct as the dodo. I should like to stress the fact that the tragedy which occurred at the London airport was not caused by the failure of any personnel, but was due to the lack of emergency equipment.

Mention was made today of the flying demonstration at Rockcliffe last week. Many hon. members will recall that two or three years ago we went to Rockcliffe one cold winter's day to see a Vampire jet demonstrated. From what I can learn, the whole program has been a miserable failure. If this last demonstration was merely for publicity, a bit of a fanfare to show the people what is being done with the $400 million, I think the people are going to be bitterly disappointed. I hope this demonstration will show greater results than the one witnessed by the members of parliament two or three years ago.

During the debate on the address in reply to the speech from the throne, I mentioned the cost of national defence. Tonight, I should like to mention the fleet air arm. Canada has one aircraft carrier, with approximately 70 or 80 planes. A complete staff is maintained for the fleet air arm, just the same as for the Royal Canadian Air Force. There is no reason in the world why the fleet air arm should not be united with the Royal Canadian Air Force, thus eliminating this tremendous expense. It would probably be as efficiently or more efficiently administered. While I am mentioning that, I should like to refer to the difficulties that have arisen in the United States over the unification of the three branches of the armed services. I believe it is most important that Canada eliminate this duplication of services, and develop more efficiency, so far as it is possible, in our defence forces.

During an earlier speech, I mentioned the Royal Military College. Recently the answers to some questions regarding Royal Military College at Kingston were tabled in my name. During the first 16 months of its operation, it has cost $1,406,998. There are somewhere between 90 and 116 civilian employees, 26 military personnel, and about 100 students. This seems to be a heavy expense to build up a military caste in this country. The reason I say that is that we have some of the finest universities in the world, and they are properly equipped and are able to train our officers, as they demonstrated during the last war. Then when the men go out into the practical field they do not have to be graduates of a military college in order to get a job. That is a serious situation. We are hoping that we in Canada were getting away from the European plan of doing things. But that step back to the old military caste system that prevailed in many European countries, and which prevails today, results in discrimination against some of the ablest men that our universities have turned out. I say that without fear of successful contradiction because of the fact that last week I talked to some of these very men who have been through one or two wars and who complimented me on the stand I had taken on that particular matter.

I will put this fact on the credit side of the ledger. They tell me that recruiting is good. We are in need of skilled tradesmen in all branches of the armed forces. Our universities and technical schools are equipped and prepared to give that type of instruction. Let us take advantage of the facilities we already have and for which we as taxpayers are paying. The universities are looking for state aid, municipal, provincial and federal. If the state is to maintain them, I think the state should use them to the greatest possible advantage.

One of our greatest faults in the matter of defence is that we prepare for each war on the basis of the one we fought previously instead of on the basis of the one we are going to fight. I can recall that when I was in the army men were being trained with guns that were used in South Africa; and during the last war men were being trained with military equipment that was used in the war of 1914-18. We should be looking forward, not backward, in considering how to win and keep the peace.

I should say also that these young men who are joining the defence forces should be equipped with the best available material of all kinds, not with old and obsolete equipment. On the credit side of the ledger I should also mention the new CF-100,—an all-Canadian plane built by Canadian enterprise —the transport jet with military potentialities; and it can possibly be used to great advantage. I wish to support the hon. member for Nanaimo (Mr. Pearkes) in his amendment to set up a committee to study the various phases of our national defence program.

Mr. J. A. Ross (Souris): I rise, Mr. Speaker, to offer a few remarks in support of the motion made this afternoon by my colleague the hon. member for Nanaimo (Mr. Pearkes), and so well supported by him in his arguments. As was pointed out by one of those who spoke this afternoon, I think it is rather significant that the present Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott), when he was minister of national defence in 1945, stated in this house that he favoured a committee on national defence such as the one which has been suggested. If the minister in his important portfolio today was of that opinion in 1945, surely, with the gigantic expenditures that this government are now proposing on the matter of national defence—almost $420 million—he should be of that opinion at this time.

Most people who have been associated with national defence realize that, no matter how careful you may be, there is great wastage, which arises from the fact that equipment rapidly becomes obsolete, which cannot be avoided. That in itself involves great expenditures.

Much has been said about the atom bomb and the hydrogen bomb. I am sure that all people are fearful of the consequences of that invention, especially if there should be another war; and God forbid that there ever should be another one. But we must prepare for war in order to try to prevent it. I am sure that many of the students of warfare and of national defence are of the opinion that, should a third great war break out, we in Canada would find ourselves in the position in which Belgium found itself in the last two great wars; and that is not a pleasant picture to contemplate. Many people today hold that belief.

With respect to a recent newspaper report to the effect that a considerable number of Liberal members had been requesting some element of patronage in connection with national defence—and I have pointed out the great expenditure to be made this year, in the amount of some $420 million—I understand that some explanation was made this afternoon by the parliamentary assistant to the Minister of Trade and Commerce, in which he pointed out that this had only been a study club, with an official invited in. I realize that we are living in an exceedingly fast age, with fast-changing conditions; but surely if we are to have study clubs set up to study the most modern pork-barrel methods, it is really something new.

I said something about the position of the Minister of Finance. I really think that the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Claxton) and the government will accept this motion, which was so well proposed by my colleague this afternoon. I want to quote some of the remarks of the Minister of National Defence which appeared in Maclean's magazine of March 1, 1943, in an article entitled "What's Wrong with Parliament?" He said:

> One reason why parliament has not functioned better is that 245 members—

We have, of course, many more members than that today.

> —cannot get down to close grips with a subject. Also there is not enough time for the whole house to deal with everything. Hence, the practice of referring specific matters to committees for study and report should be extended . . .
>
> To be effective a committee must be small, not more than fifteen. Its members should be selected because of their interest in the subject rather than solely because of other considerations like province, race or religion. Committees should be set up early in the session and bring in their reports early, before the last-minute rush.

That argument was fairly well covered in speeches this afternoon.

> The committee on war expenditures has done exceedingly useful work but it has been suggested that it has been handicapped by lack of technical assistance. A committee of this character should have attached to it one or two full-time people who are competent to prepare the material as is done at both Westminster and Washington. Without such assistance the committee is largely in the hands of the interested department.

How true that has proved to be in this House of Commons!

> Committees should sit regularly on matters like manpower and labour, financial and economic questions, reconstruction, external affairs and information, munitions and supplies, agriculture, the navy, the army and the air force.

I wonder if that is not the particular subject that we are discussing right now.

> The United States senate has forty-seven committees exercising great power. We do not need anything like that number. The close connection of our executive with our legislative branches makes it unnecessary. Fifteen working committees of our house, most of them only meeting through half the session, would do the job. My fifth point, therefore, is:

5. Whenever possible a matter of major importance should be referred to a committee of parliament and where necessary the committee should be provided with adequate research assistance.

These are the remarks of the present Minister of National Defence (Mr. Claxton), which were published in Maclean's magazine on the date that I have given. In view of these remarks, and the very able arguments set forth this afternoon, I would think that certainly now he would be prepared to accept the motion so well pressed by my colleague this afternoon.

Hon. Brooke Claxton (Minister of National Defence): Mr. Speaker, this debate, which arose today, seems to have followed the expression of the hope made by the government leader of the house last night, namely, that the defence estimates might be dealt with on Friday next. That was my hope, just as it was my hope that they would have been dealt with on Friday last and the Friday before that, but in view of the progress being made in the house it did not prove possible.

This debate has anticipated the debate that might have occurred on the defence estimates next Friday, which I hope will still take place. On that occasion I hope to give a pretty comprehensive statement about our national defence. Tonight I should like to deal with one or two impressions that hon. members have endeavoured to create: one, that the estimates of the Department of National Defence could not have been adequately discussed in the last three years because they were presented late.

In the first place I should like to say that during these last three years the estimates have been brought down just as soon as it was possible for the Minister of Finance (Mr. Abbott) to bring them down. Secondly, from the time when they were brought down officials of the Department of National Defence and myself were ready to discuss our estimates just as soon as the parliamentary program would permit us to do so. In the third place I should like to say that in 1947 defence estimates were discussed on the 9th and 10th of July; in 1948 on the 24th and 25th of June; and in 1949 on the 11th, 18th and 24th of November. In each of those three years they were discussed well before the terminal pressure of the conclusion of the government's program and the business of parliament. Indeed on the 11th, 18th and 24th of November they were discussed through some thirteen hours, and I never heard—and I was present throughout—any indication that the indefatigable member for Calgary East was suppressed or hushed in any way. If he was, then he was not doing his duty as a member of parliament.

Mr. Harkness: I was not suppressed, but there were great efforts at it.

Mr. Claxton: No; so long as the hon. member is not suppressed, then I can say that parliament is functioning in its proper and normal fashion with regard to the discussion of defence estimates, or of any other estimates. Throughout these discussions hon. members opposite, hon. members on this side of the house, and hon. members in every part of the house, spoke their minds, asked their questions, and I believe the record will bear out that they got answers.

As a basis for this appeal to change our constitutional system—because it is nothing less than that—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Claxton: —it is suggested that they sought information and it was refused. That kind of thing has been about the only pattern that one can find throughout the remarks of the members of the opposition today. If you look through the record, Mr. Speaker, you will find that that is not so. You will find that on the two or three occasions on which information has been refused for reasons of security, that has been in accord with the practice in this house and in accordance with the practice of the parliament at Westminster, which we frequently follow, because we regard it as the mother of parliaments; and we regard our parliamentary system, with all respect to all others, as much better than any of them. We feel also it is desirable that we should try to preserve that system and make it work just as well as possible.

Mr. Harkness: Quite a few instances were put on the record last year and once before to show that that was not the case.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order.

Mr. Claxton: The hon. member mentions that. I have the instances here. I have a full record of all this business with regard to the refusal of information, and the charges by the opposition. I can tell my hon. friend that in this house we have given far more information in answer to questions, and also in speeches and white papers, than is customarily the practice in the houses of the other members of the commonwealth of nations.

I should like to suggest to the house that this charge of refusing to give information is rather flattering, rather complimentary to the work of the armed services of Canada, and of the Department of National Defence. They do not seem to find much wrong either with the services or with the department, and so they say that we are not giving them anything with which to enable them to attack us properly in the way in which they would like to see us attacked. I should like to say this, and I say it without fear of possible contradiction, that never in the peacetime history of our country have this house and the country been given more information about defence than over the past three years.

Hon. members will recall that in introducing the estimates at the last session of parliament on November 11 we tabled a white paper. Then I made a statement in some detail, and those two supplemented the annual report which was tabled on October 19, four or five months before the annual report of the department was ordinarily tabled, the report giving more information in a more palatable form than ever before in the history of the department. Then we had three days' discussion in the house. At the end the estimates were voted, and there was considerable time for the hon. member for Calgary East or any other hon. member to raise any questions they wanted to. They could have been raised even that night, because we did not take up until eleven o'clock on the evening of November 24, or they could have raised them at any other time. But they did not raise their voices then. They raise them now.

I repeat that never in the peacetime history of this country have this house and country been given more information about our national defence. Also I should like to suggest to you, sir, that what I said before—that we are now giving more information on defence than is customary in the United Kingdom or in any other country of the commonwealth—should be perhaps a matter of some concern, on the ground that we are going too far.

However I feel, as hon. members do, and as the hon. member for Nanaimo (Mr. Pearkes) does, and as hon. members in every part of the house do, that all possible information must be given, so that we can judge whether or not what we are doing is right, and whether or not moneys voted by hon. members here is being properly spent.

I can assure you, sir, that a very great part of the time of those in the department and of the officers in the services is spent in trying to see that we, the members of parliament and the taxpayers of Canada—because we are all taxpayers, and so are they—are getting the utmost value for the defence dollar.

But I should like to suggest, as hon. members have been frank and honest and fair in suggesting, that this is an exceedingly difficult problem—now, probably, more than ever before. On that account we need the help of all hon. members.

[Mr. Claxton.]

I welcome their criticism and their suggestions, and so do the officers and men of the armed forces. But you must not expect the impossible. We cannot foresee what the future will bring forth. We cannot foresee if war will come, or when it will come. We cannot foresee the development of events, the development of new applications and of new inventions so accurately as to be right all the time.

What we can do is try to do the job with which we were entrusted under our constitutional system, and that is to try to spend the money voted by you for the people of Canada in the best and most effective way possible. Today we heard hon. members carry on their fight for a committee on defence. I have heard the hon. member for Souris (Mr. Ross) refer again to what I said years ago; and I heard the hon. member for Kamloops (Mr. Fulton), I believe it was, say that this case had never been met.

May I suggest that hon. members and others interested should look at Hansard for May 30, 1946; February 13, 1947; June 24, 1948; April 4, 1949; November 3, 1949; and November 24, 1949, so as to see what kind of difficulty the proposition now before the house presents to any responsible government trying to work a system of government within the large framework of what we call, and are proud to call, British parliamentary institutions.

It is perfectly clear from the speeches of hon. members today, as on those previous occasions, that what they want is a committee to deal with defence matters of the same character and having the same powers, and subject possibly to the same criticism, if it comes within our system, as a committee of the congress of the United States. I have the utmost respect for our good neighbours to the south, and for their system of government. I have no word of criticism to say about any of it. But I do say it is not our system; and before you begin to introduce bits of their system into our system, or before some reformers in the United States should introduce, as sometimes has been suggested, bits of our system into their system, the people who are responsible for the continuing of the kind of government which each country has found to work well should examine the proposition cautiously and coldly.

I put my attitude about this on record in the issues of Hansard to which I have referred, and I do not wish to weary the house by going over them again. But I do suggest that there is a fundamental difference in the American system of government from ours, in that the president is elected for a fixed term of years; that the cabinet is responsible, not to the people through congress, but to the president; that the members of the cabinet do not meet congress; and that consequently in the United States it has been found necessary to devise a means whereby the executive meets with the people's representatives in congressional committees.

Now, I do not say that is a good thing or a bad thing. But I say it is almost inevitable, from the kind of constitution they have, that that result should be followed. And I do say further that a similar kind of procedure, if it results in a committee of parliament having anything like the powers of a committee of congress, would defeat our kind of government, and is unnecessary under our kind of government. Here the members of the government are appointed because the party they represent holds a majority in the House of Commons. They meet parliament every day. They are responsible collectively for the exercise of the functions of government, and they are responsible through parliament every day to the people.

So that we do not need this device that is so essential, or regarded as essential, in the United States. When I spoke before about this I said there was not a committee of the kind suggested by members of the opposition in any commonwealth country of which I was aware, and certainly not in the United Kingdom. I was taken to task for that statement by the Globe and Mail, that very dispassionate and accurate and non-partisan paper, in an editorial in the issue of November 30, 1949. That editorial concluded with these words:

> A committee—or a subcommittee, it does not matter which—to study the government's defence plans and learn about them from chiefs of staff and other informed persons is what is asked for. Mr. Claxton says this cannot be done because it is not done in London. But it is in fact done in London.

The Globe and Mail pinned this statement on the existence of a committee on estimates in the United Kingdom. That committee on estimates has a number of subcommittees and estimates of various departments are referred to various subcommittees. The order setting up the committee on November 17, 1948, reads:

> That a select committee be appointed to examine such of the estimates presented to this house as may seem fit to the committee, and to suggest the form in which the estimates shall be presented for examination, and to report what, if any, economies consistent with the policy implied in those estimates may be effected therein.

That is the end of the quotation. Hon. members will see that this committee on estimates in the United Kingdom is a committee to deal with the form in which the estimates shall be presented and to report on economies, but within the scope of the policy presented. The Globe and Mail went on to suggest that we should have a committee of that character and ended up by saying what I have just quoted:

> —and learn about them from chiefs of staff and other informed persons.

In that editorial the Globe and Mail listed the people who had appeared before this committee on estimates and there was no chief of staff among them. The people who attended were people who did not have to do with major planning, intelligence and operations of the forces; they were deputy ministers and people of that character who had to deal with the presentation of estimates, their preparation and the arrangements relative to finance. So far as I know, and I have made some inquiry, no chief of staff has yet appeared before the committee or any of the subcommittees on estimates in the United Kingdom. They have not discussed questions of strategy, the adequacy of defence or anything of that kind, which were the sole subject matters of the speeches made today by hon. members of the official opposition. They discussed matters of form, economy and efficiency, quite a different thing and of course a thing which simply did not justify the conclusion of the Globe and Mail.

In connection with defence estimates, defence preparations and defence planning, the democracies are obviously in a difficult position. As I have said, I welcome every word of criticism, every suggestion by hon. members of this house, or for that matter by people outside the house, and we go to considerable length to obtain it. But we do not think it is desirable, in order to meet the views of the opposition, that we should change or jeopardize our constitutional system so that in effect the government of Canada would come to be conducted by a committee of members, including members of the opposition.

The British constitutional system has worked well. It is a system we admire and respect and revere. Under that system government is carried on by a committee of the group which constitutes the majority in the House of Commons and which is responsible to His Majesty's representatives, to the House of Commons and through the House of Commons to the people. We think that that is a better kind of committee than the one suggested by the opposition.

In his really helpful speech the hon. member for Kamloops (Mr. Fulton) referred at some length to that magnificent book "Modern Arms and Free Men" by Dr. Vannevar Bush and he quoted a number of extracts. As I followed the hon. member I gathered that he wanted us to believe that the extracts he was quoting were in support of the proposition he was upholding.

I had the advantage of two days of most profitable discussion with Dr. Vannevar Bush when he came up to discuss defence research with us. From what I know of him I do not think he was gravely concerned about having a committee in this house deal with defence matters. I do not think he mentions it in his book and if he did I am sure it was an oversight because he would not be so indiscreet.

Mr. Fulton: Would the minister permit me to say that I certainly did not intend to leave the impression that Dr. Bush suggested there should be a committee. What I tried to say was that the ideas put forward by Dr. Bush could best be considered and implemented by a committee.

Mr. Claxton: Hansard of tomorrow will show what the hon. member said. Whether the views put forward by Dr. Bush could best be implemented in that way is a matter of opinion. I should like to refer the hon. member to another passage in Dr. Vannevar Bush's book at page 114, where he said:

> To spread our entire thinking before a potential enemy is senseless; it gives him a very real advantage, and an avoidable one. There is a reasonable balance between keeping our people informed and intelligent and unnecessarily supplying data to a potential enemy.
> Since the war ended we have at times erred and departed from this balance. As new aircraft have been developed, we have described their performance in some detail, published photographs of them, and discussed their merits and limitations. When a new guided missile flies well, the whole world knows of its success. We even discuss parts of our war plans, and examine in the full light of public discussion the relative merits of carriers and land-based planes for strategic bombardment, spreading out concepts of how we would use our power for all to read. Doing these things does not make sense.

Dr. Vannevar Bush is one of the world's great leaders in the field of scientific research. He is certainly one with whom my colleague the Minister of Trade and Commerce (Mr. Howe) and people like Dr. O. M. Solandt were very glad to work when the going was tough. It has been suggested by the hon. and gallant member for Nanaimo (Mr. Pearkes) that giving information to a parliamentary committee of the character described would allay fears. I do not think that has been the result of giving that kind of information in the country which has the type of committee that hon. members of the opposition seem to want. I do not think so.

Of course I believe we are in a very difficult period. We must give all possible information, and we must also do everything possible to sustain the confidence of the people. I believe it was the hon. member for Calgary East (Mr. Harkness) who said that if a committee were established it would help recruiting. Our recruiting for the active forces, the navy, army and air force, does not need any help. We are getting all the men we want. They are first-class men of fine character.

An hon. Member: Unemployment.

Mr. Claxton: That is interesting. I should like to take up the hon. member on that statement. I can give him some figures. When I last spoke to the house on the subject of defence on the 11th of November I put before the house the results of recruiting for the twelve months ending the 30th of September, 1949. In the introduction of the defence estimates, which I hope to make on Friday, I will put before the house the results of recruiting for the twelve months ending the 30th of January, 1950, four months later. No doubt the hon. member would suggest that during that period we should have had a great influx of recruits owing to unemployment. Not at all. We have had a slight decline resulting from our increased standards and our diminishing pressure. What is more, we have had just about the same number of applicants in respect of each twelve-month period, indicating that what the hon. gentleman suggests is simply not so.

As to the question of recruiting, because it has some bearing on the discussion, I believe that hon. members must now appreciate, because it has been said time after time, that we can only spend each defence dollar once. We can spend it on construction; we can spend it on equipment; we can spend it on personnel, but we cannot spend the same dollar twice. Therefore the problem of defence planning—and that is what we are concerned with—is finding out on the basis of the best information available what proportion of the amount that parliament and the country are willing to spend on defence should be spent on construction, equipment and personnel. We cannot spend the same money twice.

Then you have the same thing when you come to the allocation between the navy, army, air force, defence research and development. The allocation must be made, and under this government it is made by the cabinet on the advice of the cabinet defence committee, and in respect of matters affecting all three services on the joint advice of the chiefs of staff acting through their committee. When it comes down to a question concerning only one service, then it is done by the chief of staff with my approval, and subject always to the approval of the cabinet defence committee, the treasury board and the government. This planning operation is continuous.

We plan to meet events that may develop three, four or five years ahead. We plan for steady development, but we also plan so that we will be able to make adjustments as they may be indicated to be necessary by the changing march of events. As to the distribution of our defence dollar, I propose to deal with it at some length on Friday in order to indicate to hon. members and the country at large on what the present division is based.

I should like to say a word or two with regard to the remarks of the hon. member for Nanaimo. It may be recalled that, when the defence estimates came up last November, he questioned if enough was being spent on the air force; and moved, I think, by nothing but the most serious considerations, he put forward a rather extreme case for that arm of the services. I said we were putting due emphasis on the air force, and were going to do more, that it was in accordance with our plans; and, as he indicated today, that is being done. Today he questions if the navy is getting enough. He asked if the increase in the appropriation for the navy was in any way matching up to the requirements for anti-submarine activities. I should like to give him some figures now which possibly may not be available in the estimates. On a cash basis the estimates and appropriations for the navy are proposed to be increased from $67 million for 1949-50 to $82 million for 1950-51, an increase of 22·4 per cent. That partly reflects the increase in the strength of the navy which is now over its present establishment of 9,047, standing at the 30th of January at 9,322, but mostly the increase in the proposed appropriation for the navy is due to our desire to meet exactly the thing that the hon. member had in mind, the necessity of constructing anti-submarine vessels of a type and character designed, equipped and manned to meet the threat of any submarine that can sail the seas.

Incidentally, I would not accept the hon. member's suggested figures for either the speed or the capacities of submarines so far developed, although that may be a possibility in the not too distant future. We are developing these anti-submarine vessels just because we recognize, and have ever since the end of the war, the need for the kind of thing that the hon. gentleman now mentions. So far as I know, our ships when they are produced will be at least up to and probably in advance of any other anti-submarine vessels. The hon. member also asked about the capacity of frigates, corvettes and destroyers to deal with modern high-speed submarines.

Our position in that respect is the same as any other country's. We do not like the situation that exists today, and we are doing what we can to meet it. We are doing just as much as the Canadian parliament, and the Canadian people, will enable us to do. We believe that our anti-submarine vessels, our destroyers which are undergoing modifications for anti-submarine work, and our other vessels will be able to do the job.

The hon. member also raised some question about the R.C.A.F. interceptors, the number of squadrons and so on. The member for Middlesex East (Mr. White) said our plan to have Vampires was a miserable failure. I hope he is not serious about that, and I do not think he is. If he is, I do not think he knows the record made by Vampires throughout the world. I do not think he recognizes that these Vampires were the best aircraft we could get for this interim period, and that Vampires, winterized and equipped by us in Canada to meet the conditions of Arctic warfare, behaved magnificently during Exercise Sweetbriar.

Then, what are we doing? We are going on to produce the F-86A, which has the world's record for speed. I think it is by far the most effective single seater interceptor plane in the world. We are also producing the CF-100. Hon. members who, in common with the member for Fort William (Mr. McIvor), saw the demonstration of that aircraft last Saturday, will I think agree with me that we have a real aircraft. It is more powerful than any fighter aircraft yet produced. When it is equipped with the Orenda engine, after it has been flight tested, that aircraft will be still more powerful. Hon. members who saw that demonstration of air power no doubt feel that we are moving along in the right direction. This aircraft is designed to suit Canadian conditions—long range, all weather, navigational instruments, and the capacity to do the kind of job which it was indicated by Exercise Sweetbriar might have to be done if some future eventuality occurs, which we hope will not occur.

The hon. member for Nanaimo and others referred to Exercise Sweetbriar as if it had been in some sense a failure with regard to Canadian forces, aircraft, or equipment employed. I was there. I talked with the officers and men of United States forces and Canadian forces. I heard no such remarks from any of those who were on the spot. I found, as I am sure he would have found had he been there, that we had reason to be proud of the way in which the Canadian staff, the Canadian servicing corps and above all the men of the P.P.C.L.I., the artillery and the other people who were out for eleven days in the exercise but almost seven weeks altogether, withstood the rigours of the north. They came through with magnificent physique, and in high spirits.

Proposed National Defence Committee

As for this charge that they did not have the required aircraft to do the job of airlift, the hon. member must be familiar with some of the facts about airlifts. My recollection, and I am only speaking from recollection, of the time when the Germans came into the low countries is that they had a total of 2,200 airborne troops. My recollection is that when we came back, and made that great air attack on Arnhem, it took the airlift of the United Kingdom, the United States and ourselves working a shuttle service to get in the airborne troops. Now the hon. member knows just as well as I do how many aircraft it takes to lift an airborne brigade; and how many it takes to lift an airborne division in one lift. But that is not the way it is done, because it is not possible for any country in the world to do it that way. I saw the airlift in to the final moment of the exercise at Northway. They came in three flights of Dakotas. I must say I never saw anything finer than the sticks of men coming out of the aircraft, their bodies almost horizontal, then swinging down to the perpendicular position, the parachutes opening up and all of them landing almost in a row. It was a superb operation. We had Dakotas then. I do not know of any country in the world that has anything better than Dakotas to do that job, except the United States. Their aircraft for that job are of the C-82 and C-119 types. The United States had two C-82's at Sweetbriar, and we had a good many more Dakotas. They had no C-119's. We have contemplated buying the C-119, and we have even contemplated making it in Canada. At this particular moment, it is felt we just cannot afford it. Each of those aircraft would cost over half a million dollars, and with a year's supply of spare parts as well as the modifications, it might well run into a million dollars.

It is felt that this exercise has shown that the defence of our northwest, which is important beyond words, is an operation in joint defence. In that operation, the Canadians took just as great a part, and did just as well, as the fine forces of the United States. When you move up the highway from Whitehorse to Snag, and then cross over into Alaska, it takes a cut boundary line to tell where the boundary is. No enemy would ever respect that boundary. The defence of that country must be done as a joint or combined operation. As matters stand, we will play our part, a proper, fair, honest, respectable and respected p rt, in any combined operation.

I am afraid, sir, that I have anticipated something of what I was going to say next Friday and have also delayed the house too long, because I am sure some hon. members are anxious to get into supply and discuss other matters of real importance, in addition to defence. The hon. member for Middlesex East referred to the Royal Military College at Kingston. I wonder if he has ever been there? I should like to ask him if he has ever been there. I was there following the demonstration of the CF-100 and the transport aircraft, equally good in its field.

Mr. Smith (Calgary West): And attended a hockey match.

Mr. Claxton: On Saturday I motored down and assisted in laying the cornerstone of a new building and then attended a hockey match. The hon. member for Calgary West (Mr. Smith) is quite right. And I was extremely pleased to be present at a hockey game and see R.M.C. win over West Point for the first time since 1938! But I saw, as I have seen on four or five visits I have made to that college over the last year, the work being done, the bearing of the cadets, the quality of the staff, and the amount of research work that is being done by the staff; and I honestly wonder if the hon. member for Middlesex East (Mr. White), whom I respect, should not accept from me an invitation to go there and see what is going on. I think he would come back and say that it was a good thing for Canada that we had a college like that.

In conclusion I should like to refer to some remarks, in that connection and others, of a great general, Field Marshal Earl Wavell, who, in an article appearing in the Sunday Times of December 18, 1949, and headed "A Great Nation's Greater Future", had this to say:

> My visit was primarily a military but unofficial one, to the Black Watch of Canada, which most proudly and worthily upholds the traditions and reputation of the oldest Highland regiment. I had also an opportunity at Ottawa and at Kingston, where the staff college and Royal Military College are very pleasantly situated on lake Ontario, of learning something of Canada's military ideas and progress. They seem to me eminently sensible.

Then he went on:

> Canada has gone farther on the road to the integration of the three fighting services than any other country. There is a single defence budget; and while I was in Ottawa a bill was passed providing for a common code of discipline for all three services. The Royal Military College at Kingston trains cadets for all three services together; they looked to me a very likely lot of lads. The graduates of the staff college, also a combined one, whom I saw on the last day of their course, were obviously keen and efficient.
>
> Canada does not attempt to maintain a large force in being, but does manage to keep alive the military spirit which proved itself on the battlefields of two great wars; and to be prepared to raise the forces necessary for any fresh emergency without undue delay. In political affairs, too, I should say that Canada gets herself governed—

And here perhaps we should hide our blushes.

Mr. Fulton: Is he a qualified observer?

Mr. Claxton: The article continues:

—with a maximum of quiet efficiency and a minimum of fuss and interference. As a proof of her political stability, it is worth while to note that in the eighty-two years since federation in 1867 Canada has had only 12 prime ministers and 17 ministries.

And then these words:

A great nation already, Canada has a still greater future.

That, Mr. Speaker, is my belief. It is also my belief that the armed forces of Canada are today working to secure that future. From what I have seen of them—and I venture to say that I have seen a great deal more than has any other hon. member in this house—my belief is that they are people with whom it is good to work. They are good citizens first; they are good Canadians; and they are good soldiers.

I must say I am sure that they, like myself and all others concerned with our national defence, welcome every kind of suggestion and every offer of co-operation so that our armed forces can become better still; because Canada deserves nothing but the best.

Mr. George A. Drew (Leader of the Opposition): With the closing remarks of the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Claxton), Mr. Speaker, there will be complete agreement. I might point out that there is, of course, no one in this house—including the Minister of National Defence—who has had experience in any way comparable with that of the hon. member for Nanaimo (Mr. Pearkes) whose service was direct and immediate, in active command of these very troops for whom these high praises have been expressed. When the hon. member for Nanaimo gives voice to the views he has expressed here as to the necessity for a committee of this kind, he is doing so out of a background of experience unique in this house; and he is doing so as a man who rose from the ranks to the command of a division. From the experience he has had he knows, better than anyone else, of the high qualities of Canadian troops in every kind of active service. It is out of that experience that he has made this motion that is now before the house.

Tonight we have listened to the Minister of National Defence give the strongest argument that has yet been presented in this house for the committee that is asked for by this motion. It is extraordinary, Mr. Speaker, how sometimes quite innocently a strong argument can be given. The Minister of National Defence just read a statement by a great soldier. Lord Wavell was one of the outstanding officers of the last war. But, like everyone else, Lord Wavell can be misled by propaganda.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Drew: The Minister of National Defence has quoted an article in which Lord Wavell said "While I was in Ottawa a bill was passed providing for a common code of discipline for all three services." Every member of this house knows that that bill is not even in the house yet. We all know that Lord Wavell must have been misled by somebody who was guiding him on that trip, because he himself is a most careful man. But unfortunately he did not know of the extent of the inaccuracies that we are called upon to accept here.

Mr. Rowe: He has not had our experience of them.

Mr. Drew: No. Some question was raised that implied an element of surprise that this motion should come on at this time when the estimates are to be considered on Friday, as we hope. Let us be quite clear as to why this motion is before the house at this time. On Friday there will be brought forward the estimates of the department which is asking for the largest amount of money asked for by a department of national defence in this country, and much the largest amount of money asked for by any operating department of the government. It is asking for $425 million, and it is asking for more than that; because in addition to the $425 million being asked for in the estimates as presented, it is also asking for $194 million in deferred obligations, bringing the amount actually under consideration by this parliament to $619 million. It is appropriate that just today in the Montreal Standard there should appear that article by the Minister of National Defence entitled "Defence is Big Business." It certainly is. What we are dealing with is $619 million. In this the Minister of National Defence quite properly puts forward a number of views as to the defence plans of this country. I think it would be very interesting for hon. members to read the article and obtain some information as to the problems that are being considered by the department. In this article we find this statement:

Last year we spent $145,033,051 on construction and maintenance of buildings, equipment, food and other supplies through 65,308 contracts placed through our crown-owned purchasing agency.

That is an interesting figure, because it indicates the extent of the interest hon. members should have in this department.

Why is it suggested that there should be an opportunity to examine these accounts in a way that cannot be done here? It is most unfortunate that the Minister of National Defence should so underestimate the intelligence of the people of Canada, if not the intelligence of hon. members, as to convey the impression that by an examination of these estimates we are able to get down to any detailed knowledge of what the facts are. Look at your estimates; look at the huge sums blocked in $25 million, and then have it suggested that in these estimates we are in a position to find out how the money is being spent. It is our duty to find that out.

It is not only the question of the adequacy of our preparation; it is the question of how the money is being spent. This is not something that affects only Canada. After all, if there is one man in public life in the world today who has had experience and knowledge of defence estimates it is Winston Churchill. This is what he had to say a couple of weeks ago in referring to the estimates of £2,125 million, then under consideration in Great Britain. I quote his words:

> I have a feeling, having handled these things before, that a considerable reduction in the expense and burden of our defences might be combined with an actually stronger fighting force and better conditions for the troops.

We have in mind not only that; we want to know whether we are getting the best type of balanced military forces; we want to know whether the money is being properly spent, and whether there are any economies that could be practised which would save money for the people of Canada.

As I said, one of the reasons that the Minister of National Defence had himself given the strongest argument for the setting up of this committee is the extraordinary misinformation that he gave this house. Referring to an editorial in the Globe and Mail of November 30 last, the Minister of National Defence said that in that editorial it had been stated that in Britain there is a special subcommittee on defence estimates, and that we should have a similar committee here, where staff officers could be called. He sought to convey the impression that staff officers are not called before that committee there. I do not think anyone will question that that was the impression he sought to give.

Mr. Rowe: That is what he said.

Mr. Drew: I have in my hand the second report from the select committee on the defence estimates of last year. Just let me indicate to the house the kind of thing they have under consideration. This is a statement made by one of the members of the committee during the hearings:

> But this inquiry really deals with defence, and we want to find out how much money is being properly or improperly used by the service departments in respect of defence, and how much, if any, of the expenditure has been incurred on behalf of civil aviation, or whatever it might be.

That is clear enough. This committee in Britain goes right into the question of how the money is spent, and of the allocation of the money, and whether it is being properly allocated for civil aviation, military aviation or otherwise. Let us see who appear before that committee. Let me just take as an example one day, February 16, 1949. At the opening of the hearing on that day the chairman said:

> For the purposes of the record, Sir Harold, would you once more state your position?
> (Sir Harold Parker:) I am the permanent secretary of the ministry of defence.
>
> General Hollis? (Lieutenant-General Hollis): I am chief staff officer, ministry of defence.

These are the witnesses.

> And Captain Searle? (Captain Searle): I am the admiralty representative on the oversea defence committee, and director of plans.
> Major-General Redman? (Major-General Redman): I am director of military operations.
> Mr. Key? (Mr. Key): I am assistant secretary, F1 and F5.

Then it goes on:

> And we have a representative of the air ministry? (Air Vice-Marshal Foster): I am assistant chief of the air staff for policy and plans.

That is the kind of thing, Mr. Speaker, that makes it so utterly impossible for hon. members to have any confidence in the statements made here on national defence.

Mr. Claxton: Excuse me. If I may, what I said was that there were no chiefs of staff, and no one in charge of operations. That will be found to be so. The hon. member has not yet referred to any who are.

Mr. Drew: Just the chief staff officer in the ministry of defence, and just the director of plans, that is all. These are not staff officers; these are not men who are military officers; they know nothing about it. These are people dealing with all accounts and economies. No; there was an attempt to mislead this house. These are not by any manner of means the only witnesses who were called. Read through this record, and you will find the witnesses of the highest standing who were brought before that committee to give their evidence and to assist the members of the house in regard to the subjects that were under discussion. Let me give the house the names of a few others, all experts. They are: Sir John Lang, K.C.B.; Sir George Turner, K.B.E., C.B.; Sir James Barnes, K.C.B., K.B.E.; Sir Archibald Rowlands, G.C.B., M.B.E.; and Sir Harold Parker, K.C.B., C.B.E., M.C.

These are only some of the witnesses who were brought before this committee and examined in regard to the way in which the money was being spent and the results that were being obtained. That is a regular, annual committee that sits and hears evidence and gives advice as to how the money can best be spent with economy on the one hand and with efficiency in the actual military preparation on the other.

This subject is not one that has only arisen by way of suggestion that we should try to change our constitutional procedure. On the contrary, here is the mother of parliaments, as the Minister of National Defence has described it, going into their estimates with a committee whose evidence is printed in full and handed to the house. This is only one of the reports that they make each year on this subject. Why the difference between the Minister of National Defence today and the man he was in 1943? Why has all this change come about? In 1943, as has already been stated, and quoted, he then made one of the strongest arguments possible in regard to setting up a committee on national defence—under our system, not the American system. He pointed out that before a committee of the house there could be an inquiry into the army, the navy and the air force, where members of all parties in the House of Commons could sit around and have evidence brought before them and, in an impartial manner, reach conclusions that would be of assistance to the whole house.

Why the change?

Then he was parliamentary assistant, I believe, to the then prime minister; and in that capacity, and with that experience, he thought then there should be a committee on national defence. But now, as Minister of National Defence, he suggests to us that this would be contrary to the constitution and that it would, in fact, be an attempt to accept the American system of government, which is so unlike our own. To use his exact words —"It is an appeal to change our constitutional system, because it is not anything less than that."

Mr. Speaker, within the bounds of parliamentary procedure, it is not possible to use words that describe language of that kind, in relation to what the reality is. And after all, is it not remarkable that it should be so unconstitutional to have a committee on national defence when it is perfectly constitutional to have a committee on external affairs? And yet these are twin departments which are related to the maintenance and security of this country.

The Department of External Affairs is closely related to the Department of National Defence—so closely related, in fact, that the Department of External Affairs must, for instance, screen the arrangements which are made for the export of arms. Naturally that is something in which the Department of National Defence is not interested. But when I hear statements made about the lack of confidence of this government in the government of China, I cannot help wondering why it was that this government was sending millions of dollars' worth of arms and aircraft to the government of China last year, on the approval of the Department of External Affairs.

That is something members should realize —this close fellowship. They drive as a team, and if external affairs says that arms should not go to a particular country, they do not go. But when this government sends rifles and munitions and aircraft and nickel and other things of that kind to governments elsewhere, they do so with the approval of the Department of External Affairs and obviously with the approval of the Department of National Defence, because only the Department of National Defence could have had control over those military rifles and munitions. They are as close as that.

Yet we have a committee dealing with the Department of External Affairs, a committee precisely like the committee in Great Britain on national defence. And we have a committee on atomic energy, that other branch of activity which is so closely related to defence these days.

Mr. Howe: You had a committee.

Mr. Drew: You are not going to have one again?

Mr. Howe: I have not been asked to.

Mr. Drew: I had hoped this had become a good habit. I hope this remark by the minister is not a suggestion that we will not have it again.

In any event it did produce very satisfactory results. It produced results; there was no breach of confidence and no improper disclosure, while at the same time it satisfied those who attended that things were being done in accordance with the best practice in regard to that particular subject. And that is exactly what committees of this kind should be able to do.

This committee also would have the right to find out why arms and munitions in enormous quantities are being sent to other countries—because it is for members of this house to know whether these are surplus rifles, or whether we are replacing them with a new type of rifle, or just what the circumstances are under which our reserve military surplus supplies are being depleted in any respect.

Now the Minister of National Defence has made a lot of general statements in regard to the amount of information given. He said that, in fact, this charge of a refusal to give information is rather flattering and somewhat complimentary to the Department of National Defence. Then he goes on and makes a statement to this effect—"I would like to say this, and I would say it without fear of contradiction, that never in the history of this parliament has the house been given so much information as it has during the past three years."

Well, I have been here for just over one year, and I do know that, if the two presentations of estimates we have had are samples, no parliament has had less information which could really make it possible for the members to express an opinion as to whether the troops are satisfactory, or whether the equipment is satisfactory.

Last year, the minister told us—and these were his words—"information was given in a more palatable form than ever before." Palatable to whom? Palatable to the minister; palatable to those who are prepared to accept meaningless generalities, and at a time like this not prepared to fulfil their obligations as members of parliament and demand the facts for which this money is being spent.

I know the minister may not actually admire those cartoons; but sometimes one cannot help wondering when we see the minister wearing that paper hat that he appears in so often in a particular cartoon, because to hear some of these statements made you would think we were living in a kind of make-believe.

We are living in a land of cold reality that cannot be measured alone even by the more than $600 million that goes to this department. We are living in a land of reality in which the evidence is that Russia today has an air force with 9,000 transport and other heavy planes, and that they have today in these various fields of activity the largest army in the world, and that they have the largest air force, and that they have the largest navy. We have, for instance, the figures in Jane's annual book, recently published, and today regarded as almost an official publication, to show that Russia now has 360 submarines and expects to have between 750 and 1,000 submarines next year. This is merely an indication of the kind of reality we are facing.

It does not help to have the Minister of National Defence go on a junket, as he did out to western Canada, when he made forty speeches and told the people some things about national defence. On one occasion he said that we had a higher percentage of jets than any country in the world.

Mr. Claxton: I never said anything of the kind.

Mr. Drew: What did you say?

[Mr. Drew.]

Mr. Claxton: I never said anything of the kind.

Mr. Drew: You said that our plans called for the highest number of jets of any country in the world.

Mr. Claxton: I never said anything of the kind.

Mr. Drew: We will see what some of the things are you did say. Here, for instance, is an editorial in the Calgary Herald of January 27.

Mr. Claxton: The hon. member said I said something. Does he say I said it, or not?

Mr. Drew: I say that you were reported to have said—

Some hon. Members: No, no.

Mr. Drew: Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Speaker: Order. May I inform both the leader of the opposition and the minister that it might be better if they would address the Chair.

Mr. Drew: Mr. Speaker, I think the attitude that has been adopted in this case is evidence of what is happening in this house. Does anyone here suppose that I was on that trip with the Minister of National Defence? I had better use to make of my time. While the Minister of National Defence has extended every courtesy to me, he would not have expected me to go on that trip and I would not have expected to have accompanied him. The minister knows perfectly well that I was not there and he knows I am referring to reports of what he said.

Mr. Claxton: It would be interesting if the leader of the opposition would give the report so that I could deny it.

Mr. Drew: What I said is that the minister was reported as saying that our—

Some hon. Members: No, no.

Mr. Drew: I said the minister was reported as saying that our plans called for a larger percentage of jet planes than any country in the world. If he did not say that, let him say so.

Mr. Claxton: The leader of the opposition did not say that I was reported as saying that, he said that I said it.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Claxton: The leader of the opposition has not produced the report to which he has referred. If he does produce the report, it will be wrong.

Mr. Drew: It is the same old story. I am reading from an editorial in the Calgary Herald of January 27 which states:

Hon. Brooke Claxton's nimble footwork in an interview with a representative of this newspaper on Wednesday must not be allowed to divert attention from the central problem of Canada's defence: Have we an actual defence force, capable of taking the field, or haven't we? And if not, why not?

Mr. Claxton: What about these jets?

Mr. Drew: What is the minister bothering about now?

Mr. Claxton: Just your statement about jets.

Mr. Drew: Mr. Speaker, I have said before and I repeat, that I made the statement that the minister was reported to have said—

Some hon. Members: No, no.

Mr. Drew: —that our plans called for the use of a larger percentage of jet planes than any country in the world. He either made that statement or he did not. If he denies it, I am called upon by the rules to accept his statement.

Mr. Claxton: Read the report.

Mr. Drew: I have made a statement and the minister either denies it or he does not. If he does not deny it—

Mr. Claxton: The leader of the opposition is attempting to diminish his statement. He said I made a statement and now he says there is a report that I made a statement. I say that he ought to prove one or the other, and I also say that he cannot prove either.

Mr. Drew: Mr. Speaker, I have said before that I have made a statement and the minister can either challenge it or not. If he denies it, I am called upon to accept it.

Mr. Garson: Read the report.

Mr. Drew: I am reading something else and I do not intend to read anything but what I have before me. Do not let the minister who tried to mislead the house in regard to these defence estimates make statements of that kind. I am going to read—

Mr. Claxton: The hon. member—

Some hon. Members: Sit down.

Mr. Claxton: On a point of order.

Some hon. Members: Sit down.

Mr. Speaker: May I say to the minister that the leader of the opposition has the floor.

Mr. Claxton: Mr. Speaker—

Some hon. Members: Sit down.

Mr. Speaker: The minister can ask a question with the consent of the leader of the opposition or he can rise on a point of order.

Mr. Claxton: I rise on a point of order.

Some hon. Members: Sit down.

Mr. Speaker: As I said, the minister may rise with the consent of the leader of the opposition and ask a question, or he can rise, as can any other hon. member, on a point of order.

Mr. Claxton: I am—

Mr. Drew: Mr. Speaker—

Mr. Claxton: —asserting the right that any hon. member has to raise a point of order. My impression was—I may be wrong—that in his concluding remarks the leader of the opposition said that I had misled the house.

Mr. Rowe: It amounts to that.

Mr. Claxton: I think, therefore, he should be called upon to withdraw that remark.

Mr. Rowe: No, to prove it.

Mr. Drew: Now, I am going—

Some hon. Members: Withdraw.

Mr. Speaker: The leader of the opposition made a statement to which objection has been taken. I might point out that Beauchesne's second edition sets out on page 99 certain expressions which have been ruled to be unparliamentary in the British House of Commons, and one of these is:

That a minister has stated what he knew not to be correct.

I would think that misleading the house would be stating what was known not to be correct.

Some hon. Members: No.

Some hon. Members: Withdraw.

Mr. Drew: Mr. Speaker—

Some hon. Members: Withdraw.

Mr. Drew: The minister may be misleading the house innocently or otherwise. There is no occasion to withdraw the remark when there is not some accompanying word that makes it deliberate.

Mr. Speaker: If the leader of the opposition is not saying that it was done deliberately I would not ask him to withdraw.

An hon. Member: You have him worried, George.

Mr. Speaker: In this respect I may say that I have given a very generous interpretation to the remark. If I remember the words of the leader of the opposition correctly, he said that the minister had tried to mislead the house. Can a member try to mislead the house without knowing he has tried?

Mr. Drew: Mr. Speaker, I am going to continue this because it has reference to the problem. I quote:

All Mr. Claxton's talk that "it all depends on the time element" and his insistence that these things must be considered in relation to "the likelihood and scale of attack" are so much camouflage. We trust that in the coming session the Minister of National Defence will not be allowed to dodge this issue any more.

For a start, M.P.'s should insist on being told whether Canada possesses any operational forces, in the strict sense of the word, at all. By "operational forces" we mean combat units which could take the field and engage an enemy immediately. Mr. Claxton makes much of what he calls the "time element"—but it seems to us a very dangerous doctrine to suppose that there would be any time element at all in an emergency.

Then I come to a paper which has not always been unfriendly to the government, the Saskatoon Star-Phoenix, which states:

Since Mr. Claxton made almost forty-six speeches during his western trip, it must be assumed that he considered his junket, in part at least, as a public relations job. From this point of view his performance in Saskatoon (where he made four speeches) must be judged a failure. Our minister of defence has come and gone and we are no better informed on the principles governing our defence experts' thinking, on the state of our armed forces, on the part we play in the Atlantic association, than we were before he came. In a city keenly aware of the threat from the north Mr. Claxton found himself unable to rise above bromides and platitudes.

And later on:

So far Mr. Claxton and his colleagues have refused to give us anything to work on. It is literally true that the average Canadian knows more about the size, equipment and disposition of the American forces than he does about his own.

He also knows more about the principles upon which American planners base the defence of the continent than he does about what our own planners are thinking. For a few dollars he can buy Vannevar Bush's recent book, "Modern Arms and Free Men", and learn more about the technical developments in warfare and their implications than Canadian officials have released in the past decade.

In case it may be suggested that there is any attempt simply to quote those papers that might not be unduly favourable, let me quote the Toronto Daily Star which has not been regarded as extremely unfavourable to the government. In the closing paragraph of an editorial headed, "Canada's national security", they say:

As defence problems ought to be considered on an all-party basis, it seems not unreasonable that parliament should have a defence committee in which the utmost frankness consistent with safety should prevail. Should occasion arise, the committee could go into secret session to hear confidential reports. The committee, however, should not be given a status that would relieve the defence minister or the government of any of their responsibility for maintaining national security.

That editorial reflects the general opinion that has been expressed across the country in regard to the desirability of bringing these subjects under consideration, finding out exactly what it is we are spending money on, whether in fact we really have a defence force consistent with the needs of Canada at this time, whether more than $600 million is going to be properly spent on this particular occasion, and also, remembering the words of the minister, whether contracts that run into thousands of dollars are being properly dealt with and properly let.

One could not help of course feeling a great interest in the study group of the Liberal party which unfortunately caused so much misunderstanding, but it was rather interesting that when Mr. Low was giving his explanation it did not embrace quite as wide a field. They were having an informal chat about matters connected with the letting of contracts, and it was doubtless a very informal chat, but at least it is interesting that the method by which these thousands of contracts are let is subject to study, and we hope that study will be extended to the advantage of the people of Canada if not to the others who are concerned.

So far as the amendment is concerned, it is nothing but the most blatant evasion to suggest for one moment that there is any breach of our constitutional practice called for in setting up a committee on national defence. The Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Martin) is asking for a committee.

Mr. Martin: You are opposing it.

Mr. Drew: The minister must be a mind-reader. I have not spoken on that subject yet. If it is unconstitutional to have a committee dealing with the problems of the Department of National Defence it is equally unconstitutional to have a committee dealing with the problems of the Department of National Health and Welfare, the Department of External Affairs, or any other department of the government. It is the most meaningless evasion that this house has heard. It is simply an attempt to dodge the responsibility of presenting to the house information which every member should have. The minister talks about the information that is given on the estimates, but what earthly opportunity is there for any hon. member to get down to any detail that would help dètermine whether or not the money is being properly spent? Look at the bulk figures even in what is given in the details of the estimates. You will find there such figures as $22,492,208 for acquisition, construction, purchase, maintenance, repairs, rentals and operating expenses of properties for the army. A fine chance there is for anyone in this house to fulfil his obligation to find out what the money is being spent for or even whether money is being lost. What about the military camp that disappeared at Farnham? What about other military camps that have almost walked away? We have a right and a duty to find out exactly what has happened to that government property. The only place we can do so is before a committee of this kind. Before hon. members of the house applaud the remarks of the minister in evading his responsibility in this way it would be well for them to bear in mind that we are dealing with the national defence of Canada, and that every one of them knows perfectly well that they will get no information on the discussion of the estimates which will make it possible for them to determine whether or not the money is being properly spent.

Undoubtedly it would take time. Undoubtedly it would involve the attendance of officers before that committee just as it involved staff officers before the committee in Great Britain last year, and as it will involve the attendance of staff officers this year. It took time, but it also presented an opportunity for that house to get the actual information. If the issues are unpleasant to face then they are too dangerous to hide. After all, facts are the very foundation of our democracy, and it is the duty of members of this house to support an amendment which calls for the production of the facts in the one and only way that they can be obtained. In spite of the remarks of the minister and the way in which this has been done, I still hope that he will concur in the amendment when it is presented.

The house divided on the amendment (Mr. Pearkes) which was negatived on the following division:

Mr. Speaker: I declare the amendment lost.

Some hon. Members: Question.

Mr. Speaker: Does the motion carry?

Mr. Knowles: Eleven o'clock, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Harris (Danforth): I was paired—

Mr. Speaker: Do hon. members wish to declare their pairs?

Mr. Coldwell: I think that standing order—

Mr. Speaker: Order. I will hear any members who wish to declare their pairs.

Mr. Harris (Danforth): I was paired with the hon. member for Waterloo North (Mr. Breithaupt). Had I voted, I would have voted in favour of the amendment.

Mr. Ross (Souris): I was paired with the hon. member for Melville (Mr. Gardiner). If I had voted, I would have voted for the amendment.

Proposed National Defence Committee

Mr. Cardiff: I was paired, Mr. Speaker. If I had voted, I would have voted for the amendment.

Mr. White (Middlesex East): I was paired with the hon. member for Middlesex West (Mr. McCubbin). If I had voted, I would have voted for the amendment.

Mr. Coldwell: At three o'clock this afternoon, Mr. Speaker, I was somewhat sharply reminded that there were certain rules which governed this house. One of those rules is that we adjourn at eleven o'clock. I suggest that we call it eleven o'clock.

Mr. Abbott: Let us get to the consideration of the estimates as soon as possible so that we can scrutinize the expenditures carefully.

Mr. Knowles: What about unanimous consent?

Mr. Speaker: Is it the pleasure of the house that this debate be adjourned?

Mr. Coldwell: Eleven o'clock, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Abbott: I do not want to hear too many speeches about considering the estimates; we have already heard a great many.

Mr. Speaker: The hon. member for Rosetown-Biggar (Mr. Coldwell) moves, seconded by the hon. member for Vancouver East (Mr. MacInnis), that this debate be now adjourned.

Some hon. Members: No.

Mr. Coldwell: Yes.

An hon. Member: Eleven o'clock, Mr. Speaker.

Mr. Speaker: It being after eleven o'clock, unless there is unanimous consent, I am forced to put the motion for the adjournment of the debate.

Mr. Knowles: The Prime Minister is not asking for unanimous consent.

Mr. Abbott: A month has elapsed and only two departments are in supply.

Mr. Speaker: Order. Mr. Coldwell moves, seconded by Mr. MacInnis, that the debate be now adjourned. Is it the pleasure of the house to adopt the motion?

Motion agreed to and debate adjourned.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Fournier (Hull): Tomorrow we shall resume the debate on the address.

It being fifteen minutes after eleven o'clock the house adjourned, without question put, pursuant to standing order.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Wednesday, March 15, 1950

The house met at three o'clock.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

WELCOME TO VISITORS IN GALLERY FROM MONTREAL

Mr. G. A. Cruickshank (Fraser Valley): On a question of privilege, Mr. Speaker, in view of the absence of the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Claxton) I should like to bring to your attention the fact that we happen to have with us today in the gallery a group of the good citizens of Canada from his district, and among them happens to be one of my nieces. I also wish to say, sir, that you will never see a more beautiful group no matter how long you are here. I want to welcome them on behalf of the Minister of National Defence.

ROYAL CANADIAN AIR FORCE

FIRE AT CRUMLIN, ONT., AIRPORT

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. O. White (Middlesex East): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of National Defence or his parliamentary assistant. In view of the recent disastrous fire at Crumlin, is he at this time prepared to make a statement with regard to it?

Mr. J. A. Blanchette (Parliamentary Assistant to the Minister of National Defence): I will take the question as notice, Mr. Speaker.

LABOUR CONDITIONS

POLYMER CORPORATION, SARNIA—REPORT AS TO THREATENED STRIKE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. W. Murphy (Lambton West): I should like to direct a question to the Minister of Trade and Commerce. It is based on a dispatch in today's Globe and Mail, and also on a telegram which I have just received. The dispatch indicates a threatened strike of employees at Polymer Corporation which would involve all the major industries in Sarnia. Is the Minister of Trade and Commerce prepared at this time to make a statement to the house?

Right Hon. C. D. Howe (Minister of Trade and Commerce): Mr. Speaker, I have had no report today from the Polymer Corporation, but a few days ago it was reported to me that a conciliation board had been sitting on a labour-management dispute, and that the board had brought in a unanimous finding which the management intended to accept. What has developed since I cannot say. The management of the corporation handle their own labour negotiations. From what I know of the relations between the management and labour at Polymer I can assure my hon. friend that there is not likely to be a strike.

TREE FRUIT INDUSTRY

BRITISH COLUMBIA—REQUEST FOR SUBSIDY OR OTHER FINANCIAL ASSISTANCE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. H. W. Herridge (Kootenay West): I should like to address a question to the parliamentary assistant to the Minister of Agriculture. In view of the serious marketing situation facing the tree fruit industry in British Columbia, has the government given consideration to the granting of a subsidy or other form of financial assistance? If so, has a decision been reached?

Mr. Robert McCubbin (Parliamentary Assistant to the Minister of Agriculture): In reply to the question asked by the hon. member for Kootenay West, I can say that the Department of Agriculture has given consideration to this question, but no decision has been reached as yet.

HANDICAPPED PERSONS

QUESTION AS TO PROPOSED DOMINION-PROVINCIAL CONFERENCE

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Jean François Pouliot (Temiscouata): Mr. Speaker, may I ask the industrious and diligent Minister of National Health and Welfare whether he or any member of the cabinet has called a dominion-provincial conference to consider the rehabilitation of handicapped persons and the provision of more adequate protection for disabled persons?

Hon. Paul Martin (Minister of National Health and Welfare): The hon. gentleman, who has always taken a great interest in this problem, was kind enough to give me notice of his question. The Minister of Labour, acting in collaboration with the Minister of Veterans Affairs and the Minister of National Health and Welfare, has issued invitations to provincial authorities to send representatives to a conference on the rehabilitation of handicapped persons. The date has been fixed as May 25. This conference of course will be of an exploratory nature, and will be held on the technical level. It is expected that representatives of some voluntary organizations will be present. The discussions will cover the entire field of rehabilitation, and I know my hon. friend will follow the proceedings with great interest.

Mr. Knowles: May I ask a supplementary question? Will the conference to which the minister referred in his answer to the hon. member for Temiscouata have the right, or the necessary terms of reference, to discuss the possibility of some pension arrangement for invalid or incurable people?

Mr. Martin: Mr. Speaker, I have given as complete an answer as I think one can give in the circumstances.

Mr. Knowles: What does that mean?

ST. PATRICK'S DAY

QUESTION AS TO HALF HOLIDAY FOR HOUSE OF COMMONS

On the orders of the day:

Mr. Daniel McIvor (Fort William): I should like to direct a question to the Prime Minister. I have not given him notice of the question, but I know he is intelligent enough and knows all about the background. I am asking the question in order that he may have time to prepare. Will the house be allowed to have a half holiday on Friday, March 17, to celebrate St. Patrick's day?

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister): I would, as much as the hon. member, appreciate a half holiday, but it has not been the practice in the past, and the progress we have made since the beginning of the session would not indicate that it would be wise to start half holidays at this time.

Mr. McIvor: Thank you.

WHEAT

INQUIRY AS TO PAYMENT ON SALES, 1945 TO 1949

On the orders of the day:

Mr. J. G. Diefenbaker (Lake Centre): I wish to direct a question to the Minister of Trade and Commerce similar to that which I asked him the other day. Has a decision been arrived at as to further payment from the wheat pool? The reason I ask the question is that in the last three days I have received some thirty-eight letters inquiring about this matter. If a decision has not been reached, when may it be expected? The matter is of general interest.

Right Hon. C. D. Howe (Minister of Trade and Commerce): There will be a substantial payment from the wheat pool, but this is the last year of the five-year pool. It is expected that the pool can be wound up shortly after the end of the pool period, which is July 31 next. In view of that, it has been decided that no interim payment will be made, but a final payment will be made as promptly as possible after the crop year ends.

CANADIAN NATIONAL RAILWAYS

SHIPPING OF POTATOES AND TURNIPS—SUPPLY OF REEFER CARS IN PRINCE EDWARD ISLAND

On the orders of the day:

Mr. W. Chester S. McLure (Queens): In the light of disquieting phone calls, telegrams and air mail letters which I have received from Prince Edward Island shippers and farmers in regard to a shortage of cars to move the potato and turnip crop, I desire to direct this question to the Minister of Transport. Will the minister state whether any improvement can be looked for immediately?

Hon. Lionel Chevrier (Minister of Transport): The answer, Mr. Speaker, classically speaking, is yes; but the answer in detail is this: I rather expected that my hon. friend would ask the question, so I came down armed with a reply. The present position is that in Prince Edward Island for loading at the moment there are 220 reefer cars; in transit for loading, 220 more, which make 440. As I said before, Canadian National Railways think that when the position is 350 it is a good one. Therefore I do not think my hon. friend should be too greatly alarmed at the position of reefer cars on the island.

Mr. McLure: Thanks for the action.

RADIUM

THEFT OF NEEDLES FROM NATIONAL RESEARCH BUILDING—RESPONSIBILITY FOR BURNS

On the orders of the day:

Right Hon. C. D. Howe (Minister of Trade and Commerce): Yesterday the hon. member for Peterborough West (Mr. Fraser) addressed a question to me with reference to the recent theft of certain radium needles from the national research council. In stating the question he made certain allegations—that the theft was due to gross negligence and lack of proper handling and storage of the radium needles by this government.

As I stated in the house on March 10 last, a specially-constructed receiving depot had been built at the back of the main building to hold shipments of radium needles for a brief period. I explained why the separate building is needed. These facilities have been considered adequate for a number of years, and it does not seem that there is any question of negligence. However, as I also stated in the house on Friday last, the incident does prove that the receiving hut is not burglar-proof.

With reference to the young boy who had been in possession of the needles, the health officer of the city of Ottawa has already announced that a medical examination of the boy showed no evidence of radium burns. As for the two small marks the Lamirande boy found on his thumb, Dr. Day has stated: "One of them was merely a cut in the healing stage. The other was a small callosity on the end of his thumb, and there was only a slight possibility that it was a radium burn. Burns are almost never evident within ten days, and the thumb mark appeared too soon".

SPEECH FROM THE THRONE

CONTINUATION OF DEBATE ON ADDRESS IN REPLY

The house resumed, from Monday, March 13, consideration of the motion of Mr. F. H. Larson for an address to His Excellency the Governor General in reply to his speech at the opening of the session, and the amendment thereto of Mr. Drew, and the amendment to the amendment of Mr. Coldwell.

Mr. George A. Drew (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I was prompted to re-enter the debate at this time by the very remarkable speech of the Minister of Fisheries (Mr. Mayhew) the day before yesterday.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Drew: I am interested to know that his speech meets with approval of some of the members on the government side of the house, because I was under the impression that it did. I was also under the impression that it represents a great deal more than the casual view suggested by the minister himself when he read a prepared text. However, before I deal with that speech I wish to review the motion before the house, and the amendments on which votes will be taken soon—I hope.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Drew: Yes, and may I say, in response to the interjection, that it will be taken when the Liberal members have decided that they have made enough speeches.

An hon. Member: They have not made half as many as you.

Mr. Drew: Do not let there be any suggestion that this delay is caused for any other reason. There have been forty Liberal speeches so far, and the indication is there will be a great many more.

I mention this now only for the purpose of reminding hon. members of the House of Commons that any delay is entirely due to the fact that hon. members on every side of the house have exercised their right to speak. And I suggest that instead of questioning the right of members to speak, it is very commendable that they do feel freer to speak than apparently they did in the past.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Drew: I cannot imagine any better evidence of the intelligence which has gone into some of this debate than the laughter which accompanied my last remark.

Mr. Lesage: You lack a sense of humour.

Mr. Drew: This debate has wandered over a very wide field.

An hon. Member: Here we go again.

Mr. Drew: Not only has it wandered over a field including the local interests of various ridings, as is in keeping with the tradition of this debate, but it has also followed the unusual course of placing on the record political speeches made by the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) and others during the election campaign last year.

An hon. Member: We got results.

Mr. Sinnott: Let us have yours.

Mr. Drew: Those speeches form a very good basis for emphasizing the importance of the resolution before the house, and the reason why it should be supported by all who still believe in responsible government.

The debate is based upon an amendment I moved, and to which there is a subamendment, upon which the vote will be taken. That debate started four weeks ago tomorrow; therefore it would seem desirable to recall the exact terms of the main motion and the amendments thereto. For convenience I propose to read the motion as amended, instead of the motion and the two amendments.

The amendment I had the privilege of presenting, combined with the amendment introduced by the leader of the C.C.F. party, reads as follows:

> We respectfully submit to Your Excellency that Your Excellency's advisers have:
>
> (1) failed to take adequate measures to preserve and expand markets for Canada's surplus products of farm, forest, sea and mine, and to deal with the problems of increasing unemployment and reduced income to Canadian farmers and other producers; and
> (2) failed to take steps to inaugurate an over-all social security program including national health insurance and the removal of the means test from the old age pension, and

(3) deliberately violated a law of this parliament by illegally suppressing the report of the commissioner under the Combines Investigation Act on the flour-milling industry for ten months, including the period of the recent general election campaign, and denied to parliament information essential to the performance of its duty and the maintenance of responsible government; and

(4) failed to take adequate measures to protect civil liberties and at the same time to curb espionage and other harmful activities of communists and fascists in Canada.

That is the motion as amended. The subamendment changes my amendment only to the extent that it substitutes for the words "a national contributory system of old age pensions without a means test" the broader expression "an over-all social security program including national health insurance and the removal of the means test from the old age pension." It also adds in the fourth paragraph the words "to protect civil liberties and at the same time", and the addition of the further words "and fascists".

I may say, Mr. Speaker, that it is the intention of the party I lead to support the motion as amended by the subamendment. It says substantially the same thing. The variations, I am pleased to say, widen the original amendment, and we accept the advantage of that wider interpretation. As for the exact words included in paragraph 4, I might say that the over-all effect is entirely consistent with the view we have expressed on other occasions, and we therefore are happy to accept it in that form.

I propose now to deal with points that have been raised by the amendment, with the subamendment. I shall not deal with the paragraphs in the order in which they appear, and shall proceed in this way simply for the purpose of convenience.

Let me first deal with the paragraph which, as amended, reads that the government has——failed to take adequate steps to inaugurate an over-all social security program including national health insurance and the removal of the means test from the old age pension.

We have advocated, both in the house and outside, the adoption by the government of an over-all security program including national health insurance and removal of the means test from the old age pension. That was our proposal in the house last year before the election; it was our proposal during the election, and it has been our proposal since that time. We have urged, and urge now, that the government take action to deal with it.

I realize there is a motion still under debate before the house which presents an opportunity for discussion of one aspect of this paragraph. That, of course, is the motion of the Minister of National Health and Welfare (Mr. Martin) to refer to a committee the consideration of old age pensions. But the very fact that that motion is before the house is a reason why this particular part of the amendment should be adopted. If one thing has happened more than anything else as a result of the motion introduced by the Minister of National Health and Welfare it is the exposure in all its naked reality of the sham that has been behind the propaganda that has been carried on now for several years in regard to the responsibility of some provinces for holding up social security of various kinds. How many times have the people of this country heard over the radio, how many times have the members of this house been told, that if it had not been for certain of the provinces the people of Canada would have had old age pensions without a means test and social security generally, and that that was the only reason. They heard it during the last election campaign, and now we know, from the motion introduced by the Minister of National Health and Welfare, that there was never anything behind that allegation.

Now that the government are here with this enormous majority, which in its study groups has obviously been well trained to applaud at the appropriate moment no matter what may be before the house, they have the means of dealing with every one of the things they said they were ready to deal with. But instead of dealing with them, they refer them to a committee.

Last night in the course of another debate the Minister of National Health and Welfare said: "You are opposing it"—referring to his proposal for a committee on old age security. He was suggesting that it was inconsistent to urge that some subject be referred to a committee for investigation so that the facts could be obtained, while at the same time opposing a motion that was simply for the purpose of stalling action on a very important undertaking of this government which has received the support of every hon. member on this side, whether supporting the government or not.

This is simply evidence of the fact that the government is trying to find a way of stalling on their promises, of not carrying out their undertaking—it was an undertaking—to abolish the means test. That undertaking was not first given in 1949; it was given in 1945. The explicit undertaking appeared in the advertisements of the Liberal party in their election material during that campaign. Since then they have left no doubt about it. They say now: We do not know; we have not the facts, and it will cost a lot of money. Of course it will, but I want to make it quite clear that in supporting the motion, as amended, which is now before us, we do so with the understanding that we adhere to the policy we have advocated of establishing an over-all social security program on a contributory basis. The astronomical figures that have been put before the house in most cases deal with this matter as if the contributory factor was to be ignored. I have noticed a number of sincere comments by writers in various publications pointing out that we must remember that two plus two still does equal four, and that the government must be cautious in implementing any program that would add to the extremely heavy debt burden of this country. They point out that it would create a tremendous burden if everyone at the age of sixty-five years received a pension of this kind. But if it is sound for an insurance company to provide pensions to people on an actuarial basis, it is equally sound for this government, in co-operation with the provincial governments, to provide a contributory system on a sound basis. It can be done.

First of all, we simply take the figures of the contributions by the dominion government from the public treasury, and subtract therefrom the additional revenue that accrues to the treasury from a contributory scheme; this will give the net result upon which it can be determined whether this country can or cannot meet such an obligation. There is something here more than dollars and cents. We all know that there are a great many people who are not applying for old age pensions because they are too proud to do so. There are others who will not submit to the humiliation of the proceedings involved, and who carry on under extreme difficulties with the assistance of those they can find to help them.

Every one of us knows that the system as it now stands places a premium on the spending of everything that a person has up to the age at which he would be entitled to a pension. We say: If you have been provident, if you have saved money, under the law as it stands you must deduct your savings before you are entitled to a pension. The net result is that the person who has put something aside for his old age finds himself in no better position in some cases than the person who has spent everything, perhaps because of ill health or accident or unavoidable circumstances, and has nothing left to take care of himself.

In the net result, knowing the heart and spirit of the people of Canada, we can be sure they will not permit older people to be hungry, to be without clothing or without shelter, if they can avoid it. Therefore the money that is needed to take care of them must come from somewhere. It is infinitely better that as a matter of right every person reaching the age at which it is deemed appropriate that payments should be received, should receive them, those who have saved should not be penalized, nor should there be the evasions which we know perfectly well the present system invites.

If the government have not the figures, then the government were perpetrating a tremendous fraud on the provincial governments in 1945, because in that year the dominion government presented to the conference a detailed statement of what they were prepared to do. Either they were prepared to do that, or they were not. If they were prepared in 1945 they should be equally prepared now to carry out what they said at that time was the proper way of caring for the older people and others requiring social security in this country.

Mr. Knowles: They counted on the provinces refusing to agree.

Mr. Drew: That is something that might very well be dealt with right now. The question whether any province entered into financial arrangements with the dominion government has nothing whatever to do with the fulfilment of those undertakings.

Mr. Howe: Some of us were there.

Mr. Drew: Either your memory is as bad in this case as it was in others, or you know perfectly well that the conference adjourned with the undertaking that it would meet again to consider the proposals then before it. The minister who has just spoken, and the Prime Minister, who is sitting beside him—the Prime Minister particularly—know perfectly well that the different provincial governments, including the governments of Ontario and Quebec, about which they have had a great deal to say, have asked on numerous occasions that that conference be reconvened for the purpose of considering these very things. The Prime Minister should be the last to deny that, because in his capacity as acting prime minister he received those communications direct on certain occasions.

Mr. St. Laurent: Inasmuch as I am challenged, I must deny the statement as the hon. member has put it. There were no applications from Quebec, and as a matter of fact I happen to know that the government of Quebec stated at that time that they would not under any circumstances agree to the constitutional amendment that would be required to tie contributions to social welfare services.

Mr. Drew: I am quite sure that the premier of Quebec will be able to deal adequately with this subject, as he has on every occasion on which the Prime Minister of Canada has sought to take him to task. But I can say definitely that during the period to which I have reference the present Prime Minister received communications from me, as from other premiers, urging the immediate reconvening of the conference for the general purpose of discussing these very subjects. The fact that there was no conference is not the responsibility of those who have been challenged in this respect.

I have dealt with the paragraph on social security, and I now pass on to another, because, as I have pointed out, the whole question of social security, so far as it relates to old age pensions, will be dealt with on the other motion. Let me speak about the third paragraph, which states that the government deliberately violated a law of this parliament by illegally suppressing the report of the commissioner under the Combines Investigation Act.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

An hon. Member: That was a long time ago.

Mr. Drew: Yes, Mr. Speaker, it is a very long time, and I might remind hon. members that there is no statute of limitations in Canada on the commission of crime. I would also remind hon. members that this is the first occasion on which members of the house have had the opportunity to deal with this subject on a direct motion. I suggest to hon. members who will be voting on the amendment that every one of them who votes against it will thereby declare his approval of the government's breach of one of the laws of this parliament. The amendment presents an opportunity to say exactly what is thought of that.

I should like to refer to the fact that we had the opportunity of listening to a speech by the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) in which he expressed solicitous concern about the Conservative party.

Mr. Gauthier (Portneuf): Someone has to.

Mr. Drew: If the Conservative party required any advice, the last person to whom we would go would be the Minister of Agriculture. In his speech to the house the Minister of Agriculture read a radio address he made last spring which had nothing in the world to do with the matters before the house, and was just a cheap political tub-thumping speech.

Mr. Sinclair: Like yours; you are an expert on that. We will take your judgment.

Mr. Drew: I repeat, just a cheap political tub-thumping speech.

Mr. Sinclair: You are an expert on that.

[Mr. Drew.]

Mr. Drew: He placed on the record the statements he made at that time which confirmed everything that had been said by way of criticism of his constant inaccuracies; and even though he wanders out into the passageway in front of the seats so that he gets more movement for his legs, it does not for one moment carry any more conviction because he seeks to make of the House of Commons a political platform for things that are now many months old.

There are one or two matters I should like to recall. The Minister of Agriculture, in his deep and heartfelt concern about the welfare of the Conservative party, referred to the things that they should have done. He has demonstrated to us a number of things that no party with self-respect would have done, but he made one or two observations about the Conservative party which bear repetition. It was the old propaganda, without any relation whatsoever to the truth. I am referring of course to the speech he made outside of this house. In it he used the old hackneyed phrases, and then there is this particularly interesting sentence:

> They—

That is, the Conservative party.

> —do not seem to think there is any possibility of any person or corporation when given an absolutely free hand taking more out of the primary producer or labour—

You will realize, Mr. Speaker, that my attention was fixed on the page from which I was reading, and for a moment, hearing the applause that greeted the entry into the chamber of the Minister of Labour (Mr. Mitchell), I thought that the millennium had come and that the conscience of the Liberal members of the house had been aroused to the point of actually recognizing the issues before us on the amendment. But as I looked up I realized the reason for the applause, and I assure the Minister of Labour that if I had been sitting in my seat I would have joined as heartily as anyone else in the applause. I wish to express the great satisfaction we all feel on seeing the Minister of Labour again in the house, looking as well as he does. No matter how widely our views may differ from time to time—and, strangely enough, our views differ less from those of the Minister of Labour than from those of any other minister—I know there is not one on this side of the house, and without presuming I know my remarks extend beyond the party to which I belong, who does not have warm personal regard for the Minister of Labour.

I shall now quote the sentence which I was reading when I was most properly interrupted by the applause to welcome the Minister of Labour. Since some time has passed, I should like to remind hon. members that I am quoting from a speech of the Minister of Agriculture, made outside of the house, which was placed on the record by him. Whatever mistakes the Minister of Labour makes, I know he would not have made this speech.

This is the sentence:

> They do not seem to think there is any possibility of any person or corporation when given an absolutely free hand taking more out of the primary producer or labour than he is entitled to by retaining too much profit.

Is that not typical? Is that not the old hackneyed propaganda that has been repeated over and over again? And mind you, Mr. Speaker, that speech was made by a member of the government which had been hiding the report on the milling combine and making certain that improper profits could be kept, and that it would not be exposed to the public. If there is any party which by its acts has demonstrated that it is hand in glove with big interests with a capital "B", it is the party which has seen fit to say to one group of manufacturers: We are so virtuous we will prosecute you; but, to a very much larger group dealing with the main primary product of this country: Oh, no; we dare not touch you. If anyone wonders just why that should be so, let him see who are the men in charge of some of these companies; then he will not have to guess very long as to why there was such consideration.

Mr. Howe: Name them.

Mr. Drew: You probably spoke to one today. This particular statement, however, was in keeping with the very sound principle that the best defence is offence; and the Minister of Agriculture was just as offensive as possible—I mean in the sense of carrying forward an offence.

Then we come to this question of the breach of law. Of the many explanations which have been given for failure to act upon that report, none more clearly emphasizes the real situation than the statement of the government that they could not conveniently have done it within the fifteen days, and then of course the added statement of the Prime Minister that once they had broken the law, well, they might just as well leave it where it was. This is not something to be brushed aside lightly, because the inquiry in question dealt with the basic commodity of this country, the basic food requirement; it dealt with the price of the daily bread of our people. If there is one case in which the government should be most scrupulous in preventing abuses and seeing to it that no one made more profit than he should, it would be in a case affecting the daily food requirements of all the people of Canada. And of course this was done at the expense of the farmers, through a combine which fixed prices at both the purchasing and the selling end.

The explanations given just do not hold water. In none of them is an apology or excuse offered. The suggestion that the government would have looked cheap, as the Minister of Justice (Mr. Garson) said, if they had prosecuted; or on the other hand the statement that the government would have broken faith if they had gone ahead, seem completely to ignore the fact that it was within the power of the government at all times to pass an order in council expressly approving this procedure, if in fact it was approved. If they believed it to be the right course, that is what should have been done. They did not do it.

Then we had in this case something that does not appear in the other cases under consideration, in which the government has prosecuted; that is, a double set of books. Why? Because someone was doing an exercise in writing? Because someone felt it would be more convenient? No. There is not a single member of this house who does not know perfectly well why a double set of books is kept.

An hon. Member: Why?

Mr. Drew: I had not thought a single member of this house would have to ask that question. I feel sure the hon. member who has asked it has not read the report; otherwise he would see that the second entries omitted those things which clearly established the record of an agreement as to restraint of trading arrangements. The record is quite clear.

I am still waiting for comment by the Minister of Justice on the fact that there is a section of the Criminal Code which provides a penalty of up to seven years' imprisonment for anyone who keeps a false set of records of any company. Either Mr. McGregor was seeing things, and his report has no foundation in fact, or that aspect of this report should have been examined; because that would not be subject to any limitation; it could be dealt with at any time. That particular matter is something which might well be examined if the government really is so much concerned about that report. At least they had sufficient confidence in Mr. McGregor to accept and act upon his reports in two other cases. It does seem strangely inconsistent that on the one hand they should ignore these findings, and on the other hand act upon the findings of the very same man. This motion embraces that subject, and it is something that will be dealt with by the votes on the amendment and the subamendment.

The fourth paragraph states that the government failed to take adequate measures to protect civil liberties and at the same time curb espionage and other harmful activities. I am not going to deal with the question of the protection of civil liberties, because there is on the order paper a motion setting out in explicit detail the scope of an appropriate measure to assure civil liberties in this country, which I hope will be dealt with in due course. However, I am going to deal with the fact that as yet no steps have been taken to provide a procedure by which effective action can be taken against those who are comprising or otherwise carrying on activities for the purpose of overthrowing our free democratic system. May I emphasize that I have never advocated that there should be in the Criminal Code a provision dealing with communism, or other similar subversive activities, simply by use of the word "communist", because that single word is not adequate. The first thing you are confronted with is a definition of a communist. It was not Lenin who invented the term "communist"; that term has been used for centuries. As a matter of fact, as many hon. members will recall, there is a definition of a communist in the Corn Law Rhymes published nearly one hundred and twenty years ago in Britain and it goes like this:

> What is a communist? One who has yearnings for equal division of unequal earnings. Idler or bungler or both, he is willing to give you his penny and pocket your shilling.

That of course is a definition that refers to an earlier concept of communism. The communists as we know them today are men and women who have identified themselves with a world-wide form of tyranny which, here in Canada as elsewhere, they are seeking to impose. In accepting the subamendment which widens our original amendment, I want to make it clear that we are equally opposed to members of any group who seek to undermine and destroy our free democratic system, no matter what their name may be. That observation gains added strength when again, just as in the years before the war, so many false-front organizations are appearing, such as those leagues for peace and other organizations of that kind, which are simply communist false fronts trying to undermine the fibre of our people here in this country and elsewhere.

It is about a year ago now since I advocated in this house that there should be an amendment to the Criminal Code that would make it a criminal offence, punishable through ordinary judicial proceedings in our courts, if men or women, individually or otherwise, carried on activities designed to destroy our system. Hon. members who were here last spring will recall that we were informed at that time that the government had this subject under consideration. We have not heard anything about it since, and this motion is an expression of our positive regret that the government has taken no action to deal with those cases which definitely cannot be dealt with effectively under the Criminal Code as it stands at the present time.

I have said that section 98 of the Criminal Code, which was repealed some years ago, did not mention communists nor any other group by name. It referred to action designed to overthrow the state by force. In this house and outside of it I have advocated that, to replace section 98, there should be a section of the Criminal Code drafted in a way that will avoid any of the objections that were taken to the phraseology of section 98 but clearly stating, in terms that cannot be misunderstood and which fully respect our fundamental principles of freedom, that those who seek to destroy our system shall not go free to continue that treachery within our country.

I am convinced, Mr. Speaker, that we shall not have action until the members of this house indicate their views; and this motion as it stands provides the members of this house with the opportunity to indicate their belief that action should be taken to deal with subversive activities of this type, no matter what the name may be.

I come now to the first paragraph of this amendment, and this has not been changed in any word by the subamendment, which reads that the government have

> (1) failed to take adequate measures to preserve and expand markets for Canada's surplus products of farm, forest, sea and mine, and to deal with the problems of increasing unemployment and reduced income to Canadian farmers and other producers;

We had certain statements by the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) in regard to that matter as well. As hon. members will recall, the Minister of Agriculture told us, with a great deal of emphasis, that there was no reason for any concern about exports; he said you could put them all down in three words, and to each of them you could add a few million pounds, and then there would not be anything left. Then listen to this sentence, as reported at page 576 of Hansard:

> And all these surpluses, a little bit of cheese, a little bit of butter and some honey.

Those are our surpluses, according to the Minister of Agriculture: a little bit of cheese, a little bit of butter and some honey. Those were the surpluses that were causing the Minister of Fisheries (Mr. Mayhew) so much concern only two days ago. He has not been convinced by the Minister of Agriculture. He seems to hold a different view as to the importance of these surpluses. Obviously he does not think there is just a little bit of cheese, a little bit of butter and some honey. Oh, no; it goes far beyond that, and he wants positive action taken in that respect.

It is really wonderful, Mr. Speaker, to see the satisfaction of the members of this government in their omniscience. It is really wonderful to note the mutual sense of confidence expressed. It is really wonderful to note the modesty with which they describe their own limitless abilities. On May 9 last year the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) had this modest comment to make about his colleagues, and I quote his words:

> Just ask yourselves how many men of similar ability all other political parties combined can produce.

Just look at them!

Mr. Howe: The people had a look at them not many months ago.

Mr. Drew: I shall have something to say about that matter in a minute. But you have the minister of a little bit of cheese, a little bit of butter and some honey; and then you have the Minister of Fisheries who seems to have quite a different point of view. This self-adulation is a wonderful thing.

An hon. Member: You are an expert.

Mr. Drew: I wish the hon. member who has just interjected such a typical remark would read the publication called The Canadian Liberal, which was issued just a couple of days ago. It indicates how long this debate has been going on. This is typical—I will not use the word I was going to use—propaganda already appearing in the hands of the people to whom it is circulated while the debate is still on. It is headed "The ABC's of Mr. St. Laurent's speech in the House of Commons February 20, 1950." And this is indeed a reference back to something that is still related to this debate.

Mr. Stewart (Yorkton): Table it.

Mr. Drew: No, no; there will be enough useless things tabled in this house without tabling this document. This, however, does refer to a number of things. Here is one of the headings: "An Analysis of Pre-election Arguments on Devaluation and Convertibility 'Nonsense'." I am quoting from this pamphlet:

> Mr. St. Laurent pointed out that devaluation was suggested at a time when the Chancellor of the Exchequer of the United Kingdom was declaring that sterling was not going to be devalued.

And so he went on to explain, of course, that a very different situation existed then. I was not aware that we were in the sterling area. I thought we were a dollar country. I did not know that the Chancellor of the Exchequer decided what our policy was. This statement simply amounts to a statement that it was not the Minister of Finance who devalued the dollar, but that it was the pound which devalued the Minister of Finance. That is what it amounts to; because it simply means that because the pound was devalued we had to forget that we were a dollar country and devalue. If devaluation was sound in September, it was sounder still at a time when it would have given us very real advantages in the world's markets.

Then we come to another part of this interesting pamphlet:

> The words "truth, confidence and trust" should be used with care.

Mr. Ross (Souris): Which minister put that in?

Mr. Drew: This is not a minister; this is a heading put in by the Liberal magazine. You will recall on that occasion, which seems so long ago, the minister, coming back from his afternoon's speech, obviously refreshed by dinner, came back and said that he had some quotations he would like to give to the house; and he referred to certain statements I had made outside. He referred to the fact that in Quebec I had used these words, and he quoted them:

> The basic word in that system is truth. In the end it will be the people who will decide, and they will turn invariably to the party which they have come to trust and rely on.

These are the words attributed to the Prime Minister, and I think he will agree that they are correctly quoted from Hansard:

> And that is what they did; and that is no doubt what impressed itself upon the hon. gentleman and moved him to make that declaration.

What the members of this house are interested in, Mr. Speaker, is not a refighting of that election, but the principles of democracy that are governing, and that were stated in this house—

An hon. Member: No interest.

Mr. Drew: The hon. member says "no interest". It is time that hon. members did have an interest in the principles of democracy, and that is the purpose of the motion that is now before this house. It may be a vain hope, but I repeat my earlier statement. It would be one of the most refreshing things that ever happened in Canada if the Liberal members in this parliament supported this motion as a proof that they did believe in these basic principles of democracy.

The measure of self-satisfaction that has developed is really touching. You will recall, Mr. Speaker, certain words spoken in the debate last night, that a statement that had been made was very palatable. Well, sir, some of these things become very palatable to the government. For instance, I noticed in the press yesterday that the Prime Minister is to speak in a debate on March 27 at Hart House. I think that is an excellent thing because those debating groups in the universities are splendid groups; but listen to the resolution to which he is to speak:

> Resolved, that there is no effective national alternative to the Liberal party.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Garson: Why bring this up?

Mr. Drew: "After us the deluge." You remember what happened to the one who said that, or I hope you do. Listen to the applause on the desks, at this senseless statement, that there is only one party in Canada; that we have reached the point of one-party government. If that becomes accepted in this house, Mr. Speaker, then this senseless cacophony of desk-pounding may be the death rattle of a free parliament. Oh, yes, laugh and pour out the propaganda; laugh and make the government information services tell the public of the wonders of this government; make them tell the people of Canada, at public expense, that there is no effective national alternative to the Liberal party.

If there were one reason, Mr. Speaker, why every man who believes in our system of parliamentary responsibility and balanced authority in this country should vote for our amendment it would be an arrogant statement of the kind to which the Prime Minister of Canada is to speak and which he is to support.

Mr. Brown (Essex West): Watch your blood pressure.

Mr. Drew: I must confess that I did not think that even the dullest wit would have thought that I was speaking in support of such a proposition, but, you know, there is a good deal more behind this self-satisfaction—

Mr. Brown (Essex West): You bet.

Mr. Drew: —and this noise like a group of trained seals that we hear so often! Mr. Speaker, you will recall the applause that came with each of those perorations which kept repeating themselves in the speech of the Minister of Agriculture the other day. He repudiated with so much emphasis, if not with any sound facts, the suggestion that he had contended that trade was perfectly secure. Just let me recall a few of the statements he made. On May 12, he said:

> We could sell much more of most farm products if we had them in surplus supply.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Drew: It has not got into somebody's head yet what the situation is. I do wish they would study it and have a chat with the Minister of Fisheries.

Mr. Rowe: Hear, hear. Evidently he is the only one who has heard about it.

Mr. Drew: The Minister of Fisheries at least has this advantage over most of the hon. members who are applauding on the other side. He says quite frankly that he has been thinking, and that seems to be unique on the government benches; and that is a very commendable statement in relation to the things that he has said. The Minister of Fisheries (Mr. Mayhew) was thinking on the way home. Today—

Mr. Garson: Try it some time; it is a good idea.

Mr. Drew: Oh, it is a wonderful thing to do sometimes, isn't it? If the Minister of Justice had just thought, as he says himself, he would not have been in the trouble in which he was. He is not going to take a chance on that again. He will think it over more carefully next time before he suppresses any report.

Mr. Rowe: It will take him thirty days instead of fifteen.

Mr. Drew: Then, let us see what the Minister of Agriculture (Mr. Gardiner) has to say about the question of surpluses. He said this on May 18:

> "I wish to reiterate what I have said on several occasions recently with respect to the foolish claim by the opposition that we are losing our markets," Mr. Gardiner said. "We have no surplus of any staple farm product. We are exporting all we have available for export. Since we have no surpluses to export beyond what we are exporting it is foolish to say we are losing our markets."

And then, speech after speech saying the same thing—that they were not losing the British contracts and that they were not losing markets. Yet we know now from the statement of the Minister of Agriculture himself, first in the house, and then outside the house, that we are losing British markets, and we are losing them very very seriously. And yet we have just a little cheese, a little butter and some honey!—that is all.

Mr. Knowles: And a little baloney.

Mr. Drew: Now, just let us see what the Minister of Fisheries (Mr. Mayhew) has to say about this. The Minister of Fisheries went to Colombo. I must say the frankness of his speech the day before yesterday is an indication of the value of travel. But the Minister of Fisheries thought on the way back, and thought after he got home. Then he prepared a speech, and he read the prepared speech in the House of Commons. That, of course, is an indulgence extended to ministers—not of course to anybody else.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Drew: But the speech was reported, and there was only one amendment he suggested. That was the introduction of a comma to break a sentence. But it did not damage the effect in any way.

I think it would be interesting to re-read exactly what he said, according to the statement as amended. This is after his analysis of the difficulties connected with export trade. I quote as follows from Hansard at page 688:

As the idea of the joint stock company developed originally to handle foreign trade in days when international financing was impossible, perhaps it can now be extended. Instead of using the concept only on a company basis, it might be extended to an inter-company basis. We might consider therefore the establishment of a national export-import corporation, beginning its use with countries that now take few Canadian goods. We should recognize that this may be more possible in Canada than in almost any other country, because so large a part of our trade now is concentrated in only a few firms. Likewise, large parts of the primary surpluses may soon be owned by government.

It seems possible, therefore, to work out in Canada a combination between the very large groups of manufacturers and wholesalers—

Comma—deleted—comma—

—and the government to provide both the management and the finance to operate bilateral deals and to overcome the lack of facilities that faces any single corporation. Such a body could barter parcels of mixed Canadian merchandise for mixed imports from the non-dollar countries, and such merchandise could of course include capital equipment as well as foodstuffs or raw material.

This instrument might be used experimentally as an additional means of meeting the surplus-unemployment problems.

That last expression is a very good one—"surplus-unemployment problems". The Minister of Fisheries is in no doubt as to the situation. It is not just a little butter and a little honey with him—and a little cheese.

An hon. Member: And a little—

Mr. Drew: Oh no, don't extend it. Just a little cheese, a little butter and a little honey! That is all.

But the Minister of Fisheries has been thinking, and he says:

Large parts of the primary surpluses may soon be owned by government.

He must be imagining that. I do hope the Minister of Agriculture will straighten him out before long. But my impression is that the Minister of Fisheries, who is a sound businessman, and who has learned from experience something about the necessity to all trade of facing realities, will stick to his guns and insist that there is a surplus which must be recognized, and that that surplus is causing unemployment, no matter what anybody else may say.

An hon. Member: Time.

An hon. Member: Carry on.

Mr. Speaker: Order.

Mr. Drew: Now, Mr. Speaker, undoubtedly the Minister of Fisheries regards this as so serious that he is prepared to reach out and try to find some solution. Everyone, I am sure, will give him credit for the sincerity of purpose with which he drafted this strange proposition. But it is difficult to quite agree with the Minister of Fisheries when he gives as one of the reasons for this over-all national corporation the one that "our trade now is concentrated in only a few firms."

I wonder if he is aware of the fact that the Canadian Exporters Association, which does not by any manner of means include all the exporters, has over seven hundred members. That is not just a few firms; and those seven hundred members of the Canadian Exporters Association share his concern about the export markets. They have been warning this government, not just in the last few months, but for a long time, of the dangers of disregarding what has actually taken place.

Then, when they come to this little pamphlet, which I am sure all Liberal members received, "The ABC's of Mr. St. Laurent's speech," they will find of course this suggestion, that there is no occasion to worry ourselves about any of these things. "Let us not harm ourselves with fear." It is a wonderful thing! The ostrich follows that principle when it sticks its head in the sand. Let us not harm ourselves by destructive fear; but also let us not disregard the necessity for action by hiding our heads in the sand and failing to see that unemployment in this country is a very real thing. Unemployment is a real thing and that fact cannot be brushed aside by the statement that it is merely a seasonal situation resulting from the rather unusual seasonal conditions in certain parts of the country.

The figures of unemployment which have been given—the last official figure was 384,000—do not measure the actual unemployment in Canada. That figure represents the number of applications at the dominion employment service offices in this country. There is not a single hon. member of this house who knows anything of the type of applications made there who does not know that there are many small communities far from offices of that kind in which are located unemployed persons who do not apply. There are a lot of farm boys and others who do not make application but who go around to look for work. Those people are not included in the 384,000 which, as I say, represents simply the total number of applications received at the offices of the dominion employment service.

No one in this country, no red-blooded Canadian, wants to talk of anything that would in itself injure the future development of this country, but no sane Canadian will ignore reality and no decent Canadian will ignore the human agony involved in those figures. Those figures do not relate only to those covered by unemployment insurance, no matter what we may think of the adequacy of unemployment insurance. There are many men who are not covered and there are many whose term of unemployment insurance has expired. Tonight there will be men sleeping in boxcars, sleeping in railway stations, sleeping in church missions in various parts of this country, and it is the duty of the members of this parliament to recognize that human factor and to take some action to deal with it.

I think hon. members for a moment might just pay a little attention to this subject. I hope a great deal more will be paid to it.

Mr. Lesage: We are paying more attention, but we are not shouting about it.

Mr. Drew: You are not shouting about it, you are just sending out propaganda instead of doing something to help these people who are unemployed.

Mr. Lesage: You are—

Some hon. Members: Sit down.

Some hon. Members: Quack, quack.

Mr. Pouliot: Quack, quack.

Mr. Drew: That reminds me of the old song, "A quack quack here and a quack quack there, here a quack, there a quack, everywhere a quack, quack," because it seems to be coming from different parts of the house. No one wants to let his partisan point of view obscure the realities of this situation. Very clear statements have been made by this government as to what it would do to deal with a situation of this kind if it arose. All that it is necessary to do is to go to the library where you can get those light green books which are becoming more bilious with time and find out what was said by the government in 1945.

There is no occasion to embark upon any plan that would impose a burden upon the public treasury. Those who suggest that we must be careful with our money are very wise. They are very wise to point out that this government should be much more careful with money than it is. There are ways and means of carrying out these undertakings without using the current revenues of the country. Every hon. member knows of a number of things that could be done to create employment immediately and to provide the promise of much wider and greater employment in the years ahead.

Right across Canada there are power developments waiting to be undertaken. Right across Canada there are great drainage and reclamation projects waiting to be started. Right across Canada there are great irrigation schemes waiting to be commenced. All these things can be done on a sound business basis without using one cent of the annual revenue of this country. Do not let anyone suggest that any magic is being attempted. This is perhaps one of the few grounds of disagreement I have been able to find with my friends of the Social Credit party. I do not believe that this involves the application of any principles other than those which we have adhered to. There are a number of hydroelectric and other commissions in this country which are examples of what can be done on a cost basis by using public investment in securities issued under organizations created by governments within this country.

I would point out that it was a Conservative government in Ontario that developed the greatest publicly owned hydroelectric enterprise in the Dominion of Canada—I might say in the world. Certainly we believe in public ownership. Who created the Canadian National Railways? Was it the Liberals? No. Who created the C.B.C.? Was it the Liberals? No.

An hon. Member: Certainly not.

Mr. Drew: Certainly not. They believe in private monopoly.

Some hon. Members: Hear, hear.

Mr. Drew: The position I am expressing is entirely consistent with the long history of the party to which I belong. That applies to those enterprises which are not competitive and which do not by themselves gain advantage from the ordinary application of the principle of personal initiative applied to the job in hand. I am not talking now of the workers on the job, I am talking about the over-all project.

That principle can be applied to the wider field and these things could be undertaken. There is no place in Canada where they could be undertaken more effectively than in the new province of Newfoundland, with its vast power resources and other opportunities. These are some of the things that can be done. Much should be done at this time to meet the immediate situation and to lay a foundation for the future.

The Minister of Fisheries (Mr. Mayhew) has given us two sound and accurate statements. One is that we have a surplus-unemployment problem. I think that is a good summing up in three words. He said also that large parts of the surpluses may soon be owned by the government. He tried to find a way out of the difficulty, but unfortunately the way he seeks is not one that should appeal to hon. members of this house. He was suggesting a national organization under the direction of and financed by the government. Those are his words. There is no modification of that.

Mr. Mayhew: I beg your pardon, but that is not my statement, and I endeavoured to correct it. My whole proposal was to the effect that those who are interested in exports should form a company. The government's only interest would be in supplying the help that they could supply to the corporation through their corps of trade commissioners in various countries.

Mr. Drew: That is not what the minister said. I hope this is not an indication that the minister did not write the speech. I hope it is his own speech.

Mr. Mayhew: It is my own speech and my own ideas from beginning to end. I am not taking anything back, but I did make a mistake in reading. The mistake was made in the converting of my notes by my secretary to the statement that I read in the house.

Mr. Drew: It has been amended since.

Mr. Mayhew: It has been amended since.

Mr. Drew: I will read the statement:

> . . . the government to provide both the management and the finance to operate bilateral deals and to overcome the lack of facilities that faces any single corporation.

Is that not clear?

Mr. Mayhew: No, that is not right. The corporation, composed of businessmen, would supply the management and the money.

An hon. Member: Time.

Mr. Rowe: You do not want to hear the rest of it. You had better have another cabinet meeting and get together.

Mr. Drew: Let me read exactly what the minister said yesterday.

An hon. Member: Time.

Mr. Drew: You know, Mr. Speaker, I am not going to object to these interruptions because they simply demonstrate how little sense of reality some members have when we are dealing with as important a subject as this. Yesterday the minister said:

> The correction I wish to make is in the third paragraph, which reads as follows:
> ". . . a combination between the very large groups of manufacturers and wholesalers and the government to provide."

Then the minister said:

> The words "and the government" should be omitted, and after the word "corporation" at the end of the sentence the following should be added:
>
> "The government, through the corps of trade commissioners, could furnish valuable assistance."

That is the amendment. The minister has not changed by one word the statement reading:

> . . . the government to provide both the management and the finance to operate bilateral deals and to overcome the lack of facilities that faces any single corporation.

He has not changed a word. That is what he said and it is what he still says after his amendment yesterday. That is perfectly clear. There is no reason why the minister should back away from it. I have commended the minister for using some thought and for the fact that he had the originality to deal with the matter, but surely we can take his amendment of yesterday. I trust we are not going to have a new amendment every day. The statement he made yesterday is perfectly clear. It still leaves it with the government directing and financing, and with manufacturers and corporations coming into the picture. Obviously the minister did not want a Russian Amtorg.

Mr. Mayhew: What?

Mr. Drew: Amtorg. Have you not heard of Amtorg? Amtorg is the external trading organization of the communist government. It is their trading corporation. I thought the minister probably knew about Amtorg, and that he was trying to avoid any suggestion of that. Instead of Amtorg, which is an integration with publicly owned enterprises, he wants an organization directed and financed by the government into whose pool of operations will come the products of the manufacturers. I concede that is not similar to Amtorg.

Mr. Mayhew: I do not want anything of the kind.

Mr. Drew: That is what I said.

Mr. Mayhew: What I want is for the businessmen of Canada to realize that they have a responsibility for merchandising what they have manufactured. I want them to realize that among themselves they can create a national import-export company, finance it and furnish the management for it. The government would do its share in facilitating the trade they would carry on by means of the government's corps of trade commissioners.

Mr. Drew: Mr. Speaker, that is not what the minister said either the day before yesterday or yesterday.

Mr. St. Laurent: Oh yes, it is. If you will just read it carefully you will see that it is. You should refer to page 688 of Hansard, take out the words "and the government" which the minister suggests should be taken out of that sentence, and then add after the word "corporation" at the end of the sentence the words that the Minister of Fisheries (Mr. Mayhew) stated yesterday. Then you have the statement as he says he intended it.

Mr. Drew: All I can say to the Prime Minister (Mr. St. Laurent) is that if that is the situation, if the national corporation is simply a corporation to be created by the ordinary trading companies of this country, then it is most difficult to understand exactly what the Minister of Fisheries was suggesting, because in co-operation with the government there is already the dollar-pound import-export board which is doing precisely what is suggested if what the minister now says is really what he intended. It would have no other meaning.

Mr. St. Laurent: I am not dealing with the merits. I am merely pointing out that what the minister said yesterday is exactly the same thing as he is saying today.

Mr. Drew: Mr. Speaker, I must and do accept the statement as to what is now intended, and we will let it go at that. After all, however, I still come back to words that have not been amended in any way. In his speech the minister said at page 688 of Hansard:

> This instrument might be used experimentally as an additional means of meeting the surplus-unemployment problems.

Then he goes on to deal with an earlier statement reading:

> . . . large parts of the primary surpluses may soon be owned by government.

He is seeking a way to get rid of those surpluses. How are private corporations going to deal with that situation? The change the minister has made in his remarks is a change that has been prompted by subsequent thought or discussion because his new proposal is meaningless in relation to his own statement that what he is trying to do is to seek a solution for the situation involved in the fact that these surpluses are going to be owned by the government, and he wants to get rid of them. Private dealers are not going to get rid of government surpluses. That is clear. What actually is suggested here is a device by which the country sets up a trading organization to deal with these various things.

One of the things that make it so difficult to deal with subjects of this kind is the statement by the minister that this is his own idea. He says that it might be a surprise to other members. Doubtless it was.

Mr. Rowe: Evidently nobody else wants it.

Mr. Drew: In his speech the minister said further:

> This last part is purely my own, but it is the result of thinking while away and after coming home. We have to find some way out of this difficulty. If anyone knows of a better way, it is up to him to tell us. I assure the house that I am not speaking in any way for the government in offering this plan. I imagine it is new to the government.

Mr. Mayhew: You certainly have not offered any suggestions today that would be of any help, and you have been talking now for nearly two hours.

Mr. Drew: I regret that the minister is not devoting as much thought to this subject here in the house as he did to the preparation of this speech. He knows perfectly well that several proposals have been put forward. One was that this country get rid of the straitjacket of exchange control and get back to free international trading; that has been stated positively. Another positive idea, and a very real one, was that at the earliest possible moment this government take the initiative in convening a conference of commonwealth nations for the purpose of extending trade within the commonwealth and the world.

Mr. Mayhew: And when I propose that the businessmen who believe in free enterprise should handle their own business, you object and want it to go back and be handled by the government.

Mr. Drew: That is the sort of twisting and quibbling that makes it extremely difficult to deal with any subject in this house.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Drew: I say that is the kind of twisting and quibbling that makes it extremely difficult to deal with this or any other subject in the house. The minister knows perfectly well I made no suggestion of that kind, today or at any other time. I repeat; if the statement the minister made is what he now claims it to be, what earthly use is the Canadian dollar-sterling trade board, which has had the full approval of this government? That is what that board is supposed to be doing, under what would be regarded as most competent business leadership in this country. This statement was senseless and meaningless unless it did mean what it originally said; that is, that it was a device to attempt to meet the unemployment problem, and to find a way to get rid of the surpluses in the hands of the government. It is true that it was not the suggestion of an amateur, but it was strangely like the method used by Schacht in Germany before the last war, under which they retained the individual trading by the corporations but placed that trading under an import-export corporation financed and directed by the government itself.

By all means encourage trade; by all means provide opportunities to do business. But if you do that then let our people really have an opportunity to trade, and get rid of this device which makes it so difficult for the businessmen of this country to go out and sell. During the war and the immediate post-war period the world so badly needed the things we produced that real selling was not necessary. Now our businessmen have to get out and sell. That is exactly what should be done. That is what the dollar-pound board was created for and what it can do if it is given a chance by removal of the shackles of exchange control and getting back to the greatest possible measure of freedom in international trade.

Then we come to another very important matter involved here. The minister says, "This is my own idea." One of the purposes of this motion is to restore our accepted parliamentary system in this country; and under that system a minister cannot come into the house and say, "I am just a little, innocent member of the house. Don't regard me as the Minister of Fisheries. Don't look on me as having any ministerial responsibility. It may be a poor idea, but it is my own." They cannot do that. There are certain principles that govern, and they should be restored for more reasons than just an acceptance of the formality. They are very clearly stated at pages 206 and 207 of "The Government of Canada" by Dawson, an accepted treatise on this subject. At page 206 we find this sentence:

> The members of the cabinet are responsible to one another, and particularly to the prime minister.

Then follow certain observations with respect to that observation, and I quote again:

> It follows that all members of a cabinet must consider the views of one another in making any important announcement or in taking a decision which might be considered as involving government policy; and this leads in practice to prior consultation and discussion in cabinet, or, at least, with the prime minister.

Then there are certain quotations from a letter by Sir Wilfrid Laurier, and otherwise, to illustrate the point, and I come to this further statement:

> The cabinet are above everything else responsible to the House of Commons, not as individuals alone, but collectively as well. This responsibility has been the key to the control of the executive power in Canada as in Britain; the powers of the crown have remained for the most part intact or have even been increased, but the exercise of those powers has come under the cabinet and this body in turn under the general scrutiny of parliament. This is the central fact of parliamentary democracy; for it is this practice which keeps the system both efficient and constantly amenable to popular control.

The reasons for this are of immense importance. First is the fact that the government is collectively responsible to the house; but there is another point. Hon. members here should not be placed in the position of having to ask themselves whether this is just the bright idea of a minister, thought up on a trip to Colombo or some nearer place. It makes debate so uncertain and confusing. Hon. members have a right to know whether or not the government is speaking as a government, so their remarks may be made with that in mind. Unless the minister speaks on behalf of the government as a whole, under the very principle established here, certainly hon. members will never know whether they should ignore or debate any statement he may make. If they ignore it, they know only too well what may happen. Six months later something may be done by order in council; and when objection is taken, the government will say, "Oh, but this was raised in the house and no one said anything about it."

Kite-flying of that kind by ministers of the government is not permitted under our system. That is so for reasons which are too obvious, under our traditional system, to require any amplification. Now, of course, in addition to the ministers we have the parliamentary assistants. We do not know whether that principle extends to them, though if it does it has been disregarded rather broadly, as we may see by the very interesting statements by the hon. member for Middlesex West (Mr. McCubbin) and the hon. member for Winnipeg South (Mr. Mutch).

An hon. Member: What about freedom of speech?

Mr. Drew: I hear an interjection, "freedom of speech". Would it not be a wonderful thing if freedom of speech were exercised in this house by Liberal members to the point where some of them would get up and say in this house the things they are saying outside? Would it not be a wonderful thing if some of the hon. members who attended that study group at which they met Mr. Low—I do not mean the leader of the Social Credit group—took advantage of the freedom of speech in this house to tell us what went on in that discussion on how to arrange contracts for national defence projects? That is freedom of speech that would be a great advantage to hon. members of this house and to the country.

Certainly we should have freedom of speech; but under our parliamentary system there are principles which make orderly discussion of our business possible. On one or two occasions there has been the suggestion that proceedings have been delayed; but if that has been so one reason is this uncertainty as to what ministers have or have not said. Hon. members will recall the trained-seal performance last night in connection with the statement about jet aircraft. Perhaps hon. members were getting a little bit tired late at night; but if they were not, they will recall that at that time I made a statement, without quotes, that the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Claxton) on his junket out to western Canada had made the statement that the percentage of jet aircraft we were going to have under our plans was the highest of any country. The minister challenged that statement and said that, if that was in the press, it was not so; and you, Mr. Speaker, will remember the desk-thumping and shouting that took place. I did not read the quotation for the simple reason that the statement had been repeated on that junket so often that it did not need to be quoted from any press report by anybody who knew what had been said.

Mr. Howe: It is better to say it when the minister is not in his seat.

Mr. Drew: I am not responsible for the minister being away today, and I am not responsible for the absurd performance last night when the minister denied a statement that he must know perfectly well was quoted in the press. This is what was quoted from the Canadian Press dispatch of January 26. The particular quotation I read is from a speech made in Calgary by the minister as reported in the Windsor Daily Star, from a Canadian Press dispatch. This is what the report says:

> Eighty per cent of the money the federal government is spending on aircraft is going toward jet planes,—

And this is a quotation.

> —"a higher percentage than any country we know of,"—

Those are the words of the Minister of National Defence.

Mr. Howe: A higher percentage of expenditure.

Mr. Drew: Oh, yes. The Minister of Trade and Commerce has interjected "percentage of expenditure" as though that qualified it. But, Mr. Speaker, unless the expenditure is resulting in planes, then the situation in regard to contracts is even worse than anybody here has yet suggested.

Mr. Howe: That is a great twist.

Mr. Drew: No, there is no twist there, except by the Minister of Trade and Commerce.

Mr. Howe: Very amusing.

Mr. Drew: I simply mention that matter in order to indicate the way things are evaded until they can be brought right down on to the track by the record itself. This government asks what can be done. First of all, this government can and should invite the member nations of the commonwealth to a conference to discuss ways of opening up trade and then from that point to proceed to a wide examination of trading possibilities within the sterling area.

Mr. Howe: Blast our way in. R. B. Bennett back again.

Mr. Drew: The Minister of Trade and Commerce has said "R. B. Bennett back again." The Minister of Trade and Commerce has apparently not been blasting his way anywhere. He has just been trying to fool the public as to what has actually been done; that is all. What has been said here has not anything to do with the term "blasting a way into markets" or anything else. Never mind what expression you use. Invite the member nations of the commonwealth, as free and equal partners in a great world association, to sit around the table and find ways of dealing with this extremely important problem.

Mr. Howe: They did that two months ago at Colombo.

Mr. Drew: Instead of that, what is happening? On the one hand, the government says that it is encouraging imports to Canada from Britain and it co-operated in the setting up of this board for the purpose of advancing trade. What is the use of that action unless effective steps are taken to transfer from the United States account things that we are importing from the United States and purchase them from Britain? That is the answer to this problem; and that is no offence to our friends in the United States because they know as well as we do that there must be a diminution of our imports from them if we are going to regain the balance in trade with the United States.

Mr. Howe: The hon. member is the first man that ever said that, I suppose.

Mr. Drew: Oh no; not at all. Has the minister been listening to the speeches made by the hon. member for Middlesex West (Mr. McCubbin)?

Mr. Howe: No; but I have made a few myself.

Mr. Drew: The minister should, because they would be helpful.

Mr. Rowe: His were not the same as the minister's either.

Mr. Drew: The government has announced a policy of progressive lifting of the restrictions on United States imports. By July 1 some fifty Canadian imports subject to quota will then be down to less than ten per cent of the estimated imports. What is the reason for that?

An hon. Member: More exports.

Mr. Howe: Trying to please the financial critic of the opposition.

Mr. Drew: That interjection shows exactly how much the proposals the government is making have sunk into the minds of some of the members. Everybody here knows that this country has been importing from the United States an amount considerably in excess of what we have been exporting; and we know perfectly well that we have to balance that, as the British say they have to balance their situation with us. That is the position that has been taken.

Mr. Garson: Surely not!

Mr. Drew: Here is the minister of combines in the debate now. This lifting of the restrictions may be convenient, but it is not particularly consistent with the suggestion that we decrease our imports from the United States to a point at which we reach some balance with them, and that we use that amount to buy further exports from the United States.

In case anyone has any doubt about the desirability of this action, may I quote from a statement made by Mr. James S. Duncan, the chairman of the Canadian dollar-sterling trade board, which has received such unqualified expressions of approval from the Minister of Trade and Commerce. This is what he said:

> The balance of imports from the United States is so great that only a decrease of fifteen per cent, which would not be serious as far as the United States is concerned, would be equivalent to an increase of imports from the United Kingdom of some ninety-four per cent based on 1949 figures. This would go a very considerable way toward solving the whole problem.

I would ask hon. members to get that statement clearly in mind. Only a decrease of fifteen per cent in the imports from the United States would be equivalent to an increase of ninety-four per cent in imports from the United Kingdom to this country.

Mr. Howe: So we should put on more restrictions against the United States.

Mr. Drew: The Minister of Trade and Commerce evidently believes that the way to bring that about is to make it easier for the United States to ship in here. That is what he is doing.

Mr. Howe: My hon. friend had better get together with the hon. member for Greenwood (Mr. Macdonnell).

Mr. Drew: That is exactly what he is doing. May I say this. As to this question of imports from Britain, there are a number of things that the Minister of Trade and Commerce might well observe. I am satisfied that hon. members want to see imports from Britain. They want to see imports from Britain of things that we are now buying to an unnecessarily high degree from the United States; but as a member of this house and as a Canadian I say now—and I know that I do not speak alone in this—I do not care what the situation is, I do not want to see imports from Britain, or from any other country, putting our people on the street; and it is not necessary.

Mr. Howe: R. B. Bennett back again.

Mr. Rowe: Too bad it was not.

Mr. Drew: No, not R. B. Bennett back again. The present Minister of Trade and Commerce would not really understand the trade concept of the commonwealth that was in the mind of R. B. Bennett then and all through his life.

Mr. Pouliot: Let the dead bury their dead.

Mr. Drew: I hope the hon. member is feeling perfectly well.

This trade situation was not something that suddenly emerged after this announcement in the house last December. This trade picture was known last spring, and it was known perfectly to the Minister of Trade and Commerce, and to the Minister of Agriculture, who has told us that he knew two years ago what the attitude of the British government was going to be. He knew perfectly well that there was going to be a determined effort to keep our products out of that market.

But let us take independent views on this. Last spring the London Economist had this to say. I do not think the Minister of Trade and Commerce will question the fact that this is a reputable publication. The London Economist had this to say last spring some time before the election:

> To talk to officials or ministers concerned with trade, one would never think that Canada's position was at all precarious. There is a political explanation for this unfounded optimism. The Liberal government goes to the country at the end of June.

But that is a very clear statement of exactly why the people of this country were not told what the trade situation was before June 27 last year. The New York Herald Tribune, another highly reputable publication, had this to say:

> The Canadian trade picture is deteriorating so quickly that it is not out of place to suggest that the government sprang the election before the situation became so serious that it could not possibly be returned at the polls. Foreign trade is that important to Canadians and to Canadian politics.

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Drew: In view of the fact that hon. members on the other side laugh I am going to read it again because it is by an independent publication:

> The Canadian trade picture is deteriorating so quickly that it is not out of place to suggest that the government sprang the election before the situation became so serious that it could not possibly be returned at the polls. Foreign trade is that important to Canadians and to Canadian politics.

Mr. Cruickshank: Were we returned?

Mr. Rowe: Do you not know?

An hon. Member: You know.

Mr. Deputy Speaker: Order.

Mr. Knowles: The people know now, to their sorrow.

Mr. Drew: Mr. Speaker, there is this resolution before the house; and the conduct of many hon. members this afternoon is a perfectly clear and vivid demonstration of the fact that unless there are some members supporting the government who are prepared to vote according to their opinions, and not according to what they are told in the study groups, there can only be a remedy to this situation by the use of this chamber as a forum through which hon. members on this side of the house can speak to the people of Canada about the danger in which our parliamentary system now lies.

This government did suppress the facts last year. What resulted is important only from the point of view of arithmetic, because it is past. But what is important is the fact that any government would hide the truth without apology to parliament or to the people, and still suggest that they kept nothing from the people of Canada. This government not only hid the combines report, this government hid the facts upon which the people could have formed an opinion. This government now seeks to hide the facts; this government is not prepared to open up some of the departments to the examination that would place before parliament and the people of Canada information which is in its possession, and which we have the right to know, to examine and to discuss, and upon that discussion to decide.

This motion is clearly a statement of principles that are in issue, and I still hope—perhaps it is a forlorn hope—that in addition to those who have indicated their support of this motion there will be others on the government side who will follow the honoured tradition and show—

Some hon. Members: Oh, oh.

Mr. Drew: Yes, the laughter, Mr. Speaker, with which that is greeted is merely an evidence that we have here rubber stamps that are not prepared to exert their opinion.

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister): Mr. Speaker, I am not going to make a long speech. We have had a speech this afternoon, much of which was amusing, some parts of which were rather insulting. After all, I do not know that there was very much accomplished here this afternoon that will tend to the betterment of the conditions of the Canadian people.

Mr. Drew: Not unless this is a free parliament.

Mr. St. Laurent: The hon. gentleman has spoken about there being no other opportunity but this forum to speak to the Canadian people. Well, if all the speeches that come from the other house are like that of this afternoon—

Mr. Drew: Are you going to have Senate reform?

Mr. St. Laurent: From the other side of the house, are like that of this afternoon, I think the hon. member who has just taken his seat will have to contemplate the possibility of the Liberal party being a very long time in office.

As to the suggestion that there has been delay, I am not complaining. I am leaving it to the public to assess the value of what has been done here today since three o'clock in the improvement of the conditions of the Canadian people. I am not complaining but I am going to state that up to the present time there have been 82 speeches on the address in reply to the speech from the throne. The official opposition is made up of 40 members. Twenty-one speeches, including that of this afternoon, have been made by them. Fortunately, they were not all the same as the one we heard this afternoon. Of the 13 members of the C.C.F. party, 11 have taken part in this debate. Of the 10 members of the Social Credit party, 8 have taken part in this debate, and of the 190 members who support the government, 40 have participated in the debate.

Mr. Casselman: Forty-one now.

Mr. St. Laurent: Forty-one with the speech I am making. That is the situation. I think there have been a good many of those speeches more concerned with partisan political warfare than with actual realizations for the benefit of the Canadian people. But that will be judged by the Canadian people themselves.

There are only two or three things to which I should like to draw attention. The hon. member spoke about twisting and quibbling. I am not going to use any adjectives to qualify the remark I wish to make; but I invite hon. members to compare what the leader of the opposition (Mr. Drew) said last evening, as reported at page 764 of Hansard, the last paragraph on the first column, with the way he tried to assert this afternoon that he had justification in a newspaper report for what he had asserted there.

Mr. Drew: I certainly had.

Mr. St. Laurent: Just make the comparison, and you will see what he was trying to justify was his assertion that the Minister of National Defence (Mr. Claxton) had said on one occasion that we had a higher percentage of jets than any country in the world. To justify that he referred to a report of the Canadian Press in which the minister is supposed to have said that 80 per cent of the appropriations voted for the air force was devoted to jet planes. That, in the hon. member's opinion, justifies the assertion he made last night.

Mr. Drew: Mr. Speaker,—

Some hon. Members: Sit down.

Mr. Drew: I rise to a question of privilege. The Prime Minister is reading from page 764. He knows perfectly well that I said on that occasion, and repeated the statement, "You said that our plans called for the highest number of jets of any country in the world," —"the highest percentage of jets in any country in the world."

Mr. St. Laurent: I leave it to the judgment of those who will make the comparison to see where there is any twisting or quibbling.

The hon. member has said that when he was acting in another capacity, and I was acting prime minister, he had written asking that the dominion-provincial conference be reconvened. Well, I may have been unfair in my appraisal of what the hon. member then wanted. I felt that what he wanted was an occasion for partisan, political warfare. It possibly was unfair to him—but you heard his speech this afternoon.

This time the dominion-provincial conference is being reconvened, and the position the hon. member then occupied is occupied by someone else who is reported in the Windsor Daily Star of yesterday to have made the following statement about the proposal to set up a committee to inquire into old age security which was so severely criticized this afternoon:

> He sympathized with the position of the teachers but the problem extended to clergymen, railwaymen, civil servants and those living on annuities, he said.
> "That is one of the reasons I would like to see the abolition of the means test," the premier said.
> He said he thought it would not be long before the means test was removed, and that he thought a House of Commons committee, such as requested recently by Hon. Paul Martin, Minister of Health and Welfare, was a good system of dealing with pension problems.

That seems to have been the statement of someone who wished to promote accomplishments rather than attempt to score in partisan, political warfare.

Then, with respect to the suggestion of labour projects being instituted at this time to deal with an abnormal, seasonal unemployment situation, the hon. member has suggested that there were hydroelectric power projects, and that there were drainage and irrigation projects. If I am not mistaken, those are matters which are of provincial responsibility and concern. It was my privilege to say on February 20 that if there were residual problems in the provinces or municipalities, the initiative with respect to them should be taken by those who had the constitutional jurisdiction to deal with them.

I am not going to attempt to make any tub-thumping speech. I am going to leave it to the house to judge on the statements which were made—even only on those made here this afternoon—as to whether or not the amendment submitted by the leader of the opposition should be accepted by the house.

The house divided on the amendment to the amendment (Mr. Coldwell) which was negatived on the following division:

Mr. Solon E. Low (Peace River): Mr. Speaker, in the normal course of events during this debate the group I represent would move an amendment. However, after the amendment was moved by the leader of the official opposition (Mr. Drew) a subamendment was moved by the leader of the C.C.F. party, and under the rules of this house we were prevented from moving a second subamendment. For that reason, if we wish to express here our precise point of view with respect to the motion for the address in reply to the speech from the throne, it is necessary for us to wait until the subamendment has been disposed of and then move another subamendment, or wait until the two amendments have been voted upon and then move a straight amendment to the motion.

I rise today for the purpose of moving a subamendment. It is our desire to place before the members of this house the specific point of view we hold with regard to the situation now existing in Canada. It is not for any purpose of delay at all. We are not going to be long in what we have to say in support of what I am going to move.

On other occasions during the past week when we have come to six o'clock or eleven o'clock Your Honour has permitted other speakers to adjourn the debate. Because I feel that what I have to say is most important and therefore should not be cut up, as it would be if I had to go on now, I would ask you to permit me to adjourn the debate.

On motion of Mr. Low the debate was adjourned.

BUSINESS OF THE HOUSE

Mr. Fournier (Hull) moved the adjournment of the house.

He said: Tomorrow we will continue this debate. If it is concluded we will take up the motion in the name of the Minister of National Health and Welfare for the setting up of a committee on old age security. If that motion is adopted we will take up the resolution in the name of the Minister of Trade and Commerce concerning the introduction of amendments to the Research Council Act.

Motion agreed to and the house adjourned at 5.55 p.m.

HOUSE OF COMMONS

Thursday, March 16, 1950

The house met at three o'clock.

THE LATE MAURICE HARTT

Right Hon. L. S. St. Laurent (Prime Minister): Before we take up the business of today I am sure that hon. members would wish that we pause for a minute or two to pay tribute to the memory of our late fellow member, Mr. Maurice Hartt, member for Cartier, who passed away suddenly yesterday at the age of fifty-four.

Mr. Hartt was born in Roumania, and came to Canada at the age of twelve. He was educated here, receiving his early training extramurally from the Presentation Brothers, and afterwards he studied at Queen's university, Kingston. He then became indentured to the late R. L. Calder, a well-known and prominent lawyer in Montreal, and he was called to the bar of the province of Quebec in 1935. He very soon became prominent in his profession there, and in 1939 he ran for the Quebec legislature and was elected. He was re-elected to that legislature in 1944, and sat there until 1947. Then a by-election became necessary in the federal constituency of Cartier, because that seat had become vacant under rather unusual circumstances. He ran as a Liberal anti-communist candidate, and as we all know, was elected with a substantial majority. He was re-elected at the last general election with a larger majority. In both these campaigns he had waged a vigorous fight against a large communistic element in that constituency. Mr. Hartt was a distinguished member of the Jewish community in Montreal. We in this house know that he was a forceful public speaker and a redoubtable parliamentary debater. His wide popularity was based on the fact that he devoted so much of his time to seeking solutions of the general and individual problems of all sections of his constituency, the majority of whom were workers in the field of labour, and were Canadians of foreign extraction.

Mr. Hartt was a member of the Montreal Reform club, the Montefiore club, and the Mount Royal club.

I am sure that hon. members generally would wish to join me in extending to his widow, to his two sons and to his many friends in Montreal and throughout Canada generally, sincere condolences on the passing of one who gave so much of his energy in championing our democratic way of life.

Mr. George A. Drew (Leader of the Opposition): Mr. Speaker, I wish to associate myself and the members of the party to which I belong with this tribute of respect to the memory of a very gallant member of this house. I use the word "gallant" advisedly, because it is well known to all hon. members that he suffered greatly during the last year and a half or more, and his illness was such as to call for a high degree of courage. His presence in this house in itself was a manifestation of that courage.

I did not have the privilege of knowing Mr. Hartt for the number of years that he was known to many other hon. members, but I do know that his industry and the stand he took on public affairs had won the regard and the admiration of members in all parts of the house. It perhaps was both natural and fitting that a man who came originally from a country which has suffered so much under the tyranny of communism should have identified himself so vigorously with a campaign against communism in this country.

In his passing this house has lost a man who, whatever other grounds of difference there might be in political opinion, certainly represented the common viewpoint in regard to the preservation of our system of democracy and the traditional institutions which we wish to preserve.
